Provisional Record

Eighty-second Session, Geneva, 1995

Note for the delegates

The Secretary-General of the Conference presents his compliments to the delegates and submits for their information the following note concerning the work of the Conference, dealing with:

- A. Material arrangements.
- B. Procedure.
- C. Subjects to be discussed by the Conference.
- D. Entertainment during the Conference.

A. Material arrangements

Place of meeting

The necessary information concerning the place of meeting, including the location of rooms, offices and services, is contained in the Guide for Delegates, which will be supplied by the Distribution Service (in the entrance hall) to members of delegations.

In the interests of the smooth running of the Conference, delegates are requested to read the Guide carefully and keep it for reference.

The main entrance to the Conference premises at the Palais des Nations is situated on the floor below the Assembly Hall, and members of delegations will enter by the door on the right-hand side of the Assembly block (Door No. 13).

Duration of meeting

The Conference will open on Tuesday, 6 June 1995, at 11 a.m., and is expected to continue until 23 June.

Registration of delegations – Quorum

On entering the Conference premises, delegates who have not already sent their registration forms should, if necessary, obtain such forms at the Information Desk and hand them in without delay to the Information Desk duly completed and signed.

The quorum is determined by the Credentials Committee on the basis of the number of delegates registered. It is therefore important that accredited delegates attending the Conference should register personally without delay, in order that the quorum may, from the beginning of the session, accurately reflect the composition of the Conference.

The information asked for on the registration form will also be required by the Secretariat of the Conference for the purpose of arranging for the distribution of documents, letters, invitations, etc., during the session and for the delivery of documents that have to be forwarded to members of delegations after the Conference is over. All members of delegations, in whatever capacity they are attending the Conference, and observers are therefore asked to give the required information on the registration form supplied to them.

Identification cards (coded badges)

The identification cards issued to members of delegations upon their registration will be coded badges to be used for the purposes of voting, which will be conducted electronically (see section entitled “Electronic voting system”).

In this connection, delegations may wish to note that members duly authorized to vote on behalf of titular delegates, either for the entire duration of the session or for a specific vote, must use their own badges for this purpose.

Participants are requested to note that strict security measures will be enforced at the entrances to the Conference premises and the Assembly Hall. The ushers on duty will ask them to produce their identification cards. Members of delegations and observers not already in possession of their identification cards should apply for them without delay to the Information Desk.

Seating arrangements for plenary sittings

Delegations of member States represented at the Conference will be accommodated as usual on the floor of the Assembly Hall and seated in the French alphabetical order of countries. Owing to the fact that the number of seats available on the floor of the Hall is barely sufficient to accommodate the delegations of member States, observers of non-member States and representatives of intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations may of necessity have to be accommodated in the fifth-floor galleries of the Assembly Hall.

List of members of delegations

A trilingual provisional list of members of delegations is distributed in time for the opening of the session. This list gives, in French alphabetical order of countries, the names and designations of the delegates and advisers as indicated in the official credentials and the names of representatives of the United Nations, specialized agencies and other official international organizations and the names of representatives or registered observers of non-governmental international organizations. A revised provisional list and a final list of members of delegations will be issued subsequently.

Programme of meetings and Daily Bulletin

Delegates may obtain information concerning the programme of the following morning's meetings by dialling the following telephone numbers each evening after 10 p.m.

English:	917 69 82
French:	917 69 83
Spanish:	917 68 44

The complete programme for each day will be published in the Daily Bulletin, which will be available at the Distribution Service from 8 a.m.

The programme of meetings will also be posted up on special notice-boards in the entrance hall of the Palais des Nations and on Floor R.3 (near the delegates' bar) of the ILO building.

No room, whether in the Palais des Nations or in the ILO building, may be used for meetings without prior authorization of the Chief of the Secretariat Services (office A-575, telephone 7-6832 and office A-577, telephone 7-6834).

Provisional Record

A Provisional Record, giving reports of all the speeches or interpretations at plenary sittings of the Conference, the texts of committee reports and other official documents of the Conference, is published in English, French and Spanish.

Delegates who wish to have corrections made to the report of their speeches as printed should communicate these to the International Labour Office (Conference Record Service) in writing not later than ten days after the close of the Conference. Such corrections will be published as an addendum to the record of the Conference.

For the sake of economy, the press-run of the Provisional Record is limited. Participants in the Conference should therefore keep their copies and refrain from asking for additional copies. As decided by the Conference in 1977, the issues reproducing debates in plenary sitting will appear after an interval which may be of up to two working days during the first part of the Conference. Thereafter, the Provisional Record of the plenary sittings of a given day will be distributed one and a half days later, during the afternoon of the following day.

Votes during plenary sittings of the Conference will be taken by means of the electronic voting system.

The electronic voting system may be used for the three types of voting procedures provided for in the Standing Orders of the Conference: by show of hands, by a record vote and by secret ballot. The "voting stations" made available to delegates or persons empowered to vote on their behalf are equipped with a screen and a keyboard. The coded badge issued to them upon registration makes it possible to operate the voting station. When inserted into the voting station, it identifies the person voting and indicates the language used by this person.

When a vote is to be held, the subject to be voted on as well as the method of voting (show of hands, record vote or secret ballot) are displayed on the screen of the voting station. Instructions regarding the next steps to be taken will also appear on the screen.

Vote by show of hands: It should be noted first of all that this type of vote will, strictly speaking, no longer be "by show of hands", but will differ from a record vote in that no record will be published as to how each delegate voted. Once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed and subsequently published with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required.

Record vote: Once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required. These indications will subsequently be published together with a list of the delegates who have voted, showing how they have voted.

Secret ballot: Once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed and subsequently published with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required. There will be absolutely no access possible to individual votes: each voting station will be equipped with a plastic cover in order to ensure the secrecy of the vote and there will be no record of how the delegates have voted.

In all three cases it is important that delegates should have previously decided whether they or another member of their delegation will exercise their right to vote in a given case and that these persons use their own badges. Where more than one vote is nevertheless cast on behalf of a delegate at two different moments or from two different places, only the first vote will be recognized, whether made by the delegate, by a substitute delegate or by an adviser who has received a specific written authorization to that end. A standard form for this purpose will, as in previous years, be at the disposal of delegates at the Information Desk which is situated in the entrance hall of the Assembly Building. Delegates may also obtain these forms at the Secretariat of the Credentials Committee or at the office of the Clerk of the Conference. These specific authorizations, which were formerly handed in to the Clerk's office, must henceforth be submitted to the Credentials Committee Secretariat preferably the day before the vote and, in any event, at least one hour before voting begins.

The names of titular and deputy Government members of Conference committees should be communicated to the Clerk's office in order to allow those members to express their vote in committees.

An information session to familiarize delegates with the functioning of the electronic voting system will be organized at the beginning of the Conference. The time, date and place of this session will be announced in the Daily Bulletin.

B. Procedure

The procedure of the Conference is governed by the Constitution of the Organization and by the Standing Orders, which are reproduced in the publication entitled Constitution of the International Labour Organization and Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference (obtainable from the Distribution Service). The following brief outline of the procedure may be helpful to members of delegations.

Group meetings

The Government, Employers' and Workers' groups will meet separately on the eve of the official opening of the Conference, to elect their own officers. They will make proposals for the nomination of the three Vice-Presidents of the Conference, as well as for the nomination of the members of the Selection Committee, the Credentials Committee and of the various committees which will be constituted by the Conference. Only accredited delegates and their advisers may be so nominated. Information concerning the manner in which these nominations should be made is given to each group during its meeting.

Opening

On the first day the Conference meets in plenary sitting. The session is opened by the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office. The Conference will then elect its President and nominate its three Vice-Presidents. In accordance with paragraph 3 of article 25 of the Standing Orders, at its first plenary sitting the Conference will also establish various committees and appoint their members on the basis of proposals made by the groups. The general debate in plenary sitting will begin at 3 p.m. on the same day and the Selection Committee will meet at 6 p.m.

Plenary sittings

The times of the plenary sittings are shown in the Daily Bulletin and on the notice-boards.

The attention of delegates is called to the resolution concerning freedom of speech of non-governmental delegates to ILO meetings, which was adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 54th Session (June 1970). In this resolution the Conference affirms the importance it attaches to the application of article 40 of the Constitution in such manner that the right of Employers' and Workers' delegates to the Conference to express themselves freely on questions within the competence of the ILO is completely safeguarded.

Committee meetings

The committees will begin their work on Wednesday, 7 June, in the morning preceded by group meetings on Tuesday, 6 June, in the afternoon.

The time and place at which the various committees will meet will be announced in the Daily Bulletin and on the notice-boards.

The procedure of committees is governed by Section H of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the text of which is contained in the publication entitled Constitution of the International Labour Organization and Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference.

In committees dealing with the items on the agenda, equal representation is given to the three groups in the Conference – Government, Employers and Workers. This is achieved by a weighting system.

At its first sitting each committee elects a Chairman. It also elects two Vice-Chairmen, chosen one from each of the other groups. The Reporter and Drafting Committee are also appointed, either at the beginning or at a later stage of the committee's work. Separate meetings of the Government, Employers' and Workers' members of the committee may be held. As far as possible these meetings are announced in the Daily Bulletin and on the notice-boards but, to ensure that they are informed, members of committees should keep in touch with the Officers of their group.

Members of delegations wishing to speak at committee meetings should send their names up to the Chairman or secretariat of the committee (especially at the early meetings; it is desirable to send up names instead of merely "catching the eye" of the Chairman). Speakers are called on in the order in which their names are received. All speeches made in English, French or Spanish will be interpreted into the other two languages; interpretation inter alia from and into Arabic, Chinese, German and Russian is also given as required.

The work of committee secretariats is facilitated if members always sit in the same places.

Amendments to proposals before a committee must be handed in to the secretariat of the committee in writing.

In the interest of smooth and speedy working, members of committees are requested to make their speeches as brief as possible.

Members of committees who are not already in possession of the reports under discussion by their committee can obtain copies from the Distribution Service. Other documents (e.g. amendments) are supplied by the committee secretariat.

Space permitting, the public is admitted to committee meetings, unless a committee decides or the Standing Orders provide otherwise.

Committee reports

The report of each committee is prepared by the Reporter and submitted in draft in the first instance to the officers of the committee and then to the committee itself. With the approval of the report the committee's work comes to an end. The report is then published in the Provisional Record and is considered by the Conference in plenary sitting; the time is announced in the Daily Bulletin and on the notice-boards. Amendments to the committee's proposals for consideration by the Conference must be given in writing to the Clerk of the Conference. In the case of a proposed Convention or Recommendation, after the committee's proposals and any amendments thereto have been discussed and voted on by the Conference in plenary sitting, the text is referred to the Drafting Committee of the Conference to be put into final form. The text prepared by the Drafting Committee is then published in the Provisional Record and the final record vote is taken in plenary sitting at a time which is announced in the Daily Bulletin and on the notice-boards.

*

Members of delegations who are in any doubt or difficulty should not hesitate to apply to the officers of their group or to the secretariat of the committee.

C. Subjects to be discussed by the Conference

Agenda

Standing items

- I. Report of the Chairman of the Governing Body and report of the Director-General.
- II. Programme and budget and other financial questions.
- III. Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations.

Items placed on the agenda by the Conference or the Governing Body

- IV. Safety and health in mines (second discussion).
- V. Home work (first discussion).
- VI. Extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), to activities in the non-commercial services sector (single discussion).

With regard to the second item on the agenda, the Conference will be called upon to examine Report II: Draft programme and budget for 1996-97 and other financial questions, as well as any further related matters that may be brought to its attention by the Governing Body.

Discussion of the report of the Chairman of the Governing Body and of the report of the Director-General

In accordance with article 12 of its Standing Orders, the Conference will discuss a report on the work of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office which will be presented by its Chairman. A report by the Director-General of the Office is also submitted to the Conference: this report is entitled Promoting employment.

The discussion of the report of the Chairman of the Governing Body and of the Director-General's report will begin in the afternoon of Tuesday, 6 June. In order to ensure the smooth working of the Conference it is most desirable that a number of speakers should be prepared to speak early in the discussion.

Delegates who wish to take part in the discussion are requested to give their names to the office of the Clerk of the Conference (room A-571, telephone 7-6828) as early as possible and in any event before the closing day for the list of speakers which will be fixed by the Selection Committee at its first sitting. They are requested to hand in eight copies of their speeches for the use of the interpreters and the Conference Record Service. A ninth copy is requested from delegates who wish their speeches to be made available to the press and radio.

Time-limit for speeches

Article 14, paragraph 6, of the Conference Standing Orders sets at ten minutes the time-limit of speeches in the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Ministers attending the Conference and delegates who wish to take part in that discussion will certainly wish to bear this provision in mind so as to avoid the risk of being asked by the President to resume their seats before they have concluded.

Other business

Standing Orders. The Conference will have before it proposals for the amendment of its Standing Orders submitted by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office. The text of the proposals appears in the Provisional Record, No. 1.

D. Entertainment during the Conference

Before deciding on a date and making arrangements for receptions, delegates should contact the Protocol Service (room A-525, telephone 7-6862), which will be pleased to help with any necessary information and advice.

Standing Orders questions

Note concerning Standing Orders questions placed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office before the Conference at its 82nd Session

I. AMENDMENTS TO THE STANDING ORDERS OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

1. The Governing Body has referred to the Conference two sets of proposed amendments to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference, the first dealing with the use of electronic voting at the Conference and the second with the composition of the Governing Body pending entry into force of the 1986 Amendment to the Constitution of the ILO.

A. Electronic voting at the International Labour Conference

2. Electronic voting has been used, on an ad hoc basis, in the plenary of the International Labour Conference since its 80th Session. At its 262nd Session (March-April 1995), the Governing Body reviewed an assessment by the Office of the electronic voting system from the angles of its practical viability, financial impact, potentials for extension and the possible codification of its use in the Standing Orders of the Conference (GB.262/LILS/1). The Office had noted that using the system for votes in plenary offered the triple advantage of speed, reliability and immediate results. It had also pointed out that the system formed part of the global Conference management system, which had achieved savings.

3. Amending the Standing Orders of the Conference to reflect the use of electronic voting would mean that the Selection Committee would no longer have to approve its use on an ad hoc basis every year. For the convenience of delegates, however, a more detailed description of the system would continue to be appended to the First Report of the Selection Committee.

4. There was general consensus in the Governing Body on amending the Standing Orders to take account of the use of electronic means in addition to the normal methods of voting (GB.262/9/1). It was understood that the system should at present be used only for votes in plenary, and would be available for any of the electoral colleges which so wished (at present the government electoral college) for the election of the members of the Governing Body and the vote to determine the order of priority for the consideration of resolutions by the Resolutions Committee. It was noted that only votes in plenary were to occur at the 82nd Session of the Conference. No decision was needed at this time on the possible extension of the system to technical committees. The Governing Body thus recommended that the Conference adopt the following amendment to add two new paragraphs to article 19 ("Methods of voting") of its Standing Orders:

"15. Unless the Officers otherwise decide in special circumstances, the Conference shall vote by electronic means.

16. When the Conference votes by electronic means, paragraphs 7 and 12 above¹ shall not apply. In the case of a vote by show of hands, the individual votes cast by the delegates shall be accessible during the sitting at which the vote is taken, but only the final result of the vote shall be announced and recorded. In the case of a record vote, the individual votes cast by the delegates shall be recorded and published and the final result of the vote shall be announced and recorded. In the case of a vote by secret ballot, the individual votes cast by the delegates shall in no case be recorded or accessible and only the final result of the vote shall be announced and recorded."

B. Interim proposals concerning the composition of the Governing Body pending the entry into force of the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the ILO, 1986

5. Following a suggestion made at the 259th Session of the Governing Body (March 1994) by the Employers' group spokesperson, the Governing Body examined at its 261st Session (November 1994) possible proposals to increase of its membership pending the entry into force of the amendment of the ILO Constitution adopted in 1986 (see GB.261/5/18). As an interim measure, the Governing Body decided to recommend a change in the Standing Orders of the Conference that would add ten deputy seats to the government group, so that the total number of members in that group (56) would be the same as provided for under the amendment. The distribution among the various regions of the 56 regular and deputy seats to be available to the government electoral college would be made in such a way that the total number of regular and deputy seats available to each region would correspond to what is foreseen in the

"7. Record votes shall be taken by calling upon each delegation voting in turn in the French alphabetical order of the names of the Members of the International Labour Organization. A further and final call shall immediately be made, in the same alphabetical order, of delegates who did not respond to the first call.

12. Votes by secret ballot shall be counted by the Secretariat under the direction of three returning officers nominated respectively by the Government, Employers' and Workers' groups."

constitutional amendment. The number of deputy members would be increased by five for the employers' group and five for the workers' group.

6. Proposals to make these increases have been examined by two Governing Body Committees: the Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards at the 261st Session in November 1994 (see GB.261/LILS/1/2 and GB.261/5/18) and the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee at the 262nd Session in March 1995 (GB.262/PFA/9). After examining a preliminary estimate of the additional travel and subsistence expenses for additional deputy members, the Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards of the Governing Body noted that the costs were outweighed by the need to properly reflect new political and economic realities in the structure of the Organization.

7. On the recommendation of its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, the Governing Body has included expenditures (US$225,000) for an increased number of deputy members in the proposed programme and budget it has presented to the current session of the Conference (GB.262/9, para. 20.2). Accordingly, the Governing Body submits for adoption by the Conference the following proposed amendments to two of the three figures appearing in Article 49, paragraph 4, and Article 50, paragraph 2, of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference:²

Article 49, paragraph 4: The Government electoral college shall also select [18] 28 other Members of the Organization, the governments of which shall be entitled to appoint deputy Government members of the Governing Body.

Article 50, paragraph 2: The Employers' and Workers' electoral colleges shall each elect by name 14 persons as regular members of the Governing Body and [14] 19 persons as deputy members of the Governing Body.

8. In approving this amendment, the Conference should take note that the ballot papers for the Government electoral college will have to be drawn up and dealt with by it in such manner as to guarantee an overall distribution of regular and deputy seats among the regions corresponding to that envisaged in the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the ILO, 1986.

II. DEROGATION FROM THE STANDING ORDERS FOR THE NEXT MARITIME SESSION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

9. Maritime Sessions of the Conference are governed by the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference, subject to the reservations that are reproduced at the end of the Standing Orders in the form of a Note for Maritime Sessions of the International Labour Conference. In deciding to hold a Maritime Session of the Conference in January 1996 (see GB.262/3), the Governing Body determined that several adjustments were needed in the plan of work and organization of that Session (see GB.262/15/4).

The financial implications of holding a Maritime Session were based on the assumption that these adjustments would be made (see GB.262/PFA/6). The Governing Body has therefore proposed these measures: (i) to forgo reports from the Chairman of the Governing Body and from the Director-General, (ii) to reassign to the officers of the Maritime Session of the Conference duties that the Selection Committee would normally perform and (iii) to change the deadline ordinarily applicable to the deposit of resolutions and credentials.³ Since some of these steps involve preparations for the Conference, they need to be provided for in advance of the Maritime Session.

10. The Governing Body has accordingly recommended submission of the following resolution to the Conference for adoption at its 82nd Session:

Draft resolution concerning provisions of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference applicable to its 83rd (Maritime) Session

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Noting the proposal to hold a special maritime session of the Conference from 9 to 23 January 1996,

Noting also that a number of adjustments need to be made to the plan of work and to the organization of proceedings at that session so as to enable it, despite the short amount of time still available and the limited duration of the maritime session, to complete its work in an efficient manner;

Decides that the following modifications of the Standing Orders of the Conference, as supplemented by the Note for Maritime Sessions of the International Labour Conference, shall apply to its 83rd (Maritime) Session, without prejudice to any measures which that session may have to take in accordance with article 76 of its Standing Orders:

- at the 83rd (Maritime) Session of the Conference, the Selection Committee foreseen in article 4 and in article 25, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders shall not be constituted: the duties normally assigned to the Selection Committee in accordance with those and other relevant provisions of the Standing Orders and with usual practice shall be assigned to the Officers of the Conference, on the understanding that it shall be for the Conference itself, at the opening of its 83rd (Maritime) Session: (i) to confer on its Officers the powers necessary to enable them to take decisions on its behalf concerning the composition of committees as well as any other uncontroversial decision relating to the organization of its proceedings or the functioning of the session; (ii) to specify the conditions governing this delegation of authority (majority necessary for decisions and publication of decisions in an appropriate manner);
- article 12 of the Standing Orders (reports of the Chairman of the Governing Body and of the Director-General) shall not apply to the 83rd (Maritime) Session of the Conference;
- the deadline for the deposit of resolutions specified in article 17, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders shall be modified to provide that only draft resolutions deposited with the Director-General of the International Labour Office by a delegate to the Conference by midnight, 11 December 1995, at the latest may be moved to the 83rd (Maritime) Session of the Conference;
- article 26, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders shall be so modified as to require that the credentials of delegates to the 83rd (Maritime) Session of the Conference and their advisers be deposited with the International Labour Office by midnight, 11 December 1995, at the latest."

III. FIFTH EUROPEAN REGIONAL CONFERENCE: PROCEDURES

11. At its 252nd Session (February-March 1992) the Governing Body approved a number of reforms in the procedure of regional conferences, based on the conclusions drawn from the reforms introduced on an experimental basis at the Eleventh Asian Regional Conference regarding the timetable and procedures. On the proposal of the Governing Body, the Conference, at its 79th (1992) and 80th (1993) Sessions, accordingly adopted resolutions providing for an interim procedural reform concerning respectively the Thirteenth Conference of American States Members of the ILO and the Eighth African Regional Conference. At its 261st Session (November 1994, GB.261/14/17), the Governing Body decided to recommend that the Conference adopt at its 82nd Session the following draft resolution, which is identical to those adopted for the two most recent Regional Conferences, in order to authorize the Fifth European Regional Conference to follow the same simplified procedure:

"The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling that, in the light of the reforms introduced on an experimental basis at the Eleventh Asian Regional Conference, the Thirteenth Conference of American States Members of the ILO and the Eighth African Regional Conference to reduce the length and cost of regional conferences, the Governing Body has decided that it is necessary to continue the experimental procedure for the Fifth European Regional Conference and that, pending revision of the Rules concerning the Powers, Functions and Procedure of Regional Conferences convened by the International Labour Organization, authority should be given to the said Conference to derogate from them, as required, to implement these changes on an experimental basis before deciding on a revision of the above-mentioned Rules;

Hereby authorizes the Fifth European Regional Conference, by way of derogation from the applicable Rules -

- (a) to consider the business carried out at preliminary group meetings preceding the formal opening of the Conference as having been carried out in official group meetings;
- (b) to dispense with the appointment of a Selection Committee and entrust its functions (except in respect of resolutions for which a Resolutions Committee may be appointed under article 13, paragraph 3, of the Rules) to the Officers of the Conference;
- (c) to limit the composition of the Resolutions Committee to not more than five members from each group;
- (d) to authorize, in case of need, any drafting subcommittee or other subsidiary body set up by a committee of the Conference to report direct to the plenary of the Conference instead of through the Committee;
- (e) to suspend the requirement that reports concerning technical items on the agenda be dispatched by the Office so as to reach governments at least three months before the opening of the Conference if any such report is included in a single volume with the other reports of the Director-General, which would thus be required to reach governments two months beforehand;
- (f) to reduce the time-limit on addresses to the Conference from 15 to ten minutes."

12. The Standing Orders Committee may accordingly wish to recommend to the Conference that it:

- (a) adopt new paragraphs 15 and 16 to be added to Article 19 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference, as indicated in paragraph 4 above;
- (b) adopt the new figures indicated in paragraph 7 above for insertion in paragraph 4 of Article 49 and paragraph 2 of Article 50 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference with and take note of the need for the government electoral college to make appropriate arrangements with respect to the ballot as indicated in paragraph 8 above;
- (c) adopt the resolution set forth in paragraph 10, relating to a derogation from the Standing Orders applicable to the next Maritime Session of the International Labour Conference; and
- (d) adopt the resolution set forth in paragraph 11 concerning procedures for the Fifth European Regional Conference.

Provisional Record

Report of the Chairman of the Governing Body to the Conference for the year 1994-95

The present report on the work of the Governing Body is submitted to the Conference in accordance with article 14 of the Standing Orders of the Governing Body. It covers the period since the last (June 1994) Session of the Conference, i.e. the Governing Body's 260th (June 1994), 261st (November 1994) and 262nd (March-April 1995) Sessions. This report is somewhat less detailed than in the past, as it focuses only on the highlights of the Governing Body's year, and does not cover matters that are otherwise before the Conference. The notes at the end of the report provide references to more detailed information on the matters discussed. Those wishing more extensive and detailed information on the work of the Governing Body as a whole are invited to consult the Records of Decisions of the Governing Body's sessions, the minutes of its proceedings, or the documents submitted to its committees and to the Governing Body itself.

WORLD SUMMIT FOR SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Quite clearly the most significant event of the previous year in the United Nations system and for the international community as a whole as regards social affairs was the World Summit for Social Development, held in Copenhagen in March.¹ The ILO was closely involved in preparations for the Summit: it submitted papers to the Preparatory Committee meeting, including a paper entitled Towards full employment, which had been reviewed at the International Labour Conference last year by the Informal Tripartite Meeting at the Ministerial Level on Employment. The Governing Body adopted two statements concerning the World Summit for Social Development, as well as a list of points for inclusion in the draft Declaration and Programme of Action, which were also submitted to the Preparatory Committee, together with the resolution concerning the World Summit for Social Development adopted by the International Labour Conference last year.

A tripartite ILO delegation, headed by the Director-General, attended the Summit, which had before it a draft Declaration and a draft Programme of Action which had been elaborated by the Preparatory Committee. These drafts contained texts in parentheses on contentious issues which it had not been possible to resolve during the Preparatory Committee's meeting in January, and which were referred to the Summit for further negotiation.

The Director-General addressed the Summit during the initial general exchange of views on 9 March, when the theme was "Productive employment and the reduction of unemployment". The Summit's main committee examined and resolved the outstanding issues in the draft texts, and finally the Summit held a meeting of heads of state and of government prior to the adoption of the final texts.

At its 262nd Session, in March, the Governing Body welcomed the recognition given by the Summit to the special role to be played by the ILO, "because of its mandate, its tripartite structure and its expertise", in contributing to the implementation of the Programme of Action in the fields of employment and social development. It requested the Director-General to ensure that the ILO's research, operational and standard-setting activities are closely geared to contributing to the implementation of the Declaration and Programme of Action in the fields of competence of the ILO, in cooperation, where appropriate, with other international organizations; it also requested him to inform the Secretary-General of the ILO's wish that it be fully associated in any monitoring and reporting arrangements on the effect given to the Declaration and Programme of Action in its fields of competence, and to submit to the Governing Body at its 264th Session, in November 1995, detailed proposals concerning the action to be taken by the ILO in giving effect to the Declaration and Programme of Action adopted by the World Summit for Social Development, taking into account any decisions that will have been taken by ECOSOC or any other competent organs of the UN system concerning follow-up on the Summit.

The conclusions of the Summit provided major guidance for the Governing Body's consideration of the Director-General's Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97.

WORKING PARTY ON THE SOCIAL DIMENSIONS OF THE LIBERALIZATION OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE²

The adoption of the Final Act embodying the results of the Uruguay round of multilateral trade negotiations in Marrakesh prompted many speakers in the general discussion at the Conference last year to raise the issue of the social dimensions of the liberalization of international trade, its implications for the work of the ILO and its potential for economic development. Responsive to those concerns, at its session immediately following last year's Conference the Governing Body decided, at the suggestion of the Director-General, to set up a Working Party on the Social Dimensions of the Liberalization of International Trade, with a mandate to discuss all relevant aspects of the issue. In order to ensure a full and free discussion of the issues involved, participation in the Working Party was made open to all members of the Governing Body. At both its sessions in the past year the Working Party held extensive discussions on papers prepared by the Office on the subject, which examined various aspects of this broad issue and provided useful background material.

At its 262nd Session, the Working Party considered a set of conclusions, and the Governing Body noted that, at its 264th Session (November 1995), the Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards would resume its discussion concerning the promotion of basic human rights Conventions, and that the Director-General would submit a paper to the Governing Body on the strengthening of the ILO's standards supervisory system. It endorsed the Working Party's recommendation that a paper concerning child labour should be submitted to the Committee on Employment and Social Policy. The Governing Body further agreed that the Working Party would meet again at the Governing Body's 264th Session (November 1995) and continue its discussion.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

Date, place and agenda of a maritime session of the Conference

On the basis of the report of the Tripartite Meeting on Maritime Labour Standards,³ the Governing Body has decided that a maritime session of the Conference shall be held in Geneva from 9 to 23 January 1996, with the following agenda:

1. Revision of the Labour Inspection (Sea) Recommendation, 1926 (No. 28);
2. Revision of the Wages, Hours of Work and Manning (Sea) Convention (Revised), 1958 (No. 109), and Recommendation, 1958 (No. 109);
3. Revision of the Placing of Seamen Convention, 1920 (No. 9);
4. Partial revision of the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147).

In view of the limited duration of the maritime session (15 calendar days), in order to enable it to complete its work in an efficient manner the Governing Body has proposed to the Conference at its present session a set of modifications to the Standing Orders of the Conference to apply to its 83rd (Maritime) Session, which are referred in the first instance to the Standing Orders Committee.⁴

Date, place and agenda of the 1997 session of the Conference

The Governing Body decided that, in addition to the standing items which the Conference would have before it, the following technical items should be placed on the agenda of the 1997 Session of the Conference:

- (a) revision of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96);
- (b) general conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises;
- (c) contract labour.

Special sitting

The Governing Body has decided to hold a special sitting of the Conference at its present session to consider the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, along the same lines as the special sittings organized at previous sessions of the Conference.⁵ In taking this decision, however, in view of the expected continuing improvement in the situation of the workers of the occupied territories, it was understood that this would be the last occasion on which such a special sitting would be held.

Electronic voting

In view of experience with the new electronic voting system that has been in operation at the Conference since 1993, the Governing Body has recommended to the Conference at its present session an amendment to the Conference Standing Orders to establish rules for the conduct of votes and the publication of the results of different types of votes. These amendments are referred in the first instance to the Conference Standing Orders Committee.

Renovation of the Assembly Hall at the Palais des Nations

The United Nations intends to embark shortly on a programme for the renovation of this Assembly Hall, which will inevitably have consequences for the Conference in the future.⁶ This will cause some inconvenience: in particular, for security reasons it will no longer be possible to accommodate all the national delegations in the body of the Assembly Hall, and some will inevitably have to sit in the galleries on a rotating basis, for which purpose lifts will be installed. Nevertheless, after a thorough examination of the question and of alternative solutions, the Governing Body decided that the Conference should continue to meet here in the Palais des Nations, despite the space and safety constraints that will apply as from next year.

INTERIM PROPOSALS CONCERNING THE COMPOSITION OF THE GOVERNING BODY PENDING THE ENTRY INTO FORCE OF THE INSTRUMENT FOR THE AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE ILO, 1986

In view of the possibility that the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the ILO will not have come into force by the time the next elections to the Governing Body are held at the Conference in June 1996, the Governing Body has submitted to the Conference at its present session proposals for amendments to the Standing Orders of the Conference to allow for an increase in the composition of the Governing Body.⁷

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR STANDARDS

Follow-up on the discussions concerning international labour standards at the 81st Session (1994) of the International Labour Conference

In response to the resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation, adopted by the Conference last year, and the Conference discussion of the Director-General's report to that session of the Conference,⁸ in November the Governing Body examined a paper⁹ prepared by the Office covering the issues and questions raised in discussions at the Conference with a view to adapting the ILO's working practices and methods in the area of standard setting. The paper discussed, inter alia, the role of standard setting, prospects for new standards, the revision of existing ones, adoption procedures, problems of ratification, evaluation of their effectiveness, possibilities for consolidation, and ways of enhancing the supervisory system.

After reviewing that paper, the Governing Body requested, and examined at its 262nd Session, two papers on standard-setting policy, dealing respectively with the revision of international labour standards¹⁰ and the promotion of basic human rights Conventions.¹¹

An extensive and detailed discussion followed in the Governing Body's Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards, which culminated in the Committee's establishing a Working Party, which will meet for the first time in November 1995 with a mandate to examine the questions raised in the Office paper on the revision of standards. The Committee was unable to complete its work on the paper concerning the promotion of basic human rights Conventions, to which it will now return in November, when the Director-General will also submit a paper to the Governing Body itself on the strengthening of the ILO's standards supervisory system.

Freedom of association

The Governing Body was deeply saddened this year by the death of Professor Roberto Ago, who had chaired its Committee on Freedom of Association without interruption since 1961. To replace him as independent Chairman of the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Governing Body has appointed Professor Max Rood, Professor of Labour Law at the University of Leyden in the Netherlands, who is known to many Conference delegates as an active member and former Chairman of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards. The Committee on Freedom of Association itself continued to register a high number of complaints dealing with complex industrial relations and human rights issues, and its workload has remained heavy.¹²

Constitutional procedures

During the past year the Governing Body has received a large number of representations submitted by industrial associations under article 24 of the ILO Constitution. In November it declared receivable and established committees to deal with seven such representations, concerning Congo, Costa Rica, France, Nicaragua, Paraguay, Peru and Uruguay; it referred to its Committee on Freedom of Association a representation concerning Turkey. The Governing Body also took a number of decisions regarding a representation alleging the non-observance by Myanmar of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), which had been referred to a tripartite committee of its members. The Governing Body urged the Government of Myanmar to amend its labour legislation, to repeal the power to impose compulsory labour and to punish those resorting to coercion in the recruitment of labour.¹³

The Governing Body also decided that no further action was necessary on the complaint submitted under article 26 of the ILO Constitution by the Employers' delegate of Sweden at the 78th Session (1991) of the Conference, concerning the observance by Sweden of Conventions Nos. 87, 98 and 147.¹⁴

EMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL POLICY

The Governing Body's Committee on Employment and Social Policy held discussions in November 1994 on the ILO's role in relation to structural adjustment, further developing its approach to this issue and reviewing recent developments regarding collaboration with the Bretton Woods institutions.¹⁵ At that session it also examined the changing role of women in the economy, its implications for further ILO action, taking into account considerations of efficiency, growth, equity and social justice.¹⁶

The International Conference on Population and Development, held in Cairo in September last year, was also the subject of a report submitted to the Committee on Employment and Social Policy in November.¹⁷ The ILO provided technical input and substantive contributions to the preparatory work of the Conference. The Committee examined the implications for the ILO of the Programme of Action adopted by the Conference, which calls for the application of human rights standards to all aspects of population programmes.

In November the Governing Body also considered the conclusions and recommendations concerning employment, investment and enterprise development policies adopted by the tripartite ILO seminar on the socio-economic implications of the devaluation of the CFA franc for French-speaking African countries, held in Dakar in October 1994 in response to the resolution adopted by the Eighth African Regional Conference.¹⁸ The Governing Body invited the Director-General to bear them in mind in current and future activities and to draw them to the attention of the countries concerned.

In March the Committee's discussions were centred on a second paper concerning industrial relations and employment,¹⁹ which covered the dimension of human resource management and the role of labour market institutions, examining the issues particularly in terms of their impact on the quantity and quality of employment.²⁰

In March the Governing Body also briefly discussed the ILO publication entitled World Employment 1995, an abridged version of which is before the Conference as the Report of the Director-General under the title Promoting employment.

TECHNICAL COOPERATION

Through its Committee on Technical Cooperation, in November the Governing Body conducted its annual review of ILO technical cooperation during the previous year.²¹ This annual report prepared by the Office examines the salient features of the programme and trends in different regions, reviews the activities themselves and offers an assessment of the outlook for the future.

At that session the ILO's strategy for technical cooperation was also examined by the Governing Body's Committee on Technical Cooperation.²² Taking into account the conclusions concerning the role of the ILO in technical cooperation adopted by the Conference in 1993, the Committee surveyed the changing environment of technical cooperation, especially the changing perceptions and expectations of ILO constituents and donors' changing view of the development agenda. The ILO's strategy on technical cooperation is based on the three guiding principles that technical cooperation should be demand-driven, should aim to promote the ILO's values, and should respond positively to donors' calls for the specialized agencies to become "centres of excellence". The Committee considered ways of improving the ILO's delivery system and pursuing a dynamic resource mobilization strategy. The modality of follow-up on the strategy paper and the review of ILO technical cooperation in general were also discussed.

The Committee also conducted a review of specific ILO technical cooperation projects concerned with the working poor,²³ reviewed developments concerning technical cooperation in the United Nations system,²⁴ and examined progress in the implementation of the active partnership policy and the work of the multidisciplinary teams.²⁵

SECTORAL ACTIVITIES

The Governing Body undertook an evaluation of the Sectoral Activities Programme, based on the findings of a working party of its Committee on Sectoral and Technical Meetings and Related Issues.²⁶ In particular, the Governing Body adopted a new classification of sectors that better reflected economic realities and which were intended as the core of the programme of sectoral activities.²⁷ It took a decision on the structure and functioning of sectoral meetings,²⁸ and requested proposals for a new set of Standing Orders for sectoral meetings to be submitted to its Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards in November.

The Governing Body also took decisions on a number of topics for sectoral meetings to be included in the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97.²⁹

REGIONAL CONFERENCES

The Fifth European Regional Conference, to be held in Warsaw in September, will mark the end of the experimental cycle of ILO regional conferences held under the revised arrangements. In November the Governing Body will review the operation of the new arrangements before making a final decision on the revision of the functioning of regional conferences. For this reason, the Governing Body chose only the technical item for inclusion in the agenda of the Twelfth Asian Regional Conference: Challenges for Asian labour markets and labour administrations for ensuring employment and social protection in the context of structural change, on the broad understanding that the Conference would focus on the identification of suitable elements and strategies for active labour market policies that promote employment opportunities while ensuring appropriate levels of labour protection and security.³⁰ The other items on its agenda will be decided once the new arrangements have been finalized.

APPOINTMENTS

The Governing Body has during the past year taken note of the appointment of Ms. Katherine Ann Hagen (United States) as Deputy Director-General, and of Mr. Hans Hammar (Sweden) and Mr. Elias Mabere (United Republic of Tanzania) as Assistant Directors-General.

Notes

(1) Cambodia. These figures result from the application on a provisional basis of an agreement under which Cambodia would settle its arrears of contributions accumulated to the end of 1994 over a period of 20 years, which is being submitted to the current (82nd) session of the International Labour Conference.

(2) Paraguay. The International Labour Conference at its 78th (1991) Session approved an arrangement for the settlement by Paraguay of its arrears of contributions accumulated to the end of 1990 and decided that Paraguay should be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution. Paraguay has complied with the terms of its arrangement and has the right to vote. Paraguay also owes 245,066 Swiss francs in respect of contributions to the ILO and other League of Nations organizations for the period prior to 1939. The Conference at its 45th (1961) Session decided that these arrears should be cancelled, such cancellation to become effective on the payment by Paraguay of all its arrears of contributions due since 5 September 1956, the date when Paraguay rejoined the Organization.

(3) Poland. The 75th (1988) Session of the International Labour Conference approved an arrangement for the settlement by Poland of its arrears of contributions accumulated to the end of 1987 and decided that Poland should be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution. Poland has complied with the terms of its arrangement and has the right to vote.

(4) Chad. The 69th (1983) Session of the International Labour Conference approved an arrangement for the settlement by Chad of its arrears of contributions accumulated to the end of 1982 and also decided that Chad should be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution. Chad failed to comply with the terms of the arrangement in 1993, and lost the right to vote on 1 January 1994.

(5) Albania. These figures reflect an arrangement approved by the 81st (1994) Session of the International Labour Conference for the settlement of the amount of 135,142 Swiss francs due in respect of Albania's previous membership of the ILO over a period of 12 years by the payment of 11 equal annual instalments of 11,262 Swiss francs and a final instalment of 11,260 Swiss francs, with the arrangement coming into force as from 1 January 1994, and with the first of the 12 annual instalments being payable in 1994.

(6) Viet Nam. These figures reflect an arrangement approved by the 81st (1994) Session of the International Labour Conference for the settlement of the amount of 182,960 Swiss francs due in respect of Viet Nam's previous membership in the ILO over a period of 15 years by the payment of 14 equal annual instalments of 12,190 Swiss francs and a final fifteenth instalment of 12,300 Swiss francs, beginning in 1993.

Further information and proposals submitted by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to the 82nd Session of the Conference	1

Reports of the Selection Committee

First report

1. Election of the Officers of the Committee

The Selection Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman: Mr. K.A. Khan (Government, Pakistan)

Employers' Vice-Chairman: Mr. A. M'Kaissi (Tunisia)

Workers' Vice-Chairman: Mr. W. Brett (United Kingdom).

2. Discussion of the Reports of the Chairman of the Governing Body and the Director-General: closing date for the list of speakers

The Selection Committee has decided that the list of speakers will be closed on Wednesday, 14 June at 12 noon, under the usual conditions.

3. Plan of work of Conference committees

The Selection Committee endorsed a draft plan of work for committees, which would not be binding but would enable them, in organizing their work, to take maximum possible account of the overall needs and possibilities of the Conference. The plan is attached in tabular form for the information of the Conference (Appendix II).

4. Electronic voting at the Conference

A system of electronic voting has been used at the Conference at its last two sessions.

Based on experience at those sessions, the Governing Body is proposing to the Conference at its present session a number of amendments to the Conference Standing Orders to introduce specific rules for the conduct of votes and publication of their results. These amendments are referred in the first instance to the Standing Orders Committee.

Pending a decision by the Conference on the recommendations of the Standing Orders Committee, the Selection Committee recommends that the Conference decide that, unless the Officers of the Conference otherwise decide for a given question or a given sitting, the different methods of voting set out in article 19 of the Standing Orders shall be implemented in the plenary by means of the electronic system of voting outlined in Appendix I.

A description of the electronic voting system is attached in Appendix I.

5. Suggestions to facilitate the work of the Conference

(a) Quorum

As in previous years, the Selection Committee invites the Conference to confirm the following principles:

- (i) the quorum will be fixed provisionally, on the basis of the credentials received, in the brief report of the Chairman of the Governing Body on the day before the opening of the Conference, which is appended to the record of the first sitting of the Conference. This provisional quorum will remain unchanged until the Credentials Committee determines the quorum on the basis of registrations, it being understood that, if an important vote were to take place in the initial stages of the Conference (once the Credentials Committee has been appointed), the Conference might request the Credentials Committee to determine the quorum in an urgent report;
- (ii) thereafter, the quorum will be adjusted, under the authority of the Credentials Committee, so as to take into account new registrations and notices of departure from delegates leaving the Conference;
- (iii) delegates should register immediately on arrival, since the quorum is calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered;
- (iv) acceptance of appointment as a delegate implies an obligation to be available in Geneva personally or through an adviser authorised to act as a substitute for the work of the Conference until its end, since important votes often take place on the last day;
- (v) delegates who are nevertheless obliged to leave the Conference before it finishes should give notice of their forthcoming departure to the secretariat of the Conference. (The form provided for indicating their date of departure also enables them to authorise an adviser to act and to vote in their place.) At group meetings held during the second half of the Conference the attention of members of the groups will be drawn to the importance of completing and handing in this form;
- (vi) in addition, one Government delegate of a country may report the departure of the other Government delegate, and the Secretaries of the Employers' and Workers' groups may also give notice of the final departure of members of their groups who have not authorised advisers to act in their place;
- (vii) when a record vote is taken in plenary while committees are sitting, delegates are both entitled and expected to leave committees to vote unless they are replaced by a substitute in plenary. Announcements are made in the committees to ensure that all delegates are aware that a record vote is about to take place. Appropriate arrangements will be made for committees meeting in the ILO building.

(b) Punctuality

The Selection Committee recommends the Conference to ask committee chairmen to start proceedings very punctually — except where a technical section has not yet completed its preliminary discussions — irrespective of the number of persons present, but on condition that votes will not be taken unless a quorum is clearly present.

(c) Negotiations

In order to facilitate more continuous negotiation in committees between the different groups, representatives of each group should meet with the chairman and reporter of the committee and with the representative of the Secretary-General, whenever this is desirable, to ensure that the leaders of each group know fully the minds of their colleagues in the other groups; normally such meetings are held before each group has committed itself to a definite position. The function of these informal meetings is to afford opportunities for a fuller understanding of differences of view before definite positions have crystallized.

Members having lost the right to vote

At its 239th Session (February-March 1988), the Governing Body considered the implications of the appointment, as regular members of Conference committees, of representatives of a member State which had lost the right to vote under article 13, paragraph 4 of the Constitution of the ILO. It noted that, while the appointment of employers' and workers' representatives from such a State had no practical implications, because the employers' and workers' groups operated an effective system under article 56, paragraph 5(b) of the Conference Standing Orders for ensuring that deputy members of a committee voted in the place of regular members deprived of the right to vote, the same was not true of the Government group. As a result, if a Government that has lost the right to vote is appointed as a regular member of a committee, the distribution of votes between the three groups is distorted because the weighting of votes is based on the full regular membership and in practice the Government regular members of committees who are unable to vote do not make use of the possibility afforded by article 56, paragraph 5(a) of appointing a deputy member to vote in their place.

The Governing Body accordingly recommended that, in order to avoid such distortions, members of the Government group should not apply for regular membership of committees if they were not at the time in question entitled to vote. Should this practice, which has been maintained at all sessions of the Conference since 1987, for any reason not be fully respected, the weighting coefficients in committees should be calculated on the basis of the number of Government members entitled to vote.

The Selection Committee accordingly recommends to the Conference that the calculation of weighting coefficients for votes in committees should be based on the number of regular Government members entitled to vote.

The electronic voting system takes account of this practice.

7. Request by a non-member State to be represented by a delegation of observers at the 82nd (1995) Session of the Conference

The Secretary-General has received a letter dated 18 April 1995 from the Ambassador, Permanent Representative of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to the United Nations Office in Geneva, requesting on behalf of the Government of that country an invitation to be represented by a delegation of observers at the present session of the Conference.

The Governing Body has authorized the Director-General to invite the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to be represented at several sessions of the Conference since the 70th (1984) Session, in accordance with article 2, paragraph 3(e) of the Conference Standing Orders.

The Selection Committee recommends that the Conference authorize the Secretary-General to invite the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to be represented at the 82nd (1995) Session of the Conference, in accordance with article 2, paragraph 3(e) of the Conference Standing Orders.

8. Requests for representation in Conference committees submitted by non-governmental international organizations

In accordance with article 2, paragraph 3(j) of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Officers of the Governing Body have decided to invite certain non-governmental international organizations to be represented at the 82nd (1995) Session of the Conference, it being understood that it would be for the Selection Committee of the Conference to consider their requests to participate in the work of the committees dealing with items on the agenda in which they have expressed a particular interest.

The provision of the Standing Orders of the Conference which is relevant to such requests is article 56, paragraph 9. In accordance with that article the Selection Committee recommends to the Conference that the following organizations be invited to be represented in the Committees stated:

The Selection Committee took note that the Officers of the Governing Body had invited the African Commission for Health and Human Rights Promoters and the European Trade Union Confederation to be represented at the Conference in accordance with article 2, paragraph 3(j) of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

9. Debate on the draft programme and budget

The Selection Committee has decided that the Conference should hold a brief debate in plenary sitting this afternoon, Wednesday 7 June, to examine the draft programme and budget for 1996-97.

10. Consideration of the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories

On the basis of proposals submitted to it by the Director-General at the invitation of the Governing Body, the Selection Committee has decided to convene a special sitting for the discussion of the Appendix to the Director-General's Report dealing with the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, it being understood that speakers will have to confine their remarks at that sitting to this Appendix and that, conversely, that subject will not be discussed in the framework of the discussion on the remainder of the Report. It decided that the special sitting should be held in the afternoon of Thursday, 15 June.

In addition, the Selection Committee recommends that the Conference allow speakers who so wish to take the floor both on the General Report and during the special sitting, it being understood that the subject to be discussed in that sitting would not be discussed in the debate on the remainder of the Report.

It should be recalled in this connection that, according to Article 14, paragraph 6 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the time-limit for speeches is a matter for the Conference to decide on the proposal of its Officers. For this reason the Selection Committee invites the President to submit to the Conference, after consulting the Vice-Presidents, a proposal concerning the duration of speeches in the special sitting, taking due account of the number of speakers registered. For this purpose the Selection Committee has decided that the list of speakers for the special sitting will be closed at 6 pm on Tuesday, 13 June.

The Selection Committee noted that the Director-General intended to devote part of his reply to the discussion of his Report to the lessons to be drawn from the special sitting.

Lastly, the Selection Committee decided that the Finance Committee should not meet at the same time as the special sitting.

11. Composition of the Credentials Committee

The Selection Committee proposes to the Conference that the three members of the Credentials Committee should be the following:

Government member:	Mr. Jonzon (Sweden)
Employers' Vice-Chairman:	Mr. Funes de Rioja (Argentina)
Workers' Vice-Chairman:	Mr. Gray (United States).

12. Appointment of the Conference Drafting Committee

The Selection Committee recommends that, in accordance with the provisions of article 6, paragraph 1 of the Standing Orders, the Conference Drafting Committee should be composed as follows:

The President of the Conference
The Secretary-General of the Conference
The Legal Adviser of the Conference
The Director of the International Labour Standards Department
The Deputy Legal Adviser of the Conference.

13. Composition of committees

The full lists of the composition of committees are given in Appendix III.

Signed

K.A. Khan,
Chairman

Geneva, 6 June 1995.

Appendix I

Description of the electronic voting system

The electronic system provides for votes (in most cases: yes, no, abstention) to be expressed by means of a keyboard on a "voting station" that will be made available to all delegates or persons empowered to vote on their behalf.

Where the electronic system is used, the subject and question to be voted on will be displayed, as well as the nature of the vote (show of hands, record vote or secret ballot) and the President or Chairman will announce the beginning of the vote. After the President or Chairman has made sure that all delegates have been given sufficient opportunity to record their vote in one of the voting stations available to them, the President or Chairman will announce the closure of the vote.

Where the method of vote is by show of hands, once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed and subsequently published with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required.

Where a record vote is taken, once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required. These indications will subsequently be published together with a list of the delegates who have voted, showing how they have voted.

In the case of a secret ballot, once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed and subsequently published with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required. There will be absolutely no access possible to individual votes nor any record of how the delegates have voted.

It is important that, as at present, delegates should have previously decided whether they or another member of their delegation will exercise their right to vote in a given case. Where more than one vote is nevertheless cast on behalf of a delegate at two different moments or from two different places, only the first vote will be recognized, whether made by a delegate, by a substitute delegate or by an adviser who has received a specific written authorization to that end. Such specific authorizations must reach the secretariat sufficiently before the opening of voting is announced so as to be duly recorded.

Eighty-second Session, Geneva, 1995

First sitting

Tuesday, 6 June 1995, 11.15 a.m.

Presidents: Mrs. Roldan-Confesor, Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and Mr. Rosales Argüello.

OPENING OF THE SESSION

Mrs. ROLDAN-CONFESOR (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – It is a privilege to welcome all of you to the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

I would like to report that two more sovereign States have joined our Organization since the last session of the Conference, namely the Gambia and Saint Vincent and the Grenadines. We are now an organization of some 173 member States. I am sure that all of you join me in extending our warmest welcome to the Gambia and to Saint Vincent and the Grenadines and their respective delegations to this Conference. With this development, I am told that the African continent can rightfully claim the distinction of being the first continent wherein all sovereign States are Members of our Organization and are likewise members of the United Nations – of course, with the exception of Australia which is a continent all by itself.

We start this session of the Conference today barely one year from the commemoration of the 75th anniversary of our Organization. Within that short span of one year, the GATT 1994, the results of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations came into force and took effect on 1 January of this year. The hope has been expressed that the era of expanded trade liberalization expected to be ushered in by the GATT 1994 would further stimulate worldwide economic growth. I certainly share that hope as do many of you. At the same time, however, we in this Organization realize that economic growth per se, particularly of the kind indispensably relying predominantly on market forces, does not necessarily ensure the promotion of social justice. Market forces per se are essentially neutral – neither inherently good nor inherently bad – impersonal, indifferent to right or wrong and by conceptual necessity oblivious to the concerns of social justice. On the other hand, social justice, which is our paramount concern, is a highly subjective and moral concern. We in this Organization reject economic growth attained at the expense of social justice. We reject, as many of you have already stated, economic growth which cannot be translated to the level of the individual human being, enhancing his ability to live with the dignity to which he is entitled by the mere fact of his existence. If left entirely by itself, the impersonal market will go where it pleases; it will serve whom it pleases; social justice therefore will not be part of that agenda. Today, therefore, when capital investments and production can be shifted from one country to another within progressively shorter time-spans the existence of this Organization is more relevant than ever.

I started by welcoming the Gambia and Saint Vincent and the Grenadines to our Organization this morning. Allow me to go back to this phenomenon. The African continent is composed mainly, if not totally, of developing countries. The Gambia and Saint Vincent and the Grenadines are developing countries. I am also from a developing country. I trust that you will indulge me if I attribute added significance to an event involving an entire developing region as well as an entire developing nation. To my mind, this development is a clear manifestation of the recognition by the developing countries of the importance and continuing relevance of this Organization as well. In singling out developing countries it is not my intention of course to allude to the North-South divide. Neither is it my intention to imply in any manner that industrialized countries do not likewise recognize the importance and continuing relevance of our Organization. I say this only in the context that after all this Organization was established more than 75 years ago precisely by industrialized countries. Our founding fathers had the vision of spreading the promotion of social justice to all countries not only because it was morally right but likewise for the very pragmatic reason, as later on succinctly highlighted in the Declaration of Philadelphia, that poverty anywhere constitutes a threat to prosperity elsewhere. The recognition of the validity of this vision of our founding fathers is now of course almost universal. For indeed, although much remains to be done, much has been accomplished by way of promotion of social justice and the defence of prosperity. It is my firm belief likewise that these accomplishments would not have been possible had it not been for the existence and efforts of the Organization as well as of the individual member States that compose it. Thus, whenever social justice is being promoted with vigour in any part of the world today this Organization might as well say that it has contributed in no small measure to such promotion.

In the same manner, wherever there is prosperity in the world today our Organization has likewise contributed in no small measure in promoting, protecting or at the very least defending prosperity. This I believe we all know and realize almost instinctively. Nevertheless, it bears emphasizing even if only to prevent ourselves from yielding to the altogether only human tendency to take things for granted, and more so particularly in these times when governments, perhaps without exception, are confronted with serious financial difficulties. The tendency to take things for granted is even further amplified by the inherent impossibility of quantifying in monetary terms such concepts as the promotion of social justice and the defence of prosperity. And that is where the difficulty lies.

But I am certain that if these concepts could be quantified, it could most definitely be said in the objective and business-like idiom that is a sign of our times that the cost-benefit ratio to mankind has been, is, and will continue to be favourable. The seemingly isolated yet deliberate act of two developing countries, therefore, in joining our Organization in these very difficult times would, I hope, serve as a timely reminder to those of us who have joined our Organization earlier that our unwavering commitment to the ILO continues to be very relevant, valid, justified and imperative.

I now declare formally open the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

SUBMISSION OF THE ANNUAL REPORT OF THE GOVERNING BODY TO THE CONFERENCE BY THE CHAIRMAN OF THE GOVERNING BODY

Mrs. ROLDAN-CONFESOR (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – As Chairman of the Governing Body I have the honour to present to you the report on the work of the Governing Body during the year 1994-95 which is contained in Provisional Record No. 2.

Allow me to refer all of you to this report. The main highlight for social affairs was the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen in March this year. The ILO was represented by a tripartite Governing Body delegation and by the Director-General who addressed the Summit. Recognition was given by the Summit to the special role to be played by the ILO “because of its mandate, its tripartite structure and its expertise” in contributing to the implementation of the programme of action adopted by the Summit in the fields of employment and social development. The Governing Body took appropriate decisions on follow-up action by the ILO on this Summit. This follow-up action is a matter which, I trust, will continue to be accorded utmost priority by the Governing Body. The Governing Body also established a Working Party on the Social Dimensions of the Liberalization of International Trade in response to the many statements made by our speakers at the International Labour Conference last year on the implications of the conclusion of the Uruguay Round of GATT multilateral trade negotiations. The Working Party has an open composition and has the mandate to discuss all relevant aspects of the issue. Its discussions have been extensive to say the least, touching on all aspects of the Organization’s activities. Because of the importance and the delicate nature of the subject the Governing Body has decided it will continue to discuss the matter. Records of the proceedings have been issued or are in preparation and I would like to refer each one of you to them for further details, especially in the discussions.

The Governing Body decided that a Maritime Session of the Conference would be held in January 1996 with an agenda that consists of the revision, or allows the revision of four maritime Conventions. The Governing Body also decided on the agenda of the 1977 Session of the Conference, that is the year after next, placing three technical items on the agenda, namely, first, the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96); second, the general conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises; and third, on contract labour.

The resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation adopted by the Conference last year prompted the Governing Body to examine the issues raised in the resolution and in discussions of the Conference with a view to adapting the ILO’s working practices and methods in the area of standard setting. The Governing Body also reviewed an Office paper on the subject and examined two other papers on standard-setting policy dealing with the revision of international labour standards and of course the promotion of basic human rights Conventions. The outcome of these discussions has been the establishment of a working party on policy regarding the revision of the standards which will meet for the first time in November later this year with a mandate to examine the questions that have been raised in the Office paper.

The Governing Body paid tribute in April to Professor Roberto Ago who died earlier this year. Professor Ago had chaired the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body since 1991. As his successor, the Governing Body has appointed Mr. Max Rood, Professor of Labour Law at the University of Leiden in the Netherlands who is known to many Conference delegates as an active member and former chairman of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards.

As you are no doubt aware, elections to the Governing Body will be held at the Conference next year. In view of the possibility that the instrument for the amendment of the Constitution of the ILO will not have come into force by then the Governing Body has submitted to the Conference at its present session proposals for amendments to the Standing Orders of the Conference to allow for an increase in the composition of the Governing Body. An increase of 20 additional deputy members is being proposed to you, ten for government, five for employers and five for workers. This proposed increase would render representation in the Governing Body, it is noted, even more equitable.

Other sections of the Governing Body’s report to the Conference concern the work of its various committees. The Committee on Employment and Social Policy continued its discussions on structural adjustments, focusing this year on the ILO’s role in relation to structural adjustments. The Committee on Technical Cooperation, which conducted its usual annual review of all technical cooperation activities of the Organization, also gave consideration to the ILO’s strategy on technical cooperation and assessed a number of our projects concerned with the working poor. In addition to its usual work of overseeing the ILO’s sectoral activities, the Committee on Sectoral and Technical Meetings and Related Issues undertook an evaluation of the Sectoral Activities Programme based on the findings of a working party.

The Governing Body has decided on the technical item for the agenda of the next Asian Regional Conference. The organization of regional conferences will be the subject of a review by the Governing Body of course at its next session in November later this year, once the cycle of all ILO regional conferences held under the revised experimental arrangements is completed with the Fifth European Regional Conference, which will be held in Warsaw this September. The Governing Body has also taken note of the appointments of Ms. Hagen of the United States as Deputy Director-General and of Mr. Hammar of Sweden and Mr. Mabere of the United Republic of Tanzania as Assistant Directors-General of this Organization.

Before concluding I would like to offer my very sincere thanks to my two fellow officers, Mr. Oechslin, Employer Vice-Chairman, and Mr. Brett, Worker Vice-Chairman, for their friendship and cooperation over the past year. In the same vein I would also like to express my thanks to Ms. Hartwell, Coordinator of the Government Group, and to Miss Mackie and Mr. Tapiola, spokespersons of the Employers' and Workers' groups respectively, in a most difficult committee, the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee. Their valuable support and readiness to help in difficulty has greatly facilitated the task of chairing the Governing Body during the past year. I would also like to thank of course the Director-General and his staff for their constant support and assistance. I likewise offer my sincere thanks and congratulations to each and every member of the Governing Body who worked very hard during the past year.

ELECTION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE CONFERENCE

Mrs. ROLDAN-CONFESOR (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – We will now proceed to the election of the President of the International Labour Conference. I invite Mr. Ducreux, Vice-Minister of Labour and Social Welfare of Panama, to present the candidate for the presidency of this Conference.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. DUCREUX (Government delegate, Panama) – On behalf of the countries of America and on my own behalf, I have the honour and pleasure of nominating Mr. José Francisco Rosales Argüello, Minister of Labour of Nicaragua, as President of this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. Mr. Rosales has held the prestigious post of Minister of Labour of his country since 1990 and consequently held the office of President of the Advisory Council of the National Vocational Training Institute of Nicaragua. He is also the official delegate of the Government of Nicaragua on the Governing Body of the International Labour Organization. He studied at the Sorbonne University in Paris where he earned the title of Doctor of Law, specializing in labour law. He has been dean of the Faculty of Law at the Central American University, where he has also been Professor of Labour Law and, to his credit, published major works on the subject of labour law. Our candidate is an eminent expert in labour law and is renowned at both the national and international levels. We are therefore certain that his skills and experience will enable him to guide us efficiently and successfully in our work. We hope that this session of the Conference will unanimously elect Mr. Rosales Argüello as President of this important session of the Conference since his vast experience and knowledge of labour-related matters have helped him to remain a distinguished and permanent presence in the ILO. His judicious statements have helped greatly in the work of the ILO and will be of great benefit to us, as they have to the Governing Body and to regional and subregional meetings. These merits will all help to ensure the successful presidency of this session of the Conference. I appreciate your support for Mr. José Francisco Rosales Argüello's nomination.

Mrs. ROLDAN-CONFESOR (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – The candidature of Mr. Rosales Argüello, Minister of Labour of Nicaragua, has been proposed. Is the proposal seconded?

Mr. BRETT (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom) – On behalf of the workers represented at this Conference, I have pleasure in seconding the nomination of Mr. Rosales Argüello to preside over our Conference. As has been said by the mover, he has been Minister of Labour of his country since 1990. It is my privilege to have been a British trade union representative observer at the elections in Nicaragua in 1990, a country of people who suffered under dictatorship for many years and fought back to bring about democracy. It is therefore appropriate that a Minister from a country so typical of the developing nations in this body should preside over the business of this Conference. I have also had the pleasure of working with Mr. Rosales Argüello as part of the Governing Body and he has given generously of his rich experience to that body. We always listen with interest and attention to his many contributions, recognizing, as has been said by the mover, that we are listening to an eminent labour lawyer. In the views of the Workers, it is an appropriate appointment. It is an appointment that will enrich this Conference, as it has the Governing Body. I have great pleasure in seconding the nomination of Mr. José Francisco Rosales Argüello.

Original French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – On behalf of the Employers' delegates to this Conference, I have great pleasure in supporting the candidacy of Mr. Rosales Argüello, Minister of Labour of Nicaragua, a post which he has held since 1990. Since that time, he has attended many meetings with other agencies and we know him well. He has attended every session of the International Labour Conference and many sessions of the Governing Body; and he has not been a mere visitor on these occasions but has been an active participant. He has also been a delegate to many regional conferences in Central America and Latin America, including the Conference of American States Members of the ILO, and has given these various organizations and bodies the benefit of his experience and legal knowledge, which he acquired both in his own country and in Paris. It gives me great personal pleasure to be able to point out this fact, since we attended the same institutions, with a few years' interval.

The Employers' group thus has great pleasure in endorsing this proposal and looks forward to having Mr. Rosales Argüello as President of this session of the International Labour Conference.

Mr. VAN DE REE (Government delegate, Netherlands) – On behalf of the Western European group, we are very pleased to support such an eminent candidate for this honourable office during the coming Conference. We are quite confident that his presidency will be a successful one.

Mr. TIRUMURTI (Government adviser, India) – On behalf of the Asia-Pacific group, we would like to extend our strong support to the nomination of Mr. Rosales Argüello, Minister of Labour of Nicaragua. Members of our group have had the opportunity and the honour of interacting with Mr. Rosales Argüello on many occasions, including during the sessions of the Governing Body, and we have been impressed with his breadth of knowledge, his interesting comments and contributions and his firm commitment to ILO values and principles. He has an impressive set of achievements to his credit and years of experience in the field of labour, especially in the area of labour laws and industrial relations. There can be no doubt that he will lead this Conference to success. My group supports his nomination.

Original Arabic: Mr. GUIDER (Secretary of the General Committee of the Labour Force, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) – On behalf of the African group, I am pleased to endorse the candidacy of Mr. Rosales Argüello, Minister of Labour of Nicaragua, for the Presidency of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. Mr. Rosales Argüello has considerable experience in the area of labour, and it goes without saying that his election would help to crown this Conference with success. The African group would therefore like to support his candidacy.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL JARWAN (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, United Arab Emirates) – In the name of God, the merciful, the compassionate! It is for me a source of pleasure and a great honour to support, on behalf of the Arab members of the Government, Employers' and Workers' groups, the candidacy of the Minister of Labour of Nicaragua, Mr. Rosales Argüello, to preside over the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. Our support is based on the experience and wisdom of the Minister of Labour of Nicaragua. Over and above the friendship that we share personally with him and with his country, we are certain that our session of the Conference will, thanks to his leadership, be successful and achieve all its objectives. Permit me to repeat our congratulations to him and to reiterate our desire to cooperate with him so that our session of the Conference may be successful.

Mrs. ROLDAN-CONFESOR (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – Mr. José Francisco Rosales Argüello, Minister of Labour of Nicaragua, has been duly nominated and seconded for the post of President of this session of the Conference. In the absence of any other nominations, I declare Mr. Rosales Argüello President of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I should like to offer him my warm congratulations and invite him to take the President's chair.

(Mr. ROSALES ARGÜELLO, Minister of Labour, Nicaragua, is elected President of the Conference and takes the President's chair.)

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – It is a great honour for me, for my country and for the Government of Nicaragua that I have been appointed President of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like to express my profound gratitude for having been elected. I would also like to express my thanks to the distinguished delegates from the various groups and regions which make up this Organization for their kindness in coming to the rostrum and supporting my candidature. I should also like to welcome all those member States who have recently joined the Organization, particularly the Gambia and Saint Vincent and the Grenadines. The total number of countries in the ILO is now 173.

As a Central American and, in particular, as a Nicaraguan, I would like to inform this distinguished assembly that, in its 76 years of existence, the ILO has never before had a Conference President from our Central American subregion. I would like to thank those who supported my candidature this year and, at the same time, I would like to ask them to give me their support throughout the Conference so that we can proceed smoothly and successfully. Furthermore, your objective participation in the committees and in the plenary of the Conference will help us to achieve tangible results for the whole of mankind on the threshold of the twenty-first century.

At the end of the nineteenth century and at the beginning of the twentieth, the condition of humanity gave rise to considerable concern. Imperialism, as an economic system, had gained the upper hand, and led us into the major global confrontation of the 1914-18 War – the First World War. Today, as we approach the end of the twentieth century and stand on the threshold of the twenty-first, the situation is not much different. It would seem that history has come a full circle, liberalism again reigns supreme in society.

We have the same problems as we had before, poverty, social marginalization, unemployment, underdevelopment and discrimination, and they are global in their extent. To these problems must now be added disasters specific to the end of this century: the ecological imbalance, AIDS and other epidemics of which we yet know nothing and that have come to plague mankind. The major scourges facing the working classes used to be diseases and unemployment. Now we are seeing scourges spreading throughout society: drug trafficking, international terrorism, state terrorism and corruption. These are also diseases but specific to this century. In addition, we seem to have lost our sense of family values, and in some cases this has led to marginalization of both the young and the elderly. Elsewhere, people have been doomed to solitude because of this lack of family values, whereas others are suffering due to the absence of minimal levels of social protection and care.

Some of us felt that once the period of the cold war and the major ideological confrontation between East and West was over, we could envisage the possibility of building a society which was different and based on justice, freedom and true democracy. We need to put an end to all the evils and all the problems I have just mentioned.

Obviously the idea of building the society of the future on the ruins of authoritarian socialism has proved utopian. Increasing unemployment, hunger and poverty have not spared those societies which were once socialist regimes.

You need only look at the work done by the ILO Multidisciplinary Team in Budapest to understand the drop in incomes and the decline in living conditions that have occurred in Russia and in the Ukraine. The real unemployment rate is five times higher than the official rate, hidden unemployment affects a third of all workers, people are working without pay, long-term lay-offs are taking place, work contracts are being suspended and enterprises being closed down. Unemployment benefit and assistance are either inadequate or non-existent.

But the West has not overcome these problems either. On the contrary, we have been told that the European Union contains 5 million homeless people and that, in 1994, 15 per cent of the population was living below the poverty line. Unemployment in Spain has reached the highest level in the country's history. In France, Germany and in countries throughout the world, which are industrialized, developing or part of the Third World, unemployment has become the number one problem. In his Report, the Director-General referred to the unemployment rates in Latin America and Asia and showed us how, on a comparative basis, unemployment had effectively increased there too. The same is true of the countries in transition. Similarly, in the United States of America the hispanic and black minorities are growing poorer, and economic indicators also show that there has been a general loss of purchasing power which has hit workers, be they white, black or hispanic.

The Social Summit offered the possibility of bringing forward a new social contract. We thought that it would endorse the role of the International Labour Organization. We felt that the globalization of the economy and the liberalization of trade would be the subject of examination and that special attention would be devoted to the impact on and implications for social justice. Systems for assisting the weakest population groups need to be overhauled, and consequently the Summit should be looking for new worldwide mechanisms to help correct the inequalities created by the new world order.

The Director-General quite rightly highlighted the great expectations of the Summit. First, he emphasized that the World Summit for Social Development had given solemn recognition to the fact that employment must be at the heart of any efforts to achieve social justice. Fortunately, one of the first measures in the plan of action adopted by the Summit is the search for full employment and the commitment by individual countries to reach an agreement on growth-promotion strategies based on increased investment and the generation of productive and sustained employment.

In the Summit's Declaration and Programme of Action, the Heads of State and Government attending the Summit gave the ILO a mandate and committed themselves "to promoting the goal of full employment as a basic priority of ... economic and social policies, and to enabling all men and women to attain secure and sustainable livelihoods through freely chosen productive employment and work." It was also emphasized that the ILO, because of its tripartite structure and expertise, had a special role to play in the field of employment and social development.

This is why I fully endorse the Director-General's statement to the effect that our Organization must seize this opportunity to provide political and technical leadership in mobilizing action at both the national and international levels to improve the global employment situation.

The challenge laid down by the liberalization of trade and the globalization of the economy is one we cannot avoid. It is important that measures be taken which will make it possible to reduce and then eliminate the negative social consequences of economic adjustment and stabilization policies. It is important that our countries control inflation, rid themselves of hyperinflation and stabilize their currencies; yet what is just as important – if not more important – is to achieve social justice. There has to be a social component in our policies which will allow us to more fairly distribute both the costs and the benefits of the globalization of the economy and the liberalization of trade. It is impossible to accept a situation where, despite the fact that never before in the history of mankind have resources been so successfully used to produce goods and services, more people than ever are now excluded from society, alienated and unable to enjoy those goods and services.

This is what led to the coining of the famous phrase "the rich get richer and the poor get poorer". Former President Aylwin of Chile claims that the gulf between rich and poor is widening and that is why he has become one of the driving forces behind the Social Summit.

The gulf between rich and poor obviously varies in degree, depending on the economic and political ability of States to intervene effectively in social policy.

Irrespective of external and internal factors which in some cases may have had a considerable impact, such as wars, natural disasters, epidemics, hard winters and so forth, thinking that one can abandon everything to market forces and that every problem will be solved on the basis of the law of supply and demand is without doubt one of the greatest errors to have been made. Neither is the efficient allocation and use of resources sufficient in itself to solve all problems.

In Nicaragua, we have brought inflation down to zero and kept it in single figures over the last few years – following a war, our emergence from a totalitarian economy and an authoritarian regime. However, we have not achieved the economic recovery we were hoping for, and neither have we been able to solve the unemployment problem. I for one am convinced that one of the major factors behind our inability to meet the challenges inherent in the globalization of the economy and the intensification of competition in the world economy is the fact that States are too weak to intervene. The gradual approach that was required in the transition from a totalitarian economy to a free market economy was unfortunately not adhered to.

Hence, the benefits of the success achieved have not been fairly redistributed and many people have lost out and continue to be marginalized and alienated, unable to enjoy the benefits of economic growth.

I therefore believe that the State should strive to maintain the equilibrium and exert an influence on the economy. It cannot simply stand on the sidelines. In all societies there are norms and institutions to monitor the negative social effects of unregulated market forces. However, prejudices and false promises give the impression that these institutions, which are essentially geared to promoting basic levels of safety and protection, result in economic and administrative inefficiency. It is often said and frequently repeated that the State is a bad administrator. On the other hand, it is also said that everything should be left to personal freedom and to the imagination of the citizen – an approach sometimes wrongly described as denoting creativity.

Neither individual freedom alone nor market forces alone can satisfy the overwhelming problems facing mankind: poverty, unemployment, social marginalization. The reason for this is that banks are banks and they have no soul.

The nations represented here at the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference must act with clarity and concur that the only solution is to find the link in the chain which will allow us to establish continuity between temporary employment and sustained and productive employment. We need to generate high-quality jobs which will facilitate the eradication of poverty and the elimination of social marginalization.

We cannot allow under the pretext of free contracting of labour and the need to bring flexibility to the labour market, the generation of jobs in a way that openly violates international conventions agreed by many countries or in a way which violates fundamental human rights and human dignity.

The quality of jobs created is determined by the respect given to standards and conventions agreed by the ILO. These lay down a minimum basis for improving working conditions and the life of the working class. Therefore we cannot sacrifice the rights of workers in the name of labour market flexibility. We have to increase job security and for that we need to have harmony between two factors, capital and labour.

This has to be done within the framework of tripartism and a genuine social dialogue between social partners. Only by encouraging social dialogue and the participation of the social partners will we be able to achieve a real social contract on the basis of which we can bring an end to insecure employment and social marginalization.

There is no doubt that the globalization of the economy increases the possibility of economic growth and increases levels of production and productivity. However, at the same time it carries within it the seeds of insecure employment.

In our countries it is the people working in the informal sector of the economy who most seriously lack social protection. They have no social security coverage because they are not registered and therefore they do not contribute to the system. Consequently they have no access to vocational training. Generally they are simply deprived of any protection: illness, disability and death are problems as serious for them as they are for those who have no access at all to the world of work.

In conclusion I would like to say that the challenge we face is to achieve growth with equity without inflation, without unemployment and without social marginalization. It is time to meet that challenge by at least partially returning the State to the role it used to have. Social protection must become a reality, allowing us to provide minimum levels of income to the weakest groups in the population on the basis of the creation of productive and sustainable employment, social protection in the field of health, at least through preventive health care, and universal primary education.

Obviously, I am referring to developing countries where the universal application of minimum levels of income is not viable. We have to encourage investment and financing for small-scale producers for cooperatives and for family-owned and individually-owned enterprises, monitoring and encouraging innovative credit systems for those who traditionally have not been able to get loans. We have to promote micro- and small-scale enterprises, encourage also the establishment of small-scale rural enterprises, and promote wide-ranging building programmes in the public sector, particularly of working-class housing, so that we will be able to say as the French do: "what is good for the construction industry is good for the rest of the economy".

Finally, we need a formal education programme and a vocational training programme which will make it possible to improve people's employment prospects and at the same time improve the quality of production. The challenge facing our countries is to achieve monetary stability, growth with equity with social peace, democracy and employment.

President: Mr. Rosales Argüello

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – Before beginning the discussion of the Report of the Director-General, I should like first of all to make the following statement on behalf of the Officers of the Conference. This statement refers to the way in which we intend to discharge our duties. I am making it on behalf of all the Officers of the Conference in order to remind you of the principles which we propose to apply in guiding this discussion with regard to all statements, no matter who the speaker is. The principles which will be applied were determined by the Working Group on the Programme and Structure of the ILO and approved by the Governing Body and communicated to the Conference in 1967.

These principles are set out in paragraphs 54 to 58 of its report, which are reproduced in the Memorandum on the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference, a copy of which you should now all have. It is incumbent upon the Officers of the Conference to draw the attention of all delegates to the contents of paragraph 58, which reads as follows: "In periods of acute political tension the ILO has a two-fold responsibility – to uphold the values of human freedom and dignity enshrined in its Constitution, and to circumscribe rather than extend the area of international tension by ensuring the fullest possible degree of continued cooperation in pursuit of the objectives of the ILO." Every delegate here attending the International Labour Conference therefore has an obligation to the Conference to keep these considerations constantly in mind, and the President has an obligation to ensure that the Conference does not lose sight of them. In discharging my duties, I should like to draw the Conference's attention to these principles. In full agreement with my fellow Officers and on behalf of all of you, I urge all delegates to collaborate with us in applying these principles. In particular, we hope that every delegate will recognize that the Officers of the Conference are responsible for ensuring that these principles are observed. My colleagues and I myself are determined to carry out this responsibility.

Freedom of expression is a vital feature of the International Labour Organization. However, in order to exercise this right in a spirit of mutual respect, we all have to accept a certain amount of discipline if we want our work to be carried out in an appropriate way and to be crowned with a success. It is the duty of the President of the sitting to ensure that these principles are respected, and the Officers will not hesitate to intervene in this connection. In particular, if there are offensive or insulting remarks made about any head of state or government, or if personal insults are directed at any of the delegates, the President will intervene immediately. At the Conference all delegates should use parliamentary language and respect the accepted procedure, refer only to items under discussion and avoid raising any question alien to these matters.

It is important that every delegate who wishes to make a reply to a statement should refrain from asking for the floor by raising a point of order. What he should do is to inform the President of the sitting before the sitting finishes that he wishes to exercise his right of reply. A request for a right of reply should be addressed to the Officers during the sitting to which the government or delegation considers that it should exercise this right. These requests should be transmitted to the President through the Clerk, and not by asking for the floor at the sitting.

I wish to refer to the practice with regard to the exercise to the right of reply. The reply should refer only to the point under debate. It should be brief, not exceeding two minutes, and should not give rise to any further remarks. Lastly, it should be couched in correct and parliamentary language. Furthermore, I wish to point out that in order to avoid endless debates, it has been a practice of the presidents to refuse to allow replies to a reply. I wish furthermore to point out that in accordance with article 14, paragraph 6 of the Standing Orders, as amended by the Conference at its 79th Session, the time-limit for speeches of delegates participating in the discussion on the reports of the Chairman of the Governing Body and of the Director-General should not exceed ten minutes. I therefore invite all delegates to concentrate their remarks on these reports alone. The time available to the Conference for the discussion of its agenda being very short, it is imperative that these provisions be strictly respected. All delegates and ministers attending the Conference will no doubt wish to take this limit of ten minutes into account in preparing their remarks so that the President will not be obliged to withdraw the right to speak from the speaker before he has finished his speech.

May I remind you that in accordance with the established practice, the Officers and the President organize the general discussion. In particular, it is up to the President to ensure respect for the principles and provisions of the Standing Orders to which I have just referred.

Concerning the special sitting on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, may I remind you that on the proposal of the Selection Committee the Conference has decided to allow speakers who so wish to take the floor both on the general report and during the special sitting, it being understood that the subject to be discussed in that sitting would not be discussed in the debate on the remainder of the report. May I recall in this respect that it has been decided to close the list of speakers for the special sitting at 6 p.m. on Tuesday, 13 June.

Finally, it goes without saying that all the principles mentioned above also apply to the special sitting, except for the time-limit for speeches. Depending on the number of speakers, it may be less than ten minutes.

With your help and collaboration, we shall fully discharge all the responsibilities conferred upon us with a view to ensuring the proper conduct and success of the Conference. We thank you in advance for your understanding.

We now come to the second item on the agenda, which is the discussion of the reports of the Chairman of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

I give the floor to the first speaker on the list, Mr. Garache Castellón, Vice-Minister of Labour of Nicaragua.

Original Spanish: Mr. GARACHE CASTELLON (Government delegate, Nicaragua) – On behalf of the Nicaraguan delegation and on my own behalf, I would like to congratulate the President and the Officers on their election to preside over the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference and to wish them every success in their work.

Once again we have to congratulate the Director-General for the high quality of his Report, this year devoted very appropriately to the promotion of employment, because we consider it is necessary as the Report states, that the International Labour Organization should “step up its efforts to promote national and international action to solve current employment problems in the world”, especially when the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen in March of this year urges that the ILO, because of its mandate, tripartite structure and experience has an essential role to play in employment and social development.

The Report certainly urges Ministers of Labour to take an active part in the elaboration and implementation of economic policies and in particular in structural adjustment programmes with a view to introducing the necessary consistency between the productive, monetary, and financial targets and the social costs which they involve. We agree with this position for two reasons. Firstly because we think that economic growth is not an end in itself but an instrument to guarantee the dignity of mankind and render viable its aspirations to security and happiness, and secondly because in most of the developing countries, which are the most vulnerable to the employment crisis, the relevant ministries are regulatory bodies and have little or no responsibility for development programmes or for plans now emerging for employment generation.

The Report states that the relatively less developed countries where poverty is most acute and where development and modernization are most difficult should receive preferential treatment. It is not possible that there should continue to exist countries which are annually obliged to increase their external debt in order to service their existing debt. If the benefits of technological progress, production and trade are being globalized then the responsibility for poverty and backwardness must also be globalized.

It is also a matter of concern that the Report states with such confidence that in many countries the informal sector can be regarded as part of the so-called “safety net” providing a refuge for all those displaced from the formal economy as a result of adjustments or as part of the short-term costs of adaptation to the globalization of the economy. The informal sector cannot be regarded as infinitely expendable and in many parts of the world it is dangerously close to saturation point.

Nicaragua shares the concern with the effect which the development of the world economy for some decades now has been having an effect on the level and structure of employment internationally. The world trend from 1965-91 shows a decline in the primary and secondary sectors while the tertiary sector has seen an increase of 11 per cent, but it must be pointed out that in Nicaragua in the past three years the primary sector has been recovering its leading role in keeping with the country's productive potential.

Agreements on the liberalization of tariffs and of non-tariff barriers, and on foreign investment, have had their effect on employment in the short term. In the case of Nicaragua enterprises in the textiles and clothing sectors (free trade zones) have taken on more than 5,000 Nicaraguans who have at the same time undergone job retraining so as to gain access to the labour market and to adapt to technological change. Unfortunately these jobs are not stable owing to the footloose nature of the assembly units, known as maquilas.

As in other countries the chances of progress in employment depend mainly on the implementation of economic reforms and on increasing production.

In Nicaragua, in order to carry out these reforms and to move away from a state-centred economic model, there have been changes in the public sector, the financial system and foreign and domestic trade which envisage the reduction in the size of the public sector including a decline in military expenditures, privatization of state enterprises, reduction of import duties and trade liberalization; the participation of private banking and the promulgation of laws governing the financial system; tax reform and the liberalization of consumer prices.

As a result of the reforms in the public sector there has been a reduction in expenditure due to the retirement of members of the army and the police and of civilian employees of the central government, and to the reduction of posts in the remainder of the public sector. The international community deserves special recognition because Nicaragua, with the assistance of friendly countries and organizations, has carried out and kept in place these economic changes and has made enormous efforts to consolidate the achievements obtained with regard to pacification, democratization and state reform.

Accordingly, we believe, firstly, that it is essential that the ministries responsible for employment and social affairs should play an active role in the debate on economic policy both nationally and internationally – a debate which could be strengthened by better coordination and closer collaboration between international bodies responsible for economic and financial policy and those concerned with social policy and employment.

Secondly, it is only by means of concerted action by the international community and the countries whose problems are most liable to accentuate social tensions – the least developed and the most severely indebted – that it would be possible to find the best solution to the acute problems of unemployment and its accompanying social ills.

Thirdly, that the generation of new jobs is more an overall national undertaking than just a matter of governmental responsibility. The State must create favourable conditions for encouraging productive investment and reinvestment and business must take advantage of this favourable climate to promote the creation of jobs and improve working conditions by raising production and productivity. Workers must also play a fundamental role by accepting the challenge of increasing productivity, maintaining labour discipline and improving the quality of what they do, for the creation of new jobs is a social responsibility and is borne of a tripartite spirit to find not only local but also international solutions, for the former depend to a large degree on the latter. The world and life itself are always a matter of balance and we must all share responsibilities, but we must also find balance among our interests without infringing our sovereignty in the search for economic and social development of our peoples.

Original Arabic: Mr. ABOU AL SHAAR (Minister of Labour, Jordan) – In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful! On behalf of the delegation of the Royal Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan and on my own behalf, I should like to congratulate the President on his election to steer the deliberations of this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference and wish him every success in his task; we are sure that his efforts will be crowned with success. I should also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents.

In his Report to the Conference, Promoting employment, Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO, has raised an extremely delicate – and urgent – issue, given the present economic climate in both the industrialized and developing countries. Thanks to his wisdom and vast experience in the area of labour, the Director-General has been able to analyse recent developments and pinpoint the challenges facing us in the world today – as well as the effects of these challenges on the labour market. He has also dwelt upon the deep concern prevailing in most countries because of the problems of unemployment and the difficulties encountered in solving these problems.

The Director-General has demonstrated the difficulty of returning to a situation of full employment in most countries of the world, referring to studies and reports on unemployment; these tend to prove that there is no simple and painless solution to the problem. Programmes at national level are being hampered by internal reform and external economic forces – and international cooperation is proving inadequate. It is for this reason, as the Report points out, that it is difficult to return to the previous situation.

We agree with the Director-General that there are strong and logical reasons to encourage, or rather compel, the international community not to give in to the situation and succumb to the problems of unemployment in the industrialized countries and to the dual interrelated problems of unemployment and poverty in most developing countries. If the international community does give in, it will be demonstrating its failure to improve the situation in the world and to achieve full employment.

We therefore strongly support the Director-General's view that we must make a collective effort, both at national and international levels, to make full employment a major priority in national policy and to create new mechanisms to run the global economy on a just and equitable basis.

We also agree with the Director-General that one of the prerequisites for a return to full employment is the establishment of an institutional framework for international cooperation in order to find optimum solutions for unemployment, not only in the industrialized countries, but also for the problems of unemployment and poverty in most developing countries – with all the social and economic repercussions these bring in their wake. The economies of these countries are heavily burdened by a debt crisis which is hampering their growth and preventing them from achieving positive adjustment.

How can developing countries meet the challenges of positive adjustment in the light of globalization of the economy when they are struggling under the yoke of their debts, problems of unemployment and poverty and the restrictive measures which industrialized countries are taking against them? How can we promote employment in developing countries and spawn positive adjustment when these countries are worried about inequality at the international level and their economic and political marginalization? We believe in the principles of law, justice and equality in international relations; and we believe that mutual and balanced interests should prevail in these relations – and that there should be a “lifting-all-boats” effect of greater efficiency of resource allocation, as pointed out by the Director-General.

The Jordanian position has always been in line with the principle of self-growth set forth in the Director-General's Report, stressing the importance of investment in human resources and education. Jordan has spared no effort to develop its human resources to compensate for its lack of natural resources. The human being in Jordan is the cornerstone in any programme of national development. Development can only be achieved by harnessing the potential of human beings – and human beings reap the benefit – and we are making every possible effort to attain the welfare of our citizens. We are constantly trying to develop the various areas of education, higher education and vocational and technical training to harness our labour force in accordance with the principle of tripartite dialogue between the social partners.

Jordan believes in stability and world peace. We aspire to a just and fair balance of rights of people to self-determination in a modern international system free from any domination; we also believe in the respect for freedom, democracy and human rights. A just, global and lasting peace is based on the economic, social and cultural peace for all nations and peoples.

In this context, the Jordanian delegation calls upon the delegates at the Conference to request Israel to implement the resolutions adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1974 and 1980 and to implement the United Nations resolutions concerning Palestine and the occupied Arab territories – particularly the resolutions concerning the peace process in the region, i.e. resolutions Nos. 242, 338 and 465.

The Jordanian delegation would like to express its deep concern regarding the various policies and measures adopted by Israel relating to Arab East Jerusalem and urges Israel to acknowledge that peace is a strategic choice and not a tactical one – setting out to attain outdated objectives and policies rejected by the international community. Israel has to adhere to the cause of law and justice and respect all commitments made with the parties concerned. Israel must change its policies and measures concerning Arab East Jerusalem once and for all, especially those concerning the confiscation of land; because Jerusalem is at the heart of the peace for which we all strive in the region.

I wish this Conference every success in its work.

Mr. TULADHAR (Minister of Health and Labour, Nepal) – First of all, on behalf of the Nepalese delegation, I would like to extend my hearty congratulations to the President on his election to the presidency of this momentous Conference. My delegation is confident that under his able leadership, this Conference will proceed smoothly and arrive at a fruitful conclusion. It is a great pleasure for me to address this gathering of individuals concerned about the welfare of workers.

I take this opportunity humbly to inform the participants of this Conference that the mid-term poll held in November 1994 has led to the formation in Nepal of a new Government under the leadership of the Communist Party of Nepal (United Marxist-Leninist). This Government, which is fully committed to fostering parliamentary democracy under constitutional monarchy, is deeply concerned about and committed to the objective of enhancing the welfare and prosperity of the workers who, we think, are partners in progress and development of the country along with the industrialists and the industrial sector.

In order to accomplish this objective, Nepal has enacted the Labour Law, 1992, and its subsidiary Rules with provisions for better conditions of work, upgraded health and safety standards, social security and benefits in the organized sector. The intention of the legislation is to simultaneously safeguard the rights of the workers, stamp out exploitation, and create a sound and harmonious relationship between management and labour. Nepal has recently ratified the ILO Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No.144). Even before signing the Convention, tripartism had increasingly been a guiding factor in Nepal's labour policies – and the antagonistic relations between management and labour in previous decades has already been shifting to more harmonious relations.

The Nepal Government is among the ten signatories of the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour. We feel deeply concerned about the welfare of children while enforcing the laws and regulations against the use of children below the age of 14 in any establishment. We feel the necessity for setting a minimum wage in agriculture as well as in industry and we are attacking the problem of bonded labour.

While our Government is committed to the welfare of child workers it is deeply concerned about the post-Marrakesh efforts at seeking to establish a linkage between international trade and enforcement of labour standards through imposition of the social clause. This linkage deals with the issue of child labour in isolation from its context. Child labour exists because the situation of the rural families is desperate and they have lost all other alternatives. While trying to link the social clause and trade, its promoters continue to give uncritical support to entrenched social interests and social classes, and are antagonistic and suspicious towards progressive, popular initiatives. The emphasis should be on changing the conditions giving rise to child labour and at the same time on stepping up efforts to it by providing alternative means of livelihood. There should be strict norms in place, backed by a strong enforcement mechanism, for improving the working conditions, protecting children from hazardous and unsafe industries, limiting the workday to three or four hours, and imparting education and teaching of skills. Support should be switched from entrenched social groups to labour movements and to political initiatives which strengthen the position of the rural and urban working class, so that they can afford to take care of their children. Controls need to be instituted on international commercial interests so that they do not force down the price of labour internationally.

Development efforts in the past have largely favoured capital-intensive projects which emphasize technology and specialized technical knowledge. This means forsaking cheap manual domestic labour for expensive foreign labour and technology. Such development has sustained capital and employment overseas, at the cost of discounting and neglecting our own working class. It has encumbered the country with heavy debt. It has contributed to inflation, undermined the capacity for a consumption of our own workforce, and a suppressed indigenous alternatives and initiatives. Old forms of oppression and exploitation are yet to be entirely alleviated. Pervasive rural debt keeps the labour force in a state of virtual bondage, and of forms of institutionalized bondage, called kamaiya, remain in five districts.

The destruction of the rural economy, the shift of capital and resources from the countryside to the cities, and the growing desperation of the rural population have triggered the movement of labour force in growing numbers into the urban areas and to other countries in search of employment. Although our labour force still clings to the vestiges of a society and culture rich in techniques and knowledge for the sustainable use of land, forests and wetlands, it is badly prepared for confronting the new domestic and international situations. Nepal's workers are poorly educated, heavily in debt, and in poor health. Forced by desperation and lured by advertising and dreams of instant wealth, many of our young workers have fallen victims to low wages, dangerous working conditions, and all kinds of unscrupulous operators. The trafficking of many thousands of young Nepali women to brothels throughout Asia epitomizes the terrible waste of human life and labour that has resulted from the pattern of development we have embraced.

The full internationalization of capital in recent decades has meant that countries have lost much of their control over domestic policy. Even when governments such as ours come to power, which have been working and organizing intimately in the villages and factories of Nepal for decades and which have a real interest and commitment to change the situation of the labourers, they find themselves faced with the legacy of years of mismanagement and unaccountability which make innovative and independent policy extremely difficult. Nepal – like many other countries all over the globe – is being forced, without paying much attention to the real historical roots of its problem, to submit to restructuring and privatization and to subsidizing international capital to encourage it to come into the country.

The present Government is committed to improve the situation of its labour force. We are confronted by legacies of past mismanagement and corruption and the persistence of entrenched regressive interests, and largely unsustainable development paradigms supported by the international community. And, like all other countries, we are confined to the limitations of the international situation.

I would like to share our ideas on the agenda of this session of the Conference. As regards the items on the extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) to activities in the non-commercial services sector, on home work and safety and health in mines, these are very essential to protect and guarantee the interests of working people. In my view they need very careful deliberation and should be developed in line with the particular conditions of socio-economic development in the least developing countries such as Nepal. The paucity of resources is a major hurdle in the application and implementation of the ILO instruments. May I also share with you my opinion that efforts should be made to review and update international labour standards in the light of the changing global context, so that they might be effectively and pragmatically applied.

Before concluding, I would like to request that our distinguished representatives from developed countries strengthen the hands of the ILO. A stronger ILO, I hope, would be a better partner of governments of developing countries and help them not only to increase industrial harmony and peace in these countries – thus being conducive to their industrial development – but also to promote their overall welfare.

For the welfare of the workers all over the world, I wish this Conference a grand success.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-KULAIB (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Kuwait) – I have the privilege first of all of congratulating the President on his election to chair this session of the Conference. I wish him every success in his deliberations. I would also like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Vice-Presidents and I hope that our meeting will achieve the goals we have set.

I would also like to thank the Director-General for his Report, Promoting employment. This Report contains exhaustive and precise information on the economic situation and its social repercussions in all countries of the world, whatever their system may be. This Report is therefore comprehensive, all the more so since it looks at the economic circumstances of countries with fluctuating indicators as well as the direct effect on the workers' situation, unemployment and a fall in wages, a problem facing both developed and developing countries, and differences in living standards. This problem is particularly serious in a number of countries of Africa and Latin America and should be monitored closely as the problem is compounded by accelerated demographic growth.

There are some extremely important paragraphs in the Report. The Director-General addresses political instability and its impact on society, and the close relationship between political stability and improved living standards. We support the content of the Report in this regard. Instability in many countries is a direct result of their suffering. These countries stand out because of their wealth of agricultural or industrial resources and large labour force. Yet, they rank among the poorest countries because of political instability, and due to the fact that most of their resources are channelled into activities of little relevance to ordinary people and hence the tendency to neglect social issues which are central to development.

The Director-General has also addressed the equally important problem of specialized training and education which provide the building blocks for society and an ideal way to improve workers' skills provided that education and training are available to all and take account of the considerable progress made in the agricultural and industrial sectors.

In his Report, the Director-General has suggested many solutions to economic problems and ways to help promote employment, including the need to encourage foreign investment, in view of the fact that around 73 million jobs, namely 3 per cent of the world's manpower, are generated by multinationals around the world.

The Director-General also stresses policies based on the principle of trade liberalization and the removal of obstacles to and constraints on imports from developing countries.

In this regard, I am pleased to inform you that my country is a leading donor country, providing assistance in particular to poor and developing countries. This assistance amounts to more than 4 per cent of our GNP, a high percentage representing more than $2 billion a year. Similarly, the customs duties on imports from these countries are very low – a mere 4 per cent – which helps the marketing of products from developing countries.

With regard to foreign investment, Kuwait has considerable investments in most Arab and European countries, in the United States and Asia, in industrial and chemical sectors, which has helped to create many jobs in these countries.

Kuwait has also opened its doors to jobseekers from 138 countries. These wage-earners work in all sectors, including the public and private sectors. They may freely transfer their assets to their country of origin, they are not taxed and enjoy free education and health care, which has been a great help in terms of raising their standards of living and those of their families.

Kuwait is successfully helping to combat poverty in developing countries. For example, the Emir of Kuwait has decided to cancel the debt of poor countries and certain developing countries, not to mention the assistance in kind and in monetary terms from public and charitable organizations.

Kuwait is one of the few countries in the world which does not suffer from unemployment because the Constitution guarantees every Kuwaiti the right to employment and to enjoy education, health and social care. Eleven thousand dollars is the average per capita income in Kuwait, which is high compared to average income countries. Furthermore, Kuwait's demographic growth stands at 5 per cent which is also high and is due to the state policy aimed at balancing the demographic structure and creating the labour force needed to implement economic and social development programmes. The State guarantees the essential rights and freedoms of all categories of workers, which is why many people come to work in Kuwait and stay for many years, or set up home there because of the living conditions and climate of security that prevails.

The Report of the Director-General faithfully reflects the economic situation and the job situation throughout the world. We hope that all efforts will be conjugated, together with those of the ILO, whose role it is to find solutions to the problems of workers, including first and foremost the problem of unemployment. It is our sincere hope that sufficient attention will be paid to job creation, the attainment of full and productive employment, and the placing of employment and living standards throughout the world on the agenda of the International Labour Conference as permanent, standing items. We will thus be able to concentrate on the employment situation and problems of employment, so that the measures and means necessary to promote employment can be taken and adopted. Among these extremely important measures are the establishment of a link between political, social and economic issues, and a strengthening of institutional cooperation in these intricately related fields. These activities are not incompatible; their aim is above all to promote the interests of the individual, whether it be a worker or employer.

In conclusion, I hope that God will help us all in promoting the progress of all peoples.

Original Spanish: Mr. AYALES ESNA (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Costa Rica) – My delegation expresses its gratitude to the Director-General and to the staff of the International Labour Office and of the ILO's regional headquarters in Costa Rica for their cooperation with my Government's efforts to improve labour standards in Costa Rica. It is a source of great satisfaction to us Central Americans that it should be our esteemed friend and colleague Mr. Francisco Rosales Argüello, Minister of Labour of Nicaragua, who holds the office of President of this Conference. It is an office which is a well-deserved honour for him as an individual, who we regard not only as a labour expert but also as an authentic representative of the noble people of Rubén Darío.

The Director-General, in his excellent Report, Promoting employment, has highlighted the views of a nation which is seeking to attain sustainable development with social justice in a democratic framework, for which we require the cooperation of the developed countries. Indeed, the subject of employment can be approached from the standpoint of trade in its broadest sense, or from a domestic perspective, taking up two fundamental aspects, these being the economic and the social aspects.

At a time when all nations are facing the phenomenon known as globalization, the global economy is growing as never before, but there is also an attendant increase in the discrepancies between the developed and the developing countries, between those which are in situations of privilege while ours are compelled to strain every sinew to compete and are barely managing to subsist. We view with concern how, in the circumstances in which globalization is taking place, the increase in trade is causing a concentration of wealth in a handful of trading blocs. It is against this background that our countries are now being asked to fully open our borders to products from developed countries, the self-same nations which take defensive adjustment measures to hamper the access of our main products to their markets.

The conclusions of the Uruguay Round and the creation of the World Trade Organization might quell to some extent concerns about fair competition and free access for our products to their markets. However, while this situation continues we are being subjected to pressures which jeopardize the social and economic stability of our peoples. This situation includes, inter alia, the threat of applying the so-called "social clause" to us, whereby trade and economic sanctions will be applied to our exports, which will impair our levels and conditions of employment, and ultimately the well-being of our families.

There is a desire to punish us for the inequalities which still prevail in our countries as if they were the product of our own selfishness or meanness, without considering that these inequalities are the result of an imbalance in the distribution of wealth in the world.

As developing countries, we yearn for equitable participation in the apportionment of global production, but there is a wish to punish us for not giving something we do not have.

There are those who criticize us for not applying certain standards, the benefits of which are not clearly determined. It is said that these are minimum standards, and we are asked why they have not yet been enacted. But when our products are denied access to the markets of the developed nations no one raises the issue of how this affects the funding of those minimum standards.

With regard to employment and working conditions, these are directly related to the opening of the developed countries to our products, the awarding of fair prices for them and the transfer of technology in appropriate conditions. The problem of not applying certain minimum standards cannot be considered in isolation from the conditions which I have just set forth.

Workers' rights are the heritage of society. They must be protected by appropriate social legislation and the necessary judicial authority which may guarantee secure continuity in labour relations. For this purpose, the world of work calls for the growth of the global economy and an increase in productivity, in order to achieve, by way of fair and equitable distribution the greater well-being of people and their families.

Costa Rica has a labour force of 1,200,000 workers and a minimum monthly wage averaging the equivalent of US$304.

Of this labour force, only four out of every one hundred workers lacks full and permanent employment. Invisible underemployment reached 3.5 per cent in July 1994, while visible underemployment reached 2.4 per cent of the working population. These figures would appear to convey an economic boom. However, this impression is incorrect. Among other things we are facing pressing challenges in the economic sphere, and in the social field our welfare system is extremely costly for the State.

Like many nations tackling the requirements of globalization, we are facing profound structural adjustments within the State and the need for the restructuring of our technology, finances and human resources in the production-oriented sectors.

This has prompted us to see with greater clarity the advantages of the tripartism championed by the ILO. Thus, since August 1994 we have restored the Higher Labour Council – a body made up of representatives of country's main trade union confederations and the supreme body of the employers' sector, with three government ministers, including the Minister of Labour.

Among the results of this national endeavour, I would point out that of having secured the agreement of all sectors to submitting to the Legislative Assembly for ratification 16 Conventions adopted since the 70th Session of the International Labour Conference.

We feel that trade union demands cannot become a sort of group or class selfishness, however much they can and must seek to correct ills in order to benefit society as a whole. At the same time, employers must contribute and pledge themselves even further to economic and social development so that their endeavours are geared towards sustaining and creating more jobs.

For the 1994-98 period, the objective of the Government of the Republic is a labour programme to modernize and bolster production, to seek to increase employment and to improve working conditions. In this connection important decisions have been reached to facilitate job mobility from the public to the private sector.

The National Programme for the Creation of Employment has been set up with the incentive of an economic subsidy, and its aim is to support the development of training programmes in technical and basic administrative areas, as well as seeking to upgrade the vocational skills of unemployed and underemployed workers.

Recently an important agreement was formalized with the Chamber of Commerce of Costa Rica to promote employment, pooling efforts to place unemployed workers from the public or private sectors.

As for migrant workers, a candid dialogue in a framework of mutual understanding enabled us to reach with Mr. Rosales Argüeleo a constructive solution to the problem of the thousands of illegal migrant workers of Central American origin, so that they can legalize their situation and benefit from our labour and social security system. This agreement has given rise to the seasonal labour card, which to a large extent has solved the problems facing foreign manpower entering the country without fulfilling migration requirements.

We will conclude by stating that we agree with the Director-General about the need for the ILO, in conjunction with other United Nations organizations, to probe even further in the quest for a solution to employment problems, especially into efforts to define the institutional arrangements at the international level which would take responsibility for this process.

National dialogue and international debate on the effects of social exclusion and the need for full employment should prevail in the five years up until the end of the millennium. But it is not so much the idea of being at the end of an era that should inspire us, as the enthusiasm of those who are conscious of the fact that they stand at the beginning of a new universal era in which precedence must be taken by the fight for solidarity and the well-being of all people, breaking down the barriers inherent in blocs, discrimination and sectarianism.

I wish to recall in conclusion the words of one of our country's great leaders José Figueres Ferrer, the father of the current President of the Republic, who, at the beginning of the 1970s said "The response to unemployment is not a simple one. What is needed is capital investment, the reduction of the workforce, and a new attitude on the part of both employer and worker, and new priorities in relation to finance and credit that put employment first".

Mr. GREENIDGE (Minister of Labour, Community Development and Sports, Barbados) – On behalf of the Barbados delegation, I should like to join the other speakers in congratulating the President on his election to the high office of the presidency at this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I assure you of the support of the Barbados delegation during the deliberations, and have no doubt that under your chairmanship, the session will be successfully concluded.

The items on the agenda are further reinforcement of the tradition of the International Labour Organization as enunciated by the Declaration of Philadelphia. The subjects of safety and health in mines, home work, and the extension of the Labour Inspection Convention to activities in the non-commercial sector all highlight concerns which seek to address the plight of the worker.

On the occasion of the World Summit for Social Development, which was held in Copenhagen in March of this year, we noted that the Director-General presented a social policy report on world employment. In the report he pointed out that because of a change in the structure of employment and production and gaps between the shifts in the structure of output and employment, differences in productivity have been created.

In Barbados, we are well aware of the importance of maintaining a stable social climate, particularly in the light of an economic adjustment programme. Human resources are our greatest strength for creating opportunities to tackle three major problems which plague countries such as ours: unemployment, underemployment and underdevelopment.

My Government assumes a great deal of responsibility for ensuring a social balance which seeks to protect the workers and create opportunities for the country's overall development. It is recognized that governments must set an example as a model employer, while at the same time maintaining adequate surveillance on undesirable activities in the world of work.

The concerns raised by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and ILO in connection with the inclusion of a social clause in international trading agreements is a key area for consideration. Trading agreements bear a direct relationship to labour systems and consequently the possibility of creating equality of trade given various economies of scale and preferential markets remains questionable.

Barbados will continue to examine the issue of the social clause and will endeavour to find equitable solutions while acknowledging the challenge of ensuring a balanced approach.

Among the areas which are engaging the attention of my Ministry at this time is the development of a policy for the disabled. We are deeply appreciative of the efforts made by the ILO in this regard and we anticipate great assistance in formulating programmes of employment and training for this vulnerable category of persons as we endeavour to integrate them into the society.

We recognize that the Declaration on the Rights of Disabled Persons and the Standard Rules on the Equalization of Opportunities for Persons with Disabilities demonstrate a growing international concern about discrimination against persons with disabilities. Further, there is a driving need to re-educate persons so that there will be greater understanding of the nature of the problem, in the hope that insensitivities and intolerance will be reduced or eliminated altogether.

Barbados recently welcomed the Caribbean Multidisciplinary Team, which held discussions with the social partners and other interested bodies and organizations in order to come up with a country objective arising out of the consultations. We are sure that the programme of action being developed will be of great benefit to our country.

Some two years ago, when the multidisciplinary teams and the active partnership policies were first introduced, member States in the Caribbean were concerned. It was felt that there would be a reduction in the level and forms of technical assistance and other services offered by the ILO. However, it has been found that the Caribbean Multidisciplinary Team has been pursuing initiatives which seek to serve the region adequately and effectively.

Barbados welcomes the proposal by the Caribbean Office in the training of statisticians from across the region so that the collection of statistical data will be improved and updated. The adequate collection of statistical data has been a source of concern for some time, especially as regards the collection of data required for the reporting on Convention No. 63 concerning wages and hours of work.

I now turn my attention to two items on the agenda for this Conference, namely home work and the extension of labour inspection to non-commercial undertakings.

On the question of home work we recognize that this category of workers includes the most vulnerable of all workers, i.e., women and disabled persons. Home work may be considered as a flexible arrangement for tasks to be performed, and may benefit both the worker and the contractor or employer.

Unfortunately, this situation can lead to exploitation, since in many instances the homemaker is classified as self-employed and consequently will be responsible for making his or her own contribution to social security. In this way, the homemaker may be denied access to certain security benefits, such as holidays with pay and payment for overtime or even paid sick leave. These workers, because they are unsupervised, are also unable to have regulated hours of work and are frequently unable to provide proof of the number of hours worked.

In Barbados, homeworkers have traditionally been employed in the garment industry, but given the changes in our economic climate, that particular industry has shown a downward trend. However, it is envisaged that with the increasing shift to computerization and information technology, the homeworkers of the future will be employed in a wide range of occupations. It is therefore incumbent on governments to seek ways to protect these workers from possible exploitation. Consequently it will be necessary to re-examine the status of these workers with a view to setting standards for the way they work.

In Barbados, it has long been recognized that while we have legislation which regulates conditions in factories, many accidents occur in non-factory enterprises. Indeed, in 1994 my country's records showed that 198 persons were injured in factory accidents, while 251 received injuries in non-factory accidents. These accidents have signalled the need to broaden the scope of labour inspection and embrace a wider category of business enterprise. This problem has made it necessary to upgrade inspection techniques to improve occupational safety and health through a draft occupational safety and health bill. This bill includes provisions which are intended to increase the scope of inspections by the factory inspectorate, extending its surveillance to other establishments and thereby creating improved occupational safety and health standards generally. In addition, my Ministry has supported the factory inspectorate in its collaboration with the hotel sector, and a safety and health code has been launched for that sector. This was considered necessary because the statistical data confirm a high incidence of accidents in the hotel industry.

As we deliberate over the course of the next three weeks, I trust that we shall be constantly mindful of our responsibilities as governments and as representatives of the Employers and Workers, and re-dedicate ourselves to the cause of creating social justice for all.

Original Spanish: Mr. DUCREUX (Government delegate, Panama) – It is an honour for me as head of the delegation of the Republic of Panama to address you from one of the most prestigious fora of the United Nations.

On behalf of my Government and delegation, we extend our greetings to the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, as well as to each and every one of the distinguished members of the delegations of countries represented in this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

We are also particularly pleased to greet and congratulate Mr. José Francisco Rosales Argüello, Minister of Labour of Nicaragua, upon his election as President of this 82nd Session.

Panama like all developing countries is confronted with the major challenge of the massive creation of productive employment as part of its priority national objective of progress to full employment. In order to achieve this aim, we have adopted and put into effect new macroeconomic policies accompanied by an ambitious programme of economic reform which seeks to derive maximum benefit from the liberalization of international trade and the expansion of foreign direct investment, but without infringing basic labour standards. Our aim is to rapidly create an advantageous and competitive environment that will guarantee labour-intensive internal economic growth that offers a share of the benefits of the increasing globalization of the economy.

The process of globalization certainly signals important net benefits for the international community. However, the question we put to ourselves is how are these net benefits to be distributed? What will be the geographic mobility of foreign direct investment, and will it benefit all equally? We are particularly concerned about the fate of the 47 least-developed or least-privileged countries which have not so far received one ounce of the benefits generated by increased trade and foreign investment.

We are also concerned about the fate of the least-developed, least-privileged countries of sub-Saharan Africa and of Latin America oppressed by growing inequality and exclusion from the global economy.

"Poverty anywhere represents a danger to prosperity everywhere", states the Declaration of Philadelphia. We all share the same planet, and the fate of this planet is inextricably linked to the principle of global interdependence and solidarity.

It is absolutely necessary to define the reference framework and the scope of the social dimension of the globalization process. We must not lose sight of the fact that global economic growth must be no more than a means, and that the true end is the well-being of mankind. It is logical and just to believe that international trade liberalization must erase the borders of inequality not only between nations but also between the men and women who inhabit them.

The Republic of Panama believes that strengthening and intensifying international cooperation, with a strong presence and dedication on the part of the ILO, is the most effective instrument to counter the growing risks of globalization that leaves aside the social dimension. What is urgently needed is a firm foundation for a new system of global cooperation providing benefits for all without any kind of national or social exclusion.

We therefore support the idea of launching and consolidating a new international economic system aimed at preserving the integrity of basic labour standards. We need to reform the international monetary system, coordinate macroeconomic policies at an international level, alleviate the trauma suffered by economies in transition and, in particular, adopt rigorous measures to facilitate the effective incorporation of the least-developed and most-indebted countries into the international economic integration process. We feel that it is especially important that, as quickly as possible, a proposal be submitted to a world conference at the highest level aimed at relieving the debt of the most disadvantaged countries, and at granting special trade preferences to the least developed and least privileged.

Allow me briefly to inform you of Panama's achievements in promoting employment, increasing production and reducing poverty. The new President of Panama, Mr. Pérez Balladares has launched a vast national modernization plan to promote economic efficiency, based on labour legislation modernization (in negotiation with workers, employers and with the advice and assistance of the ILO) privatization of major public services and state enterprises, the widespread application of production incentives, the rigorous rationalization of public expenditure, the development of high-grade infrastructure, and the adoption of a trade and industry plan backed up by sound macroeconomic management to attract foreign direct inward investment and encourage major multinationals to set up in our country, as well as an aggressive programme of public investment to provide science and technology training for our human resources. Finally, it must be emphasized here that this multifaceted plan will safeguard the fundamental interests of our working class as enshrined in our Constitution, and in the international instruments of the ILO and other organizations to which we have subscribed.

Mr. CHETWIN (Government delegate, New Zealand) – I congratulate the President on his election to the chair of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. My Minister regrets that he is unable this year to maintain the tradition of ministerial attendance from our country, but he wishes the Conference well in its deliberations.

The New Zealand Government welcomes the opportunity for discussion of the Director-General's Report Promoting employment. The Government also commends the Director-General's decision to launch a series of regular reports on employment.

As the Director-General says, the task of creating sufficient new jobs to overcome unemployment ranks as the primary challenge for economic and social policy in countries across the globe.

The New Zealand Government has focused both economic and social policies on creating new jobs and hence reducing unemployment. This focus reflects the Government's concern with the negative economic and social impacts of unemployment and the recognition, as highlighted by the Director-General, that a stable rate of productive job creation is the mainspring of equitable economic and social development.

The New Zealand Government established a prime ministerial Task Force on employment in early 1994. That Task Force comprised 11 members drawn from government, employers, trade unions, Maori, education and business. After consulting communities throughout the country, the Task Force released its final report, Proposals for action, in November 1994. This report presented 120 proposals designed to help achieve the goal which the Task Force had set for itself – that all those who want it should have the opportunity for paid work. More recently, a group representing the Government and two other parliamentary political parties has been meeting on a regular basis to discuss the employment Task Force's proposals. That multi-party group expects to release later this month a memorandum of understanding on these 120 proposals. The New Zealand Government believes that this process has been a particularly effective way of engaging all parts of society in addressing a major economic and social issue.

For many years New Zealand was in the enviable position of having very low rates of unemployment. However, from the late 1970s and through the 1980s, unemployment in New Zealand rose steadily to reach a peak of almost 11 per cent in 1991. Since then unemployment has fallen sharply to 6.6 per cent. In the March quarter of this year there were more people in employment in New Zealand than ever before.

The recent decline in unemployment has had the greatest impact on the long-term unemployed, those seeking work for 26 weeks or more, whose numbers have declined by 36.5 per cent between March 1994 and March 1995. We believe this reflects the concerted effort which has been put into assisting this group.

As the Director-General's Report recognizes, the key to increasing employment is economic growth. New Zealand's recent improved economic performance reflects strong economic growth. In the two years to December 1994 real gross domestic product increased by 12.2 per cent. Over these last two years employment increased by 9 per cent. Of the new jobs created, some 70 per cent have been in full-time employment.

Our improved growth performance has been achieved through a comprehensive programme of macroeconomic and microeconomic reforms. In particular, the New Zealand Government has worked to achieve low inflation and strong government finances, in order to create a stable and supportive economic environment in which people, and business, can have confidence.

Stable and predictable macroeconomic conditions are necessary to create sustainable growth in output and jobs. However, they are not sufficient on their own. In New Zealand, therefore, we have implemented an integrated set of regulatory and structural reforms to create an open, competitive economic environment which encourages investment, innovation and the creation of productive jobs.

The New Zealand economy has been opened up to international influences and all the opportunities that international trade can bring, and to support international competitiveness, product markets have been deregulated.

Finally, education and training policies have been reformed. The New Zealand Government sees education and training as a life-long process. It has put in place a qualifications framework which will ensure national recognition of training received, whether in the workplace or through formal education. Industry training has also been reformed to provide more autonomy to industries to address their own training needs.

The New Zealand Government sees the way the labour market operates as central to the success of economic growth in creating employment. Labour market regulation was significantly reformed in 1991, with the introduction of the Employment Contracts Act. The Act introduced reforms designed to broaden the options available to both employers and employees while maintaining fundamental employee protections. These changes were a key point of the New Zealand Government's strategy to create an environment which fosters job growth and economic benefits for the community as a whole.

The ILO plays a crucial role in promoting and monitoring international labour standards and hence labour market regulation. The way in which the ILO pursues this role has the potential to have an important influence on many member States' abilities to turn economic growth into employment growth.

The New Zealand Government supports the advancement of the ILO's role in promoting respect for fundamental labour standards through its standard-setting activities. At the same time, the New Zealand Government has made clear its concerns about attempts to establish linkages between international trade and labour standards as a basis for trade measures to enforce such standards. The focus of the ILO's attention should be on how it can promote wider subscription to its standards in their own right. For this purpose, it is important that its standards be based on clear principles. They should also be able to accommodate the diversity of member countries while promoting core universally accepted principles. ILO standards should avoid relying on too much prescription. There is a risk that the purpose of the underlying principles may be lost in the layers of detailed prescription surrounding it.

In a rapidly changing world, international labour standards also need to be continually reviewed and updated. The ILO therefore needs to maintain under constant review the appropriateness, effectiveness and relevance of its standards so as to ensure that they work in support of economic and employment growth.

The ILO must also seek to carry out its role by the most efficient and productive means possible. This is a difficult task, but it is a critical one when many of the Organization's Members are facing severe financial constraints. The New Zealand Government recognizes the efforts made by the ILO to maintain an efficient level of operations and service in recent years. However, the Government believes that scope for more systematic change still exists.

The ILO has pursued a policy of zero real growth in recent years. As has been drawn to the Organization's attention, such a policy impacts hardest on member States which have been forced to accept zero or negative nominal growth in their national administrations in order to achieve sustainable financial positions. Many of them also face the often quite voracious bite of the exchange rate.

In this context, New Zealand may have some useful experience to share. A high premium has been placed in New Zealand on prioritizing Government expenditure and obtaining the maximum value from limited resources. This has required a careful and systematic specification of the outputs produced, constant vigilance of the mix of human and financial input, and continual evaluation of outcomes.

The New Zealand Government believes that these features ought to be given consideration in the ILO, with a view to achieving further progress in improving efficiency and productivity. In other words some fundamental structural and systematic changes should be contemplated.

The New Zealand Government recognizes that much remains to be done, both nationally and internationally, to reduce unemployment. Unemployment remains at unacceptably high levels in New Zealand and in many other member countries. Recent gains have to be built on. As the Director-General points out, there will also be a need for cooperative international action in finding the best solutions to the pressing problems of unemployment.

New Zealand looks forward to assisting the ILO in achieving its stated objectives. While New Zealand still has much to learn, we believe our domestic and international experiences, coupled with our demonstrated commitment to the ILO, show that we also have much to offer.

Mr. MOUSHOUTTAS (Minister of Labour and Social Insurance, Cyprus) – On behalf of the Republic of Cyprus, I would like to congratulate Mr Rosales Argüello on his well-deserved election to the Presidency of this Conference. I have no doubt that his considerable experience and skills will guide our deliberations to a successful conclusion. Sincere congratulations are also due to the Director-General of the ILO for taking the initiative to place on the agenda of this year's Conference the important issue of promoting employment. This is indeed very timely, in view of the recent adoption at the World Summit for Social Development of a Declaration and Programme of Action which focuses, inter alia, on the expansion of productive employment and the reduction of unemployment. Today, on the threshold of the twenty first-century, many countries are justifiably proud of having achieved enviable living standards for their entire population. Moreover, the sudden halt of the Cold War and the eventual triumph of democracy have created a climate of euphoria and rising expectations for a better and more equitable world. Despite the considerable economic progress achieved, there is no question that the world is going through the worst employment crisis since the 1930s. The crisis affects with varying degrees of intensity all countries irrespective of their stage of development. The persistence of high levels of unemployment and underemployment represent the senseless waste of resources, leads to social exclusion and poverty, weakens social cohesion and stability and undermines the very foundations of our society. The fact that the world community has finally decided to rank the problem of unemployment high on the international agenda is an indication that it is no longer willing to tolerate the continuation of this undesirable economic and social situation which defies economic logic. The Declaration adopted by the World Summit for Social Development expresses clearly the political commitment of Heads of State to take all necessary steps to tackle these problems effectively. The current employment crisis is worldwide in scope although, as many have erroneously suggested, it is not an inevitable consequence of inexorable economic forces but rather reflects the failure of economic and social policies and of the functioning of the international institutional framework.

We are now convinced that the production of employment is not only a domestic concern but also a global issue. It requires appropriate and coherent domestic policies supported by suitable international action. We know that this is not an easy task and that the problems cannot be resolved instantly and without cost. We are also convinced that if the pursuit of full employment becomes the primary objective of economic policies and if the international framework is reformed so as to make possible the achievement of high rates of promotion without endangering the external and internal stability of the countries, the elimination of unacceptably high levels of unemployment is both a feasible and realistic aim. The need for coherent international and domestic policies is greater than ever. Appropriate strategy could include the coordination of macroeconomic policy with a view to stimulating effective demand and inducing global growth, further liberalization of trade, the adoption of export-oriented policies by developing countries, as well as attracting foreign direct investment.

The developing countries should intensify their efforts for economic reform by creating a climate conducive to competitive economic action. They should be granted greater trade concessions and generous assistance to strengthen their productive capacity and to alleviate their debt burden. If we are to tackle effectively underemployment and unemployment special attention should be given to the improvement of traditional agriculture and productivity in the urban informal sector.

Developed countries, on the other hand, should take a more positive and longer-term view on trade liberalization while combatting protectionist tendencies. Moreover, it is essential that governments, in close cooperation and with active participation of the social partners, assign top priority to the creation of employment at the centre of their national policies and strategies and promote human resource development and re-establish a social pact which will make collective bargaining possible and compatible with full employment.

It is true that today's developments in the world economy such as the liberalization of trade, investment flows, the globalization of production and the introduction of new technology will affect the structure of production and growth and will involve considerable shifts of employment. At the same time, it represents a unique opportunity which will trigger high rates of growth and job creation.

The process of adjustment to globalization in the pursuit of full employment will be painful and will not only be beneficial but also costly. It is imperative that the interests of the workers should be safeguarded, due regard being taken of the basic ILO standards and other international instruments. We emphasize that it is of the utmost importance to incorporate social objectives into our economic policies. The adoption of economic objectives irrespective of their social consequences will not serve our aim for steady growth and social justice.

To restore full employment is a formidable challenge. The problem is global, multi-dimensional and controversial. The way forward is full of difficulties. There is no simple painless solution. National action is constrained by internal obstacles to reform, and is also linked to external economic factors. Only a concerted major international cooperative effort based on a comprehensive strategy supported by coherent and consistent national policies can tackle the seemingly complex and insoluble problems stemming from underemployment and unemployment. If we are successful in our efforts we shall lift the underprivileged millions from poverty and misery and thus contribute to the establishment of a just and equitable international economic and social order.

Mr. LEE (Minister for Labour, Singapore) – May I first of all congratulate the President on his election to chair the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that under his able leadership, and with the benefit of his many years of extensive experience this Conference will proceed smoothly to reach a successful conclusion.

We are meeting under generally favourable conditions. The world economy grew by 3.1 per cent in 1994, and is expected to do better this year. The IMF forecasts that the world economy will expand by 3.6 per cent in 1995, notwithstanding the current turmoil in exchange rates among major trading nations. Growth however, will continue to be unevenly distributed with economies in the developing world growing much faster than in the industrialized countries. While the economic growth rates of the developed countries is expected to be in the region of 2.7 per cent this year, growth in the developing countries is expected to be more than double that at 5.6 per cent. The expected growth rate for the Asian NIEs is even higher at 7.3 per cent.

The rapid growth of the Asian NIEs and ASEAN, together with China, India and Viet-Nam, have made the Asia Pacific the most dynamic economic region in the world. For example, between 1985 and 1993 ASEAN members enjoyed real per capita GNP growth ranging from 1.6 per cent to 8.4 per cent per annum. The potential for further growth is enormous. Sustained economic growth in these countries has created jobs, prosperity and improved standards of living for countless millions. Per capita income in most of these countries has risen. In conjunction with economic growth, important aspects of social development, such as education, health care and employment conditions have also improved.

The setting up of the World Trade Organization (WTO) on 1 January this year is a significant milestone in the history of global trade. The promotion of free trade is the fundamental objective of the agreement reached in the Uruguay Round that led to the creation of the WTO. It has been estimated that global trade will increase by over US$500 billion annually by the year 2005, as a result of freer trade made possible within the framework of WTO.

My own country, Singapore, is a strong believer and practitioner of the principles of free trade. We believe that trade liberalization will lead to market expansion, increased investment and job creation. Free trade is vital for the developing countries. A rational and equitable system of free trade will enable them to have better access to capital, technology and markets for economic development. It will also provide them with the opportunity to achieve economic growth and create jobs for their people. With economic growth and a higher volume of trade in the developing world, the developed countries will also benefit from the greater investment opportunities, and the supply of goods and services needed to support the expanded economic activities in the developing countries. In this respect, the OECD has correctly advised its member countries not to view the emerging economies of the developing world as a threat. Rather, they should take advantage of the benefits to be gained from the improved trade links with the developing countries. The OECD has rightly adopted the view that rapid expansion of the economies in the developing world would provide a fresh impetus for OECD growth.

With the establishment of the WTO, countries need to work towards achieving greater trade liberalization so that the benefits of free trade can be maximized. Trade liberalization must be supported by deregulation and the removal of market rigidities. Countries which aim to benefit from a more open trading system must work towards removing existing trade restrictions which stifle free trade, and resist the imposition of new ones.

One aspect of new trade restrictions is the linking of labour standards to trade access, otherwise known as the social clause. The issue of linking trade to the enforcement of labour standards has been discussed extensively at various international fora, including the ILO. While some developed countries have pushed for the social clause, the developing countries have resisted strongly, on the grounds that such linkage will lead to the imposition of unrealistic labour standards on them. They are also concerned that the linkage of the social clause to international trade may evolve into a disguised form of protectionism, aimed at eroding their competitiveness.

In his speech in Bangkok on 29 May 1995, the World Trade Organization's Director-General, Mr. Renato Ruggiero, stated that trade restriction measures would not solve or even contribute to alleviating the problem of social standards. He also added that "protectionist measures will create new barriers between developed and developing countries, and reduce growth prospects". We are much heartened by his remarks.

Like other Asian countries, Singapore is concerned that labour standards may be linked to international trade. Our fear is that this could lead to trade restrictions which run contrary to the WTO's efforts to promote more liberal global trade. It would also have detrimental effects on investments and job creation, and retard improvements in social conditions within the developing countries. Linking labour standards to international trade, particularly resorting to trade sanctions for non-compliance with standards, is more likely to give rise to acrimonious trade conflicts and opportunities for protectionism rather than trade promotion. In this connection, the ILO Governing Body's Working Party on the Social Dimensions of the Liberalization of International Trade has made a wise decision to suspend further discussion of the link between international trade and social standards through a sanctions-based social clause mechanism, and to reconvene later this year on the understanding that it would not pursue the question of trade sanctions. I wish to commend the Working Party for such a far-sighted decision and to endorse this approach wholeheartedly.

Given that linking labour standards to international trade could have detrimental effects on global trade and economic growth, and in view of the grave concern of developing countries, I would like to suggest that the ILO look for other ways to help member States to undertake economic and social development. One alternative is for the ILO to focus greater attention on the promotion of economic activities and employment creation with a view to gradually improving the social standards of member States. As the developing countries progress economically and more jobs are created, improvement of their social conditions will be a natural consequence. This is the experience of the developed countries, whose current social conditions are very much the result of many years of sustained economic progress. This is also the collective experience of the Asian NIEs.

Singapore, like all other members of the ILO, supports labour standards which are aimed at improving the economic and social well-being of workers. It is our firm belief that in the pursuit of economic development, governments everywhere must ensure that the workers' basic rights and protection are respected. Countries should also work towards realizing the ideals and objectives as stipulated in the various ILO Conventions. However, ILO standards should also reflect the prevailing conditions in member countries which are at different stages of development.

Of the 175 Conventions adopted by the ILO, the average number of Conventions ratified by each member State is 35. Other than the 25 OECD countries, whose average number of ratifications is 67, the average number for the rest of the ILO member countries is 30. Amongst the Asian and Pacific countries, excluding Australia, New Zealand and Japan, which ratified 54, 56 and 41 Conventions respectively, the number of ratifications by other member States is even smaller, averaging only 17 Conventions per country. It is also noted that many of the Conventions have been ratified by less than ten countries. This suggests that many of the ILO Conventions may not be relevant to the member States. Hence it will be necessary for these standards to be reviewed, taking into consideration the conditions in both the developed and developing countries.

It is for this reason that in the last two years, Singapore, along with fellow ASEAN countries, had endorsed resolutions calling upon the ILO to review and update Conventions which are outdated. There was strong support from many member States, even though the resolutions were not discussed due to lack of time. I would like to reiterate our appeal for the ILO to consider a review of its many Conventions, particularly those which were formulated decades ago and have yet to be ratified extensively. There is also a need for the ILO and its executive agencies to take a less legalistic and more developmental approach in its appraisal of compliance, by which I mean that compliance should be measured against a backdrop of overall progress in the socio-economic areas.

The ILO has an important role to play in providing technical assistance to developing countries. This will be more effective in helping to improve the social and economic well-being of their workers. Technical assistance programmes for education, training, productivity improvement and the promotion of harmonious labour-management relations are what developing countries need most if they are to make greater progress in their efforts to improve their social and economic conditions. For example, the ASEAN Programme on Industrial Relations and Labour Studies, supported by the ILO and UNDP between the years 1984 and 1989, assisted ASEAN countries in promoting harmonious industrial relations, higher productivity and social justice. This Programme was particularly welcomed and well received by ASEAN countries. Having benefited from the Programme, ASEAN is currently seeking ILO's support in introducing another project as a follow-up to the earlier Programme.

In conclusion, we are living in an increasingly interdependent world. Former adversaries have now become economic allies. Countries which were formerly isolated have opened their doors to the rest of the world. The trend of increasing interdependence among countries – economically, socially and even on security and environmental issues – cannot be reversed. It is therefore important that countries should work towards greater economic cooperation through trade liberalization. Trade liberalization is not a zero-sum game. With free access to capital, technology and markets, there will be more innovation, better utilization of resources and boundless opportunities in both the developed and developing countries. Economic growth will bring about job creation and the improvement of social conditions, leading to a better quality of life for working populations worldwide.

Original Spanish: Mr. MENDEZ (Workers' delegate, Spain) – I should like to extend a warm greeting on behalf of the Spanish trade unionists whom I represent here. It is an honour for me to take the floor for the first time and this session of the International Labour Conference, an organization with an irreplaceable role to play at this moment in history, not only for the world of work, but also to ensure a future of peace, justice and progress for all peoples and countries in the international community.

I should like, as my main point, to refer to the major issue on the Agenda of this session of the Conference: employment. The problem of unemployment is so serious a one that it must lead us to the fundamental proposal of replacing traditional systems. A conformist approach cannot suffice. On the contrary, the more we realize just how enormous and complex the world's unemployment phenomenon has become, the clearer we will perceive the need to devise new forms of action and to put them into effect.

What characterizes the international economic situation is the lack of even the slightest world "order" and the inability of governments alone to decide on the course of events. This is a situation which is allowing the development of what has been called the dictatorship of the financial markets which frequently act contrary to the general interest and which escape from even the slightest democratic control.

It is therefore absolutely essential to restore political and economic primacy by instituting common rules and mechanisms for settling disputes in a way that will defend and promote the general public interest. This is the only way to respond to economic change and the situation it brings about: globalization, new technologies, demographic change, etc. However, adjusting to these new realities is not enough; we also, and above all, need political and social innovation.

If alarm about growing unemployment is felt worldwide, in Spain – which has one of the highest unemployment rates in the industrialized world, as was so appropriately pointed out by the President of the Conference in his opening statement – it is a matter of prime concern for the whole trade union movement. Although high rates of job creation were marked up in the mid-1980's, the spectacular growth in unemployment that subsequently occurred, demonstrates the existence of a serious structural problem.

There is wide agreement on the nature of the problem but much less on the way to tackle it. Strongly influenced by economic convergence policies espoused by the European Union which does not consider employment one of its immediate priorities, the measures taken have been for economic adjustment rather than for employment creation. The result has been paradoxical up to now. No great success has been achieved in resolving macro-economic imbalances and the chronic unemployment problem has got even worse.

The labour-market measures taken have resulted in: increased labour flexibility which has meant infringement of essential minimal legal rights and the encouragement of temporary and part-time contracts; constant wage moderation even though successive devaluations have made Spanish prices internationally very competitive; loss of the purchasing power of minimum wages; and a reduction in the protection provided by unemployment benefits.

The first quarter of 1995 has witnessed a marked fall in the number of unemployed and an increase of 90,000 in the number of jobs. However, the key features of the current situation are a 23.5 per cent unemployment rate – twice the European average – together with a pronounced split in the labour market. In 1994, 110,000 permanent jobs were lost whereas the number of casual jobs increased by 193,000. Out of every 100 workers, 34 are in precarious employment. Added to this is a ten-point reduction in the unemployment coverage rate as the result of successive cuts, and virtually half the unemployed are now without benefits.

Even with this background and the rigorous labour reforms that have recently been introduced, there are still voices calling for the screw to be tightened further. We, in contrast, reject any demand to reduce costs by cutting employment under no matter what pretext.

What is a suitable alternative? I believe that the Director-General's Report Promoting employment, is a sound basis for discussion. I agree first of all that unemployment in Europe and poverty and inequality in the United States are not acceptable solutions to the unemployment problem industrialized countries are facing today.

Second, it seems to me that the main cause of massive unemployment is the restrictive economic policies implemented by industrialized countries over the last two decades.

Third, the Report looks at factors frequently considered the cause of unemployment: wage rigidity, collective bargaining systems, unemployment benefits, minimum wages, dismissal costs, etc.

The evidence given by research does not allow us to draw final conclusions on the impact these factors have on unemployment. In other cases, research results show clearly and simply that the impact of many of these factors on unemployment is insignificant.

With this in mind, we can focus discussion on the true causes of unemployment and on how to solve them without losing further time discussing peripheral issues such as those mentioned to which we are not able to find real solutions.

Specifically, what is needed is to reduce working time and to achieve a gradual social reorganization of employment. It is absolutely essential that action to meet basic social needs, such as local services, environmental conservation, and protection of public heritage, must be classified as effective work and constitute activities that are legally protected and financially remunerated. These are some of the substantive social transformations which have to be undertaken in the near future in order to make the basic objective of full employment – dear to us trade unionists – a reality. The complex nature of these problems should not act as a deterrent but on the contrary as a stimulus to move ahead. True, there is much inertia and vested interests to overcome, albeit with full realization that it is not a question of unattainable utopias but rather necessary endeavours which will bear fruit.

In close connection with the aforementioned I would like to emphasize one aspect we consider to be fundamental: the re-establishment of the important notion of the public sphere which is being systematically attacked and reduced by the prevailing neo-liberal ideology. We need solid democratic re-public powers, not only to reduce certain market inefficiencies but also to implement an active policy for redistributing wealth and promoting social integration.

The public powers must have the appropriate instruments in order to accomplish this task and promote the necessary changes. It is absolutely essential to promote and improve public services, social equipment and infrastructure; otherwise there can be no lasting prosperity and the volume of employment that our societies need cannot be created.

Two final issues: First, the need to effectively implement the conclusions from the Copenhagen Summit. We are totally in favour of the ILO acting as one of the driving forces in providing political and technical direction and guidance in order to improve the situation of employment, the main commitment of the World Summit for Social Development. The ILO, which has played a fundamental role in the outcome of this Summit, is the competent Organization in matters involving employment and labour standards within the United Nations system; it should provide the follow-up of the Programme of Action.

Another issue that I wish to raise once again on behalf of the trade unionists of my country, is the need for a social clause in trade relations in order to create respect for fundamental human and social rights, such as freedom of association, collective bargaining, the abolition of forced labour and child labour. With respect to the latter, it must be eliminated once and for all without delay, starting with the most abject forms of child exploitation such as forced labour, working with hazardous substances, and the elimination of all forms of commercial exploitation of minors. I should like to express my gratitude to the Spanish Government for having significantly participated in cooperative efforts in order to abolish child labour, which would not have been possible without the widespread mobilization of Spanish society, especially its young people, with 0.7 per cent of GNP allocated to development cooperation, a campaign in which the trade unions also participated actively.

A few months ago, Iqbal Masih, a 12-year-old boy, was assassinated for having defended the child slaves working in the rug industry. Many other anonymous children have fared no better. May their memory further strengthen our resolve to eradicate every form of exploitation.

Mr. CASIANO (Minister of Labour and Administrative Reform, Sudan) – Allow me to congratulate the President, at the outset of this session, on his election to the presidency of this Conference. I am sure that his wisdom and experience will lead our deliberations to a fruitful conclusion.

I would like as well to express my thanks to the Director-General of the ILO for his excellent choice of "Promoting Employment" as the subject of his Report to this session of the Conference. The choice is suitable because of its pertinence to all members of the Organization at all levels of development. It is, moreover, a timely and opportune work, for it addresses the role that should be played by the ILO in contributing to the Programme of Action which was adopted by the recent World Summit for Social Development for the promotion of employment as a basic priority of economic and social practice.

The issue of employment promotion is of great importance to the developing countries. The Director-General, in the part of his Report concerning the developing countries, enumerated a number of facts that show negative developments in the employment situation in the sub-Saharan region.

The causes of these negative developments have been well documented. They include the implementation of structural adjustment programmes, the price collapse of Africa's primary export commodities in world markets, unfair terms of trade, high inflationary pressure, a heavy debt burden, adverse climatic conditions, internal conflicts, civil war, and refugee problems, etc.

The Sudan, being in the same region, is also suffering from these problems that hamper the creation and promotion of employment. Hence it is evident that fostering employment in this region requires redressing these problems both at the national and international levels.

The Sudan for its part is launching a ten-year national comprehensive strategy plan that embodies objectives and priorities for employment promotion. Within this strategy, the agricultural sector provides the means of living for the majority of our population. It also generates the most export revenues.

The growth potential of the agricultural sector becomes apparent when looked at from the point of view of huge untapped agricultural resources. In addition, vertical expansion is possible through the modernization of the irrigation system and the application of appropriate agricultural packaging and practices. Another priority lies in agro-based industries. Processing agricultural outputs can generate more employment opportunities and increase the value added in Sudan. The Government considers agriculture as the leading sector, and therefore all policies and actions are directed to tackling the current problems blocking an increase in agricultural production. The liberalization policy is of great importance. The Government has provided incentives for producers.

An evaluation of the strategy behind the 1991-94 first economic programme revealed that the agricultural sector attained an average annual growth rate of 21 per cent. This positively affected an average growth rate in GDP that reached 10.2 per cent during the period of the programme.

The contribution of the manufacturing sector to GDP is 16 per cent, and it provides employment to around 5.5 per cent of the country's labour force. The sector is encountering a host of problems that makes it operate at low levels of capacity utilization.

Recognizing the loss in value added, the Government is concerned with the rehabilitation of this sector in order to generate more employment opportunities.

The services sector accounts for the absorption of the rest of the labour force. In fact, a considerable amount of the urban labour force finds work in the informal sector. At present, the Government is conducting an active privatization programme which will affect public employment. Given the limited employment generation prospects of the formal sector in both the public and private sectors, the Government is encouraging self-employment and family enterprise through training, financing and the provision of tools and implements. The endowment and zakat funds are the major funding institutions for these activities.

These efforts are supported in the first place by government human resource development and utilization priorities, which can be summarized as follows:

- (1) increasing technical education to cover 60 per cent of general education, and expansion of vocational training activities;
- (2) enhancing the institutional capacity in the fields of employment planning, employment services and labour market information;
- (3) upgrading the council for productive family schemes, and ensuring effective coordination with employment and vocational training institutions;
- (4) conducting special public works programmes in many part of the country;
- (5) encouraging self-employment and designing special employment programmes for special groups;
- (6) reviewing wage structures and labour laws to secure and promote labour standards, enhancing productivity and creating a favourable investment climate.

Besides creating employment opportunities which aim to enhance social cohesion, the promotion and encouragement of popular participation is one of Sudan's main objectives. The aim is to generate a civil society that takes initiatives in programme formulation and implementation.

The people's full participation is encouraged. The right to organize is guaranteed. Employers' and workers' organizations participate at all decision-making levels. Grass-roots organizations are also empowered to take part in all the development aspects of their localities. The equitable distribution of wealth, power and public service is ensured thanks to the adoption of a federal system of government.

Peace initiatives are supported by building a strong foundation for peace. The peace initiatives sponsored by IGAAD have met with a favourable response.

The success of national development strategies oriented towards economic growth, equity, employment promotion and the alleviation of poverty in sub-Saharan Africa requires a favourable international economic environment. That environment should pave the way to equitable and preferential world trade, substantial capital flows and a definitive solution to the debt problem of the least developed countries.

We thus call on this international body to endorse the view expressed by the Director-General, who has appealed to the international community to make adequate provision for adjustment assistance to countries facing the largest problems in this respect, such as the least developed countries.

In this regard we are looking forward to seeing the ILO play a political role in strengthening technical assistance, taking initiatives, coordinating efforts with United Nations agencies, the Bretton Woods institutions and prospective donors, so as to provide the backing required for development and to support national development strategies in sub-Saharan regions.

Concentrating on the issue of removing obstacles to development from the path of the suffering people of the world, the international community must address fundamental problems so as to bring lasting peace and an end to world conflict.

Mr. GENDA (Government delegate, Sierra Leone) – On behalf of the Government of Sierra Leone, I wish to address this Conference on the Director-General's important topic of world employment and its ensuing problems around the globe, and also on the employment issues in the work of the International Labour Organization.

Our delegation is convinced that under the liberal guidance of your supreme office the Conference will be successful in promoting the maintenance of the international status quo in terms of a more global employment promotion perspective by way of adequately generating employment and preparing the rising population in each member country to live and work in that country.

As those of you attending this Conference may recall in my speech to the 80th Session of the ILO Conference in 1993, I had made hints on the problems of unemployment, poverty, imbalance, crises and economic and political insecurity. In Sierra Leone as in other developing countries these problems still remain the enemies of the people. Because of these problems there have been no improvements or changes in the industrial composition of Sierra Leone. The few industries in the country tend to concentrate in the western areas. Some of them are incapable of processing the home raw materials as well as producing substitutes for imported goods. The economic stagnation, which has been aggravated by the rebel war in the country, is attended by the high, prolonged level of unemployment and underemployment that has resulted in 'abject poverty of the people.

The Government's effort to revive the crippled economy and attract investment which is an essential instrument for bringing the country's economy closer to full employment has been frustrated by the rebel war. This war has paralysed the major public and private employment sectors leaving thousands of Sierra Leoneans out of jobs. It has reduced mobility throughout the country and in the majority of cases rural farmers or agricultural workers are being forced out of their respective areas only to flood into the western areas and urban towns where wage-earning employment opportunities are slender.

These problems have led to a general feeling in Sierra Leone that industrial development, unemployment and underemployment are the salient points or issues that have to be central to economic and employment strategies of the country. There is a further feeling that industrialization is the only meaningful way of raising per capita income in Sierra Leone and that full employment can only be achieved when the country is highly industrialized to a stage where most of her basic needs for both capital and consumer goods are produced locally especially those regarded as essential.

In this regard our delegation is suggesting that the impetus for promoting industrialization and productive employment for the purpose of achieving a sustained economic growth, particularly in developing countries, must come through productive investments and technical aid provided by the great industrial nations like the United States, Canada, Great Britain, France, West Germany, the Netherlands, Japan, Switzerland and several others. Such investments and aid will encourage the expansion of domestic savings and the inflow of financial resources from the said industrial nations to address the problems of unemployment, underemployment and poverty now facing the developing countries which have vast investment gaps that need to be closed.

It is hoped that all the delegates from industrial nations will take an active interest in our delegations' suggestion without any reservation. Their efforts to invest and develop industries in developing countries will not only lead to a trusting relationship between the two sides but will also promote democratic participation. Such participation will not be achieved without ensuring peace and economic well-being of developing nations.

While expressing our delegations' appreciation to the active partnership policy of the ILO which is fervently hoping to promote employment programmes for Sierra Leone and other member countries which lack employment opportunities, our Government would like to suggest that additional financial and human resources with technical aid should be made available to all regional offices to enable them to promote permanent full employment with sufficient living wages for those regional populations with serious barriers to employment opportunities. Additional efforts are also needed to develop new direction programmes to assist the displaced and distressed individuals around the globe especially those who have been forced out of their agricultural and traditional employment by various kinds of war. Such programmes require wider participation by all member countries. Such participations serve as an expression of caring for the welfare of the suffering people of each region.

Although Sierra Leone is confronted with the rebel war, our Government remains genuinely committed to the idea of returning this country to a democratic environment, which is now inevitable.

So, our delegation is pleased to inform the Conference that on 27 April 1995, which marked the 34th Independence Anniversary of Sierra Leone, the Chairman of the National Provisional Ruling Council, His Excellency Captain Valentine E.M. Strasser, unconditionally announced a return to a democratic civilian rule and thus gave the mandate to organizations and groups to participate in the political process of the country by applying for fresh registrations of their respective political parties, based on a code of conduct governing the political activities of all political parties.

Original French: Mrs. SASSO MAZZUFFERI (Employers' delegate, Italy) – I would like to congratulate the President on his election. I am convinced that with his experience and abilities he will make this Conference a great success.

The Report of the Director-General is marked by its positive proposals, it therefore merits constructive responses on our part.

The Italian employers reaffirm their interest in the quest for a lasting solution to the problems discussed in it.

The Report brings out in all its cruelty the nature of unemployment, which in most countries is structural and therefore calls for interventions of a permanent kind, going beyond the short-term remedies which worked in the past.

It would, however, be a serious mistake to entertain any illusion that solution will be easy or rapid. It will be necessary to tackle this grave situation with pragmatism and resolve by using innovative instruments.

The Report is weak in this regard, especially with respect to its assessment of a tool such as flexibility which, in my opinion, constitutes mainly a response to the competitive scenario occasioned by the technological developments and globalization of the markets.

Indeed, on the threshold of the year 2000, technological progress leaves an abiding mark on traditional behaviour and values, with extraordinary repercussions on the competitive system.

In a future which has already begun, the employment relationship is destined itself to evolve as a result.

In a perspective which requires close integration between all the elements of the productive process rather than the observance of rigid rules, an ability to coordinate rather than to be coordinated, a capacity for continuous improvement rather than a maintenance of fixed standards, we can already foresee that subordination, which was one of the fundamental characteristics of traditional labour relations, will no longer have the fundamental value it has had until now. Developments in telematics, and in distance working confirm these trends.

The response to the changes made necessary by this new scenario seems to be the "networking of firms" in which participation in goals to be achieved, coordination and continuity are what count.

In this context, the future of collective labour relations lies in the ability of the trade unions and firms to promote, on the one hand, cohesion among the various elements of the system, and on the other hand flexibility in labour relations in a framework of adequate guarantees which do not stifle the entrepreneurial spirit and the progress it brings.

Consequently, in the labour market, flexible forms of labour relations and the modernization of placement, training and vocational retraining systems are instruments which may win out in the fight against unemployment.

With respect to the industrial countries, the Report addresses the problem of high wage levels and their effect on employment. This approach seems one-sided to us because it highlights only one aspect of the question, while underestimating the burden of indirect wage costs, which the conclusions of the World Summit for Social Development rightly consider as being liable to deter employers from hiring workers.

Furthermore, the Report does not attach due importance to the virtuous circle of competitiveness and employment. Indeed, an efficient and competitive enterprise is a sure source of productive jobs, provided that it is part of a framework of economic growth in which the presence of the State is not excessive and is not liable to distort the rules of the market-place. Our research has shown that excessive intrusion of the State in the economy causes an increase in the rate of unemployment.

Each country will have to seek ways and means of ensuring that technological advancement goes hand in hand with social advancement.

New job-creating areas have already been brought to light: major infrastructure networks (transport, telecommunications, power, computerization, etc.); the modernization and improvement of consumer services; the safeguarding and development of the environment, the territory and the artistic heritage. These sectors will demand the use of skilled, specialized and very professional labour.

There is thus a need for a close relationship between school and work -- a point which employers have never ceased to stress. In Italy the two Ministers concerned have reached an important agreement to reduce the gap between what the training system offers and the demands of the employment market. Our efforts have proved to be successful.

In the same vein, the ILO is producing some very satisfactory results through the International Training Centre of the ILO, Turin. Its Director, Mr. Trémeaud, deserves our gratitude and our encouragement in pursuing sound and effective management.

In this field, as well as in the broader context of safeguarding social rights, the recent World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen provided a coherent and systematic framework for an international cooperation strategy.

Italian employers share the conclusions of the Summit, especially in so far as they recognize that economic progress underlies social development, they recognize the importance of the private sector in creating jobs, employment flexibility in the labour market, the strengthening of small and medium-sized enterprises, encouragement for productive investment and the stabilization of public budgets. The view which has prevailed was that of gradually eliminating poverty and social exclusion -- hence promoting employment -- rather than the proliferation of standards and legal texts. We endorse that choice.

The ILO's mission has been invigorated as a result. The social partners are also recognized as having a role as a driving force.

We must choose the most expeditious route to achieve what is requested of us.

In our opinion, outdated standards must be revised and modernized; there should be a strengthening of the institutional mechanisms for monitoring the application of ratified standards pertaining to the fundamental rights of workers; there should be further study into the reasons for obstacles to the ratification or implementation of instruments which have been adopted in order to bring about a commitment to universal respect for Conventions which are sometimes too easily adopted formally at the Conference. And this should be done on the basis of consensus, avoiding any confrontation among the Members of our Organization.

Positive results have already been achieved in this endeavour thanks to the tripartite efforts which have been made. Italian employers are resolutely committed to the success of these efforts.

(The Conference adjourned at 5.45 p.m.)

Credentials

Brief report by Mrs. Roldan-Confesor, Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, on the credentials of delegates and advisers to the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference, Geneva, 5 June 1995

The Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office has the honour to present the customary report prescribed by Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference.

The composition of each delegation and the method of appointment of delegates and advisers to the sessions of the International Labour Conference are governed by Article 3 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization.

In accordance with paragraphs 8 and 9 of this Article, it is for the governments to communicate to the International Labour Office the nominations made. The Conference examines these nominations and decides, in the case of dispute, whether delegates and advisers have been nominated in accordance with Article 3 of the Constitution.

The Conference exercises this power in accordance with the procedure laid down in Articles 5 and 26 of its Standing Orders.

In particular, paragraph 2 of Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference provides that "A brief report upon these credentials, drawn up by the Chairman of the Governing Body, shall, with the credentials, be open to inspection by the delegates on the day before the opening of the session of the Conference and shall be published as an appendix to the record of the first sitting".

The present report is submitted in compliance with this provision. The list given in the table below was closed on Monday, 5 June 1995 at 15.00hrs in order that it might be available for inspection by the members of the delegations that same day, that is, the day before the opening of the Conference.

In addition, the present report serves for fixing provisionally, in accordance with paragraph 1(2) of Article 20 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the quorum necessary to give validity to the votes taken.

The table below, based on the files containing the names of the delegates and advisers and the credentials with which they have been provided or the official communications transmitted to the International Labour Office, shows the numerical composition of the Conference. It is to be noted in this regard that persons who have been nominated both as substitute delegates and as advisers, in the letters communicating the nominations, have been included among the advisers.

To date, 149 States have notified the names of the members of the delegations. It is to be noted that only 68 countries deposited the credentials of their delegations with the International Labour Office before 22 May 1995, that is within the 15-day deadline before the date fixed for the opening of the Conference, in compliance with paragraph 1 of Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

On the other hand, while the Conference and the Credentials Committee have already previously insisted on the obligation which Article 3 of the Constitution imposes on governments requiring them to send complete delegations to the Conference, six countries (Dominica, Ethiopia, Kyrgyzstan, Liberia, Rwanda, The Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia) had only nominated Government delegates, and one country (Eritrea) had nominated a Workers' delegate but not an Employers' delegate.

It should be noted, finally, that in the letters or telegrams communicating their nominations, a certain number of governments have not mentioned the employers' and workers' organizations which they have consulted and with which they have come to an agreement in appointing Employers' and Workers' delegates in accordance with paragraph 5 of Article 3 of the Constitution of the Organization or have not confirmed that they were paying the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers in accordance with paragraph 2(a) of Article 13 of the Constitution. In this regard, in order to ensure greater clarity in establishing the credentials, it would be advisable that governments use, for the nomination of delegates and advisers, the form enclosed with the letter of convocation and the Memorandum on the Conference which the Office addresses every year to member States.

Finally, I should like to urge delegates and advisers to register in person at the Information and Reception Desk, the quorum being calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered.

Composition of the Conference, and quorum

At present 286 Government delegates, 142 Employers' delegates and 143 Workers' delegates – a total of 571 delegates – are accredited to the Conference.

There are, in addition, 670 Government advisers, 354 Employers' advisers and 423 Workers' advisers – a total of 1447 advisers.

The total number of delegates and advisers who have been nominated in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution of the Organization to take part in the work of the Conference is 2018.

Since 18 of the States¹ now represented are in arrears in the payment of their contributions to the Organization, those Members, under the terms of paragraph 4 of Article 13 of the Constitution, may not at present participate in the voting in the Conference or any of its committees. Account is therefore not taken of 60 delegates in calculating the quorum.

In conformity with Article 17 of the Constitution of the Organization and with Article 20 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the necessary quorum to give a vote validity will provisionally be 255.

Wednesday, 7 June 1995, 10.15 a.m.

President: Mr. Rosales Argüello, Ms. Engelen-Kefer

FIRST REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda today is the first report of the Selection Committee. I would like to invite Mr. Ahmed Khan, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to come to the rostrum to submit the report.

Mr. KHAN (Government delegate, Pakistan; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – Before presenting the report of the Selection Committee, I take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Rosales Argüello on his unanimous selection as President of this Conference, which will be debating very important issues concerning employment promotion. We are confident that under his leadership the Conference will achieve its objectives.

I now turn to the presentation of my report. I have the honour to submit to the Conference the report of the Selection Committee (Provisional Record No. 4). This report deals with the election of the Officers of the Committee.

As regards the discussion of the Reports of the Chairman of the Governing Body and the Director-General, as you all know this began yesterday afternoon and the Committee has decided that the list of speakers should be closed next Wednesday, 14 June, at 12 noon, under the usual conditions. Then the Committee endorsed a general plan of work for the Conference committees which although not binding will enable the committees to organize their work so as to take maximum possible account of the overall needs and possibilities of the Conference. This plan of work is appended to its report in Appendix II.

As regards electronic voting, Appendix I of the Committee's report contains a written description of the electronic voting system which is again being used this year. The Standing Orders Committee will be considering the amendment of the Standing Orders so as to cover the conduct of voting and publication of the results. However, pending the Conference's decision on the findings of the Standing Orders Committee the Selection Committee invites the Conference to decide whether, unless the Officers of the Conference otherwise decide for a given question or a given sitting, the different methods of voting set out in article 19 of the Standing Orders shall be implemented in the plenary by means of the electronic voting system described in Appendix I.

I should like to call the attention of the members of the Conference to the proposal in the report concerning the quorum, punctuality and negotiations in committees, all of which are designed to ensure the smooth functioning of the Conference. As regards participation in Conference committees by members who have lost the right to vote, the Selection Committee recommends that the Conference should continue the practice followed in the past few years by Government members of not applying for regular membership of committees if they are not at the time in question entitled to vote.

The Selection Committee also recommends to the Conference that should this practice for any reason not be fully respected the calculation of weighting coefficients for votes in the committees should be based on the number of regular Government members entitled to vote. The electronic voting system takes this practice into consideration.

The Selection Committee suggests that the Conference authorize the Secretary-General to invite the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, a non-member State, to be represented at the present session of the Conference in accordance with article 2, paragraph 3(e), of the Conference Standing Orders.

In another recommendation the Committee suggests that certain non-governmental international organizations should be invited to take part in some committee meetings. On the basis of proposals made by the Director-General at the invitation of the Governing Body, the Selection Committee has decided to convene a special sitting of the Conference to discuss the Appendix to his Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. It took this decision on the understanding that at that sitting speakers will have to confine their remarks to the Appendix and that conversely the subject will not be discussed in the framework of the debate on the remainder of the Report. It decided that the special sitting should be held on Thursday afternoon, 15 June.

The Selection Committee recommends that the Conference allow speakers who so wish to take the floor both on the General Report and during the special sitting, it being understood that the subject to be discussed in that sitting would not be discussed in the debate on the remainder of the Report. In view of the large number of speakers who will probably wish to take the floor at the special sitting it is likely that a shorter time-limit for speakers will be necessary. The Selection Committee has accordingly decided that the list of speakers for the special sitting will be closed at 6 p.m. on Tuesday, 13 June, so as to enable the President to submit to the Conference a proposal for a time-limit for speakers at the special sitting.

The Selection Committee also noted that the Director-General intends to devote this part of his comprehensive reply to the discussion of the Report and to the lessons to be drawn from the special sitting. The Selection Committee also decided that the Finance Committee should not meet at the same time as the special sitting.

The Selection Committee has made proposals regarding the appointment of the Credentials Committee and has also made recommendations to the Conference concerning the composition of the Conference Drafting Committee.

Finally, the Officers of the Committee recommend that the Conference approve a number of changes that have occurred in the composition of committees since noon yesterday. The full lists of the composition of the committees are given in Appendix III which takes account of these changes.

I now commend the report to the Conference for adoption.

Original Spanish: THE PRESIDENT – If there are no objections, I shall take it that this report is adopted.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We shall now resume our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Spanish: Ms. MORFIN MANSILLA (Government delegate, Guatemala) – I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Chairman. My country is extremely proud to see this distinguished assembly presided over by a representative of Central America.

I would like to take this opportunity to draw attention to the continually useful role played by our Organization in adopting policies and programmes designed to improve the lot of our peoples, designed to attend to the needs of the world of work in accordance with the various prevailing trends in the world economy with a view to their future implications. The ILO's work towards the goal of full employment, job stability, vocational training, job retraining and monitoring the conditions of work, is all extremely noteworthy, quite apart from the defence of freedom of speech and association in the defence of union interests at this time of economic and political change and structural adjustment.

As a counterpart to the interest shown by the ILO in attending to workers' rights and in monitoring the socio-economic situation in Guatemala, my Government, under the presidency of Ramiro De León Carpio, understanding the transitional character of his mandate conferred in the wake of the failed coup of May 1993, has got straight down to work to lay the foundations that will make it possible for the future government, as of January 1996, to build the basis needed to improve the material conditions of the population.

This basis consists of giving priority in social policy to the commitment to fight poverty, upgrading our industries by providing them with a sound macroeconomic foundation, promoting private investment, reforming the financial system and integrating our country into the world economy, as well as environmental conservation and institutional modernization.

In this way, the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, which I have the honour to head, has undertaken specific activities, enabling us to achieve significant improvements in labour relations by encouraging dialogue between the main productive sectors. These include better protection of workers' rights and new wages policy allowing the minimum wage to be reviewed annually, as opposed to the previous policy of review every four years.

In addition, following the widespread desire to put an end to 35 years of a deplorable armed conflict, the Government is embarked on a peace process which has already achieved noticeable results and which we hope will eventually lead to the signature of peace accords and a firm and durable peace. We are, however, aware that there will be no solution to socio-economic and political conditions and problems without the involvement of all sectors of society, and without government policies which enable us to share in scientific and technological progress through training for access to new labour markets. For this purpose we have set up multisectoral bodies that do their best to achieve these objectives, and we have requested international cooperation from friendly countries.

For this reason we take great satisfaction in the contents of the Director-General's Report, in which the importance of employment creation is emphasized. We feel that the Report provides support for the measures we have taken, in particular, in the principally agricultural highland areas ignored by governments since time immemorial, and where poverty has been accentuated by the deplorable armed conflict.

Furthermore I am very happy to inform our Organization that the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), which for very many years generated great nervousness on account of our country's multi-ethnic and multicultural composition, was recently submitted to the Constitutional Court, and that this high judicial body pronounced itself in favour of its ratification. Therefore the Guatemalan Congress now has a final discussion of the Convention on its agenda for 13 June of this year and we are confident that the Convention will be approved for ratification.

Finally, I would like to congratulate the President once again on his election and my satisfaction with this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. My delegation is very happy to share with him and all the delegates to this great Conference our endeavour to create a better world – a world of peace, social justice and democracy.

Original Spanish: Mr. CARO FIGUEROA (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Argentina) – Having congratulated the President on his election, I would like to take advantage of my opportunity to speak before this International Labour Conference to discuss employment and labour relations from three complementary points of views: first, the situation in the Republic of Argentina; second, international aspects of employment and labour relations; and, finally, the new role of the International Labour Organization.

Over the last few years, my country has successfully undertaken a phenomenal process of change which has transformed the traditional bases of economic activity. Years of self-sufficiency in both the economic and the cultural fields, classism in the labour relations field, authoritarianism in the management of human resources, and state intervention in production and employment relationships are now being replaced by a modern economy which is integrated worldwide, and a model of democratic labour relations. We Argentinians are building, in a spirit of consensus, and therefore with minimum social conflict, an open and participation-oriented labour system in line with the changes which have taken place both nationally and internationally.

In this context, in July last year, the General Confederation of Labour, the Argentine Industrial Union, other employers' organizations and the Government reached an important tripartite agreement called the "Framework Agreement on Employment, Productivity and Social Equality". More than 70 per cent of this Agreement, which has established the most comprehensive and wide-ranging programme of reforms in the field of labour relations, is already being implemented, if we include the projects waiting for Government approval. Agreements which are being fully implemented include, notably, the Statute on small businesses and the Act on employment promotion which governs contracts for apprentices and for part-time work and provides a new and special channel through which employment may be encouraged. It is also hoped that the Parliament will approve the bills on occupational hazards and workers' right to information.

The State's intention is to strengthen collective autonomy and to this end we have recently initiated tripartite dialogue to amend the Act on collective agreements. We hope to encourage decentralization of collective bargaining and to enrich its contents, discuss, on a collective basis, certain labour standards laid down by the State, but not absolute public order standards. The Government is confident that in the near future there will be an opportunity to tackle what is known as the integral reform of the labour system in Argentina with the same spirit of consensus and balance.

Might I be allowed to highlight the major efforts that have been made by the workers in Argentina successfully to restructure our economy, a process which, as elsewhere in the world in similar circumstances has, in fact, led to an increase in the rate of unemployment. Although it is true that in the four years from 1991 to 1994, there was a simultaneous increase in the number of persons employed, the rate of activity and the unemployment index, the fight against unemployment remains a priority for my Government.

In the Republic of Argentina, the public authorities, the employers' organizations and trade unions are all aware that job creation depends primarily on economic growth. To this end, our economic policy is designed to consolidate the conditions that will ensure growth, and we have launched an ambitious "four-year plan" that has budgeted for public and private investment of over $80,000 million. But we are also aware that in the increasingly competitive international context we must reform certain labour standards which do not correspond to realities or which delay the decisions employers need to make to cope with the changes in markets affecting employment levels.

However, economic growth and labour reforms are not enough to create new jobs at the rate needed as a result of our demographic situation. As the Director-General rightly indicated in his Report, we must also aim substantially to increase labour productivity which calls for at least, in our case, a major and steady effort as a nation to provide vocational training for employers and workers.

The second of the subjects I mentioned at the beginning of my statement relates to the international aspects of employment and labour relations. In this respect, might I be allowed to emphasize two approaches or kinds of measures that undermine the goals of productive employment and continuing fundamental social rights. I am referring to various forms of protectionism and social dumping. My country welcomed with reasonable satisfaction the new agreements which, within the framework of the Uruguay Round, have led to the establishment of the World Trade Organization and which will undoubtedly provide new impetus to international trade.

However, it would not be out of place for me to emphasize in this forum the negative impact of certain kinds of hidden protectionism on the world economy and growth in what are known as the newly-emerging countries.

If we are to make progress in the creation of internationally integrated economic areas and, at the same time, preserve the fundamental social balances that are inherent in modern democracies, we must end social dumping.

In concrete terms we must take urgent steps at the multilateral level to ensure that trading experiments based on competitive strategies which totally disregard labour rights are ended.

This is not just on the grounds of social justice but also because of the fact that these experiments raise the spectre of the denial of the fundamental rights of workers being extended to areas affected by social dumping.

It is also essential to try to reduce illegal international migration, since forced movements of workers are rekindling the kinds of exploitation the universal social conscience believed we had eliminated once and for all.

The third and final subject I wish to mention in my statement relates to the role of the ILO in the field of employment and labour relations. As we know, the International Labour Organization has in the recent past played a central role in defending freedoms and improving working conditions.

However, if we want to continue playing an important role in the new world we are building day by day, the ILO - to which we owe so much - must strengthen and increase its efforts to promote change.

Those of us who continue to value the role of the ILO in defending the permanent values of the dignity of the worker refuse to believe that the organization will in the future turn into a bureaucracy which against all evidence continues to defend outdated standards or institutions.

We would appear out of step with reality if we were to refuse to revise old international instruments or, even worse, to try to prevent reformist processes which the countries represented here are deciding on their own to undertake with regard to the aforementioned permanent values.

Furthermore, the ILO must ally itself with the policies of austerity and spending controls which have already been adopted by most of the countries represented here.

To ensure a minimum of consistency these national policies – which have, in some cases, meant sacrifices have had to be made by certain wage-earners and pensioners – must be reflected in the internal decisions of the International Labour Organization.

During the restructuring process in the ILO, we should, inter alia, think about the expediency of promoting greater decentralization, which could extend to rotating the location of the Conference to include other continents.

By way of conclusion, the Government of Argentina would like to reaffirm before this assembly its threefold commitment – to international policies that help job creation, to improved working conditions and to strengthening a revitalized ILO.

Mr. FALZON (Minister of Education and Human Resources, Malta) – First of all, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the President on his election to steer the deliberations of this session of the Conference.

In his Report to the International Labour Conference this year, the Director-General reviews the present world employment situation and traces the impact of various economic policies followed during the past 25 years and the irrelevance to the present situation which is characterized by the rapid trends towards globalization and economic liberalization. Although most countries have in one way or another derived some benefits from economic liberalization, unemployment remains unacceptably high and the Report stresses the need for a coordinated effort to reflate the economies of individual countries and to secure full employment all round.

Malta is at present enjoying a period of relative prosperity when most industrialized countries are still in the throes of an economic recession which has brought with it the gloomy prospect of long-term unemployment. Although Malta also has economic problems of its own, the prospects for the future are bright. This is due to a large extent to the foresight shown by the Government soon after taking over the administration in 1987, when it embarked upon a programme of concerted economic and social policies aimed at changing the economy from one that was relatively closed to one that is able to sustain a high level of employment in global world markets. This economic decision is now paying fruitful dividends. The changes which were initiated at that time included heavy investment in the economic infrastructure, particularly in education, telecommunications, energy, tourism and information technology. Secondary, technical and tertiary education was oriented towards the needs of the economy. Energy generation was boosted by the construction of a new power station; the production of water which is a scarce resource in Malta was increased substantially; telecommunications systems were modernized; information technology was planned to be applied on a national scale; and major tourist and infrastructure projects were designed and implemented. A programme of change in the public service was launched and new management systems were introduced. All these activities tended to push forward the growth of the gross national product. At the same time a policy of phased economic liberalization was introduced and investment in the private sector was heavily promoted.

These policies were implemented without causing any loss of employment opportunities or of real earnings. Wage levels which up to 1988 had been pegged to 1982 levels by restrictive wage policies were allowed to find their own level on the labour market. Cost-of-living increases were applied through statutory instruments and through an incomes policy agreement reached in 1990 by the social partners represented in the National Council for Economic Development. Although this agreement has expired and has not yet been formally renewed, national standard orders will continue to be used to apply cost-of-living increases until such time as a new agreement is concluded. In Malta minimum standard conditions of employment are laid down by Wages Council Wage Regulation Orders and by National Standard Orders, while trade unions and employers are left to bargain freely for industrial agreements at plant level. The wage structures of employees in the public service have been renegotiated and improved as part of the process of civil service reform. The gradual lifting of barriers on imports, which had unduly restricted consumer choices, has allowed consumers to make free use of the increase in real incomes for the purchase of a wide range of goods and services. This in turn has helped to raise the standards of living of the average Maltese during the last eight years.

Unemployment in Malta is at present well below acceptable levels. At less than 5,000 registered unemployed, the unemployment rate is about 3.54 per cent of the labour supply. The gainfully occupied population increased by 12.47 per cent during the period May 1987 to December 1994. The expansion has been markedly pronounced in private sector employment – indeed, it was in the region of 20 per cent from May 1987 to September 1994. Participation rates which have been traditionally low owing to social and cultural factors are consistently increasing. At 54.4 per cent, the participation rate for Malta is not low compared to that of countries with similar cultural and social backgrounds in the Mediterranean.

The setting up in 1990 of the Employment and Training Corporation is an important landmark. It is an initiative which helped bring about important changes in employment and related fields, including labour market policies, and policies related to vocational and industrial training. The Corporation has the advantage of not being impeded by the bureaucracy of the civil service. It is also closer to the actors on the labour market. The tripartite responsibilities of the Corporation are now better reflected by the inclusion on its Board of persons with experience in both the trade union and the employers' association sectors. The Corporation provides flexible training schemes and – in close cooperation with the Education Division – it updates apprenticeship schemes and tunes them to the present-day needs of industry. It encourages employers who need help to avail themselves of carefully monitored grants for training or retraining workers. The Corporation has made a positive contribution towards promoting labour market flexibility and it has facilitated the employment of jobseekers. Efforts were directed at promoting the expansion of employment opportunities in the private sector and to counteract the traditional tendency of jobseekers in Malta to prefer employment in the public sector. The Corporation is now also looking forward to a new role in promoting the employment of disabled persons and for this purpose it is coordinating with the National Commission for the Handicapped and interested non-governmental organizations with the object of increasing employment opportunities for disabled persons.

A major achievement last year was the passage through Parliament of the Occupational Health and Safety Promotion Act 1994, which replaced the Factories Ordinance which had been on the statute book for over 50 years; it provides a vastly improved framework for updating relative regulations. The tripartite Commission for the Promotion of Occupational Health and Safety, envisaged by the new law, was set up in August and started operating immediately. The attainment of the high standards of occupational health and safety practised in the European Community, which is one of our official policy objectives, is to be achieved over an adequate period of transition. May I take this opportunity to thank the Director-General for arranging for a visit to Malta by an expert on this subject from his staff.

Eliminating unemployment has always been the primary objective of labour policy and in its efforts, the Ministry of Education and Human Resources in Malta has been able to rely upon the cooperation of the trade unions and the employers' organizations. Industrial relations are on the whole good. Consultations with the unions and with the employers have been going on regarding a proposed revision of the Conditions of Employment (Regulation) Act and it is hoped that it will be possible in the near future to present to Parliament a Bill which will incorporate much of what has been discussed with the interested parties. The new law is expected to update the existing legislation relating to conditions of employment contracts to the parameters set out by European Union directives.

The introduction of VAT and reforms in both fiscal and monetary policies are helping us to make inroads in the black economy and so bring about a more equitable distribution of the tax burden. New forms of cooperative societies are also being encouraged and employees with insufficient productive employment in the public sector are being induced to form cooperative societies, which offer them greater economic independence in return to an enhanced productive output. A support unit which was set up last year offers technical help in the form of consultancy and other services to cooperative societies.

All our efforts have been directed to place Malta on a par with the industrialized nations of Europe, whilst at the same time ensuring that social development proceeds in step with economic development. We have managed to do this by pursuing an overall balance in economic policies; consequently our expanding economy with an annual GDP growth of over 5 per cent was sustained without high unemployment and without a high level of inflation which was kept under 4 per cent. Reductions in the tax burdens of the citizen have helped to keep wage increases in moderation – and dialogue with all the social partners in an effort to obtain consensus was the hallmark of these policies.

Every country has its own special problems, and obviously there is no single solution which may be applied indiscriminately to all countries. Although the general trend is one in favour of economic liberalization, this should not – as the Director-General well states in his Report – be seen as an end in itself, but rather as the economic means for attaining the long-term objective of raising employment levels and living standards.

Mr. LATIEF (Minister of Manpower, Indonesia) – It gives me great pleasure, on behalf of the Indonesian delegation, to extend my heartfelt congratulations to the President on his election to chair this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. We are confident that under his able guidance we shall achieve substantive results in our work.

As a developing country with a fast labour force growth of up to two-and-a-half million per year, Indonesia is strongly determined to adhere to the principles, and fulfil the ten commitments contained in the Declaration of the World Summit for Social Development.

My delegation has no doubt that we should underscore the urgent need to implement the Programme of Action of the Summit which recommended various actions in order to create framework of sustained economic growth and sustainable development, as well as national and international environment preferable to social development in order to eradicate poverty, enhance productive employment and foster social integration.

The central theme of the Director General's Report, Promoting employment, is in it in full conformity with the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development. The International Labour Organization, because of its mandate, tripartite structures and expertise, has a special role to play in the field of employment and social development.

During the first 25-year national development plan, Indonesia has consistently endeavoured to maintain a balance between sustained economic growth and self-propelling social development objectives. Deregulation and debureaucratization policies in the economic domain have been adopted in tandem with appropriate social policies intended to enhance full participation and the empowerment of the whole population, including the workers and women in particular. A harmonious, mutually beneficial and genuine policy between all the social actors of society is consciously and persistently encouraged in order to promote and maintain peace within a State, which will in turn promote and maintain peace between States.

With the start of its second 25-year plan in April 1994, Indonesia has embarked on policies and measures to increase employment, inter alia, by way of providing adequate protection for workers. The Government is now vigorously implementing its wage improvement policy. Guided by the spirit of tripartism, the Government has gradually improved the regional minimum wage. It used to stand at only 48 per cent of the minimum living wage. By the end of 1992, it had reached 63 per cent and in April 1995 it had reached about 108 per cent of the minimum living wage. The policy is based on the conventional wisdom whereby improving wages will increase the purchasing power of society, which will in turn stimulate economic growth and boost employment.

In addition, the Government of Indonesia is at present actively engaged in a programme of developing small and medium-scale enterprises, both in urban and rural areas. The promotion of the social welfare programme in less-developed villages has been launched to boost village economic development, expand rural employment, eradicate poverty and stem urbanization.

It is also worth noting the recent development of trade unionism in Indonesia. The All-Indonesian Workers Union (SPSI) has now been restructured into a federation of 13 sectoral unions, so that each union can function more independently and professionally. In addition, in the last 18 months, independent, democratic and genuine company-level unions have been established in over 800 companies. Some of them have negotiated and reached a collective labour agreement. Greater information, awareness and training advocated by the Government will eventually make the unions more effective.

It is worth mentioning that the Indonesian Government, in cooperation with the ILO, has formulated a five-year work plan in the field of employment, training and industrial relations. We are looking forward to being able to implement this plan.

I am pleased to underline the principle expressed by the Director-General in his Report that cooperative international action is the best way of resolving the problems in terms of the measures to adopt in order to improve the global employment situation. It is this same principle, we believe, which guided the work of the Contracting Parties and contributed towards the conclusion of the Uruguay Round and the establishment of the World Trade Organization (WTO). This guiding principle is wholeheartedly embraced by the developing countries, including Indonesia, in the conduct of international affairs. As a consequence, we feel strongly that the process of improving the effective implementation of international labour standards should not be linked to new issues which have no relevance to the development of new international trading regimes.

In this connection, let me recall the Declaration of the Fifth Conference of Ministers of Labour of the Non-aligned and Developing Countries held in New Delhi in January 1995, which strongly rejected any effort to link the implementation of international labour standards with international trade agreements. Likewise, the ASEAN Labour Ministers Meeting and the Ministerial Meeting of the Coordinating Bureau of the Non-aligned Countries which were held recently, respectively in Chiang Mai, Thailand, and in Bandung, Indonesia, expressed great concerns at the attempts to use labour standards as a means to interfere into the developing countries' internal affairs, as well as at the new concepts and proposals which seek to link domestic standards to the environment, labour laws, human rights and other social issues, through the application of trade measures and bilateral pressures which negate the comparative advantage of developing countries.

Furthermore, I am glad to note that, with regard to the social dimensions of trade liberalization, the Working Party on the Social Dimensions of the Liberalization of International Trade decided in April 1995 to convene again in November, on the understanding that it would not pursue the questions of trade sanctions. It decided to suspend any further discussions of links between international trade and social standards through a sanctions-based social clause mechanism. In this perspective, the Working Party should be entrusted to follow up the Programme of Action of the World Summit on Social Development, particularly on full employment as a basic priority of economic social policies. Within the Working Party, a process should be initiated based on the principle of genuine partnership, thus avoiding any confrontational approach and stressing rather the common interest and shared benefits of all parties, free from any political motivation.

In this context, it is timely for the ILO to review and update this notion and to set labour standards which are universally acceptable to all countries so that their universal observation is guaranteed. More importantly, the ILO, renowned for its experience and excellent expertise, must faithfully fulfil its inherent mandate to first and foremost provide the necessary assistance to member states who request it in order to observe the standard they fully subscribe to, as well as to expand productive employment, reduce and eliminate poverty and develop the workers' welfare.

If the pursuit of the noble objective of the ILO, in particular that of promoting employment, is to succeed, it is imperative that the ILO maintains its basic philosophy in standard-setting and technical assistance and that members refrain themselves from using the Organization as a tool to destabilize the developing countries' economic condition through unilateral, discriminatory and protectionist measures.

Original Chinese: Mr. LI (Minister of Labour, China) – First of all, please allow me to congratulate the President warmly on his election to this Conference. I am confident that under his leadership this session of the International Labour Conference will be crowned with success.

At present the global economy is becoming increasingly integrated and the world is faced with the major economic and social issue of unemployment and poverty. In view of this challenge it is only by formulating development strategies that are in line with the actual conditions of various countries and practical policies and measures, and only by actively carrying out international cooperation, that it will be possible to facilitate the achievement of employment promotion and poverty elimination. The Report of the Director-General has provided analysis on the employment situation in the world and its macroeconomic background and put forward a number of active policy recommendations. Now I wish to make the following main observations in connection with our experience in China.

Firstly, production development and economic growth constitute the basis for the full realization of employment and social progress. Economic growth and social progress should go hand in hand and enhance one another. For the developing countries there is a special need to achieve faster economic growth. Only by so doing can we create the material basis and the necessary conditions for employment expansion. Since the beginning of its reform and opening to the outside world China has concentrated on the development of its economy and productive forces and has achieved sustained and rapid economic growth with an average annual GDP increase of 9.4 per cent, thus laying a solid basis for employment expansion. Over the past ten years the nationwide unemployment rate was kept under 3 per cent. The living standards of workers have been raised considerably with an real average annual wage increase of 4.3 per cent. Meanwhile China attaches great importance to the development of its rural economy. In 1994 the number of workers in China's township and village enterprises reached 120 million. Last year we also implemented a policy aimed at easing the pressure of the huge influx of surplus rural labour on cities and achieving orderly labour mobility based on employment needs.

Secondly, implementing the employment policies and priorities suited to our country's own national conditions is an effective way of promoting employment. The countries of the world have different national conditions and are faced with very different employment situations. Therefore they should, and are entitled to, formulate and implement national employment policies in accordance with their own national conditions, and carry out work in the field of the employment in a creative manner. The Chinese Government has always attached importance to employment and its labour departments have made employment their primary task. They have worked closely with organizations of entrepreneurs, labour unions and other relevant departments and formulated in line with China's national conditions a number of policies and measures aimed mainly at actively enhancing the labour market, widening employment channels and further strengthening the employment service system. In recent years China has made efforts to solve such problems given the increasing numbers of the long-term unemployed and the underemployment of surplus workers. China has started a re-employment project which combines government support with various employment service measures to help entrepreneurs properly place their surplus labour force and bring about the faster re-employment of unemployed workers. In the course of this project, employment insurance has proved to be effective in ensuring the basic living standards of the unemployed and promoting re-employment. At the same time there is government and social support for workers to find employment either in an organized way or through their own channels. China has paid special attention to training, the development of various skills and raising the quality of labourers in a comprehensive manner in order to help them meet the needs of labour market. All these policies and measures formulated and implemented in conformity with the actual conditions in China have proved effective in promoting employment.

Thirdly, stepping up legislative work concerning labour and safeguarding the rights and interest of workers in an effective way of ensuring better employment. The Chinese Government believes that the ultimate objective of job creation is to realize the rights to work of workers and thus to enable them to enjoy their fair share of the fruits of economic development. The Labour Act of China contains specific clauses on the promotion of employment, as well as extensive articles on the promotion of the legitimate rights and interests of workers. Committed to stepping up labour legislation, China has successfully promulgated a whole set of laws, rules and administrative regulations concerning employment and the improvement of working conditions. These include the Act on the protection of disabled persons, the Act concerning the protection of rights and interests of women, and various others. Great efforts are being made to draft a number of other important labour laws. Starting this May, China has introduced the 40-hour work-week. The Chinese Government has firmly dealt with serious violations of the rights and interests of workers by some enterprises. In the future China will continue to improve its labour law system so as to effectively promote the legitimate rights of workers.

Fourthly, active international cooperation plays an increasingly important role in promoting employment. At present global economic ties are becoming increasingly interlinked and international trade, investment and multinationals are constantly developing. Resolving severe unemployment and poverty problems not only depends on the efforts of each country but also requires extensive regional and international cooperation. The Chinese Government maintains that in dealing with this international trade, investment and multinationals, and related labour and employment issues, it is necessary to advocate consultations on an equal footing and to oppose the imposition of one's will on others. It is also imperative to advocate mutually beneficial cooperation and oppose the imposition of sanctions on others at will. The richer countries should assume greater responsibility in actively helping the developing countries put an end to poverty. We are fully opposed to the suggestion and practice of linking so-called "social clauses" to international trade as such clauses can only hinder the development of world trade. Active international cooperation is the only way to facilitate international trade as well as economic growth and employment.

As to how the International Labour Organization can play its role in promoting employment, we have the following suggestions:

- (a) In the face of the severe global unemployment crisis, the ILO should shift the focus of its work significantly. It should effectively take the promotion of employment and the elimination of poverty as its long-term top priorities and work out practical plans of action. It should realize the principles and objectives of the World Summit for Social Development concerning employment promotion and poverty elimination.
- (b) We call on the ILO vigorously to expand technical cooperation in the field of employment, to actively make new resources available and to increase efficiency. It should step up employment research and exchanges of experience and provide effective assistance to the member States, especially the developing countries.
- (c) We believe that the ILO should further enhance its cooperation with the various specialized agencies of the United Nations as well as with international economic and financial organizations. It should urge the international community to pay more attention to employment promotion in, capital assistance to, and technical cooperation with the developing countries through policy coordination.

China stands ready to work with the ILO and the international community at large so as to contribute to full employment throughout the world.

(Ms. Engelen-Kefer takes the Chair.)

Mr. LASI (Minister for Labour and Manpower, Pakistan) – It gives me pleasure to congratulate the President on his unanimous election to the presidency of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that under his leadership the Conference will be a great success. I would also like to extend my congratulations to the Vice-Presidents and the other members on their elections. My delegation assures you of our fullest cooperation in the discharge of your responsibilities.

This year the Conference is taking place at a time when we are experiencing momentous changes in the world. The end of the era of ideological confrontation has paved the way for greater cooperation between nations. Today we are making collective efforts to stop conflicts, to defend the rights of individuals, to protect the environment and to move towards greater harmony in the world as a whole. The enormous advances in the field of communications has reduced the world to a single village. The globalization of the world economic has increased our interdependence. The future confronts us all with hopes and challenges. In this hope, the poor aspire to have enough to eat, the worker wants his rights protected, the victim wants justice and the oppressed want the right to live in freedom, with honour and dignity. To fulfil all these hopes it is important for us, the policy-makers, to join hands in providing a better tomorrow for our people.

The role of the ILO as the defender of workers' rights has to continue. The ILO's stimulating and thought-provoking advice, coupled with its persuasive policies, has contributed towards the betterment of the conditions of workers throughout the world. It is in this context that the Director-General's Report on promoting employment is not only timely, but also pertinent to the global situation. We wholeheartedly congratulate the Director-General and his team on their efforts to analyse the global trends and to suggest the ways and means to promote employment.

Let me now briefly turn to the contents of the Director-General's Report, and mention some of the major problems that a developing country like Pakistan faces in ensuring better conditions for its workers. The Report suggests that the growth rate in the world in 1990 has doubled as compared to that of 1970. The world economy has seen a dramatic increase in foreign direct investment. Yet the world today is afflicted by serious problems of unemployment, underemployment, inequality and poverty.

Pakistan has always believed that it is only development, which is a basic human right, that can ensure better conditions for people. The international community with all sincerity should try to establish a more collaborative system for allowing equitable progress in the world. The current times call for a reappraisal of our policies and decisions. What is needed today is determination to eliminate poverty from the world. The massive inequalities must go. Wasteful consumption by some at the cost of starvation by others must stop. We must enter into a new compact, where the contrast between the rich and the poor, both at the national and the international level, is reduced. This will only be possible if some of us are ready to share our riches with those in need.

The problem of unemployment, while global, has different proportions for the developed and developing countries. For the developed countries, as mentioned in the Director-General's Report, the reasons for unemployment may include the rapid growth of new technologies which significantly reduce the number of jobs in these countries. For the developing countries, the problem is different. The lack of resources and difficult international economic situation has led to growing pressure on existing employment opportunities. The vicious circle of poverty, unemployment, illiteracy, rapid population growth and other similar factors has aggravated the situation. The reliance on agriculture as the basis of the economy and reduced prices for these countries' produce in the international market have made matters worse. The developed countries have provided subsidies in agriculture and raised trade barriers against labour intensive industrial products, and this has reduced the capacity of the developing countries to deal with the situation.

Let me give the example of my own country. Pakistan, being an agricultural country, cannot take full advantage of its potential in this area due to the heavy subsidization of agriculture in the developed countries. Pakistan produces 10 to 12 per cent of the world's cotton. However, due to restricted market access, our trade in textiles and clothing has been limited to merely 2 per cent of the world market.

The Government of Pakistan, continuing its efforts to create more job opportunities and to utilize fully the resources at our disposal, has launched a four-point agenda for change. The agenda includes firstly the development of a medium- and long-term economic framework. Secondly, a long-term commitment has been made to support an industrialization policy based on lasting partnership between industry and the Government. Thirdly, we support an economic policy that invests in people and in their abilities and talents, and fourthly, we believe it is necessary to strengthen international economic cooperation for growth and poverty elimination.

The implementation of this agenda is already in progress. A massive $8 billion social action programme is being implemented. It entails human resource development, provision of basic education, primary health care, population welfare (especially for rural people, and the disadvantaged in urban areas), assistance for mothers, infants and young children and making available the services of community health workers to workers, and female teachers, inviting them to take part in a new partnership for a better future. Under this programme 317,000 employment opportunities will be created. The most liberal industrial policy of the Government has attracted constant foreign private investment, especially in the energy and communications sectors which are expected to play a significant role in creating adequate employment opportunities.

The Constitution of Pakistan guarantees the fundamental rights of democracy, freedom, equality and social justice. Our commitment to these objectives is based on nationally and internationally recognized standards of well-being and collective prosperity, with justice for all. Pakistan is fully committed to observing the internationally recognised rights of workers through the progress of legislative actions and the setting up of an institutional framework.

During the last session of the International Labour Conference my delegation referred to systematic complaints made by some interested parties which referred to the use of child labour in our country;

need not unemployment benefit but social welfare payments. We would still like to encourage the others not to cut themselves off completely from the world of work, and, in the absence of a permanent job, to accept short-term employment. We are also making efforts to provide subsidized jobs for these people.

In the conditions prevailing in Hungary it is particularly difficult to meet the twofold imperative of social justice and economic efficiency. In the world of work as elsewhere, the development of democratic institutions is the key to all forms of progress. Our Government therefore intends to rely increasingly on the active contribution of both unions and the employers. The tripartite system constitutes an indispensable element in political democracy and in the social market economy. We attach, however, just as much importance to extending the range of bilateral agreements. In the various labour, professional and trade organizations, bilateral agreements are able to establish the optimum, acceptable both to the employers and to the employees, thus laying the foundations for social peace.

In order to strengthen the ability to reach agreements the Hungarian Government is endeavouring to facilitate the development of the trade union movement by extending trade union rights and ensuring proper conditions for the unions to operate in. For the same reason we encourage the development of activities of the employers' organizations.

In order to reach social consensus, we would also like to introduce an institution of a new kind. We intend to create in the very near future a mediation and conciliation service in order to facilitate the friendly settlement of labour disputes. I would like to take advantage of this opportunity of speaking to you here to ask for support from the ILO in the creation and development of this new institution.

Beyond the measures for which governments are responsible in their various countries and beyond cooperation of the social partners, increasing employment or increased employment means global cooperation. In agreement with the Report of the Director-General, I would like to state that full employment can only be regained on the basis of joint action at the national and international levels and of a renewal of international cooperation.

The International Labour Organization has a pioneering role to play in the establishing of international commitments with a view to solving the worldwide problem of unemployment and with a view to coordinating cooperation among different countries and the international organizations.

I am convinced that the debate made possible by this Conference and the proposals which will be made at the Informal Ministerial Meeting, will pave the way to meeting expectations in relation to social justice and to the achievement of sustained high levels of employment.

With these thoughts I conclude and wish the Conference a fruitful and successful conclusion.

Mr. POPESCU (Minister of State, Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Romania) – This year's Conference is marked by the strong impression created by the Copenhagen World Summit for Social Development which was a moment of political awareness and integrated approach, for the first time on a global scale, involving the serious social issues confronting humanity as the twentieth century comes to an end.

More important than the World Summit for Social Development itself is its outcome and, in this respect, Romania appreciates that the International Labour Organization has, through its expertise, experience and technical performance, a major role in following up and implementing the actions and commitments assumed in the Declaration and Programme of Action adopted by the World Summit for Social Development.

The admirable theme proposed this year by the Director-General of the International Labour Office for consideration by the member States is also included in the context of active measures that governments are supposed to take in order to eradicate the genuine scourge of unemployment.

I avail myself of this opportunity to salute the initiative taken by the Director-General to publish a series of annual reports on the situation of employment throughout the world and, at this point, please allow me to mention our highest appreciation for the scientific bearing and discipline shown by the first report in this series.

Based on these reports, one can initiate consultations on a regional level, in the framework of which national factors and international bodies with economic and social expertise cooperate in seeking global solutions meant to sustain national programmes that involve concerted bi- and multilateral cooperation focusing on the causes of the problem.

This involves neither philanthropical gestures nor the massive importing of models and systems, but instead a collaboration beneficial to all partners, in which national efforts harmonize with international cooperation. In other words, this is what Romania means by partnership for economic and social development.

A brief balance of the five years of transition Romania has gone through highlights a process of production stabilization and a positive economic growth rate as of 1993. In 1994 the positive trends in economic evolution reflected a rising curve. Gross domestic product growth was estimated to be 2.4 per cent, corresponding to increased activity in the main branches of the national economy.

Over the last year the unemployment rate has remained relatively stable, varying between 10.7 and 11.1 per cent, Romania being from this point of view about mid-way on the European scale.

None the less, economic stabilization and re-launching of growth are still fragile and strongly depend on the growth of the goods and services sector, within the context of a competitive economy, as well as depending on the stimulation of investment, the development of genuine market mechanisms and the steady continuation of current structural changes. Moreover, the setting up of a new and effective institutional and legislative framework as well as the restructuring of the labour and capital market require a longer period of time under the most favourable conditions, a reality correctly pointed out in the Director-General's Report.

The experience gathered and the constant concern of the Government and Parliament of Romania have made it possible to implement a national socio-economic reform strategy, two priorities of which are social policy and social protection.

As concerns employment, the general policy promoted by the Romanian Government aims, in principle, at improving the material infrastructure and the legislative framework, in order to attract direct investments, as well as at stimulating labour force mobility by professional guidance and training, correlated with the labour market's evolution, and by vocational retraining jointly subsidized by the State and the employers.

Specific attention is being paid to the special policies directly affecting employment and whose goal is job creation and the professional insertion of the most vulnerable categories (young people, women, the handicapped, and the long-term unemployed).

Improving employment services, granting advantageous credits for the setting-up and development of small and medium enterprises hiring the unemployed, and encouraging employers to hire graduates are constructive premises for implementing a system able to progressively reduce unemployment.

Active labour market policies will complement social protection and gradually assume part of the economic burden the latter puts on the State. The present economic and social situation as well as the perspectives oblige the State to continue being both the guarantor of social objectives in the field of employment, remuneration and labour conditions and the main agency responsible for the social welfare of its citizens, especially the disadvantaged ones, it being in charge of ensuring the transfer of resources needed. Fighting against unemployment and social exclusion requires the participation of all political, economic and social actors, including NGOs.

The reform of the social protection system in Romania supposes a gradual decentralization – in the future – of social protection and the involvement of employers, local public administration bodies, and governmental organizations, which must exercise a great deal of responsibility.

Other priorities of social reform in Romania are to identify the needs of the most vulnerable social categories and to encourage the population to directly contribute by self-protection.

In order to create the institutional framework for strengthening the tripartite consultation and negotiation mechanism, the Government has submitted to Parliament a draft bill creating the Economic and Social Council, a tripartite body meant to play an advisory role in developing economic and social policy, and acting as a mediator in developing this policy, as well as mediating social conflicts. The institutional framework will also be improved by the creation of the National Employment and Vocational Training Agency which is to be supervised by a tripartite Governing Body and will provide job placement, guidance and training of the labour force.

Our efforts in the field of economic and social reform are in line with overall structural changes at the European and global level.

This is the context in which the spirit of partnership and international solidarity should, through our combined efforts, provide a smooth path to the twenty-first century.

Lastly, please allow me to express the determination of the Government of Romania that, through its own efforts, it will join in with international action in seeking viable solutions to the social problems that are, for the time being, the major challenge which the international community is asked to meet.

Mr. TAN (Employers' delegate, Philippines) – On behalf of the Philippine employers' delegation, may I extend our warm congratulations to the President on his election to the presidency of this Conference. We are certain that under his leadership, this session of the Conference will reach a successful conclusion.

It is with a deep sense of satisfaction that I will address this body on the subject of promotion of employment in the Philippine context. For the Director-General's Report on the topic coming as it does after all these years, validates the Philippine employers' long-held thesis that the promotion of employment for the more than 3 million jobless citizens of my country is the single most compelling mandate of government.

In the many forums and councils which have brought together the tripartite partners over the last two decades, we have steered public discourse and debate towards the political dimensions of labour-management relations. We have also suffered helplessly the curse of unemployment that continued to tear at the fabric of our society.

For so long, we toiled day in and day out with labour and government, not so much to provide the conditions under which jobs can be generated, but to discuss whether the political rights of labour unions or the aspirations of their members can be protected to their satisfaction under a legal system that by any standard is more solicitous and protective of the working man than any other, anywhere in the world.

In a sense, even with the zeal of altruistic public servants, we did not make sufficient use of the opportunity to alleviate poverty and social exclusion through employment. We sacrificed the virtue of gainful work for the intellectual reward of political domination in the workplace. Instead of efforts to reduce injury to private enterprise in a labour dispute and thus save jobs, we paid greater tribute to the romance of the picket lines, even if this meant we had to consign workers to joblessness and deprivation. Instead of a compensatory wage policy that provides still greater rewards for the most productive among our employees, we continued to rely on legislated and fixed minimum wages to be applied to all, regardless of the amount and quality of the service.

Now we have reached the threshold of an increasingly borderless world that could spell out the difference between more employment or increasing unemployment for our people. On many occasions, we have expressed the view, echoed by many economists, that in order to increase employment, wages should not outpace labour productivity. In certain respects, the Director-General confirms this observation when in his Report he states that "two broad policy routes for encouraging the required creation of jobs for the low-skilled can be envisaged: pressing wages down through labour market deregulation or employment subsidies".

We do not advocate a cheap labour policy to be competitive and to increase our capability to create jobs. Rather it is irrefutable that high wages reduce the intensity of investments, and therefore of employment. It is only a high growth rate of the economy, anchored on industrialization and deregulation of employment, that can help promote job creation.

At present the social partners in the Philippines are locked in a debate not on the imperatives of skills upgrading as we move into the world of AFTA and GATT, but whether the labour unions will accept flexible working arrangements as a necessity in promoting employment. Indeed, while our neighbours are honing their skills to meet the challenges of global competition, we are still preoccupied with defending the perimeters of union hegemony, at the precise moment when our common enemy, the threat of marginalization – is knocking at our door.

We are not oblivious to the continuing vigilance aimed at protecting the gains of the labour movement. In all candour, we want to preserve them. And we will not deny the minimum rights and benefits that the law accords to all workers. In truth, we should institutionalize them. But let these be the sworn duties of the enforcers of labour standards, and not the excuse to deprive legitimate business of the right to adopt subcontracting as a means to create more jobs and make business profitable for the good of both labour and capital.

At this stage of our economic development, we cannot afford to imitate the whims and caprices of the affluent nations. Our restraint may well be the saving grace in our determined bid to be a newly industrializing country. In fact, there is now increasing unemployment in the industrialized countries, while the emerging economies of Asia are enjoying unprecedented growth and, consequently, employment opportunities.

Specifically, we are informed that Asia, and particularly South-East Asia, has shown impressive growth in manufacturing output and that Europe, on the other hand, has shifted to services. This represents for us the rising expectation of more higher-paying jobs, as the workforce shifts from agriculture to industry.

But can we sustain this movement of workers into the heart of industry? In all humility we say we can, if we remove the constraints in the law and in actual practices which are imposed on the ways of doing business. Unless the burdens of industry that go into the cost of goods and services, such as payroll taxes, are frozen or reduced if need be, the increasing taxation involved in hiring workers will thwart for us the dream of full employment.

Our efforts to promote employment must therefore be centred round a conservatism in the formulation of safety nets and social insurance – for us, anyway, in a developing country where even job-sharing has been elevated to the level of policy. We must all recognize the scarcity of jobs that this Organization has warned us about in its report on employment. For us, and for labour unions, the greatest challenge is not how much more care and protection our employed citizens deserve, but how many more should have a decent means of livelihood in the first place.

As we move closer to the reality of a borderless economy, let us seek counsel from each other for mutual survival. Let us accept the principle that employment is the fertile ground in which labour unions grow and flourish. In that life-giving environment, both employers and workers must ensure that the conditions exist to provide continuously opportunities for work, so that our peripatetic countrymen, uprooted from the refuge of their homeland and the comfort of their kinsmen, need not find themselves in the most forbidding places of the world in search of jobs at the expense of their lives, their fortunes and their honour.

PROGRAMME AND BUDGET AND OTHER FINANCIAL QUESTIONS: PRELIMINARY DISCUSSION

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – The first item this afternoon is the preliminary discussion of the draft Programme and Budget for 1996-97, and other financial questions.

Miss MACKIE (Employers' delegate, United Kingdom) – It is a pleasure to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their appointment.

This item on the agenda of the Conference represents the small tip of a very large iceberg. The most important item to be discussed by any organization must always be the provision to be made for its finances, and of course the ILO is no exception to this. Every two years the Conference receives proposals for its approval which set out the programme and budget for the next biennium. That approval is the final stage in a long and careful process in which full tripartite discussions enable the representative views of all the constituent Members of the Organization to be heard and taken into account.

The Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body on which I have the privilege to act as spokesperson for the Employers' group debated the original draft proposals for a full week and various adjustments were made. You all have the report of that discussion before you in Report II Draft Programme and Budget 1996-97 and other financial questions. On 6 April 1995 the Governing Body accepted the report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and decided with the support of all three groups to propose to this session of the International Labour Conference the amended programme and budget of which you now have the details. Of course, it is not from any point of view a perfect budget but it is a budget which represents a fair compromise between different positions and it was fully supported by the three groups of the Governing Body which represent employers, governments and workers.

On behalf of the Employers I can repeat now the support we gave a few weeks ago. I commend the draft Programme and Budget for 1996-97 to this Conference. Today is not quite the final stage; that will come when the vote is taken later in the Conference. I hope that at that time these proposals, which have been so carefully worked out, will receive the support of the Governments and Workers as well as the Employers' delegates to this Conference.

You have more than one financial proposal on the agenda. They are all important in their own way and I am happy to place on record our support for the resolutions concerning cash surpluses and deficits, the Maritime Session of the International Labour Conference and the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization.

Finally, if I may close on a more personal note, I would wish to underline my own support for the work done by the ILO. It provides a most important forum for communication, debate and better international understanding of matters which affect us all in our daily life. It does so uniquely among international organizations with the full involvement of employers and workers. That may sometimes disturb governments unaccustomed to such a manner of working. And of course we all criticize it. We believe it could be more efficient. It could be improved in various ways. But if the day ever comes when we are not interested enough even to criticize it, that will indeed be a sad day and a serious day for the employers as well as the employees of the world.

I commend the financial resolutions to the Conference.

Mr. TAPIOLA (Workers' delegate, Finland) – I would like to pass on my congratulations to the President on his election to the Presidency, and to the Vice-Presidents.

Clearly, the most significant feature of the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 is that they are based on the 75th anniversary Conference Session of the International Labour Organization which we celebrated last year. This session of the Conference should have no cause to complain that its views have not been taken into account, either by those who drafted the proposals, the Office or those who amended them and decided on their final content – namely the members of the Governing Body. This work is the result of tripartite consultations in March and April this year. The Workers' group is committed to the proposals and endorses their approval by the Conference and I say this as Chairperson of the Workers' group of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body.

This budget has to be understood as a balanced whole. Large parts of it reflect the topical discussions we had last year and in fact the whole of the recent discussion on the future orientation of the Organization. This discussion has, at times, been turbulent and critical and all constituents have put forward their views. These are reflected in the proposals, and we have recognized that the discussion has been constructive and useful. Of course we might have wanted more in some areas. The Workers' group was concerned that at a time when the globalization of our labour markets has become an overriding concern, there did not seem to be adequate provision to deal with the question of multinational enterprises. Others shared our concern about resources for work on equality between women and men. The Governing Body's discussions led to solutions for these and other key issues, which helped us to reach the necessary consensus on the programme and budget as a whole.

For instance, on the two important and interrelated issues of standards and unemployment we have worked out a programme which should enable the ILO to fulfil its role in promoting full, freely chosen and productive employment with decent conditions of work, for the benefit of society and all its members. The message this programme and budget sends to the follow-up of the World Summit for Social Development is that the ILO is ready and able to meet the expectations of it and its obligations contained under the Declaration and Programme of Action of the Copenhagen Summit.

The proposals contain several items of importance to the ILO to ensure its follow-up to the Summit. For the Workers' group it is of the utmost importance that there should be adequate resources for the work on freedom of association and other fundamental labour standards. Our group has made further proposals on how to step up this work. I note that, for instance, in the Governing Body's discussions on the social dimensions of the liberalization of international trade, the role of fundamental ILO standards has been repeatedly emphasized by virtually every participant and we have all recognized that this is both an old and a renewed priority. We also have increased provision for activities to help enterprises. The Workers' group has supported this part of the programme and budget on the understanding that when we talk of the enterprise we take it as a whole, including its workers and the way in which collective bargaining and employees' participation can improve the position of all those for whom enterprises provide employment and an income. This part of the programme has to be seen in the context of the overall objectives of the ILO. The Workers' group believes that the promotion of employment and enterprises and workers' protection go hand in hand; and of course the key element of success here is once again standards. This demonstrates how important it is for the programme to be seen as a coherent whole in which there is a high level of mutual dependency between the main components. This is how the programme of work of a tripartite organization should be.

Another aspect is that of getting closer to the constituents, implementing the active partnership policy. The concerns of governments and workers' and employers' organizations in the field must be heard. Much of the relevance of the ILO depends on this. The Workers' group welcomes the consensus on measures actively to reach out to the constituents. It is not an easy task but major steps have been made through the multidisciplinary teams.

To sum up, a substantive approach and measures to interact with the constituents are what the Conference has shown it wanted through its debates and resolutions. This is the programme and budget the Office and the Governing Body were asked to prepare, adopt and propose. Now it is more than fair to expect that the efforts made will be appreciated and that the budget will be approved.

(Mr. Popescu takes the Chair.)

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We shall now resume the discussion of the reports of the Chairman of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Spanish: Mr. CORRAL BORRERO (Minister for Labour and Human Resources, Ecuador) – My congratulations to Mr. Rosales Argüello on his election to the presidency of this Conference. His thoroughly merited election augurs well for the outcome of the Conference through fair and democratic debate.

I would like to refer to the Director-General's Report and its principal theme, the urgent need to promote employment. It could not have been more timely or better chosen.

The contrasting figures between the meaningful and constant growth of world production in the last 20 years as well as the simultaneous increase of unemployment, underemployment, inequality and poverty have sounded the alarm for Governments and the international community. Recall that last year the Director-General's Report referred to a figure of 30 per cent of the world's workforce without gainful employment, more than 120 million unemployed and some 700 million underemployed. I would also like to remind you that this year's World Summit for Social Development issued a unanimous call to eliminate extreme poverty, one of the causes of which is precisely unemployment.

There is no doubt that we are facing a problem whose repercussions and effects transcend national borders and actions and have now reached the global level, requiring a struggle involving complementary and coordinated policies, joint proposals and action at the national, regional and world level.

As the Director-General's Report points out, it is imperative that national and international organizations increase their coordination and cooperation in order to simultaneously create and implement economic and financial policies, together with social policies, with particular emphasis on the generation of employment. Although this worrisome situation, particularly in the developing countries, could result in a defeatist attitude, we cannot and must not falter but must continue to struggle unswervingly and resolutely to curb unemployment and underemployment as well as its deep-rooted effects of social and human disintegration. In order to do this, we must implement major changes and undertake action that will lead us to sustainable economic growth and social equality with socio-economic recovery, stimulating private production, attracting important investments in capital and human resources. We must also make our seemingly protective laws which bar access to the labour market more flexible, realizing that labour laws should not only protect those who have work but even more so those who do not and are desperately seeking it.

In the last two Conferences, as Minister of Labour under President Sixto Durán Ballén, who took office in 1992, I pointed out that up to that year the Ecuadorian economy had been characterized by macroeconomic imbalances, and that it had been necessary to restructure and reorient it. Positive results were obtained, such as reducing and controlling inflation, which fell from 60 per cent to 25 per cent annually, increasing our foreign reserves, cutting our fiscal deficit, and maintaining a stable exchange rate, among other achievements. At the same time in the labour and social spheres there have been fewer labour disputes, with the implementation of labour policies that are more balanced and equitable, and a complementary relationship between labour and capital. We have also embarked on a programme to restore purchasing power, and at the lowest levels wages have outpaced inflation with a 40 per cent increase in real wages. Whereas in January 1992 the minimum wage in Ecuador was a mere $57 per month, since January 1995 it has been $145 per month, although evidently it is still insufficient. With regard to employment behaviour, although we have still not achieved the level of results we had hoped for, it is very important to note that the actions and programmes being carried out have started to reverse the growing trend towards unemployment and underemployment, which in urban areas between 1992 and 1994 dropped from 8.9 per cent to 7.1 per cent for the former and from 47.9 per cent to 45.2 per cent for the latter. However, it should be noted that private sector employment is increasing at a sluggish pace and that public employment has dropped as a result of modernization and policies to trim the government sector. Yet there has been a human dimension to this bureaucratic downsizing, since the Government has provided economic incentives to encourage productive activities which create jobs. We must also, as I said before, facilitate sustainable economic growth with social equality which will generate employment and at the same time intensify the important work that we are carrying out in vocational training, which is not only the job of the State but is also incumbent on employers and workers.

As was stated by the Government of my country at the Copenhagen Summit, one public policy objective to which the Government is dedicating considerable efforts involves an increase of employment in the formal sector while boosting productivity in the informal sector as a step towards full employment. At the same time the Government will continue to encourage the implementation of programmes for the creation of new jobs, especially for such vulnerable groups as women, children and young people.

Apart from what I have already said, in accepting the generous offer of technical cooperation from the International Labour Organization, the Government of Ecuador is now, through social dialogue, trying to draw closer to its partners, namely employers and workers, in order to attain a widespread social pact that will generate employment, combat poverty and increase the living standard of the population. These three great objectives are like branches from a tree trunk to which they must always remain attached if they are to draw nourishment from its sap. At the same time the common good requires nourishment from the sap of tripartism and its indispensable cooperation and dialogue. There is no doubt that at a time when humanity is preparing to usher in the twenty-first century, the principles stated in the Constitution of this noble Organization and in the Philadelphia Declaration have more meaning than ever. These instruments establish a need for a lasting peace based on social justice. There can be no doubt that the struggle in which nations are engaged to eliminate unemployment will bring us close to attaining this objective that can no longer be delayed.

Once again, I am confident that this Conference will reach its desired goal, thus contributing to the spread of peace and justice in this dark and troubled world shut off from the sunshine around it.

Mr. TURNQUEST (Minister of State for Public Service and Labour, Bahamas) – On behalf of the Government of the Commonwealth of the Bahamas, I am pleased to lead our tripartite delegation to this 82nd Session. My delegation also joins with other delegations in congratulating the President on his election. We are sure that under your leadership, we will achieve the objectives of this Conference.

We are encouraged, upon review of the ILO and its principles, that the Organization remains committed and supportive toward improving the lives of working people in all countries of the world. Through its tripartite composition, the ILO has contributed significantly to a greater awareness and understanding of the need to foster and maintain industrial harmony in member States.

During the 81st Session the ILO celebrated its 75th anniversary of existence. It was also an opportunity for the Organization to review again its principles and chart new courses for a world that has seemingly lost its sense of direction and purpose. I contend, as confirmed by the Director-General's Report, that when the review is concluded, the ILO will once again reaffirm its belief that only when all men are free from oppression, poverty, unemployment, political dictatorships and racism will we experience the kind of world peace that the founding fathers envisaged 76 years ago when this Organization was established, and of peace which the oppressed people of the world so fervently wish for today.

The changing social and economic conditions have brought to the forefront new social and economic problems. There is now, more than ever, a greater need for the services which the ILO provides, particularly in the area of technical assistance. These conditions are impacted by problems incurred by developing countries in transition to a market-driven economy and available financial resources for social development.

My Government's thrust seeks to foster a market-oriented economy having a larger sector of the labour force employed in the private sector, and the expansion of self-employment and home work. The creation of employment opportunities remains at the centre of the strategies and policies of my Government, bearing in mind full respect for workers' rights, with the participation of employers, workers and their respective organizations.

To assist in achieving our objectives, we have expanded work opportunities and productivity in both rural and urban sectors by investing in human resource development, promoting technologies that generate productive employment, and by encouraging self-employment, entrepreneurship and small and medium-sized enterprises. We have improved access to land and credit for small business development, with a view to increasing its contribution to the eradication of poverty and to social integration and the strengthening of linkages with the formal economy.

One of the challenges facing us is to find the right balance between profitable businesses and content employees. My ultimate goal is the achievement of a full employment economy where workers are protected. The Bahamas supports the ILO playing a greater role in the international scene, due to the nature of its mandate and its experience over the years. The various multidisciplinary teams in place within the various regions ensure that more efficient and coordinated technical assistance is now available to the various constituents.

The Bahamas, within the Caribbean region, will seek to utilize all available technical assistance and expertise offered by the ILO. The ILO, I'm sure, will seize the opportunity to provide the technical leadership in mobilizing action at both the national, regional and international levels to improve the global employment situation.

As Minister of Labour for the Bahamas, and Chairman for the Standing Committee of Ministers of Labour for the Caribbean Community, I can confirm that we are cognizant and concerned about the various issues impacting upon and affecting labour within the region. We have resolved to address these issues collectively, in an appropriate manner specific to our individual territories. Foremost on our agenda is the need to establish and regularize conditions and opportunities to facilitate (a) the need for strengthening labour administration systems which will incorporate recommendations from the Regional Tripartite Working Party of Labour Officials; (b) the establishment of a Tripartite Advisory Board to become more active in serving as sounding boards for the development of policies and assessing the impact of economic policies on labour; and (c) the promotion of international labour standards within the community, and in keeping with article 19 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, to bring to the attention of national parliaments, where applicable, outstanding Conventions and Recommendations.

Within our Caribbean region, labour ministers have agreed to support and promote the recommendations of the World Summit on Social Development held in Copenhagen on employment creation and poverty alleviation, and to disseminate and discuss these recommendations widely among the constituencies of the social partners. We have also agreed that member States within our region would convene tripartite meetings with a view to formulating and implementing appropriate national strategies for the reduction of poverty and the creation of employment.

We have established these positions against the background that the international trend continues towards a market-driven economy, with increasing pressures on our national markets by non-national competitors. This means that the focus of governmental labour policies and laws will have to reflect this reality. It also means that both employers' organizations and trade unions have to re-examine their approach to the traditional labour issues which they face from time to time.

Realizing the evolving changes in the workplace and in the market-place, there is an increasing need to have in place an effective labour administrative system in each territory throughout our region, similar in content and in structure. It is with this view, and supported by the radical changes currently under way in the region's economic development, that we have reaffirmed our determination to fulfil our goals in collectively establishing generally accepted norms for labour and industrial relations.

Our efforts to bring to fruition our reaffirmed commitment for fundamental human rights and freedoms will remain our constant focus, especially with regard to the fundamental right of workers to organize and bargain collectively, to foster improved living and working conditions, as well as adequate social security policies and programmes for all our peoples.

Let us all, therefore, resolve to successfully meet the challenges and create an era of world peace and prosperity based on social justice.

Original Spanish: Mr. OÑATE (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Mexico) – It is a great honour for the Government of Mexico to participate in this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference, a Conference which, without any doubt whatsoever, will give extremely useful results because of the high level of participation and the eminence of the Conference President.

The Government of Mexico supports the ideas in the Director-General's Report about the growing importance of promoting employment. World economic development, beneficial though it may be, does have a negative balance to be seen in the rising unemployment from which both industrialized economies and developing countries are suffering. The disadvantages that the market economy holds for workers and nations can only be overcome by growth.

Social exclusion, inequality and poverty are becoming more common and more serious as our economies have proved incapable of creating employment. Mexico shares the concerns of the International Labour Organization: job creation is a priority for government policies. Mexico agrees that the solution to the jobs problem will come from growth and from cooperation between employers, employees and governments.

A variety of factors affect the ability of economies to create jobs; however, at an international level, it is economic globalization, capital movements and the degree of international market penetration that are becoming increasingly apparent. On the domestic front, investment and savings policies, financial structures, the adoption of new technology and human resource training all have a fundamental role to play in promoting economic growth that generates jobs; jobs that are stable and part of the formal sector; jobs that offer a just and adequate wage. This is a new approach to re-enhancing work, wages and productivity.

Any employment policy needs to be an integrated one. It also has to be able to reconcile the economic objectives of both employees and the employers, as well as the social objectives which all governments are committed to promote.

The Government of Mexico has been charged by its President to institute an economic policy which will create more productive jobs and better wages for the Mexican workers. President Ernesto Zedillo has stated that the aim of economic policy must be to enhance the well-being of each person and each family. And the basis of this well-being is a decent, stable and well-paid job.

For over a decade, Mexico has been plunged into a process of modernization which has allowed it to alter its industrial profile and its industrial base. However, much needs to be done to ensure that economic growth will be translated into well-being and the creation of stable and productive jobs.

The financial and currency crises of late 1994 and early 1995 have obviously hit employment in our country. Declared unemployment has reached levels never seen before. In addition, employment in Mexico is also under pressure from natural demographic growth. Without economic growth there is no solution.

Consequently, we have taken measures and adopted plans to promote and restore confidence and financial and currency stability. It is this confidence and stability that are needed for investment and economic growth in general. Mexico will support any initiative acceptable to both workers and employers which will help create jobs, raise workers' real earnings and promote labour market stability. Any initiative which will promote labour relations stability and transparency and maintain the necessary balance between labour and capital.

By improving consultation and concertation mechanisms, the Government of Mexico is working with the employers and employees to promote free bargaining, minimize disputes and maximize agreements to increase and improve employment and raise wages. Consequently, better workforce training and productivity are today a priority for the Mexican Government. Mexicans are advancing along this path in a process of consultation and concertation between employers and the employees. Training and retraining programmes, education, skill-certification and labour qualification standards to meet the current labour market situation and needs are all being developed.

The establishment just a few days ago of the Mexican Productivity Board and, for example, the expansion of the programme of grants for worker training and total quality control and modernization schemes all demonstrate the will of Government, employers and employees to put together the conditions to develop and employ human capital to the best.

Social security, like jobs, is also being redefined – a process essential to achieve wider and better cover, to revise financial and savings systems and ensure that workers and their families have better, more direct and more immediate access to mortgage savings schemes, security and pensions and to bring in to such schemes those who at present do not enjoy any formal social security protection.

At the international level, in its labour policy, Mexico envisages the fullest cooperation with the international organizations. We consider international cooperation to be the best mechanism to tap the advantages and facilities of the globalization process and to create more jobs. This will allow us to protect the rights of migrant workers, all our citizens working abroad, and press for implementation of ILO Conventions on the protection of employment, women and children, freedom of association, union rights, and safety and health at work.

With such a labour policy, the Mexican State is assuming its responsibilities in creating the basic conditions for promoting economic growth which can generate productive employment, generate better paid jobs and in this way promote concerted action of production factors and eliminate obstacles to job creation and to guaranteeing protection of the social rights that our workers have struggled for in the past. All of this, of course, with a view to improving the standard of living of the 90 million inhabitants of our country.

In conclusion, I would like to say that the success of Mexico's labour policies will depend upon the efforts made by the country as a whole. This is the way we Mexicans understand it. However, we can be helped in our efforts by international cooperation – cooperation based on respect for the free decision-making process, and of the freely decided policies of each people based upon respect for the concept that advice, support and resources must be provided through bilateral discussion, without pressure and without exclusivity.

Mexico expresses the hope that this Organization can be strengthened and that it can find its new place in the open market situation, in international competition and the increased pressure on labour and well-being that mark our era.

The history of the Organization, the quality of the Conference participants are sound reasons that give us hope for a better future.

Mr. BRERETON (Minister for Industrial Relations, Australia) – It is my very great pleasure to join previous speakers in congratulating the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to preside over this Session of the International Labour Conference. I am also pleased to address today the Report of the Director-General entitled Promoting Employment. The Report provides a comprehensive review of employment issues from the global perspective.

Let me say that this discussion is very timely as the Declaration and Programme of Action adopted at the Copenhagen World Summit on Social Development emphasised the goal of full employment as a basic objective for economic and social policy. Addressing the problem of unemployment has become a major concern to the whole of the world community and let me say Australia has not been exempt from this challenge. In May of last year the Australian Government released a White Paper on employment and growth entitled Working Nation, to reduce unemployment and to assist particularly the young and the long-term unemployed. Working Nation contained initiatives not only in relation to employment, education and training but also improved social security arrangements. Skill formation, flexibility and work incentives for the labour force were provided, focusing particularly on the long-term unemployed. Our goal is an Australia where everyone who wants a job can find one and it is a goal that cannot be reached simply and cannot be reached quickly. However, we can say that we have now reduced the Australian unemployment rate to 8.3 per cent, down from 11.2 per cent in 1992, and our aim is to reduce it further to 5 per cent by the end of this decade and of course that will be a very considerable achievement.

Let me say that national governments carry the main responsibility for finding answers to the scourge of unemployment. The great success of the rapidly need not unemployment benefit but social welfare payments. We would still like to encourage the others not to cut themselves off completely from the world of work, and, in the absence of a permanent job, to accept short-term employment. We are also making efforts to provide subsidized jobs for these people.

In the conditions prevailing in Hungary it is particularly difficult to meet the twofold imperative of social justice and economic efficiency. In the world of work as elsewhere, the development of democratic institutions is the key to all forms of progress. Our Government therefore intends to rely increasingly on the active contribution of both unions and the employers. The tripartite system constitutes an indispensable element in political democracy and in the social market economy. We attach, however, just as much importance to extending the range of bilateral agreements. In the various labour, professional and trade organizations, bilateral agreements are able to establish the optimum, acceptable both to the employers and to the employees, thus laying the foundations for social peace.

In order to strengthen the ability to reach agreements the Hungarian Government is endeavouring to facilitate the development of the trade union movement by extending trade union rights and ensuring proper conditions for the unions to operate in. For the same reason we encourage the development of activities of the employers' organizations.

In order to reach social consensus, we would also like to introduce an institution of a new kind. We intend to create in the very near future a mediation and conciliation service in order to facilitate the friendly settlement of labour disputes. I would like to take advantage of this opportunity of speaking to you here to ask for support from the ILO in the creation and development of this new institution.

Beyond the measures for which governments are responsible in their various countries and beyond cooperation of the social partners, increasing employment or increased employment means global cooperation. In agreement with the Report of the Director-General, I would like to state that full employment can only be regained on the basis of joint action at the national and international levels and of a renewal of international cooperation.

The International Labour Organization has a pioneering role to play in the establishing of international commitments with a view to solving the worldwide problem of unemployment and with a view to coordinating cooperation among different countries and the international organizations.

I am convinced that the debate made possible by this Conference and the proposals which will be made at the Informal Ministerial Meeting, will pave the way to meeting expectations in relation to social justice and to the achievement of sustained high levels of employment.

With these thoughts I conclude and wish the Conference a fruitful and successful conclusion.

Mr. POPESCU (Minister of State, Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Romania) – This year's Conference is marked by the strong impression created by the Copenhagen World Summit for Social Development which was a moment of political awareness and integrated approach, for the first time on a global scale, involving the serious social issues confronting humanity as the twentieth century comes to an end.

More important than the World Summit for Social Development itself is its outcome and, in this respect, Romania appreciates that the International Labour Organization has, through its expertise, experience and technical performance, a major role in following up and implementing the actions and commitments assumed in the Declaration and Programme of Action adopted by the World Summit for Social Development.

The admirable theme proposed this year by the Director-General of the International Labour Office for consideration by the member States is also included in the context of active measures that governments are supposed to take in order to eradicate the genuine scourge of unemployment.

I avail myself of this opportunity to salute the initiative taken by the Director-General to publish a series of annual reports on the situation of employment throughout the world and, at this point, please allow me to mention our highest appreciation for the scientific bearing and discipline shown by the first report in this series.

Based on these reports, one can initiate consultations on a regional level, in the framework of which national factors and international bodies with economic and social expertise cooperate in seeking global solutions meant to sustain national programmes that involve concerted bi- and multilateral cooperation focusing on the causes of the problem.

This involves neither philanthropical gestures nor the massive importing of models and systems, but instead a collaboration beneficial to all partners, in which national efforts harmonize with international cooperation. In other words, this is what Romania means by partnership for economic and social development.

A brief balance of the five years of transition Romania has gone through highlights a process of production stabilization and a positive economic growth rate as of 1993. In 1994 the positive trends in economic evolution reflected a rising curve. Gross domestic product growth was estimated to be 2.4 per cent, corresponding to increased activity in the main branches of the national economy.

Over the last year the unemployment rate has remained relatively stable, varying between 10.7 and 11.1 per cent, Romania being from this point of view about mid-way on the European scale.

None the less, economic stabilization and re-launching of growth are still fragile and strongly depend on the growth of the goods and services sector, within the context of a competitive economy, as well as depending on the stimulation of investment, the development of genuine market mechanisms and the steady continuation of current structural changes. Moreover, the setting up of a new and effective institutional and legislative framework as well as the restructuring of the labour and capital market require a longer period of time under the most favourable conditions, a reality correctly pointed out in the Director-General's Report.

The experience gathered and the constant concern of the Government and Parliament of Romania have made it possible to implement a national socio-economic reform strategy, two priorities of which are social policy and social protection.

As concerns employment, the general policy promoted by the Romanian Government aims, in principle, at improving the material infrastructure and the legislative framework, in order to attract direct investments, as well as at stimulating labour force mobility by professional guidance and training, correlated with the labour market's evolution, and by vocational retraining jointly subsidized by the State and the employers.

Specific attention is being paid to the special policies directly affecting employment and whose goal is job creation and the professional insertion of the most vulnerable categories (young people, women, the handicapped, and the long-term unemployed).

Improving employment services, granting advantageous credits for the setting-up and development of small and medium enterprises hiring the unemployed, and encouraging employers to hire graduates are constructive premises for implementing a system able to progressively reduce unemployment.

Active labour market policies will complement social protection and gradually assume part of the economic burden the latter puts on the State. The present economic and social situation as well as the perspectives oblige the State to continue being both the guarantor of social objectives in the field of employment, remuneration and labour conditions and the main agency responsible for the social welfare of its citizens, especially the disadvantaged ones, it being in charge of ensuring the transfer of resources needed. Fighting against unemployment and social exclusion requires the participation of all political, economic and social actors, including NGOs.

The reform of the social protection system in Romania supposes a gradual decentralization – in the future – of social protection and the involvement of employers, local public administration bodies, and governmental organizations, which must exercise a great deal of responsibility.

Other priorities of social reform in Romania are to identify the needs of the most vulnerable social categories and to encourage the population to directly contribute by self-protection.

In order to create the institutional framework for strengthening the tripartite consultation and negotiation mechanism, the Government has submitted to Parliament a draft bill creating the Economic and Social Council, a tripartite body meant to play an advisory role in developing economic and social policy, and acting as a mediator in developing this policy, as well as mediating social conflicts. The institutional framework will also be improved by the creation of the National Employment and Vocational Training Agency which is to be supervised by a tripartite Governing Body and will provide job placement, guidance and training of the labour force.

Our efforts in the field of economic and social reform are in line with overall structural changes at the European and global level.

This is the context in which the spirit of partnership and international solidarity should, through our combined efforts, provide a smooth path to the twenty-first century.

Lastly, please allow me to express the determination of the Government of Romania that, through its own efforts, it will join in with international action in seeking viable solutions to the social problems that are, for the time being, the major challenge which the international community is asked to meet.

Mr. TAN (Employers' delegate, Philippines) – On behalf of the Philippine employers' delegation, may I extend our warm congratulations to the President on his election to the presidency of this Conference. We are certain that under his leadership, this session of the Conference will reach a successful conclusion.

It is with a deep sense of satisfaction that I will address this body on the subject of promotion of employment in the Philippine context. For the Director-General's Report on the topic coming as it does after all these years, validates the Philippine employers' long-held thesis that the promotion of employment for the more than 3 million jobless citizens of my country is the single most compelling mandate of government.

In the many forums and councils which have brought together the tripartite partners over the last two decades, we have steered public discourse and debate towards the political dimensions of labour-management relations. We have also suffered helplessly the curse of unemployment that continued to tear at the fabric of our society.

For so long, we toiled day in and day out with labour and government, not so much to provide the conditions under which jobs can be generated, but to discuss whether the political rights of labour unions or the aspirations of their members can be protected to their satisfaction under a legal system that by any standard is more solicitous and protective of the working man than any other, anywhere in the world.

In a sense, even with the zeal of altruistic public servants, we did not make sufficient use of the opportunity to alleviate poverty and social exclusion through employment. We sacrificed the virtue of gainful work for the intellectual reward of political domination in the workplace. Instead of efforts to reduce injury to private enterprise in a labour dispute and thus save jobs, we paid greater tribute to the romance of the picket lines, even if this meant we had to consign workers to joblessness and deprivation. Instead of a compensatory wage policy that provides still greater rewards for the most productive among our employees, we continued to rely on legislated and fixed minimum wages to be applied to all, regardless of the amount and quality of the service.

Now we have reached the threshold of an increasingly borderless world that could spell out the difference between more employment or increasing unemployment for our people. On many occasions, we have expressed the view, echoed by many economists, that in order to increase employment, wages should not outpace labour productivity. In certain respects, the Director-General confirms this observation when in his Report he states that "two broad policy routes for encouraging the required creation of jobs for the low-skilled can be envisaged: pressing wages down through labour market deregulation or employment subsidies".

We do not advocate a cheap labour policy to be competitive and to increase our capability to create jobs. Rather it is irrefutable that high wages reduce the intensity of investments, and therefore of employment. It is only a high growth rate of the economy, anchored on industrialization and deregulation of employment, that can help promote job creation.

At present the social partners in the Philippines are locked in a debate not on the imperatives of skills upgrading as we move into the world of AFTA and GATT, but whether the labour unions will accept flexible working arrangements as a necessity in promoting employment. Indeed, while our neighbours are honing their skills to meet the challenges of global competition, we are still preoccupied with defending the perimeters of union hegemony, at the precise moment when our common enemy, the threat of marginalization – is knocking at our door.

We are not oblivious to the continuing vigilance aimed at protecting the gains of the labour movement. In all candour, we want to preserve them. And we will not deny the minimum rights and benefits that the law accords to all workers. In truth, we should institutionalize them. But let these be the sworn duties of the enforcers of labour standards, and not the excuse to deprive legitimate business of the right to adopt subcontracting as a means to create more jobs and make business profitable for the good of both labour and capital.

At this stage of our economic development, we cannot afford to imitate the whims and caprices of the affluent nations. Our restraint may well be the saving grace in our determined bid to be a newly industrializing country. In fact, there is now increasing unemployment in the industrialized countries, while the emerging economies of Asia are enjoying unprecedented growth and, consequently, employment opportunities.

Specifically, we are informed that Asia, and particularly South-East Asia, has shown impressive growth in manufacturing output and that Europe, on the other hand, has shifted to services. This represents for us the rising expectation of more higher-paying jobs, as the workforce shifts from agriculture to industry.

But can we sustain this movement of workers into the heart of industry? In all humility we say we can, if we remove the constraints in the law and in actual practices which are imposed on the ways of doing business. Unless the burdens of industry that go into the cost of goods and services, such as payroll taxes, are frozen or reduced if need be, the increasing taxation involved in hiring workers will thwart for us the dream of full employment.

Our efforts to promote employment must therefore be centred round a conservatism in the formulation of safety nets and social insurance – for us anyway, in a developing country where even job-sharing has been elevated to the level of policy. We must all recognize the scarcity of jobs that this Organization has warned us about in its report on employment. For us, and for labour unions, the greatest challenge is not how much more care and protection our employed citizens deserve, but how many more should have a decent means of livelihood in the first place.

As we move closer to the reality of a borderless economy, let us seek counsel from each other for mutual survival. Let us accept the principle that employment is the fertile ground in which labour unions grow and flourish. In that life-giving environment, both employers and workers must ensure that the conditions exist to provide continuously opportunities for work, so that our peripatetic countrymen, uprooted from the refuge of their homeland and the comfort of their kinsmen, need not find themselves in the most forbidding places of the world in search of jobs at the expense of their lives, their fortunes and their honour.

PROGRAMME AND BUDGET AND OTHER FINANCIAL QUESTIONS: PRELIMINARY DISCUSSION

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – The first item this afternoon is the preliminary discussion of the draft Programme and Budget for 1996-97, and other financial questions.

Miss MACKIE (Employers' delegate, United Kingdom) – It is a pleasure to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their appointment.

This item on the agenda of the Conference represents the small tip of a very large iceberg. The most important item to be discussed by any organization must always be the provision to be made for its finances, and of course the ILO is no exception to this. Every two years the Conference receives proposals for its approval which set out the programme and budget for the next biennium. That approval is the final stage in a long and careful process in which full tripartite discussions enable the representative views of all the constituent Members of the Organization to be heard and taken into account.

The Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body on which I have the privilege to act as spokesperson for the Employers' group debated the original draft proposals for a full week and various adjustments were made. You all have the report of that discussion before you in Report II Draft Programme and Budget 1996-97 and other financial questions. On 6 April 1995 the Governing Body accepted the report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and decided with the support of all three groups to propose to this session of the International Labour Conference the amended programme and budget of which you now have the details. Of course, it is not from any point of view a perfect budget but it is a budget which represents a fair compromise between different positions and it was fully supported by the three groups of the Governing Body which represent employers, governments and workers.

On behalf of the Employers I can repeat now the support we gave a few weeks ago. I commend the draft Programme and Budget for 1996-97 to this Conference. Today is not quite the final stage; that will come when the vote is taken later in the Conference. I hope that at that time these proposals, which have been so carefully worked out, will receive the support of the Governments and Workers as well as the Employers' delegates to this Conference.

You have more than one financial proposal on the agenda. They are all important in their own way and I am happy to place on record our support for the resolutions concerning cash surpluses and deficits, the Maritime Session of the International Labour Conference and the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization.

Finally, if I may close on a more personal note, I would wish to underline my own support for the work done by the ILO. It provides a most important forum for communication, debate and better international understanding of matters which affect us all in our daily life. It does so uniquely among international organizations with the full involvement of employers and workers. That may sometimes disturb governments unaccustomed to such a manner of working. And of course we all criticize it. We believe it could be more efficient. It could be improved in various ways. But if the day ever comes when we are not interested enough even to criticize it, that will indeed be a sad day and a serious day for the employers as well as the employees of the world.

I commend the financial resolutions to the Conference.

Mr. TAPIOLA (Workers' delegate, Finland) – I would like to pass on my congratulations to the President on his election to the Presidency, and to the Vice-Presidents.

Clearly, the most significant feature of the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 is that they are based on the 75th anniversary Conference Session of the International Labour Organization which we celebrated last year. This session of the Conference should have no cause to complain that its views have not been taken into account, either by those who drafted the proposals, the Office or those who amended them and decided on their final content – namely the members of the Governing Body. This work is the result of tripartite consultations in March and April this year. The Workers' group is committed to the proposals and endorses their approval by the Conference and I say this as Chairperson of the Workers' group of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body.

This budget has to be understood as a balanced whole. Large parts of it reflect the topical discussions we had last year and in fact the whole of the recent discussion on the future orientation of the Organization. This discussion has, at times, been turbulent and critical and all constituents have put forward their views. These are reflected in the proposals, and we have recognized that the discussion has been constructive and useful. Of course we might have wanted more in some areas. The Workers' group was concerned that at a time when the globalization of our labour markets has become an overriding concern, there did not seem to be adequate provision to deal with the question of multinational enterprises. Others shared our concern about resources for work on equality between women and men. The Governing Body's discussions led to solutions for these and other key issues, which helped us to reach the necessary consensus on the programme and budget as a whole.

For instance, on the two important and interrelated issues of standards and unemployment we have worked out a programme which should enable the ILO to fulfil its role in promoting full, freely chosen and productive employment with decent conditions of work, for the benefit of society and all its members. The message this programme and budget sends to the follow-up of the World Summit for Social Development is that the ILO is ready and able to meet the expectations of it and its obligations contained under the Declaration and Programme of Action of the Copenhagen Summit.

The proposals contain several items of importance to the ILO to ensure its follow-up to the Summit. For the Workers' group it is of the utmost importance that there should be adequate resources for the work on freedom of association and other fundamental labour standards. Our group has made further proposals on how to step up this work. I note that, for instance, in the Governing Body's discussions on the social dimensions of the liberalization of international trade, the role of fundamental ILO standards has been repeatedly emphasized by virtually every participant and we have all recognized that this is both an old and a renewed priority. We also have increased provision for activities to help enterprises. The Workers' group has supported this part of the programme and budget on the understanding that when we talk of the enterprise we take it as a whole, including its workers and the way in which collective bargaining and employees' participation can improve the position of all those for whom enterprises provide employment and an income. This part of the programme has to be seen in the context of the overall objectives of the ILO. The Workers' group believes that the promotion of employment and enterprises and workers' protection go hand in hand; and of course the key element of success here is once again standards. This demonstrates how important it is for the programme to be seen as a coherent whole in which there is a high level of mutual dependency between the main components. This is how the programme of work of a tripartite organization should be.

Another aspect is that of getting closer to the constituents, implementing the active partnership policy. The concerns of governments and workers' and employers' organizations in the field must be heard. Much of the relevance of the ILO depends on this. The Workers' group welcomes the consensus on measures actively to reach out to the constituents. It is not an easy task but major steps have been made through the multidisciplinary teams.

To sum up, a substantive approach and measures to interact with the constituents are what the Conference has shown it wanted through its debates and resolutions. This is the programme and budget the Office and the Governing Body were asked to prepare, adopt and propose. Now it is more than fair to expect that the efforts made will be appreciated and that the budget will be approved.

(Mr. Popescu takes the Chair.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We shall now resume the discussion of the reports of the Chairman of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

I would like to refer to the Director-General's Report and its principal theme, the urgent need to promote employment. It could not have been more timely or better chosen.

The contrasting figures between the meaningful and constant growth of world production in the last 20 years as well as the simultaneous increase of unemployment, underemployment, inequality and poverty have sounded the alarm for Governments and the international community. Recall that last year the Director-General's Report referred to a figure of 30 per cent of the world's workforce without gainful employment, more than 120 million unemployed and some 700 million underemployed. I would also like to remind you that this year's World Summit for Social Development issued a unanimous call to eliminate extreme poverty, one of the causes of which is precisely unemployment.

There is no doubt that we are facing a problem whose repercussions and effects transcend national borders and actions and have now reached the global level, requiring a struggle involving complementary and coordinated policies, joint proposals and action at the national, regional and world level.

As the Director-General's Report points out, it is imperative that national and international organizations increase their coordination and cooperation in order to simultaneously create and implement economic and financial policies, together with social policies, with particular emphasis on the generation of employment. Although this worrisome situation, particularly in the developing countries, could result in a defeatist attitude, we cannot and must not falter but must continue to struggle unswervingly and resolutely to curb unemployment and underemployment as well as its deep-rooted effects of social and human disintegration. In order to do this, we must implement major changes and undertake action that will lead us to sustainable economic growth and social equality with socio-economic recovery, stimulating private production, attracting important investments in capital and human resources. We must also make our seemingly protective laws which bar access to the labour market more flexible, realizing that labour laws should not only protect those who have work but even more so those who do not and are desperately seeking it.

In the last two Conferences, as Minister of Labour under President Sixto Durán Ballén, who took office in 1992, I pointed out that up to that year the Ecuadorian economy had been characterized by macroeconomic imbalances, and that it had been necessary to restructure and reorient it. Positive results were obtained, such as reducing and controlling inflation, which fell from 60 per cent to 25 per cent annually, increasing our foreign reserves, cutting our fiscal deficit, and maintaining a stable exchange rate, among other achievements. At the same time in the labour and social spheres there have been fewer labour disputes, with the implementation of labour policies that are more balanced and equitable, and a complementary relationship between labour and capital. We have also embarked on a programme to restore purchasing power, and at the lowest levels wages have outpaced inflation with a 40 per cent increase in real wages. Whereas in January 1992 the minimum wage in Ecuador was a mere $57 per month, since January 1995 it has been $145 per month, although evidently it is still insufficient. With regard to employment behaviour, although we have still not achieved the level of results we had hoped for, it is very important to note that the actions and programmes being carried out have started to reverse the growing trend towards unemployment and underemployment, which in urban areas between 1992 and 1994 dropped from 8.9 per cent to 7.1 per cent for the former and from 47.9 per cent to 45.2 per cent for the latter. However, it should be noted that private sector employment is increasing at a sluggish pace and that public employment has dropped as a result of modernization and policies to trim the government sector. Yet there has been a human dimension to this bureaucratic downsizing, since the Government has provided economic incentives to encourage productive activities which create jobs. We must also, as I said before, facilitate sustainable economic growth with social equality which will generate employment and at the same time intensify the important work that we are carrying out in vocational training, which is not only the job of the State but is also incumbent on employers and workers.

As was stated by the Government of my country at the Copenhagen Summit, one public policy objective to which the Government is dedicating considerable efforts involves an increase of employment in the formal sector while boosting productivity in the informal sector as a step towards full employment. At the same time the Government will continue to encourage the implementation of programmes for the creation of new jobs, especially for such vulnerable groups as women, children and young people.

Apart from what I have already said, in accepting the generous offer of technical cooperation from the International Labour Organization, the Government of Ecuador is now, through social dialogue, trying to draw closer to its partners, namely employers and workers, in order to attain a widespread social pact that will generate employment, combat poverty and increase the living standard of the population. These three great objectives are like branches from a tree trunk to which they must always remain attached if they are to draw nourishment from its sap. At the same time the common good requires nourishment from the sap of tripartism and its indispensable cooperation and dialogue. There is no doubt that at a time when humanity is preparing to usher in the twenty-first century, the principles stated in the Constitution of this noble Organization and in the Philadelphia Declaration have more meaning than ever. These instruments establish a need for a lasting peace based on social justice. There can be no doubt that the struggle in which nations are engaged to eliminate unemployment will bring us close to attaining this objective that can no longer be delayed.

Once again, I am confident that this Conference will reach its desired goal, thus contributing to the spread of peace and justice in this dark and troubled world shut off from the sunshine around it.

Mr. TURNQUEST (Minister of State for Public Service and Labour, Bahamas) – On behalf of the Government of the Commonwealth of the Bahamas, I am pleased to lead our tripartite delegation to this 82nd Session. My delegation also joins with other delegations in congratulating the President on his election. We are sure that under your leadership, we will achieve the objectives of this Conference.

We are encouraged, upon review of the ILO and its principles, that the Organization remains committed and supportive toward improving the lives of working people in all countries of the world. Through its tripartite composition, the ILO has contributed significantly to a greater awareness and understanding of the need to foster and maintain industrial harmony in member States.

During the 81st Session the ILO celebrated its 75th anniversary of existence. It was also an opportunity for the Organization to review again its principles and chart new courses for a world that has seemingly lost its sense of direction and purpose. I contend, as confirmed by the Director-General's Report, that when the review is concluded, the ILO will once again reaffirm its belief that only when all men are free from oppression, poverty, unemployment, political dictatorships and racism will we experience the kind of world peace that the founding fathers envisaged 76 years ago when this Organization was established, and of peace which the oppressed people of the world so fervently wish for today.

The changing social and economic conditions have brought to the forefront new social and economic problems. There is now, more than ever, a greater need for the services which the ILO provides, particularly in the area of technical assistance. These conditions are impacted by problems incurred by developing countries in transition to a market-driven economy and available financial resources for social development.

My Government's thrust seeks to foster a market-oriented economy having a larger sector of the labour force employed in the private sector, and the expansion of self-employment and home work. The creation of employment opportunities remains at the centre of the strategies and policies of my Government, bearing in mind full respect for workers' rights, with the participation of employers, workers and their respective organizations.

To assist in achieving our objectives, we have expanded work opportunities and productivity in both rural and urban sectors by investing in human resource development, promoting technologies that generate productive employment, and by encouraging self-employment, entrepreneurship and small and medium-sized enterprises. We have improved access to land and credit for small business development, with a view to increasing its contribution to the eradication of poverty and to social integration and the strengthening of linkages with the formal economy.

One of the challenges facing us is to find the right balance between profitable businesses and content employees. My ultimate goal is the achievement of a full employment economy where workers are protected. The Bahamas supports the ILO playing a greater role in the international scene, due to the nature of its mandate and its experience over the years. The various multidisciplinary teams in place within the various regions ensure that more efficient and coordinated technical assistance is now available to the various constituents.

The Bahamas, within the Caribbean region, will seek to utilize all available technical assistance and expertise offered by the ILO. The ILO, I'm sure, will seize the opportunity to provide the technical leadership in mobilizing action at both the national, regional and international levels to improve the global employment situation.

As Minister of Labour for the Bahamas, and Chairman for the Standing Committee of Ministers of Labour for the Caribbean Community, I can confirm that we are cognizant and concerned about the various issues impacting upon and affecting labour within the region. We have resolved to address these issues collectively, in an appropriate manner specific to our individual territories. Foremost on our agenda is the need to establish and regularize conditions and opportunities to facilitate (a) the need for strengthening labour administration systems which will incorporate recommendations from the Regional Tripartite Working Party of Labour Officials; (b) the establishment of a Tripartite Advisory Board to become more active in serving as sounding boards for the development of policies and assessing the impact of economic policies on labour; and (c) the promotion of international labour standards within the community, and in keeping with article 19 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, to bring to the attention of national parliaments, where applicable, outstanding Conventions and Recommendations.

Within our Caribbean region, labour ministers have agreed to support and promote the recommendations of the World Summit on Social Development held in Copenhagen on employment creation and poverty alleviation, and to disseminate and discuss these recommendations widely among the constituencies of the social partners. We have also agreed that member States within our region would convene tripartite meetings with a view to formulating and implementing appropriate national strategies for the reduction of poverty and the creation of employment.

We have established these positions against the background that the international trend continues towards a market-driven economy, with increasing pressures on our national markets by non-national competitors. This means that the focus of governmental labour policies and laws will have to reflect this reality. It also means that both employers' organizations and trade unions have to re-examine their approach to the traditional labour issues which they face from time to time.

Realizing the evolving changes in the workplace and in the market-place, there is an increasing need to have in place an effective labour administrative system in each territory throughout our region, similar in content and in structure. It is with this view, and supported by the radical changes currently under way in the region's economic development, that we have reaffirmed our determination to fulfil our goals in collectively establishing generally accepted norms for labour and industrial relations.

Our efforts to bring to fruition our reaffirmed commitment for fundamental human rights and freedoms will remain our constant focus, especially with regard to the fundamental right of workers to organize and bargain collectively, to foster improved living and working conditions, as well as adequate social security policies and programmes for all our peoples.

Let us all, therefore, resolve to successfully meet the challenges and create an era of world peace and prosperity based on social justice.

Original Spanish: Mr. OÑATE (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Mexico) – It is a great honour for the Government of Mexico to participate in this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference, a Conference which, without any doubt whatsoever, will give extremely useful results because of the high level of participation and the eminence of the Conference President.

The Government of Mexico supports the ideas in the Director-General's Report about the growing importance of promoting employment. World economic development, beneficial though it may be, does have a negative balance to be seen in the rising unemployment from which both industrialized economies and developing countries are suffering. The disadvantages that the market economy holds for workers and nations can only be overcome by growth.

Social exclusion, inequality and poverty are becoming more common and more serious as our economies have proved incapable of creating employment. Mexico shares the concerns of the International Labour Organization: job creation is a priority for government policies. Mexico agrees that the solution to the jobs problem will come from growth and from cooperation between employers, employees and governments.

A variety of factors affect the ability of economies to create jobs; however, at an international level, it is economic globalization, capital movements and the degree of international market penetration that are becoming increasingly apparent. On the domestic front, investment and savings policies, financial structures, the adoption of new technology and human resource training all have a fundamental role to play in promoting economic growth that generates jobs; jobs that are stable and part of the formal sector; jobs that offer a just and adequate wage. This is a new approach to re-enhancing work, wages and productivity.

Any employment policy needs to be an integrated one. It also has to be able to reconcile the economic objectives of both employees and the employers, as well as the social objectives which all governments are committed to promote.

The Government of Mexico has been charged by its President to institute an economic policy which will create more productive jobs and better wages for the Mexican workers. President Ernesto Zedillo has stated that the aim of economic policy must be to enhance the well-being of each person and each family. And the basis of this well-being is a decent, stable and well-paid job.

For over a decade, Mexico has been plunged into a process of modernization which has allowed it to alter its industrial profile and its industrial base. However, much needs to be done to ensure that economic growth will be translated into well-being and the creation of stable and productive jobs.

The financial and currency crises of late 1994 and early 1995 have obviously hit employment in our country. Declared unemployment has reached levels never seen before. In addition, employment in Mexico is also under pressure from natural demographic growth. Without economic growth there is no solution.

Consequently, we have taken measures and adopted plans to promote and restore confidence and financial and currency stability. It is this confidence and stability that are needed for investment and economic growth in general. Mexico will support any initiative acceptable to both workers and employers which will help create jobs, raise workers' real earnings and promote labour market stability. Any initiative which will promote labour relations stability and transparency and maintain the necessary balance between labour and capital.

By improving consultation and concertation mechanisms, the Government of Mexico is working with the employers and employees to promote free bargaining, minimize disputes and maximize agreements to increase and improve employment and raise wages. Consequently, better workforce training and productivity are today a priority for the Mexican Government. Mexicans are advancing along this path in a process of consultation and concertation between employers and the employees. Training and retraining programmes, education, skill-certification and labour qualification standards to meet the current labour market situation and needs are all being developed.

The establishment just a few days ago of the Mexican Productivity Board and, for example, the expansion of the programme of grants for worker training and total quality control and modernization schemes all demonstrate the will of Government, employers and employees to put together the conditions to develop and employ human capital to the best.

Social security, like jobs, is also being redefined – a process essential to achieve wider and better cover, to revise financial and savings systems and ensure that workers and their families have better, more direct and more immediate access to mortgage savings schemes, security and pensions and to bring in to such schemes those who at present do not enjoy any formal social security protection.

At the international level, in its labour policy, Mexico envisages the fullest cooperation with the international organizations. We consider international cooperation to be the best mechanism to tap the advantages and facilities of the globalization process and to create more jobs. This will allow us to protect the rights of migrant workers, all our citizens working abroad, and press for implementation of ILO Conventions on the protection of employment, women and children, freedom of association, union rights, and safety and health at work.

With such a labour policy, the Mexican State is assuming its responsibilities in creating the basic conditions for promoting economic growth which can generate productive employment, generate better paid jobs and in this way promote concerted action of production factors and eliminate obstacles to job creation and to guaranteeing protection of the social rights that our workers have struggled for in the past. All of this, of course, with a view to improving the standard of living of the 90 million inhabitants of our country.

In conclusion, I would like to say that the success of Mexico's labour policies will depend upon the efforts made by the country as a whole. This is the way we Mexicans understand it. However, we can be helped in our efforts by international cooperation – cooperation based on respect for the free decision-making process, and of the freely decided policies of each people based upon respect for the concept that advice, support and resources must be provided through bilateral discussion, without pressure and without exclusivity.

Mexico expresses the hope that this Organization can be strengthened and that it can find its new place in the open market situation, in international competition and the increased pressure on labour and well-being that mark our era.

The history of the Organization, the quality of the Conference participants are sound reasons that give us hope for a better future.

Mr. BRERETON (Minister for Industrial Relations, Australia) – It is my very great pleasure to join previous speakers in congratulating the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to preside over this Session of the International Labour Conference. I am also pleased to address today the Report of the Director-General entitled Promoting Employment. The Report provides a comprehensive review of employment issues from the global perspective.

Let me say that this discussion is very timely as the Declaration and Programme of Action adopted at the Copenhagen World Summit on Social Development emphasised the goal of full employment as a basic objective for economic and social policy. Addressing the problem of unemployment has become a major concern to the whole of the world community and let me say Australia has not been exempt from this challenge. In May of last year the Australian Government released a White Paper on employment and growth entitled Working Nation, to reduce unemployment and to assist particularly the young and the long-term unemployed. Working Nation contained initiatives not only in relation to employment, education and training but also improved social security arrangements. Skill formation, flexibility and work incentives for the labour force were provided, focusing particularly on the long-term unemployed. Our goal is an Australia where everyone who wants a job can find one and it is a goal that cannot be reached simply and cannot be reached quickly. However, we can say that we have now reduced the Australian unemployment rate to 8.3 per cent, down from 11.2 per cent in 1992, and our aim is to reduce it further to 5 per cent by the end of this decade and of course that will be a very considerable achievement.

Let me say that national governments carry the main responsibility for finding answers to the scourge of unemployment. The great success of the rapidly

International developments are also critically important. The liberalisation of international trade offers us the opportunity for worldwide growth, for job creation and for the alleviation of poverty. As the Director-General in his Report notes, viewed as a whole the world economy appears to be creating the basis for rising prosperity in employment growth. A key role for the ILO is to identify and address the social dimensions of this trade liberalisation and this must include any potentially negative effects on labour standards. Australia supports the frank discussion of this issue in the ILO forums, including the Governing Body's Working Party. Change and adjustment can be achieved whilst ensuring social equity and increased employment. Let me turn to Australia's experience by way of illustration. The Australian Government's industrial relations reforms have been part of a broad strategy to make the Australian economy more internationally competitive. Our industrial relations system is evolving from a centralized one to a more decentralized system in response to changed economic circumstances. The crucial element in the process of reform and adjustments has been the Prices and Incomes Accord between the Government and the Australian Council of Trade Unions. In the 1980s the accord proved vitally important both in promoting a high level of jobs growth but also in doing so without inflationary wages growth. In recent years it has assisted us in achieving labour market reform and it has contributed to the very positive employment growth that we have experienced.

The Government and the ACTU are currently negotiating the details of a new accord which will emphasise social protection in the context of progressive and efficient economic and industrial relations reforms. In introducing our reforms the Australian Government has placed a high priority on ensuring that it does not harm employees. In this way we have ensured that they support change rather than resist it. In this context we have introduced to our own national legislation a number of minimum entitlements based on the Conventions of the ILO. These have guaranteed all Australian workers the right to a fair minimum wage, equal pay for work of equal value, 12 months unpaid leave and protection against unfair dismissal.

Australia takes its ILO obligations and the ILO standards very seriously. We have ratified 54 Conventions today and we are steadily working towards further ratifications. I am pleased to announce today that agreement has been reached for the ratification of a further three Maritime Conventions and can I also say that as a major mining country we are strongly committed to the development of the new ILO standard of safety in mines at this Conference. We will consider this standard as a priority with a view to its early ratification. I know that will please John Maitland very much indeed and all the miners of Australia.

The Director-General has raised the important issue of whether rules providing for employment security are an inhibition on employment growth. His Report concludes that such rules are no barrier or constraint to creating employment. In Australia some commentators have argued that the employment protections provided in our national laws discourage employers from hiring new staff and this results in higher unemployment. Well, delegates, the Australian figures speak for themselves. Since the provisions took effect in March 1994, more than 350,000 jobs have been created representing 5 per cent growth in employment. Australia's current unemployment rate is now at its lowest point for four years. Thus we believe that we have achieved the right balance between employment creation and ensuring workers have a fair safety net to protect their wages and to protect their conditions.

The Director-General also stresses the importance of international cooperation in order to restore global full employment. We in Australia agree, and agree wholeheartedly, with this approach. Clearly high priority must be given to employment goals in the formulation of international economic policies, programmes and strategies. The Australian Government fully supports the priority given to the promotion of the employment objective in the ILO's work and also in its collaboration with other international agencies. The ILO is well placed to play a key role. Its focus should be on its core mandate emphasizing its expertise in the human and social aspects of development, and emphasizing the importance of employment issues in the process of economic change and economic development.

I know we face a difficult task at this Conference in considering the programme and the budget recommendations for the 1996-97 biennium. It is clear that resources will be limited and need to be deployed to the maximum effect. As the Conference and the Governing Body deliberates on these issues I would urge that the technical programmes which represent a truly key part of the ILO core mandate be protected to the maximum degree necessary. Cut-backs should be concentrated as far as possible in management and in administration. We must strive to protect the new initiatives that are showing so much promise at the moment. For example the Active Partnership Policy which has so much to offer, and nowhere more so than in our Asia-Pacific region.

Australia has strongly supported the technical assistance work of the ILO in our region through our overseas aid programmes. Maintaining an international focus on global employment needs is a challenge for our nations. The problem is one best addressed by all of us working constructively together. The ILO is uniquely qualified to assist in the achievement of the creation of productive employment, the alleviation of poverty and the promotion of social justice. But our work together can only be fully effective with the continuing moral and financial support of all our member States. Australia pledges its support and we urge all other member States to do exactly the same.

Ms. KELTSOVÁ (Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Family, Slovakia) – First of all, permit me to join the previous speakers in congratulating the President and the other Officers on their election to their respective posts at the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish them all success in their difficult and responsible work.

I would also like to express my appreciation for all the activities performed by the International Labour Organization, particularly by the Director-General, the Governing Body and other special committees, and thank the ILO for the support and encouragement which our country has received since it became a full member of this Organization.

The Slovak Republic is continuing its third year of democratic and pluralistic development and economic transformation based on the socially and environmentally oriented principles of a market economy. It has assumed all the contractual obligations of the former Czech and Slovak Federal Republic, and subsequently has amended its legislation according to European standards. This is a part of our work which is also called for in the association agreement between the European Union and the Slovak Republic. The Government of the Slovak Republic, as stated in its proclamation and plan of work and as a part of the country's economic development, is actively implementing the concept of the complex transformation of the social sphere. Under this concept, the systems of social insurance, state social subsidies and social assistance are being revised. As part of this revision, the Act on social insurance, Act on state social subsidies and Act on social assistance, will be submitted to Parliament for approval, and the Act on minimum subsistence levels is being amended. The Government and the Parliament are currently working on the amendment of the Labour Code.

The Government is taking measures to overcome unemployment and reduce the unemployment level. On 1 January 1993, the employment fund was established with the aim of financing an active employment policy and providing financial support to job applicants. This fund is a public, legal institution and cooperates with the national employment service and local labour offices. The employment fund's organs have a tripartite composition. The national network of labour offices is part of the state administration and provides advisory and assistance services relating to employment. It has been operating for some time. This type of assistance is also provided by non-governmental organizations.

The State has set up a social insurance company and a general health insurance company with their own budgets which are separate from the state budget. They both have boards of directors consisting of tripartite representatives. The social insurance company deals with sickness and retirement benefits. The general health insurance company deals with health insurance and contributes to preventive health care, accident prevention and accident care. There is also a possibility to establish sector, industry, company and public health insurance companies. The State participates in covering the indebtedness of the social insurance company and the general health insurance company by providing them with loans in the amount of up to 100 per cent of their payment insolvency.

Further legislative amendments which should lessen and eliminate the social impact of structural changes, and especially the impact of unemployment and inflation in the social sphere, are in preparation. The Slovak Government underlines the need to take into consideration the social dimensions of economic changes during the period of economic transformation and transition of society towards a market economy.

Our positive attitude towards the principles and goals of the International Labour Organization was also expressed during the Third European Conference on Tripartism in September of last year, which we had the honour to organize in our capital, Bratislava. What was produced by the Conference has been further elaborated by all the social partners, and the adoption of special legal instruments concerning the implementation of international labour standards is under consideration.

At present, Slovakia is bound by 57 ILO Conventions and is continuing its preparation activities to ratify additional international legal instruments, including the European Social Charter. Preparations for the ratification of 16 more ILO Conventions are included in the general agreement for this year. In this process, all the social partners are guided by the same principle: that it is necessary to amend the internal legislation to bring it into line with the requirements and provisions of a relevant Convention, and only then to ratify the ILO Convention, and not vice versa.

I would like to express the appreciation of my delegation to the Director-General for his Report which we consider very comprehensive and useful. We fully agree with the contents of this Report. As far as other items on the Conference agenda are concerned, let me express some views of my delegation.

As for the adoption of the new international standards, the delegation of the Slovak Republic supports their adoption. The reasons for our position are both historical and practical.

The safety and health protection issues related to work in mines, and mining as a whole, have deep historical roots in Slovakia. Ladies and gentlemen, you might know, but perhaps not, that the first mining school in the world was established in the old Slovak mining town of Banská Štiavnica in the year 1773 and received the name "Mining Academy". Banská Štiavnica has been included in the UNESCO list of historical monuments of the world's cultural heritage. The tradition, knowledge and experience of mining is reflected in a number of safety regulations which deal with the safety of work in mines. But the most important ones which apply in the Slovak Republic and relate directly to the proposed international standards of safety and health in mines are Act No. 51/1988 on mining activities, explosives and the state mining administration, and Executive Regulation No. 21/1989 on safety and health protection at work, operational safety in mines and activities performed in underground mining. This regulation deals with specific issues and consists of 332 sections.

The Slovak Republic's Labour Code makes provision for home work in section 267. A homemaker is defined as a person who performs work not on the employer's premises, but at home. Conditions under which homeworkers perform the work are set forth by the respective labour contract concluded between the homemaker and the employer. As a preventive measure, the above-mentioned section 267 provides for the possibility that labour relations between the employer and the homemaker are regulated by government regulations.

As regards the revision of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), we support the idea of extending its jurisdiction to non-commercial services such as health care, education, church working activities, the postal service, telecommunications, energy distribution and social service institutions, etc. In Slovakia the provisions of this Convention are mainly set out by Act No. 174 of 1968 on the supervision of occupational safety at state establishments.

The Slovak Republic actively participated in the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen, and accepted the commitments and recommendations contained in the Declaration and the Programme of Action. We are pleased that support for the transition countries, including Slovakia, has been expressed in the Copenhagen Declaration, as well as in the ILO's contribution to the Summit. The outcome of the Summit is being carefully studied by the Slovak Government, with a view to bringing its conclusions into practice.

In Copenhagen a lot of attention was paid to the situation of women. In Slovakia, particular attention is being paid to this subject and we will be able to present a positive evaluation of the topic at the upcoming Fourth World Conference on Women, to be held in Beijing this year.

In my brief presentation, I could not address all the activities which are being undertaken by the Slovak Republic in the sphere of labour and social relations. As we think that the ILO has been constantly contributing to improving the culture of labour and social relations, I would like to reiterate the commitment of the Slovak Government to participate actively in the work of the Organization in the future, and contribute to achieving its goals.

Mr. PÉTURSSON (Minister of Social Affairs, Iceland) – I would like to begin my address by congratulating Mr. Rosales Argüello on his election as President of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I agree with what earlier speakers have said and I am sure that he will discharge this important task well, thus ensuring that the Conference will produce the best possible results.

The Director-General's Report this year bears the title Promoting employment. It is an abridged version of the first of a new series of reports dealing with the world employment situation. It presents a survey of employment levels in all the main economic regions of the world and diagnoses the problems which is currently afflicting most nations of the world: growing unemployment, which leads to an increase in social problems, in particular poverty and social exclusion. The Report attempts to analyse the causes of the rise in unemployment and also to point out ways of solving this problem which most, if not all, of the governments of the ILO member States are currently facing. This is no easy task. The latter part of the Director-General's Report draws attention to the fact that full employment was the main priority in economic policy after the Second World War. The adoption of this goal stimulated the creation of employment. The Director-General points out that politicians appear to have adopted a defeatist attitude towards the challenge of unemployment and that this is unfortunate. I fully agree with him on this point. What is crucial is to tackle the problem in the conviction that unemployment is an unacceptable evil and in the belief that it is possible to maintain full employment for everyone who wants to work.

In the earlier part of his Report, the Director-General discusses the main trends in employment and the economy over the past few decades, once again drawing attention to the shifts in emphasis which have taken place in the structure of world production. Agriculture and industry have declined while services have grown in importance, particularly in the industrialized countries. This in turn has caused a change in the structure of employment. The decline in the share of industry and agriculture in world production has resulted in considerable unemployment in these sectors.

The Government of Iceland took an active part in the Uruguay Round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations, and Iceland is among the founder members of the World Trade Organization. On the whole, Iceland is reasonably satisfied with the outcome although it cannot be denied that a reduction of tariffs on certain categories of goods could have a serious effect on some employment sectors in Iceland. This applies not least to Iceland's agricultural sector which has the comparative disadvantage of difficult climatic conditions, and a large part of the workforce in Iceland depends directly or indirectly on farm production.

The Director-General's Report discusses the Uruguay Round and its potential effects on the market and employment. It is notable how cautious the Director-General is in his assessment. He points out that for many countries the implementation of the agreement will not be painless and will require many types of positive adjustment measures. This applies in particular to the export of textiles, clothing and agricultural products from the South to the North. The contracting parties must understand that, in those sectors where the agreement cannot be expected to have substantial effects, direct government intervention will be necessary. In Iceland this applies mainly to agriculture. Unrestricted competition, too rapid a reduction of grants and other forms of assistance could mean a serious destabilization in the pattern of regional population distribution with all its attendant social problems. I was interested to see that the Director-General's Report shows a sensitive understanding of this particular problem.

The Report mentions specifically the importance of continued state support to the small farm sector and also that investments in agriculture aimed at raising productivity have high economic returns. It states that economic liberalization with higher producer prices and reduced taxes ensures export potential and can improve economic opportunities for the agricultural sector as a whole. However, the agricultural sector has often been unable to make use of such new market opportunities. This has been because of the reduction or withdrawal of state support to the small farm sector. The Director-General stresses that governments should avoid making such errors policy errors so as to ensure that small farmers and agriculture as a whole are able "to benefit fully from the new opportunities created by economic liberalization". I fully concur with this view.

As most of you probably know, Iceland is a nation with a small population living in a relatively large country. Our ancestors settled in the country in the year 874. From 1262 until 1945 we lived under foreign rule and the struggle for full independence during those centuries made us aware of the value of international cooperation and the desires of other nations to enjoy freedom and independence. This is why Iceland was among the first nations to recognize the newly independent countries of Eastern Europe.

We wish to cooperate on an equal basis with other States, not least through the United Nations and its specialist agencies.

We expect Iceland and other small nations to receive the same sort of treatment as other sovereign states. It should be remembered that the contributions made by smaller nations, both in financial terms and in the form of active participation in the work of international agencies, stand comparison with the contributions made by most larger nations.

I was therefore rather surprised to note that the Director-General's Report does not say a single word about the Organization's smaller Members. At least not those that are within Europe. It seems that this policy applies even to the smallest details in the Report. For example, footnote 2 on page 66 of the English edition states: "EFTA comprises only Switzerland, Austria, Norway and Sweden". This is incorrect as Iceland had been a member of EFTA since 1970, Finland was a member State and Liechtenstein is a member. I hope that this is only an error and not a deliberate policy. If it were, I would feel obliged to object to it on behalf of the Government of Iceland. To avoid misunderstandings I should point out that as a result of their entry into the European Union, Austria, Finland and Sweden left EFTA on 1 January 1995.

I wish to make it clear that the Government of Iceland is concerned that development in the world economy and trade should be accompanied by social reforms. This is why Iceland supports the continued discussion of these matters within the framework of the ILO.

On the other hand we also wish to declare our support for the view that the work of the ILO in this area should be reviewed. We believe that this is an important subject for debate not only in connection with trade agreements as such, or social dumping. It concerns basic human rights not least the rights of workers which ought to be the prime concern of this organisation. We support those who have warned against the danger that this discussion will lead to an adoption of disguised protectionist policies that will restrict exports from the developing countries and obstruct their progress towards improved living standards and social progress. We believe, however, that such social clauses could be restricted to basic rights, e.g. the right to organize, the right to collective bargaining, the abolition of forced labour and the abolition of child exploitation at work. In this connection I should like to say how pleased I was with the outcome of the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen last March. As we have seen, the Director-General of the ILO has already started preparations for the implementation of those parts of the Declaration and Programme of Action of the Copenhagen Summit which comes under the ILO's field of operations.

I wish this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference every success and we hope that it will prove productive.

Original Spanish: Mr. ARRATE MAC NIVEN (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Chile) – First of all, I would like to congratulate the Minister of Labour of Nicaragua on his election to the presidency of this assembly. For Chile, the election of a Latin American to chair this meeting is a source of genuine pride.

I would also like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for the programme presented to us in his Report Promoting employment. Particularly noteworthy is the approach proposed by the Director-General to the objectives of improving the quantity and quality of jobs in our countries.

Mr. Hansenne points out that it is a fundamental challenge to combat unemployment, underemployment and low salaries and that this is the major responsibility of economic and social policies. In this way, he reminds us that to reach these objectives we must tackle questions from both the economic and social standpoint. This statement is of the utmost importance when, in our countries, we often hear ideas put forward that tend to ignore the social dimension of policies that are aimed at creating more and better jobs.

As the Director-General rightly points out, prevailing development trends at the international level have created new opportunities to increase growth rates and create employment, but at the same time they have given rise to various social problems that need urgent consideration. I would like to mention three such problems: one, the fact that many kinds of employment are now precarious; two, the emergence of new types of inequality; and, three, the breakdown of social integration.

For this reason we must consider the appeal made by the Director-General in his Report to adopt policies that will encourage a fairer distribution of the benefits and costs of globalization among and within countries. In keeping with his idea, which is endorsed by the Government of Chile, we must also consider, among these policies, how to improve and modernize the basic standards regulating labour relations.

It is a great source of satisfaction that the guidelines laid down in the Director-General's Report coincide entirely with the policies now being drawn up in my country. The democratic governments, starting in 1990, have defined their concept of economic and social development on the basis of growth and modernization, in the framework of equality and social justice. We are trying to ensure sustained growth against the backdrop of a highly competitive and open market economy which offers more and better opportunities for all Chileans, especially the poorest, to move forward.

The Government of Chile is firmly convinced that for economic growth to be socially legitimate it must have a moral objective, which can be no other than that of a better and more dignified life for all Chileans, especially those with the least. Growth that increases already large social differences or which condemns large sections of the national community to marginalization or exclusion does not fulfil the moral objective I mentioned. Therefore, the absence of a clear criterion of equality with regard to the distribution of the fruits of growth would rob any development strategy of sense and legitimacy.

In the last few months the Government of President Frei has submitted to the Congress a whole package of bills designed to modernize our labour institutions and tighten up rights to join trade unions and to collective bargaining.

These bills seek to build on the major progress already made by the Government of President Aylwin between 1990 and 1993. Their aim is to guarantee more suitable conditions for the development of collective agreements in enterprises and substantially increase involvement and sphere of competence.

The Government aims to promote the social autonomy of all sides through collective bargaining to which only 15 per cent of workers under contract with an employer are entitled at present. At the same time, it is trying to expand and provide better protection for trade union rights in our country where trade union membership stands at about 20 per cent of salaried workers.

We are convinced that measures to involve more workers in collective bargaining and allow them more scope to establish or join trade unions are an important weapon in reaching the objective of growth with equality and social justice. Measures of this kind will help us, on the basis of consensus, to face up to the challenges of an economy characterized by constant adjustments in labour markets as a result of rapid technological developments and changes in the conditions of international competitiveness. In this way, the cost and the benefits of this process can be adequately shared.

Along the same lines, we have launched other highly relevant projects. They include measures to modernize and improve our present system of training and vocational training, basically financed by State funds and administered by enterprises, and their aim is to reach more people and improve quality. In particular, we would like to target these resources in small and medium-sized enterprises, at persons entering the labour market, women and the unemployed, and at providing training for persons affected by the structuring of our productive apparatus.

Furthermore, we are working on new legislation to improve the supervisory powers of the State with regard to labour and social protection. We are trying to guarantee greater respect for labour standards in force, which is a prerequisite for fair competition between enterprises and for lasting social peace, in a climate of respect for workers' and employers' rights.

We are also in the throes of modernizing our labour legislation and expediting its proceedings. We are trying to improve the administration of justice and make it more accessible to workers and employers.

In the next few months we will submit a proposal relating to an income protection system for unemployed workers to guarantee an income for a certain period, for persons who are unemployed due to labour market mobility.

These policies are part of a comprehensive proposal for changes designed to improve the quality of our labour institutional structure in view of the demands of economic modernization currently facing the country at a time of fierce international competitiveness and impending agreements on economic integration.

In short, we are trying to improve the quality of the legislation currently in force, increase respect for the law and access to the judicial system, extend the rights guaranteed by our Constitution to areas of labour currently denied them because of legislative shortcomings, and to strengthen the combined effect of our information policies on employment, training and protection for unemployed workers, and of the consequent impact on the use and allocation of our human resources.

We are helped by our certainty that the initiatives we have mentioned are extremely important steps in our efforts to marry economic development with social development, the market with democracy, entrepreneurial freedom with social rights, flexibility in applying productive resources with social protection that can rise to the demands of our time.

The need to reconcile technical and economic criteria relating to the theory of the market to the social criteria which inspire the modern idea of democracy is not always understood by everyone as we would like it to be. However, we firmly believe in bipartite and tripartite social dialogue and we promote them at every opportunity in our country.

We hope that the ideas expressed by the Director-General of the ILO will be considered carefully by those that are still cautious about the changes proposed. I am sure that the Director-General's Report will help us to turn our backs on inflexible theoretical positions which, when we compare situations around the world, we see are stultifying. His analysis invites us in our opinion to look upon chances to increase employment as a social challenge to us all and to reject the tendency of some which, ostensibly to create employment, try to liberalize the labour market in such a way as to leave the worker with little or no protection.

Once again, I would like to express my Government's firm conviction that dialogue and cooperation are the most effective tool for making real progress in a world of work currently suffering tensions caused by universal and far-reaching change. Many of these changes amount to a genuine structural overhaul in our countries.

In Chile, we have learnt that constructive debate, and especially the recognition that human beings – in both an individual and social context – are the prime focus of all our development policies, are the only ways in which we will be able to find effective solutions to the challenges we currently face.

I would like to welcome the opportunity afforded by this gathering, and the agenda proposed, to look at the crucial issues currently facing the world of work.

Original Spanish: Mr. MORALES (Minister of Justice and Labour, Paraguay) – I would like to congratulate the Minister of Labour of Nicaragua on his appointment to preside over this Session of the Conference.

It is a great satisfaction to address this tripartite Conference where Governments, Workers and Employers expound their thoughts so that the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference should adopt resolutions for overcoming the social problems of today's world.

I represent the Government of the Republic of Paraguay, headed by President Juan Carlos Wasmosy, a civilian President, freely elected by the people on 9 May 1993, who has consolidated democracy in Paraguay by insisting upon unrestrained exercise of civil rights, full freedom of the press, the institutionalization of the Republic and reform of the State. In social affairs, the objective is to move away from the sterile habits of pushing claims through confrontation, replacing them with the more fruitful policy of dialogue, negotiation and mediation.

The Ministry of Labour, as part of this policy, has Dialogues which are providing effective results. For example, the most recent one was the Tripartite Agreement signed on 19 April which avoided a general strike planned for 2 May, without any sacrifice of rights enshrined in the Constitution and the law.

The Government wishes to take advantage of the tripartite basis of this Conference to congratulate the trade union and employers' leaders in our country for the negotiating skill which they demonstrated in getting over the strategy of confrontation and polarized posturing and moving towards a fruitful strategy of dialogue, negotiation and mediation.

The Government recognises that it is not easy to achieve the ideals of democracy, respect for human rights and public and political liberties. It is not easy either to achieve economic growth and social improvement, without consultation between government and representative associations, since my country has a relatively weak economy, mostly dependent upon agriculture, and it cannot remain unaffected by the unpredictable exogenous developments, nor by changes in world trade. A globalized economy requires modern domestic institutions to progressively raise financial resources and invest them, and to bring in foreign investment and social participation is the only way to formulate the projects which, with courage and decisiveness, will improve the living standards of the people.

Paraguay is not an island in this new social situation which will face us at the dawn of the twenty-first century. The Government is fully aware of the problems which ceaselessly beset us: poverty, ignorance, endemic disease, communities isolated from the outside, increasing crime both nationally and internationally, corruption, human rights violations, unemployment, underemployment – these are only some of the aspects of the globalization of the social problem in developing countries, although some also affect the first world, like crime and unemployment, for example.

The growing problem of unemployment is a world problem which affects developed and under-developed countries alike. It requires both aggressive policies and mediation and consultation, contradictory as this may seem.

We must take an aggressive stance in seeing that the law is fulfilled and that the Conventions of the ILO are implemented, so as to legalize the situation of the workers and put an end to the practice of "black" labour, which inflicts utterly subhuman conditions on workers.

Consultation and mediation arises from joint analysis and frank dialogue between governments, workers and employers on the following subjects: working conditions; the definition of the labour market; the effects of advanced technology upon the amount of labour which is required in the labour market; the implementation of accelerated vocational training policies to match the requirements of the market and that will include retraining as a way of reducing unemployment; and likewise alternative ways of hiring labour without in any way impairing the dignity of the worker.

As far as the burning subject of privatization is concerned, the policy of the Government is to adopt a gradual approach, giving preference to the wishes of the workers, and adapting them to the redefinition of the role of the State on the one hand and to the redefinition of their role as workers within the private sector on the other.

moting social integration, by fostering societies that are stable, safe and just and based on the promotion and protection of all human rights. I refer to Commitment 4.

In its Chapter III of the Programme of Action an appeal is made for "the safeguarding and promoting respect for basic worker's rights including the prohibition of forced and child labour, freedom of association and the right to organize and bargain collectively, equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and non-discrimination in employment". Likewise, it was stated that "governments should strongly consider ratification and full implementation of the ILO Conventions in these spheres".

The Social Summit gave guidance to governments and supports the policies of the ILO management in the social sphere. I can assure you that my Government like all other governments throughout the world will translate these intentions into practice.

There exist problems which are very closely inter-linked and which are of concern to politicians, economists, jurists and social partners, all touching on the great social issue at a time of profound structural changes in the economy, in trade, in production and in services. New technologies, the redesigning of the productive process, the globalization of markets (including the labour market through the relocation of jobs from high labour cost countries to low labour costs countries) worldwide competition, increased unemployment; these are some of the most burning problems.

For the solution of such problems there are extreme positions which support deregulation, the flexibilization of labour standards which are seen as obstacles to competitiveness and growth, whereas prudence demands an understanding that labour standards are instruments for the promotion of both productive efficiency and social justice. Without them there can be no industrial innovation, nor economic dynamism, nor can a fair sharing of the economic benefits which come from change.

The approach of the ILO reflects the following concerns: (a) the constitution of modern efficient institutions which are not just profitable, but are also capable of protecting people and offer them support through the adjustment process; (b) the integration, right from the start, of social considerations in the design of economic reform so as to not only mitigate the adverse effects of adjustment but also to promote positive ways of contributing to sustained long-term growth; (c) the participation of social partners in the design and implementation of programmes so as to achieve a social consensus around their objectives.

In the face of present challenges, certain regions of the world are moving to form regional associations which exhibit internal complementarity and raise their potential. Decentralization within countries is accompanied by regional or continental integration. No country can solve its social problems in isolation: decentralization and integration are not contradictory because some spheres of activity are best fulfilled at the local or departmental level, while others are better done at the regional or continental level.

The wealthy nations march forward alone but the developing countries require strengthening by integration. In our case, a relatively small country with a small population and domestic market, mutual relationships are of fundamental importance to maintain social peace and it is the job of the ILO to struggle permanently to improve working conditions.

Social issues in my country require a number of different approaches, some positive, and others requiring incentives and improved courses of action so as to achieve good labour relations.

At present the relationship between the Ministry of Labour and the employers' and employees' organizations are cordial, based upon the Government's policy of dialogue, negotiation, consultation and mediation, and the organization of a big tripartite negotiation, in January 1994, right at the beginning of its period of office.

I wish to recall once again the tripartite agreement of 19 April which led to the cancellation of a general strike announced for 2 May. It was within this agreement that workers, employers and the Government confirmed their conviction that dialogue and negotiation are the best instruments for the solution of work-related problems and reaffirmed their commitment to this mechanism of dialogue as the first step in settling future disputes.

In this spirit the National Minimum Wage Board was set up and it granted an increase of 15 per cent in the minimum wage as of 1 May 1995, on the basis of a study which was supported by all parties involved. It is established in the agreement that the central union bodies will not call for strike action while the process of dialogue and negotiation is under way, and the Government for its part agreed to study wage increases, the approval of the State Employee's Code, and likewise to set up open processes of dialogue especially in the fields of social security, wage policy and employment policy. This shows that the tripartite process underwrites the validity of social dialogue as a method to solve the problems in labour relations.

Enhanced credibility is given to the labour sector in the management of work. The Government is aware that there must be improved cooperation at various levels and in various fields, and that the administration of labour relations should be based upon better cooperation between the employers' and employees' organizations with a view to an improved application of labour legislation.

There is a steady improvement in conflict resolution by dialogue, negotiation consultation and mediation. The consolidation of this mechanism has been demonstrated in agreements for the solution of a number of conflicts with the participation of the bodies responsible for the labour sector in certain extremely delicate cases involving complex issues.

Statistics of labour disputes demonstrate that these tripartite discussions have given positive results, yielding a high percentage of disputes settled. Between September 1993 and April 1995, 61 per cent of tripartite negotiations were solved. In the year 1994, 74 per cent were settled, whereas in the previous year a settlement was achieved only in 37 per cent of cases.

The Ministry of Labour facilitates and promotes the organization of unions. The existence and strengthening of associations of workers and employers is again support for the policy of dialogue, negotiation, consultation and mediation.

The consolidation of democracy in Paraguay is also reflected in the growing number of organizations of employers and employees. Up to February 1989 there were only 172 unions whereas as of March 1995, 1,194 union organizations were registered.

However, there are still some unsatisfactory situations whose solution will require a more aggressive response.

It is necessary to improve the monitoring of the implementation of labour standards and to provide the Labour Relations Administration with the technical and material means to improve its efficiency, in its relationship with the social partners, particularly in regard to collective bargaining and in improving labour policy.

Those failures which have been reported are due to the limited effectiveness of the Ministry of Labour as the responsible administrative body, to see that these standards are fulfilled. This will be overcome by the separation of the Ministry of Justice from that of Labour and Social Security, since the present situation explains the difficulties which have arisen. Furthermore, the lack of financial resources for the implementation of an efficient labour policy and the lack of the necessary powers to enforce compliance with the law by the parties involved, since fines are an insufficient sanction.

In the final part of this speech I would like to highlight the words of Mr. Michel Hansenne who in the last Report said that the ILO could not remain indifferent to events which, beginning in 1990, led many countries to undertake a process of democratization. The ILO is contributing to necessary reforms for the consolidation of democracy, pursuing priority objectives like the protection of workers, the elimination of poverty, the promotion of democracy, the defence of human rights, respect of labour standards and the stimulation of employment.

The Paraguayan Government agrees fully with this position and states that it will make ever-increasing efforts to consolidate these objectives which are common to us all. Priority will be given to improving conditions of work and employment, and to the training of workers so as to improve the country's competitive position in a globalized economy.

To conclude, I would like to refer to the new encyclical Ut unum sit (that all may be One) of Pope John Paul II. This encyclical is an encouragement to us all and implies that we are moving forward surely and that we are heading in the right direction: dialogue, negotiation, consultation and mediation. As his Holiness said Ut unum sit let us all be one for the happiness of all our peoples.

Mr. OFFMANN (Minister of Labour and Industrial Relations, Mauritius) – I feel extremely honoured to take the floor before this august assembly on the occasion of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. In the name of the tripartite delegation of Mauritius, which I have the pleasure to lead, and in my own name, allow me to present my congratulations to the President on his election to this high office, and also to the other Officers of the Conference.

As I come from a bilingual country, I would like to renew with tradition and be allowed to continue in the French language.

The world is currently undergoing enormous upheavals that are bringing about profound changes in society on the eve of the third millennium.

The world of work in particular is faced with the employment crisis which is threatening to create serious social problems. We already see the impoverishment of broad sectors of the population in the so-called developing countries, while there are even areas of poverty in the industrialized countries. The Declaration of Philadelphia which in 1944 reformed the principles of the ILO, states that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere".

If I refer to the case of our own continent of Africa, some worrying questions arise. Beyond the problems associated with the debt burden, the lack of investment and the deterioration of the terms of trade, Africa is beset by a certain marginalization. Will we ever be able to catch up if the gulf between Africa and the other continents is allowed to widen still further? Let us recall the situation of the countries of South-East Asia in the 1970s and then look at what has become of them today. They have gone from a state of backwardness and underdevelopment to become a driving force for economic growth. We are surely seeing new attitudes, new approaches and imaginative bold policies which could also be applied to Africa. Following the emancipation of South Africa which some had believed impossible, let us dare to dream, let us dare to conceive of a vast plan of mutual assistance for the benefit of development in Africa. For it must be accepted that the globalization of markets has brought in its wake worldwide social problems, be it in the form of drugs, AIDS, hunger and poverty, mass migration and so forth. We must now face these problems together on an international scale. That is to say that in our quest for progress, stability and security which are dear to all our hearts, development must be global or it cannot occur at all. The world cannot consider itself advanced if Africa is left behind.

Initiatives are therefore required in order to increase our ability to create better conditions which are conducive to investment and job creation. This would not only enhance the rights of workers, and give them a better quality of life but would also facilitate the gradual observance of social labour standards.

In this connection, the Director-General's Report entitled Promoting employment is a very interesting document which proposes certain areas for reflection on employment prospects in various parts of the world. In his analysis the Director-General echoes our concerns when he emphasizes that the introduction of an effective economic system on the international scale is a priority which nevertheless must not turn its back on social requirements. He also echoes our economic philosophy when he stresses that even if there is no universal formula, the authorities should restrict their role to that of facilitating private initiative, leaving it to private initiative to lend impetus to the economy, particularly through the creation of jobs.

In the new economic environment that is the result of the liberalization of trade, we are witnessing a reorganization of work. New production strategies based on the globalization of enterprises must cause us to reflect on their repercussions on the labour force and on industrial relations and international standards. In the context of these structural reforms, the controversy concerning the effectiveness of standards is alive and kicking. Is it a constraint to development or is it instead an essential prerequisite to development? There is still the perception that standards reflect the development models of the industrialized regions and that other countries cannot keep up with them. This is eloquently reflected in the widening gap between the number of international Conventions being adopted and ratified. A new approach is called for in the interests of greater flexibility. An associated measure that would encourage wider ratification of standards could involve introducing protocols into all Conventions. This would facilitate a step-by-step ratification and would mean greater flexibility for the benefit of development and social justice. People will no longer point the finger at labour law as being against the right to work and the standard-setting structure of the ILO will emerge strengthened.

My country, the Republic of Mauritius, is situated in the heart of the Indian Ocean. It is without natural resources and has 560 inhabitants per square kilometre. It is a country made up of a mosaic of races, religions, cultures and traditions which offers in all humility to a tormented world, a world tormented by ethnic warfare, an example of peaceful co-existence, pluralism and tolerance.

If I tell you that peace and harmony are just as precious to us as economic development, you will easily understand our concern for solidarity, the international solidarity which we would like to see extended to our mother continent, Africa.

The genius of the Mauritian people has made it possible for us, despite restrictive circumstances, to solve the problem of unemployment during the past decade, while encouraging growth in equity.

Even if the sugar industry remains the backbone of our economy our adventure with the export processing zone gave fresh impetus to our industrialization and a new vitality to the whole economic and social life of our country. I would hasten to reassure all delegates, that our export processing zone is a rare and atypical model, in terms of social standards, where freedom of association and labour laws make their presence felt for both our workers and for foreign workers, with no discrimination between the two.

Mauritius is also well known as a high-class tourist destination with a related industry that has developed quickly. The country's rapid rates of growth with its liberal economy has also spurred the parallel development of its financial services. Mauritius seeks in fact to become an international financial centre. We have great hopes for regional cooperation in expanding our commercial prospects, particularly with the new opportunities that will be ushered in in the post-GATT era.

As regards labour, we are striving to maintain the equilibrium between economic and social aspects. Our concern is not only to preserve what has already been achieved, but also to encourage initiatives aimed at strengthening the rights of workers and affording them more security at work. One historic measure was taken whereby workers in the sugar industry were encouraged to become shareholders and to choose their representatives on the boards of directors of the sugar companies. Furthermore, in order to strengthen social protection against a backdrop of international competition, all our labour laws are currently being revised. In fact a silent revolution is now under way with a view to strengthening tripargrowing economies of East and South-East Asia demonstrates what can be achieved with the right development strategies. The policy approach underpinning the economic successes in our region is well covered in the Director-General's Report.

International developments are also critically important. The liberalisation of international trade offers us the opportunity for worldwide growth, for job creation and for the alleviation of poverty. As the Director-General in his Report notes, viewed as a whole the world economy appears to be creating the basis for rising prosperity in employment growth. A key role for the ILO is to identify and address the social dimensions of this trade liberalisation and this must include any potentially negative effects on labour standards. Australia supports the frank discussion of this issue in the ILO forums, including the Governing Body's Working Party. Change and adjustment can be achieved whilst ensuring social equity and increased employment. Let me turn to Australia's experience by way of illustration. The Australian Government's industrial relations reforms have been part of a broad strategy to make the Australian economy more internationally competitive. Our industrial relations system is evolving from a centralized one to a more decentralized system in response to changed economic circumstances. The crucial element in the process of reform and adjustments has been the Prices and Incomes Accord between the Government and the Australian Council of Trade Unions. In the 1980s the accord proved vitally important both in promoting a high level of jobs growth but also in doing so without inflationary wages growth. In recent years it has assisted us in achieving labour market reform and it has contributed to the very positive employment growth that we have experienced.

The Government and the ACTU are currently negotiating the details of a new accord which will emphasise social protection in the context of progressive and efficient economic and industrial relations reforms. In introducing our reforms the Australian Government has placed a high priority on ensuring that it does not harm employees. In this way we have ensured that they support change rather than resist it. In this context we have introduced to our own national legislation a number of minimum entitlements based on the Conventions of the ILO. These have guaranteed all Australian workers the right to a fair minimum wage, equal pay for work of equal value, 12 months unpaid leave and protection against unfair dismissal.

Australia takes its ILO obligations and the ILO standards very seriously. We have ratified 54 Conventions today and we are steadily working towards further ratifications. I am pleased to announce today that agreement has been reached for the ratification of a further three Maritime Conventions and can I also say that as a major mining country we are strongly committed to the development of the new ILO standard of safety in mines at this Conference. We will consider this standard as a priority with a view to its early ratification. I know that will please John Maitland very much indeed and all the miners of Australia.

The Director-General has raised the important issue of whether rules providing for employment security are an inhibition on employment growth. His Report concludes that such rules are no barrier or constraint to creating employment. In Australia some commentators have argued that the employment protections provided in our national laws discourage employers from hiring new staff and this results in higher unemployment. Well, delegates, the Australian figures speak for themselves. Since the provisions took effect in March 1994, more than 350,000 jobs have been created representing 5 per cent growth in employment. Australian's current unemployment rate is now at its lowest point for four years. Thus we believe that we have achieved the right balance between employment creation and ensuring workers have a fair safety net to protect their wages and to protect their conditions.

The Director-General also stresses the importance of international cooperation in order to restore global full employment. We in Australia agree, and agree wholeheartedly, with this approach. Clearly high priority must be given to employment goals in the formulation of international economic policies, programmes and strategies. The Australian Government fully supports the priority given to the promotion of the employment objective in the ILO's work and also in its collaboration with other international agencies. The ILO is well placed to play a key role. Its focus should be on its core mandate emphasizing its expertise in the human and social aspects of development, and emphasizing the importance of employment issues in the process of economic change and economic development.

I know we face a difficult task at this Conference in considering the programme and the budget recommendations for the 1996-97 biennium. It is clear that resources will be limited and need to be deployed to the maximum effect. As the Conference and the Governing Body deliberates on these issues I would urge that the technical programmes which represent a truly key part of the ILO core mandate be protected to the maximum degree necessary. Cut-backs should be concentrated as far as possible in management and in administration. We must strive to protect the new initiatives that are showing so much promise at the moment. For example the Active Partnership Policy which has so much to offer, and nowhere more so than in our Asia-Pacific region.

Australia has strongly supported the technical assistance work of the ILO in our region through our overseas aid programmes. Maintaining an international focus on global employment needs is a challenge for our nations. The problem is one best addressed by all of us working constructively together. The ILO is uniquely qualified to assist in the achievement of the creation of productive employment, the alleviation of poverty and the promotion of social justice. But our work together can only be fully effective with the continuing moral and financial support of all our member States. Australia pledges its support and we urge all other member States to do exactly the same.

Ms. KELTOSOVÁ (Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Family, Slovakia) – First of all, permit me to join the previous speakers in congratulating the President and the other Officers on their election to their respective posts at the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish them all success in their difficult and responsible work.

I would also like to express my appreciation for all the activities performed by the International Labour Organization, particularly by the Director-General, the Governing Body and other special committees, and thank the ILO for the support and encouragement which our country has received since it became a full member of this Organization.

The Slovak Republic is continuing its third year of democratic and pluralistic development and economic transformation based on the socially and environmentally oriented principles of a market economy. It has assumed all the contractual obligations of the former Czech and Slovak Federal Republic, and subsequently has amended its legislation according to European standards. This is a part of our work which is also called for in the association agreement between the European Union and the Slovak Republic. The Government of the Slovak Republic, as stated in its proclamation and plan of work and as a part of the country's economic development, is actively implementing the concept of the complex transformation of the social sphere. Under this concept, the systems of social insurance, state social subsidies and social assistance are being revised. As part of this revision, the Act on social insurance, Act on state social subsidies and Act on social assistance, will be submitted to Parliament for approval, and the Act on minimum subsistence levels is being amended. The Government and the Parliament are currently working on the amendment of the Labour Code.

The Government is taking measures to overcome unemployment and reduce the unemployment level. On 1 January 1993, the employment fund was established with the aim of financing an active employment policy and providing financial support to job applicants. This fund is a public, legal institution and cooperates with the national employment service and local labour offices. The employment fund's organs have a tripartite composition. The national network of labour offices is part of the state administration and provides advisory and assistance services relating to employment. It has been operating for some time. This type of assistance is also provided by non-governmental organizations.

The State has set up a social insurance company and a general health insurance company with their own budgets which are separate from the state budget. They both have boards of directors consisting of tripartite representatives. The social insurance company deals with sickness and retirement benefits. The general health insurance company deals with health insurance and contributes to preventive health care, accident prevention and accident care. There is also a possibility to establish sector, industry, company and public health insurance companies. The State participates in covering the indebtedness of the social insurance company and the general health insurance company by providing them with loans in the amount of up to 100 per cent of their payment insolvency.

Further legislative amendments which should lessen and eliminate the social impact of structural changes, and especially the impact of unemployment and inflation in the social sphere, are in preparation. The Slovak Government underlines the need to take into consideration the social dimensions of economic changes during the period of economic transformation and transition of society towards a market economy.

Our positive attitude towards the principles and goals of the International Labour Organization was also expressed during the Third European Conference on Tripartism in September of last year, which we had the honour to organize in our capital, Bratislava. What was produced by the Conference has been further elaborated by all the social partners, and the adoption of special legal instruments concerning the implementation of international labour standards is under consideration.

At present, Slovakia is bound by 57 ILO Conventions and is continuing its preparation activities to ratify additional international legal instruments, including the European Social Charter. Preparations for the ratification of 16 more ILO Conventions are included in the general agreement for this year. In this process, all the social partners are guided by the same principle: that it is necessary to amend the internal legislation to bring it into line with the requirements and provisions of a relevant Convention, and only then to ratify the ILO Convention, and not vice versa.

I would like to express the appreciation of my delegation to the Director-General for his Report which we consider very comprehensive and useful. We fully agree with the contents of this Report. As far as other items on the Conference agenda are concerned, let me express some views of my delegation.

As for the adoption of the new international standards, the delegation of the Slovak Republic supports their adoption. The reasons for our position are both historical and practical.

The safety and health protection issues related to work in mines, and mining as a whole, have deep historical roots in Slovakia. Ladies and gentlemen, you might know, but perhaps not, that the first mining school in the world was established in the old Slovak mining town of Banská Stiavnica in the year 1773 and received the name "Mining Academy". Banská Stiavnica has been included in the UNESCO list of historical monuments of the world's cultural heritage. The tradition, knowledge and experience of mining is reflected in a number of safety regulations which deal with the safety of work in mines. But the most important ones which apply in the Slovak Republic and relate directly to the proposed international standards of safety and health in mines are Act No. 51/1988 on mining activities, explosives and the state mining administration, and Executive Regulation No. 21/1989 on safety and health protection at work, operational safety in mines and activities performed in underground mining. This regulation deals with specific issues and consists of 332 sections.

The Slovak Republic's Labour Code makes provision for home work in section 267. A homemaker is defined as a person who performs work not on the employer's premises, but at home. Conditions under which homeworkers perform the work are set forth by the respective labour contract concluded between the homemaker and the employer. As a preventive measure, the above-mentioned section 267 provides for the possibility that labour relations between the employer and the homemaker are regulated by government regulations.

As regards the revision of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), we support the idea of extending its jurisdiction to non-commercial services such as health care, education, church working activities, the postal service, telecommunications, energy distribution and social service institutions, etc. In Slovakia the provisions of this Convention are mainly set out by Act No. 174 of 1968 on the supervision of occupational safety at state establishments.

The Slovak Republic actively participated in the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen, and accepted the commitments and recommendations contained in the Declaration and the Programme of Action. We are pleased that support for the transition countries, including Slovakia, has been expressed in the Copenhagen Declaration, as well as in the ILO's contribution to the Summit. The outcome of the Summit is being carefully studied by the Slovak Government, with a view to bringing its conclusions into practice.

In Copenhagen a lot of attention was paid to the situation of women. In Slovakia, particular attention is being paid to this subject and we will be able to present a positive evaluation of the topic at the upcoming Fourth World Conference on Women, to be held in Beijing this year.

In my brief presentation, I could not address all the activities which are being undertaken by the Slovak Republic in the sphere of labour and social relations. As we think that the ILO has been constantly contributing to improving the culture of labour and social relations, I would like to reiterate the commitment of the Slovak Government to participate actively in the work of the Organization in the future, and contribute to achieving its goals.

Mr. PÉTURSSON (Minister of Social Affairs, Iceland) – I would like to begin my address by congratulating Mr. Rosales Argüello on his election as President of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I agree with what earlier speakers have said and I am sure that he will discharge this important task well, thus ensuring that the Conference will produce the best possible results.

The Director-General's Report this year bears the title Promoting employment. It is an abridged version of the first of a new series of reports dealing with the world employment situation. It presents a survey of employment levels in all the main economic regions of the world and diagnoses the problems which is currently afflicting most nations of the world: growing unemployment, which leads to an increase in social problems, in particular poverty and social exclusion. The Report attempts to analyse the causes of the rise in unemployment and also to point out ways of solving this problem which most, if not all, of the governments of the ILO member States are currently facing. This is no easy task. The latter part of the Director-General's Report draws attention to the fact that full employment was the main priority in economic policy after the Second World War. The adoption of this goal stimulated the creation of employment. The Director-General points out that politicians appear to have adopted a defeatist attitude towards the challenge of unemployment and that this is unfortunate. I fully agree with him on this point. What is crucial is to tackle the problem in the conviction that unemployment is an unacceptable evil and in the belief that it is possible to maintain full employment for everyone who wants to work.

In the earlier part of his Report, the Director-General discusses the main trends in employment and the economy over the past few decades, once again drawing attention to the shifts in emphasis which have taken place in the structure of world production. Agriculture and industry have declined while services have grown in importance, particularly in the industrialized countries. This in turn has caused a change in the structure of employment. The decline in the share of industry and agriculture in world production has resulted in considerable unemployment in these sectors.

The Government of Iceland took an active part in the Uruguay Round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations, and Iceland is among the founder members of the World Trade Organization. On the whole, Iceland is reasonably satisfied with the outcome although it cannot be denied that a reduction of tariffs on certain categories of goods could have a serious effect on some employment sectors in Iceland. This applies not least to Iceland's agricultural sector which has the comparative disadvantage of difficult climatic conditions, and a large part of the workforce in Iceland depends directly or indirectly on farm production.

The Director-General's Report discusses the Uruguay Round and its potential effects on the market and employment. It is notable how cautious the Director-General is in his assessment. He points out that for many countries the implementation of the agreement will not be painless and will require many types of positive adjustment measures. This applies in particular to the export of textiles, clothing and agricultural products from the South to the North. The contracting parties must understand that, in those sectors where the agreement cannot be expected to have substantial effects, direct government intervention will be necessary. In Iceland this applies mainly to agriculture. Unrestricted competition, too rapid a reduction of grants and other forms of assistance could mean a serious destabilization in the pattern of regional population distribution with all its attendant social problems. I was interested to see that the Director-General's Report shows a sensitive understanding of this particular problem.

The Report mentions specifically the importance of continued state support to the small farm sector and also that investments in agriculture aimed at raising productivity have high economic returns. It states that economic liberalization with higher producer prices and reduced taxes ensures export potential and can improve economic opportunities for the agricultural sector as a whole. However, the agricultural sector has often been unable to make use of such new market opportunities. This has been because of the reduction or withdrawal of state support to the small farm sector. The Director-General stresses that governments should avoid making such errors policy errors so as to ensure that small farmers and agriculture as a whole are able "to benefit fully from the new opportunities created by economic liberalization". I fully concur with this view.

As most of you probably know, Iceland is a nation with a small population living in a relatively large country. Our ancestors settled in the country in the year 874. From 1262 until 1945 we lived under foreign rule and the struggle for full independence during those centuries made us aware of the value of international cooperation and the desires of other nations to enjoy freedom and independence. This is why Iceland was among the first nations to recognize the newly independent countries of Eastern Europe.

We wish to cooperate on an equal basis with other States, not least through the United Nations and its specialist agencies.

We expect Iceland and other small nations to receive the same sort of treatment as other sovereign states. It should be remembered that the contributions made by smaller nations, both in financial terms and in the form of active participation in the work of international agencies, stand comparison with the contributions made by most larger nations.

I was therefore rather surprised to note that the Director-General's Report does not say a single word about the Organization's smaller Members. At least not those that are within Europe. It seems that this policy applies even to the smallest details in the Report. For example, footnote 2 on page 66 of the English edition states: "EFTA comprises only Switzerland, Austria, Norway and Sweden". This is incorrect as Iceland had been a member of EFTA since 1970, Finland was a member State and Liechtenstein is a member. I hope that this is only an error and not a deliberate policy. If it were, I would feel obliged to object to it on behalf of the Government of Iceland. To avoid misunderstandings I should point out that as a result of their entry into the European Union, Austria, Finland and Sweden left EFTA on 1 January 1995.

I wish to make it clear that the Government of Iceland is concerned that development in the world economy and trade should be accompanied by social reforms. This is why Iceland supports the continued discussion of these matters within the framework of the ILO.

On the other hand we also wish to declare our support for the view that the work of the ILO in this area should be reviewed. We believe that this is an important subject for debate not only in connection with trade agreements as such, or social dumping. It concerns basic human rights not least the rights of workers which ought to be the prime concern of this organisation. We support those who have warned against the danger that this discussion will lead to an adoption of disguised protectionist policies that will restrict exports from the developing countries and obstruct their progress towards improved living standards and social progress. We believe, however, that such social clauses could be restricted to basic rights, e.g. the right to organize, the right to collective bargaining, the abolition of forced labour and the abolition of child exploitation at work. In this connection I should like to say how pleased I was with the outcome of the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen last March. As we have seen, the Director-General of the ILO has already started preparations for the implementation of those parts of the Declaration and Programme of Action of the Copenhagen Summit which comes under the ILO's field of operations.

I wish this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference every success and we hope that it will prove productive.

Original Spanish: Mr. ARRATE MAC NIVEN (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Chile) – First of all, I would like to congratulate the Minister of Labour of Nicaragua on his election to the presidency of this assembly. For Chile, the election of a Latin American to chair this meeting is a source of genuine pride.

I would also like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for the programme presented to us in his Report Promoting employment. Particularly noteworthy is the approach proposed by the Director-General to the objectives of improving the quantity and quality of jobs in our countries.

Mr. Hansenne points out that it is a fundamental challenge to combat unemployment, underemployment and low salaries and that this is the major responsibility of economic and social policies. In this way, he reminds us that to reach these objectives we must tackle questions from both the economic and social standpoint. This statement is of the utmost importance when, in our countries, we often hear ideas put forward that tend to ignore the social dimension of policies that are aimed at creating more and better jobs.

As the Director-General rightly points out, prevailing development trends at the international level have created new opportunities to increase growth rates and create employment, but at the same time they have given rise to various social problems that need urgent consideration. I would like to mention three such problems: one, the fact that many kinds of employment are now precarious; two, the emergence of new types of inequality; and, three, the breakdown of social integration.

For this reason we must consider the appeal made by the Director-General in his Report to adopt policies that will encourage a fairer distribution of the benefits and costs of globalization among and within countries. In keeping with his idea, which is endorsed by the Government of Chile, we must also consider, among these policies, how to improve and modernize the basic standards regulating labour relations.

It is a great source of satisfaction that the guidelines laid down in the Director-General's Report coincide entirely with the policies now being drawn up in my country. The democratic governments, starting in 1990, have defined their concept of economic and social development on the basis of growth and modernization, in the framework of equality and social justice. We are trying to ensure sustained growth against the backdrop of a highly competitive and open market economy which offers more and better opportunities for all Chileans, especially the poorest, to move forward.

The Government of Chile is firmly convinced that for economic growth to be socially legitimate it must have a moral objective, which can be no other than that of a better and more dignified life for all Chileans, especially those with the least. Growth that increases already large social differences or which condemns large sections of the national community to marginalization or exclusion does not fulfil the moral objective I mentioned. Therefore, the absence of a clear criterion of equality with regard to the distribution of the fruits of growth would rob any development strategy of sense and legitimacy.

In the last few months the Government of President Frei has submitted to the Congress a whole package of bills designed to modernize our labour institutions and tighten up rights to join trade unions and to collective bargaining.

These bills seek to build on the major progress already made by the Government of President Aylwin between 1990 and 1993. Their aim is to guarantee more suitable conditions for the development of collective agreements in enterprises and substantially increase involvement and sphere of competence.

The Government aims to promote the social autonomy of all sides through collective bargaining to which only 15 per cent of workers under contract with an employer are entitled at present. At the same time, it is trying to expand and provide better protection for trade union rights in our country where trade union membership stands at about 20 per cent of salaried workers.

We are convinced that measures to involve more workers in collective bargaining and allow them more scope to establish or join trade unions are an important weapon in reaching the objective of growth with equality and social justice. Measures of this kind will help us, on the basis of consensus, to face up to the challenges of an economy characterized by constant adjustments in labour markets as a result of rapid technological developments and changes in the conditions of international competitiveness. In this way, the cost and the benefits of this process can be adequately shared.

Along the same lines, we have launched other highly relevant projects. They include measures to modernize and improve our present system of training and vocational training, basically financed by State funds and administered by enterprises, and their aim is to reach more people and improve quality. In particular, we would like to target these resources in small and medium-sized enterprises, at persons entering the labour market, women and the unemployed, and at providing training for persons affected by the structuring of our productive apparatus.

Furthermore, we are working on new legislation to improve the supervisory powers of the State with regard to labour and social protection. We are trying to guarantee greater respect for labour standards in force, which is a prerequisite for fair competition between enterprises and for lasting social peace, in a climate of respect for workers' and employers' rights.

We are also in the throes of modernizing our labour legislation and expediting its proceedings. We are trying to improve the administration of justice and make it more accessible to workers and employers.

In the next few months we will submit a proposal relating to an income protection system for unemployed workers to guarantee an income for a certain period, for persons who are unemployed due to labour market mobility.

These policies are part of a comprehensive proposal for changes designed to improve the quality of our labour institutional structure in view of the demands of economic modernization currently facing the country at a time of fierce international competitiveness and impending agreements on economic integration.

In short, we are trying to improve the quality of the legislation currently in force, increase respect for the law and access to the judicial system, extend the rights guaranteed by our Constitution to areas of labour currently denied them because of legislative shortcomings, and to strengthen the combined effect of our information policies on employment, training and protection for unemployed workers, and of the consequent impact on the use and allocation of our human resources.

We are helped by our certainty that the initiatives we have mentioned are extremely important steps in our efforts to marry economic development with social development, the market with democracy, entrepreneurial freedom with social rights, flexibility in applying productive resources with social protection that can rise to the demands of our time.

The need to reconcile technical and economic criteria relating to the theory of the market to the social criteria which inspire the modern idea of democracy is not always understood by everyone as we would like it to be. However, we firmly believe in bipartite and tripartite social dialogue and we promote them at every opportunity in our country.

We hope that the ideas expressed by the Director-General of the ILO will be considered carefully by those that are still cautious about the changes proposed. I am sure that the Director-General's Report will help us to turn our backs on inflexible theoretical positions which, when we compare situations around the world, we see are stultifying. His analysis invites us in our opinion to look upon chances to increase employment as a social challenge to us all and to reject the tendency of some which, ostensibly to create employment, try to liberalize the labour market in such a way as to leave the worker with little or no protection.

Once again, I would like to express my Government's firm conviction that dialogue and cooperation are the most effective tool for making real progress in a world of work currently suffering tensions caused by universal and far-reaching change. Many of these changes amount to a genuine structural overhaul in our countries.

In Chile, we have learnt that constructive debate, and especially the recognition that human beings – in both an individual and social context – are the prime focus of all our development policies, are the only ways in which we will be able to find effective solutions to the challenges we currently face.

I would like to welcome the opportunity afforded by this gathering, and the agenda proposed, to look at the crucial issues currently facing the world of work.

Original Spanish: Mr. MORALES (Minister of Justice and Labour, Paraguay) – I would like to congratulate the Minister of Labour of Nicaragua on his appointment to preside over this Session of the Conference.

It is a great satisfaction to address this tripartite Conference where Governments, Workers and Employers expound their thoughts so that the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference should adopt resolutions for overcoming the social problems of today's world.

I represent the Government of the Republic of Paraguay, headed by President Juan Carlos Wasmosy, a civilian President, freely elected by the people on 9 May 1993, who has consolidated democracy in Paraguay by insisting upon unrestrained exercise of civil rights, full freedom of the press, the institutionalization of the Republic and reform of the State. In social affairs, the objective is to move away from the sterile habits of pushing claims through confrontation, replacing them with the more fruitful policy of dialogue, negotiation and mediation.

The Ministry of Labour, as part of this policy, has Dialogues which are providing effective results. For example, the most recent one was the Tripartite Agreement signed on 19 April which avoided a general strike planned for 2 May, without any sacrifice of rights enshrined in the Constitution and the law.

The Government wishes to take advantage of the tripartite basis of this Conference to congratulate the trade union and employers' leaders in our country for the negotiating skill which they demonstrated in getting over the strategy of confrontation and polarized posturing and moving towards a fruitful strategy of dialogue, negotiation and mediation.

The Government recognises that it is not easy to achieve the ideals of democracy, respect for human rights and public and political liberties. It is not easy either to achieve economic growth and social improvement, without consultation between government and representative associations, since my country has a relatively weak economy, mostly dependent upon agriculture, and it cannot remain unaffected by the unpredictable exogenous developments, nor by changes in world trade. A globalized economy requires modern domestic institutions to progressively raise financial resources and invest them, and to bring in foreign investment and social participation is the only way to formulate the projects which, with courage and decisiveness, will improve the living standards of the people.

Paraguay is not an island in this new social situation which will face us at the dawn of the twenty-first century. The Government is fully aware of the problems which ceaselessly beset us: poverty, ignorance, endemic disease, communities isolated from the outside, increasing crime both nationally and internationally, corruption, human rights violations, unemployment, underemployment – these are only some of the aspects of the globalization of the social problem in developing countries, although some also affect the first world, like crime and unemployment, for example.

The growing problem of unemployment is a world problem which affects developed and under-developed countries alike. It requires both aggressive policies and mediation and consultation, contradictory as this may seem.

We must take an aggressive stance in seeing that the law is fulfilled and that the Conventions of the ILO are implemented, so as to legalize the situation of the workers and put an end to the practice of "black" labour, which inflicts utterly subhuman conditions on workers.

Consultation and mediation arises from joint analysis and frank dialogue between governments, workers and employers on the following subjects: working conditions; the definition of the labour market; the effects of advanced technology upon the amount of labour which is required in the labour market; the implementation of accelerated vocational training policies to match the requirements of the market and that will include retraining as a way of reducing unemployment; and likewise alternative ways of hiring labour without in any way impairing the dignity of the worker.

As far as the burning subject of privatization is concerned, the policy of the Government is to adopt a gradual approach, giving preference to the wishes of the workers, and adapting them to the redefinition of the role of the State on the one hand and to the redefinition of their role as workers within the private sector on the other.

moting social integration, by fostering societies that are stable, safe and just and based on the promotion and protection of all human rights. I refer to Commitment 4.

In its Chapter III of the Programme of Action an appeal is made for "the safeguarding and promoting respect for basic worker's rights including the prohibition of forced and child labour, freedom of association and the right to organize and bargain collectively, equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and non-discrimination in employment". Likewise, it was stated that "governments should strongly consider ratification and full implementation of the ILO Conventions in these spheres".

The Social Summit gave guidance to governments and supports the policies of the ILO management in the social sphere. I can assure you that my Government like all other governments throughout the world will translate these intentions into practice.

There exist problems which are very closely inter-linked and which are of concern to politicians, economists, jurists and social partners, all touching on the great social issue at a time of profound structural changes in the economy, in trade, in production and in services. New technologies, the redesigning of the productive process, the globalization of markets (including the labour market through the relocation of jobs from high labour cost countries to low labour costs countries) worldwide competition, increased unemployment; these are some of the most burning problems.

For the solution of such problems there are extreme positions which support deregulation, the flexibilization of labour standards which are seen as obstacles to competitiveness and growth, whereas prudence demands an understanding that labour standards are instruments for the promotion of both productive efficiency and social justice. Without them there can be no industrial innovation, nor economic dynamism, nor can a fair sharing of the economic benefits which come from change.

The approach of the ILO reflects the following concerns: (a) the constitution of modern efficient institutions which are not just profitable, but are also capable of protecting people and offer them support through the adjustment process; (b) the integration, right from the start, of social considerations in the design of economic reform so as to not only mitigate the adverse effects of adjustment but also to promote positive ways of contributing to sustained long-term growth; (c) the participation of social partners in the design and implementation of programmes so as to achieve a social consensus around their objectives.

In the face of present challenges, certain regions of the world are moving to form regional associations which exhibit internal complementarity and raise their potential. Decentralization within countries is accompanied by regional or continental integration. No country can solve its social problems in isolation: decentralization and integration are not contradictory because some spheres of activity are best fulfilled at the local or departmental level, while others are better done at the regional or continental level.

The wealthy nations march forward alone but the developing countries require strengthening by integration. In our case, a relatively small country with a small population and domestic market, mutual relationships are of fundamental importance to maintain social peace and it is the job of the ILO to struggle permanently to improve working conditions.

Social issues in my country require a number of different approaches, some positive, and others requiring incentives and improved courses of action so as to achieve good labour relations.

At present the relationship between the Ministry of Labour and the employers' and employees' organizations are cordial, based upon the Government's policy of dialogue, negotiation, consultation and mediation, and the organization of a big tripartite negotiation, in January 1994, right at the beginning of its period of office.

I wish to recall once again the tripartite agreement of 19 April which led to the cancellation of a general strike announced for 2 May. It was within this agreement that workers, employers and the Government confirmed their conviction that dialogue and negotiation are the best instruments for the solution of work-related problems and reaffirmed their commitment to this mechanism of dialogue as the first step in settling future disputes.

In this spirit the National Minimum Wage Board was set up and it granted an increase of 15 per cent in the minimum wage as of 1 May 1995, on the basis of a study which was supported by all parties involved. It is established in the agreement that the central union bodies will not call for strike action while the process of dialogue and negotiation is under way, and the Government for its part agreed to study wage increases, the approval of the State Employee's Code, and likewise to set up open processes of dialogue especially in the fields of social security, wage policy and employment policy. This shows that the tripartite process underwrites the validity of social dialogue as a method to solve the problems in labour relations.

Enhanced credibility is given to the labour sector in the management of work. The Government is aware that there must be improved cooperation at various levels and in various fields, and that the administration of labour relations should be based upon better cooperation between the employers' and employees' organizations with a view to an improved application of labour legislation.

There is a steady improvement in conflict resolution by dialogue, negotiation consultation and mediation. The consolidation of this mechanism has been demonstrated in agreements for the solution of a number of conflicts with the participation of the bodies responsible for the labour sector in certain extremely delicate cases involving complex issues.

Statistics of labour disputes demonstrate that these tripartite discussions have given positive results, yielding a high percentage of disputes settled. Between September 1993 and April 1995, 61 per cent of tripartite negotiations were solved. In the year 1994, 74 per cent were settled, whereas in the previous year a settlement was achieved only in 37 per cent of cases.

The Ministry of Labour facilitates and promotes the organization of unions. The existence and strengthening of associations of workers and employers is again support for the policy of dialogue, negotiation, consultation and mediation.

The consolidation of democracy in Paraguay is also reflected in the growing number of organizations of employers and employees. Up to February 1989 there were only 172 unions whereas as of March 1995, 1,194 union organizations were registered.

However, there are still some unsatisfactory situations whose solution will require a more aggressive response.

It is necessary to improve the monitoring of the implementation of labour standards and to provide the Labour Relations Administration with the technical and material means to improve its efficiency, in its relationship with the social partners, particularly in regard to collective bargaining and in improving labour policy.

Those failures which have been reported are due to the limited effectiveness of the Ministry of Labour as the responsible administrative body, to see that these standards are fulfilled. This will be overcome by the separation of the Ministry of Justice from that of Labour and Social Security, since the present situation explains the difficulties which have arisen. Furthermore, the lack of financial resources for the implementation of an efficient labour policy and the lack of the necessary powers to enforce compliance with the law by the parties involved, since fines are an insufficient sanction.

In the final part of this speech I would like to highlight the words of Mr. Michel Hansenne who in the last Report said that the ILO could not remain indifferent to events which, beginning in 1990, led many countries to undertake a process of democratization. The ILO is contributing to necessary reforms for the consolidation of democracy, pursuing priority objectives like the protection of workers, the elimination of poverty, the promotion of democracy, the defence of human rights, respect of labour standards and the stimulation of employment.

The Paraguayan Government agrees fully with this position and states that it will make ever-increasing efforts to consolidate these objectives which are common to us all. Priority will be given to improving conditions of work and employment, and to the training of workers so as to improve the country's competitive position in a globalized economy.

To conclude, I would like to refer to the new encyclical Ut unum sit (that all may be One) of Pope John Paul II. This encyclical is an encouragement to us all and implies that we are moving forward surely and that we are heading in the right direction: dialogue, negotiation, consultation and mediation. As his Holiness said Ut unum sit let us all be one for the happiness of all our peoples.

Mr. OFFMANN (Minister of Labour and Industrial Relations, Mauritius) – I feel extremely honoured to take the floor before this august assembly on the occasion of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. In the name of the tripartite delegation of Mauritius, which I have the pleasure to lead, and in my own name, allow me to present my congratulations to the President on his election to this high office, and also to the other Officers of the Conference.

As I come from a bilingual country, I would like to renew with tradition and be allowed to continue in the French language.

The world is currently undergoing enormous upheavals that are bringing about profound changes in society on the eve of the third millennium.

The world of work in particular is faced with the employment crisis which is threatening to create serious social problems. We already see the impoverishment of broad sectors of the population in the so-called developing countries, while there are even areas of poverty in the industrialized countries. The Declaration of Philadelphia, which in 1944 reformed the principles of the ILO, states that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere".

If I refer to the case of our own continent of Africa, some worrying questions arise. Beyond the problems associated with the debt burden, the lack of investment and the deterioration of the terms of trade, Africa is beset by a certain marginalization. Will we ever be able to catch up if the gulf between Africa and the other continents is allowed to widen still further? Let us recall the situation of the countries of South-East Asia in the 1970s and then look at what has become of them today. They have gone from a state of backwardness and underdevelopment to become a driving force for economic growth. We are surely seeing new attitudes, new approaches and imaginative bold policies which could also be applied to Africa. Following the emancipation of South Africa which some had believed impossible, let us dare to dream, let us dare to conceive of a vast plan of mutual assistance for the benefit of development in Africa. For it must be accepted that the globalization of markets has brought in its wake worldwide social problems, be it in the form of drugs, AIDS, hunger and poverty, mass migration and so forth. We must now face these problems together on an international scale. That is to say that in our quest for progress, stability and security which are dear to all our hearts, development must be global or it cannot occur at all. The world cannot consider itself advanced if Africa is left behind:

Initiatives are therefore required in order to increase our ability to create better conditions which are conducive to investment and job creation. This would not only enhance the rights of workers, and give them a better quality of life but would also facilitate the gradual observance of social labour standards.

In this connection, the Director-General's Report entitled Promoting employment is a very interesting document which proposes certain areas for reflection on employment prospects in various parts of the world. In his analysis the Director-General echoes our concerns when he emphasizes that the introduction of an effective economic system on the international scale is a priority which nevertheless must not turn its back on social requirements. He also echoes our economic philosophy when he stresses that even if there is no universal formula, the authorities should restrict their role to that of facilitating private initiative, leaving it to private initiative to lend impetus to the economy, particularly through the creation of jobs.

In the new economic environment that is the result of the liberalization of trade, we are witnessing a reorganization of work. New production strategies based on the globalization of enterprises must cause us to reflect on their repercussions on the labour force and on industrial relations and international standards. In the context of these structural reforms, the controversy concerning the effectiveness of standards is alive and kicking. Is it a constraint to development or is it instead an essential prerequisite to development? There is still the perception that standards reflect the development models of the industrialized regions and that other countries cannot keep up with them. This is eloquently reflected in the widening gap between the number of international Conventions being adopted and ratified. A new approach is called for in the interests of greater flexibility. An associated measure that would encourage wider ratification of standards could involve introducing protocols into all Conventions. This would facilitate a step-by-step ratification and would mean greater flexibility for the benefit of development and social justice. People will no longer point the finger at labour law as being against the right to work and the standard-setting structure of the ILO will emerge strengthened.

My country, the Republic of Mauritius, is situated in the heart of the Indian Ocean. It is without natural resources and has 560 inhabitants per square kilometre. It is a country made up of a mosaic of races, religions, cultures and traditions which offers in all humility to a tormented world, a world tormented by ethnic warfare, an example of peaceful co-existence, pluralism and tolerance.

If I tell you that peace and harmony are just as precious to us as economic development, you will easily understand our concern for solidarity, the international solidarity which we would like to see extended to our mother continent, Africa.

The genius of the Mauritian people has made it possible for us, despite restrictive circumstances, to solve the problem of unemployment during the past decade, while encouraging growth in equity.

Even if the sugar industry remains the backbone of our economy our adventure with the export processing zone gave fresh impetus to our industrialization and a new vitality to the whole economic and social life of our country. I would hasten to reassure all delegates, that our export processing zone is a rare and atypical model, in terms of social standards, where freedom of association and labour laws make their presence felt for both our workers and for foreign workers, with no discrimination between the two.

Mauritius is also well known as a high-class tourist destination with a related industry that has developed quickly. The country's rapid rates of growth with its liberal economy has also spurred the parallel development of its financial services. Mauritius seeks in fact to become an international financial centre. We have great hopes for regional cooperation in expanding our commercial prospects, particularly with the new opportunities that will be ushered in in the post-GATT era.

As regards labour, we are striving to maintain the equilibrium between economic and social aspects. Our concern is not only to preserve what has already been achieved, but also to encourage initiatives aimed at strengthening the rights of workers and affording them more security at work. One historic measure was taken whereby workers in the sugar industry were encouraged to become shareholders and to choose their representatives on the boards of directors of the sugar companies. Furthermore, in order to strengthen social protection against a backdrop of international competition, all our labour laws are currently being revised. In fact a silent revolution is now under way with a view to strengthening triparlated to the level of local and foreign investments, and to the outlook for development of the service and trade sectors, etc.

In this way it will be possible for the public employment services to continue developing. They will in turn influence and actively participate in this market, providing incentives to create new jobs, as well as services operating in the labour market to mediate in tailoring supply to demand.

Measures that have demonstrated their efficiency in the different countries of the world and which contribute to increasing the job offer and facilitating the possibility of finding employment in the future areas are: training and retraining; provision of services for groups of people who represent themselves to the labour market with specific problems (we may mention here the establishment of business clubs, work clubs, etc. which will contribute to developing individual skills of the people concerning their efforts to find employment by themselves); and concrete programmes of development.

Our institutions are in the early stages of creating and implementing these programmes. A very important role is being played by the training centres established lately in Albania which by means of training programmes train the unemployed in accordance with the needs of the Albanian labour market.

Another aspect of employment promotion involves the programmes concerning temporary public labour, which will make it possible to find jobs for the unemployed, particularly the long-term ones.

The development of these programmes aimed at temporary employment for the jobless will have a positive effect both on the involvement of these people in the labour market and on the macroeconomic development of society.

In our Ministry of Labour we have been implementing ILO projects aimed at equipping the new labour administration to operate in the labour market through active employment policies at the local and national levels. It is our aim to consolidate tripartism as a very important element in the free market economy.

The Government is dedicating a great deal of attention to tripartism in order to maintain the progress achieved during the period of transition; the Government, employers and employees are indispensable to the democratization of the economy.

The Government of Albania has faith in democracy. It appreciates the cooperation with the ILO and the contribution made by this important Organization so that we can meet the challenge of a democratic society.

I sincerely wish success to all the participants in the Conference.

Original Portuguese: Mr. GONÇALVES DE OLIVEIRA FONSECA (Employers' delegate, Brazil) – On behalf of the Brazilian Employers, I should like to begin by warmly congratulating the President on his election to head the work of this International Labour Conference, and I should also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents and the other Officers of the Conference, and wish them every success.

The Director-General has selected as the main topic for this Conference the promotion of employment. His Report considers many facets of the employment situation throughout the world but we have yet to hear, particularly with respect to labour and flexibility costs, the positions of the Employers' representatives which have been expressed at various levels of the ILO. There are many problems that can hinder and complicate the creation and maintenance of full and productive employment. These include in Brazil, in particular: labour market rigidity which is a result of excessive bureaucracy, over-regulation and a tax system that holds back and discourages new initiatives; the high cost of labour and the lack of a clear and stable employment policy. Support for micro, small and medium-sized enterprises is particularly important because these generate employment. Raising the status of training programmes for the heads of small and medium-sized businesses together with technical support will be increasingly effective in creating employment. Another effective strategy is the development of policies to improve workers' skills. It is essential to invest in basic education to tackle the changes brought about by new production processes. The degree of labour market flexibility also depends on the skill levels of the labour force; this can make it easier for workers to move between jobs, thus helping to reduce the structural component of unemployment.

With respect to vocational training, let me say that, in Brazil, the employers' organizations long ago took over responsibility for this function and maintained and administered it through the National Confederations of Industry, Trade, Transport and Agriculture, their own vocational training and development departments. To ensure that these services continue to pursue excellence in vocational training in Brazil, the support of the ILO is essential, and this support will contribute to the adoption and dissemination of new low-cost technologies. In Brazil, workers' social payments are a heavy burden and are over 100 per cent of direct labour costs due to very high tax and contribution levels, and also to the many indirect workers' benefits which are mandatory on all enterprises regardless of their size. In addition, in recent years, workers' protection and benefits have been increased to such a degree – especially following promulgation of the Constitution in 1988, that this has largely served as a disincentive to creation of employment in the formal economy. Employment promotion requires labour market flexibility and deregulation and, in particular, adoption of a new model of labour relations which will define a minimum set of fundamental rights; expansion of these rights should be arrived at by free bargaining between the interested parties to the extent that circumstances permit and require.

To summarize our approach to labour costs, we believe it will be better to carry out thorough going, integrated changes in labour market regulation, and payroll taxes. This would be preferable to stringent measures that are difficult to implement, highly controversial and not very effective in generating and maintaining full, productive employment.

Another employment promotion challenge is to set up an employment policy that will lay down the conditions essential for economic stability, a population policy, investments designed to enhance international competitiveness, micro, small and medium-sized enterprises and vocational training adapted to the needs of productive units and new needs for vocational skills and capabilities for people working with new technologies.

After the Second World War, the Brazilian economy obtained an international reputation for its rapid growth and its high level of job creation. Industrialization promoted by import substitution considerably increased the number of jobs in the industrial and service sectors. This helped the labour market absorb the population growth brought about by very high birth rates. However, as from the early 1980s, the picture changed, as a result of the foreign crisis debt. Two major recessions in 1981-83 and 1990-92 significantly affected the level of economic activity. As a result, visible unemployment and, in particular, underemployment have risen considerably in recent years. Even the resumption of growth beginning in 1993 has still produced no significant increase in employment. It is here that we have the major contradiction of our times. World trade globalization sharpens competition, enforces new patterns of production and requires business in all parts of the world to adopt new technologies and to work even harder to increase productivity.

From the standpoint of the consumer this is a very positive development in that it makes available to the consumers better and cheaper goods and services. Ultimately, however, such practices destroy jobs and swell unemployment figures, even when the economy is growing. At best, the employment creation curve, even when it is rising suffers in comparison to the production curve.

To reconcile the irreversible demand for quality and productivity we need to continue to create employment and sufficient jobs to employ the millions of young people who each year enter the labour market. This seems to be the major challenge to be faced by governments throughout the world and the ILO. As Stephan Kanitz has said, "The great challenge of the future, especially for a young country like Brazil, with a population growth rate out of line with its economic growth, is job creation".

Given the many great challenges that we will face in the future, I would like to reaffirm the special interest of Brazilian employers in consolidating ILO strategies and programmes. These are designed to promote and to make known the two major resolutions that were adopted by the 79th International Labour Conference: the Resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth and the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment; and the Resolution concerning employment promotion as an essential component of overall development.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-BETANI (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Yemen) – I am very happy to be able to participate with the delegation of my country, the Republic of Yemen, in the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to congratulate the President on his election to chair this session of the Conference, and I am sure that under his guidance and with the benefit of his abilities and wisdom we are guaranteed positive results, which will help us to improve the working of the International Labour Organization.

Our participation in the proceedings of this session of the Conference comes on the heels of the unification of my country, Yemen, and of considerable progress in areas such as democracy, political pluralism, the transition towards a market economy, the formulation of the machinery and regulations needed to implement it, and measures to consolidate participation by the people. My country is trying to create a productive labour force and at the same time increase investment in human resource development.

The Republic of Yemen has adopted a market economy in the framework of its economic and social policy and is trying to encourage the population to participate in the development process. Furthermore, the Constitution of our country stipulates that the national economy must be based on freedom for economic activity which should respect the interests of society and the individual in this regard. We have adopted the following principles: social justice, the need for fair competition between private and public sectors, protection of and respect for private property, and equal opportunities for all citizens. The development of our country is nevertheless hampered by a range of difficulties. Yemen is one of the least developed countries, per capita income is a mere $640 and in recent years we have run into many economic difficulties because of certain events in our region, which have cost us $1.2 billion in lost revenue which is equivalent to the transfers made by workers who have emigrated.

The birth rate in Yemen is increasing (3.1 per cent) and unemployment stands at more than 30 per cent. In view of the increasing seriousness of our problems, the United Nations General Assembly adopted resolutions Nos. 222 and 193, in which it invited the Secretary-General of the United Nations, States and organizations to help Yemen to improve its economic and social structures.

We greatly welcome the pioneer role played by the ILO in the sphere of labour, and we are convinced that this Organization will find solutions to the problems before us, inter alia, with regard to social development, workers' rights and human rights. With its noble humanitarian principles, the ILO is the organization best equipped to deal with the social aspects of these worldwide problems.

We have taken very careful note of all the items on the agenda: safety and health in mines, home work, extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), to activities in the non-commercial services sector. These items occupy an important place in the work of the ILO and they deserve due time for them to be studied and analysed objectively. The ILO, in 76 years, has managed to achieve something that has not yet been achieved by any other United Nations agency. The Director-General's Report on Promoting employment is also most interesting in view of the enormity of the problems facing workers and countries in transition from a planned to a market economy. I have, however, noted that the Report does not deal virtually at all with workers in the Arab world even though this is one of the most important problems confronting the majority of Arab countries.

We believe that it is absolutely necessary for the ILO to further enhance its pioneering role to help developing countries. We sincerely hope that the ILO will provide support for the developing countries which look forward to social and economic development.

The developing countries are encountering major difficulties with the far-reaching changes that are taking place in economic structures. Like so many other countries, we need the expertise of the rest of the world in the labour field and increased human and other resources. We would also like to ask the developed countries and international organizations to help the developing countries with their nationalization plans, to grant them subsidies, to provide more investment, to reduce their debt and to transfer technology and other forms of expertise so that they can bridge the gap that separates them from the developed countries.

My country attaches a great deal of importance to productivity. Our Government has adopted special laws for the social protection of the elderly, of disabled workers, of workers suffering from occupational illnesses and of survivors. We have recently produced a number of texts on labour questions. The latest was Labour Act No. 5, of 1995. One of my Government's priorities is to draw up policies and programmes capable of providing training for our workforce commensurate with the economic and social changes we are experiencing and with the needs of our economy.

We have achieved a great deal to secure social gains in many fields, even as the international community has ignored the real dangers faced by Iraqi women, children and elderly people, and despite the fact that the reasons for this situation have long since disappeared. The workers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories are subjected to treatment that no worker, anywhere, can know. At this session of the Conference, we must reaffirm the rights of the workers living in these lands, along with the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination and the support of peace based on the restitution of their legitimate rights.

Furthermore, we demand that the embargo imposed on the Iraqi and Libyan Arab peoples be lifted. The workers of these two countries are beginning to suffer, and require protection. Among those who need to be protected are the children, the destitute, and others.

Original Azeri: Mr. RAGIMOV (Minister of Labour and Social Protection, Azerbaijan) – It is with a sense of pride that I am addressing you today from the podium of this authoritative international assembly.

It has now been four years since Azerbaijan joined the International Labour Organization, and now, as a full-fledged member, it is participating in the work of its highest body, the International Labour Conference. The Republic of Azerbaijan is establishing a new state based on democratic principles, and is carrying out economic reforms, ensuring a transition to market relations and introducing modern forms of labour relations. Our country attaches a great deal of importance to the role of the International Labour Conference.

Since the Republic of Azerbaijan became a full-fledged member of the ILO, it has acceded to more than 50 Conventions which cover various aspects of international labour standards.

Our young State is undergoing a complicated period of its history. On the one hand, there is the transition to new economic relations, and on the other hand, more than 20 per cent of the territory of Azerbaijan has been occupied, and there are one million Azeri refugees, or about 15 per cent of the population, in the country. As a result of the military aggression by the Republic of Armenia, the social situation has worsened and the implementation of economic and political reforms has been hampered. More than other countries, Azerbaijan is experiencing the bitter consequences of poverty and unemployment. That is why our country supports the Declaration and the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development which was held in Copenhagen at the beginning of the year at the initiative of the United Nations to respond to the deterioration of social conditions worldwide, and to address three issues: poverty, unemployment and social disintegration, both at the national and international levels.

It goes without saying that the discussion of the Declaration and Programme of Action at the Conference reflects the trust placed by the General Assembly in the Conference. We hope that the International Labour Organization will make use of its experience, its mandate and its tripartite structure when dealing with issues of employment and social development, and will make a valuable contribution to the implementation of the Programme of Action.

I would like to underline that our country, with its own specific features in the employment sector, will be able to benefit from activities carried out at the international level.

The centrally planned economy of the Soviet Union obviously paid inadequate attention to the needs and requirements of labour and the creation of new job opportunities. As a result of that situation, one-fifth of the manpower of the Republic was unemployed.

As Mr. Hansenne mentioned in his Report, the drop in production and the rise of the inflation rate have exacerbated the problems of unemployment and poverty. Unfortunately, we do not have a relevant database corresponding to international standards with which to deal with these issues. For the time being, we are thus carrying out some programmes in order to be able to deal with statistics at the international level, and to try to obtain the necessary information with regard to international statistics.

We started these activities with the help and financial assistance of the International Labour Organization and the UNDP. In this respect, a special draft of a document entitled "Labour forces survey in the Azerbaijan Republic", which is aimed at putting into good order the employment and unemployment statistics, has now been prepared and its programme is now being implemented. This March, a selective survey was conducted among the unemployed and also the employed citizens of Azerbaijan. As a result of this survey, we will soon have a comprehensive picture of the situation with regard to our country's labour market.

The complicated situation with regard to employment in Azerbaijan has led to the deterioration of the living standards of the most vulnerable groups of population. I would like to draw your attention to the following figures which clearly reflect the current situation in this field.

At present, the minimum wage in the country is 20.5 per cent of the average monthly wage, and the figures are 2.3 per cent and 3.8 per cent respectively, for disability pensions and old age pensions.

I fully concur with the opinion expressed by Mr. Hansenne about the reasons for poverty and unemployment and the increase in unemployment and social insecurity which prevails in the republics of the former Soviet Union, but I would like to underline the fact that in contrast to the majority of the newly independent countries, the situation in Azerbaijan has been aggravated by military conflict.

There are two factors really: on the one hand, the country lost more than 300,000 jobs, and on the other hand, as I have mentioned, more than one million refugees and displaced persons are living in tents. They suffer from epidemics and from extreme heat and cold. The country has also suffered enormous material damage, amounting to billions of United States dollars.

I would like to avail myself of this opportunity to address the International Labour Conference as one of the most influential international forums which is dealing with poverty and unemployment all over the world, and ask for your support in our efforts to bring about a peaceful settlement of the conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan.

The Republic of Azerbaijan, which has based its unemployment policies upon the main principles indicated in Mr. Hansenne's Report, considers that to solve such problems, we have to expand the industrial sector in order to create new jobs and improve the management of foreign investment. In this way it might be possible to improve the unemployment situation.

Two projects are planned for the creation of additional jobs, and they are to be implemented in close cooperation with international organizations. One of them aims at providing jobs for the unemployed in rural areas; the other is concerned with the rehabilitation of disabled persons. The latter is designed to help people who became disabled, for example as a result of the Armenian aggression, the Second World War, the Chernobyl disaster or the war in Afghanistan.

There are several medical institutions which provide medical rehabilitation for such people, but due to our lack of experience, our country is unable to solve problems of complete rehabilitation in the world of work without the assistance of the international community. We are thus hoping for a great deal of help from the International Labour Organization. I would like to avail myself of this opportunity to address myself to the donor countries attending this important international forum, and to ask for their assistance in the implementation of this project.

One of the issues to be discussed by the session is the specific question of adapting the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81). We fully agree with the idea that is impossible to follow appropriate labour law regulations if there is not fully developed infrastructure for the revision of such labour legislation. That is why the technical assistance of the ILO is so important. We are pleased to inform you that we are doing all this through state labour inspectorates which are now operating in the Republic of Azerbaijan.

We are also very pleased to note that the issue of home work is also to be discussed at the Conference, because it is of great interest for Azerbaijan, where we are often confronted with this problem. We welcome the adoption of any standards providing for a proper status for this group, i.e. homeworkers.

In mentioning all of these individual points, I would like to express our gratitude and our appreciation to the officials of the ILO for their invaluable assistance and for the support which they have given to the Republic of Azerbaijan. I would like once again to underline the fact that Azerbaijan is seeking full-fledged integration into the community of nations. We are looking forward very much to your assistance in this process of integration. And I would like to thank you all for your attention.

Mr. SHAMUYARIRA (Minister of the Public Service, Labour and Social Welfare, Zimbabwe) – At the very outset let me take the opportunity to extend my congratulations to Mr. Rosales Argüello on his election as President of the 82nd Session of the ILO Conference, and also to congratulate the Vice-Presidents and the other members of the bureau. I wish them all success in their work, and I am confident that given their wide experience this Conference will be a success.

I will also take this opportunity to express the appreciation of my delegation for the report produced by the ILO, World Employment 1995, and supplemented by the Director-General's own Report on the same topic, both of which are very comprehensive, analytical and very informative. First, I would like to concentrate on the unemployment crisis facing the world.

These reports underline two developments that are of great importance to those of us coming from Africa. The first is the marginalization of Africa from the emerging international economic system, and from the benefits of the globalization that we have been discussing in many speeches today.

The social and productive forces that are shaping this global economic system have generated economic growth in East and South-East Asia, they have stimulated intra-trade among the countries of the North but they have unfortunately bypassed the African continent. And that deteriorating situation calls for very special attention by the ILO to the pressing requirements of the national economies of Africa. It is a matter that should be discussed in great detail and solutions should be appropriate.

The second development is the corresponding declining national economies of the sub-Saharan countries in Africa which are also dealt with at length in the two reports. These countries have all opened up their economies of late; along with wide-ranging economic structure adjustment programmes they have launched export-oriented industrialization strategies. But these measures have had a very limited positive impact on this region. In fact, the combination of monetary policies and persistent droughts have increased the number of people without jobs and poverty is now widespread in sub-Saharan Africa.

As highlighted in the Director-General's Report, the sub-Saharan region has received very little foreign direct investment despite widespread moves to liberalize foreign investment regimes and to offer attractive incentives. Furthermore, growth rates in the region have considerably decreased since the 1960s, exacerbated by, among other factors, natural calamities, especially drought. The condition is fairly critical. Inescapably this has led to growing unemployment, underemployment and to deteriorating economic conditions in the region as a whole.

Consequently we believe that the ILO should play a significant role in efforts to alleviate the situation by providing technical assistance, enhancing the setting up of social safety nets to cushion the poor and disadvantaged groups, and in general to assist in setting up appropriate programmes to usher in and sustain economic recovery. However, that does not suggest that we in the region are not doing enough about it. In fact we are doing a lot.

In Zimbabwe, as in other sub-Saharan countries, we do face the problem of rising unemployment, rising prices and limited foreign investments. Although we launched an economic structural programme in 1991 in an attempt to increase the rate of economic growth and to generate more employment and reduce poverty, the present levels of unemployment are not acceptable to the Government and to the organized employers' and labour organizations. The unemployment rate, which stood at 15.2 per cent in 1994, has increased over the last three years and continues to increase. While the levels of unemployment and underemployment are partly due to the tight monetary policies, attributed to the implementation of economic reforms, a significant contributory factor has been the vagaries of the weather to which I have already referred. The 1992 drought and the current drought have had a debilitating effect on economic growth and consequently on levels of employment in all sectors of the economy.

Due to lack of job opportunities in the formal sector, the micro and small-scale sector, to include the informal sector, provides a substantial amount of employment in Zimbabwe. It is estimated that about 38.8 per cent of the labour force is involved in this sector and we in the Government plan to do everything possible to expand this sector so that it can include more and more people if we can get the resources to do so.

To alleviate the suffering of the vulnerable low income groups and the poor, adversely affected by the impact of the factors to which I have already referred, the Government of Zimbabwe has introduced public works programmes and social safety programmes under the Social Development Fund. We are following very closely the report and the declaration that came out of Copenhagen. We intend to link with a number of organizations and institutions that will be working on that Declaration.

In addition, we have introduced a compulsory national social security scheme in Zimbabwe. It is our intention to extend this scheme to cover, inter alia, unemployment benefits. At the moment it covers pensions, basic pensions for all our working people. This is quite an innovation in a situation where there have been no pension facilities for the majority of the workers, except those who were in special professional and other programmes.

Furthermore, in February of this year the Zimbabwe Government launched what we call the Poverty Alleviation Action Plan (PAAP) which emphasizes the need to create self-employment and self-development through enhanced community participation in productive activities. Clearly the alleviation of poverty is going to be a major programme of the Government over the next two to three years as we face the problems of drought and the shortage of investments to which I have already referred. The first phase of the plan is already under way with the poverty assessment study being conducted to assess the extent of poverty in parts of Zimbabwean society and elsewhere.

The challenge confronting the Government of Zimbabwe and its social partners is the strengthening of measures for the social protection of the vulnerable in the formal sector. Tripartite consultations have proved to be powerful instruments for fostering social dialogue, internal peace and stability as a prerequisite for national building, equitable growth and employment generation.

Another level at which we are attacking the problems of poverty, drought and lack of investment to which I have already referred is at the regional level. A dozen years ago we launched the Southern Sahara Development Community (CEDAC), which includes 11 countries in our region. With the democratisation of South Africa that has recently taken place and its emergence as a powerful state, we are now counting on rapid development of regional cooperation as a way of reducing both the effects of drought but also as a means of enhancing our capacity, not only for utilisation of our own resources but utilization of resources that may come from outside our countries. CEDAC is a thriving young organization which fits into the general plan of forming an African economic community, a plan which was agreed and signed in South Africa in 1992.

In southern Africa CEDAC is the regional block that will support the all Africa-wide communities and we have many plans for the development of cooperation in our region.

Finally, the ILO has always claimed that the social dimensions of globalization need to be given much greater weight by the international community and we support them in that endeavour. We also ask the ILO to continue supporting ELAC, which is the labour centre established in Zimbabwe to service the entire region. It enables the ILO to work with us to promote the development of good labour legislation and also management which is the root of some of our difficulties and we would like to request the ILO to continue the support it has been given to ELAC. It is an organization supported by the organized employers, by the labour unions, as well as the governments of the entire region. With this support we would be able to continue to strengthen and to improve the labour administration in our region. We make a renewed call to the ILO for continued support for this particular organization.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) – It is a great privilege for me to convey my sincere congratulations to the President and the three Vice-Presidents – including Mrs. Engelen-Kefer from the Workers' group with whom I have had the privilege of working for many years – on their election. We welcome the two new member States, Gambia and St. Vincent and the Grenadines, and hope they will make a positive contribution to this great Organization.

We also appreciate the work of the Governing Body, its Chairman and the Employer and Worker members. The Worker members are ably led by Mr. Brett, Worker Vice-Chairman, and I have also had the privilege of working with Mr. Ryder, Director of the Geneva Office of the ICFTU. I hope that the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, with his able team, will continue to further the cause of the International Labour Organization.

On behalf of the Workers' delegation of Pakistan, and on my own behalf, I also convey the greetings and good wishes to the distinguished delegates of this historic Conference.

In the Preface to his Report, Promoting employment Mr. Michel Hansenne has stated that the task of creating sufficient new jobs to overcome unemployment, underemployment and problems of low pay ranks as the primary challenge for economic and social policy in countries at all levels of development across the globe.

High levels of unemployment spawn a host of problems: growing inequality, social exclusion, the waste of foregone output, underutilized human resources, increasing income insecurity and human suffering inflicted upon the unemployed. All this is in striking contrast to a situation in which there is a high and stable rate of productivity and where job creation is linked to economic and social development.

We fully agree with the remarks made by the Director-General in his very well written Report and believe that in order to overcome the rising problem of unemployment, both in the industrialized and developing countries, both national and international action need to be taken. With regard to international action, resources should be transferred to the developing countries which are struggling under the burden of heavy debt; they also should be granted moratorium. Trade should also be boosted between the developing and developed countries which would enable them to raise employment opportunities; indeed, this would be preferable to direct aid.

We hope that protectionist measures will cease and that developing countries will have more access to the markets of industrialized countries which account for 69 per cent of industrial production. And if we are to have a better future for mankind we require an interdependent world.

Resources for the arms build-up should be also be allocated to social, economic and human development; and the transfer of commodities from the developed world should be made to the developing countries instead of building up mass armaments which constitutes a threat to the whole of mankind. Similarly the exchange rate should be stabilized as this runs counter to the economy of the developing countries. Basic human rights should be respected throughout the world; indeed the World Summit for Social Development, which adopted a Declaration and Programme of Action, stresses that the ILO standards are a prerequisite for economic and social development – and we fully support this.

Another way of helping developing countries to stand on their own feet is to step up technical assistance. At the national level we believe that there should be population control and that more resources should be allocated to the development of education and training facilities for young people and children. And the gap between the rich and the poor – which exists in many countries – should be filled. Efforts should be made to improve social and economic conditions in the rural sector since the rural poor are the main sufferers. The legacy of feudalism in the area should be eradicated, the peasants given both resources and land which would not only raise their standard of living and employment opportunities but also productivity. Similarly children – who are our future for posterity – should be provided with compulsory education; more resources should be allocated to them and they should not be left to the mercy of nature. It is the State's duty to come forward and fulfil its obligation towards the children of the poor. Similarly, discrimination against women should be terminated and they should be given the opportunity mentally, physically and spiritually – to play an effective role in society.

Basic rights should also be respected – particularly the basic rights of collective bargaining and freedom of association of workers.

Given the globalization of the economy, we believe that the ILO should help to overcome the problems linked to structural adjustment and deregulation which confront the workers. We should also set out to strengthen the tripartism for which this great Organization stands. This message should also filter down to the grass-roots level because social dialogue helps to strengthen the political, social and economic stability of a country – which is vital for promoting productive, fruitful and freely-chosen employment.

Last year we celebrated the 75th anniversary of this great Organization and we in our country organized seminars, a workshop, and a national seminar, which was also attended by the Assistant Director-General of the ILO Asian-Pacific Region. Our country has also ratified two Conventions, namely the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), and the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159).

At the national level, we are glad to report that the workers have attained multinational unity by creating the Pakistan Workers' Confederation which defends the social and economic rights of workers. We held our Conference on 18 March and the Director-General sent us a fraternal message and his good wishes, for which we thank him.

We have also been having a dialogue with the Government for the achievement of progress in labour policy because the present Government committed itself in its election manifesto to bring labour policy into conformity with the ILO Charter. There have been two issues: our Mr. Lasi has spoken today about the recommendation of the labour task force. I was also one of the Worker members of that task force. We hope that the Government, while accepting the recommendation of the task force, will not come under pressure from employers who want the right to dismiss workers without giving any reason.

Another area in which we would like the Government to take the views of the workers into account is that of restrictions on the right of freedom of association of workers. Since many employers want to impose some restriction upon the Election of Officers Bill, we pointed out that it runs counter to the principle of article 3 of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87). We hope that the Government, while finalizing labour policy, will take into account fully the principles enshrined in the Convention No. 87 and in the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), as well as the commitments contained in its election manifesto.

Another area is that of structural adjustment and deregulation. We are negotiating with the Government, an agreements whereby under privatization workers would receive a 10 per cent share of an enterprise and security of employment for one year. They would also have a "golden handshake" facility, namely five months' salary for each year in case they decide to leave. At the same time, the workers have a right to bid for the purchase of the enterprise and their bid would be given preference. Some enterprises have been taken over by the workers, such as the Allied Bank. But in the case of public utilities, we have numerous differences with the Government because we believe that a public utility such as energy, railways, the post office and telegraphs, should continue to be deployed in the public sector because it will be easy for the rich and well-to-do to pay any price for these services. But what about rural areas, less developed areas and the people as a whole? What would be their share in the provision of these basic needs? I think it is the State's responsibility to provide for them, and we hope the deliberations we are conducting with the Government will take into account our viewpoint and that these public utilities will continue in the public sector. In case there is new investment in the private sector this should be on a competitive basis and not be allowed to remain a monopoly in the private sector since it would run counter to the interests of the less privileged class of society and also would most likely hamper employment of the workers. As has been pointed out by the Director-General in his ILO World Employment Report, deregulation policy has not created social cohesion and threatens social peace and reduces jobs. Therefore our apprehension is genuine and we hope during the dialogue these aspects will be taken care of.

One delegate has spoken today and made accusations about the situation of child labour in Pakistan. I must stress that we, as a poor developing country, have a problem of child labour, but to magnify it to such an extent I think is not fair because it arises in many countries, like the case of migrants. To take one incident and to magnify it is unfair to the developing country in question and to the working class which respects the equal rights of the migrant workers. Similarly, as regards children who constitute our future prosperity, we stress to the Government the need to allocate more resources to reducing their employment. I think that the incident in question arose as a matter of abuse of human rights and not specifically of child labour. Therefore, I think that it needs to be verified by the distinguished speaker because the Human Rights Commission has also looked into these allegations.

Lastly, I should also like to point out that the Government has entered into an IPEC (International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour) project, and we hope that with ILO assistance this problem will be tackled more vigorously. Similarly, we also support the ILO programme for international migration. We also appreciate the role of the ILO Office in Islamabad, and in the Asia and Pacific Region and we look forward to useful work being done in the ILO Office in the Workers' Relations Branch, the Workers' Education Branch, the Asian Regional Team for Employment Promotion (ARTEP), the Working Conditions and Environment Department, the International Labour Standards Department and the Turin Centre, so that industrial relations will continue to be strengthened. I also wish a good life to Mr. Dumont and a happy life after his retirement as the Director of the Working Conditions and Environment Department. He has done an enormous service for improving the working conditions of workers all over the world. I hope this Conference will bring improvements for the working man and women both in the quality of life and for the better future of mankind as a whole.

Sixth (special) sitting

Thursday, 8 June 1995, 11.30 a.m.

President: Mr. Rosales Argüello

ADDRESS BY HIS EXCELLENCY
MR. ZINE EL ABIDINE BEN ALI,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF TUNISIA

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – This special sitting of the International Labour Conference is devoted to the visit of His Excellency President Zine El Abidine Ben Ali of the Republic of Tunisia. I give the floor to the Secretary-General of the Conference, Mr. Hansenne, to welcome the President.

Original French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – It is now a well-established tradition for the International Labour Conference to listen to an address from distinguished statesmen who each time bring us a more global dimension and perspective to our work on questions concerning employment and the world of labour.

This is why today I have the very great honour of welcoming you at this Conference.

The International Labour Conference greets you as the Head of a State which has a remarkably rich past and which has, throughout its history, succeeded in assimilating a wide range of cultures and values.

To appreciate fully the results achieved by modern Tunisia at the political, economic and social levels, it is enough to recall the modesty of the means and resources at its disposal when it gained its independence and in the ensuing years.

Only last month, one of the most widely read weeklies in Africa wrote that Tunisia at the time of independence had 4 million inhabitants, of which 1 million made up the working population in 1966 – 94 per cent of them men and 6 per cent women working outside the home. The resources of the country were basically agricultural and the average income per capita was 74 dinars. One-fifth of the population was literate and life expectancy did not go beyond 50. According to the same source of information, population has now doubled and is now 8.7 million; illiteracy has been reduced by 80 per cent and, what is a very rare fact in this region, all children have to attend school because it has become compulsory. A Tunisian may now expect to live until 69 years of age and earns on average 1,850 dinars per year.

We all know that these few indicators do not give a full picture of the progress achieved in this country. Nevertheless, they do give us a glimpse of the tangible aspects of its dynamism.

The economic performance of Tunisia has won recognition by international financial institutions. It has gone progressively from an economy dominated by the State to an economy opened up to the world and diversified. It has logged a growth rate of an average of five per cent over the last seven years.

From the political standpoint, Tunisia has now started to go down the path of pluralism. There are seven parties on the political scene now and they all participated in the last legislative elections; five of them are now represented in Parliament.

But as far as our Organization and its mandate are concerned, one of the major contributions our guest of honour has made has been to consider that the human and social dimension constitute a fundamental choice which has to be translated into practice in the daily life of the Tunisian citizen.

I could emphasize here that Tunisia has ratified six of the seven Conventions of the ILO dealing with fundamental human rights which is a clear demonstration of its attachment to the ideals of our Organization.

Responding to the call of President Ben Ali, the workers' and employers' organizations have signed a framework collective bargaining agreement and a protocol agreement governing negotiations concerning wages and working conditions.

I would also like to indicate, because I believe that this is essential, the very great importance attached by the Head of the Tunisian State to the problem of employment, which he considers as being a prerequisite for the dignity of the individual – as well as being the cornerstone of any future development efforts.

Activities undertaken by President Ben Ali nationally have been extended to the international sphere, particularly on the African continent. As the current President of the Organization of African Unity (OAU), he has spared no efforts in making his contribution to the establishment of stability and peace in Africa and the promotion of conditions which are conducive to greater cooperation and integration.

Amongst the words of appreciation addressed to him I would like to pick out those of President Nelson Mandela, who was one of his predecessors as a guest of honour at the ILO, and who said during a recent official visit which he made to South Africa: "The example which you have given over the last year in order to promote the organization, the OAU, on our continent, is a source of inspiration for us all. Your activities have traced out a path which others would do well to follow. I would quote in particular your initiative in order to create a central mechanism for the prevention of conflicts and the same thing can be said of your efforts in order to help the poor in your society. You are not just consigning yourself to professions of faith but you have sent your own citizens in order to help the refugees in Rwanda.”

From the very beginning Tunisia has taken an active part in all phases of Israeli-Arab negotiations which resulted in the establishment of the Palestinian Authority in Gaza and Jericho and the signing of the peace treaty between Israel and Jordan.

Today you are attending the General Conference of the International Labour Organization. It brings together the representatives of governments, workers and employers of 173 nations who have come together in order to work and define preconditions for greater social justice. They are waiting attentively for your message.

I now have the honour, Mr. President of the Conference, to ask you to give the floor to His Excellency, Mr. Zine El Abidine Ben Ali, President of the Tunisian Republic.

Original Arabic: Mr. ZINE EL ABIDINE BEN ALI (President of the Republic of Tunisia) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. Please allow me first to say what a pleasure it is to meet you at this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference to which I have been so cordially invited by Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the International Labour Office. I should like to applaud here the skill and competence with which he is carrying out his important responsibilities.

I should also like to congratulate Mr. Francisco Argüello for the well-deserved confidence that has been shown him in his being elected President of this Session of the International Labour Conference, an expression of the esteem in which his abilities are held. I wish him every success in his task. I also pay tribute here to the heads of delegations and their colleagues who are participating in this important session. Their presence here and in such large numbers proves the attachment of the member countries to the ILO and their adherence to its noble goals.

I also take this opportunity of expressing to the International Labour Organization and to the International Labour Office, my compliments and my respect for persevering so remarkably in their unflinching efforts to deal with the problems of labour in the world and for promoting industrial relations among the social partners, the expansion of businesses and the improvement of labour conditions.

This event follows closely upon the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization which has reason to be proud of the work it has accomplished in promoting labour standards, strengthening social and economic progress in the world and continuously acting to reduce social inequalities.

The fact that this prestigious organization has withstood the numerous upheavals and crises that humanity has faced throughout this century, and the continual advancement it has made, thanks to its tripartite composition, prove that dialogue is the ideal means for strengthening social relations and that forums for dialogue such as that offered by this Organization, are the most suitable and lasting.

Tunisia is proud to make its own contribution to preparing the approaches and programmes for dealing with the problems facing humanity in this time of rapid and far-reaching change in all domains.

I am happy on this occasion to express my great appreciation of the solid and fruitful relations that have linked our country with this Organization ever since our independence. Tunisia has made a real contribution to the Organization's various activities and has honoured all its commitments. It has also strengthened its cooperation with the International Labour Office and has worked to incorporate international labour standards into the country's own legislation.

With determination and persistence, our country has worked to confirm the noble goals that presided over the creation of the ILO, goals that concern the achievement of social development, the realisation of human rights in the broadest sense, and the strengthening of dialogue, understanding and solidarity among all those concerned by labour and production.

The world situation at the end of the century now raises questions in all domains which are of deep import for the international community and for the world's conscience in general. These follow the great upheavals that have, in such a very short space of time, affected political balances and economic relations, and they arise from changes that the various societies are undergoing and from the amazing progress being made in technology both of which have had an impact on all aspects of life, particularly on the world of labour and production.

The question of human development with its social, economic, urban and environmental implications, is at present the greatest challenge facing societies, both developed and developing, though it faces them in different ways and to different degrees of acuteness.

The present session of the International Labour Conference is of particular importance from this standpoint. It follows closely on the World Summit for Social Development and comes only a few months before the Fourth World Conference on Women. Addressing problems of unemployment, exclusion, poverty and social tensions, among others, has become a priority for all, especially considering that their manifestations, particularly in developing countries, are increasingly affected by developments in the new world situation and by the nature of relations governing it.

I cannot, in this connection, fail to pay tribute to your Organization for its continued support of and active contribution to many of the realizations and programmes concerning the definition of international standards, with respect to labour and workers, the establishment of justice and equality of men and women in labour and the strengthening of social action in many regions of the world. In this way it has aided in propagating and confirming universal values which are inherent in human rights and in strengthening concord and economic prosperity.

We, for our part, maintain that the building of a better world during the coming century will require the establishment of international relations founded on the principle of human cooperation and solidarity and respect for the principles and rules that govern international relations. It is our conviction that the existence of poverty, exclusion, unemployment, social tensions and conflicts in any part of the world constitutes a danger for all humanity.

The Tunisia of this new era has defined an approach to its development which is coherent in terms of its civilization, and which is based on a close interdependence of economic and social reforms, and of democracy, development of human rights, considering the individual as both the ultimate beneficiary and the instrument of all real change.

However important the economic reforms undertaken may be, however great the effectiveness of structural adjustments, both will remain inadequate to ensure lasting growth and to guarantee stability, social balance and justice among people so long as they are accompanied by no more than what are called "related social measures".

Experience has shown that such measures have never provided an effective remedy for the negative consequences of economic structural adjustments. The immediate results of adjustment merit, it is true, momentarily obscure these consequences. But they come to the surface once they have themselves become structural in nature, and they are then difficult to address, particularly in an unstable world environment marked by declining international solidarity and cooperation.

In this approach, our viewpoint is that expressed in the final declaration of the Copenhagen Summit, which is to be analysed in depth here by your Conference. We have included among our priorities the establishment in society and business of a climate that will favour sustainable development and the improvement of the quality of life. We have also set up specific policies and programmes orientated towards the poorer categories of the population, designed to facilitate their integration into the circuit of development, and we have updated the texts which strengthen and protect their rights.

Moved by the spirit of solidarity and mutual aid inherent in our civilization and our people, we have created the national solidarity fund through which voluntary contributions made by citizens and businesses are collected. The fund serves to carry out programmes designed to promote regions and areas that are unable to benefit directly from the dynamics of economic reform, so as to raise them to a level enabling their populations to benefit from basic facilities. Through the generosity of our people we are working actively to raise all these regions to a minimum level for a decent existence by the end of this century.

Work is the fundamental condition for the human dimension of the individual, the cement of social cohesion, the essential basis of the individual's dignity and the sine qua non of citizenship. This is why we have put labour in the forefront of our national priorities within an overall strategy that responds to the requirements of economic efficiency. This strategy is based on promoting investment and distributing it rationally among the various sectors and regions; redistributing roles between the public and private sector; promoting the instruments of economic policy; modernizing the production apparatus and giving free rein to private initiative by eliminating the various obstacles lying in its path. In doing this we have invariably considered the promotion of human resources as one of our first priorities. Thus we have introduced basic reforms in the systems of education and vocational training. We have renovated the framework of laws and regulations governing the vocational training sector so as to break with outdated attitudes and to improve relations between the systems of education and training, and we have set up specific programmes to train young people and prepare them to enter the workforce, whether as employees or in independent employment.

The close relationship between the various reforms we have taken, and the resulting policies and programmes, has enabled our country to register positive results in a number of domains that enable us to look to the future with perseverance and optimism. We are working steadily to reform the structures responsible for employment, to revitalize the employment market and modernize its instruments in harmony with the specific nature of each sector, and to reinforce the role of associations by promoting the practice of contracts and partnerships so as to strengthen the role of civil society in this respect, and to establish a balance between the requirements of economic efficiency and social justice.

The importance accorded by Tunisia to human rights in their global dimension and to the value of democracy and concord is the basis upon which we have built social relations in our country. The method we consistently employ here is dialogue, both in society in general and in business. We have involved all social partners in the process of defining our country's important choices, considering consensus and social entente to be the basis upon which the condition of workers and business will develop and improve. We have in this connection prepared favourable conditions for defining the most advanced forms of trade union negotiation between workers' and employers' organizations. At the same time we rationalize the role of the Government, thereby ensuring legislative reform, improvement of working conditions, regular wage increases, the institution of social peace and the establishment of favourable conditions for labour and production.

As an element reflecting the values of our civilization, our decisions, and the respect of international standards with regard to all aspects of labour and production and the rights inherent in them, we have guaranteed the protection of children from economic exploitation, abolished the practice of re-education through labour, introduced mandatory free education up to the age of 16 and adopted, as one of our prime objectives, the affirmation of the child's right to constant protection. We consider children to be the future of the nation and the base for any action to promote human resources.

Similarly, we have guaranteed the protection of women from discrimination in employment and remuneration, and have ensured their full rights with respect to instruction, training, employment and vocational training in full equality with men.

Our country, whose civilization has for thousands of years been characterized by moderation and openness, works unceasingly to implement the human principles that presided over the creation of your Organization, and to promote civilized relations among societies. Tunisia has consistently brought a high sense of responsibility to bear in its efforts, particularly on the Mediterranean and African levels to identify means by which the phenomenon of emigration may be made an economic, social and cultural bridge between North and South.

It is within this framework that we have recommended the establishment of a Euro-Maghreb Charter, concerning the Maghrebi colonies living in the countries of the European Union, to preserve the rights of emigrant workers and safeguard the interests of all concerned. We have also contributed in the context of various regional and United Nations efforts to seeking solutions for the effects of the massive expulsions and forced displacements that have taken place in certain regions of our continent.

We pay tribute to the ILO for the active efforts it is making in its areas of competence to remedy the problems encountered by Palestinian workers on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. At the same time, we take this opportunity to launch an appeal to those countries committed to establishing peace in the Middle East, and particularly the powers sponsoring the process, to give high priority to this social and humanitarian problem. The social and economic consequences of the pressures confronting these workers make them a factor of tension that is threatening the process of peace, security and stability in the region.

On the level of the Maghreb, and in coordination with its partners in the Arab Maghreb Union, our country has worked to establish an academic and economic forum in the region. This effort was given material expression in the 1994 Tunis Declaration, concerning the creation of the Maghreb free-trade zone, planned as the first step in the Maghreb strategy for co-development, the aim of which is to strengthen complementarity among the countries of the Maghreb, to stimulate employment and social development in general in our region.

We have also put problems of human resources, in all their dimensions, among our country's highest priorities in our relations with our international environment. The first illustration of this is the agreement for partnership and co-development which Tunisia is preparing to sign with the European Union, and we shall continue to work for the accomplishment of this same goal as part of the process of cooperation and complementarity between the two shores of the Mediterranean. We hope that the coming Mediterranean Summit of Barcelona will be an important step in its effective implementation.

The international community should give first place among their concerns to the problems from which certain regions of our African continents are suffering and should, through its organizations and institutions, support the African countries in the efforts they are, despite great difficulties, making to overcome this unfavourable situation.

We should like on this occasion to applaud your Organization's constant and remarkable efforts in this respect. Humanity cannot hope to achieve progress, development or stability when terrible suffering besets a vast part of our continent, as well as many other regions of the world. It is totally unrealistic to speak of development in general or of social development in particular in such regions, so long as the international community – and more especially the affluent countries – do not assist them in revitalizing and mobilizing their own potential. Precisely to make it possible to confront such situations we have advocated the definition of a global strategy founded essentially on settling the problem of foreign debt and on finding means by which to guarantee effective cooperation and confirm fruitful partnership and profitable complementarity which will serve the interests of all those concerned and be capable of reducing inequalities among individuals, categories and peoples.

The various international organizations, and more especially the United Nations and its specialized agencies, should help channel assistance from developed to developing countries, notably in Africa to benefit the sectors directly related to the elimination of poverty, exclusion and abandonment and to employment, the creation of small businesses, individual projects, the promotion of sources of income and subsistence for poorer categories and accomplishment of the necessary reforms in the fields of education and vocational training.

Tunisia was recently the venue of the meeting of African workers' trade unions, having previously hosted a meeting of employers' representatives and a symposium of African farmers' organizations. Our country is working steadily and earnestly to confirm the formula of tripartite effort upon which the ILO is founded for the achievement of the noble goals to which we all aspire.

The overwhelming technological progress taking place in the world today has affected all aspects of life; in particular it has affected businesses and the world of labour, modifying forms and concepts of work, the conditions and organization of labour, the legislation governing it and the models of relations existing between the agents of production. It cannot be denied that this is a gain for all humanity and at the same time an essential factor in the accomplishment of universal progress. Under these circumstances the inclusion of technological partnership in international cooperation, particularly that between developed and developing countries, has become an essential factor in compensating for technological imbalance and its potential economic and social consequences, which may otherwise exacerbate the inequalities between these two groups of countries.

Our country has spared no effort to strengthen cooperation with developing countries with a view to seeing that all partners in production participate in dealing with the problems related to economic and social development and of stimulating fruitful cooperation on the regional and international levels.

This is the context of Tunisia's contribution to efforts designed to promote the specialized agencies of the United Nations further, to study further the new role that can be assumed by the various organizations, particularly the ILO, as the next century approaches, and to set up mechanisms for guaranteeing effective follow-up to the decisions and programmes adopted on the international level, and establishing the principles stated in the Agenda for Development and Peace, to confirm the close independence among the many problems facing humanity.

Tunisia reiterates here its commitment to providing active support for all efforts made to reach those noble objectives.

Allow me in conclusion to thank you once again and to express my wishes for the full success of your Conference.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – In concluding this special session, on behalf of the delegates here present, I should like to thank His Excellency, Mr. Ben Ali, the President of Tunisia for his very interesting and substantial statement and refreshing analysis of the world situation. He presented the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference with a precise analysis of the social consequences of adjustment and of the liberalization of the economy and markets.

In 1973 the Secretary-General of the Conference pointed out that one of the young Republic of Tunisia's first moves had been to join the International Labour Organization. This showed then the cordial nature of the relations between Tunisia and our Organization.

The Director-General has stated, as did the President, that Tunisia has ratified 55 Conventions and that 53 of them are still in force. Since he came to power on 7 November 1987, President Ben Ali has presided over a nation which is in the midst of full economic growth and which has achieved an annual growth rate of 5 per cent over the last seven years. For this reason, many of us look with great interest at his country's experience.

Aware of the need to improve workers' protection he explained, in such eloquent terms that I do not need to go over it again, the package of legislative reforms introduced to eliminate occupational hazards. The Government, of which he is the Head, set up the Occupational Safety and Health Institute and the Higher Council for the Prevention of Occupational Hazards. He also informed us that new structures have been introduced and the new national employment agency created in order to reduce unemployment. I was also greatly interested in the part of his statement that referred to the solidarity fund that will help to fight poverty more effectively and create productive and sustained employment opportunities.

It would be very interesting for us to hear, in the near future, the results of this initiative. I would not want to conclude this statement without pointing out that throughout Mr. Ben Ali's term of office he has always defended African and human rights' causes. As Chairman of the Organization of African Unity, he has worked tirelessly for peace and stability in his region. It would appear that he has made the four pillars of peace, development, democracy and protection of human rights a central theme of his government programme. Allow me to express to him and his country my best wishes for prosperity and justice in their efforts to promote the principles he outlined and may I also congratulate him on behalf of my country and this entire Assembly, which governs world social policy, and pass on our hopes that Tunisia will, as it has done in the past, continue to work with our Organization to ensure the success of its work.

SECOND REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We will begin with the second report of the Selection Committee. In addition to the information contained in this report, you will note that Costa Rica will now serve as a titular member of the Standing Orders Committee.

If there are no objections, I shall take it that the report is adopted.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We shall now resume the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Japanese: Mr. HAMAMOTO (Minister of Labour, Japan) – First of all, on behalf of the Government of Japan I would like to express my congratulations to the President on his election to chair this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

At present, in many developing countries problems such as poverty and structural adjustment are becoming increasingly serious, and in the leading industrial nations problems such as sluggish economic growth and structural unemployment are appearing.

In these circumstances, it is becoming increasingly important to place employment as high on the macroeconomic policy agenda as trade and economic and fiscal policy. International cooperation to find solutions to these problems is urgently required. Against this backdrop, the ILO is expected to play an increasingly important role.

At the World Summit for Social Development, in March, under the themes of eradicating poverty, expanding productive employment and promoting social integration, Japan's Prime Minister, Mr. Murayama, who attended the Summit on behalf of Japan, stated that it is essential to promote the development of skills and expand employment; that in official development assistance, Japan emphasizes the fields of education and vocational training; and that the ILO has an important role to play in the follow-up to the Summit.

Entitled Promoting employment, this year's Report by the Director-General emphasizes the need to find ways to solve unemployment and related problems through international cooperation and promote complete and full employment.

In addition, tomorrow an Informal Tripartite Meeting at the Ministerial Level is scheduled to discuss a follow-up to the World Summit. Although there are some constraints, I hope that the ILO will play an active role in this field by making effective use of its budget and system.

I urge the participants in this session of the Conference to engage in earnest discussions about the specific ways in which the ILO can address employment issues in the future. In this regard, I would like to make three points.

First, the establishment of a good industrial relationship is extremely important for the maintenance and creation of employment. Workers and employers have a major role to play in this respect.

Second, we must show proper interest in and strive not only for a quantitative improvement but also a qualitative improvement in employment.

Third, it is especially important for the ILO, while respecting national conditions in member countries as far as possible, to formulate specific and effective measures that are directly related and relevant to employment, such as technical cooperation for human resources development.

I believe it is essential to promote technical cooperation, which is another main pillar of ILO activities. In particular, in addition to the expansion of technical cooperation for the solution of the employment problem, as I have stated, we should make further efforts to promote technical cooperation so as to enhance the application of international labour standards. I believe that it would be extremely useful for the ILO to provide technical assistance to member countries in order effectively to promote the application of international labour standards, especially the important Conventions concerning the basic human rights of working people. We should give consideration to this point when deciding technical cooperation policies.

I would also like to comment on technical cooperation. Looking at actual examples of technical cooperation in the past, cooperation programmes have, in many cases, gone no further than an analysis of the existing situation, or been limited to surveys and policy recommendations.

Speaking from Japan's experience of being involved in technical cooperation programmes, it can be said that cooperation at a practical policy level, such as the implementation of model projects, is more effective than theoretical surveys and research. I believe that this kind of practical cooperation should be emphasised from now on. Japan intends to contribute actively to promote ILO technical cooperation, and emphasize efforts to solve the employment problem and promote the application of international labour standards.

I would also like to touch on standard-setting activities, which are another important pillar of the ILO. Through its standard-setting activities, the ILO has enjoyed considerable success in terms of protecting human rights and improving working conditions. Therefore, I would like to pay high tribute to the successful outcome so far.

In the sense of bringing about the actual realization of international labour standards in member countries, I believe that promotion of ratification is most important. Regarding the review and revision of the existing Conventions, the last meeting of the Governing Body decided to set up a Working Party on Policy regarding the Revision of Standards within the Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards. I believe that such a review and revision should be carried out urgently to facilitate ratification by as many member countries as possible. Japan intends to participate actively in this process. Furthermore, Japan believes that it is important not to rush the process of drawing up Conventions, but to adopt universal and truly important Conventions that cover many industrial sectors and workers, and that take into account the differences in national conditions prevailing in member countries, and are flexible in their content.

Therefore, the Japanese Diet approved ratification of the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156). In response to the problem of balancing working life with family life, Japan legalized a child-care leave system in 1991, and also introduced legislation on a nursing leave system.

The passage of such laws in Japan shows how our country is trying to upgrade its policies, and is proof of our country's interest in international labour standards and of how keen it is to engage in international cooperation. It is a source of great delight and pleasure for me that Japan will deposit the instrument of ratification of this Convention during this session of the Conference.

In concluding my remarks, I should like to finish by expressing my sincere hope that this session will produce fruitful discussions on the basis of the Director General's Report, and also by making it clear once again that Japan intends to cooperate even further to enable the ILO to execute its important duties and to work towards sound development in the future.

Mr. OTERO (Government delegate, United States) – At the very outset I would like to convey my Government's personal congratulations and mine to President Rosales Argüello, Minister of Nicaragua, on his election as President of this Conference, wishing him success in the performance of his responsibilities.

I also offer my congratulations to ILO Director-General Michel Hansenne, for the thought-provoking Report that he has presented to this Conference. It is a forward-looking document which provides a valuable framework for this debate concerning the promotion of employers.

I would like to begin by reaffirming the long-standing commitment of the United States to the ILO's cause and by applauding the Organization's pragmatic efforts to improve conditions of work around the world.

I am proud to report that the Clinton Administration is firmly pledged to pursuing ratification of major ILO Conventions. In January of this year, we ratified the Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150) and we are engaged at the present time in tripartite discussions on the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1988 (No. 111) with a view towards ratification early next year.

At a time when the Clinton Administration is seeking to assure that international trade expansion is accompanied by implementation of core labour standards, the ILO's role becomes increasingly significant. The ILO is the world's premier organization in the setting and monitoring of labour standards. I am pleased to note today that it was an American, Henry M. Robinson, representing the Employers' group at the very first Conference of the ILO, who initiated the idea of making labour proposals in the forms of Recommendations and Conventions.

Clearly the top priority among governments around the globe is employment – the lowering of unemployment and the creation of more new jobs. The major employment questions which are faced by industrialized as well as developing countries alike, concerning increased trade liberalization, technological advances, urbanization and structural adjustment are at the very core of the ILO's mandate.

The Clinton Administration has made the search for first jobs, better jobs and new jobs a top priority for the United States. In the course of this search, there is much that we have learned from the ILO. I believe that there is still more to be gained by us from the ILO's experience. Many times the ILO, working with its tripartite partners, has been able to rise above political difficulties and achieve its goals. But the current challenge to the ILO and all of us must be emphasized. We are trying to cope with an economic transformation as profound as any in economic history.

The core of our economies is shifting from the factory to the computer, from the production of large quantities of identical things to the creation, processing and distribution of information. Global trade and investment are quickening the tempo and enlarging the consequences of this fundamental change.

This has profound social and moral consequences for each of our societies. While some of our citizens are flourishing in this new environment, too many unfortunately are falling behind. Depending on how our societies are organized, those who fall behind are either unemployed for long periods of time and dependent on some form of government assistance, or they are in jobs paying even lower wages and benefits.

The first order of business is to resolve that we will not subject large portions of our populations to this diabolical trade-off. The goal must be to give all of our citizens an opportunity to share in the gains of economic change. We in the United States are proud of our record in creating jobs, but we must also admit that we have a serious issue and problems with continuing decline in wages.

Either condition – persistent joblessness or low and declining incomes – threatens the social fabric of our nations. We fool ourselves if we think that we can simultaneously rip apart social safety nets, allow unfettered flows of capital and trade, and at the same time reassure those who suffer job losses that the resulting growth will more than make up for any temporary losses they experience.

It is in this context that I want to highlight three policy areas which are particularly important for world development and upon which the ILO should base its programmes of assistance.

First, investing in education and skills. The new economy bestows its top rewards on workers adept at identifying and solving new problems. The case for substantial public investment is strong as individuals cannot afford the full cost of education and training. Moreover, education is a "public good" whose benefits extend far beyond the person who obtains it. Nor, in most States, will private firms do as much job training in basic or industry-wide skills as is socially optimal. I note that many advanced economies already provide abundant tax incentives for investment in physical capital, but few allow similar investments in tax incentives for human capital. A re-examination of such priorities is in order.

In our search for solutions, simple changes in our accounting practices would be useful as a first step towards providing correct incentives for human capital formation. Investors tend to focus on fiscal deficits as an indicator of potential macroeconomic imbalances. Indeed, in the United States there are calls for massive cuts in education and training programmes. However, investors would be well advised to make distinctions between types of fiscal expenditure since some expenditures contribute to economic growth, yielding returns that more than offset the cost of borrowing over time.

Both our accounting procedures and our tax codes must be changed to reflect the tremendous social returns of human capital investment – increased productivity and labour force participation.

Secondly, we ought to focus on encouraging enterprise development. Even well-educated and trained workers may not thrive in new economies unless given wide leeway to develop new products and services. This often requires direct access to capital markets (through, for example, small business development banks); the easy creation of intellectual property (through patent, trademark and copyright laws); and protection against the predatory behaviour of large competitors (through, for example, anti-trust laws). In addition, public universities and research centres can all be breeding grounds for new small businesses, particularly if the inventors are given ownership of their inventions.

Which leads me to the third policy area: giving employees a share in the enterprise. Workers can share in the gains of economic growth through compensation systems enabling them to take part of their pay as a share of profits or as a share in productivity improvements. Research shows that when compensation is linked to performance, employees feel a greater stake in the success of the enterprise and thus contribute more. Such compensation systems also enable companies to maintain employment during downturns in business cycles. Public policies can encourage these and other forms of employee ownership.

I am not suggesting this as an exhaustive list. There are other ways in which labour markets can be organized to help all of our people across the great divide from mass production economies to information economies.

I note that in the United States many new jobs have been created in small and medium-sized businesses. I salute the work of the ILO's enterprise development programme. The thrust of the effort has been on the promotion of job creation in the informal sector, micro-enterprises and the development of cooperatives, all of which are alternatives to government job creation.

I cannot close without voicing a word of concern to the ILO and all its member States. Secretary of Labor Robert Reich is not at this Conference only because he is in Washington assisting President Clinton in defending the United States budget from severe reductions by the Congress. One of the areas of contention and criticism, is United States membership in multilateral organizations such as the ILO. I can today reaffirm the Clinton Administration's commitment to a strong ILO as an essential part of the multilateral system for the twenty-first century, and I want to assure you that the United States shares the principles and basic values of this Organization. However, governments are under unprecedented pressure to bring down expenditures including expenditures for international organizations.

The United States cannot vote in favour of the proposed budget only because we cannot in good conscience promise that we will be able to pay the full amount of our assessment for the budget currently under consideration in the Finance Committee. Therefore we have no choice but to work vigorously to reduce the budget within the realistic amount available to us. The ILO, the Conference and the Governing Body have all made great strides in this direction under the strong leadership of the Director-General. We understand that it is difficult to cut spending, but the ILO must continue to adapt to changing times. We are confident that the ILO can do this effectively as it has done in the past with the participation of all of its tripartite constituents in making the tough decisions that must be made.

My best wishes to all of you for a successful 82nd Session of the Conference.

Original French: Mr. KWIA TEK (Government delegate, Poland) – On behalf of the Polish delegation, allow me to extend to the President our cordial congratulations on his election to chair the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. May I also express our hopes that the results of our proceedings will meet the expectations of all the participants at this Session.

Last year, on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the founding of the International Labour Organization, the governments of member States and their social partners took stock of the Organization's work.

We defined the role that the ILO should play on the eve of the twenty-first century, as well as the main directions of our work for the future. It is essential that our common efforts contribute to creating conditions favourable to harmonious and lasting social development. More so than in the past, this should also be the concern of other international organizations which are active in the financial and economic sphere.

The rise in unemployment levels is one of the most serious social economic and political problems that we face at the end of the twentieth century. The struggle against unemployment and its consequences is the main concern of many governments. This is no longer solely a preoccupation of developing countries; it is also a problem for the most affluent. Unemployment was a major theme in the election campaign of Mr. Jacques Chirac, the newly elected President of France, as was job creation.

The problem of productive employment and the struggle against unemployment were also debated at the World Summit for Social Development which took place in Copenhagen. The documents adopted at the end of that Summit, the Declaration and the Programme of Action, emphasized that income should be derived from work as an essential prerequisite for the elimination of poverty and the strengthening of social integration.

The recent report by the Director-General of the International Labour Office, World Employment 1995, is entirely devoted to the promotion of employment. We would like to congratulate the Director-General on having prepared this valuable document, which has aroused keen interest in my country and will in the near future be discussed by the social and political committee of the Government.

In the light of the work done by governments and the initiatives undertaken within many international organizations, there is every reason to state that 1995 quite rightly be remembered as the year of employment promotion and the struggle against unemployment.

We are thus quite happy to announce that in Poland, for the first time in several years, the rate of unemployment has stopped rising. Recently, as compared with May 1994, there has been a decline of 200,000 in the number of unemployed people. We have also noted an increase in the number of jobs available. This, of course, is the result not only of the consistent pursuit of the Government's social policy, but also of a genuine upturn in the economy and a resumption of economic growth. Last year our growth rate was one of the highest in Europe.

Measures to maintain this positive trend which are to be outlined in a new government programme, will call for active collaboration on the part of our social partners.

Making it possible for people to have jobs which bring them a decent income is the main objective of social policy and a criterion by which economic policies are judged. Anyone who fails to promote employment risks weakening or bringing to naught those efforts which are made in favour of a society which offers its people dignity and economic development. It is our common duty not so much to mitigate the symptoms of social problems, as to eliminate their causes. Making various kinds of employment possible is an essential tool for effective economic policy. In this context, the discussion initiated in the course of this session on homework is of particular interest. Thus far, this form of employment has not been sufficiently regulated by international labour standards. No country which is trying to promote employment should be left to its own devices. In the age of economic globalization, to paraphrase an extract from the Declaration of Philadelphia, we may say that unemployment – wherever it persists – is a threat to the welfare of all. We need therefore to rethink the role of international institutions working the commercial, financial and social fields within the United Nations system, so as to help maintain constructive and lasting development in the world economy.

The globalization of the economy and the growth of transnational production can sometimes weaken the effectiveness of instruments traditionally used for employment and collective bargaining. International competition can lead not only to a depreciation of labour standards; there is also the threat of social dumping.

Poland is taking part with great interest in the discussion of this problem in the Governing Body. We hope that the November session of the Governing Body will be able to define the ILO's position on this subject.

In my view, measures taken to prevent the negative effects of globalization must not include the application of sanctions, for example via social clauses.

I am happy to offer my support to the proposal to broaden the scope of the Labour Inspection in Industry Convention, 1947 (No. 81), extending it to the non-commercial services sector. This will make possible more rapid and effective international monitoring of the observance of labour legislation.

I have pleasure in informing you that Poland recently ratified Convention No. 81 as well as the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129).

The Polish Government supports the procedure proposed by the Governing Body pertaining not only to the adoption of new documents, but also to the revision of already existing ones, in order to adapt them to current realities. This activity will strengthen the role of ILO labour standards and particularly those which, although ratified, have only had a limited impact on the situation of workers in the member States. We are in the process of discussing the Programme and Budget of the ILO for 1996-97. In making the appropriate choices, we should not forget the key role played by the ILO in promoting knowledge and disseminating know-how. The International Labour Office has become an enormous data bank which is at the service of all member States. We believe that this field of the Office's activity should be maintained and extended.

The Polish Government will make efforts more effectively to promote social development within the United Nations. Such a need has already been pointed out on a number of occasions, including at the Copenhagen Summit. This Conference should resolutely support this idea, all the more so as this year marks the 50th anniversary of the United Nations of which the International Labour Organization continues to be one of the pillars.

Original Arabic: Mr. KHALIL (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Syrian Arab Republic) – It is for me a very great pleasure, while attending this International Labour Conference, to congratulate the President – on behalf of the Syrian Arab delegation and on my own behalf – on his election. I hope that through dialogue our work will be as successful as possible.

I should like to take this opportunity to say how much the Syrian Arab Republic appreciates its constant cooperation with the ILO, its offices, its committees and officials. This cooperation has always been sincere and fruitful and is continuing to develop. We commit ourselves to trying to attain the Organization's objectives and to applying resolutions, conventions and recommendations adopted at the International Labour Conference; this is in the interest of all the social partners. In our policies, we are giving priority to workers – and indeed this is reflected in the words of our President, Mr. Hafez al-Assad: “We pay tribute to work and workers, we are combating exploitation and those who exploit and we are increasing employment possibilities to bar the way to all those who exploit and other parasites.”

My country, the Syrian Arab Republic, under the leadership of the President of the Republic, Mr. Hafez al-Assad, attaches considerable importance to cooperation between the three social partners to promote global development in all areas of activity; it is setting out, by means of development projects, five-year plans and operational programmes geared to economic and social development, to increase job possibilities both in the public and private sectors.

In this context, we have done everything possible to attain political, social and economic objectives which contribute towards the prosperity of the individual, because we believe that human beings are more important than anything else in life.

I should like to reiterate my thanks to Mr. Hanne, Director-General of the ILO, for having prepared such a praiseworthy report, Promoting employment, in which he discusses globalization and employment and the various trends in developing countries. He also refers to the transition economies, economic growth in the industrialized countries and, in his conclusion, to the challenge of global full employment.

I cannot but agree with the conclusion in the Director-General's Report when he insists on the need to pay more attention to social questions, by making ministers responsible for employment and social affairs participate in economic and political discussions. This would counter the trend which has prevailed for some years now and which focused on political and economic issues at the expense of social problems – although these still threaten progress and social and material prosperity.

At this point I should like to discuss the promotion of employment in our country, where Act No. 91 of 1959 regulates the recruitment of the unemployed through employment offices and advisory committees. These committees participate in the drafting of national policy on employment and vocational training and take account of employment market needs; they also try to create the best working conditions possible.

The movement of reform set in motion by President Hafez al-Assad in 1970 has succeeded in stabilizing the political situation in the Syrian Arab Republic and creating democratic conditions which allow for a wider participation of the population in the economic and social development of the country. We have encouraged political and economic pluralism – thanks to the participation of the three economic sectors, private, mixed and public – opened up to the outside world and struck up close relations with the Arab States and other countries on the basis of mutual respect and common interest.

This movement has also created a favourable climate for Arab and foreign investors as many laws have been adopted on the private and mixed sectors – both Arab and foreign – to try and provide the best possibilities of productive employment and eradicate unemployment.

Consequently, the number of projects regulated by Act No. 10 of 1991 on investment increased to 1,117 in 1994. These projects represent a total cost of $4 billion and will create 83,328 new jobs – of which 42,291 will be in the industrial sector.

Thanks to the wise and courageous policy of President Assad, the Syrian Arab Republic has been able to analyse international issues and events in a rational and objective way, thus proving to the whole world since the beginning of the peace process in Madrid in 1991 that it supports any efforts to bring about fair and global peace. The Syrian Arab Republic is also trying to promote the progress of the peace negotiations because it believes in true peace based on international lawfulness, the application of United Nations Resolutions and the principle of land for peace, and if it has rejected all attempts to circumvent conditions vital for a just and lasting peace, it is only because it is convinced that partial or unilateral solutions will not bring about peace.

In his many speeches and statements, President Assad has asserted that the Syrian Arab Republic will never give away the smallest part of its territory and that it will never accept the infringement of its dignity or territorial integrity; he has also maintained that the principle of land for peace would mean the withdrawal of Israel from the whole of the occupied Syrian Golan, South Lebanon and other occupied Arab territories – including the Arab city of Jerusalem.

Furthermore, the Syrian Arab Republic condemns all terrorist action, irrespective of who carries this out and what their reasons and objectives might be; but we believe that international criteria should be established to distinguish between terrorism and the right of people to throw off the yoke of occupation. The whole world and the United Nations know that the Syrian Arab Republic was the first country to call for an official definition of the term “terrorism” so that the international community could draw a distinction between terrorist action and a fair patriotic war waged by certain peoples – in this particular case the Arab nation – confronted with Israeli occupation, aggression and terrorism.

We call upon the international community to pay heed to these realities and put an end to nuclear armament, which is a threat to peace, security and stability throughout the world, and to oblige Israel to give up this armament and join the Non-Proliferation Treaty; Israel should also accept the inspection of all its nuclear installations which are a threat to the Arab region and the whole world. Indeed, global peace is contingent upon security everywhere; and we must create in our region an area free from all arms likely to cause massive destruction which places the whole world under the threat of a disaster – the scale of which we cannot predict.

In concluding, I pay respect once again to your participation at the work of this Conference and hope that it will adopt positive resolutions and recommendations likely to consolidate the role of the ILO and its social partners, and strengthen cooperation between the members of the international community so that the peoples and nations of the world might benefit from a just, democratic and prosperous society.

Original Spanish: Ms. PIÑEYRÚA (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Uruguay) – On behalf of my delegation and myself, I would like to congratulate the President and the other Officers of the Conference on their election to conduct the work of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish them every success in their work.

We would also like to applaud the topic selected by the Director-General for this year's Report given universality of the problems highlighted in it. We particularly appreciate the depth of the information and analysis contained in the Report, which are the subject of the comments that follow.

We agree in general with the diagnosis of the global situation of employment in the world and in particular with respect to the region to which our country belongs.

We share many of the proposals for creating new jobs. Indeed, our country has been applying policies of this nature. We would like to highlight a point indicated in the document already discussed at the World Social Summit in Copenhagen, namely the still widening gap separating the wealthy from the poor countries.

There is a universal model in the world today which has been promoted in many international fora to be applied in the poor countries, and we can summarize it in four points: tax reforms; opening up borders to trade; state reform; attracting sufficient foreign investment.

It is said that this would lead to a balanced increase in production and exports; it would bring the trade balance into equilibrium and increase employment, among other positive results. In short, it is suggested that it would produce a take-off economic development.

Although this does offer a response to many of the points that were included in the overall diagnosis and which are indeed being applied in many countries successfully, it does raise at least the following questions: what would happen if all countries were to comply strictly with this model? is it really possible for this to be applied by all poor countries? and would these measures not mean that the gap between the rich and the poor would indeed increase still further? We feel that these questions cannot fail to be raised in the design and implementation of employment policies.

We agree that the employment/unemployment variable is very important in drawing up government policies in their country. For Uruguay the 10 per cent unemployment level is just as important as 4.5 per cent in Switzerland, or 24 per cent in Spain. Undoubtedly, each country will have its own emphasis.

It is difficult for the participants of the Conference to agree on whether employment is primarily a matter for social policy, economic policy, or a combination of the two.

The question of employment has economic, social, cultural and psychological dimensions which must all be taken into account, and we feel therefore that it is fundamental that we increasingly involve ministries of education and culture in the design and strategic planning of employment policies.

It is clear that when priority is given to economics then the focus is on the short term and on solutions that will balance the accounts. This cannot be avoided but we need to go beyond day-by-day pressures of and plan for the medium and long term.

Therefore, we need to include the subject of work in education programmes to make young people familiar with the nature and importance of the labour market, convey to them the fundamental value placed on work as a human activity, and on a range of different occupations.

We agree with the need to reform the State in order to make it a more efficient and effective manager, reducing its operating costs and doing justice to tax payers. This may imply that many of the tasks undertaken by the State should be entrusted to private sector management, monitored by state agencies, but that will only be possible once society has reached a level of development sufficient to take on such responsibilities.

There are, however, areas in which the State cannot be replaced by the private sector, and employment is one of these, because in addition to efficiency and efficacy there must be greater justice among all sectors of society. In this case our country has not yet done everything that it should, but it has managed to make people generally aware of the problem, and it is proposing specific actions to solve these problems.

In accordance with the spirit of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), Uruguay has proposed and promoted an active employment policy. The challenge undertaken is to make this a State policy, that is designed and planned strategically so that it will transcend changes of government and be achieved by society as a whole.

We have set up a National Employment Directorate and a tripartite body to advise it and to administer jointly worker retraining programmes for the unemployed.

We are promoting tripartite relations among the social partners – government, employers and workers – as a permanent forum for solving the problems raised by training and employment throughout our country.

Our country like many others has embarked on a process of productive reconversion with its concomitant effects on the labour market, and naturally, we are also faced with the arrival of new technologies that require continual adjustment by our enterprises and among our labour force. We have also embarked on the consolidation of MERCOSUR with our neighbouring countries, and this raises completely new challenges.

In a constructive and tolerant spirit, together with workers and employers, we monitor the characteristics of the labour market and evaluate its various components.

In the design and development of active employment policies we take account of the specific relations with municipal governments believing that we must work together to bring about decentralization of our services supporting all initiatives based on development at the local level.

We support and defend each person's right to productive and freely chosen work. Until a few decades ago, Uruguay was a country receiving immigrants from the rest of the world and during that period there was no lack of work opportunities. But times have changed and we, like everyone else, have a problem of lack of jobs.

We would like to believe that full employment is a feasible project for all our peoples. However, it seems that in the current global context, with the exception of some countries that have comparative advantages, this may not be possible.

We have adopted various economic and political measures that would promote economic changes to produce more tangible results than those obtained up until now. But the trade realities are not those promoted by the Uruguay Round: rather, protectionism continues to be the rule among the developed countries.

We are members of the regional trade bloc MERCOSUR, which is moving ahead, albeit slowly, in the agreed direction; we have brought about a fiscal adjustment which has reduced the fiscal deficit; we have encouraged production and investment; we are gradually reforming the State and results are encouraging in some areas.

We have also planned a "safety net" to mitigate the effects of the reconversion arising from new technologies and from our membership of MERCOSUR. Among other initiatives, let me point out the following: design and implementation of a four-year programme entitled "Strengthen the Social Area" with the support of the IDB; a cooperation agreement signed with those countries in order to promote "Dual Training" and to promote worker training through the "Labour University"; a major structural reform in the education system; a worker retraining programme and a reconversion fund to retrain the unemployed; a programme to promote youth employment.

The unemployment rate in Uruguay has changed very little in recent years, despite structural changes that are taking place in our economy, which means that while some jobs are being lost others are being created. It also indicates that the measures adopted as a "safety net" have begun to function relatively well.

In seeking ways of establishing new jobs, we have studied what is being done by other countries and concluded that it would be politically irresponsible to fail to ignore the social costs and cultural alienation that would result from certain development models.

Let us conclude by reaffirming that the ILO has a very important role to play in this area and needs to have a thoroughgoing analysis of possible incompatibilities between their standards and the commitments that underdeveloped countries quite often have to make with international financial agencies, whose effect is harmful to economic and social balances and which have a direct impact on employment.

Original Macedonian: Mr. SABRIU (Minister of Labour and Social Policy, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia) – I am very pleased to take the floor in the name of the Republic of Macedonia and I hope the work of this Session of the International Labour Conference will progress successfully.

The problems relating to labour, unemployment and social protection that are prevalent in many countries, but particularly in countries undergoing transition, like the Republic of Macedonia, are very topical at present.

There have been major changes in recent years to our political and economic systems. In the Republic of Macedonia, as a sovereign, independent, democratic and social country, we have undertaken the processes of transition to a market economy, privatization and the restructuring of enterprises.

The process of transformation of the political, economic and social systems is being undertaken in extremely unfavourable and constraining conditions. Almost all the traditional economic and technological links which were very strong before the dissolution of the former Yugoslavia have now been cut; the international community has imposed an embargo on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; Greece has blockaded our southern border. All of this has led to the loss of traditional markets, the imbalance of the market, of finances and prices, a fall in industrial output, and in the national product and declining living standards for our people.

This trend towards stagnation and declining production, the ceasing of investments, the closing down of unprofitable enterprises and the increase of technical and structural unemployment means a continuing decline in demand on the labour market and a constant increase in the number of people unemployed. Thus towards the end of last year there was a 6.6 per cent fall in the number of people employed compared with 1993, while the number of unemployed people is rising continuously and has now reached 30 per cent.

In this connection, it should be borne in mind that during 1995, 16,000 people will remain without work as a result of the restructuring of enterprises, which will further exacerbate an already difficult situation.

Typical of this situation is that of the total number of unemployed persons, the percentage of those who are seeking work for the first time is very high (79 per cent), of these 60 per cent are young people under the age of 30 and 48 per cent are trained managerial staff; 66 per cent of job-seekers have to wait between three and six years to find employment.

The Republic of Macedonia, in its Constitution is defined as a social State, and within the financial possibilities of the budget and the economy, we are trying hard to provide the minimum living level for the unemployed. In conditions of rising unemployment the decline in the number of employed persons reduces the funds available for financing unemployment.

In 1994 and this year wages are limited by law and there is a considerable real fall which is limiting consumption. It should be emphasized that the percentage of persons receiving their wages on an irregular basis, sometimes two or three months late, is also high.

This situation means that the number of people needing social assistance in order to survive, or remain above the poverty line, is constantly rising.

Given this situation, my Government has for some years now been preparing social programmes, financed from the state budget, which, in accordance with fair criteria and procedures, seek to provide financial support to all families in need of social protection.

The Republic of Macedonia, as a democratic and social country, within the limits of its financial possibilities, is striving to provide a minimum social income for all its citizens.

Because of the unfavourable circumstances I have mentioned, the number of families receiving social assistance is constantly rising. About 60,000 families are now receiving such assistance and this represents 1.6 per cent of the national product.

We are aware of the complexity of the situation facing us in the Republic of Macedonia. However, we have set our course for development and we are making every effort to reach our aim of a country that will grant its people a democratic, stable and social environment.

What we now have to do is to overcome our current problems caused by the process of transition to a democratic society and a market economy. In doing so we need the understanding of others, and also financial assistance from the more developed wealthier countries. This is not an isolated process in Macedonia, but is part of a larger, more general process which can have positive or negative repercussions on regional, European or global matters.

In our present and future meetings, as a European country, I hope that we shall be able to contribute to the drawing up of documents, the attainment of objectives and to the development of cooperation with the International Labour Organization.

I am sure that, with the collaboration of the ILO, we shall be able to make a real contribution to the drafting of the documents and the resolution of the problems we are concerned with here.

(The Conference adjourned at 11.15 a.m.)

Seventh sitting

Thursday, 8 June 1995, 12.10 p.m.

President: Mr. Rosales Argüello

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We will now resume our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Russian: Mr. MELIKIAN (Minister of Labour, Russian Federation) – May I first of all congratulate the President on his election to this high office and wish him all success in guiding the proceedings of our Conference.

The principal theme of this session of the Conference, the problem of unemployment, as we all know, is not a new one. Nevertheless, it is extremely topical and it is very important to define the main lines of the ILO's activity in this area, as the world is undergoing a dynamic process of socio-economic transformation.

The Director-General's Report, in our view, offers a detailed analysis of current problems in the field of employment, be it generally relating to most countries of the international community or specifically to individual states. Of course, we are particularly interested in what he had to say about the transition countries which are undertaking profound reforms of their entire system of social relations.

In Russia, the cost of the initial stage of the reforms has been very high – much higher than expected – for a number of objective and subjective reasons. Over the past four years there has been a considerable decline in the level of industrial production as well as a fall in the real income of the population.

At the same time, there is today reason to believe that there have recently been some positive changes in the economy. The drop in production has virtually ended. In May of this year there was a two per cent increase in the gross domestic product. In various sectors, including metallurgy, the chemical industry, the petrochemical industry, and in a number of machine building sectors, production has definitely started to pick up.

As a result of strict control over the state deficit, inflation has fallen. The national currency is gradually being stabilized.

There has been a radical improvement of the situation in the consumer market. Shortages are becoming a thing of the past.

However, as regards the levels of the population's income, wages, pensions, benefits and various other social guarantees, as well as the problem of employment, the situation remains very difficult, although it must be seen against the background of general economic and financial stabilization. Indeed, some social problems have even become worse.

The real incomes of the majority of our population at this time are only about 70 per cent of the pre-reform level. At the same time, we see widening disparities among different population groups as concerns incomes and living standards.

With income levels generally low, these widening disparities have led to a situation where about 30 per cent of the population are now living below the poverty line. That is to say their incomes do not even reach subsistence level.

The ranks of the poor now include not only traditionally weak groups with only limited access to employment, but also a considerable number of healthy and trained citizens who have work, but who are not receiving adequate remuneration for that work. About 25 per cent of workers receive wages which place them below the poverty line.

Overcoming mass poverty and curbing the growing differentiation in incomes is now one of the most important tasks of social policy in Russia. We are drawing up a series of measures aimed at increasing the State's influence on income levels. We are also trying to improve the system of taxation.

Against the background of these problems, the unemployment situation is extremely unusual in our country. The problem of unemployment has traditionally been of topical concern for most countries, but this problem was not so serious in Russia until last year. By and large, we have had a fairly high level of employment of the active population. Even now the number of people officially registered as being unemployed with the employment service is less than 3 per cent of the economically active population, although if the figures are calculated according to the ILO's methodology, then about 7.5 or 8 per cent of the able-bodied population could be classified as unemployed.

We are well aware that in the near future, for a number of objective reasons, the problem of employment is going to come to the fore, and not only for individual regions, as is the case today, but for the country at large. For this reason, we are already now paying ever greater attention to this problem.

The decline in production levels which has taken place in recent years has not been accompanied by corresponding dismissals of workers. As a result in many sectors and spheres of activity considerable surplus manpower has been building up for some time. Even now, with the imminent resumption of economic growth, it is still not going to be possible to provide work for everyone. With the market now saturated with goods and services and competition on the rise, companies are going to be forced to take measures to cut costs and raise productivity. This will consequently lead them to reduce the surplus manpower which is now present in many enterprises. The tight monetary policy, which is quite necessary if we are to combat inflation and to balance our budget, will only accelerate this process.

Already today in a number of sectors and regions, hidden unemployment has become a considerable problem. The number of persons who are obliged to work part time or who are placed on unpaid or only partially paid leave is about 5 million people, or 6.5 per cent of the economically active population of the country.

In recent years, the problem of unemployment has been somewhat mitigated by the transfer of some of the working population into the so-called informal sector – this includes activities as street hawkers, work in petty services, and acting as middlemen in trade. However, there is now considerably less room for the expansion of informal employment.

Given the social and political situation that has arisen in Russia, any sharp increase in unemployment will be socially dangerous. Our policy, therefore, is to be as flexible and as cautious as possible, and to make full use of all available opportunities to influence the labour market in a reasonable way.

Various measures are planned, not only for the social protection of the unemployed, but also to revive and update our employment policy. These measures will be directed towards effectively maintaining posts and management potential, creating new jobs in sectors and industries with good prospects, and encouraging self-employment.

The policy is also intended to help provide state support for the transfer of workers from loss-making industries to other, more effective ones, with prior professional retraining.

In order to mitigate the unemployment situation in regions facing serious problems, there are also plans to launch a broad range of public works projects, to encourage companies to adopt flexible employment policies and, as a last resort, to make use of administrative measures, even including the imposition of an administrative suspension of dismissals or an administrative order to dismissals to take place gradually.

As you can see, much of what we are planning to do coincides with the recommendations made by the Director-General in his Report. We believe the discussion of this Report at the present session of the Conference and the analysis of national experience will be useful in this respect.

Russia is developing effective cooperation with the International Labour Organization in the field of employment and the improvement of national labour legislation. A new and important element of this cooperation is the ILO's participation in the solution of a number of regional labour market problems in our country. Thus, we have already started to implement a project to restructure the textile industry in Ivanovskaya Oblast. We are now examining the possibility of assisting a number of other regions of the country to tackle the problems of employment. With the assistance of the ILO, we are introducing a modular training system in Moscow and St. Petersburg.

In conclusion, I would like to emphasize that we fully concur with the conclusion in the Director-General's Report that the international community must take all possible measures to solve the problems of employment which have become global in nature.

We must have a realistic programme of action, both nationally and internationally, and the Russian Federation is prepared to make its contribution to organizing effective international cooperation in this area of the ILO's work.

Original German: Mr. BLÜM (Federal Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Germany) – The world is in the midst of a period of change, and this is something we can all appreciate. World history really is in search of a new current. History has always progressed in surges and never in a smooth flow. We are now facing a giant leap forward.

A characteristic feature of this state of transition is globalization. The world is growing smaller. Communications networks are now enveloping the globe. In a split second, we can know what is happening on the other side of the world. For the first time in the history of mankind everyone is living in the present. Previously, the information you receive from a far-away country was already history by the time it reached you. For the first time in history, we are all living in the same time zone.

The world's major problems cannot be given a solely national solution. In fact, we no longer really have a national economy in the conventional sense of the term. We have financial flows, monetary flows which long ago became global. The global economy has changed and politicians need to adapt accordingly. Environmental protection and the hole in the ozone layer – these are national problems that can be dealt with at a national level. And if you look down at the earth from the moon – something we can actually do for the first time – the earth looks like a spaceship. But spaceship earth has but a single crew. If a leak occurs, everyone will suffer. There can be no individual, national rescue plan.

Wealth and poverty affect everybody. It is unimaginable that one person's gain, one person's profit shall be made at the expense of another. What type of profit is it, if it is made on the back of other people's poverty? If the gulf between the rich and the poor is not done away with or bridged, there is no way that peace on earth can be guaranteed. If the bomb of hunger explodes, the consequences will be more disastrous than the destruction caused by any atomic bomb known to us.

The diagnosis of the situation is a good one but what we now need to do is to decide the type of treatment to be given. For me, the ILO represents one of the approaches we can adopt to deal with this changing world. In this new situation of change, it is not just States that have to cooperate with each other. There may be some who will not like to hear this – but it must be said: this world of nation States is being transformed into a world of societies. Societies and groups of people must work together, and I know of no other organization in the world like the ILO in which the same symbiosis between States, governments, workers and employers has been institutionalized as it has in this organization. It just doesn't exist elsewhere. We have here the pioneers of a new form of development, the development of inner policies.

I therefore appeal to all States and to all governments to support the ILO in the work it is doing.

There is no denying that the world's major problems are ones which affect us all. Sustainable world peace can only be based on social justice. This is one of the main principles of the ILO – 76 years old and still young at heart. There can be no justice if every individual does not have the right to employment. No matter how enormous the allowances and unemployment benefits that are distributed, we cannot put aside this right to employment – the right to work with one's own hands and earn one's own living is thrice more important than just receiving hand-outs. This is something that everyone has the right to.

But so much is wrong in the world we live in. There are 800 million adults capable of working who are in fact unemployed or underemployed. Eight million adults! At the same time, 200 million children are being forced to work. The world is all upside down. Children are being forced to go out to work whilst their parents are out of work. This is the world really standing on its head. I see child labour as a vicious circle of exploitation and one we must put a stop to. We all have to work on this together. The vicious circle is that because children are being forced to go out to work, they cannot go to school. Because they don't go to school, when they grow up they will be unemployed, and because they are unemployed, their children have to be sent out to work. This is how exploitation has continued throughout the course of history, and it is for us to put a stop to it. There are places where children are sold to pay off the debts of their parents – a leftover from the old world of slavery. We all thought that we had done away with the horrors of slavery. But we have not. Millions of children are being held in slavery and – bought and sold. Does this not shame us! This is a social shame of civilized mankind. Perhaps what should be done is to appeal to the consumer. Is not the consumer King? I appeal to consumers throughout the world to boycott any product that bears the stain of a child's blood. I appeal to them not to buy goods that have been produced using forced child labour. You cannot allow anybody to gain a competitive edge by exploiting child labour. This cannot be the basis of a humane world economy.

We have all done a great deal to protect the environment. In my own country, people would be ashamed to wear jewellery made from ivory because they know that for ivory to be traded, elephants have to be slaughtered. But what we do for the environment we must do ten times over for the good of mankind. Nobody should tolerate child labour and goods produced using it. We must overcome our indifference. Children do not have strong organizations to defend their rights. Children do not have a strong voice. Children do not have the power to protest. But the world reacts only in response to large pressure groups. We have to do something about this. The ILO must do something about this. Injustice has always a human face behind it. We need to beware of living in a field of abstractions and not descend into a cloud cuckoo land of hollow slogans. We have to advance one step at a time. We have to point the finger of accusation at every perpetrator of injustice. Each one has a face, a name and an address. This is a large and esteemed organization which is in the vanguard of social progress.

I believe that national economies have no future. State-planned economies have proved that they are not the model for future development. Neither do I believe that capitalism holds the answer of the future. An unfettered, beggar-your-neighbour economy has just as little future as a planned economy. The world is in search of a new model which will bring together economic progress and social progress – which brings together competition and social justice. You cannot do this without free trade unions. You cannot do this without responsible employers.

We are living in testing times. After all the mistakes made by planned economies, all the mistakes made by capitalism, can we establish some kind of order in which justice and prosperity are available to all, not just to the upper strata of society, but to all people on an equal footing.

Original French: Mr. BARROT (Minister of Labour, Social Dialogue and Participation, France) – It is most fortunate that, for his first international mission, the Labour Minister of the new French Government is able to come to Geneva and attend the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I regard this as a privileged opportunity for meetings and contacts, but also an opportunity to place the problems of my own country in their historical and international context.

Here in this historic hall, Mr. President, we can see how far we have travelled since 1919 on the ruins left by the First World War. Since that time, despite so much suffering and so many reverses and wars, a prodigious process of economic development has led to the emergence of our present world, at once so varied and open.

Today we should be living in a privileged age. The end of the blocs and of ideological conflicts and also the successful conclusion of the Uruguay Round of trade negotiations have brought the free flow of trade and with it a general increase in wealth. And yet, as is so eloquently stated in the Director-General's Report, our world is not in good shape. It is beset by the scourge of unemployment and by its tragic consequences which can be so prejudicial even to peace itself.

Employment: the number one priority of the international community. That is the forceful message of the Report presented to this Conference. The French Government, which has placed the fight against unemployment and the effort to create new jobs at the centre of its action, can but welcome that determination.

Employment today is not just a right; it is a categorical imperative. It is not only an individual right, it is also a collective duty. Everyone in some sense has an interest in others also being employed.

This priority is also in accordance with the conclusions of the European Council meeting held in Essen in December 1994. The European Union too has emphasized dialogue between the social partners and the political world, in which each partner must shoulder its respective responsibilities. That is why President Jacques Chirac and Prime Minister Alain Juppé wanted the French Minister of Labour also to be known as the Minister of Social Dialogue. The European Social Conference held in March in Paris at the initiative of French Presidency on the subject of job creation pointed to a number of convergent approaches as to methods and objectives.

To methods first of all. For a long period it must be said that collective bargaining has not given as much attention as it might have to employment. The Government to which I belong therefore wishes to give particular attention to discussions among the social partners on this particular subject. Beyond measures which are the responsibility of the Government, or initiatives which must be taken by management, the fight against unemployment requires the mobilization of the social partners so that the organization of work and resource management become more concerned with employment.

Now to the objectives. "Wanting employment" means acting in accordance with certain priorities, and in parallel in certain directions.

I will mention first of all the reduction of indirect labour costs, that is to say the costs of social and fiscal levies in the total wage bill. For companies work can sometimes cost too much, and one can easily see the risks which this brings about in a reduction of demand by the systematic recourse to automation instead of human work. This reduction in indirect labour costs has already been the subject of some initial measures and the French Government is now preparing further measures in the same direction.

Secondly, at the level of enterprise organization, improved management of working hours and in particular more use of part-time work or graduated early retirement. Here we must try to achieve if not a coincidence then at least a better balance between the aspirations of the needs of companies and the aspirations of the wage-earners. It is not always easy, but it is possible and the social partners have a central role to play in achieving it.

Finally, wanting jobs means encouraging new job-creating activities such as support services to save the daily lives of the elderly and of families, to support education, the environment and neighbourhoods. We are nevertheless creating fewer jobs than we need and we must therefore seek in an imaginative way to make of these new jobs a viable proposition.

I welcome the initiatives of our Organization in order to further strengthen the ILO's contribution to the elaboration of employment policy. The regular publication of a World Employment Report forms part of this effort. It will fill a gap which was already noted at the Copenhagen summit. The report will give us a better idea of the strategies adopted in various countries to promote employment. No one can doubt that these comparisons will enable us to have a more fruitful discussion in the ILO.

I also very much hope that we shall not lose sight of the prospects of organizing a second high-level meeting on employment and structural adjustment. If an item to this effect could be placed on the agenda for the 1996 Conference that would be a step in the right direction.

Alongside the ILO's role in the field of employment, the World Social Development Summit also pointed to the fundamental rights of workers. The French Government very much welcomes the fact that this dimension of human rights was also formally recognized by the Summit.

In this regard the ILO Conventions corresponding to those rights require the highest priority in the work of the organization. Emphasis must constantly be placed on securing the widest possible ratification of those instruments by member States and of course to ensure that they are applied in practice. The Director-General recently wrote to all governments to this effect and we hope that his letter will meet with a particularly positive response. We also would wish that the Governing Body would endorse that appeal by giving priority to those standards. My Government continues to believe that the standards in question must constitute the necessary social dimension which should accompany the liberalization of international trade.

Among these fundamental rights, allow me to say a particular word about child labour. Mr. Blum has just made such an eloquent appeal on the subject that I can only add just a few remarks along the same lines. The Conference of Labour Ministers of Non-Aligned Countries held in Delhi in January of this year highlighted the dual consequence of child labour – its dual aspect, its atrocious moral character, and the fact that it places a severe burden on future generations.

The ILO must work to combat this scourge, which is a particularly cruel form of forced labour. Governments must be persuaded to apply existing legislation. France, for her part, intends to participate fully in the International Programme for the Eradication of Child Labour.

The Governing Body will be examining this subject at its autumn session. We believe that the Governing Body should take steps to draw up formal standards on the subject because, by contrast with other fundamental rights, as enumerated by the Copenhagen Summit, child labour is not the subject of any sufficiently general instrument with sufficiently clear provisions such as could attract widespread support. The Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), which has not been widely ratified, could be supplemented or revised to this effect.

It seems to me to be highly desirable that the Working Group which is to take up the revision of standards should be given the broadest possible mandate to go beyond the purely technical aspects of this question.

This could strengthen one of the Organization's essential means of action. After all, the ILO's role, once again reasserted in Copenhagen, is to bring together governments, trade unions and employers' organizations and to guide labour relations and employment policy towards a pattern of development in which human beings will have their rightful place.

The ILO, on the eve of the second millennium, unquestionably has a major role to play in humanizing the economy and you may rest assured that France, with her wealth of social traditions, intends to play a full part therein.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – I shall now give the floor to Mr. Tirumurti, Government adviser of India, who is exercising his right of reply to a statement made by Mr. Lasi, the Minister of Labour of Pakistan, on Wednesday, 7 June 1995, in the morning.

Mr. TIRUMURTI (Government adviser, India) – My delegation takes the floor to set the record straight in regard to the baseless charges made against my country by the delegate of Pakistan.

Jammu and Kashmir is an integral part of India and the reference made by him to it is a blatant and unwarranted interference in the internal affairs of my country and the suggestion of contravention of ILO Conventions is mischievous.

The present disturbed conditions in Kashmir are the result of Pakistan's support for terrorism. It is well documented that terrorists, armed, trained and sustained by Pakistan have been unleashed in Jammu and Kashmir. This gives the lie to Pakistan's famed concern for conditions of workers in Jammu and Kashmir. If indeed its concerns were genuine, then why has Pakistan supported terrorists and torturing and killing hundreds of innocent civilians in Jammu and Kashmir, in seeking to destroy the very fabric of democracy in the area.

Pakistan's concerns about the economic conditions of workers in Jammu and Kashmir rings hollow in the face of the enormous resources spent by India on developments in the area, and Pakistan's stepmotherly treatment of the area of Jammu and Kashmir under its illegal occupation. This is borne out by the fact that while in the Indian State of Jammu and Kashmir the economy has been industrialized and diversified and every single village has access to electricity and clean drinking-water, Pakistan-occupied-Kashmir's economy remains stagnant and backward, hardly any better than it was half a century ago with less than a third of the population having access to electricity and clean drinking-water.

Pakistan appears to have got into this bad habit of raising Kashmir at each and every international forum where it has no relevance. I think they need to be told to desist from such a Pavlovian response, which only leads to the waste of valuable time.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) – We will commence the afternoon with the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-KHALIFA (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Bahrain) – In the name of God the merciful, the compassionate! It is my pleasure and privilege to head the delegation of my country, Bahrain, at this significant international gathering, the International Labour Conference.

I am also pleased to extend to the President our warmest congratulations on the trust that has been placed in him by all the participants at this Conference when he was elected President of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. We wish him every success.

I am also pleased to extend our deep appreciation and thanks to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for the sincere efforts he has made in preparing his Report and for his successful choice of subject matter. The Report is characterized by scientific methodology, an integrated viewpoint and thorough coverage.

I am pleased that the subject of the Director-General's Report this year is how to promote employment. Certainly the selection of this topic is indicative of various trends and emphasizes the fact that the promotion of employment is no longer just a buzzword bandied around at international conferences and in international circles. Rather it has become an international, vital and pressing demand.

The selection of such a topic shows the firm belief of the International Labour Organization in making full employment a global priority objective of our socio-economic policies and in providing secure and sustained employment that will enable all people, both men and women, to earn their living through productive work.

You may agree with me that changes in the world's economy over the past few decades, particularly the change in the structure of production and the fall in growth rates, production and wages, have had a major impact on the rate of employment which, in turn, has led to serious problems, not least of which is unemployment. This crisis is now facing labour and economic policy-makers throughout the world. It has become a serious challenge to development efforts in many countries.

In his Report, the Director-General has identified the phenomena and reasons that have led to increased unemployment rates throughout the world. He has also explained the framework of employment policies and the link with economic growth and labour market policies.

We believe that to minimize unemployment we will have to increase production, create more jobs, raise investment rates, improve basic infrastructures, plough productive energies into new activities, and establish a stable economic atmosphere and efficient markets. We will also need to set up new, effective organizations, improve economic regulations to attract more direct foreign investment, and establish proper channels between education and training labour market requirements.

The development and promotion of employment will require proper training for the labour force, increased efficiency and improved and varied skills that are compatible with the new industries that are trying to occupy a prime position in the world economy.

It is no longer possible at the present time to talk about socio-economic development without linkage to manpower, nor is it possible to create productive manpower without the basic requirements of training, skills and efficiency.

The International Labour Organization is currently required to mobilize procedures and establish mechanisms at both the national and international levels to improve the employment situation in the world and renew commitment to full employment. It is also required to find a corporate framework for international cooperation with the aim of attaining optimum solutions for the pressing problems of unemployment and related social issues.

We are confident that, with the tremendous resources it possesses, the International Labour Organization is capable of participating in measures and activities to ensure progress and help us achieve our socio-economic objectives. The ILO is qualified to fulfil the ambitions of the various nations of the world.

In conclusion, it is worth emphasizing that changes in the world make it necessary for us to look more carefully towards the future and move without delay to the development and implementation of appropriate policies to tackle the problems of unemployment, to promote employment, and to transform such policies into practical plans and programmes which aim to create well-trained professional staff who are capable of utilizing their innovative abilities in work and production.

Mr. SISOU LITH (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Lao People's Democratic Republic) – On behalf of the delegation of the Lao People's Democratic Republic, I wish to congratulate the President on his election; I am convinced that with his competence and vast experience this Conference will most certainly be very successful.

I also wish to express my congratulations for the Report presented by the Director-General which contains important aspects and a wealth of information and emphasis on the promotion of employment, which constitute a common issue in the world.

The contents of the Director-General's Report indicate that unemployment does not pertain to the fact that a country is developed, developing or underdeveloped, but is related to the characteristics of each country's economic development process. In addition, this issue is also dependent on a State's calculation of and balance between economic and social development, between human resource development and industrial modernization. Moreover, it is also related to the disposition of sectors in line with the use of a country's labour force.

I agree with the Report that the threat to social stability originates from unemployment, as unemployment will occur at any time and place in the conditions of a market-oriented economy.

The growth of the world economy, the development of modern production in addition to the competition prevailing in market-oriented economies has not allowed the simultaneous development of the labour force. At present, various countries are all endeavouring to modernize and upgrade production and establish conditions for rapid economic growth. This process is accompanied by the failure of ineffective operations, followed by unemployment.

However, developed countries usually have the advantage of substantial social welfare funds to alleviate unemployment problems. But the potential of underdeveloped or developing countries is labour intensity, namely in the sectors of light industry, handicrafts, agriculture and services which help to absorb unemployment.

The Lao People's Democratic Republic is presently in a period of firm conversion to a market-oriented economy. The Lao Government is endeavouring to further promote foreign investment, and has outlined focal economic development plans with a view to keeping economic growth at the same pace as human resource development, and therefore ensuring social stability.

At present, urban unemployment in the Lao People's Democratic Republic totals 3.2 per cent due to lack of skills. In addition to unemployment, the Lao People's Democratic Republic is also faced with the issue of underemployment. Therefore, the Government is obliged to adjust labour importation to the development of local labour skills.

Promotion of employment is paid much more attention by the Government in the national socio-economic development plan to the year 2000.

Based on a policy of firm restructuring and promotion of foreign investment, economic sectors have known rapid growth and have made use of increased labour in new sectors which has helped to create new employment for the population.

In addition, the Government's attention is directed toward rural development to provide disadvantaged groups with opportunities to increase their income and to encourage self-assistance through continuous and focal small and medium-scale projects with the objective of progressively reducing the difference between urban and rural areas and labour migration to new urban areas.

My Government emphasizes the development of labour skills, which is part of the human resource development plan. The various forms that labour skills development could take include the establishment of vocational training centres, the creation of conditions for Lao workers to work jointly with foreign workers in view of their replacement in the large projects taking shape or to take shape, in order to limit unemployment and ensure continued social stability.

The Government of the Lao PDR is endeavouring to efficiently apply the basic ILO principles and has closely coordinated with the regional ILO office. It has received useful assistance and support from the ILO. Any assistance and support from international organizations and friendly countries for labour development and the promotion of employment in the Lao PDR is beneficial to my country's socio-economic development.

I wish to take this opportunity to express my warm thanks and best wishes for the success of the Conference.

Original Portuguese: Mr. ALMEIDA PAIVA (Minister of State of Labour, Brazil) – It is for me and for my country a great privilege to be a participant of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. On my behalf and that of my Government, I congratulate Mr. Francisco Rosales Argüello for his election as President of this Conference. Let me also praise the United Nations organization on the occasion of its 50th anniversary. My country is proud to be a member of an institution which has provided invaluable contributions to the well-being of mankind and world peace.

Let me state that Brazil regards the sustained growth of employment as an important goal on its development agenda. However, in order to achieve such an objective my country needs to maintain price stability. We have made much progress towards stabilization since 1994 when the real plan was initiated. We believe that unless inflation is brought under definite control, economic expansion and employment generation will be short-lived. Thus my Government is proposing to the National Congress a set of reforms whose aim is greater efficiency of the economy and a balanced budget.

However, we are not only concerned with economic prosperity, but also with social justice. As the text presented by the Brazilian delegation to the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen states, Brazil faces enormous challenges on the social front. Poverty and inequality and the lack of appropriate standards in health education, sanitation, housing and nutrition demand from the Government and society at large a series of urgent actions. We have already established partnerships with local governments, NGOs and the private sector to address these issues. Furthermore, we are aware of how closely some of these social maladies are interconnected with labour market results, particularly in terms of the level of earnings and the quality of employment.

Brazilian labour markets are facing the following major problems. First of all, labour productivity is rising fast and is well above the growth level of real wages. Secondly, a few good jobs are being created at the expense of a large number of poor quality ones, particularly among unprotected wage-earners and the self-employed. In fact, the share of protected-wage employment declined from almost 60 per cent in 1990 to under 50 per cent in 1994, whereas the share of unprotected-wage employment and of the self-employed increased respectively from 17 to 24 per cent and from 17.5 to 22 per cent over the same period. Thirdly, there is an urgent need to improve the professional education of the labour force so as to increase its skills in order to gain access to better quality jobs.

Finally, in the urban informal sector and rural areas, particularly in the less-developed regions of the country, there are labour market mechanisms and structural traits of the production process which are intertwined with poverty.

These problems generate four gaps. One lies in the differential between productivity and real wage growth, leading to a decline in the share of labour in the national income. The second gap increases the cleavage between the workers holding jobs in the modern sector and the majority of labourers who are located on its periphery. The third gap is between the type of job being offered by modern competitive firms and the average professional education of the jobseeker, generating a mismatch between supply and demand and therefore structural unemployment. Finally, pre-market or market-generating poverty increases the gap between the destitute and the middle and upper-income groups, worsening income distribution.

In order to reverse such trends, Brazil needs to be successful in its development strategy which has as its main pillars the maintenance of macroeconomic stability, high rates of savings and investment, an increasing openness to world trade, attracting foreign direct investment, the privatization of state enterprises, growing investment in human capital and a steady programme to fight poverty and reduce inequality. We intend to achieve a successful integration into the global economy.

Let me now discuss some issues related to the impact of globalization on economic growth and employment. As stated in the ILO report World Employment 1995, globalization has triumphed but also has brought about some undesirable consequences. On the one hand, it has created new economic opportunities and has increased the chances that living standards will be raised. On the other hand, it has weakened the ability of States to manage their economies. President Fernando Henrique Cardoso has called the attention of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank to the need to set up controls to avoid or minimize such troublesome outcomes. I am restating such a concern to this audience.

Another distressing consequence of globalization concerns the erosion of labour standards in the face of trade liberalization. We should not allow competitive pressures to erode the quality of employment. Brazil is committed to improving labour standards. We will not fail to enact measures to protect the well-being of workers, and we shall not tolerate violations of workers' rights.

We now turn to the issues of forced and child labour. Charges referring to the use of forced labour in Brazil have been brought before the ILO. Let me assure you that all such charges are being fully investigated. Those responsible for such infringements of basic human rights are being brought to court and indicted accordingly. Brazil will not tolerate such abuses. We are developing new ways to deal with and dissuade such repulsive practices.

There have also been some reports to the ILO with respect to the use of child labour in Brazil. I would like to make clear that firms unlawfully hiring children have been punished. However, this is a much more complex issue. As a matter of principle, all children should be at school even when they are apprentices. However, economic necessity in the context of family survival strategies has led many children to either hold hazardous jobs or even to beg for money in the country's streets. This is an unbearable situation which perpetuates poverty across generations. Brazilian society is determined to confront this issue. However, it requires concerted action both on the educational and developmental fronts, which will take time to work out.

The Brazilian Government is engaged in joint efforts with NGOs, international organizations and with the ILO itself through the IPEC programme and the private sector to alleviate this problem in the short run, while the more permanent benefits stemming from development remove the sources of this regrettable social ill.

Brazil does not need to resort either to unlawful labour practices or to human rights abuses to lower labour costs so as to increase the competitiveness of its economy. We are a democratic society and as such we believe that the fair way to increase our ability to compete is by raising productivity.

Brazil will not accept, as has often been asserted in international fora, any attempt to link infringements of labour standards as a result of competitive pressures to commercial sanctions by the World Trade Organization.

The Brazilian Government sees a protectionist intention behind this argument. Any abuses of workers and their rights should be brought first to the Brazilian authorities for appropriate action and then, depending on the case, to the appropriate forum of the United Nations system, such as the Human Rights Commission or the ILO, and not to the World Trade Organization.

It has also been argued that labour market deregulation is a relevant component of structural adjustment programmes. Brazil needs to change its labour market and industrial relations institutions. The breakdown of the old model of growth has not only made explicit the rigidities in the functioning of labour markets but has also highlighted the inadequacies of current labour legislation to face the needs of capital/labour bargaining.

Notwithstanding these facts, labour institutions should not be blamed solely for unsatisfactory economic performance, which has also resulted from an inefficient industrial structure protected by high tariffs.

We agree with the principle stated in the ILO report World Employment 1995 that the challenge facing the reform of labour legislation is to set up standards applicable to all segments of the labour force while imparting greater flexibility to labour market behaviour. We also share the view that international experience does not provide any definite support to the assertion that it is essential to have an unregulated labour market in order to successfully integrate the economy into competitive globalization.

The adoption of policies to respond positively to globalization is the best way to sustain economic growth and to create modern-sector jobs in countries like Brazil.

Brazil is just beginning a new era with regard to employment policy, labour market regulation and capital labour relations. Our goals are to increase the welfare of our workers, to promote citizenship and to secure democracy. We have an unyielding commitment to fulfil such a destiny. In this endeavour we are open to discussing alternatives with all social actors. For such an undertaking it is also essential to have the support of the ILO.

Mr. SUNDSTRÖM (Minister of Labour, Sweden) – First of all I want to congratulate the President and his colleagues on their elections. The excellent Report prepared for this year's Conference addresses important questions and struggles in most parts of the world, and it suggests constructive means of dealing with them. There are convincing arguments concerning not only the myths regarding deregulation and wage cutting, but also about the need for positive adjustment. In addition, the point regarding the need for international cooperation to enforce basic labour standards is made quite clearly.

The Report presents a constructive vision of the future and makes a strong case for a new political commitment to achieve full employment. I do not intend to go into the details of the Report, but I would like to share with you five considerations connected to it.

The first aspect refers to the visibility of the ILO and the publication of World Employment 1995. The publication of that report is an initiative worth commending.

The ILO is, I am sorry to say, a fairly unknown organization, and it has had difficulties in finding its place in the international debate on economic policy. A yearly publication of such high quality would improve knowledge and understanding about employment-related problems. It would influence thinking on economic and social matters and on poverty.

The second consideration has to do with economic, versus human, development. For a long time a purely economic approach has dominated the debate on development. Economic objectives have taken such priority over other goals that one might believe that economic development is the sole purpose of all development. It is too often assumed that free markets and better incentives for private enterprises are alone sufficient to solve problems of employment and social problems. They are indeed necessary. But they cannot be a substitute for an up-to-date and effective labour market policy and social policy.

If, however, these policies lead to higher unemployment and more poverty, they could turn out to be very expensive, not only in respect of personal hardship and stress but also because of the indirect consequences they will have on health, crime, child labour and alienation – consequences which can lead to social conflicts and the rise of extremist movements.

In order to influence these discussions, the ILO therefore needs to enhance its analytical capacity, and deal more with economic policy matters. As was stated at the World Summit for Social Development, economic, employment and social policies are closely related, and the ILO should participate actively in all discussions related to them. But convincing arguments demand continuous efforts, and therefore it is important to build up the necessary capacity within the Office.

My third consideration refers to the fact that national policies to increase employment no longer are adequate in a global economy. International coordination of policies is essential to increase demand, output, trade and employment. The present global system, however, is designed for national adjustments made by single countries.

This is not a suggestion to make any group responsible for the global economy. But there is, as has been suggested by the Commission on Global Governance, a need for an international forum to consider the overall state of the world economy.

Such a forum should provide an environment for a long-term policy to promote balanced sustainable development and to ensure consistency among the policies of the major economic institutions.

The ILO should take an active part in the discussions on a new policy framework which is adapted to the global problem, and it should bring its message to the international community.

Fourthly, I believe we must listen to women, and listen to the poor. The main point for the ILO's work is the support and protection of basic human rights in the world of work. This orientation towards the rights and well-being of individual men and women is the hallmark of the ILO. The tripartite method, where governments, workers and employers listen to each other and work together, gives the ILO its unique strength and provides the Organization with a better opportunity than many other organizations to assist those who are not present in the corridors of power. This often means women, and it certainly always means the poor.

It is fair to say that what is good for women is good for all of us. If women do not get the same rights and opportunities as men, we will not be able to overcome poverty, to stop the squandering of resources and to do away with segregation. Power for women is a matter of life and death. Our goal should be a world where free working women and men are able to make decisions affecting their own lives.

My fifth reflection refers to the most vulnerable groups in our societies, and in particular to children – the children who are forced to work under very bad conditions in order to survive. The ILO is doing very impressive work with regard to this difficult and complex problem. The difficult part is of course finding ways to provide alternatives in areas of extreme poverty. Education has to be the first priority. The Swedish Government believes that questions regarding the observance of core labour standards should be considered in all relevant international fora. The reason for this is that the question is not what we normally mean by economic or social conditions, but rather a question of basic human rights. There is at present a discussion within both the ILO and the OECD regarding these matters, including the possible link between trade and labour standards. Sweden attaches great importance to these discussions, as the aim is to prevent exploitation. The action initiated by the Governing Body to strengthen the ILO's role with regard to the protection of basic workers' rights, to promote the application of ILO standards, and to fight against child labour, therefore, is of the utmost importance. The tripartite community, and all of us as individuals, need to express solidarity with the most vulnerable groups – and first and foremost, with the children of the world.

Original Spanish: Mr. PETERS ARZABE (Minister of Labour, Bolivia) – Reading the Report of the Director-General of the ILO, which was prepared to be examined during this Session of the Conference, the Ministry of Labour of Bolivia agreed with the document's conception, with the statistics contained in it, and with its observations on the structure of world employment. We were especially interested to read about employment effects of the Uruguay Round, and its impact on the Western labour markets.

With the globalization of the economy, world trade has grown, as has the trend to globalization in the flow of foreign investments in both developed and developing countries. We must stress that from the Report a trend which must be taken into account in long-term employment forecasts.

The Report of the Director-General shows that there is also a trend towards rising labour productivity, which encourages greater direct foreign investment, thanks to effective strategies of development which some countries have been able to implement, consisting mainly of maintaining macroeconomic stability, high levels of savings and investment, a liberal trade regime and the attraction of foreign resources.

These economic policies have tended, at the global level, to reduce unemployment, underemployment and poverty even if variations at the national level must be taken into account.

In Bolivia, obstacles to social and economic development have affected the country's search for quick solutions to the problem of employment.

This devastating problem of the end of the twentieth century calls for long-, medium- and short-term strategies and policies, and the country has responded through the modernization of its juridical, social, economic and political structures.

The philosophical and practical orientation entailed by these changes is guided by the need to find short-term relief for the unemployed and, in the medium-term, by the strengthening of the labour market.

In order to remedy the deficit of new jobs and, at the level of wages, to guarantee Bolivian workers a better quality of life, we have started a number of reforms which reveal the urgent need to modernize institutional policies of social development.

Of course, the solution to the problem is hampered by the constant unease of conservative economic sectors which try to neutralize the national or foreign investment policies which would open new horizons on the employment front.

Before taking office, the Government of President Gonzalo Sánchez de Lozada tried to find out exactly what the concerns and aspirations of the people were among all social strata, so as to discover what changes they wanted. Amongst these, some of the most serious have been met by the Popular Participation Law.

After 450 years during which the economic life of the area which is today Bolivia was conducted in a manner oblivious to those who constitute the nation's deepest roots, the economy of the Republic of Bolivia is now looking again towards the municipalities of the interior, especially to the rural areas, and it is handing resources over to the people so that, through democratic and popular systems of self-management, they can determine the amounts to be invested in accordance with their own development priorities and short-term employment goals.

This exercise also revealed a broad consensus around the need for an educational reform changing fundamentally prevailing structures of education and technical and professional training. With wide participation from the sectors most closely involved – teachers, parents, professional and technical experts, and also of all the political parties represented in Parliament, a project was presented to the Congress which, after the relevant analysis and discussion, was approved and promulgated by the Government. The effects of this new educational reform on the labour market in the medium and long term will be the best possible.

Another innovative and very Bolivian idea is the concept of capitalizing state enterprises. Unlike other experiences where there was a privatization of state enterprises, whereby they are sold off in a single transaction together with their substantial income stream, but with a permanent loss of wealth to the State, Bolivia has retained state-ownership and to improve management so that, with the fresh investment obtained, new jobs will be created and a pension fund created to ensure a dignified old age for all Bolivians.

All these measures will ensure a better social welfare with jobs sufficient in quality and quantity for all Bolivians.

Although the people voted for change, opposition was raised by small politically motivated groups whose rhetoric clearly revealed that they represented spurious sectarian interests.

The country suffered from the effects of changes and transformation, because the interests in question, taking advantage of the peaceful and democratic climate prevailing under the current Government, tried to upset the country's institution life in 1994 and 1995.

An opposition alliance of extremist sectors of the teaching profession with coca-leaf producers drew up an irrational list of economic, social, environmental and regional demands, going well beyond the tripartite relationship observed in the ILO. The resultant permanent street disturbances forced the Executive, with the authorization of the National Congress, to declare a state of siege in April.

The current Government continues to apply the principle of harmony in company and labour relations, and I can, from this platform of the International Labour Conference, inform the international community that the broad-minded approach of the Bolivian Central Workers' Organization and the Confederation of Private Business will enable us to consolidate change with order, and order with social justice.

Once the structural obstacles to the development of a policy for the solution of the complex social problems of work had been overcome, the Government turned its attention to the design of a methodology for the programming of an employment strategy, which we will summarize later on.

The greatest difficulty, in designing employment policy in my country is that of combining a set of strategies where political efforts and financial and administrative resources come together to respond to the problem of demand.

It is well known that there can be no employment without investment, and one priority in this respect is precisely to prevent a rise in unemployment, because the unrest it brings itself puts investors off, be their domestic or foreign, leading to further increases in unemployment. From the social point of view, this also leads to further polarization between the employed and the unemployed, and thus increased inequality in the distribution of income and an increase in the incidence of poverty.

It is in this context that the Ministry of Labour is studying strategies for solving the unemployment problem and creating jobs.

The jobs produced by investment arising in the capitalization process described above will enable the state-owned firms to modernize, to incorporate new technologies and thus to require an increase in the human resources at their disposal.

With the support of the Andean Development Corporation we have begun to draw up labour re-training and adaptation projects in each of the state enterprises due to be capitalized.

The improved distribution of resources and of investment in public works at the municipal, departmental and provincial levels will generate new jobs in the middle-sized cities and in small towns but above all in the countryside. This will act as a brake on rural out-migration and will optimize the use of labour on the spot.

With the help of the ILO it is proposed to provide support for productive units at the municipal level.

The State's social investment is carried out through various specialized funds. These mechanisms of social investment each have responsibility for particular tasks and in no case is there duplication among them, even though their function is to carry out public works of direct benefit to urban or rural communities. The Under-Secretariat of Labour is charged with the monitoring of social investment on account of its important role in short-term employment generation, and it is also responsible for overseeing conventional investment which is a natural creator of new jobs.

The cooperative system, especially in mining and agriculture, is exhibiting high levels of production which also translate into the employment of large numbers of people.

The action of the Ministry of Labour, through its Under-Secretariat for Cooperatives, is aimed at supporting the formation of production and service cooperatives which are likely to require large amounts of labour.

The great potential of the cooperative sector for development and employment has led to the creation, through a separate unit in the Ministry of Labour, of a Social Relief Fund, which is also an agency of the Ministry. It is responsible for the following: the operation of a rotating fund for people who have been marginalized or displaced; with the aim of providing a social capital for starting up units of production; market research domestically and abroad to open up market opportunities for these units; the creation of "incubators" to enable these activities to develop, providing the necessary finance and training.

Training has become an irreplaceable mechanism at all levels of productive activity. The classic approach states that for training to be profitable it must be directed at workers or unemployed people who are in a position to take on the responsibility of an improved job – and this leads again to the need for training for reconversion, for better jobs and higher wages.

The foregoing implies a series of operating mechanisms which can only be put into practice when applied at the regional or local level where the economic and social projects are actually undertaken.

Returning now to the overall analysis of employment as the object of truly intelligent but controversial economic policies in this time of crisis, Bolivia believes that a philosophy of social peace is absolutely essential for the achievement of sustained and sustainable development, be it in the economic, financial or social sphere, on the basis of a democratic stability which we must protect.

Bolivia therefore accepts the Director-General's call for the creation of an institutional mechanism at the international level which will find the optimal solutions to the social scourge of unemployment, as a solidary goal for States, Employers and Workers.

Ms. FITZGERALD (Minister for Labour Affairs, Ireland) – I welcome the emphasis given in the Director-General's Report on promoting employment and tackling poverty across the global economy. There is still a mountain to climb if we are to raise output and economic performance across the world economy and to ensure an equitable distribution of the fruits of economy activity so that everyone can enjoy work at a reasonable income.

Facing the unemployment problem at the top of everyone's agenda is an important first step in working together as a world community to tackle joblessness. Given the close interrelationship between social and economic policies, there is a good case for a new mechanism for international cooperation which would deal with social as well as economic challenges.

One recent hopeful pointer for the future was the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen. At that Summit the Irish Prime Minister committed our Government to the work of eradicating poverty, combatting social exclusion and promoting the goal of full employment.

We all live now in a global economy, an economy where inter-country trade and direct foreign investment is growing faster than GNP. It is therefore extremely important that governments and the social partners should increasingly seek to act together across frontiers through structures such as the ILO.

The increasing liberalization of international trade is a key to increasing world economic prosperity and employment and the implementation of the Uruguay Round GATT Agreement offers opportunities for growth.

As a country which exports over 70 per cent of its total output, Ireland in particular appreciates the benefits of increasingly liberalized trade. Opening up the home market to outside competition is often seen as a threat to jobs at home. I think we should turn that idea around and see the new market opportunities opening up in those countries which are experiencing fast growth.

The European Union in its Maastricht Treaty adopted economic targets to ensure greater coordination of macro-economic policies in preparation for economic and monetary union. These targets aim at low inflation and reducing the overhang of public debt. The European Union White Paper on Growth, Competitiveness and Employment maps out a strategy for more investment and training, for more employment intensive growth, improved efficiency in labour market policies, reduced non-wage labour costs and special measures to assist those groups hardest hit by unemployment. The world of rapidly changing markets, of rapidly changing technologies, means that economic success is increasingly built on ability to adapt to change. The level of investment in education and training is a key factor in ensuring the flexibility of skills to adapt to changing circumstances.

Basic social protection and labour market flexibility are not intrinsic opposites. The partnership between workers and management, the long-term investment and training for a longer-term work force are important aspects of flexibility which tend to flourish in an atmosphere of good social protection, rather than in its absence.

I welcome in particular the emphasis of the Director-General in his report on tackling long-term unemployment. Increasingly we understand that economic fluctuations tend to leave some people permanently behind, that a rising economic tide of its own will not "lift all boats" and that special measures are needed to integrate long-term unemployed back into the mainstream labour market.

Ireland has had one of the highest unemployment rates in Western Europe – a problem which has been exacerbated by a rapidly growing young labour force. However, some significant progress has been made in recent years in raising Ireland's economic performance and growth rate and that growth is now being translated into additional jobs and reduced unemployment. It is forecast that our economic growth rate will average between 5 and 6 per cent to the end of the century. Last year total employment grew by 2.6 per cent and the number of registered unemployed climbed by 5.7 per cent – and these trends are continuing.

However, we recognize that these improvements in themselves will do little to eradicate the problem of long-term unemployment or arrest the drift into long-term unemployment. That is why we have adopted an active policy to retrain and reintegrate the long-term unemployed into the jobs market, backed up by an active placement service of those who would otherwise be at the back of the jobs queue. These policies have been designed with the help of the unemployed organizations themselves, and reflect practical experience with pilot initiatives.

In addition, we have developed a special focus on developing the economic potential of unemployment black spots harnessing the input of the local communities in these areas. Thirty-three of the worst black spots are now included in a specially funded local development programme which is being assisted by the European Union.

Finally, I would like to congratulate the Director-General on his Report and on the work of the ILO. I hope that this work will bear fruit in increasing the coordination of economic policies in the focus on tackling unemployment in our own country and right around the globe.

Mr. MELKERT (Minister of Social Affairs and Employment, Netherlands) – First of all, I wish to congratulate the President and the other officers of the Conference on their election. It is good to know that the conduct of this Session of the International Labour Conference is in very able and highly experienced hands.

Winners or losers – that is what employment seems to be about. On the one hand are the privileged who have a job, and on the other hand are the jobless who are excluded from participation in society. In this context losers are not born but made, and a lesson of the recent past has been that the mere market mechanism alone has not been able to correct all the imperfections of the labour market. Consequently, we may have to reconsider and upgrade the role of government and the public sector in combating unemployment.

For this reason I am very grateful to the ILO for producing the two reports on employment this year; one for the World Summit for Social Development, held in Copenhagen, and one for this Conference. The first report was indeed a great inspiration to me during the Copenhagen Summit.

In my view a revitalization of the welfare state and the design of appropriate forms of social and labour regulation is crucial for economic success. Economic performance is the basis for employment creation, but growth just based on the elimination of both the welfare state and job security is economically short-sighted and strategically unsound. Like the Director-General I subscribe to the view that our aim is still full employment, but not at any price. Employment must go hand in hand with social justice.

The OECD in its Jobs Study has analysed a number of causes of unemployment in industrialized countries. On the whole, the conclusions of this Jobs Study are sound and useful. For instance, I find the qualification of the results of the globalization of the economy in that report very enlightening, in that it eliminates a number of fairy tales in this field. Imports from outside the OECD are almost negligible and hence cannot be responsible for the high rate of unemployment in Europe. However, it is not without reason that I have welcomed the reports of the ILO on employment for their added input. It has been more than a year since the OECD report was published and new insights are useful.

What is the additional scope of the ILO reports? In the first place these two reports do not uniquely deal with the problems of industrialized countries but also cover the problems of the developing world and transition economies. Moreover, I welcome the fact that the ILO, after some lapse of time, has embarked on studying the employment situation of the industrialized countries. The newly industrializing countries do not have the monopoly of the negative consequences of unemployment – in the industrialized world, being jobless leads to exclusion from society and all its related harmful effects.

What do we find in the Report entitled World Employment 1995 that calls for extra thought? The Report takes the view that unemployment is not the inevitable result of general processes such as globalization of the economy and technological advance. On the contrary, it is the result of deliberate decisions on socio-economic policy and the way we want society to develop. Following up this line, the ILO concludes that the solutions propagated in the 1980s such as deregulation and the withdrawal of the public sector from the economic arena, have not led to a fair deal for the unskilled as far as income and work are concerned.

The ILO regrets that the positive aspects of regulation are often neglected and points out that the evidence for the harmful effects of regulation is often thin. Existing dismissal procedures, statutory minimum wages and the extension of collective labour agreements should not be condemned out of hand. In fact, they may well contribute to stable industrial relations and the opportunity to upgrade skills, assets that employers with vision well know how to appreciate. It is striking that countries with a dissimilar extent of social protection have a similar rate of economic performance.

The ILO also points out that the McKinsey Global Institute has concluded that rigidities in the product markets are as important as those in the labour markets in explaining the slow rate of employment growth in Europe. So not only the labour market should be made the scapegoat for unemployment.

That being said, there is no reason to be complacent about the present state of the labour market, especially as far as the low skilled are concerned. It has been traditional Dutch economic policy to stress the importance of voluntary wage moderation. Although the ILO almost tends to discount the negative effects of excessive wages on creating unemployment, the Netherlands Government feels that wage moderation is sound policy in view of competitiveness and the necessary social equilibrium. Moreover, we want to realize a lowering of payroll taxes, especially for low skilled work. But this is not enough to create jobs for poorly qualified workers. For that reason, the Netherlands Government has initiated a new "social standard" in order to push back long-term unemployment by taking a number of specific measures. First, creating 40,000 new jobs in the public and semi-public sector; second, creating employment with the aid of social security funds, or allowing persons to retain benefits while holding a job; third, selective extension of collective labour agreements in order to encourage the social partners to create jobs at or just above the minimum wage level; fourth, temporary dispensation of the statutory minimum wage in order to favour the creation of jobs for the long-term unemployed. I know that the ILO deems the criticism of the harmful effects of minimum wages on employment not wholly convincing. Yet for initial entry into the labour market such dispensation can just give the extra push needed. And fifth, I would like to mention the issue of job vouchers. I realize that the measures I have just mentioned may well represent a specifically Dutch recipe. But I just want to illustrate that governments and the public sector have a more active part to play in the combat against unemployment than has been fashionable recently. Withdrawal by the Government and stringent macroeconomic policies have not in themselves resulted in making considerable inroads into the unacceptably high unemployment problem. The Netherlands has a good record in recent years on employment creation. We have seen growth in the distribution of work via the extension of part-time work, with the full support of the social partners. But this in itself has not been enough to solve the problem. We need inspiration to find new ways to arrive at full employment. I find part of that inspiration in the work of this Organization.

To conclude, I would like to reiterate my belief that the balance between the market and the public sector should be restored. The public and private sectors should cooperate in harmony. Thus, a redesigned welfare state will provide a sound basis for economic progress all over the world.

Mr. TREU (Minister of Labour, Italy) – The Government of Italy particularly appreciates the fact that the major focus of this session of the Conference and the major target set for our future commitments is employment policies, and more specifically policies aimed at promoting full employment. This is a clear response to what we consider a worldwide social request. Full employment is not only an economic good in itself, it is an economic good because unemployment is a waste of our most precious resources, human capital. But full employment is also a prerequisite for fighting poverty, social exclusion and all forms of discrimination and inequality. In fact, unemployment is in itself a factor of inequality.

These targets have been set at the international level. They have been the object of the G-7 meeting on employment and the Copenhagen Summit, but the specific responsibility must now be shifted to our States, governments and the entire United Nations system.

The market is global, and governments are local; we need, therefore, greater coordination to meet the challenge of employment throughout the world. In fact we need greater coordination in two areas: coordination between governmental, national, regional and world levels; and we need increased coordination between social and economic policies. Quite appropriately, this has been stressed in the Report to this session of the Conference.

Indeed, in the past, the institutions responsible for economic policies and the institutions responsible for social policies have worked too far apart. By setting the goal of full employment as the international community's top priority, we are trying to reinforce the role of the ILO as well as the role of labour ministers and the social partners at the national and international levels. The Report which has been submitted to this session of the Conference fully grasps the complexity of the issues and the difficulty of the challenge before us. The globalization of the world economy and the growth of the information society are both a great opportunity for the people of the world. But they are also a challenge and there is a risk that globalization and technology could place pressure on workers' fundamental rights, leading to a systematic deregulation of the labour market, which is why we have to meet this challenge. We do not accept the idea that technological progress is an enemy of full employment but, of course, we cannot take it for granted that it will promote full employment either. This is a basic issue of social policy.

The Government of Italy is fully committed to combating unemployment and to turning economic growth into jobs. Four basic measures have been implemented in line with the principles of the ILO and with European guidelines. First of all, encouragement for productive investment, particularly in depressed areas, aimed at providing the basic infrastructures needed to modernize the economy and at the same time to sustain labour-intensive sectors. In order to promote such investments in a difficult economic situation, we need, a climate conducive to investments, which means efforts to contain public deficits, which are a major problem in many European countries.

A second set of measures aims to make the labour market more flexible. We do not think that flexibility is the only measure that can promote full employment, but it is certainly an important aspect. We do not believe in all-out deregulation, we believe that flexibility is a policy which can be negotiated and sustained by active manpower policies; it is not an automatic policy.

A third set of measures aims to increase the quality and quantity of investment in human capital which is considered by everybody as a major target, but one which is not easily reached.

Finally, at this time, particularly in this area of the world, we need to keep an eye on wage dynamics and inflation. But more than specific measures, let me mention two basic principles which I think should be kept in mind at this level. One is that any policy of this dimension and difficulty needs the full agreement of the social partners in its shaping and implementation. This has been pursued in Italy through a series of tripartite agreements in recent years which have been the basis for the social and economic stabilization of the country.

A second major principle, let me repeat, is to marry macroeconomic policies with social choices. This is a principle which must be put into practice in national and supranational policies.

To give you a concrete indication of what I mean, let me stress another major problem. We need to believe in the linkage between workers' rights and development, between the globalization of the economy and trade and the preservation of workers' fundamental rights. No obstacles should be placed in the way of the globalization of trade but the same process of globalization must go hand in hand with suitable multilateral policies particularly aimed at supporting less-developed areas.

The apparent challenge is to reshape social economic policies, guaranteeing that the globalization of the economy and trade is matched by respect for fundamental rights at the universal level. We must pursue this path which again is difficult, but we have no alternative. There is no point in pursuing economic integration and development and at the same time turning a blind eye to the development of democracy and fundamental social rights. The history of mankind is filled with policies which have failed, even in economic terms, because they have considered social rights to be a luxury rather than the basis for development or because they saw trilateral agreements and consultations as an impediment to decision-making rather than as a resource for democracy.

Let me conclude by emphasizing again that this line of action offers interesting prospects for the ILO and for our Government both at the national level and regional levels. As far as Italy is concerned, let me mention in conclusion that the Italian Government is committed to supporting all action along these lines. The International Training Centre of the ILO, in Turin, will play a fundamental role in these efforts, thanks to greater integration with the rest of the ILO and with the United Nations system. Its activities are in line with the themes being dealt with at this session of the Conference, and should be given priority by the ILO as a whole. The Government of Italy will continue to provide every possible support to the Organization which needs sufficient resources to be able to operate effectively.

We call on the ILO to maintain the rigorous approach and we assure both the Organization and the Director-General that they can continue to count on the full support of the Government of Italy.

Mr. HO (Government delegate, Republic of Korea) – I would like to begin by congratulating the President on his election to preside over this very important meeting. I would also like to express my deep appreciation to the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and his staff for their efforts in producing this session's Report entitled Promoting employment.

This Report has done well to note that, with the successful conclusion of the Uruguay Round, the world economy has entered a new phase. At this watershed in history, I believe that our common employment problems require, more than ever, cooperation and joint efforts among the nations of the world.

Employment promotion, as discussed at the Copenhagen World Summit for Social Development, is a means of eradicating poverty and achieving social integration. The task of promoting employment is therefore a critical pillar in the economic and social structure of all nations.

I fully agree with the Director-General's opinion that labour and social concerns should not be secondary to economic growth and the promotion of employment.

As a result of high growth in the Korean economy, the unemployment rate has decreased to 2 per cent in the 1990s from 8 per cent in the 1960s. Improvements in the rights of workers have accompanied this economic growth. For instance, Korea embodied the protection of workers' rights within domestic institutions in the 1950s, when the Labour Code, the Trade Union Act and related laws were enacted. Since then, several revisions have been made with a view to ensuring a balanced distribution of the fruits of economic development.

Korean policy in this area has had many objectives. Efforts have been made to improve working conditions, to develop workers' skills and techniques and to promote employment security for disadvantaged employees such as women, the elderly and the disabled. Such concerns have been addressed through legislation, including an Act on the Promotion of Employment of the Handicapped, the Minimum Wage Act, the Employment Equality Act and the Act on the Promotion of Employment of the Elderly.

These efforts, along with Korea's steady economic development, have improved my country's structural income distribution. Wage increases have exceeded productivity gains throughout the development process, resulting in a remarkable rise in the ratio of employees compensation to national income.

Korea's labour laws and regulations have also improved, and now correspond to international standards. Labour rights have evolved in a positive manner, particularly since the late 1980s. Workers now have greater rights to unionization and collective bargaining. In the years following 1987, labour relations endured a crisis of acute conflict between labour and management, which led to explosive labour strikes. The significant reduction in the number of labour disputes since this time demonstrates the improvements in labour-management relations.

I am quite certain that the expansion of trade and investment between nations, which is the expected result of the successful conclusion of the Uruguay Round, will contribute to economic growth and increased employment around the world.

The accelerated change in industrial structures as a result of trade liberalization, however, thrusts unprecedented challenges upon both advanced and developing countries. Though many advanced countries have serious unemployment problems to tackle, the problem of low growth and high unemployment within developing countries must also be urgently addressed.

Industrialized countries are expected to participate in this process by supporting the developing countries, and by helping to build them into legitimate partners for open market success, active investment and international cooperation. Korea endeavours to cooperate with the international employment promotion efforts by participating in manpower development programmes. These programmes offer vocational training based on Korea's development experiences.

Future plans include the extension of existing activities and further participation in international cooperation programmes.

Thanks to the sustained economic development, employment promotion efforts have created close to full employment in Korea. However, industrial restructuring may cause structural unemployment in our country in the future, as has been the case in other developed and developing countries. Rather than responding to such structural unemployment problems in a passive way, we will tackle the issue with active and comprehensive human resource policies, as suggested in the Director-General's Report.

In preparation for the expected challenge of structural unemployment, Korea enacted the Basic Employment Policy Act and the Employment Insurance Act in 1993. The Basic Employment Policy Act is aimed at balancing the supply and demand of manpower, and at preventing unemployment through the comprehensive implementation of medium- and long-term employment policies.

Embodied within the Employment Insurance Act is the Unemployment Insurance Scheme, which is a passive social security system supporting the livelihood of the unemployed through unemployment allowances. In addition to this passive measure, the Act also contains such active policies as the Vocational Competence Development Project and the Employment Security Project, which expedite re-employment through job placement services and facilitate support for vocational training.

The world is experiencing a deepening of interdependency among economies which has reduced the autonomy of individual government policies and actions. The Director-General's Report notes that in such circumstances, a fundamental requirement for restoring full employment is the creation of an institutional framework with which to address unemployment problems. I fully support the institutional changes proposed in the report.

It is my hope that the detailed plans may be established which can contribute to the solution of employment problems for all countries.

Mr. MASINDE (Minister of Labour and Manpower Development, Kenya) – On behalf of the Kenya Delegation, I wish to congratulate the President, together with the other Officers of the Conference, on their well-deserved election to guide the deliberations of this year's session of the International Labour Conference.

My delegation has noted that the central theme for this year's session of the Conference is on promoting employment. The Director-General's Report has given a very detailed account of the world employment situation primarily with the aim of stimulating discussion and the search for solutions among ILO constituents and the international community at large.

We also note that his choice of the central theme is particularly relevant, since the recent World Summit for Social Development had adopted a Declaration and Programme of Action which specifically committed the assembled Heads of State and Government "to promoting the goal of full employment as a basic priority ... of economic and social policies, and enabling all men and women to attain secure and sustainable livelihoods through freely chosen productive employment and work."

The ILO's support in this regard will go a long way in assisting member States in the difficult task of translating the renewed commitment to the attainment of full employment as emphasized at the Summit. Despite the global economic progress since 1990, serious problems of employment, underemployment, widespread inequality and poverty still persist in the world today.

These problems are more critical in poor countries, especially those of sub-Saharan Africa which are grappling with a myriad of socio-economic, cultural and political problems that are not conducive for productive employment generation and growth. The effects of the world recession of the 1980s, the heavy debt burden and the decline of primary commodity prices has compounded the problem. The situation has been aggravated with the implementation of IMF and the World Bank structural adjustment programmes in the face of dwindling international donor support.

The adverse weather conditions, especially recurrent drought, and the high population and refugee problems, have further worsened the employment situation.

Global marginalization of the African region in trade and investment as a result of diversion of resources to Eastern Europe has further aggravated the situation and stretches the employment challenge even more.

Kenya is one of the countries suffering from these problems and I am convinced that these – combined with the incidence of declining real wages and informalization of the labour market – have led to low quality of employment, insufficient incomes, increased poverty and widespread abuse of labour standards among the population of the developing world.

In these circumstances, Kenya firmly believes that the issue of providing productive employment remains a critical core mandate of the ILO.

Generating and sustaining productive employment and income opportunities demands joint efforts of the social partners in the labour market through the spirit of tripartism, which the ILO upholds.

As the recent Summit clearly indicated, attaining high and sustained economic growth is the surest way of generating more productive employment and income opportunities to meet the needs of an expanding labour force, maintain existing employment levels, reduce unemployment rates and at the same time improve the earning and living conditions of the workers and the general population.

In the case of Kenya, a number of measures have – and are being – pursued further, with the aim of achieving the desired economic recovery, sustainable growth and social development. At the core of these programmes is the creation of an enabling environment conducive to attract and retain both domestic and foreign investors.

The Kenya Government has, since independence, upheld peace and political stability in order to create the right environment for development.

Constant consultations among the social partners in the labour market have ensured industrial harmony, a prerequisite for industrial peace, labour stability, improving efficiency, increasing productivity and generating additional employment as well as income opportunities.

It is therefore necessary that all developing countries should be given adequate financial and technical support by the international community to ensure that micro-economic policies rest on strong foundations which facilitate the efficient allocation of scarce resources.

Kenya is taking serious steps towards privatization and liberalization of the economy. It has created export processing zones and is currently examining the modalities for implementing an investment promotion code which will take into account the internationally accepted investment code and the country's interests.

The Government has, at the same time, striven to maintain and improve the infrastructure to provide the desired services for the promotion of investments, the needs of the people and the general economic growth.

As was reaffirmed by the Summit, improved education, health and shelter together with an increase in meaningful employment and economic opportunities, will significantly contribute directly to reducing poverty and its consequences in the rural and urban areas. Since independence, the Government has continued to allocate a larger portion of its budget expenditure to the development of the human resources through education, training, and health and has aggressively pursued a comprehensive population policy.

Kenya firmly believes that the ILO's contribution to the follow-up action to the Summit should mainly be confined to the implementation of commitment No. 3 to the goal of full employment. The ILO also has a crucial role to play in the area of social protection – focusing on the eradication of poverty as well as on improving equality of opportunity and human rights practices in order to facilitate social integration and to make structural adjustment programmes more socially responsible.

The ILO should therefore offer assistance to the member States at their request to help them formulate comprehensive strategies and programmes of action, define time-bound goals and targets, establish efficient monitoring mechanisms and regularly assess progress towards the achievement of the overall outcome of the Summit.

The ILO should also aim at doing fewer things but doing them better by making full use of its comparative advantage. In order to maintain the organization's credibility, the ILO should conveniently desist from pursuing issues that are irrelevant under its mandate such as the recent planned linking of international trade and labour standards through a sanctions-based "social clause" mechanism which is not a "core mandate" area for the ILO – nor does it have any economic rationale to justify pursuing the linkage. It is a counter-productive move which would end up not only in destroying more jobs rather than creating any jobs at all, but also in bringing about disaffection with this distinguished Organization.

Finally, I would like to mention here that the ILO as a tripartite Organization has a very special and unique role to play towards the promotion of social justice generally in the world of today which has become so interdependent.

It is against this background that my delegation would like to make a special appeal to all peace-loving nations of the world to fully support this worthy Organization in the noble task of promoting social justice and improving the quality of life of all the peoples of the world.

(Mr. Popescu takes the Chair.)

Ms. NAMIR (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Israel) – I would like first of all to offer the President congratulations on his election to preside over this session of the International Labour Conference.

Unemployment is the central economic and social problem in Israel and we all know that countries all over the world are facing the same problem.

Recently I had the honour to participate in the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen which dealt with policies to reduce unemployment in order to promote social progress. I believe it is our responsibility to encourage employment and ensure decent working conditions which will provide an adequate standard of living and ensure a more equitable distribution of income and wealth, thus reducing dependency on the welfare system.

In Israel during the last two years we expanded employment by taking a number of important steps. The Government stimulated economic activity by investing in the country's economic infrastructure and intervened in the labour market. These measures were successful in reducing unemployment in Israel by one third, from 11.2 to 7.6 per cent. This is clearly no small achievement, particularly when you take into account the new wave of 650,000 immigrants from Ethiopia and the former Soviet Union, which increased the population of Israel by 12 per cent and the labour force by 4-5 per cent per year for the last five years.

Specific programmes have been implemented in Israel to promote employment. The Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs played a central role through the following steps: subsidizing wages in the agricultural sector, providing vocational training in the construction industry, tightening regulations on unemployment benefits and creating immediate jobs. These last two steps were most effective in reducing the number of job seekers by 26 per cent within the past two years.

I have no doubt that you will agree with me that the success of labour market policies must be viewed not only in the light of their contribution to the economy as a whole but also in respect of their impact in advancing the weaker sectors of our societies.

A specific programme introduced in Israel in December 1994 was designed to reduce unemployment in 15 localities throughout the country where unemployment was over 10 per cent. Special attention was paid to supplementary education, vocational training and social support for the well-being of the families of unemployed workers. By April of this year, the rate of unemployment in 13 of the 15 localities had fallen by an average of 4 per cent.

As the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, I believe it is my duty to protect the more vulnerable sectors of our workforce, such as low wage earners, women and foreign workers.

The issue of foreign workers leads me to the following subject. Repeated terrorist acts committed by extreme Palestinian organizations against the peace process and the people of Israel force the Government of Israel to take certain measures in order to protect its citizens. The number of Palestinian workers entering Israel was reduced dramatically. It is obvious that the standard of living, mostly in Gaza, has worsened as a result. To my regret and against my beliefs we permitted 71,000 foreign workers to enter Israel. He who thinks that a country can absorb so many foreign workers without there being any impact upon social conditions is simply mistaken. Therefore, we instructed employers to maintain proper salary levels, suitable housing conditions and national insurance for foreign workers.

This session of the International Labour Conference is taking place at a time when the Middle East is in the midst of an historic peace process. This is a difficult road we travel with many obstacles. However, the dialogue must move ahead. The sides must reach constructive compromises and replace distrust with a collective hope for peace. Peace means an end to agony, suffering and mourning. Peace means a promise to Israeli mothers and to Palestinian mothers that their children will no longer die in wars. Peace means that the countries of the Middle East will be able to divert their human energies and economic resources away from conflict and towards better education, improved health, economic development and mutual cultural enrichment. We should not forget that peace is the future of our children.

It is our hope that the international community will continue its support for the success of these efforts for regional stability, with the ILO playing a significant role towards a better future for us all.

Ms. WIDDECOMBE (Minister of State for Employment, United Kingdom) – The Government of the United Kingdom welcomes the focus of the Director-General's Report to this session of the Conference. Global unemployment is the key issue which has to be tackled, and my department hosted an ILO anniversary seminar last September to explore some of the issues involved. In opening the seminar I emphasized the high priority which the Government of the United Kingdom gives to action to tackle unemployment.

The United Kingdom strongly endorses what is said in the Director-General's Report about the crucial importance of exploiting the Uruguay Round's potential for creating new jobs through trade liberalization. We also agree on the role of positive adjustment measures – including retraining. We believe this is a far more effective and forward-looking approach than the protectionist stance of opposing trade liberalization in misguided attempts to protect home markets.

We also welcome the support that the Report gives to the introduction of new technology as a means of creating new jobs.

We accept that full employment should be our goal. But that cannot be achieved in isolation from other policies – notably the need to achieve low and stable inflation. Increasing employment by raising demand beyond the capacity of employers to respond would inevitably lead to higher inflation, and the need to reduce inflation will in turn lead to higher unemployment.

We believe that the best way to ensure stable exchange rates is for all governments to maintain low levels of inflation. If governments try to use macroeconomic policies to create jobs, the financial markets will anticipate higher inflation. In that environment destabilizing factors are more likely to come into play – and it is employment which suffers as a result.

The United Kingdom recognizes the importance to developing countries of their comparative advantage in lower labour costs when competing in international markets, and it is imperative for us all to resist denying markets to developing countries because they have different labour standards from those that can be afforded in Europe and North America. The clear message from the majority of employers and governments in the ILO's recent debate on trade and labour standards is that any link between labour standards and trade sanctions is totally unacceptable. Nothing is more certain to depress labour standards than actually preventing countries from trading freely and expanding their economies.

Our experience in the United Kingdom shows that a properly functioning labour market is of the most fundamental importance both for economic growth and for reducing unemployment. The Government of the United Kingdom is committed to creating a flexible and an efficient labour market – one capable of providing jobs and rising living standards, while remaining competitive in the ever-changing international market-place. It is surely significant that many of those industrialized countries with the worst problems of unemployment also have the most regulated and most inflexible labour markets. The evidence of the OECD Jobs Study underscores the importance of labour market flexibility in promoting economic growth and employment growth.

I would now like to turn to the outcome of the World Summit for Social Development.

The Government of the United Kingdom very much welcomed the emphasis placed during the discussions on the need for concerted action to address the global problem of unemployment. The Summit offered a valuable opportunity for countries throughout the developing and developed world to share their experience in tackling this problem.

The outcome of these discussions was a Declaration which summarizes the long-term goals we all seek to achieve and a Programme of Action which offers key signposts along the way.

It is for each member State to identify and pursue the approach most appropriate to its own national circumstances. But it is important to remind ourselves that there is only one way to reduce unemployment, and that is by stimulating growth and the jobs that go with it. It is the enterprise of individuals and the enterprise of companies which generate economic growth and new jobs. Governments cannot create lasting jobs – but what they can do and what they must do is to help create the economic conditions in which both business and job creation can flourish. Only through sustained economic growth and employment growth can there be a solid basis for lasting social development.

The Programme of Action invites the ILO to play a special role in contributing to the achievement of the Summit's employment and social development goals. The Director-General has already emphasized in his statement to the Summit in Copenhagen the ILO's commitment to the goals set out in the Declaration, and he has signalled very clearly the ILO's readiness to play a key role in their achievement. I welcome that commitment.

There are, I believe, three key areas where the ILO's expertise equips it to make a distinctive contribution. First, and perhaps most importantly, the ILO exists to promote improved standards and conditions of work and to encourage productive employment throughout the world. It needs to make better use of its existing voluntary procedures to produce simpler, more up-to-date labour standards which are suited to modern needs and which developing countries with limited resources can recognize as relevant and as constructive; it must also make better use of them to monitor the application of those standards systematically, but without becoming bogged down in unproductive technical detail.

Secondly, the ILO has a role to play in supporting national governments' actions – for example by providing appropriate technical expertise and assistance on employment matters.

Thirdly, the ILO provides a unique forum for the encouragement of international cooperation and for the exchange of information and good practice. There is a wealth of valuable ideas and experience amongst ILO member States and the ILO has a crucial role to play in exploiting that resource to maximum effect.

In taking forward its remit, the ILO – and indeed the United Nations system more widely – must avoid creating additional burdens for member States by setting up cumbersome new monitoring arrangements. The Summit's Programme of Action does not recommend any new structures or reporting arrangements. The priority must surely be to review and rationalize existing structures and systems so as to ensure that they respond effectively to new demands.

But there is, I believe, a further requirement which the ILO must satisfy if it is to play the role I have outlined. It must show that it is a modern organization in tune with the needs of the twenty-first century and capable of delivering practical results with real value for money. It must be flexible, responsive and clearly focused on achieving realistic objectives. Its structures, policies and programmes must be coherent; they must be up-to-date; they must be effective. In short, it must be able to adapt to the demands of the future while drawing on the strengths of the past.

The process of review and reform is well under way. The Director-General and the ILO secretariat should be congratulated on the progress that they have already made. The past two years have seen significant and lasting reforms of the ILO's administrative procedures. New strategies and approaches are now being adopted in the fields of technical cooperation and sectoral work. These reforms are important and welcome. But to take forward the mandate, the ILO now faces the greater challenge of modernizing its whole approach to setting and monitoring labour standards. This is potentially the ILO's most distinctive contribution to the achievement of the goals set by the Summit. And this is where the need for modernization and reform is now most pressing.

To conclude, the most important and immediate step the ILO should take to respond to its new mandate is to increase its momentum for radical reform, transforming itself into an organization shaped by the needs of the future and not held back by the patterns of the past.

This is an urgent task and a challenging task. I believe the standing and the authority of the ILO in the twenty-first century will depend critically on its achievement.

Original Arabic: Mr. JASSIM (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Iraq) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It is my pleasure, on behalf of the delegation of Iraq, to express my greetings to this Conference and to wish it every success in its work. I am particularly happy to congratulate the President of the Conference on his election – and am sure that his skill and experience will contribute towards attaining the noble objectives of the International Labour Organization.

The Conference, which is being held at an extremely crucial economic and social juncture, is being called upon to adopt resolutions and recommendations likely to have an effective impact on the bringing about of the aspirations of the social partners in the area of social justice, to enhance the role of the ILO in the drawing up of programmes and to achieve its objective – while consolidating the activities of parties to production.

This year, the Director-General has opted to discuss the topic of promoting employment in his Report. This is an extremely vital issue for societies which are facing extremely serious challenges because of unemployment, in all its forms, and its ensuing ills, such as inequality, insecurity and social exclusion – not to mention the loss of human resources vital for global development. The extension of working opportunities, improvements in the situation of workers and their increased participation in programmes – all these constitute the most urgent objectives faced by the world because they would help decisively to deal with unemployment and "hidden employment". This objective implies the strengthening of manpower and an increase in productivity to extend the spheres of global development, reverse the trend of poverty and achieve social justice. The living conditions in the majority of developing countries, because of widesweeping changes in the international arena, must be considered seriously with a sense of responsibility, because there is a danger that they might result in new regions of poverty and famine.

The experience of my country in this area is an example for modern times; indeed, our overall national development programmes, initiated after the Glorious Revolution of 17-30 July 1968 up to the end of the 1980s and the beginning of the 1990s, made optimum use of human resources; consequently job opportunities were created.

Iraq suffered from a lack of manpower and it welcomed Arab and foreign manpower from other countries who worked in exemplary working conditions. But now we are suffering from the scourge of unemployment, because of the odious aggression of 30 countries which has led to the total or partial paralysis of essential services and the stoppage of many production projects. In addition, many workers have been dismissed as a consequence of the blind unjust blockade which has been imposed on Iraq since 1990 until the present time.

Iraq, which has contributed to the enrichment of civilization and whose history goes back over 5,000 years, is now living in extremely difficult conditions because of the blockade which has been in force for five years against Iraq; this has caused the deaths of hundreds of thousands of children, old people and women because of a lack of food, medicine and other basic services – following the iniquitous application of the Security Council resolution against Iraq and the freezing of Iraq's assets in foreign banks, as a result of the influence of those who exert their hegemony on the Security Council – in particular, the United States. In fact, Iraq has respected its obligations in accordance with these resolutions and this implies that the Security Council should also respect its obligations; in particular, it should apply paragraph 22 of resolution 687 (1991) which authorizes Iraq to export its petrol once it has fulfilled its commitments under Security Council resolutions.

Iraq's constructive cooperation with the Security Council has been rewarded by the adoption of resolution 986 (1995) which threatens the unity, security and sovereignty of Iraq, is leading to interference in its internal affairs and is at variance with United Nations resolutions. In view of the positive stance adopted by Iraq, and of the opposite position taken up by certain members of the Security Council who are calling for a continuation of the embargo imposed on Iraq, and in view of the grave problems facing Iraq, namely, food, in its health and social spheres, the immobilization of numerous factories, not to mention increased unemployment and protracted death for many of its citizens, we beseech you to speak out in support of Iraq and demand the complete lifting of the embargo against us, in the spirit of paragraph 22 of Security Council resolution 687 (1991) which authorizes Iraq to export its petroleum and use its assets frozen in foreign banks, which total more than $4 billion, for humanitarian purposes, and so that Iraq may participate alongside other countries in political, economic and humanitarian spheres, and to enable its people to live in dignity, security and peace with the peoples of the world who cherish freedom and peace.

The agenda of this session of the Conference includes subjects of the utmost importance if we are to improve working conditions, raise working levels and adopt international labour standards which give expression to the concepts of justice and equality and establish progressive working methods which may help boost economic and social development.

With regard to the item on safety and health in mines, we endorse the study carried out in this area with a view to establishing safety and health regulations.

With regard to home work, we believe that this is an important area because this kind of work is becoming increasingly common and because of its role in generating national income. For this reason, we must look at this issue carefully and draw up international labour standards to iron out the difficulties inherent in this kind of work and afford the necessary protection to home workers.

With regard to the extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Government of my country has ratified this Convention, which covers labour inspections in industry and commerce, because it believes that it includes important labour standards. We should discuss whether to extend its scope of application to include activities in the non-commercial service sector on the basis of national requirements.

The other topics on the agenda of our Conference are in accordance with the needs of the labour and production sectors. The conclusions arising from the discussions held during this session will help to provide the appropriate legal instruments to deal with the problems and issues before this Conference. They will allow the ILO to play a greater role in the field of technical cooperation, and to provide support and assistance to the three partners to production in accordance with the aims of the ILO and with the Declaration of Philadelphia.

In conclusion, I would like to congratulate those countries which have recently become members of the ILO. I am certain that through their tripartite representatives they will contribute effectively to the work of the Organization and will support it in its quest for progress and development. I would like to wish every success to our Conference in achieving the aims to which the ILO aspires in relation to promoting social justice and achieving lasting world peace based on justice which would make it possible for the children of Palestine to return home and establish an independent State, the capital of which would be Jerusalem. Long live Jerusalem! I express the hope that the embargo will be lifted and that there will be no further interference in the internal affairs of Sudan.

Original Portuguese: Mr. REIS (Minister of Labour, Youth and Social Promotion, Cape Verde) – First, let me convey greetings of my country and my own personal greetings to this assembly, expressing the wish that the work of this the 82nd Session of the Conference will go smoothly and that all the goals which have been set will be attained in full.

I should also like to congratulate President Rosales Argüello on his election. We are sure that under his guidance our work will go well and that our Conference will be crowned with success.

I should like to take this opportunity to express our gratitude, which is amply deserved, to the Director-General of the ILO for his commitment and involvement with our Organization and for the position he has taken on fundamental issues such as unemployment and poverty.

It is always an honour for a country such as Cape Verde to be able to participate in a forum such as this. This is yet another opportunity to compare and share our experience and common concerns with other countries regarding current trends which can be observed in the world and to add our contribution, albeit a modest one, to the quest for solutions to the current problems of our planet.

It is no secret that our States are currently undergoing an extremely difficult period marked by phenomena such as unemployment, poverty and social exclusion. In developing countries these phenomena often go hand in hand with population growth, debt servicing and economic stagnation which render these phenomena far more difficult and tragic.

Although it is true that there is a growing awareness of the problems which threaten the future of mankind, it is no less true that a great deal remains to be done in practice if we are to fulfil our natural and legitimate aspirations.

The expectations generated by the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen still remain and in spite of commitments and compromises the results are yet to be seen.

However, the fact that Africa is increasingly marginalized is of grave concern to the Governments of our continent, and the persistence of this attitude indicates a trend which is not in keeping with the prospects inherent in globalization.

The globalization of international relations will only become effective and beneficial to the majority of the countries of the world if it includes the globalization of the problems of our planet and sharing of the burden by all.

From this inevitably results the need to establish a new type of international relationship based on foundations forged in solidarity and complementarity.

Our world today is witnessing and experiencing one of the worst periods of unemployment of this century. This phenomenon knows no borders and has the same impact on both rich and poor countries, on young people and adults, on men and women. Moreover, the persistence of long-term unemployment affecting large numbers of people has introduced additional data that further complicate the issue and render the situation even more worrisome.

The relationship between long-term unemployment and the spread of poverty is making itself increasingly felt by all. However, we must stress that this phenomenon has a greater and more serious impact on developing countries.

The level of poverty in Africa has reached a dimension and scale which are deeply disturbing to the human conscience and which have turned our continent into a world apart, marginalized and forgotten.

The ILO's concerns with problems of employment, and in more general terms with development and social justice, show that this Organization is well equipped to deal with the problems I have described. We hope that the members of this community will recognize this fact and that the ILO will obtain greater authority to intervene at various levels.

Cape Verde is a small island State, one of whose main features is that it is an archipelago and thus broken up into islands. Our country is in the Sahel region and is greatly affected by drought and desertification; like other countries, it also suffers from ills such as unemployment and poverty.

Cape Verde has a rate of population growth which is considerably higher than the rate of economic growth, and it currently has an unemployment rate of approximately 26 per cent. This rate gives cause for concern and must be reduced to an acceptable level by means of specific measures and policies.

Although unemployment in Cape Verde is structural in nature, the Government has been actively seeking to attract foreign investment, particularly in the production sector, while minimizing the effects of unemployment and creating a foundation for sustainable development. We are convinced that the problem of unemployment can only be resolved within the context of the global development of the country. For a country such as Cape Verde, this is a challenge to us all, Government, employers and workers. We should consequently like to point out that the Government of our country favours dialogue and consultation with social partners in order to rally the forces of the nation and concentrate resources on development efforts.

We would like to express the wish that Portuguese be added as an ILO working language. This would be a positive step, especially if documents were also produced in Portuguese, and it would help in the application and implementation of ILO policies.

In conclusion, we would like to express our hopes that our work may be productive and that new avenues may opened up and new instruments identified, so that we may deal successfully with our problems and overcome our barriers.

Mr. BRETT (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom) – I wish to congratulate the Director-General on the invaluable service the ILO has performed for the entire world of work in publishing first World Employment 1995 and this shorter version we are discussing in these days. The defeat of mass unemployment is the top priority for the Trades Union Congress, my own organization in Britain. It is a top priority for our world organization, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. It should be the top priority for all of us and all other men and women of goodwill. The reason is that unemployment at present levels, which show no sign of abating, is eating away at the social and moral fabric of our societies. It is rearing monsters of racial hatred and aiding would-be tyrants. It is destroying social cohesion, fomenting conflict and threatening peace. It is killing in squalor and misery 40,000 children every day through hunger and preventable disease.

World Employment 1995 offers the hope of putting an end to these unendurable evils. It identifies the causes of the increase in unemployment in the 1970s and the factors which have sustained it since. For we should never accept that high unemployment is part of the natural order. We should never accept also that the autonomous operation of market forces, or the vain effort to establish perfect markets, even in labour, are anything more than pursuit of an illusion. It is in fact a shameful abdication of responsibility and act of abject cowardice to suggest that mass unemployment cannot be vanquished.

The Director-General's Report goes on to sketch out the remedies to which the British trade union movement wholeheartedly subscribes. Together, trade unions, employers and governments can defeat unemployment. There are difficult technical problems, particularly in respect of reforming the international monetary system. Workable ways of ensuring that adjustment policies serve the needs of the poor rather than the balance sheets of the rich must be found. But the central message is not that technical solutions are difficult to find, it is that the international community has not had the will to search for them. How many more children will have to die before we generate that political will?

The key to the solution lies in our hands, in our hearts and in our minds. It requires global cooperation which embraces employers' and trade union organizations as well as governments and, collectively, governments have failed us in the last 20 years.

The ILO came into existence at a time of war and revolution. It developed its role as a faithful proclaimer and support of human rights after another devastating world war. It would be a terrible betrayal of those who gave their lives so that a just and prosperous world could be built, and of working people everywhere if the lessons learned from the bloodshed and suffering were to be disregarded or forgotten 50 years after the end of the war, 50 years after the world rededicated itself to fighting for rights, justice and economic development, and 50 years after the founding of the United Nations. It is our view that the ILO is more relevant than ever in solving the world's unemployment problems. The Report shows that. We should now go on to act upon it.

The Social Summit in Copenhagen was a good beginning and it entrusted to the ILO a special role and responsibility in the field of employment. That role must be fulfilled and governments must ensure that the ILO has the resources to meet the challenge.

I would like, in conclusion, to refer to one of the more controversial aspects of both last year's International Labour Conference and the work of the Governing Body over the past year, namely the protection of the basic human rights of workers through a link with trade, the so-called "social clause". Much has been said about it and it has been raised yet again by many speakers at this Conference. It is right that the issue remains one of concern, but I am saddened that the workers' position remains misunderstood by so many governments and employers. They rightly voice opposition to protectionism: the workers also share that view. All that the workers seek is the right to freedom of association and collective bargaining, freedom from discrimination and forced labour and the eradication of child labour. These do not represent protectionism but the rights of freedom and dignity due to workers everywhere.

Any country, whatever its state of development, can afford those rights. No country that calls itself a democracy could deny them.

The Workers' group of the Governing Body has sought to engender a debate on the merits and conditionalities of a multilateral social clause and that task continues.

We invite all at this Conference to join that debate. All we ask is that they examine what is really being sought, and set aside the myths and fears of international minimum wages, of closed markets which prejudice the thinking and yet form no part of what we seek.

Mr. MOGULTAY (Minister of Justice, Turkey) – I would, at the outset, like to congratulate you, Mr. President, and the other members of the bureau, on your election to your respective important positions.

We are fully convinced that our deliberations will progress successfully under your wise and able guidance.

I would also like to welcome the Gambia and Saint Vincent and the Grenadines as new Members of the ILO.

The 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference is convening at a time when not only labour and employment matters but also the whole spectrum of social issues are being addressed with increased attention throughout the world and taken up with fresh vigour by the world community.

We highly commend the Director-General for his excellent and stimulating Report. We consider this Report as a turning point with regard to the ILO's functions. Henceforth, these functions cannot and should not be confined to working life. Indeed the ILO and its tripartite structure can serve perfectly as an ideal medium for improving both economic and social development.

Although international trade development, increasing capital and labour mobility, astonishing technological progress, increasing labour productivity, greater economic interdependence and market economy expansion – all elements of globalization – may indeed lead to increased and more equitably distributed wealth, they may also cause increased unemployment, a decline of the welfare state, disruption of social integrity and greater inequality.

The social improvements and changes called for by the economic restructuring initiated in the 1980s have not really materialized. A more balanced approach attributing to social development the role it deserves has, however, emerged in the 1990s. Consequently, the holistic nature of development and the interdependence and interaction of economic and social factors are now becoming more apparent in the world.

The nature of economic development is presently undergoing a radical transformation which may even, in some respects, be compared to the Industrial Revolution. The most effective force leading this transformation is technological progress which is changing fundamentally the physical and social parameters of production, practically defying the limiting factors of time and space and reflecting the most advanced qualities of human intellect and creativity.

Let us not forget that technological progress is, in essence, not merely a technical but also a social process, the driving force of technological progress being investment in human capital. In this respect, the reference to the "new growth theories" made in the Director-General's Report deserves particular mention. Similarly, the importance attached in the Report to macro-economic stability from the viewpoint of achieving and sustaining high growth rates is very significant.

In a process in which the market mechanisms and the internationalization of economies are expanding further, technological progress is creating extraordinary opportunities for economic and social development. However, it may not be realistic to expect these extraordinary opportunities to automatically come to life sheerly by the play of market forces. The new development process requires determination of a number of orientations that reflect society's interests. Consequently, one of the most important targets for the new development process must be to ensure that the market functions according to fair rules.

Equality of opportunity is therefore a major driving force in the functioning of both the market and society as a whole. In this context, equality of opportunity in education is at present as important a target as fair income distribution.

The same applies to employment. A process in which competition creates continuous higher unemployment would not ensure the benefits expected from economic development. Multidimensional innovative policies need to be applied so as to increase productive employment, unleash the creative potential of the labour force and reduce unemployment. It seems that, unless the technological and economic progress we are experiencing is really accompanied by proportionate social development, it may inevitably result in unemployment. This is why the development of a socially oriented services sector appears not only a social preference, but also an economic essential. In our view, unless this occurs, the sustained advance of globalization will be in jeopardy.

As pointed out in the Director-General's Report, high unemployment means exclusion and the danger of a breakdown of society. The recent comprehensive reports published by the ILO, the multidisciplinary study undertaken by the OECD and the relevant documents adopted at the World Summit for Social Development demonstrate that great efforts are being made on a global scale in this area. The emphasis on the target of full employment in the Director-General's Report gives added impetus to our hopes regarding these efforts. Furthermore, a globalization process in which international disparities would grow could actually reduce the very opportunities created by globalization. Therefore, at the international level of globalization needs to be oriented in a way which ensures the sustainability of the dynamism of this process which, in turn, requires stronger international cooperation in macroeconomic policies aimed at achieving objectives such as the stability of financial transactions which are disconnected from real sector investments. In order to prevent unfair competition among States for short-term interests in a global environment of merciless competition, we believe we should also opt for a "Common Social Tariff".

Another issue which we must absolutely address is the question of the transfer of technology. The process of globalization is accelerating the flow of capital, through copyright and patent revenues, from developing countries to developed ones. It is anticipated that this process will further accelerate and constitute a new source of imbalance in the distribution of international income. The fact that countries not capable of developing new technologies may freely gain access to them by paying the due cost is indeed a welcome development. Nevertheless, it is crucial for globalization and sustainability that this should take place in a way that does not cause great revenue losses for developing countries.

One of the most effective factors required for employment growth is the stable development of world trade. Improving the infrastructure of international transport and communication and reducing the costs of these services will contribute to the swift enhancement of world trade, production and employment. In particular, the integration small local markets with international ones will significantly enhance production and employment. This is why we see decentralization as an important goal for employment growth.

Another very important area for international cooperation is the protection of migrant workers and their families against the threats of xenophobia and racism, and their integration into the industrialized societies in which they live. There is certainly a need to increase cooperation in this field.

The ILO and its work have probably never been so relevant in view of this new phase of the economic and social development process. As pointed out by the Director-General, full employment is on the agenda, and the most important factor for employment growth is undoubtedly the maintenance and improvement of industrial peace, coupled with the strengthening and increased efficiency of tripartite dialogue. In this context, it is vital for ILO standards to be adopted and implemented by the social partners. We are pleased to be able to inform the plenary that Turkey is rapidly making progress in this respect. In recent years, Turkey has ratified ILO Conventions Nos. 59, 87, 135, 142, 144, 151 and 158. There are currently bills before the Turkish Grand National Assembly which have the aim of giving public service employees the right to organize, regulating unemployment insurance and job security, and restructuring the Turkish Employment Office. Another bill which revises the legislation on social insurance and guarantees state financial contribution is awaiting discussion at the relevant parliamentary commissions. Meanwhile, I would like to note with pleasure that our Parliamentary Constitutional Commission has concluded its deliberations on how to improve 21 articles of the Constitution. Among the amendments under consideration are some aimed at improving trade union rights, reinforcing legal guarantees for trade union activities, and granting trade unions the right to political participation. Likewise, comprehensive improvements have been recently introduced in our labour legislation, particularly through the elimination of some provisions which restrict freedom of election, and with the extensions of the scope of eligibility for membership in trade unions. Penalties linked to certain trade union activities have also been removed. In the same vein, our Government has signed a Decree on the establishment of an "Economic and Social Council", in order to institutionalize and reinforce the tripartite dialogue. All these tireless efforts continue, and Turkey will achieve full harmony with the standards of the countries of the European Union. I would also like to observe with pleasure that our productive exchange of information and experience on industrial relations is continuing productively with the newly independent countries of Central Asia, the Caucasus and the Balkans.

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. POP-ESCU) – The last item on our agenda today is a right of reply. Mr. Khan, Government delegate of Pakistan, would like to take the floor to reply to the speech made by Mr. Kearney yesterday afternoon. Is Mr. Khan here? As Mr. Khan is not present, I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference.

THIRD REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE:
SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – We should like to submit the report of the Officers of the Selection Committee which only contains changes in the composition of committees. To allow the Committee to continue with its work tomorrow, although there is no Plenary, and to enable all those who are now asking to be titular members to be able to vote, if the case should arise, the Conference is asked to approve the report of the Selection Committee.

This report only contains nominations. The list will be published tomorrow morning. It is already available for all those who would like to read it. If everybody agrees, Mr. President, you can submit this report for approval.

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. POPESCU) – If there is no objection, I shall take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

(The Conference adjourned at 6.45 p.m.)

Credentials

First report of the Credentials Committee

1. The Credentials Committee of the 82nd Session of the Conference is composed of Mr. Björn Jonzon, Government delegate, Sweden, Chairman; Mr. Daniel Funes de Rioja, Employers' substitute delegate, Argentina; and Mr. Charles Gray, Workers' delegate, United States.

Composition of the Conference

2. Since the signing of the brief report made by the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office (Provisional Record No. 5, p. 5/26), a number of modifications have occurred in the composition of the Conference.

3. The number of member States of the International Labour Organization represented at the Conference is at present 159. To date 14 member States (Armenia, Belize, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Gambia, Grenada, St. Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan and Yugoslavia) have not sent a delegation.

Accredited Delegates and Advisers

4. The total number of accredited delegates is 605, comprising 302 Government delegates, 151 Employers' delegates and 152 Workers' delegates.

5. There are 1524 accredited advisers, comprising 710 Government advisers, 366 Employers' advisers and 448 Workers' advisers. The total number of accredited delegates and advisers is therefore 2129.

6. With regard to the resolution concerning the participation of women in ILO meetings, adopted by the Conference at its 67th Session in June 1981, the Credentials Committee wishes to inform the Conference that there are 69 women among the 605 delegates accredited to the Conference and 268 women among the 1524 accredited advisers. The total number of women accredited to the Conference is therefore 337 as against 320 last year.

Registered Delegates and Advisers

7. The following is the present situation concerning the registration of delegates, which (in accordance with practice, approved by this session of the Conference) is the basis for determining the quorum for voting.

8. At this time the number of registered delegates is 503, comprising 262 Government delegates, 121 Employers' delegates and 120 Workers' delegates.

9. In addition, the number of registered advisers is 1165, comprising 599 Government advisers, 236 Employers' advisers and 330 Workers' advisers. The total number of registered delegates and advisers is therefore 1668.

Quorum

10. Thirty-three advisers, who are substitutes to delegates who have not registered, are taken into account in calculating the voting strength of the Conference.

11. Since 22 States¹ represented at the Conference are in arrears in the payment of their financial contributions to the Organisation so as to come within the terms of paragraph 4 of Article 13 of the Constitution, these States may not at present participate in the voting in the Conference or in its committees. The 52 registered delegates designated by these States are hence not taken into consideration in fixing the quorum. In addition, one registered Employer' delegate and one registered Workers' delegate are not taken into account in the calculation of the quorum because of the provisions of article 4, paragraph 2, of the Constitution.

12. At the present time the quorum required to give a vote validity is 241.

13. The Committee notes that the quorum calculated on the basis of the number of accredited delegates would be 264. The difference between the quorum calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered and that which could have been calculated on the basis of the number of accredited delegates is due to the fact that some accredited delegates have not yet registered. The Committee urgently appeals to delegates present at the Conference to register so that the quorum will be as nearly exact as possible and that their presence can be taken into account in its calculation.

Incomplete Delegations

14. The Committee notes that, at the present time, the delegations of six countries (Afghanistan, Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Dominica, Ethiopia, Liberia, Rwanda) are exclusively governmental. In addition, The Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia has nominated a Workers' delegate but not an Employers' delegate and Lesotho has nominated an Employers' delegate but not a Workers' delegate. Georgia has, to date, only nominated a Workers' delegate. The Committee wishes to affirm once again the necessity for governments to comply with the requirement of Article 3 of the Constitution that a complete tripartite delegation be sent to the Conference. The Committee recalls that pursuant to a decision of the Governing Body, the Director-General each year requests the governments of all member States which did not send complete tripartite delegations to the Conference to indicate the reasons for their failure to do so, and that the information received in reply to that request is duly communicated to the Governing Body.

15. The Committee also notes that there is some imbalance between the number of advisers to the delegates of each group and also between the number of Employers' and Workers' advisers. It once again urges governments to take greater account, when nominating delegations, of the proportions in the composition of the Conference envisaged by paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 3 of the Constitution. The Committee further recalls the request contained in the resolution concerning the strengthening of tripartism in the overall activities of the International Labour Organization, adopted by the Conference in 1971, and expresses the hope that Governments will accord equal treatment to each of the groups when appointing advisers to their country's delegation to the International Labour Conference. The Committee recalls in this connection the obligation of Members under Article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution, to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers and trusts that this obligation will be respected for the whole duration of the Conference.

Observers

16. Since the Brief Report of the Chairman of the Governing Body, the Government of Vanuatu has informed the Secretary-General of the Conference that it is unable to send the envisaged observer delegation, and the Government of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea has nominated an observer delegation.

Organizations and Liberation Movement Invited

17. The Conference is also being attended by:
- representatives of the United Nations and some of its organs invited by virtue of Article II, paragraph (1) - relating to reciprocal representation of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Labour Organization, which came into effect on 14 December 1946;

- representatives of specialized agencies and other official international organizations, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(b), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.
- representatives of non-governmental international organizations with which consultative relations have been established, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of other non-governmental international organizations also invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of a liberation movement invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(k), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

18. A list of these representatives is appended to the List of Delegations published as a Supplement to the Provisional Record of the Conference.

Objections²

19. To date, the Committee has before it a number of objections or communications concerning the credentials of certain delegates and advisers. The Committee considers it important that governments utilise the suggested form for credentials of delegates, enclosed with the letter of convocation and the Memorandum communicated to governments every year prior to the session of the Conference. In order to comply with article 3, paragraph 5 of the Constitution, it would be necessary that Governments provide exact information on the employers' and workers' organizations consulted in nominating Employers' and Workers' delegates and advisers as well as on the organizations which have agreed to such nominations.

20. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

President: Mr. Rosales Argüello, Mr. Popescu

RATIFICATION OF CONVENTIONS BY POLAND AND TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO

The PRESIDENT – First of all, I should like to inform you that the Director-General of the ILO has noted ratification of the following international labour Conventions. Poland has ratified the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), and the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147). Trinidad and Tobago has ratified the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). The total number of ratifications of international labour Conventions is now 6,204.

The PRESIDENT – We shall now resume our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Report of the Director-General.

Mr. PARK (Workers' delegate, Republic of Korea) – Allow me, on behalf of Korean workers, to congratulate the President on his unanimous election to preside over this session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to extend my deepest appreciation to the Director-General who presented the analysis of the current world employment situation today, and the policy and the way in which the international community should work together to resolve these problems.

According to the Report of the Director-General, the high rate of unemployment in the industrialized countries and widespread unemployment and poverty in the developing and least developed countries, resulting in idle human resources and suffering workers, are causing social exclusion and inequality within and between countries. The challenge before us demands even closer international coordination and cooperation for it to be solved.

Since globalization is the salient trend in the world today, it is no longer possible for a country to maintain an isolationist attitude, and only to pursue its own national interests. It would appear that the famous phrase from the Declaration of Philadelphia, "Poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere", is more relevant than ever in the era of globalization.

In this respect, it is imperative for workers to have productive jobs. National economic policy should set as a priority the attainment of full employment as advocated in the Declaration of Philadelphia and in the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). It is also important to ensure an even distribution of costs and benefits, and to define a policy which can make the global economic system function effectively under stable trade and financial institutions.

Korea, one of the newly industrialized countries the Director-General mentioned in his Report, has achieved persistent economic development since the 1960s, and at present the situation is that some industrial sectors are in labour shortage. However, Korea is also partly going through employment insecurity.

Firstly, even though the development of labour-intensive industries had significantly contributed to employment creation, over the past ten years there has been a steady improvement of wage levels, and through rapid industrialization the pool of low wage labour has run dry. This change in the labour market has led to the bankruptcy of some small and medium-sized companies, and domestic capital flight to low wage countries.

Secondly, the introduction of new technology has also been affecting the employment situation. These new trends have led to unemployment. Workers have had to be retrained for their adaptation to new technology, and those who lost their jobs have had to participate in vocational training in order to find alternative employment.

Thirdly, as we now see it as an international situation, Korea is reaching the stage where it will prepare protective measures for part-time workers, and also for home workers – a subject which is on the agenda of this year's session of the International Labour Conference for its first discussion.

Fourthly, management rationalization and privatization of state enterprises as a part of structural adjustment programmes in line with economic liberalization are also causing workers to be apprehensive about redundancy, which is becoming a present and potential cause for labour disputes.

Given the importance of employment, the effectiveness of a unilateral effort by one party to address this problem will not be enough. The Government should exert its full commitment for the improvement of employment policy, and should invite the tripartite parties to combine their efforts to resolve the problem through consultation and cooperation based on tripartism.

In this vein, in February 1990, the Federation of Korean Trade Unions proposed to the Government and to the employers' organization that they should form a tripartite body to deal exclusively with economic and social issues. However, our initiative could not achieve the full success we had wished, as the Government remained reserved in its participation. The National Economic and Social Council was established with the participation of the representatives of labour, management and public interests. Without the participation of the Government in this Council, the conclusions of the Council were often limited in terms of being adopted as policy. However, the role of the National Economic and Social Council cannot be underestimated, since it made remarkable contributions to various policy-making processes by providing relevant viewpoints on such issues as legislation relating to the employment insurance scheme, the reform of the taxation system and workers' housing policy. It is believed that the firm rooting of the tripartite consultation system and its extended application can contribute to the enhancement of workers' economic status and social development.

Next I would like to touch upon the Korean experience, the situation of foreign workers and foreign direct investment. Up to the late 1980s, Korea was a typical labour sending country. However, at present, it has become a labour sending and receiving country. As the Director-General pointed out in his Report, most foreign workers come from neighbouring low-wage developing countries, and many of them are either undocumented workers or foreign vocational trainees. As the foreign workers are, by their very status, very vulnerable to any form of exploitation and violation of human rights, protective measures should be taken so that they can be treated equally with appropriate compensation for their work. In reality, however, maximum profit is generally sought by focusing on the use of the low-wage labour force, or the discrimination and labour exploitation of foreign workers, the inflow of foreign workers began to appear as a new labour issue in Korea. As a result, trade unions for the protection of foreign workers are very much in demand.

Regarding direct foreign investment, Korea has been heavily dependent on such investment. This flow of investment is, however, also changing as Korea has begun to invest its capital in other countries, particularly in dynamic Asian economies. As foreign investment increases, some Korea-based investment companies are reportedly infringing on workers' rights, due to their unchanged labour practice. It is time for foreign investment countries to change their attitude towards the respect of internationally recognized labour standards and the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, rather than resorting to the maximization of short-term profits by way of labour exploitation.

The problems in the world today, that is unemployment, poverty, uneven distribution of wealth and social exclusion, need to be addressed at both the global and national levels. I believe that this is in keeping with the Declaration and Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen earlier this year.

In concluding my remarks, I would like to express my expectations for the role of the ILO for through its mandate, tripartite structure and expertise, in the search for the global resolution of employment promotion. I also sincerely hope that the fruits of the discussion in this year's session of the International Labour Conference will be conducive to the employment policy of each country and will contribute to the achievement of international coordination and cooperation.

Original French: Mr. DIARRA (Minister of Employment, Public Service and Labour, Mali) – It is a great pleasure for me, on behalf of the Government of Mali and of my delegation, to join with the speakers who preceded me to congratulate the President on his election to steer the deliberations of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. We are convinced that under his highly competent guidance, the work of the present session will be crowned with success and will constitute a new milestone in the attainment of the social objectives which are part of the terms of reference of our Organization.

My congratulations are also addressed, obviously, to the other Officers of the Conference on their election. I would particularly like to congratulate the Director-General as well as his collaborators on the quality of the Report which he has submitted for our general discussion.

The subject dealt with in the Director-General's Report, Promoting employment, is more than ever a permanent challenge for all the member States of our Organization. As the Director-General has rightly recalled, promotion of employment is the major economic and social challenge today which has to be met by all countries, no matter what their level of development. Therefore, real commitment on the part of all States to achieve together full employment has to be undertaken and the necessary policies drawn up so as to attain this ambitious objective.

My Government, aware of the fact that the present level of employment at national level is a factor of exclusion, has spared no effort in trying to find with the means available to us solutions to resolve unemployment and underemployment. In addition to the consolidation of the activities undertaken in the past, since the national consultation days on employment which were organized by the Government on 28, 29 and 30 September 1994, we have decided to implement a number of measures so as to come to grips better with the problem in the long term. In line with this thinking, we are soon to set up a service to monitor employment and training with the technical support of the ILO and the financial participation of some partners.

This is considered, quite rightly, to be necessary if we are to draw up a national employment policy. And this structure will try to promote a better regulation of the labour market and to establish a link between training and employment through the promotion of the private sector, self-employment and income-generating activities.

My country is also resolutely trying to harness all its economic potential to ensure that all its sons share in the benefit. In order to attain this noble objective of increasing income and productivity, a daring national policy of readjusting the economy, aimed at diversifying agricultural production, the promotion of export crops, and the judicious use of mining resources, has been undertaken. We are aware that this liberalization policy will not be painless because of the structural weakness of our economy.

The introduction of a macroeconomic discipline, which is allowing us today to channel public resources towards priority development sectors such as education, health, rural development, environmental management, industry and energy and the private sector, will mean in real terms that we will have to create productive jobs even at the expense of social tensions however – which, as we well know, have a negative effect on overall economic growth.

We therefore feel that, in order to be able to consolidate any national programmes, the reduction of the debt burden would help to direct financial flows towards our country, and thus promote investments which is a sine qua non condition for economic growth.

It is with particular satisfaction that we have seen on the agenda a second discussion of the subject of safety and health in mines. Mali is a mining country, and we also have problems as regards the safety and health of the workers working in this sector. Unfortunately, matters might become worse following the discovery of the gold mines of Sadiola which are considered to be some of the largest in the region.

The Labour Code and the Social Security Code of Mali certainly do provide some protection, but they could greatly benefit from new international standards. That is why in our opinion, the instruments which are submitted to us are a satisfactory basis for discussion. However, it is necessary that emphasis be placed among other things on the protection of vulnerable categories of workers such as children, on the medical supervision of the workers concerned and the strict identification of existing risks.

The placing on the agenda of the question of home work and the extension of Convention No. 81 to activities in the non-commercial services sector shows the will of our Organization to improve the well-being of workers and to promote the efficient application of standards by expanding their scope. This is something that we must welcome because it is the very quintessence of the standard-setting activity of our institution.

My delegation has noted with interest the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97. To a great extent they have taken into account the aspirations of the member States in connection with the fight against poverty and unemployment, the promotion of democracy and human rights, freedom of association and the protection of workers.

However, may we express our concern regarding the reduction of about 10 per cent of the extra-budgetary resources for technical cooperation. This reduction of resources is a worry for our developing countries. We must take this into account and try to find new ways of reinforcing technical cooperation.

In concluding my statement, I would like to express the hope that the conclusions and recommendations of this Conference – which is being held just after the World Summit for Social Development – will in a significant manner take into account the pre-occupations expressed at this important forum.

Our Organization has been entrusted with new responsibilities in the fight against poverty and social exclusion. In this context we must, thanks to a new surge of solidarity and generosity, ensure that our activities will bring us ever closer to one of the fundamental principles of the ILO laid down in the Declaration of Philadelphia which states that "Poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere".

Original Portuguese: Mr. MAVILA (Minister of Labour, Mozambique) – This session of the International Labour Conference is being held three months following the World Summit for Social Development which, inter alia, considered such issues of crucial importance to this Organization as the problem of full employment and social integration. This means that the importance of these issues and the decisions taken by the Summit fall within the mandate and attributes of the International Labour Organization, whose objectives are briefly to promote progress and social justice and to enhance human dignity.

It is a particular pleasure for me to congratulate the Director-General, his colleagues and members of the Governing Body, because I am convinced of the ILO's determination and steadfastness of purpose to implement the commitments assumed and the Programme of Action adopted at the Summit with regard to development, peace and the social progress of mankind.

May I extend to the President and Vice-Presidents in my own name and on behalf of my delegation my warmest congratulations for their election to their respective posts.

The Director-General's Report, which focuses on promoting employment, contains excellent ideas and proposals that will enable us to tackle the major challenges of this the latter part of the twentieth century.

Unemployment, extreme poverty and the consequent social disintegration are grave problems in my country, which has already been debilitated by the aftermath of a long and devastating war and by its dependency on foreign aid and investment. Thousands of demobilized, displaced and repatriated soldiers have no means of facilitating their social reintegration. Thousands of disadvantaged families and unemployed youths are suffering from poverty. There are few human and financial resources available to meet the enormous challenges of national reconstruction. There are persistent weaknesses and shortcomings in the functioning of national institutions created after the multiparty elections held last October.

Efforts aimed at peacemaking and democratization of the country must be continued. Political stability, which is crucial to the renewed economic impetus that peace has now made possible, can only become a reality in the future if and to the extent that the nation and people of Mozambique can count on the generosity of the international community. Given the unwavering determination and the desire for peace of the people of Mozambique, a successful outcome to the complex and tortuous process is now a possibility. The functioning of the democratically elected Parliament and the constituted Government following the recent elections are now a reality in my country.

Following the enactment of important legislation on fundamental rights for workers and employers and the ratification of relevant ILO instruments, a Forum for Social Agreement and a Labour Advisory Commission have been established to judge the mood of the nation and to obtain the most widespread consensus among leading development institutions concerning our country's major issues such as the functioning of the economy, promoting and defending socio-vocational interests, and economic and social stability.

Among the items on the agenda of this Conference we have such topical issues as health and safety in mines, the situation of workers in the non-commercial services sector and the protection of the rights of workers against unfair dismissal.

These issues, linked as they are to the problem of employment and poverty, can only be successfully dealt with if all nations seek consensual solutions among governments, employers and workers. This is because development of the future economic and social order is increasingly becoming a question of regional and international interdependence and relations between rich countries and poor countries, between developed and emerging economies.

International cooperation and the processes involved need rethinking and perhaps reformulating so that the idea of a global village will not be betrayed by selfish interests pursued to the detriment of the weakest.

The ILO should issue an unmistakable call to its partners in technical and financial cooperation so that their involvement in development assistance results in projects and programmes with visible social impact. Any one of our countries or its people acting alone would be incapable of meeting the challenges of the future.

In conclusion, I should like once again to repeat the very best wishes of my Government and my delegation for the success of the work in this International Labour Conference.

We feel that the new cooperation through multidisciplinary teams will undoubtedly be of benefit to governments, workers and employers of the countries of African Portuguese-speaking countries.

We all hope that this Conference will help to bring about the freedoms that all ILO member States are anxiously awaiting.

Mr. HERMINIE (Government delegate, Seychelles) – It is a pleasure and a great honour for me to address the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference, which is taking place at a time when the world is undergoing significant economic, social and environmental changes which affect individuals all over the world.

These changes translate into employment problems which are so common in all nations, whether developed or still developing. Unemployment is a common scourge which none of us can eradicate in isolation. It is this vision that Mr. Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, has so eloquently elaborated in his Report, Promoting employment. Seychelles fully supports this vision in that the time has long since passed when any nation could solve its employment problems without interaction with and the cooperation of fellow countries.

In this context, the Republic of Seychelles has embarked upon a bold process of socio-economic transition which has profound implications for all aspects of life of our people, and more specifically for the field of employment.

In a small society, the implications of any policy changes do not affect a faceless mass of humanity relatively far removed from decision-makers, as is typically the case in larger social and economic structures. Rather, they affect a collection of individuals with whom we interact on a daily basis.

We face other severe constraints when looking ahead on this path. As a small island developing State, with limited opportunities available for sustainable development, the options to diversify our economy are restricted by such factors as our small internal markets, lack of natural resources and distance from external markets.

In spite of these constraints, the Government last year launched a bold and ambitious economic plan with the aim of achieving the following objectives: sustaining strong economic growth and high employment; creating national wealth and ensuring its equitable distribution to all Seychellois; achieving a higher standard of living, a better quality of life and greater integration into the international economy.

The strategy we have adopted to implement our economic plan is encompassed in our vision of "Seychelles Incorporated", in which we are committed to see "a nation at work, a nation creating wealth and a nation enjoying the merits of its hard work". A dynamic partnership is being forged between the Government and the private sector, between employers and employees, between leaders and the people. The role of the Government is changing to that of a facilitator and a catalyst, while the private sector is expected to take the lead in development.

What are the details of this strategy?

In order to encourage local and foreign investors to join in the partnership, a gamut of incentives has been introduced.

We have enacted investment promotion legislation which rationalizes the eligibility for and administration of incentives for investment. The principles enshrined in the legislation have caused it to be described as legislation to guarantee investment incentives. On the fiscal side, significant reductions were introduced in employer contributions under the social security legislation, and modifications were made to the business tax laws, all in keeping with the Government's policy of using taxes as a means to encourage investment.

Employment legislation has been reviewed to make it more flexible and to better contribute to the new economic climate and to changes in the labour market, always ensuring that workers' rights are protected.

We have done more. With the rapid transformation of both the political and the economic international scenes in our region and elsewhere in the world, we have decided to look outward and spread our wings in the new world economy.

While tourism and fisheries continue to remain the mainstays of our economy, the Government has undertaken to create the necessary environment for economic diversification, through the development of a "third pillar" of the economy. Most important in this respect is the establishment of the Seychelles International Business Centre (IBC) which is the pivot of our strategy for the future.

The four essential components of the IBC are: the development of an International Trade Zone; the incorporation of international businesses in Seychelles; the development of financial services to support international trading and international business; and the promotion of the registration and licensing of certain activities in Seychelles.

In order to manage the planned development, we have established an International Business Authority to coordinate our efforts in this direction. The legislation for the Seychelles International Trade Zone is expected to be debated in our Parliament later this year. This is a comprehensive bill governing the trade zone. It emphasizes facilitating foreign investment in our economy and creating, directly and indirectly, employment opportunities for Seychellois.

We are actively participating in the negotiations on the Indian Ocean Rim, and will soon join the World Trade Organization.

Whilst the economic plan I have outlined is designed to ensure economic growth, the underlining purpose is to create more and better employment opportunities for our people and in particular for our youth. We hold as noble the principle that all our citizens who wish to work should be able to do so. This is the best way to ensure prosperity for our people and stability in our country.

The new economic strategy and increased international competition also create new challenges for our labour force. Henceforth, Seychelles will require a highly productive and qualified labour force. This question is being addressed through a systematic and aggressive training and retraining programme. We are fortunate to be receiving the ILO's assistance and can face the challenges ahead with confidence.

It would not be right for me to conclude my address without making a brief reference to the new international trade regime and the recent establishment of the World Trade Organization. As a small island developing State, we are concerned that our specificities and vulnerabilities as a group may not have been sufficiently taken into account.

While we recognize and support the need for a comprehensive multilateral trade agreement, we are nevertheless persuaded that ours is a special case. At the international level, the impact of free trade will undoubtedly be uneven. In small island economies, indigenous industries are especially vulnerable to dumping, particularly in view of their small internal markets and lack of economies of scale. We fear that many countries in the group of small island nations will be severely affected if the new trade agreement is allowed to be implemented unscrupulously and without restraint.

The international community must seek to ensure that any negative impacts are addressed, in order that free trade can become a mechanism for the development of humanity in general, and not just for a privileged few.

There is yet another challenge facing the international community – that is to strike an equitable balance between technology and the needs to create more jobs for more people. Whilst we must resist any attempt to stifle progress and place unnecessary impediments in man's quest to improve the quality of life through the use of technology, it is also of paramount importance that we find the right equilibrium between the two. I am persuaded that this approach will help avoid mass redundancies and social unrest resulting in inevitable social disasters. This challenge will take us a step closer to implementing the pledges we made at the Social Summit in Copenhagen earlier this year.

I am of the view that the ILO must assume a leading and decisive role in search of this balance. This is a new challenge for the International Labour Organization. It may, however, require the ILO to review its role so that it can adequately respond to the realities of today.

Last but not least, it is only through a spirit of international partnership, solidarity and cooperation that mankind can realistically address and find solutions to national and international problems. And we know that to survive, we must succeed.

Original Portuguese: Mr. FALCÃO E CUNHA (Minister of Employment and Social Security, Portugal) – May I begin, on behalf of the Portuguese Government and on my own, by offering my congratulations to the President on his election and on the excellent way in which he is managing the work of this session.

The excellent Report of the Director-General demonstrates that in recent decades growth of world production has been higher than that of world population. However the distribution of the growth in production has not benefited all countries equally. Unemployment is causing personal and familiar difficulties for individuals and for families, and leaves untapped the productive capability of people of working age; it consumes large financial resources in social benefits and it can lead to serious social unrest.

The promotion of employment thus is associated with the fundamental rights of the individual and consequently should be a priority in economic and social policies of all countries, irrespective of their level of development. The solutions to be found must be durable and just, and will involve productive investment, with the consequent creation of wealth, and its distribution, through international trade and the changing regional population patterns, opening the way to ensuring well-being and peace.

Free trade is not an end in itself. On the contrary, the development of international trade should be a way of raising standards of living. We believe that it is desirable to combine liberalization of international trade with respect for minimum social standards. To this effect it is necessary to ensure compliance with the fundamental rights of people in the workplace recognized in many important standard-setting instruments adopted by the ILO.

Acceptance of the social dimension in international trade does not mean promoting protection by other means. Nor does it signify eliminating the competitive advantages of developing countries. Although human skills and social structures cannot be adopted as fast as investment can be shifted or as technology and productive patterns can be changed, it is desirable nevertheless that international trade between regions with different labour costs should allow a convergence between their different economic and social levels and should contribute to the promotion of the intrinsic dignity of the individual by ensuring the right to work, to social protection and to leisure.

In order to promote employment, it is indispensable that human resources be developed through systems of education and vocational training. Education is the most important way of ensuring that there be equality of opportunity irrespective of the social status of those involved, but it is also desirable to reduce inequality through a "second chance" provided by the system of vocational training.

The organization of the vocational training systems should ensure that young people do have an initial qualification so that they can gain access to the job market, and should provide all workers with the possibility of diversifying or re-gearing their qualifications throughout their working life.

To this effect the Portuguese Government has undertaken a medium-term programme which will cover about 2 million people, that is one-fifth of the population of our country. We are also developing a programme of local development initiatives which supports specific projects with a direct job creation effect in urban and rural areas, to recover and preserve regional crafts to discourage emigration from less developed areas, and to support micro- and one-person enterprises. Support for craft activities are also an important way of affirming the cultural identity of our peoples at the same time as providing earnings from work.

This Conference will discuss two international standard-setting instruments on home work, the approval of which will certainly be to the benefit of craft activities.

May I offer a few further words upon one specific way of home work, namely the embroidery industry in the Autonomous Region of Madeira. This is an age-old art, which is providing a large number of jobs, and is of considerable economic and social importance, which is subject to regulation under national law and also by the regional authorities, and has been the subject of several international studies. This craft industry has received economic support, for marketing its products internationally and in the social sphere, it has attracted the attention of the authorities with respect to pay and social protection.

Over the last 22 years, earnings have increased in this industry by 26 times which is considerably more than the adjustments of the national minimum wage which was instituted 21 years ago and has since then increased some 16 times.

In general, in the fight to reduce unemployment and to promote employment, it is necessary to reduce the high non-wage costs of labour so as to increase the international competitiveness, of production to counter the trend to replace labour by capital, to combat the informal economy and to avoid redeployment of investment and economic activity.

Recently in Portugal we took certain decisions in this area in reducing, albeit symbolically, employers' social security contributions, balanced by an increase in the general consumption tax.

I do not wish to conclude these remarks without using this opportunity to report to you that we intend to request next year that the Portuguese language be adopted as a working language of the ILO. This objective, which is more than justified by the fact that today some 250 million people speak Portuguese, enjoys naturally the full support of the governmental representatives of the Portuguese-speaking African countries (Angola, Mozambique, Cape Verde, Guinea-Bissau, Sao Tome and Principe) and is also supported by Brazil, and of the Employers and Workers of these countries.

Original Spanish: Mr. ALEMANY (Employers' delegate, Dominican Republic) – May I begin by congratulating the Minister of Labour of Nicaragua for his election to the presidency of this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. We wish him every success in this high office and we should also like to extend our congratulations to his Vice-Presidents.

The Employers' delegation of the Dominican Republic extends a brotherly greeting to all delegations who are attending this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference which, in view of the issues it will be discussing, is bound to contribute to the progress of social justice in the world.

This meeting is taking place at a time of far-reaching change in economic and social and international relations, and particularly at a time when it is becoming increasingly urgent to ensure that standards governing labour relations are commensurate with the globalization of our economies.

We also congratulate the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for his enlightening Report. On addressing the important issue of promoting employment in the world, he sums up developments in this area in the light of the implications of the conclusion of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations of GATT, now the World Trade Organization.

The picture he gives of employment and its impact in developing countries, in traditional economies and in the so-called industrialized countries leads us to take a fresh look at our national policies for promoting labour force participation in productive activity.

In the face of these changes, the Dominican Republic has exerted tremendous efforts to follow such lines despite all the internal and external difficulties it is now having to face, such as the challenge of training our workers, increasing productivity and remedying the distortions created by inadequate provision of basic services, amongst other things.

Our economy is developing in a manageable balance-of-payments environment, though production for both domestic and foreign markets is clearly stagnating, and this does nothing for the creation of new jobs or the improvement of wage levels. We are making every effort to avoid deterioration of the exchange rate because, in view of the structure of our economy, this would mean real wages would have to fall to keep exports buoyant.

We concur with the reasons given by the Director-General for the success of the economies of eastern Asia based on well-devised development strategies in which the maintenance of macroeconomic stability, high levels of savings and investment, a liberal trading regime, an export-oriented industrialization strategy and the successful attraction of foreign direct investment are among the reasons for such success.

In view of all these changes, the Dominican Republic has adopted a model for the rapid creation of jobs which has proved extremely effective. This is the system of free zones and industrial parks which has generated 170,000 direct jobs in an economically active population of 2.8 million workers, of whom 2,398,800 are now in employment. A well-designed growth policy such as this could, in our case, be a highly effective solution; it would turn our country into a centre for the production of goods and services since our workforce is quick to learn new mass-production technologies. Our infrastructure is, in general, acceptable, and we are located close to the world's largest and most competitive markets. Many countries in Asia have used this growth model with a great deal of success.

We should also point out that in our country a new Labour Code has been in effect since 1992. In practice, this new Code has not significantly boosted job creation. What it has done, however, is to secure higher incomes for the minority that is employed. It has allegedly encouraged stability for those who have managed to find work, but it has introduced rigidities into the labour market at a time when the globalization of our economies calls for flexibility in labour relations.

The problems of our economy cannot be solved by rigid and inflexible labour relations, but by increased productivity and growth in exports, by an increasingly open economy, by giving fresh impetus to privatization and by promoting competition. We must improve the purchasing power of our workers. This is a challenge to employers. We also need the participation of workers and the assistance of the Government in promoting the creation of more jobs and better wage levels. An adequate monetary and fiscal policy and the implementation of projects for the development of human and material resources would be of assistance in achieving these goals.

If it had adequate trade policies and policies to promote competitiveness, our Government could significantly improve the purchasing power of workers, who would then be able to buy more goods and services; this would increase the workers' well-being but not undermine the competitiveness of the economy. By reducing operational costs and improving wage levels, our exports, which generate foreign currency, would be more competitive. Exports would be increased and, as a result, so would the need for new jobs. The unemployment rate would thus drop and ultimately workers would have better purchasing power.

In this context, we are eager for the ILO to focus on debating and proposing concrete employment policies in accordance with the specific requirements of each country. We are eager for it to be a catalyst, bringing together the different social actors who constitute it and who also participate in other bodies in the United Nations. We look forward to it preparing initiatives that make it possible for the world community to join forces in mutual support to overcome the problems of unemployment and the scourge of poverty. Only thus will it be possible for social justice and lasting world peace to prevail.

Original Lithuanian: Mr. MIKAILA (Minister of Social Security and Labour, Lithuania) – On behalf of the Lithuanian delegation I would like to avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Rosales Argüello on his election as President of the Conference, and to wish him constructive and productive work.

Having commemorated its 75th anniversary, taken a look back and determined the guidelines for the future, the International Labour Organization is ready to start solving the most urgent of the world's social problems.

This is clearly reflected in the Report of the Director-General to this session of the Conference which contains a profound analysis of unemployment problems and measures for the promotion of employment in the world. We are certain that this session of the Conference will further develop the ideas expressed earlier this year during the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen.

The economic situation in Lithuania, which has now been independent for six years, is similar to that in other countries in transition. Intensive processes of privatization and restructuring of the economy are taking place. At present, more than half the state capital is privatized. Sixty two per cent of all employees are working in the private sector which produces approximately 64 per cent of the gross national product. The composition of the GNP is also changing. The share of services and commerce has increased whereas the contrary has happened in industry and agriculture.

Due to limited investment opportunities, the processes of restructuring and technical renovation of the economy are still very slow. Bankruptcies of enterprises are expected. Nevertheless, there are positive changes in the economy. In 1994, for the first time in five years, the GNP increased by 1.5 per cent. This year an increase of 5 per cent is estimated. Inflation has been drastically reduced and we stabilized our national currency; it has remained stable for more than a year. The above-mentioned economic processes have a direct impact on the situation in the labour market. A constant increase in official unemployment is common for Lithuania today. During the year, unemployment increased from 3.1 per to 5.1 per cent according to the statistics compiled by the state employment services and it reached 12 per cent according to labour market research data. Socially vulnerable groups of the population, including young persons and unskilled workers, are increasing in the ranks of the unemployed. The number of registered vacancies is constantly decreasing, partial unemployment and employment in the unofficial labour market are significant and have a negative impact on the development of normal labour relations. Lack of investment hinders improvement of working conditions. As a consequence, the number of occupational diseases and injuries is still high.

The Government of the Republic of Lithuania has set as a priority the development of the labour market administration system and has established a modern network of employment services, occupational training institutions and labour inspection services.

The employment policy of the Government is mainly directed towards social protection and prevention of the negative social implications of unemployment. Taking into consideration the changes in the labour market, emphasis has been switched from payment of unemployment benefits to prevention of unemployment, occupational training of the unemployed and measures to support employment.

It is very important for us to preserve jobs in the private sector. Therefore, we are trying to preserve jobs and promote the creation of new employment. The National Programme for Occupational Safety and Health, adopted this year, and the Employment Programme, which is in the process of being adopted, will contribute to more effective solutions of labour market problems.

It is also very important today to involve the Ministry of Social Security and Labour in solving economic problems and promote its active participation discussions of issues related to the strategy of job creation, privatization, restructuring and other economic policy questions which have an impact on the situation in the labour market. This would make the economic policy more social.

Tripartite cooperation among the social partners in solving labour market problems is functioning effectively. A network of tripartite councils, covering employment, labour protection and social insurance issues, has been established. In May this year, an agreement on tripartite partnership at the highest level was concluded between the Government, the largest employers' organizations and trade unions. A National Tripartite Council has been established and all parties agreed to cooperate in implementing socio-economic and labour policy. We hope this cooperation will also strengthen our social partners.

We agree to the idea expressed in the Report of the Director-General that in order to seek full employment, international cooperation is necessary and that the ILO has a major role to play in this regard. Nowadays, the purpose of the ILO, set forth in the Declaration of Philadelphia, namely, to examine and consider all international economic and social programmes and measures is particularly topical. In the process of improving the network of social security institutions, the creation of legislation compatible with new economic relations to solve other labour and social policy questions, we enjoy a high level of assistance from the ILO, other international organizations and countries. However, consistent coordination of this cooperation is still a problem. We suppose that regional cooperation could be constructive too. Last year, the three Baltic States signed a memorandum on the establishment of a common social area and labour market. Agreements on labour migration with other neighbouring countries have already been signed or are being drawn up.

In June last year, the Parliament of the Republic of Lithuania ratified 23 international labour Conventions related to basic human rights and freedoms. The experience gained in the process of our preparations for the ratification of the Conventions and their implementation is important for us in the light of integration into the European Union.

We are certain that the cooperation promoted by the International Labour Organization will help us to solve the social and labour problems of the transitional period.

FOURTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – I would like to submit to the Conference the fourth report of the Selection Committee (Provisional Record, No. 4C). If there are no objections, I shall take it that the report is adopted.

Mr. KORALSKI (Government delegate, Bulgaria) – Allow me, first of all, on behalf of the Bulgarian delegation and on my own behalf, to congratulate the President on his unanimous election to the Presidency of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I feel confident that under the able guidance of the President and the Vice-Presidents the fruitful deliberation of the Conference will produce the best possible results. I would like to assure them of the fullest cooperation of my delegation in the discharge of their duties.

I take this opportunity to join previous speakers in commending the excellent and thought-provoking Report of the Director-General Promoting employment. No doubt its topic and the ideas contained therein stem from the ILO core mandate and are extremely opportune against the background of globality of the problem, its specific dimensions in the transition to a market economy, as well as in the context of the follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development.

For a third consecutive year the International Labour Conference is dealing with pertinent issues for my country – enhancing democracy, social security, employment promotion and labour-market adjustment are crucial for Bulgaria. In the initial period of transition a high proportion of the largest plants and factories in the country were halted or closed down. Unemployment growth rate led to unfavourable effects, such as expansion of the informal sector coupled with non-observance of the Labour Code and other labour and social insurance instruments and increased pressure on vulnerable groups.

To overcome these difficulties and negative trends, solutions in the following directions were looked for.

Firstly, macroeconomic stabilization. Control over inflation, a stable exchange rate, protection of incomes are fundamental priorities of the new Bulgarian Government installed this January. As a result of the consistent anti-inflation policy, the inflation rate during the first quarter of 1995 was reduced to one-third of the rate in the same period of 1994. In 1994 annual inflation was estimated at over 120 per cent. It is encouraging that the figure for the month of April 1995 was 1 per cent only.

Secondly, the stabilization of the exchange rate made it possible to decrease interest rates and stimulated economic growth. The decline in real incomes was curbed. For the first quarter of this year the decline was 1.5 per cent in the production sector compared to 30 per cent for the whole of 1994.

The above measures have produced positive effects and for the second consecutive month the employment rate has manifested an upward tendency. At present, the rate of unemployment is the lowest in the last couple of years, 12 per cent.

The structural reform in the Bulgarian economy, the measures to speed up privatization in industry and agriculture, the Government's support for small and medium-sized enterprises, and increased foreign investments will be conducive to economic growth in the short term (about 3 per cent for 1995).

We hope that through an Association Agreement with the European Union and other relations of partnership additional incentives will be created to speed up reforms in the economic and social fields and to harmonize the respective legislation. It is our conviction that integration of smaller nations in European and world structures should provide grounds for mutually beneficial cooperation and contribution.

I completely share the views of the ILO, reiterated from this rostrum, that market forces per se are not able to solve the social problems of the community entirely. The support of the largest social groups and especially the social partners – the employers' and the workers' organizations – is indispensable for resolving the sharp and deep problems which arise in the transition to a market economy. The ILO's values and traditions provide a wealth of experience to draw on and my Government favours the consistent policy of strengthening the tripartite dialogue and promoting law and social justice as a way toward the solution of social problems.

This philosophy of my Government is reflected in particular in the draft laws on protection of the unemployed and employment promotion, and on the establishment of social insurance and health insurance funds independent of the state budget. Amendments are envisaged to update labour legislation and provide full guarantees for basic workers' rights, meeting ILO standards.

We duly appreciate the cooperation of the International Labour Office and its Central and Eastern Europe Multidisciplinary Advisory Team within the framework of active partnership policy, promoted by the Director-General. The present lively debate and yesterday's Informal Ministerial Meeting provide an opportunity to join my colleagues in reconfirming the leading role the ILO has to play in the implementation of the Declaration and Programme of Action adopted at the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen.

To conclude, I would like to extend wishes for successful and creative endeavours at the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

Original Arabic: Mr. GAREEB (Workers' delegate, Iraq) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I am delighted to greet you on behalf of the workers of Iraq. I should like to congratulate the President on the confidence that has been placed in him by the Conference, duly merited confidence in view of his experience, his wisdom and his ability to ensure the smooth running of our work.

This session of the International Labour Conference is taking place after a long process during which the ILO has made considerable progress in promoting social stability, humanitarian relations based on democratic dialogue between the social partners, social development, decent working conditions and education and vocational training.

It is a great honour for Iraq to have participated in that process since 1932. The workers of Iraq continue to share the noble aspirations of the Organization and intend to pursue their role alongside the workers of the world in order to keep up with the rapid changes taking place in the world today. The aspirations of Iraqi workers are all the more legitimate in the light of their glorious past and their considerable contributions to mankind throughout history. However, the embargo now imposed on them has isolated them, has stopped them playing their role, and has plunged them into the torments of hunger, poverty and underdevelopment, at a time when everywhere people are talking about human rights, democracy and social progress. All this accentuates the flagrant contradiction between words and deeds and clearly demonstrates that economic regimes and international competition have become tools used by the powerful and their enterprises to further exert their control on the most destitute whose situation will thus deteriorate to an even greater degree. It is against this background that an unjust economic embargo has been placed on Iraq, an embargo with underlying economic interests which are no longer a secret to anybody, and which are based on the need of the United States Government to have the upper hand on Iraq's share of oil production in the area. This is the justification for that Government to seek any possible pretext to keep the people of Iraq at the threshold of death, or even to push it beyond that threshold. This drama, which is described in the reports of international humanitarian organizations, has caused the death of over a million children.

Moreover, surgical operations are being carried out without anaesthetics, there is no drinking water, diseases are spreading due to the lack of medicines, unemployment is on the increase, and prices are rocketing. This is the situation that the unjust embargo is causing in Iraq, and this is without having the opportunity to enter into more detail.

The Director-General was right to choose employment promotion as the subject of his Report. He has spoken constructively of the changing international situation; of our responsibility to help the ILO to take up the challenges that face it, and of the importance of social development as an essential factor of world economic progress. He also summed up the conclusions of the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen and the problems related to poverty and unemployment, and set forth the conditions necessary to achieve full employment.

If this Conference really wishes to take up these challenges, we should refuse to allow Iraqi workers to be deprived of their resources and to have to suffer poverty and unemployment. I should point out that more than 3.5 million Arab and foreign workers who work in Iraq, and several other countries, are suffering as a result of this embargo.

Given this situation it is perfectly justifiable that we are concerned at the aggressiveness of the policy of hegemony and pillaging of wealth practised by the United States of America.

We think that this policy will widen the gap between the rich, who impose their conditions and exert their influence, and the poor, who are being crippled by debt, poverty and unemployment. We will all reap the fruits of this policy which is undermining social stability, nationally, regionally and internationally and which is causing tensions, conflicts and ...

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to the delegate from Kuwait on a point of order.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-KULAIB (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Kuwait) – In the Name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate! I would like to see applied the provisions of paragraph 5, article 14, of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference. I would like to draw the speaker's attention to the fact that he is required to adhere to the agenda of the Conference. One cannot make statements which are irrelevant to the subject under discussion make comments that are not true. Iraq has not fulfilled its obligations under Security Council resolutions. Moreover, resolution 986 ...

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – I must ask you all to confine your remarks to the item under discussion. Otherwise, I shall be obliged to ask the speaker to resume his seat. Mr. Gareeb has the floor.

Original Arabic: Mr. GAREEB (Workers' delegate, Iraq) – This is not a point of order. It is anarchy and a desire to keep the Iraqi people in suffering. It is not a point of order. I hope the President will put an end to practices aimed at maintaining the Iraqi people in a state of suffering. We are talking about medicines, disease, lack of water and suffering. The Director-General's Report does in fact refer to "poverty" and "hunger" and my statements are therefore relevant to the Director-General's Report. We are dealing here with people whose behaviour is anarchical, who do not obey the Standing Orders. I will therefore continue. The Iraqi workers call upon your Organization and the international community as a whole to put an end to this tyranny, particularly as Iraq has fulfilled the obligations imposed on it by the Security Council. The resolution recently adopted is one which, in appearance, aims at putting an end of Iraq's suffering, whereas in fact it simply maintains ...

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – This forum is not the place for this kind of statement. Please return to your seat. Your time is now up.

Mr. RAJAPAKSE (Minister of Labour and Vocational Training, Sri Lanka) – It is indeed an honour and a privilege for me, on behalf of the delegation of Sri Lanka and on my own behalf, to extend to you and the Vice-Presidents of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference, my warm congratulations upon your election. We have no doubt that your vast knowledge and experience will bring this session of the Conference to a successful conclusion.

May I also convey the warm felicitations of Her Excellency President Chandrika Bandaranaike Kumaratunga and of the people of Sri Lanka to the delegates present here today.

My Government which has consistently stood by the objectives of the International Labour Organization, will contribute its share towards promoting and strengthening social justice, nationally and internationally.

The Director-General of the ILO deserves our appreciation for the theme he has chosen for this year's session of the Conference, which is most timely and relevant. He must also be congratulated for the outstanding Report which he has presented; a Report which is thorough and replete with ideas on a problem that we all have to grapple with. As has been stated in his Report, "anxiety over employment problems, and pessimism over the prospects for resolving them, reign in many parts of the world today".

In many of our countries, employment, particularly youth unemployment remains a major problem. It is therefore appropriate that the theme of promoting employment is presented for discussion at this Conference. Measures geared to alleviation of problems of unemployment and poverty should be accorded the highest priority by the international community. In this regard, the need to promote self-employment as part of employment promotion policies cannot be overemphasized.

Productive employment is central to the alleviation and reduction of poverty. In many countries, high levels of unemployment have been accompanied by a significant decline in real wages. Another discernible feature is the jobless growth which is influenced by the prolonged period of economic retrenchment. Studies have revealed that of the 2.5 billion people who constitute the world's labour force, an estimated 30 per cent are not productively employed.

This global phenomenon has manifested itself in the employment situation of my own country as well. It is estimated that the rate of unemployment in Sri Lanka is currently between 12 to 14 per cent of the labour force. It is depressing to note that the educated youth constitute a large majority of the unemployed labour force in Sri Lanka. This trend has resulted in a build-up of an acute sense of frustration and marginalization of the youth.

Studies undertaken by the Government of Sri Lanka and other organizations have revealed that the primary reason for youth unrest in Sri Lanka was unemployment resulting from the mismatch between the goals of education and the demands of the economy. In view of this, the Government has decided that, although the education system should not be solely geared to job creation, it should, nevertheless, be reoriented.

The Government of Sri Lanka is, as a matter of policy, resolved to reach out to the youth of the country by providing them with technical education and vocational training. This new policy orientation will ultimately result in the effective participation of the youth in the mainstream of economic activity by joining the productive workforce. Towards this end, training programmes conducted by the public and private institutes will be coordinated, with a view to achieving maximum benefit.

As we are aware, the development of human resources is an important requirement for the promotion of employment. Vocationally useful knowledge, skills, work habits and attitudes, which are inculcated through education, contribute in no small measure to the improvement of the employability of human resources.

Past experience of the developing countries suggests that, in resource allocation for development, their social service sectors, particularly outlays on education, have been adversely affected. Bearing in mind that expenditure on education represents deferred revenue, and hence a long-term capital investment, it is important to constantly review the percentage of GNP allocated for education.

An alarming trend that may be observed in the South Asian region is the non-employability of those who graduate from schools. One of the reasons for this phenomenon lies in the fact that education is often found to be irrelevant to the world of work. This situation inevitably leads us to the conclusion that education should be re-oriented towards meeting the requirements of the labour market. General as well as vocational educational systems should be based on periodic surveys of the employment market. Such systems should be undertaken with the active involvement of industry, and integrated with courses whose objectives are consistent with the demands of the economic forces. An industry-led education strategy should constitute the basis for human resources development in developing countries.

There is no need to overemphasize the necessity for human resources development. As we all know, it is a pivotal factor in the complex process of employment creation and improvement of social conditions. This process sets a new framework for the training of human resources as an investment for the future. To that end, it is important for the developing countries to re-examine not only the content, structure and the form of education and training, but also the costs and benefits thereof, and its direct linkage with industrial strategies and policies of individual countries. Let us, therefore, resolve to undertake such an endeavour in the interest of enhancing the employability of the human resources of our countries.

I would also like briefly to touch upon some of the items on the agenda of this Conference, which are of interest to Sri Lanka. In this respect, I must mention that the item on safety and health in mines is an important subject to my delegation. It is noted from the replies received from various countries that the proposed instrument constitutes a basis for a constructive exchange of views. It is heartening to note that a number of countries have indicated a strong desire for a Convention on this subject. My delegation is of the view that the proposed Convention should be founded on the principle of employer-employee cooperation.

Regarding the item concerning the extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), to activities of the non-commercial services sector, it should be pointed out that many developing countries, including Sri Lanka, may not be in a position to ensure full compliance with existing legal provisions due to resource constraints, shortage of trained manpower, lack of logistical support, etc.

On the question of home work, I wish to stress that reconciliation of social and economic objectives, reinforced through practical rather than regulatory approach is required. As our experience has shown, more often than not, regulation might prove detrimental to those it aims to protect. In most of our countries, home work is the only means of survival for an appreciable section of the labour force. It is widely prevalent in the informal sector which comprises the two vulnerable groups, women and children. On the positive side, it may be mentioned that it allows many housewives to supplement their income, while organizing their work in a flexible way to tie in with their family obligations.

I am glad to take this opportunity to inform the Conference that my Government has decided to fully implement the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). Necessary legislation will be framed shortly to make anti-union discrimination an unfair labour practice. We have also ratified the Plantations Convention, 1958 (No. 110), and have taken action to ratify the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Among the several measures taken by me following the induction of the Peoples' Alliance Government to power in August last year, was the appointment of a Tripartite Committee to formulate a National Workers' Charter. I am pleased to inform this Conference that the Committee has concluded its work and produced a National Workers' Charter, which was developed with inputs from all interested parties. This Charter is meant for further guaranteeing the rights of workers in my country. It is my belief that, once fully implemented, it will ensure and strengthen industrial peace and harmony between the social partners.

The Government of Sri Lanka remains committed to the principles embodied in the Constitution of the ILO. In this spirit, we have established a Tripartite National Labour Advisory Council which considers all important matters concerning labour in my country. Tripartism and social dialogue inspire our policies at various levels of the decision-making process as they enable the achievement of progress in partnership, by giving those concerned a say on the decisions that affect their lives.

Alongside the numerous positive developments taking place in my country in the field of human rights in general, and the rights of workers in particular, I should not fail to mention the ongoing process of updating the labour laws of the country. This process has been set in motion, with a view to keeping pace with social evolution for the present and future generations. Its ultimate objective is to produce a single Labour Code which will codify provisions that are presently found in various Acts and Ordinances.

Finally, I wish to wind up my speech on a justifiably optimistic note. I am convinced that we have all come here – and will leave at the end of the Conference – with a strong commitment to strive to work with more vigour and zeal for the well-being of our peoples in peace, justice and equality.

I wish the Conference all success.

Original Arabic: Mr. ALAANI (Employers' delegate, Iraq) – In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful! Allow me first of all to convey to you my warmest congratulations and the warm wishes of my colleagues in Iraq and wish you every success in your work. I should also like to congratulate the President of the Conference on his election to chair this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. His competence and experience auger well for the outcome of this Conference and will help the ILO attain its objectives in the areas of development and social justice.

This 82nd Session is taking place at an important time of rapid and decisive change which has given rise to a serious deterioration in economic relations. This imbalance has led to an increase in poverty, unemployment and hunger in many regions of the world, while wealth and prosperity continue to be focused in certain other regions.

The International Labour Organization, through its tripartite system, is able to deploy the necessary efforts to boost development, create new job incentives and eliminate unemployment, particularly in the developing countries which are the most vulnerable.

The subject of the Director-General's Report, Promoting employment, is of cardinal importance. The proposals and ideas contained in this Report are at the heart of the concerns of this Organization, whose aim it is to help create new jobs and to improve the employment situation as a whole. This requires a joint effort on the part of both the industrialized and the developing countries. The agenda of the Conference contains a number of items seeking to promote dialogue between the three partners in production and to provide adequate working conditions for workers so as to improve production and quality. In this context, the employers of Iraq would like to say that: first, we are in favour of international labour standards pertaining to safety and health in mines; and second, we are in favour of international labour on home work to protect home workers and encourage them to improve their production and quality.

The global development programmes introduced in our country in the 1970s and 1980s led to full employment in Iraq at that time. We even had to recruit foreign workers – from the Arab world and elsewhere. The private sector was particularly flourishing. Unfortunately, the economic blockade of Iraq, which has been unjustly imposed upon us, has taken its toll and resulted in factories almost coming to a standstill because of a lack of raw materials. This has meant that we have had to terminate contracts of Arab and foreign workers, who have had to return home. The blockade is thus one of the major causes of unemployment among the ranks of Iraqis and immigrant workers. It is for this reason that the international community should take a firm stand and lift the blockade to allow Iraq to pursue its development and achieve economic growth, as well as to renew trade links with countries throughout the world – and their enterprises.

Original Arabic: Mr. OULD MOHAMED VALL (Minister of the Public Service, Labour, Youth and Sports, Mauritania) – In the Name of God the Merciful and Compassionate. May I begin by congratulating the President on behalf of my country, the Islamic Republic of Mauritania, on his election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference, and may I also extend congratulations to his country, Nicaragua, with whom we have deep-rooted and sincere friendly relations.

We are confident that thanks to his experience, he will lead the work of this Conference to a successful conclusion.

I should also like to extend my thanks to the Director-General of the International Labour Office and to his staff for their efforts in efficiently preparing the work of our Conference.

And I should also like to extend a welcome to all those countries who have joined since the last session of the Conference.

We have examined the Director-General's Report concerning the need to promote employment worldwide, taking an objective look at the reasons underlying this problem as well as its implications, bearing in mind the statistics on the current status of the world.

I should also like to point out that, from our point of view, this Report is a very rich point of reference and represents a major contribution and effort which will encourage States to consider how they can assist the international community in dealing with problems of unemployment and all related problems at the social level.

It is not by chance that this issue has been given an important place in our Conference only a few months after the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen. At that Summit, Heads of State and governments placed the issue of employment among the top priorities of their socio-economic policies.

Our Organization is the best possible forum to make the international community aware of the seriousness of the problem of unemployment and the need to improve working and employment conditions worldwide.

In Mauritania, we have of course not been spared from these problems. However, there is a very strong political will in our country to take up this challenge and to establish a political and social climate based on harmony, security and stability by the implementation of a series of development programmes, and by establishing machinery and special government bodies.

In this connection, the sectors considered to be the major employers have made investment plans one of their main priorities. Government agencies have been created to deal with training of young people.

Specialized agencies have also been created for the insertion of young people to the labour market by facilitating the creation of small and medium-sized enterprises.

We have also stressed the implementation of state-approved projects in order to employ large numbers of the jobless.

Human resources in our country have been given special attention. We have, for example, stressed handicraft, technical and vocational training in order to make them compatible with market needs.

We are naturally having to count on our own resources and redouble our national efforts in order to create job and work possibilities. However, the interdependence of today's world makes international cooperation extremely important.

For years now the world has dealt with political and economic issues to the detriment of essential social issues. Thus nowadays it is important to convince decision-takers of the need for cooperation, especially in extending help to developing countries implementing structural adjustment programmes or that are labouring under the burden of debt, which thus limits their ability to combat unemployment. This is also why they suffer even more from poverty and destitution.

We hope that at the international level we will be able to find the means which will enable these enormous social disparities between the different peoples of the world to be eliminated. The interests of all countries are closely linked, and our world is characterized by international relations that are both global and interactive.

(Mr. Popescu takes the Chair).

Mr. NACOLA (Minister for Labour and Industrial Relations, Fiji) – It is a great honour for me to address this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. Like other distinguished delegates who have spoken before me, I extend my very warm and sincere congratulations to the President of this Conference for his election to this high office. He has amply demonstrated a great ability and efficiency in the last few days, which I am sure will go a long way towards ensuring the smooth running and success of this Conference. I also extend congratulations to the two Vice-Presidents and all those who have been elected to hold office this year.

I am very happy to guarantee the cooperation and support of the Fiji delegation in completing the tasks which face all of us here at this Conference.

This year's Report of the Director-General is devoted to a social policy theme. That is timely, for this is the first year after the 75th anniversary of the ILO, which has set itself the task of defending values and promoting change as its targets as we approach a new century. Towards that end, these words from the Preamble to the ILO Constitution will light our path: "Universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice".

I would like to reiterate, in a world characterized by change, that the compass that should guide the work of the ILO and its 173 member States is the pursuit of social justice.

We in Fiji believe that the ILO with its tripartite structure can help, can shape a world economy where freedom of association and free collective bargaining can flourish along with free unions, free employers and free governments.

This is the true path to peace, as well as to economic growth, social stability and sustainable development.

The Social Summit held in Denmark this year reflects the new challenges facing us in the post-cold war era – alleviating poverty, and fostering productive employment and social solidarity. We maintain that one of the ILO's responsibilities is employment, because we feel that the problem of unemployment implies not only national responsibilities and national policies but also those at the international level. The Government of Fiji strongly believes that we cannot have a successful employment policy on a national scale if there is not national as well as international debate on this topic, which must also involve both employers and unions.

Towards that end my Government has reactivated the tripartite forum where Government and the two social partners participate on an equal footing. While the old tripartite forum was most active in the areas of guidelines for wage-setting and industrial conflict resolutions, the new forum is intended to be an instrument for a strategic planning approach relative to an outward-looking trade policy. The four elements of this policy are trade deregulation, tax reform, labour market reforms and public sector reform. This policy is strategic, rather than comprehensive.

We in Fiji are very conscious of our size, with a population now approaching 1 million. A quarter of the size of New Zealand, and like other small island nations we are vulnerable to external shocks. In that regard our problems should be recognized and our shortcomings understood.

My Government is a party to the majority of the basic human rights Conventions, and we are now preparing to ratify the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87). In that connection we request that the ILO judge our observance of these Conventions in terms of our economic and social policies.

There have to be sacrifices from the Government, the employers and the workers. We have to resort to the so-called "pacific way" of solving crises, for we believe that taking into consideration our current economic situation, we may not be able to fully observe the letter and the spirit of some of these Conventions we have ratified.

I appeal for a balanced judgement on the activities of my Government in regard to implementation of ILO instruments. We are now going through a very important time, a transition period when our economy is trying to grapple with the global changes in the last few years. We are pursuing the path we have mapped out for ourselves. We request the ILO to provide us with guidance so that when all is said and done every citizen of our country will enjoy a high level of social justice.

My Government is conscious of the needs not only of mine workers but other employees engaged in undertakings faced with such difficult conditions. We now have before Parliament the Occupational Safety and Health Bill which should provide the framework for Government and the social partners to work together in ensuring that safety and health are maintained in the workplace.

I should like to conclude by expressing the hope that the current session of the Conference will inaugurate a new era in the activities of the ILO, with the aim of establishing stable and extensive socio-economic relations in the interests of all member States.

Mr. MPAMBA (Minister of Labour and Youth Development, United Republic of Tanzania) – At the outset, allow me to express my sincere gratitude, on behalf of the people and Government of the United Republic of Tanzania, and on my own behalf, for the opportunity afforded to me, to address this august assembly,

I would like to associate myself with all the previous speakers in congratulating the President on his election to the Chair of this important session of the International Labour Conference which is taking place at a time when the United Nations is celebrating its 50th anniversary. In the same vein, I should also like to congratulate the members of the Bureau. I am confident that under their able leadership we shall have fruitful deliberations and conclusions.

I should like to pay a tribute to the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for his most comprehensive Report on the question of employment creation. This is the major and most challenging issue facing all of us today. The discussion on this subject is also timely since it is taking place soon after the recent World Summit for Social Development in which a Declaration and Programme of Action to promote the goal of full employment was adopted by the assembled Heads of State and Government.

Even though the situation of unemployment afflicts developed and developing countries alike, it is acknowledged that it is more serious in the least developed countries, especially those in sub-Saharan Africa, in which economic retrogression has been prevalent since the 1980s.

Tanzania is undertaking measures aimed at reducing unemployment and alleviating poverty in both rural and urban locations. In the recent past, public wage employment and the agricultural sector in Tanzania were the major providers of employment opportunities. Today, the private and informal sectors have assumed greater importance. About 1.8 million people are employed in the informal sector, constituting about 53 per cent of the urban dwellers. It is estimated that the informal sector in Tanzania is growing at the rate of 3.5 per cent per annum, equivalent to 56,000 jobs annually.

My Government is very concerned that the most affected persons are the youth and women who are also the poorest of the poor of our society. Policy measures are therefore on hand to provide an enabling atmosphere for them to participate meaningfully in the informal sector in both the rural and urban areas and also to gainfully employ themselves in the key productive sectors of agriculture, small-scale mining, small-scale industry and fishing. Programmes and projects are being prepared to this effect in full recognition of the fact that the key to success would be to improve their access to land, credit, training markets and technology. We therefore fully share the recommendations of the Copenhagen Summit and the ILO Director-General's Report on this subject.

Providing skills, appropriate technology and financial services to the low-income entrepreneurs and producers is among the most effective means to promote job creation and self-employment in most African countries. It is for this reason that my Government lays great emphasis on formal and informal vocational training for both men and women. The main challenge for us is how to absorb these people after such training in order to avoid waste, and create jobs and incomes; that is to say, how to settle these trainees through self-employment. In these endeavours, we need urgent support from the international community, particularly technical assistance in designing and implementing job-creation projects.

Shortage of capital is perhaps a more crippling constraint in our job-creation efforts. We need to encourage the formation of very many grass-root savings and credit organizations capable of providing small loans to members and perhaps supported by a wholesale credit institution along the American idea of a small business development bank to service these institutional clients. There is enough evidence in the world to show that poor people, especially women, are bankable and that their repayment records as borrowers are as impeccable as any. What is required is a well designed institutional set up which stresses the full participation of beneficiaries with the support of government, local business and the international community. The ILO is, in my view, well placed to spearhead such a venture on a global scale. It is worth noting that, in Africa, a lot of money – especially in rural locations – is not in the formal banking sector and that, if well harnessed, it could provide much needed capital for micro-enterprise development. A way must also be found to prevent the outflow of funds from rural to urban areas, which leads to further impoverishment. Too often funds earned from cash crops end up in urban locations through trading and formal banking activities.

At this juncture, I should wish to make a brief comment on the current implications of the reform measures advocated by the Bretton Woods institutions for most of our developing economies. Available evidence continues to show that, in spite of the fact that many LDCs have undertaken profound economic reforms as advised by the IMF and the World Bank, it is a fact that the pace and scope of those painful reforms contrast sharply with the meagre results achieved so far. The main shortcomings have been the lack of timely resources to carry out the reforms and the neglect of the reforms themselves on production and social services. Hence the reform process has neither removed the structural constraints in many LDC economies nor improved the social well-being of the people.

These reforms have, in most cases, caused social ills including unemployment, increased poverty and crime due to de-industrialization, exorbitant costs of agricultural input, inflation and credit squeezes.

We therefore call upon the Bretton Woods institutions to adopt a more flexible and realistic approach in which reform measures would be based on development strategies prepared by the recipient country in accordance with its own priorities. The purpose should be to build the capacity of the recipient developing country to sustainably help itself. It is well to bear this in mind in discussions about labour standards and foreign trade.

Finally, let me end by agreeing with those who see the need for flexibility in labour markets and employment creation, those who advocate a practical approach such as the use of model projects targeting the poorest of the poor, those who stress the imperative of removing the debt burden and ensuring a steady rise in commodity prices for developing countries. In all respects, we need to exchange information and experiences on success stories and technology sources – generally, what works where and why. And, in all our endeavours, international cooperation remains central to success in combating the scourge of global unemployment and poverty.

Original Spanish: Mr. JIMÉNEZ AGUILAR (Employers' adviser, Spain) – May I begin by congratulating the President on his election to the presidency of this Assembly and I also convey my congratulations to the officers. I am convinced that under their leadership this Conference will be the success that we all hope for.

The Director-General's Report with the evocative title of Promoting employment is a starting point for a thought process which I believe to be necessary not only at the level of this gathering but also in all those countries where, to a greater or lesser degree, there is concern regarding employment, expressed in both economic and labour market policies.

In recent years, the developed countries have been able to justify measures which, although inadequate, point the way clearly towards growth. However, in the coming years, critical phases of this process will persist as will continued problems associated with imbalance between countries and the transition towards a market economy, social injustice, and soon.

Without giving up the objective of full employment, its attainment in today's environment is far from being a short term prospect. This compels us not to turn away from those countries and social groups in the least advantageous circumstances, but we should not lose our sense of direction, and we must perfect the basic tools that will enable us to overcome these critical situations and move towards higher levels of employment.

Our societies are becoming ever more complex. While this should lead us to distrust any single overarching model or any centralizing of decision making, neither should preclude the shared concepts that underlies national decision making and policies.

The essential problem today is to try and learn how to tackle the problems at the global level. This will call for a new culture and a new political vision, greater creativity in all fields of our activity and a joint effort by governments, employers, workers and society at large. Hence, the contribution that we can make to these shared concepts is to identify a series of general principles on which to base future action.

Firstly, in a market economy, action to promote job generation and wealth-creating initiatives falls to the employers. At the same time, the creation of appropriate conditions for the emergence of those initiatives should be the outcome of joint action by governments, employers and workers. Our experience of social dialogue has been generally very valuable because it has given new impetus to investment and has created a climate of confidence.

Secondly, in our present context the disparity of situations and of levels of development both economic and social between countries, is a clear indication of how difficult it is to identify universally applicable policies used. One need but think of the existing economic blocs and how difficult they find it to deal with this situation. However, there does seem to be a clear need for macroeconomic policy with structural reforms, though they by no means have to be homogenous, either in their priorities or in speed of implementation. Economic efficiency ought to facilitate social progress, and the two together should establish the necessary balance.

Furthermore, the implementation of trade liberalization agreements and the increasing mobility of capital is going to call for a substantial competitive effort by countries and by enterprises.

European employers, through the Union of Industrial and Employers' Confederations of Europe, have put forward a number of proposals to improve competitiveness stressing the need to make the economic and social framework more flexible than it is at present in the principle areas of the economy.

In the more advanced countries, the role of the public sector deficit has been questioned as an incentive to employment, and emphasis is now placed on the role of savings and investment. Possible counter-cyclical budgetary policies or the expansion of public in investment should be carefully analysed in the light of the level of development of the various geographical areas concerned. Promotion of savings both on a public and private basis is the best way to hold down interest rates, as an indispensable condition to stimulate economic activity, investments and employment.

To date labour market policy has been based on penalization of employment in the form of non-labour costs. For this reason reconsideration should be given, as indeed the Director-General's Report suggests, to other means of financing social protection systems to cover situations of unemployment or illness without in any way jeopardizing the viability or survival of the systems themselves. Administrative and tax burdens borne by companies in many countries are a clear disincentive to expansion of enterprises or the emergence of new ones. For this reason further thought should be given to simplifying these charges and keeping them to the strict minimum that will lead to a more dynamic industry.

One cornerstone of policy both in the developed countries and in the developing countries should be investment in human resources. Technological advance and the competitiveness of firms, both of which are highlighted in the Director-General's Report, require the establishment of permanent training systems to avoid unemployment, especially in the most needy communities.

A substantial effort needs to be made in the fields of education and training to prepare individuals for the reality of the labour market. The growing numbers of young people seeking employment calls for the adoption of specific measures in terms both of training and of their incorporation into the labour market.

If we wish to keep a healthy, society and an effective social benefits system for the future, youth unemployment must constitute a priority issue. In this context, I should like to announce that in December, in Madrid, in the context of the Spanish Presidency of the European Union, we will be holding a European Employers' Summit on youth employment, as proof that the European business community has a commitment to the young people and their access to work.

In a world of open economies and globalization there should be no resistance by any social partner to the speedy adoption by enterprises of technical progress and the most modern equipment, always in the awareness that this will imply changes in the labour force and will require new forms of work organization. Past experience shows that by preserving positions companies have been hampered or held back in adopting their technology. This situation has led to even greater unemployment through the disappearance of enterprises which have become obsolete and uncompetitive enterprises in technology, human resources and organization.

The long-term unemployed and socially disadvantaged groups should be the object of particular attention. Their situation stems from a general absence of training, rigid labour standards and inadequate levels of economic development.

Finally, an important challenge for employers and workers alike is the need to develop collective bargaining processes in which the role of administrative regulation is reduced, and a new culture of cooperation rather than confrontation contributes to raising competitiveness, employment, and the well-being of workers.

In my country, there is a deep-rooted concern at the high levels of unemployment we have compared with other countries of the European Union. There is, therefore, a widely shared concern to bring an end to youth unemployment.

With this in mind, we have recently, albeit partially, undertaken the reform of the labour market. This measure will not, however, be sufficient in the short term. We also need to undertake a further series of more structural reforms in such varied areas as the public deficit, the tax system and the deregulation of various sectors of our economy. I trust that these principles can be shared by all of you.

Original Russian: Mr. KOLMOGOROV (Employers' delegate, Russian Federation) – The delegation of Russian Employers too feels that the consideration of ways to stimulate employment is a priority. We should concentrate the attention of the world community on this priority as we integrate national economies into the world system. This process should be guided by the principles of the ILO to the effect that civilization cannot be the property of only a few selected States.

The Minister of Labour of the Russian Federation, Mr. Melikian, gave a detailed analysis of the labour market in Russia in his statement. This makes it possible for me immediately to mention certain assessments and make certain proposals regarding the problems which have developed and the situation we have now to face in Russia.

There is no need to prove that employment levels are determined by the economic situation as a whole. In the Russian economy, according to the experts, in the period from 1991 to 1995 the level of industrial production will drop by two-and-a-half times.

Of course, the period of transition to a market economy has not been easy. But who could have foreseen the dramatic drop in production which has taken place not only in Russia, but also in the other transition countries? it is indeed worthy of being put in the Guinness Book of Records. On average, the GDP of the CIS countries was in 1994 half of what it was in 1989. The reasons for this drop were mentioned earlier. What I would like to say is that the assessment of the situation and the conclusions in Mr. Hansenne's Report regarding the transition countries as a whole, are, we feel, justified and objective.

We believe that the decisive factor in overcoming this crisis is a correction of the course of economic reforms. The "economic pendulum" which swings from inflation, to a drop in production, to unemployment offers no future for Russia. We must now move to a corrective economic course, with the Government playing an active role in the transitional period, using non-administrative methods. It must do everything possible to play its part in the modern market economy – drafting and enforcing laws, conducting tax and credit policies which stimulate production, and supervising certain sectors of the economy, such as finance and natural monopolies.

A completely uncontrolled market economy apparently does not exist anywhere. The market can work perfectly and meet demand for consumer goods, but there are always some sectors in which it cannot work at full strength. This is true, for example, for education, basic research, health protection, infrastructure and quite obviously, for environmental protection.

Governments must concentrate on overcoming the depression by conducting a rational scientific and industrial policy, by providing support for certain competitive sectors, by stimulating demand and productive activities and by drastically reducing the tax burden.

Some of the sectors which should be considered as priorities for selective assistance are: food production, pharmaceuticals, products for children, housing and specialized technology. It is also important to choose for investment spheres which have a technological "echo" and will thus create a multiplier effect.

Another important factor in overcoming the crisis is, in our opinion, making optimum use of present economic trends in combination with the specific conditions and traditions of the countries of this enormous subregion. In this connection, it is necessary to first of all strengthen economic relations between the transition countries. The economies of these countries still have much in common; their economic crises have the same roots, one of which is the breakdown in traditional economic relations.

This breakdown in economic relations has accounted for more than half of the drop in production in these countries.

This was inevitable. For we may criticize the defects of the former economic system, but the fact remains that these countries, with the exception of China, represented an enormous and united economic unit. Experience has shown time and again that relations between these countries will always go from a centrifugal tendency to a centripetal one.

I would especially like to stress the conclusions drawn up by the Assembly of the International Congress of Industrialists and Employers, which brings together 28 employers' and industrialists' associations of 21 countries of Europe and Asia. The Assembly concluded that it is necessary to improve the economic cooperation among States, and that a multifaceted approach would be the best guarantee of effectiveness and stability. We need such a system. Mutually beneficial relations should be combined with the collective implementation of measures and actual projects in the scientific, technical and investment spheres. I would especially like to emphasize that Mr. Hansenne in his Report quite rightly spoke about the need for more investment at this key time of economic adaptation to the new conditions.

In Russia, for instance, at the beginning of 1995 investments had dropped by two-thirds. As a result, there are not enough resources even to restore capital funds, and many sectors are on the verge not only of moral, but also of physical, collapse. Capital funds have been depleted to such an extent – 60 per cent – that there has practically been a technical collapse.

This catastrophic situation has been compounded by the constant flow of productive capital toward consumer sectors and speculation. There is no need for me to explain how this complicates structural adjustments to the economy and the stabilization of production, and threatens future economic development. It appears to us that a similar situation is brewing in practically all the CIS countries and a range of Eastern European countries.

What conclusion can we draw from this? It is quite clear that the main emphasis should be placed on a goal-oriented investment policy to generate productive processes throughout the economy.

It is only logical to ask where we are going to find the money for our proposed rescue package, this active investment policy. In our opinion, the main problem is that of private capital. It was assumed that private capital would invest the large amount of money it had accumulated, but so far it has only done so in dribs and drabs.

That is why we are trying to strengthen the State's influence. Strong state support, and legislation, are essential for investment during the transitional period. In that way, foreign investors will also be tempted to invest in production.

During the past year foreign investment in production has amounted to 1 billion dollars but we need at least 10 to 12 thousand million dollars every year.

Of course, foreign investors are scared off by the lack of stability in Russia, particularly in the political arena. However, the threats and dangers in the minds of foreign investors do not exist. The political situation in our country is now slowly stabilizing and a modern standard-setting and legislative basis is taking shape. Commercial risks of course exist but they exist everywhere, Singapore – that is business.

I am not dwelling on Russian examples just for the sake of it, but because Russia has vast and unique resources, bestowed on us by mother nature. Per capita, the resource potential in Russia is 2 to 2.5 times greater than in the United States, six times greater than in Germany and 18-20 times greater than in Japan.

Russian employers' associations are now turning their efforts toward finding solutions to these problems. They have joined forces to find and implement general and coordinated approaches to social and labour relations. They have also set up a Coordination Council for Russian employers' associations which I have the honour to represent at this session of the Conference.

In conclusion, I would like to say that the problem of employment in the world economy, as has been discussed at this session of the Conference once again shows convincingly that ILO member States should not weaken their support for the International Labour Organization, which is a time-honoured and strategically important instrument for "tuning" international labour relations throughout the world. They should apply common sense to the task of defending the interests of their populations and humanity as a whole and strengthen the capability and role of the ILO.

(The Conference adjourned at 12.45 p.m.)

President: Mr. Rosales Argüello

FIFTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – We start this morning's sitting with the adoption of the fifth report of the Selection Committee, which you will find in Provisional Record 4D.

If there are no objections, I shall consider that the fifth report of the Selection Committee has been adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We shall now resume the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Arabic: Mr. BETTELMAL (Secretary of the General People's Committee of Planning and Finance, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. Allow me first of all to congratulate the President on his election to chair this session of the International Labour Conference. I am quite convinced that under his enlightened leadership our discussions will be crowned with success.

The subject of the Director-General's Report, Promoting employment, is of vital importance: indeed our Organization should attach even greater importance to this issue because employment has considerable influence on the daily life of individuals and the destiny of peoples. It is relevant to recall at this juncture the figures and data contained in the Report, particularly those concerning the economic reform policies carried out by the various countries. These figures reveal imbalances in most of the cases and clearly show that failing to take account of the human factor – which is the raison d'être of any economic activity – is bound to lead to disaster. The member States of the ILO, irrespective of whether they are industrialized or developing, should therefore step up their cooperation in order to establish an order based on equality and social justice – thus guaranteeing the well-being of every one. They should increase their cooperation in the area of employment with a view to offering decent living conditions to their citizens and increasing their industrial production; this would allow them to cut down on their imports, which weigh heavily on the finances of the developing countries, and to earmark the funds thus saved for education, health and social security.

During the past 20 years, my country has adopted many economic and social policies and measures allowing it to improve considerably the living standards and conditions of all its citizens, who have been provided with high standard accommodation and improved health, education, and social security services. In spite of the difficulties it has been encountering during these past few years, my country has made great efforts to draw maximum benefit from the resources at its disposal to improve the economic and living conditions of all its citizens; in so doing it has created a balance between the needs of the individual and those of the community and ensured respect for human rights in our society – which is based on the participation of each and everyone in decision-making in the economic and social spheres.

The Great Jamahiriya has however suffered as a result of measures taken against it – particularly United Nations resolutions which have considerably slowed down its efforts to guarantee the well-being of its citizens and to create employment.

These unjust measures have also hampered our projects in the agricultural and industrial sectors and in the general services, as well as our efforts to improve the infrastructure of our country (electricity, roads, bridges and airports). I should like to give a number of examples.

First, we have had to slow down the implementation of our projects for economic and social transformation because of a lack of specialized labour and difficulties of access to the necessary new technologies – both equipment and tools. If these projects were to be carried out, they would create 134,000 jobs, of which more than 45,000 would go to foreigners.

Second, the number of foreign workers employed in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya fell from 161,000 in 1992 to 72,000 in 1994 in the high technology sector.

Third, the embargo imposed on the Great Jamahiriya has considerably slowed down the flow of foreign workers to and from our country and reduced the possibilities of regional and international cooperation between the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, on the one hand, and its neighbours and other countries on the other – and this is true in all areas, including the area of labour.

Fourth, the Great Jamahiriya has participated in the quest for a solution to the problem of unemployment, which is one of the greatest problems besetting the world during the past ten years, by providing quality jobs to foreigners on its soil. But the fact remains that the embargo and its negative repercussions are not only a threat to the jobs of foreigners but also to those of our citizens who find themselves unemployed – in the same way as all those starting out in the labour market. This situation may be attributed to the fact that many economic projects have been discontinued and that it is difficult to obtain the necessary spare parts required for any projects.

Fifth, the movement of labour between countries is positive in so far as it allows for a transfer of funds. During the three years preceding the embargo, for example, foreign workers in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya transferred some 427,800,000 Libyan dinars to their home countries – i.e. some US$1,459,906,000.

Sixth, the increase in road traffic, which has become the main means of transport, has caused a great number of road accidents – 10,200 – resulting in 1,622 deaths, 4,220 seriously injured and 3,124 lightly injured.

The unjust sanctions imposed on my country and other countries under iniquitous resolutions are, despite their economic nature, dictated by purely political considerations. And political differences, which may arise between countries at any moment, are no justification for the adoption of measures with economic and social consequences.

We believe that economic sanctions, which consist of freezing funds and assets, are a serious blow to development and economic systems. It is for this reason that many countries will revise their trade, economic and investment policies, particularly those concerning the import of equipment such as airplanes, because these countries might one day find themselves on a black list and be unable to procure the spare parts they need to operate their factories and aircraft; this is the case in my country where commercial airplanes have been grounded because of a lack of spare parts. These are some of the items covered by United Nations Security Council resolutions. In the future, therefore, we shall ask partners in whom we have confidence to provide us with our airplanes, factories and desalinization plants.

The problems I have just mentioned are due to the embargo imposed on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and we are thus calling upon the ILO, in its capacity as an agency devoted to helping its member countries overcome underdevelopment, poverty and unemployment by means of recommendations and labour standards, to do everything that it can to lift this embargo and remove all obstacles to international peace – so that more than 2 million people of various nationalities living and working in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya are not forced into unemployment; indeed, this would have serious repercussions on the economies of their countries, especially since most of them come from African countries.

In concluding, I wish to point out that we are striving for real peace between nations in order to attain the objective of social development, especially in poor countries. We also hope for greater cooperation between developing countries and we call upon the rich countries to support this cooperation and to refrain from exerting political pressure on small countries.

Mr. FREELAND (Government delegate, Antigua and Barbuda) – My delegation and I would also like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to preside over the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. We wish them every success. I bring greetings from the Government and people of the twin-island nation of Antigua and Barbuda. This greeting is warm with optimistic expectations and aspirations for a world with fewer traumatic occurrences and situations in the coming year. Our optimism is fired by our dream of a new world order, devoid of the atrocities experienced by millions of people during the past year, such as in Rwanda. These are images we must all work harder to erase from the human experience.

The ILO has been the conscience of the world in the fight against the abuse of human rights and dignity since 1919; today, we may rejoice in this Organization's integrity and faithfulness to the ideals of its Constitution, as articulated by the 1944 Declaration of Philadelphia. The ILO, through its International Labour Conference, has positively enhanced the opportunity for the quality of life and the availability of employment for the world's people. This premise is now recognized as the possible panacea for the alleviation of some of the negative situations and occurrences which presently plague humankind.

As the Minister of Labour in my twin-island State for the past 19 consecutive years, I have witnessed and experienced the dynamism of the labour portfolio, especially in managing and creating effective labour relations and industrial policies which focus on and foster employment policies and in providing direction for policies based on the tripartite process, structure and expectation. It has been my positive experience that abiding by the principles of international labour standards results in positive, peaceful and productive industrial relations. The spin-off of such an environment is the mutual recognition that labour should not be perceived as a commodity. This recognition results in a highly attractive environment for the creation of employment.

Antigua and Barbuda agree with the Director-General's Report. In his Report to this session entitled Promoting employment, he states that: "These highly favourable outcomes were largely due to the successful development strategies followed by these countries. The main elements of these included the maintenance of macroeconomic stability, high levels of savings and investment, a liberal trading regime, an export-oriented industrialization strategy, and the successful attraction of foreign direct investment".

Our analysis of this conclusion of the Director-General reveals a close alignment with the vision of Antigua and Barbuda. Today, some of the elements in the Director-General's conclusions are already operative for us, and others are being considered for the future. In Antigua and Barbuda we recognize the correlation between rapid growth in labour-intensive activities and the realization of full employment. We further recognize the relationship between full employment and an improved socio-economic status of our people. In support of this recognition, the Government has encouraged and has attracted foreign direct investment in our main industry, tourism. In turn, the resultant creation of employment has over the years been beneficial to the people of the country, especially through the spin-off effect. We are prepared to accept the Director-General's timely advice, as it is relevant to local needs, infrastructure and applicability. It is important for the ILO as this century draws to a close to be ready to provide the requested technical direction as requested by national governments for the realization of full employment. The Government of Antigua and Barbuda now sounds its intention to achieve this goal. We believe this to be in line with the outcome of the recent World Summit for Social Development, as it was commented on by the Director-General in his speech at this session of the Conference. I believe this Conference must include the principles of the Summit's Declaration in its deliberations, especially in the context of the mandate of Heads of State and governments, and I quote: "to promote the goal of full employment as a basic priority of economic and social policies, and to enable all men and women to attain secure and sustainable livelihoods through freely chosen productive employment and work".

Recognizing the crucial role of ministries of labour in the governmental structure, the Summit decided that: "the International Labour Organization, which because of its mandate, tripartite structure and expertise, has a special role to play in the field of employment and social development, [is] to contribute to the implementation of the Programme of Action".

It is noteworthy that the Summit placed the creation of full employment at the centre of strategies and policies of governments, and that such goals and expectations must reflect full respect for workers' rights within the range of the tripartite system. We believe that the articulation of the Summit is laudable, and must be fully supported in the spirit of the Declaration of Philadelphia, which specifically declared the following three principles: labour is not a commodity; freedom of expression and of association are essential to sustained progress; poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere.

Antigua and Barbuda therefore understand the critical role of the ILO for the successful outcome of the objectives and goals of the World Summit, as outlined by the Governing Body in its March-April 1995 report. That report states: "The ILO should be prepared to assist countries in their request in formulating their strategies to attain the goals set by the Summit in the field of employment and labour policy, and in monitoring progress towards these goals. It would do so in cooperation with its tripartite constituency in member States, in the framework of its active partnership policy".

Our National Labour Board, the tripartite mechanism of our nation, was reactivated in 1994 after a short dormancy, in an effort to attain similar goals. We are therefore in line with the ILO's mandate and direction to alleviate poverty. On a national level, we have already implemented the following programmes to alleviate the woes of poverty: an all-out effort towards full employment; social programmes to assist the elderly and orphans at home; institutional social programmes to assist the elderly and underprivileged youths; skills-oriented programmes to prepare our citizens for productive employment; and social and employment-oriented programmes for disabled persons.

The 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference has special meaning for me, as it ushers in my 20th consecutive year as Minister of Labour in Antigua and Barbuda. It has brought home to me the fact that abiding by the principles of the international labour standards will be invaluable for my country if we are to experience development and social justice. Our Labour Code, Civil Service Act, Social Security Act and many other instruments of labour legislation reflect our firm commitment to comply with these standards. As of this year, we are ratifying all relevant Conventions.

I take this opportunity to wish this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference fruitful deliberations and productive conclusions. Let us work together so that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity".

Original Portuguese: Mr. BALDE (Minister of Public Administration and Labour, Guinea-Bissau) – It is an honour for me to be able to take part in the work of this International Labour Conference and I should like to avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate President Rosales Argüello, on behalf of my Government, my delegation and in my own personal capacity on his election to the presidency of this Conference, in just recognition of his merits throughout a brilliant career. I should also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents of the Conference.

The Director-General's Report reflects concerns felt by all members of the international community, and in particular it echoes the concerns felt by a citizen of one of the ten poorest countries in this world. Because of changes in our country's political and socio-economic fields, and because of institutional and legal changes which are helping to move the country closer towards democracy, we are able to meet the daily challenges facing our young democracy.

In spite of some progress which has been achieved, we are still faced with countless challenges in seeking the social justice to which all of us aspire. We nevertheless cannot speak of social and economic justice or fundamental human rights without ensuring adequate levels of training and employment for the citizens of our country.

Regarding these two issues, it would behove all of us, especially those of us who are attending this Conference, apply a constructive philosophy to the debates so that they might help our governments to find the most appropriate ways and means of reintegrating our people into global development strategies.

But there is no such thing as a single development model. It would be best to focus on the problems of our own continent and of all the more advanced countries as partners in socio-economic development.

Another important dimension of development is freedom, namely freedom to choose freely one's social model, freedom to choose one's orientation and strategies without any form of duress.

In that sense, development means strengthening the people's ability to give each citizen the chance to prosper and contribute to the progress of the country as a whole.

We should offer our heartiest congratulations to the contribution made by the Director-General in his work. We are confident that he will continue to deal with the problems facing humanity in an active and well-balanced way.

We recognize that the International Labour Organization has achieved a great deal for the developing countries, particularly owing to its technical cooperation programmes.

The Director-General has submitted a very comprehensive Report. Many of the concerns he referred to were also discussed at length at the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen and we would like to recommend that the Conference adopt this Report.

I should also like to appeal to all Employers' representatives, urging them to diversify their investments in the lesser developed countries, helping them to create more jobs.

In conclusion, may I express the hope that my modest contribution and the contributions made by others to this Conference will be discussed to the fullest so that we can renew our partnership as together we strive for development and the consolidation of democracy everywhere. Long live solidarity and friendship among the peoples.

Original Spanish: Mrs. NAVIA VELASCO (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Colombia) – Allow me first to congratulate the President on his appointment and for the very fair way in which he has led our deliberations. I would like to state my appreciation for this opportunity to express some comments about the Colombian position on the Director-General's Report, on the extremely important subject of employment policy and measures designed to promote productive employment and thereby equitable social and economic development.

At various national and international fora, emphasis has been laid on the importance of employment in maintaining international order. Nevertheless, social tendencies have not always advanced together with economic results. World production and its internationalization, both in terms of quantity and in its regional distribution, have increasingly led to the paradoxical situation of a world economic system with a high long-run rate of growth; yet from the point of view of regional social development, this growth is accompanied by serious problems of unemployment, underemployment and poverty, especially in some Latin American developing countries.

Particular attention should be given to world trade liberalization. The commitments of the Uruguay Round should lead to more open trade, together with an increase in trade flows. However, merely reducing tariff barriers is not a guarantee that economic development is going to be transformed via employment into social development. Discriminatory tariff barriers, particularly against exports from recently industrialized or less developed countries, runs counter to the express purposes to improve social welfare in those countries through the benefits of trade flows.

While recognizing that the Uruguay Round contains important decisions designed to prohibit such practices, its future effect on employment and social development depends to a large degree on the implementation of their commitments by developed countries.

These new challenges posed by the new international order are now added to the problems we have been traditionally concerned with, on account of new forms of protectionism which, if they take root, would undermine the efforts undertaken by nations to internationalize their economies and make them more competitive, with inevitable consequences for employment.

In connection with international trade liberalization and its social dimensions, any link between trade and labour standards through the so-called social clause, could represent the imposition of restraints on the free trade by industrialized countries afraid of suffering supposed comparative disadvantages due to their labour costs.

We do therefore agree with the Director-General's Report that trade liberalization will create a virtuous circle from which countries can obtain mutual benefits. Yet at the same time we are opposed to the erosion of labour standards as an incentive to attract foreign investment. On the contrary, we must always start from the principle of applying basic labour standards. In this sense the commitment we have to strengthen the fulfilment of labour provisions and to follow ILO guidelines is absolutely clear.

After the deterioration of the employment situation in the early 1980s, urban labour markets in Colombia have shown a positive trend. Economic growth has allowed for the absorption of the labour force generated by the increased population of working age and by women's participation in the labour market. At the same time there was also a qualitative improvement with the decline in the proportion of informal employment and a slight increase in job stability.

However, the same cannot be said of earnings among newly employed people, or of rural employment. The crisis of agricultural production led to a loss of jobs together with falling real incomes and a growth in rural poverty between 1991 and 1993. Furthermore an examination of labour income growth together with employment, shows that new jobs are badly paid, which is reflected in the fact that Colombia has a lower per capita income, but a higher educational level than the Latin American average.

While it is true that in the last decade economic, social and political reform has generated a satisfactory level of economic growth, we cannot ignore that at the same time social imbalances related to high poverty levels and glaring income differentials between the different segments of society have begun to appear.

In this context, our Government intends to pursue the successful economic and political reforms of recent years, but with the clear commitment to enabling the population's least favoured sectors to derive benefits from them. The President of Colombia has presented to the country a new plan entitled "Más y Mejores Empleos", "More and Better jobs", aimed at creating 1.6 million new jobs, thus reducing the unemployment rate, increasing labour market participation, and improving the quality of jobs.

The new Employment Plan is based on four basic strategies: a macroeconomic strategy designed to reach an average of 5.7 per cent GNP growth between 1994 and 1998, leading to an average employment increase of 2.8 per cent given an annual growth rate of the population of working age is about 2.2 per cent. The macroeconomic strategy is based on sectoral economic policies; a social policy designed to strengthen and develop small enterprises and the creation of human capital; a labour training policy to designed to help reduce structural unemployment, involving the restructuring of the National System of Vocational Training; and last, the establishment of a new culture of business and labour relations, based on cooperation, where both sectors will assume their responsibilities vis-à-vis the goals of economic and social policy, and where they will achieve an equitable distribution of the value added between factors of production, recognizing the worker as a total human being and as a vital element of the economic process, and the enterprise as a community with social and economic objectives which must be pursued together to achieve growth, productive job creation, and the projection of those objectives in society.

Within this strategy the Social Pact on Productivity, Prices and Wages and the Agreement on the establishment of a Tripartite Commission on the Development of the Trade Union Movement, have been signed.

As our Government sees it, productive employment is the main reflection of balance between economic and social development. On the one hand the various manifestations of deterioration in the employment situation are the result of the underutilization of the labour force's productive potential. On the other hand, low incomes arising from unemployment or from insecure employment results in social marginalization and low living standards.

Our country considers that, in agreement with the Director-General's Report, economic policies, especially those related to world trade liberalization and positive adjustment will be major mechanism for the achievement of full employment at the world level. There is in addition a need to coordinate international cooperation for the implementation efforts of basic labour standards.

Within this framework, when Colombia next October takes over on the Presidency of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, it will seek to reorient the movement's policy and strategy away from conflict and confrontation towards cooperation through negotiations to find solutions to the problems of harmonious social development and to global questions arising from internationalization. Likewise, it will call for inclusion in the next Non-Aligned Summit's working agenda subjects of interest for all countries such as the environment, migration, drug trafficking, terrorism, international trade and social development.

An active employment policy, geared to training and retraining human resources, to the improvement of the system of labour relations, and to the extension of the benefits of development to vulnerable sectors of the population, is absolutely indispensable within this framework and should be a major element in the work of all Ministries of Labour and of International Cooperation.

Social policy cannot be conceived merely as a by-product of economic policy rather both should have equal priority. Consequently employment produced by means of macroeconomic policies, embodying the objectives of development and social improvement, but also contributing in their turn to economic development, should be the starting point of the social and economic policies to be adopted so as to effectively satisfy the needs of mankind.

Original French: Mr. TSOMAMBET (Minister of Labour, Civil Service and Social Security, Congo) – I consider it an honour to have an opportunity to address this august assembly on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Congo and the delegation accompanying me to this Conference. Above all, I should like to echo what previous speakers have said in congratulating the President upon his brilliant election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. My congratulations also go to the three Vice-Presidents. May I assure you of our full trust and confidence, and I would like to say that you can count on the full and frank support of the Congolese delegation in accomplishing your noble task.

The theme dealt with by the Director-General of the ILO at this session, that is to say employment promotion, is of crucial importance and is very much in line with the concerns felt today by all member States of this Organization.

Today, unemployment has reached disquieting proportions in most of our countries. The situation is even more alarming in the developing countries, in particular the developing countries of Africa.

Recent developments do not give any room for us to hope for sustained growth in production or employment over the next few years. The economic forecasts of the World Bank for the current decade are particularly gloomy as far as our continent is concerned. Unless resolute remedies are taken, urban unemployment levels will go from 18 to 31 per cent of the active population by the year 2000.

This is a situation which should be given particular attention by the whole of the international community, and is indicative of a deep crisis in the economic systems of most of our countries, particularly because it is so persistent a crisis which has left its mark on the last two decades of this century.

We need to break with classical conventional ways of dealing with unemployment and invent new models which are more suited to the developments which are affecting the fields of science, technology, the economic and social fields, and the world of labour.

It is becoming more and more urgent to adopt vigorous economic policies which are oriented towards employment. Since the early 1980s most African countries have had to implement economic stabilization programmes and structural adjustment programmes under the auspices of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, with the ultimate aim of re-establishing growth and macroeconomic balance.

The relevance and effectiveness of the reform efforts thus undertaken are called into question by many. The restructuring and the privatization of public enterprises, the recent devaluation of the CFA franc, staff cuts in the public service and the absence of job prospects for young people have further accentuated exclusion, have led to the breaking up of the fabric of society and have increased unemployment levels.

This new poverty, a secondary effect of structural adjustment, is the main cause of the social agitation, violence and insecurity which are besetting many of our countries.

As the African employment planners said at their fourth biannual meeting held at Accra in December 1994, what we need is an appropriate employment policy combining the promotion of economic growth with an equitable redistribution of income among the majority of the population.

Promoting employment is one of the prime priorities of the Government of the Republic of Congo. A national mechanism for combating unemployment is currently being deployed. First of all, we are going to revitalize our economy and put it back on a sound footing.

To this end, my Government has adopted an economic and social recovery plan which provides, among other things, for a restructuring of the public sector and of public enterprises. Unfortunately, implementing this plan will result in a net loss of jobs in these two sectors and will lead to an increase in the number of jobseekers, particularly among young graduates.

To cushion the detrimental effects of this restructuring, we have decided to adopt accompanying measures. We have thus opted for job creation and employment promotion.

A draft law to this effect has already gone before Parliament. As a basic component of our employment promotion policy, this fund will help to run a certain number of employment-creation support and assistance programmes, such as the national retraining programme which is aimed at taking care of the social reintegration of those who will be made redundant as a result of restructuring in the public service and in state enterprises. The careers guidance and vocational training programme is essentially based on apprenticeships and ongoing training. The self-employment and small enterprise programme is aimed at encouraging entrepreneurship among young graduates and young people who have been made redundant.

The draft bill setting up the employment promotion fund is one of a whole series of activities already developed as part of the necessary restructuring of our public employment service.

Because of the limited scope for job creation within the public service and within enterprises, the Government is now looking towards the opportunities afforded here by the informal sector. It is with this in mind that at the end of last year at Brazzaville, with the assistance of the ILO and UNDP, we held a first national meeting to discuss promoting the informal sector in the Congo.

The main objective is to establish an environment in this sector which would be conducive to setting up small enterprises and to other job-creating activities. This meeting, which enabled us to inform and alert the economic actors concerned, led to the setting up of a national committee for follow-up which is going to help to develop and implement strategies and policies relating to the national programme to promote the informal sector.

We know that there is still a lot left to be done if we are efficiently and effectively to combat unemployment and underemployment. We are delighted that the recent World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen adopted a Declaration and a Programme of Action in which it specifically invites the ILO to contribute to achieving full employment.

Thus the ILO is placed squarely before its responsibilities and must do everything in its power to mobilize forces at the national and international levels with a view to improving the employment situation, particularly in developing countries.

The African countries especially need to have the necessary resources to be able to implement the Declaration and Programme of Action. The 18th Session of the OAU Labour Commission which met recently in Tripoli asked if it would be possible to increase the budget appropriation and resources allotted to technical cooperation programmes for Africa by giving greater focus to employment issues, training and poverty.

The ILO must continue to exercise its influence with the Bretton Woods institutions to ensure that these institutions really do take into account the social dimension when it comes to the structural adjustment programmes developed for African countries.

Particular attention must be given to training senior civil servants, especially those working in the ministries for labour and employment, when drawing up technical cooperation projects.

Liberalization of trade and globalization of the economy may have speeded up growth and promoted employment. Unfortunately, the beneficial effects of this liberalization have not been equitably shared out among countries. Given the over-indebtedness of most developing countries and given the persistent trade imbalances which thus penalize these developing countries' raw materials and export products, these countries have very little chance of finding sustainable solutions to problems of employment, unemployment and poverty.

After the fall of the Berlin Wall, now that the Cold War is over, now that we no longer have the fierce ideological struggles which for so long divided mankind, the world has to look for greater solidarity and a more human environment.

Should we really carry over into the third millennium all the disputes and handicaps which have so shamefully beset the past century – problems like poverty, destitution and famine? The rich countries must understand that they have an important role to play in taking concrete action to reduce or even forgive the debts of the poor countries, and to abolish protectionism against the countries of the southern hemisphere, especially non-tariff barriers which are built against products and goods coming from the developing countries.

Poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere. That is what the Declaration of Philadelphia proclaimed 50 years ago.

It is therefore imperative that the member States of the ILO and the international community as a whole should commit themselves fully to promoting full employment and to combating all forms of exclusion.

The Declaration and Programme of Action adopted by the Copenhagen Summit constitute an admirable act of faith in this connection. The ILO, whose mandate and tripartite structures give it a particularly important role to play in the fields of social development and employment, must assume its responsibilities and translate this important commitment into reality through its action and future programmes.

The Congo, like many other developing countries, has very high hopes for the future action of the ILO, and within the limits of our resources we are prepared to make our own modest contribution.

Original Farsi: Mr. KAMALI (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. Growth in employment creates income-generating opportunities, increases overall demand and leads to the growth of national output and investment, and thus to economic growth. On the one hand, full and productive employment improves the distribution of income and enhances social justice. It directly improves the welfare of society and lessens the need for government assistance. On the other hand, by improving the tax basis, it makes more funds available for welfare and development activities carried out by the government.

There is also no doubt that full employment can afford better opportunities for the improvement of working conditions. We may thus conclude that employment is among the fundamental factors and also the basis for economic and social development.

World Employment 1995 and the summarized version of this report, which has been presented to the Conference, represent major steps in the right direction if we are to analyse the current employment situation. The ILO should pay more attention to the issue of employment. The report is interesting, but being the first report of its kind, it is naturally quite general and extensive. Any future report can address specific employment issues, and concentrate only on such analyses and details which are action-oriented and can serve as input for policy-making.

We agree with the report that the employment issue should be placed at the centre of concern for all governments. Increasingly, the level and the structure of employment in each country is affected by the external factors. The globalization of the economy, by opening new markets for international trade, and the flow of capital and investment among countries have made it necessary to study the problems of unemployment in both the national and global contexts.

The globalization of the economy entails both opportunities and hazards. The opportunities for developing countries would be increased access to export markets, and hence increased employment and income. One of the hazards would be the establishment of a new division of labour, where multinationals and large corporations with huge capital assets, high technology and economies of scale would be able to monopolize the production of some of the goods and services which otherwise could be produced by small and medium-sized enterprises in developing countries. To prevent this, there would be a need for strict regulations at the international level, similar to national antitrust regulations already in force in the industrialized countries.

There is also a need for better national macroeconomic management and policies capable of ensuring optimal use of local resources, increased productivity and an enhancement of comparative advantages in order to achieve balanced economic growth. These policies, which are part of economic adjustment, can only be fully implemented in the course of time. In the short run they can have disturbing economic and social effects. Thus, the social dimensions of such adjustment should be taken into account.

The management of adjustment, the choice of which steps are necessary and when, and the proper combination of policies, is an issue of extreme importance. It is true that precipitated and ill-designed programmes will inflict unnecessarily high social costs in the adjustment process.

May I add that the ILO should play an active role in the study of social policies. The Islamic Republic of Iran believes that economic growth and development are a means to promote material welfare and the spiritual development of individuals and of society. Therefore, social policy is an integral part of economic policy. The promotion of employment and social justice and the fight against poverty are of paramount importance.

In the field of employment the previous five-year development plan witnessed the creation of 2 million new jobs. A comprehensive scheme to support self employment is currently offering loans and credit, as well as training and marketing facilities. There are now programmes being prepared and implemented to increase labour productivity in industry. Investment is being encouraged and labour market institutions such as the employment services and labour market statistics services are being developed. Various other schemes are targeting rural employment. Further expansion of vocational training, the expansion of labour inspection and the continuation of privatization are also envisaged in the second development plan.

Tripartism has been adopted as a mechanism for constructive dialogue among the social partners. There are tripartite councils in charge of industrial relations, labour policy, occupational safety and health, social security and also arbitration.

I have to take the opportunity to add a few thoughts about some of the issues currently being discussed in the ILO. As regards the need to reorganize the ILO, we are against the use of financial pressures by single countries to impose certain policies on the ILO. ILO policies should be decided in the ILO itself. There is no doubt that there is a need for improvements in the organizational aspects and also in cost effectiveness. Further attempts are needed to redefine the roles of the Conference committees, the Governing Body committees, and the tasks of the Office. Some of the activities can be integrated and streamlined. Some of the sectoral activities can also be undertaken by the Conference technical committees. This session's Plenary can also carry out some of the decision-making and policy-setting that was supposed to be done at other sessions.

The Islamic Republic of Iran, as a major contributor to the budget of the ILO among the developing countries, gives great importance to the financial aspects of the ILO's activities. Nevertheless, as the Conference discussed last year, promoting change should only enhance the defence of values.

On the issue of technical cooperation between the ILO and the Islamic Republic of Iran, in spite of recent developments, there are some problems pending which need to be overcome. In order for technical cooperation, advisory services, participation in seminars and symposia, as well as regional and sectoral activities to be fully covered, further attention is required. We are looking forward to the forthcoming biennium, and are confident that through the activities of the regional office in Bangkok, full coverage of the Islamic Republic of Iran in various ILO technical cooperation activities will be realized.

My country was a founding member of the ILO in 1919. In drafting the Labour Code of the Islamic Republic of Iran, particular attention was paid to international labour standards. As a titular member of the Governing Body, we have supported the initiatives to strengthen this Organization. We would like to reiterate once again our justified request that the existing situation of the ILO office in Tehran should receive due attention, and that necessary action should be taken to revitalize this office. We are prepared to cooperate as necessary in this regard.

I would like to draw your attention to the injustice imposed on the people of Palestine and the people of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The international community, instead of mere condemnation, should adopt the necessary action against occupation and injustice.

Ms. KLINAR (Minister of Labour, Family and Social Affairs, Slovenia) – First of all, on behalf of the Government of Slovenia and on my own behalf, I would like to express my congratulations to the President on his election to chair this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference and I hope that, through dialogue, our work will be successful.

In its publication World Employment 1995 the International Labour Office draws our attention to the burning issue of the growing number of pensioners. This may indeed be seen as a threat to the economic stability of numerous countries which will barely be able to carry the burden of pension and health-care costs.

Allow me to present the Slovene situation in the area of retirement, along with the related problem of unemployment, and our approach in tackling these issues.

In the Republic of Slovenia, we have set up a system of social security for virtually all permanent residents who are unable independently to earn their living owing to their age or physical or mental disability, or who have lost their jobs for reasons beyond their control, as well as for those without any means of subsistence. Most important in terms of their scope are the retirement and disability insurance systems and the unemployment benefit system.

Although the Republic of Slovenia has no national pensions system that would secure for every citizen or permanent resident a pension after reaching a certain age, or in the event of disability for work, the compulsory retirement and disability insurance system includes practically the entire active population, comprising employees, small business owners, farmers, artists and cultural workers, individuals in freelance occupations, priests, monks, nuns and other church officials and their immediate relatives who enjoy certain rights on their behalf.

The Retirement and Disability Insurance Act envisages a combination of the current income financing and capital cover systems, although it is the former which still prevails in Slovenia. This is the "generation contract" under which younger members pay contributions to cover the pensions of those already retired, knowing that once they themselves have reached pensionable age their children's generation will contribute to pay their parents' pensions.

The financing of the retirement and disability system is organized through the allocation of funds on a monthly basis for the payment of pensions and other benefits, and these are drawn from the contributions paid by insured persons and their employers during the preceding month. This financing method will operate without any serious difficulty only if the ratio between the number of gainfully employed insured persons and the number of beneficiaries is in equilibrium. In the Republic of Slovenia, the ratio is deteriorating year by year, even though the population covered by the scheme has been extended. In 1981, for instance, 3.3 active persons were insured for each pensioner, whereas last year the figure was 1.7.

This is causing increasingly serious problems for the Republic of Slovenia, with its population of only 2 million, since it is becoming increasingly difficult to maintain a level of contributions which would still provide a modest standard of living for approximately 454,000 pensioners. Obviously, the financing system must provide sufficient funds for social security, taking into account also full implementation of solidarity between the poor and the better-off, the healthy and the sick, men and women, wage-earners and those who are too young or too old to work. The result is that the retirement and disability insurance contributions paid jointly by the employee and the employer now amount to 31 per cent of the gross wage of the insured persons (15.5 per cent by each party).

Since no improvement in the ratio between insured persons and pensioners is to be expected, the legislation has introduced elements of the capital cover system to supplement the current income financing procedure. In Slovenia, a combination of the two financing approaches is realistic, due in particular to the fact that legislation has been passed to restructure ownership of and privatize the former socially owned companies, and 10 per cent of the value of these enterprises, either in shares or in cash, has been allocated to the retirement and disability insurance capital cover fund.

The current Retirement and Disability Insurance Act also envisages the possibility of optional complementary insurance.

Furthermore, the existing pension insurance scheme is currently being reviewed and we are now embarking on the creation of a new system whose elaboration will involve PHARE experts.

Slovenia is no exception to the problem of an ageing population due to a low birth rate. One of the key reasons for deterioration of the ratio between employed persons and pensioners is the early retirements brought about by our transition to a market economy and the resulting unemployment.

By the end of 1989, the number of people out of work in the Republic of Slovenia was slightly less than 33,800. During the transition period, their number grew by a factor of four to give a total of more than 137,000 by the end of 1993. Nevertheless, this number has been slowly falling over the last two years. It was slightly more than 123,500 at the end of last year and slightly under 120,000 at the end of April.

The average unemployment rate in the Republic of Slovenia measured according to the ILO method was 9 per cent last year, which is below European Union average. Both in the European Union and in Slovenia, the main feature of unemployment is "structural unemployment" with a "hard core" of unemployed, made up of persons with inadequate qualifications, insufficient professional training and women and the elderly.

The consequences of unemployment are direct as well as indirect, and the costs are both economic and social in nature; they do not involve simply unemployment benefits and lost taxes, but also costs incurred by social services, poverty, crime, ill health and non-completion of education.

In addition to providing cash benefits for the unemployed, the legislation employment and unemployment insurance in the Republic of Slovenia contains active employment policy measures which, since 1991, have proved of value in preventing, reducing or mitigating unemployment.

These measures give direct or indirect stimulus to job creation and maintenance and are especially designed for first-time jobseekers, the young, the hard-to-employ and the disabled. In Slovenia, we are especially proud of the fact that we have succeeded in maintaining and preserving the levels of social security that had been achieved for the disabled despite the decreasing number of employed persons and rising unemployment.

One active employment measure that should be mentioned is the co-financing of the creation of new jobs and of the preservation of existing productive jobs, retraining, education and training for the disabled, public works and co-financing the employment of trainees.

In the years that followed our independence and during the period of economic restructuring, these measures have made an immense contribution to calming social tensions and to more rapid transition and economic growth.

Funding these measures from the national budget, together with other economic and social policy measures in Slovenia's development policy, have helped establish Slovenia as a country with economic growth, stable conditions and a relatively high level of social security.

This year, the members of the Economic and Social Council – the employers, employees and the Government – signed a social agreement for the current year, and we will continue to discuss the main issues of unemployment and employment in an environment of dialogue.

Allow me finally to wish you every success in your work at the Conference.

Mr. RANANAND (Government delegate, Thailand) – On behalf of the delegation of the Government of Thailand, and on my own behalf, I should like to extend greetings to fellow delegates and others attending this Conference. As in previous years, we appreciate this opportunity of meeting and exchanging views with delegates from all over the world.

I am pleased to add my congratulations to the President on his unanimous election to the high office of guiding this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that his wisdom will ensure a fruitful and successful conclusion to the deliberations of this Conference. I would also like to congratulate the other distinguished representatives on their election.

The Conference has before it a full agenda. Accordingly I would like to confine my observations to specific suggestions on the agenda items, so that meaningful decisions can be taken.

The Director-General, as usual, has presented a thought-provoking Report. It discusses the global employment situation and recommends international action for restoring full employment. However, the role of the ILO in promoting such international action has not been elaborated. An indication has been given that the ILO will devote more attention to research work and policy analysis to deal with social dimensions of economic policies.

We, in Thailand, have succeeded in our efforts to avoid the more adverse impacts of high growth. The policy of dispersing economic activities to poorer regions of the country has been a factor in this, as have also special programmes for disadvantaged groups such as women, children and farmers. These two policy arenas have reduced rural-urban migration and boosted employment in hitherto depressed regions. Inflation has remained low and domestic and foreign investment has been maintained at a satisfactory level. All this has been achieved without any "debasement of labour standards" mentioned in the Director-General's Report. In fact, significant improvement has been recorded in areas of collective bargaining, social security, labour inspection and labour welfare. Workers' unions and collective bargaining agreements have increased steadily. Labour disputes and industrial accidents have remained at a minimum level, while real income of workers has increased.

Our next efforts will be devoted to improving the income and working conditions of workers in agriculture, family enterprises and the informal sector. We request the Director-General to organize a technical cooperation programme to help us in devising and implementing appropriate measures for these sectors.

In this context, we particularly welcome the discussion at this Conference on homeworkers. We are pleased to see that provision of training to improve the skills and earning capacity of homeworkers has been included in the Proposed Conclusions of the report of the Office on home work. Careful study will be needed to identify the right type of training and to organize post-training assistance. I hope the Office will be in a position to organize a programme of assistance to the homeworkers in the Asian and the Pacific regions.

The proposed protocol on extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), to activities in the non-commercial services sector deserves closer scrutiny. An information system on employment and working conditions in this sector will need to be organized. This is another area where the technical cooperation programme of the ILO can help.

On the question of technical cooperation I should like to point out that the Asian-Pacific region, being the most diverse in the world, lends itself to technical cooperation between developing countries (TCDC). The establishment of subregional multidisciplinary teams also facilitates such TCDC. We hope the Office will take advantage of this, particularly for programmes to assist skill upgrading and income augmentation of workers.

On the question of labour standards, I would like to reiterate that the Royal Government of Thailand attaches great importance to the principles underlying international labour standards. We are concerned that some developed countries and the International Trade Secretariat may attempt to use labour standards in the internal affairs of the developing countries through a sanctions-based social clause mechanism. We reiterate that such a linkage would be detrimental to the interests of developing countries. While reaffirming our commitment to the application of labour standards, we request the ILO to undertake a review of outdated labour standards as a follow-up to the discussion of the 262nd Session of the ILO Governing Body.

I conclude by assuring the Director-General of our wholehearted cooperation in supporting the principles and policies of the ILO. I thank him for the assistance received during the last year from the Bangkok area office and the Bangkok-based East Asia multidisciplinary advisory team. I thank the President and the delegates for their attention – and wish them every success in achieving the objectives of the Conference.

Ms. HOZOORI (Workers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! First of all I would like to congratulate Mr. Rosales Argüello on behalf of workers in my country on his election as President of the 82nd Session of the ILO Conference. I trust that this Conference will obtain valuable and useful results by making a complete and collective review of the Director-General's Report.

The Director-General has emphasized the fundamental and important issue of promoting employment – or, in other words, dealing with the unemployment crisis, which is an obstacle to the promotion of employment. By setting forth problems such as unemployment, under employment, inequality and poverty he has tried to suggest solutions for their eradication. By presenting many charts that show work output and per capita output growth he has given us a so-called “optimistic perspective” of investment, in particular, the miraculous effect of direct and indirect foreign investment. But the problem starts when, out of these discussions, the wrong conclusions are drawn and the only way for developing countries to be saved is to turn to foreign investment.

The International Labour Organization has always acted as a supporter of labour rights in developing countries, trying to make the destructive effects of international trade on developing countries clear. For instance, in the past year the reports indicate that international companies have earned six or eight times their investment in underdeveloped and developing countries. It is believed that with an input of US$1 billion, 100,000 job opportunities are lost. It has been said that the right thing is provide poor countries with financial, educational and technological aid, among many other forms, but the Report of the Director-General is now following a trend different from what we originally expected from the ILO.

The Report has paid attention to the useful effects of foreign investment, unemployment and improvement of job opportunities. For instance, in the subsection “The importance of positive adjustment”, on page 15 we read: “Improvements in market access generally lead to trade expansion, and output and employment growth in the long run, even though the process of adjustment may entail losses in real output and employment in the short run”. It seems that the Director-General has forgotten this reality and particularly a characteristic of developing countries in that their products have no chance of competing with those of developed countries. This is a sort of fanciful view, when we present such philosophic preachings for countries that will undergo destruction of their domestic industries as soon as they open their markets to foreign products. Following this process, contrary to the Director-General's forecast, the world can only expect the destruction of industries and the increasing dependence of such countries on the industrialized world. This will entail increased unemployment and will endanger the natural employment infrastructure in those countries in the long run, and will even jeopardize their economic, social and political stability.

We are wondering whether, although the ILO has published many reports on the destructive effects of this type of adjustment, now it is trying to promote this policy.

In the section on “Foreign direct investment”, on page 21 the Director-General says, “The total number of jobs directly created by MNEs [multinational enterprises] in the world as a whole is estimated at some 73 million, accounting for about 3 per cent of the whole world labour force.”

It seems that the Report has not specified what other measures Third World countries have to take. Following this idea, the Director-General adds that most of the concerns, fear of the future and doubts on investments have been put aside. He states that a total of 73 million jobs created in the world by foreign investment constitutes about 3 per cent of the whole world labour force. Thus the conclusion that each job created could produce one or two more additional jobs indirectly. It is interesting to note that the Director-General has transformed his beliefs into statistics. Finally, he concludes that total jobs associated with MNEs stand at some 150 million.

There is no doubt that this sort of one-sided approach towards foreign investment issues will once again result in more dominance of world powers over developing countries. It seems that this is a new world order in which imperialism wants a world of private ownership at any cost.

It is in this process that we witness an international organization which was the leader of the fight against oppressors and confronting the problems of capitalism, now changed into a means of following the same trend. In this circumstance, independent countries which oppose the dominance of imperialism are being boycotted in different ways. The latest economic sanctions against Iran by the United States is one of these baseless actions. I feel the necessity to assure the world community that the workers of Islamic Iran will continue on their path in spite of this misguided trend proposed by the United States.

I would like to request that the ILO try to lessen the differences between North and South by providing scientific and technological assistance and occupational training facilities.

We know that workers of Palestine are living in very tough conditions, so we request the ILO to assign a group to investigate unemployment of these workers.

Also, in Bosnia-Herzegovina workers are suffering because of the destruction of economic and industrial centres. The ILO must take appropriate measures in this regard.

Finally, before the Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing I, as a woman worker, would like to request the ILO to condemn those economic policies of the great powers of the world which cause more poverty and unemployment, while depriving women of their rights and their families in developing and under-developed countries. Also, that the ILO present a plan at this Conference for social justice for women, since without social justice for women, development, peace and equality would not be achieved.

Original Arabic: Mr. ABOU-RIZK (Workers' delegate, Lebanon) – Let me begin by adding my voice to that of the preceding speakers, by congratulating the President on his election to this session, an election which confirms his diplomatic and personal talents. I likewise wish to congratulate the Secretary-General and his staff on the technical reports submitted to this session.

Please allow me to draw your attention to the principal Report, Promoting employment, the subject of which is so vital and essential that it may become an obsession well beyond this session and indeed beyond this Organization. This obsession concerns labour relations in particular and social and economic life in general.

The Report offers an excellent analysis of economic and social developments, especially after the creation of the World Trade Organization. However, it does not present a clear or decisive enough vision with respect to the right to work, wage levels, the freedom of association and social and economic stability, and other questions of concern to us Workers.

The absence of the social factor from the Uruguay Round is a lacuna which threatens any economic progress which might arise from the liberalization of international trade. On the contrary, it is our view that the World Trade Agreement does not encourage the expansion of employment, but rather constitutes an attack on real wage levels and the labour movement.

Indeed, the danger goes further, threatening all the factors of production and even governments. I believe that the globalization of the economy is a challenge to small and medium-sized enterprises who are essential to economic recovery and development. It is also a challenge to all governments, especially those of small and developing countries who, without having recourse to any controls, will be unable to resist the pressures of multinational corporations.

For these reasons, we wish to insist on the role of a tripartite organization such as the ILO to resist this threat and guarantee stability and development in a climate of justice and freedom. It is the duty of this Organization to work for this objective. However, to do so, as you know, requires the revision of some of its rules, starting with the mechanisms of its own activities. The Organization must also implement the Conventions and obstinately defend the fundamental principles on which it is built, such as the freedom of association, tripartism, the right to dignified work, a decent wage and basic social security for workers.

Lebanon, indeed like other countries, has not a little experience in this area. For example, the delay in ruling on a complaint which we presented more than a year ago, the non-implementation of ratified Conventions, especially the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and our exclusion from a project of concern to us as the General Union of Workers, concerning the labour census in Lebanon. As for the complaint we presented, we have today written to the ILO withdrawing it, as a gesture of goodwill to the new Lebanese Government, to which we have held out a friendly hand proposing a project for the implementation of the Convention.

This project is based on principles which our organization has always supported, namely participation, tripartite cooperation and development in justice. It proposes a National Social Charter to be signed by us, the Government and the employers, with a view to ensuring long-term stability. We believe this project to be necessary to deal with the next phase of the reconstruction in which we must take part, not only at the implementation stage but also in its elaboration. The project also looks to the solution to the everyday problems faced by the majority of the Lebanese people, of whom 70 per cent live just above poverty, and 30 per cent below the poverty line. Unemployment affects some 15 per cent of the population, and there is only partial and precarious access to essential services such as electricity, telephones, water and education, among others. This scarcity encourages certain people to bet on a continuation of the situation and lay their hands on the country's wealth.

Our ambitious project of active participation – the motto of our organization – deserves a wholehearted welcome from all the interested parties in Lebanon, just as it can revive hope for real support from our many friends across the world. We hope that the ILO can join in the launching of this project and its implementation.

The General Union of Workers would like to take this opportunity to express its pleasure at the recent reopening in Beirut of the ILO's Regional Office for the Arab States, and to thank the Director-General for his expressions of goodwill on the occasion of the opening of the Office.

The Lebanese situation constitutes a unique experience of firmness in the law, reinforced by our immense faith in the solidity of our national unity with the help and support of our sister country Syria. But this experience of goodwill and law must face up to the permanent challenge of our enemy, Israel, which continues to occupy a large portion of our beloved country in the south and in the West Bekaa, with their daily aggressions leaving hundreds of victims and thousands of people forced to flee their homes, not to speak of the tens of thousands of fishermen and farmers whose livelihoods have been destroyed by the blockade of our ports and the seizure of Lebanese resources. In the face of this situation, we have undertaken a legitimate national resistance against the occupation, and we call on the international community to impose the application of Security Council resolution 425 under which Israel is obliged to withdraw from occupied Lebanese territory and allow the State to reassert its sovereignty in it.

Lebanon, in total accord with its sister country Syria, is working tirelessly for an overall and just peace in the region, based on the principles of international legitimacy and on the liberation of Southern Lebanon, of West Bekaa, of the Golan Heights and of Arab Jerusalem.

Ours is a position based on law and justice and deserves full support from all our brothers and friends. Let me today reiterate, firstly, our call on our Arab brothers for a fulfilment of the material commitments they have entered into at numerous summit meetings on Lebanon's behalf, most of which unfortunately remain a dead letter to this day. I also renew my call on our friends to offer material and moral support for the reconstruction of Lebanon which, more than just a small State and a people, represents on account of its unique arrangements and the unity of its people and its territory, an essential condition for peace in the Middle East and in the world.

Constructive international cooperation is the quickest road to peace, justice and welfare. Let us join hands to consolidate its foundations, and let us look with optimism to the guiding role which the ILO can play in this area on the threshold of a new century of hopes and challenges.

Together let us follow the road of law and justice.

Original Spanish: Mr. ARTHUR ERRAZURIZ (Employers' delegate, Chile) – Promoting employment is an ethical imperative for any human being and for any society, and in particular those who hold responsibilities at the various levels represented at this meeting, Government, Employers and Workers.

The Director-General's Report analyses the effects of a growing globalization of the economy on the output pattern of various countries and unemployment. A significant number of workers are going to have to switch from activities in decline to others that are expanding. To solve the problems of unemployment that the adjustment of enterprises to the new globalized markets will cause, the Report suggests adopting positive adjustment policies which consist in adapting to the new conditions through vocational readaptation, and to subsidize geographical mobility, at the same time as criticizing defensive adjustment measures taken by industrialized countries to protect themselves from competition from less developed countries.

The Report says that "economic liberalization which has characterized adaptation to globalization has, in some developing countries, also exposed weaknesses in national patterns of labour market regulation. This is to be expected, since, as in Latin America, labour market institutions which may have been appropriate to earlier development models and more closed economies have been slow to adapt to new economic regimes".

We fully agree with the Director-General in saying that national legislation has not adapted itself to the globalization of the economy. Furthermore, we believe that some legislation, including unfortunately that of Chile, continues to be guided by economic theories that the country left behind two decades ago. However, we wish to point out that international legislation has not adapted either to the new reality, and that the ILO, rather than spearheading changes required in domestic regulation through its standard-setting machinery, has very often obliged countries to cling to ideas that are at best outdated, at worst complete failures.

An example of this is the incredible opposition that has been shown to the new pension regime in Chile, on account of its non-conformity with Conventions that are more than 60 years old and which are completely inapplicable in our country, and in many others which are carrying out reforms as radical as ours. A change in the ratio between the working and non-working population (from 10 to 1 in the 1960s to 2.5 to 1 in the 1980s) made it absolutely necessary to replace a structurally bankrupt system by one based on workers' own savings.

It is true that the new system does not strictly abide by the ILO Conventions, but it is also true that the old system had collapsed. It is also true that the pension fund managers are profit-making concerns but the pensions contributions are now lower for the worker. It is true that the pension fund managers are set up as limited-liability companies, but it is also true that various groups of workers have set up their own. In fact, some members of the Chilean Workers' delegations at recent ILO meetings are directors of such pension fund managers. It is true that the State only contributes indirectly to the system through the state guarantee, but it is also true that pensions are much higher than under the old system.

Nobody challenges the success this system has had in Chile. Old-age pensions are 43 per cent higher than under the old system, invalidity benefits 68 per cent higher, for widows, benefit is 42 per cent higher, and that for orphans 92 per cent higher, and they have all been funded with lower contributions from the worker.

The pension funds manage sums amounting to US$22,000 million, representing 40 per cent of the GDP, and annual flows constitute more than 5 per cent of total savings. They have been invested in a broad range of instruments which have made it possible to have an annual real return of 14 per cent.

For all these reasons, the system is very well consolidated. Created under the military government, it has been deepened by the two governments that followed. In May this year, Law 10,389 was passed, extending the range of investments open to such funds, both in Chile and abroad.

In the light of these facts, we cannot hide our surprise that the ILO continues to insist on a policy which, at least in our country, only brought frustration and poverty for retired people.

We are quite convinced, especially having read the Director-General's Report, that we should carefully study new directions for labour legislation, confront new challenges, and look carefully at the Conventions in force, which at this stage of the modernization process have lost their raison d'être and only hamper reforms that will make our countries competitive in the world economy.

International labour legislation was born in 1919, along with the ILO, as a response to the terrible injustices and inequalities that were born when millions of men, women and children joined the labour market during the Industrial Revolution.

Those were the years of the "social question", in which the encyclical Rerum novarum denounced inhuman conditions imposed on workers, and proposed a new path that would diverge both from the unfair and untimely socialist solution of abolishing private property and from the absolute dogma of laissez-faire liberalism. Within this framework, it called for controls over contractual freedoms to protect the worker, so as to put an end to the violation of individual rights. This was the inspiration behind the first international labour standards, the justice of which made them very influential in the preparation of the first Labour Codes, while the participation of governments, employers and workers clearly ensured their viability.

But 76 years have gone by since the creation of the ILO, and these years have not been wasted. The advance of science and technology has given a completely new dimension to labour because now man can use these means to accelerate progress and contribute to the improvement of welfare, all of which has had a decisive effect on employment structures.

One of the most noteworthy changes over the last decades has been the rise in services and the declining importance of agriculture and industry. In the industrialized countries, employment in the services sector has grown from 41 per cent in 1965 to 67 per cent in 1991, while in agriculture it has declined together with industry.

The development of enterprises from primary activities to more complex ones, principally the provision of services, has been marked by a revitalization of the labour factor relative to capital. The inequalities that yesterday separated employers and workers, which fanned conflicts and made it necessary to establish protective standards, have given way to a situation in which the worker is identified with his enterprise, and as his principal measure of protection, calls for enough training so that he can work efficiently in it. To insist on a kind of protection which does not correspond to current reality in labour relations, far from protecting the workers, is detrimental to their interest, since it discourages job creation and thus restricts the right to work.

The social question is no longer what it was, and as a result, solutions can no longer be the same, either. The encyclical Laborem exercens, 90 years after Rerum novarum, calls for cooperation between capital and labour. If capital is the fruit of labour, it cannot be opposed to it.

We are quite sure that the ILO, under the wise leadership of the Director-General, will know how to direct its activities towards meeting the challenge of promoting employment, which brings us together here today, with the same lucidity that in the past has promoted justice in labour relations.

In the developing countries, one of the causes of unemployment is poor systems of formal education, whose content is completely divorced from the needs of the labour market, the world of work which young people must face. Aware of this situation, the Chilean employers' organizations, grouped in the Production and Trade Confederation, have implemented a set of measures designed to prepare young people for the world of work. These include 60 technical training colleges in the various areas represented by our organization: industry, mining, trade, agriculture, construction and banking. By this means more than 40,000 young people have been linked to firms in their preferred area and have received training which takes account of the latest technical advances in the sector. The result of this is that the percentage of students graduating from this training, employed in the area of their specialization, has gone from 12 to 60 per cent.

Another initiative to promote employment is the Small Enterprise Development Plan, sponsored by the relevant representative organizations. This programme trains small businessmen in the skills necessary for keeping accounts, improving marketing, calculating costs and prices, developing sales techniques, and other subjects so as to encourage the development of a truly entrepreneurial outlook.

The programme also provides credit for those individuals who cannot have access to such credit to finance their new activities. Through this programme, we have helped the needs of 12,470 small business people, who received 42,000 loans of an average of US$446, constituting an overall expenditure of US$19 million.

Throughout its many years of lengthy standard-setting work, the ILO created labour law. We should now push forward the most elemental of those rights which is the right to work. This will only be possible if certain legal impediments are removed which do not correspond to current realities, and which constitute disincentives to enterprises in creating new and productive jobs.

In undertaking such a task, we believe that the principles that inspired the creation of the ILO and its great contribution to justice, peace, healthy competition and fair and balanced development are immutable and fully valid today.

As in the past, countries need the support of the ILO. A forthright commitment to the principles behind the ILO's creation, rather than to the various instruments through which those principles were applied in different times and different circumstances, will make it possible for the ILO once again to lead the major changes that are taking place in the world of work, so as to ensure that those changes take place in justice and in peace.

If, however, the ILO renounces that role, and clings to Conventions and Recommendations that are no longer relevant, it will not have any influence on the changes which countries will in any case continue to make in order to fulfil their obligation to seek the welfare of all.

Original Spanish: Mr. ALBURQUERQUE DE CASTRO (Secretary of State for Labour, Dominican Republic) – At this point in time and particularly for the developing countries, including the Dominican Republic, the subject for discussion proposed by the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne in his Report Promoting employment is of great interest. It is also our most important task as this century draws to a close for reasons of moral and social justice, and also to ensure the viability of the new economic order which can only fulfil the hopes of material progress for the majority of humanity if it can solve the problem of unemployment which divides society, causes unrest and jeopardizes universal prosperity.

Thanks to Mr. Hansenne's insight, we have already considered the changes in the world economy, which since the agreement setting up the World Trade Organization came into force is moving inexorably towards the liberalization of markets, which means that world trade will open up further and that the flow of trade will increase rapidly. The reduction of tariffs and of non-tariff barriers, the gradual phasing out of multi-fibre arrangements and the prohibition of market regulation are all rules that call for drastic changes in countries' production structures and, inevitably, reform of their legal standards.

The inevitable globalization and opening up of world trade call for corresponding measures so that we can reap the benefits of trade potential, possible export markets, new networks of world production and direct foreign investment, because this is the only way we will achieve economic growth, reduce poverty and increase the potential for increasing the number of jobs available. If we are to fight social inequality and promote employment, we must maintain macroeconomic stability, high levels of savings and investment, a liberal trading structure, a strategy of industrialization to promote exports, a clearly-defined policy for attracting direct investment and ensuring the dynamic and full integration of our countries into the world economy.

Therefore, we must promote more liberal trade structures in underdeveloped countries, which inevitably means the abolition of monopolies and oligopolies by establishing a legal framework which deregulates the economy and provides for free competition without neglecting, through these decisions, the manufacturing sector which can take all of the time it needs for reconversion thanks to the safeguard clauses provided for under the GATT.

Of course, economic changes will only work if, at the same time, we implement new legal standards that can guarantee security for investment, unlimited respect for the rights of ownership, promote exports, compliance with contracts and stability with regard to regulations, alongside a competent and efficient public administration which is able to function effectively in a climate of stability and in tandem with a respected and reliable legal system. Without these institutional requirements, very little can be expected from trade liberalization and the market economy.

Furthermore, it should be pointed out that the market economy does not necessarily mean that the State can sit back and ignore what is happening in the economy. Apart from promoting the institutional reforms needed for this economic model to develop, the State will have to be involved in the creation of an infrastructure, in maintaining successful macroeconomic management, an industrial and trade regime which will allow enterprises to operate and be internationally competitive, correct market distortions and protect the fledgling economic sectors to increase their capacity and investment in human resources as a reliable way to improve performance and encourage growth.

These thoughts lead us to question whether regulating the labour market is an obstacle to transformation and restricts the promotion of employment. There has been no shortage of studies in this area whose conclusions show that a minimum wage policy, rules of stability in employment, the cost of lay-offs and rigid hours of work can reduce the number of jobs available. However, thus far these statements cannot be proved as empirical data does not confirm the theory that regulation of the labour market is the major obstacle to the creation of jobs and economic stimulation.

What I have just pointed out does not alter the fact that standards to protect wage employment can also be made flexible in terms of their adaptation, making it easier to balance the contrasting needs of economic efficiency and social protection, especially with respect to working time which is an area in which new concepts of organization and hours of work may be introduced to improve productivity, performance and the creation of new jobs. The same may be said of the establishment of jus variandi which allows heads of enterprises to rotate workers where and when needed by the enterprise, and of the acceptance of in peius negotiations to deal with the changing needs of the market, or of temporary suspension of contracts of employment because of a shortage or an excess of production which is not needed according to market conditions.

But this flexible adaptation to improve productivity and international competitiveness should not lead us to overlook standards to protect employment, because if we do this, as some are trying to do, we would be sowing the seeds of social and political unrest which could negate the changes we are trying to promote.

The Dominican Republic has undertaken these changes, trying to solve the problems of transition in the short term and at the same time trying to implement a new Labour Code in force since 1992. Although it includes mechanisms to make adaptation more flexible, it protects and strengthens the rights of workers. The maintaining of mechanisms for regulating the labour market in the Dominican Republic has not been an obstacle to the recently initiated trade opening and liberalization of the economy, which are beginning to bear fruit. A recent Central Bank study of the labour market for 1991-94 shows that the formal sector, which provides fixed employment and protection under the Code, has increased with respect to the informal sector. The percentage of the economically active population (EAP) in the formal sector went from 36.2 per cent in 1991 to 61.6 per cent in 1994, while for the informal sector the percentage dropped from 63.7 to 38.3 per cent. At the same time, the EAP rose from 79.8 per cent to 84.5 per cent, with the number of women employed increasing by 8.6 per cent.

To these figures we can add that real wages of workers in 1991-94 increased by 12.6 per cent, while GDP rose at an annual rate of 5.3 per cent.

Two conclusions can be drawn from these figures: although the trade opening is only in the early stages, labour market indicators show signs of improvement, while the changes have not led to the sacrificing of labour standards. To the contrary, workers' rights have been strengthened and expanded.

I would like to conclude by congratulating the Director-General for his highly appropriate section of a theme for this 82nd session of the ILO conference, and I would like to express my congratulations to the Minister of Labour of Nicaragua, Mr. Rosales Argüello, for his election as President.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL JARWAN (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, United Arab Emirates) – It is a pleasure and an honour for me to be able to convey to the President, the Ministers and the members of the delegations attending this session of the International Labour Conference greetings from His Serene Highness, Sheikh Zayed bin Sultan al-Nahyan, the Head of State of the United Arab Emirates and his best wishes for the success of this session of the Conference.

I should also like to congratulate the President of this session of the International Labour Conference on his election to this high office. I wish him every success in guiding the debates of this session and of achieving the results to which we all aspire. I would also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents on their election, a sign of trust placed in them by the Conference.

I welcome to the fold the new States which have become members of the Organization in the course of the past year.

Let me also take this opportunity of thanking Mr. Hansenne, the Director-General of the International Labour Office, and his staff for their tireless efforts and for their excellent preparations for this session of the Conference. We are grateful to them for the many reports they have drawn up relating to the various items on the agenda of this session.

I would also like to thank members of the Governing Body for the various activities it has organized over the past year. These activities are reflected in the various reports submitted by the Governing Body to the Conference.

This session of the International Labour Conference is taking place shortly after the World Summit for Social Development which was held in Copenhagen and which entrusted to the International Labour Organization the task of ensuring the follow-up work to this Conference and assigned it an important role in view of the considerable progress it has made in this area.

The Director-General's choice of employment promotion as the theme for his Report to this year's session of the Conference is a wise choice in keeping with the concerns dealt with at the Copenhagen Summit. This choice expresses the ILO's serious intention to assure the follow-up work for the Copenhagen Summit. In his Report the Director-General deals with the main issues relating to the achievement of full employment at national and international levels. He maintains that it is necessary that a balance be found between economic and social development and he invites member States to find an appropriate framework for international cooperation in an attempt to solve the problems of unemployment.

We are grateful to the Director-General for his Report which was full of facts and very objective, but I would like to add the following comments: First, achieving full employment in all countries of the world is something which is closely related to levels of economic and social development. Jobs cannot be created out of thin air; they have to be the result of development projects. Therefore employment promotion will depend upon the potential and opportunities in the various countries, which in turn will depend upon those countries' development strategies. This being the case, we do not think that it would be appropriate to link world trade to international labour standards because they come within the exclusive jurisdiction of the International Labour Organization. To establish a link between international labour standards and world trade would mean that many countries would lose their specificity and more particularly their comparative advantage in economic and commercial terms.

Second, we are all today facing the same challenge, the challenge of adapting ourselves to international economic change. The international community has no option but to take the necessary measures to assist the less developed countries which are in the most need of assistance for their development. These countries must be given an advantage to enable them to increase their share of world trade.

Third, we must strike a balance between economic and trade policies so that economic issues will not take precedence over social issues. Persons in charge of social questions should also be involved in dealing with economic and financial problems at the national and international levels.

The United Arab Emirates' labour policy is based on the principle of creating employment opportunities for all citizens, providing them with adequate training, appropriate benefits and fair working conditions.

We also provide education and training opportunities at both primary, secondary and university levels. Technical colleges and technical and vocational training centres have also been set up.

The Government has undertaken a major architectural restoration project covering all sectors. This has meant a considerable number of jobs not just for nationals but also for migrant workers. We have set up enterprises to provide the necessary employment services for workers and to safeguard their rights.

The State has sought to adapt education and training to the needs of the labour market. By carrying out studies to identify the balance between supply and demand on the labour market. We have also tried to enhance the potential of our citizens in the fields of the production of goods and of services. We have made every effort to increase the number of civil servants working in all areas of the national economy and to formulate programmes in the framework of an economic and social planning programme.

However, the best proof that our State is actively engaged upon a course towards full employment is that our Serene Highness, the Head of State, Sheikh Zayed bin Sultan al-Nahyan, may God protect him, has entrusted to the appropriate bodies the task of ensuring that all citizens, men and women, whatever their age or specialization, have access to employment opportunities.

The labour market in the United Arab Emirates provides plenty of work both for nationals and migrant workers. Workers enjoy many benefits and equitable working conditions on the basis of our current labour legislation. The labour market in our country is considered as being an example of international cooperation to promote employment and to help solve the unemployment problems besetting many countries throughout the world. The workers in my country are allowed to export their savings to their country of origin or indeed to any other country without any form of restriction. We do not levy any tax on their savings, their wages, or on the property of investors who are resident in the Emirates.

There are many items on the agenda of this year's session and we are confident that there will be a favourable response to these items which will contribute to the smooth running of the future work of this Organization.

May I touch briefly on the question of the budget for 1996-1997. In this connection, you may rest assured that we lend our full support to reforms aimed at achieving active cooperation with the ILO; we consider such cooperation should not be concentrated on one single activity.

We would also like to say that we are in favour of training translators and of documents being translated into Arabic. We are also in favour of adding an article dealing with that part of the budget relating to technical cooperation. We would also like to support the project for an Arab centre in Tunis.

On the subject of the report of the Governing Body, we are surprised to learn that given the situation of the workers of the occupied Arab territories, we are surprised that this will be the last special sitting that the Conference will devote to this issue. We have certain reservations about this decision as the reasons for these sittings are still valid. We are, however, confident that the Director-General will continue to ensure that the Resolutions adopted by the Conference in 1974 and 1980 are implemented and we trust that he will continue to submit periodic reports in the years to come until the reasons for the submission of these reports are no longer valid.

This session of the Conference is coinciding with various major events at the international level. The international community and the members of this International Labour Organization are all too aware of the importance of these events. We must, during this session, react to events relating to the right of peoples to life, to human dignity and to the non-violation of the rights of others. We must also seek to solve the problems of the world by peaceful means, in a spirit of justice, dialogue and in respect of the right of peoples to self-determination, independence and regional security.

Mr. MCAULEY (Employers' adviser, Ireland) – In addition to offering our congratulations to the President on his election, we wish him a successful outcome to the debate on the extremely important subject of Promoting employment. As he is on the podium at the moment, we would like as the Irish Business and Employers' Confederation, to offer our congratulations to Mr. Hans Hammar on his appointment as Assistant Director-General and the person now in charge at senior level of enterprise activities.

We are very pleased that the Director-General devoted his Report to this issue of promoting employment and that the ILO has accepted the challenge of the World Summit for Social Development to play a special role in this matter. The measures necessary to alleviate the employment crisis extend beyond the remit of the ILO. We trust however that the ILO will play to its strengths by concentrating its efforts on those areas where it has special knowledge. It should also coordinate its activities with those of other international agencies, and we support the Director-General when he says in his Report that there is a need to create "an institutional framework for cooperative international action in finding optimal solutions to the pressing problems of unemployment and related social ills". We also consider it appropriate for the Director-General to point to the value of closer collaboration between institutions and persons with responsibility for economic and financial issues at both international and national level and those whose special concern lies primarily in the field of social affairs. Such coordination of effort is essential for progress to be made.

The debate at last year's session of the International Labour Conference pointed to the need for the ILO to press ahead with a reform of its own policies, structures and methods of working. The task which the ILO now faces brings a new urgency to this process and a requirement that the ILO should mark out very clearly its priorities for the future. Many proposals about what these priorities might be were put forward during last year's session. We are particularly pleased to note the positive response of the Director-General to the demand that the ILO should take a much more active interest in matters concerning enterprise development and the creation of a more entrepreneurial culture both within the Office and externally. It is now clear and beyond question that enterprises large and small, private and public, are the principal vehicles for providing the higher stable rate of job creation which is necessary to reduce the level of unemployment in industrialized countries as well as those in transition or in the earlier stages of development. It is in everybody's interest that enterprises should be allowed to start up and grow without unduly onerous restrictions being imposed on them by either the State, international organizations or collective agreements.

The OECD has pointed out that policy can encourage entrepreneurship "by removing red tape, regulations and controls that discourage new and expanding enterprises".

In the ILO context, two comments seem appropriate. The ILO should speed up the process of reviewing its international standards and should not hesitate to eliminate or change standards which obstruct enterprise development or which do little to bring about greater social justice. Also the small enterprise work of the ILO in developing and transitional countries should receive a higher priority even if this means transferring resources from other programmes.

I am pleased to say that in recent times there has been a growing awareness among the public authorities and others in Ireland that non-essential restrictions and regulations should be abolished or simplified in order to encourage the establishment and development of business and especially small business.

Some progress has been made but much remains to be done. It has not been sufficiently recognized that employment regulations in their totality fall relatively more heavily on smaller enterprises and these can be a deterrent to their establishment and expansion. This in turn leads to a situation where these enterprises do not fulfil their job potential.

In an employment crisis such as now exists in many parts of the world it is essential for those responsible for legislation and collective agreements to have special regard to the needs of smaller enterprises. While it is neither desirable nor acceptable to distinguish between the position of employees in small and large enterprises in the matter of fundamental employment regulations, it is necessary to give special assistance to smaller enterprises by reducing the burden of other regulations which inhibit their growth, and by giving them preferential treatment through the application of tax and social security systems. We feel the section of the Director-General's Report which deals with labour market regulations understates the benefits for employment expansion which may flow from a review of obstacles in the way of introducing more flexible working-time arrangements, the hiring of employees, the rules relating to lay-offs and the impact of taxation and social security costs. The ILO, which seems to attach less importance to these issues than the OECD, should once again examine these matters objectively with a view to removing any significant impediments to raising the level of employment.

The information and general analysis of the problems of employment creation contained in the Director-General's Report are interesting and valuable but do not lead to a strategy for the future. This is understandable to the extent that macroeconomic policies which take account of trade, technology, social security, taxation, etc. fall largely outside the remit of the ILO.

Nevertheless, the ILO has an important role to play because the introduction of difficult and sensitive economic measures should be accompanied by arrangements for proper consideration of their social impact and by appropriate social measures which may facilitate acceptance of their consequences. The ILO has considerable experience in these areas and this should be at the disposal of member States and other agencies.

The relatively new problem which hinders employment creation arises from the fact that in industrialized countries economic growth is not reflected in a corresponding increase in employment, although the relationship varies from country to country. In Ireland's case, as shown in table 12 of the Director-General's Report, the annual average rate of economic growth through the various cycles and oil shocks which have occurred since 1960 has been significant and considerably above the average of other industrialized countries. But, as table 10 in the same Report shows, unemployment, exacerbated by demographic factors, has increased from around 6 per cent in 1960 to between 15 and 16 per cent at the present time. The situation would be considerably worse except for the attraction of direct foreign investment, induced by substantial improvements in the scope and standard of education and training and the development of a consensus between governments and the social partners on the priorities and measures necessary to overcome the difficulties facing the country. Since 1987, three successive three-year economic and social programmes have been agreed by government, employers and trade unions. These programmes contained inter alia centrally bargained collective agreements providing for wage increases which, taken together with tax adjustments, compensated for price inflation but which were lower than the underlying rate of productivity improvement. The social stability and gains in international competitiveness which these agreements achieved have led to a modest increase in employment, and an improving standard of living.

We mention this because the Report before the Conference seems – unlike the OECD – to be less than enthusiastic about the employment benefits of pay restraint. Because the ILO is rightly concerned about employment it should be up-front in stating that pay increases below the average level of productivity growth are an essential precondition in many circumstances for reducing unemployment.

Irish experience would support the emphasis in the Director-General's Report on the contribution which education and training, and environmental and social investments can make towards realizing the conditions in which employment opportunities can develop. The financial and other incentives available to encourage direct foreign investment to locate in Ireland would not have been effective without the large human investment in education and training at all levels and particularly in recent times in computer and information technology. The continuous upgrading of standards and skills is a necessary prerequisite for attracting and retaining investments in both the industrial and service sectors. This again is an area where ILO expertise can be usefully expanded.

In conclusion, it is our view that the ILO will optimize its contribution to the promotion of employment by concentrating on the elimination of any barriers to job creation that it may inadvertently have erected through its standard-setting activities, and by developing those programmes, activities and services that are most relevant to the creation and expansion of enterprises. The ILO, with the active support and encouragement of countries in the developed world, should also concentrate its work in those regions where economic progress and employment creation is difficult to achieve without substantial external support. To the extent possible, Irish employers will, as in the past, encourage, support and assist the ILO in this important and commendable objective.

Mr. CHIBAMBO (Minister of Labour and Manpower Development, Malawi) – It is a pleasure for me to address you and the distinguished delegates for the first time in my capacity as Minister of Labour and Manpower Development. Mr. President, may I extend my warm and most sincere congratulations to you on your well-deserved election to the high office of President of this august Conference. I wish you and your officials every success in conducting the business of the Conference. From what has transpired so far since the opening of the Conference under your presidency, I have every hope that the deliberations will be successfully concluded. On behalf of the Malawi delegation and indeed on my own behalf, I wish you all the best in your task of guiding the proceedings of this Conference which, owing to your wisdom, vast knowledge and experience, has started on a very successful note.

This is the first time I have attended an ILO Conference and I owe this to the political changes that have taken place in my country where the people of Malawi opted for a multi-party system of government through a referendum in June 1993 and the subsequent general elections in May 1994. I therefore bring with me to this Conference warm and fraternal greetings from His Excellency Mr. Bakili Muluzi, the President of the Second Republic of Malawi and the entire people of Malawi. They all wish this Conference successful deliberations and hope that delegates at the Conference will come up with useful resolutions, particularly regarding the problem of unemployment and underemployment, which are getting worse each new day in Malawi.

I have thus noted with keen interest and deep appreciation that the Director-General has chosen as a theme for this Conference the global concern of promoting employment. Please allow me to congratulate the Director-General for the able analysis of the employment problem and also for putting at the disposal of delegates the relevant documentation that has provided an insight into a better understanding of the employment issue.

Turning to the theme of this Conference, I would like to support the observations made by the Director-General in his Report on Africa's growing marginalization in the world economy, especially Africa south of the Sahara. As a result of the poor economic performance in Africa during the past two development decades, the employment problem is reaching dangerous proportions. If the trend is not reversed in good time, we have a social bomb to face in Africa.

African countries south of the Sahara are facing negative development due to socio-economic upheavals such as protracted civil wars, economic mismanagement, dire poverty, increasing debt burden, natural calamities, environmental degradation and high rates of population growth, among others. All these socio-economic ills have militated against sustained economic development and the capacities of our economies to generate employment. It is sad to note that while our colleagues in east and south Asia have experienced dramatic economic growth, the opposite has happened in sub-Saharan Africa. Perhaps through South-South cooperation we have a lot to learn from the success stories of these countries.

Malawi is one of the smallest countries south of the Sahara and, as such, it has not been spared the negative development cited by the Director-General in his Report. Although the world has become more unified than ever before, and although there is more globalization of trade and investment, Malawi seems to be one of the countries which has not benefited from these favourable developments. This small but potentially agriculturally rich country has, during the past 31 years under one of the world's worst autocratic administrations, failed dismally to attract foreign direct investment. The majority of the people, about 60 per cent, still live below the poverty line as defined by the World Bank. Population growth rate is one of the highest in the world, about 3.2 per cent. Inflation is now soaring at alarming rates due to the problem of foreign exchange. There was a lot of misuse of economic aid by the former government and there was no diversification of agricultural products to take advantage of the opportunities in the world commodity market. Our new democracy also inherited a huge debt burden of nearly US$1.5 billion and a budget deficit, and many other serious social, political and economic problems.

With all these problems in mind, the new administration has devised a poverty alleviation programme that aims at promoting economic growth through poverty alleviation. The main purpose of this development strategy is to give economic empowerment to the people to safeguard their human dignity and develop the social and physical infrastructure. The poverty alleviation programme also aims at encouraging mass participation at a grassroot level so that the people themselves are involved in making decisions that affect their everyday lives as opposed to policies and programmes that are top down and thrown to the people as if the people themselves did not matter or did not know what their needs were. No wonder such top-down policies have failed to produce positive results anywhere they have been applied in Africa.

In talking about employment promotion and poverty alleviation programmes, the correlation is very clear. The new Government regards employment as a source of income, an empowerment of an individual to contribute to national development, whether it be through paid employment or self-employment. Thus one of the priorities of the new Government in Malawi is to create employment through encouragement of foreign as well as local investment in the country. The Government has seriously embarked on the development of a conducive environment for as many investors as possible to choose Malawi as a location for their business. I am pleased to inform this august house that our efforts seem to have already started bearing fruit. Many more investors, particularly from east and south Asia, have shown great interest in investing in Malawi. It is our motto to continue to remove all the barriers to investment in our country so that Malawi can join the world economy and benefit from the world's increased trade and investment flows.

In addition to promoting paid employment as a very reliable method of economic empowerment, it is the policy of the Government to encourage entrepreneurial spirit and self-employment. The Government has therefore established a rural finance company where people in the rural areas of the country can freely borrow money with which to start their own business. Mr. President you may wish to know that the Government established this rural finance company after considering that 81 per cent of Malawi's population is rural. In addition to this rural finance company, the new Government has also set up a poverty alleviation fund where people from all walks of life are free to get loans for their projects, particularly those projects with an income and employment-generating capacity. Malawi believes that self-employment, if properly supported, is an important way forward to create employment. Thus the more people are self-employed the more the likelihood of bringing down unemployment, and therefore the more prosperous the nation becomes.

However, a small country like Malawi, which is landlocked and labouring under all sorts of social, economic and technological problems, cannot do without the world community. As the Director-General put it in his Report, employment creation is not just an intra-national effort. A nation has got to work with other nations in creating employment by ensuring symmetrical adjustment between deficit and surplus countries. Since the Director-General has already declared in his Report that the ILO is to collaborate with the other international agencies in order to create an institutional framework for cooperative international action on restoring full employment, I would like to urge the ILO to immediately consider starting research work and policy analysis of international agencies. I am sure that young democracies, such as the one in Malawi at the moment, can benefit from the findings of such research work and policy analysis and subsequently make informed policy adjustments, particularly in the field of employment creation.

Mr. President, I and my colleagues within the southern Africa subregion can do a lot to achieve full employment provided we can integrate, consolidate and dynamize our economic and social policies with particular emphasis on employment creation. The southern Africa subregion being a developing region shares quite a lot in common.

I cannot be complete in my statement if I fail to mention the important role being played by the ILO in reshaping labour administration in southern Africa, and Malawi in particular. The ILO is doing a marvellous job in assisting the new democracies in southern Africa to smoothly adjust labour administrations in order to suit the new political environment in the region. The ILO is providing assistance in human resources development and consultancy services through the ILO area office in Lusaka, Zambia, the ILO SMAT in Harare, Zimbabwe and the ILO ARLAC also in Zimbabwe. I must commend the ILO for having adopted active partnership programmes to deal with problems of member States at source. However, I wish to request the ILO to provide countries in our subregion with more technical assistance in the human resources sector. I would be very grateful if this proposal were seriously considered by the ILO.

Mr. SUNMONU (representative, Organization of African Trade Union Unity) – On behalf of all the workers of Africa and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU), I congratulate the President and all the Officers of this session of the Conference on their well-deserved election. I also congratulate the Director-General for his excellent and lucid Report entitled Promoting employment.

Employment has become, for all countries of the world, developed or developing, the key to the doors of prosperity, development and social stability. It is because of this that the World Summit for Social Development, held in Copenhagen, Denmark from 6 to 12 March 1995, made employment, the eradication of poverty and social integration its theme.

Also, the theme of the 6th Ordinary Congress of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity, held in Accra, Ghana from 22 to 24 May 1995 was "Employment, trade union rights and social stability: Challenge for African trade unions".

The Director-General's Report notes that, while the share in world trade of Asian developing countries has increased from 4.6 per cent to 12.5 per cent, that of sub-Saharan Africa has fallen. However, the Director-General's Report did not adequately analyse the factors responsible for the fall of Africa's share of world trade. Two of the major reasons are the continuous fall in the commodity prices of Africa's agricultural and mineral products and the orthodox structural adjustment programmes imposed on African countries by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

Lower commodity prices and injustice in international economic relations, and particularly injustice against developing countries, are the major external factors responsible for the debt crisis. The neo-liberal economic principle of putting profits before the welfare of the people which has been developed by the IMF and the World Bank and imposed especially on the poor and heavily indebted developing countries has destroyed most of their infant industries and million of jobs.

According to the commandments of the "holy books" of the IMF and the World Bank, it is a "cardinal sin" for the State to subsidise education, health, housing, water, electricity, and fertilizers, etc. The people, most of whom are poor, must pay "user fees" for these basic needs, even when they cannot afford two square meals a day! It is also an inexcusable sin for the State to own, either fully or partially, any kind of business as only the private sector is ordained to engage in business.

The role of the State is to facilitate the "free ride" of the private sector by building the infrastructure, namely roads, electricity, water and telecommunications, with money borrowed by the State at high interest rates, which must be repaid from the tax contributed by hungry people, to maximize the profits of the private sector. The private sector referred to above in most cases is not the indigenous private sector. More than 50 per cent of the indigenous enterprises died under the hangman's noose of the orthodox structural adjustment programmes of the IMF and the World Bank. The actual "private sector" is the multinational enterprises (MNEs) which are the only "superpowers" that can make or unmake any country, big or small, developed or developing.

This has been our experience in the developing countries. I believe it has not been reflected very well in the analysis of the Director-General's Report. It is now evident that the orthodox structural adjustment programmes imposed by the IMF and the World Bank on countries in Africa and other developing countries have failed. To ask African and other developing countries to continue to implement the orthodox structural adjustment programmes is to ask them to continue to draw water with a basket in order to fill a water tank. They will never be able to overcome debt, massive unemployment, underdevelopment and social instability.

If a medicine does not cure a disease, but brings death and sorrow, then it should be abandoned and a better alternative should be used. In the case of Africa, as far back as 1989, we found a better alternative to the orthodox structural adjustment programmes. It is the "African alternative framework to structural adjustment programmes for socio-economic recovery and transformation", which is supported by all African governments, employers and workers. The IMF and the World Bank should therefore support the African alternative framework to structural adjustment programmes.

As regards the role of the ILO, we want the ILO to play a role in assisting in the development of human resources, of African workers and capacity-building of African trade unions, especially in the following areas: workers' education; entrepreneurship and small business development within the African trade unions; empowerment of women for development; labour standards; occupational health and safety; technical assistance to organize the informal sector; provision of books and equipment for trade union libraries; and the granting of more fellowships at the International Institute for Labour Studies and at the ILO International Training Centre in Turin.

We would also like to see the ILO take the centre stage in all issues concerning employment and social policy. This is a task which the World Summit for Social Development quite rightly conferred upon the Organization. Never again should the ILO play second fiddle to any other United Nations agency in these two important areas. In order for the ILO to play this key role, we appeal to all ILO member States to pay their dues promptly to the Organization.

As regards the much talked-about globalization of the economy, we do not accept the assertion in the Director-General's Report that "for countries with abundant land and natural resources, as is true for many countries in sub-Saharan Africa and Latin America, comparative advantage will continue to lie in primary production". On the contrary, comparative advantage in the short-, medium- and long-term for Africa and other developing countries will lie in the development of human resources, the transformation of primary production, the integration of their economies and the cornering of both domestic and foreign markets. That is where the comparative advantage will lie.

The creation of employment on a sustainable basis should be the concern and business of governments, employers and workers. Therefore, any economic or social programme leading to unemployment should be avoided. In order to generate employment on a sustainable basis, education and training, including vocational and professional training, should be prioritized, particularly in the developing countries, which still have high rates of illiteracy among their populations. The provision and satisfaction of the population's basic needs should form the cardinal objectives of all governments' economic and social programmes. Governments should continue to participate prudently and efficiently in all their countries' economic activities. Where the indigenous private sector has matured sufficiently in a particular line of economic activity, the government should abandon such areas and move on to others. Governments in developing countries should not submit to the blackmail of the right-wing economic ideologues of international financial institutions that request governments to leave economic activities to the private sector. Japan and South Korea both offer good examples of government initiative in industrial development. African and other developing countries should emulate this example.

The main conditions for the success of any economic, political and social programme are peace and social stability.

To secure peace and social stability, the welfare of all the people should be ensured through: strict observance of standards ensuring social and economic justice at the national and international levels; active involvement, participation and empowerment of the people in all matters, economic, political and social, that affect their lives; respect for human rights and trade union rights; an end to all forms of dictatorship, and the restoration of popular, participatory and people-empowered democracy.

I cannot end this speech without appealing to all the tripartite constituents of the ILO to continue to give financial and moral support to the ILO in order to enable it to rise up to the challenge posed by the globalization of the world economy.

President: Mr. Halliwell

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) – We shall now resume the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Turkish: Mr. MERAL (Workers' delegate, Turkey) – At the outset of my speech as the Workers' delegate of Turkey, I congratulate the President on the occasion of his unanimous election to chair the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I believe that this year's Conference, under his competent chairmanship, will bear fruitful results for the workers, all working people and our world. I also thank the Director-General for his excellent Report to the International Labour Conference on the most burning problem of our time.

The world is going through a globalization process under the control of and in line with the interests of transnational capital. Since the social aspect of economic issues is almost completely ignored in this process, the inequalities among and within States are increasing every day. The rich are getting richer at the expense of the poor getting even poorer. Unemployment, poverty and social disintegration are spreading rapidly. The working peoples of the developing world experience these difficulties even more intensively, especially due to servicing of the foreign debt and the austerity programmes imposed by the IMF and the World Bank, the representatives of international monopoly capital. However, the governments of the developing countries are more inclined to honour their promises and pledges to the IMF and the World Bank, rather than to the ILO, which is much more democratic.

Following the attack of pro-employer governments on the social welfare state and the trade union movement in the 1980s, in the 1990s we face a very systematic assault all around the world on protective labour legislation, which is either adversely amended or rendered ineffective. Privatization, subcontracting, deregulation, free trade zones, new sweatshops, child labour, lack of job security, union-busting practices, pseudo self-employment, precarious forms of employment, mass dismissals, clandestine, or hidden employment, suspension of concluded collective bargaining agreements, compulsory retirement and the request of "flexibility" in the implementation of ILO Conventions and national legislation are all practices and attempts aimed at increasing the oppression and exploitation of workers. The precondition of social peace is the procurement of humane living and working conditions for all people. There can be no social consensus, partnership or social peace in the absence of democracy, social justice, bread, peace and freedom.

Heads of States and governments acknowledged the severely adverse social consequences of the unbridled forces of the free market, or actually, the unbridled forces of transnational monopoly capital at the Copenhagen Summit for Social Development in March 1995. We hope that the governments will honour their obligations as stated in the commitments of the Copenhagen Declaration and that the ILO will play a major role in following up the results of this historic event. We also urge the governments of the developed countries to contribute to solving the problems of the developing world, which they to a certain extent have aggravated.

Transnational capital, using the advances in information, transportation and production technology, is shifting production to the cheapest labour areas, where basic human and trade union rights are violated with impunity. Therefore, we urge that social clauses guaranteeing basic human and trade union rights with appropriate and effective sanctions will be included in international trade agreements. We also hope that the complaint mechanism developed in case of the violation of the freedom of association will also be extended to other Conventions.

The preconditions for the realization of the ILO's ideals are independence of sovereign States, social and political peace and democracy. However, increasing racism, xenophobia, fuelling of ethnic rivalries and regional wars all constitute major threats to these ideals.

On the other hand, we hope that the ILO will set international standards that guarantee basic civil and political rights to migrant workers who have resided and worked in a host country for more than a specified duration.

Whatever the motive might be, terror and all other forms of force and oppression are enemies of democracy and are being used as pretexts to destroy democracy, trade union rights and freedoms and the rights of the working people. On this occasion, I would like to draw the attention of all States, our brothers and sisters in all countries and employers to the threat to democracy represented by the activities of the terrorist-separatist movement in my country.

Another precondition for democracy is secularism. I would also like to draw your attention to the dangers for democracy, rights of working people and trade union rights and freedoms resulting from the strengthening of anti-secular tendencies in various countries.

The inadequacy of the United Nations when faced with the inhuman massacres that have gone on for years in various countries should be given consideration and is a source of regret for everyone.

In Turkey, the problems of the working people have been further aggravated since last year, following the new austerity programme that had been prepared solely in accordance with the requests of and in line with the interests of international financial institutions. As a result, the already unequal distribution of income and wealth has further deteriorated. The purchasing power of the unorganized sections of the working population has dramatically declined.

I regret to state that, in spite of all our efforts to democratize my country, the Government violated 19 ratified Conventions last year. The Committee of Experts, in its report submitted to this year's Conference, criticizes Turkey for having violated eight Conventions.

The 1982 Constitution, and the legislation promulgated in the military period and its aftermath, as a whole, violate many Conventions ratified by Turkey. The most recent Bill for the amendment of the Constitution is far from eliminating the anti-democratic essence of the Constitution; on the contrary, it proposes even stricter measures to curb trade union activities.

Amendments made in the Trade Unions Act in April 1995 are also far from meeting the requirements of the recommendations made by the ILO bodies on various occasions.

As a radical solution to this problem, I once again propose to bring labour legislation in Turkey as a whole in harmony with the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151) by a tripartite activity pursuant to the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), and with the technical assistance and active involvement of the ILO.

Since the ratified ILO Conventions have not been reflected in our national legislation and implemented, workers and public servants are deprived of many of their rights. In particular, the obstacles which prevent the exercise of the rights to collective bargaining and to strike and public servants' rights to be involved in political activities, emanating from ratified Conventions, have not yet been eradicated. In addition, a related issue is that some negative verdicts of the judiciary concerning trade union rights constitute serious problems, especially for public servants.

I again regret to state that many trade union members and officers of trade unions and public servants' trade unions have faced administrative and judicial prosecution for having exercised their rights as stipulated in ILO Conventions, or for having been involved in peaceful industrial actions. But in spite of all these obstacles, the trade union movement in Turkey is carrying on its struggle for bread, peace and freedom and for democracy. The Government's plan last year to cancel the wage increase under collective bargaining agreements in the public sector has been altered successfully by the determined stance and struggle of TÜRK-İŞ. TÜRK-İŞ will proceed with the same determined stance concerning government initiatives to curtail the social security rights of the working people.

In spite of all these difficulties we face, we are still full of hope for a better world in which social justice, full employment and humane conditions of work shall be achieved for all humanity.

Mr. CHAKRABARTY (Employers' delegate, India) – Let me at the outset convey my sincerest greetings to the President on his election and to congratulate the three Vice-Presidents elected at this Session.

The 1990s have ushered in an era of geopolitical and economic changes of sweeping dimensions. Yet, despite the growing symbiotic relationship for economic survival among nations and the world trying to come under a canopy of a single economy, threats of discrimination, disintegration and deprivation are still looming large over societies and nations. Despite commonality of interest, the concept of "haves" and "have nots" has resurfaced in a new form. Societies are plagued with new socio-economic maladies despite attaining pinnacles of economic prosperity. As a result, the dream of attaining universal and lasting peace based upon social justice, as envisaged by the ILO's founding fathers, has yet to be realized.

The global recessionary trend following slow economic growth, coupled with imperatives for technological upgrading and structural adjustment has slowed down the pace of economic growth and employment growth, which is the major concern of today. The chances for "freely chosen and productive employment" which the Philadelphia Declaration promised to further, has never receded before to this extent. To illustrate a few facts: an estimated 30 per cent of the global workforce is not productively employed, more than 120 million people are registered as unemployed and some 700 million are underemployed. It is widely feared that poor and underdeveloped nations might not survive these social pains even during the gestation period of restructuring, threatening reversal of policies. The role of the ILO, its programmes and policies should, therefore, aim at helping such nations so that the transition to a market economy is peaceful and painless.

India has also embarked upon its journey to a market economy. The transition has so far received wide support. Yet, the problem of unemployment and underemployment is equally baffling to us. We have targeted full employment by the year 2000. To fulfil our target, employment and the economy will have to grow by around 3 per cent and 7 per cent, respectively. Export performance has been progressing on the lines expected. If the trend continues, it is hoped that the Indian economy will gain substantially in terms of employment generation through structural adjustment.

Poverty is both the cause and effect of unemployment and it is estimated that 20 per cent of the global population lives below the poverty line. The ratio is 30 per cent in the case of developing countries. Eradication of poverty through sharing the gains of prosperity is the major challenge confronting the ILO. This is possible only through increased gainful employment opportunities and the ILO's role in this regard is perceived in the following three ways:

First, the ILO can gear up its technical cooperation machinery in poor and underdeveloped countries to speed up the process of economic development so that economic growth accompanies higher employment generation. Secondly, the ILO can devise suitable social safety mechanisms in countries undergoing structural changes. This can be done only by launching more employment-generating programmes, entrepreneurship development and self-employment schemes. Third, the most important strategy would entail increasing the employability of the vast human resources available in these countries through strengthening education and training programmes, which may result in skill formation and skill upgrading.

Recently, the ILO has released World Employment 1995. This report raises several crucial issues. One of the basic issues is that wherever there are structural changes which world economies, particularly the developing countries, are undergoing, there is a significant shift in terms of output from agricultural towards industry and services. The structure of employment has also changed accordingly, posing serious problems to labour market adjustment and to human resource development processes. Some of the developing countries which could not reap the full benefits of globalization have experienced low productivity in formal sector employment. As a result, employment generation has had no significant effect on poverty alleviation and income generation. The Report, while advocating that the developing countries should maximize gains from continued globalization through higher output and efficiency, also justifiably recommends continuation of special employment programmes. Apprehension among the developing countries about the impact of new technologies on employment has also been noted but without indicating directions for solution. Some of these issues also bother the Indian planners. World Employment 1995 requires detailed examination and in-depth deliberation.

The post-Uruguay Round development and formation of the World Trade Organization while on the one hand promising free global trade by reducing tariff barriers, seems to be a subtle attempt on the part of few countries to impose non-tariff barriers to reduce the competitive advantage available to poor and underdeveloped countries. In this connection, I refer to the last paragraph of the Director-General's Report relating to the social clause.

Let me assure this body that developing countries equally share the concern of the advanced countries about the slow pace of social development in their countries. They are committed to upgrading the labour and social standards of their people. They have shown a genuine concern by gradually strengthening social sectors and passing necessary supportive legislation. The Conference of the Ministers of Labour of the Non-Aligned Countries, concluded in India in January this year, has resolved to eliminate child labour and gender discrimination which is a living testimony of collective concern by a group of nations.

But let us not forget that nations pass through different stages in their economic development which necessarily precede social development. It would be wholly unjustifiable to compare their present capacity to spend on social sectors with the poor nations.

The developing countries have demonstrated a collective will against linking the social clause with international trade through the Delhi Declaration signed in January this year. Generally they have all spoken unequivocally in the debates of the Governing Body Working Party on the Social Dimensions of the Liberalization of International Trade. The ILO principle of voluntarism is the time-tested mechanism for deliberating social issues and evolving suitable labour standards to be ratified by nations, according to their socio-economic conditions. It has enjoyed a wide reputation and international acclaim over the years.

Now, at this juncture, any doubt over its efficacy would amount to a great disservice to this august body and its supervisory function cannot be taken away by WTO or any other institution.

I take this opportunity to express my concern over some of the prevailing social issues we in India are trying to eliminate. Child and bonded or forced labour are the two common forms of social abuse. India has taken progressive steps to identify and gradually eliminate child and bonded labour. We have enacted respective legislation making such employment a recognized offence.

It is also to be appreciated that child employment has been a social and economic sustenance or supplementary income to the parents where they do not have adequate means of livelihood for the family. Moreover, they are not able to provide quality education to their children owing to financial distress. Our constitution enjoins Government to ensure primary education being compulsorily introduced, which ideal should be achieved by 2000 if not earlier. As it is progressively and universally implemented, the engagement of child labour in hazardous employment avocations having been already banned by law, it will demolish the foundation of child labour employment and lead to the gradual elimination of this social evil.

In this noble task of social commitment, Indian employers are wholeheartedly with the government and international community. Withdrawing children from work must be integrated with arrangements for properly supplementing parents' or dependents' income, and also for their proper rehabilitation, education and development. Only then would the objectives set forth be fully realized, but this approach is time-consuming. I hope some of my friends in Europe and the developed world will appreciate this and would not lose patience on this score.

We are alive to the problem of bonded or forced labour and since the inception of the Bonded Labour System Abolishment Act, 1976, approximately 250,000 bonded labourers have been identified and released and rehabilitated up to 1993. The Government of India has accorded the highest priority to the total eradication of the bonded labour system.

The population explosion is contributing significantly to unemployment and poverty in developing countries. Unless it is checked through education and awareness, it may imperil future global prosperity along with its socio-economic development.

In the end, I submit that no economic development will be sustainable without the social dimension being attended to. It should be our endeavour to work for a world where there would be no illiteracy, hunger, social exclusion or denial of any basic need to the individual.

Mr. ITO (Workers' delegate, Japan) – First of all, on behalf of the Workers' delegation of Japan, I should like to congratulate the President on his election to chair this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. It is an honour for the Japanese Trade Union Confederation with its 8 million members, and for myself, to be given the opportunity to take part in the discussion here – for which I express my sincere appreciation.

In view of the very severe employment situation throughout the world, and considering the role that the ILO should assume, the Report of the Director-General is a very timely one. Since the first oil shock, full employment has been set aside as an impossible objective in many industrialized countries. Today the ILO called upon its member States to consider full employment a priority objective – and this was accepted by the World Summit for Social Development. This acceptance is very important.

Yet it is regrettable that the Report of the Director-General is an abbreviation of World Employment 1995, and remains at the level of macro-analysis. In fact, a number of countries have rather good records of employment and I would have hoped that the Report would have analysed these countries; on this basis it could have advocated concrete proposals for activities to achieve full employment.

Japan has also maintained a rather good record of employment. The main reason for this has been, as already mentioned in this plenary by the Labour Minister and the President of the employers' organization Nikkeiren of Japan, the existence of a consensus to give employment the highest priority between management and union in many enterprises, as well as at national level between the Government, trade unions and employers. In the last ten years, the maintenance of employment has been a very difficult task because of the continuous rise in the value of the yen. In many Japanese companies, when a cut in employment became inevitable, serious negotiations were carried out to minimize the number of dismissals – and to take as much care as possible of those who had been dismissed.

Those countries belonging to EFTA, as well as the United States, merit deep analysis. Similarly, analysis at regional level seems to be important. The ILO, as the only tripartite international institution, cannot be satisfied with a global and macro-analysis of employment; it must look further, to the regional and national level, and propose concrete measures – for example in Africa where many countries are struggling under restructuring measures imposed by the World Bank and the IMF. Indeed, the result of assistance in Africa has been that the traditional economic basis of the continent has been destroyed and employment has been dramatically reduced. It is necessary that the ILO, with its tripartite constituency, elaborates concrete action programmes, and proposes them to the World Bank and IMF.

In some developing countries which have registered economic success, national wealth has grown but the people remain poor. This may be attributed to an unfair distribution of wealth. The ILO should play an active role to establish in each country a system of fair distribution of wealth, through discussion among the three parties – that is the workers, enterprise and managers, and the State. To bring about such a system, it is necessary to guarantee the fundamental rights of workers so that they are able to participate themselves in the fair distribution of wealth and solve the problem of poverty by themselves. This is, in fact, the objective of the “social clause”. The discussion on the social clause should be actively organized and concrete propositions made. The ILO should assume its responsibility in this field.

As regards the industrialized countries, the ILO requests them to make a greater contribution to the expansion of international trade and abstain from egoism. The ILO should also request industrialized countries to contribute actively to the establishment of a fair distribution of system through their development aids and technical cooperation to developing countries. It goes without saying that ILO technical cooperation to the developing countries is vital. Consequently, in view of the sharp fall of funds from UNDP, the industrialized countries, including Japan, should make a large increase of their voluntary contribution to ILO technical cooperation.

This year the Conference is examining the adoption of the Programme and Budget for 1996-97. As Workers' delegate of Japan, I support strongly the proposed budget. The Programme and Budget proposals are drawn up after a year of discussion in the Governing Body of the ILO, under the real zero growth limitation. This is the appropriate budget to respond to the necessary activities of the ILO. Yet, the fluctuation of exchange rate, and the move of some governments to reduce their contributions, create a fear that the income of the ILO may not be fulfilled, thus disrupting ILO activities.

The ILO, headed by its Director-General, should define more clearly its role, strengthen its efforts to contribute to the achievement of the objectives of the World Summit for Social Development – especially the expansion of employment and the guarantee of fundamental trade union rights – and demonstrate its capacity for achievement. On the basis of these activities, the ILO should persuade governments of the need for appropriate funding, the full payment of their contributions within the time-limit and increased technical cooperation contributions. On my part, I assure you that the Japanese Trade Union Confederation will participate actively in ILO activities and support the ILO.

Original Vietnamese: Mr. TRAN DINH HOAN (Minister for Labour, the Disabled and Social Affairs, Viet Nam) – At the outset, I would like to warmly congratulate the President on his election to his high office at the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference, and to express to the Director-General and his colleagues, our great appreciation for the excellent preparations for the issues to be considered by the session.

The 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place at an important time, when the issues of social development, issues related very directly to the ILO's mandate on social justice, social security and social integration, have attracted more and more attention from all governments, international organizations and, indeed, all those living on our planet. This concern was highlighted at the recent World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen, the outcome of which ILO's contribution was very important. Hence, I believe that this session provides the most appropriate forum to exchange ideas and discuss the most effective ways and means to implement the resolutions on social development which relate to ILO's mandate and competence.

In Viet Nam, the philosophy of the paramount importance of developing all aspects of the human being has governed the whole course of the national liberation struggle in the past, as well as the course of the current national development process in the country.

The achievements of the Vietnamese renovation process during the last few years have helped the country overcome a serious socio-economic crisis and enter a new period of development. The annual average GDP growth is 8 per cent; the national economy is heading towards stabilization; inflation is gradually being driven back from 800 per cent in 1986 to 10 per cent on average during the last two years; poverty and backwardness are being reduced. All these endeavours and achievements are aimed at the goal of building up a prosperous country, wealthy people and a civilized society.

During the last three years, the government budget allocated between 26 and 28 per cent annually for social development. The Government has launched a number of national programmes for social development, such as the National Programme for Employment Promotion, the Programme for Poverty Alleviation, and the Programme for Prevention of Social Vices. Thanks to these efforts, significant progress was achieved in the field of labour and social affairs. For example, more than 1 million new jobs are created yearly; great impetus has been given to the implementation of the National Programme on Poverty Alleviation. More particularly, after many years of preparation with the technical assistance of ILO, the new draft Labour Code of Viet Nam was adopted by the National Assembly on 23 June 1994. This was a turning point in labour legislation of Viet Nam for the transition period.

During the forthcoming years, Viet Nam, will give greater priority to social issues. Efforts shall be concentrated on the development of human resources and job creation. The goal is to achieve harmony between two goals, that of building up an educated labour force with a high level of technological expertise and skill in order to meet the requirements of the industrialization and modernization of Viet Nam, and that of designing a policy to achieve full employment, a job for every person who wants to work, with a reduction in unemployment in urban areas and in underemployment in the countryside. We will continue to implement the Labour Code to carry out programmes on poverty alleviation with the objective of eliminating hunger in households and drastically reduce the number of poor families through establishing the poverty alleviation fund which provides loans and preferential interest rates to the poor. It also carries out policies of social integration, assistance and support to those affected by the reform (the disabled, orphans, war victims) in order to give them equal opportunities to be reintegrated in their communities. Viet Nam is preparing for the early accession to or ratification of ILO's Conventions dealing with basic workers' rights.

The need to strengthen the effectiveness of the ILO's Active Partnership Programme between the Organization and its Members is more relevant than ever before, at a time when the ILO is faced with budget constraints.

In this spirit, we firmly believe that the proposal put forth in the past by the Government of Viet Nam concerning the need for ILO to be represented in Viet Nam itself as soon as possible even at a modest level, to serve as a focal point and to coordinate its cooperation with national constituents is aimed at promoting the above-mentioned effective cooperation. We consider it as the most economic and effective way to secure ILO's understanding of and timely response to the needs for member States with an economy in transition.

The delegation of the Government of Viet Nam realized that the biggest challenge for all of us here is to express the desire and determination expressed at the ILO's 75th anniversary last year, and the spirit of the World Social Summit in Copenhagen in practical and effective activities which will enhance the synergy of national and international efforts.

Mr. MUSSANHANE (Employers' delegate, Mozambique) – It is a great honour for me to have been given the opportunity to address the Conference. I would like also to congratulate the President on his election to preside over this year's session of the ILO Conference.

I represent the Employers' group of Mozambique, a country that after years of civil war has succeeded in permitting the peace process to prevail. This process was assisted by the holding of peaceful and democratic elections in October 1994. I thank the United Nations system and the International Labour Organization in particular for the support they have rendered us in the peace process. Currently there are a number of ILO-sponsored projects and programmes actively in place to support the reintegration of demobilized and displaced people throughout our country.

Political stability and the multi-party environment are the preconditions and vital ingredients for restarting our development process with the collaboration of both local and foreign investors.

The topic of employment promotion is a timely one as it is of the highest interest for Mozambicans. Through this topic, we can discuss ways and means to obtain the correct scenario for the promotion of employment.

There are a number of figures that I would like to share with you to demonstrate the very poor employment scenario in Mozambique. Unemployment is 7 per cent and underemployment is 52 per cent; illiteracy is 63 per cent; demographic dependency is 92.2 per cent; economic dependence is 146.5 per cent. And there are more than 1 million displaced persons and some 100,000 demobilized soldiers or other persons.

In addition to the above figures, there are also repatriated persons from the former Soviet Union bloc. One out of three families is considered to live in extreme poverty.

The causes of this bad scenario have been the macroeconomic policy and the massive destruction of the economic and social structure during the war. Control of business has gone berserk, since the war damaged not only the physical infrastructure but also the proper mind sets and good values that underscore proper management. The instability of the situation has also led to a decline in discipline and expertise among the workers.

The 1994 UNDP publication on human development characterized Mozambique as a country in crisis, because of the deterioration of development factors, such as unemployment, lack of infrastructural development, high military expenditure and a poorly skilled and undisciplined work force among others.

The Employers' group is prepared to join hands with social partners, the ILO and other members of the international community to develop an action plan on employment promotion.

We support the resolution advanced during the World Summit in Copenhagen pertaining to sustainable development and poverty alleviation. Thank you very much for your attention.

Mr. LUCHMAN ROY (Workers' delegate, Mauritius) – It gives me pleasure to congratulate Mr. Rosales Argüello on his election as President of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I have no doubt that under his able leadership the Conference will make fruitful deliberations to the satisfaction of all parties and delegates present.

I will seize this opportunity to express my satisfaction at the brilliant Report produced by the Director-General on promotion of employment throughout the world. The analysis about the developing countries, the transition economies and the industrialized countries provides a very clear picture about the present employment situation.

While going through this Report we can easily situate our own country which has adopted a very clear-cut strategy to promote and maintain a high level of employment. With a market-oriented economy and a liberal trading regime, our Government has chosen an export-oriented industrialization strategy. Mauritius has chosen a policy to attract foreign investors, and the overall strategy is to integrate the country's economy into the global economy.

However, we believe that this strategy should not aim at penalizing workers at all costs. We are happy that the Director-General has pointed out in his Report that it is possible to maintain economic growth with sound macroeconomic policies and ensure a good match between technologies, policies and institutions.

We believe that government should pursue a policy to promote confidence among workers. Workers should be made to feel that they play a central role in the process of development. We disapprove and condemn the policy which tries to justify the theory that this decision and the implementation of economic strategies is a matter to be finalized just by government and the private sector.

We noted with satisfaction last year the decision of our Government to ratify the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). This decision naturally gave rise to great expectations in the trade union movement in the country. However, we have noted that some of the tripartite structures set up by the Government are not functioning in the true spirit of tripartism as spelled out in the said Convention. We do not understand for which reason the Government hesitates to involve the trade union movement in the process of decision-making on vital issues.

Last year I had the opportunity to raise the issue of privatization. The privatization of the Central Housing Authority (CHA) has been a traumatic experience for workers in the country, and we in the trade union movement are against the privatization for specific reasons. No safety net was provided for hundreds of workers who were laid off in 1993. The service provided by the private company which has replaced the CHA, which was a public enterprise, is now much more expensive. The primary objective of the public enterprise was to provide a service to the nation. It has today been replaced by a private enterprise whose immediate concern is nothing but profit.

While addressing the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference last year I had the opportunity to denounce the Mauritius Trade Union and Labour Relations Bill whose second reading in the National Assembly was expected in 1994. With the prorogation of the National Assembly, the Bill is, for the time being, no longer on the agenda of this same assembly. The trade union movement in Mauritius reacted violently against the Trade Union and Labour Relations Bill because it literally abolished the right to strike. It conferred excessive powers on the Prime Minister and encouraged union proliferation in the country. At the same time, the proposal to institute a National Pay and Productivity Council (NPPC) threatened directly the existence of the Pay Research Bureau (PRB) and the National Remuneration Board (NRB), the two bodies which are responsible for carrying out revision exercises in the public and private sectors on a regular basis. The NPPC Bill specified that the PRB, the NRB and the Tripartite Committee for the Determination of Salary Compensation would be declared redundant.

With industrialization, and compared to the past, the number of strikes in the country has diminished substantially. It is precisely for this reason that we believe that there is no need for industrial laws to become harsher for workers and unions. The decision to maintain the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act and the NPPC would mean for us that the Government harbours sinister motives against unions and that it is dictated by employers. Hopefully, this is not going to be the case and I must point out that we have appreciated the Government's decision not to proceed further with the Bill in the National Assembly.

We do not want the Government to have no room for manoeuvre and, in this context, we have proposed that the Garrioch Report should be used as the basis for new industrial legislation, and we are prepared to extend our full support and collaboration along this line. The Trade Union and Labour Relations Bill and the NPPC have indirectly had the effect of unifying the trade union movement in the country, and it is prepared to take real risks if the right and appropriate decisions are not taken in the days to come.

The issue of imported labour is today a matter of vital interest in Mauritius. The number of foreign workers has attained unprecedented proportions, and they are being used in agriculture, construction, industries, in brief in all sectors. We get the impression that there is the tendency to downplay their role and there are clear indications that these workers are being exploited with very low wages and, in many cases, very poor living conditions. Some employers are making real abuse of imported labour – treating them more or less like slaves. I must also add here that we have doubts about the real statistics concerning foreign workers.

I am happy that the Director-General has mentioned the issue of social protection in his Report. The Mauritius Labour Congress (MLC) has laid regular emphasis on this issue. Some two years back the Government removed subsidies on rice and flour which are the staple food for the population. We felt at that time that pressure was being exerted by the World Bank and the IMF to dismantle the welfare state. We are happy to note that this year the Government has decided to reintroduce subsidies.

In spite of the substantial amount of economic progress achieved so far in our country, we are of the opinion that social protection is indispensable for the vulnerable sections of the population. There is still a significant section of the population which depends on the safety net of social protection to live a decent life and this is the reason for which we insist on the continued existence of the welfare state.

We have struggled for long years calling upon the authorities to introduce the five-day week in the sugar industry. We are happy that the Government has at long last taken the right decision. However, we consider that this should not be the final point so far as the five-day week is concerned. The MLC believes that the principle should be extended to other sectors of the economy like the civil service, the postal service, the banks, etc.

We are fully conscious of the constant effort being made by our Government to modernize our economy by setting up and operating a strong and viable service sector through the stock exchange, offshore banking, the free port, etc. We have always had the conviction that economic and social development should go hand in hand and that it should also promote workers' welfare. We are of the opinion that development should not infringe on workers' acquired rights and this is the experience that we want to live in our country and show to the world. So far there is nothing that proves that this is not possible.

On behalf of the MLC, I also have to acknowledge and express my deep appreciation for the significant and important role that the ILO continues to play in our own country to promote better understanding among tripartite partners and to sustain growth and development in the Indian Ocean region. The ILO has a vital role to assume to defend international standards, and there is no doubt that it will have to play its role more significantly.

We appreciate the initiative of the Government to ratify a number of international Conventions. After having dealt with Conventions on child labour and tripartism, it has now signified its intention to ratify the Convention concerning maritime environment protection. We have taken note of this good initiative and we believe that the Freedom of Association and the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140), and the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151), to be fundamental instruments whose objectives are not in the least way contrary to the pursuit of development strategies. We express our satisfaction on the ILO's invitation and solicitation to governments in this regard.

Finally, I reaffirm my organization's faith in and support of the objectives of the ILO. We hope the ILO will maintain its standard-setting activities which are, in our opinion, essential for the pursuit of economic and social development all around the world.

Mr. SANGMA (Minister for Labour, India) – May I join my other colleagues in congratulating the President and Vice-Presidents on their election.

World Employment 1995 is a timely and topical report. I compliment the Director-General in presenting a summary of it.

The crucial strategies projected in the report for meeting the challenge of full employment are sound macroeconomic management, trade liberalization, export-led industrialization, stabilization of financial markets and adjustment measures to improve labour markets. Most countries responding to the challenge of globalization have generally come to adopt them and are implementing them with varying degrees of pace and success. Variations in the pace and success of implementation of these strategies are due to the fact that economics in its application is not pure science but is political too.

The refrain of the Report of the Director-General would seem to be emphasis on international action. He advises: "If globalization is to proceed benignly, then it is clear that the loss of national policy autonomy has to be compensated by the development of an international policy". While international action could be in terms of global coordination, it cannot, and should not, detract from or substitute national policy autonomy.

In the context of globalization and international trade liberalization, one school of thought is strongly apprehensive that there will be job losses in the industrialized countries. Market competition from lower wage economies, social dumping and delocalization and transnational location of industrial enterprises are the factors on which this apprehension is based. These apprehensions and the consequent protectionist sentiments arising out of them are clearly misplaced. The developed countries continue to command over 70 per cent of world trade. They have virtually saturated their own markets. That the growth of an economy is limited by the size of its market is as old as Adam Smith. Unless they access new markets, they cannot enhance their output and sustain their economic growth and employment. It is the developing countries of the world which offer new markets. The practice of new forms of protectionism by developed countries will stand in the way of access to these markets which, in the final analysis, will adversely affect the former. Viewed in this perspective, the decision to suspend the debate on the social clause is only logical.

Other factors which need to be put in perspective in this context are: wage differentials should be understood in terms of purchasing power parity; higher wages in developed countries are linked to higher productivity and higher technology; a fall or stagnation in wages is also caused by lower growth rates of productivity and cannot be attributed merely to trading with lower-wage countries; about half of all foreign direct investment in developing countries is in the area of infrastructure or services which cannot be exported from the developed countries and hence involve little relocation of jobs; a substantial percentage of international trade occurs within the multinational corporate world itself and job losses are more than neutralized by the export of capital goods, intermediate goods and financial services; in many industries the ratio of labour cost to total production cost is rather low, hence, translocation will not be worthwhile; and, above all, according to UNCTAD, investment in developed countries continues to remain much larger though of late, in relative terms, foreign direct investment in developing countries has more than doubled.

Much apprehension has been expressed about international capital movements in terms of "speculative currency flows". The argument is that portfolio investments are hot money and are volatile. But the degree of its volatility depends very significantly on national economic policies. Maintenance of exchange rate stability, channelling inflow of capital into wealth-generating investment rather than in consumption imports, pre-emption of hurtful levels of current account deficit in international trade and avoidance of unbridled free market policies like abolition of all capital controls, are the essential ingredients of sound national economic policy which will cool down foreign money. It should also not be forgotten that the very sale of shares could depreciate the investment of the foreigners. Given the right national economic policies, therefore, such value-depreciating sale of shares will not take place. The crux is the quality of national policy and not of foreign money. "Red hot policies will make even the coolest money evaporate. The temperature of money depends on the temperature of policies."

The global coordination in the area of international capital movements has to be complemented by sound national economic management and be within a coherent policy framework backed by a strong commitment of political credibility. Individually, the current economic cooperation groupings do not reflect adequate political representation. Hence, creation of politically broad-based economic cooperation structures is the need of the hour.

The growing significance of multinational enterprises has been rightly emphasized in the Report. But the argument that the "increased footlooseness" of multinational enterprises could lead to a debasement of labour standards, seems too categorical. Labour protection in the context of multinational enterprises cannot, of course, be overemphasized. But there is another side of the picture too. Instances of manpower in other domestic enterprises making competitive demands for parity with service conditions in multinational enterprises are also not wanting. In any case, as early as 1977, the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy was adopted by the Governing Body. The ongoing surveys to follow up this Declaration should continue and their results disseminated.

As regards adjustment measures to improve labour standards, the various ILO Conventions and the national laws based on them largely provide for employment security, wage protection and social security. The obvious philosophy behind this configuration of Conventions and laws is that protective service conditions would be productive too. Theoretically, of course, this cannot be faulted. But in practical terms, correlation between protection and production does not always materialize. This is principally due to the inherently pervasive adversarial relationship between employers and workers that gets projected in the Conventions and the laws and in their practice. When economies are globalizing there is no place for class conflict, which is anachronistic. If this malady is not remedied, ILO Conventions and laws may seriously detract from employment generation. The principal task of the ILO while reviewing and updating these standards is one of cleansing them of this adversarial orientation. The employers and workers should demonstrate a new bilateral solidarity amongst themselves and strengthen the hands of the ILO in this cleansing process. It is this solidarity which should be the propelling mechanism for labour market regulation and not the legislative might of the ILO or of its member States. Such a solidarity will assist the governments in playing their legitimate role. The ILO for its part should continue to play the role of the benign law-giver, resisting temptations to become the policeman.

In the area of social security, unemployment benefits would need to be necessarily contributory. Because of the sheer numbers involved, budget support may not be sustainable. In countries with millions of unorganized workers, budget support may result in inequitable transfer of income to the more privileged and protected amongst the working class. Group insurance could be tried out. Contributions could be channelled into payment of premiums for such insurance.

There is a suggestion in the Director-General's Report for subsidies to employers to hire low-wage workers. Such subsidies may become self-perpetuating. They cannot easily be administered and may not even reach the targeted beneficiaries. They also defy meaningful analysis of costs and benefits.

Finally, these are some of my observations on the issues before us. I conclude calling for vigilance and perseverance of national action supported by international coordination for achieving full, freely chosen and productive employment.

Mr. TEMANE (Minister of Labour Home Affairs, Botswana) – The time has never been so opportune for the discussion of the subject of employment promotion at this forum. The basic feature that makes this subject ripe for discussion is the readiness shown by the world to embark on the process of globalization. There are indications of commitment among countries towards trade liberalization as witnessed by the conclusion of the World Trade Organization Agreement. There is the consolidation of the democratization process that has just taken place in most countries in Eastern Europe and Africa, resulting in an attitude welcoming foreign investment based on the concept of free market competition. There is also a general openness towards new technology and appropriate practices. Countries that are embracing these open policies are reshaping the associated benefits in the form of high and sustained growth rates and the resultant generation of more employment opportunities, rising real wages and significant reduction in poverty.

The liberalization of world trade as envisaged in the World Trade Organization Agreement is of particular importance to the developing countries since it represents an intention to reduce a wide range of trade barriers. As can be imagined, the developing countries are interested in the removal of barriers which have a negative impact on their economies in order to enable full enjoyment of the advantages of liberalized trade. Admittedly, there has not always been a coincidence of mutual interest and gain between the developed and the developing countries, resulting in considerable strain in relations. It is helpful to remember, however, that poverty anywhere threatens prosperity everywhere. Those of our colleagues who are better off are encouraged to use their extensive resources to eschew defensive and protectionist responses. This naturally flows from the momentum of the Copenhagen Social Summit.

This rare moment needs to be tapped if we are to harvest maximum benefits from our efforts to combat the global unemployment problem. An encouragement of open-door policies must form the foundation of our programme of action regarding employment promotion.

The unemployment crisis continues unabated in most countries and Botswana is no exception. Unemployment and underemployment are at their highest levels particularly among youth and women. It has been observed that women generally continue to be the last to benefit from job expansion and the first to suffer from job contraction. The increasing active working population tends to exacerbate the unemployment problem. The increase in the labour force far exceeds formal employment creation.

This situation depicts a timebomb because unemployment, particularly in urban areas and among the educated, provides a breeding ground for a host of political, economic and social problems if no efforts are made to attend to these problems. There is no doubt, therefore, that generating full employment is the wish of each and every society.

It is true that developing countries are the hardest hit by the unemployment crises for reasons advanced in the Director-General's Report, and many others that have to do with the choice of inappropriate technology, education systems that are not suited to the manpower development needs of the economies of those countries, and the unfavourable trading positions of those countries.

The challenges are indeed daunting for developing countries. A global solution, the objective of which is to facilitate the integration of developing countries into the world economy, is an absolute requirement. Strategies that do not take glaring inequalities between States and regions into account are not likely to provide appropriate remedies. Our plea is that developing countries in general, and Africa in particular, need the special attention of the ILO. The deliberations of this Conference must be centred on seeking ways to direct efforts by the world community to generate employment to the realization of equitable benefit by all countries irrespective of their economic position, location or status.

In Botswana our employment promotion policy is an outcome of our four National Planning Objectives for Rapid Economic Growth, Economic Independence, Social Justice and Social Development. The underlying assumptions behind these objectives are that improvement in the rate of economic growth would bring about a rapid expansion of employment opportunities which in turn would generate income for the majority of our people, resulting in the improvement of living standards as well as changes in the lifestyles of the people and the alleviation of poverty.

Our employment policy is a blend of an export-oriented industrialization approach, an import substitution strategy and an economic diversification thrust. Efforts to diversify the economy and to substitute for imports are embodied in the Financial Assistance Policy, the aim of which is to render financial assistance to businesses that produce or process goods which can either substitute for imported goods or be exported so that the economy can be diversified to avoid reliance on mining and the beef industry.

We acknowledge the significant role played by the ILO in assisting member States to tackle the major problems of unemployment and in the search for ways to generate employment opportunities. The ILO continues to render technical assistance in the fields of employment, manpower planning, labour market information studies and technical advisory services, to mention but a few. We also note that special attention has always been given and continues to be given to areas such as training, research and consultancy services through Regional Labour Administration Centres.

An examination of the role the ILO should play in the world, characterized by the economic restructuring that is under way, should continue. ILO activities must be geared to the promotion of the process of openness and globalization.

We recognize the importance of ensuring that workers share in the benefits of increased trade resulting from the dismantling of barriers to trade and other practices that hinder competition. Consequently, we believe in the good intentions of international labour standards. However, we do have concerns about the link between international trade and international labour standards as contained in the social clause. As we have stated on previous occasions at this forum and others, we strongly believe that the ILO is best suited to address issues concerning the protection of workers' rights, and those issues must be left to its exclusive jurisdiction.

The slow process of ratifying the amendments to the ILO Constitution as approved by the International Labour Conference in 1986 gives cause for concern. It is disturbing to note that the reluctance to ratify these amendments spreads right across countries of different economic standing. We would like to encourage those countries which have not ratified the amendments to do so as a matter of urgency. We also request the Director-General to use his good offices to encourage the speedy ratification of those amendments.

In conclusion, we commend the Director-General for placing at our disposal such a candid and informative Report. The importance and relevance of the item on safety and health in mines cannot be ignored by those of us involved in the mining industry. The recent loss of over 100 mineworkers in the South African mines is a sobering reminder of the risks associated with underground mining in particular, and further represents a challenge to our appreciation of human life. We all have a duty to work towards limiting human suffering to circumstances which are truly accidental.

Original Russian: Mr. KASKEVITCH (Government delegate, Ukraine) – May I first of all congratulate the President on his election to this high office and wish him every success in his work at this session of the Conference.

The Report submitted to this session of the Conference by the Director-General of the International Labour Office contains what we believe to be a fairly in-depth analysis of the employment situation and the proposed guidelines for future work of the ILO in this area to promote joint national and international efforts to solve current employment problems. We fully support the conclusion in the Report that the task of creating enough jobs to overcome unemployment and underemployment and finding a solution to the problems of proper remuneration is a priority in the economic and social policies of countries throughout the world.

ILO activities are an integral part of the concept of stable social development enshrined in the Declaration and Programme of Action adopted by the World Summit for Social Development held in March this year. There is no doubt that the ILO will be called upon to play an important role in implementing the decisions of the World Summit, and in particular, ensuring respect for the obligations contained in the Declaration and Programme of Action regarding employment. In this regard, we support the decisions of the 262nd Session of the ILO Governing Body on the use of existing supervisory machinery to monitor progress in applying the decisions of the World Summit. We also welcome the Report of the Director-General, World Employment 1995, as part of the new practice of compiling regular reports on the status of employment in order to find ways to solve employment problems within the tripartite structure of the ILO.

We fully endorse the analysis in the Report on the employment situation and trends in countries in transition, including Ukraine, and we support the conclusion that the negative effects of economic reforms, in particular the growth of unemployment and an increase in the proportion of the population living below the poverty line, threaten political stability in these countries, raise the spectre of social conflict and will lead to increased social inequality.

We also agree with the Report that the crisis of mass unemployment can be overcome by expanding industrial output and creating jobs in new areas of activity based on the comparative advantages of the economies of the countries in transition. At the same time, the key in this element will be an increase in capital investment. In this context, we support the conclusion that problems of mass unemployment cannot be solved without increased direct foreign investment, whereas up to now, negligible amounts, if any, have gone to the transition economies of the former Soviet Union.

An important and positive feature of the Report in our view is the fact that it contains useful recommendations on employment and labour market policies. In this connection, we support the proposals in the Report for a gradual approach to trade liberalization, the introduction of privatization and enterprise restructuring, while dismissing the pointless practice of protecting state enterprises by giving them soft credits or applying binding import quotas. One cannot but agree with the conclusion in the Report that a labour market policy's primary aim should be to reduce unemployment, expand the labour market, improve the situation of the most vulnerable sectors of the population, promote geographical, occupational and industrial mobility in the workforce and raise productivity.

Unfortunately, the drafting and implementation of a strong social policy in the Ukraine has been extremely complicated because of its difficult economic situation, a fall in output, and the crisis in its financial and monetary systems. The situation of the Ukrainian economy compared with the data given in a report for 1990-94 has hardly changed.

Under the circumstances, the President of Ukraine, Mr. Kuchma, proposed, and the Parliament of Ukraine has adopted, a new social and economic reform strategy aimed at speeding up the most important economic changes and developing a strong social policy which includes measures to create jobs.

Obviously the acute economic crisis is having an effect on employment in our country. In addition, the peculiarity of this kind of dependence affects not quantitative but qualitative features and indicators of employment and the labour market. Unemployment has hit first and foremost young people and women.

There are certain features of the labour market in Ukraine during this economic crisis: low occupational and territorial mobility, an underdeveloped infrastructure, an excessive hidden labour market and a high level of underemployment. The most salient feature is the low level of official unemployment and the high level of hidden unemployment.

The situation, of course, has prompted us to react properly and to take steps to promote employment.

In Ukraine we are promoting employment using economic, organizational, standard-setting and legislative measures.

The aim of these methods is to achieve, one way or another, the main objectives of the employment and labour market policy, i.e. to reduce unemployment, to enlarge the labour market and to improve the situation and the social protection of vulnerable population groups. We are trying to promote the mobility of the labour force, to increase productivity by broadening industrial production and creating jobs in new areas of activity and also to transfer production away from non-competitive industries to labour-intensive branches requiring highly skilled workers.

In Ukraine we have developed yearly state employment programmes, with the help of which we are promoting employment and reforming the labour market by taking the necessary steps at both the national and the regional levels.

At present, apart from the state and the territorial employment programmes, there are also one-off programmes, including the following: the National Public Works Programme, the State Programme for the Promotion of Youth Employment, special branch employment programmes, the Regulation for the Promotion of Employment in the Event of Mass Dismissals, and so on.

For example, the state employment programme for 1995 has the objective of finding jobs for about 300,000 people, sending for vocational training and retraining more than 60,000 people, to involving more than 57,000 in public works projects and reserving about 230,000 jobs for special categories of the population.

We can now say that employment is shifting to the private sector. Private entrepreneurship is growing. Privatization is gaining pace. Non-governmental structures – which directly or indirectly should promote employment – are becoming more prevalent.

It is clear that because of the scale and particular nature of the problems of a country in transition such as Ukraine, the country's reforms require broad international support to ensure that the changes are irreversible and to integrate the country as quickly as possible into the world economy. This underscores the need to tackle the problems of the countries in transition, including the promotion of employment, as one of the priority areas for ILO action. In a number of other United Nations bodies and organizations, this has already been done, in accordance with resolutions 47/187, 48/181 and 49/106 of the United Nations General Assembly.

I would also like to stress that we are very grateful to the ILO for actively participating in carrying out reforms in Ukraine. In particular, I would like to note the practical value of the recommendations in the major study of the labour market and social security system in Ukraine, which was prepared by the ILO's multidisciplinary team in Budapest. At the same time, I would like to stress that we believe that the further development and increased activity of the ILO is necessary to improve social and labour relations.

Mr. MOLOPO (Minister of Trade, Industry, Tourism, Labour and Employment, Lesotho) – Allow me to congratulate President Rosales Argüello and his colleagues for their well-deserved election to guide the deliberations of this Conference. I equally commend the Director-General and his staff for the high quality of documents provided to delegates to enable them to participate effectively during the deliberation of issues before this Conference.

Unemployment continues to be one of the pervasive problems facing the whole world today and which many countries will continue to face in the foreseeable future. The Director-General of the ILO has made the timely choice of Promoting employment as the theme of this Conference to stimulate ongoing debate on what should be done to generate full and productive employment in all of our economies.

It is gratifying to note that the problem of unemployment is being addressed in many fora. The United Nations at the recent World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen, Denmark affirmed that unemployment is the root cause of hunger, poverty and social injustice and found it fitting to give employment issues a higher priority requiring urgent action, and we look to the International Labour Organization to contribute meaningfully towards the implementation of a programme of action to promote employment.

In Lesotho unemployment is estimated at about 45 per cent of the labour force, and this is rather high. Our unemployment problem is compounded by a number of factors. The first one is persistent drought, which has resulted in the lowest recorded rainfall during the past cropping season, the result being huge migration from rural areas to urban areas in search of non-existing jobs. Secondly is the retrenchment of our people from South African mines due to economic factors such as the fall in gold prices. Coupled with this is the cessation of recruitment of novices for the mines, which means South African mines do not employ new miners. Last but not least, Lesotho's population growth rate is relatively too high at 2.7 per cent a year, which means there are too many jobseekers as opposed to the rate at which jobs are created.

The International Labour Organization is uniquely suited to address this problem of unemployment because of its tripartite nature. Governments which are responsible for policy, economic and social development for job creation are here. Employers who create jobs are here and workers who take up these jobs are also here. There is consequently no reason why we should not put our heads together to tackle this menace of unemployment.

My Government has already embarked on programmes and measures geared towards redressing this problem, both on a short- and long-term basis. Apart from adopting enlightened population policies, we have adopted an economy driven by market forces, and in collaboration with our donor partners, we have embarked on privatization and commercialization of government businesses (parastatals). The Government is actively promoting cooperatives and development of small and medium-scale enterprises, particularly in agricultural-based industries.

In order to address the drought-exacerbated unemployment, we have also embarked on labour-intensive public works, which also address environment degradation problems. The unemployed and destitute will be engaged in construction of rural access roads, soil and water conservation works such as dam building, tree planting and donga rehabilitation. We are grateful that donor agencies like the UNDP have agreed to get involved in these environmental protection programmes, which may create temporary jobs even for unemployed youth.

In addressing unemployment on a long-term basis, my Ministry, in collaboration with our neighbour, South Africa, has established a skills training centre, where the unskilled, the unemployed and returned miners are trained and retrained in basic skills such as construction, motor vehicle maintenance, joinery and carpentry, electricity, plumbing, sewing, welding, bartending, catering and food management. It is hoped that trainees will acquire skills that they can sell in the labour market or preferably equip themselves for self-employment.

In the same vein, we have also established a vocational rehabilitation centre aimed at the training of the disabled and mentally impaired. We hope that donor countries and agencies will show interest in these efforts so that they may be strengthened and extended to the rest of the country, particularly in the rural mountainous areas.

One of the topics of this year's Conference is safety and health in mines. We are aware that safety and health issues are as old as mankind and the International Labour Organization has a number of standards relating to safety and health problems, including mining safety and health, and yet horrific accidents bordering on disasters continue to occur. One such accident recently occurred on 10 May 1995 in a South African mine, in which 104 miners were crushed by machinery; 55 of the dead, or more than 50 per cent, were Lesotho miners.

As my brother and colleague Mr. Tito Mboweni, recalled in his remarks during this assembly, in 1960 a South African coal mine accident claimed close to 500 lives and a sizeable group were Basotho miners. Statistics show that apart from mine disasters other fatal accidents in South Africa claim about two lives a day. The incidence of fatal accidents in South African mines are an indictment of the South African Government and mine employers, who should leave no stone unturned in the quest for safety in mining. It is our hope that the recent accident is the last of its kind. As an interested party we look forward to the Convention under consideration by this Conference and pledge our commitment to cooperate with the South African Government, mine employers and workers in creating a safe working environment for their mines.

Lesotho encourages the development of home work and other forms of informal economic activity which provide an alternative means of income given our high unemployment rate. We are of the view that this is a new area of work and we would have preferred to see it grow before we start restricting it with over-regulating such as by the proposed ILO Convention.

We are, however, not opposed to guidelines on the protection of workers in any sphere of economic activity. We would have consequently preferred a Recommendation rather than a Convention.

As I mentioned earlier, Lesotho experienced the worst drought in living memory during the past cropping season and harvest forecasts indicate the lowest yields in recorded history.

In the circumstances, the Prime Minister has declared a food emergency in many areas, especially the remote, mountainous and inaccessible ones. An appeal has been made to the international donor community for emergency food assistance.

Any assistance in this regard to help alleviate the effects of this adversity will be highly appreciated.

Allow me to conclude my remarks on the issue of the social clause, which is very topical within international fora. We want to reaffirm our commitment to protection of workers' rights, but we are apprehensive about the linkage of international labour standards and international trade. There is no doubt in our minds that the implementation of punitive measures will be very subjective and will invariably be used against small countries like our own. Our view is that countries who fail to observe workers' rights should be assisted through technical cooperation to enhance their capacities to observe and comply with relevant ILO standards.

Original French: Mr. MBILA (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Cameroon) – Like all of those who have taken the floor before me at this podium, allow me to congratulate the President on his election to chair the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. This competence, along with his lengthy experience, obviously guarantee the smooth running of our work which, from year to year, gradually shapes the social aspect of the world to come.

My congratulations are also addressed to the Director-General of the ILO for the excellent reports which constitute a good basis for discussion and, in particular, the report World Employment 1995.

Cameroon, as a Member of the International Labour Organization, has always worked for the ideals of our Organization in order to meet man's needs through productive work freely chosen.

For this reason, the Preamble to our Constitution stipulates that the State must spare no effort to help its citizens to find and keep employment.

Furthermore, Cameroon has ratified the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and is endeavouring to apply it. Nevertheless, as is obvious, the employment situation in a country cannot be dissociated from the general economic situation prevailing therein.

Hence Cameroon, which is one of the most diversified of the African countries in terms of natural resources, experienced moderate yet sustained growth of the order of 7 to 8 per cent in nominal terms in the first decade of its independence. In terms of employment this period was characterized by a sharp upswing in employment in the modern sector.

The second noteworthy period in the recent economic history of Cameroon was between 1970 and 1985, when it experienced accelerated growth of the order of 8 per cent on average in real terms. That period was also marked by an expansion in exports and the discovery of oil. The public sector and the parastatal sector peaked. The regular rise in budgetary income made it possible to support a high level of public expenditure in all sectors: production, communication infrastructure, social services (health, education, and so on). Over that period the unemployment rate, while not negligible, nevertheless gave little cause for concern. It was estimated at approximately 5 per cent in 1976.

Since 1986, a severe crisis followed that period of sharp growth because of the drop in the prices of the country's principal export products. That crisis was reflected in various ways and produced perverse effects, such as: first, negative growth in the gross domestic product; a deficit in the state budget; an excessive public debt burden; the shrinking of internal demand. In this context, the employment situation can only be deemed alarming. Retrenchments, factory closures and bankruptcies of certain enterprises contributed, along with the population increase, to a rise in unemployment from 8.6 per cent in 1987 to 10.3 per cent in 1993.

I have taken the liberty of describing the various phases in Cameroon's economic development in order to show how external factors may underlie the collapse of an economy. Today, more than previously, external factors are becoming more decisive with the globalization of the world economy.

We agree with the Director-General of the ILO when he affirmed that one of the principal economic policy objectives of a country such as ours should be to benefit as much as possible from the rapid increase in trade and investment flows.

For this reason Cameroon, which has been undergoing structural adjustment since 1988, has implemented a series of reforms to implement a more liberal economic policy likely to attract foreign investors and to increase exports.

These reforms include: the recovery of production and the redefinition of the State's role; disengagement from certain productive sectors and services and the promotion and facilitating of the private economic activity; the restructuring of the parastatal sector, through rehabilitation, liquidation and privatization, and the reform of the banking sector; the implementation of a new tariff system; the democratization of political life and the organization of pluralistic legislative and presidential elections.

The Government is convinced that with this series of reforms economic recovery is possible and, along with it, an improvement in the employment situation. Indeed there have already been several signs foreshadowing this recovery, such as in the steady performance of the primary and secondary sectors, whose exports have made possible to improve substantially the balance of payments in the course of the past financial year.

While awaiting fuller recovery, the Government will continue to lay particular emphasis upon the social aspect.

As to employment, more particularly, the Government has set up the National Employment Fund, to disseminate information to graduates of universities and specialized teaching institutes, seeking their first jobs, and also to workers made redundant for economic reasons. It is also helping to promote self-employment and micro-enterprises.

The National Employment Fund also participates in implementing the emergency social programme which consists in road cleaning, public health and rubbish-disposal work as well as emergency public works in urban centres, supplementary support for the procurement of medicines, teaching manuals and supplies in schools, as well as other target-specific initiatives for those social groups most affected by the structural adjustment.

While we consider that reforms must be made at the national level, it is also of primary importance for the entire international community to find solutions to certain crucial problems such as indebtedness and protectionism.

It is fortunate that the World Social Summit evoked the problem of developing country debt which nullifies all our efforts at recovery. Since the Summit was held, certain countries have taken initiatives to cancel out or to alleviate the debt burden. This is a gesture which we appreciate for what it is. We hope that this trend will continue in the course of the next few years.

As to protectionism, in the past this has taken the form of import quotas. Today there is an attempt to push this to an extreme, by including international labour standards and the respect thereof in trade agreements. We can but condemn this attitude, above all since it would deprive the ILO of its primary role, which is precisely to draw up and ensure respect for labour standards.

Now that the time has come to translate the spirit of Copenhagen into specific action, what will the role of our Organization be? As far as we are concerned this will be a role of awareness-raising on the international scene, among the member States, and also in financial circles in order that all of them launch programmes to promote employment and to help eliminate poverty. Carrying out these programmes will lead to an increased productivity of capital.

Allow me by way of conclusion to say a word or so about the programme and budget for the biennium 1996-97. I would like to congratulate the Governing Body of the ILO for keeping to zero budgetary growth despite the increasing needs throughout all countries in the world from year to year and particularly in developing countries.

Despite the crisis plaguing us today, we hope that all the member States which recognize the irreplaceable role played by the ILO will spare no effort to support the budget.

Original French: Mr. BAKEVYUMUSAYA (Minister of Labour, Craft Industries and Vocational Training, Burundi) – Allow me on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Burundi, the delegation which I have the honour of heading, and on my own behalf, to join previous speakers in expressing my sincere congratulations to Mr. Rosales Argüello and to the other Officers of the Conference on their successful election to preside over the work of this session of the International Labour Conference. Their wisdom, experience and knowledge of world labour issues will no doubt enable us to achieve successful results.

I would also like to express my full appreciation to Mr. Michel Hansenne and his staff at the International Labour Office for the objectivity, topicality and importance of the topics so skilfully developed in the Report entitled Promoting employment” submitted to the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference for its examination.

Before presenting to this honourable assembly my delegation's contribution to the discussion on the Report of the Director-General, I would like to mention that for nearly two years the Republic of Burundi has been undergoing a serious social and political crisis triggered by the assassination on 21 October 1993 of the first democratically elected civilian Head of State since independence.

The effects of this crisis have reached all areas of national economic life, and in particular, employment, the prospects of which have been somewhat bleak for the last five years. The public insecurity which characterized this period has had a negative impact on both public and private investment, thus rendering uncertain any attempts at economic recovery and a redistribution of income generated by employment.

However, this situation has been positively countered by the authorities of the Government of the Republic of Burundi which, determined to bring about a return to normal conditions, launched a major campaign three months ago to create an awareness of the need to re-establish peace and to rebuild the nation. This is a noble task, but as I said last year from this very same rostrum, it requires the support of the international community and of friendly countries represented here, and I hereby once again repeat my call for their support.

During the past ten years, there have been numerous changes throughout the world which have had a considerable impact on the level and structure of employment in all countries and particularly in the developing countries. Amongst these changes I would like to mention the widespread economic crisis, structural adjustment, democratization, the ensuing social and economic conflicts, etc.

The consequences have disrupted living standards and hampered access to goods and services that are indispensable to the population. These effects are, however, not all of the same degree depending on whether we are talking about developed or developing countries.

The Report of the Director-General draws an accurate picture of the developing countries, and in particular of the African ones, including Burundi. The Report reviews the problems of employment throughout the world and analyses the various political approaches that can be adopted to solve the problem at the international and national levels for the various groups of countries.

The World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen last March looked at three main issues: the eradication of poverty, the expansion of productive employment, and social integration. At the end of the Summit a Declaration and Programme of Action were adopted, clearly indicating that because of its mandate, tripartite structures and expertise, the ILO should play a special role in the implementation of the Programme of Action in the fields of employment and social development.

The delegation of my country fully supports the contribution that the ILO should play in relation to the problem of employment, as expressed by the Director-General in his address in Copenhagen, "the expansion of productive employment is of strategic importance for social progress. Enabling each person to participate, through remunerated work, in the development and welfare of society is beyond doubt the best means of combating effectively poverty and social exclusion".

Unfortunately, these problems have deteriorated considerably in a number of countries, such as mine, which for some time have been facing a political and social crisis triggered by the democratic transition whose effects are not under full control. Creating an economic, political, social, cultural and legal environment that will enable people to achieve social development is the first of the ten commitments set out in the Declaration of the Copenhagen Summit.

The action required in this connection will no doubt be difficult in view of the situation in countries where social peace has been compromised and public security rendered precarious as a result of events that have taken place there. A flexible system will therefore be required to take into account certain specific situations.

Following the celebration of its 75th anniversary, our cherished Organization is once again called upon by nations throughout the world to make available to its constituents its expertise and vast experience in favour of worldwide social development.

I do not for one minute doubt that the ILO will rise to the occasion. I would, however, urge it to instruct its regional offices, as well as the multidisciplinary teams currently operating throughout the world, to ascertain through extensive field work which concrete activities should be carried out in conjunction with the implementation of the Programme of Action which resulted from the recent World Summit for Social Development.

The Government of Burundi will spare no effort to contribute positively towards the commitments undertaken at the conclusion of the Summit, in particular efforts to build stable and just societies based on the promotion and protection of all human rights, tolerance, equality of opportunity, security and the participation of all people.

Before ending my statement I would once again like to express my gratitude to the International Labour Office for all the work done within the framework of this, the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

Finally, I would like to make an appeal to the international community and to our friends represented here to keep a watchful eye on the social and political situation in our country in order to be able to continue to support us in the quest for a peaceful solution to the conflicts threatening the unity of our people and hampering our full economic and social development.

Original Russian: Mr. JANTSAN (Employers' delegate, Mongolia) – May I, on behalf of the Employers of Mongolia, associate myself with the preceding speakers and congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their unanimous election to these high offices at this session of the Conference, and wish them every success in their work.

I would also like to congratulate the Director-General on his valuable Report, Promoting employment, which analyses the economic situation in the world, today's trends in industry and trade, the employment situation and the regulation of the labour market in countries with various levels of development.

In Mongolia, the problem of employment and unemployment has become one of the most serious we have to face.

Our association, which works to create favourable conditions for the development of private enterprise, considers it important to make a contribution to reducing poverty and unemployment in our country. In our view, the main way to do this is by creating small and medium-sized enterprises, thus increasing the number of jobs and providing everyone who can work with a real chance of finding a job.

For some five years now, Mongolia has been trying to cope with the transition to a market economy. We have met some success and some difficulties as well. As a result of the privatization of state property and a major transfer of industries to the private sector, small catering enterprises, public catering, trade, technical and material equipment industries and agricultural production enterprises have become predominantly private. This explains the need to set up an organization to defend the interests of private employers.

The organization which I represent, the Employers' Association of Mongolia, has from its inception worked to defend the interests of employers and to promote favourable conditions for private business.

Our association is a new institution; it has existed for four years. In the first few years, when the foundations of the market economy were being laid, the work of the organization was mainly aimed at promoting the development of private entrepreneurship.

There were at first some difficulties because of the lack of laws governing private enterprise. At this point, a whole body of legislation has been adopted.

In the beginning, as a result of the breakdown of the former economic relations, the economic crisis and a lack of consumer goods, private entrepreneurs concentrated on trade, the import of ready-made goods and the export of raw materials and natural resources.

In the past year, the economy has stabilized somewhat and the market has been saturated with goods. Employers have thus begun to pay more attention to the production of goods and services.

The true role and function of our employers' association is thus becoming more important. One of its main tasks is to train employers in business management, administration and social and labour relations of the enterprise.

In a context of growing competition, market laws gain importance, and only the most financially efficient enterprises can survive. This underscores the fact that business is not for everyone – it is only for those who are most capable at it. On the other hand, the shutting down of small enterprises entails a loss of jobs, and leads to unemployment.

Therefore, one of the main tasks of our association is to develop and strengthen small and medium-sized enterprises and to train their managers.

I should thus like on behalf of our association to express our great thanks to the Organization for its help in organizing national and international seminars and in promoting an exchange of information on labour-related issues.

There is yet another area of activity of our association. It participates at the national level in tripartite negotiations with our social partners, with the aim of finding a social consensus, providing for stable economic development and preventing disputes. In respecting tripartite principles, the association is trying to carry out its work in ways most well adapted to market conditions. I would like, in this regard, to stress the importance of the help and support of the ILO, which provides us with its standards, the Conventions and Recommendations, and also has offered the assistance of experienced advisers and experts. With the help of the ILO our organization is also establishing close links with employers' organizations abroad and is exchanging information and sharing its experiences with them. I would like to take this opportunity to express our thanks to the Japanese employers' association for organizing training for members of our association, and for its technical help and all round support.

I would like to point out that in the cooperation programme drawn up for work within the ILO, Mongolia has placed a great deal of importance on the development of private entrepreneurship. This will lead to the growth of our association and strengthen its activities.

We consider the ILO to be one of our main and most reliable partners. We will spare no effort to further cooperate with it to solve the social and labour problems facing our country, and the world as a whole.

Original Russian: Mr. GONCHARIK (Workers' delegate, Belarus) – May I associate myself with the words of congratulation and good wishes expressed to the President on the occasion of his election to this high office. I would also like to wish the delegates to the Conference every success.

And now to the heart of the matter under discussion.

First of all, I would like to point out the topicality of the problems being discussed at this session of the International Labour Organization. Efforts to achieve full and productive employment are part of our humanitarian and social task. This provision has been reflected as you know in a special ILO Convention.

The guarantee of the right to work as a means of satisfying people's material and spiritual needs and the most fitting way to achieve self-fulfilment has been enshrined in the Constitution of the Republic of Belarus. The creation of conditions for full employment and a higher standard of living are considered to go hand in hand. However, one must admit that it is one thing to state this and another thing to put it into practice.

I would therefore like to welcome the attempt to give a detailed analysis in the Report of the Director-General of the situation in countries with transition economies. The assessment made to a great extent characterizes the situation in my Republic, too. In brief, the situation could be summed up as follows: against the backdrop of a sharp fall in output, unemployment, at 2.3 per cent of the economically active population, remains fairly low, as do wages, while the price of food and goods is comparatively high. In the last two years, the standard of living of most of the population has fallen sharply. Clearly, there are grounds for social discontent, as seen in the mass protests by workers in January this year.

When analysing the reasons behind the situation, several conclusions become clear.

First, there is no doubt that the break-up of the Soviet Union has had a negative impact on the economy and standard of living, as has the rupture of traditional economic and other links between the former union republics. Hence the need, and we support this process, for economic integration in the framework of the Commonwealth of Independent States and with other countries.

Second, it is clear that there is a delay in structural reforms in the economy, and the privatization of state property. The creation of new jobs is taking time. The Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus has been forced to speak out against mass redundancies. In the General Agreement for this year between the Cabinet of Ministers of the Republic and the associations of employers and unions, provision has been made for regulation of the labour market if unemployment exceeds 3 per cent. This figure is what we have decided is a socially acceptable level of unemployment for this year. This has been reflected in the employment programme, in regional programmes to provide temporary work for the unemployed, and in other documents.

Experience has shown the economic and social dangers of hidden unemployment. Its level is considerably higher, and as a result, productivity has fallen, as have wages, which reflects badly on people's attitude to their work.

The way out, we see, is through correcting the economic process, namely through creating favourable conditions for production, selling and consuming goods, and developing the private sector. With our participation, proposals to reform the tax system, the credit and monetary policy and wages are being drawn up. Their adoption by the Supreme Council of the Republic would help to relieve social tensions. If the situation continues, it will be impossible to provide a decent level of social protection for the poor, for pensioners and for students.

Unfortunately, we are running into problems such as a failure to pay wages on time and attempts to revise the Act on unions and curb their rights. I think that strengthening the status of social partnership, and at our initiative, a draft presidential decree to this end is being prepared, would help the negotiating process, help us to reach legally sound compromises, and give all sides a certain amount of responsibility for respect for their obligations and agreements.

Third, the problem of training and retraining is becoming ever more acute. The fact of the matter is that the main increase in unemployment is among young people and women, on the one hand, and on the other, a further cause for concern to other sectors is that scientists are going abroad to work. I would like to remind you that my Republic has to spend vast amounts of money to cope with the aftermath of the accident at the Chernobyl nuclear power station, and find jobs for the displaced population. It is therefore obvious that there is a need to strengthen the employment services even further.

Here, assistance from the ILO and other national and international organizations is most opportune.

Of equal importance is support for the sciences, scientific research and the introduction of computer technology.

Finally, our Republic has to introduce a broad-based programme to convert the arms industry and promote disarmament in accordance with international agreements. In this connection, finding additional jobs for people living in towns that were centred exclusively on the arms industry is becoming a serious problem.

Projects have been drawn up. However, without external assistance and donors we cannot solve our problems. We are also counting on help from the ILO.

In its 75 years, the ILO has drawn up and adopted 175 international Conventions, many of which are working well and are of vital importance.

We believe that the standard-setting activities of the ILO should continue and be directed towards the establishment of universal and flexible Conventions. This would enable many states with varying levels of economic development to ratify and implement them.

In conclusion, I would like to express our gratitude to the Director-General of the International Labour Office, and his colleagues in the various departments and sections of the ILO, for their work and for holding a range of seminars in Belarus. We are counting on further cooperation with you and the advent of a real spirit of solidarity.

Mr. INTATHIRATH (Workers' delegate, Lao People's Democratic Republic) – On behalf of the Lao Federation of Trade Unions, I am extremely honoured to be participating in this 82nd session of the International Labour Organization which is examining globalization and employment. I am firmly convinced that we shall be able to contribute to its success and promote mutual understanding and friendship among the participants in this Conference. I would also like to congratulate the President on his election and the Director-General for his timely Report, Promoting employment.

The Lao Federation of Trade Unions is a firm believer in and promoter of tripartism because tripartism promotes healthy labour management relations and is the key to harmonious industrial relations. The government, workers and employers have an important role to play as partners in society and as participants in the social dialogue. Tripartism normally means a certain equilibrium between the government, workers and employers, with no one group exercising a particularly dominant force over the others; the most important function is to avoid conflicts and preserve social peace. This is evident in the role played by Lao labour legislation and Lao trade unions.

Section 2 of the Labour Code provides that: the Government shall ensure that employers and workers derive a mutual benefit from their relationship without discrimination on the basis of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion or social status; workers shall respect and observe work rules and comply with all labour regulations; and employers shall provide workers with fair wages, safe working conditions and social protection.

The Lao Federation of Trade Unions believes that only when the social partners join together in a harmonious spirit to resolve employment problems, develop the economy and promote social justice, will the livelihood of workers be constantly improved. The problem of mass unemployment will only be solved by expanding output and creating jobs in new activities in line with the comparative advantage of these economies. The world today is still afflicted by serious problems of unemployment, inequality and poverty. The structure of employment in the Lao PDR has also changed accordingly. In 1989 it had an active population of 1.9 million, distributed as follows: 88.7 per cent were engaged in agriculture, 5.6 per cent in the services sector and administration, 2 per cent in industry, 1.8 per cent in commerce, 1 per cent in transport and communication, 0.9 per cent in construction. At present, the labour force has increased in the construction, services, textiles and garment sectors; however, agriculture in the Lao PDR is still predominant and poverty is consequently concentrated in the rural areas. Luckily, the gap between rich and poor people in the Lao PDR is not very wide.

As far as the Lao Government's employment policy is concerned, experience has shown that the rapid growth of labour-intensive sectors such as manufacturing, construction and services is the key to achieving full employment and rising standards of living in the Lao PDR. This growth normally results initially in a rapid reduction of surplus labour in traditional agriculture – and subsequently to rising real wages once surplus labour has been eliminated. The Lao PDR has only recently embarked on economic reforms towards a more open and market-orientated economy. For example, in 1988 the Lao Government adopted a programme of structural reform known as the new economic mechanism – the main purpose of this reform was to accelerate transition and it has: removed restrictions on private sector activities; done away with the subsidy control of prices of goods and services; resulted in the adoption of a unified market exchange rate; liberalized domestic and external trade and foreign investment regulations; introduced tax and financial sector reforms and increased autonomy in the management of state enterprises. To achieve these objectives, the Government instituted various legal and administrative reforms.

The transition to a market economy has had a direct impact on the industrial relations system, employment and social status in our country. Ongoing reform in the Lao PDR is aimed at boosting the development of the social productive forces.

These forces are fundamentally beneficial to tripartism. However, such reforms inevitably create new problems – for example when the State turns over its enterprises to private ownership. They operate for better economic returns and, as a consequence, elderly and manual workers are dismissed and the Government administration is cut – with an ensuing loss of jobs. Fortunately the Lao People's Democratic Republic has plenty of natural resources and a surplus of land, compared to a population density of 17 inhabitants per square kilometre. When workers lose their jobs they can be self-employed or engage in agriculture, manufacturing, livestock and retail. Those who have had a high level of education can obtain jobs with foreign agencies and enterprises.

The Lao trade unions support the establishment of foreign-funded enterprises; at the same time we have set up trade union organizations to safeguard the legitimate rights of the workers. The trade unions are responsible within their labour unit for promoting: the solidarity, training and mobilization of workers with regard to labour discipline; work performance according to production laws established by the labour unit; submission of any claims regarding compliance with labour regulations and contracts of employment by employers; participation in inspection and settlement of labour disputes; and consultations with employers on matters relating to salaries, hours of work, rest periods, working conditions and statutory social security systems.

The Lao People's Democratic Republic is a backward country; we have had many obstacles in our path. We therefore need assistance so that we can work towards renewed and broader international cooperation.

Original Spanish: Mr. HERNANDEZ VALLE (Workers' delegate, Peru) – Allow me to convey to you the greetings of the Trade Union Confederation Coordination Centre and in particular those of the General Confederation of Peruvian Workers (CGTP). Let us be positive and let us make a genuine effort to resolve labour issues – and not just run a marathon of sterile speeches. The central issue of the Conference is employment, and, in Peru, employment has become extremely precarious as a result of structural adjustment measures and requirements imposed by the international financial bodies. President Alberto Fujimori's Government has shown the world that it is a good payer, and, for this reason, the International Monetary Fund now considers us a model country. Ours is a country which submissively follows the recipes the IMF mercilessly imposes upon us. In Peru, underemployment has risen to 75 per cent and total unemployment to 9 per cent. Only 16 per cent of the adult population is in adequate paid employment. Social problems have grown more acute, even though more than 13 million people already live in abject poverty. There is no lying to the international community. Human rights are constantly violated. The CGTP and the trade union movement as a whole have clearly and firmly condemned every type of terrorism. Yet the Government, using its instruments of repression, is persecuting and imprisoning trade union leaders and social militants. Government party congresswoman, Ms. Marta Chávez, proposed that, because he had submitted a complaint to the ILO, the Secretary-General of the CGTP should be declared a traitor to the homeland and sentenced to life imprisonment. The Government has taken action in the national universities, and this will lead to widespread dismissal, thereby increasing unemployment. We denounce the expulsions of thousands of trade union workers and leaders in the mining, banking, breweries, ports, textiles and steel and electricity sectors, together with the dismissals announced in the national election supervision committee to distract attention from the serious irregularities committed to help in the reelection of Mr. Fujimori, and the intervention of the intelligence service which cancelled the CGTP Secretary-General's legitimate election to the Peruvian Congress.

The minimum wage is $66 per month, whereas the basic shopping basket costs $560. The big employers have had granted to them all the laws they could ask for. The Government is behaving like a dictator and there is no dialogue with the workers. To survive people are working up to 18 hours per day in the informal sector. Powerful economic lobbies, with government support, are carrying out a plan to liquidate the social security system. Freedom of choice in the pension system is violated. Retired people wake up to find themselves with a pittance for a pension. In the Peruvian jungle, children are still being put to work as gold washers. Legislation has been introduced to permit unjustified dismissals. Employers have the right to sack 5 per cent of their permanent workers every year and active trade union leaders, past officers and those likely to hold office in the future are the first to go. In Peru, additional systems of exploitation have been set up through the institutionalization of private service firms which contract out workers without any rights. These services are owned by top-ranking officers in the military or persons with close government ties.

At the 81st Session of the ILO Conference the Government of Peru announced its intention to amend the Collective Labour Relations Law, and it has now done this. The recommendations and observations of the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Committee of Experts fell on deaf ears. Quite the contrary, the Chairman of the Labour Committee, who is also a prominent member of the ruling party, submitted a Bill which is far more seriously in violation of Conventions 87 and 98, the Freedom of Association, and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). We wish to alert you to these threats.

The proposed legislation envisages conditions imposed on the setting up of trade unions which are not required by ILO Conventions; there is an attack on the simplification of the registration of trade unions. There is an undermining of the freedom of trade unions to determine their internal rules; trade union immunity is denied; trade unions can be dissolved for reasons independent of trade union activities; the trade union is being replaced by employer delegates; wage agreements are considered not to have binding force; there is discrimination between permanent staff and contract labourers concerning the benefits of the Convention; there is again an attempt to hinder the freedom to exercise the right to collective bargaining; employers are empowered to ignore agreed benefits contrary to the principles of stimulating and promoting collective bargaining; causes independent of the action of the workers can be invoked to declare demands duly presented to be out of date; the ILO's observations on the exclusion of certain reasons for strikes, recognized in international instruments, are ignored; on the contrary, in defiance of the ILO's observations, the list of "essential services" is further extended.

The Government and the employers in Peru are against justice and equity. They are backward looking and are against employment promotion.

The "labour flexibilization" propounded by extreme neo-liberals and by those who oppose the existence of the ILO offers countless pretexts for worker dismissal. How many reasons can be invoked to take measures against the employers? When a worker does excellent work or brings ideas to benefit the firm, where is the prize? where is the incentive? The worker has more obligations than rights, more sanctions than incentives. There is neither democracy nor balance. There is no promotion of employment with economic and trade blockades. The challenge today is to promote productive employment with dignity.

In expressing our solidarity with the workers of Bolivia, I wish to stress that the workers of Peru and Ecuador last February met at the border at the height of the armed conflict. Today we reaffirm that wars are not in favour of the peoples and the war which we should wage and win definitively is the war against hunger, poverty and unemployment.

From Geneva, I wish to send out a message of good news to the workers of my country. After a long time we have agreed this afternoon, Workers, Employers and the Government of Peru, to set up a tripartite labour dialogue. This is a good result and a fitting tribute to the anniversary of the CGTP (General Confederation of Peruvian Workers), and of the birthday of our founder, the illustrious Peruvian, José Carlos Mariátegui, both of which occur on Wednesday, 14 June.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) - That completes the list of speakers for this afternoon.

However, Mr. Toofany, the Government delegate of Mauritius, wishes to exercise his right to reply to the statement that was made this afternoon by Mr. Luchman Roy, the Workers' delegate from Mauritius.

Mr. TOOFANY (Government delegate, Mauritius) - I am very happy to be given this opportunity on a point of order. I wish to state that the Government of Mauritius denies and protests most strongly against an incorrect statement made by Mr. Luchman Roy, Workers' delegate of Mauritius, when in his speech this afternoon, he alleged that workers are ill-treated or exploited in Mauritius. This is blatantly not true. In fact foreign workers enjoy the same wages and the same conditions of employment as are stipulated in our laws which apply without any discrimination whatsoever, I repeat, to both Mauritian and foreign workers equally. This was made amply clear by the Minister of Labour and Industrial Relations of Mauritius, Mr. Offmann, in his speech to the plenary of Wednesday, 7 June.

(The Conference adjourned at 5.45 p.m.)

Report of the Standing Orders Committee

1. The Standing Orders Committee, set up by the Conference at its first sitting on 6 June 1995, held a single sitting on 8 June 1995. It was composed of 71 members (36 Government members, 13 Employers' members and 22 Workers' members).

2. The Committee elected its officers as follows:

Chairperson and Reporter: Ms. Laura Thompson Chacón (Government member, Costa Rica);

Vice-Chairpersons: Miss Cornélie Hak (Employer member, Netherlands); Mr. Khurshid Ahmed (Worker member, Pakistan).

3. The Committee had before it the Note concerning Standing Orders Questions placed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office before the Conference at its 82nd Session (Provisional Record No. 1). The Note proposed certain amendments to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference and derogations from the rules governing respectively the next Maritime Session of the Conference and the Fifth European Regional Conference.

I. Amendments to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference

4. The Chairperson noted that the Governing Body had referred to the Conference two sets of proposed amendments to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference, the first dealing with the use of electronic voting at the Conference and the second with the composition of the Governing Body pending entry into force of the 1986 Amendment to the Constitution of the ILO. She asked the representative of the Secretary-General, the Legal Adviser, to explain the proposals to be examined in relation to each point.

A. Electronic voting at the International Labour Conference

5. The Legal Adviser noted that the proposals to amend article 19 of the Standing Orders were designed simply to codify the ad hoc practice that had been followed, with satisfactory results, since the 80th Session of the Conference. As with manual votes, the electronic voting system permitted different types of votes to be taken (vote by a show of hands, a secret ballot or a record vote). The amendment addressed the use of electronic voting only in the plenary of the Conference, but it would also be available on a voluntary basis for use in determining the priority of resolutions and in the electoral colleges if so desired.

6. The Chairperson recalled that the Governing Body had unanimously approved the proposed amendments to add two new paragraphs to article 19 of the Standing Orders. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson declared support for the proposed changes. She stated, however, that despite the savings achieved, the Employers still regretted that, contrary to expectations, the costly electronic voting system was not being used by any other organization; had this been foreseeable, the Employers might never have approved its installation. They were pleased that the system would not be used in technical committees, where they thought the results should be based on consensus so as to produce realistic instruments.

7. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson recalled the consensus in the Governing Body on use of electronic voting in the plenary of the Conference, with the possibility of employing it in the Resolutions Committee and the electoral colleges. They welcomed the savings in time and money the system brought to the Conference. They also hoped other organizations would use the system. The Chairperson noted that negotiations for this were under way with the United Nations.

8. The Committee agreed by consensus to recommend that the following two new paragraphs be added to article 19 ("Methods of voting") of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference:

15. Unless the Officers otherwise decide in special circumstances, the Conference shall vote by electronic means.

16. When the Conference votes by electronic means, paragraphs 7 and 12 above¹ shall not apply. In the case of a vote by show of hands, the individual votes cast by the delegates shall be accessible during the sitting at which the vote is taken, but only the final result of the vote shall be announced and recorded. In the case of a record vote, the individual votes cast by the delegates shall be recorded and published and the final result of the vote shall be announced and recorded. In the case of a vote by secret ballot, the individual votes cast by the delegates shall in no case be recorded or accessible and only the final result of the vote shall be announced and recorded.

B. Interim proposals concerning the composition of the Governing Body pending the entry into force of the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the ILO, 1986

9. The Chairperson introduced these proposals by noting that they would result, on a provisional basis, in an increase of ten Government deputy members

"7. Record votes shall be taken by calling upon each delegation voting in turn in the French alphabetical order of the names of the Members of the International Labour Organization. A further and final call shall immediately be made, in the same alphabetical order, of delegates who did not respond to the first call.

12. Votes by secret ballot shall be counted by the secretariat under the direction of three returning officers nominated respectively by the Government, Employers' and Workers' groups."

and five new deputy members each for the Employers' and Workers' groups in the ILO Governing Body. The proposed changes to the numbers in article 49, paragraph 4, and article 50, paragraph 2, of the Standing Orders would mean that there would be 28 instead of 18 Government deputy members and 19 instead of 14 deputy members for the Employers' and Workers' groups. The document serving as the basis for discussion had described the additional cost to implement the interim measures, which had been included in the proposed Programme and Budget for 1996-97 in the amount of $225,000.

10. The Legal Adviser explained that the purpose of the amendments was to provide for a more representative Governing Body to reflect substantial increase in ILO membership in recent years. This could be achieved as from 1996 by an amendment to the Standing Orders, without having to wait for the entry into force of the 1986 amendment to the ILO Constitution. He noted that this interim arrangement would follow as closely as possible the 1986 amendment as concerns the composition of the Government group (which would, it should be recalled, no longer include a distinction between regular and deputy members). The 1986 amendment would distribute the 56 Government seats (including so-called rotating seats) as follows: 15 for Asia, 13-and-a-half for Africa, 12-and-a-half for the Americas, and 15 for Europe. Although the Constitution and Standing Orders did not now provide for geographical distribution, the intention was to apply the amended Standing Orders so that the total number of Government seats available to each of the regions could be the same as under the constitutional amendment.

11. In declaring the Employers' support for the proposed changes to the Standing Orders, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that they reflected two realities: the increased number of ILO Members and the unlikelihood of the 1986 constitutional amendment coming into force soon. The Workers' members recalled the lengthy debate on reforming the structure of the Organization that had culminated in the 1986 constitutional amendment. They supported the more democratic participation that the proposed changes to the Standing Orders would achieve.

12. The Government member of Spain supported the proposed amendments to increase the size of the Governing Body. Nevertheless, he wished to make several observations with regard to paragraph 8 of Provisional Record No. 1, according to which the Conference, in approving the proposed amendments, needed to take into account that the Government electoral college would have to establish a geographical distribution of the new total of titular and deputy members between the various regions identical to that foreseen in the Instrument of Amendment of 1986. In fact, the distribution by region of the new total of titular and deputy members, although numerically identical to that foreseen in the constitutional amendment, would not reflect the same situation as provided for in that instrument, taking into account in particular the fact that at present, and until the amendment entered into force, the number of elective members in the Governing Body was 46 rather than 56. Thus the geographical distribution would need to be different, especially for regions in which there were more Members of chief industrial importance, which would mean fewer elective members. In addition, the substantial change in the geopolitical situation since the adoption of the Instrument of Amendment only accentuated the differences between the configuration of the Government electoral college as it would be under the constitutional amendment and as it would be under the changed Standing Orders of the Governing Body. For these reasons, and since it did not appear that there would be the requisite number of ratifications for the Instrument of Amendment to enter into force in the immediate future, it would be necessary to reach new electoral arrangements within each region and, where appropriate, within the subregion, with a view to reflecting the new situation and permitting a greater degree of representation.

13. The Legal Adviser recalled that the purpose of paragraph 8 in the document on Standing Orders questions had not been to apply the provisions of the 1986 amendment literally, which would be impossible. Rather, its intent was to follow the numerical goal of the constitutional amendment as closely as possible, particularly as regards the overall geographical distribution of seats between the regions in order to avoid a debate over the allocation of newly created deputy seats between regions in the Governing Body. That was in fact why the Conference was being asked to take note of the considerations sketched out in paragraph 8 of Provisional Record No. 1.

14. In reply to the Legal Adviser's statement, the Government member of Spain reiterated that the problem was not one of numbers, but rather one involving the situation in each region as regards abiding by the informal agreements that had been made. As from the next Governing Body election in 1996, it would be necessary to have a more equitable distribution based on criteria more appropriate to current circumstances.

15. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson expressed the view that this was an internal problem to be resolved by Governments, thus falling outside the scope of the document under discussion by the Committee.

16. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson recalled the unanimous support the 1986 amendment had had from the three groups. Currently, the more developed regions had a greater number of non-elective seats than lesser developed ones; this would be corrected once all seats became elective. If more Governments had ratified the 1986 amendment, the Committee would not be facing the problem raised by the member of Spain. They urged more Governments to ratify the instrument.

17. In the absence of further comments, the Chairperson noted a consensus to recommend to the Conference the following proposed amendments to two of the three figures appearing in article 49, paragraph 4, and article 50, paragraph 2, of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference:²

Article 49, paragraph 4: The Government electoral college shall also select [18] 28 other Members of the Organization, the governments of which shall be entitled to appoint deputy Government members of the Governing Body.

Article 50, paragraph 2: The Employers' and Workers' electoral colleges shall each elect by name 14 persons as regular members of the Governing Body and [14] 19 persons as deputy members of the Governing Body.

18. In approving this proposed amendment, the Committee observed that the Conference should take note that the ballot papers for the Government electoral college would have to be drawn up and dealt with by it in such manner as to guarantee an overall distribution of regular and deputy seats among the regions corresponding to that envisaged in the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the ILO, 1986.

II. Derogation from the Standing Orders for the next Maritime Session of the International Labour Conference

19. At the request of the Chairperson, the Legal Adviser explained that Maritime Sessions of the Conference, such as the one envisaged for January 1996, are governed by the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference, subject to certain modifications that are reproduced at the end of the Standing Orders. To make savings, the Governing Body had decided to streamline the Maritime Session by forgoing reports from the Chairman of the Governing Body and from the Director-General and by making several adjustments in the procedure prior to and during the session, such as the deadline for the submission of resolutions and credentials. Since some of these steps involved preparations for that session of the Conference, they needed to be stipulated beforehand.

20. Expressing their support for the proposed adjustments, the Employers' members stressed the savings and slimming down that they would bring about. They noted the investment already made in holding a Maritime Session of the Conference. The Workers' members also supported the changes to the Standing Orders for the Maritime Session, since they would make it more efficient and would bring about savings.

21. The Committee agreed by consensus to recommend that the Conference adopt the resolution, reproduced as Appendix I(A) below, concerning provisions of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference applicable to its 83rd (Maritime) Session.

III. Fifth European Regional Conference: Procedures

22. Turning to the last item on the agenda, the Chairperson observed that the proposal to adopt simplified procedures for the Fifth European Regional Conference was in line with earlier practice for other ILO regional conferences. It would mean a reduction in the length and cost of the event. The Legal Adviser added that this was the last in the cycle of conferences that had been launched, in 1990, with a view to reducing formalities and expenses.

23. The Employers' members favoured the simplified procedures for this regional conference, on the assumption that once the cycle had been completed, the changes would be formalized to avoid a need for further ad hoc decisions. The Legal Adviser confirmed that this was the intention the Governing Body had expressed. Observing that the reduced length and cost had made regional conferences more efficient and productive, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson joined the Employers in supporting the proposed resolution concerning the Fifth European Regional Conference.

24. By consensus, the Committee agreed to recommend adoption by the Conference of the resolution concerning the Fifth European Regional Conference that is reproduced in Appendix I(B) below.

IV. Recommendations of the Committee

25. The Committee, through its officers to whom it had delegated the task, approved its report and recommended the proposals contained in its paragraphs 8, 17, 21 and 24 for adoption by the Conference.

The sitting closed at 4.30 p.m.

Appendix I

A. Resolution concerning provisions of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference applicable to its 83rd (Maritime) Session

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Noting the proposal to hold a special Maritime Session of the Conference from 9 to 23 January 1996,

Noting also that a number of adjustments need to be made to the plan of work and to the organization of proceedings at that session so as to enable it, despite the short amount of time still available and the limited duration of the Maritime Session, to complete its work in an efficient manner;

Decides that the following modifications of the Standing Orders of the Conference, as supplemented by the Note for Maritime Sessions of the International Labour Conference, shall apply to its 83rd (Maritime) Session, without prejudice to any measures which that session may have to take in accordance with article 76 of its Standing Orders:

- at the 83rd (Maritime) Session of the Conference, the Selection Committee foreseen in article 4 and in article 25, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders shall not be constituted: the duties normally assigned to the Selection Committee in accordance with those and other relevant provisions of the Standing Orders and with usual practice shall be assigned to the Officers of the Conference, on the understanding that it shall be for the Conference itself, at the opening of its 83rd (Maritime) Session: (i) to confer on its Officers the powers necessary to enable them to take decisions on its behalf concerning the composition of committees as well as any other uncontroversial decision relating to the organization of its proceedings or the functioning of the session; (ii) to specify the conditions governing this delegation of authority (majority necessary for decisions and publication of decisions in an appropriate manner);
- article 12 of the Standing Orders (reports of the Chairman of the Governing Body and of the Director-General) shall not apply to the 83rd (Maritime) Session of the Conference;
- the deadline for the deposit of resolutions specified in article 17, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders shall be modified to provide that only draft resolutions deposited with the Director-General of the International Labour Office by a delegate to the Conference by midnight, 11 December 1995, at the latest may be moved to the 83rd (Maritime) Session of the Conference;
- article 26, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders shall be so modified as to require that the credentials of delegates to the 83rd (Maritime) Session of the Conference and their advisers be deposited with the International Labour Office by midnight, 11 December 1995, at the latest.

B. Resolution concerning the Fifth European Regional Conference

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling that, in the light of the reforms introduced on an experimental basis at the Eleventh Asian Regional Conference, the Thirteenth Conference of American States Members of the ILO and the Eighth African Regional Conference to reduce the length and cost of regional conferences, the Governing Body has decided that it is necessary to continue the experimental procedure for the Fifth European Regional Conference and that, pending revision of the Rules concerning the Powers, Functions and Procedure of Regional Conferences convened by the International Labour Organization, authority should be given to the said Conference to derogate from them, as required, to implement these changes on an experimental basis before deciding on a revision of the above-mentioned Rules;

Hereby authorizes the Fifth European Regional Conference, by way of derogation from the applicable Rules:

- (a) to consider the business carried out at preliminary group meetings preceding the formal opening of the Conference as having been carried out in official group meetings;
- (b) to dispense with the appointment of a Selection Committee and entrust its functions (except in respect of resolutions for which a Resolutions Committee may be appointed under article 13, paragraph 3, of the Rules) to the Officers of the Conference;
- (c) to limit the composition of the Resolutions Committee to not more than five members from each group;
- (d) to authorize, in case of need, any drafting subcommittee or other subsidiary body set up by a committee of the Conference to report direct to the plenary of the Conference instead of through the Committee;
- (e) to suspend the requirement that reports concerning technical items on the agenda be dispatched by the Office so as to reach governments at least three months before the opening of the Conference if any such report is included in a single volume with the other reports of the Director-General, which would thus be required to reach governments two months beforehand;
- (f) to reduce the time-limit on addresses to the Conference from 15 to ten minutes.

Provisional Record

Eighty-second Session, Geneva, 1995

Twelfth sitting

Tuesday, 13 June 1995, 10 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Rosales-Argüello, Ms. Engelen-Kefer

SIXTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We shall begin today's session with the examination of the sixth report of the Selection Committee, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 4E.

If there are no objections, I shall take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

FIRST REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – The next item on our agenda is the submission of the first report of the Credentials Committee, Provisional Record No. 8.

I give the floor to Mr. Jonzon, Government delegate of Sweden and Chairman of the Credentials Committee, to present the report.

Mr. JONZON (Government delegate, Sweden; Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – I have the honour, to present the first report of the Credentials Committee, which appears in Provisional Record No. 8.

The report sets out the position with regard to the composition of the Conference, as well as the quorum, as of 8 June (the date when the report was adopted). Because they are relevant to the calculation of the quorum, these figures are continually updated to reflect the actual situation as accurately as possible. It is therefore important that any delegates leaving the Conference early should inform the secretariat of their planned departure and of the name of any adviser they have appointed to vote on their behalf.

The table attached to the report sets out the statistical data of the delegations that had registered at the time when the report was adopted. Unfortunately, while the final figures are correct, the detailed data in the French and Spanish versions are incomplete. A corrigendum will appear in a subsequent issue of the Provisional Record.

The present report is similar to the first reports of previous Credentials Committees. I will therefore only refer to one or two points that seem to be of particular interest this year. One relates to the number of women accredited to the Conference – 337 this year. This number represents 16 per cent of the total of delegates and advisers. It is still low but it is a significant increase in a percentage that has been steadily rising each year since 1988.

On another important point, the report stresses the obligation under the ILO Constitution for member States to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of all their delegates and advisers. In the form for credentials that is sent to ILO Members, governments are asked to confirm that those expenses will be paid or to indicate any difficulties in this respect. Forty-eight governments have responded, stating that they are paying, or in four cases, partially paying the expenses. No information has, however, been received from the other governments.

Finally, the report notes that a number of objections to credentials have been received, and these are now under examination.

This then is the first report of the Committee, which is only required to be noted by the Conference.

(The report is noted.)

RATIFICATION OF CONVENTIONS BY JAPAN AND MALI

Original Spanish: Mr. PRESIDENT – I have pleasure in announcing to the Conference that the Director-General of ILO has registered the ratification of the following international labour Conventions:

By Japan:

Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156);

By Mali:

Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135);

Rural Workers' Organizations Convention, 1975 (No. 141);

Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151);

Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159).

This brings the total number of ratifications of international labour Conventions to 6,209.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We shall now resume our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. JORDAN (General Secretary, International Confederation of Free Trade Unions) – My congratulations go to Mr. Rosales Argüello, on his election to preside over our Conference, and to the Director-General for the Report that he has presented to us.

One year ago, the Conference took up the challenge of building an ILO agenda for social justice in a globalized economy. It was that task that took us to Copenhagen where the ILO's contribution to the World Summit for Social Development did so much to put the commitment to full employment back where it should be – at the top of the international policy agenda.

With its report, World Employment 1995, the ILO has renewed its standing and influence in the dominant debate of the day – how to secure jobs for all. The cold economic rationale for job creation is obvious enough. It is about getting rid of the criminal waste of resources that mass unemployment brings. But it must be sustained by the heat of our commitment to social justice that brings this message home, because the incalculable multitude of individual human tragedies behind the jobless figures is an affront to everything that this Organization stands for.

The ICFTU has no interest in idle posturing. We do not see Copenhagen's Declaration and Programme of Action as a "wish list" of goals that we know to be unattainable. If anyone is inclined to file them away as utopian they should think again. The international trade union movement will be pursuing them with all the means at its disposal. And we see the ILO as a key actor, where employers and governments join with us as partners in those efforts.

The Director-General has provided the perspective and the vision that we need in the fight for jobs, and I am conscious that any delegate in this hall could extract one quote or another from his Report to reinforce all legitimized long-established opinions or policy positions. But I equally hope that this debate will bring much more than a recital of preconceived ideas. Because, frankly, those ideas have not got us far over the last two decades. I doubt that they would win much applause from the millions of unemployed around the world.

Instead, we need to break out of the mind-frame generated by tried and failed policies; to grasp the overall message which is the need for a radically changed approach. Nothing less is going to be enough.

Received orthodoxies – even when they are demolished by the evidence of our own lives – can be a persistent and malevolent influence. Those of the 1980s – labour market flexibility, deregulation and the virtues of free market forces – have served their time and done too much damage. The particular merit of the Director-General's Report is that it submits them to objective scrutiny. And time and time again they are found wanting. The time has come to break with the need for them, and to construct an alternative that all must recognize is now needed.

Past periods of full employment were not unique and unrepeatable accidents of history. They were the fruits of deliberate policy decisions and grew out of the general consensus on basic values and priorities. Can it really be that today this is beyond our joint capacity to recreate that shared determination to beat unemployment? Are the champions of self-interest to prevail over the fundamentals of social justice and lead us to craven acceptance of the intolerable?

The answer is "No", because if it were to be otherwise let nobody underestimate the scale of our failure; but the answer is "No" and we will change things. The indispensable precondition for progress, however, is winning a global commitment to cooperate in an alternative full-employment strategy. In fact, that commitment already exists on paper in the documents that came from Copenhagen, but the acid test is putting them into action.

The key is cooperation. Cooperation between the three groups and the 173 nations that make up the ILO. Without trust between them, the type of positive adjustment that the Director-General rightly urges on us becomes impossible. Defensive and protective reactions may be damaging to the general good, but they can also be logical when it is "everyone for themselves" is the name of the game, and there is no basis of trust in the motives of others.

The case for tripartite cooperation between trade unions, employers and governments is as old as the ILO itself. But it has come under strain in recent years. A part of that has been the abuse of the quest for more jobs as a vehicle for advancing other less laudable aims. I deplore that. There must be an end to the fallacy that the price of new jobs must be the fundamental degradation of the conditions of workers and a reduction of the influence of their trade unions in the workplace, in the enterprise and in society more generally.

The imperative of worldwide cooperation is no less strong and is reinforced as every day as economic globalization proceeds. Globally coordinated policies for job-creating growth are more urgently needed today than ever before. Moreover, as the Director-General points out, there is now more scope for their successful implementation than there has been for many years.

This is the only way of filling the gap left by the shrinking effectiveness of national policy instruments. Only through a new institutional framework for international policy-making can the forces of the global market be brought under the collective control of nations; nations that are currently controlled by them.

There is real tyranny in the operation of massive speculative flows of money which condemn nations to high interest rates, slow growth and fewer jobs. It is a tyranny that can only be brought to an end by the concerted action of governments.

The task is to draw up the rules of the global market and to create the machinery to ensure that everybody plays by them. Among those rules must be international labour standards, particularly those on freedom of association, discrimination, forced and child labour. Guarantees of their universal application are the essential platform for realizing the opportunities of a more open economic system across the world. They are the indispensable safeguard against the threat of the erosion of labour standards that globalization also brings.

The ICFTU remains convinced that the compelling logic of the social clause requires decisive action by the ILO to link basic labour standards to international trading arrangements in the manner it has consistently advocated in this forum and in others.

We do not believe that the great majority of governments have any other than the firmest attachment to respect of those standards. But I put it to them: can you really afford to allow the delinquent minority to undermine your good practice, to penalize your honouring of international obligations, by their abuses? Surely not.

And for those developing countries that commit themselves to these standards but are faced with the cost of their implementation, programmes to promote reform and improvement must be put into place with the backing of the industrialized world.

The ILO has brought us a long way in the fight for full employment. There is still a long way to go. This is absolutely not the moment for any party to loosen its commitment to our Organization whose value and worth is so evident in the issues before us. To do so would be a mistake of truly historic proportions and the world cannot afford that.

Mr. KUNANANTAKUL (Employers' delegate, Thailand) – It is a great pleasure for me to be among the honourable delegates to the International Labour Conference today to witness the commemoration of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

The ILO plays an important role in the social and economic development of the member countries, especially of developing economies such as Thailand. We therefore highly appreciate being a Member of this long-established and prestigious Organization.

The Uruguay Round, as we all know, has generated many major changes in the world economy. A major potential effect of the agreement is to reinforce the trend towards greater openness to trade and a rapid increase in trade flows, resulting from tariff reforms and a move towards reducing non-tariff barriers. This greatly involves major increases in market access to the industrialized countries, in particular for specific imports from developing countries.

Apart from that, new technology and information system development has also played an important role in the employment situation. It can create new and worthwhile jobs which represent regular employment with wages often significantly higher than earnings from alternative employment in the agricultural sector, resulting of course in a higher standard of living.

The economy of Thailand is now benefiting from globalization and trade liberalization. There is an expansion of employment in the production and service sectors which are labour intensive.

What we have not been able to avoid is the high rate of rural to urban migration that is a matter of concern to our Government which is trying to implement the necessary measures to provide suitable facilities to check any problems that might arise from this trend.

Also, to prepare for employment growth created by new technological development and trade liberalization, many training programmes have been organized in various institutions to prepare workers moving to new, more technologically advanced jobs.

At present, labour-market promotion in Thailand is more active and is proving favourable in reducing unemployment. Our education curriculum designed by the Education Ministry is now geared towards more vocational areas, rather than towards academic areas which was the case in the past.

Looking at the negative aspects of trade liberalization, it is clear that some forms of unemployment are due to its openness to new and highly technological positions, the necessity to change jobs and the requirement for new knowledge and skills. However, since these are unavoidable circumstances that all countries must encounter, it is much more appropriate that we should take full advantage of trade liberalization by preparing and implementing positive adjustment measures. It is our belief that well-adjusted measures can finally lead to trade expansion, and in the long run to output and employment growth.

The Employers' Confederation of Thailand is committed to working in conjunction with both the Government and the workers' institutions with the common goal of economic stabilization and social equality.

The Employers' Confederation of Thailand has policies relating to the protection of children and women's welfare, increased efficiency, environmental protection and development, the promotion of occupational safety programmes and of other policies to increase family and social stability. We strive to use and efficiently develop any useful new ideas that are presented to us.

The most important point is that developed countries should give developing countries a chance by not using trade sanctions and regulations to compel and take advantage of those countries and to thus allow them to achieve a better economic situation and hence further develop the standard of living of workers in their countries.

We hope that developed countries will pay attention and help to subsidize Thailand and other ASEAN countries which require these budgets to successfully promote and develop programmes.

Mr. DATO'LIM (Minister of Human Resources, Malaysia) – I wish to extend my warmest congratulations to the President on being elected to chair this august assembly. I am confident that under his capable leadership he will be able to steer the proceedings of this session of the Conference to a successful conclusion. May I also offer my congratulations to the three Vice-Presidents.

The first World Summit for Social Development convened last March in Copenhagen discussed core issues of unemployment, underemployment, poverty and social exclusion, and concerns were expressed about job security, retrenchment, falling real wages, acute labour shortages and the social clause. These concerns have attracted the ILO's attention, as explicitly reflected in the Director-General's Report. I appreciate the concerns and interests shown by the ILO at the Summit and especially during the three Preparatory Committee meetings prior to the Summit.

At the World Summit we declared our commitment to cooperate, and agreed on a Programme of Action. Now it is time for implementation. While at the national level actions are being taken by various member States, the ILO on its part, should now accept the challenge to provide the relevant assistance to its constituents, taking into account their different needs and their individual constraints. In this connection, we welcome the convening of the high-level meeting on employment and social policies during this session of the Conference. This will provide for an international discussion on ILO activities in the follow-up to the Summit. With the limited resources available, the ILO should be committed to assisting member countries to launch programmes that would create employment opportunities. It is only through employment that the fruits of economic growth can be equitably shared, contributing to the alleviation of poverty.

The Western world which was once considered as the locomotive of global economic growth is currently saddled with double-digit unemployment and underemployment. The concept of development has changed from one of synthetic economic targets to that of real economic gain, securing human needs and optimizing human resources at the centre of development. Obviously the free market and selective human rights alone will not do the job. Despite the weakness of capitalism and the free market, only one western model is permitted. The obvious failures of the so-called locomotives of growth are now acknowledged. The time has come for the recognition of the successful economies of Asia and Latin America. The high growth that some of these economies are experiencing should not be construed as a threat to the North. These achievements should instead be seen as a progressive step nearer to a situation whereby the South can make rapid improvements in terms of fundamental labour issues.

Liberalization of trade and international cooperation have been widely recognized as the vehicle for global economic growth leading to the generation of employment. The inception of the WTO should be regarded as a mechanism to facilitate and a catalyst for such a process. Unfortunately, there are efforts to negate this effect through the inclusion of the social clause in international trade agreements. Labour standards may thus become yet another instrument for preventing the South from becoming internationally competitive.

The Malaysian delegation welcomes the decision of the Working Party of the Governing Body to suspend any further discussion on the link between international and social standards through a sanction-based social clause mechanism. ASEAN labour ministers unanimously endorsed this decision at the informal meeting held last April in Chiang Mai, Thailand.

While we recognize that workers' rights should be protected and that member countries should take measures to improve the working conditions of its workers commensurate with their economic development, we certainly would not agree to reflect those standards rigidly in our labour legislation, as this would stifle the economic growth of developing countries, resulting in the eventual displacement of workers. Labour standards should be construed as an agent to institute and promote changes in a congenial manner.

International labour standards are targets to be achieved progressively after taking into account the varying stages of development and the social and cultural values of the individual constituents. It should not be perceived as a mechanism to discipline the developing world on the basis of a western model that "one size fits all".

The harmonious industrial relations environment has provided the thrust for and further enhanced the growth process. These prerequisites, coupled with political stability are indispensable ingredients for the continued growth of any nation. Freedom of association should be practised subject to local conditions. Each country has to set its own priorities when confronted with a multitude of challenges and opportunities unique to its own people. There is, therefore, a need to grant individual governments the right to determine their destiny and their freedom to choose appropriate strategies. I must say that, no government with a modicum of sense and responsibility would like to see its own people languishing in sweat shops.

Malaysia's economy which has gone from agriculture-based to export oriented over two decades (1970-90), has faced several challenges and tribulations posed either internally or by external sources. It is only the will of the Government and people of Malaysia that has elevated the country to its present status. The country's GDP has averaged 8 per cent for the past seven years which has created a situation of full employment five years ahead of the target date, the year 2000.

This was made possible through the innovative and visionary initiatives of the Malaysian Government which was instrumental in devising liberal investment and labour policies, laying down the necessary infrastructure and other framework for the big "take-off".

I wish to take this opportunity to thank the Director-General for his Report entitled Promoting employment. Its relevance and timeliness given the current global situation in which 200 million able-bodied workers are unemployed, provides a platform for further deliberations on this issue. In this regard, I would urge the ILO to look at labour market flexibility and human resources development as key elements in its programme of work in coming years. As human resources constitute valuable assets in any country, their potential must be enhanced and nurtured to increase productivity and ultimately contribute to national development. National development and prudent economic and social policies, coupled with industrial harmony are the key to resolving several of the social ills which are plaguing the world today.

I would also like to thank all those who have worked so hard to make this session of the Conference a success.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL DERHAM (Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Housing, Qatar) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. It is both an honour and a pleasure for me to convey to you the greetings of His Serene Highness Sheikh Khalifa Ben Hamad Al-Thani, the Emir of Qatar. It is also a great pleasure for me, on behalf of my delegation, to congratulate the President on his election to chair this session of the International Labour Conference and to wish him every possible success in his duties.

It goes without saying that the Director-General's Report, that has been put to this session, is vitally important because it lays stress on matters concerning employment and their impact on economic and social situations – both nationally and internationally. Through the Report all States are able to benefit from a clear analysis of the problems of unemployment, living conditions and economic realities in most regions – even if it does not in fact cover the situation in the Arab world and in the Middle East in general. The problem of unemployment is dealt with realistically; indeed, solving this problem is viewed as sine qua non to correct economic situations nationally and internationally. We are invited therefore to prepare policies based on openness, free action and balance so as to improve everybody's lot in the various countries and regions.

We believe that such a vision does indeed correspond to the aspirations of the weaker countries and it ties in with our own ideas of relations between human beings locally and internationally. These relations should be based on common understanding and cooperation and respect basic moral rules. We believe that in the same way as autarchy which creates hatred, hegemony threatens international relations because it incites conflicts and hampers development. You are well aware that these tendencies have been a source of much suffering in the past and that their repercussions are still being felt; a feeling of injustice and fear of the future still prevail although the political changes that have taken place internationally are promising for the future.

Although we agree that full employment can help avoid a good many social conflicts and reinforce social cohesion, we believe that a considerable number of problems require extra efforts, complementary policies and substantial resources. Poverty for example, which is a relative concept, cannot be eradicated simply by providing everybody with their daily bread; it is much more a matter of satisfying essential needs such as education, health, housing – not to mention problems to do with marginalization, the break-up of the family and other problems which seem to be taking on very alarming dimensions in some societies.

Allow me to refer to our own experiences at home in this respect. We do not have an unemployment problem; but according to our Crown Prince employment must be a permanent item on our political agenda among the various bodies concerned in Qatar. Full account is taken of the needs of the labour market and development priorities – and all that these imply for education and training. We are constantly evaluating our human resources so that manpower can be distributed in the best possible way. We try and create jobs in new areas, ensure a greater participation of women in the labour market, increase productivity, encourage inventiveness and step up national production.

This employment policy is accompanied by a social security and housing system. Indeed, we aim to provide a vital minimum to those who have no income and no home to guarantee a social security system to workers that includes health, education and other services; this is designed to ensure material and psychological stability for our workers so that all members of our society can play a full and active role in the development process.

These policies are supported by various institutions because associations and private bodies, which are guided by religious and ethical principles and moral values, provide material and spiritual assistance to those who need it. In this way, national endeavours all tie in together to improve the social lot of our citizens.

The Director-General's Report stresses the globalization of the economy and the effects this is having on national policies. He also points out that international machinery cannot cope with the forces of change. We have noted that the role the State can play – in particular in the developing countries – when it comes to economic activities, the protection of vulnerable groups and the improvement of their lot, is contingent upon the price of imported goods, raw materials and technology. The new situation calls for fresh initiatives to develop the kind of policies and machinery that would be likely to improve the position of human beings in our societies. However, this has to be done with full respect for international labour standards, as well as the values of justice, cooperation and fraternity; which, in turn, require investments to eradicate unemployment, poverty and underdevelopment.

In view of all this, we must strive to ensure that we support unreservedly the values defended by the ILO and its efforts to safeguard the social component in economic and trade activities. We should also reinforce and modernize the United Nations system itself, so that it can cater not only for political problems but also for social and economic ones and propose solutions at all levels.

This is not an easy task because we are confronted with a very serious situation. For example, we have only to consider the problem of indebtedness, which deprives developing countries of their revenues, condemning their efforts at development to failure. Their production is exported, which increases the incidence of poverty and undermines international relations.

Political and military conflicts which break out throughout the world also have a negative effect on economic and social development – and the repercussions are not confined to the countries in which they take place. Unfortunately the measures taken to solve these political crises are inadequate.

In spite of these efforts made by the Arab countries, the peace process is not advancing – which bodes ill for the future. It is for this reason that the international community should act with more determination to try and usher in a lasting and worldwide peace. To attain this, our people should regain their sovereignty over their land and their wealth and an end should be put to all forms of occupation, hegemony, expansionism and threat of arms and mass destruction. Our people aspire to peace and want to contribute themselves to their own development by taking part in international efforts to ensure the well-being of all mankind.

Original Spanish: Mr. FALBR (Workers' delegate, Czech Republic) – Firstly, I would like to begin by congratulating the President on his election and wish him every success. I am from a country that five years ago concluded an historical experiment with a planned economy and democracy. This was not successful and had serious economic and psychological repercussions. I am from a confederation that has a 35-member federation and two-and-a-half million members.

We very much appreciate the theme of the Director-General's Report to the International Labour Conference. The subjects of employment and social development are, without any doubt whatsoever, extremely appropriate if we are to continue the work set in motion at the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen. More discussion on these two vital topics is a matter that we all feel is vital.

When we expressed our wish to attend the Social Summit, the response of the Czech Government was that trade unions were organizations like any other and that there was no particular reason to include members of our confederation in the Czech delegation. However, thanks to the intervention of the Public Services International, we were able to attend – and this is an example of solidarity in practice.

Before I turn to the domestic situation in the Czech Republic, I want to state that our confederation fully supports all the efforts made to promote the “social clause”. We support the ILO’s tripartite organization and its efforts to create a decent working world. Unfortunately, not all governments view tripartism with a friendly eye. My Government is one of such governments. Everybody knows that our confederation, from the very outset, supported the economic transformation of our country. We were inspired by the example of Portugal and had a tripartite body during the days of the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic. When the economic transformation came to an end and our Government was ready to embark on social change, we were not allowed to take part in the discussions and have any influence on the outcome of the ministers’ work.

Our reaction was to launch a protest campaign because when we analysed the project as a whole we saw that, behind the flowery words, the only reason to carry out the social transformation was simply to make cuts in our national budget.

Czechoslovakia – now the Czech Republic after the break with Slovakia – is one of the countries whose social traditions go back many years in history. And we do not therefore wish to be a party to a social transformation based solely on World Bank recommendations.

When we began our protest campaign we immediately understood what our Government’s attitude was to tripartism. We were penalized and for more than half a year now, our tripartite body has not met and there have been no discussions – on the grounds that organized a strike and protest campaign and held a major demonstration in the old square in central Prague.

We feel, however, that we should return to the negotiating table. Consequently, we have tried to negotiate to create a new system for tripartite negotiation, because the Government has told us that it does not want to play the same role it played in the first five years. But according to information we heard yesterday, there are new problems connected with the establishment of a tripartite body.

We do have other ways of defending our interests but we believe in tripartism and we believe that it is necessary to negotiate. But I do not wish to complain solely of my Government and acknowledge what they have done to bring the unemployment rate right down. The Czech Republic does have one of the lowest unemployment rates in the world – 3.5 per cent. Sometimes, unionists from other countries come to us and say: “Well, what more do you want?” However, apart from the very good work carried out by the employment offices account has to be taken of the favourable geographical situation of our country and the fact that under the old regime there was practically no services sector – either public or private. We want to negotiate because during the six months we have not been doing so, new disputes have arisen – with teachers and railway workers. And we believe that if we had negotiated, most of these disputes might have been averted.

I should therefore like to reiterate that, as far as we are concerned, the ILO is an Organization we believe in – if only for the type of work it carries out and the methods it uses. We sorely regret the fact that our Government does not appreciate tripartism. We shall do our utmost to work in a tripartite body – but we are not prepared to come begging. It is necessary therefore that everybody acknowledges the benefits of dialogue.

In three months’ time, the ILO’s European Regional Conference is going to be held. We are convinced that it will be successful and discuss the issues that have to be resolved on the European continent. But we do not believe that the problems can be solved without well-developed tripartism.

You may find it rather strange that I am repeating this word “tripartism” so often, but in our countries in Central and Eastern Europe, industrial relations are deteriorating rapidly and some of our colleagues are even talking about the Wild “East”. That is the reason why I say “Long live tripartism, and long live the ILO!”

Original Spanish: Mr. ANTONIOLI VASQUEZ (Minister of Labour and Social Development, Peru) – I would like to extend to the President on behalf of my Government and on my own behalf the most sincere congratulations for his well-deserved election to the presidency of this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. Personally, I consider that his election is also a recognition of the efforts of the Central American group to promote the integration of labour and society.

The central theme of this session is one that is of interest to all countries of the world, a major source of concern. It has been chosen in a very timely and judicious way by the Director-General.

We are actors and witnesses of the following changes going on in the world. We may now envisage the possibility of an international community governed by solidarity. The development and globalization of the economy with its profound structural changes, and the satisfactory growth rate of many countries shows us to look towards the future with great hope.

Unfortunately these profound changes, which could open the way to generalized well-being, have not had the same positive results in the social sphere. As has been said by the Director-General, “they have given rise to a new generation of social problems and reduced the effectiveness of current instruments of national and international economic and social policies. More people are out of work than ever before and there is widespread concern that these numbers will grow. The crisis is truly global in scope and nature. Few parts of the world have been spared and common causes can be identified.” These last few sentences, taken from the contribution of the ILO to the first substantive session of the Preparatory Committee for the World Summit on Social Development, show the seriousness of the problem of unemployment. In the same document we have suggestions for solutions to these problems. It is for this reason that we are here in this Conference, to try to find the most feasible solution to the problem of unemployment, if not in the short at least in the medium term.

In Peru, over these last few years, we have made strenuous efforts to try to resolve the very serious crisis in which we found the country in July 1990. We have embarked upon a process of structural changes of varying intensity and mixed results due to the need to adapt to the new conditions of the world economy, as well as to renegotiate our external debt.

The main objective was to overcome economic stagnation, reduce rising inflation, increase our foreign exchange reserves, increase production and productivity, and thereby lay the foundations for sustained growth.

It is from 1993 that the country started to come out of one of the most severe crises of recent times. The liberalization of the economy, reduction of state control and the priority accorded to the market are leading the country to relative economic improvement compared with the chaos which reigned before.

We have brought the inflationary process under control, which was one of the main objectives of economic policy. From the inflation in 1990 of 7,649.9 per cent it came down by 1994 to 15.4 per cent, and the monthly inflation index to 1.2 per cent.

We have halted the steady decline in the purchasing power of salaries and wages. The policy for wages and salaries, in which the market is the regulating mechanism, had positive effects in 1994 where the real salary index reached 65.95, 18 per cent more than the previous year, while the real wages index reached 41.36 – 16 per cent more than the previous year.

It is quite clear that the economy is growing much more than employment. GNP has increased by 6.5 per cent in 1993 and 12.7 per cent in 1994, whereas employment levels in December 1994 were as follows: 16.9 per cent were adequately employed, 74.2 per cent underemployed and 8.9 per cent employed. Employment is increasing with respect to 1993, but not at the same rate as the growth of GNP. This growth gives us reason for optimism because we can, in the next five years, undertake a sustained social programme in education, health, basic legal arrangements, and the creation of productive employment, principally in the agricultural sector.

A lot remains to be done in the coming years. Sustained growth is not enough to create new jobs nor is it enough to reduce labour costs. It is repeatedly emphasized, in my country, that labour costs should be closely aligned with production and productivity, and in order to achieve this we have to undertake an energetic reform of the educational system as well as of professional and vocational training and education, so that in the short term we can have qualified personnel in the productive sectors. We know that in some countries wages are US$2.65 whereas in others they are US$4.30 and US$5.30 and in the most developed US$16.00 an hour. However, in order to produce a car, we need 40 to 48 hours in developing countries, whereas in the developed countries the same car can be produced in 17 to 25 hours, showing that high wages go with high productivity.

On the other hand, labour relations in Peru have substantially improved, as shown by the agreement announced by the distinguished representative of the Workers at yesterday's meeting. I am convinced that this time dialogue and tripartism will indeed be a reality. Most trade union and employers' organizations have finally understood that disputes within enterprises can only benefit the competition. Our indicators for strikes and work stoppages have dropped drastically from 613 in 1992, with 15,067,880 work-hours lost, to 168 in December 1994, with 1,936,647 work-hours lost. Obviously there are trade union leaders who do not want to recognize the fact that very often one has to take drastic decisions for the benefit of the great majority. Our people do recognize this and they have re-elected, with an immense majority, President Fujimori for another period of five years.

We think that we are on the right track, and are therefore in a position to have faith in the emphasis placed on our firm support of the independent workers of the small and medium-sized enterprises in the informal sector so that they need no longer be marginalized and can become integral participants in the national economy. Our greatest support will go to those workers who have been displaced by violence or by the economic crisis who were forced to leave their homes and now should return to their land with the support we must, as a Government, provide. Also, special support should be given to job creation in different parts of the country so that we can have "living" frontiers to protect the integrity of our territory.

Our labour laws have been deregulated and made more flexible so that they are compatible with the world economic transformation. However, we think that some of the ILO Conventions should be revised or adapted in accordance with contemporary economic and social change. We do not want to be the object of frequent observations by the Committee on the Application of Standards merely because we comply with letters of intent signed with the World Bank and the IMF. We also think it is important to have a uniform methodology to measure levels of employment. At present we are unable to compare the efficiency of our labour and social policies with those of the other countries of the region, which would also give us a welcome opportunity to exchange experiences and compare our problems of critical unemployment.

I would also like, on behalf of my Government, to thank the international organizations, and especially the ILO, for the support and advice they have given us. This support has enabled us to develop our intended programmes and thus to comply with the recommendations of the World Summit on Social Development and the Conventions of the ILO – an institution of which we have been a member ever since its foundation in 1919.

Original French: Mrs. GUILAO (Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Employment, Guinea) – First of all I should like to express to the President, as well as to the other Officers, the warm congratulations of my delegation on their brilliant election to preside over this session of the Conference. My delegation hopes that under their experienced and wise leadership our session will be successful.

Before all else, my delegation would like to express its satisfaction with the topical and relevant nature of the items submitted to us for examination at this session, and to thank the Governing Body for its choice of theme, and the Director-General and his experts for the quality of the documents that have been drawn up and proposed for discussion.

We would in particular like to express our thanks on the one hand to the Governing Body for its excellent and informative report of activities, which demonstrates the vitality of our Organization for all to see. We would also like to thank the Director-General for this year devoting his Report entitled Promoting employment to an urgent problem which is forever relevant to our work.

This subject is certainly a source of concern and anxiety for all countries, and especially the developing countries, which often must face an economic expansion rate which lags behind demographic growth. In these countries employment is endemic, and the economic slow-down of the past few years has paralysed the structures which would otherwise create new jobs.

My delegation would like to share its thoughts concerning the main ideas of the Report. These ideas can act as a catalyst and barometer in the approach to and treatment of joblessness and the creation of new activities.

Unfortunately, my country too has been affected by the tragic and sad reality of joblessness. Unemployment has been aggravated by the brutal transition from a centrally-planned state economy to complete economic liberalism, by the strict application of structural adjustment measures which involve the closing and liquidation of nearly all the country's state enterprises, by the streamlining of the public service, by the devaluation of the national currency, by the massive return of Guineans residing abroad, by a growing exodus from rural areas, and by chronic unemployment among new graduates, etc.

At the same time, the public employment services have lost the monopoly of placing jobseekers in posts, and are now facing serious difficulties in collecting information on the general development of the labour market, in an economy which is still giving us mixed signals.

Thus, with a view to efficiently finding lasting solutions to economic problems and employment, on 18 August 1994 the Government was restructured, and a Ministry of Labour, Social Affairs and Employment was established. Its tasks are to define and implement the policies and strategies of the Government as regards employment, social protection, and the improvement of human resources, as well as to integrate and promote the social and occupational status of the handicapped, displaced people and victims of war.

Since then, a plan of action covering several years has been drawn up, based on a definition of national policies for employment, social affairs and social protection, with the assistance of the social partners as well as other ministerial departments. A national integration and occupational rehiring plan is now being negotiated. A National Labour Consultation Commission has already been set up, with all the active trade union confederations participating.

The new department has participated most actively in the establishment of a Guinean human development initiative and in the creation of a new institutional and legal framework to promote private initiative. It has benefited from the assistance of the UNDP and especially the technical assistance of the ILO, particularly through its multidisciplinary team based in Dakar.

We should like to express our satisfaction with the quality of this assistance, as well as our wish to strengthen technical cooperation with the ILO in all our areas of competence in order to accelerate the social development which we are all so anxiously awaiting.

In particular, our priorities lie in consolidating a climate of social peace by strengthening consultation bodies with our natural partners, in training managerial staff and their partners on how to work together, and in disseminating national and international labour standards. Through these priorities, we hope to benefit from the richness of plurality and to strengthen the democratization of industrial relations within enterprises.

I would like to express our constant concern about the democratization of our Organization through fair representation of the various regions which make it up. In the composition of its staff, Africa has for all intents and purposes been left out, especially as regards high-level and intermediate posts. This is completely at variance with the universality of our Organization, which, as one of the oldest in the United Nations system, must seek to set the example in practice.

I would like briefly to express the position of my Government on other points on our agenda.

As regards safety and health in mines, my country, as a major mining country, is in favour of adopting new standards which are better adapted to conditions of operation and work in mines.

The study of home work is also of interest, especially in our countries, where not all sectors have yet been covered by affirmative law. Discussion concerning this theme will be of great usefulness in promoting the extension of social protection to the informal sector, which often makes use of home work, and in establishing conditions for a more sure way to combat unemployment.

Finally, my country shares the conclusions of the Office's study concerning the extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No.81) to the activities of the non-commercial sector.

My Government strongly supports the standard-setting activity of our Organization, which is a permanent source of inspiration. It will accept any opportunity to improve the national standards to bring them in line more closely with ILO standards, and will ratify such standards as necessary, as it has already begun to do for Conventions Nos. 144, 156 and 159.

In these standards we find ways to promote social dialogue and to improve participation in the development of both the economy and our human resources, which are the main wealth of our country.

The Republic of Guinea places great hope in the work of this 82nd session of the International Labour Conference, which is taking place three months after the Copenhagen World Summit for Social Development. It believes that partnership, solidarity and international cooperation will make it possible to alleviate poverty wherever it exists.

The International Labour Organization is the most appropriate organization to attain these objectives, in accordance with the Declaration of Philadelphia.

Original Arabic: Mr. HASSAN FULLAD (Workers' delegate, Bahrain) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. I have the pleasure of greeting you on behalf of the General Committee of Bahrain Workers at this vital Conference which always strives for the attainment of peace, social justice and freedom of the whole of mankind, without discrimination or hegemony.

I have the honour to begin my statement by expressing my most sincere congratulations to Mr. Rosales Argüello for the confidence that has been placed in him, in recognition of his qualities and expertise, by his election to preside over this session of the International Labour Conference.

I also have the pleasure of expressing my esteem and appreciation to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General, for the scientific and technical efforts behind his choice of theme for this session of the Conference. The theme Promoting employment is a judicious choice that fully merits our appreciation. There is no doubt that the issue of employment and the attainment of full employment are the most important matters under discussion by the international community. Furthermore, developing human resources, increasing labour capacity, raising productivity levels, eradicating unemployment and creating opportunities to work constitute the major challenges for development and human resources the world over regardless of the characteristics of the individual countries and their levels of culture and development.

Convinced of the objectives and principles of the ILO and of its resolutions and recommendations which aim to encapsulate and unite the interests of governments, employers and workers in a single body in order to propose international standards for the treatment of workers and to propose international labour Conventions, we, as representatives of the workers of Bahrain, would like to reaffirm the following.

Firstly, our faith in the role of workers in the attainment of economic and social development and in the taking of vital decisions on the national, regional and international levels, particularly with respect to development policy and to their future.

Secondly, the real solution to the economic, social and political crises currently affecting us all resides in the workers' cause. Achieving the objectives of stable, global development is only possible by focusing on the human aspect through the attainment of full employment for national manpower by means of the effective development of human resources both quantitatively and qualitatively speaking to enable them to deal with development plans and the requirements of the modern world.

Thirdly, a study should be made of the new approach to development which consists of adopting the policy of privatization as a scientific method for development in future, and also doing away with the public sector, which will have serious social consequences, particularly on national employment levels as well as on most categories of workers.

Fourthly, the progress achieved by working women who participate in all areas of life should be reflected in labour legislation in order to ensure the freedom, position, independence and personality of women.

However, the question of the promotion of employment is first and foremost the responsibility of governments and then of employers. Workers represent the very soul of industry and will usher in the new dawn of society. Development and progress cannot be achieved without the participation of these three parties and the sharing of responsibility in decision-taking on an equal footing with no discrimination among the parties.

As workers concerned in the workers' movement on the eve of the twenty-first century, we are witnessing violations of international laws, of the most elementary rights, of humanitarian principles and of labour laws all over the world.

It is for this reason that we are lodging an urgent appeal to study these violations and to strengthen the role to be played by the ILO so that we may create the appropriate machinery to ensure that resolutions and national and international programmes are implemented, that the principles contained in international labour standards are fully observed and that the interdependence of all the problems facing humanity is brought into play.

May the peace, the mercy and the grace of God be with you.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-FAYEZ (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Saudi Arabia) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. I would like to tell you how pleased I am to have the opportunity to congratulate, on my own behalf and on behalf of my delegation, the President on his election to chair this session of the Conference. I hope that this session will be a success and reach the goals we are all working toward.

I would also like to thank the Director-General of the ILO for choosing the theme Promoting employment for his Report. This is a very important subject and the Director-General's Report analyses various aspects of it. He also considers the experiences of several countries and regions and gives the reasons for and consequences of unemployment. He also covers organization of the labour market and how to guarantee full employment on the basis of continuous development policies, the creation of productive employment, speeding up industrial development, increasing productivity in all sectors, promoting investment, and training. He also refers to the need for additional efforts with regard to vocational training and retraining, and additional measures at the national and international levels to solve the problem of unemployment throughout the world. In the introduction to the Report, he states that an increase in productive employment is the key to fair economic and social development. He also gives an explanation of the situation as it stands.

I am pleased to be able to take this opportunity to explain briefly the great interest Saudi Arabia has shown in promoting employment and how we have done this. I will also explain the measures my country has taken with regard to economic and social development. The development of human resources is one of our main aims and is reflected in the education and training programmes we have launched since our Sovereign became Minister of Education in the framework of five five-year plans. They were put into practice thanks to the interest shown and follow-up guaranteed by the Servant of the two Holy Sites of Islam. Thousands of schools have been established and the number of students has grown in a relatively short period of time. Higher education has made rapid progress. Seven universities and dozens of faculties providing specialized education have been set up in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia.

With regard to concerns related to technical education and vocational training, offices have been set up to find employment for persons with technical qualifications. There are dozens of centres providing vocational training, secondary institutes for industry, commerce and agriculture, and faculties providing technical education. Places are increasingly sought after. The increase in centres and institutes is the result of government efforts to cater to the need for specialized personnel.

The Government has also turned its attention to the capital of companies and enterprises that support the vocational training centres set up for their benefit. Emphasis has been placed on the role of Chambers of Commerce and Industry which have helped to provide training. While broadening general education, efforts have been made to link educational programmes with practical work in enterprises. Practical work is required before a student can graduate from these institutes and centres.

We are proud of the fact that in all sectors, and at all levels, education and training are free. In addition, students are provided with books and educational material free of charge throughout their education. Students are given financial support if they go on to higher education, technical training or vocational training. We are equally proud of the results of our considerable investment in education and training. These results can be seen in the growing number of graduates of our education and training centres. In their working life they may choose to work in the very centres that trained them or set up their own businesses. The State grants them interest-free loans at preferential rates.

Under the guidance of the Servant of the two Holy Sites of Islam, the policy of the Government of Saudi Arabia has gone beyond merely promoting employment. Saudi Arabia has been successful in developing human resources, and vastly improved other social spheres including health care, industry, agriculture and housing. Our country has developed significantly its electricity, water and telephone services. We have developed these services thanks to state support, and long-term interest-free loans at preferential rates and for social, industrial, agricultural or housing projects. Development plans include support for the private sector in Saudi Arabia so that it can help to promote development. The Government is making every effort to ensure that planning programmes are balanced in terms of rural and urban areas, and is expanding projects and services to include areas where people have been rehoused. This has led to the growth of these areas, and the creation of new jobs, and has stopped the rural exodus with all the problems it brings with it.

This vast development has had a knock-on effect in all areas of employment. The number of jobs available has increased, as has the number of persons looking for work.

Development in Saudi Arabia is not confined to generating employment for national workers alone. Our development has also helped development in other friendly developing countries. We have helped to offset the problems of unemployment by welcoming many workers from other countries who work alongside national workers. They enjoy stable employment and workers' welfare is our constant concern. All workers are covered by the Labour Code which the ILO helped us to draft and whose principles are based on Islamic law. Saudi Arabia does not tax the wages of foreign workers and they are at complete liberty to transfer their savings to their country of origin.

The agenda of this session of the Conference includes many technical subjects. We should discuss them at length and exchange points of view. The first subject is home work. The document before us sets out how we should work towards the standards needed in this area and explains the difficulties involved in their implementation. In this regard, it is difficult to find a satisfactory definition of home work because of the diversity of the activities it includes. It is also practically impossible to carry out surveys in workers' homes. This should be taken into account when we discuss the influence of home work on full-time employment.

The second technical subject on the agenda is the extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), to activities in the non-commercial services sector. Different points of view have been put forward on this subject. It is of no benefit to state bodies if the Convention is extended to include them. All the workers in these bodies will follow state policy which guarantees the necessary protection for all workers.

The third technical subject relates to safety and health in mines. We have a Bill, and would like to make two proposals aimed at establishing new regulations for safety and health in mines. They complement standards which have already been established in other areas.

During this session I would like to reiterate the need to take into consideration the differences in development in various countries when we draw up these standards. Obviously, developing countries are less developed than developed countries and what may apply to one country may not be true for another.

Finally, I would like to conclude my statement by thanking the members of the Governing Body and the Director-General of the ILO for their considerable efforts. I hope this session of the Conference will enjoy the success it deserves.

(Ms. Engelen-Kefer takes the Chair.)

Original French: Mr. MBA ALLO (Government delegate, Gabon) – On behalf of the Minister of State for Labour, Human Resources and Vocational Training of the Republic of Gabon, allow me to join the preceding speakers in congratulating the President on his election to preside over our Conference. At the same time I should like to extend my congratulations to all the members of the Office and state that I fully share the feeling of satisfaction at the excellent way in which our Conference is being steered.

I also extend the congratulations of the delegation of Gabon to the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, whose ability and competence are unanimously recognized. We welcome the relevance of the subject of his Report submitted to our discussion this year.

The World Summit for Social Development held last March in Copenhagen was the opportunity for the entire international community to concentrate for the first time on the major social problems the world is facing and to find solutions to them. The Heads of State and Government came to the conclusion that although unemployment, underemployment, poverty and social exclusion were problems common to all countries, they were felt more acutely in the developing countries. The outcome of this situation is an ever-greater gap between the developing and developed countries. Africa does not occupy a very enviable position in this regard. Among the guidelines for future action proposed, the Summit formally stressed policies to eliminate poverty, to reduce inequalities and to fight against social exclusion in order to promote employment.

The creation of a sufficient number of productive jobs is the basic challenge the international community must take up to demonstrate its intention to improve the human lot; but the degree of urgency for devising solutions varies significantly from region to region. In this context, the Director-General's Report we are discussing here, does not leave unstressed the gravity of the situation in the developing countries in general and in Africa in particular which has become a marginalized continent which runs the risk of losing the benefits of globalization if more forceful policies to adjust to new world economic conditions are not urgently adopted and in particular, policies providing solid support for our problem-ridden continent.

Overcoming these difficulties depends on the ability of African countries to fulfil, along with the assistance of the international community, a number of preconditions, including transition to democratic rule, the mastery of technology, an efficient education and training system, and lasting regional integration.

In speaking first about transition to democratic rule, we must recognize that the institutional framework in which our States have developed for many a long year has not encouraged this necessary adjustment.

We note a definite ray of hope in the process of progressive democratization in Africa. There is reason to believe that the close association of all social partners at all stages of economic policies will give rise to a positive partnership for economic and social development of Africa – partnership which will guarantee for each of our countries the awaited advantages of globalization, including, inter alia, the promotion of productive and lasting employment, improved conditions of work, and a fair distribution of the fruits of growth for all social categories.

The example of young industrial countries teaches us that economic success is achieved first of all through the mastering of technology, that is to say, through training – the prerequisite for productive and freely chosen employment. We think in this connection that this transfer of technologies must no longer be considered the mere transposition of the techniques and results of studies devised in developed countries. Technology transfer must be achieved by establishing research institutes or rather institutes of experimental research in developing countries.

The advantages of this option are clear to see: first, it would enable better exploration and exploitation of our comparative advantages, using as a base our own realities, in greater respect for our environment. Next, it would promote high-level job and employment creation in our countries and halt the brain drain that Africa continues to suffer. Finally, it would facilitate the promotion of inventiveness in Africa, without forgetting the role that such institutes will be called upon to play to enhance our education and vocational training systems.

Gabon shares the belief that the international trade liberalization will produce, among other effects, a fair distribution, on a larger scale of the results and fruits that have been achieved. For workers, this would mean productive employment, better conditions of work and greater profits for investors.

The delocalization phenomenon, together with that of the multinationals, unfortunately tends to offer to the host country's labour force only jobs requiring a low level of skills. The high-skilled jobs tend to go to workers from industrialized countries. This situation may be justified at the outset, but thereafter it becomes embarrassing if it is prolonged, with the country maintaining a large imported labour force at the same time as it manages a difficult situation of its own young, skilled unemployed nationals.

It is in the interests of the international community to enable our own national labour force to react positively at any time to the differing staffing of undertakings. This is an essential condition for full employment in our developing countries. But to achieve this we need to develop training and human resource management facilities and to adapt to the rapid change of pace in the labour market.

The rural sector in our countries in general and in Gabon in particular continues to hold out hope both for investments of any size, and for self-employment. Training and better support systems for rural area youth, improved agricultural methods and foodstuff preservation, as well as organization of marketing routes, are all essential if we are to stabilize village populations. Here an international strategy is necessary.

For small and medium-sized enterprises, we wish to repeat here what the President of the Republic of Gabon, His Excellency Omar Bongo, stated at the Copenhagen World Summit: "The Government of Gabon believes in the dynamism of small and medium-sized enterprises, both for restimulating growth and for promoting employment. National policies have already been initiated to promote development of small production units. Of course they need to be improved. Alongside these policies, training for enterprise managers is necessary to awaken the entrepreneurial spirit and enhance the way enterprises are run."

Concerning regional integration, Gabon is convinced of the need to set up large regional groupings – this is a prerequisite in globalization!

We think, however, that political will alone is not sufficient for lasting success in integration. We need first get a grasp of certain factors such as, for example, human and structural factors. Progress towards regional integration must be gradual and unhurried to allow each State to prepare itself better from within.

In conclusion we wish to express our satisfaction that the Programme and Budget proposals for the 1996-97 biennium incorporate all the concerns we have just mentioned, in particular, democratization in Africa, training, promotion of the small and medium-sized enterprises, and improved support structures for rural populations.

As the Copenhagen Summit recognized, the struggle against poverty, exclusion and social disintegration will entail first and foremost, promotion of productive and lasting employment, that is, by the ability of the State, the entire international community, to provide all and everyone the wherewithal to become self-sufficient in society.

Gabon, through the able leadership of its President Omar Bongo, shares this approach, and we can assure you of our country's commitment to contributing to the success of the Organization's in the follow-up of the conclusions of the World Summit for Social Development.

Ms. SIMPSON (Minister of Labour, Social Security and Sports, Jamaica) – I join fellow speakers in congratulating Mr. Rosales Argüello on his election to the presidency of this Conference. My delegation has complete confidence in his ability to guide us to a productive conclusion of our deliberations.

Our Conference theme is at once relevant, challenging and perfectly timed. We therefore congratulate the ILO for its foresight. We thank the Director-General for an engaging Report. We also recall with pleasure the Director-General's recent visit to the Caribbean, and in particular to Jamaica.

Reality does not permit several of us here to talk about full employment now or in the immediate future. We understand better the nature, impact and the challenge of mass unemployment, chronic unemployment and structural unemployment. This problem has always been the preoccupation of public policy in Jamaica since independence. The societal impact of this problem is social exclusion, unacceptable levels of human suffering, rising inequality and poverty, as well as the threat of untimely death.

The challenge of reducing unemployment always requires good policies and collective effort. But it is also a challenge for global partners. We agree with the sentiment in the Director-General's Report that to view this challenge otherwise would be "both morally unacceptable and economically irrational".

Jamaica has had to contend with a well known backlog of structural unemployment difficulties. So we know that the problems cannot be resolved all at once. We have been forced to recognize the changing character of the unemployment problem. It is now a complex mix of youth and rural unemployment, massive unemployment among our womenfolk and among those with deficits in education and skills. All of this experience leads us to appreciate that unemployment is more than a socio-economic problem. It is also political, such that it has now mobilized the international community in a joint search for solutions. Jamaica's search for solutions has had mixed results. Presently we are concentrating our strategy on structural adjustment policies and on others informed by the globalization movement. Government and its social partners have adopted and are committed to a programme of significant economic restructuring aimed at macroeconomic stability and growth.

We are implementing a wide and varied range of human resource development strategies. The Labour Ministry is fully identified with national policies aimed at labour market reform, administrative reform and reform of the State in general. Clear and transparent policies towards investors reflect our favourable attitudes toward private enterprise in general.

These and other policies fuel the search for efficiency and employment creation. Some of these policies do impose social costs. We minimize such social costs by government intervention, but not in a "market denying" manner.

What should be the character of the new international cooperation on promoting employment? There are at least three possibilities relating to the developing-country situation.

The first requires continued and concessional support for local efforts to raise productivity in the formal and informal sectors. There can, for example be no better investment in the developing states than support for improvements in human and physical capital, support for innovative facilitating schemes, targeted at relevant constituencies. In short, international support aimed at employment creation, poverty eradication and economic growth must now be a major agenda item. The role that debt forgiveness can play in easing the unemployment problems in developing countries should not be underestimated.

Second, new global strategies to create a better employment situation must draw on the experiences with structural adjustment in the developing world. There can be no uniform package for the whole world.

Solutions to unemployment must reflect a mix of policies and special timing considerations. Above all, global efforts to solve unemployment problems will require the strengthening of national policy autonomy, not a weakening of it.

Third, international efforts to promote employment will continue to contradict themselves in this age of globalization unless lingering protectionist practices are relaxed, unless aid flows are better targeted rather than arrested, and unless greater attention is played to the social aspects of economic policies. Clearly, the search for a better employment situation must now be guided by a new global consensus on a more equitable way of sharing economic power and a better approach to redistributing the benefits of globalization.

Employment promotion represents a big challenge. In this forum we are concentrating on strategies. But we must swiftly move to action, action which will yield benefits to all, especially to the less-developed States where unemployment remains a danger to social order.

The right to a job or employment, which translates to the right to decent, civilized living, is a right not even the all-powerful technology on the information super highway should deny. For the right to the dignity of work is at the same time the right to our innate humanity.

It must be our firmest commitment to work increasingly to ensure that education, training and employment become acceptable pathways from poverty and powerlessness to self-reliance and empowerment.

If we can develop the laser beam, if we can travel at top speed along the information highway, if we can discover the secrets of the ocean bed, and send spaceships to traverse the heavens, why can't we rid ourselves of the scourge of poverty and unemployment?

The Jamaican Government stands ready to cooperate with and contribute to any action strategy that would expand employment in our time. Let the twenty-first century find us actively struggling to promote global employment.

Let us remain on the right side of history.

Original Arabic: Mr. ELAMAWY (Minister of Manpower and Employment, Egypt) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Please allow me to congratulate the President on his election to preside over the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish him and the other Officers of the Conference every success in guiding the work of this session, a session which is being held at a time when we are witnessing many changes in the international arena, and in the wake of two important international meetings: the International Conference on Population and Development held in Cairo in 1994, and the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen earlier this year. These conferences tackled very important issues which have a direct influence on the activities of our Organization, the ILO. I would like to discuss the problems of poverty and unemployment. This session is also preceding the next meeting of ECOSOC and the World Conference on Women: Action for Equality, Development and Peace, which is to be held in Beijing in September.

We have studied with great interest the Report of the Director-General entitled, Promoting employment.

This Report analyses in depth the employment situation in the world, and we in turn would like to participate in this constructive dialogue on one of the most important issues of our time, which is unemployment in general and underemployment in particular. We consider that the achievement of full employment is the best way of overcoming unemployment and poverty. I am quite sure that this dialogue will prove positive for our Organization and will help it to draw up labour policies on the local and international levels.

This Report is an abridged version of the Report that the Director-General presented to the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen in March 1995, and it was also discussed at the 262nd Session of the Governing Body of the ILO in March-April 1995. For this reason, we would have preferred if the Report before us included, even in a separate annex, a summary of the results of this discussion and the trends adopted so that the Members of the Conference could participate in the development of policies to be applied at a later stage by the International Labour Organization in order to achieve full employment, which is the main objective of the Declaration of Philadelphia, adopted in 1944, as the main objective of national policies.

We are particularly concerned because we note that this Report is based on statistical data issued by organizations and institutions other than the ILO. The question could therefore be asked whether the statistical data available to our Organization is sufficient enough a basis on which to build documents for future use. Therefore I would like to propose that this Organization should establish simplified models of reports which would be filled in by the member States themselves and which would constitute the principal source of data and information for the drafting of these reports. These models should also include a reference to the professional sectors in the various countries and regimes because unemployment is a direct consequence of an imbalance in these various sectors and not only of the economic activities on which the Report is based. In Egypt, we are fully prepared to cooperate with the Organization in this area so as to provide all necessary statistical data concerning Egypt so that this information may be added to that of other countries and thus help in the preparation of future reports.

The Director-General has made a very pertinent analysis of long-term unemployment and of the causes of its growth in the transition economies (the East European countries) and also in the industrialized countries. Unfortunately, the Director-General has not adopted the same approach in analysing unemployment on the African continent which groups together no less than 53 Members of the International Labour Organization. He has looked at the issue in the chapter of the Report entitled "Reducing underemployment and poverty", although we all know that total unemployment is the number one problem facing the African continent. Thus this continent has not been given the attention it deserves and the Report has only vaguely referred to sub-Saharan African countries, and has not dealt at all with the other countries of the African continent. This is a trend of which we do not really approve. We are against the subdivision and the discrimination between the various regions of this continent. We are all members of one organization which is the Organization of African Unity.

The Director-General says in his Report that the attainment of full employment must be an objective priority of national policy, and stresses the importance of developing employment creation programmes. In Egypt we created the Social Development Fund at the end of the 1980s. It is one of the bodies responsible for remedying the secondary effects of economic reforms and for creating productive jobs by encouraging independent work in small enterprises. The Fund has been able to provide more than 250,000 jobs in the last few years. I would also like to say that there is full coordination between the Social Development Fund and the Ministry of Manpower and Employment because their employment policy is an integral part of the social and economic development of my country, and aims to accelerate economic growth, combat the poor use of resources, encourage savings and national investment and attract foreign investments in order to create jobs and reduce the problem of unemployment, especially among young people.

In Egypt we are trying to improve the working of employment offices, spread throughout all the governorates of the country, and to provide them with the means to play an important role in the field of employment. We are trying to establish links between these employment offices, the production enterprises and the employers' organizations so that they can provide the latter with the qualified manpower which they need, the necessary skills, and on fixed dates. These activities are occurring in the framework of a unified Labour Code, established in consultation with the workers' organizations and the employers' organizations which takes into account the rights and obligations of both sides and guarantees good occupational relations based on consultation and collective bargaining. We hope that this will have a positive influence on the working environment in our country, will enhance the stability of industrial relations and will increase production and productivity, leading to the creation of new jobs.

The Director-General in his Report refers to international labour standards and the liberalization of world trade. In particular, he states: "the growth of transnational production has undermined the effectiveness of traditional instruments of labour policy and of collective bargaining. Competition for foreign investment and the increasing footlooseness of production tend to lead to the debasement of labour standards. This clearly needs to be countered by giving a fresh impetus to international cooperation to enforce basic labour standards."

We fully agree with the Director-General on this. In fact, Egypt is one of many countries that took a firm stand on international labour standards at the 81st Session of the Conference last year, as well as at Governing Body sessions in November 1994 and April 1995. We repeated it at the Conference of Labour Ministers of the Non-Aligned and Other Developing Countries, held in New Delhi in January 1995, at the Arab Labour Conference held in Alexandria in January 1995, and at the OAU Labour Commission meeting held in Tripoli in April 1995.

In short Egypt is one of many countries that promote the ILO's role in drafting international standards and we fully cooperate in their implementation. In fact we have ratified more than 60 international Conventions, including the seven Conventions which guarantee the fundamental rights of workers. Egypt calls on those States which have not yet ratified these Conventions to do so as soon as possible. We also believe that international standards should be revised to make them more applicable by every country.

With respect to liberalization of trade and international labour standards our position is very clear and consistent. We have affirmed this at every previous session of the International Labour Conference including the last one. We believe that the ILO should not establish a link between international trade and international labour standards, because it is an infringement of the ILO Constitution and contradicts the principles on which this Organization was founded. There was in fact never a consensus as regards this link at the 81st Session in 1994, nor at any of the sessions of the Governing Body. This could possibly hamper the process of ratification and even cause member States to drop out of the Organization, in light of the large number of Conventions which have not been ratified.

We say this because we feel that the ILO should not debate the subject of international trade or its liberalization, since to do so infringes the Constitution. There are several international bodies that deal with international trade issues: ECOSOC, the WTO and UNCTAD, which have been created specifically for this purpose, and they are comprised of the same member States as belong to the International Labour Organization.

Original Spanish: Mr. BUSTOS HUERTA (Workers' delegate, Chile) – As you know, I am from a very small country which, after many years of suffering, is now making tremendous efforts to leave behind it the dark night of military dictatorship and to look to a future, rich in the opportunities opened to it by democracy.

We agree with the statements in the Director-General's Report that "Adopting policies that respond positively to globalization is the key to achieving sustained growth and productive employment creation in developing countries". To fail to do so would be to close our eyes to change, and try to turn our backs on the future.

With the same conviction, we also agree that the commendable movement towards a more open economy and the successful integration of the modern sectors into the world economy "will not solve problems of underemployment and poverty fast enough". In this context, stepping up the fight against poverty and improving the quality of jobs must inevitably mean adopting redistribution measures in favour of the poorest in our societies.

Our much vaunted modernization should benefit all to ensure justice, the stability of our institutions and economic growth.

This is why we propose to this ILO assembly that a special committee be set up to promote and provide technical support for the adoption of social clauses in the discussion of trade agreements, so as to ensure that world trade expansion is accompanied by improved workers' rights throughout the world.

The trade union movement has been a key player in restoring and bolstering democracy. History bears witness to the proof we have given to our attachment to democracy. Our commitment to democracy is based on our profound conviction that it is the system that provides the surest channels for proclaiming and struggling for our rights, and it is the most promising tool to achieve our objectives of better working conditions.

We should once again like to remind this Conference that, as workers, we are prepared to contribute to any political vision that can combine democracy, growth and equity, that is capable of making due allowance for the differing interests of the various parts of societies, that is capable of understanding different sensitivities and that can ensure collective cohesion and bring about satisfactory results for all.

The country also needs employers ready to engage in tripartite discussion and talk about the labour reforms necessary to ensure adequate protection of trade union organizations and extended coverage for those involved in collective bargaining.

Finally, the country needs a government that is ready to implement fully the programme for which it was elected, to foster tripartite meetings, to consolidate political democracy with legal and economic machinery that display a common purpose and is respectful of the human person.

Our country has made significant progress in various fields – this is something we do not deny or underestimate. The country is growing at an average of 6 per cent annually. At 8.9 per cent, the inflation rate in 1994 was the lowest for the last three decades. Domestic savings and investment are still growing. This vision of Chile, however, contrasts with the fact that poverty is still a cause for alarm in the country and affects one-third of all Chileans.

At the same time as we are making economic progress, we have the sorry honour of being the country in Latin America with the second greatest inequality of income. The 20 per cent of the wealthiest part of the population receives income 17 times higher than the poorest 20 per cent of the population.

Recently, despite this terrible inequality, the business sector rejected a government proposal to increase the pensions of 1 million retired people by stepping up taxes on cigarettes and petrol, although 85 per cent of this tax would have affected the 20 per cent of the wealthiest families. To overcome these inequalities, the workers have stressed that we need more social dialogue. Of late, the employers have systematically resisted such a development. They do not want tripartite discussion on a rise in minimum salary, expansion of trade union organizations, measures to prevent sackings resulting from anti-union practices; neither do they wish to establish machinery that would extend the cover of collective bargaining.

Unfortunately, my country still has many employers whose touchstone is exclusion. To Chile's embarrassment, The Economist recently quoted an employer who said that what Chile needed was strong enterprises and not strong unions – an unacceptable justification for persecuting unions and a veiled appeal for confrontation.

We absolutely condemn the way employers have rejected tripartism, even though this is a principle they indulge in each year as members of the Chilean delegation to the ILO. The employers' rejection of tripartism harms the principles of social understanding promoted by the ILO.

Genuine democracy should bear the stamp of participation and respect for labour and union rights, and fair protection for the weakest in society.

In Chile, employers are good business people but the vast majority side-step their obligations to their workers. To this end, they use a set of labour standards that reflect the authoritarian spirit of the dictatorship days; today, we workers have to form underground unions so as to avoid worker persecution by the employers.

To consolidate our democracy and avoid social conflict, the Government of Chile has put before Parliament various bills on labour legislation reform. These are designed to achieve greater equity in labour relations and arrive at a more just and fair distribution of revenues.

We believe that the proposals put forward by the Government are important but inadequate. We have, therefore, submitted to Parliament a whole series of ideas for correcting the injustices that taint labour relations in Chile.

At this Conference, we would like to denounce the intransigence of the employers who, with the political right-wing, shelter under their majority in the Senate, vote together en bloc with the Senators appointed by the ex-military dictatorship, and refuse to discuss labour reforms to protect union membership and give wider scope to collective bargaining.

We, as workers, consider it mere justice to have a stable and balanced democracy, and improvements in existing labour laws, and especially the provisions extending the right to bargain collectively to protecting inter-enterprise trade unions and casual labour. Collective bargaining guarantees civilized dialogue, and it permits agreements which make enterprises themselves work better. However, in our country, no more than 10 per cent of the workers can bargain collectively. This is just not fair or reasonable and it is, for us, a matter of great concern.

The workers want solutions to their urgent problems. We are very concerned about the type of society that we are currently building. We reject the materialist, consumer, individualist society. We want a society that is imbued with transcendent values rooted in justice and solidarity.

In that context, the commitment undertaken at the Social Summit to promote full employment as a basic priority of economic policy is very lucidly reflected in the Director-General's Report. The ILO, 75 years after its creation, is now in the vanguard of the struggle for human dignity and for a fairer and more compassionate society.

Mr. ATASAYAR (Employers' delegate, Turkey) – I have great pleasure in extending to everyone here on behalf of myself and of the delegation of Turkish Employers, my best wishes for a very successful session. I would also like to take this occasion to congratulate the President on his election to chair this session of the International Labour Conference.

First of all, I would like to express our satisfaction at the Director-General's decision to make employment the major theme of his Report to this year's session of the Conference. Employment and unemployment have indeed become issues of concern to all of us in this age of globalization.

In today's world where capital can easily move across national boundaries through simple computer transfers, technology can mercilessly take the place of human beings in production, and information can incredibly replace goods and services, it is not surprising to see that employment has become the focus of attention everywhere. Thus, the ILO has every reason to seek international solutions to this problem which cannot be adequately tackled by individual countries.

I should also like to take this opportunity to mention Turkish Employers' deep concern over the growing unemployment problem in our country and the adverse international business cycle and climate. The 1991 Gulf crisis and its aftermath, coupled with wrong and extremely populist policies pursued by successive governments have had a major impact on and created problems in Turkish working life. As a result, we see that enterprises in Turkey shrink in terms of employment. In addition, investment has decreased considerably and capital has started to fall. In consequence, the rate of unemployment has reached very high levels and the informal sector has grown enormously.

Recently, government policies have led to a crisis which resulted in a sharp fall in national output for the first time since the late 1970s. High rates of inflation and interest are major obstacles to recovery. Privatization has never reached the desired momentum.

Social legislation, and in particular, its rigidities have also contributed to the present bottle-neck. The Turkish industrial relations system which is highly regulatory has proved to be unable to cope with high rates of unemployment.

Today, the public sector is no longer able to create employment in Turkey, as in any other country committed to a liberal economy. The private sector is not as yet in a position to fill this gap simply because it is still hampered by the rigidities of existing laws. What is perhaps more important is the fact that the labour unions have so far failed to realize that they also have important tasks and responsibilities as far as employment creation is concerned.

Having said this, I must add that I do not intend to draw too pessimistic a picture here. We as Turkish Employers firmly believe that with appropriate policies and their determined enforcement, the Turkish economy can easily overcome its current difficulties thanks to its great potential. A rapid improvement can be made with the creation of a macro- and micro-climate conducive to new investment and growth.

After having very briefly talked about the employment situation in my country, I would also like to submit our views regarding ILO tasks and responsibilities in promoting employment all over the world.

We believe, as Turkish Employers, that we need new ILO strategies and approaches towards creating more jobs because in our opinion existing ILO strategies and even recommendations have proved to be ineffective vis-à-vis technological advances. This is one of the main reasons for the unemployment problem we face today.

A new and effective ILO employment strategy can best be worked out by taking into consideration the following points: (a) we need new formulae and recommendations to create an employment environment within which international capital movements will be sufficiently motivated; (b) labour organizations should be won over to an understanding that will induce them to support policies to increase investment; (c) we need more Recommendations and fewer Conventions; (d) the social partners should be offered more deregulation rather than regulation and solutions to conflicts should be sought through mutual dialogue rather than rigidly binding legal provisions. This approach should be embodied in Conventions and Recommendations; (e) existing Conventions and Recommendations should be reviewed and amended in light of this new philosophy; (f) we also believe that, in addition to this, there are certain things that the ILO should carefully refrain from doing. Employment can only be promoted through concrete measures. In putting such measures into practice, encouraging flexibility, rather than binding rigidity, should be the golden rule.

In today's highly competitive climate, ILO measures should not undermine the competitiveness of individual countries. The ILO should strike adequate balances between the interests of the industrial countries and the requirements of the developing countries.

Finally, ILO Conventions and Recommendations should aim to reduce the size of the informal sector throughout the world.

Before I conclude, I would like to reiterate the Turkish Employers' determination to go along with the international cooperation proposed by the Director-General. We are not pessimistic about the future. In the hope that the resolutions of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference will pave the way for the creation of effective international cooperation under the auspices of the ILO to promote employment, I extend, on behalf of my delegation, my best wishes for a very successful session.

Original French: Mr. LAICHOUBI (Minister of Labour and Social Protection, Algeria) – Allow me on behalf of the delegation of Algeria to offer to the President my sincere congratulations on his election to this session of the International Labour Conference. I should also like to extend my congratulations to the other Officers. I remain convinced that under their able leadership our session will meet with the success we all expect.

The Report submitted by the Director-General of the ILO to this session suggests a new approach to promoting employment in the context of a world economy undergoing changes in which increasing inequalities harm human dignity and therefore cannot leave us indifferent.

Our interest in this issue results from its crucial topical nature, internationally as well as nationally, and from that fact Algeria has given priority to it in its period of transition towards a market economy.

The search for full employment is, without any doubt, the best way to promote social progress in a world dominated by power structures which tend to exacerbate imbalances and accentuate poverty and marginalization, leading to social tension and instability, even violence, which could seriously threaten stability in the regional context.

The state of the world illustrates the fact that although unemployment and poverty spare no country, developing countries are most seriously affected.

Attempts to find a solution to this problem, despite arousing hope, have only had limited effects on the development and growth of these countries, in the absence of appropriate means and support.

In this atmosphere of uncertainty a large number of countries have the means to resolve many of the difficulties which hold them back. Algeria is one of these countries which, in spite of experiencing disturbances, has both the will and potential to achieve a satisfactory recovery.

In my country full employment is a declared policy objective despite a transition in which we support a heavy burden of unemployment. The search for full employment in Algeria is a phrase which reflects a concrete reality, in the knowledge that the low level of unemployment was dealt with in past decades without major difficulties thanks to the industrialization policy.

However, since the end of the 1980s an abrupt change in trends was to appear, characterized by a drastic reduction of income derived from exports of oil and gas, inevitably leading to a slowing down of the economy.

These unfavourable external factors were aggravated by the prevailing approach to development and by a high rate of demographic growth and its corollary, an increase in the labour force, leading to difficulties in the labour market, as unemployment reached 25 per cent in 1994.

Faced with this situation many initiatives have been undertaken in all areas conducive to facilitating the return to growth and investment. These include the management of the external debt, industrial restructuring, privatization, trade liberalization and the encouragement of non-hydrocarbon exports.

However, unemployment is often accompanied by a social decline. Thus employment policies are connected to social integration and to healing of society's wounds.

This is why the approach initiated in Algeria has three main elements, integration, insertion and employment itself.

The area of integration is directed towards the most vulnerable sectors of the population in their daily life. This area, based on the principles of solidarity, organizes community action and promotes the improvement of infrastructure, environmental health, etc. This has meant the establishment of 13,000 projects involving 400,000 individuals.

This approach offers a framework of solidarity in which neighbourhood support, such as remedial teaching, health coverage and health education, vocational training, etc. can be organized. It particularly aims at promoting women and young people in general and re-establishes the relationship between the individual, the community and the State.

The second segment of the approach is insertion. It consists of a public works and renewal programme making intensive use of labour and providing vocational training to the participation.

The third segment includes activities concerning small and medium-sized industries and small and medium-sized enterprises, self-employment and home work.

The interest in micro-activity not only derives from a concern to upgrade existing economic potential and to occupy space left vacant by the change in economic policies which previously promoted large-scale industrial complexes, but also aims at including women and young people and reintegrating those who have lost their jobs, particularly in public sector enterprises. This segment thus constitutes a key element in promoting employment against a background of structural adjustment.

The various solutions initiated by the State to promote these programmes include, apart from incentives in the state and parastatal sectors, support for those responsible for employment promotion, additional technical assistance to acquire means of production, training to upgrade know-how, financial support according to pre-established criteria in order to complete the financing for projects.

It goes without saying that indispensable action with regard to labour market management and the search for balance between the supply and demand are also included in these programmes.

The logic of dealing jointly with employment and social integration is based on the conviction that unemployment does not only indicate economic incapacities but also, indeed above all, the limit of society's capacity to generate social cohesion, placing a question mark over civilization itself.

These ills obviously affect poor countries as well as developed countries, so that social cohesion becomes a strategic matter.

Algeria, with its economic potential and human potential, its geographic position, making it a meeting point between Europe, the Mediterranean and Africa, with its infrastructure and sources of energy, is in a position to take advantage of the economic and financial opportunities offered by globalization in order to enhance employment and achieve full employment.

For my country the social pact which has been supported in principle by all the tripartite partners, and would be also a covenant for growth and the creation of wealth, is an area of use to society, an area of responsibility whose role is crucial for societies undergoing fundamental change and almost at boiling point. It is also an area where young generations may emerge and contribute their sense of responsibility and economic efficiency. These initiatives deserve the support of the ILO, which must not cut back on its activities at a time when the mood it inspires is so necessary for countries in transition.

The effectiveness of the tripartite model should be measured precisely at times of crisis like these.

The pathologies of poverty should not be seen as shameful diseases from which one turns away when one sees their devastating effects which threaten the stability of entire societies, be the cause the development models followed by individual countries or the structure of international economic relations.

It is quite clear that poverty, unemployment and the failure to integrate young people and women in society are a threat to peace.

The international community should therefore pay more attention to the place of less developed economies in international trade, to the burden and distribution of international debt which gives rise to all the structural adjustment programmes, as well as to the aims of international aid.

The ILO must intervene more directly in the strategies devised by the international financial institutions and persuade them to redirect their policies in a direction more supportive of a return to full employment.

Indeed, this is one of the recommendations of the Declaration and Programme of Action adopted by the Heads of State at the World Summit for Social Development.

Evidently, the ILO should continue to promote labour standards and ensure that States respect them.

On the other hand, in the context of the consultations proposed with the Bretton Woods institutions, the observance of labour standards, already endangered by the fierce competition for foreign investment and market share, must not become a pretext for new types of conditionality or for the implementation of a much decried social clause.

In other words, international organizations and institutions must seek and maintain a balance between the competing demands of economic efficiency and social protection.

Mr. SALMENPERÄ (Government delegate, Finland) -- My delegation would like to join all those who have addressed this Conference before me in congratulating the President, as well as his Vice-Presidents, upon their election. I am confident that their experience and wisdom will bring this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference to a successful conclusion.

Unemployment persists and degrades human dignity all over the world. It is our view that unemployment is the most urgent challenge the ILO is facing. Given its enormous proportions, unemployment already challenges the stability of societies everywhere. Recent discussions within the ILO are proof that this is a universally shared sentiment. The encouraging results of the Social Summit held in Copenhagen only a few months ago make it all the more clear that there is universal commitment to deal with the issue of unemployment. It is therefore important to keep the employment issue at the centre of the international agenda. This is why my Government welcomes World Employment 1995 and looks forward to its continuation at regular intervals.

I take this opportunity to express, as many have done before me, my sincere appreciation also for the shorter version of World employment 1995 the Director-General has presented to this Conference. It is clear in the light of this report that there still are many misconceptions about the underlying reasons to unemployment. Also, the effects of globalization have clearly been underestimated. No more is it, for example, possible to seek lasting comparative advantage through monetary or wage adjustments in the national level. This just means that these exist everywhere and will have to be resorted to if pressures arise, leading merely to a wider distribution of poverty.

The way out is, and I quote the report: "The crisis of mass unemployment will ultimately be solved only by the expansion of output and creation of jobs in new activities ..." The globalization of the economy and free trade have great potential in creating jobs everywhere. These jobs will not, however, appear if greater division of work based on national comparative advantages is not achieved. Linking trade with labour standards will not produce more work either. That is not the reason why we should go and discuss the social dimensions of liberalization of international trade.

What really is at stake here is human dignity and basic rights of workers. Free trade is not really free if it endangers the freedom of workers and their right to fair treatment. The Social Summit clearly established the content of these values and the common commitment to them. It also became clear that the ILO has a positive role to play in this field. However complicated the issue is, surely a way can be found that will not harm the trade of developing countries but would rather encourage them in a common struggle for a better life for workers. Missing this chance for a new approach would mean undermining the significance of the ILO and leaving the field free for other players who have less competence on the working life and industrial relations. In our view, the intent of the Summit participants is clear. It is for the ILO, together with the other UN agencies, to provide the missing ingredient of human development, human dignity and the rights of workers in order to create the right policy mix for the increasingly globalized world economy – free trade and sustainable development.

The ILO did not achieve this recognition spontaneously. The Director-General deserves to be congratulated for seizing early enough the opportunity presented by the Summit. After the Governing Body committed the required human and financial resources for the preparatory work in cooperation with other organizations, it is no surprise that the ILO now more than ever takes its rightful place among the international organizations dealing with economic and social issues such as the World Bank, IMF and WTO. The Summit statement on worldwide employment policies agreed at the highest political level is a significant recognition of the values the ILO stands for.

Although the critical mass of information about the reasons of unemployment and about the ways and means of how this should be tackled seem to be available, signs of improvement are still very scarce. It seems as though little could be done to deal with those reasons even if they are known. In the old times, when timber was floated down the rivers to the sawmills, it was well known that very easily a single log of timber which became stuck in the wrong position could block the whole operation. I am now suggesting that there is a similar blocking log in the world of work. All other efforts are nullified by this blockage. In this case, the blocking log is lack of innovation, or to be more specific, lack of opportunities to use it. Opportunities to employment are of course always direct or indirect results of innovations. It is not a question of huge technological leaps but rather a question of continuous search for small improvements everywhere. When this search is blocked for one reason or another, monetary, public expenditure, education or other problems, stagnation follows. It is therefore of utmost importance to focus on a working environment which creates a supportive atmosphere for entrepreneurial initiatives and continuous learning. Without such an environment the skills and the abilities which form the basis of employment opportunities will not grow. Clearly it is a question of organizing work in a manner which respects human qualities far better than some seem to think necessary.

We thus find ourselves in a situation where employment issues cannot be separated from working conditions. The crux of the matter is that these conditions should intensively encourage workers to take initiatives and help them to build the confidence that is needed for this. If these possibilities are left as prerogatives for only a part of the workforce, we will have an immense waste of human resources which will certainly result in unemployment.

I have tried to demonstrate that good jobs will in time turn into more jobs. The history of labour standards shows that slowly we are able to advance towards this goal. The slow progress has also brought about voices of suspicion. Some suspect that it can be downright detrimental for employment to try to improve conditions of work through labour standards. It is claimed that such efforts will be justified only so far as the economic situation leaves room for them. Surely a balance must be struck. However, such a balance will not be at hand if labour standards are set aside, or if they are formulated with no real objectives of improvement.

In this connection, and as the new Governing Body Working Party on Policy regarding the Revision of Standards is about to begin its work, it is perhaps timely to voice a note of concern. The discussion has so far reflected more pragmatic questions of universal implementation than insight of the needs of the world of work. It would do little good to start producing standards which are applicable even in the worst of conditions. They would not set standards for anyone. ILO standards have proved their significance and value in the world of work. Let us continue upholding these values and the system that has been built up for supervision of labour standards.

Original French: Mr. MERTEN (Workers' delegate, Luxembourg) – The major issues that are on the agenda of this 1995 ILO Session must be examined in a constructive spirit by delegates and technical advisers, assisted by the devoted officials of the ILO. We must achieve specific results that will notably improve and adapt social protection, labour conditions and the treatment of workers in view of the new world employment crisis.

A worker who develops in a healthy social environment does not create extra-parliamentary opposition, nor revolutions, nor terrorism, nor wars, because a stable social environment is the objective that this Conference should set for itself, cherishing as it does peace, prosperity and justice – values which are dear to the ILO.

The ILO is widely called on for such a mission. As the President of the United States, Mr. Bill Clinton, recently pointed out, there is a challenge that we have to meet, to adapt our international institutions and to further cooperation among nations so as to manage a new generation of problems that go well beyond national boundaries.

National leaders at the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen acknowledged that a world governed solely by the international market and by financial logic is socially unacceptable, politically dangerous and unproductive. Over the last three years there has been a real apocalypse. Wage-earners have been insidiously laid off, en masse or individually, as a result of trade competition. Eight hundred million of them have been sacrificed on the altar of competitiveness or abusive political power, as respect for the laws and regulations in force in the various countries continues to decline.

Mr. Jacques Santer, former President of the Government of Luxembourg and now President of the Commission of the European Union, has called for machinery to supervise employment markets and machinery, as well as to collaborate as an influential spokesman for the draft Green Paper, which has become a White Paper, a medium-term programme of action for the Commission.

I would also like to see the various ILO member States arrive at and sign an agreement on the insertion of the social dimension and the liberalization of international trade.

I would once again voice an appeal to our Conference that it should accept its responsibilities, as recently stressed at the World Summit for Development in Copenhagen. The Social Summit should not be limited to a media "scoop", nor should it become a costly enterprise to the detriment of social victims.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate our new Prime Minister, Minister of State of the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, Mr. Jean-Claude Juncker, for having maintained the vital Ministry of Labour and Employment, and for his effectiveness in governing and his commitment to employment. I place my full trust in him and I thank him for his stringent policies to protect workers.

One of the subjects that we are looking at together is a consequence of a new era, a computerized society with information super-highways and worldwide data processing: the issue involves home work and the social protection of homeworkers. Progress in information and communication technologies is changing the way we live, the way we work, do business, educate our children, study, do research and learn. But it is not enough just to take note of the situation, we must nurture the social dimension of the information society, and of the technological revolution that it involves.

Homeworkers, working for one or more employers, even as "pseudo"-self-employed people, are burgeoning in the labour market, multiplying at a dizzying pace. Homeworkers are particularly vulnerable because they enjoy no legal protection, they are isolated and their bargaining power is weak. Very often they earn less than the minimum wage and work long hours. They have no job security and they are unable to ensure that the contractual obligations due them will be respected.

Most of them are women, either because they wish to juggle family responsibilities and paid employment or because they lack the proper qualifications. Home work is often the only source of income in areas where unemployment is very high.

New problems specific to this particularly vulnerable category of workers have emerged and there is no appropriate protection either nationally or internationally for them.

On behalf of today's and tomorrow's ever-increasing ranks of homeworkers, I call on the ILO to grant absolute priority to discussing these specific problems for workers and employers arising from this new category of worker.

As an adviser to the Economic and Social Committee of the European Union I would like to voice this message: no to travelling at variable speeds; yes to the definition of a highway code for the information super-highway. Our permanent concern is for employment, though not at the price of stripping away all social protection.

The role of the ILO is to expand all social protection to everybody, and to avoid abuses due to the accelerated, uncontrollable globalization of trade. In the light of social disintegration arising from unemployment and poverty, it must dissuade employers from taking advantage of current uncertainties in order to exploit workers. It should play a dual role as monitor and job creator.

In order to achieve this, perhaps there should be reform of the United Nations agencies, at least creating synergies between the ILO, the WTO, the World Bank, the IMF and the United Nations.

Should we not try to create and institutionalize such a system based on trade liberalization, trade flows and investments?

It is our duty to approach politicians worldwide, calling on them to recognize the ILO as being the fifth pillar of such a system, that it is the only international institution in which civil society participates. Humanitarian work must go hand in hand with the ILO's machinery to bring an end to the massacres that range from Biafra to Bosnia.

I read the note for the workers' representatives on the subject of the social clause and the report of the Chairman of the Governing Body. I see that the social clause is not on the agenda of this 82nd Conference. It has been scattered among committees here and there. We are in a state of emergency, with 800 million unemployed people in the world. I say that the social clause should be on the agenda of this Conference.

In Europe we have made labour more humane, we have established laws which codify various fundamental values. As we stand on the threshold of the twenty-first century, the worker has been reduced to a material good, a thing, an object to be thought of solely in terms of output potential. It is unthinkable for the ILO to view this situation impassively.

Let me conclude by expressing my hope that this 82nd Session will respond to the appeal voiced at the Copenhagen Social Summit and achieve its objective of fostering greater solidarity, of creating a civilized and more reassuring world as we enter the twenty-first century, recalling that the purpose of being human is to serve other humans.

Original French: Mr. OMBA PENE DJUNGA (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Zaire) – On behalf of the Government and people of Zaire I should like to convey the warmest and most sincere greetings to the President and all the delegates of this august assembly.

I would also like to join all the speakers who have preceded me in congratulating the President on his unanimous election to lead the work of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I can assure him of the full cooperation of my delegation. I am certain that under his wise leadership, and with the help of the Vice-Presidents to whom I also extend my warmest congratulations on their well-deserved election, our discussions of the various items on the agenda will be crowned with success.

The theme of the Director-General's Report, Promoting employment, is a timely one. Indeed, it is one of the preconditions for social, political and economic stability in our countries.

My delegation studied this Report with care and interest. We are satisfied with the Report's quality and we are grateful for having received it. I am sure that it will serve to inspire us as we seek to tackle and solve the difficult problems of the world of labour.

My country is also confronted with the problems resulting from the pillaging of 1991 and 1993. We are still trying to restore the equilibrium that was broken in those times.

As a result of the mass departure of foreign entrepreneurs and the no less massive destruction of the tools of production, an extremely large number of people have found themselves on the street without a job.

It will not be possible to attract these entrepreneurs back to Zaire unless the Government can ensure that they receive just reparation.

My Government has therefore undertaken to renew relations with international financial organizations. As we see it, this is the most useful approach in the view of the present situation of my country.

As soon as a relationship of trust can be re-established, we hope to gain access to credit, which my country's economy will sorely need to resume the activities which have been interrupted and to start up new economic activities as well.

In the light of the present economic situation of my country and, as I mentioned earlier, the constant increase in the number of unemployed people, the so-called "informal" sector has grown to such an extent that it now employs more than 80 per cent of the active population.

This sector has also played a significant role in the training of young people, who seek employment through apprenticeships.

According to a survey conducted in Kinshasa, training at informal enterprises is five times less expensive for students than it is in a technical training centre. According to entrepreneurs, 55 per cent of the apprentices who are currently being trained will subsequently be employed by the enterprise which trains them, whereas some 35 per cent might find a job with other informal enterprises.

This remarkable performance of the informal sector has taken place in the face of total indifference on the part of the authorities. Indeed, the entrepreneur is very often left to his own devices.

Today, in an effort to restore the equilibrium which has been lost, my Government has decided to take action to take care of this sector.

Indeed, we have begun two types of action: one as regards training, and another aimed at improving relations with the social partners.

With the support of UNESCO, my Government is now holding general congresses addressing the question of education, with a view to bringing training and employment closer together.

With the help of the ILO, my Government will be able to carry out a number of training programmes in the national institute for vocational training to improve the organization of the informal sector.

Tripartite consultations have been introduced in all decision-making bodies dealing with labour questions. The National Labour Council and the Economic Management Committee are currently implementing measures to give new momentum to national employment policies.

We believe that all these fruitful exchanges and experience from our 173 member countries will make it possible for this forum to propose, as was done in Copenhagen, bold solutions that can ensure economic growth in the developing countries and foster trade on an equal and fair footing so that we can progressively reduce poverty.

This is the cry of hope that my country's delegation is making in this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.15 p.m.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) – We shall resume the discussion on the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Russian: Mr. KUNYAVSKY (Employers' delegate, Belarus) – To begin with, I would like to join the numerous other speakers who have congratulated the President on his election to this important post, and express my confidence that he will be successful in his work.

At this session of the Conference, the ILO has presented us with a very interesting and, as always, informative report prepared by Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the International Labour Office. It has already become something of a tradition for the ILO and its Director-General to propose very progressive ideas of social development which are suitable for each of the various stages of the historical evolution of the world community. This certainly helps to bolster and enhance the authority of the ILO.

Full employment is directly or indirectly the aspiration of the overwhelming majority of people. In the context of the globalization of world production, the problem of full employment is all the more important in the social sense. Of course, the realization of full employment is extremely difficult, and there is a plethora of objective and subjective obstacles blocking the path, some of which are mentioned in Mr. Hansenne's Report.

This problem has become highly relevant for the so-called transition countries, including my own. Although our official statistics give relatively low unemployment figures, they do not take hidden unemployment into account. Hidden employment has resulted from the sharp decline of production and a large-scale suspension of activity in state-owned enterprises, which account for 78 to 80 per cent of production. The overwhelming majority of companies are running at no more than 35 to 40 per cent of capacity, while the number of persons employed has remained higher; at between 80 and 90 per cent.

When we consider that the decline of production is largely due to the loss of markets for our products and a dramatic drop in investment as sources of capital dried up, it is clear that there is a serious risk of mass dismissals and of massive unemployment.

That is why the Conference of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs of Belarus has consistently campaigned in favour of an acceleration of market reforms, and first and foremost, for privatization, a restructuring of enterprises, a renewal of the entrepreneurial spirit, the liberalization of trade, relief from a disproportionate tax burden, the creation of conditions conducive to savings and investment, the export of nationally produced goods and the stimulation of foreign investment.

Our economic analyses confirm that only such changes, if implemented by the Government, are capable of preventing massive unemployment by overcoming the economic slowdown and stimulating investment.

Nonetheless, we believe that in a number of sectors, we cannot maintain current employment levels, as far-reaching structural reforms are required. The nature of enterprises must change, and the production process must be restructured to increase the efficiency of these sectors.

The alleviation of the employment problem lies in the growth of small and medium-sized businesses. In the appropriate conditions – if such businesses are given access to unused resources; if the tax burden is reduced; if there is no risk that property and income will be confiscated – these businesses could, according to the most conservative estimates, create annually a number of posts equal to between 5 and 8 per cent of the country's active workforce.

I should note the important role played by the ILO and the UNDP in assisting our country in dealing with employment problems. They have provided assistance, including partial financing of a project for the social and economic revival of former military bases. The ILO, through its Enterprise and Co-operative Development Department and the Regional Office for Europe, and especially thanks to the work of Mr. von Muralt, Mr. Hidalgo, Mr. Louzine, Mrs. de Vries and Mr. Klotz, has helped draw up a national programme designed to provide in the next few years employment for some 150,000 people who were formerly in the military, by stimulating self-employment, small and medium-sized business and the establishment of the necessary infrastructure.

That is the task that our Government, employers' organizations and workers' organizations are undertaking. Part of this project calls for the transformation of former military bases into testing grounds for market reforms, in addition to employment and investment measures. Clearly, we are counting on entrepreneurship to lead the way.

The experience gained through these programmes, which can justifiably be considered as pilot projects, permits us to count on the ILO and other international organizations for further effective assistance on a wide range of problems. I am referring in particular to the drafting of legislation for economic reforms, for setting up an efficient labour market, for social partnership and for many other questions, including, of course, employment promotion.

I have already mentioned and emphasized our agreement with the ideas contained in the Report of the Director-General of the ILO. The problem of employment is indeed a complex and difficult one, both from the point of view of macroeconomic management and as regards social and cultural experience and the mentalities of the various countries. We believe that it would be useful to develop several models which would concretely define effective ways of promoting employment. These could be used by Governments, employments and workers in their practical activities. The Conference of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs of Belarus is ready to work under the aegis of the ILO to help develop such a model for the countries of the former Soviet Union. I am sure that our Government would support this type of project. It would also be in line with the ILO's ideas as regards the practical application of theories for the social systems of specific countries. That is one of the main aspirations of the ILO.

By way of conclusion, I would like to express my hope and confidence that the Report of the Director-General of the ILO will serve as a powerful stimulus for the international community to adopt effective measures to promote employment in the new context of more open borders and a more globalized economy.

Mr. THAILUAN (Workers' delegate, Thailand) – On behalf of Thai workers I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the President on his election to chair this very important session. Under his able leadership and guidance, I believe that this session will be very successful.

As the Thai Workers' delegate, I feel obliged to report the labour situation in Thailand to the Conference.

Let me begin with child labour. This subject has been widely spoken about by many people and the Thai Government has been blamed for not taking appropriate action against this practice. I would like to inform you that in fact the Thai workers' organizations took this subject as one of the major problems that needed immediate action. We therefore cooperated with the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare in implementing various measures to resolve the problem including inspection and strict supervision to protect children and prevent employers from hiring children below 13. Through genuine and conscious actions and joint efforts, child labour is being reduced sharply, and is now nearly ended. One of the major policy measures that the Thai Government is now implementing is to extend compulsory education from 6 to 9 years. This means that the children will be at school until they are over 13 years of age, hence helping to reduce child labour problems in Thailand. I would like to confirm to you that the child labour situation in Thailand is now diminishing sharply and we are very satisfied with the situation.

The second subject I would like to touch upon is tripartism. The Thai Government has not ratified the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention (No. 144). However, tripartism has been practised in Thailand for a long time. Several tripartite committees have been established such as the Labour Relations Committee, the Social Security Committee, the Wages Committee, the Workmen's Compensation Fund Committee, etc. The tripartite concept is also applied in appointing the Judge of the Labour Court. However, the Government still hold the power to appoint the committees and there are many tripartite committees that have been unfairly appointed, for example the Labour Relations Committee. The Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare has changed the procedure for appointing this committee without informing the parties concerned. He did this because he wants to strictly control this committee. The representatives of workers appointed to this Committee came from small labour organizations, while the representatives from the large organizations who are the members of WCL and ICFTU were intentionally left out.

Although we have made protests against it the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare pay no attention to our protests. As I have mentioned earlier, the Ministry wants to have close control over this Committee, so it appoints workers' representatives from small organizations to this Committee because these workers' representatives usually do not argue with the government officials but will follow the orders from the Government, while the workers' representatives from large workers' organizations would not be under the control of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare. So, in this respect I would like to inform you that although tripartism is practised in Thailand, the appointment of the Committee is still under the control of the Ministry of Social Welfare.

The third issue I would like to inform you about is safety. At present the rate of accidents and on-the-job injuries, causing workers' deaths and disablement is still maintained at a high level. This is because the lack of serious interest of the Thai Government in this area. The safety problem is a national problem, but in Thailand the organization responsible for this matter is still a very small unit called "safety institution". This organisation does not have sufficient manpower, budget or equipment to cope with the growing safety problems. So, I would like to state that the safety situation in Thailand has not improved.

The last subject I would like to mention concerns public enterprises. I am pleased to inform you that the Thai Government has shown sincerity in resolving the public enterprise problems by proposing a Bill to Parliament to allow public enterprise workers to establish a labour union. The Bill is now in Parliament and I believe that public enterprise workers will enjoy their right to organize their labour union very soon.

In conclusion, I would like to state that the Thai Government by the Ministry of Social Welfare has implemented several policy measures to improve the labour situation in Thailand except the appointment of the tripartite Committee which needs to be corrected as soon as possible.

Lastly, I would like to express my sincerest thanks to you for giving me the opportunity to have the floor and I will report to you again at the next session of the Conference on the situation and improvement of the performance of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare in Thailand.

Original Polish: Mrs. SPYCHALSKA (Workers' delegate, Poland) – As delegate of the Polish employees, I would like to congratulate the President on his election to chair this session of the International Labour Conference. We are also impressed by the Report of the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Michel Hansenne.

Allow me to share with you a few reflections at this most representative tripartite forum of the contemporary world – the first to be held after the World Summit for Social Development.

We believe that the documents adopted in Copenhagen are the expression of the will of the international society to solve the most burning problems of the world today, namely hunger, poverty, unemployment, child labour and all forms of discrimination. We would also like to refer to the Copenhagen Declaration adopted by the Trade Union Forum, and mainly to those entries which, on behalf of the International Trade Unions movement, make reference to the document of the Workers' group of the ILO Governing Body: The ILO towards the twenty-first century. We would like here to express our recognition of this Workers' group, the initiator of the Trade Union Forum which brings together representatives of trade union centres and organizations holding different viewpoints. Indeed, despite many differences within the international labour movement, we believe that it is possible to reach agreement on issues that are basic to the world of labour.

It is obvious that the matters discussed at the Social Summit concern also the region of Europe – and mainly the central and eastern parts of Europe. The working people of our country, as well as the unemployed, the elderly, the disabled and the most vulnerable social groups, are having to cope with many problems and difficulties. They do, however, cherish the hope that any further changes will be free of mistakes and settlements which are inappropriate to the reality of the situation today. Despite its difficulties, Poland is changing very fast. According to official data, particularly promising signs include: growth in industrial output, a considerable increase in exports, lower costs and growing profitability. We hope that these positive trends, apparent in many fields, will continue alongside increasing stability. We perceive the improvement of our economy as a basic prerequisite for bettering the social welfare of working people and curbing unemployment. At the same time, we are also aware of the burdens placed on the weaker social classes in our country during the present process of transformation. Despite all this, we, as unionists, support the process of systematic reform and understand the need for changes for the better. Our main discussion now is on methods of implementation and the pace of transformation – not on the essence of this change. Much, for example, hinges upon employment policy. This is why for several years now we have pressed the Government and employers to pay more attention to the human factor in the context of trade and economic relations. In 1993 we were forced to file a complaint against the Government of Poland in connection with the high unemployment rate, as we felt there was no programme to reduce efficiently this rate. However, we do appreciate the efforts on the part of the Ministry of Labour and Welfare Policy and the Confederation of Polish Employers to improve relations with trade unions. Nevertheless, I have to address certain important questions that influence the laying of the foundations for social peace.

There are some 12 million people working in the national economy and the same number of old-age pensioners, disabled and unemployed. This situation is worsening with respect to the working population. The former system of social insurance has been transferred to the state social insurance system. But the State finds it difficult to shoulder the increasing burden of social insurance – and for some time now there has been a lively debate on the subject. A new concept of social insurance put forward by the Government is based on the experience of highly developed States where the pay and incomes of employees are several times higher than of those in Poland. Those who understand the need to develop systems for the pensioners of tomorrow are concerned that this category of the population will be poverty-stricken. In addition, the State is having to cope with the growing public debt which, although reduced, exceeds the state budget for the current year.

The All-Poland Alliance of Trade Unions (OPZZ) is supporting dialogue and negotiations within the tripartite structure. This is served by the appointment of an institution for social dialogue, the Tripartite Commission for Socio-Economic Affairs.

Given these circumstances, we feel that trade unionists must resort to the "final weapon" if they cannot solve their disputes by any other means. We are, however, firmly against abusing this solution which can undermine the economy. We are against strikes or street demonstrations, particularly when they become an element of a political game where the workforce becomes a mere pawn. We think that social dialogue should, among other things, favour the neutralization of trends to involve the economy in politics, since this can lead to destabilization and threaten the democratic order.

Negotiations on a pact for state enterprises and a charter of social guarantees resulted in a package of bills. Some of these have been passed by Parliament, thanks also to the activity on the part of the Members of Parliament representing trade unions. We try to draw upon experience gained during hard discussions to negotiate collective labour agreements. At present, there is a legislative programme linked to amendments to the Labour Code, to bring its provisions in line with ILO Conventions. In this context, we are interested in experiences of other countries – mainly in the European Union – in the area of occupational safety and health. The number of economic units has grown in Poland as a result of the privatization. The State and Labour Inspectorate cannot effectively monitor all these changes in many large firms. We attach great significance to these questions. We count on further support for our training, information and publishing activities by the ILO.

I have already said that Polish families are experiencing hard times. Over the past 12 years or socio-political and economic upheavals have added to the disintegration of the family. We are witnessing the growth of social ills. This is an international problem – and as such it requires coordinated efforts. What is also alarming in our country is the condition of the health service, education and culture. The indebted health service institutions, schools and universities are not able to solve their problems by themselves. They need appropriate programmes and financial support. We are holding negotiations with the Government concerning conditions under which these problems can be solved – though we know the difficulties involved.

I hope that the current session of the International Labour Conference will contribute significantly towards the implementation of priorities in the documents adopted at the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen. I would also like to express great satisfaction at the decision to organize in Warsaw the Fifth ILO European Regional Conference. We are convinced that the problems which I have only briefly outlined here will be discussed in detail at that conference. We also hope that it will mark another step forward in our attempt to implement the decisions taken at the Social Summit. I am convinced that this subject will be addressed by representatives of trade union centres and organizations functioning in Europe – particularly those in Central and Eastern Europe.

Original French: Mgr. TABET (Apostolic Nuncio, The Holy See) – I should like to begin by extending our congratulations to Mr. Rosales Argüello on being elected President of the Conference. Our congratulations also go to the other Officers of the Conference.

The Holy See welcomes the fact that the Director-General has made the problem of employment the focal point of his Report to the Conference this year. Plainly, unemployment is spreading in the industrialized countries just as it is wreaking havoc in all countries of the world, bringing in its wake poverty and alienation. This is the challenge that is addressed to the leaders of our societies.

And this challenge, far from being a fatality, is a call for us to search for and find practical solutions which are not just short-term palliatives, but which pursue a long-term objective. That objective is to build societies in which the economic approach is purposefully thought out, targeted and implemented with respect for the human beings for whom States, heads of enterprises and trade union leaders share responsibility.

Three years ago, Pope Jean-Paul II, in his social encyclical Centesimus Annus recalled vigorously that it was up to civil society to implement reforms so that each man, each woman and especially each young person, would be able to exercise his or her right to self-fulfilment. In other words the right to live in dignity, in honesty and in humanity.

In the preface to his Report, the Director-General says it is necessary “to place the employment issue at the centre of the international agenda”. He also says that “developments in the world economy such as the liberalization of trade and investment flows and the globalization of production have created vast new opportunities for higher rates of growth and job creation”.

We do, of course, support that project. However, to ensure that this objective does not remain purely utopian and an unachievable wish, it would be useful to define what we are actually seeking to achieve and how. The fact is, there are jobs, even paid jobs, which do nothing to increase a person's worth, which do not encourage the creation of social ties. There are, however, a multitude of human activities that it should be possible to organize which are useful to society and enriching for the individual.

In other words, whatever technical measures might be envisaged and adopted to better organize the labour market, political and social intuition that can rally all the actors in society is still both indispensable and urgent.

Because of its mandate, the ILO has the heavy and difficult task of conceiving and instigating a social order based on equity, solidarity and sharing. The fight for social justice does not only mean encouraging growth in a globalized economy. The struggle that the ILO has been called to lead is broader and more demanding. It means adopting a higher goal which can be summarized in the following question. Is the free market now developing throughout the world really in the service of mankind, of all men so as to ensure “their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity” as the Declaration of Philadelphia so rightly states?

Thanks to its original and specific mission, namely, of achieving social dialogue through tripartism, the ILO is well placed to instigate amongst social partners throughout the world appropriate ethical discussion on employment promotion.

The questions that the delegation of the Holy See would like to take the liberty of placing before your Plenary Assembly do in fact draw their inspiration from the philosophy and pragmatism of your Organization.

Is it not now time for ILO Member States to ask themselves whether their Governments are employing sufficient means, enough measures to stimulate and encourage leaders in the world of labour to draw up and establish a framework suitable for the development of our citizens? Has not the time come to institute with heads of national and international enterprises a practical discussion on the negative effects of competitiveness now prevalent in modern economies?

It also befalls the ILO to encourage workers' organizations to duly consider the daily realities of the many millions of men and women in the world of labour who still have no voice – without, of course, forgetting the legitimate aspirations of those suffering from exclusion in the informal sector.

The social dialogue the world's workers are waiting for is, we would like to emphasize, not confined to defending the interests of a limited number of categories. It concerns all those men and women whose only aspiration is to become active players in economic and social life.

It seems to us that the ILO's mandate is specifically to facilitate this.

To encourage the framing of new social policies in the world of labour, we believe it is necessary to stress the following objectives.

In the current economic situation it is necessary first and foremost to examine employment issues and link them closely with real everyday working conditions. To talk about employment is to talk about man and all that he comprises including man's social integration. Work does exist today that does not respect all the dimensions of man.

Even though encouraging technical progress and rationalization of trade, I feel it essential to point out that the economy and competitiveness can be given pride of place only if they are for the purpose of employment promotion. To follow on the tradition of your Organization I wish to reiterate “labour is not a commodity,” labour still has priority over capital, and speculation without a social purpose is a serious threat to the world of labour. Without any doubt, social dialogue must maintain as its goal the human purpose of the production of wealth for the benefit of the greatest number.

Lastly, to ensure that this realistic approach is implemented internationally, the ILO has the mission to propose relevant legal instruments in order to establish a balance between the rules of international trade and the social needs of countries and regions, and particularly the poorest amongst them.

Thanks to the ILO's well-known experience, many social difficulties have already been overcome in the world of labour. With the interdependence which now characterizes the world economy, another social logic is emerging; as a result, some will lose their advantages but only to allow others to gain in dignity and in humanity. In order to implement this new solidarity worldwide, there is a price to be paid and this price begins by a change in mentalities. May your Organization contribute actively to that goal.

Original Arabic: Mr. BOULOUIZ (Employers' delegate, Morocco) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. First of all, I should like to extend my heartiest congratulations to the President on his election to preside over the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish him every success in his task.

I should also like to congratulate the Director-General on his Report, Promoting employment. This is a subject requiring the greatest attention by all countries, particularly now that we are experiencing the globalization of the economy. The ideas and proposals put forward by the Director-General in his Report make a positive contribution to the quest for effective solutions to the problems caused by the unemployment which is afflicting both developed and developing countries.

The problem of promoting employment is particularly important. We believe that the enterprise, as an institution generating employment, must have all the necessary encouragement and means so that it can contribute to improving production and thereby create new job opportunities. It is not possible to promote employment without preparing the necessary framework in which to develop an enterprise as an essential part of the job-creation process.

In this connection, the private sector in my country is satisfied to note that the Moroccan government is increasingly trying to create a climate conducive to the establishment of small and medium-sized enterprises as part of an organized liberal process.

In spite of the many advantages inherent in the legislation on investment in my country (namely simply administrative regulations, tax and customs incentives, tax exemptions and a special scholarship for job creation), our Government is about to make an important amendment to its legislation to facilitate investment even more. Furthermore, employment is one of the priorities of the Moroccan Government which is doing all it can to create new job opportunities. I would like at this juncture to refer with pride to all the efforts made by the National Council for Youth and the Future to bring education and training programmes in line with the needs of the labour market and to integrate young people into the fabric of economic production.

The responsibility for promoting employment lies as much with the employers as with the workers. Both parties must therefore step up their efforts to transform their traditional relationship into one based upon cooperation and dialogue in order to increase production and job opportunities and to improve working conditions.

The danger of unemployment is threatening countries the world over, irrespective of their governments, systems or size of their economies – as the Director-General has pointed out in his Report. Although the present economic climate requires all countries to undertake domestic economic and social reforms in order to promote employment, it is also necessary to stress here the importance of international cooperation; this should take the form of programmes and assistance to those countries particularly hard hit by unemployment. We would also like to highlight the need for an active partnership at the international level and the need to adopt all practical measures to promote employment for the good of man and mankind.

In conclusion, I should like to reiterate my congratulations to the President and the Vice-Presidents and thank the Director-General for having made the excellent choice of promoting employment as the focal point of his Report.

Original French: Mr. OUEDRAOGO (Minister of Employment, Labour and Social Security, Burkina Faso) – Participation in this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference with the theme "Promoting employment" is for me a great honour at a time when all representatives of Governments, Workers and Employers agree on the need to give thought to the action to be taken to promote the attainment of the goal of full employment – a goal which is so dear to so many different States.

Before continuing, may I, on behalf of the delegation of Burkina Faso and in my own personal capacity, convey my warmest congratulations to the President and to the other Officers on their election to head this august Conference. I should also like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, who has given us a Report with a wealth of detail which is very relevant to the basis of our thoughts and our discussions.

The Director-General of the ILO in his Report to this session has not only focused on the problem of employment in its three-fold dimension: structural, institutional and economic, but has also proposed tentative solutions at a national and international level for developed and developing countries.

Needless to say, ever since the human communities became aware of the need to organize, the problem of employment has always been a source of concern to leaders of State. But today more than ever the growth of the world's population, and the deterioration of economic, political and social relations have made the question of employment more acute than ever. In Africa, in Asia, in Europe and in America anxiety over unemployment has given and continues to give sleepless nights to governments and populations.

Although in advanced countries efforts can be concentrated on this issue, and therefore it can be better tackled, in developing countries the situation is very different because they must wage war on all fronts at once.

In effect, food self-sufficiency, health, education, industrialization and environmental protection, to name but a few, are all priority issues in need of urgent solutions.

Burkina Faso is one of the most disadvantaged countries, with scant resources. We have 10 million inhabitants; 85 per cent of them depend for their livelihoods on agriculture; less than 60 per cent have access to health care; less than 12 per cent to sanitation; less than 40 per cent to education; and less than 70 per cent to drinking water. This list, though long, is still not exhaustive.

Like very many other countries of sub-Saharan Africa, Burkina Faso is suffering the effects of a generalized collapse of the modern sector of the economy and the impact of rural outmigration. As proof, the Population and Health Survey carried out in 1991-92 showed that only 3 per cent of the labour force are wage earners, which means that the majority of our employment takes place in the realm of agriculture whose inadequacies are well known to all.

Furthermore, the joint survey by the National Statistics and Demography Institute and the International Social Studies Institute revealed a level of unemployment in of 25 per cent for the city of Ouagadougou alone.

In this context it hardly bears repeating that employment, in all its breadth and complexity, is one of the main concerns of my country's leaders.

Unemployment in developing countries, particularly in Burkina Faso, is characterized by its impact on young people, 65.3 per cent of unemployed in our country are under the age of 24 and a further 28.6 per cent are aged between 25 and 39.

Burkina Faso must deal with three categories of unemployed. First there are the victims of restructuring and privatization, on account of the absence of any safety valve in the implementation of the structural adjustment programme. Then there are thousands of educated young people who have not really been trained by the educational system. Finally, there are the young people who are drawn away from the rural areas towards the towns by underemployment.

As the Director-General has stressed in his Report each State must find its own solutions at a domestic level. In Burkina Faso our authorities have undertaken vigorous measures to offset the imbalance between the various sectors of the economy to promote gainful employment.

Thus, on a structural level, deep transformations are anticipated in the education and training system. Demographic factors, namely population growth and migration, are the focus of Government attention. Varied and complex actions have been undertaken within the framework of the six national commitments set out by the Head of State on 2 June 1994 which are as follows: protection of the environment and combating desertification; the establishment of production teams to enhance the quality and level of production; promotion of the private sector and the creation of small and medium-sized enterprises and industries; the development of gainful activities for women; the organization of and support to the informal sector; combating illiteracy and building vocational training centres.

The aim of all these actions is direct or indirect job creation. At an institutional level a certain number of structures have been set up. Following the creation of the National Employment Promotion Office, one of whose aims is to design, coordinate and follow up labour-intensive public works projects, other structures were set up: the Faso Baara agency, a key employer in major sanitation work in the cities of Ouagadougou and Bobo-Dioulasso and some medium-sized cities; the National Employment Promotion Fund which helps educated young people set up businesses; the Informal Sector Support Fund, to help the gainful activities in this sector; the Women's Employment Support Fund; the National Programme for the Placement of Retrenched Workers which, as its name indicates, contributes to helping this category of workers regain a place in the country's economy.

On the legislative front the revision of the Labour Code, the Investment Code, the Trade Code, and the Code on Taxes and the Social Security Code is intended to encourage private initiative and to open the doors to foreign investment as has also been proposed by the Director-General in his Report.

Despite the impact of initiatives and actions that have been described we are still far from our goals, which shows to what extent we are in need of the contribution of the international community and of the industrialized countries in particular.

In view of the central role of the ILO in promoting economic and social development in Africa, the delegation of Burkina Faso knows that we can count on the support of the ILO in consolidating and extending employment initiatives. For we know well that national efforts alone are insufficient to attain full employment, unless we have technical and financial support from the international community.

We need the means to attain food self-sufficiency. We need assistance to develop our agricultural sector and our modern sector. We need funds to support education and health for all the Burkina-Be. We need the means to mobilize domestic savings.

This is the only way we shall be able to reduce the profound imbalance that exists in our economy and make ourselves a true partner in the international scene.

Even so, already now President Blaise Compaore of Burkina Faso and his Government, convinced of the need for solidarity between North and South, fully ratifies and endorses the international and regional programmes to encourage the free movement of goods and services between rich and poor countries.

Since the progress of liberalization and globalization of the economy is more or less a fait accompli, closer study is needed of the distribution of its fruits. There is a need for the most wealthy countries which are the principal beneficiaries of liberalization, to resist forms of protectionism with respect to the poor countries. In the framework of the implementation of the structural adjustment programmes which affect so many countries in Africa, I would call for international solidarity to raise awareness of the social costs involved. I should like to conclude by thanking all States and all those agencies that contribute to the development of Burkina Faso.

I should like to express the wish that these debates, which will certainly be marked by respect for the principles of tripartism and democracy, will also produce auspicious conclusions of value to sub-Saharan Africa in particular and which, need I say, has received very little in terms of foreign capital, despite the important measures taken towards liberalization in this area.

Original French: Ms. OSSENI (Minister of Labour, Employment and Social Affairs, Benin) – On behalf of the tripartite delegation of the Government of the Republic of Benin, which I have the honour to lead, allow me to congratulate the President most warmly and whole-heartedly on his election. I am convinced that under his leadership the proceedings of the 82nd Session will be brought to a successful conclusion.

Once again we are assembled in Geneva, to reflect jointly on the problems which fall within the competence of our organization. In line with the traditions of the ILO, the Director-General of the International Labour Organization has brought before us a Report that focuses on the main theme of our session, promoting employment.

By selecting this subject the Director-General of the ILO has given a new impetus to a debate, the complexity and importance of which are self-evident. In the light of this analysis of this Report, I would like to express my gratitude to the ILO and congratulate him for his attachment to our Organization and to the values incarnated in it, as well as for the very positive innovations of the last five years.

With reference to the Report, I would like to say that the Director-General has drawn on a comprehensive study of employment thus producing a diagnosis regarding the impact of unemployment and underemployment, in both industrialized and developing countries.

The globalization of the economy, and its implications for employment; the marginalization of African countries, because of their small share in international trade and investment; the transition economies characterized by long-term unemployment; the worsening of poverty in the South; the deregulation of labour markets as a remedy to employment; and full employment as a policy objective, constitute the organizing themes of the Report.

Personally, I attach great importance to opinions expressed in this Report and the values defended therein.

But apart from these considerations, I am one of those who feel that the consequences of the employment crisis are imminently linked not only to the thematic and semantic context of the word itself, but also, and above all to the new problems which arise in our countries, i.e. delinquency, drug abuse, the drawing of young people into regional, ethnic and political conflicts, social exclusion, etc.

When the world's will is put to the test we can say that the employment crisis explodes the social fabric, culture, civilizations, to the point where the complexity and gravity of the resultant problems defeat any number of studies by distinguished international experts.

Faced with this painful employment problem, we do not have the right to give up and surrender, which is why I would like to think back over history and recall that this is not the first time that our Organization and mankind are confronted with such a cruel economic and political crisis. Yet earlier generations were able to forgo their privileges in order to overcome what seemed inevitable, accelerating the course of human history.

This is why today's generation bears a very heavy responsibility in seeking appropriate solutions to the scourge of unending unemployment, whose harmful manifestations lead to mental disturbance, institutional disorganization, family disintegration and the degradation of the human species itself.

In view of this crisis, at the end of this second millennium, when everywhere we fall under the sway of the "market", our Organization must do everything it can in order to establish fair conditions and economic and social balance.

The International Labour Organization will doubtless, of course, continue to show its ability and universal competence, and its willingness to adjust its structures and its working methods, to the aforementioned problems arising from the globalization of the economy.

This is why I believe that the International Labour Organization, in view of the present and foreseeable future situations, must promote more dialogue, more consultation and mediation between the social partners and governments, all protagonists of a new development, so that problems of employment, unemployment, and underemployment may be given top priority through joint programmes.

The employment crisis should be resolved at two levels; first of all, nationally, and then internationally.

Nationally, I think it is imperative to restore basic freedoms especially in the developing countries where consensus so far has not been reached. It is necessary to draft a development plan aligned to employment strategies. Governments, through coherent programmes, should promote small and medium-sized enterprises, encourage self-employment, set up labour-intensive public works programmes in the city and in the countryside in order to discourage rural out-migration and urban crime. The informal sector must be promoted, through easier access to credit; training programmes in schools and the relevant institutions must be rethought in order that their students will be more suited to the needs of companies; labour legislation and social protection laws must be revised in the light of the new structure of labour markets and employment; we must create national employment monitoring systems and study their extension at the regional level to act as a support for national manpower planning and labour market information systems; we must also take appropriate action by strengthening labour ministries and ministries of social affairs in order to enable them to act more efficiently in reducing social tensions.

Internationally, it seems vital, "in every structural adjustment programme", to attend to its social dimension so that they can help retrenched workers from enterprises and the public service to undergo vocational retraining, and likewise for the educated unemployed. It is also desirable that regional manpower planning programmes be drawn up.

It is in this connection also desirable that the ILO strengthen, both technically and financially, the multidisciplinary teams, as well as Regional Offices, to improve their ability in the fields of employment, labour and manpower.

Finally, the international community must give renewed attention to the need to set up an inter-regional labour and employment fund, for the benefit of developing countries.

These are some proposals which I believe are relevant, which should be given priority, which I thought useful to bring before you at this stage of our discussions, but apart from these proposals my country is one of those which feel that any national employment policy deserves technical and financial support. Generally speaking, we can say that developing countries, especially the African countries south of the Sahara, are heavily indebted and are confronted at the same time with the problem of economic growth and development.

In view of these conditions, how can we reconcile the requirements of the employment crisis with that of chronic indebtedness? In view of the situation, the international community must reconsider the debt mechanism in African countries, not only for historical reasons, but first and foremost to curb the trend towards their pauperization. This is all the more true in the light of the words of the Declaration of Philadelphia: "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere".

Thus, reaffirming the values of our Organization, we, the leading actors of today's history should, in the words of the Director-General in June 1994 in the magazine of the ILO, The World of Work, we must invent "new paths towards social justice".

I would like to express once again to the Director-General and his staff our appreciation for the technical and financial assistance extended to my country in recent years in the fields of occupational health and safety, labour administration, social security, employment and international labour standards. I also have in mind the financing of the Tripartite Meeting on the Socio-Economic Implications of the Devaluation of the CFA franc for French-speaking African countries in October 1994 in Dakar, Senegal.

These are the concerns of my Government, Benin, which I have the honour of bringing to your attention. I therefore hope that the ILO will continue to pursue its objectives, of peace, social and economic justice for a better future for all of mankind.

Mr. NALAU (Minister for Labour and Employment, Papua New Guinea) – It is an honour indeed for me, my delegation, my Government, and my country to be accorded this opportunity to address this distinguished 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. Permit me first of all to congratulate the President on his election to the highest office of this Conference. Under his able leadership, this Conference will have no problem achieving its objectives by the time we conclude. I also offer my best wishes to the distinguished delegates from throughout the world attending this Conference.

As far as the ILO Director-General's Programme and Budget proposal for 1996-97 are concerned, I wish to congratulate the Director-General and his management team for a job very well done indeed. The programme and budget proposals for the next two years have certainly been framed taking into account the changing nature of our world of work. They have indeed incorporated the common views of ILO constituents, as expressed in the years leading up to last year, but more emphatically at last year's Conference, which also marked the 75th anniversary of the ILO.

The priority objectives of the biennium 1996-97 are most relevant indeed to the needs of our world today, including the ILO's continuing promotion of democracy and human rights, alleviation of unemployment and poverty, and the continuing protection of our working people. The ILO's achievements of such priority objectives, I believe, will no doubt contribute to the fulfilment of the United Nations agenda for development, including peace, growth, environment, justice and democratic governance.

Through the ILO's active partnership policy involving the continuing dialogue that is now firmly established between the ILO and its constituents, I note with appreciation that the ILO's programme and budget proposals have been defined and prioritized on what have emerged as common priority objectives of each region. Without doubt, the problem of employment, which is largely unemployment itself, has indeed become the common denominator or the number-one world problem that must and has rightly commanded renewed attention for the next two years.

I note with appreciation the dialogue that is being established between the ILO and international lending institutions such as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund in the most important need area so that such international lending agencies can increasingly balance the interests of economics with those of social needs, within the policies they advocate at both the national and international level. At present, my country is having some difficulty with both the World Bank and IMF, as the social aspects of our national development efforts are not easily appreciated by the lending policies of such bodies, and the ILO's role in influencing such lending policies in years to come is a most welcome development for the better.

I also note with appreciation the ILO's continuing promotion of democracy and human rights in the next two years, including its continuing technical assistance to employers and workers in my country, through workshops, seminars and fellowships, which have certainly played an important role in getting our employers and workers to play their full role in the social dialogue so very much necessary for sustained economic growth within the framework of free markets.

Industrial relations, for example, are continuing to mature in my country because of the kind of exposures that are continually being made available to us by the ILO. The freeing of our labour market, for example, has presented our country with so many challenges, requiring our employers and workers to increasingly deal with problems of their various relationships, without the previous heavy reliance on government intervention.

I admit, however, that workers' rights and the specific role of labour inspection in ensuring equality in my country have not been effective in the last few years, basically for lack of resources, and I appeal to the ILO in the next two years to intervene by assisting us to formulate alternative, efficient and effective approaches to achieving the same goals.

The fight against poverty and unemployment in my country attracts and commands first priority attention by my Government today, and the new emphasis given to this same problem by the ILO in the next two years is a most welcome development indeed in supporting and supplementing our own national efforts in alleviating unemployment, which is the common enemy of our world today.

The alleviation of poverty is very much dependent on our success in alleviating unemployment, and this is where we look to the ILO in the next two years, bearing in mind its vast technical capabilities, to assist and advise on how best we can tackle the unemployment problem in our country and region.

In the fight against unemployment, we recognize that enterprise development has a key role to play in the generation of employment opportunities, through the development of small to medium-sized enterprises. However, in enterprise development, first preferences should be given to the owners of capital, land, labour and entrepreneurship from within national economies themselves, to properly establish and consolidate firm national foundations and equal footings by indigenous people, upon which to promote and guarantee nationalistic economic ownership and participation.

Global economic interdependence in the area of enterprise development is a little too premature for my country. The fact that, during the first 20 years of our political independence, there has not been marked development in our small to medium-sized enterprises, while our unemployment problem has continued to rise, does not give both the World Bank and the IMF the right to insist as they do at present that my country throws wide open its doors to outsiders to exploit economic opportunities, particularly in the small to medium-sized enterprises in my country. If these two international lending institutions cannot anticipate the likely long-term adverse economic, social and political consequences of the economic policies they are imposing on us, then I would like to sound a word of warning to both that they are now planting the seeds for long-term strife in my country.

On the role of the ILO in the fight against unemployment and poverty, I look forward to the ILO's research, analysis and advice in the next two years, in the technical areas of employment strategy, labour market policies, social security, enterprise development, training policies, collective bargaining and labour administration.

I note with appreciation the ILO's moves in the next two years, to assist and advise ILO member States on the subject of privatization, which is a major aspect of national economic restructuring everywhere, and the need for such a major exercise to be based on economic democracy, which calls for the views, interests and aspirations of all parties involved to be taken into account to avoid national instabilities, and to secure commitments by all parties affected. I do look forward to receiving the ILO's guidelines for use by governments, employers' and workers' organizations on this participatory approach to privatization.

I also note with appreciation the ILO's other activities in the next two years, relating to the many social aspects of structural adjustment, including the ILO's research in response to the claim often made that labour regulations and worker protection reduce employment. On this subject, it was in 1992 that our national Minimum Wages Board abolished minimum wages for skill and experience, while drastically reducing the minimum wage for unskilled workers, under a strong lobby by the World Bank, supported by the then Government. In this regard I look forward to the results of the ILO's assessment of the costs and benefits of specific measures, including the actions of our independent national Minimum Wages Board, to increase labour market flexibility, as a precondition for increased employment creation.

On the subject of protection for our working men and women throughout the world, I note this is also one of the ILO's priority objectives in the next two years, although it is a continuing activity. Protection for our workers is of historical and fundamental significance and concern to the ILO's many technical endeavours, involving the development and application of the ILO's international labour standards, relating to safety and health in the workplace, and the continuing improvement of working conditions generally. Bearing this in mind, I also look forward to the ILO re-enforcing its technical assistance programme to ministries of labour such as mine, to strengthen our capacities of labour inspection aimed at improving our workers' working conditions.

The ILO's international labour standards play a vital role and, in fact, they are the major tools the ILO has in promoting democracy and human rights in its fight against poverty and unemployment, and in promoting working people everywhere. Many of these standards are now becoming out of date in our continually changing world, and I very much welcome the ILO's intention to review and update many of these, making them more relevant and effective to our world today.

Simultaneously, of course, the ILO's intention also to continue to promote broader acceptance and application of a wide range of its existing standards is also another welcome move. We do have plans to review and update many of our labour legislations, and the ILO's technical assistance in these endeavours will be much appreciated in the next two years.

The ILO's intention to formulate international labour standards relating to contract employment is also welcome.

Last but not least, Mr. President, I agree with the ILO Secretary-General that the most effective way of combating poverty is through employment creation and social protection, based on the ILO's international labour standards. Bearing this in mind, I appeal to the ILO to make special efforts in the next two years to assist my country in particular, through its vast technical capabilities, in the field of labour, to ratify and apply many more of these international labour standards, although many of these could prove costly in our drive to create jobs for our people.

Mr. AHMAD (Workers' adviser, Indonesia) – On behalf of the All Indonesia Workers' Union (SPSI), I would like to congratulate Mr. Rosales Argüello on his election as the President of this very honoured Conference. I am confident that with his experience and ability he will be able to preside most successfully over all of the upcoming important sessions and lead them to a productive outcome.

I would also like to express the All Indonesia Workers' Union's appreciation to the Director-General of the ILO and his staff for their work, particularly for the Report which focuses on the theme of Promoting employment. The Report is both comprehensive and essential and has highlighted the strategic problems which both the developing and developed countries have been striving to address so far.

For Indonesia, the obligation to promote employment is a constitutional obligation and is clearly mandated by article 27, paragraph 2, of our Constitution, which says that "every citizen is entitled to employment which would guarantee decent living...".

Now that we are in our 50th anniversary year, while we are proud of the progress which Indonesia has achieved socially, culturally and economically as well as politically, we also have to admit that there are still many areas in our national development that need improvement. There are citizens of Indonesia who still live below the poverty line, and of all the problems we still face "promoting employment" is the most urgent. Every year, 2.5 million Indonesian jobseekers enter the labour market, and not all of them by far succeed in finding employment which could guarantee a decent living.

The natural resources which have become the economic backbone of developing countries can no longer be fully relied on as a problem-solver for economic development, particularly for the optimal development of human resources.

Such conditions have caused an uneven distribution of the development cake and a wider gap in social and economic welfare, resulting in social tensions and instability as far as security is concerned.

The inability to create sufficient employment has resulted in strong competition among jobseekers. At the same time, they face employers who tend to use them as production tools, as "objects" to exploit, and this must be ended.

Therefore, all efforts and programmes for economic development in any country must be directed toward improving the welfare and preserving the dignity of workers.

The scarcity of employment, coupled with free market competition, requires that more attention be paid to the question of workers' rights and better protection provided in this respect. Within this framework, basic workers' rights as laid down in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), as well as the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) must be upheld to eliminate exploitation at workplaces.

Therefore, the issue of pitting "protection" against "workplaces" shall not be pursued; the need for employment is as important as the need for protection and therefore efforts to create employment are to be accompanied by efforts to increase protection of workers' basic rights. Workers' rights in accordance with ILO standards must be taken into account in the development programme of every country.

The need to protect workers' rights in Indonesia – in line with the increasingly democratic approach to this question – has already been anticipated by the Indonesia Workers' Union by making the necessary adjustments to the structural organization. Consequently, my delegation is pleased to inform the Conference that the All Indonesia Workers' Union (SPSI) is now functioning as a federation, supported by 13 autonomous industrial unions and further strengthened by the establishment of some 800 autonomous local enterprise unions. Thus, the spirit of freedom of assembly has consistently grown of its own right within the basic framework.

Nowadays countries are increasingly interdependent. Therefore, the survival needs of a particular country must unavoidably take into consideration the survival needs of another country. For this reason, we strongly contend that the international order which governs the interests of all nations should put equality and justice for all ahead of all other considerations. Rich and developed countries must not take advantage of the weaknesses of the least developed and developing countries and seek benefit for themselves only.

Therefore, rulings which are protective to certain countries cannot be forced upon other countries since they will certainly become a burden and consequently impede the economic development of the countries concerned instead of promoting employment. This will inevitably exacerbate the already critical unemployment conditions in many countries on which these protective rulings are forced, thereby creating more tensions and injustice. In this context, I support the opinion that if the developed countries bring force to bear upon the developing countries, then the prospects for improving the welfare of the majority of people in the developing countries will be seriously threatened. Therefore, it is of the highest importance that we remind ourselves constantly of the Philadelphia Declaration "... poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere".

It is therefore expected that the ILO will play a more important and greater role than ever in assisting countries to promote employment, through more programmes in vocational training in order to bridge the gap between the different interests of developed and developing countries, for the purpose of creating a better world where workers can live decently as human beings.

Original Russian: Mr. SCHERBAKOV (representative of the General Confederation of Trade Unions) – May I begin by congratulating the President on his unanimous election to this lofty post. I am convinced that his masterly guidance of the debates will lead to fruitful conclusions on issues of such vital importance as those on our agenda. I should also like to thank the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Hansenne, who has chosen such a topical subject for this session of the International Labour Conference in his Report Promoting employment which we have studied very carefully.

We also welcome the fact, first of all, that the International Labour Organization has again shown that it fully acknowledges the topicality and importance of this problem and secondly that it is ready to participate with those willing to work towards full and productive employment.

The dramatic employment situation is certainly one of the major challenges facing the world community today. This is why we want the ILO to play an active role and follow up the decisions on employment made by Heads of State during the World Summit in Copenhagen. In point of fact, who better than the ILO, in view of its traditions and long experience in tripartite activities, to deal with this very difficult problem.

I should like to take this opportunity to assure you that all constructive efforts deployed by the ILO will enjoy the support and understanding of the General Confederation of Trade Unions, and, I am sure, trade unions throughout the world.

Employers, trade unions and governments, if they are truly working in the interests of their people, must join forces to put an end to unemployment, underemployment and unacceptably low wages.

We very much hope that this will be given priority in economic and social policies in all countries.

The problems of social disintegration and unemployment are now very high on the agenda of the General Confederation of Trade Unions and its member organizations. Our position today reflects the conclusions of the Copenhagen Summit.

The General Confederation of Trade Unions and national and independent trade unions feel that our priority to our economic policies should undoubtedly be to combat mass unemployment and find a fair solution to the problem of employment.

We should try to generate employment which will guarantee workers a dignified and fair standard of living. Furthermore, we welcome the fact that the Report emphasizes the situation facing what are known as countries with transition economies. By definition, the countries of my region belong to this group, and this is where the General Confederation of Trade Unions is currently operating.

Presumably, the ILO only has data relating to three European countries of the CIS, but this is enough to be able to draw certain conclusions on the incredible growth in unemployment. The convincing analysis contained in the Report shows that industrial output has fallen, working time has been reduced, many enterprises are no longer operating and that workers have been given long-term unpaid leave as a way of trying to camouflage the real unemployment situation. Attempts are being made to mask the truth by providing reassuring data on the growth of unemployment.

According to statistics compiled by the CIS there were 2 million more people unemployed in 1994 than in 1993.

The highest rate of unemployment is in Ukraine, Moldova, Armenia and Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan. The greatest problem facing our countries is hidden unemployment, which is considerably higher than official statistics would lead us to believe.

The Report of the Director-General rightly emphasizes the fact that many people who have lost their jobs see no point in registering at unemployment exchanges. They simply leave the labour market or move into the informal sector.

For this reason, we should take note of the judicious conclusion in the Report on the long-term growth of unemployment. We recognize that unemployment in our young country and the percentage of young people without jobs in the CIS is now over 30 per cent.

We agree with the Director-General. Like him we believe that we could offset the effects of unemployment through socially oriented works. However, this idea has not been taken up or developed in the CIS. Trade unions in the CIS and the General Confederation of Trade Unions hope to see the development of an economic union in the CIS and that economic ties will be restored so that we can stabilize the economic situation of the countries of the region and develop and modernize industry and agriculture and improve the employment situation.

For this reason, the Confederation has, since its inception, worked to establish and strengthen this kind of union. A union like this would only be viable if it included a social element. Work with regard to the rights and social guarantees of workers in the region is already being carried out at present by our Confederation.

To this end, we will make the best possible use of our observer status in several bodies of CIS countries. These include the Council of Heads of State, the Council of Heads of Government, the Interpar-liamentary Assembly and most recently, the Intergovernmental Economic Committee.

The difficult employment situation, not only in CIS countries but also in most countries with a transition economy, calls for a special ILO assistance programme.

We have already put forward this idea in the report we submitted to the Summit in Copenhagen. We hope that the ILO will look carefully at this report.

The future of humanity depends to a large degree on development in this region. For us, unemployment is one of our most serious and potentially explosive problems. However, it is not too late to look at practical solutions to this problem.

The ILO's special programme for employment in this region should become a historic landmark.

In this regard, I would like to stress that the problem of unemployment undoubtedly deserves the priority attention of the ILO, as do the questions related to liberalization of the economy and the problem of providing social protection for workers.

This process should help to stimulate economic growth throughout the world. Economic development must help to improve the welfare of the population, promote social justice and protect the rights and interests of workers.

For this reason, I fully endorse the opinion put forward by the Workers' group with regard to the need to include a social clause in international trade agreements, thus making market access dependent on respect for the fundamental rights of workers guaranteed by ILO Conventions.

These are the principles we uphold in our Confederation. The Confederation is appealing to the ILO to listen to what workers have to say and to continue actively to work for the introduction of a social element in international trade. To this end, the activities of workers' groups with regard to ensuring a social element in international trade are essential.

To conclude, I would like to state, once again, that we fully agree with the conclusions in the Report of the Director-General with regard to finding a solution to the crises in the countries of our region.

With regard to the General Confederation of Trade Unions and its member organizations we fully intend to work together to this end. We hope that the International Labour Organization will provide real and effective assistance.

I am certain that this session of the International Labour Conference will be a step towards strengthening the ILO's authority and influence, because workers throughout the world are placing their hopes in this Organization.

Original French: Mr. PHINITH (Employers' delegate, Lao People's Democratic Republic) – On behalf of the Lao Chamber of Commerce and Industry, I should like to extend to the President my heartiest congratulations on his election to the preside over this august assembly.

Might I point out that this is the first time since it joined the International Labour Organization in 1964, that the Lao People's Democratic Republic has been able to send a tripartite delegation to the annual Conference of this Organization. It has meant a tremendous financial effort that our country has had to make in order to meet its statutory obligations.

I fully concur with the points of view expressed by the Director-General in his Report entitled Promot- ing employment. The important role played by the National Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Laos as representative of the country's employers consists, among other things, in promoting employment in enterprises which are still in their infancy.

In order to cut down unemployment in the country, we have called on all enterprises in both the public and private sectors to make all the necessary sacrifices to extend the national employment market as widely as possible. Directives on the privatization of the public sector have been drafted to guarantee employment for the workers affected, either by keeping them in their jobs, or by redeploying them in the enterprise concerned.

Current legislation stipulates that dismissal of workers can only take place in cases of absolute necessity such as serious misconduct. The Lao People's Democratic Republic does not as yet have serious unemployment problems, but such problems could undoubtedly arise in the very near future. I fully agree with the Director-General in what he had to say about poverty and underemployment in southern Asia, and Laos, of course, is no exception to this.

As regards the other major points raised in the Director-General's Report, and particularly with regard to foreign investment, legislation in Laos stipulates that priority in recruitment must be reserved for nationals and that the introduction and employment of foreign workers will only be authorized in the event of necessity, when the skills in question are not available in the country. In addition, such foreign investment must be accompanied by measures for the transfer of the occupational skills to national workers.

Lao employers cooperate actively with the Government in implementing projects for training managers and production agents, particularly in the field of technology.

Although Laos is recognized as a country which has many natural resources, in fact it has very few human resources and consequently has a pressing need for skilled labour, which is essential to the economic and social development of the country.

This year the Conference has quite rightly included in its agenda the issue of home work which plays a very important role in the struggle against unemployment and underemployment, particularly in developing countries such as mine.

In conclusion, allow me to remind you that the National Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Laos is a young organization lacking experience both in the field of industrial relations and in that of job creation. We thus hope to benefit from the technical assistance of the International Labour Office in the areas of both organization and of the training of our managerial staff.

Original French: Mr. HIDOS (Employers' delegate, Romania) – First of all, on behalf of the delegation of Romanian employers, allow me to congratulate Mr. Rosales Argüello on his election to the post of President of this Conference. I should also like to convey my congratulations to the elected officers of the Conference. We are convinced that the work of this Conference under their leadership will be a great success. May I also take this opportunity to thank the Governing Body and Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO, for the exceptional quality of the Report we have received.

Allow me to express my fullest satisfaction for this opportunity to participate in the Conference as a delegate of Romanian employers, represented here by the National Confederation of Romanian Employers (CNPR).

The CNPR, for the first time in my country's history, has brought together employers' organizations from all fields, and enterprises of all sizes, small, medium and large, without distinction as to the nature of their capital, whether it be private, public, joint, independent or foreign.

Romania has since the revolution undergone a period of transition which affects all sectors of economic and social activity. Outside the country we have noted the dismantling of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance (CMEA) market, which has had serious implications on the level of trade, and hence on our production. Consequently, in the country increasing economic imbalances in the various sectors of activity have given rise to certain negative phenomena which have made themselves felt on the quality of life of our citizens.

As you know, until 1990, in Romania there was officially no unemployment. In general, enterprise staffing levels were much higher than were strictly necessary for a rational organization of labour. This contributed to consistently low productivity and low wages.

From 1990 onwards, the state of Romania's economy was characterized by a steep drop in production and in overall economic activity in the country for the period between 1990 and 1992.

In 1993-94, production picked up. There was a decline in the actively employed population with the number of wage-earners falling by 1.5 million, or 18 per cent. There was a continued rise in unemployment levels, from 3 per cent in 1991 to 11 per cent in 1994.

With GNP falling even faster than the number of actively employed, wage-earners began earning less in comparison to 1989, along with a substantial drop in working time, and a continuous low level of productivity.

The decline in economic activity was characterized in particular by a substantial reduction in real working time without any appropriate accompanying measures to boost productivity, the loss of major markets for Romanian products, and the sudden abolition of structures run by our centralized economy without any alternatives being set up to replace them.

At present the general picture for enterprises in Romania could be characterized as follows: a large number of private-capital enterprises particularly some 400,000 small and very small enterprises (these establishments pursue purely commercial activities and in general are fairly profitable); some 11,000 enterprises backed mainly by state-held capital and which employ a substantial number of the active population, and where virtually all of our country's production takes place (these enterprises are scarcely profitable, if at all); approximately 1,000 small and medium-sized enterprises which have been privatized; they have maintained or increased their economic potential and are more profitable than prior to privatization. There are also more than 200,000 individual and family associations authorized to operate commercially.

Despite the large number of enterprises, problems of employment are becoming increasingly acute.

The creation of new jobs is one of the key problems in development, restructuring and improving the efficiency of our overall economic activity. Such efficiency is directly linked to a substantial decline in staffing levels, which has implicitly led to an increase in the number of unemployed persons and all the repercussions thereof.

Therefore it is imperative to find efficient and long-lasting solutions to resolve these two problems – the high level of unemployment and the low quality of life.

Aware of the importance of these problems, one could say that solving them is a general aim of our national economy towards which all efforts should be devoted, within a properly structured framework and with specific strategies for each particular stage. In solving this problem, all three social partners are equally important, albeit each with its own special interests which require coordination.

So it is that the Government is more interested in ensuring full employment of the labour force; trade unions mainly are interested in reducing the levels of unemployment and improving the quality of life; while employers are mostly interested in increasing productivity, product quality, and the level of competitiveness.

From this brief listing of the priorities of the three social partners we can easily note the need for cooperation among these partners if they are to reach a common objective – the use of labour resources and improvement of the quality of life.

This can only be achieved within the framework of an efficient economy. This is why it is crucial, within a practical ILO programme of action, to assign priority to the command centre of an indispensable alliance for socio-economic development, particularly in those countries in transition towards a market economy.

All the questions that are before this session are of capital importance to our confederation. On the basis of some of these problems and the ways in which they can be resolved, in Romania we are counting on the understanding, support, advice and experience of the ILO, the international organization of employers. As for us, we are ready to take a full part in implementing the main task of the ILO, namely, to achieve a social partnership in a climate of peace and prosperity for all.

Original Arabic: Mr. IDRIS (Workers' delegate, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. First of all let me join other speakers who have preceded me in congratulating the President on his election to preside over the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I am certain that through his experience and expertise he will guide this session of the International Labour Conference to a successful conclusion. I include in my congratulations the other Officers of the Conference.

I would also like to congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report on the theme of employment promotion. This is indeed a vital question at a time characterized by profound worldwide concern in the face of worsening unemployment and the resulting poverty, disease and human suffering, especially in the countries of the Third World. Unemployment is the chief challenge facing the economic and social policies of all the countries of the world, irrespective of its consequences to which the Director-General draws attention in his Report, such as growing inequality, social exclusion, non-utilization of human resources and increasing economic insecurity.

This is indeed an important issue on the international agenda, as the Director-General said in his Report, and is in keeping with the Declaration and the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen, whereby the policy-makers of all countries pledge to promote the achievement of the goal of full employment as one of their fundamental economic and social policies, which also commits the International Labour Organization, in its quality as a tripartite social organization with a wealth of experience behind it, to take decisive action in the fields of employment and social development.

Let me stress here that the Great Popular and Social Libyan Arab Jamahiriya accords considerable attention to the issues of employment promotion, job creation and support for full employment in view of achieving these objectives and of avoiding the problems mentioned in the Report, most particularly unemployment. We have encouraged the creation of small and medium-sized enterprises as well as individual and family economic activities, in particular in the fields of processing and in the craft and industrial sectors. This has resulted in the creation of new jobs, which has made it possible to establish new production cooperatives and enterprises and to voluntarily abandon public employment and marginal professions which in fact constituted hidden or partial employment and were an obstacle to the quest for development launched in the Glorious Revolution of 1 September 1966 AD.

Thanks to the popular, well-balanced legislation which we have adopted we have been able to eliminate all the factors contributing to unemployment. Our society was able to provide the necessary loans and assistance through its banking institutions. We have also introduced measures through our direct involvement in the National People's Council, the trade unions and various professional groupings which also form an important factor in the decision-making process, especially in relation to the economy. We have direct involvement in production with a view to bolstering the national economy; this has been achieved by introducing measures to overcome some of the barriers that are hindering the conversion of our economy into a high-production economy governed by social justice, equality, democracy and development. These measures include: simplification of tax procedures, better management of resource and commodity movements as well as other measures designed to reduce dependence in the area of wages and public services. This will help transform our society into a high-output economy able to guarantee freedom in our lives and worthy of all members of our society.

However, in spite of the successful policies launched in the glorious 1 September Revolution, thanks to the active participation of the masses – especially the workers – and which allowed us to put an end to exploitation, unjust and iniquitous social regulations in force prior to the AD 1978 Revolution. In spite of the enormous successes that allowed workers to take an active part in the economic life of the country, by becoming partners in production, whereas before they were but wage-earners, our country is still confronted with a number of problems, which the Director-General omitted to mention in his Report. These form obstacles to our country's progress and are accompanied by numerous factors of regression that threaten to disrupt the national economy of the peace-loving country. These factors are not attributable to defective economic policies but are rather the outcome of an imperialist and colonialist plan hatched by certain Western States against the Libyan people, who exploit their hegemony over the Security Council to obtain the adoption of iniquitous resolutions to impose a blockade on a developing country and a small people whose sole desire is progress and well-being with the other nations of the world, aspiring only to liberty and development. These unfair measures of constraint are an obstacle to the efforts of our people which launched itself into the building of the Jamahiriya society and which extended its hand to all peace-loving nations desirous of progress so as to achieve prosperity for all.

The resolution calling for a blockade of our country has had adverse effects, not only for the workers of our country but also for hundreds and thousands of foreign workers and their families who have lost their employment.

I will say nothing here of the catastrophe brought about by this conspiracy which has produced numerous victims. We have had the opportunity in previous addresses to sessions of this Conference to present the figures on the losses and damage that we have sustained.

I need only say that the African Confederation of Labour and the Arab Labour Organization, and the African Trade Union Organization took note of a Report which describes the consequences of this conspiracy. They then adopted resolutions condemning this blockade and calling on the international community to work towards putting an end to it.

It can therefore be seen that underdevelopment, disease propagation and unemployment in numerous countries are not the result of governmental factors or poor national policies – rather they are attributable to an imperialist conspiracy aimed at extending the hegemony of certain countries intended to rob small States of their resources and to turn these countries into experimental sites for testing arms of destruction of all sorts.

Our population is limited in size, but has faith and considerable stamina and determination to stand up to the forces of evil in full confidence of its final victory to build its free and felicitous society. Our nation knows that the tyranny cannot last and that only the values of justice and peace contained in the "Green booklet" of human rights will prevail.

We know that all peace-loving peoples will support us in this endeavour. We shall under no circumstances stray from our principle of struggle for liberation, and we renew our statement of support for the Palestinian people until final victory is achieved and Palestine is fully liberated.

Original French: Mr. VERONESE (Workers' delegate, France) – We fully agree with the idea of full employment adopted by the heads of state and all the participants in the Copenhagen World Summit for Social Development.

Is this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference going to be an immediate step forward towards achieving major progress for everyone, everywhere?

We can hear, all too well, all the moving pleas being made, as economies, trade and finance are globalized, for workers to join in a destructive race for competition. But what is it all about? In actual fact, large multinational firms are competing to conquer markets. They are in the throes of a relentless war.

The demand for capital yield, and world competition for capital investment, has led to speculative monetary policies which work against employment. They also have led to new kinds of exploitation of working men and women and for all of us, to more pressure on wage levels and collective guarantees of public and social spending.

In reality, the world is sick. There is a crisis of economic and social efficiency produced by a system which has seen profound contradictions.

It has long been clear that we cannot solve the world's problems for the benefit of the workers and the people by simply adopting mere palliatives, and above all, by making a mindless headlong rush into deregulation and generalized flexibility.

The Director-General says in his Report that all countries have tremendous human wealth. How can we do anything but agree, and devote the necessary means to ensuring that the ILO's Budget and Programme are renewed?

While the industrial revolution continues, we now see emerging a revolution of information technology which is responsible for very real upheavals in science, work and trade. This new reality whose implications for future generations we are only just beginning to see, requires unprecedented creativity in terms of democracy, transparency and the ability of workers and their trade unions to monitor what is going on and to intervene.

How then can we continue to tolerate a situation in which the introduction of new technologies inevitably leads to a loss of posts, debases the quality of jobs and makes unemployment and precarious work situations unavoidable?

In fact, this situation is the result of a policy whereby individuals are sacrificed for the sake of productivity and profit gains. It is a policy which refuses to place the social dimension and human development at the centre of its concern.

Yet it is from their very inception, when they are devised and first considered for use in production, that these policies must deal with social matters, so that these technologies may be used in such a way that the conditions of workers can improve. We must also address full employment on a basis of solidarity, namely by increasing the purchasing power of workers and reducing working time, without loss of salary.

The whole issue of multinational enterprises must be looked at again. While the World Employment Report stresses the positive side of the injection of capital and the subsequent creation of jobs, it also provides serious criticism of capitalist strategies and policies which do not necessarily bring any lasting benefits for the development of the countries concerned. In fact things are much worse. Financial flows are selective, according to rates of return. They sometimes bring with them relocation, which eliminates jobs. Multinational companies concentrate in free trade zones, where workers lack trade union rights and social services, and are severely exploited. Not only do these enterprises not satisfy internal markets, but the countries where they set up got into debt to accommodate them.

Workers and their trade unions should be able to meet and to discuss matters, making use of their legal rights and means to support their own proposals and initiatives. Why should they not have prerogatives, just as the managers of multinationals do?

At this stage of the globalization of the economy, when it is necessary to set up new relations between peoples, we believe, contrary to those who advocate that the ILO should cut back or even abandon its standard-setting activities that, on the contrary, it should intensify them and introduce more effective means of operationalizing and monitoring international standards, conventions and recommendations with increased powers of intervention.

If we truly want a "High Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment" to be implemented as part of the Copenhagen follow-up, then the ILO, led by the Workers, must fight to eliminate the developing country debt and pursue a thorough and speedy reform of the international financial institutions so as to redirect their policies toward the objective of full employment and social development.

In this connection, would it not be a good idea to look again at the whole issue of the informal sector where increasingly entire professions, and even privatized public services are to be found?

Everybody knows, in fact, that the informal sector is in fact a highly structured environment where slave labour and child labour are to be found side by side with mafia-style rule, and where, in the absence of any state authority, the individual can count only on him or herself to survive. That is why employment must be governed by standards which impose respect for the dignity of men and women and which ensure that the rights and collective safeguards of all workers are protected in the name of social justice and the improvement of the lot of the workers.

This implies working for the ratification and especially for the universal implementation of fundamental social rights. More than ever what is needed is a single instrument which can be used as an effective sanction throughout the whole assembly chain and arrive at the end user without being covered in the misery of the workers.

The time has come to increase pressure to incorporate so-called informal labour into the documented sector.

Is it too much to believe that our world has the potential to enable our societies to live in peace, cooperation and progress? As trade unionists, in any case, we are fully committed to that belief.

A civilized society cannot let the law of the jungle prevail. The ILO's raison d'être in a creative effort of all its constituent parts and in awareness of all the contradictory interests within it, is to strive for a new type of development in order to produce appropriate responses to the tremendous needs of humanity.

Original French: Mr. SUY (Secretary of State for Social Affairs, Labour and War Veterans, Cambodia) – It is an honour for me to address this international gathering which brings together representatives of countries from all over the world.

First of all and on behalf of the Royal Government of Cambodia, I would like to express my sincere thanks to the International Labour Office for inviting my country to attend this important gathering.

On behalf of the Cambodian delegation and on my own behalf, I would like to express my sincere congratulations to the President on his unanimous election to chair this august gathering. We believe that thanks to his experience and clear-sightedness, this Conference will produce results which will help improve the living conditions of the working peoples of the world. Moreover we trust that under his able leadership we will succeed in adopting new approaches for the Organization, which will be in step with the changing world.

In this regard I would like to congratulate the Chairman of the Governing Body and the Director-General of the ILO for their Report. I join with other speakers who have welcomed the wisdom of the Director-General who has put forward timely proposals for future action programmes. He should also be praised for his objective assessment of the Organization's present activities and programmes and his suggestions concerning the adjustments needed to keep pace with the changing world. We would also like to express our support for the appeal he has made to the international community to re-state its belief in social justice as a fundamental value and to defend its cause. He has stated his confidence in active tripartism as a driving force and his determination to adjust the Organization and its Secretariat to the tasks before them.

The world has witnessed the unceasing efforts of the Organization to promote economic and social progress throughout its existence, which have been based on its noble ideals and firm principles.

The International Labour Organization, as a specialized agency of the United Nations, is taking on its responsibility to promote the economic and social progress of all peoples.

In this context the Director-General mentioned in his Report, Promoting employment, that encouraging full employment for all nations of the world was considered in the past to be one of the main tasks incumbent upon the ILO.

The Kingdom of Cambodia, as other member States, has cooperated actively with the ILO in the implementation of national programmes and taken part in regional activities to do away with unemployment and make optimum use of human resources.

Access to fair and remunerated employment should be available to all – and this is why we support any new initiative by the Organization to reactivate the promotion of employment.

The nations of the world are devoting their attention and energy today to the development of economic and social progress.

The Kingdom of Cambodia is at the stage of nation-building. The age of economic and social development is once again upon us. An investment code has been promulgated, which encourages foreign investment in our territory by providing incentives such as: a guarantee against nationalization; the freedom to fix prices for manufacturing goods; and the possibility of re-exporting capital and profits through the National Bank of Cambodia.

This code immediately produced good results. During the first three quarters of 1994, after it had been adopted, investment projects totalling almost US$2 billion were recorded.

Our rapid industrialization has, by the way, been made possible because of the confidence of foreign and national investors in these new institutions.

These spectacular results are only what was expected by the Royal Government and are intended to benefit the nation as a whole. Tens of thousands of jobs will continue to be created; towns and villages will be better equipped. Our village dwellers see – and will continue to see – that the rural areas are better developed.

We trust that 1995 will bring us even more pledges for foreign economic investment, allowing us to resolve the employment problems encountered especially by young graduates from the schools and universities, demobilized military personnel and widows of men killed on the battlefield.

This development will make it possible to resolve progressively social problems of the underprivileged strata of the population: the war victims, orphans and disabled persons.

It is necessary to point out further that this group does receive considerable support from non-governmental organizations. Functional rehabilitation centres and specialized training centres have been created with the assistance of these associations from various industrialized countries.

As complementary measures to our economic expansion, my Ministry, together with the ILO, has prepared a draft Labour Code of 390 articles which has already been brought before the Council of Ministers and then before Parliament.

Together with this Labour Code, and also in order to attract foreign skilled technicians to manage our companies, my Department, together with the French Government, has drawn up a draft Social Security Code which envisages insurance against the three primary social risks, namely old age, occupational injury and family benefits.

A Directorate of Social Security has been formed in my Ministry and is in charge of leading this project.

Training programmes for officers in the Labour Administration have been taken on by the French Ministry of Labour. Fifteen civil servants are receiving instruction under this agreement to “train the trainers”.

After receiving initial instruction at the theoretical level, some of these will continue with practical attachments in France.

Furthermore there are plans to have a similar training scheme for officers in social protection, a project which is at an advanced stage of preparation.

Finally, I would like to thank the President for the good organization of this session, which is enabling us to conduct a very useful exchange of views with various delegations, and I can assure you of our full cooperation in order to ensure the success of this session and also to the implementation of the results it will have achieved.

Mr. GAROËB (Minister of Labour and Human Resources Development, Namibia) – If I might start on a lighter note, I would like to believe the biblical precept that the last shall be first. Hopefully, that will be so one day.

Having said that, first of all, allow me to join previous speakers in congratulating the President and other Officers on their election to their respective posts. I might not know the President personally, I know the President knows a lot here, and the description of the qualities with which he is endowed and his capacity for work tells me only one thing, that this Conference under the guidance of the President will be a resounding success. I have no doubt about that.

I wish to express my sincere appreciation for being afforded this splendid opportunity to deliver my first address to this august gathering as the second Minister of Labour and Human Resources Development in the Republic of Namibia since Independence. If in the process I make mistakes I shall crave your indulgence, as I am a novice in this exercise and might be touching troubled waters.

The Namibian Government is seriously committed to the improvement of the welfare of all its citizens, more especially the workers who are the creators of wealth and who in most cases are living below the poverty line. I am told that in 1992 the poverty line in terms of food, say meat, was defined, for the poor, at 27 kg per annum. This is in 1992. But in 1994 in fact the poor needed, to survive, 64 kg per year. In Namibia I do not know whether this is the precise position as I am standing here because the poverty that I see is so abject as to defy any description. The tragedy in Namibia is that wealth and poverty are drawn in colour as a consequence of our colonial past. We have a situation where invariably if you are white you are rich and if you are black you are necessarily poor. It is against this background that the Government's main preoccupation has been and continues to be to improve the living and working conditions of our workers.

The Government has therefore formulated development objectives aimed at reversing the horrible working and living conditions of our people, in particular farm and domestic workers, which aims at reducing unemployment, promoting employment opportunities in both the formal and informal sectors of our economy, reducing income disparities, and alleviating poverty especially amongst the disadvantaged groups, and providing basic social services.

In this regard, the first major step taken by the Government of Namibia in labour and industrial relations was the enactment of the Labour Act of 1992. This Act creates an institutional framework for health, human and industrial relations based on the principles of tripartism where government, employees and employers work together as equals. Even as I am speaking here, Namibia is characterized by labour tensions, tensions between employers and employees which sometimes results in physical fights, stabbing each other with knives. And what have you got? In our country, employees labour under deplorable conditions. The Labour Act therefore makes provision for the establishment of workable and participatory mechanisms of solving labour disputes which in the past were otherwise not known in our country and these are: the establishment of the impartial Office of the Labour Commissioner; the creation of the tripartite labour advisory councils; the setting up of district labour courts in certain regions of the country; the appointment of a wages commission which will look into the salary/wages structures in different sectors of the economy; and the expansion of labour offices countrywide.

In Namibia domestic and farm labourers are the most exploited and the most downtrodden category of human beings in our society. It is for that reason that recently the President of the Republic appointed a Commission of Inquiry into matters related to domestic and farm workers to look into their conditions of employment and to come up with appropriate recommendations for action to alleviate their circumstances, a task which this Ministry is supposed to implement.

As a response to the call by the Namibian workers and more especially by the women, the Government enacted the Social Security Act of 1994. Under this Act, the Government has established the Social Security Commission which would oversee the provision of maternity leave benefits, sick leave and death benefits, for all Namibian workers. In addition, social security benefits will be extended in the near future to include other funds, for example the development fund, aimed at improving the quality of life.

In line with the Government's commitment to harmonious labour relations, Namibia ratified the following three basic ILO Conventions which are intended to strengthen the principle of freedom of association: the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention (No. 144); the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention (No. 87); and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention (No. 98). I am told that there are so many ILO Conventions, and as we are only five years and a few months old I would plead the indulgence of all concerned and to assure them that the Namibian Parliament will in due course ratify all the Conventions.

Furthermore, the Government is working hard in implementing fiscal, trade and investment policies aimed at stimulating economic growth and countering the effects of the worldwide economic recession.

Africa at the moment is experiencing a period of severe economic marginalization caused by natural calamities and downward trends in our economies. In order to address this, our Government has attempted to focus on vocational training and skill empowerment as paramount, together with financial assistance to small-scale industries in the economic development of our country.

Namibia is a mining country above all. The Government seeks therefore to ensure that the minerals industry develops in a manner that provides maximum potential contribution to the national economy with due regard to the environment and the safety and health of the people who work in it. To these ends, the Government pursues the following objectives: to prevent accidents as well as harmful effects on the health of those employed and diseases arising from employment in mines; to ensure the safe operation of mines; to provide guidance in setting up administrative, legal and remedial measures; to promote the fullest consultative cooperation between government, employers' organizations and miners' organizations on a tripartite basis on the improvement of health and safety standards in mining industry; and to maintain these standards at a level that is acceptable to the international community as a whole.

The implementation of these objectives is being realized through appropriate legislation, that is, the Labour Act and the Mines Safety Regulations legislation which we are proud to state comply with all the concepts and policies of the International Labour Organization.

The Government has also brought forward legislation during the past five years to expand the country's industrial base. The country's manufacturing sector, however, remains extremely small, accounting only for about 5 per cent of gross domestic product (GDP) and some 18,000 jobs, compared to 200,000 in the informal sector.

The improvement of skills capacity of all Namibians to actively participate in economic activities at all levels is of paramount importance to us. To this are linked the improvement of business management skills, the increasing role of competition in the economy ensuring effective performance of public enterprises, supporting regional economic integration and promoting regional trade and investment.

Because of the imbalances of the colonial past, the policy of affirmative action is a necessary imperative in the development of our country. Therefore affirmative action as provided for in the Constitution of the Republic of Namibia will be implemented in three phases for a period of 24 months. It will commence in July 1995 to give effect to the constitutional provision.

I will conclude my remarks by simply thanking the ILO for all the support that has been extended to us during the days of our liberation and into our independence and to hope that the ILO will be strengthened in order to meet the obligations that have been assigned to it under the Copenhagen agreement.

On a final light note, I would observe that it is not particularly pleasant to be standing here to address empty chairs, but that no doubt is in the nature of things.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) – Thank you, sir. We all know that the empty chairs are the result of delegates being busily engaged in other committees.

(The Conference adjourned at 5.30 p.m.)

Fourteenth sitting

Wednesday, 14 June 1995, 10 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Rosales Argüello, Ms. Engelen-Kefer

SEVENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – The first item on the agenda this morning is the seventh report of the Selection Committee, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 4F. If I hear no objections, I will take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

STATEMENT OF THE PRESIDENT CONCERNING THE SPECIAL SITTING OF THE CONFERENCE

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – The delegates will recall that a Special Sitting of the Conference is to be held tomorrow to consider the appendix to the report of the Director-General on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories.

You will further recall that the list of speakers for the Special Sitting was closed on Tuesday, 13 June, 1995 at 6 p.m. so as to enable me, after consulting the Vice-Presidents, to submit to the Conference for decision, without debate, the proposal for a time-limit for speeches at the Special Sitting.

The list contains the names of 47 speakers, of whom eight are representatives of international non-governmental organizations. This number has enabled the Officers of the Conference to consider fixing the maximum length of speeches at seven minutes, it being understood that this would be a maximum, and that the average length of speeches would be five to six minutes, in order to respect the limits of the timetable already decided upon by the Conference.

An exception will be made in favour of the European Communities, whose spokesman will speak on behalf of 12 member States. An exception will also be made in favour of the Arab group, whose spokesman will be the representative of the United Arab Emirates, and for the spokesman of the Non-Aligned Movement. Since this contributes substantially to an overall reduction in the length of the debate, and since this practice is followed in other organizations, it appeared to the Officers of the Conference that as last year, it would be equitable, and in the interests of the Conference itself to increase the maximum length of these particular statements from seven to ten minutes.

Moreover, in order to ensure that the absolute deadline of 9 p.m. already fixed by the Conference is respected, the Officers of the Conference have also concluded that it should be understood that the President will periodically review the situation in the light of the number of speakers who remain on the list, and that the maximum time allotted to each speech will then be recalculated to conform to the time remaining for the speakers still on the list.

If there is no objection to these arrangements, which have to be decided without debate by the Conference in accordance with article 14, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders, I will consider them adopted.

(The arrangements are adopted.)

I would also like to inform the Conference of certain other arrangements concerning this sitting which fall within the prerogative of the President and the Officers of the Conference, but which I feel I should inform you of now in order to ensure complete clarity and to enable everyone to act accordingly.

The first concerns possible requests for the right of reply during this sitting. In order to save time, this right of reply will be granted at the end of the sitting, in a global, but not in a cumulative manner. This means an absolute limit of two minutes which was decided on in a general manner at the beginning of the Conference for the exercise of the right of reply. It will not be multiplied by the number of statements to which the speaker requesting this right wishes to respond, it being understood that the President may, if time permits, allow this limit to be somewhat exceeded if the reply concerns a large number of statements.

The second matter concerns non-governmental organizations, of which, as I have already mentioned, eight have registered for this sitting, but which may in principle only speak with the authorization of all the Officers of the Conference. My colleagues and I have concluded that they will only be authorized to speak at the end of the sitting, in the order in which they are registered, and only if their interventions do not result in the Special Sitting continuing beyond 9 p.m.

May I in conclusion emphasize that these arrangements have been decided upon by the Officers of the Conference in the interests of consistency and objectivity and of respecting the legitimate interests of all the parties concerned, with whom, moreover, there have been contacts. They are entirely in accordance with the spirit of consensus without which this Special Sitting could not take place. They should contribute, once again, to the success of an undertaking of whose importance everyone is aware.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We will now continue our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. ROBINSON (Employers' delegate, Jamaica) – I begin, first of all, by congratulating President Rosales Argüello and the other elected Officers of the Conference and wish for them all success in the carrying out their duties.

I bring greetings from the Employers of Jamaica and other employers' organizations within the Caribbean community. As a group, we continue to enjoy a very positive partnership relationship with the ILO in the pursuit of our common vision of a peaceful, productive and just world. We are particularly pleased at the admission of St. Vincent and the Grenadines to the Organization. We join in welcoming them and wish for them a long and beneficial period of membership.

The selection of employment promotion as a theme for this year's Report and discussion is very timely. Last year's Report also highlighted the problem of unemployment and underlined the need for the ILO to focus its strategic interventions on issues of employment and job creation. This year's Report therefore is a welcome elaboration of one of the key themes of last year's Report, Defending values, promoting change, which we so vigorously debated during the last session.

The Report prepared for this year's discussion is as usual comprehensive, thorough and most importantly, thought-provoking.

We concur with the assertion in the Report that a high and stable rate of productive job creation is the foundation for any system of equitable social and economic development.

We applaud the Report for recognizing that it is time to focus more of the energy and resources of the ILO on employment-related issues.

A Conference such as this which brings together some of the most fertile and creative minds in the arena of work, should rightly devote a greater proportion of its time to the search for approaches to improve opportunities for people to be gainfully employed. The principles enshrined in the Declaration of Philadelphia are a reminder that the issues of employment and the improvement of standards of living were very much in the forefront of the minds of those whose vision shaped this Organization.

The main tragedy of unemployment and underemployment is the lost opportunity for human development. Unemployment depletes the individual's self-esteem and sense of worth. A society in which a vast number of persons of able mind and body who are not engaged in productive endeavours is a society which will ultimately lose its ability to sustain and renew itself.

As our contribution to this debate, we would like to share with this assembly some views on the strategies which should be pursued at the enterprise, the national and international levels to enhance the climate for employment promotion.

I begin first at the enterprise level. The notion of the workforce as a productive asset needs to gain greater currency. As an asset the workforce should be invested in, nurtured and allowed to grow. In an ever-changing world, the only renewable and sustainable resource is the energy, intelligence and drive of our workforce. We should therefore invest more and more resources in the area of enterprise labour training for the improvement of skills, competencies, attitudes and knowledge. This will put the enterprise in a position to respond promptly and creatively to the forces of change coming from either within or outside the economy. It will also enable the enterprise to avoid or minimize the need for employment contraction and widen the pool of employable workers.

At the enterprise level more effective leadership is required to re-design work systems in ways which will enable the individual employee to make value-added contributions to the development of the enterprise. An enterprise sometimes fails because insufficient use has been made of the knowledge and expertise existing within the workforce.

At the national level we need policy interventions to foster a greater social and economic climate, friendly to both internal and external investment. The legislative and bureaucratic obstacles, which in many countries confront the potential investor, must be dismantled to make it easier for ideas and resources to come together to create wealth and provide employment. We need policy interventions at the national level to develop an educated workforce. Education and training are elements of crucial importance to the process by which societies traverse the stages of underdevelopment to development. The societies which are now cited as models of development have all invested a considerable amount of resources in the training and education of their population.

Governments, particularly those in developing countries, must maintain a sharp focus on education and training as the primary catalytic agents in the development process.

In the emerging new world order, this education and training should be strongly biased towards technological literacy. The comparative advantage which accrues to those countries where the investment in technological education has been substantial is well documented. The Report cites the case of India which, through strategic investment in technological education, has emerged as a world power in the area of computer development software. Developing economies need to bench-mark this approach and consider applying similar concepts to their thinking about economic development.

In little over two decades we have moved from being an industrial world to an information world. Today's world is being increasingly shaped by telecommunications and computer technology. These two influences are expected to drive the world economy in the same way that manufacturing drove the industrial economy of the past.

The information society is one where there is an abundance of opportunities for workers who are well educated and technologically prepared.

One writer has observed that the percentage of manual labourers engaged in producing manufactured goods is heading in the direction of zero. The world in which vast armies of manual workers represented the majority of the workforce is fast disappearing. In its place will be an equally vast army of workers who will be working with intelligent systems and whose job revolves around the management and manipulation of information.

Economies which fail to heed this paradigm shift and do not take immediate corrective action will continue to experience an erosion of the economic base needed to support the gainful employment of their workforce.

Policy interventions at the national level are needed to develop and maintain the physical infrastructure to enable investments which will in turn expand the possibilities for employment creation. Investors will only be attracted to environments which are free of impediments and hassles as regards high productivity.

Policy intervention at the national level is also required to encourage domestic savings. Investments and incentives which result in people saving a higher proportion of their earnings will ultimately provide more resources internally for investment and job creation.

At a national level we also need policy intervention to eliminate labour market impediments which discourage the expansion of the labour force. In this respect governments, including that of my country, which have undertaken labour market reform projects, are to be commended and encouraged. The principle of deregulation, which is a new tenet of economic organization, must also find expression in the way in which we manage the labour market. With the emergence of a more educated workforce there should be a lessening of the need for government involvement as a regulatory player in the labour market.

At the international level intervention should be pursued to encourage the removal of barriers which prevent or inhibit the free-flow of labour between areas of shortage and areas of surplus.

If we accept the notion that the world is now a global village then we should be able to embrace the concept that the residents of this village should have greater freedom to seek out employment wherever it exists.

Another vital enabler of the "employment promotion" process is the availability of access to information regarding the demand and supply for labour.

The ILO is ideally positioned to provide leadership and technical expertise for the installation of systems of information exchange at both the national and international levels.

Employment promotion must be tackled from various angles. We should not be daunted or overwhelmed by the apparent magnitude of the problem. By carefully selecting the appropriate strategies and applying them in a sustained way, we can go far in achieving the goal of employment for all.

I do not wish to conclude this intervention without taking account of the storm clouds currently gathering over the Organization as a result of uncertainties about financial issues. The mind set we bring to bear on this issue might very well be the key to determining our future.

Viewed as an opportunity instead of a crisis, this might be the wake-up call for the ILO to create revolutionary changes for which many have called in the past.

Perhaps the time has come for us to wipe the slate clean and go back to the basics and ask certain fundamental questions which could result in the reinvention of a different and more cost effective and affordable ILO.

What is certain is that this is not the time for tinkering or business as usual but rather a time for bold, imaginative and unconventional thinking.

What is necessary is the courage, determination and inspired leadership to move forward. I trust we will be equal to the cause.

Original French: Mr. LUQUINDA (Deputy Minister of Public Administration, Employment and Social Security, Angola) – On behalf of the Government of Angola and of the delegation accompanying me as well as on my own behalf, I congratulate the President and his Vice-Presidents on their election and wish them every success in their considerable task.

The Republic of Angola can but join those who have spoken favourably on the Report of the Director-General of the ILO on the theme of social policy. The topical nature of this subject certainly warrants an in-depth reflection by us all and this reflection should take into account the transformations which shook the world at the beginning of the 1990s and which forced developing countries to adapt and to face up to new realities.

As the distinguished politician and former Director-General of the ILO, Mr. David Morse, wrote: "Peace could be a purely negative and probably precarious notion if it was only said to be the absence of war. It must respond to a positive and dynamic conception signifying the existence of stable, just and harmonious conditions".

The recent meeting in Lusaka, the capital of the Republic of Zambia, between the President of Angola, His Excellency, Mr. José Eduardo dos Santos, and the leader of UNITA, Dr. Jonas Savimbi, has given new hopes to the Angolan people for the peace it craves.

With this step, we expect to begin a new era of peace for the Angolan people. The groundwork has therefore been laid for the beginning of the process of mine clearance which will allow for the free circulation of persons and goods throughout the national territory and the return of displaced persons to their homes, in order to allow them to participate, in an environment of peace, in the productive process, and, in a word, in the reconstruction of the country.

The critical situation which my country is facing and which is characterized by high levels of unemployment and inflation, a sharp drop in agricultural and industrial output and, in addition, a number of social problems, warrants the special attention of my Government. The economic and social programme approved for the two-year period 1995-96 has presented guidelines for the alleviation of these problems. This programme sets out many of the actions recommended by the World Summit for Social Development which was recently held in Copenhagen.

The measures aimed at reducing unemployment and considerably increasing productive employment should be highlighted. Emphasis should be placed on the protection of the most vulnerable groups of society, in particular, of the children who are victims of war, demobilized soldiers and displaced persons, and also on the problems of women and of programmes relating to schooling and health.

In order to achieve these tasks we have counted on the valuable contribution of NGOs and of several international organizations to which we express our gratitude.

Moreover, I should like to take this opportunity to thank the ILO for the assistance it has given and continues to give my country in connection with the implementation of certain projects. I would like to consider the importance of the Portuguese language which should be an ILO working language given that several million workers use Portuguese as their official language.

The period of effective peace which my country is hoping for will require considerable expenditure which my country will not be able to shoulder alone. This is why I appeal from this rostrum to the international community to continue providing its precious assistance to Angola, to enable our country to heal the wounds caused by a war which has lasted for over 30 years.

Original Chinese: Mr. QISHENG LI (Workers' delegate, China) – At the outset, I wish to warmly congratulate the President on his election to the chair of this Conference. I am convinced that his able leadership will steer our Conference to a complete success.

Today when human society is at the threshold of the twenty-first century, the world we live in is still confronted with mounting unemployment. This is not only a most serious waste of resources in world economic development, but also inflicts enormous suffering and pain on the unemployed and their families, thus adversely affecting the development and stability of the international community. It is therefore timely and necessary for this Conference to focus on employment promotion, to explore the root cause of unemployment and seek solutions.

Thanks to the reform and opening-up in the past 16 years, China has for years enjoyed sustained and rapid economic growth, resulting in a cumulative figure of over 200 million newly employed in urban and rural areas, thus creating conditions for employment promotion. However, since China is a populous country with an annual labour force increase of over 10 million, the phenomenon of the labour resource supply exceeding demand will continue, and the employment situation confronting us is very grave. This is a major problem which causes the trade unions of China deep concern, and one they have worked enthusiastically to resolve. Over the years, the trade unions of China have done a great deal to promote employment and earnestly safeguard the rights and interests of the workers.

The trade unions of China have taken an active part in the formulation of employment policies, laws and regulations, as well as in the work related to employment promotion, unemployment insurance, reduction of working hours and the "re-employment project", contributing their share to the improvement of China's employment situation.

The trade unions of China have been an active driving force to urge both Governments at various levels and enterprises to adequately deal with the surplus labour force and help the unemployed to re-enter employment. At the same time, to better serve the workers, trade unions at various levels have established independently 120,000 institutions and enterprises which offer 690,000 job opportunities, as well as over 100 employment agencies which recommended about 100,000 people for new positions.

The trade unions of China have also taken an active part in the leadership and management of training organizations run by the government and enterprises. By stepping up education and training through various types of schools of their own, trade unions have contributed to improving the skills and professionalism of workers and offered service to them to ensure smooth transfer, re-employment or higher efficiency in their jobs. The trade union training courses enrol over 22 million workers every year.

The Director-General has prepared a quite substantial Report for this Conference, which has provided a basis for our discussion on this issue of universal concern to the workers of the whole world. I wish to take this opportunity to make the following observations.

First, in formulating socio-economic development strategy, the international community should give top priority to the elimination of poverty and unemployment. In the wake of the Cold War, the international situation is, in general, moving towards relaxation, and it has become the common aspiration of countries in the world to revitalize their economies. However, the grave situation of poverty and unemployment, instead of easing up, has become more acute in some countries and regions. Economic development undoubtedly constitutes the basis for eliminating poverty and unemployment. But experience has shown to us that it is impossible for economic development to automatically solve poverty and unemployment. Governments, employers and trade unions throughout the world need to work together, starting out from their national situation to set up a feasible economic development strategy and corresponding social development strategy and effective employment policies. Sustained and sound economic development is impossible without solutions to poverty and unemployment.

Second, while combating global poverty and unemployment, the international community should focus its attention on the developing countries. The mass unemployment in industrialized countries and the underemployment and poverty commonly seen in the developing countries are two problems for which the solution depends upon the all-round development of the world economy and the joint efforts of both developed and developing countries. In the world today, even if unemployment exists both in developed and developing countries, the serious unemployment in the developing countries is part and parcel of the extreme poverty, of the working people of the developing countries which directly endangers their right to subsistence.

The international community must necessarily pay great attention to this situation against the current background of economic globalization and the increasing interdependence of the world economies. The deterioration of the economies of the developing world and the plight of their workers cannot only destroy economic development but also impede the economic growth of the developed countries in the world as a whole and the reduction of global unemployment. Only when the developing countries achieve economic growth and gradually improve their employment situation can there be a reduction of global poverty and unemployment.

Third, in seeking economic development and social progress, the international community should bring into full play the world of trade unions. It has been proved by experience that a strong trade union movement plays an indispensable role in the national or even international political, economic and social fields. Likewise the active participation of trade unions is often indispensable in dealing with the currently acute worldwide unemployment problem. The international community and each country should fully involve the trade unions and listen to their opinions and requests when formulating economic and social development strategies or specific employment policies. Regrettably, however, up until now, no wide-ranging consensus has been reached on such an important issue. In some countries, the status of trade unions has been weakened and their rights restrained. We call upon governments to attach greater importance to the participation of trade unions in economic restructuring.

Fourth, the ILO should play a bigger role in promoting the elimination of global poverty and unemployment. Over the years, the ILO has made many contributions to achieving the objective of poverty and unemployment elimination enshrined in the Declaration of Philadelphia. We hold that the ILO, as the only tripartite international body, can and should plan a greater role. We hope that this would be reflected in implementing the Declaration and Programme of Action adopted at the World Summit for Social Development and, in particular, a more effective role in promoting employment. Through seminars, training courses and other events, the ILO should also provide more information and technical assistance to its tripartite members, and especially to workers' organizations in developing countries.

The achievement of full employment and maintenance of social stability constitute the basis for economic development, social progress, basic human rights and improved well-being. Trade unions in China are ready to enhance our friendly ties and sincere cooperation with our counterparts in other countries, as well as the ILO, in exerting our efforts to promote international economic development and social progress, improve world employment and safeguard the legitimate rights and interests of workers all over the world.

Ms. ANDERSEN (Minister of Labour, Denmark) – On behalf of the Danish delegation I would like to congratulate Mr. Rosales Argüello on his election to the office of President of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish him every success in this important function.

This year the Director-General's Report deals with employment and unemployment issues. Employment and unemployment problems are perhaps the most important challenge we are facing today. Denmark therefore fully supports the ILO's efforts on this subject. If the unemployment problems could be solved all social problems would also be much smaller. This also became very clear to the Heads of State at the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen earlier this year when they adopted the Declaration and the Programme of Action.

The serious national and global employment problems mean that it is not possible to achieve the objective of increased social cohesion. Constant and determined efforts to create new jobs are thus one of the most important conditions for achieving fair and equal economic and social development at the global level. The Director-General's Report this year focuses on economic imbalances which are reflected in mass unemployment and underemployment. The Report points to the enormous waste in this connection. It also points to the fact that the measures that have to be taken will be very extensive.

In the Copenhagen Declaration the combat against unemployment was seen as the most important factor for ensuring better and sustainable social development. Heads of State and Government have made a commitment to taking into account the impact on employment of their decisions. But although increased awareness and declarations of intention are important steps, they are not enough. Action is urgently needed. Employment should therefore play a central role in the formulation of future policies. Increased international trade and technological development involve major challenges to all of us.

In this connection it is very important to give a high priority to both the quantity and quality of training activities. Everybody must learn to read and write and we must guarantee a number of years of basic schooling for all, but we should also ensure advanced and continued training at all levels. This is the only way we can ensure access to the creation of quality jobs which are adapted to economic and technological development.

The highly skilled labour force will also make it possible to use modern technological know-how to ensure a safe and sound working environment. We must not create jobs at the cost of safety and health. In order to avoid the growing competition that makes some countries accept social compromises for quick profit, we need a common reference framework. This means the formulation of an international policy with global job creation as the most important goal. The ILO should play an important role in this connection. This was stressed in the Copenhagen Declaration which refers to the ILO's competence, experience and wide international contacts. The ILO has the capacity to serve two important functions, monitoring and communication. Monitoring of the development in terms of statistics and guidance, and to make sure that certain rights and minimum standards are not lost. Communication of general contacts and experiences among the countries in order to ensure constancy and continued high priority to employment considerations.

We must not forget that the ILO with its tripartite structure is well-g geared to point out solutions which are relevant for workers and employers all over the world. It will not be an easy task. It will be difficult and it will cost money. The cost will be even higher if we fail to take common action to combat unemployment as soon as possible.

The Copenhagen Declaration commits the ILO to take initiatives. Therefore, the ILO must decide upon the follow-up to the Summit as soon as possible. I firmly believe that the ILO can rise to the challenge.

The discussion on the social dimension of the liberal world trade has been going on in the ILO for almost a year now. I believe that it is important that this discussion continue in this Organization. The subject is being discussed in many other international fora and everywhere the discussion involves ILO labour standards. The Copenhagen Declaration has helped to define what we call workers' basic rights. The Declaration and the Programme of Action refer to ILO standards. In my opinion, we must concentrate our work on these standards.

It is now up to the ILO to continue the debate and to make sure that the basic ILO standards are respected by the Members. It is, however, important that the ILO is given the opportunity to help countries to solve the problems they are having when trying to live up to these standards. Technical assistance is also, in this connection, one of the key activities of the ILO.

Original Russian: Mr. STOYAN (Workers' delegate, Ukraine) – Allow me to congratulate the President on his election to chair this session of the International Labour Conference.

Finding solutions to the problems of employment has now become one of the priority objectives of economic and social policies in many countries in the world, which is only natural given the fact that increasing unemployment is not only the scourge of the international community as a whole but is also a challenge to the international economic system.

In his Report, the Director-General goes into great detail on a range of issues related to three main problems, namely trade and employment, direct foreign investment and employment, and new technologies and employment.

Not so long ago, the only employment problem Ukraine had faced was that of demand for labour exceeding supply. Developments in countries with transition economies, particularly those with accelerated reform processes have inspired confidence that economic revival on the basis of market principles is feasible. However, the fear caused by growing unemployment and the threat of losing one's job will inevitably hold back institutional reform. The implementation of these reforms has become a complex and difficult task.

The Ukrainian economy is also in deep crisis. This has led to a constant fall in levels of income and, therefore, consumption. A significant proportion of the population is now living below the poverty line.

In this difficult context, the Federation of Trade Unions of the Ukraine, which has a membership of 20 million workers, finds itself faced with the question of whether to support the reforms or not. We analysed the President of Ukraine's economic reform programme from every angle at a special trade union congress. We subsequently drafted a series of demands regarding the implementation of this reform programme which we then sent to the Government. Basically, we stated that the trade unions would only support the economic reforms if they included a strong social policy. We also decided on what tactical action we would take to get what we wanted.

Very recently, under pressure from the trade unions, the President of Ukraine, Mr. Kuchma formally submitted to Parliament a revised version of his reform programme which includes a greater social element.

However, the most alarming aspect of the current reform process remains the fact that, on the one hand, reforms are still not encouraging employers to produce and, on the other hand, they still fail to make efficient use of the existing labour pool. From 1991-94 alone, the number of persons employed in Ukraine fell by 3 million people. At the same time, hidden unemployment has spread like wildfire and many enterprises are working only two or three days a week, many workers are working shorter hours and many of them are forced to take lengthy unpaid leave. Last year, for example, over 3 million persons were on unpaid leave, which represents over 21 per cent of workers.

Today, in Ukraine each worker is maintaining two persons temporarily out of work. This is why labour is so cheap. The trade unions are insisting that this hidden unemployment be legalized and that a fully fledged state employment programme be set up to provide for the restructuring of the economy in Ukraine, and set up retraining programmes for workers to learn new skills and expand public work. If these steps are not taken and if loss-making enterprises are forced into bankruptcy then over one-fifth of the Ukrainian labour force could be out of work which, when unemployment benefit is low and short-lived, this could seriously jeopardize the economic reform process.

We have realized that trade unions cannot achieve the desired results simply by demanding that the Government improve the lot of workers, increase the cost of labour and reduce unemployment. We have thus submitted to Parliament alternative draft legislation to overcome these problems. Trade unions have this right of legislative initiative because we have ten deputies in the Ukrainian Parliament, most of whom are members of the Commission of the Ukrainian High Council on Social Policy and Labour.

Two major new Acts have been adopted at the trade unions' initiative: one defining the poverty line and another on remuneration. The latter Bill was drafted by the Federation of Trade Unions of Ukraine, taking into account the appropriate ILO Conventions and Recommendations. However, the executive branch has insisted on implementing the Act without a number of basic sections governing the definition of, mechanisms for setting ways to revise, and indexation of the minimum wage, and compensation for delayed payment of remuneration.

None the less, the trade unions are continuing to insist that the remuneration in Ukraine be carried out in a civilized manner. Otherwise the rift between hourly wages paid in Ukraine and in the industrialized countries will become insurmountable. This is why we are in favour of the introduction of certain world labour standards with the simultaneous elimination of export quotas for goods as conditions are established for international trade.

International experience has shown that establishing a value for labour which corresponds with its production potential and providing work incentives and other types of stimulus can lead to economic recovery. We thus support the idea expressed in the Report regarding the new impetus to be given to international cooperation in the application of basic labour standards. If this is done, then it is not only countries, but all the population groups of each one which will together reap the benefits. We would like the ILO to play a more active role in the standard-setting aspect of this cooperation.

One of the main problems with the restructuring of the Ukrainian economy continues to be the need for more foreign investment.

Clearly, the reform effort in each of the transition countries has its own economic momentum, and it would be wrong to expect that external assistance will make it possible to change that. Still, it can alleviate some of the economic difficulties of the reforms. That is why we would like the ILO to work more actively in providing technical and advisory assistance to Ukraine, first by stepping up the pace of current projects and then by developing new programmes and concepts for training and retraining, the prevention and avoidance of mass dismissals and the settlement of labour disputes. All of this will help in Ukraine's gradual integration into the world economy.

We hope this request will meet with the understanding and approval of the international community.

Original Spanish: Mr. SIFONTES (Government delegate, El Salvador) – On behalf of my Government and on behalf of the delegation which I have the honour of leading, may I offer the President our sincere congratulations for his well-deserved and unanimous election to lead this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. In addition, this is a real honour for the countries of Central America, particularly if you take into account the fact that this is the first time in all the years of existence of the International Labour Organization that a Central American is responsible for presiding over the Conference.

We have very carefully read the Report presented by the Director-General under the title Promoting employment, because in my country, as in many others, employment promotion is our greatest cause of concern and a major priority.

Studying this important document reminds us that poverty and unemployment are two sides of the same coin. As Montesquieu said: "A man is not poor because he owns nothing, but because he has no work."

At the beginning of his Report the Director-General says: "Anxiety over employment problems, and pessimism over the prospects for resolving them reign in many parts of the world today. Indeed the task of creating sufficient new jobs to overcome unemployment, underemployment and problems of low pay ranks as the primary challenge for economic and social policy in countries at all levels of development across the globe."

The document reminds us that, although sometimes the emphasis is placed on the "social" aspect of development and sometimes on the "economic" aspect, it would be a better idea to combine both aspects. Social and economic issues are interdependent components of the development process and the development process has to be directed at achieving progress on both.

It is not only economic indicators which allow us to draw conclusions about the level of development of the country. We also, and inevitably, have to take into account social indicators. It is not enough simply to know the level of a country's GDP, or its growth in terms of per capita income; you also have to know how the income is distributed, what share of the state budget is spent on social matters and, in addition to that, whether the country's citizens have effective rights to health, education and culture.

A serious problem in the search for development is the difficulty of rendering social and economic objectives compatible, because in general terms any, or virtually any, provision of social benefit implies prior economic decisions.

Today we continuously hear the argument that economic problems prevent social development and even cause it to slip back. Worse, it is frequently claimed that achieving and maintaining a high standard of social progress in a time of economic crisis inevitably leads to a worsening of the economic, and therefore the social, situation, and that continued provision of social benefits at a time of economic recession is a mirage, a dream to be followed by a bitter awakening sooner or later if prudent and corrective measures are not taken.

It is said, furthermore, that the health of the economy requires cut-backs in social benefits, and it is claimed, almost as an axiom, that the labour market needs to be made more flexible, which can be interpreted – and there is no lack of people prepared to do so – to mean that the scope of legal protection, embodied in labour law, should be reduced if the economic situation and, as a result, the position of the workers is not to be further exacerbated.

In El Salvador we feel that social provisions should never exceed the limits of the economy to bear the burden, and that there are no unlimited rights. Drawing a demarcation line here is what we are trying to do in our labour policy. We do not consider, however, that flexibility should in any way mean taking away existing benefits under the genuine rule of law.

As part of our policy, my country recently ratified various fundamental ILO Conventions dealing with employment. These include the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Employment Services Convention, 1948 (No. 88), the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), and the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142). Naturally these ratifications have extended and strengthened the content and scope of standards in these very important areas.

I should highlight the participation of the Labour and Social Security Ministry and of the social partners in the design and implementation of social and labour programmes directed at achieving more and better training and job creation for the workforce. For this purpose, the Ministry of Labour has, for some time now, implemented the development of a nationwide employment policy aimed at creating jobs for various categories of workers.

These policies are complemented by additional regulations of apprenticeships and vocational training, which are essential if we are to respond to the current demands of the labour market in various sectors of the economy.

In order to discharge its responsibilities effectively, the Ministry of Labour needs to have a modern structure capable of meeting current requirements. In order to bring it in line with current conditions, we are currently engaged in reorganizing the Ministry and in the drafting of new framework legislation governing it.

I would like to state clearly that much of the progress achieved owes a great deal to the assistance of the International Labour Organization, particularly the recent reforms of the Labour Code, the establishment of the Supreme Labour Council and the modernization of the Ministry of Labour.

We believe and hope that this will continue when we turn to vocational training, apprenticeship, and other institutions related to labour.

While on this subject I would like to quote from an ILO document which was published recently by the Regional Office for Latin America and the Caribbean, entitled The employment challenge in Latin America and the Caribbean.

The Report says of El Salvador that "with respect to collective labour relations the new law is a very advanced text compared to others in Latin America over the last ten years, and particularly compared to the restrictive provisions of the Labour Code which the law now revises". The document continues by pointing out, inter alia, "the extension of the right to form unions to agricultural workers and self-employed workers, a ban on the possibility of dissolution of a trade union by executive decision and the introduction of very many measures aimed at reducing the control exercised over trade unions by the Labour Ministry".

Trade unions can now be established with the minimal number of 35 workers. They no longer have to show that they represent a majority of workers in the enterprise as was the case beforehand. Another provision now gives Federations and Confederations the right to strike and collective bargaining rights, in so far as their own respective statutes allow them to do so: previously they did not enjoy such rights. The majority required for calling a strike has been reduced and the procedures to call a strike have been simplified. In addition, compulsory arbitration is only applied when the conflict affects an essential service in the strict sense of the term. On individual relations the document quoted refers in particular to "the extension of the Code to cover apprentices; the improvement in levels of compensation in cases of unjustified dismissal, the suppression of discrimination against woman workers, and improvement in the protection of pregnant women".

Furthermore, I should particularly like to refer to the San Andrés Pact which, under the title Development – the new name of peace, was signed by the political forces of my country on 31 May this year. It contains a declaration of principles and commitments and because they are relevant I would like to highlight the following among them. First, the challenge of globalization: the inclusion of the country in the process of globalization should be the priority principle of economic policy, since only through such inclusion will it be possible to achieve rates of economic growth necessary for social progress. Second, human development as a means to and an end of economic development: A fundamental commitment in this area is recognition of investment in human resources as the States' first priority for social as well as for economic reasons. Only such investment can assure maintenance and increase in levels of productivity, an improvement in social conditions and the creation of a developed society. Third, labour policy: labour policy should be directed at eradicating confrontation and encouraging the creation of an atmosphere of cooperation between employers and workers so as to achieve a continuous increase in productivity. The principle of legality should be at the basis of action taken by employers and by workers. The only way of bringing about a wage increase is through increasing productivity. Increases in productivity should be shared between capital and labour so that a growth in the country's competitiveness can be reflected in benefits for all those who are involved in the production process. This is the only sustainable foundation for a strong and thriving private sector.

Lastly, I should like to express my gratitude to the delegations of various member States of the International Labour Organization who have been participating in this meeting and I would particularly like to reiterate my congratulations to the President on the excellent way in which he is running our plenary discussions.

Mr. STEFANSSON (representative of the Nordic Council) – As a representative of the Nordic Council, which is the parliamentary body of cooperation between the parliaments and governments of the Nordic countries, I wish to congratulate the Director-General on his excellent and most comprehensive Report. I also want to congratulate President Rosales Argüello on his election and I am certain that under his guidance we will achieve the results we expect from this Conference.

As the Report vividly shows, the facts of unemployment in the world are already alarming. It is therefore appreciated that the ILO, with its expertise on labour market policies, is highlighting the matter.

The Nordic countries value highly the accomplishments of the ILO in the labour market, as they value highly the work of the United Nations in general. The results of the International Conference on Nordic Countries in the United Nations, held in Helsinki by the Nordic Council last January, bear this out. In the final document of the Conference the Nordic Council recommends that the Nordic countries continue to play an active role within the United Nations and also that the key means of alleviating poverty and achieving social integration is combating unemployment and promoting productive and freely chosen employment.

The Nordic countries also support the economic and social stabilization of the Baltic States. As demonstrated in the Report, the situation of the transition of the economies in the countries of Eastern and Central Europe is very serious. Unemployment rates are generally high all over, although they differ from one country to another. A worrisome fact is that certain groups suffer more than others from the unemployment situation in a particular region, such as ethnic minorities, women, disabled workers and young workers.

Youth unemployment is a matter which calls for special attention in all countries. In the Nordic countries, young people have been active in the labour market. With growing unemployment, the participation of young people in the labour market is reduced.

This seems to be the general tendency in many countries and calls for special measures to reduce youth unemployment. Without such measures, there is a risk of a growing number of people throughout the world with good working skills never having the opportunity to use them.

It is interesting that although economic growth has been similar in the industrialized countries for two decades, the unemployment figures vary in these countries. The three models dealing with slower growth as demonstrated in the Report are obviously not beyond doubt, both in economic and social terms.

When it comes to the Scandinavian model, it is well known that the emphasis has been placed on social welfare, given that it is a very important and fundamental factor in modern society. In that context we clearly deny the theory that a certain figure is necessary for normal economic growth.

The Nordic countries want the Scandinavian model to be maintained and we are certain that social welfare is necessary and is an important weapon in the fight against social ills.

Solving the problem of unemployment is a very difficult task. In the Report it is pointed out that greater international cooperation is needed when it comes to the challenge of restoring full employment. The World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen in March this year is a significant step forward in that direction. Increased cooperation in this field will benefit all countries of the world in the long run. In a global perspective, unemployment is not an isolated problem of regions, countries or trades. Putting social problems on a global agenda alongside political and economic issues is therefore of the utmost importance.

International cooperation can take place on many levels. Cooperation between governments and particularly the relevant ministers is necessary on both the national and international levels. Also the work of international offices and institutions such as the ILO is very important. The participation of national parliaments is also crucial to achieve the best results. It is necessary for the members of parliaments to promote employment issues both nationally and as part of the global agenda. The latter can easily be done as there are numerous organizations in which members of parliaments already cooperate internationally.

The instruments mentioned here and in the Report to provide support in the fight against unemployment allow us to hope that the image of full global employment is not far-fetched. On the contrary it is a very practical task and hopefully in due time it will cease to be an image and become a natural fact.

In conclusion I wish to express my gratitude for this opportunity to present some Nordic views on a few of the items before the Conference. I wish the ILO continued success in its important work and especially in the task of promoting employment.

Original Spanish: Mr. RAMÍREZ LEÓN (Workers' delegate, Venezuela) – Allow me first of all to join with those who have spoken before me this morning to congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents on behalf of the Workers' delegation of Venezuela on their election.

We should also like to congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for the interesting Report he has submitted for our consideration, which in fact summarizes the first of a series of reports on the world employment situation – World Employment 1995.

The subject selected by the Director-General in his Report could not be more appropriate. We all know that the promotion of full employment, which is both productive and freely elected, has been one of the historical aspirations of the workers, and today it has acquired a special significance at a time when various forms of employment which are low in quality, precarious, poorly paid and insecure are tending to spread in the world.

It is very encouraging that the ILO has taken on the defence of full employment at a time when other international organizations are attempting to present full employment as something Utopian which is impossible to achieve.

As indicated in the document of the Workers' group of the Government Body The ILO towards the 21st century: "The ILO ... must highlight the fact that full employment promotes economic growth through the demand and tax revenues it generates, and through lower social security bills. Employment promoting policies also bring benefits through training, retraining and investment in infrastructure".

However, we see the need to establish policies at international level to promote full employment. The increasing globalization of economic relations implies that national economies will become more and more interdependent; consequently, purely national policies have lost their impact.

The trade union movement in Venezuela is aware of the fact that at present national economies must be efficient to be able to compete on international markets and take on board change so that they can adjust to the process of globalization.

Nevertheless, as pointed out in the Director-General's Report, there is no panacea and the opening up of economies has to respect the specific conditions prevailing in each country. But the need to gain efficiency should not be an excuse to dispense with the rights of workers and undermine their living conditions.

The changes have to be agreed upon, politically viable, socially acceptable and adapted to national realities. We in Venezuela know, from first-hand experience, the consequences of trying to impose technical criteria – in an inflexible manner, models designed in the "laboratories" of international financial organizations.

Today there are those who claim that the rights of the workers represent a factor of rigidity and distortion of the markets and that, as such, they constitute an obstacle to employment creation. This idea, sometimes disguised under the terms of flexibility and deregulation, is an erroneous concept: indeed, the well-being and protection of workers contributes to harmonious economic development, integrating society as a whole and allowing it to generate the necessary energy to achieve development and competitiveness.

It is not by promoting jobs which are not protected and are of low quality that countries are going to be able to develop.

Recent history has shown that flexibility of the labour markets which has undermined welfare institutions and trade unions and further reduced the scope of collective bargaining has only served to increase social tension – bringing a host of low quality and unstable jobs in its wake. What is more, these jobs have negative repercussions on the environment.

In my own country, Venezuela, we have in recent years witnessed a deterioration of all the social indicators. The official unemployment figure is said to be 11 per cent. In our movement we believe that the figure is in excess of 18 per cent. The basic family shopping basket costs now four times more than the minimum statutory wage. Approximately 25 per cent of the economically active population earn their living in the informal sector and according to recent statistics, critical and relative poverty is increasing at an alarming rate. And this as stated in the Report of the Director-General, "is morally unacceptable and economically irrational".

We have to introduce changes to overcome this state of affairs which is common to the majority of the countries of our region; but these changes cannot be dictated solely on the basis of technical criteria and the profit motive. The genuine development of our society calls for much more than these parameters. The technical component has to be complemented by the political component; economic policies linked to social policies; and financial gain governed by moral attitudes.

We understand the logic behind the movements of capital and investment in the world; this unprecedented increase in world trade which is called globalization. But we deplore the speculation on capital markets which takes place on the stock exchanges of Tokyo, London and New York and which can decide the fate of whole nations; this is more of gamble than a rationally designed financial activity. We therefore agree with the Report that we should reform the international financial system.

We also denounce the transfer of production activities when this is designed to use cheap labour which exists in many areas of the world, where forced labour and even child labour are common; we also deplore the so-called economic zones, which are true concentration camps – much to the shame of humanity at the end of this twentieth century.

We refuse to accept the fact that labour is merely a commodity, devoid of any human, social or cultural dimension.

We underscore the emphasis which the Report of the Director-General attaches to social policies and the battle against poverty, underemployment and social exclusion. We also welcome the highlighting in the Report of the role of democracy, trade union freedoms and the collective rights of the workers in order to try and counter the risks of globalization; in fact, instead of ushering in a situation of well-being it often widens the gap between countries, results in poverty and loss of jobs in the North and reinforces the despair in the South.

We strongly believe that wages and living conditions should not be pawns in international trade.

We have no doubt that there are interests who wish to utilize labour standards and international trade for protectionist aims. But what is even worse is that these two factors are often linked with a view to maintaining poverty and slavery, promoting trade exchanges which only benefit the very rich.

We therefore fully support the initiative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) in its campaign to ensure that the World Trade Organization adopts a social clause, which will at least establish minimum requirements for the protection of workers guaranteeing that no item will be circulating in international trade which has been produced at the expense of human dignity or as a result of despotism or the actions of unscrupulous individuals.

It is with satisfaction that we note that the nations of the world paid tribute to the ILO at the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen because we, the trade union movement in Venezuela, consider that the ILO is the most important international forum. We see standard setting activities, its advisory role and cooperation as representing one more step towards equity and justice. In the same way as all the other workers in the world, we all look to this Organization every time our national bodies are run down or usurped. We are therefore extremely concerned when we hear of those who oppose its development and expansion.

We hope that these persons, with outdated views will soon be convinced of their error and that their dark intentions will be overcome.

The ILO today has to remain firm in fulfilling its basic role as outlined in the Constitution and in the Philadelphia Declaration of striving for social justice and the protection of the interests of the workers.

This mandate is today more important than ever before, and efforts in the fields of standard setting should be further strengthened. International labour standards are not only compatible with the creation of jobs, but they also are a guarantee of a harmonious and coherent social effort in order to achieve economic development.

We, the Workers of Venezuela, congratulate the Director-General in his decision to take up the battle against exclusion and poverty. It is with satisfaction that we have noted that the alleviation of unemployment and poverty is a priority objective in the Programme and the Budget proposals for 1996-97.

In this modest contribution on behalf of the workers of Venezuela, the ILO will have seen that the trade union movement in Venezuela is one of its staunchest allies.

(Ms. Engelen-Kefer takes the Chair.)

Original Spanish: Mr. CASSIA (Workers' delegate, Argentina) – I would like to express the sincerest congratulations of myself and my delegation to the President on his election to chair this session of the International Labour Conference. We should like to wish you and everyone else represented in this assembly success in its work.

The immediate concern facing the world at the close of the century is employment. The task is a difficult one to assess because we have the paradox that, throughout the world, even in those economies which are growing, the unemployment rate has not dropped as was hoped.

Faced with this problem, employers tell us that labour market flexibility is the magic wand to make unemployment disappear. The basic idea circulating seems to be that labour regulations have actually over-protected workers, and exaggerated standardization of conditions of work. It is also claimed that rigidity in labour regulations prevents any adjustment to current economic circumstances, and that this affects companies' and enterprises' potential to grow and create employment.

However, this pursuit of flexibility by employers and many governments tends to place the burden of adjustment – a result of the globalization of the economy, the current recession and international competition – on certain parts of the labour market such as employment, wages and social protection, or on particular working population groups such as women, young people, older workers and migrant workers: these all occur basically as a result of staff compression, wage reductions and social protection cutbacks.

Basically, increased labour market flexibility is used to make employment more precarious and to compress labour costs; however, it should be used only as a last resort, since it opens the door to unfair competition based on cheap and unqualified labour.

We can quote examples from throughout the world indicating that this increasingly high level of precarious employment – the result of new labour relations stemming from the application of more flexible practices – have not been an efficient remedy to the onward march of unemployment.

The ILO's report for the Copenhagen Summit, entitled Towards full employment: Contribution of the International Labour Organization to the Second Session of the Preparatory Committee of the World Summit on Social Development (ILO, Geneva, 1994), indicates that the sharpest increase in unemployment occurred in Europe in just a few years starting in 1979. Since then labour systems have been reformed to bring about greater labour market flexibility and reduced social protection. Despite the recovery in growth rates, unemployment has either stabilized at high levels or, as in certain areas, actually increased. In other words, there is in practice no convincing evidence of a cause-and-effect relationship between increased labour market flexibility and the reduction of unemployment.

On the contrary, employment levels are much more closely linked to economic growth rates and investment than to labour market "adjustment".

We believe increased flexibility would be valid if it were part of a collective effort to build an economy based on a re-industrialization process, with a State which would provide the regulatory framework within which solidarity, equity and participation would be the most important aspects.

We believe employment will only increase if a nation's production infrastructure and services are expanded. However, labour market adjustments cannot and should not be the unilateral responsibility of employers – since many of them would be likely to make employment more precarious – nor of the State. This should be the subject of collective bargaining exclusively. It is collective bargaining that could transform labour market adjustment into something effective, thus filling the gap left by state intervention not being used properly or being sharply cut back on. Collective bargaining will enable us to find solutions based on consensus, and because of this they will derive from participation and be better adapted to specific problems and situations.

However, measures adopted to create employment should take into account the specific features of each country, and within each country, the specific features of each sector of economic activity.

We are convinced that dialogue is the best way of bringing about the necessary changes and, with this understanding, the Argentine General Confederation of Labour, together with the State and representatives from the employers, signed a Framework Agreement for Employment, Productivity and Social Equality in July 1994. As its name indicates, this instrument provides a framework for a tripartite agreement in which each group has shouldered its share of responsibility for dealing with today's serious challenges.

Its first result has been an attempt to draw up new rules for designing labour policy in Argentina so as to free ourselves from the possibility of the State dictating standards that have not been the subject of consultation.

Given that the world economy depends as much on work and workers, as on capital movements, it is essential that workers' rights be included in a social clause linked to international trade. The Argentine General Confederation of Labour has declared itself in favour of a social dimension to the globalization processes in the world economy, through the inclusion of a social clause which could provide guidance for the World Trade Organization. We said exactly the same thing at last year's Conference.

We have given support to the international trade union organizations to which we are affiliated in emphasizing that globalization of the world economy requires a coordinated trade union strategy between countries of the North and South. The Argentine General Confederation of Labour has met with a similar stand by the Argentine Government in its statements in GATT and at the recent World Summit for Social Development.

We hope that this convergence of views will appear in other international initiatives taken by the Argentine General Confederation of Labour, including the preparation of a special MERCOSUR charter and ratification of the San Salvador protocol in the OAS. We hope, in this way, to support a standard-setting strategy in favour of trade union and labour and worker rights which, at this time of globalization, are in a more exposed position than they have ever been before.

We note with enthusiasm that the ILO has set up a working party on the social dimension of international trade liberalization. We hope that it will progress towards the drafting of a social clause, and we hope that the expectations of governments and the social partners represented in this Organization can be met as a result of its work.

In conclusion, it is our hope and our wish that this Conference will be able to provide renewed impetus so that workers throughout the world can enjoy social justice in a framework of real and lasting peace.

Ms. ROLDAN-CONFESOR (Secretary of Labor and Employment, Philippines) – On behalf of the Philippine delegation and on my own behalf I join those who have come before me in congratulating the President and his Officers on their election to this session of the International Labour Conference.

Once again we must commend the Director-General for an incisive Report that outlines the challenges we need to face individually and collectively in restoring employment in many parts of the world.

The current employment situation, if not corrected, entails an enormous waste of resources and, as the Director-General correctly points out, an unacceptable level of human suffering. The growing inequality between and within nations and between and within social groups within a nation, is both morally unacceptable and economically irrational.

The Director-General knows that per capita output has been consistently increasing, with the opportunities presented by globalization and more robust trade. But weighed on the scales of social justice and development, growth in global output has not put an end to inequity. Even with and perhaps because of globalization, solutions to the classical problems of unemployment and poverty, underemployment and social exclusion have become more elusive than ever.

This discussion on the promotion of full employment takes place at a most significant period in the life of this 50-year-old Organization. The World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen in March this year has conferred upon the ILO a special role in promoting full employment and social development today.

In this respect, the ILO's role as an international labour and employment ministry in a global cabinet providing for facilitative interaction with other international organizations becomes increasingly relevant, if not very urgent.

At the same time, member countries look upon this Organization as a source of policy direction and technical assistance in shaping a comprehensive global employment strategy at both international and national levels and in monitoring global trends affecting the global employment situation.

Towards this end, ILO action in the following areas must be strengthened or expanded: active partnership policy in the formulation and implementation of technical cooperation; informal meetings and dialogue among social as well as economic financial institutions, especially at the level of decision makers, those whose policy directions will shape the very environment in which the promotion of full employment can be further challenged or enhanced; research and the utilization of such research to build upon national as well as international capabilities for addressing the very ills spawned by the globalization and thoughtlessness of capital inherent in the rights of transnationalism and the introduction of new technology; internal reforms and retooling of this Office itself to enhance its own field operations and to develop its own authority in international economic relations.

Today, more than ever, the Organization is being called upon to do more. And that task cannot be accomplished without the corresponding resources. As I speak today, the Finance Committee of Government Representatives still has to endorse the budget for the 1996-97 biennium which was earlier passed by the Governing Body. Some member States have manifested their inability to approve this budget at the levels proposed on the basis of their respective current national situations. In this regard, our colleagues representing those member States must be appreciated for their candour and deliberate efforts to be transparent. Furthermore, we firmly believe in their continued firm commitment to the ideals of this Organization. They have done what they could, what they should. However, it is equally incumbent on us other member States to likewise do what we can, and what we should. And as our Organization evolves into the next century we must reiterate our firm resolve that we will not allow essentially transient circumstances to impede us in the pursuit of our permanent roles.

As a developing economy, the Philippines considers that development must be pursued in a democratic context, and in an atmosphere of trust and equality among the social partners.

Economic growth and the creation of employment must be accompanied by a social reform agenda, designed to raise incomes and standards of living, improve working conditions and the quality of jobs, mainstream the most marginalized and the most vulnerable, and provide adequate social and welfare protection for those who may be adversely affected by structural adjustment.

We note with concern, however, that innovation and technology-driven workplaces have given rise to increasing flexibilization of work. According to some, flexibilization leads to more employment creation and is the only way for firms to survive and compete in this economy. It is also suggested that the only way for economies to grow under the new global order is to sacrifice employment security. To us these views tend to abstract employment creation from the individual person. As a result they nullify any agenda directed at attaining social justice. More specifically, we have not seen how flexibilization has contributed to the reduction of unemployment and underemployment. Flexibilization in effect even broadens the base of social exclusion among workers, a result incompatible with social development.

The relevance of standard setting in an environment committed to liberalization and deregulation cannot be overemphasized. Globalization has made it imperative for governments, particularly of developing countries, to be assisted in, instead of being penalized for, implementing such standards.

The present economic situation has spawned the increasing phenomenon of international labour migration. The Philippines, like many developing economies, is a labour-sending country. However, it is not the policy of our Government to promote full employment through the export of labour. We have long recognized that overseas employment is no longer simply a strategy for promoting employment but is also a phenomenon like globalization. There will always be labour market gaps which can only be filled by manpower from other countries. Given this transformation, the world's manpower resources must be seen and nurtured as an internationally shared pool of resources moving in accordance with the dictates of the free market. The protection of such resources should be a fertile ground for cooperation among governments and the social partners.

During the last two years my country has turned into a classic example of how development and democracy can in fact reinforce one another. In 1992 when President Fidel V. Ramos took over, GNP growth stood at less than 1 per cent. The unemployment rate was 10.7 per cent and underemployment was at 22.1 per cent. The crippling power crisis had arrested industrial growth and inflation stood at 18.6 per cent.

Today the unemployment rate has gone down to about 8 per cent and underemployment has plunged to 18.6 per cent, the lowest since 1987. The biggest winner among the sectors was manufacturing, where jobs grew by as much as 24 per cent. We have not won these gains through sheer good luck. As working men like to say, the fight for jobs and growth is won only by good, old-fashioned hard work.

We have introduced major structural reforms in our economy, sometimes even dragging monopolists and cartelists down in the process. We have prevailed upon all sectors to support a common economic policy and we are finally experiencing what it is like to do business on a level playing field.

Through our manpower development programme, we are putting in place a solid social infrastructure for education and training to support our development growth. Today our prospects are better because we have shown our political will for change and reform. We know now that we can sustain growth, create new jobs for our unemployed and new labour entrants, and attract foreign investments and trade at the same time. We are now also undertaking a review of our Labour Code, first promulgated 20 years ago. As a complement to our manpower development strategy, we must evolve new models to govern employer-employee relations and balance social protection, employment generation, collective rights and the imperative of sustained development.

The major challenge for the Philippines in the fast growing Asia-Pacific region in the remainder of this century is to highlight human resources development in engineering, and sustaining development itself. The traditional approach of directing human resource planning principally towards employment generation is not enough, because it tends to emphasize low-cost or cheap labour. The competitive edge of the economy is neither commodities nor low-wage labour but skills, entrepreneurship and research.

The President has recently ordered the launching of a multi-agency effort to study and recommend a comprehensive employment strategy that seeks to promote employment in the country in the next decade in an economic environment not exactly friendly to its achievement. And this is where the ILO, given its expertise and mandate, is an active partner of my country. Together with our social partners, such a strategy should provide us not only with the answers but also the commitment of the main actors themselves to ensuring the success of such a strategy. An employment summit, in addition to a series of dialogues, will ensure the support for such a strategy in the coming months.

Formulating such a strategy is now vital to poverty alleviation, improving labour efficiency and, in the final analysis, to making our country more competitive in the global economy.

Our strategies cannot be identical, even in my region which is considered the fastest growing region in the world, because we are at different stages of development. The similarity will lie in the fact that we will see people as our cornerstone for progress.

Original French: Mr. LOUNIS KHODJA (Employers' delegate, Algeria) – Allow me at the outset and on behalf of the Algerian employers to warmly greet all the participants at this session of the Conference. I would also like to congratulate Mr. Rosales Argüello on his brilliant election to the office of President of this 82nd Session, and to greet him as a friend of long-standing.

I would also like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, for his remarkable work at the head of this Organization and for the thorough and instructive Report that is dedicated this year to the subject of Promoting employment.

The decision to consider this subject and undertake a renewed debate on this theme bears witness to the will and tenacity that the ILO has always shown to proceed with a democratic evaluation of how its programmes are applied in practice. Our Organization is constantly concerned with a qualitative adaptation of its work to the far-reaching changes which affect international life in all fields.

The Report of the Director-General of the ILO reflects this concern to adapt to the accelerated globalization of the economy, which gives rise both to high hopes and to some very distressing tendencies.

Despite the serious problems which stand in the way of employment promotion policies and programmes, the Director-General's Report shuns pessimism, and instead suggests that we explore new paths so as to tackle, more collectively and with great ter solidarity, the problems of economic and social development.

He is justified in calling, and I quote, for "greater international cooperation ... to bring current social problems and anxieties to the fore of the global agenda".

Like other developing countries and other countries in transition to a market economy, Algeria is facing painful problems in reviving growth and creating productive employment in the context of a multi-faceted crisis.

This crisis is to a large extent the result of a bad choice. The system for too long wasted human and material resources, deliberately blocked any initiative and creativity and showed a complete lack of foresight with respect to the globalization of the economy, which has been stepped up by the disintegration of countries which previously shared a planned and administered economy.

The economic and social difficulties which face Algeria, as it seeks to begin a lasting economic recovery and to enter the third millennium as a modern and democratic country with universal and republican values, are not insurmountable, though they are indeed serious.

Indeed, the country has considerable assets as regards material and human resources. These must be used in a new way, thanks to the beginning of a new cooperation policy which appears to be promising, particularly in the fields of hydrocarbons, petrochemicals, building and construction materials.

With initial support from the international community, Algeria is now implementing a structural adjustment programme along with a programme of economic stabilization.

While it is still quite early to assess the results, we have noted some progress in the implementation of institutional, economic and social reforms.

Algeria is committed to respect its commitments to the IMF and the World Bank, and is therefore taking the necessary monetary, budgetary and structural measures to accelerate the transition to a market economy.

I would like to emphasize that the issuing of currency is strictly controlled, and that the allocation of resources to public enterprises is now governed by highly selective criteria, based on performance contracts. In the final analysis, these determine the framework and the conditions for industrial restructuring operations. The break-up of monopolies is continuing apace, reflecting a definite will to do away with obstructionism and discrimination in the private sector.

At the same time, a social safety network has been set up, with unemployment, insurance and early retirement programmes.

The efforts made to promote the market economy have led to profound structural changes which reflect a concern to eliminate imbalances besetting the Algerian economy and also the will to make a sharp break with the previous economic model. Within this framework, the private Algerian employers have insistently reiterated their request for a concrete strategy to promote the private sector. This could at the outset consist of measures to step up the pace of removing legal and administrative obstacles to the development of the private sector.

We have also experienced stagnation in the productive sectors, with the exception of hydrocarbons, along with rapid growth of parasitic speculative activities and an increase in unemployment and exclusion which hits youth and women the hardest. Despite the rescheduling of its debt, Algeria is suffering from the major constraints of a foreign debt burden, which has blocked investment.

The result is a well-accepted liberalization policy which meets the requirements of the structural adjustment programme. Unfortunately, this may disregard the specific economic and sociological traits of our country, such as the predominance of the public sector, the high level of social protection, the egalitarian approach and the extremely young age of the population. It may also revive fears of the cost of the structural adjustment which would be primarily borne by workers and the vulnerable categories of the population.

To overcome the situation the social partners have undertaken a permanent dialogue and agree that there is a need to sign a social pact to usher in a democratic transition to a market economy.

The rescheduling of the debt, together with a very demanding structural programme, does not solve the crucial problems of economic growth and job creation. They can only be addressed by Algeria's clearly expressed will to take advantage of opportunities and to live up to the challenges of the globalization of the world economy.

This globalization is not a panacea, and the design and implementation of the structural adjustment programme is not yet a reliable instrument with which to ensure a lasting social and economic recovery.

Experience has shown that it is difficult to meet the multiple challenges of development as long as the selfishness of the rich and powerful prevails, and as long as the ideas of unbridled monetaristic laissez-faire capitalism hold sway, though it has become amply clear that this theory has its limits.

The world order which is being established with us as onlookers is fraught with the risk of serious distortions which may lead to incalculable consequences for humanity as a whole. What is needed is a qualitative transformation to promote renewed international cooperation. This international cooperation should continue in the spirit of the exemplary action of the ILO and the Copenhagen World Summit for Social Development.

In a world marked by the interdependence of economies, the promotion of employment is to a large extent the responsibility of the international community.

We must thus conduct more forcefully, directly and with greater determination the future work of the ILO. This action requires an evaluation of the most important decisions adopted by the Organization in the field of employment and development.

Today, and in accordance with the provisions of the resolution concerning environment, development, employment and the role of the ILO which was adopted at the 77th Session of the Conference in 1990, the Organization must act to: "encourage world financial institutions to review their policies and programmes with a view to stimulating the growth of employment within the general framework of sustainable development".

It must also contribute, with the competence with which it is unanimously credited, to the implementation of the Declaration and the Programme of Action adopted by the World Summit for Social Development.

We encourage the Director-General to do all he can to give concrete shape to the ideas and the actions that he has so relevantly described in the Report submitted to the present session of the Conference.

To conclude, I would like to express on behalf of Algerian employers our feeling of legitimate pride that we belong to the ILO, this institution of the United Nations family with a well-established ethical standing, noble ideals and objectives which are acknowledged by all of the world of work.

Original Spanish: Mr. GRINAN (Minister for Labour and Social Security, Spain) – I would like to express my congratulations to the President on his election to chair this session and I am particularly happy to congratulate him because I am speaking to a representative of a country, Nicaragua, which has so many ties with Spain.

As usual the Report of the Director-General has selected with great perspicacity the theme of this Conference. Employment is at the centre of social debate at the present moment and I believe that it will be at the centre of political debate in the coming years.

The Report has taken the correct focus since it starts with a very complete analysis of the employment situation in the world and it makes certain suggestions and puts forward alternatives both for the present and immediate future. This is done on the basis of criteria which were contained in the report entitled World Employment 1995 which was published by the International Labour Office in February of this year and in the Director-General's Report of last year.

The report approaches questions such as the globalization of the economy and more generally speaking the major changes which have been taking place in the economic and technical context of work, in a very appropriate manner, particularly as regards the likely effects on employment.

Here it seems to me to be important, to insist on two ideas. The first, which is perfectly described in the Report, is the question of the necessity to recognize the diversity of situations and effects of globalization, in developing countries, countries with economies in transition and industrialized countries.

The problems of employment manifest themselves in different ways in these different stages, and that is why measures taken cannot be identical everywhere although, without a doubt, employment has to be seen as a necessary condition for the full exercise of civil rights.

The second idea expressed in the Report of 1994, which continues to be the subject of lively debate, is the idea of ensuring that international trade takes on social dimension. That is why I would like to come back to an idea which I expressed in my speech last year – that the globalization of the economy, should not only be used as a positive element in promoting employment, but should also be seen as an opportunity to generalize basic social rights.

This statement has to be accompanied by another which I also made last year at this rostrum. The social dimension of world trade has to emerge taking into account the diversity of patterns of development, avoiding the temptation to skip stages of growth by exporting the costs ruling in the most powerful economies to those still in the initial stages of industrialization and technological development.

That is why it is absolutely essential to increase international cooperation as a complement to those measures aiming at adding social dimension to international trade. This leads us once again to highlight the importance of an Organization such as the ILO which can act in the three fundamental areas in order to obtain better results in this new economic scenario. First is the global analysis of the economy and employment; the second is that of establishing and monitoring basic social rights, and the third is international cooperation.

If I am allowed, I should like to give one example, a positive example, of what I am saying, this programme, and that is the ILO International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour, has been established by combining the monitoring of basic rights, connected in this case with the prohibition of child labour, with cooperation among the parties involved in order to maintain a just balance between the protection of rights, economic development and free trade.

I would like now to return to the subject of employment. The Report of the Director-General speaks of ways in which labour regulation can be made to contribute to job creation. I would like here to make a few comments on this.

As I see it, one of the major elements in the European Commission White Paper on Growth, Competitiveness, and Employment was that it gave a new dimension to the concept of employment policy because it stated that economic growth had to be subordinate to the creation of employment. So far, employment has been considered as an effect of growth and was therefore seen as a secondary concern. Today, however, there is no doubt whatsoever in anyone's mind that employment is the raison d'être of economic growth.

This is a new approach and it has to have a legal counterpart. Just as we state that it is necessary to subordinate growth to employment, we also have to see legal instruments be oriented to job creation. Employment promotion should be the guiding principle of modern labour law.

It is in this spirit that we tackled the reform of the labour market in Spain, whose first results began to appear already in 1994. I do not wish to bore you with figures but I would just like to say that before the reform was introduced 1,000 jobs were being lost each day whereas now, a few months after it came into force, 1,000 jobs are being created each day.

Economic policy and labour development must therefore be adapted to the need for job creation, and this implies many decisions and progress in many directions. I would like here just to mention four measures which can help us because I consider them to be fundamental in the immediate future.

First, policies to promote employment. These are actions aimed at encouraging the employment of people from disadvantaged groups: young people without work experience, young people without qualifications, women, the long-term unemployed, unemployed over the age of 40-45, the handicapped. The labour market must be guided by positive discrimination; if not, if we allow a spontaneous functioning of the laws of the market, then these workers will be the first to be dismissed and last to be hired.

Second, market intermediation policies and assistance for the unemployed, policies to increase transparency on the market, making it possible to match rapidly supply and demand. It is necessary here to highlight the human dimension of employment policy. We have to avoid the pressure of statistics and the obsession with macroeconomics. Unemployment is not a figure; it is a problem, a problem which affects millions of human beings and these are the men and women who should be our concern, and for whom we must devise a system of personal guidance. There have to be interviews, classification and evaluation of cases, training, active seeking after employment; all these are the objectives of the agencies involved in employment.

Third, policies of adaptability to match the conditions of labour to the productive necessities, and which have to recognize the fact that in order to maintain the level of employment companies must have leeway for adaptation, other than dismissal as the only solution in times of economic crisis.

Fourth, there are the training policies, based on a quite obvious and fundamental premise: the wealth of a nation lies in the intelligence of its inhabitants. Therefore the essential investment is in the field of training, because the human factor is the strategic factor par excellence in development.

All these policies are a commitment on behalf of society as a whole, and governments must be able to count on the willing participation of the social partners. No employment policy which can do without the support of the trade unions and employers' organizations, because they are without doubt the true protagonists in the battle against unemployment. It is they who take decisions with the best information.

We must not be deceived into thinking that a legislative package, however effective, can alone solve our problem. Unemployment is a consequence of the lack of jobs and not the product of the rigidity or flexibility of labour regulation. Just as economic growth is a necessary, but not sufficient, condition of solving the problem, the same can be said of the role of legal adaptation.

We have to go into the causes of unemployment in greater detail. If we do not frame it precisely, we shall never solve the problem. As I see it, it is a consequence of one of the most salient characteristics of modern economies, in which growing wealth is accompanied by a decline in the number of jobs, so that labour is becoming a secondary factor of production. And since the right of work is the fundamental right of our citizens, we cannot give up the task of constructing a society which makes it possible for all those to work who wish to work. This is the true dimension of the wager and we have to commit ourselves to it.

Might I now humbly indicate two lines of approach to help us achieve this goal? The first of these approaches concerns the relationship between the employment and territory, and the second concerns the social reorganization of production, sometimes known – in a semantically confused expression – as “work-sharing”.

For some time now, unemployment has been the result not of crises in particular companies, but of economic depression in a whole region, and the relationship therefore is not one of the firm to employment but rather of a territory to unemployment. In the light of the existence of these pockets of unemployment, we shall find ourselves obliged to apply policies going beyond the confines of the enterprise and extending to entire territories, integrating all available resources, public and private. This means that local authorities, have to be seen as partners in employment promotion. Let us recall that as Keynes said, there is a great deal to be done and if there is something to be done that means employment. The new reserves of employment and jobs will come into being as a result of this partnership in the development of untapped resources and unexplored initiatives.

But to achieve this goal it is necessary to have a better global distribution of productivity.

We hear very much about sharing of working time, and we should not reject that approach. Obviously it has to be defined otherwise there is a risk of even greater confusion, of a pursuit of miracle solutions. However, we have to look at this question of the sharing of working time because it is becoming a central issue under discussion. I would like to remind you, precisely at this ILO Conference, of something which is often unnoticed for the last 105 years we have celebrated the First of May. In 1890, when this first celebration was held, there was one single claim and demand: the eight-hour day. This was not utopia because for years there had been these "eight-hour leagues" and the claim had led to success in certain areas and soon thereafter in other areas in the industrialized world followed suit.

Since that time, more than 100 years have passed and the average productivity of a worker in the agricultural and industrial sectors has multiplied 70, 80 or 100 times, yet still we have this eight-hour day.

What has happened then? What has happened is that the gains from productivity have been divided exclusively between capital and employed labour. Obviously this has brought great productivity gains and an evident improvement in the living conditions of employed workers, but without a concomitant increase in the volume of employment.

Our reflections as the twentieth century draws to a close, should therefore recognize the fact that the distribution of gains from productivity is a question not only of income but also of employment. We have to learn, if we all wish to have work, to work in another manner. We shall have to conduct a social reorganization of production. We shall have to learn to produce using all the variables which condition labour, that is to say, time, price, quality, organization, etc.

The debate on work-sharing has only just started and it will become very exciting in the future. We should not over-simplify matters. We must tackle this issue with seriousness and honesty, because we have to recognize that what we are really sharing out is productivity and so we have to speak here both of time and wages.

In conclusion I would like once again to express my appreciation of the excellent Report of the Director-General because it gave us the opportunity to speak of one of the principal aspirations of millions of men and women throughout the world – employment. Once again, thanks to this Report here in this Conference we are speaking about and trying to find solutions to the real problems of our citizens.

Mr. JARIKOV (representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions) – Allow me to congratulate the President and her colleagues on their election and on successfully conducting this important session of the International Labour Conference.

The Report of the Director-General has this time focused attention on the most crucial task facing humankind today, namely, the need for urgent national and international action to deal with the huge problems of unemployment and underemployment which afflict almost one-third of the labour force in the world today. The current unemployment crisis is indeed the most serious since the 1930s. The World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) welcomes the fact that at the recent World Summit for Social Development considerable attention was paid to this challenge and that one of the ten commitments reiterates the goal of achieving full employment. As the Report underlines, the mass unemployment of today stands in striking contrast to the full employment that prevailed in the industrialized countries in the 1950s and 1960s. There are also several instances of successful efforts to create jobs in other countries as well in the past. Therefore, we are not asking for the impossible when we ask for effective measures to ensure full employment. In this context, the WFTU cannot avoid the conclusion based on the living experience of the labour movement that the large increase in mass unemployment and underemployment in recent years was policy-induced and the mistaken policies and their tragic results could and should have been avoided.

The introduction of technological change and restructuring could have been implemented without arbitrary dismissals by employers who were unconcerned with the social consequences of their policies. It is important that at this session of the Conference we are also discussing the question of protection against unjustified dismissals on which the International Labour Office has provided us with a serious analytical report. The job losses which were effected through actions in disregard of social consequence could well be deemed as unjustified dismissals.

The 13th World Trade Union Congress held in Damascus last year, in which representatives of more than 300 million trade union members took part, concluded that the policies of governments and multinational companies engaged in economic war, disguised as competitiveness, are causing the mass destruction of jobs. The Congress drew attention to the pressures on wage costs, public spending cuts, cut backs in health and pension schemes, the decline in conditions of employment, the withdrawal of rights and freedoms, together with privatization and deregulation which are destabilizing economic and social structures as a whole.

It also has to be recognized that the consequences of the structural adjustment policies enforced by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) in terms of unemployment and underemployment are colossal. The socio-economic cost of such job destruction policies should be assessed on the same basis as the economic and social cost of environmental damage or of projects which inflict such damage and endanger people's lives.

It is equally important from the standpoint of social justice to assess the economic and social cost of the unequal exchange which is imposed on raw material in exporting countries, in particular, in Africa, by the transnational corporations, and the consequences of the IMF-imposed policies.

The recent Congress of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity, for example, paid particular attention to the massive loss of jobs, the increase in mass poverty and the decline in living standards caused by the withdrawal of subsidies on food, health, education and basic utilities like water, electricity and so on, resulting from structural adjustment policies.

In the so-called transition economies where the previously dominant state sector has managed to provide jobs for all, the present situation is that, as the Report points out, unemployment levels are already in the range of 10-15 per cent in most countries. Reports warn that a further sharp increase would be socially catastrophic and that another massive wave of unemployment would lead to further falls in real wages that would exacerbate the increase in income inequality and poverty that has already occurred.

The trade unions in these countries have therefore called for a serious review of economic policies which have been pursued and for these policies to be redirected towards safeguarding production and jobs, promoting new investment so that peoples' needs can be met and retraining and re-employing the millions who have already lost their jobs.

Summing up these experiences in the different regions, the World Federation of Trade Unions would therefore urge this Session of the Conference to invite all member States to translate commitments made at the World Summit into full employment and concrete policies. Such policies should include the adoption of temporary programmes to try to ensure a significant reduction in unemployment. Immediate steps could be taken to ensure that economic recovery does not mean the loss of jobs.

Other priorities could include greater investment in housing, infrastructure development and environmental protection to create new jobs and contribute to development. More energetic action could be taken to promote job-creation measures, such as a reduction of working hours and working time, and to stimulate demand by increasing purchasing power through wage rises, raising the minimum wage and so on. The WFTU fully supports the proposal to impose a tax on speculative capital movements as a resource for development and to curb speculation.

Urgent steps are also needed to revitalize agricultural and rural areas through land reform and rural development on a large enough scale to deal with the severe underemployment and unemployment in this sector.

Recognizing the major input of trade and inter-state economic relations on jobs and the promotion of development, it is important that the ILO should work with the World Trade Organization and encourage member States to uphold the principles of equality, sovereignty and cooperation to the benefit of us all, and to implement international labour standards which can help promote balanced development, set out in the United Nations Declaration on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order.

The WTO should, in particular, take steps to ensure that the normal development of world trade is not jeopardized by unilateral trade sanctions or by quotas for non-economic reasons and for political aims. Such boycotts and sanctions destroy jobs and livelihoods and should therefore be condemned in the strongest terms.

In this regard, we cannot but express our alarm at the voices being heard calling on countries to end their participation in the ILO because this agency's approach is allegedly ill-suited to an era in which the role of labour unions is vastly diminished. To say the least, these voices stand in marked contrast to the documents of the World Summit for Social Development which recognized that the ILO has a special role to play as a result of its mandate, its tripartite structure and its competence, and acknowledged the need for the active involvement of trade unions in promoting social development.

The WFTU, as an international organization, actively supports all steps to promote international cooperation and fully supports the proposal in the Report of the Director-General on an institutional system of international cooperation and the establishment of effective mechanisms to coordinate macroeconomic policies. Appropriate mechanisms could also be promoted to accomplish the specific tasks of the three segments of the tripartite structure of the ILO. The Trade Union Forum held in the framework of the World Summit in Copenhagen mobilized the support of the entire world trade union movement for the aims of the Summit. As was suggested at that Forum, trade unions, through the Workers' group and with the support of the ILO, could create their own mechanisms for monitoring and follow-up, including the convening of a broad-based forum every year at the international and national levels to examine all aspects of the follow-up to the World Summit's Declaration and Programme of Action. Such initiatives can ensure the continued involvement of trade unions and their vast membership in all continents in promoting broader participation in social development. But we have also to promote concerted action to guarantee freedom of association and prevent the terrorism and repression against trade unions now prevailing in several countries.

The shooting down of 12-year-old Iqbal Masih, an internationally known campaigner against child labour, on 16 April in Pakistan, shows the desperation of the exploiters and all those who want to make profit by ignoring international labour standards. There are many other cases of the assassination of trade union activists reported in different countries. The ILO, through its Committee on Freedom of Association, should take steps to conduct international investigations into all cases of the repression of trade unions and violation of their rights, and ensure that all member States respect the international labour standards they themselves have adopted.

Mr. MALLIA MILANES (Employers' delegate, Malta) – For some years now the world has been experiencing a phenomenon of unacceptably high rates of unemployment. The first years of this decade have been marked by a recession that threatened the stability of many countries, thus affecting many categories of workers hitherto left virtually unscathed in previous recessions.

This experience has not only affected developing countries but also the most highly developed economies. More alarmingly, as the latter group of countries has been emerging from recession, unemployment levels have remained obstinately high despite comparatively high rates of economic growth.

All this is a departure from the traditional pattern whereby, as countries emerged from recession, the unemployment rate declined to approach its previous levels. Traditional prescriptions to reduce unemployment no longer seem adequate to provide the desired cure. Worse still, projections up to the end of the century and beyond do not provide much comfort.

Indications are that despite economic growth unemployment figures will remain at persistently high levels with especially vulnerable groups like the long-term unemployed, older workers and newcomers to the labour market being particularly affected.

It is becoming increasingly evident that this bleak situation represents a watershed and a break with traditional cyclical fluctuations which are giving place to the implacable rules of an interdependent global economy. The vital importance of this development is recognized and highlighted in the Director-General's Report for this year's Conference Promoting employment. Similar messages focusing on this contemporary problem have been produced by other authoritative institutions, not least different organs of the European Union, amongst whose members many are particularly afflicted.

The Director-General's Report suggests two basic sets of causes for the rise in unemployment in industrialized countries, namely economic policies and their impact on growth and employment, and differences in labour market regulation.

The Report goes on to attempt to discredit the second of these causes. It acknowledges, however, that the debate on the effects on employment of excessive labour market regulation is by no means settled, and refers in this context to the concrete proposals for reform of existing labour market regulations as being on the current policy agenda in several countries.

Unnecessary and harmful labour market regulations are targeted for attack and the Report points to "rigidities" imposed by regulations on the length and organization of working time. These can frustrate voluntary labour supply decisions, new working-time and work-organization patterns, and thus job growth. The Report goes on to say that "the continued removal of regulatory impediments to voluntary labour supply choices should be encouraged". My Association fully endorses these views and has repeatedly drawn attention to the lack in Malta of a personalized approach which brings out the optimum of the individual and rewards him or her accordingly.

Training is also highlighted in the Director-General's Report as one of the essential remedies in combating unemployment, with particular reference to problems associated with low-skilled workers.

The Report acknowledges that: "financing unemployment through expenditure taxes (instead of payroll taxes) may generally be expected to have a favourable effect on employment; expenditure taxes lead to lower labour costs and higher take-home pay than to payroll taxes. This raises incentives for firms to employ and for workers to seek work." This vindicates the view consistently expressed by my Association with reference to the situation in Malta. Finally, it is difficult to fault the conclusion of the Director-General's Report that a fundamental requirement for restoring full employment is concerted international action, namely the creation of an institutional framework for cooperative international action.

Let me now turn to my country, Malta, where, after a concerted effort between the present Government and the private sector, we are now enjoying an economic and employment situation which is among the healthiest in the western world.

In December 1986, the number of the gainfully employed was 115,109. By December 1994 the number of the gainfully employed had risen to 133,900, an increase of 18,791. Most of this increase was created in the private sector. In fact, private sector employment rose from 65,000 in May 1987 (when the ruling administration took office) to 82,000 in March 1995. The unemployment rate now stands at 3.5 per cent – one of its lowest levels in memory. The economy has also offered additional opportunities for a total of 17,400 persons in part-time employment. In other words, the demand for labour cannot yet be met by the full-time labour force and has spilled over to the part-time sector. All of this was achieved at a time when a lingering recession and record unemployment levels plagued neighbouring countries.

The strategy that led to these results was based on a broad programme of liberalization and on giving private enterprise its head as far as circumstances permitted. The biggest advances were made in the services sector – not only in the established tourist sector but also in offshore financial services, ship registration, transshipment, telecommunications and aquaculture where sources of foreign revenue earnings, which had earlier been dry or limited, have been tapped with positive results.

The grand design was to turn Malta into a regional hub compatible with Malta's traditional vocation. In this way, Malta is seeking a niche taking advantage of its geographical position to serve countries on the Mediterranean rim and beyond.

Turning now to the vital issue of training, the present Government set up in 1990 the Employment and Training Corporation (ETC) with the aim of assessing the registered unemployed and of determining job preferences and training needs.

Efficient placement services brought about by a combination of trained personnel and computerized information search facilities at their disposal lead to the immediate auctioning of employers' vacancies. Between April 1994 and March 1995, the Corporation placed over 2,500 persons in the private sector.

In support of action taken by its employment services arm, the Corporation develops and delivers continuously updated training programmes to meet skills shortages and to train the unemployed, be they school-leavers or older unskilled workers. Interesting is the fact that trained persons seldom appear again on the unemployment register. Eighty per cent of the unemployed persons trained by the Corporation are now in employment.

Apart from delivering basic skills, ETC also supports employers through the financing of on-the-job training. ETC partly finances the training of new entrants to the labour market through the subsidization of training costs incurred by employers by means of such tools as training grants given under the Industrial Development Act of 1988, as well as subsidies under the Employment Training Placement Scheme. These measures encourage employers to employ and train unskilled people as they know they will receive financial support from the State.

In managing apprenticeship schemes, the ITC strives to place apprentices in the private sector for on-the-job training and eventual employment. This is being done because the public sector's human resources are in excess of requirements, while the expanding private sector is in need of qualified craftsmen and technicians.

I have no hesitation in saying that the strategies adopted by the Government were a success story. Credit is also due to the full, mature cooperation of all the social partners without whose support this progress would have never been possible.

Original Portuguese: Mr. VAN ZELLER (Employers' delegate, Portugal) – First of all, may I offer my congratulations to the President on her election to the high office which she now occupies, and I would like to express my wishes that she be successful in the discharge of her duties.

The Report presented by the Director-General for this session of the International Labour Conference deals with an extremely current problem, and poses a series of questions which are of great concern to contemporary society – questions which have not yet been given a generally accepted and peaceful answer.

First of all, there is the problem linked to employment promotion vis-à-vis globalization of the world economy in the light of recent and unforeseeable changes taking place in international trade, particularly as a result of the Uruguay Round, a subject to which the Report pays particular attention. We believe that these problems merit special attentions, and we justify more thorough-going analyses than those which have been carried out so far.

However, although there has yet to be a completely satisfactory or conclusive study of these matters, the fact is that, as is mentioned by the Director-General, "Overall, the Round would appear to give greatest opportunity for the expansion of southern exports to the north, given the liberalization of textiles, clothing, agriculture and manufacturing markets in the north. If so, this will clearly augment employment in the south and deplete it in the north, in the short run at least", page 13 (last paragraph).

The Director-General adds, and very rightly so, in the final part of the same paragraph "It is possible that significant short-term adjustment friction in developed countries could be associated with such trade expansion. If so, it could lead to greater reliance on defensive adjustment measures".

Now, it is precisely here that the ILO – in the spirit of the goals set forth in its Constitution, especially the promotion of social justice – should and must play an extremely important role in the liberalization of international trade, to the extent that such liberalization entails competition without distortion, particularly in the social area.

As far as we are concerned, we think that this distortion-correcting role could be efficiently played by the ILO on the condition that it be given added impact in promoting a greater acceptance by member States of certain fundamental social values which are recognized worldwide, so as to ensure that so-called "customs disarmament" "will not be at odds with fair trade practices.

This renewed importance of the ILO on the international scene would entail, as the Employers constantly stress, the consideration of certain essential aspects. I will point out the three which I think are the most essential in terms of rethinking ILO activities.

First of all, promoting the rigorous monitoring of the implementation of international legal instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference, in addition to the adoption of measures aimed at ratification of certain instruments considered to be fundamental by the greatest number of member States.

Secondly, a balanced, realistic approach to the adoption of new legal instruments, so as to ensure that such adopted instruments will in fact be applied by a reasonable number of Members of this Organization.

Thirdly, a review of the instruments and international standards which have already been adopted, so as to adapt them to the new socio-economic realities, either by rendering their content flexible or, if deemed advisable, doing away with some of them.

Another aspect which I would like to mention, a measure arising from the detailed analysis contained in the Report, deals with adding flexibility to the labour market and its effect on employment, particularly in the industrialized countries.

I would like to emphasize a statement by the Director-General, namely that "there are strong limits to the extent to which a reliance in [labour market] policies can solve the unemployment problem. In particular, a purely (or mainly) deregulatory route to keep greater labour market flexibility will not be a panacea" (page 86, paragraph 2). This, of course, cannot be separated from the realities and specific situation of each country.

It is true that in certain countries, such as Portugal, labour legislation continues to be in general terms excessively rigid and out of date as regards the characteristics and requirements of modern economic activity. Thus the adoption of measures to add flexibility to the labour market would be a very important factor for enterprise competitiveness, owing to overall growth of the economy, and consequently the potential to create jobs.

Furthermore, the Report itself, although it questions certain aspects of the deregulation of the labour market – a position with which we do not agree – does recognize expressly that: "These doubts over the effects of labour market deregulation do not, of course, imply that all labour market regulations should be retained in their current form. A case in point is the rigidities imposed by regulations on the length and organization of working time. These can frustrate voluntary labour supply decisions, new working time and work organization patterns, and thus job growth".

Flexibilization is a current issue in my country and in most of the countries of the European Union. We think it is essential to stimulate the economy as well as employment, particularly in regard to the long-term unemployed, which is one of the most serious aspects of the general problem of unemployment.

In conclusion I would like to note that in discussions of the problems of flexibility of the labour market, it is absolutely necessary to reverse the occasionally noted trend of adopting, nationally and internationally, policies and policy measures in the economic and social area, without such measures being programmed and implemented with the participation of the social partners.

In this regard, I would like to quote the Director-General, who states quite clearly that "It is important that the social partners be involved not only in the general debate on these proposals but also in the actual formulation of new regulations. Social concertation in this area will be essential for arriving at a harmonious balance between the competing demands of economic efficiency and social protection".

I hope that the Government in attendance will take into account the future of this appeal, so clearly launched by the ILO, because this is the only way to create realistic conditions that truly promote employment.

Original French: Mr. NIDELCU (Government delegate, Moldova) – Allow me on behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Moldova cordially to greet and express our deep respect for the distinguished delegates at this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

It is a particular pleasure for me to be able to express to the President my warmest congratulations on the occasion of his election to chair this session of the Conference and to express my firm belief that the work of this session will be a watershed in the promotion of social policy, and the implementation of the ideas and conclusions put forward by the ILO at the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen.

I would also like to express my satisfaction to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the International Labour Office at his wise choice of the central theme of this session of the Conference, namely social problems and, more particularly, how to promote employment, a problem which is at present of prime importance for countries throughout the world.

I wish to assure him that our delegation will contribute actively to the work of this session of the Conference and to the adoption of the final documents.

I would like to mention the fact that amid the numerous problems faced by the Republic of Moldova, particular attention is being given to the promotion and the implementation of social policies and above all to problems arising in the sphere of employment and in the social protection of the population.

The solution to these problems is based on a new system of social protection which is more specifically linked to the market economy which is contained in a special chapter in the programme of activities of the Government.

In the difficult conditions of transition, the Government of the Republic of Moldova is constantly monitoring the problems of the use of manpower and of unemployment. Each year national and territorial unemployment programmes are drawn up and implemented. Legislation and standards relating to the problems of labour, unemployment, incentives, remuneration, occupational safety and social protection, particularly for disadvantaged categories, are all systematically revised and improved.

Careful attention is paid to active measures to recruit unemployed persons and providing vocational guidance and training and retraining in accordance with the supply and demand of the labour market. At present, we are concerned with the organization of public work, the creation of new employment and providing assistance in these areas so that we can develop self-employment and entrepreneurial skills. Our ultimate goal is the effective and productive use of available manpower.

In our country, employment policy aims to promote the development of small and medium-sized enterprises which are able to recruit people who have been dismissed from larger enterprises. That is why the programme to privatize these enterprises is being intensely applied. At the same time we are in the process of improving the infrastructure of the labour market and its regulatory machinery and trying to bring our system of statistics, including on labour, into line with the requirements of the ILO. Thanks to the help of the International Labour Office we are now receiving technical assistance for the creation of a computerized system with regard to labour matters. We hope to be able to train our national labour force in the relevant areas and improve on our labour experiment.

The Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO, which cover so many issues in the area of labour and social protection, are of great assistance to us. The Republic of Moldova accepts fully and supports the proposed instruments on home work and safety and health in mines, which are in the agenda of the Conference with a view to their adoption. We shall vote in favour of these instruments and we believe that their provisions will be applied in our country.

The Report of the Director-General of the International Labour Office puts forward new proposals and measures to strengthen social integration, reduce and eradicate poverty and encourage the development of productive employment at world level. We believe that these will increase the efficiency of the ILO in the promotion and implementation of social policies, thus ensuring a greater degree of continuing cooperation among the peoples of the world.

We accept and give our support to these proposals and measures although we understand only too well that in the context of change occurring in the world today, the promotion and definition of social policies is impossible without a return to full employment worldwide. For the implementation of these proposals, the Republic of Moldova has favourable conditions. It only needs financial support – adequate foreign capital – to help it out of the present crisis.

I would like to express our willingness and hope that we might embark upon cooperation with all those countries – particularly the European countries – which might be prepared to make capital investments in our country. We are convinced that in a short time, we shall succeed in revitalizing production activities and create new jobs in mixed enterprises, limited companies, agricultural units and other forms of business, thanks to the continuous development of education and vocational training, as well as the assimilation of new specialities.

Human rights is an area in which the ILO plays a very important role. The increase in its activities pertaining to social policies, especially those connected with the harnessing of human resources at the international level, can only strengthen the position of this Organization.

Anxious to follow and adhere to the principles and measures adopted by this Organization, my country will do its best to promote and implement the conclusions and the decisions of this Conference.

(The Conference adjourned at 1 p.m.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. POPESCU) – Let us return to the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Spanish: Mr. HERNÁNDEZ FÁBIAN (Workers' delegate, Guatemala) – We would like to express our warmest greetings to all of the bodies that make up the ILO and to the various delegations that are here today on the occasion of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference, which is making significant effort in the study of the world's labour problems.

Internationally this is an extremely complex problem with neo-liberal models based on individualism in contrast to social and collective interests. A feature of this market situation is that wealth is being concentrated, poverty is becoming more widespread, profits are going to individuals and the costs are being socialized. Therefore, when talking about employment promotion in this context, it is vital to think of defending our social interests, especially of those sectors that have been excluded from progress.

Three major regional blocks exist nowadays. They generate 70 per cent of the world's GNP and 75 per cent of international trade. Each one of these blocks applies an aggressively protectionist policy and, according to GATT estimates, Latin America is confronted with a world in which only 20 per cent of world trade is free and 80 per cent of world trade is in some way controlled. This, of course, imposes very great difficulties in attempting to achieve full employment.

Economic globalization and the formation of economic blocs reflects an international division of labour in which countries like ours are considered as pure manpower-providers without being able to enjoy a right to genuine development.

In the 1950s ECLA put forward an import-substitution model to establish a macroeconomic balance and to solve the employment problem by strengthening the role of the State in the provision of the most important social services. The model did not solve the problem. The structure of production was not really changed. The economic, social and political crisis, brought about by internal and external factors, worsened and led to greater social confrontation that, in some cases, turned to civil war, as has been the outcome in my country for 35 years.

We now wish to enjoy the "benefits of globalization" by diversifying our exports, in particular our agricultural exports and our agricultural commodities. But this affects the security of food supplies in our own country, and at the same time limits access to markets, due to quotas and price-fixing. Something more than policies are needed to create employment because in our country 50 per cent of the population is unemployed and the informal sector is growing very fast.

We share the concern set out in the Director-General's Report. Obviously, there are very serious difficulties in achieving full employment, and external factors cause further difficulties as well. But nevertheless we have to meet the challenge of promoting full employment, because unemployment in our country causes ever greater poverty, and further inequalities which are morally and economically unacceptable.

The situation is an unacceptable one for the workers. The States attending the World Summit for Social Development adopted an agreement to promote full employment as a basic priority in economic and social policies. But, in actual practice, many countries are adopting policies which pare back state intervention, which means that public sector jobs are suppressed and health, education and housing sector services are cut back which further reduces the living standards of the workforce. This causes even greater difficulties for workers and one only needs to reflect on the statement in the Declaration of Philadelphia that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere".

There is no denying that major progress in information technology and innovation in production processes have led to an expansion of international trade and of investment in services, and that this has had an impact on specialization and the division of labour. However, it is important to remember that, as part of the trade globalization process, the developed and industrialized countries have not practised a policy of cooperation with our countries; there has been no transfer of technological progress to help improve industrial and agricultural production so essential to us. Thus we have not benefited from the technological advances that should be placed at the service of humanity as a whole so as to guarantee the well-being of all.

Moreover, the international division of labour puts us at a disadvantage and prevents us from taking part in the world economy on an equal footing. The result is that we are deprived of the opportunity of solving our major unemployment and underemployment problems, and the resultant terrible social problems.

It is socially and economically unacceptable that international division of labour be put forward as a solution to our economic and social crises by creating jobs with the sole comparative advantage of being filled by cheap labour employed with no regard whatsoever for the workers' dignity. These workers are employed in free zones where bonded-goods enterprises exploit cheap labour and especially women and children without any significant economic benefits to raise human living standards. Furthermore, investment by these bonded-goods production companies in Guatemala does not provide added value, does not provide technology transfer; rather it offers unfair competition which within GATT is considered to be "social dumping".

The implantation of these manufacturing industries as part of an employment policy means that the ILO must adopt standards to prevent its Conventions and Recommendations from being breached by the transnational companies and to reaffirm the need for social clauses to be applied as part of expansion of global trade; this the NTO cannot and should not disregard.

Following the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen, the presidents of Central American countries recently approved a treaty on social integration, the civil initiative for Central American integration, to which our Organization belongs. This provides that the concept of social development should be looked into more closely and provides for social assistance programmes. These will be used only as a source of finance for governments and will not solve the profound structural problems of our countries.

Consequently, the structural difficulties faced by our countries need to be carefully analysed. Space should be made for participation by all parts of society and in practice, they should generate benefits for people which are reflected in an improved standard of living, genuine human development, social cohesiveness, guarantees of social opportunities, and so on and so forth.

As part of this approach, it is very important for workers in Guatemala that thought be given to the agrarian aspect of economic advancement in the framework of dialogue and negotiation for peace in our country. If agreement is reached, then the foundations can be laid to contribute to a political solution of the economic and social crisis that reigns in our country. And indeed, it will be possible to construct a fair and democratic and humane society.

Consequently, support from the international community, including the ILO, is absolutely vital to ensure that this is not just a paper peace but so that it takes practical shape so that it is firm and lasting.

Original Spanish: Mr. TEITELBAUM (representative of the American Association of Jurists) – It is a great pleasure for me to congratulate the President of this session and the Officers on their election.

The American Association of Jurists is a non-governmental organization that has branches in almost all countries of the American continent. It is made up of jurists and magistrates; often they are specialists in labour law and in social security. For example, the existing President is a labour judge from Porto Alegre, Brazil.

I thoroughly approve the contents of the Director-General's Report. Unemployment in the world is a very topical issue; it's a very serious one, too, not only for the world of labour but also for society as a whole.

We believe none-the-less that the question of employment should be closely connected to two other essential problems, namely poverty and social exclusion, a link that was made at the Social Summit in Copenhagen. Furthermore, in order to put forward adequate proposals to find solutions to these serious problems in our world, we have to analyse the way economics actually functions in today's world, namely the globalization of its fundamental components – trade, industry, and finance capital.

International trade is very far from reaching the state of perfect competition that classical economists dreamt of, if we take into account the unequal exchange between rich and poor countries and the protectionism practised by the former while they pressure the weakest countries to open up their frontiers in disadvantageous conditions through the IMF's structural adjustment policies. The recent conclusion of the Uruguay Round which gave birth to the WTO has meant that the developing countries, especially those of sub-Saharan Africa are the great losers, according to the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization and UNCTAD specialists.

Transnationalization of industry is another aspect of globalization. Transnational industries can move very swiftly from one country to another, seeking comparative advantage, above the cheapest possible labour. When they set themselves up in a country, they create jobs, but they destroy much more than they create, causing the disappearance of industries and local crafts. This process of delocalization and the mobility of industry also has a negative impact on employment in the developed countries.

The third aspect of globalization of the economy is internalization and concentration of finance capital, that is, fundamentally, speculative capital, which is much more voluminous than industrial capital. Such capital is moved very swiftly electronically from one part of the world to the next without any kind of control and often for purely speculative purposes. A movement of this kind can, and indeed does, lead to vast financial catastrophes, nationally and internationally, with very serious consequences for employment and living standards in various places and countries in the world.

Another typical feature of today's economy is technological innovation based on electronics and information technology, bringing about a qualitatively different revolution from the industrial revolution which the world has seen before.

The coming together of a globalized economy and technological innovation has meant that unemployment is no longer conjectural but structural. The "Fordest" Keynesian model of full employment by mass production of standardized consumer goods for a permanently expanding market is no longer applicable.

The response which is now proposed and which is being applied at best because of a social and economic short-sightedness, in the long run, is for the sake of competitiveness, to push down wages and social security expenditure, leading to a spread of insecure labour conditions without social justice. And when the situation is favourable in some sectors, instead of taking on workers, they not infrequently quite simply lengthen the working day and adopt night work and rest-day work, stepping up the intensity and pace of work, often without any compensation in terms of time off or increased wages.

Both in rich and poor countries, staff are hired in insufficient numbers and are even cut back when it comes to essential services for the community such as health or education and the services with the consequent deterioration in these services, leading to accentuation of poverty and social exclusion, market shrinkage and thus an infernal circle that leads to the disappearance of small, medium-size and even large enterprises, or their absorption by monopolies, with consequent increase in unemployment.

It is not the supposedly free market of monopolies and oligopolies and financial speculation that is going to solve the growing problem of unemployment, poverty and social marginalization.

The destiny of human beings cannot then be simply handed over to the rationale of monopolies who motto is to get the maximum profit in the shortest time. Rather society itself should have the power to decide through democratic national and international institutions and increasing popular participation.

On this basis, if we want to seriously fight the scourge of unemployment, poverty and social exclusion, then we must take measures such as: totally cancelling the external debt of the poorest countries and substantially cutting down that of other developing countries; introducing reforms in the international monetary system so as, inter alia, to stabilize exchange rates and discourage international financial speculation; modify the policies of the IMF and the World Bank in the light of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant of Social, Economic and Cultural Rights, and bring them under the control of the General Assembly of the United Nations and ECOSOC; establishing fair prices on the world market for primary and manufactured exports from developing countries, and open up the markets of wealthy countries to these products; establishing a policy of income redistribution and impose heavy taxes on speculative and unproductive finance capital; creating fiscal and credit incentives for micro-enterprises and small and medium-sized enterprises; encouraging the active and selective intervention of governments in development and social investment policies, facilitating access to fertile land and irrigated land for the hundreds of millions of farmers all over the world who lack such resources, instituting democratic control over agricultural credit by farming communities.

But economic measures designed to promote employment would be enough in themselves; they do not go hand in hand with a new concept of what employment is, including socially useful work in the home, in the community and so forth, and also by encouraging free time to be used for further training, reintegration in the labour market for personal advancement.

In the most highly industrialized countries above all, where new technology and the consequent increase in productivity and the growing burden of the service sector has irreversibly reduced the need for human labour, it is necessary for working hours to be reduced so that everybody can have a share of work that is available, but without reducing wages, since it is labour and wealth, not poverty which must be reduced.

So the solution for developing countries is not a reduction in trade union, labour and social rights, but rather their observance, guarantee and extension. Such measures would include respect for the Tripartite Declaration of Principles on Transnational Enterprises.

To close, on the eve of the Women's Summit in Beijing, let me bring to your attention the fact that the much-vaunted role of women in development, their underprivileged position in society and that, far from being a basis on which their position can be improved, it is taken as an excuse to increase their burden of work and their responsibilities, often without any remuneration or compensation whatsoever. For poor women, whether wage-earning or not, equal rights, free time to improve their skills and advance themselves, is at the moment Utopian.

Workers, employees and governments have an unavoidable obligation to sit down together to make sure that all human beings can live in conditions of welfare safety and dignity.

Original German: Mr. ENGLIS (Workers' delegate, Slovakia) – First of all, I should like to join other speakers who have preceded me in congratulating the President on his election. This year's international meeting of the representatives of the social partners follows on from the decisions of the first World Summit on Social Development – both as regards the significance and content of the issues involved. The questions of poverty and employment were at the very centre of the Summit's concerns. In our troubled world, these problems particularly affect ordinary men and women. They are also affecting and worrying the citizens of Slovakia. But the representatives of the governments and employers do not always share our views on the way to solve these problems.

The restructuring of the economy has also led to changes in the philosophy underlying the social system. The Confederation of Trade Unions of the Slovak Republic is very critical concerning the unsystematic way in which the changing government has been attempting to solve the social problems. Only now are basic concepts regarding the transformation of the social environment being discussed and elaborated.

Our greatest concern is the problems of employment. Statistics show that unemployment reached a level of 14.59 per cent last year. However, different circles put forward percentages ranging from 5.72 per cent to 26.78 per cent. The present active labour market policies are inadequate and cannot solve these problems.

One of the most important questions and one of the priorities of our trade union confederation in the social sphere concerns family policies and child benefits. In our view the Government's proposal to limit child benefit to certain social groups would amount to discrimination.

In any social dialogue, agreement is rarely reached during the first round of discussions. This was clearly seen in recent discussions on proposals to cut social reductions on train and bus fares. Although it is obvious that the State cannot subsidize all these payments indiscriminately, we cannot agree in principle that citizens who have to rely on social security payments have to bear these costs without any assistance. We insist that the Government cannot take such a step without any compensation for the weakest members of society.

Our trade union confederation is actively involved in the reform of fiscal legislation. This year we are undertaking the reform of the most important fiscal law – the Act on income tax. We are determined to ensure that the citizens will not have to bear an increased tax burden as a result of inflation.

Social dialogue, the search for compromise and an attempt to reach reasonable decisions with the participation of all three social partners were felt to constitute the cornerstone of our new democracy. The Confederation of Trade Unions of the Slovak Republic considers that its most important task in tripartite negotiations is to achieve social conditions which are bearable for the workers. This is extremely important, especially in view of the speed at which reforms are taking place in our society.

The quality of the model of tripartism has been steadily improved, even though this is largely dictated by the political situation. We note that all the governments we have had so far have been interested in continuing the process of social dialogue. However, the fact that governments were changing so frequently prompted us to demand that the process of tripartite negotiations should be enshrined in law in order to guarantee that collective agreements would be legally binding.

This step was also taken to ensure that trade unions would not be overlooked in discussions to solve important social problems.

We have agreed with the social partners that preparations to ratify ILO Conventions should be continued. This important process is closely linked with the adaptation of Slovakia's legislation to European legal standards. In the collective agreement for this year, we included 16 separate instruments.

Finally I would like to mention the deliberations of the committees at this year's session of the International Labour Conference.

The representatives of the Slovak Confederation of Trade Unions are taking part in discussions to extend the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) to activities in the non-commercial services sector. Once the instrument has been adopted, we shall cooperate with the Government and employers' representatives in order to incorporate the Convention into Slovak legislation and to promote its application in practice. This also applies to the new Convention and Recommendation on safety and health in mines. The problem of homeworkers is covered by the Labour Code in our country. We tend to agree with the Slovak Government that these workers are well protected under our laws. It would therefore be desirable not to have to change the present legal situation of our homeworkers except in cases where it is absolutely necessary.

I wish you a successful Conference and every success in achieving consensus in the discussions and approval of these instruments.

Original French: Mr. TINAYRE (representative of the World Union of Liberal Professions) – The social and professional sector of the liberal professions is honoured to speak before you for the second time.

Already last year, on behalf of the World Union of Liberal Professions, it was my privilege to bring our message before you and to assure you of our keen interest in the work of the International Labour Organization and that the liberal professions intend fully to cooperate with you.

I have stressed how open we are to the new ideas and thrust which in keeping with the traditional calling of the ILO were expounded in the brilliant Report of the Director-General and, of the three challenges posed in the conclusions to this Report, we especially appreciated the open attitude expressed towards other actors in the social sphere, which includes us.

Today the Report of the Director-General for the 1995 session of the Conference confirms this attitude, thrust and relevance to the major problem of our day, employment.

The World Union of Liberal Professions means to work with you and is offering to help, with our modest means, the ILO to combat the scourge which is currently afflicting the whole planet.

We have three basic reasons for proposing to do this. First, the liberal professions constitute a social and professional sector in their own right. One could even say that we are a social partner. Second, we are also affected by the employment crisis. Third, we have a non-negligible employment potential which, if it is carefully studied and assessed, could help to solve the problem. It is for these three reasons that we should like to work with you and I should like to explain these reasons briefly.

Firstly, I should like to repeat here, and this repetition is not out of place because it challenges preconceived and firmly entrenched ideas which should be corrected that, contrary to what one might think, liberal professions, medical, legal and technical workers are part of a highly specific and homogenous group.

It is specific, because the liberal professions lay claim to a very individual approach to the employment relationship: a person working in the liberal professions is legally, economically and politically independent and responsible, these two features going hand in hand which means that a doctor or a lawyer, for instance, may have a colleague or assistant who belongs to the same profession but the relationship between them is of a specific and particular hierarchical nature since both these professionals are independent. Moreover, a person working in the liberal professions is above speculation of any kind. He does not wish to be beholden to capitalist mechanisms. Finally, he is committed to binding ethical rules, including professional secrecy which he hopes to keep to as much as possible in the interest of his clients. This characteristic is justified by a desire to serve humankind. We have our individual characteristics but we are also a homogenous group. You must realize that the principles I have just mentioned are more or less universal. Every profession be it veterinary surgeon, accountant, physiotherapist, consulting engineer, solicitor or dental surgeon, although apparently very different, obeys the same rules and speaks the same ethical language. This is true throughout the world. I can assure you that despite the geographical latitude, traditions or level of development, people working in the liberal professions all respect the same principles and are committed to protecting them in the public interest when they can and demanding respect for them where they are disregarded, sometimes even if this means putting their life on the line. The consequence of these common elements is that contrary to what you might believe, the liberal professions because of this unity are actively involved in trade union activities, including at the international level through the World Union of Liberal Professions which it is my honour to preside over and whose vocation is to bring together these professions so that we can join in the ground swell of globalization marking the end of the century.

These professions represent dozens, perhaps hundreds of millions of workers around the world who today wish to break out of their isolation and break down the distorted image of corporatism with which they are labelled and work with their partners in the world of work for the benefit of mankind and to build its future.

Having said this, and this relates to the third preconceived idea, you must realize that the liberal professions nowadays do not in any way resemble, if they ever have, the traditional image of elitism and dilettantism which they are all too often charged with.

They are extremely hard-working professions, most of the people working in them even in developed countries find it difficult to earn a decent living. I would like to repeat that for three years in Paris, I was on the Bar Council and I have seen that even there, an allegedly prosperous city, there is a large professional sub-proletariat of lawyers, maybe even reaching one quarter of the lawyers operating there.

The liberal professional, in whatever sphere must after a very lengthy training period, work for years before his practice, office or agency can guarantee him a comfortable living.

His situation is always precarious because clients come and go while he has no employment guarantees, allowances or unemployment benefits, and is working in a profession where age becomes a liability earlier than in other areas as clients drift away and where meagre pensions do not compensate for the fall in income. You must realize that they are no stranger to any of the alarming phenomena mentioned in the Director-General's Report, be it exclusion, insecurity or a fall in general prosperity. Even though the phenomena may take a different form in this sector in view of the nature of the work involved, people working in the liberal professions share the anguish of the workers and consequently the spirit of cooperation reflected in the Report.

You must be aware, and here I will end that contrary to preconceived ideas, the sector comprising the liberal professions is, and could be even more so, if the necessary steps were taken, a real source of employment, a vein waiting to be tapped and which is not always taken into account in statistics and forecasts. This can be seen in two ways. Firstly, the liberal professional is himself an employer. Today, throughout the world, the image of the lawyer alone with his civil code, the doctor alone with his stethoscope, the architect alone with his drawing board, is out of date.

Even leaving aside large engineering and auditing companies which are glowing exceptions, no liberal profession can operate without a minimum of staff.

For instance, in France as of 31 December 1992, there were 513,600 people in the liberal professions, employing 765,700 workers. An in-depth study would show a similar situation elsewhere.

Today's market only needs to open up and it would inevitably lead to increased demand for labour.

Consequently, the liberal sector is already in a position to offer employment, but it is not the only source.

When considering the particular problem of the employment crisis in the countries of Eastern Europe, the Director-General drew attention to the promotion of self-employment which he rightly pointed out is so far a relatively unexplored area.

This comment is valid not only for Eastern Europe. Demand being what it is, the ranks of the liberal professions are willing to open up if the appropriate means can be found and put at their disposal.

There, I believe is a second source of employment.

So, this is the reaction of the liberal professions to today's major problem that this session of the Conference is priding itself on discussing this year.

I should like to end my invigorating speech by quoting from the Director-General's commendable Report: "A third compelling reason is that there is scope for effective action at both the national and international levels. There will in fact be vast benefits from a serious commitment by all nations to achieving full employment".

To this end, we need commitment from States and the social partners.

The World Union of Liberal Professions is prepared, following the necessary studies and consideration, to work alongside the International Labour Organization, and rise to this challenge.

Mr. LARSEN (representative of the International Confederation of Executive Staff) – The International Confederation of Executive Staff, the CIC, congratulates the President on his election to chair this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. Furthermore, I wish to extend my admiration and appreciation to the Director-General for a most detailed and excellent Report which in many ways gives a new perspective on one of the most important problems in the world today, namely employment. This factor affects men, women, families and employees of all categories and leads to social exclusion, social unrest and social injustice.

The Report in fact analyses in detail the reasons for unemployment and in a very objective way describes some of the fallacies so often used in discussing why unemployment is increasing, be it strong unions, high salaries, security rules, etc., all of which have, according to the Report, no real effect in increasing unemployment.

In our opinion it is, therefore, correct to concentrate on a number of other remedies that could prove effective in fighting unemployment in combination with increased economic growth in the world. Certainly there is a link between poor efficiency and high unemployment rates. The question is how to improve efficiency? Some of the relevant remedies could be, in our opinion, improving flexibility in a broad sense within enterprises and on the labour market, establishing greater cooperation between the public and private sectors to obtain a synergy effect, making better use of public funds in respect of unemployment to enable unemployed persons to find alternative employment as soon as possible. These measures can, in our opinion, only be carried out by involving the relevant social partners and by creating a worldwide forum for social dialogue, which the ILO is certainly doing, in order to carry out the relevant changes.

Managerial staff have a specific responsibility in these areas because they are at the enterprise level and are the persons responsible for establishing and implementing the changes. Referring in particular to training, we believe that training and investment in training is a decisive factor in creating an economy that is competitive. A very high level of continuous training is necessary to create a dynamic society in constant development. Also in order not to lose valuable experience in people who are unemployed, focus should be placed on maintaining their qualifications rather than allowing them to passively receive unemployment benefits.

Experience through the years has shown that qualified management is a decisive factor in making small and medium-sized enterprises competitive, and training should be allocated for this group as a specific employee group.

Investment in training is in our belief as necessary as investment in machinery and should be promoted continuously throughout the years a person is employed to maintain a dynamic and flexible labour force that keeps companies competitive. Companies should in fact be allocated tax-deductible incentives if they procure training for their employees since it should be considered as an investment in order to combat unemployment indirectly.

When speaking of unemployment, focus is often on young people and women but increasingly the unemployment rate has gone up considerably for managerial staff at all levels and this fact is particularly deplorable in view of the essential role they play as a driving force for innovation inside undertakings.

The failure to utilize the skills of young graduates also represents a serious intellectual and economic loss. We believe it is absolutely indispensable to identify different means for different groups of employees when discussing measures to fight unemployment. Senior managerial staff are increasingly being dismissed, meaning that very valuable resources are being lost. Therefore, the focus should be on the abilities and qualities of this group and on developing an inventive and flexible senior policy combined with a gradual withdrawal from the labour market instead of making them unemployed.

Labour regulations should also be flexible, allowing individual schemes for the individual employees. Human resources at all levels and ages are the most important raw material and resources we have in the world. It is therefore a shame and a loss to let it go as we are doing today. The ILO is in fact taking responsibility for this area, a fact for which we are extremely thankful, and is focusing on all aspects of unemployment and also using its recognition, competence and expertise to bring together all social partners who wish to contribute to creating new forms of employment. The International Confederation of Executive Staff is fully aware of having specific responsibilities in this area and wishes to cooperate closely with the ILO in promoting job creation and full employment.

Original Russian: Mr. BYAMBATSEREN (Deputy Minister for Population Policy and Labour, Mongolia) – I should like to take this opportunity to join the previous speakers and, on behalf of the Government delegation of Mongolia, congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their unanimous election to these responsible posts. I wish them every success.

The 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference has been convened at a very specific time. At the beginning of this year, the international community gathered at the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen and drew the world's attention to the issues of poverty and unemployment.

I am very pleased to note that the ILO played an important role in the preparation for this historic meeting. We highly appreciate the concrete proposals made in the Report of the Director-General to address the issues discussed during the World Summit.

As follows from the Report, employment and unemployment levels vary from country to country. In some countries unemployment is steadily decreasing, whereas other countries still have serious problems, with unemployment only increasing.

Unemployment leads to a loss of opportunity to secure adequate incomes to support normal living standards, and it is a cause of poverty, which is usually considered as its shadow. I would like to draw the attention of this session to the fact that unemployment and poverty emerge most startlingly in the least developed countries during their transition to market relations. In Mongolia the unemployment rate is about 9 per cent of the economically active population. According to official surveys, 26 per cent of the total population of Mongolia is living below the poverty line. Of this group, one-third is extremely poor.

Our delegation considers that unemployment can be reduced only through the liberalization of international trade and by means of effective investment policies directed towards the generation of employment, for instance, by improving the economic structure and reviving national industries.

The Government of Mongolia recently approved the national programme of poverty alleviation, and is now implementing the programme with the assistance of international financial and other specialized organizations and donor countries.

Within the framework of the national programme, there are poverty alleviation funds, including the employment fund, the local development fund, the women's development fund and the social assistance fund. The Government of Mongolia provides economic support through these special funds to the citizens of Mongolia to help them overcome unemployment and poverty. Since one of the ways to improve the welfare of citizens is through the optimum utilization of available financial and labour resources and by making the most of the work that is available, we are pursuing a policy aimed at rallying all of society under the slogan "Every citizen should be a producer, and every family should run production activities".

Furthermore, we are implementing measures through a social assistance fund to care for citizens who are unable to work, to help them overcome transitional difficulties. The Act on unemployment benefits, which is part of the social insurance system, came into force this year. Its purpose is to provide unemployment benefits for a limited period.

Our delegation sincerely hopes that the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference will arrive at a comprehensive decision to find a rational way to overcome the negative impact of unemployment, which is worsening in our society. We call for active ILO activities to launch cooperation among countries and international specialized organizations under the slogan "one for all, and all for one".

Our delegation attaches great importance to this session. We appeal to all governments to pursue a policy that will ensure an optimum combination of structural policies for human resource development, economic management and investment to fulfil social development objectives and to prevent unemployment and reduce poverty.

Another important aspect which I would like to mention is the financial support given in the form of loans and technical assistance by international financial institutions to the least developed countries undergoing the transition to market relations. This support plays a significant role in accelerating structural reforms in social and economic life. However, features of development specific to each individual country should be taken into account in this process.

As new technologies have been introduced in Mongolia, and with the introduction of various types of property in the last few years, we have had to pay more attention to the issues of labour inspection and occupational safety and health. In particular, we must take measures to improve working conditions and protect the health of employees in mining, and to ensure environmental safety. Therefore, our Government fully supports the adoption of international labour standards on occupational safety and health in mining.

The Government of Mongolia attaches great importance to the report on home work. The traditional Mongolian form of economic activity, with a nomadic way of life, is in reality based on the structure of home work. The number of homeworkers has increased significantly in Mongolia in the last few years. Therefore, we fully support the adoption by the ILO of new international labour standards concerning home work in order to ensure the legal protection of homeworkers.

Our Government is making efforts to give effect to the international labour standards it ratifies and to ratify new Conventions of the ILO. The Government intends to ratify certain ILO Conventions, and I am very pleased to inform the Conference that a few days ago at its spring session the Parliament of Mongolia decided to ratify the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1977 (No. 135).

Although the Government of Mongolia is taking a large number of measures to improve the welfare of its people, we still face financial difficulties and are suffering from a lack of well-trained staff. We share the ILO's opinion that priority should be given in its Programme over the next two years to increasing employment, developing small enterprises and combating poverty. It is also important for our countries to spend the budget of the International Labour Organization in a rational way matching it with the actual needs of the member States. We have no objection to the budget of the Organization as proposed for the years 1996-97.

We are very pleased and grateful that our cooperation has grown with the ILO Beijing Office, the Asia and Pacific Office and the East Asia Multidisciplinary Advisory Team based in Bangkok. Recent, we discussed with the ILO the country objectives statement for the next few years. We expect the ILO to help us overcome the problems of this difficult transitional period. We hope that Mongolia continues to be given its due in ILO policy.

Finally, permit me to thank the International Labour Organization for its assistance, and wish it success in its work.

Mr. SNEYERS (representative of the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations) – It is estimated that there are several hundred thousand international public sector workers worldwide, and today I have the honour of addressing the International Labour Conference on their behalf. This is a new departure for FICSA, the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations, which usually limits its address to this Conference to a presentation of the issues affecting the 54,000 international civil servants in the United Nations system. However, over the last 18 months FICSA has joined forces with the staff representatives of non-United Nations system organizations to discuss matters of common interest and has concluded that international public sector workers have much more in common than conventional wisdom would suggest.

The ILO has a long and distinguished history of advocating and protecting workers' rights. The Organization can only be applauded for the advances they bring in fair and equitable labour relations.

But I have a complaint, for like several hundred thousand international civil servants, including the ILO's own staff, I sit on the sidelines where the Conventions and resolutions and Recommendations of the ILO are concerned. The greatest irony of the ILO's existence is that it does not give its staff the same rights that it advocates for billions of workers worldwide.

The time has come for this to change.

All over the world employers are implementing changes and restructuring to make their enterprises more efficient. The same goal is seen in the international civil services. The problem with the changes in international civil services is that they are being implemented without any participation of the staff. Does anyone really believe that this is a sensible way to act? As the hundreds of resolutions and Conventions and Recommendations that you have agreed upon over the years have shown, you are aware of the necessity for staff participation in the decision-making process.

The issues of terms and conditions of service and legal status affecting international public sector workers require the urgent attention of a competent international body. The International Labour Organization is, by definition, the forum in which workers' issues can be discussed and solutions developed in conjunction with the employers and the Governments. The Annual Conference and the Governing Body are the ideal fora as all social partners work together in a tripartite structure.

I represent a category of worker which is not fairly treated. The right of freedom of association, the right to bargain collectively on working conditions, the right to petition and address governing bodies, the right to strike, the right to due process and independent legal review of workers' complaints, the right of staff representation to initiate class action are not accorded to international civil servants.

These basic rights, which are laid down in the various ILO Conventions, Recommendations and resolutions, should be extended to international civil servants, including both United Nations and non-United Nations organizations. At the very least, the staff of the International Labour Organization should enjoy these rights.

On behalf of all international public sector workers, we ask the International Labour Organization to lay the foundation for an international instrument to define the rights and legal status of all international civil servants as a distinct category of worker. The model for such an instrument was drafted in January 1995 at the Symposium on the Legal Status of International Civil Services, held in New York at the law offices of Mr. Theodore Kheel, a prominent American attorney.

The legal experts participating in that symposium drafted the New York Declaration which was adopted by all participants. The Declaration provides a legal framework consistent with modern labour practices that guarantees to all civil servants due process and equal protection equivalent to the rights and principles they would enjoy under relevant national laws.

The Declaration has been distributed to governing bodies, executive heads, the staff representation of over 200 inter-governmental and international organizations, the presidents of international administrative tribunals, permanent missions to the United Nations in New York, Geneva and Vienna, Public Services International affiliates and members of the European Parliament. FICSA promoted the Declaration in Washington during its biannual liaison exercise, discussing it with members of Congress, their legislative assistants and State Department officials.

A second request to this body is to ensure that international civil servants enjoy the protection of the Labour Relations (Public Services) Convention 1978 (No. 151), the Convention concerning the protection of the right to organize and procedures for determining conditions of employment in the public service. Article 7, "Procedures for determining terms and conditions of employment", is of particular relevance here: "Measures appropriate to national conditions shall be taken, where necessary, to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for negotiation of terms and conditions of employment between the public authorities concerned and public employees' organizations, or of such other methods as will allow representatives of public employees to participate in the determination of these matters."

The terms of Convention No. 151 are applied to the public services of the countries that have ratified it. However, by a strange twist of international law it cannot be applied to the international civil services, nor even to the ILO itself.

Our third request relates specifically to the United Nations common system. At the request of the United Nations General Assembly last year, staff and administrations have been working together to review the consultative process used to determine terms and conditions of service. Three discussions have so far taken place in which a number of proposals, some of which were put forward by the administrations, were made to move towards tripartism. We request that the ILO Governing Body and the ILO Director-General review and support the FICSA proposal for setting up a tripartite negotiating body to decide on the conditions of employment in the international civil service, with the equal representation of staff, administration and the governing bodies of all United Nations organizations.

We also request the Conference delegations representing the workers, employers and Governments to support the introduction of a tripartite structure in the United Nations common system. Such a structure would be a replica of the tripartism the ILO has been advocating for over 75 years.

FICSA also solicits special support from the labour ministries represented in this Conference, since these ministries will need to convince their counterparts in the foreign ministries to support, in the United Nations General Assembly, the establishment of a tripartite commission for determining conditions of service of United Nations system staff.

International civil servants must be accorded the right to participate in the decisions affecting their working lives. It is time for the international organizations to eliminate the elitist and paternalistic notion that employees are permitted to speak "by invitation only".

Mr. PASKA (Workers' delegate, Papua New Guinea) – Like the speakers who have taken the rostrum before me, I take great pleasure in conveying greetings on behalf of workers in my country and congratulations to the President of this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

As we debate the twin problems of unemployment and underemployment, as well as their adverse effects, we are unavoidably drawn to the mountain of sobering statistics which amplify the extent of the dilemma facing the world today. I do not intend to be repetitious about these statistics. They have been sufficiently echoed.

Suffice it to say, I am compelled nevertheless to point out that my country has not escaped this global malaise. Indeed, countries like mine which are in effect peripheral minnows on the globalized scale are resigned to having to absorb the trickle effects of international pressures exerted by those who dictate the tone of balances or imbalances on the world stage. For us the ability to cope often begins with the design of appropriate formulas to meet these challenges, which is almost always inextricably linked to adjustments to accommodate these shifting international pressures. Often, however, strategies are based on word-for-word plagiarism of trade liberalization language propelled by political expediency as opposed to foresight and prudence.

At this juncture, it is pertinent to point out that the world's political and economic theatres – wherein exponents of varying ideologies strive to secure the signatures of the international community to give its blessing to their perceived prescriptions, believed to contain a therapeutical dosage for economic recovery and prosperity – often do so based on concepts that mirror the environments in which they live and the ideological foundations of their cultures.

Take for instance the topical issue of employment. In contemporary economic parlance, the notion of employment is almost always invariably linked to the relationship between capital and labour. Hence the employer and employee. Viewed in this context the perpetual pull to increase the capital base in order to enhance economic growth and therefore employment opportunities is an unmistakable fact. A major feature of this arrangement is the heavy concentration of resources among the few, and being a notable element.

In discussions to date the distinct emphasis placed on formal employment negates the fact that countries like mine which have dual economies, where the majority of people have title to land, are being encouraged to join forces with the rest of the world on the promise that the successful application of economic prescriptions as offered will undo the shackles of poverty and deprivation. The result is the abandonment of sustainable livelihood on a rural subsistence scale in preference to the glory and promise of the formal monetized sector.

This fallacy deserves scrutiny because often even in the presence of abundant natural resources, the propensity to experience economic stagnation and even capitulation arises not least because the prescribed formulas are frequently confined to an unresponsive, small, self-serving private sector coupled with the lack of appropriateness of such policies to local conditions. The situation is further exacerbated by an inadequate capital base and undeveloped institutional machinery insufficient to facilitate policy initiatives.

Some salient features of my country's economy and its performance may need to be postulated with a view to highlighting the incongruities.

Like many countries, the contagious effect of trade liberalization and structural adjustment policies has consumed the nation's policy-makers, forcing the Government to simultaneously adopt and implement policies hatched in distant corners, targeted at promoting free market ideologies and concepts.

Thus, privatization was introduced. Automatic wage indexation was shelved. Minimum wages were slashed by a massive 62 per cent in order to create surplus savings for employment creation (it was argued).

Devaluation of the local currency followed by its subsequent floating was imposed. Price controls were removed and taxes increased. A wage moratorium was introduced and is still in place despite a substantial upward movement in inflation rates. So-called free collective bargaining is in place although the Government sets the benchmark in the public sector. Retrenchments are being pursued in the public sector coupled with productivity-linked employment contracts for the upper echelon of the wage structure in the public sector. Industrial zones, including liberal trade regimes and a horde of other measures designed to promote and enhance trade liberalization, are on stream.

Against this backdrop, it should be noted that the country recorded impressive growth figures of 9.5 per cent in 1991, 11.8 per cent in 1992, and 14.4 per cent in 1993, followed by a dramatic fall to three per cent in 1994. In addition, profit margins soared to astronomical figures.

Viewed from this angle, it would be logical to presuppose that the austerity measures introduced under trade liberalization were indeed coming to fruition. The contrary is however the case, and the negative indicators highlight this paradox.

Thus, despite the slashing of minimum wages, employment has not picked up and any marginal increase is often linked to seasonal activities. Meanwhile, given the fall in real wage value, minimum wage-earners are effectively slaves in their own country. Despite impressive growth figures and profit margins, growth in the private sector has remained stagnant, offering no promise for employment creation. The number of people living on the poverty line or below it has increased inexorably. Mortality rates for both women and children are among the highest in the world, as well as population growth rates. Urban migration goes unchecked and places added pressure on the already meagre urban budgets. Crime and other illegal activities are worsening, interest rates are beyond reach and literacy rates very low. In short, most if not all social indicators point to the negative, characterizing Papua New Guinea as a poverty-stricken country. This, despite genuine attempts to solve our problems, the implementation of policy initiatives and adherence to trade liberalization measures, and despite an abundance of natural resources, among them oil, gas and gold.

Increasingly, labour and trade union rights are being eroded and undermined with unprotected workers caught in the crossfire as rigidities and distortions in the labour market forces are being blamed on trade unions, rather than being seen as failures of the Government and the private sector. This erosion is gaining momentum with little resistance due to the already relative weakness of trade unions where employers are already enjoying a field day.

All of this points to the fact that the highly vaunted growth figures released in many countries, coupled with excessive profit margins, have not delivered the desired results in terms of gainful employment and the eradication of poverty. In effect they camouflage the tragic reality facing the world today where millions of people have been alienated from mainstream society while the minority continue to amass fortunes at their expense, a poignant reminder of the vast inequalities the world faces today. It also points to the fact that free market competition as the nucleus of trade liberalization is heavily lopsided in favour of developed economies whose obligations to developing economies are met through reciprocal trade arrangements that guarantee favourable returns to the former at cost benefit. Viewed from this angle there cannot be any fair competition.

In an article appearing in the 3-4 June 1995 edition of the International Herald Tribune, published with the New York Times and the Washington Post, it was reported that there has been an increasing backlash over trade liberalization around the world. In particular, the writer noted the findings of a workshop convened recently at Harvard by the Luxembourg Institute for European and International Studies where, among other things, "it was found that the globalization of national economies so enthusiastically promoted by the American Government and business amounts to an ideological form of Western imperialism, to which the rest of the world is compelled to react".

This observation points to the preceding assertion that trade liberalization rules are heavily inclined towards superior macroeconomic frameworks present in developed countries which pay little regard and do not take account of or responsibility for the inferior macroeconomic network and the negative fall-out of unworkable or unattainable policies, supposedly designed for the benefit of most countries.

This is not a bashing of developed economies, since the spiral effects of trade liberalization also affect the vast majority of workers in developed economies. Rather the intention is to highlight the glaring deficiencies that are often left to the developing nations to grapple with in the absence of proper institutional frameworks, technical know-how and appropriate means, coupled with a cultural environment not readily attuned or receptive to sudden violent change.

The views expressed do not absolve local failures, which among others, may be attributed to political and bureaucratic lethargy and corruption.

Returning to the issue of employment, the argument is that countries which are likely to do better on the employment front are those whose policies respond positively to globalization and those which are designed to take advantage of trading and other opportunities. Conversely, countries which have failed to respond positively to the new opportunities created by globalization have performed poorly and in many cases have experienced economic retrogression.

If the latter holds true for my country, it is not because of lack of policy, and the empirical evidence supports this.

It follows that the desired competition, as dictated by market forces under trade liberalization, will always be lopsided unless basic ingredients enhancing vigorous commercial activity are in place.

We would therefore suggest that a concerted effort from the Bretton Woods institutions backed by developed economies needs to be applied in order to improve the developing countries' ability to effectively tackle the intricacies of trade liberalization and maintain a comparative advantage at the international level. It would border on callous neglect were the Bretton Woods institutions to shirk this responsibility.

Thus the imperative requirements that cross-country infrastructural, institutional, and human resources development be preconditions for the successful application of trade liberalization measures must receive genuine assistance and priority attention.

With the liquidity belt continuing to tighten at the international level, domestic savings become a paramount consideration where all avenues must be explored with a view to improving on domestic capital formation required for credit and entrepreneurial development.

I will conclude by saying that the unique role and position of the ILO in spearheading the crusade to tackle unemployment and its negative effects, and to reaffirm social justice need no vociferous announcement.

In essence, the ILO stands out as the leading organization that must play a pivotal role in coordinating a global search for ways of alleviating the debilitating effects of trade liberalization, unemployment, social exclusion and poverty.

Left on its own, the ILO would find this to be an insurmountable task. We would therefore urge all member States to recognize and accept this collective human responsibility and obligation. To shirk this humane and moral obligation would aggravate the seriousness of the catastrophe facing us today.

Mr. OGERA-OCHABAL (Government delegate, Uganda) – Permit me, first of all, to congratulate the President and the Officers on their election. I am confident that with their vast experience they will be able to guide our deliberations and enable us to come out with implementable conclusions.

May I also take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for his vision in publishing an inaugural annual Report on the world employment situation just before the World Summit for Social Development, which Report has provided the basis for the theme of this Conference.

The theme for this Conference, Promoting employment, is an expression of a recommitment to this global challenge. It presents an opportunity for member States to reaffirm their pledge to place promotion of full employment at the centre of government policy action, as well as to launch new initiatives to contribute towards the implementation of the Programme of Action, adopted at the recently concluded World Summit for Social Development.

The problem of employment and poverty has become a global threat and a major source of social injustice. More and more people are suffering from poverty. While increased globalization of the world economy, increased world trade, flows of foreign investment as well as technological change have brought about job creation in the world, they have given rise to inequality in the distribution of the material well-being. Jobs, assets, skills and incomes are becoming increasingly unevenly distributed within and between countries. Whereas some regions have shortage of skills and manpower, others are facing growing joblessness and marginalization. The challenge of creating enough jobs to overcome unemployment, underemployment and poverty, therefore, demands greater efforts both at the national and international level to search for innovative solutions.

The task of creating productive and gainful employment is more acute in Africa. Here the severity of the problem of poverty and employment is aggravated by the high rates of population and labour force growth. It is estimated that the labour force in Africa will grow by 2.5 per cent per annum in the 1990s. This implies an additional 6 million job seekers every year. The swelling of ranks of the unemployed, if not timely addressed, could condemn Africa to perpetual poverty, increased crime, political upheavals and instability.

Part of the problem has been the lack of comprehensive employment policies to clearly articulate and integrate employment objectives in the national planning process. To this end, the Government of Uganda invited an ILO Multidisciplinary Employment Advisory Mission to the country last year to assist the Government in identifying the problems of unemployment and poverty, as well as help in the formulation of a coherent employment policy.

In addition, the development of the African region is impeded by a number of external factors such as capital movements, access to markets, an increasingly competitive world environment, and especially the excruciating debt burden which remains a major impediment to our development. For instance, in 1994 more than a third of Africa's export earnings was used to service foreign debt. According to the 1995 African Development Bank Report, the continent spent 35.4 per cent of its export earnings on debt servicing. The total debt stock for Africa rose from US$251.4 billion in 1993 to US$269.5 billion in 1994. In the case of Uganda, as of 30 June 1994 a total external public sector debt of US$3 billion was registered, representing over 80 per cent of estimated GDP for the 1993-94 financial year.

All the above problems have been compounded by the structural adjustment programmes prescribed by the IMF. Despite the good intentions of these programmes their immediate result has been job losses in both the private and public sector, increasing job insecurity, lower incomes and deteriorating terms of employment with greater inclination to unemployment. This situation presents great threats to the upholding of international labour standards and the administration of the national labour legislation. We are, therefore, living in a time of uncertainty.

It is my belief that in pursuing a guided solution to the pressing global question of poverty and employment, the first step should be the formulation and adoption by our governments of well-articulated employment policies specifically targeting categories of the community that are grossly disadvantaged.

In this era of structural adjustment, a pragmatic employment policy needs to take into account the importance of well-designed training programmes to facilitate the adaptation of the workforce that is being shed by enterprises to new situations. Displaced workers need assistance to acquire new skills required to find alternative employment. In a similar way, the new entrants to the labour force, who are typically young people, need greater support to ease their adjustment to new technology and gain the competitiveness demanded by the economic reforms. Emphasis on training will, therefore, enhance ability, skill, and numeracy and will stimulate a positive attitude to set up self-employment. In this regard, strengthening of employment services to provide advisory information, career guidance and counselling and job search assistance for new opportunities is vital.

We have learnt from experience that the majority of those who have lost their jobs through structural adjustment programmes (SAPS) are either joining agriculture or the informal sector. Unfortunately, these sectors are characterized by low productivity and income. In Africa, 73 per cent of the population is rural and three-quarters of the population are smallholders in agriculture and the informal sector, and the informal sector will continue to be the major source of income and employment in the African region. It is imperative, therefore, that we address the issue of enhancing and promoting the development of modern agriculture and the informal sector.

We in Uganda, where agriculture provides a livelihood to 89 per cent of the population, have committed ourselves to greater investments in the rural areas. The strategies include diversification of agriculture and agro-processing industries, improved land tenure, price incentives as well as innovative credit schemes for small income-generating projects, popularly known as Entandikwa. Other support measures include improved basic needs such as education and health services, improved rural training and community-based rural public works.

The informal sector, which has for many years existed in most of our countries without enthusiastic support of government, has now emerged as a sector with potential, holding the promise of generating employment for the majority of the population in the urban areas. The informal sector provides employment for nearly 60 per cent of the urban population in Africa.

Despite such potential, the informal sector is still handicapped with a number of constraints including, among others, lack of sufficient credit, requisite skills, basic social amenities, technology and markets. These obstacles that stand in the way of the development of dignified productive employment in this sector should be removed.

In Uganda, the informal sector provides three times as much employment to the labour force as the formal sector. We are making it an important component of government policy. This sector not only absorbs most of the victims that have been affected by redundancies; it also supplements income to even those workers in formal wage employment.

Further recognition of the importance of the informal sector has demonstrated itself in the commitment of the three East African States, namely, Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda, to mount a joint approach on promotion of employment in this sector. Greater support will be needed to enable this initiative to come into reality. In this connection, the ILO-inspired methodology that is being developed for improving productivity, social protection and working conditions is most welcome.

Past experience has shown that low levels of investment, particularly in developing countries, have contributed to perpetuating the problem of unemployment and poverty. Indeed, as stated in the Director-General's Report, the total number of jobs created by multinational enterprises, in developing countries, is estimated at 12 million. This represents merely 2 per cent of their labour force. At this time of a worldwide shift of policy to competitive market forces and liberal economic policies, strong efforts are needed to lobby foreign investors as major instruments for economic management and generation of employment. At the same time, well-thought-out projects for local industrial growth need to be part of an active employment promotion programme.

Uganda has launched an aggressive foreign investment attraction drive, first by ushering in peace and political stability and improving the infrastructure, and second, by enactment of an Investment Statute which gives attractive incentives for both local and foreign investment. As a result, 1,500 investments valued at nearly US$1 billion have already been licensed since 1992, and we still expect more investments. These investments will undoubtedly generate more job opportunities.

Women are still the majority of the unemployed and the poor, especially in Africa where the majority of them live in rural areas. Their work and contribution to productivity remains unvalued, which makes them more marginalized. Their chances of joining the labour market are increasingly frustrated. This problem seems to stem from their powerlessness and low level of education. The above issues pose real challenges for the redefinition and constant evaluation of strategies that are effective in integrating women and other disadvantaged groups, in the mainstream of the economy.

In Uganda we recognize the important role played by women in economic, social and political development. The Government has therefore come out with forward-looking strategies and policies for mainstreaming women in socio-economic development. A Ministry of Gender and Community Development was created, headed by a woman who is no less than the Vice-President of Uganda.

Reversing the global problem of poverty and employment will also require greater economic collaboration and regional networking. In doing so some of the rigidities that stand in the way of free movement of capital goods and labour should be eased so that we can reap the full benefits that regional cooperation can offer such as sharing infrastructure, resources and experience.

We therefore urge the international community to extend technical and financial support to regional institutions such as the African Economic Community, the Preferential Trade Area (PTA) and the Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa (COMESA). In the same vein, I should like to echo the recent OAU Labour Commission Resolution calling upon the Director-General of the ILO to increase budgetary funds allocated to Africa, in particular those related to technical cooperation programmes, and also to seek other budgetary resources.

The threats of globalization, such as loss of control of mechanisms for influencing economic policy by national governments, arising from increased liberalizing of capital flows, reduce the capacity of governments to take more definitive action in the areas of social development. Reforms at the international level are, therefore, called for. In particular, the international monetary system needs to be reviewed. Stronger implementation of debt relief measures are also called for as well as actual market access improvements in trade.

In conclusion, I would like to reassure you of the commitment and will of the Government of Uganda to the global battle against poverty and unemployment. I should also like to acknowledge the contribution made by the ILO and other donors towards our development effort.

Finally, I trust that our deliberations will consolidate the national and international action needed to confront the common challenge of poverty and unemployment in a rapidly changing global economy.

Original German: Mr. ARBESSER-RASTBURG (Employers' delegate, Austria) – First of all, I would like to congratulate the President on his unanimous election to chair the deliberations of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that, on account of his great experience, he will succeed in overcoming the difficult problems before us.

Thanks to its excellent preparations for the World Summit for Social Development and the outstanding presentation it made in Copenhagen, the ILO managed not only to draw the attention of Heads of State but also that of many international organizations to its work. It also succeeded, in a very convincing way, in highlighting the decisive tasks the ILO has to carry out.

In Copenhagen I had the impression that in the future, it would be easier for us to obtain more funds from the Bretton Woods institutions – funds which are absolutely necessary to allow us to carry out our vital technical cooperation activities.

We should not forget that these activities are particularly required in the developing countries and countries in transition to a market economy; as we all know, speedy help is twice as effective.

In this connection, reference must be made to the problem of the dollar exchange rate and the fact that there is likely to be a certain shortfall in income because some member States will probably pay their contributions late.

I would, therefore, like to propose examining the possibility – on a provisional basis – of only holding the International Labour Conference once every two years when we are beset by financial difficulties.

As a permanent representative of the International Organization of Employers (IOE) at UNIDO, I am convinced that a further strengthening of cooperation with this organization will especially benefit the developing countries.

As a personnel manager of many years' standing, I believe – and I have mentioned this on previous occasions – that our Organization should devote particular attention to the selection of staff and their training. Many experienced and leading personalities in our Organization have recently retired – or will be retiring shortly – and this task is therefore of special importance.

When I compare our present activities and the growing number of member States in 1995 with those of 37 years ago – when, for the first time, I came to Geneva as an Austrian Workers' delegate to take part in industrial committee meetings – I clearly see how important it is to have the right people to carry out our important duties – especially for the developing countries and the countries in transition to a market economy. This can only be guaranteed if further training is given more value. Especially in these days of major structural change it is important for the ILO to comprehend the importance of permanent education.

Copenhagen has shown us what a social responsibility our Organization bears; for the words spoken 75 years ago – that universal peace can be established only if based upon social justice – are still as valid today as they were then.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-JASSEM (Employers' delegate, Kuwait) – In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. Permit me to begin by conveying to all of you the respectful greetings of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Kuwait, which brings together my country's business community and which I have the honour of representing here. I would like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents who represent the three constituent parts of the ILO on the way in which they are conducting the work of this session of the Conference, while offering them my wishes for success and happiness.

As time goes by, every year we meet in June at this august assembly which brings together the ILO's Members and friends in a unique international event.

The subject chosen by the Director-General as the theme of his Report, Promoting employment, is a fine choice, especially as it was based on one of the decisions taken by the World Summit for Social Development, held in Copenhagen last March. Indeed, the Summit called on States to give the highest priority to achieving full employment in all their economic and social programmes and policies. Work is a natural right of every citizen of every country, and it is the duty of good government to ensure that opportunities for work exist. Providing a job for each and every able-bodied citizen is the best way to establish a basis for social peace and security.

The Director-General has described at length the economic and social consequences of unemployment, and he has given several examples from the various geographic regions. But the length of the diagnosis, however important it may be, detracted from the proposals for remedial action and alternatives with which to deal with unemployment and achieve full employment, and the Report did not sufficiently highlight the role of the ILO.

We agree with the contents of his Report in its broad lines. Indeed, unemployment cannot be solved except by increasing production, by creating new jobs in non-traditional industries, attracting more investment, fostering small business, liberalizing trade and privatizing, which is the best way to provide real job opportunities, thanks to the competition it spawns which will benefit all of society.

Privatization is not an end in itself. It is not a stand-alone development strategy, but rather a part of an overall economic reform package which includes a number of concepts, policies and measures aimed at freeing market forces and managing companies that produce goods and services with a high level of technical skill and without waste, while encouraging a spirit of initiative, creativity, discipline and freedom at the workplace.

The Report contains a good deal of information and some very useful data with figures and statistics which are drawn from reliable international sources. Like the previous Report last year, this year's Report mentioned the concept of a post-industrial society, and we believe that the Governing Body should pay full attention to this subject, and place it on the agenda of one of our forthcoming sessions of the Conference.

The Report courageously points out the obstacles which the developing countries and the newly industrialized countries have had to face. It states that: "From this perspective, a continuation of current trends in trade and investment flows will depress industrialized countries' living standards to the levels obtaining in cheap-labour countries. Not surprisingly, such perceptions have been at the root of the recent resurgence of protectionist sentiment in several industrialized countries." We can only imagine how far this could go, especially as some industrialized countries have begun wielding international labour standards as a weapon against the newly industrialized countries.

Multinational enterprises and transnational enterprises are praised somewhat excessively in the Report. The negative sides of their activities are ignored. We cannot go into this topic at length for lack of time. Furthermore, we cannot help but wonder at the 15 pages devoted to what the Report refers to as the first and second oil shocks. This term is used five times as of page 49 in the Arabic text (page 65 of the English version) and more than ten pages are devoted to it. What is more, each time the Report refers to the oil shocks, it attributes to them the entire economic recession, and a worsening of the unemployment situation in the industrialized countries. How can you place the blame on peoples who are entirely entitled to sell at fair prices the natural resources that God gave them? Are we going to start talking soon about the cotton shock, the gold shock, any other shock? Why for that matter do we not talk about the finished products price-rise shock for the developing countries, which brought about a tragic mountain of debt with an exorbitant cost?

We have noticed, at the very time when the Director-General is devoting his Report to promoting employment and the struggle against unemployment, that in the last four sessions of the Conference and in this one as well, the Conference has discussed topics such as self-employment or home work. The aim is to make such forms of work subject to rules and standards which are likely to hinder their growth, despite the fact that these are sources of new, non-traditional jobs. I think you will agree that this is something of a contradiction. I would also like to take this opportunity to draw your attention to the need to evolve. Our Organization is now more than 75 years old. The experience acquired in the first decades of the Organization's existence point to the need to take a fresh look at its role, for the following reasons: the current international labour standards that have been adopted by the International Labour conference over the past three-quarters of a century now cover all spheres of work and industrial relations; the formulas and the machinery for adopting the standards and following up on their application are outdated and insufficient (they are unable to take account of changes occurring nationally and internationally every year, if not every day); as a result, the subjects that have been put to the Conference over the last few years have become repetitive and redundant. As proof, I need only refer to the rate of ratification of international labour standards by the member States.

In conclusion, I would like to address the constructive cooperation between the ILO and the Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Kuwait. Our Chamber this year received two delegates from the International Labour Office, and we reached an agreement in principle to resume the joint cooperation which began in the 1980s and was designed to provide training and an exchange of experiences between a number of people working for the employers' organizations of Arab countries, under the aegis of the Chamber's training programme. The programme was interrupted in August 1990 due to the barbarous invasion of Kuwait which took place at that time.

I would like to thank the International Labour Organization for its assistance. I hope the programme will be crowned with success and that cooperation between employers' organizations in the various countries and the ILO will increase in forthcoming years.

May peace, mercy and the grace of God be with you.

Original Spanish: Mr. OBREGÓN SABOGAL (Workers' delegate, Colombia) – I would like to congratulate the President of the 82nd Conference, Mr. Rosales Argüello, on his election to the presidency of the Conference. He is an influential government representative who is very aware of social problems.

The phenomenon of unemployment has in today's world become the main scourge of the economies of many countries, and especially those which are less developed. This is why it is so significant that this theme was chosen by the Director-General of the ILO for this Conference.

In Colombia it was thought that unemployment was mainly associated with a low level of dynamism in the productive sector, preventing growth from absorbing the labour force.

Colombia is a country characterized by an intermediate level of industrial development with a high proportion of production of primary commodities and exploitation of non-renewable natural resources. The manufacturing industry has not achieved a level of productivity and competitiveness which would enable it to reach a significant position in domestic and foreign markets.

The agricultural sector has declined, and urban activity has experienced unsteady growth. Migration of workers towards urban centres can be explained by the structural transformation of the economy, the process of industrialization and by the displacement of large numbers of peasants driven, among other factors, by political violence in the rural areas which has been going on for four decades.

Structural transformation and the urban migration which has accompanied it has gradually reduced the labour surplus in rural areas. However, the cities were incapable of absorbing productively a large part of this migratory flow and growing numbers of surplus workers were formed in the cities, while marginal occupations and badly paid jobs proliferated, in commerce, but also in other urban sectors.

Colombia jumped on the bandwagon of liberalization with an ill-prepared national industry, an ill-qualified labour force, and without the physical and infrastructural conditions to compete on the international market.

The indiscriminate opening of the domestic market deeply affected national industry and employment, especially in textiles, clothing and leather goods. This led to economic instability in small and medium-sized enterprises, and unprecedented social consequences on account of the closure of many such enterprises. Now we see the importation of manufactured goods, via contraband and "money-laundering", of the order of US$3 billion per year.

The Ministry of Labour and Social Security, through its Programme of Industrial Labour Adaptation, has calculated that some 450,000 workers have lost their jobs as a result of the liberalization of trade. There is no doubt that the worst effects of these ill-managed policies have been felt in the agricultural sector. According to studies carried out by the Colombian Farmers' Association, the importation of foods and agricultural raw materials led to more than 400,000 hectares being withdrawn from cultivation and 100,000 jobs being lost.

The Department of Agricultural Studies of the Colombian Farmers' Association noted that 2 million tons of foodstuffs and raw materials entered the domestic market, leading to a substantial decline in domestic prices. Paradoxically, while the Colombian Government is eliminating subsidies and incentives to agriculture, the European Community, the United States and Japan are spending more than US$300 billion to subsidize their own production.

The country is stimulating foreign investment with favourable conditions; however, these investments have not led to major benefits such as added value and the creation of new enterprises. Foreign investors prefer to invest in sectors and services where they get large profit margins such as the exploitation of natural resources and financial services.

The Trade Union Confederation is in favour of policies which channel foreign investments into labour-intensive sectors using locally-produced inputs, and where production is complementary to local production, such as environmental conservation and above all where there is a real transfer of technology and reinvestment of profits.

In tune with the neo-liberal wave, it was considered that the Colombian State was "very large" and therefore had to be reduced to its minimal expression, shifting functions, liquidating and privatizing state enterprises in industry and commerce, and likewise in the parastatal sector.

According to a study of the National Federation of State Employees (FENALTRASE), in the four years of application of the neo-liberal policies, almost 80,000 civil servants were laid off, and there is a possibility that this number will grow to 120,000 as a result of the proposed further restructuring and privatization of state enterprises.

Open unemployment in recent years has dropped; recent figures show that 7 per cent of the economically active population is unemployed.

For the trade unions it is not sufficient to show that there has been statistical reduction in indices of open unemployment; it makes more sense to analyse the type of job which have been created.

Redundant workers have been forced to create small production units or to work providing services in the home in order to survive. Through these small, individual or family units, there is a further widening of the already worrying bricolage economy. The informal sector is growing in dizzying proportions and now involves about 60 per cent of the working population.

The informal sector is precisely the mechanism adapted to respond to the so-called "modern" requirements of self-exploitation of labour through the "decentralization of production" or homework. It is the so-called "rationality" of modern firms which hands over to micro-enterprises (in the informal sector) those tasks which they do not find efficient and/or profitable.

Informality has become a socio-economic phenomenon at the national and international levels involving vast numbers of people. Its fundamental characteristic lies not in its articulation with labour, with the market or with the State, but in the level of poverty of its workers, expressed in very long working hours, lack of social security and insecure incomes.

It is calculated that the number of small informal units producing goods and services is about 1.2 million in the ten biggest cities of the country.

Trade unions have proposed numerous measures to deal with the problem of the informal sector, ranging from special policies and the provision of social security to the provision of working capital and professional training. Such measures must be accompanied by the encouragement of the organization of both trade unions and employers' organizations.

Recently the Colombian President presented a programme to generate 1.6 million new jobs in the country, to raise the quality of employment, set up a new ambitious professional training policy and promote a new culture of work-employer relations.

The trade union confederations and especially the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT) expressed some doubts with regards to this ambitious programme. It is our view that so long as the structural and conjunctural problems of the economy persist, so long as the macroeconomic policy remains unchanged and does not guide private and public saving towards productive investment, the productive apparatus of the country will not recover and will not therefore provide jobs for the unemployed.

It is important to note, however, that the Government did create a Commission to follow up this employment plan, with four places set aside for trade unionists.

The main points of employment which need to be looked at are: (1) the economic opening needs to be directed towards the creation of better productivity and competitive conditions in industry and agriculture; (2) the programme of job creation must be based on the stimulation of national industries with special incentives and credit facilities for cooperatives, small enterprises, micro-enterprises and small-holding farmers; (3) a programme agreed with trade unions for the modernization of enterprises and the adoption by them of new technology in accordance with the need for industrial reconversion and development; (4) an agreed programme of training and retraining to adapt the labour force to the need for modernization, efficiency, productivity and competitiveness at the enterprise level; (5) productive employment must also lead to the adoption of special programmes of conservation, protection and decontamination of the environment; (6) raising the real incomes in order to promote demand for goods and services, re-activate the economy and consolidate the domestic market and make the supply, especially of basic consumption items, more responsive to demand; (7) a change in the protectionist policies of industrialized countries, with the establishment of more equitable relations and trade preferences for less-developed countries, as well as a campaign against unfair practices and the channelling of financial flows towards productive investment.

As the Director-General of the ILO stated: "It is clear that a fundamental requirement for restoring full employment is the creation of an institutional framework for cooperative international action in finding optimal solutions to the pressing problems of unemployment and related social ills." This is why we, Colombian workers would make a plea for maintaining the opportunities which already exist, and for the creation of new ones, for developing countries to play their part in the international context.

Original Spanish: Mr. TRAVIESO DAMAS (Government delegate, Cuba) – I would like to congratulate President Rosales Argüello on his election and that we are proud, as Latin Americans, that he has been elected.

It is heartening that the International Labour Organization is redoubling its efforts to promote, both nationally and internationally, action that will make it possible to solve the current world employment problems. In his Report, the Director-General tells us that the ILO has been receptive to the idea expressed many times by the Members of this Organization that the struggle against unemployment and poverty should be a fundamental objective of the Organization, without which other activities would only have very limited application. This approach is reaffirmed by the mandate contained in the Declaration and Programme of Action adopted at the World Summit for Social Development, which stresses the special role the ILO should play in the sphere of employment and social development to put the two documents into practice.

The so-called liberalization of trade will be nothing more than a white elephant for poor countries, affected by foreign debt and the fall in commodity prices if the opening up of markets is not accompanied by activities undertaken by the international community to provide technological and financial support to governments from the south to help them achieve better levels of development.

To the extent that free trade is really free and governments take definite measures to redistribute the fruits of economic progress on an equitable basis, the effects on employment and social development will vary accordingly.

In the Director-General's Report it is said that the globalization process restricts the effectiveness of traditional instruments to influence the level and quality of employment.

There can be no denying that developing countries should adapt their policies and institutions to the search for greater participation in the world economy, but such a quest does not mean accepting pre-conceived schemes, nor foregoing the right to decide which measures are necessary to develop and to meet the nation's requirements. Globalization and the ensuing interdependence should be seen as a broad process of exchange in which the diversity of the participants is respected and in which their universal aspects can be acknowledged.

Until recently the politicians of only a few countries, including Cuba, voiced the need to combine economic and social development. Today this approach has become universal.

Alongside the problems affecting the developing world as a result of the current globalization process, for Cuba there are also the consequences of the disappearance of the Socialist bloc and the Soviet Union, and the renewed intensity of the economic blockade that we have had to endure for over 30 years.

The country has had to cope with the abrupt disappearance of 85 per cent of its markets, over half of its fuel supplies and over 70 per cent of its imports, and we have coped with this simply through our resolve to resist and with a series of measures and changes that are designed to tailor our economic model and policy to the new situation, without forsaking the principles of equity and the achievements of the socialist revolution in the field of social justice.

The changes that have taken place include the development of agricultural cooperatives, by giving workers 58 per cent of state-owned land to use freely; they are the owners of their production machinery and profits are distributed among members; the expansion of self-employment; the application of a new tax law and stringent budget control, including domestic financial restructuring measures; the decentralization of foreign trade and the expansion of the financial and operational autonomy of enterprises; the free fixing of prices on the new complementary agricultural and industrial markets; the simplification of the state machinery; the adaptation of our labour legislation to existing and future conditions; and the development of foreign capital investment.

In the sphere of employment it has been necessary to reallocate our available manpower as a result of structural and institutional changes that have occurred in enterprises, and of reduced activity for economic reasons. Work and production has been reorganized so our manpower can be used more appropriately. Despite the adverse conditions, no worker has been left unprotected and, apart from the alternatives of employment, training and refresher courses, for those workers for whom alternative employment cannot be found, there is a wage guarantee of 60 per cent of the fixed wage, that can continue for a period of up to 54 months depending on the number of years of service.

At the moment we are trying to generate useful jobs that do not require high levels of investment within Cuba. The community participates very actively in order to guarantee consumer goods and services for the population. As mentioned earlier, self-employment is also being promoted. At the same time, we are maintaining a priority on stepping up tourism, the pharmaceutical industry and biotechnology, areas in which a substantial investment programme has created a considerable number of new jobs.

In our employment strategy, foreign capital investment, that began in the tourist sector, has been extended to other areas of the economy. This open-door policy is not just an emergency measure to alleviate the economic situation, but instead is part of a very carefully conceived plan to promote our insertion into the global economy. Legal guarantees exist, such as the amendment of article 23 of the Constitution which now expressly recognizes the property rights of joint ventures, and agreements have been reached with various countries to protect foreign investments. At present we are working on an investment law that will provide for new guarantees and transparency.

The road of change which Cuba has chosen in a sovereign and independent manner in order once again to take its place within the world economy, to reactivate its productive apparatus and thus to increase employment levels and improve working and living conditions, is being blocked by the harassment policy that is being levelled against our country unilaterally, violating the will of the international community that has for the third time, and with a vast majority, condemned the blockade policy against Cuba.

The Government of Cuba is not among those countries that feels sceptical about full employment. This has been an objective of our social economic policy ever since the revolutionary triumph in 1959, and we have certainly not forsaken that policy. From our own experience we can say that when you have the political will and the right measures to combine economic development with social development, great progress can be made.

Those who actively promote globalization have a great deal of responsibility to meet the needs of the developing countries, so that the political will of governments may bear fruit by providing new jobs.

The eradication of poverty and the struggle against social exclusion call for employment promotion. Economic growth in conjunction with social development will have an impact on employment. All this should be done without detracting from social justice.

Mr. PARROT (Workers' delegate, Canada) – The Report of the Director-General is an abridged version of World Employment 1995 and we congratulate him on bringing it forward. The way in which it is presented positively changes the terms of the debate. We also applaud the attempts made in the Report to attack many of the myths, fostered by corporate propaganda and neo-liberal economic theory. These myths suggest that the unemployment crisis in the north is caused primarily by north-south trade, too much labour market regulation and high wage and security demands of workers.

For a long time, workers in Canada have been saying that the primary cause of high unemployment has been bad government policies which have deliberately escalated unemployment as an anti-inflation measure and failed to pursue positive adjustment measures.

Our concern is that despite the analysis contained in this Report, many governments will continue to operate under the premise that the globalization process can continue to be driven exclusively by the free market and that the role of the State is to simply adjust to it.

Canadian workers disagree. We think there is still a place for the State in the international economy, and we think the ILO can and must be a place where country delegations made up of Workers, Employers and Government representatives can come to share ideas about how organized society can best intervene in the free market to bring about social justice.

When we recently lobbied our Prime Minister prior to his hosting of the G7 Summit, we said to him that, after nearly two decades of failed neo-liberalism, the State must now take back its ability to influence the macro-economy on behalf of its citizens, and this includes taking control of both the international financial markets and the social dimension of the international trading system.

Of course, no country can do this by itself. It will take cooperation at a multilateral level, and we strongly believe the ILO is well-placed to play a leadership role here. We are therefore disappointed that governments are threatening the ILO with non-payment of dues or, in the case of one government, outright withdrawal from the institution if it should have the audacity to criticize it.

Our reading of ILO history suggests that the fostering of multilateral cooperation was the role those who conceived the Organization had in mind in 1919 when everywhere they looked, they found social lawlessness and moral anarchy. Those leaders whom, one thinks, had considerably more vision than some of the leaders of today, recognized that to practise economics that were neither socially nor politically sustainable was to foster instability and threaten civilization itself.

With a billion people in the world living in abject poverty and misery, with hundreds of millions of people unemployed in north and south alike, with some 400 million youth expected to be unemployed in the developing world by the end of this decade, with corporations reaping profits unsurpassed at any time in this century, with the income gap between rich and poor both within and between countries widening at a dramatic rate, we think it is indeed time to revisit the ideas of social intervention.

As we have said in this place before, the world trading system is a useful and logical place to begin the process of socializing the global economy. We have advocated, and we continue to advocate without apology, that a rules-based international trading system that provides a level playing field of basic workers' rights is absolutely essential to the long-term political, social and economic stability of the world. We will continue to promote a social clause in the world trading system that will help to bring this about.

Workers categorically reject the proposition which has been repeated in the Director-General's Report, that the advocacy of such a social clause is in any way protectionist. We think it would at least begin to deal with the worst form of protectionism, that of those corporate citizens and pirate States that want to protect some competitive advantage by trading products procured through slavery, bonded labour, exploitation of women and minorities and exploitation of the working poor who are denied the right to freely associate and participate in the development of their societies.

We appreciate that there are poorer countries that may need technical assistance to reach up to the bottom of the social norms advocated in the relevant ILO Conventions, and we would hope that a social clause in the WTO can act as a lever to get these countries the assistance they so desperately need. But let us not be fooled by those countries that would hide behind the poorer countries in hopes of defeating the idea of socially regulated trade and investment. Let us instead push to implement a social clause that will serve to expose the unscrupulous.

A social clause in the WTO is by no means the only measure required to socialize the global economy. We must also find ways to put sand in the wheels of market speculators who transfer more than a trillion dollars per day around the world. I am shocked that the Director-General's Report makes no mention of this practice which, in the case of Mexico alone, will cost the economy more than 1 million additional jobs this year alone. We must put a stop to this and the ILO must play its role in analysing the employment aspects of market speculation.

Finally, we want to reiterate the point that the overriding priority for governments must be to improve growth in an effort to progressively reduce employment. For this to occur, governments must become more free to intervene in the domestic economy on the one hand and be more willing to cooperate with one another in the global economy on the other hand. International economic cooperation must include a new deal for developing countries and for Central and Eastern Europe. In view of the fact that I have two more minutes, I must point out that I was very happy to see that the Copenhagen Summit entrusted to the ILO the task of setting up a more just situation and we hope that the social clause will also be implemented. We hope that this will happen in the near future.

Original Arabic: Mr. RASHED (Workers' delegate, Egypt) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. First of all I should like, on behalf of the Workers of Egypt and on my own behalf, to congratulate the President on his election to chair this session of the International Labour Conference. We are sure that, thanks to his wisdom and experience, we shall be able to attain our objectives.

I would also like to express my congratulations to the Officers of the Conference and those countries that have recently joined the ILO; this confirms the worldwide mission of our noble Organization.

We have become used to coming to the International Labour Conference year after year to speak about problems besetting mankind and its legitimate hopes of creating a world in which men and women live as God wanted – free, honourable and proud.

This session of the Conference is taking place at a time when the world is undergoing a profound and rapid change, which has both positive and negative repercussions. It is drawing attention to the negative repercussions to try and come to grips with them and examining the positive ones to see how we can learn from them.

Be that as it may, what matters is that we try to create better conditions on earth for mankind. And in this context, the Report of the Director-General, for which we would like to thank him, concerns the problem of employment in a new age, full of challenges – the most important being employment and poverty.

It goes without saying that we endorse the views expressed by the Director-General in his Report and have to cope with these challenges and try and bring about full employment. At the same time the Report does not pay sufficient attention to some of the employment and social problems of the developing world, in particular the African and Arab countries, and this despite the very grave problems endured by Africa because of poverty, unemployment and structural adjustment, not to mention disease and epidemics, and natural disasters. This omission is all the more surprising given that the Report expresses concern about the ever greater marginalization of Africa. There has to be a much closer look at the assistance provided by developed countries to Africa, so as to help the continent to implement policies to combat poverty and unemployment. On this point, let me recall that the Social Summit in Copenhagen did confer on the International Labour Organization a heavy responsibility in this sphere.

The problem of the social consequences of trade liberalization is a very important one which has been discussed in the ILO Governing Body. For this reason the ILO must continue to draw up international labour standards so that the Organization's objectives can be met, whether in improving standards of living or creating social justice. We are convinced that the ILO is the only organization competent to apply these standards.

It is obvious that the developing countries and poor countries desperately need this economic development which is their lawful right. They are also entitled to benefit from their comparative advantages, such as a cheaper labour force, to be able to be competitive on the international market and succeed their social development.

In this context, we believe that the International Labour Organization should step up its support to its member States, especially the developing countries, and to help them transform their economic development into social development.

I should also like to add that the Organization should play a role in coordinating and cooperating with international financial and monetary institutions, in particular the IMF and the World Bank, so that these institutions give priority to employment promotion and social issues in their programmes.

In Egypt we were very quick to see which way the wind was blowing in terms of world economic change. That is why the Government, in consultation with the social partners, has drawn up policies which take these changes into consideration and which emphasize the social dimension. This appears clearly in the social reform and structural adjustment programme which we have gradually begun implementing, and which has eliminated some of the negative repercussions which had affected workers and the poorest segments of the population. This programme makes provision for employment protection measures, stimulates investment in labour-intensive industries and in income generating sectors and facilitates the social integration of all population categories, and especially of women, the young and the handicapped.

Egyptian trade unions have thus had the labour legislation pertaining to workers' organizations amended so as to bring it in line with international conventions.

The trade union movement, working with the Government and the employers, is now working with the ILO in drawing up new labour legislation which is in conformity with international labour standards and which meets the needs of the future.

We are not opposed to the proposals made at this session of the Conference as regards an increase in the number of members of the Governing Body. This could be a temporary move while we await the completion of the amendments to the ILO Constitution, adopted in 1986. We would also like to say that we are rather shocked by how slowly these amendments are being ratified, in particular by those countries that have permanent seats on the Governing Body. We should like to recall to the Conference that these amendments were the outcome of great efforts made by the Members of the ILO and by the various regional groups over some 20 years. The objective was to modernize the structure of the Organization so that its structures and programmes would reflect the needs of the membership more closely, especially the developing countries, in a democratic and fair manner. Consequently we have great hopes that the Director-General will use his good offices to make sure that those countries which have not yet ratified these amendments do so as quickly as possible.

Economic and social development as a means of achieving full employment is the very noble objective being discussed by this Conference. In order to obtain it, there has to be a climate of security, stability and peace; and an end must be put to the tensions and conflicts prevailing in many regions of the world, especially in the Middle East. It is clear that the unresolved problems and continuous tension have had a negative effect on employment and block development efforts.

We are proud to see that great efforts have been made by the ILO to assist our Palestinian brothers and to alleviate their suffering. Nevertheless, we have certain concerns about the contents of the budget proposed to the Conference for the forthcoming financial year. Indeed, there is a proposal that the Organization's funding be cut in half for programmes aimed at developing the Palestinian Authority's institutions and employers' and workers' organizations.

The debates and deliberations of this session demonstrate that we all share the same desire to see peace and security and to create conditions conducive to international efforts to build a new world, with prosperity and wealth to ensure a brighter future for everyone.

Mr. PALKOVICS (Workers' delegate, Hungary) – On behalf of the Hungarian workers' organizations, I would like to congratulate the President and office holders of the Conference on the occasion of their election and wish them full success.

The Hungarian trade unions have given the Director-General's Report their close attention. It offers a comprehensive review of the past and maps out the tasks and orientations for the future. There are crises all over the world the consequences of which affect the masses of wage earners first of all. The scope and dimensions of poverty are more and more alarming. The rights of workers and their unions are being rudely violated. It is therefore a priority objective for the ILO to step up its work and be in the vanguard concerning initiatives aimed at doing away with the grave problems.

Hungarian trade unions are aware that occasional major international conferences, such as the Social Summit held earlier this year, cannot take over the role of the ILO in the struggle against poverty. The rich, time-tested experiences and mechanisms of the ILO are the guarantee of enduring and effective efforts.

Hungarian unions share the conviction that the recipe offered by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund is neither the sole nor a welcome remedy for economic crises in several regions of the world (developing countries, Central and Eastern Europe). Subordinating social security to financial balance at all costs means a huge burden on workers and gravely jeopardizes social peace.

We observe with concern the attempts of the above financial institutions to influence the range and role of ILO activities. We know from our experiences that there is a genuine need for the knowledge and skills of the ILO, especially for the sake of maintaining tripartite interest negotiation.

The intention of the ILO to improve the enforcement of Conventions and Recommendations is of the utmost significance for us amidst growing social tension and dependence. Hungarian trade unions insist on maintaining a social dialogue under the circumstances of the economic crisis in the country.

A shift in the role of the State can be noted worldwide. In Hungary this fact is of particular relevance since earlier the presence of the State both in the economy and the social field was overwhelming. The withdrawal of the State is presently disproportionate since no definite economic, financial or any other conditions have been proposed for its replacement. The consequences at the individual level are often unbearable, and the many tensions could provoke a social explosion.

Hungarian trade unions legitimately expected the new socialist Government – unlike the preceding Conservative Government – to improve the conditions of labour and of social partnership. With the new Government's restricted room for manoeuvring the proposing of a comprehensive and long-term socio-economic agreement appeared to be a logical development. Now, one year later, we are forced to admit that agreement has not been reached. In the opinion of our unions, the Government is mainly responsible for the failure. The tripartite agreements that had been reached in the process were repeatedly violated or declared void by the Government without the consent of its social partners.

Interest negotiations were also weakened by the way in which the Government prepared and introduced its economic stabilization package. Its measures are having a negative effect on a broad strata of society, as well as provoking strong public discontent because the Government has taken decisions without consulting or negotiating any interests.

The Government's stabilization package is far from focusing on job creation or unemployment management. The effects of the package are as follows: it damages the functioning of the institution of free wage negotiation, which is one of the latest achievements of the Hungarian labour movement; changes in the unemployment system are aimed purely at cutting costs, no distinction is made between its social and employment policy aspects; the transformation of the social benefits and social security systems destroyed the presently not very efficient but relatively reliable system and replaced it with another one without seeking public acceptance or examining its impact on society; the package reflects a clear intention to push aside the present system of social security which is based on risk sharing and self-governance. No distinction is made between the operational area of social security for public benefit and commercial insurance companies. These commercial insurance companies are gaining ground, subsidized by the State, while there is still no law regulating their activities in Hungary. Social insurance refuses to finance on-the-job medical care, which is a violation of an ILO Convention that had been earlier ratified by Hungary and is fraught with grave consequences for workplace security and health care; the Government – despite union protests – modified the Labour Code without providing effective protection to union officers, ignoring an ILO Recommendation. The planned imposition of sanctions for violations of labour regulations disregards the respective ILO Recommendation. Consequently, the possibility of violating labour regulations – such as arbitrary cessation of employment, disrespect for procedures of negotiations and wage protection, unilateral work contract modification, employer coercion or threats, etc. – may persist without sanctions.

In 1993 one of our union confederations, the National Confederation of Workers' Councils, submitted a complaint which was accepted as justified in the 294th Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association at the 1994 ILO Conference. So far, the Hungarian Government has taken no substantial steps to remedy the causes of our complaint. It is for this reason that we duly appreciate the words of the Director-General concerning the ILO's intention to work harder for compliance with the Organization's activities.

I wish full success to all participants of the Conference.

Original French: Mr. ANGUIMATE (Government delegate, Central African Republic) – It is a great honour for me to represent my country, the Central African Republic, at this the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I should like to take this opportunity to associate myself with previous speakers in congratulating the President on his brilliant election to preside over our Conference. I should also like to congratulate the other distinguished Officers, whose valuable assistance will facilitate his onerous duties.

The Government of the Central African Republic welcomes the topic for this year selected by the Director-General of the ILO, Promoting employment. This subject is very relevant and topical and no one can remain indifferent to it in this period of general unemployment. This topic is a perfect extension of the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen from 6 to 12 March 1995. My country was represented at this Summit at the highest level of State by His Excellency Ange Félix Patasse, President of the Republic and Head of State, accompanied by a large delegation of ministers and experts. This shows the importance we attach to the Summit.

When he spoke at the Summit, the President of the Central African Republic welcomed the fact that at last a World Summit had been convened to consider the social problems at the turn of the century: poverty, unemployment, underemployment, exclusion and intolerance.

In his address, the President of our Republic expressed the wish that courageous and responsible decisions would be taken as a result of this Summit to eradicate the omnipresent scourges of our planet. He invited the international community to undertake a collective and objective scrutiny of the causes of these scourges which strike indiscriminately against the rich countries of the North and the poor countries of the South, so as to identify appropriate solutions.

Moreover, he launched an urgent appeal for the establishment of a new Marshall Plan for the poorest countries, in particular those of the African continent who strain under the heavy burden of debt and conditions imposed by their development partners.

At the conclusion of this Summit, the Declaration and Programme of Action were adopted by our Heads of State and Government. Our Government is totally committed to this text.

Though only three months have passed, we have once more come together to study ways and means to promote employment.

This might appear superfluous at a first glance given the Declaration and Programme of Action adopted by our Heads of State and Government. However, the overwhelming fact described in the Director-General's Report on the world labour situation and the nature of our Conference justify our further consideration of these issues.

In general terms, apart from certain developments seen in isolated cases, we must face the fact that internal and external factors are simultaneously exerting a negative effect on employment causing difficulties in most of our States. Thus at a time when promotion and creation of employment are becoming major concerns in every State, at a time when we are all working towards the central goal for the year 2,000, employment for all, for the fulfilment of the individual, the labour market is shrinking and even tending to disappear.

The creation of more opportunities to promote productive employment has a very high priority in the development policy in my country, which is coming out of a period of political unrest and chaos which have undermined economic structures, destroyed the industrial and commercial system and broken up the social sector.

It is therefore essential to increase employment in the industrial and commercial sector to reabsorb surplus agricultural manpower and combat underemployment which is rampant in rural areas and the informal urban sectors, which constitute a veritable haven for small traders and craftsmen.

This is why we appreciate the incisive approach of the Director-General of the International Labour Organization who has stressed the interdependence between employment and meeting basic needs.

The goal of any measure to promote social progress should be full productive employment and equitable distribution of wealth obtained from balanced economic growth for the benefit of all sectors of the population. We believe that promoting employment is of particular importance given the great poverty which is crushing two-thirds of the world population, people who are victims of unemployment and underemployment.

The topic chosen by the Director-General of the ILO for his Report has received close attention from the Government of my country since it is in keeping with the goals we have set for the economic and social development of the Central African Republic in the years to come.

In its policy our Government intends to merge the National Manpower Office and the National Inter-professional Organization for Training and Advanced Training and to create a National Agency for Employment Promotion which will assist in the attainment of the priority goals set down in a programme for the implementation of a coherent employment and training policy.

The Government intends to do all it can to put this agency into operation in the course of this year in order to be more effective in combating unemployment among young graduates who continue to come onto the labour market in ever-growing numbers and find there are no longer opportunities.

Since its assumption of power as a result of the 1993 elections, the Government of change has faced a problem of vast proportions: the lack of a coherent and formal policy on employment and training. To remedy the situation the Government has carried out an analysis of all the services within the Department responsible for labour, in order to identify priority needs. This assessment was carried out with assistance from the ILO Multi-Disciplinary Team for Central and West Africa (EMACO).

We applaud them enthusiastically for the work they have done. Two projects were launched in parallel. The project on work-experience placements in enterprises for young job-seekers aims to combat long-term unemployment of young executives seeking their first job, and thus to promote in the long term their employment by employers who are often reluctant to hire young graduates without professional experience.

To extend this first programme my Government has set up a national employment promotion project. This project is intended to help the Government to develop institutions, strategies and measures to promote employment through medium and long-term policies of integrated human resource development.

The implementation of this project should lead also to the establishment of the national employment fund to help find jobs for those made redundant by public and private enterprises and for young people from rural areas who have been trained in non-governmental organizations, by providing assistance with retraining or advanced training, or with setting up micro-enterprises or independent activities.

This shows that professional training and increase in productive employment are dominant in our employment policy in all sectors of the economy. But in our situation as a developing country our development policy and the results and social consequences can only have a positive outcome if we receive external support through bilateral and international cooperation based on human solidarity rather than on considerations and motives of a political and strategic nature.

This is why we hope that our gathering will be able to translate into practical decisions and programmes of action the suggestions of the Director-General concerning policies to be implemented for a new approach to the problems of international development. Therefore, our Conference should shun declarations of intent and empty slogans in favour of tangible results to bring an end to persistent distortions in economic relations which consist of confrontation between rich and poor in a position of the dominant and the dominated.

The spirit of the recent Copenhagen World Summit should triumph through the promotion of international cooperation and solidarity in action. It has become necessary for the countries of the North to revise their view of economic cooperation and technical cooperation with developing countries by authorizing transfers of appropriate technology and sufficient capital.

We feel this new orientation will promote an increase of employment which will be able to absorb millions of men and women who live today in a world in which they have no hope of finding employment.

This is the only way in which we can fairly share wealth between nations and between individuals within nations. This requires an international division of labour and a far-reaching change in investment policy by managers of multinational corporations because of their influence on transfers of production, capital, technology and production techniques.

Thus we suggest that the International Labour Conference should adopt a veritable international ethical code for development which would apply not only to States but also to transnational corporations which exert a considerable influence on the world economy.

Original Arabic: Mr. EL DIN (Employers' delegate, Egypt) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. I should like first of all to congratulate the President on the confidence shown in him by the delegates to this session of the Conference. I wish him and the Officers of the Conference every success. I should also like to express my deep appreciation to the International Labour Organization for its achievements over the past 76 years in terms of drawing up and assessing labour standards throughout the world.

Personally, I feel that the work of this Organization is particularly difficult, in comparison with other international organizations, due to its tripartite structure which is reflected in social and economic relationships in the various countries of the world. In this regard, I should like to point out that Egypt is one of the first countries of the world to have fully understood the importance of this Organization and its objectives in terms of ensuring economic and social justice with full respect for human rights. In pursuance of those principles, the relationship between the social partners in Egypt is based on complete understanding thanks to continuous dialogue and cooperation, as all parties have realized that this is the only way to ensure development and stability in the light of the current economic challenges facing Third World countries.

Our meeting comes at a very important and delicate juncture in view of current economic changes and the agreements reached in the World Trade Organization. The pressures these agreements exert on Third World countries call for radical changes in the role to be played by the International Labour Organization, including in the sphere of training, vocational guidance and efforts to instruct the production partners in how they can play their universal role and guarantee their share of international trade in the near future.

In the last ten years, Third World countries have started to restructure their economies and simultaneously develop and strengthen the role of the private sector in order to cope with developments in production and exports. Egypt has embarked on a gradual policy of privatization based on the principle of respect for workers' rights, and of allowing entrepreneurs to buy a number of companies and to participate in the management of other enterprises to make them more competitive in international markets.

I should like to point out the importance of the role of the International Labour Organization in the future, when it will have to pay particular attention to Third World countries, including on the African continent. It will also have to encourage rich countries to support development in these countries so that they can ensure social justice. In this way the term "international cooperation" can become a reality, including with regard to offsetting the negative impact of economic structural reforms advocated by the World Summit in Copenhagen.

Given the importance of work in people's lives and in society, unemployment is a dreaded disease spreading through developing countries where unemployment rates are at their highest. In order to find a solution to this problem, Egypt has enacted laws and regulations to encourage and protect investment and investors. For example, exemption from custom duties and taxes as well as essentially free grants of land at symbolic prices. As a result, we have created many industrial parks and other enterprises that have led to the creation of thousands of jobs. This policy is the crux of development in Egypt. The employers have responded positively to this policy. They are very keen to boost their production as well as to upgrade continuously these projects.

The World Trade Organization agreements, calling for the globalization of trade and the liberalization of international trade, will cause serious harm to poor countries, which could become even poorer while only rich countries enjoy development and progress. An in-depth study of these concerns should be carried out, since herein lies a role that the ILO could play in the future. The Organization must stress the comparative advantages of the developing countries in order to re-establish a certain balance in international investments so that each country will receive its rightful share of international trade.

The unemployment crisis affecting developing countries will only be solved and eliminated by increasing production and investment, and by creating jobs, while favouring highly labour-intensive industries. These include textiles and clothing, which are making considerable strides in international markets, such as in the United States, Japan and Europe.

The World Trade Organization has set a timetable for the gradual implementation of this programme by the developing countries. However, this is insufficient. The rich countries must provide technical and financial aid to the poor countries, especially in this transition period, if the new world order is to be sufficiently equipped to create the social balance that the WTO aspires to. Other international organizations also have a role to play. They must help these countries to modernize their legislation and to improve the conditions of production so that they will be compatible with international standards, leading to the attainment of an economic and social balance in these countries, that reflects the rapid technical developments throughout the world.

Before concluding, I should like to point out that the Government of Egypt, since the implementation of economic reform policies and restructuring, has been keen to involve employers in the decision-making and legislative process. Of course, this new policy has helped to create an atmosphere of economic stability and promoted investment. It has also helped to bring down inflation and interest rates, which has encouraged employers to increase investment and create jobs for young graduates.

Recently, the social partners have put the final touches to a new standardized Labour Code which is in line with new economic policies and restructuring which cater to the interests of all parties and lay a solid foundation for long-term stability.

In conclusion, I wish the President, the Officers of the Conference and the distinguished delegations every success. I hope that the people at the helm of this Organization will implement our recommendations whenever possible.

May the peace, mercy and grace of God go with you.

Mr. ZIMBA (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Zambia) – It is a great pleasure and opportunity for me to address the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. Allow me on behalf of the Zambian delegation and indeed on my own behalf to extend to the President my heartiest and warmest congratulations on his unanimous election to office, together with my congratulations to the entire team in respect of the deliberations of this session. I am positively confident that by virtue of the immense experience that the President possesses, the business of this important Conference will undoubtedly be crowned with tangible success commensurate with the aspirations of our people, as he ably steers the deliberations of this august gathering to a successful conclusion. I wish all the distinguished personalities and participants of the Conference great inspiration in the debate of the issues on the agenda.

May I now take this rare opportunity, like previous speakers, to happily and warmly welcome all the new Members of the ILO, who have joined us to defend together the importance of this Organization's foundations, and the role that it is called upon to play in the promotion of social justice, of human dignity and of social dialogue.

When we gathered here last year, by means of the Report that he presented to the august and historic 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, entitled Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: an ILO agenda, the Director-General paved the way for an animated and extensive discussion on highly topical issues, such as effectiveness and the role of the ILO's standard-setting activities in a globalized economy; the social dimensions of international trade and investment; the organized and decentralized approach to the ILO's technical assistance and advisory activities; the generation of employment in both the formal and informal sectors; and the enhancement of the ILO's analytical and research capacity for issues falling within its mandate. The Director-General and his staff should be complimented for the wonderful job that they are doing.

I am pleased to note that the theme of this year's session of the Conference is the concept of promoting employment. This issue is of paramount importance. It figured prominently on the agenda of the World Summit for Social Development which was held in Copenhagen, Denmark from 6 to 12 March 1995. No doubt the ILO was determined that the Summit should leave a mark on social policy worldwide. By defining a new approach to such a policy, the ILO sincerely hoped that a political consensus would be reached by the heads of state at the World Summit. All nations have a common interest in each other's welfare, social progress and stability. Such consensus should of necessity embody a determined collective commitment to the desired goal of full productive and freely chosen employment.

Productive work is not only a means of economic livelihood, but also a defining element of human identity. There is no doubt that employment gives meaning and dignity to people's lives, provides a structure for social relations and solidarity for the community. Zambia, like many other developing countries, is experiencing high levels of structural unemployment and underemployment which requires that the State, the private sector and other sectors and institutions at all levels cooperate fully to create conditions to make it possible for everyone to participate in productive work.

The Zambian Government attaches great importance to the subject of employment promotion, and is ready to share the stance that the International Labour Organization is prepared to take on this matter. No doubt, any meaningful initiatives in an attempt to stimulate growth in overall employment will entail the mobilization of resources, because of the evident changes that have taken place in the world economy in the past few decades. These changes obviously have affected both the level and the structure of employment across the globe. Currently the trend of growth in employment is greatest in small and medium-sized enterprises and in self-employment. We have witnessed an unprecedented phenomenon in developing countries to the effect that informal sector activities often are the leading source of work opportunities for people with limited access to formal sector wage employment and, in particular, for women.

Zambia as a concerned member of the global family of the nations belonging to the United Nations is very concerned about doing something positive with regard to the issues of employment and human resources. It is for this reason that the Government ratified the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) in 1979 and has, under very difficult circumstances, endeavoured to ensure that there is work for all who are available for and seeking it; that such work is as productive as possible and that there is freedom of choice of employment.

The unfortunate situation facing the Zambian nation today is that while the concept of social development is broad and multi-dimensional, the guiding principles of which include commitment to the provision of equal opportunities for all, promotion of economic growth and equity, and promotion of effective participation of people, (and especially the poor, the deprived and civil society), the envisaged development has not been sustained, mainly due to poor economic performance since 1974 when the price of copper, the country's major foreign-exchange earner, fell on account of the world economic recession.

As a result, by 1982 the Government adopted a structural adjustment programme. The change of Government in 1991, when the country returned to pluralistic politics, brought about the vigorous implementation of the programme, with emphasis on private sector initiative as an agent for economic growth and social development. Through these reforms, Zambia has been able to achieve microeconomic stability. However, the structural adjustment programme has had short-term negative impacts on the poor and most vulnerable. These negative effects have been addressed through various poverty alleviation programmes that have been launched.

It is fully acknowledged in Zambia that gainful employment is a prerequisite to meeting the basic needs of life, and a means of placing all the Zambian people on a path of assured material security and independence. In recent times, generation of gainful employment has been frustrated by the poor performance of the economy, which is to be attributed to numerous factors. In order to stimulate and expand productive employment in the economy the Government has taken such measures as creating and enabling an environment for productive investment and the promotion of small-scale labour-intensive programmes.

In taking the above measures, with a view to redressing the employment problem, the Government has initiated the following long-term strategies: provision of incentives through an appropriate micro-economic environment to promote the creation of employment opportunities; giving incentives and support to the development of the informal sector through small-scale enterprises and village industries that are production-oriented and labour-intensive since such industries generate more jobs per unit of investment than large-scale industries; promotion and maintenance of good industrial relations through tripartite consultation machinery, mediation and conciliation services, and arbitration by the Industrial Relations Court; provision of a conducive legal framework through the revision and enactment of labour laws, the Investment Act and the formation of an Investment Centre.

I am pleased to note and report that the Zambian Government has as of now ratified all the ILO Conventions on basic human rights as a gesture of support for the ILO Programme of Action. In this regard, we in Zambia desire that a great deal of the ILO's attention and assistance therefore now be focused, more than ever before, on matters of social welfare, namely, creation of productive employment, poverty alleviation and improved social protection.

We look forward to receiving substantial support in our efforts to fight social evils such as child labour abuse. It is clear that the fight against social ills and inequalities and the promotion of employment will require combined international action. The fundamental requirement for restoring full employment is the creation of an institutional framework for positive and cooperative international action in finding optimal solutions to the pressing problems of unemployment and related social ills.

Many developing countries still have natural resources which have not been or have only been inadequately exploited, as well as the problems of poverty and unemployment. This situation is due to scarce capital and technology. There are limits to the mobilization of domestic resources in the short or medium term for the exploitation of our abundant resources, as a result of which we are compelled to seek capital from external resources.

EIGHTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We start today's session with the eighth report of the Selection Committee, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 4G.

If there are no objections, I shall take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

REPORT OF THE STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – The next item is the adoption of the report of the Standing Orders Committee, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 11.

I call on Ms. Thompson Chacón, Government delegate of Costa Rica and Chairman and Reporter of the Standing Orders Committee, to present the report.

Original Spanish: Mrs. THOMPSON CHACÓN (Government delegate, Costa Rica; Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee) – I have the honour to present to this Conference the report of the Standing Orders Committee, which met on 8 June to discuss and approve the amendments referred to in Provisional Record No. 1.

The Committee's discussion took place in a spirit of cooperation among all three groups. As indicated in its report, published in Provisional Record No. 11, the Committee examined two amendments to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference, whose adoption is now being recommended to the Conference.

The first refers to the established practice of electronic voting for plenary sessions of the Conference. If the amendment is adopted it will also be possible for electronic voting to be used, if they so wish, for the Resolutions Committee, and for elections to the Governing Body by the electoral colleges.

The second amendment to the Standing Orders of the Conference involves increasing by ten the number of deputy seats in the Government group of the Governing Body, and by five each in the Employers' and Workers' groups.

In this way, and assuming that the necessary resources will be approved in the budget, the membership of the Governing Body will be increased pending the entry into force of the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the ILO, which was adopted in 1986. The Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution will however serve as a guide to the number of seats attributed to each region within the Government group.

The Committee also recommends to the Conference the adoption of two resolutions concerning the procedure to be followed at the two Conferences to be held in the next few months.

In view of the Governing Body's decision to convene a Maritime Session of the International Labour Conference in January 1996, the first resolution proposes a series of measures to facilitate the work of the session and limit its cost.

The second resolution proposes to apply to the Fifth European Regional Conference the same simplified procedure as has been used on an experimental basis for the past three Regional Conferences.

Both of these proposals were unanimously endorsed by the members of the Committee, and I wish to thank the Vice-Chairmen for their collaboration.

It is therefore a great pleasure for me to recommend, on my behalf and on that of the two Vice-Chairmen of the Committee, that the Conference approve the amendments to articles 19, 49 and 50 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, which appear in paragraphs 8 and 17 of the report, and the two resolutions annexed to the report, which I hereby submit to the Conference for adoption.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – The report presented by Ms. Thompson Chacón, Government delegate of Costa Rica and Chairman and Reporter of the Standing Orders Committee is now open for discussion.

If no one wishes to ask for the floor, we shall move on to the adoption of the report, section by section. To begin with, I submit the introductory paragraphs 1-3 for adoption.

May I take it that paragraphs 1-3 are adopted?

(Paragraphs 1-3 are adopted.)

I now submit for adoption Part I, which concerns amendments to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference (paragraphs 4-18). The text of the amendments appears in paragraphs 8 and 17.

May I take it that paragraphs 4-18 of the report are adopted?

(Paragraphs 4-18 are adopted.)

Part II, concerning the derogation from the Standing Orders for the next Maritime Session of the International Labour Conference (paragraphs 19-21) and the resolution concerning provisions applicable to the 83rd (Maritime) Session (Appendix I.A).

May I take it that paragraphs 19-21 of the report and the resolution that appears in Appendix I.A are adopted?

(Paragraphs 19 to 21 and Appendix I.A are adopted.)

I now submit for adoption Part III, concerning the procedures at the Fifth European Regional Conference (paragraphs 22-24) and the resolution concerning the Fifth European Regional Conference (Appendix I.B).

May I take it that paragraphs 21-24 of the report and the resolution appearing in Appendix I.B are adopted?

(Paragraphs 22 to 24 and Appendix I.B are adopted.)

Finally, I submit for adoption Part IV of the report, containing the Committee's recommendations (paragraph 25).

May I take it that paragraph 25 of the report is adopted?

(Paragraph 25 is adopted.)

May I take it that the report as a whole is adopted?

(The report as a whole is adopted.)

I would like to congratulate the Chairman and the Vice-Chairmen and the other members of the Committee on their excellent work.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We shall now resume our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original French: Mr. DENIS (representative of the World Confederation of Teachers) – The subject of the Director-General's Report is central to all debates currently being held in all continents and societies throughout the world. Two essential elements should be emphasized. It is necessary by promoting employment significantly to reduce or better yet, to do away with inequality and all forms of exclusion which eat away at our communities. Then, we should effectively and in the solid framework of national and international plans, in a spirit of cooperation, to implement bold and innovative policies. This is how the legacy of the World Summit, in Copenhagen should look.

While the Summit, as such, was a major event hopes have been raised with regard to its follow-up, particularly in the field of education, and in terms of the budgetary aspect, employment and the fight against marginalization and inequality. Teachers emphasized this again at the sixth Congress of the World Confederation of Teachers held in Dakar in August 1994. The realization of human potential depends on education and training. The extent to which teachers keep a close watch on what is going on in their local communities will determine how far they are able to increase awareness of the fact that urgent solutions can and must be found to a good many more aspects of the crisis than merely those associated with finance and economics.

In a motion relating to the problems of structural adjustment and social justice in the educational sector, the World Confederation of Teachers emphasized that education can promote a country's economic growth and social development and that, accordingly, any cut in the resources allocated to education impoverishes human resources in the medium- and long-term, with particularly devastating consequences in developing countries.

We must therefore strengthen the whole social dimension of the programmes proposed.

Against this backdrop, we welcome the impending first session of the Standing Technical Committee for Educational Personnel, to be held in October 1995 at the ILO. This will provide an opportunity for an up-to-date and targeted approach to the situation of teachers throughout the world. The analysis then undertaken will give an outline of future policies as concerns the financing of educational services and its impact on employment and the conditions of work for teachers, career development, equality of opportunities and treatment, particularly for women teachers, consultation and negotiation, remuneration and the general conditions in which the profession is exercised.

The World Confederation of Teachers welcomes the results of the work of the Committee on Sectoral and Technical Meetings and Related Issues, the programme and the work methods proposed. We venture to hope that the timetable of meetings will be confirmed and that the requisite financial and human resources will be earmarked for the attainment of the objectives proposed. We are prepared to assume our responsibilities so far as the programme's proposals are concerned.

The Recommendation Concerning the Status of Teachers, a Joint ILO/UNESCO Recommendation dating from 1966, remains, maybe even more than ever, important as the guiding force of and inspiration for future-orientated strategies. What we have to do now is to ensure that it is even more widely known. We have taken careful note of the conclusions of the meeting of the Joint ILO/UNESCO Committee of Experts on the Application of the Recommendation held in July 1994.

The WCT wishes to register its support for the approach adopted by the Committee. We would like to emphasize that international trade union organizations should be fully involved in the work of the Joint Committee.

Selective and partial implementation or indeed the non-implementation of the Recommendation in many countries is jeopardizing the status of teaching staff. Failure to respect ILO Conventions relating to negotiation, to the individual rights of teachers and to freedom of association is an all too frequent element which we must condemn.

Furthermore, the essential role played by women in education is not duly reflected in equality of opportunities and treatment for women. If women are to have a better access to the teaching profession, particularly to responsible posts, we must eliminate the legislative, administrative, social and cultural obstacles in their way.

Finally, we must condemn the exploitation of children and child labour. Albert Thomas, first Director-General of the ILO, said that child labour was the most hideous and most abhorrent form of evil known to man – and, we might add, to teachers. We demand that children receive an adequate and high-quality education, that they be able to enjoy all the other rights which appear in the Convention on the Rights of the Child and in the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138).

Running through all the subjects which we have only been able to touch upon is the problem of employment, and all questions pertaining to human rights. The ILO has a paramount role to play. We support it while making it clear that when necessary we are determined to redirect certain approaches in a spirit of constructive criticism, cooperation and close collaboration.

The hope that the world of the future may be more balanced is perhaps somewhat Utopian. However, this Utopia is not beyond our grasp. It is already the reality of tomorrow. The international trade union activities of teachers will assume their full meaning only if they build bridges to the future and open new horizons. Our true vocation is to look to the future and here and now to encourage action.

Original French: Mr. GARBA (Minister of Public Service and Labour, Chad) – It is a great pleasure for me to be taking the floor at this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like to take this opportunity to convey on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Chad, and on behalf of the delegation that I am leading, my warmest congratulations to the President and other elected officials. I am sure that they will use their great skills in guiding this Conference to a complete success.

Referring to the Report of the Director-General on the promotion of employment, I would like to commend it for its quality, its relevance and its gravity. Once again the Director-General has defended the ideals of the International Labour Organization in its struggle for lasting economic and social development.

The disease that has been diagnosed in this Report is a universal one. No country has been spared – the developed countries and the developing ones, the North and the South. All, in fact, are suffering in varying ways the problem of unemployment. The major changes that have occurred over the last few years throughout the planet have caused a crisis in unemployment and poverty, and this has been compounded by the growth rate of the population in general and of the active population in particular.

Unemployment is one of the most alarming things that can happen to a man. Can you consider a man, an unemployed man, as a complete human being when he is incapable of meeting the basic needs of either himself or his family. It is very important that the ILO should use all of its energies and show a great deal of imagination so that unemployment, if it cannot be eliminated, should at least be reduced to decent proportions so that the right to work for all human beings is not just some vain idea.

Chad, my country, is in the belt of the most deprived countries on the planet. It is part of those countries of sub-Saharan Africa whose situation is so well described in the Director-General's Report. Our country is doubly marginalized because the economy is globalizing on the one hand, but we on the other are geographically landlocked. We have no maritime shoreline and the nearest port is 12,000 kilometres away. Furthermore, we have very little industry in our country.

Chad, rising up from the ashes after many years of civil war along with an equally devastating drought, is trying once again to endow its development partners with confidence. The employment problem is accentuated in my country by the rural exodus towards the towns. People come seeking hypothetical employment without any kind of qualifications. Tens of thousands of young people expand the lists of job-seekers – a list which is always growing because of budget cutting and restructuring measures.

The public administration is the largest employer, but it is no longer recruiting the graduates that it has in fact trained as part of the structural adjustment measures. Very strong pressure is brought to bear to bring about drastic reductions in staff. This situation leads to a new phenomenon which is a real time bomb in fact. We are talking about unemployment which affects several thousands of young, new graduates.

It is recommended that the State should relinquish its hold on the production sector, but at the same time private operators cannot promote activities or even absorb all of these unemployed people. The number of unemployed – swelled by those demobilized from the army – in our country has increased by 17,000 over two years; it is therefore easy to understand that there is a good deal of delinquency both in our towns and in rural areas.

Despite this very difficult task, the Government is trying to find ways out of it by: reactivating the programme on education, training and employment; modernizing production in the rural sector; giving support to small trades and crafts; developing associations and cooperatives; and developing small and medium-scale enterprises.

In this struggle to fight unemployment, the Ministry of Public Service and Labour is trying to train hundreds of young people in various purpose-built centres to give them a chance to find a job.

Also in the hope of cutting down on unemployment, the Government has signed the ATETIP programme, that is the Chad Agency for Works of Public Interest. This leads to an improvement in various parts of the country's infrastructure and it provides a good deal of jobs for the unemployed.

The Government of Chad is trying to tackle the endless question of improving living standards of workers, together with the trade unions. We have signed a social covenant, the basic characteristics of which are to: consolidate systems for dialogue between the social partners; reinforce the protection of workers and trade union freedoms, in particular by ratifying and putting into practice a good many Conventions under the aegis of our Organization; and to upgrade payment both in the civil service and in the semi-public and private sectors.

This covenant has come into force while the Government is caught between the need to motivate workers on the one hand and while being severely afflicted by the CFA franc devaluation, and the need for structural adjustment on the other hand.

It is a very difficult exercise as you can imagine. Nevertheless, we made decisive progress when we promulgated the new Labour Code that is currently being prepared – and we request assistance from the ILO in this phase. Needless to say, at a time when our economy and our society are changing very seriously, and when the various social partners are looking for something to hold on to, any assistance we can have from the ILO would of course be of very great assistance.

I hardly need to repeat that job-creation policies and policies to improve the standard of living of workers in my country, which is burdened by external debt both multilateral and bilateral and which is bleeding our budget dry, is essential. In such a situation our burdens would be greatly lessened if we were to receive the assistance I have mentioned above.

We need, more than ever before, international solidarity which is both sincere and active so that those islands of paradise – glimpsed here and there – should not be swallowed up by the oceans of poverty constituted by the poorest countries and continents. We must ward off this fate.

Original French: Mr. RAKOTOVOLOLONA (Minister of Public Service, Labour and Social Law, Madagascar) – On behalf of the delegation of Madagascar at this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference, it is a great honour for me to extend our warmest greetings to the President as well as to the Director-General of the ILO and all members of the delegations of each country.

I would further like to express my wishes for the smooth running of the Conference's work as all the constituents and the authorities of each country express their ideas on the development of international trade and international labour standards.

On the 75th anniversary of the ILO, my address, which I hoped to be a message, stressed the importance of international solidarity and support for greater social justice in a world which is in the throws of change, while at the same time calling for respect for the specific characteristics and sovereignty of each State.

The World Summit for Social Development which took place in Copenhagen in March 1995 allowed us, on the threshold of the twenty-first century, to take stock of the trends and factors in the growth of international trade, as well as the relevance of structural adjustment and international standards, especially for developing countries.

In simple terms, there should be a correlation between the liberalization of international trade provided for in the document signed in Marrakesh and international labour standards.

According to this concept, the social clause should be considered as one of the most important conditions for international trade, because no full economic progress is possible without the adoption of basic and universal labour standards. International labour standards formulated by the ILO as Conventions, whether or not they have been ratified by the various member States, are the fruit of discussions, exchange of experience and observations that have been gathered by the regional offices of the ILO or have been communicated by each member country.

The application of the recommendations included in these Conventions, however practical and flexible they may be, should take into account the economic recovery and development policies which each State intends to follow, as well as their respective institutional structures.

In the developing countries, full employment depends on natural resources, access to financial markets and international trade.

However, the structural adjustment which has been advocated, which must strike a balance between internal constraints and objectives in order to provide for regular growth and equitable distribution, amounts to making sacrifices in the present for the sake of development in the future.

This structural adjustment involves a balancing and stabilization phase, during which it is recommended to take measures to make the balance of payments maintainable in the medium term and to ensure sustainable growth of GDP.

Even at the very beginning, the price of such a policy in social terms and in human suffering cannot be measured.

The experience of structural adjustment leads us to ask the following questions. How can we implement structural adjustment programmes and at the same time avoid a loss of jobs and a reduction of social protection as the State cuts back? How can we guarantee the application of social clauses linked to international trade, while at the same time embarking upon economic and social reforms?

It is quite true that adjustment with a human face is still at the centre of each State's concerns, but as I said in my speech last year, it is important that the assistance provided by the ILO should be part and parcel of the promotion of democratic values and the market economy.

A new strategy for the development of international standards should therefore be considered. This strategy, through sincere and faithful cooperation, could be the centre of activity of the ILO's regional offices. These offices can all be modelled according to the economic and social programme of each State.

The problem of employment in such a strategy requires a new kind of industrial and international relations; relations which should adapt to changes in the institutional structures of all member countries.

It is all too clear that the problem of employment is very closely linked to economic progress, as this was stressed in the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen.

It is for this reason that the application of resolutions, and especially the follow-up of international labour standards as desired by the participants in the Copenhagen Summit, can only be effective with the contribution of the ILO and its constituents.

The delegation of Madagascar, which was reassured by the pertinent comments made by the Director-General at the Copenhagen Summit, can only express its full solidarity with his remarks. My delegation believes that social clauses should not be used as a tool to accentuate differences in the level of development between countries.

Any attempt to perpetuate the perceived geopolitical causes of these differences can only be a hidden form of protectionism from another era.

The delegation of Madagascar continues to believe that international labour standards drawn up by the ILO are part of a larger vision for the development of the human personality, and thus contribute to the defence of human dignity and to the changes that have to be undertaken.

Original Spanish: Mr. CUEVAS (Workers' delegate, Dominican Republic) – The delegation of the Workers of the Dominican Republic would like to extend cordial greetings to the delegates attending this 82nd International Labour Conference which is going to be discussing a topic that is very closely linked to the future of the working world.

First and foremost we wish to point out that the Report submitted by the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, on Promoting employment, pinpoints some of the major evils afflicting the world of work, in particular, afflicting the developing countries. The Declaration that was adopted at the World Summit for Social Development at Copenhagen, along with the Programme of Action in which Heads of State and Government, commit themselves to promoting the objective of full employment “as a basic priority of [their] economic and social policies and to enable all men and women to attain safe and sustainable livelihoods through freely chosen productive employment”, highlight the need to resolve this problem because if it is not solved levels of poverty and social protection will worsen and there will be no guarantee for the development of peace in the world.

One factor that has to be stressed in the ILO Director-General's Report on the promotion of employment are the reasons that he selected for the success of the East-Asian economies, based on well-planned development strategies, high levels of saving and investment, a liberal trade regime, an export-oriented industrialization and a very successful attraction of foreign direct investment.

In Latin America and the Caribbean, these are basically the recipes that are suggested and very often imposed by neo-liberalism through international financial structures which have as their supposed objective the development of all peoples. They propose processes of modernization and economic restructuring through the reform of the State, liberalization of the economy, effective adjustment and stabilization policies so these countries can face up to the new realities in the world economy, so as to ensure the payment of their external debts to banks and international organizations.

The basic components of these neo-liberal economic policies are: reducing the role of the State to a minimum as a regulator of the economy, giving free rein to the market to set the priorities of each economic activity; deep and permanent cuts in the quality and quantity of social expenditure and social security, and the privatization of functions which for generations were the sole preserve of the State; application of purely sectoralized and remedial social policies; the prevalence of speculative finance and the service economy over more sustainable, harmonious, productive economies; making labour legislation more flexible so as to reduce the scope of provisions which regulate worker protection inside the firm; restriction of trade union rights such as the freedom to join unions, the right to strike, the right to bargain collectively, in order to lay the stress on individual hiring by the enterprise and thus undermine the legitimacy of trade unions; partial or total elimination of price subsidies for basic needs in the family budget; the control of important areas of the national economy by transnational enterprises and groups of local business people through privatizations which increase the degree of monopoly and the transnationalization of the economy; a shift in the tax burden bearing no relation with the distribution of income between rich and poor; elimination of the minimum wage or reduction of its role as a floor for the earnings of the poor and of unskilled workers, under the banner of wage competitiveness.

As a result of this policy, in the name of micro-economic stability, the population of Latin American and the Caribbean is in fact suffering very serious social consequences in terms of unemployment and underemployment in the formal sector: decline in job quality, absence of social protection, for middle and working classes, extreme misery and serious social marginalization. In Latin America, more than half of the population lives below the poverty line.

In the Dominican Republic the economic adjustments have meant that more than 57 per cent of the population is now living below the poverty line. According to official statistics offered by the Government, unemployment amounts to some 27.5 per cent and underemployment to 20 per cent which has meant that more than half a million Dominicans over the last ten years have had to emigrate.

As part of the changes in the global economy, the Dominican Republic has been trying to promote a service economy in which a prominent feature is the export processing zone, known in Central America as maquiladoras. This has generated more than 170,000 jobs of which 75 to 80 per cent are women's jobs and 73 per cent of the enterprises are in textiles and clothes manufacturing.

Another dynamic sector is tourism. The vital importance of tourism which has become our prime source of foreign exchange, overtaking the traditional sugar industries. This service-based economic model involving free trade zones and tourism are based on tax breaks, and low wages, even lower than the legal minimum, in order to compete internationally. Indeed they even have special exemptions because they are not obliged to share profits with workers. Also, trade union rights are generally not respected by these industries, since they oppose free organization of trade unions and collective bargaining.

Despite the fact that the Dominican Republic has approved a new Labour Code (Law 16-92) agreed by consensus among government, employers and workers, in practice, in many cases employers, and the Government as employer, violate it quite brazenly. Many employers wish to make changes to the Code saying that it creates a rigidity on the labour market at a time when the globalization of our economies call for flexibility in labour relations.

I would conclude by stressing that at this time in history, the question of whether or not we should link internationally recognized basic labour rights to the trade liberalization arising from the Agreement establishing the World Trade Organization. This social clause would subject international trade to certain conditions such as the respect for fundamental rights enshrined in ILO Conventions namely freedom of association, protection against discrimination, the banning of forced labour, and the elimination of child labour.

There is no good reason for the opposition to this social clause expressed by the Employers' group and certain governments on the Governing Body Working Party set up in 1994.

These Conventions and Recommendations are absolutely vital for the fundamental human rights of the workers, and to protect them against repression, exploitation and discrimination. Therefore we support the proposal of ICFTU that the social clause contains basic standards which could be taken up by the World Trade Organization.

Such standards apply to every country in the world. There is a very serious danger in many countries that if you have a dynamic market based on extreme competitiveness, then basic rights of the workers will quite simply be abused.

The International Labour Organization should play its full role in this sphere. It has a tripartite structure and its experience can therefore play a major role in the fields of employment and in equitable development.

Today, more than ever before, in a world that is becoming more globalized, the Declaration of Philadelphia of 1944, in which full employment was recommended as a basic objective of national policy, is more relevant than ever. As the Declaration states: "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere".

Mr. AHMED (Minister of Labour and Productivity, Nigeria) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I begin, on behalf of the Government and the people of Nigeria, and my humble delegation, which I have the honour and privilege to lead, by congratulating you, Mr. President, and your Officers on your election to chair the current session of the International Labour Conference. Since your assumption to this chair, the conduct of our affairs here so far has been highly admirable and, of course, commendable.

I wish also to congratulate the International Labour Organization for the singular honour accorded to it by the Copenhagen Summit of Heads of State and Governments to play a major role within the United Nations system in the implementation of the Summit's Programme of Action. Furthermore, I congratulate the Director-General for his Report which was eloquently delivered.

The Copenhagen Summit brought together many Heads of State and Governments for the sole purpose of addressing, for the first time, the problems of human and social development. These problems have arisen in part as a result of the globalization and liberalization of trade that is being pursued without due regard to the social and human exigencies.

The significance of this Summit should be viewed from two perspectives. First, it brings into focus the global nature of social problems and the universal concern for the urgent need to address the human and social consequences of globalization before they get out of hand. Second, by its decision, the Summit underscores the importance and pertinence of our Organization as an international institution that is capable and appropriately structured to address social problems.

The ILO is involved in Nigeria in many ways. The Organization has assisted us to handle and cope with the scourge of unemployment, underemployment, skills formation and social security. Nigeria appreciates the technical assistance of the ILO and looks forward to additional assistance in these and other areas.

The nine years of structural economic reform policies have created so much stress and strain in our political and social lives. At this moment the social problems caused by our compliance with the prescriptions of the international financial institutions continue to affect adversely our effort to achieve sustainable economic recovery and indeed development.

These are some of the reasons which informed the decisions of the present administration to reappraise and reassess some key areas of these reform measures. Our objective is to strengthen our institutions and people to cope and contend with the prevailing economic realities of our nation which bear relevance to our national socio-economic aspirations.

In pursuing these objectives our intentions are being misunderstood in certain international financial institutions. As a result, we are being intimidated and frustrated and, in some respects, our sovereignty is eroded in various international fora.

The effect of the structural adjustment programme weighs heavily on Nigerian workers, in both the formal and the informal sector. Government has tried to mitigate these effects without unduly interfering in the affairs of the unions. Among other things, the Nigerian Government has invested 230 million naira in the last four years in assisting the unions to develop their own infrastructures. This is in addition to the assistance given to them in the sum of 200 million naira for the ongoing construction of their secretariat in Abuja.

As regards employment and the unemployed in our wider society, we have set up the National Directorate of Employment for the purpose of job creation. Our aim is to create 2 million jobs; furthermore, we have given periodic relief measures and these are being extended to all categories of workers.

There are many more development activities that we can do in this area, but a developing country such as Nigeria does not have adequate resources to deal with its multifarious development problems. Hence, Nigeria will welcome international assistance that will genuinely lead to growth and development.

The ILO, in its 76th year now, more than ever before requires to be fully equipped to face the challenges of today and tomorrow. We believe that one way of assisting the ILO to play its part effectively is to support its budgetary proposals as put forward by the Governing Body. This is why we have come here with the sole intention to give the ILO that necessary support that it requires in increasing its financial resources, so that it will be able to contain and extend its valuable services to the wider societies of the underdeveloped and Third World nations.

This is why we get concerned when some delegates speak of strengthening the ILO and yet object to increasing the financial resources of the Organization. This, in my opinion, appears to be contradictory.

May I reaffirm the consistent stand of Nigeria since our joining the ILO in 1960. We support all the ideals and objectives of the Organization and we believe that it should be funded, and it must be funded, fully.

Original Greek: Mr. SKOULARIKIS (Minister of Labour, Greece) – Allow me first of all, in taking the floor, to extend my warm congratulations to the President and all the Officers on their election, and to wish them every success in their work which, I am confident, can be taken for granted since their personal skills are well known to all of us.

My congratulations also go to the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, on his annual Report entitled Promoting employment, where, much to my satisfaction, the Director-General stresses the ILO's role in ensuring employment.

As we are about to witness the dawn of the new millennium, and as we are evaluating the contribution that the twentieth century has made to the development, progress and happiness of mankind, we could have said that this century has been the century of great expectations and of great disappointment. The liberation of the potentialities of man and the anticipation of creative work that have been achieved by the introduction of scientific knowledge, in mass production and the shortening of time of work, including the technological miracle that followed, have all created the impression that the days of poverty, of adversity and prejudice have all gone forever.

The twentieth century could easily have been named the century in which a divided mankind, a mankind that has been ideologically charged with fanaticism and each time with different interests, has fought and competed with itself for the liberalization of labour. It is about a contrasting effort of liberalization of different practices such as involve the bonds and necessities of the natural environment, and social bonds, seeking to bring to an end to human exploitation, monotonous and alienating repetitive work, social marginalization, intervention of the State, and modern slavery. Today's rise in unemployment and the marginalization of work indicate that efforts to liberalize labour have their limits, at least for the remaining years of this century and in consideration of the forms that these efforts have taken during this time.

The hopeful global vision of liberalizing labour, the first historical moment of becoming conscious of the universality and globalization of human existence, this very vision that has been built on the foundations of science and technology, has been turned into a nightmare, this vision aimed at removing forces that gave their absolute support to controlled or free economies, political totalitarianism or individualism and to the social superiority of a group of people taking advantage of others. The wars and revolutions of the twentieth century are closely linked to efforts to establish work as the principal creative and liberalized activity of man. Instead of this, today we are witnessing economic, political and social changes and the degradation of the concept of work, of the very employment that strives to provide the employee with the possibility of surviving in an exceptionally competitive and unkind environment, accepting without question or criticism the statutory limits, structures and functions involved in securing a place of work. In fact, this is happening at a time when the necessary international democratic institutions are absent, while the globalization of the economy, on the one hand, and the maintenance of social policies at a national level, on the other, tend to create a contradictory situation characterized by doubts and an undermining of the democratic institutions of various countries.

If the developed countries have the luxury of differentiating work from employment – the first as a dynamic force of creating, and the second as a mere bread-winning activity – what can we say about developing countries? What can we say about marginalized and outcast social elements in rich countries? The new global discrimination is between those who have jobs and those who do not – the latter are becoming more and more dependent on charity, social welfare and social relief.

And here is the greatest paradox of our times: if the awareness of globalization was formerly nourished on the basis of the social liberalization of work, dependent on practices of social justice, social relief and welfare, and social care for our fellow man, and in contrast to the economic logic of profit, today its realization is the result of the domination of the economic logic of profit and runs contrary to social sensitivity and understanding of the effects of unemployment, poverty and adversity that are experienced by millions of people throughout the world.

By the end of the Second World War and in the three decades that followed, the developed countries, despite the cost of the cold war, based on Keynesian political economy, managed to create conditions of full employment and at the same time to create a welfare state, notably under market economy conditions. Economic policy was linked to social policy within the framework of a regulative intervening state.

The planning of the relation between economic and social policy could have been made at the moment of shaping rather than at the time of application. The latter would have placed social policy in an inferior position with regard to economic policy. Thus, it was possible to include the cost of social policy in such a way as not to appear as antagonistic to the country's economic policy. The intervening parliamentary institutions, which were in a constant process of development and expansion, have been providing for the possibility of creating a wider approval, both for the economic as well as for the social policy of the State. Thus, the economic, political and social role of work has expanded, and in the final analysis this has upgraded modern society.

The monetary and energy crisis of the mid-1970s led to changes, from a policy of prosperity to a policy of austerity, from a policy of full employment to a policy against inflation, from a welfare state to a free-economy policy. Today, 20 years after these changes, the developed countries are witnessing unemployment that averages 12 per cent without taking into account part-time employment or even occasional employment. Developing countries are experiencing frightening levels of unemployment approaching the figure of one billion unemployed persons, not to mention the quality of employment in these countries. The new jobs that will be created by the year 2000 will not exceed one-quarter, roughly, of the total jobs that the world needs today.

It is interesting to note in this context that developing countries which entered the developed world in terms of free market labour and without building a social state are experiencing growth of their gross national product at a rate between nine and 11 per cent without necessarily undergoing a corresponding decrease in unemployment.

One more interesting element of the limits of employment policies that are possible in a non-regulated labour market concerns the policy of reducing the cost of work as a means of increasing employment. A country with ten per cent unemployment and a 0.5 index of elasticity wishing to reduce unemployment by five per cent, should increase employment by 11.8 per cent and reduce the cost of work by about 40 per cent, reducing employer contributions by 80 per cent, a practice that of course, can be supported by government.

The creation of an international fund is becoming highly important, as it is meant to support policies for combating poverty and unemployment throughout the world, particularly in the developing countries. This need has existed since the time of Keynes, and it was supported at the recent Summit for Social Development, attended by Heads of States and Governments in Copenhagen. If it is realized, it could place the responsibility for development on the international community and thus would reduce the speculative character of various isolated national development policies.

The unification of economic and social policy for labour within the framework of international intermediary parliamentary institutions in an environment of tough economic competition becomes a precondition for changing a policy of maximization into a policy of development. Social policy in labour must be integrated into the economic union.

International institutions that secure and promote measures for healthy and safe conditions for employees, for their democratic union rights, for their social protection and care, as well as for a more equitable distribution of produced wealth, will constitute a starting point for the democratic control and regulation of the global labour market.

The experiences of the past two years has shown that European economic policy is not likely to get anywhere near the target of creating 20 million new jobs by the year 2000.

At the same time, Europe is facing difficulties aplenty: illegal immigrants adding to the already high jobless rate, increasingly severe international trade competition, and the increasing need for assistance to countries with economies in transition. One should also bear in mind that the economic and technological reconstruction being attempted by the European Union cannot catch up with that of competitive countries and unions, which results in a tendency toward deindustrialization, particularly in less developed European countries. We must add the fact that the labour force is getting old, a tendency that requires specific attention and welfare policies.

Under these conditions, Greece, perhaps less hit by unemployment to date compared to other European countries, is suffering from widespread deindustrialization and is pressing ahead with the vision of a social Europe as a basic political strategy. Greece is interested in the development of investment activities that include the social factor and promote employment. This is because Greece believes that the political and social cost for all those countries that are not promoting unification of the economic and social policies regarding labour will be much greater than the cost that should be borne today for social care and relief.

Political and social institutions which support social dialogue among community partners with the contribution and support of the State could play the role of legislator on socially sensitive practices concerning development policy for employment and against unemployment.

An important problem facing almost all countries in the European Union is that the labour force is getting older. A possible solution could be an early retirement scheme, so as to fill this manpower gap with younger employees.

The Union is also focusing its attention on the social dimension of international trade. Action is needed to improve working conditions of workers.

The ILO has an obvious part to play in exploring ways of solving the problem. In this regard, the ILO should of course be inspired by the basic principles that govern its own functioning and that of every truly democratic society, such as abolishing forced labour, forbidding child labour, allowing the freedom to organize and granting the right to collective bargaining.

Original Arabic: Mr. EL KHAZEN (Government delegate, Lebanon) – The Labour Minister has asked me to read for him the speech which he has prepared as circumstances have prevented him from coming here himself. First of all I would like to congratulate the President on the confidence placed in him by the Conference. I would also like to pay tribute to the efforts which he and his colleagues are making to ensure that the work of this Conference is a success despite the conditions prevailing in the world today.

Before going into detail on the Report of the Director-General, I would like to pay my respects to him – first and foremost because the visit he made recently to my country was a fruitful one. It bore witness to the fact that all the institutions of the United Nations system, as well as other organizations, could now return to Lebanon and reside there, because they can now enjoy security and stability as well as the hope of reconstruction and human development. Next, I would like to tell him that my country will continue to host the Regional Office of the ILO so that it can continue to help the 14 countries of the region, including Lebanon.

Finally, I would like to assure Mr. Hansenne and his colleagues – especially Mr. Dajani, the Assistant Director-General – that everyone – Government, workers and employers – will do everything possible to guarantee the success of their mission.

In the past four years, Lebanon has succeeded in ending the chaos which prevailed during the savage war which lasted for more than 15 years.

The unity, determination and solidarity of the economic and social forces of Lebanon, particularly of its workers, as well as assistance from the Syrian Arab Republic, under the leadership of President Assad, have helped Lebanon bring about a miracle in the reconstruction of its country after its enemies had counted on its disappearance. The armed militias have been done away with, weapons have been collected, and we have been able to put an end to acts of aggression against persons, as well as public and private poverty; all this has allowed rights and freedom to be born anew.

And as if that were not enough, the Lebanese have reformed their parliamentary democratic system, based on a new national charter. They have also elected their representatives to Parliament. New constitutional governments have been set up and the judiciary has resumed its independent course so as to ensure that justice prevails in society. The Lebanese have also reformed the armed forces and their national security forces and established a constitutional court to be able to keep a check on Presidents and governments so that we can look to the future with confidence.

In this climate of security and political stability a movement for reconstruction and development was launched which has enabled us to recreate the infrastructure of our country and develop our resources.

We have achieved all this with limited resources and without any international assistance – although we need this urgently to rebuild what has been destroyed, to import modern technology and to prepare for the major changes of the twenty-first century.

I might add that all the problems my country has faced had an impact on our labour force which – imbued with patriotism – was prepared to make every effort and undertake any sacrifice. Indeed, it was able, throughout the war, to preserve its unity, its trade union freedoms, and its particular status in society.

The period of reconstruction, of which the Lebanese are alone in assuming the political, social and financial costs, do not allow the State to provide the benefits which the labour force requires. Nevertheless, the least it can do during this period of reconstruction is to provide all workers with their daily bread and a secure future by adopting legislation in conformity with democratic principles. Our economy is a liberal one and promotes development, with a view to guaranteeing social security for all our citizens.

Having said this, the Director-General's Report this year is very different from other reports we have seen in previous years. He reviews the employment situation over the past 75 years and describes prospects for the future. The Report reveals three realities.

First, our modern era is undergoing widespread economic change. This may be attributed to many factors, such as major economic regroupings and rapid scientific and technical development. It is therefore not surprising that my own country, as well as other countries, for reasons beyond our control, has been unable to keep pace with these major world changes. Our economic structures and means of production have remained behind the times. We thus need a new culture to develop these structures to be able to respond to the new world changes. If we are to be successful, we must review many of our policies, much of our labour legislation, and university, vocational and technical training. Lebanon is starting to give due attention to all these matters – even more so as our existing productive base is not sufficient to provide for our needs. Indeed, many professions and trades are facing a severe crisis because of the far-reaching changes which have taken place.

The second reality is that international cooperation over the past 75 years, in the form of human development programmes, has not borne fruit. Economic and social disparities are widening – as are those between nations. What will happen if our world is divided into two by technological progress? On the one hand, there will be a world which is rich because of its science, technology, resources and skills; on the other, there will be a world which is in the grip of poverty because of its limited means and low living standards – especially if international cooperation does not hold out hope for a better and more just international community.

The third reality is that many of our workers live in a climate of fear rather than being able to promote well-being and social progress, because state budgets allocate more to arms than to development, reconstruction and international cooperation.

These three realities give rise to three questions: first of all, how is it possible to assure the well-being of all the peoples of the world? The answer is clear. For many years, nations have fought for more civilized societies; yet these continue to be victims of discrimination; there is continuing child labour; and workers continue to be deprived of trade unions which, themselves, are deprived of freedom and legal guarantees. Our Organization cannot solve all these problems because its role is of a moral nature. We need assistance but we do not need an international labour police force. We therefore call upon it to restore some balance.

We believe that our membership of this Organization will help us to strengthen international cooperation and improve the living standards of workers in the world. The process of reconstruction in Lebanon is, in our opinion, a brave attempt, whether it concerns the material reconstruction or human development. The process of reconstruction in this country, which might be small in area but is great in its ideals, is based upon the principles of justice, law and liberty. And we are scrupulous in implementing our labour legislation. It is not merely based on the principles of this Organization but also upon free and tripartite cooperation.

One of our greatest social institutions is the National Social Assistance Fund, now under the management of the three social partners; and we are trying, through this fund, to fulfil our social needs.

Allow me to be candid. There can be no attempt at progress as long as Israel continues its systematic terrorism against my country. Israel is a very serious obstacle to the plans for reconstruction and development which my country is undertaking.

Original Portuguese: Mr. LANÇA (Workers' delegate, Portugal) – On behalf of Portuguese workers allow me to congratulate the President on his election and to express my wishes for the fruitful and constructive outcome of the work of this session of the International Labour Conference.

I would also like to congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report in which he not only carries out an in-depth study of the overall employment situation but also points out some of the ways for the international community to tackle and to solve this crucial problem.

What we are witnessing today is the internationalization of economies, the interdependence of peoples and continents, and globalization. But alongside this globalization and interdependence appears another movement, particularly in the sphere of labour relations, showing a tendency for the adoption of individualistic solutions. This contradiction, illogical as it is, brings about clashes and obstructs the normal path of human societies.

Against a background of various activities, qualifications and the diversity of roles and jobs, the need for coordination becomes evident, as well as the need to harmonize their multiple complementarities.

This coordination demands firmer regulation and not the total deregulation brought about by individualistic solutions. As clearly underlined in the Director-General's Report, this is not the path that leads to job creation since it also jeopardizes the promised harmonization resulting from the promotion of workers' rights.

This is the reason why we place ourselves among those who refuse this increasingly dualistic society in which we are living. A society which has more central countries, from whose hyperactive workers more and more is required, whilst in the periphery, vast masses are increasingly pushed towards exclusion.

We are living in a dualistic society from the point of view of market economy and of market considerations. The market is used, for instance, for dealing with financial and monetary policies, but it is used in a totally different sense when we talk about wages or the effect of wages on inflation.

Let us for a minute consider the dimension of wealth produced by mankind and the existing economic possibilities. They are immense! But because there is no control over the machinery governing creation and distribution of wealth, imbalances appear among continents and countries, and also within countries, even the wealthiest ones, where the number of excluded citizens is sharply rising.

Therefore, in our view, the search for more definite solutions for employment inevitably requires that we tackle the issue of the distribution of wealth. It is possible to find solutions if we carry out expansionist macroeconomic policies, particularly with greater real convergence.

In Portugal, when we look at the country in its full and real dimension, economically and socially, we have to conclude that its macroeconomic dimensions and its national averages hide many imbalances.

To start with the question of education and training, which we all admit must meet both present demands, and more particularly future requirements. As generally recognized in my country, Portugal, this is, however, not the path which is being followed. In fact efforts essentially geared to the present may threaten the medium- and long-term results. This is what happens with programmes which have little to do with the real needs of the economy, and which are frequently implemented only to reduce the growing unemployment figures.

Massive lay-offs, dismissals and unemployment are not inevitable, but where are the policies, the financial resources and the responsibility of economic decision-makers and bodies which would be able to generate solutions?

The so-called local employment initiatives, disconnected from global job-creation policies, nationally coordinated and managed through programmes which are simply aimed at maintaining power, are not in themselves the proper solution for employment.

What is necessary is to make full use of local synergies by ensuring people's full participation in their places of origin and in the communities to which they belong.

In a country in which all figures indicate a rate of around 25 to 30 per cent of covert employment, the question of regulating the working conditions of homeworkers takes on added importance.

It is a fact that in the Madeira Autonomous Region embroidery homeworkers, through their union's perseverance, have achieved regulation, which even though not perfect is nevertheless worth mentioning. On the other hand, in central and northern areas of the mainland, there are several thousand homeworkers making shoes and clothing who are at the mercy of the law of the jungle, and child labour is not unknown in these areas either. We therefore greet the excellent opportunity provided by the International Labour Conference to produce a Convention contributing to the regulation of this serious problem.

Finally, I would like to stress how important and necessary it is to make Portuguese one of the ILO's official working languages, a suggestion already made by the Portuguese Government representative. There are 250 million Portuguese speakers throughout the world, and we are proud to have among us the heroic people of East Timor, who are engaged in a just struggle for their self-determination and independence.

Mr. RANA (Employers' delegate, Nepal) – On behalf of the Employers' Council of Nepal, permit me also to extend my heartiest congratulations to the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to chair this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

The promotion of employment is a very laudable and important goal, and has to find favour with employers all over the world. Growth in any sector automatically means the growth of employment. Our country has only recently embarked on the path of a free and liberal economy, and I expect we shall make giant strides in the future. However, we also believe that one cannot liberalize markets on one hand and, on the other, still try to provide safety nets and western-style social security systems. We in Nepal are trying to come out of a totally agricultural system where the need of the hour is the creation of jobs. We are doing our best to cope with a very high degree of urbanization where employment has to be promoted to keep people off the streets and save them from the clutches of poverty and starvation. The security of the workers is important, but so is the survival of the enterprises. We cannot only look towards the interests of the minority who already have jobs but also, as responsible citizens we should be able to solve the problems of the larger number who have come in from the villages and are still unemployed. We firmly believe that our Government has to create an atmosphere that is less restrictive and regulatory if we, as employers, are expected to tackle this situation. This is not to say that we wish to escape from our duties as responsible employers. A previous delegate brought up the question of child labour in our carpet industries. For the record, I wish to state that the employers, in conjunction with the Government, have systems in place which have to a large extent, if not totally, solved this problem. Inspections have been carried out and buyers have been invited to carry out their own surveys also. Now no carpets may be exported unless the manufacturer receives a child labour free certificate, which is granted by the competent authority.

Employment cannot be an end in itself. No employer is willing to create a situation whereby the unemployed become the underemployed in some state-subsidized enterprise. We believe that employment consists of three major points: first and foremost it is a contract of productivity; secondly, it gives the workers the right to decide on their choice of work; and lastly the employer has the right to demand the required level of efficiency. The system of employment protection legislation, while securing the rights of the workers does to some extent act as a disincentive towards this end. We have to have laws that are flexible and practical and there has to be greater freedom for employers to hire and fire. We understand that in the short term there will be some requirement for minimal protection and regulation by the Government under their investment and industrial policies; but they should not cause us to have to go against global trends.

The basic challenges to all the countries of the world, be they small or large, is to provide their people with an improved quality of life. Full employment is the only way in which this goal can be achieved. The issues of providing the means could be different, because of the stage of development of each country. The world has become a global market also for employers and employees. No longer are employment problems limited to within one's own boundaries, they have started to play a role and affect the situation in other countries. This has created an area of interdependence between the developing countries and those countries who are in the vanguard of industrial development. Therefore, the failure of any nation to create and provide adequate employment will cause labour migration to those countries who can, thus sometimes creating major problems.

Promotion of sound and productive industrial relations is also a major priority for all employers. The challenges for developing countries are far greater than those of developed countries. The formation of a multi-party democracy in my country has aroused high expectations among the people in general and the labour force in particular. As we all know, the ushering in of a democracy does not mean an immediate increase in living standards; as a matter of fact with the advent of a free market economy it is going to get worse before it gets better. It is here that I see a greater role for the developed nations and the ILO in helping to ease the transition process that is taking place in countries like ours. What is required here are awareness and education programmes for both workers and employers to help them to survive together in this changed context. I would be remiss here if I did not mention the support we are already receiving from the ILO Bureau for Employers' Activities, NIKKEIREN International Cooperation Centre, the Danish Government and the Friedrich Normann Stiftung who are to some extent helping us to achieve these goals.

With your permission I would like to put forward a few ideas which would help to foster employment in countries like mine. The new economic initiatives need responsive and proactive government policies which decrease intervention in business affairs.

Employment has to be made an honourable and productive bond or agreement between the workers and employers so that rights and responsibilities are equally matched at the workplace.

Trade unions will have to play a productive and responsible role not limited to wage and facility negotiations.

Human resources development has to be given major importance by all the concerned sectors since retraining and re-engineering are going to be very important for most enterprises forced to adapt to changing circumstances.

I am convinced that the above points are vital for generating employment in those developing countries whose enterprises are trying to keep up with the competitive challenges brought about by the recent changes in the global market-place. Several restrictive standards and practices, rigid labour market rules and inflexible wage systems are beginning to have a negative impact on increased private initiatives and employment opportunities. I believe that the time has also come for the ILO to evaluate the impact and relevance of these past policies and activities in the present context and through its good offices to endeavour to bring about positive changes in the interests of the workers and employers of the world.

Mr. MOORHEAD (Employers' delegate, United States) – On behalf of the United States employers, I would like to offer to the President our heartiest congratulations upon his election at this session of the Conference. We know that under his leadership and that of his excellent Vice-Presidents, the Conference is in good hands.

The United States employers commend the Director-General for focusing on the need to promote employment. It is a position which the employers in general have been urging the ILO to undertake for a number of years. As the Director-General so correctly notes in the preface to his Report, "the task of creating sufficient new jobs to overcome unemployment, underemployment and problems of low pay ranks as the primary challenge for economic and social policy in countries at all levels of development across the globe".

Having said that, I would have hoped to see the Director-General propose an agenda for the role the ILO could play in dealing with the problem he so eloquently outlined at the beginning of his Report. Instead, we have a Report which in some cases correctly analyses the issues, and in some cases, such as that of my own country, does not. The Report reflects the ILO's penchant for regulation as the panacea for our problems. There is a concentration on multinational enterprises and their alleged "footlooseness". The Report also concentrates on how multinationals somehow manage to debase labour standards, while in fact, in his own Report, the Director-General points out that multinational enterprises account for only 3 per cent of the total world labour force. At the same time, he ignores the recent OECD report which concluded that multinational enterprises generally uplift labour standards in their host countries.

In the time allotted, I would like to concentrate my remarks on the situation in my own country. In his Report, the Director-General states that new jobs have been created in the United States, but at the cost of labour productivity gains. This simply is not the case. This year, 3 million more of my fellow countrymen have jobs than did last year. Output per hour and real compensation per hour in the non-farm business sector have steadily increased, particularly in the last few years. In fact, the productivity growth last year of 2.4 per cent equalled the usual average growth rate enjoyed by the United States in the years prior to 1973. A recent study conducted by McKinsey and Company of worker productivity worldwide showed conclusively that United States workers were by far the most productive in the world. The two economists who conducted the study expressed surprise at the main reason for such high productivity: the flexibility United States employers have in managing the business enterprise.

There is a direct correlation between the level of productivity and standard of living. It should be no surprise therefore that the real purchasing power of United States workers' earnings exceeds that of all other developed countries.

A myth which is shared by the Director-General and some in my own Government is that improved worker well-being depends upon labour standards or upon the Government. The truth is that new jobs depend upon economic growth, which is impeded by the high cost of workplace regulations which do not match the characteristics of today's workplace. In a fiercely competitive global market, workers' job security and real compensation depend upon productivity growth and the success of the company for whom they work, not government protection. The main determinants of productivity growth are investment decisions by firms and individual workers, and these decisions are in 97 per cent of the cases made by local employers and workers based upon their ability to compete in their specific market, and not by multinational enterprises.

In this connection, there is now under way in my country a massive re-examination of workplace regulation at both the federal and state levels. Recognizing the need to update laws and reduce regulations which in some cases are over 60 years old, there is an emerging consensus on a new employment policy for the twenty-first century which will keep the United States competitive with the rest of the world. Without doing away with basic worker protection, we are looking into introducing as much flexibility as possible at the workplace, so that workers and employers together, and without government intervention, can find the solutions which will best fit their needs and the needs of their customers.

Meanwhile, at the ILO, we spend our resources to create new regulations which will impede change and lead to a loss of jobs. We concentrate on adopting Conventions on part-time work and attempt to draft one to regulate home work.

The Director-General notes that real wages have declined in the United States. The statement ignores the fact that today, in real dollar terms, over 65 per cent of the United States workers' real wages have grown substantially since 1950. In constant 1977 dollars, family income is, in the United States, distributed around much higher levels for every income quintile. At the same time the lowest fifth and the highest 5 per cent of families receive, in constant dollars, the same income share as in 1950.

The statistics in the United States simply do not support the Director-General's assertion that the "American model" is one of, and I am quoting the Director-General, "sharing low incomes by giving jobs to a large part of the labour force at the risk of creating a whole class of working poor". The real dilemma, and not just in the United States, is how to reintegrate a significant share of the workforce through training and education, into an emerging global enterprise system which pays a premium for the education and skills that some workers have not developed.

Many of our workers are no better prepared for the new global market-place than any other country's workers. The new global market-place will see an accelerating pace of technological change, along with the conversion of work from simple to multidimensional tasks.

What better organization at the international level is there than the ILO, with its consultative tripartite structure, to bring the collective wisdom of all of us to bear on these problems? Instead of promoting change, the ILO tries to control it. This strategy is costly in the short run and futile in the long run.

The economic and political circumstances of today's world are vastly different from those that prevailed when most ILO standards were adopted. Rapid change and international competition are here to stay. The ability of workers and employers to play a central role in the political and economic life of their respective countries requires economic growth, productive employment and job creation. The emphasis of the ILO should be on refocusing existing standards to meet contemporary realities. Moreover, it is time for the ILO to place its primary emphasis on technical cooperation, education and training that assists member States, workers and employers to develop the necessary infrastructure and tools to compete and succeed in the global economy.

As I said to this body last year, there is a global economic revolution under way in the world of work, and the ILO cannot stop it. However, by using the unique strength of the ILO, its tripartite structure, we can perhaps make the transition into the twenty-first century and the new global market-place easier for all of the workers of the world. We urge the Director-General to lead us in that direction.

Mr. SZIRMAI (Employers' delegate, Hungary) – I would like to join the numerous other speakers who have congratulated the President on his election to this important post and express my confidence that he will be successful in his work. It is a great honour for me to address you as the Employers' representative of a country that is internationally known for advancing dynamically from a planned economy towards a market economy.

Hungary is generally recognized for its pioneer role in the development of the institutions of market economy and also the widening of the market within the Central European bloc. Therefore, I feel it would be beneficial to mention the problems we encounter in the course of this development and the solution of which could certainly be aided by the creative processing of international experience.

The political change in Hungary, adjusting to a democratic system as opposed to a one-party system, took place a few years ago. Despite the economic problems, unemployment was a virtually unknown phenomenon until 1989. In December 1989, there were 40,000 unemployed persons registered in Hungary. The number grew to 400,000 by the end of 1990 and by 1991 it had reached 700,000 which was approximately 14 per cent of the five million employed. This rate has stabilized since then although many researchers have asked the question "Can the stabilization of the unemployment rate be attributed to statistical registration or rather to the positive economy processes?" I myself think that both factors play a role. Nevertheless of the positive economic processes I would emphasize the economic dynamism of the people and the strengthening of the small and medium-sized enterprises rather than the effectiveness of the employment policy of the Government.

Democratic reform was accompanied by the sudden growth of income differences and the spread of unemployment and as a result numerous social strata were stricken by poverty. With some simplifications but nevertheless grasping the main idea, this very process was the cause of the victory – exceeding 50 per cent – of the left-wing Socialists in the 1994 elections. This new situation carries infinite dangers for both us, the employers, and the institutions of democracy as well.

The parliamentary opposition, forced into the background during the law-making process, can only criticize the governing majority the Government but it has no real chance for influencing it for reasons of size.

One of the factors contributing to the victory of the Socialist Party was their close cooperation with the largest and strongest party trade unions formerly linked to the state party. Thus several trade union activists made it into Parliament. Unfortunately the number of employers sitting on the benches of Parliament is much less as their performance during the elections was so much poorer than that of the trade unions.

The Socialist Party was quite aware that the citizens voted for their hopes and dreams and they attribute to the Party certain promises, never actually made even during their campaign (such as the ending of unemployment the drastic reduction of inflation, already above 20 per cent).

All this is paired with a misguided economic political philosophy – misguided according to us employers – which philosophy has for ten years dominated economic policy regardless of party. This philosophy is the concept of monetary restriction which, in the definition of today's Government, holds that first economic stability should be established, and only following the stabilization can development be placed on the agenda. This misguided policy leads to the conscious and deliberate slowing down of economic development, whereas the question of development has not arisen for years. In the past six years industrial production fell by 40 per cent and agricultural production by 45 per cent. Thus the goal of equilibrium can only be realized on a decreasing level of employment and living standards.

For many years foreign investors and investment have applauded our efforts and results in the development of a market economy. Hungary, with a population of ten million, still attracts more Western investors than the much larger Russian market. I must mention the fact that after the electoral victory of the Socialist Party, the rate of privatization has slowed considerably and the governing party's lack of commitment to privatization, is not justified by numerous successful privatizations so far. We feel that the real cause of this is not so much the lack of intent, rather the uncertainty and fear of decision-making and the wish to avoid any risk. According to all reasonable expectations the receding economic situation should have led to greater recourse to tripartite conciliation. Nevertheless in the past year, despite feverish efforts, the socio-economic agreement was not signed following the elections. The social partners generally felt that the Conciliation Council was forced into the background when important economic decisions were made. Social tensions are growing and the premonition that the idyllic era of decades of social peace in Hungary is over does not seem to be exaggerated. Although I must add that up to now there has not been any serious conflict in Hungarian private enterprise, and that most strikes and other conflicts took place in State-owned companies.

Such an economic and social situation always carries the danger that there might be forces trying to use the tensions to their advantage and whose interests lie in the destruction of the democratic institutions and for whom market economy can only be imagined with their own political and economic monopolies.

The National Association of Entrepreneurs, the organization I represent, is interested, along with other Hungarian employers' organizations, in the preservation of democratic institutions. The economic policy we urge solves the social problems on the basis of economic development and we believe that this is of interest not only to the employer but also to employees and the whole of society. Many times we have experienced obtuseness from our friends living in market economies because it is difficult for them to accept that the unemployment of Western Europe in the 1970s and 1980s, caused by rapid economic and technical development, needs a very different type of treatment from that of Eastern Europe, largely caused by the lack of economic production and effectiveness. Training and retraining for such unemployment can only bring success in the long run, as it is difficult in the short run to achieve a dynamic industry, and it is exceptionally hard to ensure the necessary resources for the organization of the social safety net. This specific historical situation has two further implications: firstly, in the post-socialist countries not only the trade unions but also the new employer organizations need the help of the international community; secondly, in the application of ILO standards, we have to look for most flexible ways and methods of application to avoid excessive regulation.

Therefore we ask the United Nations, investors and the International Labour Organization to consider these particular circumstances, and consider that in these economies, especially in regard to Hungary, the developed socio-political system of benefits is not yet on the agenda, rather the opposite in some respects, namely the dismantling of an unfounded and backward system of social benefits characteristic of socialism and the commencement of economic development based on effective employment.

The National Association of Entrepreneurs has already received much help from the IOE and the ILO within the framework of their programme directed at training our experts. We hope that Hungarian employers can continue to count on the support of these international organizations and the United Nations.

Mr. FLYNN (representative of the European Commission, European Union) – Can I begin by offering my congratulations to Mr. Rosales Argüello on his unanimous election as President of this session of the Conference. I am delighted to return to this important forum and I am pleased that you are focusing here so closely on social and employment concerns.

We have collectively much to be concerned about and much to share. The tripartite nature of the ILO and the balanced way that it addresses global issues very much reflect the European Commission approach.

We too are clear that close cooperation between governments and the social partners is the only way to ensure the relevance and quality of decision-making and to bring stronger commitment at all levels to implementing such decisions.

This process is crucial to our shared aim of achieving a just, productive and working society for the twenty-first century.

Because that is the task, and as Mr. Hansenne's excellent Report Promoting employment makes clear, it is very much a matter of interdependence. The world is interdependent to a degree and depth unimaginable 20 years ago in terms of capital, trade and production, in terms of technology, environment and people. And we must see this interdependence as a strength not as an inconvenience. As I made clear at the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen, I believe a special responsibility in this matter lies with the wealthier, more industrialized countries represented here.

The World Summit made progress. It brought our social and employment problems into stark focus. But a quantum leap is still required in our readiness and capacity to tackle poverty and inequality at the global, regional and national level. We must make economic policies more people-centred and employment-friendly.

Wealth creation – through open markets and competitive forces – must be channelled into what people want and need most; namely the opportunity to work and develop skills, a decent standard of living, equality and fairness. We must, in essence, enable people to be productive, so that they can create the wealth and jobs which can offer prosperity and stability.

The labour market is changing fast. New and more productive jobs are being created while old jobs are disappearing. There is a 10 per cent turnover every year in the stock of jobs. The speed of change is remarkably high.

The skill requirements of the new jobs being created are higher than for those being lost, putting severe pressure on our education and training systems. But in these systems, the speed of change is much less, capacity is too low and adaptation to new conditions is slow.

We have found ourselves, in much of the world, with a two-speed labour market, bringing great re-employment problems for those who lose their jobs and at the same time difficulties for expanding firms to find skilled labour. This leads to slower growth and continued pressure on public finances.

As the Report World Employment 1995 highlights, we need to respond with new approaches to human resources investment. We need to acknowledge the benefits of appropriate regulation to market functioning. We need to develop new, more positive relationships between work and welfare. And new patterns of work must be embraced.

We are learning these lessons in the European Union. They are reflected also in the Director-General's Report, and I agree too with the stress placed by you on the need for closer coordination between economic and employment policy. The European Union has recently moved a step closer to achieving this.

The European Council at Essen in December last agreed an important new Union-wide process to gauge and improve employment performance. It is an inclusive process bringing together the agendas of our Economic and Social Committee and EcoFin Council. It draws heavily on social partners' involvement and that of other institutions.

The key facets of the Essen conclusions relate to a stronger push for training, employment-intensive growth, reducing employers' cost obstacles to recruitment, and stronger action to help those most affected by structural unemployment. The importance of small and medium-sized enterprises and local initiatives and capacity is also stressed.

So we have some of the building blocks in Europe to shape a more productive and inclusive society, but we have much still to do, particularly in terms of new skills and capacity building, shaping economic policies towards job-generation and ensuring sustainable development.

But, in endeavouring to tackle its own problems, the European Union recognizes the need for openness and equity in its dealings with the world at large.

As the world's foremost trading power and, with its Member States, the largest aid donor, it has a key role to play in helping to build a better world for the poor, in generating productive paid jobs for the unemployed, and in ensuring optimal social integration in our ever-more diversified societies. And if we are serious about obtaining these objectives, sensible economic policies which positively reflect our interdependence will have to be pursued. World economic and social development cannot simply be left to market forces.

We of the wealthier nations will have to make a renewed commitment to help our less developed and less wealthy neighbours to meet the growing challenges posed by globalization of the market-place, by the ever-increasing pace of technological progress, by the structural causes of unemployment and social exclusion, and by dualization of and between societies.

The protection of human rights and of the basic rights of workers must also be an integral part of the equation, and I hope now that the political commitments made at the World Summit will be translated into practical measures. Within this, we must find the best means to promote ILO Conventions on child labour, forced labour, rights of association, collective bargaining and non-discrimination.

The European Union recognizes the reality of global interdependence and the mutual need to secure each other's economic and social development. We can and must build positively on that interdependence. And while we may each have different starting and finishing points in the process, we must share direction if the objectives of the Copenhagen Summit, widely shared in this forum, are to be achieved. And for our part, the European Commission is committed to building on the Copenhagen results and we will play a full part in making it a live agenda, not a dead letter.

The ILO has a hugely important place in this equation, and I look forward to continuing to work together in helping to make the world economy focus clearly on sustainable employment and social progress.

Original French: Mr. CUCU (Employers' delegate, Republic of Moldova) – I would like to congratulate the President on his election. I am very happy to have this opportunity to address you from this rostrum on behalf of the employers of the Republic of Moldova. May I warmly greet and extend my best wishes to the participants in this international forum. I am convinced that the work of this Conference will culminate in the adoption of certain documents which will be really useful to us.

The issues examined at this session are very topical, above all for the countries in transition to the market economy, which include the Republic of Moldova.

The economic reforms promoted in our countries are bound to have an impact on the utilization of labour. Large-scale privatization, the elimination of hopeless and unprofitable enterprises, demonopolization and the creation of new enterprises are giving rise to structural transformations and growing unemployment.

Unfortunately, unemployment has, in the first instance, affected women, the disabled, the elderly but also young people, following the declining levels of production and other negative factors in the urban economy which have triggered a process of migration from the countryside. But it must be emphasized that the situation of country dwellers is also bad because of the intensive methods used in agriculture, the privatization of state farms and collectives, leading to a rise in rural unemployment.

It should be noted that the present system of social protection, in particular, is inherited from the centralized system of social consumption funds.

The main thrust of the new social policy should be to raise individual incomes so that they can meet the socio-cultural needs of the population. Social funds must be used to guarantee a minimum level of social provision for all sectors of the population. People unable to work must be assured of a higher level of consumption free of charge, whereas those who are able to work must be able to raise their living standards through their work and through their personal income.

At present, wage levels are not producing socially desirable results. They are ceasing to function as an incentive and are related in the first instance to the minimum consumption basket. One major social task is to provide incentives to work. Wages must fully reflect the real cost of reproduction of qualified manpower. In this context the development of certain forms of alternative employment are of great importance: home work, cooperatives, self-employment and so forth. It should be noted that in the past three years the number of people employed in the non-state sector has increased by an annual 12 per cent.

Foreign investment could, to a certain extent, improve the employment situation. At the same time new technologies could be imported into our country as well as a new attitude as concerns labour incentives. The authorities clearly understand this fact, as is demonstrated by the adoption of legislation favouring foreign investment.

The proliferation of new enterprises and production units in response to market forces and the formation of a market infrastructure urgently requires a broader approach to retraining particularly in the fields of management, marketing, finance, credit, accounting and other important specialities. Such retraining can be done at enterprise level with the maximum support from the appropriate government authorities.

The situation that has been created requires re-examination of the range of subjects taught and the curricula now used in the educational system.

International organizations consider that the Republic has passed the point of crisis and it is expected that the economy will begin to recover this year. It is certainly true that the present crisis can only be overcome if a scientifically well-founded programme of social and economic development can be set up in which the problems of the proper use of manpower would be singled out for special attention.

An ever more important role in improving the situation as concerns the use of labour is played by tripartite consultations and negotiations. In taking our first steps in this area we are taking advantage of the opportunity provided by the ILO to familiarize ourselves with the experience accumulated by the international community.

In conclusion I would like to express our conviction that the role of the ILO will grow stronger, which will help more effectively to resolve the problems now facing the human race as well as future generations. Our country will spare no effort to promote the principles of the ILO.

Original Chinese: Mr. PAN (Employers' delegate, China) – First of all, please allow me, on behalf of the Chinese enterprise directors, to congratulate the President on his election to chair this session and meanwhile congratulate the Vice-Presidents on their election. I am sure that under their leadership this Conference will be a complete success.

The main theme of the Director-General's Report to this session is employment promotion which is obviously a subject that has drawn the world's attention. At present, on a world scale (particularly in developing countries) unemployment and poverty are outstanding problems. In its work the ILO should give priority to promoting employment and eliminating poverty and should actively conduct international cooperation in order to help those countries with serious unemployment and poverty problems. Measures to be taken should be practical and effective in the light of the different conditions of the countries, to alleviate the pressures on employment, which would surely be welcomed by all.

The World Summit for Social Development held not long ago adopted a Declaration and Programme of Action for employment promotion and poverty elimination that underscore their importance for social and economic development. Promoting employment is aimed at eliminating poverty and advancing social and economic development. Only when the economy develops will there be sufficient capital to expand production and create more jobs, thus reducing poverty.

From a global point of view, in promoting employment and eliminating poverty it is necessary to make the world environment favourable for developing countries with serious unemployment and poverty problems. International cooperation in trade must be based on equality and mutual benefit. Any practice to restrict development of developing countries will not help realize the objective of promoting employment and eliminating poverty.

It is true with every country that the overwhelming majority of all the enterprises are small and medium-sized ones. Therefore encouraging the growth of small and medium-sized enterprises is an important way of developing the economy and promoting employment. In China, small and medium-sized enterprises, including those owned by the State, are owned by collective units in urban and rural areas, and individual and private enterprises. They are distributed in industry, construction, transportation and communication, commerce and other service trades.

China is the most populous country in the world. Since reform in the late 1970s, great changes have taken place in rural areas where as agricultural productivity increases, surplus labour in agriculture is on the rise. China has vigorously developed rural, town and village enterprises, to create more jobs. To date, 120 million people are employed in those enterprises. The number of such enterprises totals 20 million. Now, their industrial output value and export earnings account for one-third of the national total. This shows that by taking into account concrete conditions, which vary between countries, it is possible to adopt effective measures in creating new jobs.

Because of its large population, China is still under great pressure in employment. However, we are optimistic. As reform has deepened, in recent years the tertiary sector has developed in China. Its product now accounts for about one-third of China's GNP. In view of the fact that the tertiary sector accounts for 60 to 70 per cent of the GNP in developed countries, China still has a great potential which also makes it possible to create more jobs.

To help small and medium-sized enterprises, we need more support from the Government as well as more effective support by the society at large such as consulting, training, research and development, and marketing. The organization I represent, the China Enterprise Directors' Association, is active in this field. For instance, in collaboration with the ILO our cooperative project is under way using the ILO publication Improve your business to provide small and medium-sized enterprises with training and consulting services.

Pilot reform projects are being conducted among China's large and medium-sized state-owned enterprises. A major difficulty encountered by state-owned enterprises in reform is the problem of the placement of unemployed workers and redundant workers within the enterprises which affects economic performance and normal operation and development of such enterprises. The Government is trying to establish and improve the social security system, especially pension and unemployment insurance, in order to alleviate the burden and promote their development. Furthermore, the Government has strengthened employment management and developed employment and retraining services aimed at employment promotion and improve the health of the economy. At present, the Government is implementing project re-employment which no doubt is good news for enterprises. It is expected to respond to enterprise bankruptcy and streamlining with the mechanism of social security and with re-employment which will help deepen reform measures in the enterprise system and promote the healthy development of the economy.

Just as conditions are different from country to country, so also are methods of promoting employment. In working out its policy of employment promotion, the ILO has to give full consideration to different conditions of various countries.

Finally, I would like to reiterate that any policy or concrete measure that would hinder the economic development of member States will affect negatively the attainment of the objective of promoting employment and eliminating poverty, a situation that member States would not like to see.

Mr. JEETUN (Employers' delegate, Mauritius) – On behalf of the Mauritius Employers' Federation, I take great pleasure in extending our congratulations to the President on his election to the presidency of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

The theme of the Director-General's Report, Promoting employment, is highly topical and relevant for both developed and developing economies, since most of them are plagued with severe unemployment. It cannot be denied that employment is an essential element for political, economic and social stability in all countries. We hope that the enriching debate during this session of the Conference will spark off ideas which will help different countries to tailor their own policies and action for employment creation. Of course, there is no magic formula for success in this respect. Each country has to devise a package of policies to suit its specific requirements, particularly at a time when the global environment is characterized by rife competition.

In view of its human dimension, employment is a priority for all countries, but we should not overlook the fact that productive employment cannot be divorced from the development of enterprises. Enterprises are the driving force for economic and social progress; they are the primary source of growth and generator of wealth. Enterprises are the pillar of the economic fabric, just as the family is the pillar of society. However, enterprises do not operate in a vacuum, but within a broad political and economic framework which determines in large measure their development and success. It is vital for governments to provide this framework in order to create an enabling environment for enterprises to generate job opportunities and consequently for the population to reap the benefits accruing in terms of enhanced economic growth, higher per capita income, an equitable distribution of income and a higher standard of living.

We can say without a shadow of doubt that in Mauritius, we have operated within such a framework, and that it has been beneficial to employers, workers and the country at large. The Mauritian economy has continued to have positive growth for 15 consecutive years, with an average annual growth rate of 6 per cent. We have also achieved full employment after undergoing a period of structural adjustment. There has been a judicious blend of policies to encourage employment, investment and growth, while at the same time sharing the fruits of development among all Mauritians.

In the context of full employment, the scope for further growth is seriously limited. Two avenues explored by Mauritius to maintain the tempo of development have been training and the utilization of foreign workers. Investment in human capital is as important as investment in physical capital, and the Mauritius Employers' Federation is a leading player in training in the country. Training is necessary to ensure higher productivity and the quality of products and to introduce new technologies.

Foreign workers are recruited on a very selective basis, and on stringent conditions when local labour is not available. They represent about 2 per cent of the labour force. They range from skilled workers to technical and managerial personnel. We should emphasize that both local and foreign workers are governed by the same labour legislation and working conditions in the country. We, as employers, operate fully within the legal framework established by the Government in this respect. Furthermore, as an employers' organization, we have our own Code of Practice for Enterprises, which is designed for employers to fulfil both their economic and social role.

Our experience reveals that, while achieving full employment is one thing, sustaining the full employment level is another, as we are confronted with problems of a different nature. In such a situation, there is the danger of becoming complacent. Our labour costs have risen substantially over the years. Average earnings in virtually all sectors are at least twice as high as the prescribed minimum wage rates, due to the tight labour market. As a result we no longer have a comparative cost advantage and we are gradually losing our competitive edge. We can only cope with the acute competition overseas if we can boost our productivity. The setting up of a productivity institution is long overdue.

Moreover, our labour legislation is characterized by a number of regulations established in the 1970s and which are no longer compatible with the needs of a rapidly industrializing economy. We believe that the legislation has to be made flexible to correct structural rigidities in the economy and to promote collective bargaining as the cornerstone of our industrial relations policy. At this stage of our development, it is imperative to promote productivity and collective bargaining. We hope that the Government will set up a productivity centre as other countries that have been successful in their industrialization process have done.

Mauritius has known a long period of industrial peace thanks to the collaboration of and dialogue among all social partners. This has also been a contributory factor in our economic development. We are now on the threshold of the second phase of our industrialization. We can only be successful if we introduce new technology, enhance productivity and invest in training. Once again, all the social partners should rise to this challenge, because the survival of enterprises and the prosperity as well as the quality of life of all Mauritians depend crucially on productivity.

(Mr. Popescu takes the Chair.)

Original Arabic: Mr. BEYDOUN (Employers' delegate, Lebanon) – I congratulate you, Sir, on your election as President of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I have no doubt that with your experience you will lead this Conference to success.

I would like to thank the Director-General of the International Labour Office for his Report entitled Promoting employment. Indeed, it did focus the light on the present global problem of unemployment. The Report is inspiring because, although the objective of GATT, of the establishment of the WTO, of the liberalization of international trade and of the process of globalization is precisely to achieve full employment in the world, the fact is that the GATT came in for broad criticism at last year's session of the Conference for neglecting the "social clause". Moreover, this has given rise to the belief that the outcome of the GATT has been primarily to benefit the industrialized countries through a system that hinders the transfer of intellectual property from industrialized countries to developing countries and forbids the latter to manufacture their raw materials and export them to industrial countries while permanently opening up their own markets to the products of the industrialized countries.

Allow me to present some comments on that Report. The section globalization and employment presents challenging issues and shows clearly what may be expected in the future. It gives a clear picture of the sensitive problem of capital movements, particularly the attraction of capital to the developing countries. In Lebanon, which is a small developing country, we share the concerns presented in the Report over globalization, especially in the area of international inequality where we think the balance will be largely in favour of the industrialized and rapidly industrializing countries. Developing countries will be handicapped in the areas of trade, competition in international export markets, foreign capital acquisition, access to information and productive knowledge, and advanced technologies. In order to share in the gains from globalization, an opportunity must be given to the developing countries to adapt to the situation. Time and concentrated effort are needed to develop their technological capability to upgrade the standard of their production. It is in the interest of the industrialized countries to provide needed assistance in the process of adjustment of developing countries to globalization, since this will be to their own long-term benefit.

The section of the Report on new technologies and employment showed the direct and indirect, short- and long-term implications of the new technologies on promoting employment. However, no mention was made of technological capability and the ability to forecast technological change, and of their relevance to the positive impact of the new technologies. This point should have been emphasized when discussing employment in the developing countries. By way of example, I would like to mention the development of new and advanced material and their short- and long-term effects on both industrialized and developing countries.

This may seem a complex problem, but it would involve a shift in the utilization of many raw materials and natural products and a change in their market value. A shift in the location of employment opportunities can also be expected. Developing countries that have technological capability and an ability to generate knowledge and new technologies and to predict future technological developments will not be the ones who suffer from the kind of developments that can provoke economic and employment tragedies. This makes me want to suggest that future ILO activities focus more on the development of scientific and technological capabilities among developing countries, since that is the basis of economic and social development. Furthermore, I found no mention of the countries of Western Asia or of the Arab region in the section on developing countries. Even if that were presented by a separate organization, a summary of their activities should be included as part of the global picture.

In the section on reducing underemployment and poverty in developing countries, the direct adaptation of policies designed to respond positively to globalization should be critically and carefully studied. Although these countries have some problems in common, yet each country or group of countries must be taken and studied separately. The strategy for phasing in the changes to be introduced must be carefully planned and implemented.

Global full employment is a great challenge and we agree with the Report that the problem is complex and that there is no simple and painless solution. The mass unemployment in the industrialized countries and the widespread underemployment and poverty in the developing countries are generally related. The former group is rich, more advanced, and accounts for 79 per cent of world production; the latter group has a much larger population, consists mainly of suppliers of raw materials and is an important market for the products of the first group. One could look at it from the standpoint that unless the latter group is developed there will be fewer consumers for the products of the former group.

Attempts to deal with this problem therefore must, as suggested in the Report, involve effective action at both the national and the international level. There should be a common and serious commitment by all nations to achieving full employment, in such a way that each nation at the end benefits from its full share of the gains to be derived from this effort.

I would like to mention a few facts about the employment situation in Lebanon. Lebanon, as you know, is located in Western Asia, to the east of the Mediterranean. It is a small country with a population of about 3 million and an annual increase of 2 per cent. Lebanon is an open-market economy, and had a 3 per cent economic growth in 1991 and 9 per cent in 1994. The labour force during the period 1990-92 was 30 per cent of the population. The distribution of labour among the main economic sectors in 1993-94 was 59 per cent in the services, 27 per cent in industry and 1 per cent in agriculture. The number of workers in the industrial sector was about 140,300 in 1994. The total number of workers was 694,000 in 1990; about 22 per cent of them were women. A recent industrial survey showed that there are about 23,867 industrial establishments, most of them export-oriented, of which 16,000 employ fewer than five workers, 17 per cent employ between five and ten workers, 7 per cent employ between ten and workers and about 20 per cent employ over 20 workers.

The Lebanese Government, I am sorry to say, does not exert enough effort to encourage the establishment of industrial concerns, nor does it give assistance worth mentioning to develop its industrial sector, in spite of the job opportunities the sector creates directly or indirectly in the industry-related services around it.

The Government lacks an industrial policy. Particularly worrying is the fact that it has no basic data on the size of its manpower and the extent of unemployment, and this makes it impossible to plan counter-unemployment measures. This is why we requested the assistance of the ILO, who gratefully responded.

Foreign contributions to Lebanese industry are still limited. In order to attract foreign investments, therefore, our Government has reduced tax on profits to 10 per cent on a linear basis, once cumulative tax has reached 39 per cent. It has also suppressed all taxes on the exchange of shares in shareholding companies in an attempt to encourage the establishment of such companies.

Prior to the civil war in 1975, Lebanon enjoyed a high level of employment and economic prosperity. It attracted foreign capital especially from the Arab countries; the Lebanese economy is now in the process of recovery. The standard of living in Lebanon and the wages are much higher than those of its neighbours. As a result, Lebanon attracts legal and illegal workers who are willing to accept low wages; as a result, experienced Lebanese workers emigrate to seek their fortunes somewhere else.

I hope that I have succeeded in giving you a quick picture of the employment situation in Lebanon. Finally, I would like to thank you and wish all success to our Conference.

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. PO-PESCU) – I give the floor to Mr. Samad, Government adviser of Indonesia, to exercise his right of reply to the statement made by the Workers' delegate of Portugal.

Mr. SAMAD (Government adviser, Indonesia) – My delegation has asked for the floor in exercise of the right to reply to the abusive statement made by the Workers' delegate of Portugal this morning, which contained unsubstantiated and misleading information on the province of East Timor.

My delegation feels compelled to set the record straight and right for the benefit of this meeting. Without going into details, the Portuguese colonial power irresponsibly left East Timor in 1975, creating chaos and civil war that cost many lives and much suffering among civilians in this territory. Subsequently, the majority of East Timor exercised their right to self-determination in accordance with United Nations General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1541 (XV) by integrating themselves with Indonesia. Since then, East Timor has become the 27th province of Indonesia and has enjoyed equal status with all other provinces in the country.

In this regard my delegation firmly believes this is neither the place nor the time for a delegation to raise political issues. If it were tolerated it would constitute interference in matters which are within the jurisdiction of a sovereign member State.

REPORT OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL ON THE SITUATION OF WORKERS OF THE OCCUPIED ARAB TERRITORIES: DISCUSSION

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – Today's special sitting will be devoted to the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories.

Before giving the floor to the first speaker, I should like to remind you of the arrangements which I announced to the Conference yesterday morning.

First, the maximum length of speeches has been fixed by the Conference at seven minutes, except for those speaking on behalf of a group of countries such as the European Union and the Arab group, who will be given ten minutes, as will the spokesman of the Non-aligned Movement. I urge all speakers to respect this time-limit for their speeches and to abide by the Standing Orders and decisions of the Conference, in order to give this debate the dignity it deserves.

May I also remind you that, if there are any requests for the right of reply, such requests will be granted at the end of the sitting, and they will be limited to two minutes.

Lastly, I would like to remind representatives of non-governmental organizations who have registered to speak that they will be authorized to do so at the end of the sitting.

Original Arabic: Mr. GHOCHEH (representative of Palestine) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. Allow me at the outset to express to the President, the Director-General and the Governing Body our thanks for having organized the special sitting to discuss the situation of the workers in Palestine and the other occupied territories, on the basis of this Organization's responsibilities and the resolutions adopted in 1974 and 1980. I would like to express my thanks to all those who are participating in this special sitting for I feel that their participation is indeed a further contribution to a just and durable peace.

The Report of the Director-General before us has dealt with many violations which are still continuing despite the signature of the Declaration of Principles by the Israeli Government and the Palestinian authorities. I would like to stress the deleterious effects of the border closures on the Palestinian economy and on the labour market. Employment in the occupied territories remains a complex problem (paragraph 54): they still have no safety net for workers and vulnerable groups (paragraph 67); the education and training systems are still fragmentary (paragraph 71); the economic and social situation is further aggravated by border closures; there has been no change in the criteria for granting work permits or hiring Palestinian workers. In fact, workers continue to be in a very vulnerable position without any protection and are often subject to discrimination at the hands of Israeli employers, (paragraph 92 ff.).

While fully appreciating the efforts of the Director-General and the mission – in spite of the efforts of the Israeli Government to place obstacles in their way and the Israeli Government's delay before granting visas – we would still like to say that the rather short Report has omitted to deal with certain other very important problems, no less serious than the violations mentioned in it. I refer here to the effects of creating further settlements, the confiscation of land and natural resources, the deliberate policy to destroy the nascent Palestine economy, not to mention depriving Palestinians of their jobs by replacing them with foreign workers with no good reason or justification – all of which has resulted in an unemployment rate of between 38.5 and 55 per cent, and all the social consequences that entails.

In the light of the Israeli policy of appropriating human and natural resources and the continued establishment of new settlements, it has become very difficult to achieve any kind of development. These Israeli policies, far from encouraging investment, constitute a major obstacle to the Palestinian Authority and its agencies in their efforts to solve the problems of the Palestinian workers, whose origin goes back to the beginning of Israeli occupation 25 years ago.

In the light of the foregoing, we ask the following:

(1) Intensified international pressure on the Israeli Authorities to respect the agreements signed with the Palestine Liberation Organization and the Palestinian Authority; to put a stop to their deliberate destruction of the Palestinian economy; to land confiscation and creation of new settlements; and to cease further demographic and geographical changes to the Holy City of Jerusalem. (2) Encouragement of donor countries and international organizations to extend all their assistance and technical help directly to economic and social projects and employment-related projects to help solve the unemployment problem so that the Palestinian people feel the benefits of the peace process. (3) International efforts should be stepped up to make the peace process a reality and to ensure the implementation of the Security Council resolution concerning the complete withdrawal from the Golan Heights to the 4 June 1967 frontiers, and of resolution 425 concerning Southern Lebanon so as to create a climate of confidence and bring about total and just peace. (4) The establishment of a special Committee of this Conference to monitor the situation of the Arab workers in Palestine and in other occupied territories, similar to the Committee set up on the apartheid question, and to provide the Committee with the means necessary for its work, as envisaged in the resolutions adopted by the Conference in 1974 and 1982. (5) To continue to hold this special sitting until such a Committee is established. This is not an end in itself but a means to protect Palestinian workers, employers and other social groups from these Israeli practices as long as the occupation and settlement continue. (6) A continuation of ILO technical assistance to all three partners in Palestinian production to help them build social and professional institutions.

The transmittal of the results of this sitting to the Director-General and their translation into a programme of work for the improvement of the situation of the workers and people of Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, in addition to the despatch of a mission and the presentation of a report to the ILO Conference, all fall within the responsibility of this noble Organization, representing as it does the conscience of the world.

Without going beyond my allocated time, since the full discussion of the various social and economic aspects of the Palestinian problem would take too long, let me merely say that all social groups within the Palestinian people suffer from the discriminatory practices of occupation and settlement, and are in the most urgent need of your material and moral support. As representatives of the three social partners in Palestine, we need your experience and assistance to build institutions that abide by international standards, and to overcome the burdensome inheritance of Israeli occupation. We will need your continuous help in the coming stages so as to be able to extend the powers of the Authority over all aspects of life, bringing to an end the Israeli occupation and dismantling the settlements.

The Palestinian people will then be able to set up institutions and an independent State with Jerusalem as its capital, and contribute to peace and security and to social justice in their own country of Palestine, land of peace and cradle of faiths.

Original French: Mr. CHOTARD (Government delegate, France, speaking on behalf of the European Union) – I have the honour of speaking on behalf of the European Union at this special sitting devoted to the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories.

As you know, the European Union has given its vigorous support to a quest for peace in the Middle East.

We are pleased with the progress that has been made in this area over the last few years, and in particular we have witnessed the signature of the Israeli-Palestinian Declaration of Principles, of the Agreement on the Gaza Strip and the Jericho Area and of the peace treaty between Israel and Jordan. The European Union has long been calling for a settlement in the Middle East, a settlement which is not only just and durable, but one which is also comprehensive in nature and based upon the resolutions adopted by the Security Council.

The excellent Report that has been submitted to us by the Director-General reinforces my conviction that our hopes for a consolidation of the peace process have not been in vain.

The European Union welcomes the fact that the peace process is now moving forward. It had its ups and downs for several months, but now the peace process appears to be respecting the latest timetable set by the Palestinians and the Israelis. Indeed all of the factors appear to prove that the negotiating partners have the will to reach an agreement before 1 July. This is the agreed date for the start of the second phase in the process to establish autonomy, by its extension to the West Bank of Jordan.

Three sets of negotiations are taking place on the organization of presidential elections and of elections to the national Palestinian Council, on the transfer of new areas of competence to the West Bank of Jordan, and on the redeployment of the Israeli army, a necessary prerequisite for the holding of elections. These negotiations have been preceded by and accompanied by a number of different acts which constitute some considerable encouragement. There has been an increase in the number of work permits for Palestinians working in Israel, and also the opening up to goods of the border between Egypt and Gaza and also the reimbursement of tax revenue to Palestinians.

The measures taken to open up the borders of the territories and also the granting of work permits are essential conditions for the functioning of the Palestinian economy. If it has been clearly understood that Israeli security is a vital cause, one can but deplore the closure of the passage between Israel and the Palestinian territories which impeded all economic development. Certain statistics have revealed the fact that the Palestinians have seen their standard of living drop since the signing of the Oslo agreements.

This situation, due partially to the repeated closure of the territories, was obviously absurd, first and foremost for those who were its victims. Also for those members of the international community that have been contributing to the financing and the functioning of the Palestinian economy. A rough estimation shows that their assistance has been equivalent to the losses suffered as a result of the closures.

The European Union is pleased to see that Palestinian workers are now entering Israel again. This is an essential prerequisite for an economic upturn and a first stage towards a solution to the problem of employment facing the Palestinian economy. This economic upturn also has to be reinforced with international assistance, but it is quite clear that this assistance will not be sufficient if the Palestinians do not manage to adopt the suitable economic policies and to create the structures necessary for investment and job creation.

It is all a question of political options and financing. The issue will also revolve around ethical values when we come to consider the rights of Palestinian workers and to elaborate labour legislation which must enshrine the principles of democracy.

We are convinced that the ILO has a major role to play and we wish strongly to encourage it to pursue its technical cooperation programmes. The European Union wishes next year to be able to examine the ILO's activities in this region and hopes that the efforts deployed by both parties will prompt the Conference not to have to hold a further special sitting of this kind. I would recall that this is a concern which was widely expressed at the Governing Body session this April.

In conclusion, again, we believe in peace.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL JARWAN (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, United Arab Emirates, speaking on behalf of the Arab group) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. It is indeed an honour for me to address you on behalf of the Arab group, and it is my pleasure at the outset to express sincere congratulations to the President of our Conference for the excellent manner in which he is conducting our deliberations, and for his wisdom and his understanding. It is also a pleasure for me to express thanks and appreciation to all of you for being here in this special sitting, for making a point of participating in it, for we see in that reaffirmation of your support for the Palestinian people and for workers of the occupied Arab territories.

The Report of the Director-General submitted to you this session deals with a subject which has been a cause for concern for your Conference for the past 20 years. A just cause indeed and the International Labour Organization is the appropriate forum for discussing such a cause since our Organization is the embodiment of the conscience of the world. Not only because of its unique tripartite structure, but also because of its mandate in defence of the workers and social legislation. The cause of the Arab workers in Palestine and the other occupied territories is one of concern to the entire world because of its justice, its nobility and credibility.

The Conference adopted two resolutions, in 1974 and in 1980, with regard to the workers of Palestine and the other Arab occupied territories. The adoption of the two resolutions was a true reflection of the ILO's concern for the workers, for their freedoms, condemnation of the settlements and its support for the just struggle of the Palestinian people to achieve the legitimate rights of which they have been deprived without any reason. Nevertheless, and despite the fact that 20 years have gone by and despite the perseverance of your Organization, the two resolutions were neither respected nor implemented by the relevant authorities.

The fundamental rights of the Arabs and those territories are still subject to unrestrained violation; the uncontrolled extension of the settlements continues; confiscation and Judaisation of Arab land particularly the Holy City of Jerusalem continues in accordance with a well-known Israeli plan.

The working conditions for Palestinian workers and employers are constantly deteriorating. Despite the optimism generated by the Declaration of Principles, agreements on which the peace-loving forces of the world pin their hopes, those hopes soon came to be shattered by the bitter reality embodied by Israeli policies and their own very special understanding of the word "peace", thus depriving the initiative of any credibility.

Unemployment has reached very dangerous levels. Palestinian workers are being dismissed and thrown out of Israeli economic activities and being replaced by foreign manpower. This affects approximately 80,000 workers whose rights are still violated.

Employers are also subjected to discriminatory practices and policies to prevent them from participating in the revitalization of the Palestinian economy. They are burdened with taxes without the benefit of services as would be normal in most parts of the world. The Israeli authorities hamper the exercise of the freedom of worship and the freedom of religious belief. They desecrate religious institutions and violate the freedom of expression. These are the daily violations by the Israeli occupying authorities in total disregard of the principles and rules enshrined in international agreements, particularly the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1948.

I do not want to dwell at length on the details of all such practices; suffice it to refer to these facts and many others which we see in the Director-General's Report. Daily life is subject to military jurisdiction; Arab territories are blockaded; social peace is non-existent; Israeli employers continue their discriminatory and iniquitous practices. All this and more is in the Director-General's Report and we mention it here without further comment.

The Report of the Director-General, despite its importance and despite the irrefutable facts that it contains, deals with the issue of Arab workers in the shadow of occupation, and therein lies the true problem. I do not believe that the problems of these workers can be solved as long as occupation continues and settlements continue to be built. Programmes of technical cooperation cannot yield their results in the shadow of expanding Israeli settlements which tears apart the unity of Palestine and the identity of its land and of its people. What is the point of technical cooperation if the Palestinian workers are deprived of their right to work, of their freedom to travel and of every single one of their rights as workers. In any case, the peaceful labour relations advocated in the Report cannot be pursued in the shadow of advancing settlement.

We do believe in peace and we aspire to peace. We spare no efforts in bringing about peace. For peace in fact is one of the foremost things of our faith and of our philosophy. Yet the peace that we believe in, is a peace based on justice, on equity, on the restitution of rights to those to whom they legitimately belong. As for the partial peace achieved at the expense of one party and in the interest of another, that is a peace we do not believe in, and cannot accept.

The International Labour Organization with its objectives and noble principles based on the achievements of peace through social justice should continue its efforts in support of the struggle of the workers of Palestine and the other Arab occupied territories. Our Organization has a long experience in struggling against apartheid in South Africa and the determination of our Organization is called upon today to stand in the face of discrimination and injustice in the occupied territories until the land is liberated and until peace becomes a reality in that part of the world.

Within this framework, the position of the Arab group is for the setting up of the special Tripartite Committee which will meet periodically to study the Report of the Director-General on the situation of the workers in Palestine and the other occupied territories and to submit recommendations on the matter to the Conference similar to the Apartheid Committee which was set up to combat apartheid and which came to an end with the disappearance of apartheid. Until such a committee is set up, the Arab group believes that this special sitting should continue and would like to express their reservations concerning the resolution of the Governing Body to the effect that this special sitting should be the last of its kind.

We are confident that the Director-General will continue his efforts to implement Conference resolutions and that we will continue to present periodic reports, so long as the conditions underlying these two resolutions last. In conclusion, Mr. President, we would like to underline the importance of continuing to support, both technically and morally, all the Arab workers concerned. We thank the Director-General for his Report and we thank you all for your presence and your very valuable contribution. (May the peace, mercy and grace of Allah be upon you).

Mr. TARMIDZI (Government adviser, Indonesia, speaking on behalf of the Non-aligned Movement) – Allow me to begin by expressing the pleasure of the delegation of Indonesia at the decision once again to hold a special sitting on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories in the course of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

My delegation values highly this special sitting as a manifestation of the international community's legitimate concern at the plight of workers in the occupied Arab territories. As we are gathered here today, we cannot but express our dismay at the current deteriorating conditions of the workers in the occupied territories as clearly shown in the concluding parts of the Director-General's Report. It is indeed paradoxical that with prospects for peace emerging, the general conditions for workers in the occupied territories seem to be worsening.

In the final analysis, since the problems of the occupied Arab territories are indivisible, measures to solve socio-economic problems, including the problem of workers in the occupied territories, must be taken in parallel with security measures to achieve progress on the road towards peace and security. The two are closely interlinked and mutually reinforcing. In this perspective, the exclusive and discriminatory policies and practices used by the occupying power, such as the establishment of Jewish settlements in the occupied territories in order to effect de facto geographic and demographic changes, the confiscation of land and water resources and border closures and the other forms of political constraints applied in fact deal a deadly blow to the prospects of a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the region in accordance with relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions and therefore must be rejected.

By the same token measures such as ending the curfew in the West Bank town of Hebron, introducing simple procedures for cargo entering Palestinian self-rule areas, plans to allow a heliport in Gaza, increasing the number of Palestinians allowed to enter Israel to work from 27,000 to 31,000 and even the suspension of the decision to confiscate Arab land in East Jerusalem should be considered as cosmetic, marginal and falling short of Israel's commitment to making a substantial effort to promote the real socio-economic development of the occupied territories which should go hand in hand with political developments.

It is worth mentioning that Israel's border closures have dealt a serious blow to the economy of the occupied territories. The closures are estimated to have cost the Palestinian economy over US$600 million, a sum equal to the grand total of donor pledges for 1995. Moreover, the Palestinians do not want to be consulted about further land grabbing, but to see it stop, for it has brought the whole of the Middle-East peace process to the brink of collapse. Thus, the reversal of the occupying power's onerous and discriminatory policies and practices in the occupied territories must be a sine qua non for further improvements to the conditions of work in the territories and the achievement of a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the region.

The international community bears responsibility for a conclusion of the peace process and in particular for creating the socio-economic conditions that will facilitate progress towards that end. As we may recall, at a meeting which brought together donors from 30 countries in Paris at the end of April, donors agreed to underwrite the Palestinian Authority's projected 1995 budget deficit of US$135 million. In this regard, Indonesia and other non-aligned countries are calling for the speedy implementation of the economic assistance pledge to the Palestinian people at this crucial time.

There is no doubt that the ILO has a unique mandate to further improve the conditions of workers in the occupied Arab territories. Within the limit of that mandate and in conformity with this year's session of the Conference, we share the conclusions of the Report of the Director-General to the effect that it is imperative that the ILO and other agencies step up their efforts to promote national and international action to improve the chronically acute unemployment situation. This, we believe, constitutes valid grounds for us to propose that another special sitting be convened in the course of next year's session of the International Labour Conference to consider the follow-up action to the programmes adopted with a view to improving the conditions of workers in the occupied Palestinian territories.

Original Arabic: Mr. KHOURY (Government delegate, Syrian Arab Republic) – Allow me, first of all thank the Director-General of the International Labour Organization for his continuous interest in this problem, his commitment to the resolutions of the International Labour Conference and for sending a mission to Palestine and the occupied Arab territories to prepare a report on the situation of workers. We would also like to stress that the mission bore in mind the relevant standards of international law, in particular the Hague Convention of 1907 and the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949, relating to the protection of civilians in the time of war, and was guided by the principles and objectives laid down in the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, including the Philadelphia Declaration, the standards and resolutions adopted by the International Labour Conference and by the principles enunciated by the supervisory bodies of the ILO.

The Report submitted by the Director-General describes the tragic situation of the Palestinian workers in the occupied Arab territories, which is due to the Israeli occupation, the discriminatory practices adopted by the Israeli authorities and the violation of human rights, the provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention and the principles and objectives of the ILO. The Director-General's Report could have been clearer had it relied on the available information at the United Nations, especially that furnished by the Special Committee to investigate Israeli practices affecting human rights of the population of the occupied territories.

At this point, I would like to make some observations on some of the various paragraphs of the Report submitted by the Director-General. First of all, paragraph 18 mentions that the situation has remained unchanged since 1967. Indeed, the administrative, police and military structures still remain in place. Paragraph 24 describes the situation in the occupied Syrian Golan. It states that the inhabitants of the Golan have always strongly resisted the occupation, that they call themselves Syrian and claim to be the victims of discriminatory practices.

Since they first occupied the Golan Heights, the Israeli authorities have used all sorts of pretexts in order to drive people from the land, undermine the economy which they wish to judaize and move in settlers which exploit the local resources.

We feel bound to draw attention to the fact that in the Golan Heights, there are only Syrian citizens. The presence of Israeli settlers is neither lawful – nor justified from a legal standpoint. The Fourth Geneva Convention, United Nations resolutions – particularly those of the Security Council – and resolutions adopted by many international organizations, including the International Labour Organization, all condemn these practices.

As regards paragraph 35 we would like to express our regret and surprise that actions taken by the Palestinians are considered as “terrorist acts” while those taken by the Israelis are described as “acts of violence”. It is vital that a distinction should be drawn between terrorism and the legitimate struggle of people against foreign occupation.

The Syrian Arab Republic is committed to the peace process, in accordance with United Nations resolutions and international law.

In conclusion, I would like to say that devoting a special sitting of the Conference to study the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories is necessary. The Conference should shoulder its responsibilities, according to its Constitution, and set up an appropriate mechanism to draw up recommendations based on the conclusions of the Director-General's Report. This can only be achieved by setting up a special committee.

We would like to avail ourselves of this opportunity to thank the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, which has always supported the cause of the Palestinian people, especially at the International Labour Organization, and which adopted a resolution in New Delhi in January 1995 calling upon the ILO to set up a standing committee to consider the Report of the Director-General.

We would also like to thank all the countries and representatives of workers and employers who have always helped the Arabs to defend their rights.

Original Arabic: Mr. ELAMAWY (Minister of Manpower and Employment, Egypt) – In the name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate. Firstly, I should like to congratulate the President on his election to chair this session of our Conference and the special sitting devoted to the discussion of the Report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. I wish the Officers full success. I would also like to thank the Director-General of the International Labour Office for his Report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, and to thank the members of the two missions sent by the Director-General to the occupied territories, to Syria and to Israel to study the situation of the workers in the occupied territories.

Peace negotiations began with the 1979 peace treaty between Egypt and Israel and continued 13 years later with the Madrid peace talks of 1991, which led to positive political developments in the Middle East, culminating in the mutual recognition of the State of Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Israel and the PLO signed the Washington Declaration of September 1993 as a first step towards a peaceful and just settlement based on Security Council resolutions 242 and 338. The detailed Cairo agreement, which was aimed at implementing the Declaration of Principles, was signed in May 1994, and Israel and Jordan signed a peace agreement shortly thereafter.

We hope that the recent expectations as regards the peace process for Syria and Israel will lead to true progress, that similar headway will be possible between Lebanon and Israel, and that Security Council resolution No. 425 can be implemented.

We consider that it is most important to overcome the different obstacles to the implementation of the Declaration of Principles. In particular, we have to find a solution to the question of the elections in the Palestinian territories. We will thus be able to realize the aspirations of the Palestinian people.

We consider that the Jewish settlement policy in the occupied Arab territories and the confiscation of land and water rights that are mentioned in the Director-General's Report are an obstacle to peace.

The building of settlements contradicts human rights and international humanitarian law. Specifically, it violates the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949.

Still, we would like to welcome the suspension by the Israeli Government of the confiscation of Arab land in East Jerusalem. We invite the Israeli Government to go back on its decision and to put an end to the settlement of the occupied Arab territories.

The peace process must lead to concrete results in Palestinian-Israeli relations, especially as regards the situation of workers in the occupied territories. They should enjoy freedom of association. Their suffering must end. The peace process will thus benefit, and we will be able to achieve a comprehensive peace, applying the principle of land for peace.

As the Report says, the problem of unemployment is a very important one because the supply of workers is much greater than demand. Furthermore, the Israeli authorities have prohibited Palestinian workers from working in Israel where they go to look for jobs. This is a problem that has to be resolved urgently so that social unrest does not become an obstacle to peace in the Middle East.

The Director-General also stated that the occupied Arab territories were suffering from a kind of unemployment which has many aspects. We agree that as the region becomes more peaceful and the occupied Arab territories develop, we have to study the problem of employment much more deeply in order to reduce its impact on Palestinian workers and their families.

The Report also says that although the political conditions of this last quarter of a century are to a considerable extent responsible for the problem of unemployment in the occupied territories, solutions will not be easy to find, even if these political conditions disappear.

Indeed, there are structural restrictions which are an obstacle to the growth of the economy. We agree that one of the greatest challenges is the creation of enough jobs to overcome unemployment and underemployment in the occupied territories. We support the Director-General when he invites the international community, and in particular donors, to support at this very important period in the life of the Middle East the projects and programmes of the ILO which can lead to economic development.

We would like to praise the report of the multidisciplinary mission conducted in December 1993 and welcome the projects presented in the report. We also welcome the efforts made by the different departments of the International Labour Office in the occupied Arab territories.

As I said at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference last year, the evolution of the peace process is leading to new duties for the ILO and the other specialized agencies. All these organizations should help Palestinian workers to enjoy their rights.

We would like to state that we cannot accept the reduction of allocations for the occupied Arab territories in the 1995-96 budget. We think, on the contrary, that they should be increased.

Egypt is taking part in the Middle East peace process to achieve just and lasting peace in the region, based on United Nations Security Council resolutions 242 and 338 and the principle of land for peace. We hope that peace will eliminate the true causes of the sufferings of the workers in the occupied Arab territories.

Original Arabic: Mr. KARA (Workers' delegate, Israel) – Both in Arabic and in Hebrew we use the words “peace be with you” as a form of greeting, which proves the will of the two peoples for peace.

At the outset, I would like to avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate the President on his election to chair the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like also to congratulate the Vice-Presidents and Mr. Michel Hansenne for his balanced Report on the situation of workers in the occupied territories.

Last time I addressed you, I expressed the hope that the special sitting at the 81st Session of the Conference would be the last in the life of the dramatic progress of the peace process in the Middle East. I am gratified today by the resolution of the ILO Governing Body that this sitting will be the last. This will, therefore, be the last time I will address you within this special framework on the importance of the subject of Israeli/Palestinian relations and coexistence, from the point of workers and trade unions, an issue which is still of paramount importance for the Histadrut which I am honoured to represent.

During last year, Israel and the Palestinian Authority continued to work together to consolidate and advance the peace process. This has provided new momentum and hopes for the advancement of peace and an increased readiness on the part of Israel to work with the Palestinian organizations with regard to labour and labour relations. At the trade union level, I am happy to say that progress has also been achieved in so far as the Histadrut and the Palestine General Federation of Trade Unions took it upon themselves to work as partners and concluded the first agreement of its kind between the Histadrut and Palestine General Federation of Trade Unions. Within the framework of this agreement, the basis of fruitful and constructive peace was laid. We are now working toward a better future based on dialogue, assistance and joint ventures of interest to both parties.

We know that these are just the first steps and that we have to surmount many hurdles on the way to implementing this agreement but what is important is that the step has been taken, as mentioned, by the Director-General in his annual Report and the wheels have been set irrevocably in motion. What is equally important too is that we should work with all our strength to improve the situation of Palestinian workers and encourage them to support the peace process.

I would like to add that, in spite of the fact that the Palestinian Authority has begun to shoulder its duties in the Gaza Strip and Jericho area, Israel is still providing labour opportunities to between 35,000 and 40,000 Palestinians within Israel although there is considerable internal opposition in view of terrorist action against Israeli citizens. Here I would like to mention that the Israeli Government recently granted the Palestinian Authority 102 million Israeli shekels, which is equal to 34 million dollars, to be invested to alleviate the suffering of the Palestinian people.

Histadrut, for its part, is still continuing to defend the interests of the Palestinian people and exerting every effort to ensure that Palestinian workers enjoy good working conditions. The struggle for better working conditions can be furthered through joint cooperation between us and the Palestinians. But, this is not enough. There is a pressing need for international investment to help the Palestinian Authority to build an economic infrastructure, promote lucrative industries and provide a respectable standard of living for the workers. From this august podium I call upon all countries, especially the donor countries, including Arab countries, to give generously to the Palestinian Authority and to accelerate assistance to achieve the aforementioned objective. The ILO has an important role to play in building peace and this could be achieved through assistance and technical projects to improve working conditions and extend social security and education for democracy and social justice.

The missions to study the situation of the Palestinian workers and routine reports compiled by the ILO fall short of achieving their primordial objective to satisfy their daily requirements and improve conditions.

What our region needs today is for the ILO to increase assistance and consolidate the Palestinian trade unions, as well as trade unions in other Arab countries to safeguard the interests of labour masses and ensure their rights and the living standards of those they represent.

These are the challenges faced by the Palestine General Federation of Trade Unions, the Histadrut, the international trade union movement and the ILO.

Let us together courageously and assiduously take resolutions to solve the problems of the workers in our region, to guarantee their rights and peace. Let us turn dream into reality and turn the Middle East into a secure and flourishing region. This is the duty of the ILO today, tomorrow and in the years to come. Help us realize the most sublime of all our duties which is to build genuine peace in the Middle East.

Peace be with you.

Original Chinese: Mr. FU (Workers' adviser, China) – Over the years we have reached an important consensus, namely, that the Palestinian issue is the crux of the Middle East problem. It directly affects not only peace and development of the Middle East, but also that of the world at large. The International Labour Conference has on many occasions convened a number of special meetings to explore a fair and reasonable solution to the Palestinian issue and to express our support to the Palestinian workers and peoples in their perennial and brave struggles to restore their legitimate rights. For these meetings are absolutely necessary. Progress has been made in the Middle East peace process over the past year. In March this year Palestine and Israel have both agreed to conclude negotiations by 1 July on the redeployment of the Israeli troops on the West Bank and on the Palestinian general elections, and they also formally signed a comprehensive agreement. It is a major breakthrough in the peace talks between Palestine and Israel to set this date, and it will help to promote a comprehensive settlement of all other remaining issues and speed up the implementation of all the provisions of the peace accord between the two countries. The Chinese workers and trade unions are happy to see this. However, we should not fail to note that the road to peaceful negotiations is still tortuous, with many obstacles and difficulties standing in the way. We hope that the Middle East, a land tortured by wars for nearly half a century, will turn into an oasis of peace, and that the Palestinian workers and people will very soon be able to lead a happy, peaceful and stable life.

The present achievements in solving the issues involving Palestine and the Middle East should be attributed to the protracted struggles by the people of Palestine and other Middle Eastern countries and the law-abiding people of the world. The ILO has also made its due contribution. We shall value this success and tolerate no sabotage of it. Meanwhile, we should bear in mind that it is only a good beginning of a genuine, fair and reasonable solution to the Palestinian issue, and it is just a beginning for the achievement of a comprehensive and enduring peace in the Middle East.

Palestine and several trade unions have proposed that a special committee be established to examine the conditions of workers in the occupied Arab territories. The Chinese trade unions support this proposal. We hope the international community, including the ILO, will as always continue to take every possible action and measure, and cooperate with the Palestinian people and workers as best we can to promote the peace process in the area.

The Chinese workers and trade unions have always stood for peaceful settlement of international disputes through negotiations, and supported the Palestinian workers and people in their just struggles to restore their legitimate rights. History has always proven Chinese workers and trade unions to be the most reliable friend of the Palestinian workers and people in their struggles. We will, along with the workers and trade unions of all other countries, continue to contribute to the achievements made thus far of a comprehensive, fair and lasting peace in the Middle East.

Original Arabic: Mr. SAHBANI (Workers' delegate, Tunisia) – Allow me on behalf of my organization, the Tunisian General Federation of Labour, to congratulate the President on his election to chair this Conference and to pay tribute to what he said in his opening statement in terms of humanitarian values, indicating full sympathy with just causes throughout the world.

This Organization, ever since its inception at a time when the world was witnessing many struggles and difficulties, has defended the principles of equality, justice and freedom. The Organization has stood with the just causes. These are the humanitarian values, perennial values, which have allowed the Organization to stand steadfastly despite all the changes in the world. They are the values that have helped our peoples to find their freedom from exploitation and domination.

The very serious transformations and changes witnessed by the world today have given rise to many negative consequences and have made the task of organization more and more difficult, for it is called upon today to be very vigilant in defence of the principles for which it was established and which it has enshrined in international standards – principles which we have defended and stood for in Tunisia.

Within this humanitarian framework we have to place the issue which brings us here today, as we have in the past, namely the Palestinian cause and the cause of the occupied Arab territories. The Palestinian people and the workers of the occupied Arab territories have suffered for long because of the policies of oppression and the deliberate starvation of the people by the occupying authorities. They have incarcerated hundreds and thousands of Palestinians and have attempted to silence all those who call for their legitimate rights. They have thrown out the Palestinians, annexed their lands and their homes, replacing them by waves of settlers coming from all parts of the world and being defended and encouraged by the occupying authorities.

The policy of oppression and assassinations perpetrated by the occupying authorities has gone hand in hand with organized terrorism directed at innocent citizens with the aim of annexing all the Arab territories. Such policies, of course, have generated different forms of self-defence in order to recover annexed territories. That is the reality which has led the ILO to hold the special sitting, in order to examine the circumstances suffered by the Arab people in Palestine and the other occupied territories.

Any discriminating observer of the situation in the region today can see that such policies are continuing, that the Palestinians are still being thrown out of their land; their land is being annexed and given to settlers – to wit, the latest decisions adopted to annex parts of Jerusalem. Assassination and persecution continue to afflict against the Palestinians. It behoves us in such circumstances to refer to what is being suffered by the Palestinian people in the region. It is not surprising that they have to resort to self-defence, and yet their operations are no justification for the policy of collective sanctions and for the throwing out of the Palestinians from their country.

Bearing in mind all the above, we have to recognize that until just settlement is reached the situation will continue unchanged in the region. A just settlement which will enable the Palestinian people to recover their land and set up their State with Jerusalem as its capital. It is consequently essential today to seek timely solutions which we consider valid and which may lead to a better situation. First of all we believe that the special sitting should continue to be held during the Sessions of the Conference. Secondly, a Special Committee should be set up by the Conference which would examine annually the Report of the Director-General on the situation of the workers in Palestinian and the other occupied territories and to continue as long as settlement and occupation continue. So as to continue international support for the Palestinian people as we submit those proposals we are counting on the Organization to support them, for its task is to stand by the workers.

Original Chinese: Mr. LIN (Government adviser, China) – For many years, our Organization has continued to examine this issue, which surely illustrates the concerns of the member States. Over the years, the situation in the region of the Middle East has been turbulent and unstable, which has had a serious impact on conditions of employment for the Palestinian people in the occupied Arab territories and further affects all the people in this region. In this regard, the Chinese delegation wishes to express its serious concerns.

We are gratified to note that, following long and difficult negotiations, Palestine has begun to exercise self-rule in Gaza and Jericho. Jordan and Israel have at long last signed a peace treaty and established diplomatic relations. We would like to express our appreciation of and support for all these positive results of the peace process. The breakthrough in the Middle East peace process fully proves the point that confrontation and war cannot solve problems and that active participation, by all the parties concerned, in dialogue and negotiation on the basis of international law is the best way forward and the only alternative with regard to solving the Arab-Israeli conflict. The Middle East issue is complex. It involves the sovereignty and fundamental interests of the countries concerned, and because of this, it is inevitable that negotiations should run into difficulties and twist and turn. However, the trend toward peaceful negotiation is irreversible. As long as all the parties concerned continue to adopt flexible and practical attitudes, continue to make an effort and remove barriers, the Middle East peace talks will continue to make progress.

The Chinese Government has, all along, supported a solution to the Middle East issue through peaceful negotiation. We endorse the efforts of all the parties to the Middle East conflict to solve their differences through peaceful negotiation. To advance the peace process in the Middle East it is essential to improve further the living conditions of the people in the occupied Arab territories and make redress for the unjust treatment of the Palestinian people. We therefore call on this session of the International Labour Conference to help work out and implement a practical employment policy, develop labour force resources, improve the quality of work and expand revenue spent on employment in order to solve the serious unemployment and poverty issues. China will do all it can, together with the International Labour Organization to improve the conditions of workers in the occupied Arab territories.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL DERHAM (Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Housing, Qatar) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. It is a pleasure for me first of all to be able to express my thanks to the Director-General and to the mission sent by him to find out about the situation prevailing in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories. That mission drew up the Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories which we are currently discussing. I should also like to thank the mission for the efforts it made and to express our thanks for the support. We count on this support to help us identify the measures which can be taken by the International Labour Organization in order to support the Arab residents in the occupied Arab territories. In this way, they will be able to assess the arbitrary measures to which they are exposed and make a contribution to improving the very difficult living and working conditions being confronted by the Palestinian people.

Developments in the course of the past few years and the movement towards peace in the region have given hopes to our brothers in Palestine and in the occupied Arab territories. Those developments, as I have said, have raised hopes that an end can be put to the war and to the aggressions to which they have been exposed. Nevertheless, on a daily basis we continue to be shocked by what takes place. It could be said that the peace process in the Middle East has objectives other than achieving peace as all peace-loving people on the planet understand it.

Peace in the region is only meaningful if it can lead to a lasting solution, if an end can be put to the bloodshed amongst Palestinians, as well as to the other material and physical losses which have been suffered by the Palestinian people for decades now. There can be no peace if we do not put an end to the occupation. We must put a stop to the confiscating of lands, other resources and all other practices which run counter to national sovereignty and the national economy.

The Israeli and other media show us images which are very difficult to bear. Every day the Israeli authorities find new ways to restrict the movements of Palestinian workers. There is increased unemployment, the rate of which was already high amongst Palestinians, and living conditions are deteriorating still further. The Israeli authorities continue to confiscate Arab territories under the pretext of seeking peace and also they continue to build new motorways etc. There is an on going Judaization of the city of Jerusalem and unrelenting attempts to change its historical and cultural identity despite the appeals launched by various international organizations.

The Report highlights the deterioration in the infrastructure and services in the autonomous regions and gives us some indication of the resources necessary to improve the situation and also to develop the economic and administrative structure of state institutions. Yet, once more, we wonder how this can be done if the transfer of the various powers continues to be delayed. In fact, delaying the transfer of powers is simply the practical expression of the on going nature of the arbitrary, unjust policies directed against the Palestinian people. The goodwill of neighbouring countries could be translated into a rapid withdrawal and the release of detainees, as well as into the provision of aid to the Palestinian authorities and to the Palestinian people.

When we speak of peace, we are speaking of a just global peace which would return rights to those entitled to them throughout the occupied Arab territories, and in southern Lebanon. The occupation has emptied these lands of tens of thousands of inhabitants. It has created economic, social and humanitarian problems, a plethora of which is afflicting the people in Syria and Lebanon.

This special sitting allows us to shed light upon the realities of the situation in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. Indeed, this sitting, reflects the interest shown by the Organization in this matter and its desire to see freedom and justice prevail. Nevertheless, if we do not manage to agree upon the measures to be taken, it will be difficult to implement this peace.

We very much appreciate the efforts made by the Organization to help the Palestinian people in the autonomous areas and the other occupied territories. However, we express the wish that such assistance be increased so that the Palestinian people may strengthen their structures and improve the living and working conditions of Palestinian workers. For this reason we believe that the International Labour Conference should turn this special sitting into a special committee which would discuss specific recommendations on measures, programmes and projects to be implemented. This committee would not be a political committee. Nevertheless, it would contribute to reflecting the efforts made by the Organization to improve the situation in the occupied territories. We believe that the setting up of such a committee would be a step in the right direction.

Original French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – The principal objective to my statement is, in the same way, as at previous sessions is to express the solidarity of all Employers' delegates at the Conference with populations covered by the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers living in the occupied Arab territories. You will understand that our concern relates not only to workers but also to employers in these territories who are pursuing their tasks in difficult circumstances.

From paragraph 36 on, the Report correctly stresses the importance of promoting employment in the occupied territories. Paragraph 37 states that "the political circumstances of the last quarter of a century have been a major factor shaping the employment problem of the territories". This is quite clear; however, it is also quite clear that without a return to peace and stability in the region, it is scarcely likely that we will see any development of employment. Consequently, peace is a sine qua non even if, in itself, it is not completely sufficient for a return to employment, as is pointed out in the Report.

Employment development also means the development of enterprises especially of the small and medium variety which can then produce goods and services for a stable market capable of absorbing them. It is for this reason that employers – just as much citizens as employees – share all the hopes for peace expressed at this podium, even if the responses evidently depend on measures to be taken by the public authorities.

It seems to me that, this year, we are confronted with a new situation. The debate has changed somewhat – for two reasons. First, we seem to have got away from sterile confrontation and the irreconcilable position of contradiction that we saw in the past; what we now have is the start of a real dialogue which obviously reflects the positive course of events in the region.

Above all, this new situation now allows the ILO to be present in the field and to implement practical action to help the competent authorities take measures to help create employment. It is only through job creation, that it will be possible to effectively combat unemployment and poverty which are, of course, the source of frustration and anger, and which are endangering the very process of peace.

I would like also to emphasize paragraph 64 of the Report which quite rightly highlights the importance of small enterprises. I do indeed believe that it is indispensable for the ILO to undertake specific measures – and I quote from the Report – "to improve the small enterprise environment and to provide support services as appropriate".

This paragraph also points out that economic structures of the region are based above all on small or single-worker firms. However, this action also has to be accompanied, as is the vocation of the ILO, by the strengthening of the representative organizations in particular, for our part, representative organizations of employers.

I would emphasize here the importance we attached to the project for enhancing the capabilities of chambers of commerce, industry and agriculture in Palestine. I will not go into detail here, but I think the ILO is justified in according it the greatest of importance so that this federation of chamber of commerce made up of existing organizations can act as a nucleus for developing capabilities of effective and representative employers' organizations.

With this hope in mind, I would once again express the hope that an improvement in this situation will allow us to tackle the real problems of this area in a serene and practical manner.

Original Arabic: Mr. NASR (Employers' adviser, Lebanon) – Once again I stand on this rostrum to comment on the Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers in Palestine and in other occupied territories. I would have much preferred not to have to do that. I would have preferred that there would be no reason for this special sitting, but what can we do if the situation of labour in the occupied territories remains a very complex and serious one?

To deal with the problems of security by closing off the territories has made the problems more complicated. What can be done if the occupied territories do not have a comprehensive net of social security, and if the vulnerable groups are left without protection, and if the mechanisms for the implementation of a Labour Code, if they exist, are not implemented? What can be done if the economic and social conditions in the occupied territories are constantly deteriorating? What can be done if the peace process is stumbling, not to say limping, and what can be done if the policy of settlements is continuing in the Syrian Golan Heights and in Jerusalem? What indeed can be done, if occupation is still present in Palestine, in the Golan and in the southern parts of Lebanon? What can the ILO do but be concerned, and how can this International Labour Conference proceed without this special sitting or a special committee?

The International Labour Office and its Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, his collaborators and his many assistants, are indeed to be thanked for their constructive work and efforts in the course of the past year, in order to help the Palestinian workers, Palestinian employers and managers to raise the standard of their management systems and skills. I believe that this special sitting devoted to the discussion of the Report of the Director-General is a recognition of their efforts. I sincerely hope that the day will come when we can say that the international family has accomplished its task with success, that the occupation has ended, freedom has been achieved, and the process meets with a successful culmination.

May the peace of Allah be upon you.

(Ms. Engelen-Kefer takes the Chair.)

Mr. DATO'LIM (Minister of Human Resources, Malaysia) – On behalf of the Malaysian delegation allow me, first of all, to congratulate the President on his election to preside over this special sitting on the occasion of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

Last year when we met here on a similar occasion, there was great hope that a new era in the relationship between Israelis and Palestinians would come about, when Chairman Yasser Arafat of the Palestine Liberation Organization and Prime Minister Itzhak Rabin of Israel signed the Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements in Washington on 13 September 1993, followed by the subsequent signing in Cairo on 4 May 1994 of the Agreement on the Gaza Strip and the Jericho Area.

This was indeed a bold step, which to us was a step forward in the long search for a comprehensive, just and durable solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Regretfully, as we can see in the Appendix to the Director-General's Report, the much anticipated peace dividend still appears elusive. We are deeply concerned about the continued enforcement of repressive policies by the Israeli occupation authorities, including the confiscation of land, the continued expansion and establishment of Israeli settlements, the demolition of Palestinian houses, the closure of the border, the prohibition of access to workplaces of Palestinian workers inside the green line and Israeli violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms. All these actions are flagrant and blatant violations of international humanitarian law and relevant Security Council resolutions as well as the Declaration of the Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements. This undoubtedly will undermine and wreck the fragile peace process in the region.

My delegation would like to thank the Director-General for highlighting the plight of the Palestinian workers in the occupied territories, and express our appreciation to the representatives of the Director-General for their extensive Report. The Director-General, in his Report, has highlighted the massive employment problem in the occupied Palestinian territories. We are concerned that this problem will deteriorate with the increasing labour force and with hardly any employment opportunities within the occupied territories. In this regard, it is therefore regrettable that the Israeli authorities have closed the border thus curtailing employment opportunities for the Palestinians. The recruitment of foreign workers in occupied territories would further aggravate the employment opportunities for Palestinian workers.

It is my country's conviction that for the peace process to succeed in the region, the Palestinian people must tangibly feel that their lives have changed for the better. Basic amenities such as health and education, as well as employment opportunities, must all be provided. The international community, including Israel, must ensure that all these are rightfully emplaced. The ILO and other agencies must redouble their efforts to promote appropriate action to improve the current acute employment situation facing the Palestinians, and promote policies and measures that will enhance employment opportunities. The ILO must also continue to schedule such meetings in the future, with a view to monitoring the situation there.

Original Arabic: Mr. MEGHLAOUI (Government delegate, Algeria; speaking on behalf of the Arab Maghreb Union) – It is a pleasure for me to address this august assembly on behalf of the Arab Maghreb Union and to inform you of some of our ideas on this item of the agenda.

For a number of years now, the International Labour Conference has given us an opportunity of holding a special sitting on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. This has allowed us to look into the situation, see where we stand, and suggest measures to try and improve it.

This approach is not clearly reflected in the Director-General's Report, perhaps because the mission took place late, perhaps because of, and I quote the Report, "the understanding that this would be the last occasion on which such a sitting would be held, in view of the expected continuing improvement in the situation of these workers" (that is to say those in the occupied Arab territories).

What is behind this optimism?

This is a question worth asking in view of the fact that, even today in this part of the Middle East, torn apart by decades of conflict, scepticism is difficult to eradicate. And worries still mask some of the glimmers of hope that have appeared here and there, above all thanks to the personal efforts some have made to speed the onset of an era of peace, justice and cooperation.

These glimmers of hope – it should be remembered – started to appear when the peace process was started in Madrid in October 1991. Subsequently, the signing of the Declaration of Principles in Washington on 13 September 1993 marked an important milestone. Other agreements, like those of Cairo, followed and initiated a period of transition and the founding by the Palestinian people of an autonomous entity on a part of its national territory.

But peace is a demanding phenomenon. It has to be built. The current process in the Middle East does not escape this rule.

In this region, more than anywhere else, the steps leading to peace have to be made rapidly. In this region, more than anywhere else, extremely urgent measures have to be taken and applied immediately. We must free the prisoners, allow the refugees to return, dismantle the settlements, allow the Palestinian people to hold elections within the scheduled time, rebuild the devastated infrastructure and relaunch the economy.

Further progress in the situation in the Arab occupied territories still faces multiple obstacles and threats for the peace process – which itself remains extremely fragile.

It must be stated here and now that one of the parties has still not come around to stating clearly and frankly its adherence and commitment to a just and global peace and its dedication to a peaceful and durable settlement.

The occupation authorities continue to take action that the international community has an obligation to condemn. For example, we may cite: obstacles to free movement; cordoning off the occupied territories and autonomous zones; and collective punishment. All the exactions disorganize economic life, aggravate unemployment and deprivation, accentuate exclusion and frustration, and strengthen the feeling of injustice.

This is the type of situation that feeds despair, generating extremism and violence that raise a serious threat to the peace process.

Diverting water courses to the settlements is another example illustrating the volatility of the situation. The populations of the occupied territories are deprived of their already inadequate water supplies. It makes it difficult to farm their lands and makes their future uncertain.

The occupying authorities are pursuing a well-known strategy of changing the physical and demographic characteristics of the occupied territories in flagrant disregard for international law.

A recent example of this policy was the decision on 30 April 1995 to confiscate 55 hectares of Arab land at El Qods. The reaction of the international community has made the occupying authorities back down, and they have put their decision on hold. It is necessary to continue to vigorously denounce this action and demand purely and simply the cancellation of this decision which is unjust, illegal and dangerous for the peace process.

Continuation of the settlement policy is another example illustrating the fragility of this process. The policy can be seen both in the extension of existing settlements and in the creation of new ones. It is a crime against the Palestinian people and an affront to the international community. An end must be put to this policy. The settlements must be dismantled.

The International Labour Organization has a major role to play, particularly by intensifying cooperation programmes for Arab workers in the occupied territories.

In this respect, while this situation in the occupied territories remains what it is, we believe a special committee at the Conference would be the appropriate framework for examining the Director-General's annual Report.

The international community has committed itself collectively to the peace process. It must protect it and ensure that it finally achieves success with the creation of a Palestinian State with – as its capital – El Qods, Jerusalem.

Mr. BOATENG (Government delegate, Ghana) – I wish to add my voice to those of the previous speakers by congratulating the President and his Officers on their unanimous election to steer the affairs of this session. I would like on behalf of my Government and on my own behalf to commend the Director-General of the ILO and his able staff for presenting to this special sitting a detailed and well-balanced Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. The Report eloquently testifies to the tripartite orientation of the ILO, the aim of which is to cater for the interests of government, employers and workers alike.

There is no doubt that the peace process signed in Washington on 13 September 1993 between Israel and the PLO, and subsequent peace accords have raised new hopes and expectations for a peaceful settlement of the Middle East conflict, in spite of the occasional violations of the provisions of the agreement.

As has been rightly pointed out in the Director-General's Report, the Israel-Palestinian conflict is the epicentre of the Middle East conflict. Consequently, special attention has to be paid to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. It is in pursuit of this cause that my Government wishes to urge all peace-loving nations and the international community to do everything in their power to support all initiatives to enhance the peace process in the Middle East, notwithstanding the unpleasant set-backs that keep disturbing the peace.

Ghana would like to call on all the parties to the conflict to exercise the maximum restraint, tolerance, open-mindedness, understanding and goodwill to make the new relationship and peace endure. This is because whatever happens, the parties shall continue to live as neighbours in the geographical areas where they now reside.

This being the case, our collective effort as has been clearly outlined in the Director-General's Report is to help and support the Palestinian Authority to reconstruct their country and tackle the massive employment problems facing the workers in the occupied territories. This is because a peaceful solution to the conflict cannot be sustained if efforts are not able to achieve economic development in the occupied territories.

The problems confronting the Palestinian Authority are grave but not insurmountable. This is borne out by the large degree of international solidarity they enjoy, and the succinct analysis of the problems and possible solutions as suggested in the Director-General's Report. This is indeed a first step forward, and I would like to support the idea of establishing a committee to consider this Report in future sessions.

What is required of the Palestinian Authority is to concentrate their efforts and energies in establishing institutions and mechanisms that will assist the social partners to meet their basic socio-economic needs. This effort should undoubtedly be actively supported by Israel and of course the international community led by the ILO.

I am convinced that this collective support and international solidarity with the Palestinian Authority will motivate and encourage them to maintain and enhance their commitment to the pursuit of a comprehensive just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

In conclusion, I wish to entreat both the Israeli and Palestinian Authorities to endeavour to step up the tempo for a peaceful solution to the conflict.

Such a peace would serve as an enduring memorial to the many people, including Ghanaians, who have lost their lives in the United Nations peace-keeping duties, finding peace and stability in the Middle East.

Original French: Mr. TIXIER (Workers' adviser, France) – In 1993 when the agreements were signed in Oslo the CGT, like many others, gave them a warm welcome. Indeed, they began a peace process not only between Israelis and Palestinians, but also for all the other States in the region. These agreements were, and remain, the only chance for a just, lasting and comprehensive peace. The CGT continues to hold this view in spite of the impediments, the suspension of negotiations and the failure on the part of the Israeli Government to respect many of the important aspects of these agreements.

There are two basic conditions which are vital to the success of this process. The first is the actual implementation by the different parties of the Oslo agreement. The second is the real and effective assistance of the international community.

As regards the first, we can only recognize that the attitude adopted by the Israeli Government supposedly for security reasons, as important and vital as security may be, has the effect of jeopardizing the peace process.

While the agreement calls for a freeze on the building of settlements, more are still being developed on the West Bank.

Using security as a pretext, the Israeli army still has not redeployed. This hampers in particular the holding of free and democratic elections for the Palestinians. The complex issue of East Jerusalem is also a stumbling block, as Israel is pursuing its policy of expropriation.

The negotiations are at a standstill as regards exiles and Palestinian refugees outside the territories.

And finally, more than 5,000 Palestinians are still political prisoners in Israel, whereas the agreements provided for their release.

As regards the international community, with few exceptions, it bears considerable responsibility for the future of peace. A great deal of financial assistance has been promised, but it has still not reached the Palestinian Authority for which it was intended.

The Palestinian population on the West Bank and particularly in Gaza is living in tragic economic and social conditions, and this does much to lessen the credibility of the peace process. It feeds the currents which advocate violence and extremism against both Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

In Gaza, the unemployment of tens of thousands of Palestinian workers provoked by the closure of the area by Israel makes it impossible to have any economic development.

We are convinced that a just and lasting peace can only be built if the Israeli Government resolves fully to apply the Oslo agreements. If it does not, there is a risk of seeing in the next few months an unprecedented yet alas predictable increase in extremism on both the Palestinian and Israeli sides.

It is also vital and urgent that the international community, and in particular the European Union and France, should use their political influence in this region to strengthen the peace process. A substantial increase in financial assistance from the European Union is also vital to building stable economic and social structures.

As regards trade unions, the CGT welcomes the cooperation agreement between the Palestine General Federation of Trade Unions and Israel's Histadrut at the beginning of 1995. It is convinced that the trade union organizations of the two countries are playing and will continue to play a very important role in the peace process. The CGT has always worked for a strengthening of ties between these two organizations. In fact, in 1988 it was at the CGT's initiative that they officially met for the first time, in Montreuil, at the CGT's headquarters.

On behalf of the French workers, I think that I can express the hope that we have for the establishment of lasting peace for all the peoples in this region.

I would also like to express the hope that this special sitting will be continued at all sessions of the Conference until such time as peace has been definitively established.

Original Arabic: Mr. DAHLAN (Employers' delegate, Saudi Arabia) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, I would like to express my appreciation for the efforts by the Director-General and his mission sent to study the situation of workers and employers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories.

The Philadelphia Declaration, ILO resolutions and standards have all been taken into account. We have always insisted on the protection of workers and employers, since this creates an appropriate climate for economic development. In this regard, the ILO should play a key role.

We must take into consideration certain variables that characterize our age, including peace in the Middle East. But which kind of peace is that? It should be a peace that guarantees the rights of everyone; workers and employers, and that respects the principles of the ILO while liberalizing trade. Such liberalization is one of the aspirations of employers in Palestine and will contribute to the flourishing of the economy of the region as well as being a positive contribution to the future of workers there.

The concerted efforts of the entire international community will also be extremely important to peace efforts in the area.

The creation of an infrastructure in Palestine, the attainment of political stability, freedom for employers' and workers' organizations, and the creation of a climate conducive to employer investments, as well as support for small and medium-sized enterprises, are among the most sought-after objectives for us, the employers in the Arab world.

I would like to conclude by expressing my wish that the same reasons which impelled us so enthusiastically to meet here will also result in the creation of a special committee for ensuring that these achievements will not have been in vain.

Mr. TIAGI (Workers' adviser, India) – One has nothing but admiration for the reference made by the Director-General in his Report about the situation in Palestine. It is a very complex situation. I myself come from India, which was under foreign domination for 200 years; and I have been a freedom fighter. I know what freedom means.

Israel has developed into one of the finest examples of a democratic State, guaranteeing trade union rights but their rights; but, in many respects it is behaving like France under Louis XIV of France which tolerated religious freedom provided that those practising religion were Catholics not Protestants.

The security of the State is not contingent upon the number of arms at its disposal but upon its harmonious relations with its neighbours. It is impossible to remain an island in the midst of a sea of hostility; peace must be sought by all means. It is no use entering into an agreement with geographical limitations. A State must decide whether it wishes to remain in constant conflict with its neighbours or create a Utopia where human beings live in peace, harmony and goodwill.

I hope that my friends from Israel and from Palestine may recognize the situation. We gained independence in 1947, one year before Israel came into existence. We have already experienced turmoil and we know that without peace and political stability there can be no progress. What does this occupation imply? We are living in the twentieth century. Occupying other peoples' territory is not fashionable or desirable at this moment. Israel is developing into a very sophisticated State; but what is it doing to the occupied territories? Is it not allowing people to benefit from their production or to work; it is denying them the freedom to choose their livelihood, thereby undermining their economic wellbeing. And if their economic wellbeing is undermined, poverty becomes rampant, unemployment increases and the social climate deteriorates.

All this creates a dangerous situation – and I want to avoid this for my friends from Israel. There is still time to act, to create peace and stability and provide for the economic wellbeing of the entire area, to prove that it is not a nation trying to live in a sea of hostility. I hope that in the coming year they may recognize these geographical and economic constraints – and goodwill will be created.

Mr. SKOGMO (Government delegate, Norway) – The Governing Body decided at its spring session this year to recommend the holding of this special sitting on the understanding that this would be the last time such a sitting be held. Norway fully supports this decision and we hope it will not be challenged in coming Governing Body Sessions.

I would like to congratulate the Director-General on a forward-looking and constructive Report on the situation in the occupied Arab territories. It highlights some of the central problems for the workers in those territories and for the peace process itself. Since last year's special sitting on this issue, the peace process in the Middle East has taken important steps forward. A Palestinian Authority has been set up in Gaza and the Jericho area. Close to one million Palestinians have, for the first time ever, their own administration and are able to influence their own affairs. A Palestinian police force has been established under difficult circumstances. Palestinian responsibility for education and culture, health and social welfare, taxation and tourism in the West Bank as well as in Gaza and Jericho are also important steps in the right direction.

The upcoming deadline of 1 July for reaching an agreement on extending Palestinian self-rule to the West Bank will be an important test of the ability of the parties to implement the even more crucial parts of the Oslo agreements. Both parties have committed themselves to adhere to the deadline. Intense negotiations are under way with the aim of reaching a common understanding on both redeployment of Israeli forces from cities and populated areas in the West Bank and on Palestinian elections.

Both parties have internal problems and the peace negotiations face opposition on both sides. Hopefully the parties will, by the time of the deadline, have reached agreement on the Israeli withdrawal from the populated areas of the West Bank, thereby paving the way for holding Palestinian elections in the autumn.

As illustrated in this year's Report of the Director-General, the present economic situation in the Palestinian self-rule areas remains extremely difficult and the living conditions for the Palestinian workers appear to be deteriorating. If we do not manage to solve the problems caused by unemployment and deteriorating living conditions, it will be difficult to consolidate lasting peace.

Unemployment is still a major problem. There are few jobs available within the territories. A large number of Palestinians are therefore dependent on having job opportunities within Israel. We are thus deeply concerned with the border closures and withdrawals of work permits as well as with the new Israeli policy of recruiting substitute workers from countries outside the area. This has led to a large number of Palestinians losing their jobs. The economic and social consequences of this policy are described as disastrous in the Director-General's Report. The misery could also encourage the growth of extremist groups in the territories.

We agree with the conclusions of the Director-General's Report that the employment problems of the territories can only be solved if the Palestinians succeed in achieving rapid and sustained economic growth. Therefore, existing constraints on economic activities should be removed as soon as possible. We welcome the Israeli commitment in the Tripartite Action Plan from the Ad Hoc Liaison Committee Meeting in Paris on 27 April to take all possible contingency measures in order to maintain maximum possible Palestinian economic activity whenever security measures are applied.

We should examine further what the ILO and its member States can do to support development towards the achievement of rapid and sustained economic growth. The member States should concentrate on efforts to promote labour-intensive public works programmes in order to improve the economic and social conditions of the population, as well as to rebuild the important infrastructure of Palestinian society. At the international conference to support the peace process in the Middle East held in Washington on 1 October 1993, Norway pledged a total of US$156 million in assistance to the Palestinian areas for the period 1994-98. I am happy to tell you that as a follow-up to this pledge, US$40 million was disbursed in 1994, US$62.5 million has been pledged in 1995. I would like to take this opportunity to encourage all members of the ILO to disburse their pledges to the Palestinian areas as soon as possible and to increase their assistance further. The very future of the peace process needs an active economic and political support.

The ILO should, for its part, continue its work on institution building in the areas mentioned in the Report of the Director-General. The establishment of employers' and workers' organizations, a Palestinian Ministry of Labour and the promotion of a tripartite dialogue on social and economic questions are vital steps towards social justice and peace. We encourage the ILO to continue its cooperation with the Palestinian Ministry of Labour to develop policies and structures in areas such as employment services, labour inspection, safety, health and training. Let me in this connection express our appreciation to the Histadrut for its willingness to cooperate with the Palestinian unions and to provide them with any practical assistance they might need.

In conclusion, the ILO should continue its forward-looking approach to the situation of the occupied territories. The creation of new jobs and the strengthening of Palestinian self-rule and democratic institutions in the territories would be most important contributions to the peace process.

Mr. AHMED (Minister of Labour and Productivity, Nigeria) – The people and Government of Nigeria congratulate the Director-General for the brilliant presentation of his Report on the Palestinian issue. We are encouraged by developments in the Middle East peace process and we urge a speedy completion of all outstanding issues in the Middle East.

We are concerned with the slow pace of achieving a meaningful and durable peace in the Middle East. We should spare no efforts in bringing an all-encompassing peace to this strategic and religiously vulnerable region of the world.

Peace, as we all know, rests on social development and economic growth. The enemies of peace are hunger, deprivation and poverty. Consequently, we call on the international community to provide the necessary technical assistance to the Palestinian people and all the deprived peoples of the Holy Land.

One effective way of doing this is through the development of the economic infrastructure of the Palestinian Authority. It will be quite encouraging to see the existing intergovernmental organizations such as the International Labour Organization developing tangible job-creating schemes for the Palestinians.

We appeal to the international community to assist the Palestinian Authority with manpower training and development, and to provide them with the much-needed financial assistance without which nothing much can be achieved. But first, the world must lay a foundation so as to facilitate the realization of a much-needed peace, and possibly the gradual economic development of the Palestinian people.

My Government and the people of Nigeria are looking forward to an enhanced peace process, which should be enriched with the wisdom of all of us that are here and with those communities that contribute and subscribe to the noble ideals and objectives of the International Labour Organization.

We support the call for the establishment of a committee that would help various nations, but particularly the people of Palestine, with the assurance that there will be a meaningful follow-up to whatever we agree to here, as presented by the Director-General, within a short space of time.

Ms. DEL RIO (Workers' adviser, Italy) – On behalf of the three Italian trade union confederations, CISL, CGIL and UIL, let me start by thanking the Director-General for this important Report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. This year the Report does not just give a precise statistical picture of the situation, it is also a useful instrument for acquainting us and giving us a better understanding of the dramatic situation of the everyday life of Palestinian workers and their families. The general information provided by the mass media does not describe these realities, and we need to be aware of them. We need the debate in this special sitting to reflect the latest diplomatic and political developments. We follow them with concern but also with great hope. There are contradictory signs. On the one hand, the clear commitment of the Israeli and Palestinian leaders to reach the necessary agreements, and on the other, we note the worrying reactions of the different political sectors which in various ways put obstacles in the way of the peace process.

The lack of substantial changes in the economic and social situation of the Palestinian population and the delays in the implementation of the Oslo, Washington and Cairo Agreements have led to a serious feeling of frustration which negatively contributes to increased extremist radicalism among the Palestinians. We knew before, and we know now, that real peace could and can be built on the basis of a broad and rapid social and economic development of the territories which has been denied by 28 years of occupation.

Unemployment remains the major and most urgent problem to solve. Most of the development projects submitted by international institutions and national governments are still on the wait-and-see list. The economic support of the international community for peace should be urgently transformed into concrete initiatives for the creation of employment and development. Only by improving the social standards of the population can we avoid social tensions and ensure stronger popular support for the peace process. But, as described in the ILO Report, there are serious problems regarding workers. Their working conditions are still degrading and difficult. Border closures represent a serious measure and are affecting Palestinian workers and their families. There is no comprehensive social protection system and much remains to be done in terms of education and training.
