Even in such a difficult framework, trade unions have tried to strengthen their role and their presence. We note the particularly important progress made in relations between the Palestine General Federation of Trade Unions and the Histadrut. The Italian trade union confederations have supported these direct dialogues, and we welcome the agreement relating to mutual cooperation signed by the Secretary-General of the Palestine General Federation of Trade Unions, Mr. Shaher Sa'ad and Histadrut. The international trade union movement played a strong and positive role in the implementation of this dialogue and we must continue to play such an important role and call for coherent action on the part of the international financial institutions and national governments.

We would like to stress here the constructive action carried out by the ILO aimed at improving the social conditions of the Palestinians, encouraging and supporting tripartite mechanisms for dialogue between the Palestinian Authority and the social partners. We would like to recall the various recommendations proposed in previous Reports of the Director-General. Unfortunately, many of them have not been implemented at all. However, we believe that the ILO continues to monitor the development of the situation in the territories, through an effective programme of technical cooperation. The Palestinian people, the international trade union movement, and those engaged in the peace process strongly need this ILO commitment.

Original Russian: Mr. BORSCHEVSKY (Government delegate, Russian Federation) – First of all, the Government delegation of the Russian Federation would like to express its particular satisfaction at the fact that the ILO mission to Israel and to the occupied Arab territories was able to take place. It is important that that mission was able to hold in-depth and frank discussions with the representatives of all the parties involved.

The Director-General's Report on the results of these activities contains a great deal of useful information which we believe is not only of interest to this Conference, but will also be carefully studied both in Israel and in the Arab circles concerned. The main objective of the Report, despite the obvious difficulties it mentions, is to improve the situation of workers in the occupied territories and to assist in the Middle East peace process.

We are heartened by paragraph 14 which contains the following encouraging statement: "The Middle East conflict, of which the Israeli-Palestinian is the epicentre, is now heading towards a peaceful and lasting settlement thanks to the spirit of open-mindedness and dialogue displayed by the parties in agreeing to negotiate".

I should like to emphasize that this statement is particularly important since the authors of the Report and we ourselves have reason to be concerned about the events that are described in paragraphs 24, 25, 26 and 27. The Russian Federation has, on more than one occasion, and indeed from this very rostrum, presented its position on the most important problems that are involved in bringing about the final success of the peace process. The essence of these problems is indeed presented in this section of the Report. Our position of principle on these issues remains unchanged.

Russia, as a co-sponsor of the peace process, is very much interested in the creation of conditions conducive to the broadest possible agreement between the parties. The best way of resolving the complex employment problems in the occupied territories is by speeding up the implementation of the Israeli-Palestinian Declaration of Principles which, as we know, provides for the final establishment of Palestinian autonomy, including the holding of elections to the national Palestinian Council and the beginning of negotiations on the definitive status of the Palestinian territories. We believe that a favourable environment for the development of the peace process is incompatible with any manifestations of terrorism or blockades. On the other hand, the importance of fostering normal trading and economic relations between the territories and Israel cannot be overstated, and we fully support the conclusions in paragraph 62 of the Report on the need to resolve security issues not by closing off the territories but by other means. The practice of sealing off the territories only aggravates problems and does not assist in their resolution. On this point, we share the opinion expressed by the distinguished representative of France, who spoke here on behalf of the European Union.

Today, we believe that the fulfilment of financial aid commitments to the Palestinians would serve to improve the situation of Palestinian workers. At the Washington Conference of Middle East donors in October 1993, a decision was taken to grant $2.4 billion worth of international assistance to the Palestinian autonomous territories over a five-year period. To date, though, the Palestinians have received only a small part of the promised amounts.

The need for such assistance is all too evident. The Report convincingly demonstrates the gravity of the situation of the workers in the territories in terms of employment and social protection, and it quite correctly draws attention to the need for strengthening structures and mechanisms for industrial relations.

The Russian Federation supports the ILO's technical assistance activities for the territories. We concur with the ideas in the Director-General's concluding remarks. Russia, as ever, will do everything in its power to foster the Middle East peace process, to create more favourable conditions to enhance the situation of workers in the occupied territories, to strengthen security and to increase mutual understanding between all States in the region.

Mr. LAGUESMA (Government delegate, Philippines) – On behalf of the Philippine delegation and on my own behalf, allow me to first congratulate you and the other Officers for having been chosen to lead and preside over the deliberations of this session of the International Labour Conference.

As in previous special sittings, the Philippine delegation reaffirms its full support of the efforts and initiatives of the ILO towards the improvement of the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories and the alleviation of their working and living conditions.

While efforts to carry out these objectives have borne positive results, we fully recognize that much remains to be done. As things stand now, it is still a long but fulfilling way to go.

This year's special sitting assumes an even greater significance because it is slated to be the last one to be held during the session of the International Labour Conference. Although the Philippine delegation welcomes this Governing Body decision, in view of the continuing efforts to improve the condition of workers in the occupied territories, we believe that the ILO's activities and programmes of action should be intensified and sincerely hope that these will even be accelerated to ensure that the gains already achieved will be preserved and enhanced. In addition, the ILO's existing machinery should be able to respond to developments that may threaten or erode whatever has been accomplished.

The Philippine delegation is mindful of the financial dilemma that our Organization is currently facing. In fact, discussions on the ILO budget have been rather difficult and exhaustive. We believe, however, that competing priorities and budgetary constraints should not daunt us nor deter our resolve to accomplish our goal in seeing social justice, in conditions of lasting peace, reign in that part of the world.

It is in this context that the Philippine delegation joins the appeal for continuing international community and ILO active involvement and pursuit of programmes that are designed to foster social justice in the occupied Arab territories. This last sitting should signal the beginning of a new chapter geared toward realizing the theme of the Director-General's Report to the 82nd International Labour Conference, which is promoting employment. The recommendations therefore, contained in the Report of the Director-General, particularly as concerns the adoption and setting up of an employment policy framework, and its implementation in the area, deserve all our support.

In conclusion, we would like to wish both the Israeli and the Palestinian peoples success in their search for and journey towards lasting peace, and to assure them of our continued cooperation, through the ILO, in respect of the promotion of social justice and the improvement of workers' conditions in these territories.

Original Spanish: Ms. HERNÁNDEZ OLIVA (Government adviser, Cuba) – My delegation thanks the Director-General of the ILO for his Report on the situation of workers in the Israeli-occupied Arab territories and notes with concern the deterioration in the socio-economic climate for all workers, and more particularly for the Palestinian workers.

Approximately 60 per cent of the economically active population is currently unemployed. This situation is further aggravated by other measures applied by Israel, such as the confiscating of land and water sources, as well as the violations of the 1994 Paris Agreement based upon the principles of freedom of movement.

Furthermore, other events should also be mentioned, since they constitute provocations and attacks on freedom, in addition to the inhumane conditions in which imprisoned Palestine trade unionists are living.

The peace process in the Middle East requires constant monitoring by the ILO in order to support the just cause of the Palestinian workers and to make the measures taken to improve their living and working conditions feasible. The special sittings of the International Labour Conference have shown that the international community rejects the action carried out by the occupying forces, which are an infringement of the fundamental human rights that fall within the competence of the ILO. The special sittings should continue to take place; otherwise, a special committee should be convened to render an opinion to the Conference along with measures deemed appropriate for putting an end to the violations of international labour standards in the Arab territories occupied by Israel and to channel the international assistance intended to mitigate the suffering of workers in those territories.

A just and lasting peace should involve recognition of the Palestinian people's right to self-determination.

As long as the Arab territories continue to be occupied and colonized, giving rise to violations of the rights of Palestinian workers, there is no reason for the ILO to cease to convene these sittings. On the contrary, international action should be expanded, given the increasingly critical situation of the workers.

Mr. KHAN (Workers' adviser, Bangladesh) – Allow me to join the previous speakers in congratulating the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to the high offices of this session of this august Conference.

I also would like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for his efforts in presenting a forward-looking document on the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories. We unhesitatingly share his views that much more could and should have been done for those workers who, as we have seen, have been forced to suffer so much and are still being subjected to unjust discrimination and torture.

The working people of Bangladesh have, over the last 21 months, followed with optimism and interest the dramatic and positive breakthroughs in the Middle East peace process. The signing of the Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements on 13 September 1993 between the PLO and the Government of Israel, and the subsequent agreement signed on 4 May 1994 on Gaza and Jericho were the essential first steps towards the restitution of Palestinian and Arab rights, as well as the establishment of peace in the region based on fairness and justice. The return of Chairman Yasser Arafat to Gaza and Jericho and his assumption of the leadership of the Palestinian Authority marked the beginning of their march towards the realization of the cherished dream of an independent State. The peace accord signed between Jordan and Israel has added yet another positive dimension to the scenario.

It is universally recognized that the move towards the establishment of a durable political structure in Palestine must be accompanied by economic, social and other measures to reinforce the shattered socio-economic structure of Palestine. Prolonged Israeli occupation, severe restrictive and manipulative measures on economic and other activities, and denial of the basic human and economic rights of the Palestinians have taken a severe toll on the people in the occupied areas in physical and socio-economic terms. It is heartening to note that the international community, including the ILO, has demonstrated its willingness to recognize these realities and come up with some measures of support to overcome the difficulties faced by the Palestinian people in general and the workers in particular. These, however, have yet to take effect in the scale promised. We welcome the ILO's efforts to help them develop labour legislation, social security provisions and representative organizations to support their cause. We also welcome the efforts initiated by the ICFTU to assist the unions there in the field of worker education and training.

We strongly feel that the momentum created by the peace process in the Middle East would not be served by an imposition of Israeli laws, jurisdiction and administration in the occupied territories, including Jerusalem. The rights of the Palestinians to self-determination, to their land, and to political association are fundamental questions of human rights. Stray incidents of terrorism should not be used as a pretext for retaliation against the Palestinian nation and workforce. The repeated siege of the Gaza Strip and Jericho is a denial of their fundamental rights to live and work with dignity. Workers in Bangladesh express full solidarity with their Palestinian brethren in their efforts to uphold these rights.

The continued and systematic proliferation of illegal settlements in the West Bank confirms that gross and persistent violations of the rights of the people of the occupied territories go on unabated, despite hopes raised to the contrary by the initiation of the peace process. These not only mean dispossession of Palestinians, but also a gradual alteration of the demographic composition of the occupied territories, with consequential implications for Palestinian workers in terms of access to opportunities. All Israeli efforts illegally to alter the demographic composition of the occupied territories, including the development of Jewish settlements must, therefore, be stopped and reversed.

In conclusion, I would like to reaffirm the commitment of the people of Bangladesh in general and workers in particular to the just struggle of our brothers and sisters in the occupied Arab territories. We urge the world community to reinforce this commitment to the Middle East peace process and to support, both politically and financially, endeavours for achieving a comprehensive and equitable resolution of the issue of Palestine and the occupied Arab territories. This is imperative for the people and the workers to regain their means of prosperous and respectable living. It is our sincere hope that the International Labour Organization will continue to play a constructive role towards the attainment of this just and noble cause.

Original Arabic: Mr. BAKR (representative of the Arab Labour Organization) – In the name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate. Allow me at the outset to congratulate the President of the Conference – and the President of our session now – on their election. The Arab Labour Organization expresses its deep satisfaction with this special sitting, for the sixth consecutive year, which confirms its continued concern to closely monitor the situation of the Arab workers in Palestine and other occupied territories. The reasons which led to the holding of such special sittings are still present – we can even say that they have become more urgent despite the glimmer of hope that we felt following the signing of the Declaration of Principles, but which unfortunately disappeared very fast because of the position adopted by the Israeli authorities.

An objective observation of the peace process ever since the Oslo agreements goes to show that the Arab side has opted for a just peace, whereas the Israeli authorities are still the prisoners of their own concepts and theories and the illusion of domination by all means over the Arab territories.

We in the Arab Labour Organization consider the acts of violence and terrorism against the Palestinian people to be in contradiction with all principles and values. They are against the spirit of civilization and the message of God.

As an Organization for dialogue and social justice in the Arab world, we denounce the effects of wars on humanity, entailing a waste of energy and human and material resources, all of which should be directed at this stage of human history towards construction and development to overcome the problems that are facing humanity.

For the 18th consecutive year the Director-General is submitting his annual Report concerning the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories. We do not see a glimmer of hope to hope of improvement in working and living conditions, nor any hope for the implementation of the recommendations of the mission of the International Labour Organization – quite the opposite. It is indeed ironical to note that conditions have worsened since the beginning of the peace process. This should have been a time when we lay our weapons aside and deal with problems through constructive dialogue, and yet unemployment is the prevailing characteristic in the economic and social life of the Palestinian people, and indices of poverty, living standards and health have all worsened. Furthermore Palestinian workers are being dismissed without compensation and replaced by foreign workers.

The prevailing rule in the civilian Palestinian life is embodied in the military orders and collective punishments applied by the Israeli authorities.

We believe that a just peace is a condition sine qua non for economic, social and cultural development in the area and that all efforts should be devoted to development and reconstruction. But the principles of a true peace cannot become reality as long as the military occupation of the Arab territories continues and as long as settlements continue to be established.

We fully realize that unless the Israeli authorities give up their plans for expansion and for occupation the region will continue to be a source of tension threatening world peace. Any peace which is based on weak foundations is only a way of covering the fire with the ashes, and hesitancy on the road to peace is a step towards the precipice. Israel must behave in a manner compatible with the expectations of the entire world. Peace cannot be imposed, and the area depends on the peace as understood and envisaged by all parties.

We in the Arab Labour Organization fully appreciate the significance of these special sittings and look forward to see the Organization and the Conference play an even more important role, as symbols of social justice in the world, in supporting the Palestinian workers, to put an end to the injustice under which they labour, and establish an independent Palestinian State with Jerusalem as its capital.

The setting up of a special committee of the Conference, similar to the Committee on Apartheid, could be a serious contribution to finding solutions that would put an end to Israeli policies and practices which go against the objectives and principles of the ILO.

We in the Arab Labour Organization believe in social peace. We know that the coming period is a difficult one, but peace is worth the sacrifice, for the catastrophe is evident and nobody will escape from its effects, so the only way to face it is to respect our principles.

Ms. PEDERSEN (Workers' delegate, Norway) – Madame President, allow me to congratulate you on your election to the Chair. I like to see women in that position and in that sort of Chair.

For the third time I am addressing this session to discuss the Director-General's Report on the situation of the Palestinian workers in the self-ruled areas and occupied territories.

My statement in 1994 was very optimistic. The Declaration of Principles between the PLO and Israel had been followed up and the process had reached a level that none a few years ago would have dreamt of. In May 1994 the PLO took over in the Gaza Strip and Jericho and assumed some responsibilities on the West Bank. The process of expanding self-rule to new sectors of society is continuing, and civil society seems to be taking part in the process. This is important to ensure a democratic development. We have all welcomed the agreement achieved last March between Histadrut and the Palestinian General Federation of Trade Unions, which expresses the determination of both organizations jointly to push forward the peace process in the interests of the workers from both sides. It should not be necessary in this forum to recall the importance of trade union participation in the peace process, and of cooperation between trade unions.

We expect all trade union organizations, and also employers' organizations and governments, to support this agreement. It will contribute to improving the situation of the Palestinian workers and protecting their rights and interests. Our role is to support the desire of both sides to promote the peace process in cooperation.

The expectations in 1994 were very high. How I hoped that the situation would improve according to these expectations. I hoped that the situation of Palestinian workers would improve compared with past years; we have seen a positive development, but the process has been slow for the workers. Two years after the signing of the Declaration of Principles, and one year after the PLO took over in the Gaza Strip and Jericho, there is a need for more results. I regret that the social and economic situation in these areas has deteriorated and that unemployment has risen. This is an obstacle which threatens the peace process and its continuation. The reasons are many. One reason is the closure of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip by the Israeli authorities for several months. This makes it impossible for Palestinian workers to work inside Israel. For most job-seeking Palestinians this has been their only choice.

Workers losing their work because of the closure have so far not received any material compensation, this in spite of the fact that these workers have paid taxes to Israel and thus should be entitled to unemployment benefits. The closure of the Palestinian areas has been a response to terrorist action carried out by Palestinian terrorist groups. Israel justifies the closure with a need for security. We agree on that. It is necessary to fight terrorism on both sides. It is necessary to hinder extremist groups from committing violent actions. We see and understand the need for Israel to protect its citizens. However, we do not believe in collective punishment, and to our knowledge it has not so far been proven that Palestinian workers carrying work permits have participated in terrorist actions inside Israel. We therefore urge Israel to reopen the borders for Palestinian workers. This would immediately change the social conditions in the Palestinian areas to the better.

Israel has also continued to build and expand the Israeli settlements. This has happened both in East Jerusalem and in other Palestinian areas. The declaration of principles postpones the negotiations about Jerusalem to a later stage in the process. We therefore welcome the Israeli Government's decision to stop this expansion of settlements in East Jerusalem.

Extremists must be fought in at least two ways. First of all people have to see social improvement. Secondly, both parties must take their necessary security measures.

It is now necessary to encourage the follow-up of the agreement achieved last March between Histadrut and the Palestinian General Federation of Trade Unions (PGFTU). LO Norway has entered into project cooperation with PGFTU. We are convinced that there is need for assistance from other agencies as well. We therefore hope that the ILO will increase its assistance and further develop its action programme for the Palestinian areas. The areas need technical assistance to build an infrastructure, to create jobs and to execute projects which will give employment and thereby improve the economic situation for the benefit of Palestinian workers.

The international community should keep its promise to the PNA to help it face social and economic expectations. If these problems are not solved the peace process may fail, and continued social failure will give more prestige to extremist groups.

LO Norway has a long tradition of friendly relations with PGFTU and Histadrut. The projects we started two years ago aim at offering assistance to the Palestinian trade unions on the West Bank and in Gaza, to help them develop their unions. The basic conditions of the trade union movement must be developed so that they can participate actively and build the basis of a future Palestinian State, living in peace with Israel.

Finally, I would like to thank the Director-General for his valuable Report and reaffirm our support for his commitments. Regrettably, the Report was late. We understand that there were obstacles in the preparation of the visit of the observers to the occupied territories. We do regret this.

Palestine and Israel are on their way to peace. The road requires cooperation. Both parties confirm that they will not allow extremists to destroy the peace process. Therefore we are hopeful that the development of the process will show that there is no need for a special session next year on this subject.

I would like to express our support for the Israeli Government and the PNA on their joint efforts, together with the trade unions and civil society, to bring about peace, freedom and social justice. Let us continue to support the struggle for lasting peace and development in the area. Israeli and Palestinian workers deserve that.

Mr. ZELLHOEFER (Workers' adviser, United States) – I would like to thank the President for giving me the opportunity to address this, which is now the sixth and will, I am more firmly optimistic, be the last special sitting.

The peace process has made dramatic advances this past year in an arena of political dialogue and negotiation, an arena beyond the ILO. Unfortunately, it is still apparent that there are some who think the ILO is a political organization, or an organization that can be used for political purposes.

The ILO's mandate is not political. It is a unique and specialized United Nations body with a universally accepted and respected competence. Bypassing the time-tested normal supervisory machinery and other accepted procedures in order to hold special sittings like these only serves to politicize and, regrettably, weaken the ILO's effectiveness and credibility. Sadly, there are some who would prefer to see the ILO weakened, or worse, and there are some who would prefer to see the peace process derailed, or worse. There is obviously a proper and constructive role for the ILO to assist in the process of underpinning genuine peace, security, democracy and social justice, which is clearly within its mandate and competence. The appendix to this year's Report of the Director-General confirms that some practical assistance has already been started, and more is needed. However, taken in sum, these particular reports, if they ever really served any constructive purpose, have outlived their usefulness. Aside from the unfortunately familiar slanting in this year's Report, there were some remarkable inconsistencies. Is the Director-General really recommending a one-way opening of the green line to an "unlimited number" of workers? In one paragraph, it is noted that tens of thousands of Palestinians are unsure of their jobs in other countries, yet in another paragraph it is recommended that Palestinian workers seek re-employment in other countries. The Report at least does recognize that extremism and wanton acts of violence undermine any climate of security.

The conclusion of these remarks concerns the whole region. It should be rather painfully clear that underlying the tensions and difficulties faced by Palestinian workers, their emerging trade unions and the daunting challenges to build a democratic and socially just society is the deplorable state of human and trade union rights in the greater surrounding region.

Human dignity and thus human potential have been held in check by all too many regimes in the region through the suppression of fundamental human rights, including one of the most basic, freedom of association. The constructive, social-justice, democracy-building role that genuinely independent trade unions can play has been repeatedly blocked. All too often violently. This is of grave concern to the national trade union centre I belong to, the AFL-CIO. The most recent Annual survey of violations of trade union rights by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, released just two days ago, confirms the deplorable reality. From that survey and other reliable sources, the stark facts emerge. Workers in some 20 countries in the greater surrounding region continue to face serious violations of basic rights. Unions are simply outright banned in three countries. No collective bargaining is permitted in four countries. In one country, organizing a strike is punishable by death. Outright governmental control of labour organizations is the case in three countries. Only a few States permit trade unions to exist independent of government control, but these countries place very substantial restrictions on union activity. Slavery and forced labour continue to exist in at least two countries. The lack of democracy and the failure to develop supportive civil democratic institutions when linked to gaping social inequities and appalling poverty clearly continue to be fertile ground for the seeds of fanatic, violent extremism. Meeting this challenge head on here in the ILO, and elsewhere, is the real issue before us all.

(Mr. Rosales Argüello takes the Chair.)

Original Farsi: Mr. MOOSAVI JAZAYERI (Workers' adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran) – It is of course imperative to recognize the great importance of this special sitting because Palestine, with its rich history, needs us to recognize the sacred nature of the land of Palestine, since colonialism and neo-colonialism have never withdrawn from that land, have constantly attempted to establish their domination over the land of Palestine. Muslims have always been driven off their lands so that opportunist Zionism can establish itself in their place.

The Muslims of Palestine have been successively betrayed in all the wars which have been led against them, in all the political manoeuvres which have been undertaken to drive them from the land of their ancestors. The Palestinian people have had no other way out than of reacting like any other country would if thus deprived. The Palestinians are still under the yoke of Zionism which is based upon a policy of enslavement, a policy which is to dismember the very fabric of Palestinian society to create mutually aggressive clans within what used to be a uniform society, and I am not referring now to other direct aggressions upon the Palestinian people perpetrated in this ancient and holy land.

There is no doubt that the humanitarian values which are dear to all of our hearts, call on us to denounce these Zionist manoeuvres.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – I would like to request you to direct yourself to the Director-General's Report. You are out of order, Sir.

Original Farsi: Mr. MOOSAVI JAZAYERI – It is the Palestinian people, it is the young people, it is the workers who today are in the prisons of Israel. It is true that a certain number of Palestinians have in fact decided to collaborate with the Israeli authorities, and have given up the Palestinian cause. The Muslims of Palestine have had to invest all their efforts in an attempt to free their country, but the United States and their allies in the region have played this tragi-comedy based upon the acceptance of certain limited rights for the Palestinians. The farcical nature of this recognition deceives no one. Injustice, indeed is the watchword in these territories.

The Palestinian workers are now forced to sacrifice everything they have to try and shake off this dominant Zionist regime. The policies practised by the authorities are policies of cowardice, of the denial of their existence to the Palestinian people.

The Zionist forces merely practise the will of the United States which nevertheless continually preaches that it supports the freedoms and rights of oppressed peoples. Is the defence of human rights merely the defence of illegitimate rights, or does the definition of that term vary, depending on the location? We denounce this policy. These are not the human rights we are supposed to be talking about.

The financial and political support given to the Zionists is such that human rights and international law are given no respect in the region, and arms are continually channelled to the authorities of that regime. This is a matter of increasing and considerable concern to all peoples in the region.

We ask the ILO to provide greater assistance to the Palestinian people so that their legitimate rights be respected and so that the intolerable pressure which is exercised upon them by the Israeli authorities be lifted. We require that the Organization send groups of inspectors to the region to monitor what the Palestinian people are suffering from at the present time so that they can study the full range of problems facing the Palestinian people. This tragedy now being played out in Jericho and in the Gaza Strip, with the so-called autonomous Authority, is a mere veil drawn over the injustices which are daily inflicted upon this people. The resolution of the United Nations, particularly the last resolution which was adopted in regard of the city of Jerusalem, is a disgraceful text for the United Nations and for the whole international community. We are convinced that your conscience will not allow the perpetration of the present injustices practised against the Palestinian people.

Mr. ANAND (Employers' adviser, India) – I stand before you to express the Indian Employers' sense of deep concern about the delay in the peace process and slow pace of social and economic development in Palestine. In my humble view, the Director-General's Report does not do adequate justice in contributing to finding solutions for the basic problems at hand. I admit, though, that his effort does deserve recognition and appreciation, and if I may add, sympathy from us all. How much he can or could have done within the budgetary constraints, I continue to wonder. However, it was expected that the peace process would be accompanied by economic progress and social development. One way or another, problems are continuing to beset the region, dashing hope for the immediate future. Therefore, a reiteration of what the Employers' group said at the last Conference is both justifiable and called for. I should like to reiterate it with all the emphasis I can.

Our group's chief spokesman, Mr. Oechslin, apart from what he said today, made a very appropriate statement last year which I would like to re-endorse. It called for more affirmative and positive action in the development field, and also as part of peace restoration efforts. It is obvious that without peace it is not possible to envisage durable economic development, social progress and sustainable employment.

We have seen in my own country that if men and women, and especially the young, cannot find productive and gainful employment to utilize their energies and capacities, then they take refuge in lawless adventurism, negative approaches and subversive activities which escalate violence and crime. We therefore urge more urgent attention with more positive support from international institutions like the ILO and the UNDP and other bodies of the United Nations system, through technical cooperation to promote not only infrastructure, both social and physical, but also undertakings which can attract youth into constructive channels. Adequate infrastructure therefore should be a priority project. It should also embrace expansion and modernization of not only education, but also vocational training, preferably including sufficient opportunities for women. In this, employers' organizations and workers' organizations should be associated as a part of the social active partnership policy adopted by the ILO.

We may or may not deal with this question at later sessions of the Conference. This is for the Governing Body to decide, according to the resources available and the priorities it sets from time to time. But the responsibility of the ILO in Palestine will not cease to exist as long as the task is unfinished. Until the task defined over the years by the various sessions of this Conference has been accomplished in adequate and sufficient measure, the job is not done. Moreover, there can be no outside or indigenous investment on a stable basis in disturbed conditions of visible terrorism or invisible proxy wars. Therefore, I would stress to the Director-General and the Governing Body the need to look into this obligation with sympathy for those who have been suffering since the end of the First World War and who have been building up hopes in the United Nations system. Numerically, those living in the disputed areas of Palestine may not compare favourably with many other peoples in regions suffering violence and terrorism. But this is a highly explosive region, and one that is very important to world peace. It merits more than cursory attention. Otherwise, continued attrition, violence and conflict will undoubtedly result again in chaos, undoing the efforts and the investments made by the ILO so far.

The objective of this special sitting – or of any subsequent committee – should be clear. Permit me to use a Persian proverb: "The wise man sat, debated and ran home". The questions as to what we do next are, where do we go from here? Next year, what will authorities of the ILO and the Governing Body and the United Nations system do for peace? The responsibility of the international community and the social partners is as great as ever. I hope they will ponder this and find some solutions.

Thank you for your patience and cooperation. I endorse the observations made earlier by my group leader, Mr. Oechslin, and my Indian colleague, Mr. Tiagi, who so eloquently spoke in defence of the workers and in the preservation of peace in the area.

Mr. TABANI (Employers' delegate, Pakistan) – As I am taking the floor for the first time, I will start by congratulating the President on his unanimous election to chair this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I also congratulate the Vice-Presidents for the confidence reposed in them by their respective groups.

We wish to commend the Director-General for the excellent Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. The Report contains valuable information, is precise, with well-balanced conclusions.

We have noted with satisfaction that the fact-finding mission sent by the Director-General was given all necessary facilities for meeting the tripartite constituents, both in Israel and the occupied territories. This is indeed one reason why this factual Report reflects the two states of affairs of the workers in the occupied territories.

The ILO must be complimented for the prompt and generous assistance being provided to the Palestinian workers. Immediately after the signing of the Declaration of Principles in September 1993, a Memorandum of Understanding was signed in January 1994, with the PLO approving in principle a programme of action for which an immediate amount of $900,000 was allocated from the regular ILO budget. This shows the concern of the ILO to bring into sharp focus the need to improve the conditions of the Palestinian workers.

The labour and employment statistics in paragraphs 36-47 of the Report are a cause for concern.

Employment of Palestinian workers in Israel has shown a sharp deterioration, falling from 115,000 in 1992 to 47,000 in 1994, with further decline in the current year. The unemployment rate in the occupied territories is even worse. Instead of further worsening the already grim situation, Israel can help by removing restrictions on employment of Arabs within Israel in order to ease the present situation.

In a political situation of long years of confrontation, progress will be slow and arduous. As mentioned in paragraph 35, there is still visible opposition to the peace process from both sides. What is really required, and urgently, is to promote a climate of mutual trust to bring this peace process onto the right track. Both Israel and the PLO have to move in this direction if they are to succeed.

We agree with the Director-General that an employment policy framework needs to be adopted to provide for short-term and long-term measures to promote employment in the complex and serious situation as the supply of Palestinian labour force increases and demand for it declines. In this effort, the ILO will need the full support and assistance of all United Nations agencies, as well as friendly countries and governments to help in the economic uplift of the Palestinian people by enabling the Director-General to implement the programmes enumerated in paragraphs 54-77 of the Report.

Original French: Mr. OKOUMOU (representative of the Organization of African Unity) – On behalf of the Organization of African Unity which I represent here, I wish to address to Mr. Rosales Argüello my warmest congratulations on his election to chair the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I refer to the wealth of his experience, and I know that this will be made available at this sitting to ensure the success of the work and, indeed, the success of the whole Conference. I offer my congratulations also to all the members of the Conference bureau. I would like to express my tribute to the Director-General of the ILO for the remarkable work which he has produced and presented since taking Office at the head of this Organization, and for having again this year developed, in his Report to the Conference, his thoughts about the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories, the subject of this present special sitting, which should in fact have been studied by a committee within the Conference.

It is with pleasure that I am participating in the special sitting of the Conference to examine the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories.

The Organization of African Unity which it is my honour to represent in this special sitting has always considered that the Palestinian question was the prime and deep-seated cause of conflict in the Middle East, and that the question of Jerusalem is at the very centre of the Palestinian question. The Organization of African Unity thinks that a just and durable peace in this part of the world involves the withdrawal of Israel from all occupied Palestinian territories, including Jerusalem, and the recognition by Israel and the international community of the rights of the Palestinian people including the right of return to their country and to establish an independent State in such territories with Jerusalem as capital, in compliance with the resolutions adopted in the United Nations on this important matter.

The city of Jerusalem should be considered as an integral part of the occupied Palestinian territories, and its domination by Israel and indeed all decisions taken by Israeli institutions in regard to the city of Jerusalem should be considered illegal.

From this rostrum, I would like to pay tribute to the legitimacy of the struggle led by the Palestinian people and the leadership of the PLO, its own legitimate representative, so as to recover the occupied territories and to exercise its inalienable national rights. From this rostrum I address the Palestinian workers, and I encourage them to pursue their struggle to final victory.

I would like now to turn to the Organization for the Liberalization of Palestine and the Government of Israel, and express the appreciation of the OAU for all the efforts they and other partners involved have made in the bilateral and multilateral peace discussions. The OAU encourages them to persevere and to achieve a just and peaceful solution to the Palestinian question.

The Israeli Government and the PLO should pursue the peace processes which they began and signed on 13 September 1993 in Washington. The Organization of African Unity will make its contribution at the appropriate time to this peace objective which has, since the beginning, benefited from the mobilization of all African peoples in the just cause of the Palestinian peoples.

Original French: Mr. ZANOU (Government delegate, Benin) – First of all I would like to congratulate the President on his election and then take the opportunity of this special sitting to express my satisfaction, on behalf of the Government of Benin, to the Director-General of the ILO for the excellent Report he has submitted at this time of reflection on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories.

In connection with this Report, I note with satisfaction the efforts that have been made by the international community, and in particular by the International Labour Organization, to ensure peace and security in this part of the world. However, I regret to note that the situation of Palestinian workers has not actually improved. The cause for this unfortunate situation should be seen in the notorious security system established and upheld by the law of brute force rather than by the strength of reason. It is therefore important for the political situation to be improved so that the considerable efforts that the ILO is trying to develop in favour of Palestinian workers can be realized. From this point of view my country is among those that feel that the peace process that has been under way over the last few years deserves to be accelerated for the well-being of the parties concerned.

One point which I consider important at this stage of the discussion is respect for human rights. Here the ILO should be able to continue its activities and improve not just the living and working conditions of the Palestinian workers, but above all promote respect for the human race as a whole.

My country continues in its conviction that without security there can be no peace, without peace there can be no development, and without development there will necessarily be poverty. I am sure you will agree with me when I say that poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere. Therefore, I would like to see a healthier, more humane political and social climate in this part of the world.

Mr. VAN HEERDEN (Government adviser, South Africa) – Allow me to extend my congratulations to the President on his election and to congratulate him on the very professional way in which he is conducting this session.

In recent years I think the international community has seen two very stark choices facing countries in transition. We have the examples of South Africa, of the Middle East, of Northern Ireland on the one hand, and we have the examples of Rwanda, Burundi and Bosnia on the other.

In South Africa we have veered between these two options over the years. In the 1980s we saw a period of very intensive repression met by very intensive resistance. We launched a campaign to make the country ungovernable, and we felt that we did a very good job of making it so. The Government reacted by trying to repress all democratic and legitimate organizations and like two boxers slugging away we got to a point where eventually we saw quite clearly that nobody could win, and we were faced with a lose-lose situation. Thank God that we had leaders of sufficient vision, sufficient courage and sufficient humility to admit that a lose-lose situation was not a desirable one, and to put down their weapons and come to the table to start to negotiate. In those negotiations they started to define an area in which nobody would achieve exactly what they wanted, but where both sides could say that we had a win-win situation. One of the essential ingredients of those negotiations was the existence of very strong democratically organized trade unions and employers' associations. And one of the points I would like to make today is that those organizations were the essential guarantee of integrity and honesty in those negotiations. Because every time we saw the politicians – and I am sorry to say that politicians cannot always be trusted – departing from their mandates or acting in a way which was not in the best interests of the people, our trade unions and our employers' associations put the pressure on or took to the streets, they stopped the economy, they made it quite clear to the politicians that they would accept nothing but the correct democratic solution. And I think that if in Palestine we could see the establishment of very strong democratic employers' and trade union organizations, it would be something that could enhance the peace process. And I appeal to the Israeli authorities to allow the development of those sorts of organizations. I think that it would constitute an investment in the future.

A second characteristic of the transition period in South Africa which I think is interesting for us all to see, and President Mandela himself stressed it when he was at the International Labour Conference a number of years ago, is that it was essential for the international community to walk the last mile with the South African people and not to assume at too early a stage that the situation was irreversible and that they could now turn their attention to other more pressing problems. The constant supervision, monitoring and involvement of the international community was something for which the parties in South Africa will be eternally grateful. So I appeal to the ILO and to the other organizations and countries which are involved in the Middle East situation to go the whole mile and not to relax either the pressure, or the encouragement to the parties to reach a solution.

A third feature of our transition in South Africa which I would like to emphasize, is that we now have a situation of democracy, a multi-party democracy with a strong respect for human rights. The fact that we have 50 per cent unemployment, millions homeless, millions without adequate education facilities, and that health care and social security cannot be extended to the majority of the population threatens our democracy. People come and they say we cannot eat the vote, we cannot eat human rights, what is the Government doing to improve our standard of living? And until the Government can deliver those basic social needs, we will not be able to say that we have achieved a proper democracy in South Africa.

Democracy is not only political, it is economic and social as well, and one of the things that I fear in the Middle East is that the actions of some of the parties and of some of the governments involved intensify the social inequalities that exist, and that social inequality will haunt you, it will haunt the entire region. I urge you all in your actions, in your negotiations, in your development programmes, to ensure that you address those social inequalities, otherwise you will not be able to say that you have achieved peace or democracy.

I bring this message to you from South Africa in all humility. I do not claim for a moment that we have solved our problems in South Africa. I do not claim for a moment that anybody should try to emulate us. I simply show our experience to you for what it is worth. It has worked to an extent for us. I hope it can work in other parts of the world as well.

Mr. SMITH (Government delegate, United States) – On behalf of the United States, I would like to congratulate Mr. Rosales Argüello on his election as President of the Conference. We appreciate the excellent work you have done in the past and we very much look forward to your continuing leadership.

The United States is very pleased with the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. The Report recognizes a new era of peace has dawned in the Middle East. It concentrates, as it should, on how the ILO can contribute to building a solid foundation for peace by assisting the Palestinian people in such areas as employment generation, human resource development, and institution building. We commend the Director-General for refocusing the Report in this manner.

My Government is pleased that the ILO's resources on the ground have already been channelled into priority projects. These projects include the establishment of a Palestinian Authority Department of Labour, the vocational rehabilitation of ex-detainees, the development of a system of social and labour statistics, the creation of an employment-intensive community infrastructure, and the formation of a social security system.

At the same time, the United States has striven to do its part to provide substantial levels of assistance to the Palestinians. I would like to take a few minutes to outline what the United States has done to assist the Palestinian people since Israel and the PLO signed the Declaration of Principles in September 1993.

In October 1993 the United States organized a conference in Washington to support the Middle East peace process. Donors pledged over $2.3 billion. Of this total, the United States pledged $500 million for the period of 1994 to 1998, including $375 million in grants from the United States Agency for International Development and $125 million in programmes of the Overseas Private Investment Cooperation (OPIC). The United States continues to take a leading role in coordinating the international assistance effort for the Palestinians.

In January of this year we reprogrammed approximately $40 million of our fiscal year 1995 funds to emphasize job creation, high visibility infrastructure, and private sector activity. Agreements for several of these projects were announced during Vice-President Gore's visit to Jericho this past March. They included $8 million for two public works projects and $11 million for a storm water project in Gaza.

Of the $200 million pledged by the United States for calendar years 1994 to 1995, we have released nearly $106 million as follows: $50 million in technical and development assistance, including funding for the United Nations Relief and Works Agency's (UNRWA) rehabilitation of housing, schools and clinics, a Gaza housing project, food assistance, and assistance to private voluntary and non-governmental organizations; $40 million for the World Bank's Holst Fund; $8 million for emergency job creation; $5 million for the Palestinian police; and $3 million for OPIC programmes.

Above and beyond our 1994 to 1995 pledge, we are also providing: $142 million in contributions to UNRWA for its regular programmes of education, training, medical and social services; $11 million in in-kind assistance for the Palestinian police and Ministry of Health, including 400 vehicles, spare parts and medical equipment; and $6.2 million for UNRWA, rehabilitation and training projects for Palestinian refugees in Gaza, the West Bank, Lebanon, Syria and Jordan.

ILO activities are only one element of a very broad, multi-faceted international effort to build peace through practical programmes of support for the Palestinian people. My Government considers ILO programmes to be an important part of this effort. We greatly appreciate what the ILO has done and will continue to do for the Palestinian people. As a Government, we have endeavoured to do our part, and will continue to devote resources for assistance to the Palestinians. We look forward to working closely with the Organization in its future efforts on behalf of the Palestinian people.

Finally, we are pleased that this will be the ILO's last special sitting on the occupied territories. Since the practice began five years ago, the United States has consistently opposed the holding of special sittings on the situation of workers in the occupied territories. We have done so because the practice singles out one ILO member country, Israel, for different treatment from other members. Accordingly, the United States is very pleased that, as the result of a decision by the Governing Body last April, this will be the last year in which the International Labour Conference holds a special sitting on the occupied territories.

The ILO secretariat and the Governing Body, including the sponsors of the original resolution on the special sitting, deserve credit for making the wise decision to end this outdated practice. This decision reflects the significant changes brought about in the Middle East through the advances in the peace process during the past two years. This new scenario is also reflected by the fact that most of the speakers this afternoon have focused on positive developments in the region on ILO assistance programmes for the Palestinians and on prospects of peace for the future. It is fitting and proper that this last special sitting has shown a much desired improvement in substance and tone. The United States applauds this positive development.

Mr. LAURIJSEN (representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions) – It will soon be two years since the Israeli Government and the PLO leadership signed the historic Declaration of Principles generating new hope and prospects for peace in the Middle East. A lot of hard and delicate work has since been done over that period leading to slow but very significant progress on the road to finding political solutions to the many problems and injustices confronting the Palestinian people.

The international trade union movement has on several occasions saluted the political leaders and the international community for their resolve and commitment to keep the peace process on track. Despite criminal attempts to undermine these efforts, they will show – with our support – that dialogue through democratic institutions is the only way forward. I wish to express the ICFTU's warmest appreciation and congratulations to the Palestinian and the Israeli trade unions for having participated in this process by working out their own agreements and cooperation on issues of joint interest. The ICFTU has supported and will continue to support the important contributions made in this way by the trade union organizations on both sides.

In the light of all these positive developments and bearing in mind the vital need to continue these efforts in the spirit of productive and non-confrontational dialogue, it is significant that the Governing Body has decided that this is to be the last special sitting of the International Labour Conference devoted to the theme of the occupied territories.

However, it is our view – and I trust that it will also be the position of the Workers' group of the Governing Body – that the ILO should apply all other and more effective means to step up its action in support of the Palestinian workers and their independent trade unions.

This is a Conference for addressing labour problems, labour problems that are once again clearly explained in the excellent Report presented by the Director-General to this session. The Report shows that, notwithstanding the political breakthrough, the situation of Palestinian workers and their families remains extremely precarious by all standards. Unemployment is incredibly high, particularly in Gaza where at best 30 per cent of the workforce has a job. Furthermore, wages are extremely low. Social safety provisions are virtually non-existent and vocational training facilities very poor. The social situation, therefore, remains one of the most explosive obstacles on the road to lasting progress and stability.

What the Palestinian people need now is the international assistance that was pledged but has been very slow in coming through. The Arab neighbours of the Palestinian people should also contribute towards this international effort of solidarity. In addition, Palestinians need investments as well as the removal of trade impediments and other obstacles to the development of their economy.

What is crucial, however, is that the Palestinian authorities should ensure from the outset that the economic and social pillars of the national development process will rise in harmony and that they will be mutually supportive. The Palestinian people, who have been deprived of economic and social justice for much too long must get the benefit and their full share of the process of economic development and investment.

As in other developing nations or countries in transition, it will be crucial not only to work for exports but also to establish a sound domestic market for Palestinian products and to make sure that the national economy can provide the goods and services that the Palestinians themselves need. To achieve this, it will be of capital importance to secure a decent level of income and standard of living for the Palestinian workers and their families.

Independent trade unions will have to play their full and natural role in this process and help to ensure a fair and adequate distribution of the fruits of development. In this regard we call on the Palestinian authorities to be guided by the relevant ILO Conventions and to take full advantage of the ILO's advisory services in translating these standards into the Palestinian needs and realities. The ILO instruments have served us as a yardstick in our struggle for the respect of Palestinian workers' rights and conditions during the occupation period. Today, and tomorrow, they should continue to serve as a basis for the Palestinian Authority itself in its efforts to establish fair and constructive labour relations and labour conditions.

Original Arabic: Mr. DJEMAM (representative of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions) – This is the sixth time that we have held a special sitting to defend the rights of the Palestinian people to self-determination, to return to their territories and have as capital of their independent nation the city of Jerusalem in compliance with Security Council resolutions and indeed in compliance with the resolutions of the whole of the international community.

The missions that have been sent by the ILO have widely described the state of injustice under which the Palestinian workers labour in the occupied territories. Collective sanctions, discriminatory measures, a lack of social protection for Palestinian workers and limits on their freedom of assembly continue.

The Director-General's Report demonstrates also that a Jewish settlement policy still operates in a number of places, and Palestinians are still being deprived of their rights to training and education.

The continuance of this state of affairs in the occupied Palestinian territories, the Golan and southern Lebanon, stands at the very core of the ILO's responsibilities. Indeed this is the main concern of the ILO, which should continue to provide assistance to Palestinians to relieve their sufferings and eliminate the injustice which is imposed upon them.

Hence, we are determined to defend the continued existence of this kind of special sitting. More than that, we would like to see a special committee set up to deal with the legitimate rights of the Palestinian peoples and to strive towards of a just and lasting peace.

Peace clearly is the best solution to the problems of Palestinian workers but it cannot be just any peace – it must be complete, overall, real, genuine peace befitting the sacrifices that have been made by the people and that recognizes their dignity.

We would like to express the hope that the ILO will increase its efforts to improve the status of the Palestinian workers in the Golan, occupied territories and southern Lebanon and we condemn the policy pursued by the Israeli authorities under which the rights of Palestinian workers are denied, and which casts a permanent threat over the prospects for peace in the region.

Only on the basis of a complete withdrawal from southern Lebanon, the Golan and all occupied territories, and of an end to the Jewish settlements policy can we aspire to a just and lasting peace in the region.

Original French: Mr. VITTORI (representative, Pax Christi international) – We would have expected the Israeli Government to welcome the ILO mission eagerly. The subsequent Report should have shown progress achieved this past year within the framework of the peace agreements in favour of Palestinian workers and their families. The initial refusal to grant an entry visa to the mission, which was granted only after the April session of the ILO Governing Body, was an unmistakable signal. The State of Israel thus acknowledged that it had little to boast about as far as improvements in the living and working conditions of the Palestinians were concerned.

The brevity of this year's Report compared to the one of previous years is due to time constraints but also to the fact that the mission was hesitant in analysing the reasons for a fundamental problem – the repeated closing of the territories. Caution is a virtue, but objectivity implies no obligation to keep the scales balanced when they are in fact tipped. If, for example, we read paragraph 35 of the Report, it says that "Israel has found itself constrained frequently to close the territories and increase the number of migrant workers from other parts of the world." But the question immediately arises, where does this constraint come from?

The Palestinians of course have many reasons to revolt against the constraints imposed on them, but terrorist attacks are unjustifiable, even when motivated by despair they lead to suicide attacks. That Israel should protect itself and seek to punish those who are guilty and those who provide them with arms is perfectly legitimate. The application of collective sanctions, however, is not. The closing off of the territories during a third of the working days during this past year is, frankly speaking, a punitive retaliatory act rather than a means of protecting oneself. It undermines the peace process far more than the declared opponents on all sides could do. It is not by depriving hundreds of thousands of Palestinian workers and their families from an income in an economy totally dependent on Israel that it can hope to effectively combat terrorism. The Report, in paragraph 62, states that "It is imperative that security problems be dealt with otherwise than by closing the territories, a practice that has aggravated problems rather than solved them."

Furthermore, the Report relevantly points out that the status of autonomy is part of a narrow framework: "The Palestinian Authority can in no case challenge the legislation or military orders in force given that the status of the territories remains unchanged." Another key problem pointed out by the Director-General is the creation of Jewish settlements in the occupied territories. This has been condemned on several occasions by the United Nations, in particular the Security Council in resolution No. 242 of 22 November 1967, which is the basis for the Oslo agreements. These settlements are still being expanded, Palestinian land, including Jerusalem, continues to be confiscated. In violation of agreements, Israel is pursuing a fait accompli annexation policy. Only extremist groups are benefiting from the poverty created by this economic situation, while the peace process is losing its popular support as the standard of living deteriorates.

Israeli employers have protested against the repeated closing off of the "green line", which leads to unannounced work interruptions, disrupts production and forces them to recruit migrant workers from other countries. The Director-General's Report points out that the Histadrut (the Israeli trade union federation) has currently agreed to return part of its dues and give them to the General Federation of Palestinian Trade Unions Federation, though this does not give the trade unions the right to defend their members in Israel. In this regard, we would like to mention once again the activities of Workers' Hotline, an Israeli lawyers' collective which, since 1990, has kept Palestinian workers informed of their rights and handles their disputes with employers or with the Israeli administration. The Workers' Hotline has scant means at its disposal and therefore relies on volunteers; it also deals with health problems of workers threatened by the use of hazardous substances and by exposure to petrol in garages and petrol stations, as well as workers who lack protection against on-the-job accidents and their consequences.

We would like to congratulate the ILO for the initiatives it has taken and strongly encourage it to demonstrate its willingness to contribute to the achievement of the peace process naturally within the limited framework of its mandate. Peace – which is only possible with social justice and the assurance for each worker of guaranteed employment, beneficial to society, that will enable him and his family to live in dignity – does this not lie at the heart of the ILO's mandate in Palestine and elsewhere?

A happy population does not spawn terrorists in its midst. A people that recognizes the rights of other peoples who are its neighbours, and relinquishes the idea of hegemony whether it be for historic, ideological or religious reasons, will not make enemies and fear for its security.

As the first Director-General of the ILO said, "if you want peace, promote justice". Sound advice, which we would like to repeat from this rostrum and address to men and women of good will on both sides living in the same land. They should all be able to live in freedom, enjoying mutual respect and equal rights.

Mr. SUNMONU (representative of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity) – I would like to express on behalf of African workers and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) our appreciation to all members of the ILO Governing Body for making this special sitting possible. This time last year we were all optimistic that this year the peace process would have led to the establishment of the Palestinian National Authority over the entire Palestinian territory occupied by Israel since 1967. That was the hope on the basis of which everybody thought that year's special sitting would be the last! The events in the occupied Arab territories since last year prove that we were all wrong. It would therefore be unrealistic to declare that a match is over until the final whistle.

I congratulate the Director-General for his Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories in spite of the initial delays caused by Israel to the second mission sent by the Director-General.

The technical and material assistance of the ILO to the occupied Palestinian territories is highly commendable and should be increased. ILO assistance in the areas of employment promotion, the strengthening of the appropriate institutions and labour relations should be intensified.

There are certain measures taken by Israel in the occupied Arab territories which can permanently damage the peace process. These include: continuous building of Jewish settlements; unjustifiable and arbitrary confiscation of Arab land; the high-handed collective punishments of Palestinians and closure of the borders of the occupied territories; and the failure of Israel to implement some parts of the agreement signed with the PLO, thereby delaying the peace process.

The Israeli authorities should be mindful of their moral responsibility to abide by the agreement they signed with the PLO and the grave consequences for peace and stability in the Middle East in the event of a breakdown (God forbid) of the peace agreement. Israel should therefore put an immediate stop to these anti-peace measures.

The OATUU appeals to both Israel and the PLO not to give extremists on either side the opportunity to break the peace process. The objectives of both parties should be peace and justice. They should all remember that there can be no peace without justice.

It is gratifying to note that Israel has signed a peace accord with Jordan and that there are positive developments concerning the Golan between Israel and Syria. The meeting later this month in Washington between the military leaders of Syria and Israel for discussion on the return of the Golan to Syria, its rightful owner, is very encouraging. We commend the United States administration for its mediating role between Israel and Syria as well as that of President Hosni Mubarak and the Egyptian Government.

It is with pride that I declare at this august assembly that at the 6th Ordinary Congress of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity, which was held in Accra, Ghana, from 22-24 May this year, African workers unanimously reaffirmed their unflinching support for the workers and peoples of Palestine in their just struggle for a free and independent Palestine with Jerusalem as its capital and for the return of all occupied Arab territories by Israel to their Palestinian and Syrian and Lebanese owners.

We appeal to the member States of the Arab League, the United Nations and the international community for massive financial, technical and material assistance to the workers and people of Palestine, in order to allow them to overcome poverty, unemployment and underemployment, which more than 40 years of oppression and exploitation during the forceful occupation by Israel has brought on them.

If the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories has not improved by this time next year, the Conference should set up a permanent Committee to consider the Report of the Director-General.

Original French: Mr. VERSTRAETE (representative of the World Confederation of Labour) – The World Confederation of Labour stated from this very same rostrum last year that it welcomed with great satisfaction the signing of the Gaza and Jericho Agreement, in the knowledge that this agreement could not fully meet the aspirations of the Palestinian workers.

Today, unfortunately, we have to note that the Israeli Government has decided to slow down the negotiations and the implementation of the agreement. Furthermore, not only is the creation of Jewish settlements continuing but it has in fact been intensified as the Report of the Director-General says, and I quote: “The changes to the physical and demographic characteristics of these territories, contrary to international law, as well as the confiscation of land and water resources which continued settlement has involved, are serious obstacles to the establishment of a comprehensive, just and lasting peace.”

Furthermore, the Israeli Government regularly closes off the territory thus depriving several tens of thousands of Palestinian workers of an income. Fewer and fewer Palestinian workers can enter Israel to work there since their jobs have been taken by foreign workers under six-month to one-year work permits whereas Palestinian workers are still recruited on the basis of daily contracts. Despite the recommendations made in previous Reports of the Director-General no effective measures have been taken to follow up these recommendations.

Cordoning off the territories also has serious consequences for the price of imported staples which have more than doubled overnight, whereas the price of local produce has dropped far below production costs. Cordoning off the territories “destroys the Palestinian economy on which over 100,000 families depend”. The Oslo agreement should have improved the economic situation for the Palestinians, but in fact it has brought them disaster.

The social and economic consequences of the loss of a job or income for such a large number of individuals are truly disastrous. The extremist groups are the only true beneficiaries of the poverty created by this economic situation and the peace process is losing its popular support as the standard of living deteriorates.

Furthermore, the human rights situation in the occupied territories remains serious, in particular as regards the violations of the right to live and the right to security as can be seen by numerous cases of collective punishment, aggressive or violent behaviour on the part of settlers, torture or bad treatment of prisoners, in particular during interrogation. Not all Palestinian political and trade union prisoners have been released and they continue to suffer inhuman conditions of imprisonment.

We would like to repeat what we have stated for years: “There can be no true peace in the Middle East until the Government of Israel respects United Nations resolutions, as long as the military occupation continues, as long as the irresponsible and serious settlement policy of Arab land continues and until the full right to self-determination can be exercised.”

To end we would also like to repeat that the ILO should continue to play a central role in favour of the workers of the occupied territories, strengthen its technical cooperation, rapidly implement employment projects and create a special Conference committee that would submit to the Conference its recommendations on appropriate measures to end the violations of international labour legislation.

We would like to express our hope for fair and lasting global peace in the Middle East, which can only be achieved in the right to self-determination and sovereignty of all nations.

Original Russian: Mr. YOURGENS (representative of the General Confederation of Trade Unions) – The discussion at this session of the Conference of the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories bears witness once again to the continuing devotion of the ILO to defending basic human rights. We also note the serious concern expressed by the ILO at continuing violations of the vital interests of the workers in this potentially explosive region.

I would very much like to share the optimism of the Director-General who hopes that this is the last occasion on which such a sitting will be held, but we are not quite sure that this will actually be the case.

For the first time, the five million Palestinians have been granted a national administration, though with limited powers. At least, theoretically the establishment of the Palestinian Authority is a first step towards a resolution of the Palestinian problem on the basis of enjoyment by the Arab people of Palestine of their inalienable rights.

Unfortunately, implementation of the Palestinian-Israeli Declaration of Principles is lagging behind the proposed timetable. Elections in the occupied Palestinian territories should have been held in July last year. A final date has still not been set. Because of the delay in holding the elections, the enjoyment of autonomy in the remaining Palestinian territories has been postponed.

The recent decision of the Israeli authorities to build houses in East Jerusalem was seen by world public opinion as a move to derail the Middle East peace process. Luckily, common sense prevailed and the Government of Israel suspended its decision.

While we welcome as a major political event the signing in August 1994 of the peace agreement between Jordan and Israel, we cannot but express our concern at delays in finding a solution to the Syria/Israel situation. To this end, an important contribution could be made by the trade unions. Obviously, we should consider how the ILO could help to normalize and strengthen relations between Palestinian and Israeli trade unions.

We greatly appreciate the contribution made by the ILO toward solving the serious problems facing workers, including unemployment, underemployment, discrimination in recruitment and at work, and vocational training.

The situation mentioned in the Report whereby "a large majority of working-age Palestinians is unable to find stable and decent income-earning opportunities within the territories" is surely unacceptable. It is quite fitting that the ILO should give priority to the problem of employment in the Palestinian region.

We are satisfied with the work being carried out by the ILO to establish a normal constructive dialogue between Palestinian and Israeli trade unions and the progress made in this area. Undoubtedly, "It may be hoped that the continuing dialogue between the Palestinian unions and the Histadrut may lead to an improvement in the basic rights of these workers and of their interests", as it says in the Report.

The GCTU is ready to continue to support the efforts of the ILO to promote economic development and social justice and peace in this region.

Original Russian: Mr. POTAPOV (representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions) – On behalf of the World Federation of Trade Unions we express our sincere solidarity with the Palestinian people, which has been carrying on for many years a just struggle for the restoration of its legitimate rights and freedoms in the Arab territory of Palestine.

The World Federation of Trade Unions reaffirms its consistent support for the legitimate struggle of the Palestinian workers and for the whole of the Palestinian people as they struggle for their inalienable national rights and, first and foremost, for the right to self-determination and the creation of an independent State.

We firmly believe that a comprehensive solution to the Middle East problem, including the Palestinian question, is only possible if it is based on the withdrawal of Israeli troops from all the occupied Arab territories and on a guarantee of the right of the Arab population to return to their country and to build a national independent State.

In spite of the recent signing of a number of agreements, the situation in the occupied Arab territories remains extremely tense and unstable.

Let us take, for example, the situation in East Jerusalem, and some figures which will illustrate the situation.

Until June 1967, the population of East Jerusalem was practically 100 per cent Arab, and West Jerusalem was practically 100 per cent Jewish. At the present, West Jerusalem is still 100 per cent Jewish, whereas East Jerusalem is only 48 per cent Arab. These figures are more than eloquent.

As of June 1967, Israel appropriated more than 7,000 hectares of land in East Jerusalem, two-thirds of which was land belonging to dozens of Arab villages. On these lands 38,500 apartments have been built, all of them for Jews only, and not a single one for Palestinians.

The construction of housing for Palestinians runs up against all types of so-called "technical difficulties". In actual fact, these technical difficulties have a clear political agenda: the strengthening of Israeli control over all of Jerusalem and the creation of a geographical and demographic situation whereby, in the future, it will be impossible to question so-called Israeli "sovereignty" over East Jerusalem. This is the policy of creeping annexation.

We are especially concerned about the practice of the Israeli authorities in respect of the trade union organizations of Palestinian workers. They have used various pretexts to put obstacles in the way of normal trade union activities.

With due respect for the efforts of the authors of the Report, we consider that it will be necessary in the future to continue this work. The Report is needed as long as the Palestinian people lack the necessary conditions for a life of freedom and dignity.

The World Federation of Trade Unions reaffirms its unstinting solidarity and support for the just struggle of the Palestinian people for liberation, in defence of its inalienable right to self-determination and independent development.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – Thank you, Mr. Potapov. By way of exception I will now give the floor to those speakers who have requested the floor temporarily since some speakers withdrew from the list, and since we have the necessary time we will give the floor to the two speakers who asked to speak – Mr. Nadjat, technical adviser to Lebanese Workers and then Mr. Tale, Government adviser, Iran.

Original Arabic: Mr. NADJAT (Workers' technical adviser, Lebanon) – Never have I found myself in such a difficult situation as I do now when I take the floor in this special sitting to show our solidarity in favour of the workers in the occupied territories. The difficulty is not due to my great feeling of solidarity and despair. I am disturbed by the continuation of the acts of aggression perpetrated by the Zionist entities against the Arab peoples since this entity set itself up on the Holy Land.

I am surprised by the contents of the Report of the Director-General. The Report suggests primarily that this sitting should be the last such sitting, so that we move from this stage to a special Committee where we would have all the partners from Israel and the occupied territories for the purposes of coordination and negotiation around a table, and this with an eye to signing an agreement so that we should forget all of the injustice committed against the workers and the Arab peoples by these Zionist entities.

This haste to end such sittings is nothing other than a curtain that is being drawn to conceal these heinous acts committed by Israel against the Arab peoples, worse than the acts committed by the Nazis.

In fact, we are congratulating Israel for its behaviour. The aggression that has taken place in Lebanese territory since 1969 up until today under the pretext of curbing Lebanese and Palestinian resistance as though this resistance were the resistance of an occupying force, as though the enemy oppressing us has the right to attack us.

We would appeal to the international community and to the Director-General to continue holding such special sittings to denounce Israeli manoeuvres against the Palestinian people and against the occupied Arab territories.

Mr. ? – On a point of order may I please ask the speaker to confine himself to the subject of this special sitting, which is the Director-General's Report on the occupied territories and not to deliver a totally irrelevant political tirade.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – I request the speaker to confine his remarks to the Report.

Original Arabic: Mr. NADJAT – We would like to launch an appeal to the Director-General and to the Conference as well as to the international community to continue organizing such special sittings to denounce Israeli manoeuvres and furthermore the Committee which has been proposed should also cover the occupied territory of Lebanon until peace is achieved. Then we will be the first to give up this type of meeting and special sittings. Peace in the Middle East is what we aspire to as Arab workers and peoples. We feel that peace cannot be achieved as long as Israel flouts your decisions and flouts United Nations resolutions. The day Israel applies these decisions and resolutions, the day when in line with these resolutions Israel withdraws from all occupied Arab territories and grants the Palestinian people the right to create its own State, then we the Arabs and the Lebanese will be the first to welcome this peace. We would welcome this peace, but if Israel continues to flout United Nations resolutions we Lebanese and Arab workers shall continue to resist its oppression, its occupation, its bombings, the murders and assassinations carried out by Israel in southern Lebanon because we have our national resistance and, thanks to Syria, this resistance which has vanquished the Israeli army will not fail to win once again and to inflict the heaviest defeat possible on the Israeli army. Our problem with Israel can be summed up as follows:

Allah is unique and right is unique. Anyone who violates our laws can only fall into the pitfall he sets up for others.

Original French: Mr. TALE (Government adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran) – I would like first of all to pay tribute to the Organization which has decided to hold this special sitting, which is an appropriate occasion to discuss the situation of Palestinian workers in the occupied territories. The delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran, fully aware of the importance of the Palestinian question for the Iranian people and the Islamic Republic of Iran, listened with great interest to the previous speakers and studied very carefully the Director-General's Report. Generally speaking, the points which are made in the Director-General's Report and those which have been made in today's special sitting unfortunately point to an unchanged situation for hundreds of thousands of Palestinian workers and their families in the occupied Arab territories. The fact that the actual situation of Palestinian workers is described only briefly in the Report indicates to us that the situation in the occupied Arab territories has not only not improved, but it has worsened. We believe the Report does not reflect enough the harsh realities of the Palestinian workers and their families in the territories. The ILO, based on its own international responsibilities, and independently and impartially, should spare no effort to bring to light this painful reality and to secure the rights of the Palestinian workers and of their families.

The harsh reality is that because of the occupation by the Zionist régime and its continuous violation of the innocent Palestinian people's rights, the people of the world have been and are witnesses to a crime. This land belongs to Muslims. Jerusalem was the first place towards which Muslims turned for prayer, even before they turned to Mecca. The way in which these violations of rights and this aggression are committed even today is an extremely painful fact for the Muslim community. This preoccupation is not limited to one single country in the Middle East: it concerns the whole of the Islamic world, and it has always been a source of constant concern.

This is the oldest problem of the last 50 years. The Palestinian question has had its ups and downs, but it has never been solved, essentially because of the expansionist policies of the Zionist régime and its sponsors, and because of the mistaken protection of the two major world powers.

This historic crisis of the Muslim world and its painful consequences have never been overcome in spite of the various resolutions passed by a number of international assemblies, including the ILO. The increasing violations of human rights of the Palestinian people, and in particular of the workers and their families, continue unabated.

Consequently, from our point of view it is vital, and even extremely vital, not to lose sight of the historic origins of the problems of violations perpetrated by the Zionist régime in the occupied Arab territories.

On the basis of this, we are convinced that the only way to establish peace and tranquillity in the Middle East is fully to understand the region's problems of which the first and most important is of how to restore the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people.

In the light of the situation, both historic and current, there is no doubt that the recent agreements on the Palestinian question in spite of all the efforts invested in them, have not paved the way to a solution to this fundamental problem. Nor have they led to guarantees of the rights of the Palestinians. In our opinion, these agreements cannot serve as the basis for the justice which is a prerequisite for lasting peace in the region.

A just and lasting solution to the Palestinian problem is conditional on the return of the Palestinian people to their native land, and peace can only be through the establishment of an independent Palestinian State which is the inalienable right of the Palestinian people.

My delegation believes that a standing committee to examine the parlous situation of Palestinian workers, along the lines of the special Committee on Apartheid, should be set up and which should continue to function as long as is necessary.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – I am now going to give Mr. Abdul Ghani, representative of Palestine, the right of reply to the statement by Mr. Kara.

Original Arabic: Mr. ABDUL-GHANI (representative of Palestine) – Thank you, Mr. President, for giving me the floor for a right of reply. What the representative of the Histadrut said is false. It is a manoeuvre. It is a manoeuvre to hoodwink the workers, trade unionists and employers because we have only one trade union authority and it has never signed such agreements. We consider that the just solution is not to enter other peoples' houses through the window. If you are invited in you enter through the door, so any partial agreement or any agreement that is imposed can never be successful. This is why the Histadrut should recognize fully the rights of our workers, in particular as regards the excessive taxes levied on us. The Histadrut should show solidarity and defend our rights.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We are now concluding the sitting. As President of the Conference, and in accordance with the Standing Orders, it is not incumbent upon me to draw any conclusions from the debate which has just taken place; but I would like to change hats and, as Minister of Labour of Nicaragua, say a few words. I had initially intended to speak but I crossed my name off the list.

I would like to say that on the basis of a principle of public international law, when the conditions under which something has been negotiated or agreed have changed, the resolution adopted under these conditions is not irreversible. I am specifically referring to the decision of the Governing Body of which I am a member. And on the basis of this principle which dates back to the Romans: "when conditions have changed, negotiations can start again". In any case the Governing Body's decisions are not like the Pope speaking urbi et orbi; the Governing Body may well go back on its decision, since we have learnt today a wealth of information we did not know when the decision was taken in March. The question of whether we should or should not have another special sitting or create a special committee will be discussed at the November session of the Governing Body.

Now that I am putting back my hat as President, I would like to say that I am very pleased that this sitting was held in conditions commensurate with the seriousness of the subject we were called upon to examine. I think that all statements were of a high quality. Clear evidence of this is that there was only one right of reply and one interruption with a point of order. I would therefore like to congratulate everyone on the way in which the debate was conducted.

I also wish to commend the real effort that was made to keep the discussion within the field of competence of our Organization – that is the situation of the workers and employers in the occupied Arab territories. It is not always easy to disassociate this subject from the general context because, as the delegate of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity said, "without democracy, there is no development, no economic take-off". Poverty becomes the enemy of justice, of democracy and, finally, of peace. Consequently, no efforts should be spared in trying to overcome the problems in Palestine, and I would request those present who give their help during a time of peace; indeed, it would seem that peace is sometimes accompanied by a cut in cooperation. It is easier to help in a time of war than in a time of peace. This is a tragedy of society, and, I might go so far to say, reflects the cynicism of the world in which we live; but it is very important that we should direct this aid to Palestine. Suffice it to say that the budget adopted last year by this Organization was extremely low. Nine hundred thousand dollars for a country that was being born. It is very little. Obviously you all took part in the big discussion on the budget; and you all remember the Social Summit in Copenhagen. It is evident that if we do not give this Organization the means to deal with problems, it will not be able to solve them. I would therefore like to call upon all of you present to join efforts to maintain cooperation in the true sense of the word, so as to consolidate this peace process.

The usefulness of the Report of the Director-General is clearly recognized by the fact that it forms the basis for the debate which, I sincerely hope, will contribute to the promotion of a real dialogue and strengthen the determination to find an equitable and lasting solution.

I am sure that the Director-General will draw important and useful conclusions from this sitting when he replies to the general discussion on his Report at the end of this session of the Conference. I would like to thank him for this at the outset, and I also thank all of you for your spirit of cooperation without which we would have not been able to carry out this special sitting.

With these words I now declare the special sitting of the Conference on the Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories closed, and I hope that Palestine will have the right to sovereignty and true self-determination.

(The Conference adjourned at 19.45 p.m.)

Second item on the agenda: Programme and budget proposals and other financial questions

First Report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives

1. The Finance Committee of Government Representatives met on 8 and 16 June 1995. The meetings were chaired by Mr. H.-M. Melas (Austria), Vice-Chairman of the Committee, who also acted as Reporter.

Request of the Government of Cambodia, under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, for permission to vote

2. The Committee had before it a request from the Government of Cambodia for permission to vote at the Conference. This request was referred to the Finance Committee as a matter of urgency in accordance with paragraph 1 of article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

3. The text of the request, dated 22 October 1994, is as follows:

Ministry of State for Social Affairs,
Labour and War Veterans,
Phnom Penh, Cambodia

Mr. Director-General,

I have the honour to inform you that the Royal Government of Cambodia wishes to be granted the right to vote in the International Labour Organization and at the same time to pay its contributions in arrears that are due to the Organization.

The Royal Government of Cambodia wishes to confirm its commitment to the goals and objectives of the International Labour Organization and its desire to take part fully in its work. Cambodia's contributions have not been paid for several reasons, namely:

- civil war since 1970 (two decades);
- difficult financial and economic circumstances.

In view of the foregoing, I would like to request your assistance in submitting to the competent authorities of the International Labour Organization the following proposals for the payment of Cambodia's contributions:

- (a) Cambodia will pay in full in 1995 its contribution of 33,822 Swiss francs for 1995, and will continue to pay in full its contribution for each year in which it falls due;
- (b) Cambodia will pay its accumulated contributions in arrears, which at 31 December 1994 stood at 541,234 Swiss francs, by means of nineteen (19) equal annuities of 27,062 Swiss francs, plus a final annuity of 27,056 Swiss francs. The first annuity will be payable in 1995.

I should like to ask you to be so good as to transmit my Government's request to the International Labour Conference so that it may be authorized to participate in the voting at the 82nd Session of the Conference.

I trust that this request will be favourably received and assure you, Mr. Director-General, of my highest consideration,

(Signed) SUY SEM,
Secretary of State for Social Affairs,
Labour and War Veterans.

4. The Committee noted that paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization provides as follows:

4. A Member of the Organization which is in arrears in the payment of its financial contribution to the Organization shall have no vote in the Conference, in the Governing Body, in any committee, or in the elections of members of the Governing Body, if the amount of its arrears equals or exceeds the amount of the contributions due from it for the preceding two full years: Provided that the Conference may by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast by the delegates present permit such a Member to vote if it is satisfied that the failure to pay is due to conditions beyond the control of the Member.

5. The Committee also noted that article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference provides as follows:

ARTICLE 31

Procedure where proposal is made to permit a Member in arrears to vote

1. Any request or proposal that the Conference should nevertheless permit a Member which is in arrears in the payment of its contributions to vote in accordance with article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution shall be referred in the first instance to the Finance Committee of the Conference, which shall report thereon as a matter of urgency.

2. Pending a decision on the request or proposal by the Conference, the Member shall not be entitled to vote.

3. The Finance Committee shall submit to the Conference a report giving its opinion on the request or proposal.

4. If the Finance Committee, having found that the failure to pay is due to conditions beyond the control of the Member, thinks fit to propose to the Conference that the Member should nevertheless be permitted to vote in accordance with article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution, it shall in its report —

- (a) explain the nature of the conditions beyond the Member's control;
- (b) give an analysis of the financial relations between the Member and the Organization during the preceding ten years;
- (c) indicate the measures which should be taken in order to settle the arrears.

5. Any decision which may be taken by the Conference to permit a Member which is in arrears in the payment of its contributions to vote notwithstanding such arrears may be made conditional upon the Member complying with any recommendations for settling the arrears which may be made by the Conference.

6. In examining the financial relations between Cambodia and the Organization for the preceding ten years, the Committee noted that the last payment received from Cambodia was in 1975 as final settlement of the 1973 and partial settlement of the 1974 assessed contributions. Contributions outstanding at 31 December 1989 amounted to US$225,721. Following the Conference decision to establish assessments in Swiss francs, this balance was converted into that currency to give a total of Swiss francs 395,012. Assessed contributions outstanding for the period 1 January 1990 to 31 December 1994, after offset of a credit of Swiss francs 8,310 in respect of refund of the Working Capital Fund, were Swiss francs 146,222. The total amount of assessed contributions outstanding and in arrears as at 31 December 1994 was therefore Swiss francs 541,234.

7. The Committee, being satisfied that the failure of Cambodia to pay its arrears was due to conditions beyond its control, in accordance with the provisions of article 4 of paragraph 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, reports to the Conference as follows:

- (a) *the Committee finds that the failure of Cambodia to pay in full its arrears was due to conditions beyond its control, as explained in the letter appearing in paragraph 3 above;
- (b) *the financial relations between Cambodia and the Organization for the preceding ten years have been set out in paragraph 6 above.

8. The Committee accordingly recommends the adoption by the Conference of the resolution concerning the granting to Cambodia of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Request of the Government of Chad, under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, for permission to vote

9. The Committee also had before it the following requests received from the Government of Chad for permission to vote at the Conference. These were referred to the Finance Committee as a matter of urgency in accordance with paragraph 1 of article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

10. The texts of the requests, dated 23 May 1995 and 9 June 1995, are as follows:

N'Djamena, 23 May 1995

Dear Sir,

By letter of which the reference is indicated above, you indicated the amounts due from the State of Chad, representing its annual contributions to the budget of the International Labour Organization, and its accumulated arrears of contributions payable under an arrangement reached in 1983, which amounted to 74,596 Swiss francs. As you stated in your letter, if this amount remained unpaid by the date of the next session of the International Labour Conference (June 1995), there was a definite risk that the arrangement of 1983 would be considered as having lapsed, which would bring the total of Chad's arrears to 170,760 Swiss francs.

It is true that since 1993 the Government of Chad has not been in a position to honour its commitments to the ILO, despite the many reminders sent by your financial services, and Chad has therefore been denied the right to vote, in accordance with the penalty laid down in the Constitution, since 31 December 1993.

For more than a decade now, my country, considerably weakened by the civil war of 1979, has been endeavouring in vain to achieve political, economic and financial stability in a global environment which is hardly conducive to this.

In particular, the years 1992-93 and 1994 were marked by grave social problems related chiefly to the non-payment or late payment of public-sector wages. Untimely and protracted strikes brought production to a standstill, which in turn made it impossible to pay wages. Painstaking negotiations with the trade unions were necessary to enable activities to be resumed, and thanks to the international community, it was possible to ensure the payment of wages in arrears and keep up regular payments in the ensuing months, thus breaking the vicious circle in which my country had become trapped. And the corollary of all these actions was the signature of a social pact with the trade unions in July 1994.

This is the turbulent national context in which Chad's relations with the ILO must be seen. It is by no means a question of indifference on our part, and our decision to refrain from participating in any international meetings in recent years, far from being taken lightheartedly, was dictated by the fact that we simply could not afford it.

Our country is taking its first timid steps towards economic and financial recovery thanks to a stringent structural adjustment programme negotiated with the Bretton Woods institutions. Budgetary constraints have been imposed with the aim of ensuring regular payment of salaries and wages as an incentive for staff to work and to help maintain social peace.

For the 1995 fiscal year, credits allocated for contributions to the ILO budget amount to 6.6 million CFA francs, taking account of the country's real capacities. Operations for the transfer of this settlement are under way.

This amount covers only an infinitesimal part of Chad's debt to the Organization, but is a token of the goodwill of Chad, which is striving to meet its commitments.

Chad must continue its efforts until its situation is normalized, and we would like the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference, in which for the first time for some years a full delegation is participating at the expense of the Government of Chad despite its financial difficulties, to agree to a new arrangement and enable us to recover our right to vote, as a sign of encouragement.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) Salibou Garba,
Minister of the Public Service and Labour.

9 June 1995

Dear Mr. Director-General,

Reference is made to the letter of 23 May 1995 explaining the difficulties faced by the Government of Chad in meeting the obligations due to the International Labour Organization.

Instructions have now been issued to transfer the amount of FCFA 6,600,000 to the Organization. In spite of the difficult economic situation described in the above-mentioned letter, an additional allocation will be sought to meet the obligations due for 1995.

The Government of Chad wishes to confirm its commitment to the goals and objectives of the International Labour Organization and its desire to take part fully in its work.

I would therefore request your assistance in submitting to the competent authorities of the International Labour Organization the following proposals for the payment of Chad's contributions:

- (a) Chad will pay in full in 1995 its contribution of 33,821 Swiss francs for 1995, and will continue to pay in full its contribution for each year in which it falls due;
- (b) Chad will pay its accumulated contributions in arrears, which at 31 December 1995 amounted to 170,760 Swiss francs, by means of 20 equal annuities of 8,538 Swiss francs. The first annuity will be payable in 1996.

I should be grateful if you would transmit my Government's request to the International Labour Conference so that it may be authorized to participate in the voting at the 82nd Session of the Conference.

I trust that this request will be favourably received and assure you, Mr. Director-General, of my highest consideration.

(Signed) Salibou Garba,
Minister of the Public Service and Labour.

11. The Committee recalled the provisions of paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, and article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, reproduced above in paragraphs 4 and 5 respectively.

12. In examining the financial relations between Chad and the Organization for the preceding ten years, the Committee noted that at its 69th session (June 1983) the Conference adopted an arrangement proposed by the Government of Chad for the settlement of the arrears of contributions for the period 1975-82 amount to US$122,107. In addition to payment of its current contributions in full in the year for which they were due, the Republic of Chad would settle the arrears of US$122,107 by payment of 19 equal annual instalments of US$6,105 beginning in 1984 and a final instalment of US$6,112. At the end of 1987, the Government had fallen behind in its payments, but the amount due was paid in January 1988. At its 75th Session (June 1988) the Conference, noting that Chad had brought the payments up to date, agreed that the financial arrangement should continue. The last payment received from Chad was in 1992. The current situation was therefore as follows:

	Swiss francs
Arrears remaining due under the financial arrangement 1975-82	117,532
Arrears of current contributions 1993-94	53,228
Total arrears of contributions	170,760
Assessment for 1995	33,821
Total contributions outstanding	204,581

As the annual instalments and current contributions were not paid in 1993, the terms of paragraph 2 of article 32 of the Standing Orders of the Conference were not met and Chad lost the right to vote on 1 January 1994.

13. The Committee, being satisfied that the failure of Chad to pay its arrears was due to conditions beyond its control, in accordance with the provisions of article 4 of paragraph 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, reports to the Conference as follows:

- (a) the Committee finds that the failure of Chad to pay in full its arrears was due to conditions beyond its control, as explained in the letters appearing in paragraph 10 above;
- (b) the financial relations between Chad and the Organization for the preceding ten years have been set out in paragraph 12 above.

14. The Committee accordingly recommends the adoption by the Conference of the resolution concerning the granting to Chad of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

15. The Committee also agreed to authorize the Reporter to adopt on its behalf the First Report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, so as to expedite the consideration by the plenary of the Conference of the requests for permission to vote from the Governments of Cambodia and Chad.

Geneva, June 1995.

(Signed) H.-M. Melas,
Vice-Chairman and Reporter.

Resolutions submitted to the Conference

Resolution concerning the granting to Cambodia of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,
Having regard to paragraph 7 of the article 10 of the Financial Regulations;
Accepts the arrangement proposed by the Government of Cambodia for the settlement of the arrears of contributions due for the period 1974 to 1994 to the effect that:

- (a) in 1995, the Government of Cambodia will pay in full its contribution for the year 1995;
- (b) in subsequent years, the Government of Cambodia will continue to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due;
- (c) the Government of Cambodia will settle arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1994, amounting in total to 541,234 Swiss francs, by payment of nineteen instalments of 27,062 Swiss francs and a final instalment of 27,056 Swiss francs, beginning in 1995;

Decides that Cambodia be permitted to vote, in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, after the conclusion of the present business.

Resolution concerning the granting to Chad of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,
Having regard to paragraph 7 of the article 10 of the Financial Regulations;
Accepts the arrangement for the Government of Chad for the settlement of the arrears of contributions due for the period 1975-82 and 1993-94 to the effect that:

- (a) in 1995, the Government of Chad will pay in full its contribution for the year 1995;
- (b) in subsequent years, the Government of Chad will continue to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due;
- (c) the Government of Chad will settle arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1994, amounting in total to 170,760 Swiss francs, by payment of 20 instalments of 8,538 Swiss francs, beginning in 1996;

Decides that Chad be permitted to vote, in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, after the conclusion of the present business.

Eighteenth sitting

Friday, 16 June 1995, 10 a.m.

President: Mr. Rosales Argüello, Mr. Halliwell

NINTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We will start our meeting with the adoption of the ninth report of the Selection Committee, which you will find in the Provisional Record No. 4H.

If there are no objections, shall I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted)

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – The next item on our agenda is the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Spanish: Mr. CARVAJAL BUSTAMANTE (Employers' adviser, Mexico) – I would like to wish the President of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference, Mr. Rosales Argüello, Minister of Labour of Nicaragua, every success in work. As a Latin American I am particularly pleased at his election, and I think it is an additional tribute to his personal qualities that he is the first Central American President.

I would also like to extend to Mr. Michel Hansenne very warm greetings from Mexico and I am sure that the efforts that he has dedicated to this Conference will benefit all the social partners.

Mexico, which has often been shaken by very strong seismic upheavals – literally and metaphorically – has recently been exposed to a truly serious earthquake, the effects of which have been felt elsewhere.

I am sure that all of the social partners – the workers, employers and governments – will help us emerge from the crisis stronger than before.

Over the last few years, we have been involved in a process of trade and economic opening whose virtues and consequences can be examined in the light of the general outlook for this opening.

Against this global backdrop, Mexico is feeling the impact and concerned by the widespread problem of unemployment and the creation of jobs.

The phenomenon is not restricted to developing countries, but is also being experienced by almost every country in the world. This has led to discussions in various fora, for example, at the Copenhagen Summit, by the OECD at its May meeting, and also at this meeting, where it is our essential theme.

A major source of concern for my country has for some time been unemployment. Of particular note is the participation of employers who continue to provide support and ideas, actions and solutions to promote the improvement of the employment situation.

Mexico, based on its macroeconomic indicators, has chosen the proper, albeit-painful-path, though it has resulted in a considerable loss of jobs. This is a consequence of recession caused by shrinking aggregate demand. This measure for reducing inflation is a sword hanging permanently over the heads of the people, not only of my country, but those of many countries. To fight and control inflation will be a bitter pill to take.

The exercising of freedom naturally involves risks, and to run them is much more healthy than to avoid them. The result has been the decision in favour of the trade opening and the privatizing of various enterprises formally owned by the Government. It has confirmed the increasingly strong presence of employers and their organizations in decision-taking, with the same happening in the process of tripartite social agreements.

The critical situation in Mexico, by necessity, leads us to seek solutions that will strengthen development, favour growth, and reduce unemployment, serving as a viable support for improving the standard of living of the Mexican people.

In these conditions, we have examined with great interest the national development plan for 1995-2000 submitted in May by the President of Mexico, Ernesto Zedillo. It is a short- and medium-term plan for orienting economic policy, aimed at stability and growth.

We are convinced that the resultant programme of action will achieve its goal of halting the crisis and placing GDP back on the path to recovery. To achieve this we must do two things; favour exports to increase our trade balance, and boost productivity in general. These efforts will require us to place our confidence in the deregulation process as a means of supporting and stimulating exports.

There is no doubt that the support of micro, small and medium-sized enterprises will serve to generate employment, to include self-employment, and will be a step toward eliminating underemployment and informal activities.

Along these lines, small-business financing programmes have been proposed and studied at length. The objective is to create or support feasible projects in which we employers' organizations are involved, so as to have every possible means at hand for creating jobs.

Recently, standards for the creation of integrated enterprises have provided us with another option whereby small and medium-sized enterprises can join forces to attain economies of scale and facilitate their access to the export market while improving their efficiency and productivity.

There is no doubt that since we are a country with a large area and a young population as well as with high demographic growth, it is essential to grapple with the problem of education. We have taken positive strides by tailoring the needs of industry to our universities and technical schools.

We are also coordinating efforts to create various systems: for the certification of vocational skills to facilitate the training and retraining of personnel so that they need not resort only to formal training systems with a limited curriculum, therefore combining needs, potential and skills.

Most of the above activities have emerged from tripartite agreements, at least as far as their conception is concerned, even when each sector could have participated independently in carrying them out. Thus at the core lies the overall vision of the social partners.

This is not an ideal world, but rather a set of situations, actions and options whose intent is to build a better Mexico. That the reference to employment is pertinent can be seen in the Director-General's Report, which analyses the models whose development strategy has been successful and which have boosted economic growth and eliminated unemployment.

There is no doubt that the successful experimental methods can be developed into formulas for orienting countries undergoing, or that could eventually undergo, a critical situation.

Let us hope that at the end of this Conference we can join together all the positive steps to ensure that despite the diverse situation the true path will be found so that unemployment will not become the apocalyptic evil of the end of the century but that instead the hopes of full employment be realized in the next century.

Mr. CAL (Workers' delegate, Italy) – On behalf of the Italian workers, I would like to warmly congratulate the President on his election and wish him every success in effectively conducting the work of this session of the Conference. I also express my sincere appreciation to the Director-General for placing employment at the top of the agenda of this Organization and clearly establishing it as its foremost priority.

World Employment 1995 which has received wide approval of its comprehensive approach encourages the search for positive solutions, with the contribution of the social partners and governments that must be coordinated at the world level.

In particular, we agree with those proposals which, in our view, have the potential to create employment. I would like to enumerate some of them: the creation of viable mechanisms for the international coordination of macroeconomic policies; reforms of the international monetary system and the establishment of a transaction tax on financial flows; greater international cooperation to enforce basic labour standards; debt relief for severely indebted countries, and so on.

The growing role of the ILO in the new international context as a body that tries to solve employment issues, social injustice, poverty and exclusion, has been visibly appreciated in recent months. In particular, the ILO contribution to the preparatory phase of the World Summit in Copenhagen was extremely relevant.

It followed the developments of the meeting of G7 Ministers of Labour held in March 1994 in Washington, and the Informal Tripartite Meeting at the Ministerial Level during the 81st Session of the Conference – an event which was repeated here last week.

The contacts initiated by the International Monetary Fund aimed at the implementation of decisions taken in Copenhagen include an invitation to the Director-General of the ILO to participate in its meetings – a move we hope the World Bank and other United Nations agencies will also follow. They are of vital importance in order to ensure that structural adjustment and development cooperation policies, programmes and projects take the criteria established by the World Summit for Social Development into account.

First and foremost, consultation and agreements with the social partners on the definition, implementation and assessment of projects will have to take place. The only way to guarantee an improvement of present social and economic conditions, and ensure the future well-being of coming generations, is to lay the foundation for stable economic growth, based on environmentally compatible development and on the participation of workers and other sectors of society, with full respect for basic human and trade union rights.

In Italy, a tripartite National ILO Committee was set up to promote a series of important initiatives to carry out commitments defined in Copenhagen. This National Committee, among other things, will help the ILO to establish a national monitoring mechanism to measure the progress made towards the goals and objectives set by the Summit itself.

There is strong evidence that the globalization of world economics is taking place without any ground rules and is guided by one main objective, namely to serve the interests of the powerful and wealthy. The new liberal ideology justifies full deregulation, promotes the free intervention of capital investors wherever chances of profit are the highest. The situation has resulted in massive and dangerous financial operations, that are speculative in nature, do not create jobs or provide for healthier economies, as demonstrated by the recent Mexican debacle and the collapse of the Barings Bank.

To avoid this kind of situation, as has already been stated during the Informal Tripartite Meeting at the Ministerial Level last week, a mechanism should be set up to enable ministers of finance and economic affairs, on the one hand, and ministers of labour, on the other, jointly to review policies that need to be followed, in order to ensure that employment promotion is given high priority in national and international economic policies, with respect for the policies and principles of the ILO.

Otherwise, the new liberal fundamentalism will worsen the existing economic and social development imbalances, widen the already unacceptable gap between North and South, and create very serious economic and social consequences within industrialized countries.

The people of my country recently faced an attempt at structural deregulation. It was stopped, however, by the determination of the trade union movement, acting unanimously and responsibly by tackling the serious problems that characterized a period of delicate transition. It was a difficult period, after the fall of political and institutional structures which had kept the country running for 50 years, but which proved suddenly unable to lead it into the future.

Owing to a lack of political stability and credibility of most political parties, the trade union movement took on the responsibility to put forward a strong proposal to solve the most serious problems. Contrary to what occurred in 1993, when a tripartite agreement was reached to control inflation and define levels of national collective bargaining procedures, this year, our unions entered into an agreement only with the Government on the vital issue of pensions. We regret that employers' organizations have not supported the agreement and refused to share responsibility for such an important subject in our country.

A global grass-roots consultation among all workers and pensioners was held a couple of weeks ago on this topic and the ensuing agreement was supported by a 65 per cent majority.

This agreement guarantees the essential benefits and rights obtained by workers and trade unions in the pension system and, at the same time, it reduces the impact of pensions on public finances by establishing a closer link between total workers' contributions and the pension he or she will obtain. There is a cost, of course. Retirement age will gradually have to increase to the same level as the other European countries.

Through these agreements, the Italian trade unions have avoided simplistic and unjust solutions, such as budgetary cuts, the liberalization and privatization of social security and the general deregulation of our economy which, in the final analysis, would greatly impair the quality of life of the workers in our country.

The initiative of the ILO in cooperation with world financial and economic institutions must ensure that globalization does not result in major world economic and social chaos.

While there has been economic development in some regions, mainly in the industrialized countries and in part of Asia, a vast number of countries have lost economic clout and importance. They have experienced a significant decrease in trade and have been subject to the imposition of drastic adjustment measures, which has increased their marginalization.

The conclusion of the Uruguay Round and the creation of the World Trade Organization now offer these countries a chance to take part again in the process of development, or at least the potential to do so.

However, this will not occur spontaneously without a special commitment on the part of the wealthier countries to guaranteeing fairness in trade and support towards development. Instead, competitiveness without rules, "a free fox in a free chicken pen", which was attributed to Adam Smith 200 years ago, would cancel out any potential for open world trade and condemn hundreds of millions of people to a life of poverty and despair.

The first inevitable step is the linkage between basic human and labour standards and trade, in order to make sure that fundamental ILO Conventions are observed in trade agreements. For this purpose, the setting up of a special committee with the World Trade Organization must be undertaken.

The ILO as well must be part of such a committee. There, the system and all procedures needed to facilitate, and promote and reward compliance with these rules must be defined.

As a last resort, compulsory measures should be applied to countries that consistently violate the international labour standards, contained in core ILO Conventions and outlined in the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions's social clause proposal.

In view of this, it is necessary to undertake, within the ILO, a sincere and courageous dialogue between social partners and governments on the future development of technical cooperation and training programmes and projects, with a view to promoting compliance with and observance of international labour standards.

We wish to take this opportunity to express our appreciation and encouragement for the work carried out by the International Training Centre of the ILO in Turin. In view of the new important task the ILO will have to undertake in the future, the Italian tripartite committee believes and requests that the Centre's role should be enhanced by allocating the resources needed to strengthen and expand its activities.

Finally, we suggest again that the ILO take on and promote Jacques Delors' proposal to create an economic security council with the power and the resources needed to intervene and resolve serious problems which are more and more frequently creating crisis situations that negatively affect the life of millions of men and women in our country.

Original German: Mr. NORDMANN (Government delegate, Switzerland) – Allow me, first of all, to congratulate the President warmly on his election. My congratulations are also addressed to the Worker and Employer Vice-Presidents. Furthermore, I take this opportunity of thanking the Director-General as well as his colleagues in the International Labour Office for the good preparations made for this year's Conference as well as for their hard work throughout the whole year.

One impressive result of that hard work is before us in the Report to the Conference, Promoting employment. I would like to congratulate the Director-General and his team for this excellent piece of work. Its more detailed version in the form of report World Employment 1995 may fairly be characterized as one of the basic documents for the World Summit for Social Development and was so regarded by much of the world's press. I hope my compliments on these two reports will encourage you to continue, as planned, to submit annual reports on the world employment situation.

However, the preparation of reports only has a job-creating effect for those directly involved. It is up to us to give practical effect to these works of reference so that they do not just lie around in libraries.

For the first time we can get an overall view of the implications and impact of economic globalization; down-to-earth scenarios – and I mean this in the best sense of the term – make a welcome change from the more emotional discussions on globalization. I gather with satisfaction from the Director-General's Report that globalization can have positive job-creating effects for all participants, including developing countries, countries in transition to a market economy and industrialized countries, provided that protectionist reactions are avoided.

In this context, I would like to explain how Switzerland is preparing to cope with the competitive situation which has changed as a result of globalization and the measures it feels may facilitate the process of adjustment.

Switzerland, as a strongly export-orientated country, has always been committed to free trade. The export sector has, for the past few decades made a powerful contribution to a balanced increase in employment. However, recently, we have had the painful experience that even flourishing enterprises have created only comparatively few jobs in Switzerland itself while precious jobs have been created abroad. This downside of globalization has hit us relatively hard. As this decline in employment has not only been cyclical but also to a large extent structural, we are concentrating on three specific areas. And when reading the Director-General's Report on employment production, I noted that the ILO experts also considered the same areas to be a priority. Indeed, we are attempting to: eliminate obstacles to the creation of new jobs in Switzerland; place emphasis on reform of the educational system; and adapt our unemployment insurance systems to the new conditions.

The only effective way of overcoming unemployment is to create new jobs. This conclusion was reached by the participants at the Social Summit; and it emerges clearly from the Director-General's Report. It is recommended that any regulation should be examined in the light of its positive or negative impact on job creation so that the pros and cons may be weighed; and I think this recommendation is correct and important. In any deregulation we must be aware of what we are likely to gain and what we are liable to lose. The revitalization of the economy in my country is not being made at the expense of good healthy working conditions but seeks to introduce greater flexibility in order to improve the framework conditions for the economy as a whole. We have in mind not only the labour market but also, for example, new anti-trust and domestic market legislation to stimulate competition. The opening up of our markets in connection with the GATT agreements will tend to stimulate greater competition – and this will help to produce new jobs.

Most of the previous speakers have already emphasized how important education and training are for effective adaptation to the globalization process. For a country which is poor in raw materials, qualified and highly motivated workers are the most valuable form of capital.

Integration in a global economy presents new challenges to the educational system. Switzerland has an even greater need now than before for highly qualified workers for its industry and research. Our system of dual vocational education has been very useful. The combination of practical training in a company and theoretical training in vocational school makes it easier for most young people to find jobs upon completion of their training.

We have noted, however, that fewer and fewer young people are opting for vocational training – not least because of the poor career prospects. The Swiss Government is seeking to counter this trend by creating technical colleges. These, together with other measures intended to increase the attractiveness of vocational training, seek to make vocational training comparable to university education. A reform of the school-leaving examination and university courses is aiming to overhaul the curricula so that young people are better equipped to cope with the challenges of globalization in their everyday working lives.

Good training, together with effective further training, is and remains the key to success. However, government action alone will not suffice. I am fully aware that the employers and workers have an important role to play. The Swiss employers are investing considerably in the further education of their employees and the trade unions are also contributing to the development of the educational system with their ideas and specific actions.

Despite the improved regulatory framework for enterprises and increased educational programming, not everyone manages to find a job. Even in our country, unemployment levels have risen to such an extent that we are obliged to adjust our system of unemployment insurance. In addition to income guarantees, this will involve a whole range of partly compulsory measures. We are attempting to break new ground by providing jobseekers with advice at regional employment agencies so that they can be quickly brought back into gainful employment.

The ILO has an important role to play in the process of globalization. How it should embark upon this has already been discussed at the Social Summit and at the Informal Tripartite Meeting at the Ministerial Level last Friday. I believe the two following areas are important.

First, the globalization of the economy must be accompanied by a globalization of the fundamental rights of workers. Here we see a particularly important challenge to our Organization. We should not only seek to improve and strengthen standard-setting activity but also act to make the supervisory mechanism more effective.

Second, as World Employment 1995 shows, globalization may be accompanied by a painful adjustment process. Unfortunately there are no concrete recommendations as to how these restructuring processes may be cushioned. This is another new important area of activity for the ILO. Its experts could provide advice to Members if they so wish and could also draw upon the experience of individual countries in applying various measures to this end – and make this accessible to others. The ILO could thereby become a sort of data bank and know-how centre for information on ways to cope successfully with adjustment. I would therefore support the proposals contained in the follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development. But I believe that emphasis should be laid on advice and accompanying measures. Statistics are important but even more important, given the shortage of financial resources, are specific support programmes. Closer cooperation with other international organizations could not only help to enrich this dialogue but also avoid an overlapping of activities.

Globalization may also provide an opportunity for this organization to strengthen its own activity and to broaden it. The discussions about the budget, however, show that the ILO will have to reckon with less – rather than more – funds in the future; all the more important, therefore, that it should set its priorities and overhaul its organization.

My country believes in the important mission of the International Labour Organization – a mission which also costs money. In order to be able to carry out its wide range of duties, the ILO needs a sound financial basis. In this sense, my country supports the budget which has been proposed to us.

Original French: Mr. WADE (Employers' delegate, Senegal) – On behalf of the National Council of Senegalese Employers and of the delegation it is my honour to lead, I wish warmly to congratulate Mr. Rosales Argüello on his election to preside over the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to take this opportunity to congratulate the other elected officials and also Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the International Labour Organization for the intelligent, incisive and topical ideas and suggestions contained in his Report on Promoting employment. I shall come back to the Report at a later stage in my statement.

In the wake of those who have taken the floor before me I will if I may, allude to the historical role that we play together, drawing inspiration and legitimacy from the objectives, principles and rules of our Organization. The binding force of which is tripartism, its own special instrument for analysing questions that concern this world of ours in its tireless quest for peace, happiness and progress.

Today, history has thrown down the gauntlet before us because policies and programmes in so many countries to try and solve the acute problem of unemployment, underemployment, poverty and marginalization have proven themselves to be ineffective and in responding to the challenge the ILO has a vital role to play. In order to do so our Organization must continue to act as the world's social conscience and should accordingly intensify its quest for symbiosis between matters economic and matters social.

That is why the analysis and the proposals contained in the Report are particularly significant. Both here and in our countries we must now take these ideas further and produce decisive measures to promote employment.

The decision you took, Mr. Director-General, to publish periodical reports on the employment situation in the world is a highly commendable one. Nevertheless, we should go even further and convene high-level meetings bringing together the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions.

Similarly the fact that the Copenhagen Summit adopted a Declaration and Programme of Action on the subject of employment is very heartening to us. Indeed, it sets us a shining example. The Director-General is quite right to say that unemployment increases economic insecurity and human distress. I would say also that it destroys the principle forces for a stable society in our countries. It makes individuals' lives more fragile and families more vulnerable. In fact, all manner of abuses can spring from unemployment.

Today we should acknowledge that in countries whose economic structure is similar to Senegal's the real economy is gravely fragmented, leading to increasing poverty among broad strata of the population, a decline in real income and more fragile governments.

Furthermore, our countries are having ever greater difficulties in finding their place in the new international division of labour based in particular on stringent output and productivity standards, while at the same time the globalization process and international economic integration are pushing our nations towards an ever more marginal position.

To take the example of the African countries south of the Sahara, their share in output, trade and global direct investment has declined continuously over the course of this decade. As for unemployment, it has become endemic, hitting young people the hardest. Furthermore population growth rate is higher than the growth rate of GNP. Young adults aged from 15-34 account for two-thirds (64 per cent) of unemployed people in my country. We have to act quickly to reverse these trends, but in order to do this we are going to have to bring about economic recovery in our countries to create the right economic environment for expansion of employment and gainful activities because employment cannot be decreed by law; it can only be created by productive investment.

Such growth is going to need more competitive and more flexible economies, a stable macroeconomic and institutional environment that offers genuine incentives. It is going to need government budgets to be rationalized and new harmonization policies to be applied. It is going to call for massive productive investment, better management of human resources, coherent and far-sighted employment policies that provide incentives to hiring, such as a cut in the indirect costs of labour that are very often inflated by high employer contributions. There are going to have to be effective training and education policies that better tailor training to jobs. Our economies are going to have to be integrated. Tariff and non-tariff barriers must be eliminated, as should be dumping and unfair competition. The labour market is going to have to become more flexible, and we need a social consensus based on good management of tripartite arrangements.

As part of such a strategy, the private sector has a central role to play. The National Council of Senegalese Employers got it right last April by organizing a national seminar on employment for young people, by showing more interest in business women by proposing to labour organizations a social compact, and flexible framework for dialogue, and I commend the responsible and constructive spirit that was shown by the workers' organizations. They are our natural partners to make enterprises the driving force of our economy.

Furthermore, we need to emphasize the role of the informal sector in training young people who have not been able to finish their schooling. It is therefore useful, even vital, that the informal sector come closer to and develop complementarity with the more structured sector. The Government of Senegal with help from donors has set up a labour-intensive public works called the Public Works Execution Agency. This has been a very successful experiment and is being taken up by other countries in the region.

It is also opportune to underline the very relevant recommendations that were put forward on these issues at the Tripartite Meeting on the Socio-Economic effects of the Devaluation of the CFA Franc for French-speaking African countries held in Dakar in July 1994, as well as the UTICIA/IOE/CPE/ILO

High-Level Symposium for African Employers' Organizations held in Tunis from 24 to 27 October 1994, and the Seminar for Employers' Organizations in the CFA Franc Area of Africa held in Libreville from 11 to 13 April 1995.

Economic growth on its own is not enough to heal the social rupture created by the labour and social crises. We have to be imaginative and prepare policies and programmes that are based on permanent consultation, on the creation of small and medium-sized enterprises and the identification of job-creating activities.

In the spirit of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights we must do everything to guarantee man his undeniable rights – namely, freedom, equality and dignity. Such dignity, however, cannot be provided without employment. At the moment it is vital that we restore hope in a better world, a world where justice, equality, peace and understanding reign, where poverty, exclusion, intolerance and the arbitrary exercise of power are removed and banished forever.

At the same time we have to assist the ILO to put into practice its noble ideals by reinforcing its authority and the means at its disposal for the projection of its influence.

Mr. ZAINAL (Workers' delegate, Malaysia) – I am indeed honoured to have been accorded this opportunity to address this distinguished gathering. Allow me at the outset to convey the fraternal greetings of Malaysian workers to their counterparts the world over, whose representatives are gathered here today.

This year marks the 76th year of the ILO as the conscience keeper of workers' welfare, a role that it has performed well, given the external constraints.

Similarly, the Malaysian Trades Union Congress (MTUC), the umbrella organization for Malaysian trade unions has, in its 44-year history, endeavoured strenuously and relentlessly to ensure that the "toiling class" is accorded its rightful share of economic development and its rightful place in society. We will continue our struggle without fear or favour.

This 82nd Session of the ILC is being held at a time which has witnessed drastic changes in the structure of the world economy. The pursuit of rapid economic growth and the significant shift towards manufacturing has altered the very landscape of world trade. The inability, rather than the ability, of countries to adapt to these structural changes has had an impact on their respective economic performance. For instance, manufactured goods now constitute more than 78 per cent of the total exports of south and South-East Asia; however, Latin America and Africa still continue to be exporters of primary products, while the export performance of eastern European transitional economies actually fell.

It cannot be denied that the Bretton Woods institutions, specifically the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank have yet to act positively, especially in combating the debt crisis problem faced by the poor and very poor countries.

The significant changes in the world trade system impose the need for these financial institutions to make the necessary structural adjustments to their lending policies. These institutions must act upon the recommendations, specifically those made at the recently held World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen, which called for the provision of debt relief and debt cancellation to enable the poor and the very poor debtor countries to climb out of the dark pit of poverty.

The need to break the shackles of financial restrictions placed on these and other developing countries is urgent, and it is indeed time that these institutions act in the spirit in which they were founded and funded.

It is a sad commentary on our times that developing countries have been reduced to a state of desperation, that they are forced to offer low wages in order to bring foreign investment. It is time for the international community to find a more humane way to bring new investment to the developing countries who are desperate for new employment opportunities.

We are in support of foreign as well as domestic investment as these are sources of new employment opportunities in the modern sector of the economy. However, we remain concerned about the liberal conditions being offered by developing countries in order to attract foreign investment and we are especially concerned about the stiff conditions being extracted by multinational companies (MNCs) from developing countries who are hungry for their investment.

We recognize the need for foreign investments and welcome them as they create jobs; but we are also strongly opposed to what we view as their rampant exploitation of the working class. It is high time that MNCs treat their workers in developing countries in the same way as their workers in their country of origin. MNCs should be an example of good industrial practice in developing countries rather than examples of predatory labour practice.

The failure and reluctance of both the developed and developing countries to ratify several important Conventions of the ILO is indeed saddening, for these standards constitute the cornerstone for humane development and work-related welfare. All ILO constituents must take immediate measures to ensure that the standards, especially the relevant key standards, are enforced immediately. The ratification and implementation of these Conventions will serve to demonstrate that these constituents are indeed honourable and will put an end to the accusation that they are prone to abusive action. Further, there is the need for the ILO to use its offices and machinery to ensure that such member nations do immediately implement these Conventions, both adequately and effectively without any conditions whatsoever.

The significant shift towards manufacturing has resulted in the need for technological advancement. The spectrum of skills development and skills upgrading has not been accorded the due attention it rightfully deserves. I therefore make this clarion call that both MNCs and the constituent nations place adequate if not equal emphasis on training and re-training. The technological skills of the resident workforce must progress in parallel to the development needs of the economy. The failure, and to a certain extent, the reluctance, aimed solely at the creation of a dependent mentality, to provide for adequate opportunities and facilities for skills development and upgrading will only result in a "decadent" economy.

The exploitation of women and the denial of equal opportunities for women has existed from time immemorial. Though numerous announcements and proclamations have been made and continue to be made, the plight of women continues to remain the same, if it has not worsened. Women constitute a large percentage of the rapidly increasing workforce and they warrant, if not demand, specific and special attention and action. Member constituents must take all the necessary action to ensure that this significant and material segment of society is accorded its due recognition and protection.

The Director-General, in his Report to the Conference, has stated in no uncertain terms that the primary challenge for social and economic policy across the globe is the task of creating sufficient new jobs to overcome unemployment, underemployment and low wages. Employment creation is now perceived as the underpinning for sustainable quality of life and as such has taken centre stage. It is therefore imperative that we dovetail both our material and human resources to attain this laudable objective. Let us, Mr. President and fellow delegates, do this in an atmosphere of undivided commitment and sincerity for human beings.

Original French: Mr. BARDE (Employers' delegate, Switzerland) – Please allow me first and foremost to congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. I would like to publicly state here the interest that I have in following your deliberations and participating in them. Switzerland, and the Swiss Employers who I represent here, have always been very attentive to the search for negotiated solutions on the basis of social and political partnership. This is just an indication of how the tripartite structure of the International Labour Organization corresponds, in its principles to our own way of working. I would like, as an Employers' delegate, to state that I am new here. This is the first session of the International Labour Conference at which I am participating in my present capacity. The fact that I have a fresh view of the situation leads me to a number of reflections that I would like to share with you, and if the assembly should deem them to be excessive, please forgive me.

In all our societies, be they industrialized or developing, the issue of employment is a priority one. The problem is that there are also other priority issues, starting with the protection of the environment, be it land, air or sea. These priorities are going to come up against one another against a background which consists of achieving development for some, and for others to safeguard at least, their achievements. Unbalanced demographic development, even though our Conference may not be dealing with the issue as such, is clearly one of the great question marks linked to employment development. We cannot make employers and the economy the only ones responsible for more or less endemic unemployment, when they are no more in control of one of the central elements of the problem than any other sector of society.

The Report of the Director-General of the ILO is to be commended. It marks to a certain extent a turning point for the Organization in the sense that, beyond the standard-setting aspects that it seeks to promote in the fields of labour law and social rights, it has become aware that the creation of employment is in fact the best social and, indirectly, political safeguard available.

However, as employers we cannot follow all the recommendations contained in this Report. Indeed, at the inaugural ceremony of this session of the Conference, on 6 June, we were struck by the insistence of the calls for greater state intervention, in other words, for interventionist measures, to counter the effects of the market economy, the principles of which are now rarely called into question, although there is a general denunciation of the total lack of humanity, the coldness and consequently the inequality that is generated by the market economy.

The truth lies elsewhere however. There is no market without market participants, and the participants do have a soul and do have feelings, whether they are employers, workers or consumers. And that is what counts, and is why we must let market forces operate freely, without restraint, and, above all, we must not obstruct freedom of association, which our Organization upholds. It is only through the interplay of opposing forces that we will achieve true democracy and the chance to create, and in particular the chance to create employment.

My second remark is the following. The State, no more than the market, does not have its own soul. It is a product of the will of its citizens. To believe that the State, through a sort of divine power, is a just arbitrator, situated over and above the everyday exchanges of the common mortal, is an illusion that has unfortunately been entertained for too long.

The State can be just, and it can be an arbitrator, guaranteeing the tenets of democracy and the respect of all its citizens. But the State can also be grabbing and purely interested in benefiting itself or those who serve it, by growing sluggish in a stifling bureaucracy which is against all dynamic development and creation, including the creation of employment.

In this context, tripartism, which is the very backbone of our Organization upholds the opposing forces to which I just referred; on condition that we respect the balance established and are attentive to the ensuing creation between social protection on the one hand, and employment creation and development on the other. Too much of one can kill the other, and vice versa.

One of these excesses can consist of analysing economic and unemployment problems only in macro-economic terms, while it is often "on the ground", in micro-economic terms, when we can see the actual situation in the place and country concerned, that many decisions are taken. If we are aware, according to a recent OECD study confirmed by a study by the International Economic Institute of the University of Kiel, that it is today small and medium-sized enterprises that create most jobs, if we are aware that the costs generated by legal provisions are per capita significantly higher in a small or medium-sized enterprise than in a larger one, we can assess the burden that these provisions can sometimes represent, and the obstacle that they can constitute for employment. In many developing countries we can see a similar, if not identical, phenomenon taking place, with the focus being on activities and employment in the so-called informal sector of the economy.

Recalling these facts is not to plead in favour of deregulation or of social cutbacks, but rather to plead in favour of greater flexibility, in the codification and application of a certain number of standards, according to prevailing economic and social circumstances. In short, it is moving from the principle of equality which all our societies try so desperately to attain but never quite manage, and which is naturally accompanied by the trinity – centralization, regulation, uniformization – towards a more complex principle of equity, which is harder to manage, but which is far more fair as regards both the effectiveness of its redistribution and the economics of its taxation.

Freeing creation, freeing employment, is also a form of social progress. We must construct societies based on the pragmatism of actual experience and not fashioned in a common mould. Of course, the minimum standards of our Organization must be respected, but beyond this the balance must also take into account the constraints inherent in the economy, and the need to create jobs, and if possible, solvent jobs.

To refer to the current situation in Switzerland, there are two important aspects I would mention – the first are the efforts undertaken in respect of training in general, and vocational training in particular for young people of course, and also for the unemployed, so that they can have a greater chance of being reintegrated into a constantly evolving labour market. The second aspect is that in the collective labour agreements that we negotiated in this country, greater flexibility is granted to enterprises. In other words, without detracting from the fundamental principles of centralized collective bargaining, we give greater autonomy to the social partners in the implementation of these provisions within their respective enterprises. This philosophy is indeed the philosophy of the future – laying the basic foundations on which the social partners, branch by branch, and, if necessary, enterprise by enterprise, can negotiate the necessary adjustments.

I am aware of the modifications which are inherent in such a philosophy, but it corresponds to the change in mentality seen not only in employers, but sometimes also in workers and governments. Flexibility, in the most common sense of the term, is what we now need. It responds to the aspirations of us all and is one of the conditions for the creation of new jobs. We must not miss the opportunity to link standards relating to social protection to those born of the need to generate employment.

Original French: Ms. SMET (Minister of Employment and Labour, Belgium) – Mr. President, while congratulating you on your election to the presidency of the Conference and wishing it all success in its work, I will not conceal from you that the delegation of Belgium is taking part in this 82nd Session with mixed feelings.

Promoting employment is indeed central to the concerns of the political formations which are negotiating a new government in Belgium, and to the projects of other European governments. The theme of home work has already justified draft legislation in my country, which draws upon the work of the ILO in the run-up to this Conference. There are no longer any mines in my country but there are a number of quarries and we have a good mining code. Labour inspection in Belgium has long been authorized to monitor a number of activities in the non-commercial services sector. The subjects chosen for this Conference do not therefore seem to be of any practical use to my country. To this we must add the disappointment of my delegation on seeing that the discussions in the Governing Body since the last Conference have failed to give the Office any very useful indications as to the direction to be taken in two major controversies, that is to say, the role of the ILO in promoting the social dimension of the liberalization of trade, and the future of the ILO's standard-setting activity. In these circumstances, we are worried about the ILO's capacity to influence international social policy. More than ever, in the new context of rapid transformation, the world of work should not feel it has been left to its own devices, or has lost its bearings.

However, many workers in industrialized countries also undergoing change see no other prospect than unstable employment and the risk of a permanent quest for more flexible labour markets. Furthermore, they note that work relations are growing more tense under the weight of economic constraints, and that growth, if there is any growth, is not creating sufficient jobs. In other words, the political world as well as the world of work is also hoping for new ways of approaching work, training and how to make the best use of unemployment as a time of creativity and training.

The Copenhagen Summit set ambitious targets, beginning with the target of full employment for all. Some people wondered whether this was realistic. That indicates how much we must do in order to overcome the fatalistic outlook on the future of employment. The virtue of the Director-General's Report is that it confronts us with the harsh realities and presents us with new prospects. We must not give way to fatalism. We must find the will to put aside false controversies which may jeopardize the ILO's aims.

While job creation does of course depend on growth, private initiative, particularly in the job-creating sectors, and the conditions available for the creation of small enterprises, it also depends, in countries like Belgium, on more flexible organization of labour and work hours. But this must not be accompanied by a decline in social rights. Those who accept this must not be penalized.

There are many employment opportunities to be developed and supported in the socially useful non-commercial sector. The creation and development of such employment, however, faces an enormous problem of financing, and this we need to think about, because it presents many people with great opportunities. In order to develop this area, we must also refrain from considering that these are less highly qualified jobs. This sector calls for other qualifications in a different context of requirements.

These are the priority concerns of Belgium at this time. However, our delegation will, as usual, try to contribute positively to the work in the technical committees.

We share the Office's view that the question of home work is an important one in order to prepare for the future. It is indeed possible that this organization of work may become more widespread in certain sectors and in various forms. It is, therefore, important that these workers should enjoy the same treatment as workers occupied in more typical jobs in comparable situations. In Belgium, while the practice of home work seems to be limited to a few sectors, experiments are also under way, and we must keep an eye on them to see what happens.

The social partners and the Belgium Government approve the principle of extending the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) to the non-commercial sector, to the extent that this approach indicates a will to consider this Convention a priority. One cannot imagine promoting labour legislation without at the same time setting up labour inspection which is able to act in the various sectors of activity.

Belgium is always ready to provide technical assistance in the field of labour inspection. In this technical assistance we give priority to approaches which provide a specific response to a specific request and we have noticed a similar preference among a number of our colleagues. When we can, we are happy to be able to associate ourselves with the ILO's actions.

Together with the ILO, Belgium urges a strengthening of international cooperation in regard to jobs. We are encouraged to do so in the ILO by the conclusions of the Copenhagen World Summit for Social Development. The paramount role of the ILO in this area will be exercised by significant actions both inside the Organization as well as outside it.

Inside the ILO we still have a tendency to pay too much attention to national policies to the detriment of the search for common responses to common challenges.

The ILO Report on World Employment is an excellent initiative, particularly if supplemented by other authoritative analyses. The Director-General, in the course of this Conference, has heard appeals for very concrete action by the ILO to promote jobs. There are three areas here which seem critical to us.

First, the informal sector of the Third World where there are millions of people working, particularly women and children. There is doubtless a need to build bridges with protected employment as the freedom of employment must function in order to pave the way for mechanisms of collective defense. There is a need for greater trade union solidarity, and the creativity of employers in this sector can be sustained in many cases.

Secondly, the ILO must be effectively associated with the various approaches to develop and assess structural adjustment programmes so that it supports productive and high-quality employment strategies. We encourage the Director-General to negotiate with the IMF and the World Bank to establish the most useful measures to do this.

Finally, the ILO must seek to promote high-quality employment in all initiatives taken internationally and by governments. Since Copenhagen, there is a growing conviction that the fundamental Conventions of the ILO have a critical role to play in social development and in establishing high-quality employment. It would be desirable for the countries having an interest in technical assistance to avail themselves of the opportunity provided by the Conference, not just to defend themselves, but also to clearly formulate their needs.

I appeal to the ILO, and principally to its Governing Body, to support the Office in its efforts to live up to its responsibilities, at a time when there is considerable uncertainty as to how best apply the conclusions of the Summit. This is not the time to rest on our laurels. That, at any rate, is the spirit in which Belgium will continue to work in Geneva.

Original Spanish: Mr. SALAS MOYA (Workers' delegate, Bolivia) – On behalf of the Bolivian Workers' Confederation and on behalf of all Bolivian workers, I would like to congratulate you, Mr. President, on your election to preside over this 82nd International Labour Conference.

We commend the Director-General for choosing employment as his central theme for this meeting, because there can be no doubt at all that in most countries, perhaps in all, the question of employment – or rather unemployment – is the main problem they are facing at the moment, especially countries with less-developed economies such as Bolivia.

The ideas most frequently expressed in this debate revolve around proposals to generate fresh investment, mainly in productive industries, to ensure a fairer distribution of wealth and to develop international trade without protectionist barriers. Also, and quite rightly, we hear talk of the need to develop human resources for vocational training, training for new kinds of jobs and many other sorts of measures which, depending on the characteristics of the individual economy of each country, have a significant contribution to make in promoting the growth of employment. However, when we take stock of the results, it would appear that all of these efforts come to nothing when one sees that both official and, more especially, unofficial employment figures are going up much faster than we can create new permanent and productive jobs.

In practical terms, this is what is happening in my country, Bolivia, where the so-called structural adjustment programmes have a negative impact on the number and quality of jobs available. The prime victims of privatization are the workers, who are ejected en masse from their jobs to make way for new modes of organization and production imposed by private owners, and to allow for the hiring and the wage practices that tend to accompany efforts to make labour more "flexible".

In this and other ways human labour is becoming one more commodity on a market, a market that is saturated by the supply of unemployed workers. It is becoming a commodity that is tailored so that it can be more easily used to reinforce competitiveness in enterprises. Alongside this, open or underhand restrictions make it harder and harder to enjoy trade union rights.

Of course the outcome of all of these policies is seething discontent among thousands and thousands of human beings who cannot meet the most basic of their needs, and who have no chance of doing so in the short or medium-term. Nobody could or should fail to notice that growing social injustice inevitably has consequences of a political kind, the most serious being that poverty and wretchedness are increasingly being identified as being part and parcel of democracy.

There can be no doubt that in today's world the United Nations is foremost in those organizations that are working hard to change this situation. The Social Summit in Denmark and the theme for this 82nd Conference bear this out. However, we are quite convinced that these efforts will not be enough in themselves if they cannot do without the almost domineering oversight of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank when it comes to adopting uniform economic policies in all countries. Without forgetting that there is an interdependence between each country's economic policy and a trend towards globalization, each nation should nevertheless be able to carry out its own development programmes in terms of its own needs and resources, and be able to count on international cooperation without ties. What is serious is that these economic policies without any human dimension are being combined with authoritarianism that is striving to offset the absence of sound social and economic policies with the repression of workers and of their representative organizations.

As an example of this I might quote what is happening at the moment in Bolivia. Last April the Bolivian Government ordered the repression of a peoples' and workers' demonstration, the arrest of more than 330 trade union leaders, their deportation to barren and remote parts of Bolivia and the banning of freedom of association and the right to demonstrate, thus riding roughshod over the constitutional and trade union rights of Bolivians and violating Conventions No. 87 and 98 of the International Labour Organization, which Bolivia has ratified. The state of emergency is still in force today, and this is why the Bolivian Workers' Confederation, through the various ILO bodies and instruments, is demanding that the Government of Bolivia be notified about its duty to respect ILO Conventions and that human rights and trade union rights be immediately reinstated.

The Bolivian Workers' Confederation is quite sure that repression is no kind of solution to our problems. Repression only compounds the grievances of workers. That is why we agree with many of the initiatives that have been expressed at this meeting and are demanding that the rights of Bolivian workers are requested.

(Mr. Halliwell takes the Chair.)

Original Arabic: Mr. DJILANI (Employers' delegate, Tunisia) – In the name of Allah, the Compassionate, the Merciful. It is a pleasure for me to extend to the President on my own behalf and on behalf of the Tunisian Employers, our congratulations on his election as President of this session of the Conference. We wish him and the Vice-Presidents success in their work. It is a pleasure to meet again in this framework. The participants will attempt, through a constructive dialogue, to find the best possible solutions to the problems of our society, be they economic, cultural or social in nature.

I would like to recall the statement made by President Ben Ali regarding our strategy leading up to the year 2000. We would also like to state that we are pleased that previous sessions have taken place in a positive context of harmony and complementarity. We have been able to adopt a qualitative approach to meet the challenges of a changing world and, thus, to ensure social peace, organize the world of work and improve the general working environment. We must find new criteria to permit enterprises to improve their competitive capacity and to ensure their development.

Allow me here to recall the success of the structural adjustment programme in Tunisia, which has permitted my country consistently for a number of years to achieve the best economic performance in the region. We have had a relatively high rate of growth and made significant progress in the social field, such as the improvement of living conditions and increases in individual income.

A collective approach has been adopted to enhance our international competitiveness, based on the development of human resources and skill improvement. Vocational training programmes have been set up not only for those who have failed in their studies but also for supervisory staff who want to improve the productivity and competitiveness of their enterprises and enhance their chances of success in competition with international companies which have specialized manpower.

It is in this framework that we can mention the changes which have occurred since November. Wages are periodically revised, not with the aim of keeping up with prices, which are under control, but to improve the standard of living. This has been possible thanks to the dynamic economic growth of the country.

We must continue to lighten the burden imposed on enterprises, to encourage them fully to play their social role. This has already taken shape in the establishment of the national solidarity fund (26-26) for the most disadvantaged. This mechanism is a tool to strengthen the principles of solidarity and cooperation among the various groups in society, to enable the country to enter the coming century with a society free of social exclusion.

What our society expects of enterprises is that they should reconcile economic and social imperatives. The competitive system places a demand on society: that it should demonstrate solidarity. Enterprises too should be encouraged, and especially the most efficient ones, to work for the development and prosperity of all.

The Convention signed by Tunisia and the European Union to establish a free-trade zone has proved to be a turning point in the economic development of the Tunisian economy since it compels us to go to even greater efforts to integrate into this zone and undertake the restructuring of our industry that this entails. It is for this reason that we have adopted a national strategy of supporting Tunisian enterprises and providing assistance to sectors at risk so that they can face up to international competition. This strategy provides for increases in investment, adoption of manpower retraining measures and the scientific organization of work.

We fully realize that to take up these challenges, we must take maximum advantage of our financial and human resources and our technical capabilities – without which we will not be internationally competitive.

We are proud in Tunisia of what has been achieved in improving wages and social security. The ILO forms the ideal framework to enhance our experience, bolster our resolve and to create the best possible conditions for establishing fruitful collaboration between trade unions and professional organizations, which, although different by both nature – when all is said and done – have the same objectives.

Mr. HARRIS (representative of Education International) – This Conference is unlike any other in the international system. The ILO is the oldest of our international organizations and the only institutional survivor of the Treaty of Versailles. Its unique feature of course is that States are represented by both governments and the social partners, who should be able to express their views independently of government.

But the ILO shares with all other parts of the United Nations system the feature that it is composed of States. The question that I want to pose today is this: do we not live in an era when the power of the State is contracting?

I pose that question because so much of the debate at the International Labour Conference as elsewhere assumes that the locus of power continues to reside with States. The assumed power of States still provides the framework of reference for our debates, whether on labour standards, on economic policy, on social policy, on structural adjustment, promoting employment or on the concept of the social clause. In each case the power of the State is presumed to be the determinant factor.

But is that still the reality today? Will it be the reality tomorrow?

Last year, I conveyed to you the anger which could be sensed tangibly among the members of our International. In every one of the 140 countries where we have member organizations, that anger was real then and it remains real today.

The four million teachers and other education employees who have joined our ranks just in the last 12 months (for a total now of 23 million) are just as angry as their colleagues. They are fed up with the gap between rhetoric and reality.

We know this anger and frustration extends well beyond our particular sector. It is general.

The profound changes which have shaken our societies, technological, economic, demographic and social changes, are visibly beyond the power of any State to manage – even the most powerful among them. Yet political leaders strive to maintain the illusion that they are in control. By their failures, they hasten the alienation of people from political institutions.

Consider this irony: it is the fashion for finance ministry officials and central bankers and their agents, the IMF and the OECD, to advocate a dramatic reduction in the role of the State, pressing for deregulation and leaving the provision of even basic services and investments to the market. Yet those officials are supposed to be accountable to elected leaders whose political careers are based more than ever today on a supposed capacity to manage the economy – to create jobs, jobs, jobs.

Consider the G7 meeting today in Halifax. We have read the famous leaked communiqué which has been public for about one week in many circles and is supposed to be released tomorrow. It is full of pious rhetoric about the fight against unemployment and improved management of exchange fluctuations. It then goes on to describe the leaders' concerns for the environment and sustainable development, and their wish to stimulate the information society. These esteemed gentlemen are striving mightily to maintain the illusion that they lead States which still have powers to determine these things. They have put economic issues at the top of their political priority list, but they have little power to influence the markets which they or their predecessors deregulated. So all they do, as the gap between rhetoric and reality becomes flagrant, is to foster even greater frustration and greater scepticism about government.

Consider the issue of child labour – or more exactly child exploitation. I am not talking here about work which youngsters do out of school hours or in vacation time, work which is not only essential to family welfare, especially in rural areas, but also preserves and respects children's educational opportunities, health and future prospects in life. No, I am talking about degrading, intolerable, soul and body-destroying exploitation affecting up to 200 million children according to ILO estimates. Most countries have legislation banning this kind of child exploitation, but the legislation is not enforced. The gap between rhetoric and reality is flagrant again because of the lack of political will or ability to have national law respected.

What is the World Bank's answer to that flagrant gap? To annul the laws which are not being respected! Words fail me! What is the reaction of some governments? Their reaction is to cloak their willingness to sacrifice young children to the market, with talk of tradition and cultural differences. What hypocrisy! No wonder we are angry.

Consider, if you will, the status of teachers. The ILO/UNESCO recommendation on this matter was adopted unanimously by States in 1966. But the committee of experts set up by the ILO and UNESCO has just provided, in its latest report, irrefutable evidence that conditions for teachers are worse today than when the recommendation was adopted almost 30 years ago. Is it any wonder our people are not only angry but also incredulous about the actions and promises of governments?

Consider the World Summit for Social Development. Will the commitments solemnly adopted by 116 national leaders be implemented? Are they able to implement these commitments?

And consider also the question of the social clause. No one denies the reality of serious threats to the safety of workers in certain factories, or the existence of forced labour, or the denial of basic trade union rights, and certainly not the existence of discrimination and the exploitation of children. Yet some governments oppose our proposals to protect workers, with arguments about something quite different: the protection of trade between States.

What is the common feature in all of this? In each case States no longer have the power to deal satisfactorily with realities which everyone recognizes: unemployment, the havoc caused by volatile, unpredictable financial markets, social injustice, and failure to respect international agreements and standards.

During an earlier period of rapid change at the end of the nineteenth century, there were also free-wheeling markets. There was rampant exploitation in the newly-industrialized North and in the colonized South. The conditions of workers were widely recognized as being intolerable and the Conferences of Berlin, Brussels and Paris laid the foundations for what later became the International Labour Organization.

At the end of the twentieth century exploitation is again rampant, as is speculation. The South is politically independent but economically dependent. Anger at social injustice is rising again.

In these 100 years, the power of the State has risen and then fallen. New points of focus for the exercise of power will emerge, probably in the economic sphere, and through a new mobilization of civil society.

If the thesis I have presented today is accurate, there are obvious dilemmas. Even if economic power has shifted away from the State, there is no apparent substitute for the legislative powers of the State. If the State does not establish common rules; who does? The deregulators would answer, "nobody". So at the end of the day the rule of law, one of the fundamental tenets of civilization, goes out the window.

The oldest of the international institutions, the ILO, may in fact be the best place to respond to this shift in the locus of power which is already under way, for three reasons: because of its unique tripartite structure which involves the social partners; because of its programmes of sectoral activities and technical assistance, which get close to the realities; and because of its mandatory commitment to social justice.

There is a need for new thinking as well as the reaffirmation of some fundamental values about justice which should be found in the ILO Constitution. Actually you will find some of that in the document of the Workers' group, The ILO towards the 21st Century.

By looking beyond the State as the framework for its action and by being prepared to rethink policies, the ILO could give a new impulse to the battle for social justice – that battle in which victory is never completely won, but in which defeat must never be conceded.

Original French: Mr. GODONOGA (Workers' delegate, Moldova) – It is a particular honour for me to address to the President my most cordial congratulations on his election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. It is my conviction that, thanks to his skill and experience and to the active participation of delegations, this forum will be most fruitful and will be crowned with success.

The Conference is taking place at a time of radical changes in the world, indeed it is no exaggeration to say that this is a critical time. Problems like unemployment can be solved successfully only if combined with an effort to ensure fundamental human rights, respect for social equity and human dignity. We believe that these principles should constitute the cornerstone for the future work of governments, trade unions and all the social forces that have an interest in creating a prosperous and harmonious society.

Here I should like to turn to the subject addressed in this year's Report by the Director-General of the ILO and to say how urgently topical it is, presenting as it does a clear view of the most acute problems of our time which are causing much concern and much suffering, namely the problems of unemployment and poverty.

I would also like to say that we support and share the concerns addressed in the Report pertaining to employment, a problem that has not previously been examined from a world perspective. These phenomena seriously affect the countries in transition to a market economy, countries like the Republic of Moldova which is now going through an extremely difficult period. Our country's economy, like all those of the former Soviet Union, is in recession. Worse, most of our people are living in a situation of desperate poverty.

One of the saddest consequences of the deplorable state of the economy is unemployment which has in recent years reached alarming proportions. In 1994 it reached 8 per cent including concealed unemployment. On 1 March the Labour Bureau registered 23,000 unemployed, 64 per cent being women, and the real figure was a good deal higher.

In terms of the psychological shock, unemployment was even harder to bear for the population than price increases.

The experience of transition demonstrates that the best means of social protection is to increase production, and in general to raise economic performance. In other words, to diversify ways of implementing social protection. Here, the trade unions have a major role to play, being called upon to protect the rights and interests of wage-earners.

At the insistence of the Federation of Independent Trade Unions of Moldova there have been increases in unemployment benefit and child-care allowances as well as compensation for work in harmful conditions. The minimum wage has been increased five times in the last two years. We are now entitled to 24 working days of holiday and the working week has been set at 40 hours.

The Moldovan trade unions have shown a responsible attitude to the most acute problems facing our country. Given the worsening socio-economic situation, the Federation has initiated a nationwide civic protest. The main demands presented to the Government and employers have been for the payment of arrears of wages, an end to unemployment, an increase in the minimum wage and indexing the money income of the population. In the course of negotiations within the Republican Collective Bargaining Commission, an agreement was signed setting deadlines for meeting these demands.

In this very grave situation, we have thus succeeded in resolving some of our problems at the negotiating table. We are trying, not without difficulty, to create and develop a system of social partnership, a system upon which the ILO is based. Albeit imperfectly, the tripartite machinery has started functioning. However, the effective participation of the trade unions in protecting the rights of wage-earners is impossible without the establishment of a legal framework based on international practice and in the first instance on ILO Conventions.

Moldova has however ratified only one ILO Convention, namely the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105). In the last two years, our Federation has proposed to Parliament and Government the ratification of 35 ILO Conventions, including those pertaining to social partnership. We note with regret, however, that no concrete results have been achieved in this area. We hope nevertheless that 1995 will prove to be a more fruitful year in this regard and that Parliament will ratify a considerable number of Conventions.

We believe that in the coming period there will be an end to the decline in production, and signs of an up-turn. Our hopes are associated with the progress of privatization and the adoption of regulations to stimulate foreign investment, with diversification of the institutional framework appropriate to a market economy.

These things can only be achieved, we believe, if there is close cooperation with the trade unions of all continents.

Here, the ILO has a very important role to play. I take this opportunity to express our gratitude for the ILO's ongoing support to Moldova's trade unions as well as expressing the hope that we may continue to count in future on the wealth of experience and the support of this prestigious Organization, particularly as concerns improvement in the working methods of the Republican Collective Bargaining Commission of the Republic of Moldova.

I would also note the substantial contribution made by the International Labour Organization to the Copenhagen World Social Summit which played an important role in seeking remedies to the key problems of our time: poverty, unemployment and social disintegration.

In conclusion, I would express the hope that the proceedings of this session of the Conference will mark a decisive stage in the improvement of the living conditions of workers.

Original French: Mr. GAOURI (Minister of the Public Service, Labour and Employment, Niger) – First and foremost, on behalf of the delegation of Niger and on my own behalf, I would like to convey to the President and to the other elected officials my strongest congratulations on their election to the high offices of this assembly. I am quite sure that under their guidance, the work of this session will be crowned with success.

I would also like to take the opportunity to offer my sincerest congratulations to the Director-General of the International Labour Organization for the excellent Report he has put before us on a question which is one of the major sources of concern for our countries.

In his Report entitled Promoting employment, the Director-General has summarized in one sentence the objectives that should guide all governments in the area of employment, namely “the task of creating sufficient new jobs to overcome unemployment, underemployment and problems of low pay”.

The situation in my country corresponds, for all practical purposes, to the one described in the Report. Employment has declined in the modern structured sector, there is more official unemployment and underemployment, there are more precarious forms of employment and more barely productive occupations in the non-structured sector and finally, there has been a drop in real wages. This situation provides us with great concern, but in addition to that there is the fact that many young graduates have reached the market looking for their first job.

That is why the Government of Niger, taking up the struggle against unemployment and underemployment, has centred its economic and social development policy on various areas.

Thus, contemporary economic structures mean that the State must disengage itself gradually from certain economic activities. Indeed, its excessive interventionism in the past in managing public enterprises, and manning their leadership with civil servants, are all factors that may serve to explain their poor performance and the reason why their viability has been called into question.

In order to ensure the survival of these enterprises to make them more able to invest, to make them a more effective locomotive for other economic activities in the country and to preserve and defend jobs, the Government of Niger feels that it is important that the State should cut down its participation in social capital to a level at which it can be managed according to the rules of private enterprises.

We are quite sure that promoting the private sector is crucial to development and diversification of job-creating economic activities and our policies in this sphere are as follows. We wish to reorganize the banking sector; make export-oriented industries more dynamic; create new industries to give support to substitution industries that use local inputs; and promote activities to assist small and medium-scale enterprises to development.

Developing the informal sector is also something we are looking at very closely due to the scope of this phenomenon; however, this does not constitute a matter of major concern for the Government of Niger since it feels that this sector could, in fact, make a very significant contribution to solving problems of unemployment and underemployment. Our programme aims to selectively integrate the most viable activities from this sector into the modern sector by setting up a programme to promote small and medium-scale enterprises and by facilitating access to credit and to training about modern production and marketing techniques.

One of the principal causes of unemployment in the urban areas is the rural exodus towards the towns by people hoping to find jobs there that will give them a decent income. Solving this problem is going to mean offering incentives and boosting paid employment in rural areas.

As part of this we are planning to: continue to analyse institutional problems and to seek solutions to the inadequacy of marketing methods for our crop, forestry and livestock products; encourage economically viable cooperatives; carry out in-depth studies on agricultural product lines that are currently doing well on export markets so as to encourage farmers to switch to cash crops; encourage banks to have an activity in rural areas; promote the emergence of skilled national and foreign private operators and interest them in the production, marketing and processing of agricultural products; promote and develop exports of these products; and bolster our industrial fabric by setting up small and medium-scale enterprises for processing and marketing crop, forestry and livestock products.

This is a brief overview of the broad lines of the activities that the Government of Niger intends to undertake to meet the challenge of the year 2000.

Of course, implementing this policy means setting up permanent legal and institutional structures in conjunction with employers and workers, professional organizations, in addition to the consultative bodies provided for by our labour legislation. We intend to establish a high-level tripartite group designed to plan and implement a genuine employment policy that would take account of all the relevant dimensions. As part of the preliminary talks that have been undertaken on employment policy in Niger, the International Labour Organization has already provided us with much-appreciated technical assistance. So I would like to take this opportunity to express my thanks to the Director-General in this respect.

Now, turning to the agenda of the session, I can see that there are some very pertinent issues before us, in particular the question of safety and health in mines and other equally important matters.

It is for this reason that we are very interested in the discussions on these questions within the Conference.

The Director-General has stressed that globalization and economic liberalization have in some developing countries also exposed weaknesses in national patterns of labour market regulation. Niger has unfortunately not escaped from this phenomenon. But it is our ambition to work with the social partners and discuss the adjustments that have become necessary due to the changing economic and social environment.

In that regard we are planning very soon to organize a national seminar that will bring together the representatives of Government, the employers and the workers; and of course, our development partners will also be invited to this seminar.

The purpose of this tripartite seminar is to look closely at our institutional framework and to propose certain changes to the Government in our labour legislation, so that this legislation can make an effective contribution to economic and social development in Niger.

Before I close I would like to refer to the highly significant role of international cooperation in seeking solutions to employment problems throughout the world. Promoting employment is today something that all countries must undertake, rich countries and poor; however, only genuine cooperation among all can make it possible to attain this objective and bring about general prosperity.

I would also like to offer my Government's support to the endeavours undertaken by the Director-General of the ILO in spheres as diverse as democratization, defence of human rights and of individual freedoms, employment promotion and the war on want.

Mr. REDDY (Workers' delegate, India) – We are all gathered here at this 82nd Session convened soon after the adoption of the Declaration and Programme of Action by the World Summit for Social Development at Copenhagen. I take this opportunity to extend to the President my colleagues' and my own felicitations on his being unanimously chosen to conduct the deliberations of this session, while conveying to him and those participating here the greetings of over 314 million working people of India. I also congratulate the two Vice-Presidents on their election.

At the World Social Summit, the Heads of States and Governments from all over the world expressed serious concern about unemployment, poverty and social exclusion, and hammered out a programme of action to deal with these problems, particularly in the context of globalization. They also underscored the need for the International Labour Organization, with its mandate, unique tripartite character and expertise, to play a special role in the realm of employment and social development. I, therefore, compliment the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for his intention "to launch a new series of regular reports on the world employment situation with the aim of stimulating discussion and the search for solutions among ILO constituents and the international community at large".

Globalization of economies has serious implications for the establishment of an international economic order of balanced development in the world. This is particularly so in the context of the present unipolar world that has emerged after the collapse of the former Soviet Union.

The imbalances and wide disparities between the developed world and the developing world have further grown. The developed countries have been rather halting and hesitant to commit 0.7 per cent of their GDP to the developing countries and their economic development. Furthermore, in the globally integrated open economies, many of the parameters that guide the construction of the welfare state seem to be under serious threat.

International action has become imperative to put an end to the iniquitous imbalances among nations, to ensure that the world's poorest citizens share in the Earth's resources, so as to create a more civilized and more secure society. Here, I cannot help recalling the words of our all-pervasive leader, Mahatma Gandhi, who said that the world has enough for man's need, and not for man's greed.

Yet several features of the GATT agreement only serve to reinforce North-North trade. The greatest volume of changes in trade is predicted to be in North-North trade in manufactured goods. Yet the developed countries are systematically trying to resort to concealed protectionism. Instead of seeking to reduce non-tariff barriers, they are consistently attempting to impose fresh non-tariff barriers. They are relentless in their pursuit to get the so-called "social clause" included in the Charter of the World Trade Organization, in an attempt to link social policy with trade policy in a bid to deny market access to developing countries in international trade. Our country's highest tripartite body on labour affairs, the Indian Labour Conference, has shown significant solidarity against any move to make market access in international trade conditional on the application of labour standards. The ILO is the instrument to monitor the observance of labour standards set by it non-coercively. Let us not be parties to the loss of credibility of this oldest tripartite agency, arming it with coerciveness. If the ILO lacks teeth, then let us put our heads together to find ways and means to give it the teeth it so badly needs within the framework of its present Constitution and values, rather than dividing ourselves into opposing camps on the basis of our views on the "social clause".

The world has been passing through tremendous technological changes. Yet we continue to see that serious disasters still take place in mines all over the world, destroying a large number of productive lives. In our anxiety to survive in a world with a highly competitive market, we seem to concentrate on more production at any cost, unmindful of the human cost. Setting an updated standard for safety and health of mineworkers doing highly hazardous jobs has therefore become a necessity.

The plight of home-based workers is another issue that the Conference is to consider at this session. There is no doubt about the need to establish a labour standard to ensure social justice and equity for this deprived section of society. At the same time, there is also the need to go into the question of the feasibility of effective implementation of an international labour standard for this purpose.

I also have some comments to make on the observations made by the Committee of Experts concerning India's application of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), which the country has ratified. The sum and substance of the 13-page report on India is that the Committee notes that "over the years since the authorities of India took the decision to abolish the bonded labour system in 1976 and the Supreme Court took its landmark decision in 1983, the situation in practice did not appear to have improved very much ... ". Let me not be mistaken to be holding any brief for my Government as such. As a trade unionist, let me point out that as a result of several developmental measures including land reforms, there has been a sea of change all over India in the labour front, and bonded labour is certainly not the order of the day, as the report seeks to make it out. The earlier all of us see this issue in the right perspective, the better.

Our country's policy is for the elimination of child labour, which is a result of broader socio-economic problems. Six ILO Conventions concerning child labour have been ratified and backed by legislative measures. The present regime of labour laws on child labour is consistent with the resolution of the International Labour Conference of 1979, calling for a combination of prohibitory measures and steps humanizing child labour where elimination is not possible in the short run. A programme for the total elimination of child labour from hazardous industries by the year 2000 has just been set in motion. The tripartite constituents in India are also actively involved in the implementation of a programme in this area designed by the ILO-sponsored IPEC. At this point, I would like to re-emphasize that the ILO has not adequately used its technical cooperation arm to assist countries in greatest need of such assistance.

I conclude by drawing attention to the World Summit's Declaration and Programme of Action, which saw the Heads of States and Governments to commit themselves to promoting the goal of full employment as the basic priority of economic and social policies and to enabling all men and women to attain a secure and suitable livelihood through freely chosen, productive employment.

As the Director-General has pointed out, the ILO should provide political and technical leadership in mobilizing action at both the national and international levels to improve the global employment situation by placing the employment issue at the centre of the international agenda. The ILO should play a forceful role in helping to achieve the goal of a more equitable sharing of the costs and benefits of globalization among and within countries, and to bring about a better coordination of economic and social policies for ensuring the reinforcement of economic and social progress.

Mr. SIMION (Workers' adviser, Romania) – First of all, I would like to warmly congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference and wish them the best of luck in carrying out the important responsibilities they have in guiding the proceedings of this session. Also, allow me to take this opportunity, on behalf of the representatives of the Romanian National Free Trade Confederation, to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, for the theme he has selected to be debated during this session of the Conference. The theme of the report to the Conference, Promoting employment is an up-to-date issue both at the national and international level, and relates to the promotion of a decent and stable standard of living by ensuring productive and freely chosen employment.

The discussion of this theme is much more expedient now, after the recent World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen, where a Declaration and a Programme of Action was adopted, engaging the present Heads of State and Government in support for a priority programme of extensive employment for the workforce.

Romania is going through a period of transition from totalitarianism to democracy, from a centrally planned to a market economy, and it is therefore faced with numerous problems. Apart from the problems that are inherent in each transition period, we are faced with difficulties due to the delay in the process of privatization, increased unemployment, reduced purchasing power, the lack of adequate social protection, increased inflation, growing corruption and, last but not least, the passing of some laws which do not observe the rights of the workers such as, for instance, Ordinance No. 1 which limits wage increases without taking into account price increases.

The Report presented by the Director-General analyses the effects of unemployment in industrialized countries, developing countries and countries in the process of transition to a market economy. The Director-General has made some relevant observations concerning countries in the midst of the transition process which, if not checked, could have serious repercussions in the long term. For instance, maintaining a minimum workforce at enterprises, which may be necessitated by the slow restructuring process, keeping bankrupt enterprises open by cutting down on working time rather than on the workforce, will all have a boomerang effect once privatization has been achieved. Our opinion is that unless privatization in Romania is accompanied by a retraining programme, and consequently by the creation of new jobs, unemployment, which is now 11 per cent and 25 per cent in some regions, will not decrease but increase.

The major trade union confederations have pointed out to the Government that the privatization process and economic stimulus should be accompanied by an adequate programme of social protection and retraining for the unemployed.

As has been shown in the Report, every effort should be made to eradicate and reduce unemployment, including: domestic and foreign investment; the establishment of small and medium-sized enterprises; foreign trade development; the reorganization of the infrastructure; and the liberalization of trade. The Director-General rightly advocates a gradual approach to the liberalization of trade, privatization and the restructuring of enterprises, as all these elements influence general policies which have a direct impact on full employment.

In future, the trade unions in our country will continue to promote the speeding up of privatization, social protection for the unemployed, and eventually the elimination of unemployment which in our country has led to a decrease in the living standards of over 1,150,000 habitants.

We believe that the ILO will play a big part in this approach, especially because of its tripartite structure. The ILO has therefore the opportunity to contribute to the implementation of the Programme of Action adopted at Copenhagen with a view to finally eradicating unemployment. As you are aware, Romania has ratified 42 ILO Conventions, which in terms of other countries seems to be an average number of Convention ratifications. The labour movement in our country is discontented as, since 1989, only a few Conventions have been ratified. We would like the Government of Romania to analyse the possibility of ratifying some Conventions concerning working and living conditions, which would help to improve domestic legislation. Also, we cannot overlook the fact that some Conventions that have already been ratified are not being observed. I am referring in particular to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), non-compliance with which has led since 1984 to the engine-drivers being fired, and subsequently to Case No. 1788, which contains a complaint filed by the National Trade Union Bloc and the Free and Independent Trade Union Federation of Train Drivers of Romania, which has been discussed by the Committee on Freedom of Association. In the same vein, some strikes have been declared illegal after they have taken place.

In 1991, the Romanian Parliament adopted an Act on trade unions, which states that a trade union cannot be formed within enterprises employing fewer than 15 people. So, in the great majority of private enterprises where there are less than 15 employees, it is impossible to organize trade unions, and of course it is impossible to discuss real social protection. This is the case for over 1 million workers in private enterprises in Romania. We are waiting for the new Act on trade unions with the amendments proposed by trade union confederations to be discussed in Parliament. We believe that the ILO should pay more attention to the problems in Central and Eastern European countries. Therefore, we suggest that the ILO should consider organizing meetings of trade union leaders from Central and Eastern European countries on topics such as the trade unions' role and strategy in the period of transition, social protection and how to achieve it, for example.

Trade unions in Romania are faced with problems concerning the decline in working and living conditions, and increasing poverty of the people.

Recently, in order to become more efficient in their struggle to meet workers' grievances, the three major trade union confederations, CNSLR FRATIA, Alfa-Cartel and BNS, concluded an agreement which includes a joint action plan.

In conclusion, I would like to stress the fact that the trade unions of Romania need the support of the ILO for training, the training of instructors and experts, and so on. We need support to be able to promote social and economic development and to meet international labour standards on the welfare of workers and trade union members in our country.

We are sure that the ILO will continue to promote social justice, tripartism and international solidarity.

Mr. BOTHA (Employers' delegate, Republic of South Africa) – May I add my congratulations to the many who have congratulated Mr. Rosales Argüello as President of this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to congratulate the President, the Vice-Presidents, and most particularly yourself, Mr. Chairman, for the excellent way in which you are conducting the proceedings.

Business South Africa, the South African employers' organization, is honoured to have the opportunity to address this Conference – only the second time it has done so since its formation in April 1994 as a fully inclusive confederation of South African employers.

The establishment of Business South Africa has enabled all South African employers to participate meaningfully and effectively in national tripartite institutions, to affiliate with regional and international organizations of employers and to take up their seat in this Conference.

We hope, as South African employers, to make a significant contribution to this Conference's consideration of health and safety in the mining industry. The mining industry in our country remains not only the backbone of our economy, it is in the forefront of technological development and in particular in the development of technology to bring about improvements in health and safety in mining, which is unfortunately an inherently hazardous activity.

The Chamber of Mines, which represents virtually all of the mining employers, and is an affiliate of Business South Africa, has accepted the recent Judicial Commission finding that mining legislation in our country should be overhauled, that supervisory and enforcement mechanisms be enhanced and that education and training be specially emphasized. We agree with our Minister's statement to the Conference that a culture of occupational health and safety awareness should be created and look forward to participation in the development of international norms in this area during the course of this Conference.

These international norms, we believe, should express the combined wisdom of the Committee concerned, in the form of fundamental principles for security, safety and health in mining, but which permit sufficient flexibility to enable their ratification by all member States in which mining is conducted on any significant scale. The importance of this last point must be emphasized as there is no point in producing a document which has no practical effect.

Our presence here last year followed in the wake of a momentous resolution of what, at the time, often appeared to many observers and South Africans to be insurmountable political problems. Our first non-racial elections in 1994 and the subsequent formation of a government of national unity placed South Africa firmly on the road to the consolidation of both democracy and national reconciliation.

As we enter international markets and begin to address the imperatives of global competition, the major challenge we face is the transformation of our economy. We do so at a juncture in which the problems identified at the World Summit for Social Development, namely poverty, unemployment and social disintegration, are particularly acute in South Africa. We share with our social partners the view that none of these problems is capable of resolution without economic growth; indeed, without growth and the consequent creation of employment, the capacity even to begin to address them in any significant manner remains impaired.

We read with interest therefore the Director-General's Report in which the creation of employment is addressed. We agree with him that the key to achieving sustained growth and productive employment is the adoption of policies which respond positively to globalization and that a successful shift to a more open economy, the acceleration of exports and industrial growth will serve both directly and indirectly to boost employment.

We are concerned, however, that labour market prices should not create barriers to growth by inhibiting or retarding productive employment. Nor should the regulation of labour relations serve to directly or indirectly protect only the interests of those who comprise the elite of the employed. Rigidities which might be sought in the promotion of the interests of the employed and in defence of their conditions and security of employment may ultimately exclude from the benefits of employment those seeking entry into the labour market and those displaced by sectoral restructuring. These comments should be seen in a context of 33 per cent unemployment in South Africa.

An important component of the programme of creating productive employment is the creation of an environment in which the establishment, development and growth of small and medium-sized enterprises might be accomplished, thus establishing an entrepreneurial culture and an environment for enterprise. As an organization representing African employers, we consider this imperative to the establishment of full and equal partnership by African employers, and by Africa itself, in the world economy.

In pursuit of the policies to which I have referred, we are concerned that the process of economic liberalization on the one hand and democratization on the other be reconciled and reinforced. These are not mutually exclusive goals, they are fully integrated and interdependent objectives.

The first steps to create the necessary institutions to enable the social partners, at a national level, to define and support these policies, were taken in February this year when the National Economic Development and Labour Council was launched. While matters relating to trade policy have been the subject of fruitful discussions between the social partners, the draft Labour Relations Bill, submitted to NE-DLAC's social chamber, has tested the fragile institution of tripartism. While employers remain committed to seeking consensus on this important issue, they will not do so at the expense of the reinforcement of the barriers to growth to which I referred earlier, or to the establishment of new barriers.

Employers have endorsed free and voluntary collective bargaining as the primary means of determining terms and conditions of employment and of resolving disputes, freedom of association, the protection of employer and worker rights and the promotion of forms of cooperation between employers and employees in the workplace. We will measure new labour legislation in South Africa against the yardsticks of enhanced competitiveness, the creation of employment and respect for basic employer and worker rights.

We believe that in broad terms the draft Labour Relations Bill has the capacity to secure industrial peace and economic growth without prejudicing labour, management or the unemployed, and that balance, flexibility and equity are the keys to good labour relations. That is why the South Africa employers' negotiating team was given a mandate to support a bill which: protects freedom of association and consequently promotes voluntary collective bargaining at levels decided by the parties involved; protects legally striking workers yet allows employers to take on temporary labour to protect their companies from ruin; provides for freedom of association by allowing workers to choose for themselves whether or not they want to belong to a union yet prevent "free riders" by ensuring that non-union members will pay dues (i.e. allows agency shops); provides for the effective involvement of all employees, union and non-union members, in decision-making in the workplace.

In conclusion, the technical cooperation programme agreed between the South African social partners and the ILO last year has benefited South African employers specifically with regard to assistance with the drafting of the Bill and exposing employers' representatives to ILO expertise. We also welcome the decision to establish an ILO Office in South Africa. We are indebted to the Director-General for this support.

Original Spanish: Mr. PARRA GAONA (Workers' adviser, Paraguay) – I would like to extend my congratulations to the President on his election to chair this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to convey to the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, our thanks for his document Promoting employment.

The national workers' organizations of Paraguay – the Paraguayan Workers' Confederation (CPT), the National Confederation of Workers (CNT) as well as the United Confederation of Workers (CUT) which I represent, would like to express their satisfaction at being present in this international forum to find a way of solving the conflicts that beset our societies.

With the advent of the transition to democracy in Paraguay it must be recognized that the workers' and workers' organizations have enjoyed greater trade union freedoms. They enjoy the right to organize, to collective bargaining, both in the public and private sectors, as well as the right to strike, among other measures.

However, some groups of employers are seeking to change the labour legislation (the Labour Code), while the trade union confederations are committed to defending these rights acquired by the working class in our country.

Despite these changes the trade unions in Paraguay are still subject to all kinds of harassment. Indeed, once a trade union has been set up, the leaders of the union are immediately dismissed or threatened. In these cases, the Ministry of Justice and Labour does not have sufficient punitive force to take action against enterprises and employers.

It must be stressed that the Ministry of Justice and Labour has no difficulty in registering trade union organizations but at the same time 80 per cent of employers wish to have no unions in their enterprises at all. This backward mentality contributes to the exploitation of the workers.

Violation of the labour laws occurs daily. One example of a company where this has occurred is Eximpora where trade union leaders have received death threats. Another in Codema, where workers have been dismissed despite an agreement with the enterprise to put an end to a strike. A third example is that of the Dutch transnational Cervepar-Bengber where the collective contracts signed with the workers' union has not been respected.

The transport sector exhibits the most serious violations of labour laws. Non-compliance with labour agreements is a constant phenomenon and the employers in that sector exploit their workers pitilessly.

Union leaders are also being laid off in the Itagua oil company and the local offices of the Banco de La Nación Argentina.

When the labour courts do intervene in labour conflicts, this has been totally without effect and their procedures are extremely slow. The worker, having limited means, usually has to abandon the case.

The case of Lineas Aereas Paraguayas is a clear example of how privatization is carried out in my country. Agreements are not respected. For example, the payment of double compensation for redundancy has still not been complied with by the due date. Neither is Article 111 of the National Constitution being applied, allowing workers the option of participation in privatized enterprises.

The trade union confederations, as well as church leaders, farmers' organizations, human rights organizations, and other social sectors have denounced the prevailing corruption. Events in the Central Bank of Paraguay and their repercussions in the financial sector are but one indication of the magnitude of the problem.

Unemployment is a source of deep concern. Young women and men, having no opportunity to study either, are forced to emigrate. There are, however, great sources of wealth like the Itaipu hydroelectric dam, shared with Brazil, and Yacyretá, shared with Argentina, which await healthy and transparent investment to achieve greater employment of the workforce.

The rural sector is suffering serious setbacks due to a lack of real agrarian reform leading to better distribution of land. Eighty per cent of all land is concentrated in the hands of 1 per cent of the owners. Repressive measures have been a habitual method to clear the rural workers from lands occupied by them.

We share the views expressed by the Director-General for the application of new technologies. We have to find mechanisms that respond to this reality, respecting the workers and their families, preserving jobs, and enabling workers to share in profits.

The MERCOSUR project, to our mind, was designed with purely economic ends without taking into account social and cultural objectives, or the Recommendations and Conventions of the ILO. We therefore demand that social clauses should be included in all these agreements. We should like to point out that the Southern Cone trade union confederations are working together, to bring about industrial peace and development, improving the standard of living and quality of life of the workers.

Government, workers and employers are taking part in the tripartite negotiation. Various commissions have been set up in the fields of public transport, employment policy, MERCOSUR and social security, in the hope of overcoming labour conflicts.

In my country, the ILO has held various seminars and conferences which the workers value very much. We hope that the ILO will continue with these programmes, and that they will be further strengthened. Our wish is that this Conference should continue to support the RELASUR project.

I have exposed our situation before the workers of the world so that together we can find a way to overcome conflict. We would like to express solidarity with all workers of the planet, and our hope that the International Labour Conference will achieve its objectives.

(The Conference adjourned at 12.45 p.m.)

Nineteenth sitting

Friday, 16 June 1995, 3 p.m.

Presidents: Mr. Popescu, Ms. Engelen-Kefer

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. POPESCU) – We shall now resume the discussion on the reports of the Governing Body and of the Report of the Director-General.

Original Spanish: Ms. CANO DE JAÉN (Workers' adviser, Panama) – May I congratulate the President on behalf of the Panamanian workers for having been elected to chair this prestigious session of the ILO Conference. As a Central American, I am doubly satisfied with this election. We also greet the Director-General of the ILO, and congratulate him on his Report, aimed at finding a solution to employment. This is one of our main concerns.

We Panamanians have not escaped from the major problems affecting the developing countries such as high levels of unemployment, underemployment, self-employment and independent work, these last two being mechanisms of bare subsistence. In addition to these problems, we have the privatization of state companies, where, at best, the interests of the workers are not taken into account, nor are they involved in the negotiations.

The last Government privatized the state cement company, Bayano, which was bought by a Mexican company, and in the sale agreement, it was said that they would reserve 5 per cent of the shares to be bought by the workers, over a period of one year. But to the surprise of all the workers who had this right, they were made redundant and they were therefore not in a position, economically speaking, to acquire the shares.

The situation was aggravated by the fact that the Government neither said how many shares were available, nor made them available to the workers for purchase. And the right to these shares by the workers will expire in August this year. Some confederations are negotiating with the new Government to fulfil its obligation and to make the company do likewise. In the case of the telecommunication company, INTEL, and the electricity company, IRHE, under this new Government the workers were able to take part in the negotiations and decisions guaranteeing their interests, right from the drafting of the law up to its application.

Concerned with this issue and based on our past experience, we are trying to ensure the defence of our interests and trying to ensure, too, that public employees can join trade unions, as suggested by the ILO.

In Panama we set up the Labour Foundation, an organization made up of the employers' organizations and workers' confederations, which shows that the two most antagonistic sectors have managed to sit down together so as to find a solution to some extent to the high level of unemployment. For this purpose we are setting up the Labour Exchange, and in this we have had the permanent support and guidance of the International Labour Organization for which we are extremely grateful.

In December 1994 the workers' confederations and employers' organizations who make up the Labour Foundation, the small farmers' organizations, women's and indigenous peoples' organizations, the public and private universities and the Government and the political parties, were invited by the United Nations to consult together in search of a solution to the major problems facing the country. This exercise produced only one agreement, signed by employers, workers and the Government, supported by the Women's Forum and the small farmers' organizations. This agreement has, as its guarantors, the directors of the two universities, the United Nations, the ex-President of Colombia, Belisario Betancur, the ex-President of the United States, Jimmy Carter, and the ILO.

Thanks to this agreement, we now have a Tripartite Commission discussing an updated Labour Law, of which so far 70 articles have been approved, and progress is being made on mobility, unemployment, an unemployment fund and the protection of workers. We hope this effort will reach a successful conclusion.

The workers have tried to ensure that in each article there is respect for ILO Conventions and for those articles of the national Constitution of the Republic of Panama relating to labour and the social provisions protecting the worker. Our concern now is to make sure that the Legislative Assembly respects and adopts the consensus decision of the social partners and the Government. In adopting this position, we are showing that the Panamanian workers have understood and analysed the changes taking place in the world, such as the transformations and the reordering of the world economy.

We also understand the major challenges that these changes represent for the workers; we are not opposed to these changes, as you can see, but neither do we wish to give up the social rights gained through great sacrifice, or accept that changes should be imposed in such a way that only the workers have to tighten their belts.

We have therefore stated that it is necessary to have a platform of basic agreements that would help

Panama to adopt agreed policies to deal comprehensively with the problems of social development and those connected with the efficient integration of the country into the world economy.

We wish to go on record at this Conference before the President and the Director-General that right from the start of the negotiating and the setting up of the Labour Foundation, we have had the advice, guidance and permanent support of ILO experts, Guillermo García, Agustín Muñoz, Daniel Martínez, and at the stage in which we are now, Arturo Bronstein, who arrived at a difficult stage of negotiations and whose visit and guidance were very useful.

Original Arabic: Mr. DJEMAM (representative of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions) – In the name of Allah, the Merciful and Compassionate. I add my voice to those of previous speakers who have congratulated the President and Officers on their election. I thank the Director-General for his choice of the theme of employment promotion. This is indeed a question which arouses both interest and anxiety, particularly at this time, and whose solution requires the efforts of all the parties concerned.

The Director-General in his Report deals with a problem which has arisen from the charges occurred in recent years.

When we look at the problem of employment we have to think of the scale of the phenomenon, as well as the suffering caused by underemployment, underemployment marginalization, social exclusion and inequality in all its forms. The Director-General shares our concerns in saying any economic system must give priority to the social question, and any economic development must be accompanied by far-reaching social reforms.

We oppose the imposition on developing countries of economic systems which are not appropriate to their conditions, or to the needs of the people. We must create mechanisms for trade, which are favourable for development. We must also ensure the training of technical staff who can make known the needs of their country.

The globalization of communications has accelerated the globalization of the economy. Obstacles to development have multiplied: unemployment and other problems have led to poverty, ignorance, drug abuse and social exclusion. Among the obstacles to development we may cite foreign debt, conditionality imposed by international financial institutions, relentless restructuring, speculation against poor countries' currencies, as well as the protectionism imposed by developed countries and many of the GATT clauses as well as the WTO conditionalities, the arms trade and trade sanctions.

Hence the importance of the social clause and the role of the ILO which is the only international organization which can defend the rights of workers in international trade agreements. We all know the implications of these agreements for the fundamental rights of workers, of their families, and of society at large.

The social clause, as a part of all trade agreements, must try to ensure, at minimum, fundamental rights as enshrined in the ILO's standards, such as freedom of association, collective bargaining, the elimination of forced labour, the exploitation of children as well as equal pay for equal work. The clause should also include employment, both qualitatively and quantitatively.

International solidarity and the mobilization of human resources to help the developing countries to confront the difficulties that accompany rapid global change, are the only protection against catastrophe.

We must therefore channel financial resources to those countries that need them most, and reorientate the enormous arms expenditure to more noble objectives. We should increase technical assistance to developing countries and facilitate the transfer of modern technologies to promote health-care education, and training.

We think that the ILO has an important role to play in overcoming problems arising from the restructuring of foreign debt and in reinforcing tripartite consultations, as the basis for social dialogue at all levels.

We also believe that the ILO must follow up the Final Declaration of the Copenhagen World Social Summit as well as the ten Commitments and the Programme of Action.

The ILO will continue to be the main defender of the rights of workers who suffer injustice as a result of the globalization of the economy and trade, and it will do all in its power to prevent human beings from becoming mere commodities in international markets.

We are concerned at some proposals as a result of which the ILO could be weakened, and its capacity and resources reduced, precisely at a time when we are drawing up the important tasks which await it, and we would like to reiterate our support for the ILO.

The cooperation between the ILO and the international Confederation of Arab Workers is excellent. Last year we held a number of regional Arab seminars: these dealt with trade union rights, collective bargaining, the social clause, the globalization of the economy and its impact on workers and the problem of women at the workplace. We have had a positive joint evaluation of these activities. Nevertheless, in view of the deterioration of the social situation we are hoping to extend these activities.

One problem of concern to the workers of the Arab countries is the lack of information about this Organization's activity. Language is a major obstacle, and it is for this reason that we reiterate the need to translate ILO documents, studies and analysis into Arabic.

In conclusion I would like to add that apart from the suffering of the workers arising from the above-mentioned cause, we have to think specifically of the workers of the Arab world, who have to confront other problems due to particular political, economic and social circumstances, to the occupation of Arab territories, not to speak of violence and terrorism and the assassination of trade union leaders by extremist groups in Algeria and Egypt, all of which are added to unemployment, social anarchy and economic stagnation.

Arab and migrant workers suffer the consequences of economic sanctions. In the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya this has translated into work stoppages in factories, unemployment and declining incomes. In Iraq the consequences of economic sanctions are becoming tragic and for these reasons we call for the lifting of sanctions, and for dialogue and peaceful negotiation as the only means of settling conflicts.

Mr. SULKOWSKI (representative of the International Association of Labour Inspection) – The International Association of Labour Inspection is pleased to have the opportunity to address the plenary of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

The Association is a non-governmental international organization with consultative status with the ILO. It includes over 60 member organizations from more than 40 countries worldwide. Its mission is to promote professional understanding of all aspects of labour inspection, to provide opportunities for labour inspectors to exchange information and ideas about inspection and the implementation of health and safety and other labour protection laws, to disseminate information about these matters through its congresses, technical symposia, workshops, international enquiries and reports.

The Association is an organization providing a forum for professional discussions among labour inspectors. It is not a political body, and does not seek to interfere in the systems or methods of implementation of labour protection law by its member countries and organizations. Rather, the Association aims to provide an international network for the exchange of information about methods and techniques of inspection and other programmes for influencing and improving the conditions of people at work.

Since the Association was founded in 1974, there has been a series of three year programmes of activity. Recent examples have included symposia in: Geneva 1984, industrial robots, transfer of technology, forestry operation; Warsaw 1986, the management of health and safety by companies; Tunis 1987, labour inspection in the construction industry; Budapest 1988, labour inspection in the food industry; Vienna 1989, the use of computers in labour inspection; Barcelona 1989, health and safety on large construction sites; Geneva 1990, increasing the effectiveness of labour inspection in the 1990s; Wiesbaden 1991, labour inspection and hazardous substances; Albufeira 1993, labour inspection and small enterprises; Geneva 1993, labour inspection and the public services; and Tunis 1994, labour inspection strategies for vulnerable groups.

The next technical symposium is to be held in London from 6 to 8 November 1995. It will be on the subject of inspection for health, that is to say how risks to workers' health can be best tackled by labour inspectors. The symposium will hear views from many international experts on five important areas of interest to inspectors: how health risks can be identified for inspectors; what sort of information do inspectors need about health risks; different approaches to health inspection; inspection techniques that work; and future needs and opportunities for improving health at work.

The Association is already planning its Congress in Geneva in 1996 on "the changing world of work and the preventive role of labour inspectors" with two sub-themes: labour protection management, and exercising judgment in labour inspection. There will also be a technical symposium in Warsaw in 1997 on the subject of "modern management information systems for labour inspection".

We are glad to have the helpful collaboration of the ILO in these events, and we hope that many countries here today who are not members of the Association will be interested in attending the symposium in London in November 1995 and hopefully will want to join the Association so that they can enjoy the benefits of being part of an international network dedicated to the profession of labour inspection. There is information available about the November conference in London, about our International Association, about the report of the 1994 symposium in Tunis, and also on the workshop on the risk assessment for labour inspectors in Wiesbaden in 1994.

The Association is not part of the ILO nor is it formally associated with the ILO, but we have a long tradition of working together both through formal cooperation and informally on matters concerning the improvement of labour inspection, as we are the only independent international professional organization with wide knowledge in this field to whom the ILO can turn for information. We look forward to successful future collaboration with the ILO on practical projects concerning labour inspection.

The proposed extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) to activities in the non-commercial services sector, which is being discussed in this session of the International Labour Conference, is naturally of great interest to us. We will do our best in our observer capacity as a non-governmental organization to contribute positively to the debates, supporting any outcome which would improve conditions for people working in this section.

Original German: Ms. ENGELLEN-KEFER (Workers' delegate, Germany) – The world economy is growing but this is not of much use to those who are unemployed and poor. Quite the contrary, the social tensions and divisions between continents and countries – but also within nations – are increasing all the time.

In the OECD alone 34 million people are registered as unemployed. At least a further 12 million are demoralized and looking for work.

In Germany, one of the richest countries of the world, poverty has reached new record levels. Mass unemployment, it seems has become a normal state of affairs. It has become a constant companion of a streamlined economy which needs fewer and fewer people, not only for production but also for commercial services.

A never-ending series of currency crises and ruinously high interest rates have had disastrous consequences for jobs in certain sectors and regions. Unemployment is a waste of human skills and resources and it is the greatest threat to democracy.

At international conferences, such as this one, or summits, such as the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen, voices are constantly raised to discuss the international interdependence of the world's economy.

The securing and creation of jobs and the effective fight against unemployment are declared to be the highest priorities on the political agenda. And if we are to believe the international documents, we all seem to agree on the objectives we should try to attain.

But as long as in real life, we do not score any successes, these statements must seem increasingly hollow to the people concerned. Many of us are already resigned to the situation, have got used to unemployment or even lost any real will to fight it.

In fact the world would be one step closer to full employment if even only a few of the aims of the ILO were really tackled in a decisive manner.

I cannot help but feel also that those who procrastinate in this Organization seem to gain influence when there is a discussion on practical measures to combat unemployment.

It is therefore most welcoming that the Governments who were party to the Declaration adopted at Copenhagen undertook to promote: "the goal of full employment as a basic priority of ... economic and social policies". But these words must remain a mere declaration of intent; they must be translated into specific policies.

I would like to give the Director-General my express support in his efforts to elaborate specific proposals for action following on from the 1969 World Employment Programme. The most important lesson should be that the serious social problems cannot be solved – or only with great difficulty – if there is no economic growth. But economic growth is not an automatic guarantee for the realization of social aims.

In the past few decades, the blessings of growth have only trickled down very slowly to the poorest of the poor. In many cases there has been a further exacerbation of the differences. And simplistic solutions put forward by neo-liberals merely accentuate the social divisions. Reducing wages and cutting into the social welfare system are not solutions. Deregulation, that magic word – meaning the reduction of labour and social protection – does not in any way boost competitiveness and employment; all too soon, it sets in motion an international spiral effect with negative repercussions for everyone. From the ILO, we are expecting a commitment from Governments, employers and workers to overcome the social divide between the poor and the rich in all parts of the world – regardless of whether they are in the West or the East, the North or the South of our earth. Only then can the aspirations of people for a lasting peace be fulfilled.

This task must primarily lie with the industrialized countries, who hold more than 70 per cent of the world GNP in their hands.

The increasing globalization of markets, the internationalization of products, services and capital flows on to deregulated financial markets, as well as the increasing destruction of the environment, are all creating new challenges for policy-makers.

The highest priority is for the industrialized and developing countries to adopt joint growth and investment policies to create and secure jobs and social security. The social partners must be included in this process. There is a strong need for more work, and for this we must change our approach so that we strive for a more humane concept of work, for protection of the environment and for the establishment and modernization of infrastructures and services. Investment in people is certainly the most productive. It is also important to harness the creativity of people by motivating them in their work and providing them with better working conditions.

The Commission of the European Union is urging its member States to halve the number of unemployed people by the year 2000 – it has to set a goal, because without a goal there is no way forward.

The German trade unions support this goal. Indeed, they propose a five-step strategy, in which they advocate: a forward thrust in economic policy; a drive for innovation, accompanied by ecologically sound industrial and regional policies; active strategies for education and training as well as skilling of the workforce; more choice for workers in organizing their time and a fairer distribution of work; support for the labour market and extension of labour market policies.

At the same time a new solidarity has to be built up between industrial and developing countries. Global changes clearly show that we share a common destiny, not least through currency crises, environmental and natural disasters. Re-establishing solidarity is not an act of charity – but a prerequisite for our common survival.

Currency speculation is increasingly seen to be the major weakness of our world economic system. With huge turnovers, the speculators swing the world economy from one crisis into another, from which they can make lucrative profits. Urgent attention must be given to an international tax on currency deals. The renewed debt crisis of the developing countries is not an isolated problem. New efforts have to be made to cancel the debt of developing countries – and this includes their debts with international financial institutions.

At the same time a concerted action has to be taken by the developing countries to examine their fiscal and taxation policies. Not only the ILO but also the IMF and the World Bank have to find a way of tying their assistance to the rules of democracy and the observation of human rights. They must also include the social partners in the formulation and implementation of national economic programmes – and the ILO must have the right to veto structural adjustment measures if these violate core labour standards.

The IMF must also be at the centre of efforts to return to a system of stable exchange rates. International trade must not be based on unfair and unsocial practices and carried out at the expense of basic human and trade union rights; this cannot be tolerated.

The trade union call for a social clause does not imply a discrimination against developing countries and a form of protectionism for industrialized countries. Rather it would serve as a protection against violations of human rights throughout the world.

It might also be envisaged to set up an international social fund. Furthermore, sanctions could be applied in the case of serious trade violations.

Finally, we must double our efforts to emerge from the present economic and social crisis.

Original Arabic: Mr. DEMNATI (Minister of Employment and Social Affairs, Morocco) – First of all may I congratulate the President on his election to lead the work of this session. His great experience and acumen are the best guarantees of the success of our Conference. I also extend my congratulations to the other Officers.

There is no doubt that employment is the essential issue requiring the in-depth reflection and discussion of this session of our Conference. The Director-General quite expertly and objectively reflected the importance of this theme in his Report to the Conference. The main characteristic of this problem is that it is global; it affects all regions of the developed and developing world. This feature is in itself a major challenge. Indeed, we must cooperate at all levels to find appropriate solutions. If we do not, we will lose a major part of human resources which should normally work to the benefit of the economies of countries suffering from an unemployment crisis.

We therefore express the hope that our Conference will not simply produce a declaration of intent at a time when millions of people are hoping for effective solutions and programmes of action that will put an end to their daily suffering.

On this point, I would like to congratulate the Director-General on his approach, which is aimed at strengthening international cooperation in the areas of finance and economic management. We believe that it is time to re-think the cooperation and coordination between the ILO, the World Trade Organization and the international financial institutions so as to find solutions to the problems on our agenda.

International cooperation in the economic and financial fields should not be restricted simply to providing limited and conditional aid and assistance which are dependent on temporary economic considerations, but should go beyond this and represent a real partnership to eliminate the obstacles blocking efforts to promote employment nationally and internationally.

We believe that cooperation efforts should concentrate on the main problems which cannot be solved by national policies alone, particularly in a world which, thanks to globalization, has become increasingly interdependent. It is impossible for countries to master their national policies without a healthy international environment in which there are the necessary conditions for growth and complementarity among countries.

On the occasion of the conclusion in Marrakesh of the Uruguay Round agreements, His Majesty the King of Morocco proposed an examination of the consistency of trade policies, so as to alleviate the negative effects of the liberalization of world trade. A working group was set up for this purpose in the WTO. We hope that the ILO will think of a similar formula, in line with its Constitution and its objectives, so as to examine the possibility of making the monetary, financial and trade policies of the world more consistent in order that they may serve to promote employment and eradicate poverty and exclusion. This has become the overriding priority of the international community in the light of the commitments made by the Heads of State and government in Copenhagen.

Among the most negative elements affecting the economic and social situation, and thus employment promotion efforts, is the drop in foreign demand resulting from increasingly protectionist policies and the use of more technical barriers to trade. In addition there have been extreme fluctuations of exchange rates, and these have had an impact on the flow of productive investments. The weight of foreign debt worsens the situation and makes the developing countries net exporters of capital.

The ILO, with its Constitution and the objectives it has pursued for 75 years, has a major role to play in assisting the developing countries as regards employment. It can make use of its technical cooperation programme, which requires resources commensurate with the aspirations and needs of these countries. While we know that resources are limited and that the Director-General has made a great effort to present us with a zero-real-growth budget as recommended by the Governing Body, we hope that all member States will pay their contributions so as to enable the ILO to continue to carry out its programmes normally.

Morocco has since independence followed an economic policy of openness to the world economy. It has adopted adjustment programmes that have enabled it to be solvent vis-à-vis the international financial institutions, to restore a balance of payments both internally and externally, to cope with inflation and to have a reasonable growth rate that should have an impact on employment and serve to improve the life of its citizens.

The efforts of the Government are now concentrating on the completion of structural and administrative reforms to create an environment favourable to an increase in productive investments. Priority has been given to reforming the investment system to create a climate of incentive and to strengthen existing privileges and simplify most administrative procedures involved in carrying out projects.

Together with the revision of the financing policy, a privatization programme is being carried out to promote savings and investment among the public.

My country has also taken several measures to liberalize foreign trade and prices, with a view to permitting enterprises to adapt to the competition and variations of a global economy.

At the same time, the banking system has been reformed to facilitate exchange operations and to gradually reduce the tax burden on companies.

Other direct measures have been taken to promote the employment policy. The public and private sectors both play a very important role in this policy. The establishment of the National Council for Youth and for the Future, which is tripartite, should make it possible to find ways to increase employment levels, especially among young people.

Efforts are continuing to reduce unemployment among young graduates both by assisting young industrialists through such measures as tax breaks and project financing and by providing incentives for companies which take part in training and integration programmes. These programmes are part of a partnership between the public and private sectors to promote employment. Other social measures have also been taken to promote the role of intermediaries on the labour market who bring together job-seekers and potential employers.

The development of human resources is one of the priorities of the Government. It has devoted the greater part of the state budget to education and training.

Morocco's employment policy is inspired by the principles contained in ILO Convention No. 122, which encourages States to make use of all economic, financial and trade factors to set up programmes to meet the needs of jobseekers.

We believe that the ratification by all countries of this Convention would strengthen the commitments of States to adopt national policies to promote employment. However, national commitments can only have a limited impact if there are no collective commitments by all member States of the Organization to achieve better coordination and limit the effects of unemployment, poverty and exclusion.

We hope that our Conference can reach a formula that can give concrete expression to these commitments; that can define the responsibilities of the developed and developing States and establish supervisory machinery with a deterrent effect to ensure that the moral obligation to fulfil these commitments is respected in practice.

Original French: Mr. DIOP (Workers delegate, Senegal) – Allow me on behalf of the workers of Senegal to extend to the President and to the Officers of the Conference of this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference our heartiest congratulations on their election. We hope that they will make every effort skilfully and forcefully to guide our discussions so that effective and innovative decisions may be taken, the implementation of which will help us to promote employment and eradicate poverty.

I would like to take this opportunity also to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for the very well-chosen theme of his Report and his pertinent analysis of the globalization of the economy and its consequences for employment and poverty.

Could he have chosen any other topic, given the state of the world which is now characterized by a lack of jobs, unemployment, poverty and its corollary, exclusion, which is now such a widespread phenomenon in industrialized countries?

So irreversible is the globalization of the economy that no one can today claim to be able to find unilateral solutions to the problems it causes. Either we create employment by drastically reducing individual incomes but increase the number of poorly paid jobs and increase poverty, or else we create jobs in the state sector to ensure employment for all in relatively satisfactory conditions but put a strain on state financing and thus increase budget deficits, we can maintain a certain wage level and provide social security benefits. We cannot create jobs in fact, worse than that, we are doing away with them and prompting further exclusion.

This all goes to show that effective international solidarity, free of the hypocrisy which poisoned relations between States in the past, can solve, once and for all, the painful problem of poverty and unemployment.

The solution to unemployment and poverty does not lie in marginalization or in a world dominated from East to West, from North to South by an unscrupulous financial oligarchy which is more interested in monetary speculation in a bid to further enrich itself than improving the living conditions of the workers. Nor is the solution to be found in xenophobic protectionism which is very often encouraged at the highest level by people in political life whose sole concern is their careers.

Africa, is today, a victim of all of these injustices, and sub-Saharan Africa even more so. There is no doubt that a large share of responsibility for this situation lies with African governments due to their repeated failures in any move towards united action and integration. However, the considerable wealth of this continent does not correspond in any way to Africa's position in world trade.

Despite the structural adjustment programmes thrust upon it, Africa receives very little capital. The Director-General in his Report said that "Clearly, there is more involved in attracting FDI than opening up to foreign trade and investment".

So, what extra should be done? Having imposed all sorts of adjustment policies, devaluation, the review of social legislation, privatization, the reduction of the budget deficit, at the risk of losing such basic rights as the right to education and health, what are we now being asked to do?

For several years, just using my country, Senegal, as an example, we have been in the clutches of the IMF and the World Bank which imposed stringent structural adjustment programmes on us which have put thousands of workers out on the street and forced the State to pull out of such vital sectors as agriculture. This has led to an unprecedented rural exodus and has completely disrupted education and health systems.

In August 1993, a domestic adjustment programme caused the Government to impose wage reductions combined with a tax hike.

In January 1994, the 50 per cent devaluation in the CFA franc doubled outstanding debt and debt servicing costs, halved household purchasing power and forced enterprises to restructure, putting thousands out of work.

In 1995, the provisions of article 47 of the Labour Code concerning the authorization of dismissals were revised.

Large-scale privatizations have already begun, starting with the National Water Commission (SONEES) and soon to be followed by electricity and telecommunications.

Urban workers are increasing by the prey of unemployment and the exodus of rural workers to the towns swells their ranks. Young people completing their education in secondary, tertiary, technical or professional institutions just add to the numbers.

The information technology revolution the Director-General speaks of so positively has not created the hoped for number of jobs. Unemployment is clearly apparent in this sector as it is elsewhere.

In Senegal, it has been clearly demonstrated that the revision of article 47 of the Labour Code has not produced the expected investment results. Workers are subject to the merciless forces of the free market since liberalization erodes, and even eliminates household purchasing power.

Yet, for all this, investors have still not come forward.

The Director General's Report tells us that job creation is only 2 per cent in developing countries. Spiralling living costs due to commodity price increases have plunged the country into a vicious cycle of impoverishment.

Poverty has become endemic in the less well-off sectors of society and is progressively gaining ground among medium-income workers. The speed of economic change, together with rising unemployment and inflation have seriously hampered social security programmes.

Benefit and pension payments, which were already hardly sufficient, have now plunged even further due to unbearable inflation levels.

Economic changes have profoundly altered social structures and therefore social peace. Social security cannot be reduced to a simple accompanying role.

International inequality is a reality already firmly anchored in international relations. Capital in the hands of the most privileged in the financial hierarchy is increasingly attracted to countries where profits are sufficiently easy and high for speculation. We must, however, go beyond pious rhetoric. Our countries' collapsing economies cannot and will not be to the advantage of any continent or group of countries. What must be achieved is real international solidarity that respects individual features together with international Conventions so that competition is healthier and fairer and speculation gives way to investment in agricultural and industrial development. The social clause – as it has been conceived – is an important step towards this solidarity.

Over the last decade, my organization, the CNTS, has tried to develop a participatory employment-reduction strategy made up of two thrusts, the first was the creation of workers' cooperatives to produce bread from local millet and imported wheat. This project, which received ILO support, gave good results and reduced wheat imports, saved foreign currency, and cut back our balance of trade deficit. It was a major new development in the consumption of local products. The second was to give a boost to a number of enterprises in difficulties. This also entailed support for river valley rural workers' and private sector workers' organizations.

Finally we used cooperation resources to help finance 68 projects for industrial and agricultural workers hit by the situation since it is becoming increasingly clear that the struggle for employment is turning into a struggle for existence: nobody wants to lie in bed dying of hunger.

We wholeheartedly subscribe to and support the Director-General's idea of strengthening international cooperation – the solidarity which is now the only alternative solution for our unemployment and social protection problems. Our institution must safeguard the basics of what has been achieved to date and which feeds the vital humours of international interdependence.

Mr. CALAMATTA (Workers' delegate, Malta) – Before I start my rather short speech dealing with the social problem of unemployment, I want first of all to join all the speakers who have taken the floor before me in congratulating the President on having been elected to chair this session of the International Labour Organization Conference. I am confident that his ability and experience will serve to guide each one of us here in making this world forum for discussion of labour and social questions a very fruitful one.

I want also, on behalf of the working population of my country, Malta, and on behalf of the Maltese General Workers' Union and the other Maltese trade unions, to convey to all national delegations at this conference our fondest greetings and our best wishes for a brighter future.

May all of us gathered here today find enough strength and courage to strive harder and achieve our goal of making the world a better place in live in.

This year brought the retirement on grounds of age of my colleague, Mr. Salvino Spiteri, from the trade union scene in Malta after presiding for at least two decades over the Confederation of Malta Trade Unions.

Mr. Spiteri had been coming to this Conference year after year without fail and had contributed with zeal to each and every Conference committee he participated in. His contributions within the ILO fora were always valid and aimed at enhancing economic and social justice.

Therefore please permit me to say from this rostrum that I wish Mr. Spiteri a long and happy retirement.

Allow me also to state that his retirement is surely sad news for this Conference and, even more, an irreplaceable loss for trade unionism in my country. But I am sure that he leaves behind him a legacy that will enrich trade unionism in Malta for many years to come.

The Director-General of the ILO was right to put before us a massive challenge by choosing the promotion of employment as the main theme for discussion at this Conference. Quite rightly, he asserted in his Report that the creation of sufficient new jobs to ease the worldwide unemployment problem is indeed a hard task to accomplish.

And for my part I venture to add that it is an even harder task to find new solutions and new ways forward; a new economic and social strategy for ridding us once and for all of the worldwide scourge of unemployment is beyond our horizon. Therefore, we cannot let ourselves be illusioned – what may seem simple in concept might be complex in implementation.

High levels of unemployment spawn a host of socio-economic problems and, in contrast, a high and stable rate of productive job creation is the mainspring of equitable economic and social development.

Against this background, each and every country represented in this forum is duty bound to strive harder and step up all measures to promote national and international action for diminishing the wave of job losses we have been facing since the beginning of this decade.

If we take a brief look at the European Union, we find that, for the past four and a half years, unemployment has been climbing fast, wiping out virtually all the 10 million jobs created in the late 1980s. This has proved a disappointment, even a disillusionment, on a massive scale.

Consequently, in its Report for 1994 the European Commission concluded that while output is recovering and the increase in unemployment seems to have come to an end, these favourable developments do not signify that the problem of excessive levels of unemployment is about to be resolved.

Still less, generating enough jobs to employ all those who wish to work – whether recorded as unemployed or not – is a thing of the past for most countries.

Despite the short-term improvement in economic fortunes, unemployment remains the major economic problem facing the European Union – both now and for the rest of the decade as the prospects for the long term are highly uncertain.

It is our duty to galvanize ourselves into action. But certain countries are, very unfortunately, not concerned with creating new jobs. It seems that fighting ethnic wars and resolving conflicts at gun point is for some even more important than forging a new world economic order that can provide new structures and offer new opportunities to create new jobs. We are witnessing today the unveiling of scenarios that hold in utmost contempt and are an affront to civilized humanity.

Allow me to ask: is not the contemporary era a chapter of malevolence and destruction? Are we not today the witnesses of enormous suffering, enormous hunger and enormous massacres and bloodshed? Is there anyone who can deny that this is today's reality?

We will be distorting our own history if we make believe that armed conflicts are the only cause of so much misery and deprivation. And I emphasize that unemployment could equally be a cause of misery, poverty and the degradation of living standards that are, moreover, falling far below levels considered decent.

And again I ask: does not everyone have a fundamental human right to have the means to raise living standards? It is here that the ILO is unique. The ILO was established 76 years ago to advance the cause of social justice and, in so doing, contribute to the establishment of lasting universal peace.

Allow me now to turn my attention to the employment situation in my country, Malta, where unemployment stands at around 4 per cent of the labour supply. Measured by international standards, a 4 per cent unemployment level is nothing less than full employment.

But in reality, the employment situation in Malta is not that good, and this for two main reasons: first, more than 1.15 per cent of the gainfully occupied population are in temporary employment; and second, the number of jobless persons over 49 years is increasing while, at the same time, long-term unemployment (those registering as jobless for more than 48 weeks) is becoming more widespread and affecting not only those over 49 years of age but also younger persons – most of whom are, unfortunately, unskilled.

This means that in Malta we have significant unemployment because, for example, and only naturally, employers give preference to younger and more adaptable persons who are easy to train in the new skills and technology that industry requires today.

Therefore, we have to be very cautious and not get carried away by a mirage deceiving us with an illusively bright employment situation when in fact this is not at all so in reality.

For example, what about the short-term trend in the creation of new jobs? We can get an idea of this from the latest half-yearly survey carried out by the Malta Federation of Industry which has found the trend in the provision of additional new jobs to be less positive than six months before.

For example, 36 per cent of the industries surveyed forecast an increase in jobs while 16 per cent envisaged a decrease. This results in an overall balance of a positive 20 percentage points. The forecast for the previous six months stood at plus 32 percentage points; this therefore indicates a negative 12 percentage point movement in the trend.

At last year's session of this Conference, I was very optimistic and expressed satisfaction that, at last, the Maltese Government had recognized the dire need to carry out a general overhaul of the Conditions of Employment (Regulation) Act (CERA).

This piece of important legislation was enacted 43 years ago and, in many of its provisions, it is today outdated and does not match – if at all – today's working environment and modern concepts.

The optimism I expressed last year is today my greatest disappointment because the Government seems to be ignoring its duty to consult the workers' unions and the employers' associations on the changes it is to propose in Parliament to align CERA with today's needs.

If ever there was the need of a tripartite dialogue, that need is on CERA – which is a legal tool used almost daily by trade unionists in the exercise of their work.

So I appeal to the Maltese Government to enter into a meaningful and positive dialogue with the social partners because this is the only way to ensure creation of a new CERA which would be really conducive to today's work environment and which would contribute positively to safeguarding the rights and interests of working men and women in Malta.

(Ms. Engelen-Kefer takes the Chair.)

Mr. LODRINI (Government delegate, Dominica) – On behalf of the Government of Dominica, I would like to express my congratulations to President Rosales Argüello, Minister of Nicaragua, on his election as President of this session of the International Labour Conference.

My congratulations also to the Director-General of the ILO for his thought-provoking Report entitled Promoting employment which seeks to focus the debates of this assembly and which could be considered as a follow-up to the conclusions reached at the recent World Summit for Social Development.

The Report provides a detailed analysis of the current problems being experienced by countries in the field of employment and addresses the question of how to promote employment.

Unemployment is the central economic and social problem of developing countries. Many of them are experiencing poverty and structural adjustment problems. As the Director-General's Report points out, high unemployment means exclusion and the danger of a breakdown in society. Developing countries, he rightly points out, face the major challenge of employment creation. The Report proposes as a solution to reducing unemployment, underemployment and poverty, the need to adopt policies that respond positively to globalization by shifting to an open economy and the acceleration of industrial growth and exports.

Despite global economic progress in recent times, there is still a prevalence of problems of unemployment, underemployment, widespread inequality and persistent poverty. The effects of the recession in the 1980s, the debt burden of developing countries, structural programmes and dwindling international technical cooperation assistance means that the developing countries are set to face the next decade at a severe disadvantage in the face of the increasing globalization of the world economy and the liberalization of trade which should normally carry dividends.

There must be a commitment to the lowering of unemployment, and the creation of new jobs, as persistent joblessness and low and declining incomes threaten the social fabric of all societies.

The creation and sustaining of productive employment are crucial and are within the mandate of the ILO.

The ILO must respond to the needs of developing countries by directing its technical cooperation to helping countries find solutions to their unemployment problems. It must formulate specific and effective measures directly related and relevant to combating unemployment.

In a country like mine with 14 per cent unemployment, we are intrigued by your proposals for creating new jobs, and the creation of a climate conducive to attracting and retaining domestic and foreign investment of course. We would therefore make a plea for technical and financial support to assist us with our investment programme in order to enable us to achieve the goals of the World Summit for Social Development and indeed those identified in the Director-General's Report.

My country therefore considers it very important that the ILO's assistance should be targeted to assisting developing countries in developing their capacities in certain sectors which are known to generate employment. In the case of my country, the tourism sector covering hotels, restaurants, catering, etc., is one of the economic sectors which require such urgent assistance. Immediate technical assistance is required in this field to encourage enterprise creation and training for the tourist industry since these would significantly contribute to employment creation in the country.

My country would certainly be interested in considering the ratification of the Working Conditions (Hotels and Restaurants) Convention, 1991 (No. 172), but before it is able to do this it will require assistance to ensure that it would be able to comply with the provisions set out in the Convention. We would undoubtedly need the ILO's assistance to enable us to be able to meet the requirements of that instrument.

The role of tourism in employment creation for many developing countries cannot be underestimated. Assistance directed at feasibility studies, training and other forms of assistance which would enable countries to develop basic capacities along with the necessary basic structures, would directly assist them in their own bid for economic and social development, and would directly tackle the employment problem.

Countries like mine look to the ILO to help them develop comprehensive strategies and programmes which take account of national conditions so that specific and effective measures are developed and implemented, which will ensure that social justice is effectively promoted and that the quality of life for all people is improved and the stability and development of all nations assured.

Mr. EDSTRÖM (Workers' delegate, Sweden) – First may I congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents upon their election. I would also like to congratulate the Director-General for his Report, Promoting employment. The fight against unemployment ought to be the top priority for governments all over the world, and we appreciate the efforts made by the ILO in this respect.

It is an excellent Report that describes the process of globalization of the economies and shows the magnitude of the unemployment problem most countries face today. We have to realize that a single country to a large extent is dependent upon what kind of economic policies other countries are pursuing, which of course makes it necessary to agree on joint solutions if we are ever to be able to tackle the problem of mass unemployment. As the Report rightly states, by cooperative international action we will be able to create positive-sum policies which benefit us all. Without a coordinated demand-led economic recovery policy, supportive of fulfilling people's basic needs and utilizing the human resources available, social tensions and disparities will continue to grow in our societies.

Swedish trade unions have always emphasized the virtue of keeping full employment as the top priority. We are pleased to note the strong advocacy of the Director-General on this basic point, hopefully convincing some governments to reconsider their present static economic policies.

We fully agree with the Director-General on the need to take joint action internationally to limit the negative effects of the unrestricted freedom of capital movement, now being exploited by currency speculators. Workers in my own country are among those severely hit, with deteriorated social security systems as a result. In the long run people's confidence in our parliamentary political system is at risk, unless measures are taken.

The Report convincingly shows the weakness in the argumentation for labour market deregulation. Employers and some governments claim that labour market regulations constitute rigidities of such gravity that it hampers employment. Enough to say that such claims are not based on empirical evidence, but are put forward for ideological reasons. It would be much more fruitful to engage in a dialogue on "positive flexibility", emphasizing active labour market policies, including training, and taking into account the positive contribution by the workers and their trade unions through their active involvement.

In the Report attention is given to the need to lower interest rates, but from a European perspective this should be stressed even more because of its effects: the private demand for consumption and investments will grow, leading to economic growth and reduced unemployment; as a result, public finances will improve due to increased tax revenues, lower expenditures on unemployment and lower interest on debts; the higher European demand will at the same time increase imports from countries worldwide, creating a more balanced growth in world trade.

There are, however, some points where we disagree on what is stated in the Report. This concerns first of all what is described as the Scandinavian model. Here it says that full employment is guaranteed by job creation in the public sector, with inherent risks of causing high inflation and public deficits. But as long as the Scandinavian countries in reality have upheld full employment as the main goal, they also have had strong public finances. There is a close relationship between high unemployment and public sector deficits, mainly due to the visible and hidden costs of unemployment. Inadequate internal demand results in job losses, further increasing the burden of costs for unemployment on public finances.

We regret that the Report does not give a more in-depth analysis of the negative effects that globalization will have on labour standards unless international action is taken. It is precisely because of this threat that we strongly support a social clause. We want the social clause, not for protectionist purposes – but instead to ensure that basic human rights in the field of labour are respected everywhere. To accomplish this we need economic incentives not to exploit human beings! In the long run, it is the only way to guarantee that protectionism will not be relaunched by unilateral measures.

We are also a bit worried when the Report proposes the removal of administrative and other obstacles to the growth of the informal sector. What happens with labour standards? By definition the informal sector is a sector where normal working conditions are not being upheld and where basic ILO Conventions cannot be guaranteed – labour standards which the ILO must promote in all cases.

Finally, I am sorry to have to inform this Labour Conference that two days ago our Parliament took a decision whose effect is the continued violation of the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121) [Schedule I amended in 1980]. We regret the fact that our Government fails to respect the decision of the Governing Body in this case, dealt with in November 1993. This decision by the Swedish Parliament will add to the list of countries not respecting their voluntary commitments made to this Organization.

Mr. AAGAARD JAKOBSEN (Workers' delegate, Brazil) – Greetings to the participants in the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. We are gratified by the content of the Director-General's Report because of its concern about employment and its contribution to the World Summit for Social Development. We also congratulate the President of this session on his election.

We had the opportunity to participate in the delegation of the ICFTU to the Summit, which we believe to have been a first and important step, although its resolutions were unable to address the gravity of the social situation of humanity today.

The current period is one in which economic growth, arising from adjustment policies and the globalization process, has not contributed to social development. On the contrary, a strong concentration of income, reduction in employment, destabilization of jobs, flexibilization of rights and social exclusion are the rule. All of this occurs in the name of competitiveness, that takes a form that casts labour relations back to the last century.

The Report shows very clearly that there is no relationship between reducing labour costs – with flexibilization of salaries and rights – and job creation. On the contrary, such tactics have increased international financial speculation, reinforcing certain models of economic adjustment based on the attraction of speculative capital, as in Mexico and other Latin American countries. The statement by Michel Camdessus, Managing Director of the IMF, indicating that there are at least ten situations that are potentially like that of Mexico, is a great concern. We all know that sufficient resources do not exist to deal with this.

Therefore, we need to change the adjustment policies, putting social development on the same level of priority as economic development. This implies promoting reforms in the United Nations and multilateral agencies like the IMF, the World Bank and the WTO.

Adjustment models cannot be imposed that have already proven failures in various ways and that have even led to authoritarian practices that restrict international labour rights, as was recently witnessed in Bolivia, where a state of siege was declared and 400 trade union leaders were imprisoned. Demands for freedom of association and collective bargaining in Korea were responded to with the imprisonment of hundreds of trade unionists.

The present Brazilian Government is also showing intolerance in its treatment of labour conflicts during the recent oil workers' strike for compliance with an agreement; it refused to negotiate, sacking 73 union leaders and activists and sending in the army to occupy four refineries. This situation was the object of a denouncement to the ILO for non-compliance with the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and for not respecting the right to strike.

Thus, the ILO's role in the defence of labour rights, ethics and democracy must be reinforced.

The World Summit for Social Development, held in Copenhagen, was unfortunately unable to build a consensus on changes in adjustment policies necessary to finance social development, such as the Tobin tax and the 20-20 formula. Nor did it give a clear definition of a policy to create more and better jobs. It is important to continue what was begun in Copenhagen and the ILO has already shown its capacity to contribute.

On the employment issue, we would like to repeat some proposals already presented on other occasions: (1) We reaffirm tripartism as an alternative to authoritarian practices in labour relations and in the search for national economic, social and job-creation policies. (2) Policies must allocate investments to productive activities that create more jobs even after restructuring, as well as to housing and basic sanitation. (3) Reduction of working hours and elimination of overtime should be part of labour contract negotiations. (4) Land reform in the developing countries has considerable job-creation potential. For example, in Brazil there are 4 million landless peasants. (5) The abolition of child labour, an ethical and humanitarian issue, also has considerable job-creation potential. In Brazil there are at least 2 million children aged under 14 working and taking the jobs of adults.

As for the quality of jobs, we believe it is fundamental to eliminate any kind of forced labour, combat gender and race discrimination in the labour market and establish policies to combat informal labour relations. Special concern about establishing health and safety standards at the workplace is necessary.

The labour world's far-reaching technological changes mean more and more is expected of qualified workers. Good vocational and general education is also important for the exercise of civil rights. Governments should invest substantially in education.

Finally, we would like to express our wishes with regard to international trade and economic integration agreements. These must be reached democratically, with the involvement of the various social partners. Funds should be created to finance the resulting industrial restructuring and workers' basic rights should be an inherent part of the agreements.

We are in favour of including social clauses in trade agreements that, as a last resort, after investigation and attempts at solution, provide for the application of sanctions in the event of disrespect for basic ILO standards. It is unacceptable that countries or economic sectors that improve competitiveness through social dumping, should maintain the same trade advantages as others which respect human and trade union rights.

I dedicate this intervention to Iqbal Masih, a Pakistani of 12 years of age, murdered because of his actions against child labour. Let this boy be the symbol of the democratic struggle against this kind of exploitation.

Ms. FOULKES (Workers' delegate, New Zealand) – First I would like to congratulate the Officers of the Conference on their election and wish them well during the course of their office.

I would principally like to congratulate the Director-General on the excellence of his Report to this Conference. The Report is excellent both in terms of identifying employment promotion as the priority for national and international action, and in its technical treatment of both the problem and possible solutions to it.

I sincerely hope that it will inform those who frame macroeconomic and labour market labour policies in my own country.

There are three aspects of the Report that I would like to comment on during my presentation.

The first is the matter of labour market deregulation and the decentralization of industrial relations systems; the second is the matter of the quality of employment, and the last the question of labour standards.

Many delegates to this Conference will be aware that in recent years at least New Zealand has become something of a social and economic laboratory, implementing an almost pure version of neo-liberal policies in most aspects of economic life.

In the labour market, deregulation has gone as far as almost anywhere in the world, and has, even removed any provision for or prescription of the role of trade unions from the law. Collective organizations of workers exist in spite of, not because of, the law in New Zealand.

Our experiment stands in direct defiance of, and is a philosophical and practical rejection of, the notions of tripartism and social partnership. It is our firm belief that although that experiment is relatively young, experiences from it confirm everything that the Director-General's Report says about the limits of deregulation as a panacea for employment growth.

It is true that the economy has been expanding for nearly four years now, and it is true that employment has increased and unemployment declined during that period.

But economists are divided on what caused the expansion. Some cite external factors – lower international interest rates, falling oil prices and unusually good terms of trade – as being of prime importance. Others identify the maturation of horticultural and forestry investments undertaken more than a decade ago as primary determinants for the growth. An additional school of thought says that the growth is largely arithmetic, it simply reflects that the economy has returned to its long-term growth path from an incredibly long six-year stagnation that was brought about by economic restructuring.

The Council of Trade Unions lays a lot of importance on the stimulation given by an easing of monetary policy coinciding with improved terms of trade and an expansion of trade that resulted from the final stages of the creation of a common market with Australia. In this last respect, I would suggest that the positive features of the New Zealand experience confirm the validity of the macroeconomic policy prescriptions that the Director-General recommends.

The Government, of course says that a lot of the credit for the expansion lies with the deregulation of the labour market, and it is here the validity of World Employment 1995 comes under the spotlight.

I would suggest that in New Zealand the sustainability of the economic and employment expansion is under threat from two crucial deficiencies in the deregulated labour market model. It is also under threat from other causes, notably the failure of the Government to maintain adequate levels of infrastructure investment, the absence of an effective programme for industry development and the growing social discord that the massively unequal distributional effects of the experiment have precipitated. But these extra factors fall outside the scope of the labour market debate.

Where deregulation has impacted, it has tended to do so through distributional effects. A radical shift of power relationships in the labour market via a massive empowerment of employers has allowed a one-off cut in labour costs and a substantial transfer of national income from wages to profits. The problem is what to do next.

What we lack in New Zealand is an effective mechanism for integrating wage policy with national goals on consumption, savings, investment and employment. The result has been that even after modest expansion, and with unemployment still unacceptably high in social, political and historical terms, the only instrument available to contain inflation is the crude instrument of monetary policy.

Interest rates, both short and long term, have been rising in excess of international interest rates, and the currency has appreciated markedly. This is bound to dampen labour demand in the near future, as monetary authorities use the vicious instrument of unemployment to control wage demands, and a suppression of wage demands as the instrument to contain price stability.

On the supply side, the uncoordinated and voluntarist training regime that goes with the deregulation of the labour market has left training in disarray.

With weak labour demand and a deteriorating skills stock, the longer term outlook for employment in New Zealand is not good.

But even if the quantity of employment has been rising, the quality of employment has been declining. There has been a substantial displacement of full-time work by part-time work, and not all of that is voluntary. One-third of all part-time workers want longer hours or full-time work, so there has been a substantial rise in involuntary underemployment associated with deregulation and decentralization.

For both full- and part-time workers, employment has shifted to a much shorter term basis, and has become more casual, more insecure and more intermittent. There are major concerns about a deterioration in safety standards in workplaces, and about routine undetected infringements of the minimalist employment rights that remain.

We are now seeing in New Zealand the emergence of working poverty, but there are few if any robust statistics that monitor quality of life. The best estimate is that around 18 per cent of New Zealand households are poor, and that a quarter of the households that are poor have at least one member in full-time employment.

Much of the reason for the deterioration in the quality of employment in New Zealand is the disregard of our Government for basic labour standards.

In this the New Zealand Government does not stand alone. New Zealand unions would affirm that employment strategies internationally need to have many dimensions. That it is not just about a job on any terms, but rather that employment should be safe, rewarding, equitable and dignified. The social clause, with its linkage of basic worker rights to the benefits accruing to member States from free trade is clearly the preferred mechanism of workers in New Zealand. We support such a mechanism and a strong role for the ILO in both establishing this regime and supporting governments, workers and employers in meeting its requirements.

The role of this Organization in both establishing standards and monitoring their application is seen as a key to the goals of employment promotion contained in the Director-General's Report. Indeed, at the end of the day, the ILO is itself a key international recognition that both the quality and quantity of employment are best delivered through free, voluntary and independent collective organization and bargaining.

It is therefore with regret that I report this valuing of freedom of association and collective organization has not been reflected in the response of the New Zealand Government or employers to the excellent report of the direct contacts mission sent by the Governing Body to New Zealand and the recommendations of the Governing Body that flowed from it. They have taken no action to correct the clear flaws in our industrial relations and economic system. We as workers will continue to seek change with the support of the ILO.

Those who reject the concept of a strong and active role for the ILO in achieving commitment to basic standards should realize that there is a ground swell of support for such a role – a ground swell we are confident will succeed in the 1990s as it did in the 1940s when the mission of this Organization was re-established.

Original Farsi: Mr. GHADIANI (Employers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, and the Compassionate. The idea of labour and employment has a meaning which is as broad as the meaning of life. One can say that the greatest deprivation for an individual is to be deprived of the possibility of earning his living and meeting his needs. Unemployment is an excellent example of such deprivation. An analysis of the notions of employment and unemployment is important on the macroeconomic as well as the micro-economic level. It is an important socio-economic indicator which influences life at every level – individual, family, regional, national and international.

There is a psychological dimension to unemployment and employment, but one must not underestimate the importance of employment as a chance for all to enjoy life's opportunities through more equitable distribution of wealth within political boundaries, that is, on the national level as well as on the international socio-economic level.

As we have been told by the experts on economic questions, the negative repercussions of unemployment are making themselves felt more and more throughout the world. The level of employment and unemployment, notably in developing countries, depends on the distribution of income and wealth as well as international investments. Consequently, in these countries the solutions to the problem of unemployment, whether it be hidden or apparent, and to the problem of underemployment must be found in the policies and programmes applied on the national level, as well as in imbalances in international relations.

The idea of unemployment or employment has a technical, economic and social element. But powerful countries have always given priority to the technical and economic dimensions at the expense of the social component.

In today's world, problems and difficulties besetting developing countries must be seen as universal problems because these countries cannot find solutions to their problems all by themselves on the national level. Moreover, the trend of the last two decades has been to transfer cheap resources from these countries to industrialized countries, and consequently leading to the concentration of opportunities and know-how in the richer countries of the world. It is quite clear that if the international community does not participate by its efforts in the search for solutions which will gradually correct these socio-economic imbalances and for solutions to the increasing unemployment in the developing world characterized by rapid democratic growth, one may expect widespread social, economic and environmental crises.

Unemployment and its attendant problems need a global and urgent solution. This solution must be characterized mainly by an emphasis on strategies to re-establish the balance and justice in international relations.

The uncertainty of being able to find fundamental solutions to the problem of unemployment and its attendant problems has led to great concern in all countries of the world. But we have to go to the root of the problem. Mr. Hansenne, the distinguished Director-General of the ILO, in the introduction to his Report to the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference, referred to five problems resulting from increasing unemployment. Among these problems is the growth of inequalities as well as deprivation and social exclusion.

I would also like to briefly look at this latter point. In my opinion, unemployment is one of the causes of social exclusion which continues to grow. Furthermore, the search for full employment is based on the real and sincere concern of the international community to re-establish justice in all of its dimensions, especially through the just and fair sharing of wealth. In this field, the developed countries have an important role to play. Unfortunately, I must note that these countries have shown indifference to these pressing problems, and in many cases have furthered the deprivations and social injustice in the less developed countries. Here I would like to mention some of the reasons why the imperialist countries are not interested in establishing justice in the world.

First, the possibility of acquiring at very low prices the resources of developing countries. Indeed, a plundering of the natural resources of these countries is involved. The delegates are quite aware that the added value of a barrel of crude oil bought by an industrialized country is much higher than the purchase price of this same barrel, and the added value goes only to the industrialized country. The gap between these two groups thus continues to grow, and the difficulties of the developing countries continue to increase.

Second, an unwillingness to transfer technologies to developing countries. There is no need to explain that developing countries must continue to pay colossal amounts for the transfer of technology, even when the dependency contract has expired.

On the one hand, technological backwardness and dependence continue to widen the cultural, scientific and labour gaps, and hamper the creation of new jobs. Furthermore, raw materials continue to acquire added value outside of their country of origin, while trade in raw materials develops into a vicious circle which perpetuates injustice.

Third, the utilization of military, political and economic threats and pressure against those countries which wish to preserve their independence at all costs. These methods will have extremely serious and costly repercussions on newly independent countries and popularly elected Governments. The consequences include killings, neglect, disorganization, unemployment, closing down of those sectors that generate employment, and the squandering of the country's resources for defence and in order to try to correct the anomalies resulting from these methods. These costs will absorb these countries' entire capacity for years and years to come. This will only serve to further widen the gap between rich and poor and accentuate inequalities between the various classes within the same society.

Fourth, interference in the domestic affairs of a country. Since it is greatly in the interest of developed countries to exploit the weak points of developing countries, they will oppose any reform programme that will help developing countries to achieve intellectual, cultural and economic independence.

But it is not only a matter of interfering in the domestic affairs of countries; it is also a major obstacle to the realization of social justice in the countries of the Third World.

Fifth, exploitation of the factors that generate unemployment. We have seen that exploitation of factors such as illicit drugs, subversive leisure activities and the culture of idleness and frivolity sometimes push the productive forces – often consisting of young people – in developing countries into idle and useless pursuits. The statistics on employment and backwardness are evidence of this. Unfortunately, international gangs and networks, as well as major enterprises in imperialist countries, manipulate these hidden, and sometimes even visible, policies throughout the world.

Sixth, the precedence of individual and group interests rather than collective interests. The Report of the Director-General says that between 1960 and 1994 the unemployment rate also increased significantly in industrialized countries. I believe that the reason for this is the lack of importance given to the need to make justice widespread and to maintain it in industrialized countries. The causes of this indifference can be found in the attitude taken by these countries with respect to two notions, of "humanity" and of "profit". From this point of view wellbeing and justice for mankind is not a fundamental principle. What is important is profit, not individual profit but rather profit for certain groups, they being transnational enterprises. No one worries about the fact that these profits may have been derived from the sweat of many others.

The ILO must dedicate a great deal more attention to the matter of justice and its institution, as well as to the elimination of discrimination between the rich and poor countries. I propose that the ILO set up a committee to look into this question of justice. This committee should have as its mandate to wake up the sleeping conscience of humanity, to obtain its rights and to restore morality, civility and respect for the individuality and dignity of man to the rightful place which they deserve. A committee that would work toward eliminating discrimination and cruelty.

We must realize that only through cultural efforts, efforts to foster a mentality of universal cooperation can we obtain peace and security in the world. With such a mentality, respect for law will no longer pose a problem.

By proposing the creation of a committee for justice, it is not my intent to be a do-gooder. But we must remember that creation is based on justice, that humanity not only has the duty to promote justice among men, but it also has need of such justice, because the worthwhile survival of humanity can only be assured in a world that is just and merciful.

Original Arabic: Mr. MATTAR (Employers' delegate, United Arab Emirates) – I have the honour of addressing this session of the International Labour Conference in the name of the Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry of the United Arab Emirates, and would like to congratulate the President on his election to preside over the 82nd Session of the Conference. I would also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents on their election and to wish the Officers every success in their work, thus enabling the Conference to achieve its set aims. We welcome the new member States. Their participation at this Conference confirms the international nature of the Organization.

Our federation has carefully read the report of the Governing Body on its activities in 1994, the Director-General's Report entitled Promoting employment, the report on the Organization's activities in 1994 and other reports relating to the various items on the agenda. We would like to pay tribute to the Chairman of the Governing Body and to the tripartite members for the efforts which they have made in supervising the work of the Office and the activities of the Organization during the past year. We would also like to thank the Director-General for his excellent Report on employment promotion and for the many other reports describing the role of the ILO in the preparation of the work of this Conference.

In the report of the Chairman of the Governing Body which can be found in Provisional Record No. 2, one decision in particular attracted our attention – the decision taken by the Governing Body at its March 1995 session, to consider this year's special sitting to be the last to be dedicated to the discussion of the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. We wish to express a reservation as to this decision, because the objective causes behind this special sitting still remain. In this connection I would like to pay tribute to the democratic, objective attitude of the em-players in the Governing Body when this question was raised.

The Director-General made the right choice by dedicating this year's Report to employment promotion. This choice is in keeping with the recommendations of the World Summit for Social Development. Furthermore, employment takes on particular importance in countries suffering from unemployment and all its resultant social problems.

The Report drew attention to employment trends in the world and mentioned all sorts of actions carried out in this area to reduce unemployment as well as the necessary plans to create conditions favourable to employment throughout the world.

We would have liked this Report to include some examples from the Arab world, such as the example of the United Arab Emirates which offer employment opportunities to workers from all over the world, and thereby contribute to finding a solution to the employment problem and evening out the balance of payments of these countries through the transfer of the savings of nationals of these countries working in the United Arab Emirates.

The United Arab Emirates does not have an unemployment problem thanks to the wise economic and social development policies of His Highness the Head of State, the members of the Supreme Council of Rulers and the Governors of the Emirates, aimed at creating a favourable environment for development and a market economy infrastructure through infrastructure liberalization and promulgation of rules and laws designed to ensure peace and stability for all. This is the framework in which my country has made considerable progress in industry, agriculture and the services. Our country still offers numerous employment opportunities in various areas, production and services. There are also all kinds of investment opportunities for self-employed specialists and professionals.

The Conference agenda contains numerous technical topics but we would, in particular, like to comment on the programme and budget for the 1996-1997 biennium. We think it is essential to meet the technical assistance needs of the developing countries, to carry out the Organization's programmes in the various regions, and to strive to reduce administrative costs. The draft budget is a compromise. It has been accepted by the three groups within the Governing Body. In line with the Employers' spokesman, we would recommend adoption of the programme and budget approved by the Governing Body in March 1995. We propose that adequate funds be allocated to technical assistance to help the victims of war and natural catastrophes, and that employers should also benefit from this assistance.

In conclusion we would like to reaffirm the desire of the Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry of the United Arab Emirates to cooperate with the International Labour Organization because we believe sincerely in the noble objectives upon which this Organization is founded. The Director-General has done us the honour of visiting the headquarters of our federation when he visited our country in April 1995 and we would like, once again, to express our gratitude for this.

Original Russian: Mr. SHMAKOV (Workers' delegate, Russian Federation) – May I congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to their lofty posts and express my confidence that they will successfully guide the work of this session of the Conference.

The Federation of Independent Trade Unions of Russia is convinced that any State aspiring to the title of "social", should include in its Constitution the commitments signed in Copenhagen by more than 180 Heads of State and Government including "promoting the goal of full employment as a basic priority of our economic and social policies and to enabling all men and women to attain secure and sustainable livelihoods through freely chosen productive employment and work".

In our view, the main purpose of this session of the Conference is to examine the practical steps we can take towards achieving this strategic goal.

My country, Russia, is in a situation as described in the Report whereby "large numbers of workers will have to shift from declining to growing activities and problems of transitional unemployment will have to be faced". As Mr. Hansenne has said, we believe in the need for measures to help us adapt successfully. We recognize that this process "may entail losses in real output and employment in the short run". We also agree that "the best policy in the circumstances is to facilitate necessary changes rather than seek to retard them". But we have no right to talk in abstract terms about the real situation in Russia.

In the fifth year of restructuring in the country, we still see no growing sectors of the economy to which the workers from stagnating enterprises could transfer. The high-tech sectors which were until recently the country's pride have been practically wiped out, including the electronics industry, heavy engineering, instrument-making, machine-tool construction, and the aerospace industry. Next on the list are the aircraft industry, shipbuilding and the electrical industries. It is difficult to write them all off as having no future.

What is the significance for Russia of these unavoidable losses in terms of industrial output? As compared with 1991, the GDP has fallen by 43 per cent and industrial output by 48 per cent – and this is a huge country. Capital investment has slumped three times below the level needed for investment in employment. The present fall in productivity, the growth in the level of energy consumed in industry, and the heavy tax burden, all reduce the competitiveness of national industries. They are being squeezed out, not only of foreign, but also domestic markets. To the detriment of domestic industry and agriculture, we are satisfying 50 per cent of total demand by imports. The outflow of hard currency has been put at 100,000 million dollars over the last three years.

Impoverished Russia has at the same time become a net exporter of the best jobs and national capital so necessary to the country. One in 20 of the registered unemployed in the world is a citizen of Russia, which until recently had never known this calamity. The number of people unemployed or underemployed or in jobs but not being paid a full wage has reached 12 million, that is 15 per cent of the economically active population.

According to statistics supplied by the State Employment service, since the beginning of 1995 the number of unemployed has risen by 17 per cent. The territorial and professional imbalance in demand for labour and its supply on the labour market is now entrenched. Long-term jobseekers now account for more than 60 per cent of the total number of people out of work. Six out of every seven unemployed persons registered with the employment service cannot count on finding a job.

Our federation fully supports the conclusion in the Report that low unemployment benefit puts many people off registering as unemployed and forces them into the "black economy". This process, which excludes the long-term jobless from society, is easy to understand if you bear in mind that unemployment benefit in Russia is less than 25 per cent of a living wage.

One of the reasons for increased unemployment in Russia is the social and economic stratification of society, as rightly pointed out by Mr. Hansenne. As recognized in Russia's report to the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen, about 60 per cent of the population is worse off now than before and only 10 per cent has been able to improve their material standard of living. The elite are not in a position to create powerful demand for consumer goods. As a result, the vast differences in income will increase stagnation in terms of production, and therefore, unemployment. Hence, a vicious circle.

Economic security in employment should be the dominant factor of a new structural policy. Our federation, which supports the Summit's conclusion that concern for people should be the essential concern in promoting sustainable development, thinks that the social dimension should be an integral part of any aspect of structural policy.

What does this mean for promoting employment in Russia?

First, we fully agree with the Report's conclusion that the crisis of mass unemployment can only be overcome by increasing industrial production and creating jobs in the most promising sectors. This requires a new impetus of investment, more dynamic movement of capital and greater mobility of workers between regions and branches of industry.

At the same time, we are wary of the Report's recommendation that countries in transition develop first and foremost the textile, clothing and food sectors and those industries which are based on the use of natural resources. The Report also proposed to convert sectors producing the means of production, which it out of hand qualifies as uncompetitive. This is a onesided appraisal. It is no less than a simplistic distortion which could deprive the transition countries of Central and Eastern Europe of their status as developed States in both the social and economic sense.

It is typical that even the negligible amounts of investment which have reached the countries of the former Soviet Union have been placed in sectors which work with raw materials. The Russian trade unions strongly object to the current economic course. We can already see a glimpse of the future of Russia as a fuel and energy appendage of the developed countries; a reservation set aside for environmentally dirty industries; a country without high-tech industry or basic or applied sciences; in other words, a country without a future.

Secondly, from the very beginning of the process of economic transformation in Russia, our position has been the same as the one expressed in the employment policies section of the Report, which states that "there is a strong case to be made for adopting a more gradual approach to trade liberalization, privatization and enterprise restructuring". As tension rises in the country, the main thing is to ensure that the reforms remain acceptable, by conducting them gradually, without putting millions of people into a state of shock by going too fast. Encouraging the process of widespread bankruptcy would not only lead to obvious inefficiencies, as the Report says, but could also wipe out the real progress made in building a normal economy in Russia and which has already cost the population an inordinate amount.

Thirdly and lastly, the positive adaptation measures mentioned by Mr. Hansenne mean, in the Russian context, that the state employment policy should be seen as one of the components of the federal programme of social and economic development of the country. For the time being, there are in Russia only institutes providing assistance to the unemployed, but there is no proper system for the promotion of employment. In other words, the system simply treats the symptoms and not the causes of the disease.

In its work in the country, our federation insists that programmes for investment promotion, support for entrepreneurship, tax reform and foreign trade privatization, should be preliminarily assessed on the basis of whether or not they will change the demand for labour, and whether they will generate socially useful employment.

At the same time we realize that the problem of employment requires cooperative efforts at the international level. Here, I would like to cite the British economist, Keynes, who said that when one government is more concerned with inflation than unemployment and another has a diametrically opposed position, you cannot expect them to reach agreement to fund joint action. This is why it is so important for the ILO to make the maximum effort to promote the fulfilment of the obligations undertaken by more than 180 countries in Copenhagen.

It is especially important to stress on the one hand that no social development can take place without economic progress, and on the other, that any economic progress must be reflected in social terms. That is why we see the need for an active partnership between the ILO and the World Trade Organization.

The ILO's duty to supervise compliance with the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) means that the ILO has the broadest powers in this area. The advisory assistance provided by multi-disciplinary teams in the ILO's regional offices in solving employment problems in each country could offer more possibilities for action as well.

Today, when the Governments of some countries are considering cutting their financial contributions to the work of the ILO, I would like to remind them of the wise words of the Declaration of Philadelphia: "Poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere."

Mr. SUKARTIN (Employers' adviser, Indonesia) – First, may I, on behalf of the Employers' Association of Indonesia (APINDO) and its 9,100 member enterprises, take the privilege of extending the most cordial congratulations to His Excellency, Mr. Rosales Argüello on his election as President of this 82nd International Labour Conference and further to Mr. Popescu, Mr. Halliwell and Madam Engelen-Kefer on their respective elections as Vice-President. May I further express my conviction that their experience and wisdom will ensure the smooth and successful conduct of this Conference.

Representing the Indonesian Employers, I would like to mention the significant changes which are to be anticipated in global economics.

The consensus which was reached on all matters relative to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) has resulted in the establishment of the World Trade Organization (WTO). The developing countries will enjoy broader opportunities notwithstanding the related unavoidable risks.

May I further briefly touch on the economic prospects of Indonesia for 1995. Growth in 1995 is expected to be higher than in 1994. According to the sixth Five-Year Development Plan, economic growth of 6.5 per cent or more is expected in 1995. The Asian Development Bank and the World Bank are quoting figures between 6.5 per cent and 7 per cent.

Investment in 1995 will be higher than in previous years. The continuing deregulation in commerce and industry and a further decrease of corporate income taxes have attracted larger investments.

The data for growth in agriculture and industry show higher figures than in 1994. The growth in the area of industry is positively affected by the increase in domestic demand for consumer goods, bigger investment and expansion of foreign markets.

Most important in Indonesia is the remarkable growth of the tourist industry which many anticipate will become the number one foreign exchange earner by the turn of the century. Most significant is the rapid increase of the number of incoming tourists, the construction of new hotels and the improvements to the infrastructure of the tourist industry throughout the country.

The expected growth, coupled with the trend of globalization, will undoubtedly have a high impact on the development of human resources in enterprises throughout Indonesia. This will naturally affect the scope of activity of the Employers' Association of Indonesia.

In anticipation of these changes, APINDO has expanded and improved its activities in the area of human resources development.

While in the past years the activities have been focused merely on industrial relations, since 1994 various training programmes have been undertaken, at national level and in the provinces.

Other programmes to be mentioned are as follows: training programmes for enterprise managers; training workshops on topics related to productivity improvement, environmental management, occupational safety and health; specific training programmes conducted by the provincial and district branches; cooperation with the Indonesian Ministry of Education and Culture on the so-called "link-and-match" system of education in technical vocational high schools; cooperation with the Indonesian Ministry for the Role of Women on concerted undertakings for the improvement of working conditions for women workers; the skills development project in three provinces with the support of the World Bank.

In concluding my remarks, I wish to mention in particular the support and cooperation which APINDO has received from the various international organizations, namely the ILO, the IOE, Nikkeiren (Japan), ACCI (Australia), KEF (Korea), MEF (Malaysia), SNEF (Singapore) and others, all of which have significantly contributed to the progress of the Indonesian employers' association.

Ms. LOCHBIHLER (representative of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom) – As this is the first time the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom has taken the floor during the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference, we wish to congratulate the President on his election.

In this 50th anniversary year, major United Nations conferences such as the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen and the World Conference on Women in Beijing are taking place.

As an international women's organization, we are actively involved in preparing for the World Conference on Women in Beijing and we were present at the five regional preparatory meetings held in 1994. Women's groups and organizations have been leaders in innovative ways of solving social, political and economic problems. They have defended their own rights and worked for the benefit of their families, communities and nations. Women have mobilized to address critical global issues such as poverty, malnutrition, starvation, environmental degradation, armed conflicts and not least women's work and workers' rights.

The emergence of economic liberalization sharpens the disparity between the rich and poor, destroying and displacing national economies and threatening a deterioration in the conditions of life. It also reduces job opportunities and seriously erodes the life of working women and the poor. Poverty is an obstacle to the advancement of women and a persistent cause of the inequality of women. More than 1 billion persons in the world live in extreme poverty – the majority of them are women. More than 820 million are unemployed, and women in particular are affected by unemployment, underemployment and degrading working conditions. Within many societies both in developed and developing countries the gap between rich and poor has increased.

Women worldwide face severe poverty as one-quarter of all households are headed by women. As sole or major income earners, they struggle for their own survival as well as their family's. Family disintegration, urban migration, war and internal displacements are factors contributing to the rise of female-headed households. Yet the restructuring of the economy is driving women into insecure employment, unemployment, unprotected home-based production and dangerous working conditions. Diminishing social security systems and services are becoming the daily reality for women.

Structural adjustment programmes (SAPs) in particular impoverish and overburden women who are forced to make an invisible adjustment in the use of their time. This translates into longer, more intensified workdays, the loss of income (their own and that of other family members) and the closure of basic public health and social services on which women depend both as carers and as a source of wage employment. SAPs shift activities from the public state sector to the individual household and community on the assumption that what happens in that sector, being unpaid carries no cost.

The working group on employment of the NGO Subcommittee on the Status of Women discussed the Director-General's Report to this session on Promot- ing employment and regrets that the Report has not analysed it from a gender perspective. In omitting to mainstream a gender perspective in its economic analysis, it has made women's positive contribution to the economy through both their remunerated and unremunerated work at home, in the community and the workplace once again invisible in employment creation and the alleviation of poverty. We wish to draw your attention to the Draft Platform for Action of the World Conference on Women which states that "the application of gender analysis to a wide range of policies and programmes is therefore critical to poverty-reduction strategies. The failure to adequately mainstream a gender perspective in all economic analysis and planning and to address the structural causes of poverty is a contributing factor to the feminization of poverty". By overlooking the gender specificity of social issues, it has failed to call attention to women's rights to equal opportunity and treatment in human resource development, training and retraining schemes, in equal pay, in equal access to long-term employment, in protection from exploitation in precarious employment, in the "black economy", in sub contract labour, in piece work, in free trade zones (all of which employ mostly women), in loss of social welfare benefits and safety net protection, notably in economies of transition, etc.

We welcome Report V(1) on home work to this session, for its comprehensiveness and attention to a sector where the workers "receive very low levels of remuneration, work excessively long hours and have very low, if any, social protection". Some 90 per cent of homeworkers are women. Homeworking has also increased because of growing pressure on women to contribute to the family income. Many women need to earn money in ways that neither challenge the male breadwinner ethos, nor leave undone their domestic responsibilities. The lack of child care, in particular, ties many women to the home. Employers benefit from women's lack of choice by undervaluing their skills. It is important to recognize that a number of women work at home on their own account – offering a service or running a small business – but many more work on a piece-rate basis.

Let me just draw your attention to an additional fact which was not mentioned in Report V(1), the connection of racism and homeworking. Many women migrant workers are forced into underpaid homeworking by the same structural factors as other women, with the additional oppression of discrimination on the basis of race. A survey carried out among Asian women in London showed that a significant proportion of the women had left their outside job because of intolerable levels of racial and sexual harassment.

In the preparations for the World Conference on Women we congratulate the ILO for organizing a Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Social Security and Social Protection: Equality of Treatment between Men and Women, held in Geneva, November 1994 and to the Caribbean Subregional Tripartite Seminar on Equal Opportunity and Treatment for Workers with Family Responsibilities, in Guyana, December 1994; both meetings are very valid contributions.

We hope that the ILO will be adequately represented at the World Conference on Women in Beijing itself to have substantial input on women workers' issues in the Platform for Action.

In the follow-up to the Beijing Conference we support very much the suggested close cooperation between the ILO and the other specialized agencies and the United Nations in working together to implement the achievements of the Platform for Action.

Mr. FALEIRO (Labour Minister, State Government of Goa, India) – Let me at the outset join other speakers in congratulating the Officers of this session of the Conference.

The Report of the Director-General is indeed thought-provoking and throws up a range of issues which deserve serious consideration.

Our country, India, is going through a period of economic liberalization and structural adjustment. Our liberalization policies which came about initially to cover a severe economic crisis in 1991 have now been set on an even keel and have reached take-off stage. Yesterday's detractors have become today's supporters, and I can safely say that the liberalization policies now enjoy the consensus of all the major political parties in India. The issue now is not the fact of change but the pace of it.

In an effort to create more than 9 million jobs a year to meet the growing demands of the population, we have used the vehicle of accelerated economic growth. Creation of employment is our first and primary task and our policies are designed to achieve that. Let us not forget that even the best-intentioned ILO Conventions are of no use if the individual remains unemployed. Our goal is to bring down unemployment levels to a minimum by 2002 A.D.

However, while our pattern of mixed economy ensured a balanced all-round regional development, the influx of foreign investment may not be an unmixed blessing. Foreign investment, triggered by liberalization of economies, tends to flow to areas where infrastructure is readily available already. This can cause regional imbalances in investments vis-à-vis areas lacking in infrastructure with consequent employment and income disparities.

Domestic policies, therefore, should promote evenly spread infrastructure development. In fact, an important strategy should be to invite foreign investments for infrastructure development itself on a priority basis. This would also spur further growth and development in non-infrastructure areas.

An open door to investment and industrialization does throw domestic industries into competition with stronger overseas investors. Exposure to such competition, coupled with withdrawal of domestic industry protection, results in a demand from the domestic industries for a level playing field. This would, therefore, call for careful prioritization of the direction of investment flows instead of leaving them totally to the market forces.

Apart from equitable growth, a higher level of economic growth would certainly have extremely beneficial effects on many of our socio-economic issues including the issue of child labour.

The issue of child labour has recently come into sharp focus as was evident from many interventions in the Plenary. I would, therefore, like to dwell on it at some length.

India has reiterated on numerous occasions its determination to root out child labour and has taken several purposeful strides in this direction. Our legislation and policy have been in line with the 1979 resolution of the ILO Conference and we have set in motion a series of measures to tackle not only the problem itself but the broader socio-economic factors which contribute to it. In August last year our Prime Minister, Mr. P.V. Narasimha Rao, announced an ambitious scheme to root out child labour in hazardous employment by the year 2,000 A.D. An amount of US$300 million has already been earmarked for this purpose.

Child labour is a deep-rooted socio-economic problem which cannot be eradicated overnight as many speakers in the Plenary would lead us to believe. Those who have doubts on this score are living in a make-believe world. The causes are multifaceted, given that in developed countries there is a prevalence of child labour. Its existence in the developing countries is a matter of survival necessitated by extreme poverty and the need to supplement the meagre resources of the family. In this fight for survival, our endeavour, and certainly the ILO's, should be to form part of the solution and not add to the problem. It is important to exercise our minds as much as our hearts to find a well-thought-out policy, not just an emotional one, to bring it to an end.

However, our delegation has received signals from many speakers in this Plenary that they look at this issue primarily as one from which to draw political mileage, and not as a socio-economic problem, as it is in reality. Seen in this light it makes us wonder whether this sudden focus from some quarters has a hidden agenda. Some aspects of the agenda are manifest even now, especially in the moves to promote a social clause. The mood today is confrontational. So instead of working with countries to solve the problem of child labour in a non-confrontational manner, we are being targeted. We see this as a dangerous trend. If this trend were to continue we would end up worsening the situation rather than helping them. Further, being a socio-economic problem, excessive emphasis on legislative action and prosecution is not the best answer to this issue. Economic growth combined with political resolve is, and this is evident, as only some States in India still face this problem.

The ILO has a long tradition of technical cooperation and we applaud the good work done in this connection. It is important that the ILO strengthens this important arm and stands by to assist developing countries to tackle many issues which are bound to arise from the liberalization and structural adjustment policies. It is wiser that the ILO remains sensitive to our concerns. If the ILO distances itself from realities on the ground in developing countries, then the credibility gap would only become large and result in a far less auspicious role for this Organization on social matters.

I thank you for the time given to me to address this august Conference. Needless to add, India, as a founder member of the Organization, remains committed to the ideals of the ILO and the pursuit of social justice.

TENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE:
SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION.

The PRESIDENT (Ms. ENGELLEN-KEFER) – We come now to the adoption of the tenth report of the Selection Committee, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 41.

If there are no objections, I shall take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

RATIFICATION OF INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONVENTIONS BY EL SALVADOR

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) – To commence our business, I have pleasure in announcing to the Conference that the Director-General of the ILO has registered the ratification by El Salvador of the following international Conventions: Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946 (No. 77), Medical Examination of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention, 1946 (No. 78), Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88), Minimum Wage Fixing Machinery (Agriculture) Convention, 1951 (No. 99), Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131), Rural Workers' Organizations Convention, 1975 (No. 141), Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142), Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). This brings the total number of ratifications of international labour Conventions to 6,222.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) – We shall now resume the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Russian: Mr. NARMANDAKH (Workers' delegate, Mongolia) – Allow me on behalf of the workers of Mongolia warmly to congratulate the President on his unanimous election at the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to congratulate all the participants in this session and wish them all the best.

First of all, I would like to give you a brief account of the current social and economic situation of our country. Mongolia is now in a transition period. We are changing social structures, and the further we advance on this path the more difficulties arise. Even though we have made achievements in the political, intellectual and legal spheres, of the many economic and social problems that first appeared in 1990 remain unresolved. The economy is unstable, production is low and the level of unemployment remains relatively high. What is of the greatest concern is that real income, and therefore the living standards of workers, is continuing to decrease. The differences between rich and poor are growing, poverty is expanding and the principles of social justice are being violated.

Trade unions need to consolidate their position in the changing social situation in our country and are therefore trying to reform our activity and fight for the protection of workers' interests.

I would like to thank the International Labour Organization, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and its regional organizations for the contribution they have made to reviving a new democratic trade union movement in Mongolia and to helping us defend our interests in a civil society. We are cooperating in a number of fields, and developing cooperation with trade unions and non-governmental organizations in Japan, the United States of America and other developed countries of the world. As a result of all this, Mongolian workers are increasingly able to reap the benefits of education, improve their working methods, learn democracy, become acquainted with their rights and fight for their own interests and freedoms. A teachers' strike has been going on for over 30 days now, and aims to increase teachers' pay. Our Government is paying very little attention to this event. Instead of respecting their demands and holding negotiations with teachers, the Government has declared that the strike is illegal, and some trade union activists have been taken to court for their participation in the strike. We believe that this is a violation of basic human and trade union rights.

Parliament has passed an Act on the Public Service and in accordance with this Act, employees in the public administration do not have the right to strike. From the outset, the Mongolian Government has aimed to make the public service an area in which workers do not have the right to join trade unions, to engage in collective bargaining or strikes. This policy is being implemented.

Therefore, we believe that we need specialized assistance and support from the ILO with regard to implementing the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Our workers' organization wishes to pursue negotiations in order to protect our members' interests and will actively move toward this aim.

The Report of the Director-General to this session of the Conference, Promoting employment, is highly topical and deserves our full support and approval. An increase in employment and the elimination of poverty are not the only challenges facing our countries. They have become regional and global issues. Mongolian workers' organizations should do everything possible to solve poverty and unemployment problems and to develop Mongolia so that it can take its proper place in the world economy.

Our Mongolian trade union organization is doing all it can to achieve this on the basis of national unity and social agreement in cooperation with the International Labour Organization.

Ms. ROOS (Employers' delegate, Estonia) – Changes in economic relations during the transition period of Estonia, the privatization of state enterprises, the development of human-centred social structures have strengthened and assisted in the development of employers' associations, working on the basis of labour relations and the creation of new associations. This development is naturally, starting from 1992, from when Estonia again became a full Member of the International Labour Organization, based on the stability of the Estonian Republic. Also, the recent birth of our Confederation of Estonian Industries and Employers in May this year, established on the basis of the previous confederation, is a contributing factor to development. With the new statutes of the Confederation, there is a more precise definition of present-day employers and prospective development, based on industry trends and on international labour standards.

Now allow me to present some general data characterizing our new Confederation. At the moment, we are made up of 16 employers' associations with approximately 100,000 workers in all. The objective of the reorganized Confederation is to develop cooperation with all the Estonian confederations and associations of employers who are not members of our Confederation but who have expressed the wish to participate in the activities of the Council of Employers formed by the representatives of primary employers' associations. The Confederation represents small, medium and large enterprises with different forms of ownership, including state, mixed and private stock companies and cooperatives.

The Confederation considers its main task is to protect the interests of employers, representing the employers' viewpoint in negotiations with the State and workers on labour and social relations. We are partners of the Government in working out the basis of labour law and solving problems concerning entrepreneurship.

In the year 1995 the Confederation of Estonian Industries and Employers considers it necessary to hold tripartite consultations and negotiations before adopting new legislative acts which deal with entrepreneurship and the social sphere, social insurance, labour and social relations, regulating taxation and joint participation of employers and employees in paying social taxes. The work involves regional policy and the mechanisms for its application including the reform of the vocational training and retraining system and creating the necessary material framework.

In all the above-mentioned spheres we consider it important to take into account the working trends and recognized practices of the ILO. A great contribution to our working experience has been given by the Confederation of Finnish Industry and Employers. Thanks to their assistance, in 1994, 65 employers' representatives, heads of industry, received training. Finland has promised to continue the joint training this year also. Above all, we see the need for training in the field of wage-related matters and in inputting and sorting statistical information. It seems that cooperation with Finland will also be necessary as in the future, to direct the activities of the employers' association along the right lines and to create an elementary material framework, we will have to ask for assistance from the European Commission PHARE social assistance programme. The project itself presupposes cooperation with at least one country of the European Union which is Finland.

The Confederation of Estonian Industries and Employers together with the scientists of the Republic have put together and presented to the Government their own standpoints about the development and implementation of Estonian industrial policy. I will mention only the most important of them. Firstly, successful development of the industry of the Republic can only occur by involving science, technical and higher education and technical engineering development work in the innovation process. In spite of the low level of salaries, the high level of skills and information of our specialists will guarantee the progress in the area of science-related matters. Secondly, the privatization of industrial enterprises is at present our primary economic and political task, the main criterion of which is the increased economic efficiency of production and employment. Thirdly, in the preparatory work for joining the European Union, our legislation has to be brought into line with international standards, quality levels and ecological regulations.

The jubilee conference of the International Labour Organization in Estonia in April 1994, in the organization of which we, on behalf of the employers, took an active part, proved once again that the market economy cannot be separated from solving the problems of social protection, that the main precepts of the ILO – promoting negotiations in the labour market – are an integral part of market relations.

The employers have specific aims which, in order to be realized, require the agreement and cooperation of workers' interests and also of the interests of other sectors of society. If Parliament adopts laws concerning employers, but does not take their aims into consideration, or if the law is not in keeping with other social interests, then the Government will be unable to effectively implement the law.

In Estonia it is necessary to form a system to establish public, legal and social insurance. Unfortunately, to date it has not been possible to reach an agreement as to how to structure such a system, in which the State, employers and workers should all be represented. I assure this session of the International Labour Conference that the Confederation of Estonian Industries and Employers is doing all it can to guarantee the development of employers' activities in our Republic, both on a general and economic level, and also to raise representation levels.

Mr. ALI (Minister of Labour and Manpower, Bangladesh) – On behalf of the Bangladesh delegation, and on my own behalf, I would like to join previous speakers in congratulating the President on his election to chair the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents. With their extensive experience and able leadership I am confident that the deliberations of this Conference will be brought to a successful conclusion.

Coming on the heels of the World Summit for Social Development, held in Copenhagen in March this year, where the world community pledged to eradicate poverty, enhance productive employment and promote social cohesion, the 82nd Session assumes special importance. The Copenhagen Declaration aims at assisting in the creation of an enabling environment at the national and international levels towards implementing and overseeing the Programme of Action. Thus, the Director-General's Report, Promoting employment, presented to this year's session of the International Labour Conference is very timely and appropriate.

The richness of information, content, depth of analysis and aptness in identifying issues in the Report have stimulated meaningful discussions. It has gone into considerable depth in analysing the structure of employment of various groups of countries and at various levels of development. The Report has also tried to link employment with the changes in the patterns of trade and the recent trade liberalization, globalization of economies, changing technologies and investment patterns. It highlights the tremendous potentials created by these changes for generating new employment, and describes the barriers and challenges posed by the existing development paradigm in translating these opportunities into reality.

The successful conclusion of the Uruguay Round and the establishment of the WTO represent a milestone in international trade and the globalization of economies. We join the Director-General in hoping that this will usher in a new era of trade liberalization, leading to rapid growth in investment, employment and trade based on comparative advantage.

We also hope that, in consonance with the tenets of free trade and the open market economy, future negotiations on creating a richer global economic environment will focus on the need to provide free and easy access to labour markets worldwide. If we accept unhindered movement of goods and services in the interests of both the developed and the developing countries, we feel that it is equally important to have free access to labour markets, since labour, along with goods and services, is integral to the process of economic growth and development.

While addressing this point, I would like to point out that migrant workers are not even extended protection deserved under the national law of the host country and face exploitation. Hence the issue of the rights of migrant workers calls for greater attention of this august body.

With the increasing globalization, we in Bangladesh have undertaken wide-ranging economic reforms and structural adjustment measures. Besides liberalization of trade and exchange rate and banking regulations, these include labour market reforms. The updating and modernization of all labour laws is under way, and the principle of tripartism is being strengthened in all spheres to ensure the safety and security of workers and the workplace. While developing countries, and particularly the least developed countries, are undertaking costly and painful measures of restructuring and liberalization with a view to promoting growth and creation of jobs, there appears to be a new threat on the horizon.

It goes without saying that the social standards of the developing countries are poor because they are economically poor. Linking labour standards to trade at this stage would, therefore, be detrimental to the interests of the developing countries, and particularly the least developed ones. Bangladesh would like to reiterate here the position taken by the fifth Conference of Ministers of Labour of the Non-Aligned and Other Developing Countries, held in New Delhi in January this year. International trade should be detached from the question of labour standards, as such a link tends to negate the economic gains of developing countries and will cause acute distress among those whose lot it seeks to improve.

This brings us to the question of labour standards, and particularly the issue of child labour. In Bangladesh, child labour is banned, and legal provisions in this regard are in consonance with international Conventions. Another redeeming feature is that there is no bonded or forced labour in Bangladesh. Bangladesh was one of the first few countries that ratified and adopted various measures to implement the Convention on the rights of the child. However, the problem of child labour cannot be solved merely by the ratification of Conventions or the enactment of laws.

Child labour is a socio-economic phenomenon arising out of poverty and underdevelopment. It is a survival strategy for families in the developing world, without which many of them may, in fact, face hunger and abuse. It cannot be eliminated overnight without the risk of inflating the pool of juvenile delinquents.

Bangladesh has taken some innovative initiatives to deal with this problem. While monitoring the enforcement of legal provisions, it is in the process of formulating a programme of shorter hours of work in light jobs. To begin with, this makes provision for education, skill development and rehabilitation for 12 to 14-year-old children in the garment sector. But it would be difficult for poor countries like Bangladesh to sustain such programmes without significant external assistance.

What, however, is unfortunate is that, despite these serious and arduous efforts undertaken by Bangladesh at the risk of considerable social cost, this problem has of late been blown out of all proportion by some quarters with vested interests. However genuine their concern may be, the symbiotic relationship of child labour with the overall socio-economic conditions of the country concerned should not be ignored. Moreover, child labour should not be confused with apprenticeship and development of skill in certain trades, which traditionally require starting at an early age due to the very nature of the skill. It may be worth mentioning that child labour is a phenomenon not necessarily limited to the developing countries. It was a common practice in the West during the industrial revolution, and continued to be widely used as late as the 1930s and in many of the presently developed countries, when they were even at a higher level of development than many of the present-day developing countries.

Since education is universally recognized as a means of integrating the child into society, in Bangladesh a multi-pronged approach to ensure education for children is being promoted. The Food for Education Programme, launched by Khateda Zia, the Prime Minister of Bangladesh, in rural areas as an income supplement and stipend programmes for female children, has been undertaken to keep children in school. Apart from regular primary education, a new system of integrated non-formal education has been developed for drop-out children. It is being developed in close cooperation with NGOs.

My delegation is keenly interested in the programme, budget and financial questions which are being debated in the Finance Committee. Bangladesh attaches the highest priority to major programmes relating to employment in the Asia-Pacific region, which contains the largest number of unemployed people in the world. Bangladesh would, therefore, like the budget allocation for field programmes in the Asia and Pacific region to be augmented and more resources provided for supporting programmes that are related to the elimination of child labour, safety and health at the workplace and the skill development of the workforce that will soon be seeking employment.

With the fast changing technologies and increasing interdependence of the economies of the world, the need for technical assistance to cope with the changing world situation has never been greater. I therefore take this opportunity to urge all concerned member States attending this Conference to expand their field of collaboration, both through the technical assistance programmes of the ILO and through other global regional and bilateral agreements.

Before I conclude, may I stress that Bangladesh has been consistently trying hard to take appropriate steps for improving the condition of our working class. As an elected member of the Governing Body of the ILO in 1978, 1981 and 1990, Bangladesh voiced the sentiments and aspirations of the member States of South Asia in particular and the least developed countries in general, and lent active support to the ILO in its standard-setting work to make the world a safer place for workers. Bangladesh would like to continue to play its active role as a Member in furthering the objectives of the ILO in future, particularly in promoting productive employment and poverty alleviation of the least developed countries.

Mr. STRASZYNSKI (Employers' adviser, Poland)

– It is a pleasure to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their appointment, and the Director-General for the Report he has presented to us.

The organization to which I belong has been representing Polish Employers in the work of the International Labour Organization for as long as six years already. At the beginning our participation was first and foremost evidence of economic and political transformations taking place in Poland. Existence of an independent, dynamically developing employers' organization proved that the Republic of Poland had joined the group of sovereign and democratic countries. During the period 1989-95 the number of organizations united in our Confederation has increased from five to 51.

Yet the process of the development of the free market and the institution of a democratic State is not harmonious and uniform throughout our country's social and economic life. Economic freedom is not accompanied by the development of up-to-date regulating mechanisms, especially in the sphere of social relations originating in the labour process. It has not been possible yet to create an effective mechanism of social dialogue, by means of which it would be possible to solve inevitable conflicts between capital and labour, between employers and employees. Neither in the legislative sphere nor in socio-economic reality has an equilibrium of forces been achieved between the organizations nor have the mechanisms of dialogue between employers and employees been built.

Poland is a country of trade union domination and thus there is a danger that conflicts connected with labour move to the sphere of politics. Since 1989 activists and representatives of trade unions have, as Deputies to the lower house of Parliament, been members of majority coalitions, determining the balance of power in those coalitions.

This is our Polish problem, but certainly not only ours. One should, however, look critically at the generally accepted thesis that conflicts between capital and labour are more and more of a local nature, and that global danger is created first of all by national or religious conflicts.

The thesis is right but only within a very limited period. At present, labour conflicts in highly developed countries are solved by very efficient regulating mechanisms of dialogue and the market. In developing countries they are limited by weakness of employees in the face of strength of employers or the State.

The world arena will be entered more and more actively by countries of the former communist camp with a formation of employers, which is likely to remain weak for some time; a weak democratic State because newly formed, and a strong, well-organized formation of employees motivated by claims which had been put off for dozens of years. All this is accompanied by the lack of respect towards the authorities, eroded by the years of totalitarian communist rule, the lack of experience of social dialogue and compromise, and the lack of trade union activists familiar with mechanisms of the free market and modern economy.

This thesis is based on results of sociological research. To the question: "Are strikes in the present situation of the country the right way to fight for an improvement of living conditions?" as many as 70 per cent of trade union leaders answered: "definitely and rather the right way". The majority, that is 63 per cent, were of the opinion that "further strikes against the economic policy of the Government are inevitable", and another 36 per cent thought that they are "very likely to happen". This means that 99 per cent of trade union activists recognize strikes against the economy policy as "inevitable and very likely to happen". Over 81 per cent of trade union activists are of the opinion that "a general strike is inevitable and very likely to happen". The process of transformations and the privatization are only accepted by trade union activists at a theoretical level. In practice, they opt for the state and public ownership. Their standpoint may resolve itself to the thesis: "Let capitalism (especially a family and workers' capitalism) develop in Poland, but without us."

All this may be conducive to the development of labour conflicts, to moving them to the level of the State and, as a result, this may counteract the development of the world order. In an ever more open world economy and political system, any tension in such a region as Central and Eastern Europe may turn out to be expensive even for highly stable countries.

The employers' organization which I represent and which brings together a substantial part of Polish employers, especially in economic regions and sectors endangered by social conflicts, wants to become the creator and the anchor of social peace in Poland. We do not, however, find full understanding for the tasks of partnership and social dialogue in the activity of successive governments in our country. Formally we are included in a number of tripartite committees with very little power to bring our influence to bear on the outcome of the results of their work. For example, in the Labour Protection Council there are only two representatives of employers out of 31 members.

For several years we have been unsuccessfully attempting to persuade Polish politicians and Polish authorities to abide by the commitments assumed by Poland, which result from its membership in the International Labour Organization as well as from the Conventions ratified by Poland.

We have still not managed to achieve full equilibrium between employees' and employers' rights. We have no influence on the activity of health insurance institutions, social institutions or the vocational training system. We have no effective influence on the form of the legal framework of labour conflicts or on the process of privatization of state-owned enterprises. There is no equality in the access to financial means necessary to create the organizational base for the collective employers' activity. According to the Trade Union Law, the employers must maintain and finance the activity of the trade union apparatus. In the hard coal industry alone the employers pay salaries to over 470 trade unions activists, but may not spend any company funds for their own organizations.

We are convinced that the International Labour Organization, without any infringement of its Members' sovereign rights to solve economic and social problems, could, in virtue of the powers which it possesses on account of its membership, and of the voluntary obligations it has taken upon itself, exert a more energetic influence on the formation of the principles and mechanisms of partnership and social dialogue in Poland. Intensification of the Polish progress along these lines would be a success of Poles, would contribute to lessening potential tensions and would be a source of increasing prestige for the International Labour Organization, in the same way as its prestige increased when solidarity, due to the efforts of the International Labour Organization, was registered in Poland on the basis of the Freedom of Association and Protection of Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

We hope that it is now the Polish employers' turn. And we hope that in our activity aimed at the intensification and extension of our presence in Polish economic and political life, inspired by the ideas which are the foundation of the activity of the International Labour Organization, we will be actively and strongly supported by this Organization. This is not a complaint, but a true presentation of the situation which the employers in Poland are facing and have to deal with in their own activities.

Mr. TAPIOLA (Workers' delegate, Finland) – At this rather late stage of the debate, and as I already congratulated the President on his election when speaking on the Programme and Budget proposals nearly two weeks ago, let me express my appreciation at the way in which he and his colleagues have conducted our deliberations. He has made a valuable contribution to the success of the Conference.

I have carefully studied the Report, World employment 1995, of which the Director-General has produced a good summary for this Conference. This shows the importance of having a basic analysis on the employment situation which we can use for different policy-oriented purposes. Apart from our deliberations here, the Report has already significantly strengthened the case of the ILO for being the focal point on employment in the follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development.

A report of this kind is a tool in the necessary dialogue and exchanges with other international institutions, particularly the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and the World Trade Organization. It should establish its place among those regular surveys published by these organizations and others, such as the OECD. The ILO has to continue to get through to all the fora where a strategic discussion on the future of our societies is carried out, and the ILO should have an impact there, including the G-7 group which most recently met in Halifax.

At the same time a report of this kind is necessary for national decision-making bodies, parliaments and congresses, and administrations as well as for the workers' and employers' organizations. Its main function at this stage should be to help dissipate at least a part of the anxiety felt by normal people – wage-earners and leaders of enterprises of all sizes and categories alike – faced with the realities of the new globalized labour market.

Ours is a period of both great expectations and great fear. The one-world reality which is forged by trade, investment, technological change and the generally welcome demolition of barriers separating peoples has changed the situation in the labour market. The shelter from the consequences of global competition which many people have had may not have been ideal. It has been either oppressive or artificial, but it has been or at least has been felt as one element of security for the people concerned. We have now entered a new reality, and the ILO Report clearly shows the adjustment pressures with which everyone is faced.

The major question is, how can the world community approach this adjustment so that the basics of social justice are respected? This is the component which the ILO has to bring to the efforts of international financial and trade bodies. If this is not done, it is as if treasuries and trade departments would take over the social and employment concerns of all countries. The labour and social affairs ministries would then be assigned a palliative role with insufficient resources.

The question facing us is that of the development model which our common world follows. Many of us have long entertained a rather simplistic belief that gradually the so-called developing countries would achieve the level of those whom we call developed nations, and that the countries in transition would just turn their system upside down and become industrialized democracies.

But we have to think that this rather simple and optimistic vision may, in fact, be fundamentally wrong. It is just as possible that the differences in development will be evened out in another, much less rosy way. Income differentials are growing everywhere. The coexistence of enormous wealth and extreme poverty is not a feature of the industrializing developing countries only. It is very much real in countries in transition. It is true for the capitals of major OECD countries in the Americas and in Europe too.

When old barriers go down, new ones begin to appear. We have new stratifications of our societies all over the world. There is growing exclusion within each of our societies, not only between them, and on close analysis we see that this also increasingly extends into working life. Some categories of workers are in relatively safe core activities while others, due to the changes in the structure of economic activities, are in a growing number of insecure, dependent functions. The further from centres of decision-making we go, the higher the risk of marginalization is.

This is a major challenge for us all, including the trade union organizations. Fragmentation and polarization in our societies provide ample breeding ground for the kind of extremism which threatens to blow up societies and produce internal conflicts and war. We should pause to reflect that it was exactly to minimize the risk for such disruptions that the ILO was founded 76 years ago. I fail to understand that someone could seriously think that the tripartite model of conflict prevention embodied by it would be obsolete now.

All of us develop methods to deal with difficult situations. My favourite one is that when nothing else helps, try common sense. Much of the debates that we have recently had should be subjected to some kind of common sense test. This concerns also the debate on the social clause – which we have unsuccessfully tried to rebaptize.

Now, what is the common sense approach? No one has convincingly denied that there is a link between trade and labour standards, although views differ on the nature of this link. It would seem generally accepted that trade advantage should be sought in a positive way and not through suppressing fundamental workers' rights. This conclusion would seem to stand independently of the question of whether we first should focus on liberalizing trade in the belief that that automatically improves labour standards, or that high labour standards first promote trade. This seems to be a chicken-and-egg discussion which certainly will be pursued, as you cannot really have the one without the other anyway.

Positive measures include dialogue, cooperation and assistance; investments in knowledge, innovation and skills; participatory management methods; the elimination of poverty to create the consumers which a successful economy needs; and giving people good reasons to believe in their future. The signs of desperation in the global labour market are due to a lack of appropriate rules. When countries, enterprises and also whole categories of workers are thrust into unfettered competition with one another, the result is insecurity for all. This pushes many into seeking comparative advantage at any cost, as there is no security that others will abstain from abusing their labour force.

We need to establish the basic level of security for promoting successfully global trade and investment. The question of a social clause is not more complicated than this.

In establishing these rules, we have to dwell on the positive measures which can be made use of when problems arise. They consist of advice, dialogue, assistance and cooperation. These take the form of measures where the ILO has the competence and which can be brought in whenever the appropriate monitoring of the global trade and investment system has identified the need for such measures.

In the debate on such a future system, some people shudder at the mention of possible sanctions. First of all, I should argue that dialogue and assistance are positive sanctions – which does not have to be a contradiction in terms – aimed at solving certain development problems. In the vast majority of cases where problems arise, they would be the right way to find solutions.

The feared trade sanctions would in all probability concern only a small number of hard-core cases. They certainly would not be applicable to the large, medium-sized and small democracies of both the developing and the developed world. I regret that the positive dimension of dialogue and assistance has largely been absent from the discussions on the social clause. Through it we could come to the conclusion that a social clause (or whatever we call it) would, when applied correctly, considerably support the democratic way of development and be beneficial for the large and growing number of countries who have decided to seek a better future for their people on that road.

There should be no taboos in a genuine discussion on what rules should apply in the much expanded global labour market. We have consensus on the importance of fundamental workers' rights, as was expressed by the Social Summit in Copenhagen. We are engaged in a debate on the future of our societies and the linkages governing that future – and no-one should be afraid of continuing this debate.

Original Spanish: Mr. CUSTER (representative, World Confederation of Labour) – Just 75 years ago, the World Confederation of Labour was founded in the Hague, the Netherlands. The ILO, recently established at the time, was also very closely connected with its creation, since it was present at the constitutional congress of the WCL. From its beginning, the WCL has also supported ILO action, in particular with respect to international labour legislation. Albert Thomas, in his report of 1925, confirms this in stating that trade unionists of our international Organization “devote particular attention to labour legislation, and are constantly endeavouring to bring influence to bear on the legislative authorities. Both in the national and international sphere they have done much to stem reaction and to hasten further progress”. It is for this reason that, with humility and modesty we wish to honour the memory of the trade unionists who preceded us and who, in very difficult circumstances, were unstinting in the defence of our values and ILO ideals.

Our organizations fully supported the ILO, and the ILO in turn sought this cooperation because it needed and continues to need the support of all trade union forces in order to accomplish its mission and carry out its role. The WCL organizations have attributed much importance from the outset to the fundamental principles of the Organization: universality and tripartism. At the 1970 Conference, the General Secretary of the WCL referred to the ILO as the "social conscience of the United Nations", and expressed the desire that it continue to be so more and more.

Today, the role that the ILO has played is more essential than ever. But we must face up to the new challenges and stress the fundamental role of the ILO in an absolutely necessary new international order.

We are now witnessing spreading globalization and interdependence throughout the world. This is a fact, and it may be a positive aspect for social progress, but this anarchical and irrational globalization without rules is leading us to a growing "duality" in society; in each country, power and riches are becoming concentrated in the hands of a few, which is worsening the dependency and poverty of Third World countries.

As we said earlier at the World Summit in Copenhagen: unemployment, poverty and social exclusion are the logical results of a certain model of development and an unfair system of international economic relations.

This problem stems from a liberal conception in which the market, the profit motive, unrestricted competition and flexibility are the determinant and virtually exclusive elements of the economy. The results are clear: 32 million unemployed in industrialized countries, 17 million men and women without employment in the European Union, and growing misery in the countries of the south.

If these consequences are serious for industrialized countries, they are even more so for the countries of the Third World and countries undergoing transition, where democratic advancements are jeopardized by misery. It is essential to realize that if a solution is not found to the problem of international trade (which is even more beneficial to industrialized countries), if a solution is not found to the problem of external debt, and if an end is not put to international financial speculation which sabotages any possibility of a productive and rational economy, we will never find a way out of the crisis.

We do not have even one more second to lose. There is no time left if disaster is to be avoided. The WCL, which invites you to join it in the celebration of its 75th anniversary, does not wish to be pessimistic or negative. But it would be worse not to share the anguish of being unable to react in time to dispel all the threats hanging over us.

These evils are spreading throughout the world. Some sectors are so accustomed to full enjoyment of individual freedoms that they do not realize, or probably never have realized, that the misery of others may contaminate the entire social structure and thus become the misery of all. It is no longer a matter of generosity, charity or solidarity. The current problem is one of survival of people worldwide. With the poorest countries allowed to continue to bear the burden of foreign debt, their people suffocating under adjustment plans whose sole objective is that of making them pay off their indebtedness to financial powers, with illiteracy and epidemics on the rise, with millions of men and women living without the slightest hope. All this is a very potent brew that will create extremely bloody and barbaric reactions; herein lie the seeds of extreme radicalism and homicidal and suicidal terrorism.

It is obvious that we recognize the importance of the market as a dynamic element of the economy. It is also clear that we defend an efficient economy, but we need one that is humane and rational. The market must be regulated and politically controlled by an effective democratic State which protects the interests of the society as a whole and the common good.

We must once again place mankind at the heart of all our objectives and actions, in a political, economic and trade sense. The mechanisms of mere economic profitability and unlimited competition are the very negation of everything that is human and every relationship involving brotherhood, coexistence and solidarity to which man aspires. We are heading toward the brink of an abyss – we must change course.

During the recent World Summit for Social Development, which many of you attended, the problem was assessed very clearly. Are we prepared to contribute the solutions that are needed as well as the appropriate means of arriving at them? It was pointed out earlier that the role and action of the ILO has to be strengthened. However, some groups are now threatening to withdraw or decrease their financial contributions. Is it because of lack of awareness, or are there more sordid reasons?

When he opened this session the President of the Conference made an appeal very similar to one currently being made by the WCL. What we need is more soul and a greater sense of urgency. Money and finances do not have this. Mr. Rosales Argüello, in referring to banks, said that nothing should be expected from them, because "banks are banks and they have no soul". This is our opinion as well, and we would also include international economic and financial institutions, which are mainly concerned with their role as safekeepers of their richest stockholders' assets.

Only a different world order – just as we attempted to describe at the 23rd WCL Congress in 1993 – which includes the basis of a different development model and new international economic relations will be able to ensure social progress and democracy in our societies.

It is essential that the United Nations and democratic control of financial and economic bodies be reformed. The International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, the World Trade Organization, and certainly the ILO, should coordinate with each other for a true development which goes beyond monetaristic policies.

It is impossible for the world's path to continue to be mapped out by a group of seven countries (it seems that in Halifax they have forgotten about Copenhagen) that are essentially defending their own interests.

The developed countries must arrive at an equitable solution for the problem of foreign debt with the sole condition being transparent management, and the refunding to countries of all monies that have been misused by their leaders.

We must promote international social legislation which protects the rights of the weakest, be they individuals, groups or countries. This includes laws which offer protection from the power exercised by the strongest, from deregulation, speculation and new types of slavery, and from new exploitation of the defenceless working masses who are bled dry or cast aside at the whim of an all-powerful market.

And it is for this reason that we defend the proposed social clause, but with the clear understanding that there will be neutral multilateral mechanisms which prevent any neo-protectionist shift.

We believe that the ILO must continue with the discussion – and extend it to other international bodies – concerning the fair application of social clauses which foster international legislation.

And finally, we must emphasize that despite certain reservations, the Report Promoting employment has some very positive aspects, specifically as regards application of the principles of the Copenhagen Summit. We fully support the Office's ratification campaign, and we also stress the importance of improving effectiveness in supervising the application of standards. These are measures which will enable us to make progress in the right direction. This is our most heartfelt desire, for the good of all and while there is still time. The WCL repeats that it will faithfully cooperate with the ILO, but we have no time to lose – as we have said, and we are firmly convinced – because tomorrow may be too late.

We cannot conclude without recalling that peace is an essential objective as reflected in the ILO's values. We express our solidarity with the peoples of Bosnia, Palestine and Chechnya, without forgetting the situation of Rwanda, Liberia and other countries throughout the world where human and social rights are being violated.

FIRST REPORT OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES:
SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) – The next item on our agenda this morning is the first report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

I give the floor to Mr. Boateng, Chairman of the Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. BOATENG (Government delegate, Ghana; Chairman of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the first report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives. This report is circulated in Provisional Record No. 16 and submits two resolutions authorizing Cambodia and Chad to participate in the vote.

The Finance Committee considered the requests received from the Governments of Cambodia and Chad and were satisfied that the failure of these Members to pay their contributions in the past has been due to conditions beyond the control of the Members, and thus adequate measures were proposed for the settlement of the arrears. The Finance Committee adopted two resolutions which proposed that, in conformity with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution, Cambodia and Chad should be given permission to vote. The draft resolutions before the Conference, which are modelled on previous ones of this kind, do not expressly refer to the restoration of the vote to the Members concerned. In this connection, it seems appropriate that – if the resolutions are adopted – they should enter into force at the same time. I therefore propose the following amendment to both resolutions before you, relating to the arrears of contributions of Cambodia and the arrears of contributions of Chad.

The title of the resolution for Cambodia should read "Resolution concerning the granting to Cambodia of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization".

The following paragraph should be added at the end of the resolution relating to Cambodia: "Decides that Cambodia be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, after the conclusion of the present business."

Similarly the title of the resolution for Chad should read "Resolution concerning the granting to Chad of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization", and the following paragraph should be added at the end of the resolution relating to Chad: "Decides that Chad be permitted to vote, in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization after the conclusion of the present business."

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) – You have heard the amendments to the report proposed by the chairman of the Committee.

If there are no objections, I shall take it that these amendments are adopted.

(The amendments are adopted.)

The adoption of the first report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives involves the adoption not only of the report itself, which is contained in paragraphs 1 to 15, but also of the two resolutions – as amended – that are appended to the report. These resolutions, which concern the granting of permission to vote to Cambodia and Chad, will be the subject of a record vote.

May I therefore first of all take it that paragraphs 1 to 15 of the report are adopted?

(Paragraphs 1 to 15 are adopted.)

RECORD VOTE ON THE RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE GRANTING TO CAMBODIA OF PERMISSION TO VOTE UNDER PARAGRAPH 4 OF ARTICLE 13 OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) – In accordance with article 13 of paragraph 4 of the ILO Constitution, the Conference may by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast by the delegates present permit a member State in arrears to vote if it is satisfied that the failure to pay is due to conditions beyond the control of the Member.

In accordance with article 19, paragraph 5, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, we shall now proceed to a record vote on the resolution concerning the granting to Cambodia of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization.

(A record vote is taken.)

The result of the record vote on the resolution concerning the granting to Cambodia of permission to vote under article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization is as follows: 248 in favour: 3 against: 1 abstention. The quorum is 258. Since a quorum has not been attained, the resolution is not adopted.

(The resolution is not adopted.)

I refer this body to article 20, paragraph 3(1), of the Standing Orders of the Conference: "Where a quorum has not been obtained in a vote by a show of hands or in a record vote, the President may take a record vote on the same question at one of the two following sittings". I therefore declare that a record vote on the same question will be taken again tomorrow morning.

Moreover, since a quorum has not been reached and it is apparent that the same situation would arise in respect of the second resolution concerning Chad, the record vote on that resolution too will be held tomorrow morning

(It is so decided.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) – We shall now resume the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. BOATENG (Government delegate, Ghana) – It is indeed a great honour for me once again to address this august assembly on behalf of the Government and people of Ghana. Allow me, therefore, to join with the previous speakers in congratulating the President and the Officers of the Conference on their well-deserved election to preside over the deliberations of this session. My delegation and I pledge our fullest cooperation in the interest of successful and fruitful debates.

Permit me also to commend the Director-General of the ILO for both his foresight and tireless efforts in responding promptly to the major challenges that seem to assail workers in various parts of the world as a result of the rapid socio-economic development taking place.

The theme for the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference Promoting employment could not have been more appropriate, coming immediately after the successful World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen in March 1995.

The Director-General has once again come up with a theme which is testimony to the fact that he is fully abreast with the challenging developments in the world of work. We hope his concern for the promotion of employment, and the International Labour Organization's determination to ensure that people throughout the world are gainfully employed to enable them to contribute effectively to the social and economic development of their countries will be supported by other concerned international organizations and agencies. Here again we hope that we can count on the usual generous support and cooperation of our friends in the developed countries.

The Director-General's Report undoubtedly seeks to address the realities of the rather dismal situation concerning job creation in the developing countries, especially Africa. We share the concerns expressed in the Report and seek no less than enhanced employment opportunities in our countries. However, with increasing pressures on the labour market as a result of the impact of economic recovery programmes and structural adjustment, people's perceptions of unemployment in our country today ought to be confronted objectively and scientifically.

In pursuance of this policy, we have strengthened tripartite consultations with our social partners to work out agreeable guidelines for determining wages, salaries and other working conditions based on the principles of productivity, profitability, elimination of waste, maximizing efficiency, social justice and the ability to pay.

These measures, if they are to make any meaningful impact on the working population, in view of the modernization process taking place in the economy, should also try to change people's attitudes to work, introduce cost-saving mechanisms at the workplace, eliminate waste and make optimal use of both human and material resources.

Our Government's policy shift from centralized planning to decentralization and the devolution of political power at the district level under the authority of the district assemblies which are now the focal points of political authority and development, is aimed at encouraging our labour force to stay in rural areas so that people can develop their own areas.

To support those initiatives, we have taken a number of measures aimed at helping unemployed people into work. These include Funds for Small and Medium-Sized Enterprise Development (FUSMED) supported by the World Bank, the Rural Business Women's Enterprise Development supported by the ILO and business start-up schemes carried out by the National Board for Small-Scale Industries (NBSSI).

Unemployment remains a global threat affecting all countries, both developed and developing. It will require a tremendous amount of resources to abate its ugly and unpleasant consequences. It is our belief that through the various cooperation and supportive activities we have embarked upon with the ILO and other donors, we shall be assisted in our determined efforts to provide employment for our people.

Our Government, through the adoption of a broad national socio-economic development policy, dubbed Vision 20 20, continues to make human resource development the cornerstone of our development programmes. Therefore, we share the sentiments of the Director-General of the ILO and consequently endorse fully the theme of this 82nd session of the International Labour Conference.

Since October 1992 we have, with the support of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), implemented an ILO-based programme on sustained employment generation. Through this programme we have strengthened our Ministry's capacity to generate and analyze employment data for the purposes of evolving policies on employment generation. Another important component of the programme is the improvement of vocational and technical institutions to provide our youth with employable skills for self-employment and entrepreneurial initiatives. Finally, we have also developed policies for enhanced micro and small-scale enterprise development and promotion in Ghana.

I have the mandate of my colleague, the Honourable Minister of Roads and Highways, to acknowledge with sincere gratitude the assistance of the ILO in helping our Ministry of Roads and Highways to institute viable labour-intensive road and construction programmes. Our Management Development and Productivity Institute has also collaborated with the ILO to develop capacity enhancement and "Improve your business" training programmes for local contractors, artisans and entrepreneurs. We are grateful for this technical assistance programme and are ready to share our experience with colleagues in our sub-region in particular and elsewhere in Africa when required.

As a developing country which is engaged in the development of infrastructure, appropriate technologies, agriculture, industry, trade, commerce, communications, health facilities, schools and transport systems, we have directed our policies and efforts towards harnessing the potential which abounds in our country as the key to our national socio-economic development programme.

It is to be noted however that acquiring, developing and modifying science and technology to our developmental needs have created certain distortions in our labour force. As a result, we need to redirect our vocational and technical training programmes and education to create a new labour force with the capacity to meet emerging challenges in the labour market. In this respect, we shall call on developed and friendly countries to support our efforts to make appropriate technology facilities available to our people.

In his Report, the Director-General rightly raised the issue of the marginalization of countries in our region and the apparent lack of adequately attractive investment policies. However, some countries, including Ghana, have implemented policies aimed at promoting investment in our countries. It is anticipated that our partners in progress will realize the tremendous potential that exists in our country and help us to develop it. At this point, we would like also to reiterate what has been stated here and in other forums, that a continued reduction in trade opportunities regardless of which guise it presents itself in, will only exacerbate an already grave situation in our region.

The ILO has been a special ally in our fight against unemployment. We are grateful for the ILO's support and believe that we shall continue to enjoy its assistance both technically and financially. Similarly, we wish to acknowledge the support and assistance we have received from our multilateral and bilateral donors as well as our friendly colleagues from developing countries.

To our colleagues in our sub-region of West Africa, with whom we have trade links and labour mobility facilities, we are most grateful. Let us remember that the problem of unemployment is a global phenomenon which should engage our collective attention and efforts.

Mr. ROUYNEKOV (Employers' delegate, Bulgaria) – On behalf of Bulgarian employers' organizations, I would like to congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents for being elected to their high positions, and wish them success in their work.

In Bulgaria, the transition to a market economy and the development of private enterprise have gradually enhanced the significance and the prestige of the employers' organizations and have increased the opportunity they have to influence national economic policy.

The employers gained the opportunity of acting as a counterweight to the trade unions which had risen to an extremely powerful position over the past years due to the populist governmental and syndical platforms that existed at the beginning of the transition period.

Attempts to restructure the economy through slogans, promises and short-term manipulations were brought to an end. They produced nothing for us, chances were wasted, and the economy collapsed. Turnover went through a difficult period. Enterprises were indebted primarily to the state banks that saved them without instituting refinance programmes. The lack of fresh money and new ideas at that time pulled financial and credit relations into a vicious circle. Prices shot up abruptly. Serious investors waited for the situation to calm down and demanded guarantees and preferences.

Changes took place throughout the system. The administration realized the role of enterprises as the only guarantors and implementers of this transition. Consultations were needed. The struggle for leadership slipped into the background.

Bulgarian employers link employment with political will and social dialogue.

The executive powers took into account our position and moved towards progress and understanding, and resumed social partnership despite the trade union position. We stated clearly that we were against any interruption in the social dialogue.

We insisted on the launch of special incentives aimed at employment promotion, tax incentives and practical help in the development of the small and medium-sized enterprises. A general outline has been given in this respect, but we have insisted that these incentives be clearly defined and that their mode of implementation be specified.

The Bulgarian employers draw up their positions in accord with each other. This has brought progress, but no miracles can be expected since all the employers' organizations have their own ambitions.

Employers' organizations need to be more widely involved on all issues.

In our opinion, the main reasons for unemployment are as follows: first, a disastrous loss of markets – both domestic and foreign markets have been squeezed. Second, investment promotion has been reduced practically to zero as a result of restrictive macroeconomic policies. The very tough situation led to a decrease in the number of jobs created.

Strict maintenance of trade embargoes imposed have had severe consequences for the Bulgarian economy. No one has compromised himself in easing the situation and compensating for damage. We are keen to see these restrictions ended, and working conditions return to normal. We would like to see an agreement with the international organizations on some relief for Bulgarian exporters and on the quotas to be set.

The lack of investment is clear for all to see; it has had a negative impact on the economy, and international projects are needed.

The Bulgarian economy shows signs of a revival. The inflation rate for 1994 was 120 per cent; lower, for the first four months of this year, it was down to 12 per cent and, for April 1995, it was only one per cent. This is a good indication that inflation is calming down.

Mr. Getchev, Bulgarian Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Economy Development, stated, in his presentation before the 1995 World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen, that he gave his support to full employment.

However, this is something that is difficult to achieve. Official statistics are scarce. The Government has had to use old data drawn from 1993, which indicate an unemployment rate of 16.4 per cent. The National Institute of Statistics, however, gives a figure of 20.5 per cent. According to our assessment, the real situation is even worse and the employment rate is even higher – with all the complications this entails.

We agree with the analysis made that the rapid rise of mass unemployment, inequality and poverty during the transition period was brought about by the fall in production, and that the prospects for the future continue to be bleak. There is no denying that the transition to a market economy has proved to be a difficult one.

Restructuring of existing institutions and establishing new market institutions has had a very high social cost, and will prove a time-consuming task.

The transition economies' share of world trade has fallen sharply and the inflow of direct foreign investment is underestimated. New economic institutions are being developed very slowly. Consequently, further trade liberalization and enterprise restructuring and privatization are an essential prior condition to achieving an optimal balance between adequate efficiency and bearable damage. Every mechanism that might assist this gradual transition therefore needs to be actuated, protection of non-collateralized credits should be dropped, export and import quotas should be increased and promotion given to the most important national companies. We link job creation with increased production and "relative progress" until the potential for competitive production for both domestic and foreign markets can be more clearly defined.

The basic criterion for new capacity potential is level of investment and infrastructure improvement. If reforms are to be boosted, we need a reliable property and funding market.

An important factor for investment in employment is training and retraining. Part of the funds put aside for training and retraining should go to the enterprises where they will be managed by employers who know best how to adapt to new production requirements.

Businesses in Bulgaria insist that integration into the European Union is the right approach for economic improvement.

The Bulgarian economy is an open one, and about 75 per cent of the gross domestic product is now accounted for by foreign trade.

Bulgaria is open to GATT and the WTO, and we highly appreciate PHARE programmes to support tripartite cooperation in Bulgaria.

Tripartite consultation and negotiation mechanisms should be improved through maintaining strong, representative and effective social partnership. This is where efforts should be focused and where discussions should be instituted for establishing reasonable solutions and for introducing more efficient measures for employment promotion.

There is a need for technical assistance, and dialogue should be maintained with the politicians at national and international levels. Unemployment has been correctly diagnosed as being a global problem, and there should be initiatives at international level to look for new solutions. Dealing with social problems will accelerate liberalization of trade and investment. Our objective is that measures be implemented to achieve an open and effective global economic system.

We welcome the studies on economic efficiency and unemployment reduction in which the ILO is playing a prominent role.

We will be happy to collaborate in attaining the above-mentioned goal, and we give our full support to the initiatives the ILO has launched.

It is not just those who aim for increased turnover and profits who deserve respect but also those who are searching for solutions to society's crucial problems.

Original Arabic: Mr. DAHLAN (Employers' delegate, Saudi Arabia) – I am pleased to congratulate the President on his election to preside over this session of the International Labour Conference and on the excellent way in which he has led our deliberations during the past two weeks. I also thank the Director-General for his Report to this session which is focused mainly on the very important theme of employment promotion.

This subject well illustrates the ILO's tireless quest to come to the assistance of workers and to guarantee their rights the world over. Employment is a matter of relevance to people of all countries. It is the development of mankind that is at stake, and the achievement of this objective justifies all possible efforts being made. The objectives of the constituents have changed somewhat with the passage of time. Now economic prosperity is the main priority of workers, and it is their qualifications that constitute one of the main factors of production, and thus of development, in all societies.

If the economic expansion of the developing countries is hindered by innumerable problems, this is not only due to a lack of natural resources, but also to imbalances inherent in the labour force, either of a quantitative or qualitative nature. It is therefore important to establish development objectives for Third World countries and to carry out in-depth studies of the situation of the labour force, so as to define the major problems affecting the labour market and thereby promote employment and employ human resources to the best possible advantage.

A balance should be established that takes account of all the new factors in the international economic arena, and integrated policies should be applied that put the emphasis on the best possible employment of human resources, so as to place society in a better position to increase production and to achieve a level of development that will guarantee the well-being of all. This is all the more important in that these economies need to become independent and autonomous and to become part of the world economy, the specialized activities of which require an increasingly qualified labour force, facts which economic restructuring programmes should take into account. These programmes can only be effective if they are based on energetic employment promotion policies and if they are supported by programmes to absorb unemployed persons and to encourage enterprise creation. It is therefore necessary to have specialized, well-trained workers who, through their dynamism, will contribute to development. This policy should have the support of governments and employers' organizations.

In this connection, I would like to inform you of the experience of the Government of Saudi Arabia in the field of employment promotion in our private and public enterprises. There have been considerable achievements made in this area, thanks to government and private sector initiatives and to measures taken within the framework of the Saudi Arabia development plan. The King himself has been particularly insistent that the national economy should serve to raise the standard of living of Saudi Arabian citizens in order to ensure the social stability of the labour force and to increase its productivity.

The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia has adopted an economic approach which is based, most particularly, on recruitment. The Government has developed specific programmes to evaluate requirements for blue-collar and white-collar workers in the various economic sectors. These workers are often brought in from abroad, and investments must be approved to increase the number of jobs and give the necessary boost to the continued economic development of Saudi Arabia.

With regard to working conditions in public and private sectors, Saudi Arabia is particularly keen to guarantee decent working conditions in the various occupations. Furthermore, the Government's wage policy aims to ensure just and equitable remuneration. With regard to training, responsibility lies not only with the State but also with the private sector and chambers of commerce and industry. These chambers of commerce, in cooperation with vocational training centres, play an important role in terms of improving skills in several sectors of the economy.

In conclusion, I would like to express my hope that our efforts will not only bear fruit, but also build upon the efforts made by the International Labour Organization to respond more effectively to the aspirations of the workers.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-EISSAI (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Oman) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. Allow me first of all to say how pleased I am to be able to participate in the work of this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I am honoured to convey to you the best wishes of His Excellency Sultan Qaboos bin Said, who wishes you every success in your work. I should also like to congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents on being elected to chair the deliberations of this Conference – and I am sure that, with God's help, their work will be crowned with success.

It augurs well for the future that the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference is being held at the same time as preparations are being made by the Sultanate of Oman to celebrate the 25th anniversary of the rebirth of the nation – led by His Majesty the Sultan on 23 July 1970. This movement, which is based on the belief that human beings are the means and ultimate goal of development, has set out to ensure a safe and stable life for all citizens, to achieve global development in all sectors of society and promote scientific and technological progress in all areas.

I should like to take this opportunity to express our appreciation for the fruitful cooperation between the ILO and the Sultanate. Indeed, the Organization sent a multidisciplinary mission under Mr. Shukri Dajani, Assistant Director-General of the ILO, to study the Sultanate's needs in the area of technical assistance. This mission carried out its work with success and, at the moment, we are examining the report it submitted with a view to implementing its recommendations in the light of the economic conditions prevailing in my country. We hope to strengthen our links of cooperation with the ILO and to open up areas of common interest between the Organization and the Sultanate of Oman. I would like to thank the members of the mission, as well as the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, who recently visited the Sultanate – thus demonstrating the Organization's interest in the membership of the Sultanate.

Furthermore, we should particularly like to benefit from the achievements of the ILO and apply the regulations laid down in its international labour standards. We agree with the contents of the Director-General's Report, Promoting employment, and firmly state that the Sultanate of Oman is determined to implement development strategies to eliminate all forms of unemployment, partial unemployment, low wages and low living standards. In so doing, the Sultanate is adopting a macroeconomic policy, encouraging savings and investment, supporting the system of free exchange and undertaking all necessary efforts to attract direct foreign investment – while introducing social and economic development projects.

The agenda of the Conference contains many interesting items of which the most relevant – in our opinion – is that concerning safety and health in mines.

It goes without saying that the Government of the Sultanate has always devoted considerable attention to occupational safety and health whilst also trying to maintain a healthy working environment. To this end, the Government has promulgated laws, regulations and standards guaranteeing a healthy environment for production and the protection of workers against any possible occupational hazards; it has also concentrated on training of workers in social, health, cultural and occupational areas in order to consolidate links between workers and employers and their cooperation in the area of occupational safety and health.

We hope that the discussions on safety and health in mines will have a positive outcome, likely to fulfil our objectives in the area of the protection of the working environment and safety of workers.

Anxious to update its legislation, especially its labour legislation, so that it is in line with the social and economic developments that have occurred since the rebirth of the nation in July 1970, the Government of the Sultanate recently adopted a decree to amend certain provisions of the Labour Code, especially those concerning disputes procedures in which an independent judicial body has the last word when the various parties fail to reach an amicable agreement.

We are awaiting the results of this Conference with optimism and hope because we believe that work has always been – and will continue to be – a prerequisite for human civilization – with all that this implies for spiritual, social and economic values.

God is the guarantor of success.

Original Spanish: Mr. GARCÍA SEGOVIA (Workers' delegate, Uruguay) – Mr. President, we represent the International Workers' Assembly – National Convention of Workers (PIT-CNT), which groups together all workers of Uruguay.

We would like to congratulate the President and the other officers on their election and for the efficient way in which they are conducting this Conference. We would like to particularly express our agreement with the central theme of the President's address. With respect to the theme presented by the Director-General, we think that it is extremely appropriate and well chosen. The promotion of employment has a priority interest for all workers.

The globalization of the economy with the opening of borders, State reforms, structural adjustment and the promotion of foreign investments, all of these have been carried out in harsh ways and without any transitional phase, have unleashed uncontrolled market forces, the most adverse effects being felt by the LDCs, condemning the majority of their working population to poverty. We do not deny the need to adapt to scientific development or new technologies or even to State reforms. But what we do reject is the new individualistic conception of society and humanity where competitiveness is worshipped like a God. According to this creed, the world is best off manufacturing any products, no matter what they are, as long as they are consumed. The ethical and solidaristic values of humanistic culture are left by the wayside, while leaders speak emptily about human rights. Those who indiscriminately propound these policies without adapting or adopting measures to defend the most vulnerable sections of society are principally responsible for this situation, and here we are referring to the great powers, to international financial organizations and to transnational companies which are more powerful even than many countries.

The Director-General says that world production in 1990 was almost double that of 1970 and that production per capita was 26 per cent more and if we forget the problems of distribution between countries, there has been considerable economic progress in each country.

So we have to ask how we can accept in silence the overwhelming rise of unemployment and poverty, the breakdown of families with its attendant ills of increase in child labour, crime, drug addiction, when there has been such an increase in wealth?

We do not accept the position of our governments and employers in their attacks on the labour legislation and regulation. For them the solution of problems arising from competition lies in the destruction of labour legislation and regulation. The Director-General gives us very important elements to go against this thesis and to destroy some myths. In a reference to the industrialized countries, which is also valid in its consequences for the entire working world, we are told that in Europe since the mid-1980s, when States have renounced the system of automatic indexation of salaries, wage increases have lagged behind increases in productivity. Therefore the increase in unemployment cannot be attributed to "excessive wages". With respect to the consequences of "inappropriate industrial relations", which are said to contribute to European unemployment, the thesis of the superiority of decentralized bargaining structures has been invalidated.

The Report also examines the view that safety rules have been a brake on the creation of new jobs, and that the cost of compensation for dismissal has discouraged hiring, concluding that in most countries which acted to reduce such payments in Europe, the main affect was to shift employment from full-time to temporary employment, confirming that the security regulations do not decrease employment.

Turning now to the ILO: for many years employers have been saying that the labour-setting activity of the ILO has now achieved its objective. At the beginning of every session, the Employers refuse to vote in favour of the adoption of new Conventions, arguing that those in existence should first be revised to make them more flexible. Governments then manage, by a small majority, to agree to the study of new Conventions as long as they are sufficiently flexible. The consequence is generally that the new Conventions adopted in recent years have been surprisingly and discouragingly innocuous. They cannot be implemented, and they do not really impose obligations, limiting themselves merely to recommendations. The ILO's work in setting labour standards was initially the raison d'être of its existence. It was incorporated into the Treaty of Versailles to prevent unfair competition between States and to make working conditions more humane. If we eliminate these bases we will be undermining the very essence of the Organization, and naturally, if that were to happen, the workers would lose interest in participating actively with all the foreseeable consequences such action would bring.

The solutions suggested by the Director-General seem to be very difficult to achieve. Starting from the premise that the present situation is morally unacceptable and economically irrational, the Report concludes by proposing the creation of mechanisms for coordinating action on the domestic and external front. In relation to the former, it believes in the possibility of growth without inflation, with cooperation agreements between workers and employers. On the external front it advocates equilibrium of the balance of payments to favour more rapid economic growth through action at the international level, due to the reduction of national policy autonomy. It also mentions the debasement of labour standards as a problem to be corrected as a palliative "debt-relief measures for severely indebted countries as well as enhanced trade preferences for the least-developed countries", all of which require greater international macroeconomic harmonization. These are all difficult paths to follow.

In our country, as far as unemployment is concerned, the Government has not exhibited the expected receptivity. True, Law No. 16.320 has created a specialized body for labour retraining, with tripartite participation in its management. Nevertheless, there will be some surprise that this Labour Reconversion Fund is exclusively financed by the workers. Government participation in the direction of this Organization has been far less than that necessary if it is to achieve its objectives, and the evident indifference of the Employers' representatives has hampered its operation, while the Ministry of Labour has not given it the necessary infrastructure. Other organizations in this same field, on account either of their limited scope or of a lack of infrastructure, have had little impact on the level of unemployment.

We hope that the new Minister of Labour of our country, having spoken so enthusiastically on this subject before this Conference, will carry out the measures she announced.

We would like to say that in Uruguay we have recently approved a fiscal adjustment whose costs also fall on wage-earners, retired persons and pensioners, causing considerable reductions in their income. The objective of this was to achieve fiscal balance and promote exports, but the contribution of capital in this sacrifice was absent.

A draft Social Security reform is now under consideration in the Legislature, and has specific reference to the system of retirement and pensions. Under this reform benefits are decreased, the number of years of work required to qualify are increased, and private sector management of funds is proposed. It is not advisable that a commercial company, whose objective according to liberal doctrine, is to make a profit, should be in charge of managing the compulsory savings accumulated over the entire active life of all workers, especially in view of the constant news of bankruptcies, even in banks with the most solid reputation.

In conclusion, we would like to express our wish for the further strengthening of ILO, we would like to extend our greetings to all participants in this Conference and through them to all the workers in the world.

Original Spanish: Mr. BERNAL CAMERO (Workers' delegate, Cuba) – I would like to congratulate Mr. Rosales Argüello for the admirable way in which he is presiding over this session of the Conference. We as Latin Americans are especially proud of his work.

The Report of the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Hansenne, is very interesting. It is well written and thought-provoking, and presents the most important problems to be resolved by governments and employers of all countries.

Without full employment, the most cherished aspirations of human beings, such as freedom and other aspirations, cannot really be realized anywhere.

For many centuries, humanity has been subjected to chronic and apparently permanent inequality, and in the last few years this inequality has been strengthened still more by the fact that the rich are trying to determine the fate of the whole world.

The hope of finding a solution to the problem of unemployment is faint if not non-existent. Everything seems to indicate that at the end of this session, if we continue on the same path, no matter how many new jobs are created the number of unemployed persons will actually rise.

To put an end to such despair, we would have to mobilize all the capitals of the world to work towards this objective. So far there has been no sign of such a mobilization.

The structural adjustment policies that are being applied are brutal and inhuman. Many trade union leaders and other persons have expressed and described this in their own terms.

The brilliant statements made at this session of the Conference are no doubt extremely valuable contributions to assessing the present and future situation. They should lead the ILO and its Governing Body to consider the solutions suggested very clearly and calmly, so that more appropriate measures can be taken to solve the very serious problems that hamper the full realization of social justice.

I consider this a very timely opportunity to address questions of interest to the ILO and to my trade unionist colleagues.

During all of the festivities held in Cuba for International Workers' Day, we read a message convening the 17th Congress of the National Committee of our workers' union, the CTC.

This Congress will be held at the end of April 1996. As on other occasions, the agenda will be discussed by trade union leaders and workers from the grass-roots level. This process will be a genuine expression of trade union democracy.

Taking into consideration the general interests of the workers, the CTC and its unions will give due attention to the justified claims of labour collectives and to the individual rights of each worker. All of this requires new approaches, a new style of work and a new mentality. It also requires employers to play fully their role so that we can be able fully to play our own with creativity and responsibility.

We are discussing these and many other questions. But our discussions should really focus on how we will adapt now and later as the country's development prospects change. How can we maintain the unity which has been, and remains, the indispensable precondition for our strength? What can we do to maintain a revolution of the workers, by the workers and for the workers?

We are aware of the very complex situation facing the Cuban nation. It is the most difficult problem in its brief and heroic history.

The economic strategy which has been set out by the Government under the leadership of Fidel Castro Ruz, which rejects neo-liberal solutions and so-called shock therapies which are opposed to our ideas and interests, is the only possible reply to the situation prevailing in the world today. It is the only possible answer to the anachronistic blockade which is attempting to make us surrender by inflicting upon us hunger and disease.

The blockade inter alia has the effect of increasing unemployment and reducing the standard of living of all Cubans.

Cuban workers would greatly appreciate any steps taken by the Director-General in his high post and with his well-recognized skill to insist on the need to put an end to the blockade. This is the position which has been expressed by the General Assembly of the United Nations for three straight years.

According to the Government's strategy which I referred to above, state enterprises will continue to play an important role in the economy, and cooperatives will play a decisive role in the production of sugar cane and other agricultural products and in the livestock sector.

These socialist forms of property ownership and production will co-exist with the presence of foreign capital and other elements of the capitalist economic system.

We know that we have to find ways to create a more efficient and competitive economy, with reduced costs and high quality of production.

This strategy demands, together with the measures we adopt to improve the national financial situation and to bring about economic recovery, other measures, such as the rationalization of the workforce, aimed at applying the revolution's principle that no worker should be unprotected.

The policy is aimed at ensuring a voluntary transfer of available workers to enterprises and cooperatives which require manpower and to new jobs, which will have to be created. This includes the retraining of workers and the extension of different forms of self-employment, in addition to making available unused lands to families who would like to settle on them.

We think that the transformations under way in Cuba are a real basis on which the International Labour Organization can work to meet our aspirations for technical cooperation with our country, and especially with the workers.

Our congress will examine many important subjects. For instance, we will discuss how to defend our historic values and moral customs in the face of those who are trying to weaken these principles and who work in favour of intolerable privileges and the encouragement of corruption in our society.

We will consider, in particular, the presence of trade unions in new economic entities such as joint ventures, basic production cooperatives and others, whose workers must be represented and assisted in defending their legitimate rights by freely elected leaders, chosen as always in Cuba by direct and secret ballot, without interference from employers, management or state or party bodies.

Mr. WIN (Workers' delegate, Myanmar) – I feel very much honoured and delighted to have this opportunity to deliver an address at this tripartite assembly as a Workers' delegate from Myanmar. First of all, may I congratulate the President on his unanimous election to this high office. I have full confidence in his ability to conduct this session of the Conference. His vast and rich experience and wisdom will ensure that this session will bear fruitful results which will be beneficial to all the working masses of the world.

May I also take this opportunity to congratulate and commend the Director-General for his superb Report entitled World Employment 1995. I am indeed very much encouraged and would like to express my sincere appreciation for his promptness in responding to the accords concluded at the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen early this year. There is no doubt that employment matters are the concerns of us all. Indeed, employment is the prime source of income for the livelihood of workers and their dependents. Needless to say, it is an important factor of human dignity.

This being so, our Government has adopted employment-oriented plans and programmes with a view to promoting employment opportunities. Presently, there seems to be no serious unemployment problem prevailing in our country. And yet, we are constantly on guard in monitoring any indication or sign of a serious unemployment problem which, to say the least, can become a threat to society.

Thanks to the adoption and implementation of the policy of all-round development by my Government, along with the policy of transformation and trade liberalization, employment opportunities are rising in various sectors of the economy. Likewise, the services sector and informal sector are also expanding at a rapid rate which makes possible the formation of substantial income-generating employment for a large number of workers. I am fully confident that the market forces will have their tremendous impact on the creation of large employment opportunities.

As a Workers' delegate from the Union of Myanmar, allow me to support and hail the message made by the Chairman of the State Law and Order Restoration Council in honour of both white- and blue-collar workers throughout the Union on the auspicious occasion of 1995 Workers' Day, which falls on 1 May. The message mentioned the crucial role of workers in national development endeavours. It also reiterated that the present encouraging performance of the national development plans is attributable to the concerted efforts of workers and peasants. It further exhorted all workers to continue striving to fulfil or even surpass the targets set for the 1995-96 yearly economic plan, to boost the production of goods and services, and also to improve the quality of products. It urged workers actively to participate in working towards the emergence of a new state Constitution which will bring about a peaceful, prosperous and modern nation.

Allow me to emphasize that the working people in Myanmar are being given their proper place in every national political, economic and social affair. To give you a concrete example, let me inform you that a workers' delegate group has been participating actively in the National Convention, along with other delegate groups, for framing the new Constitution on a firm and enduring basis. Let there be no doubt that Myanmar's workers will have their legitimate rights and proper protection enshrined in the new Constitution.

As a gesture of our acknowledgement of the genuine goodwill of the Government towards the workers and its resolute concern for the welfare and general well-being of workers, we pledged to strive harder for increased productivity. We resolved to give further impetus to the improvement of the national economy and the successful implementation of the development plans. Furthermore, we are determined to follow the guidelines as outlined in the above Workers' Day message, that workers need to be diligent and well-disciplined to possess the essential qualification of an efficient worker.

Our country is rich in both natural and human resources. There is no doubt that human resources need to be tapped and developed properly so as to meet the growing demand of economic and industrial undertakings. In this regard, may I conclude by saying that demand-oriented strategies should be emphasized in the planning and administration of human resources, with a view to giving a helping hand to the newly adopted market economic system of our country.

Original Bulgarian: Mr. DIMOV (Workers' delegate, Bulgaria) – On behalf of the Community of the Free Syndicate Organizations in Bulgaria, allow me first of all to congratulate Mr. Rosales Argüello on his election to the office of President of the 82nd

Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents who together with the President have the difficult and responsible task of guiding the discussions, the report of the Governing Body and that of the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, entitled Promoting employment. The excellent explanation of the problems and of the ways to promote employment provide an overview of the situation in the world. We must all contribute to the implementation of the main points and recommendations in the Report, taking into account the views of all the social partners and endeavouring to find common ground, even if we have to reach a compromise, in accordance with the values of the International Labour Organization, namely the progress and welfare of all people around the world without distinction on the grounds of sex, race, faith or political affiliation.

All countries in transition have faced similar processes over the past five years of democratic change.

These problems have been particularly serious in Bulgaria as a result of misguided reform models implemented under the pressure of international financial organizations. Unfortunately, this pressure has not diminished nor has the approach been changed. The problems can be seen through: a 30 per cent fall in gross domestic product as compared to 1989, due to rapid liberalization, the loss of traditional markets, and the direct and indirect adverse effects of observance of United Nations embargoes; a sharp increase in the number of people unemployed, reaching 18 per cent of the active population; a more than twofold decrease in the real income of the population, which for over 85 per cent of the people means that they are living on income which is below the social minimum. This was caused by the transformation of state property which has led to hidden privatization which lays the main burden of the reforms on the workers; the failure of the legal framework to provide guarantees for the transitional process, which has led to chaos and a lack of confidence among the population in democratic changes; the fact that social dialogue has been hampered by political bias and confrontations among trade unions, which reduces confidence in trade unions; an increase in corruption and an unprecedented crime rate; the reappearance, after 25 years, of diseases which we believed we had eliminated; moral and spiritual degradation.

All of these problems must be overcome by various means, the most important of which are the following: development of legal instruments to stabilize the financial system. (It should be pointed out that over the past few years, 25 per cent of GDP was represented by credit without collateral. This has been a barrier to the implementation of mass privatization programmes); the implementation of mass and socially-oriented privatization which would allow workers and pensioners to be at least partially compensated for the national wealth created by them and which was taken from them during the last years of the totalitarian regime; the step-by-step restructuring of the economy which would diminish the risk of unemployment and create jobs; a reduction in the inflation and basic interest rate which would stimulate domestic and foreign investment, and which would, as a result, increase potential for promoting employment; the establishment of stable quotas as a percentage of GDP for the cultural sphere, which would prevent the degradation of society and create a new set of values for the people; separation of social insurance funds from the state budget and the placing of these funds under tripartite management; a new form of social dialogue which is politically independent and aims to find optimal solutions to the main difficulties facing workers.

The initial negotiations between the Government and social partners within the National Council for Tripartite Cooperation were carried out under favourable economic conditions. The inflation rate has fallen threefold over the first five months of the year as compared to the same period the previous year and industrial production has increased. This has led to the adoption of a package of social agreements regulating the income of the main social groups.

Measures have been taken to ensure the full payment of income and social benefits to pensioners this year. This will lead to a gradual increase in incomes which would bring them closer to the social minimum by the end of the year. The wage mechanism has been liberalized in industrial enterprises and a new mechanism has been adopted for people working in the public sector.

Within the framework of tripartite cooperation, a new mechanism for social contact was introduced. Hence, an information database must be set up, organizational and material conditions must be improved so that efficient activities may be pursued and draft legislation must be brought into line with trade union demands. The proposals of our colleagues from other trade unions are of great importance and we hope that they will contribute to the improvement of these new mechanisms.

Due to the extreme importance of the laws being adopted now, which should be designed to offset the adverse effects of the crisis on income and employment levels, we are concerned that the Government is drafting legislation without consulting us. Unlike our Polish colleagues, we have no opportunity directly to participate in drafting legislation at the national level. However, our relations with all parliamentary factions allow us to submit our proposals to the National Assembly.

Our attention is mainly focused on active tripartite dialogue aimed at concluding collective agreements in all branches and enterprises. If this is not possible, we will organize protest activities within the framework of the law. The Community of the Free Syndical Organizations in Bulgaria is also trying to work out proposals to find solutions to problems so far ignored by Parliament and the Government.

We share the concerns expressed by the ILO with regard to education and have accepted UNESCO and ILO proposals in this sphere and submitted our requests to all state institutions. These requests are accompanied by arguments put forward by our experts and aimed at the priority development of this area. For us, this would mean minimal obligatory amounts from the state budget and would be earmarked as follows: secondary education – 5.5 per cent; higher and college education – 1.5 per cent; scientific research – 0.6 per cent; culture – 0.6 per cent.

The adoption of such laws will slow down the emigration of highly qualified specialists and, consequently, the outflow of our national potential. It will promote employment and our economy will be able to take advantage of the high educational level of the workers. It will also provide an opportunity for the training and retraining of the unemployed. New technologies and scientific advances will be introduced and developed with the help of qualified staff. Each individual will have the possibility for self-fulfilment which indeed is the ultimate objective of every democratic State.

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. POPESCU) – Let us once again resume the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. JENNINGS (representative of the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical, Professional and Technical Employees) – I am speaking on behalf of FIET, the 11-million strong International Federation of Commercial, Clerical, Professional and Technical Employees. We are the global union federation for private services, professionals and employees in industry and high technology. Our members are on the cutting edge of corporate, technological and structural change where the information society is not a dream but a daily reality. In services employment has expanded but the upheaval in business strategies has cut jobs and changed jobs.

Today we see growing disparities in wealth. The gap is growing between nations and within nations. In 1994, the 48 poorest nations became poorer.

There is a greater distance between the “haves” and the “have-nots”. In the information society, there will be new distinctions between the “knows” and the “know-nots”. The “knows” will be the new conductors on the information superhighway; the “know-nots” will be on a different road named exclusion.

We welcome the Director-General’s Report on employment. The Report emphasizes once again that fighting unemployment and poverty is the priority. The ILO should be looking more into what this new information society means to wealth creation, jobs, working conditions and opportunity. If you are a “know-not” you are bypassed by technological change. What does this mean to civilization, to democracy, to the economy?

In an atomized society, where is the place for solidarity, for community, for welfare? Because of this we support and look forward to the conclusions of the Committee on Home Work.

We are told that security of employment has gone forever – but what new and socially responsible thinking are we seeing from governments and businesses to retrain and re-employ the innocent victims of change? Unfortunately, many governments and business leaders fail to recognize that there are limits to competition.

We need a new sense of global purpose based on partnership, dialogue, respect for basic human dignities and on sustainable development. Why not give the dialogue and partnership economy an opportunity? A dialogue based on free trade unions and responsible employers; partnership because everyone should have a stake in the creation of wealth. A business is be more likely to meet market challenges if it adopts an approach based on dialogue and a commitment to high ethical standards. Those that accept dialogue, transparency and involvement will be the winners in the global economy.

Today we see businesses publishing so-called vision statements – but with precious little few of a social or human vision. There is a growing demand by workers and their unions, shareholders and consumers for higher ethical standards and that includes human rights and employment conditions.

Unfortunately, old-time reactionary thinking has been directed against the social clause. Perhaps if it had been termed “competitiveness through dialogue clause” or “cooperation and competitiveness clause”, then the opportunities for consensus would have been better. Because that is what the clause is all about.

Neither the ILO nor the World Trade Organization (WTO) can turn away from the challenge to build a social dimension to change. Ways always have to be found for the ILO and WTO to look at the social consequences of a global market place on people. What will the people say when they discover that the WTO can discuss the shelf-life of hot dogs, the storage of oranges and grapefruits and the fungicide used in red wine and yet fail to discuss the conditions of production and people’s basic rights.

The World Summit for Social Development made steps in the right direction and we applaud the initiatives taken by the Director-General to follow up the Summit’s recommendations. His campaign to promote fundamental standards shows the oppressed that we have a champion for basic human rights.

The FIET World Congress takes place in July in Vienna under the theme “One world, one voice, solidarity”. It will be our largest congress with over 1,000 participants. We will be developing FIET’s strategy into the twenty-first century on the information society, the social dimension to globalization, child labour, trade union organization and the working environment.

Our affiliates are taking the message to new generations of workers in new century jobs, to young workers, women and professional and managerial staff, that they need to be union members. They are responding and our unions are growing. We also have a global campaign to recruit professional and managerial staff. We welcome the new recognition that the ILO has given to them. And we look forward to working together with the ILO to ensure that they all have the right to join trade unions.

In FIET we are prepared for the twenty-first century. We have a global and regional structure that is campaigning for social justice, globally and regionally.

In Europe we have developed a social dialogue with employers in the services sectors which encompasses millions of our members covering such topics as trading, security and working time. We are building union-management company councils and we in negotiation today with over 50 companies to introduce such councils. Unions and management, through dialogue, are thus trying to build a new era in labour relations. Whether it is in ASEAN, APEC, NAFTA or MERCOSUR, ways have to be found of developing a dialogue with trade unions. It may take different shapes and forms. If business and government cooperate in these initiatives then a way must be found to include the unions in this dialogue on the tripartite principles of the ILO.

A global economy is taking shape but of course the nation State is not dead – although their options are more limited. Last year I spoke here in this hall of the power of financial markets: “FIET warns you today of the changes of a collapse of the uncontrolled financial derivative market which will have repercussions on markets everywhere.” Since then we have seen the collapse of Barings Bank, a collapse brought about by old-fashioned greed and an absence of management discipline. We have seen the peso crisis in Mexico which sent shockwaves throughout all emerging markets.

We should be finding ways of giving the cold shoulder to hot money – to ensure that these investments are linked to portfolios and not purely financial instruments. What chances do the newly democratic nations of Central and Eastern Europe, the emerging markets in Asia and Africa, have when in the pursuit of speculative profit, entire financial plans are wrecked by financial markets? For economic progress we require some sense of certainty, of stability and of continuity in financial markets. We do not have it today and it is costing us jobs. In Mexico, in February alone, 350,000 jobs were lost. We need new standards of corporate financial governance. In our campaign to improve ethics to develop a social vision in business, we are confronted with those that simply refuse to be good world citizens.

Let us take “Toys R Us” as an example; they have declared war on any union that seeks normal collective bargaining arrangements with them. We are supporting a strike in “Toys R Us” in Sweden. We have in “Toys R Us” a very serious collapse in corporate ethics; and we warn them that we are in this struggle for the long-term.

The same lack of ethics is rife amongst those businesses that exploit child labour. In FIET we have millions of members in retailing and they want to know more about where and how products are made. We want to reach agreement with employers to eliminate child labour and to help those nations ensure that it is the adults and not the children that go out to work. The ILO’s work on child labour is to be applauded and further developed.

In closing, in my references to a social dimension, to achieving competitiveness through dialogue and to the need for solidarity, it is clear that the ILO has an important and critical role to play. We condemn those that now play with the destiny of this Organization and all this it has achieved for the sake of domestic politics.

The global economy requires an ILO; workers require the ILO to provide social justice; employers require the ILO because it establishes core standards to help them determine corporate policy and practice.

We need a stronger, not a weaker, ILO. We believe that there will be a voter backlash against globalization when they discover that the ILO, one of the pillars of fairness in today’s harsh global economy, is under threat. We need a new approach to resolve today’s inequalities. Pure capitalism will not work, the planned economy did not work. Through the ILO we should give the dialogue and partnership economy a chance.

Mr. GRAY (Workers’ delegate, United States) – I have decided to restrict my remarks today to the question of a social clause, firstly because I strongly believe the inclusion of such a clause in trade agreements is vital to the continued well-being and development of workers of both the third world and the industrial countries. I have said it before and I will continue to say it again, and again, and again.

In all my years of trade union experience, I have never heard a concept more maligned, more twisted and more deliberately distorted than that of a social clause. What are we talking about? I could better understand a discussion or even a dispute if we have a language of a social clause to debate but no one has crafted the language of a social clause, no one has crafted the language of “linkage”, no one has crafted any language on “sanctions”.

All this may eventually come from the WTO, if it decides to set up a working party and if the working party ever manages to come up with a draft.

What are we really talking about? In plain and simple language, we are talking about the enforcement of existing ILO standards: the ILO Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29); the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87); the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98); the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100); the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105); the Plantations Convention, 1958 (No. 110) [and Protocol, 1982]; and the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138). All of these Conventions, with the exception of No. 138 on minimum age have received well over 100 ratifications involving somewhere between 70 per cent and 85 per cent of the ILO’s constituents. Further, many of the Governments which are so stridently vocal in their opposition to any social clause have already ratified several, if not all, the so-called “core conventions”. Why then the hue and cry? The only conclusion one can draw is that there is a large element of hypocrisy involved – that these countries are not applying and not enforcing the provisions of those Conventions which they made such a show of ratifying. They are fearful, one might say almost paranoid, of the possible ramifications that some sort of social clause including these conventions might be incorporated in trade agreements. In the meantime their workers – the backbone of the nation – pay the penalty of deprivation and rampant exploitation.

Workers do not expect nations to live beyond their commitments but we have every right to expect them to live up to those commitments.

The workers' goal is to seek to enhance and enrich trade between nations. After all what purpose of enterprise can there be more worthy of promoting by democratic societies than the improvement of the conditions of those who do the work and create the values to be exchanged.

But if the multilateral system is not grounded in that pursuit and more particularly in the notion that economic and social progress are wholly dependent on one another, then it cannot fulfil its proper role as a catalyst for progress.

We have no quarrel with capital and markets as such. Trade unions emerged from them, learned to live with them and become the instruments by which they are humanized. But as we do not expect Governments to reform themselves, we do not expect the pursuit of profit to embrace a loftier mission. Capital flows freely across borders and enables flagless and stateless corporations to shop the world for the cheapest, most depressed labour. To say that the question of human and trade union rights somehow stands totally apart from all this is to deny reality.

Our experience in the United States, and I am certain it is replicated in other industrialized countries, is that there is no despot on earth that good gentlemen of commerce will shun if there is money to be made. And there is no limit to the depth to which so-called "market pressures" will drive wages and working conditions in the absence of enforceable standards on freedom of association, the right to organize and bargain collectively, the elimination of forced labour, discrimination in employment and child labour.

This is why such standards are needed and why they should be incorporated in some form in both bilateral and multilateral trading agreements. For my organization, the AFL-CIO, the question of whether labour and human rights standards should be part and parcel of such agreements has long been settled.

Look at history if you will. Where such standards have been pressed and tested and pressed again without flinching or retrenchment, they have been instrumental in helping ordinary working people cast off the yoke of totalitarian repression. Look at the former Soviet Union. We see democracies emerging there today because the Western democracies refused to incorporate a repressive system into the channels of world commerce.

Look at South Africa. Does anyone doubt that last year's non-racial elections would have taken place had it not been for the application of international trade sanctions?

And look at Chile. Today it is a democratic country because its working people courageously demanded their freedom and my country sided with them by revoking their oppressors' special trade privileges.

These events have given body to the idea that freedom comes not from on high, not from governments or ministries, but from the ground, from the workplaces and the streets, wherever ordinary people, backed up by enforceable international standards, stand up and declare that they mean to live on their feet and not on their knees.

Putting standards in place in trade agreements is not only a moral and just thing to do but it is also an economic imperative.

Around the globe the labour of millions of men, women and children is still obtained by force, intimidation or sheer desperation. Many live or die solely at their employer's discretion. These workers are neither players nor beneficiaries in the international free market system. They are its pawns.

The economic consequences are a matter of plain common sense. If workers do not earn enough to purchase the goods they make, you will end up with too many workers with too little money chasing too many goods and services.

On the other hand, a democratic experience has shown that workers who are free to pursue their fundamental rights through their own democratic institutions have been remarkably successful in building the strong consumer markets that support industrial growth and development.

In conclusion, what do workers want? Two things. First, recognition by the world trading system that the spectacle of corporations roaming the world in search of the cheapest and most repressed labour is more perversely protectionist than any tariff or quota and that it serves in the last analysis to restrict and undermine markets and lower standards the world over.

Second, we also want, in the interests of basic fairness and the continuing elevation of the human condition, that the denial of basic workers' rights should be clearly defined internationally as the unfair trading practice that it is.

Original Arabic: Mr. ABDOUN (Workers' delegate, Sudan) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. On behalf of the General Confederation of Workers of Sudan, I would like to extend my greetings to all the participants in the Conference.

As we are considering the Report of the Director-General on the promotion of employment, we should like to express our gratitude to the International Labour Organization for the efforts it has made in this field. The problem of unemployment is a vital one; it has been given top priority in most of the countries of the world, and especially in the developing countries where workers are deprived of social security and unemployment benefits. These are essential human rights.

At a time when the ILO is considering the topic of the promotion of employment, we regret to note that the Organization is being inconsistent in its own policy. It is supporting structural adjustment policies and market economics on the terms laid down by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. The International Labour Organization must not view things from the perspective of the industrialized countries which are intent upon pillaging the resources of developing countries in order to reduce their exports and increase their imports from industrialized countries. We would like the ILO to help the countries of the Third World reduce their debt to the rich countries, which provide them with assistance subject to unfair conditions.

We believe this is a new form of colonialism. This is confirmed by the advent of an unfair new world order whose advocates are attempting to interfere in the internal affairs of other countries, to foment trouble, provoke tribal and regional conflicts and subject the poor countries to the hegemony of the rich countries. We cannot accept that the ILO should make its technical assistance dependent on political conditions or that it should toe the line of one of the international trade union federations which represent the workers in this new world order.

In spite of all this, we have not lost hope for the ILO, which represents the conscience of the international community because of its tripartite structure.

This is why we would like the ILO to work within each member country, especially as regards employment issues and the situation of workers. Our Organization should not let itself be influenced by the acts of imperialist, colonialist and Zionist countries. These countries are in fact waging war on the peoples of the world; they punish them if they refuse to accept the regimes imposed by them. I would like to offer the example of my own country, Sudan, which has been suffering from a war in the south. This is a war which has been provoked and financed by colonialist forces, who continue to provide weapons for the war. This war has had a serious impact on the Sudanese economy and on employment in the country. When the Sudanese people lose trust in a regime it is capable of overthrowing it. It has, for example, had two people's revolutions, in October 1964, and in April 1985.

We would urge the ILO to strengthen its efforts to help restore peace in southern Sudan. Workers' organizations in both North and South are working for peace. Thanks to the will of the Sudanese people in both the North and the South, there is peace and security in 90 per cent of southern Sudan. I should also mention the rapid development of the trade union movement in the South. The trade unions and confederations of workers which have been set up in most southern states are playing a positive role in favour of peace.

The situation of the Arab workers in Palestine and in the occupied Arab territories, despite the measures taken to advance the cause of peace...

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. PO-PESCU) – Please do not digress from the item on the agenda.

Original Arabic: Mr. ABDOUN (Workers' delegate, Sudan) – I am speaking of job opportunities for Palestinian workers. This is a topic which was addressed by the Director-General in his Report. To respect the President's request, I will sum up my point briefly.

Israeli stubbornness and arrogance are responsible for the failure of all attempts to provide employment for Palestinian workers. To bring pressure to bear on Israel and to protect Palestinian workers and the Palestinian people, it is necessary to set up a special committee of the International Labour Conference, along the lines of the Committee on Apartheid. Such a committee would consider violations committed by Israel in the occupied Arab territories.

Finally, I would like to transmit to this Conference the protest of the Confederation of Workers of Sudan against the actions of the Italian Government, which through its embassy in Khartoum, refused to grant an entry visa to a Sudanese trade union leader who wanted to travel to Italy to come to this session. I ask that the International Labour Office take note of this protest and forward it to the Government of Italy ...

(The President interrupts the speaker.)

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. PO-PESCU) – You must heed what I am saying, Sir. We have well-established rules here.

Original Arabic: Mr. ABDOUN – I do not think that I am departing from the Report of the Director-General.

Mr. RAMAGIMAGI (Government delegate, Fiji) – It is indeed an honour and a privilege for me to speak on behalf of the Fiji Government concerning the topic of safety and health in mines in Fiji.

First and foremost, I would like to congratulate the members elected to office and I am certain that their contribution to the Conference will be of the highest standard. I would also like to thank and congratulate the members of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference in 1994 for completing such an excellent framework in which to set safety and health standards in such a hazardous and risky industry, especially in the critical area of occupational safety and health and in regard to the welfare of the industry's workers.

I would now like to provide a brief overview of the state of safety and health in Fiji's mining industry and then go on to identify some of the possible strategies that will align the ILO's framework as proposed by the ILO Committee on Safety and Health in Mines in both the 81st and the 82nd Sessions of the International Labour Conference to Fiji's mining policy on health and safety in mines.

Mining in Fiji began in the 1930s. Although mining methods and conditions have changed, the appropriate regulatory statutes have not. The reasons for this are many and interwoven with the internal and external economic, social and political environment of the period.

But the primary reason has been of a political and economic nature. During the first 30-40 years of mining in Fiji, mining's contribution to Fiji's economy was significant, reaching 30 per cent in 1945. The mining industry was then able to dictate mining policy in Fiji with the assistance of the colonial governments of the day, right up until political independence was gained in 1970. But the processes on how mining policy is formulated and implemented that were put into place have continued to the present day. The Mineral Resources Department of Fiji has only recently come to terms with the fact that the mining industry requires a minerals policy that ensures not only that the industry contributes to Fiji's well-being but also that policy measures are in place to then regulate the industry more effectively.

The mining industry in Fiji, comprising mining and processing of economic metal ores, quarrying and dredging activities, and the use of industrial explosives and pyrotechnics, is regulated by the Fiji Mines Act and Regulations, and there is only the Emperor Gold Mines in Vatukoula that are operating. Mining ordinances since 1908 were used initially to regulate and control the use of labour and wage rates at the mines, and were the precursor to the later amendments of the Mining Act and Regulations, which have survived to their current form. It is still by far an incomplete and inappropriate statute for regulating the mining industry in its current state of operation. The Mineral Resources Department has only recently acquired suitably qualified staff to satisfy its mandate to the Government, and has sought assistance from the West Australian Department of Mines on a ministerial level, to amend the Mining Act and Regulations, and to assist in implementing work standards that satisfy the Australian standards of occupational health and safety.

A lot more work needs to be done to further this end, especially in the light of a possible start-up of the world-class mining operation at Namosi and other new mining operations coming on line in the near future, such as the Tuvatu and Mount Kasi mining operations.

As an indication of the state of health and safety in mines in Fiji, in the 20-year period from 1935 to 1955 there were 27 fatalities. From 1956 to 1975 there were 12 fatalities, and from 1976 to the present there have been 23 fatalities in the industry, for an average mining population of 1,500-2,000 per year.

Although the last five to ten years have seen a dramatic decrease in fatalities in the mining industry, on a yearly basis, when the figures are compared to the size of the mining population, these figures are still quite alarming compared to figures in say, the Australian mining industry.

In terms of health and safety standards, the mines section has relied heavily on work standards used by the mine operators and comparable to the standards stipulated in the West Australian Mining Act and Regulations and other work standards required by that State. Besides routine inspections of working areas underground and in surface facilities, the mines section to date relies heavily on the mine operators' health and safety programmes and standards.

Certification is also an area that needs to be addressed and all these issues can only be addressed adequately if the Fiji Mining Act and Regulations are amended, with an agreement on work standards to be used in the mining industry, and that suitable resources, in terms of capital and labour, are made available to do this.

The current strategies for regulating health and safety in mines in Fiji include: assistance from the sister West Australian Department of Mines; amendment of the Fiji Mining Act and Regulations; the requirement that a more specific section of the recently passed Safety and Health at Work Bill 1994, as passed in Fiji's Parliament, deal with mining and mining-related activities; the incorporation of the ILO Safety and Health in Mines standards as presented in the 81st and 82nd International Labour Conferences; and procurement of resources in terms of capital and labour to achieve this end.

In concluding, the Fiji Government recognizes that its most important national asset is its people, involving the development, training and welfare of its citizens, in particular, its workers in this context, given Fiji's limited resources in terms of natural, capital, labour and land resources.

Occupational safety and health is thus a critical aspect of Fiji's development policy, especially in the formulation of a minerals policy.

Fiji Government policies, mine-operator initiatives, and the ILO's framework for addressing safety and health in mines should then recognize this fundamental precept if the mining industry in Fiji is to provide for a harmonious working environment for its workers, and also contribute to Fiji's sustainable development of its natural resources.

Original Spanish: Mr. BROWN YOUNG (Workers' delegate, Costa Rica) – On behalf of the Workers of Costa Rica I would like to congratulate the President and Officers of the Conference for their election to their high office.

At the last Conference the Workers strongly defended the role of the ILO in the setting of international standards, its tripartite nature, its constant concern for the scourge of unemployment and the growing global problems characterized by the deterioration of the environment, social disintegration and poverty.

Many governments have introduced labour reforms that lead to poverty and deprivation. Injustice is encouraging the return of dictatorships and threatening harmony and coexistence. This prompts us to recall the extreme importance of the standard-setting function of the ILO and that new forms of employment require new standards, as a result of increased flexibility, technological development and modern forms of employment, privatization, the management and provision of public services, and expansion of the informal sector.

The structural adjustment programmes imposed by the international financial institutions – restructuring of the state, privatization, tariff dismantling etc. – have put “emerging” countries in a defenceless position.

The Director-General has put on the agenda for discussion this important issue of employment. From the point of view of solving the problem of extreme poverty, there is no doubt at all that it is impossible to conquer it without a proper employment policy which will provide sufficient jobs paid enough to ensure a minimum acceptable standard of living of a family, in food, clothing, health, housing, education and recreation. This means that at the same time one should consider the prompt payment of wages, and the strengthening of social security through properly supervised and efficient mutual systems.

Employment and proper remuneration give human beings a sense of personal security and strengthen the relationship between the worker and his family and between the family and society.

This will only be possible with an efficient and effective application of the standards for the protection and defence of children, women's work, and the total elimination of forced labour and the real application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87); the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135), which permit the activities of trade unions and negotiation of collective agreements that have been so weakened in my country in the private sector where, if they but mention the word “trade union”, workers are dismissed and blacklisted, leaving them unable to find work.

I would like to stress that there have been obvious cases of trade union persecution – the dismissal of almost all the pilots from the national airline company, Geest, with the undoubted negligence of the General Labour Inspectorate; and the Geest Caribbean International, the British banana company – where in spite of decision number 5,000 of the Constitutional Court, the General Labour Inspectorate did not respond efficiently to the request to investigate the denunciations, and many months afterwards concluded by saying that there had been no trade union discrimination.

For decades, Latin American countries have based their economic development on the primary sector of agriculture which has been a sizeable source of employment.

In the case of Costa Rica, neo-liberal policies applied since the beginning of the 1980s have created havoc. In relative terms, the agricultural, forestry and fisheries sectors have reduced the numbers employed by 5 per cent in the last five years (1990-94), while in the manufacturing industry the increase has not even reached 0.5 per cent over the same period. If we analyse the other two sources of employment generation, in the commercial sector, retail and wholesale, there was a real increase of 2.7 per cent in services there has been a fall of 1 per cent. Another source of employment, construction, has hardly grown at even 0.5 per cent. So we are in the same complex situation as those countries where increased activity takes place in the informal sector. The poverty, marginalization, and lack of protection generated by the neo-liberal model ruled exclusively by the logic of profit has generated categories such as migrant workers, homeworkers, maquila workers, and free trade zone workers who are not benefiting from labour protection or social security.

A vital role is played by the application of the core ILO Conventions and for that reason bilateral, multilateral and free trade area treaties, should incorporate those Conventions which are indispensable in trade agreements.

The link between trade and workers' rights should be based on the social clause. This is of extreme importance which is why we suggest that the ILO go into this matter in more depth and try to draft an international framework treaty.

Many of our countries have favourable conditions in infrastructure, peace and political stability, but their greatest treasure is to be found in their population and its training and education. This should attract investors. This comparative advantage should also include policies which promote productive employment, which stimulates social mobility, security and better conditions in a country.

Since this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference is discussing Promoting employment, its relevance should go beyond this important Organization if we wish to see in the future harmonious development of humanity.

Mr. ENGELBERTS (representative of Public Services International) – On behalf of Public Services International, representing some 20 million workers in 128 countries, I would like to congratulate the ILO, that well over 100 Heads of State and Government singled out as having a “special role” to play in implementing the conclusions of the World Summit for Social Development in the field of employment and social development. The Summit's Programme of Action in Chapter V on Implementation and Follow-up declares that, “nothing short of a renewed and massive political will at the national and international levels to invest in people and their well-being will achieve the objectives of social development”. But hearing of the difficulties with the ILO budget, one wonders whether that renewed and massive political will is really there. Governments do not seem to want to put their money where their mouth is.

Under item (i) of Commitment 3 of the Social Summit, governments committed themselves to “pursue the goal of ensuring quality jobs, and safeguard the basic rights and interests of workers and, to this end, freely promote respect for relevant International Labour Organization Conventions, including those pertaining to prohibition of forced and child labour, freedom of association, the right to organize and bargain collectively and the principle of non-discrimination”. Paragraph 54 of the Programme of Action further elaborates on this commitment. But do many governments really show respect for these core ILO Conventions?

The ICFTU has just published its 1995 annual survey of violations of trade union rights. More than 500 trade union activists were murdered in 1994, more than 4,000 were imprisoned and some 66,000 were sacked for their trade union activities. The list of individual countries cited for various violations of trade union rights is growing quickly: from 53 in 1991, 87 in 1992, 91 in 1993 to 98 in the current year's survey. Systematic interference in trade unionism by governments and the increase of legal barriers take place at alarming levels. Official interference includes cases of dissolution of unions, denial of or prior permission required for recognition, violent repression of strikes and marches, seizure of headquarters, withdrawal of dues check-off facilities, intimidation of leaders, attempted kidnapping and death threats. Reported incidents of this type grew by 65 per cent in the past three years. The ICFTU further notes that the liberalization of world trade and the competition between employers to find the cheapest labour have further exacerbated anti-union repression.

It will come as no surprise that it is very often the same governments that are most vehemently opposed to the social clause that perpetuate the worst trade union rights violations. Let me give you two examples where our members have suffered. On more than one occasion the Government of Kenya has been condemned for violation of ILO Conventions, most recently last year. Has the Government implemented the recommendations of the ILO Governing Body? No it has not, because the ILO can only exert moral pressure and does not have the possibility of enforcing sanctions. Does the same Government respond to the carrot-and-stick of IMF cash and conditions to adopt and maintain free-market friendly economic policies? Yes it does, because the world bankers and free marketeers have an excellent policeman in the IMF.

Year after year, the outlawing of unions at the United Kingdom Government's communications headquarters has been discussed in the Committee on Freedom of Association. Has the British Government implemented the ILO Governing Body's recommendations? No it has not. A government minister even started to threaten to leave the ILO if there was a special paragraph. Governments have sanctions, the ILO does not. And what did the British Minister of State for Employment say in the plenary? "Any link between labour standards and trade sanctions is totally unacceptable. Nothing is more certain to depress labour standards than actually preventing countries from trading freely and expanding their economies".

This is what the free marketeers want us to believe with an evangelical delight. A global free market producing all they ever hoped for. In a race for global competition, the nation State has no option but to accept the lowest common denominator. Some go even further and ask themselves: "Who needs the State?" As did James Morgan, an economics correspondent of the BBC, in the Financial Times of 27 May 1995. He stated "If some countries, especially in Africa, were to be run along the lines of commercial enterprises rather than States, investors might find much that was attractive. The United Kingdom, New Zealand and others have handed out many government operations to commercial agencies. But nobody has tried to do it with a whole country. What room does this leave for democracy? That question can be asked everywhere. In a world where the bond markets dominate much of the decision-making process in the wealthiest nations, democracy is, in one sense, on the way out. One almost hesitates to re-state the cliché that, in many developing countries what is known as Westminster democracy has no tradition and no roots".

This is what the free marketeers want, back to the times of the East India Company. There are now 37,000 East India or transnational companies and they have benefited in recent years from an unprecedented expansion in their rights and privileges. The GATT, in particular, has limited the regulatory powers of governments while extending corporate privileges into new areas. The Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights, for example, enhances the power of transnationals to enforce patents, trademarks and copyrights, while simultaneously impeding governments' efforts to require transnationals to assist with indigenous technological development. Similarly, the Agreement on Trade-Related Investment Measures restricts developing country governments that wish to put conditions on investment. And transnationals have benefited from measures taken voluntarily by national governments anxious to attract more investments. Worldwide we see a liberalization of foreign investment codes. Transnationals are, therefore, in a much better position to expand their activities, and they have also been able to buy up many state corporations that have come on the market as a result of privatization. These greater freedoms and rights for transnationals are raising even more acutely the question as to whether these rights also imply social responsibilities. Many corporate executives argue that social development is not their concern; their primary responsibility is to shareholders and they should not voluntarily take decisions in favour of either their workforce or the community at large that would undermine long-term profitability. Transnationals go to enormous lengths to weaken government regulations – often lobbying for lower environmental, labour and consumer standards – and they can play one government off against another and choose to invest only where they win the greatest concessions.

In Public Services International we believe in democracy. Democracy must permeate all levels of society from international institutions to workplace and community activities. People and their representative bodies must be included in decisions, not excluded. That includes workers and their trade unions.

Democracy has always been accompanied and strengthened by complementary legal systems to ensure that one party does not extend its freedom at the expense of another. The new World Trade Organization protects the freedom of international trade, it does not protect other freedoms, and so risks exacerbating a fundamental imbalance in global society. International business cannot be expected to author its own regulation: this is the job of good governance.

So governments, if you want to benefit from free trade you must free your own workers so that they can have trade union and collective bargaining rights. I fully support what Sneyers of the Federation of International Civil Servants' Association has said in this plenary – this should also apply to international civil servants.

We hope that governments will earnestly implement the text commitments of the Social Summit. One step in that direction would be to adopt in the next Governing Body meeting the conclusions of the Joint Meeting on the Impact of Structural Adjustment in the Public Services, which was held from 24 to 30 May this year.

Mr. CHIWESHE (Employers' delegate, Zimbabwe) – May I start by congratulating the President and the other Officers of the Conference on their election to preside over the work of this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. My delegation notes with satisfaction that they have so far acquitted themselves admirably.

The World Summit for Social Development has, among others, set the mood and tempo of this Conference. In our view, the most redeeming feature of Copenhagen was that it brought together so many Heads of State and Governments to discuss social and economic issues, resulting in the realization at state level that social and economic issues need to be accorded the same amount of importance as that attached to the international political issues. We commend the ILO for its active participation in preparations for this Summit, and the attendance of a tripartite delegation led by the Director-General.

The ILO report, World Employment 1995, treats the subject of employment in a detailed and definitive manner, and points out a number of employment-creation options.

In his Report the Director-General has responded positively to the wish that the ILO should, among others, concern itself more actively with matters of entrepreneurship. It is now accepted – though grudgingly by some – that medium- and small-scale enterprises have many means at their disposal for realizing higher rates of employment creation. It is, therefore, to the benefit of all that the development of this category of enterprise is strenuously encouraged. In this respect the ILO, with its network of officials throughout the world, is in a unique position to help build capacities which facilitate the implementation of this objective.

Technical cooperation, in its widest sense, between the ILO and the social partners is the principle mode through which the ILO provides assistance. Any international labour standards which question this principle must be reviewed – and where necessary – appropriate action should be taken to delete the provisions in question.

The Employers' Confederation of Zimbabwe (EMCOZ) notes with gratitude that the ILO has created an Enterprise and Cooperative Development Department and has appointed Mr. Hans Hammar as its head. We all know Mr. Hans Hammar very well; he has distinguished himself in every position he has held in the Organization and we congratulate him and wish him success in his new position.

Turning to Africa, we observe that the continent is being increasingly marginalized in economic terms. Lack of investment, both domestic and foreign, has resulted in a poor economic performance during the past 20 years. Growth in economic development has been undermined by – among other things – our systems of government. Other factors have also had a negative effect: brutal tribal laws, corruption, mismanagement of resources, the vagaries of the weather and controlled population growth, rampant inflation, unstable currencies and the debt burden. Almost a third of the continent's countries are ruled by regimes which are not accountable to their people. Almost as many other countries are burdened by such a heavy foreign debt that servicing eats into an unduly large proportion of their gross national products. Natural diseases such as drought and famine – to mention only two – have had a devastating effect on the food resources of sub-Saharan Africa. This has necessitated the importation of basic foodstuffs at a very high cost – and the people are already impoverished.

On the international scene, Africa is a victim of its own economic weakness. It has no competitive capacity and the price of whatever commodity it offers to the trading partners is determined by those partners – obviously to their advantage. For instance, the continent cannot put a halt to the continuous fall in the price of its agricultural and mineral products. Because of the persistent devaluation of the continent's currencies, the importation of capital equipment has become exceedingly expensive. This forces enterprises to remain under-equipped or to be equipped with antiquated machinery; and these produce goods at high cost which are usually sub-standard both in quality and quantity. This is another obvious cause of the negative growth and low rate of employment which we are experiencing in our countries.

We have already pointed out that the sub-Saharan African countries are facing immense problems of rising unemployment, inflation, currency devaluation, limited foreign investment and debt burden. Zimbabwe is located in this geographical region and has not been spared these afflictions. Despite the launching of economic reforms – the IMF and the World Bank prescriptions to boost economic growth and increase employment-creation opportunities date back to 1991 – employment levels have remained depressed to the obvious discomfort of the social partners.

EMCOZ, in tandem with the social partners, is participating in schemes intended to promote measures to help alleviate the depressing effects of unemployment, and high interest and inflation rates. From an economic standpoint, a safety valve has been the growth of small-scale enterprises and the informal sector. In Zimbabwe, according to statistics, 38.8 per cent of the total labour force is employed in the informal sector. EMCOZ believes that it must vigorously resist the implementation of any regulatory measures which would inhibit the continued growth of this sector. When the economic climate improves, there is every sign that the informal sector will react rapidly and grow. With the growth of the economy and absence of prohibitive regulations, the transition from informal to formal will accelerate and boost economic growth.

It is vital that small-scale enterprise managers be trained to be able to cope with this transition; and that these enterprises should continue to exist and flourish. At the same time, Zimbabwe must step up its exports – both to the regional and international markets. The drought has shown that, without a doubt, the internal market is limited and that it has been seriously affected by: the lowering of wages in real terms over the past four years; the increase in interest and inflation rates; and a drop in the purchasing power of the people.

When to this is added the scourge of AIDS and its cost to the population, it is self-evident that even if the agricultural seasons were to be fairly normal, the internal market would only pick up marginally in economic terms. Consequently, EMCOZ will support any strategy which leads to increases in export performance. It will also ensure that equality of labour regulations prevails within the export processing zones. Indeed, one of the competitive advantages which Zimbabwe has is a stable labour relations environment – and that must be maintained. For the Zimbabwean economy to grow appreciably, more emphasis must be given to productivity improvements. It is therefore imperative that the ILO productivity centre should be developed and used to a greater extent by the employers.

In conclusion, I would like to say that if the ILO is to fulfil its noble objectives, especially that of employment promotion, it must adhere to its major activities – standard-setting and technical assistance, especially to the most needy of its member States.

Mr. MANUFOLAU (Workers' delegate, Fiji) – I feel privileged in joining the other speakers who have taken this rostrum before me. It is an historical occasion for me to be one of the Worker delegates representing the working people of Fiji.

For the past 76 years the International Labour Organization has provided unparalleled service to workers of its member States and beyond. This has been possible through the tripartite approach it has adopted involving all three social partners – governments, the employers' and the employees' organizations.

The ILO Conventions adopted over the years are a foundation for social justice in the attainment of social security, equal opportunity and dignity of work. It is the view of the workers' organization in Fiji that economic and social progress should be judged in the light of the achievement of these fundamental objectives. All member States should aim to achieve a balanced economic and social development for all their people.

It is our view that the ILO should play a more proactive role in assisting governments in framing laws and regulations on the basis of these standards.

Furthermore, the ILO should take measures to encourage governments to ratify Conventions and encourage countries not to move backward and adopt regressive social legislation.

Today we are seeing exploitation of workers and suppression of trade unions, carried out in the garb of structural adjustment policies stipulated by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank and imposed by the Government. So although we have on the one hand an international agency like the ILO using all its resources to alleviate exploitation and promote social justice, we have on the other hand the IMF and the World Bank, who are acting as a parallel counter force, in propagating economic policies which compel governments to adopt measures aimed at eroding the conditions and standards achieved by many countries over many years of hard labour, and reducing workers to exploitation and poverty.

Today every effort is being made to weaken the collective bargaining strength of workers by measures which are completely contrary to the ILO Conventions. This is done mainly by curtailing the rights of trade unions. In the name of deregulation of labour markets and free trade policy the rights of unions are being curtailed drastically. Individual contracts between individual workers and employers are being openly encouraged. These conflicting policies need to be addressed by various United Nations agencies and the social partners in the country, instead of prescribing such doctrines to countries who go ahead and implement these policies. Today social systems are being fractured, causing irreparable damage. The United Nations agencies will have to take the principal share of this blame.

The Government of Fiji has been guilty of implementing such a policy, of which the workers are the victims. In the 284th Report of the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association, in response to the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions' (ICFTU) allegation of violations of trade union rights against the Government of Fiji, came up with a series of recommendations to the Governing Body and recommended that the Government of Fiji amend the legislation and leave the necessary autonomy to workers' organizations. Although the Government of Fiji took some positive steps and reviewed the labour laws, these changes were only nominal. Laws violating trade union freedom still remain on the statute book.

With the elected Government in power, we are still hopeful that it will effect necessary changes to labour laws and restore the rights of workers as recognized by the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). The Government has been very slow in responding to our call to revoke legislation violating the rights of the workers of Fiji.

It is heartening to report that the tripartite forum has been resurrected after a period of some ten years. We believe that this forum will provide an opportunity to the three social partners to discuss and cooperate on the issues of national interest with a view to providing a better future for the people of Fiji. Already the workers of Fiji have paid most dearly for the political misadventures in the country, and we believe it is our right to demand that solutions be found in the short term. Only then will we experience the economic growth which we all have been waiting for.

We in Fiji and indeed people all over the world want development which reaches the people. This is not true of the current economic policy which has been imposed by the Government without any consultation with its social partners.

Certainly the Fiji Trades Union Congress has never been seriously consulted.

The workers of my country are ready to play their part in reconstructing this country as equal partners. We are capable of creating a society where everybody can enjoy a decent living which every citizen is entitled to.

Our goal is a democratic society, where human rights for all citizens are respected and there is no discrimination on the grounds of gender, race, religion or ethnicity and which recognizes and protects the inalienable rights of indigenous Fijians to land ownership and fishing rights. Such a society will also protect the environment and resources for future generations.

We in Fiji are immensely grateful for the work being done by the ILO in promoting social justice and commit ourselves to this course.

Mr. TAN (Workers' delegate, Philippines) – I wish the President and all the elected Officers success and fulfilment in this year's Conference.

This year's session marks yet another watershed for the ILO, the only tripartite international organization in the family of the United Nations devoted to questions of labour and social standards.

The Director-General himself pointed out in still another thought-provoking Report on Promoting employment, that this year's theme seeks to translate into concrete global policies the mandate of the recently concluded World Summit for Social Development, to promote the goal of full employment as a basic priority of economic and social policies, and to enable all men and women to attain secure and sustainable livelihoods through freely chosen productive employment and work.

It looks like every so often the dynamism of the ILO is provoked by forceful currents other than its own impetus that drive it to steer a course of reasoned pragmatism if not critical realism, and especially at times when the battering winds of change in a stormy global milieu portend to sink the ship of state of global institutions and international organizations.

In its preface, the Report says that "anxiety over employment problems, and pessimism over the prospects of resolving them reign in many parts of world today". It then attempts, in the next 104 pages or so, to smoothen the ruffled feathers of pessimists by telling them that, in fact, the situation now is not all that bad. I don't know myself if this course will prove auspicious.

But there is always that proverbial light at the end of the tunnel which also serves as a beacon for all of us to exert more positive efforts while traversing the pit-black darkness currently enveloping our march, hopefully to a brighter world beyond.

How else must we interpret the upbeat Report of the Director-General in contrast to a globalizing economy that brought us only recently the Mexican crisis. Its ominous, Tsunami-like waves could yet easily wash away even the bright economic prospects of East and South-East Asia, whose sterling economic performance – against a background of a world only now emerging from troubled decades of recession and stagnation – has become the envy of many.

And we must ask, would accelerating liberalization of economies in the context of globalizing trade and investments, prevent a looming trade war among the economic giants?

On this last question, it may not take the end of this Conference to get a clear answer.

What happens on 28 June when the United States and Japan must settle their current trade row, and the weeks following this fateful date, will show us with greater perceptiveness whether, indeed, those among us who placed their bets on the positive role of the World Trade Organization in bringing about a peaceful and prosperous regime of trade and investment, would not retreat with their tails between their legs.

This is also one time I wish that my pessimistic calculations are proven wrong, if only because when two elephants fight, it is we the workers and farmers of underdeveloped regions who get trampled upon.

For we agree that a more liberalized and less protectionist economic environment could present greater opportunities to provide jobs for those who have none, and to give better employment for those who are already at work.

Provided, as is always the case in life, that the correct and consensual economic and social policies are followed by nation states, while positive approaches are pursued, energized and rhymed by the international community.

The Report is replete with such realistic and edifying examples, for which we congratulate those who contributed to it. We also know that opposite the scale of verdant opportunities, the balancing factors of lurking threats can only open our eyes and minds to make more realistic assessment of where we are at present and what it is more possible to do in the future.

If hindsight can give us foresight, as the Report of the Director-General does so well in its analysis of the American, Scandinavian and European models, the lesson is that growth does not offer a simultaneous assurance of full employment and a satisfactory improvement of incomes, conditions of work and standards of living for all.

Precisely put, what really matters is this. Equity must be achieved not only in view of future promises of progress expected to come from liberalization and globalization, but also, and perhaps more importantly so, by ensuring that, in the process of adjustment and reforms, growth with equity is attained, maintained and sustained. This is because, sad to say, for some of us in the trade union movement, experience has shaped our attitude of healthy pessimism, even perhaps to the extent of making this a self-fulfilling prophecy. We will applaud the cook only after we have tasted the food.

Seventy-five years of the World Confederation of Labour, whose anniversary we celebrate this year, forces us in WCL to pause, to reflect and to hope that the ILO, an elder colleague by one year, will ably steer its constituencies to make full employment a self-fulfilling prophecy in the near future, at least for our grandchildren, if no longer for ourselves.

Mr. RIMAL (Workers' delegate, Nepal) – It is my honour and privilege to convey my own and the greetings and congratulations of the General Federation of Nepalese Trade Unions (GEFONT) on Mr. Rosales Argüello's election as President of this 82nd Session. May I also congratulate the Director-General for his valuable Report, Promoting employment. Being a Workers' delegate from one of the least developed countries (LDCs), I welcome the emphasis he has given to the struggle against poverty throughout the world.

It is a great event for us, the workers of Nepal, to be present here at this important gathering. It has been a long road for our own union to be represented at the ILO. We have been petitioning the Credentials Committee for three consecutive years about the erroneous selection process involving the Nepalese Workers' representative during that period by the Government then in power.

I would like to say something about employment promotion in the light of the policy of economic liberalization. I believe that it is this liberalization policy imposed upon the LDCs by global financial institutions like the IMF and the World Bank which has been the cause of serious problems for our labourers. Instances of "no work, no pay", mass layoffs and retrenchments, labour-only contracts, repressive labour legislation in export processing zones, no union-no strike clauses, liberalization to attract incoming capital from the developed countries to the LDCs while restrictions are imposed on the workers of those LDCs who wish to go and work in these developed countries.

I would like to comment on the other distinguished delegates who have categorically stated that "workers are not commodities in the labour market". However, that is exactly what free market policies have achieved! It is an irony, that on the one hand, we are talking about the Termination of Employment ILO Convention 1982 (No. 158), and on the other we are forcefully putting forth policies like the structural adjustment policy which I believe is one of the causes of the mass retrenchments we are witnessing. I refer to the figure of 800 million, which was quoted here earlier, of unemployed and underemployed in the world. I agree that there is a vicious circle of unemployment and child labour. However, I would like to add that in this circle we also have poverty; so it should be unemployment, poverty and child labour. I do not believe that the problem of child labour will be eliminated by only boycotting the goods of a particular country. I know from the little experience that I have in this area that such campaigns have forced the children into the streets and into a life of crime for the sake of survival. This vicious circle can be broken only if programmes are implemented to help poor children and also to help raise the standard of living of their families. In this way, child labour would die a natural death. I must mention here the laudable work being attempted by the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC). All of us, and especially the developed countries, should provide maximum help to the ILO in this noble cause.

I would like to mention some of the objectives the ILO should set in regard to Nepal and other developing countries. The main problem of my worker members is mass illiteracy. This is a great obstacle to fostering the spirit of tripartism. Therefore I urge the ILO and the donor countries to make literacy and workers' education campaigns their priority when trying to help the cause of developing countries such as ours.

Before I conclude, I would like to mention here my uneasiness at hearing some delegates praise the Report of the Director-General but not agreeing to support his budget. I somehow feel it is a form of blackmail when a country threatens to pull out of the ILO because it disagrees with reports from the Committee of Experts.

With these few words let me conclude by wishing the President and the Conference a grand success.

Original Russian: Mr. SASNOW (Government delegate, Belarus) – I would like to express our profound gratitude for the opportunity to take part in this forum and to address you. We would also like to congratulate Mr. Rosales Argüello on his election to this lofty post and to express our certainty that under his successful leadership this session of the Conference will achieve its goals.

The Republic of Belarus is a young Eastern European State. Despite our long-standing participation in the ILO, we have little experience of its work. We are taking the first steps toward consolidating our State, and overcoming the problems inherited from the previous regime.

It should be pointed out that these problems constitute a considerable burden on us. Primarily, they are related to the need for structural reform in the economy, given the present lack of investment. This leads to increased unemployment, lower living standards and the loss of traditional markets. I will not go into this in any greater detail since the statement made by the Minister of Labour of the Russian Federation, Mr. Melikian, gave an excellent account of the problems in Russia which are very similar to our own. I would just like to add, however, that Belarus is, almost singlehandedly, trying to cope with the aftermath of the Chernobyl disaster. More than 20 per cent of the state budget is spent on this operation, which is an additional burden on the economy and hinders attempts to resolve the crisis. We are grateful to those countries which are kind enough to offer us their assistance.

Despite the difficulties, we nevertheless note with satisfaction the successful cooperation between the ILO and our country. We are deeply grateful for the active participation of the distinguished experts of this Organization in reforming labour relations legislation and in the development and consolidation of tripartism as the basis for economic and social development.

The International Labour Organization is also providing vital assistance in terms of solving the critical problem of converting military enclaves into areas of business activity and social development. A conference held in April this year in Minsk noted with satisfaction the successful development of this programme. We hope for further fruitful cooperation in this area, because apart from encouraging economic and social development it will also promote further demilitarization and strengthen peace and trust among peoples. I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the work of Mr. de Vries, Mr. Klotz, Mr. Hidalgo, Mr. Kern and others.

Of course, solving our own problems is primarily our own task. We are sure that without close cooperation on a tripartite basis, we will not manage to achieve economic stabilization and consequently economic recovery, to strengthen peace between social classes and achieve higher living standards.

We believe that the strengthening of cooperation with all international organizations, including the ILO, is vital for us. We hope that it will bear fruit.

We note with satisfaction the profound analysis contained in the Report of the Director-General and the practical conclusions which of course will have a decisive impact on the direction of our efforts.

At the same time, on the road to full employment we must avoid the temptation of taking short cuts in the development of social awareness. We are very familiar with the negative effects of such an approach. In our own history we have seen such short-sightedness, and we will continue for a long time to have to live with the consequences, which are far from favourable for our development. We share the concerns expressed by the distinguished Ministers of the Netherlands, Mr. Melkert, and of Italy, Mr. Treu.

This humanitarian goal must serve as an important guide for all of us in choosing strategies for economic and social development.

In conclusion, may I once again present my greetings to you all and wish you success in your work.

Mr. VENERA (Government delegate, Czech Republic) – I would like to join the other speakers in congratulating Mr. Rosales Argüello on his election as Chairman of this year's session of the International Labour Conference.

It is very important that the Director-General's Report stresses the economic aspects of employment and reminds of the direct relationship between job creation, economic growth, the inflation rate, and direct foreign investment. These relationships are fully proven also by the experience of the Czech Republic.

The Government of the Czech Republic has always emphasized the responsibility of each country for its own economic and social prosperity. Nevertheless it is a fact that the present development of the global economy supported by an unprecedented growth of new technologies leads to the interlinkage of national economies and to their interdependence. That is why we welcome the possibility to exchange our experience in the ILO and to seek common solutions where possible.

The Czech Republic has opened itself wide to international trade in the recent years, so international mobility of goods, capital, people and workers are considered to be natural and positive factors. Liberalization and globalization of world trade have led to a pressure for extensive structural adjustment of our industry and agriculture. We are aware of the fact that this pressure will be much stronger in developed economies, challenged by the competition of countries with lower production costs. However, in the present situation it would be a great mistake to insist on maintaining extensive protectionist measures. These measures are not only against the interests of the poorest countries, they also offer no sustainable solution for progress of the developed countries either.

My Government is committed respectfully to fulfil the results of the Uruguay Round.

Let me in this context make several remarks on the problem of international labour standards.

Recent discussions in various international forum have proved that no real linkage of the question of minimal labour standards and international trade is possible. The decision of the Working Group of the Governing Body on the Social Dimensions of International Trade taken in this respect after a thorough discussion was well considered and correct. However, this does not mean that we should tolerate violation of those universal standards concerning fundamental human rights ensuring the respect of basic human dignity.

The Czech Republic, bound by most ILO standards, considers further that the standard-setting work of this Organization is an important part of its activity. However, we will support the adoption of standards that are unambiguous and at the same time flexible enough to be applicable on the national level in all member States; only then can one speak of their universality. New or revised labour standards must offer sufficient space for collective bargaining, eventually even for individual agreement between workers and employers. Only in this way can the requirements of these Conventions be harmonized with the economies and possibilities of national economies and individual enterprises. Adoption of non-realistic and technically complicated Conventions would lead to non-ratification, non-respect, even neglect. In the long term it would undermine the whole standard-setting work of the ILO. A number of quite-recently adopted Conventions ratified by a minimum number of States should be a warning in this respect.

Let me now mention briefly the situation of the labour market in the Czech Republic. Our experience shows that employment is to a great extent influenced by the capability of the Government, but first of all by that of the enterprises and individual employees who adjust to new conditions.

It is frequently noted that in the Czech Republic the annual rate of unemployment is relatively low: in May 1995 2.8 per cent of the economically active population were unemployed.

There are a number of reasons for this, but I would like to mention just the basic ones. The privatization of small enterprises meant a rapid creation of small and medium-sized enterprises, mainly services, able to absorb a large number of workers. The fast "coupon privatization" of the majority of large enterprises enables their consolidation and gradual adjustment to new conditions.

An effective network of public employment offices was created in a short period of time supplemented by a network of private employment agencies. The active labour market policy of the Government, especially by way of retraining and creation of public benefit jobs contribute in particular to the solution of problems at the regional level.

The inflow of direct foreign investment was one of the main reasons for a low unemployment rate. It contributed to the survival, restructuring and development of a number of old enterprises as well to the creation of many new ones.

As in the previous sessions of the International Labour Conference I can confirm this year again that the Government considers social peace and social dialogue to be one of the preconditions for successful economic transformation in the context of global structural changes.

Nevertheless, the existence of tripartite organs, at the national and international levels, cannot deprive Governments of their final responsibility towards Parliament and nation in individual countries. Social dialogue and structures have to be in conformity with actual functions of government and social partners in society.

The Council of Economic and Social Agreement has functioned in the Czech Republic since the very beginning of the economic reforms, mainly as a consultative organ, of the Government. The Council concluded annually a general agreement as a political document on basic policy directions, in particular in the areas of wages, employment and social policy.

The direct involvement of the Government in the economy decreased substantially due to the latest stage of privatization. This was the reason for transforming the Council of Economic and Social Agreement into a new organ the Council for Social Dialogue, created on the basis of an agreement, with representative organizations of employees and employers. This Council has also a tripartite composition, but the emphasis is put first of all on the dialogue of the social partners, which means the employers and trade unions, while the Government creates a suitable legislative framework for dialogue.

Another important way to solve problems of employment is the creation of conditions for the geographic mobility of the labour force within the country.

The importance of international mobility of workers grows significantly in connection with the entry of foreign investors into the Czech economy. Within the framework of liberalized trade in services as well as within the process of association with the European Union, and gradual incorporation into the Single Internal Market of the European Union, the Czech Republic expects a more open approach to the mobility of workers in trade and services especially on the part of the Western European countries. The fact that this is not merely a one-way flow of our workers to the West any more can be demonstrated by the number of several dozens of thousands of Western European citizens legally working in the Czech Republic.

Let me express my hope that not only the member States but the ILO itself will find the courage to adjust radically to the new situation. Globalization and internationalization of the world economy will inevitably require close international cooperation in many areas. This is an undisputed challenge for the ILO. However, let us be realistic. The resources will be limited and this makes it absolutely necessary to focus on acknowledged priorities common to all member States.

The process of reforms which has already started within the ILO and has brought a number of positive changes in the recent past has to be continued. The aim is to bring the ILO nearer to the needs of member States and to use its resources effectively. Flexibility, mobility and adaptation are the requirements of present, and they are not to be met just by the members but also by the ILO itself.

(The Conference adjourned at 4.45 p.m.)

Credentials

Second report of the Credentials Committee

Composition of the Conference

1. Since 8 June, when the Committee adopted its first report, Credentials have been received from Sao Tome and Principe bringing the total number of member States at present represented at the Conference to 160. The number of delegates and advisers who have registered at the Conference at this time is contained in the annex to this report. The table includes a tripartite delegation from St. Vincent and the Grenadines which was admitted to membership of the Organization on 31 May 1995. It is also interesting to note that the Conference was attended this year by 134 Ministers of Labour from the 173 member States of the Organization. A total of 3,269 persons were accredited to the Conference with 2,770 having been registered at this time.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Bulgaria

2. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Bulgaria submitted by the Confederation of Labour – PODKREPA, the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions of Bulgaria (CITUB), the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), and the World Confederation of Labour (WCL).

3. According to the objecting organizations, the Workers' delegate coming from the Community of Free Trade Union Organizations in Bulgaria (CFTUOB) had been nominated in violation of article 3, paragraph 5 of the ILO Constitution as the Government had failed to consult with a view to reaching agreement with the most representative Workers' organizations in the country and had proceeded to a unilateral decision to nominate the representative of CFTUOB. The objecting organizations contended that the Workers' delegate should have come from PODKREPA according to the agreement made in 1991 between PODKREPA and CITUB, and following the agreement they had reached after a meeting of 4 May convened by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs which had been attended by the objecting organizations PODKREPA and CITUB but not by CFTUOB. PODKREPA and CITUB were the two most representative trade union centres in Bulgaria with a membership of 516,000 and 1,060,000 respectively. On the other hand, CFTUOB represented only 26,000 workers and, unlike the two other organizations, CFTUOB had only been granted national representative status in February 1995 despite the failure of that organization to meet the minimum membership requirement (50,000) under the Bulgarian Labour Code. By a joint letter of 30 May to the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, the Presidents of PODKREPA and CITUB formally refused to participate as advisers to the Workers' delegate. The objecting organizations requested the rejection of the credentials of the Workers' delegate as not being in conformity with article 3, paragraph 5 of the ILO Constitution as the Government had allowed political considerations to override its constitutional obligations to the ILO and had sought to interfere in the autonomy of trade unions thereby violating the principles of tripartism.

4. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. Mintcho Koralski, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of the Republic of Bulgaria and Government delegate at the Conference, stated that at a preliminary and preparatory meeting held on 4 May at the initiative of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs which all social partners – members of the National Tripartite Cooperative Council (NTCC) – were invited to attend, PODKREPA and CITUB participated but CFTUOB had been unable to attend for technical reasons. The Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs had requested the organizations at the meeting of the NTCC on 10 May to reach agreement on the composition of their delegation. CFTUOB subsequently protested at the failure of the other trade union organizations to consult them. In this regard, the Labour Code adopted in 1986 and the Decree No. 7 of 1993, set out the criteria – which included membership – for the recognition of trade union organizations as representative. In accordance with those provisions CITUB and PODKREPA were recognised as such in February 1993 and CFTUOB in February 1995. However, there had been no formal trade union membership census and elections since 1989 and there had been an increased movement of members among the organizations which had made it difficult to collect precise data on membership. In addition, the rotation agreement to which the objecting organizations referred had been reached in 1991 before the emergence of CFTUOB as the third representative trade union organization. The Government did not question the representativity of the objecting organizations, which participated on an equal basis in the NTCC. It could confirm that no agreement had been reached between the Bulgarian Socialist Party and CFTUOB as alleged by the objecting organizations. The Workers' delegate had been nominated after it had emerged that the representative trade union organizations had been unable to reach agreement on the nomination of the delegate and advisers on the basis of bona fide discussions among them and in view of the short period of time left for submitting the credentials of the delegation. The Government had however included in the Workers' delegation the representatives of the objecting organizations including Mr. Trentchev, one of the authors of the objection and their names had been published in the provisional List of delegations to the 82nd Session of the Conference published on 6 June 1995. The Government expressed its willingness to assist representative employers' and workers' organizations in the country in creating conditions for reaching agreement on their inclusion in the delegations to the International Labour Conference in accordance with ILO standards.

5. In an oral statement to the Committee Mr. Emil Miroslavov, Vice-Minister of Labour and Social Affairs and Government substitute delegate, pointed out that his country was at present in a period of transition and that it was continuing to promote tripartite dialogue including trade union pluralism among social partners which it had begun five years ago. Its concern was to enlarge tripartite cooperation and to associate new organizations which had emerged in 1995 in the dialogue. Regulations governing the NTCC enlarged on the criteria set out in the Labour Code. In 1993, CFTUOB had not met the criteria for recognition as being a representative organization, but it had since met them, which enabled CFTUOB to be recognised by the Council of Ministers in February of this year. In response to the question concerning the arrangements made by the Government for the payment of travel and subsistence expenses of Mr. Trentchev, whose name was included in the List of delegations but who had refused the nomination, the Vice-Minister explained that in view of the financial difficulties experienced by his country, the Government could only pay for the titular delegates.

6. In an oral statement to the Committee, the representatives of the objecting organizations stressed that their objection was not based on whether CFTUOB was representative or not as there was no doubt as to representativity, but was directed instead at the unilateral decision taken by the Government after agreement on the name of the delegate had been communicated to it on 4 May at the consultation meeting called by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs. At no time did the Minister request the organizations to reach agreement following the meeting of 4 May, nor was the subject included as an item on the agenda of the meeting of the NTCC on 10 May or even discussed by it. The Government's attitude towards what it called its encouragement of trade union pluralism was an attempt by it to undermine and fragment existing trade unions.

7. The Committee received documentary evidence from both the Government and the objectors in support of their respective versions of the facts.

8. The Committee, noting that the author of the objection listed as an adviser had declined to act in that capacity and had not registered in the Workers' delegation of Bulgaria, considered that he could not be regarded as serving as adviser within the meaning of article 26, paragraph 4(c), of the Conference Standing Orders. The Committee concluded that the author of the objection should not appear as a member of the Workers' delegation of Bulgaria in the List of delegations.

9. The Committee noted that there was no dispute concerning the representativity of the two objecting organizations, nor on which organizations were in fact the most representative in the country. While consultations had taken place on 4 May and agreement had been reached by the most representative organizations on the nomination of the Workers' delegate, the Government had appointed the delegate from an organization which was not among the most representative and which did not attend the consultation meeting to which it had also been invited. The Committee found that the Government had been inconsistent by, on the one hand, recognizing CFTUOB in February of this year as a representative organization and, on the other hand, being unable to provide statistics on membership of that organization since one of the conditions that had to be complied with under Bulgaria's Labour Code related to number of members. In view of the rotation system in place since 1991 and in the absence of up-to-date statistics on representativity, the Committee considered that the Government, although it had to some extent complied with the requirement for consultation, should not have unilaterally set aside the agreement reached on the nomination of the delegate by the two most representative organizations in favour of a representative from CFTUOB.

10. In these circumstances, the Committee considered that there was serious room to doubt the representative character of the organization from which the delegate came and whose credentials had been challenged. In the absence of consultation and agreement with the two most representative organizations on the nomination of the person appointed as Workers' delegate, the Committee concluded that his nomination had failed to comply with the provisions of article 3, paragraph 5 of the ILO Constitution and that there were sufficient grounds for invalidation. However, trusting that in the light of the above the Government would in future take the necessary action to ensure that the nomination of the Workers' delegate was made in agreement with the representative Workers' organizations in the country, the Committee decided not to propose invalidation this year.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Sri Lanka

11. The Committee examined an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Sri Lanka submitted by the Lanka Jathika Estate Workers' Union (LJEWU) and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

12. According to the objecting organizations, the Ceylon Workers' Congress (CWC) with a membership of 417,000 workers was the largest and most representative organization, while the LJEWU and the Jathika Sevaka Sangamaya (JSS) had a membership of 392,000 and 256,000 workers respectively. After a challenge to the credentials of the Workers' delegate at the 1984 International Labour Conference, an agreement had been reached in 1985 between the CWC, the LJEWU and the JSS at a meeting chaired by the President of Sri Lanka to the effect that the CWC would nominate the Workers' delegate every two years and the LJEWU and the JSS alternately for the other years. This rotation system had been successfully implemented for the past nine years. On 22 March of this year, the CWC had been requested by the Government to nominate one person for inclusion in the delegation, to which it had responded by submitting the names of two representatives, but it had subsequently been announced that the delegate was to be a representative of the Sri Lanka Nidahas Sevaka Sangamaya (SNSS) and that advisers would be nominated from the JSS, the CWC and three smaller unions. The CWC had refused the nomination. The registration returns attached to the objection showed that the organization from which the Workers' delegate came (SNSS) was placed tenth in the order of size of trade union centres in the country with a membership of only 30,000 workers with no representation in the important plantation sector and was politically affiliated to the ruling Party. The objecting organizations concluded that by failing to consult and reach agreement with the most representative organizations and totally disregarding the 1985 agreement by choosing the delegate from a small non-representative organization, the Government had placed political considerations before its constitutional obligations to the ILO. They requested the rejection of the credentials of the Workers' delegation.

13. In a letter addressed to the Chairman of the Credentials Committee, the advisers to the Workers' delegate representing the Ceylon Federation of Trade Unions (CFTU), the Ceylon Federation of Labour (CFL) and the Ceylon Mercantile Industrial and General Workers' Union (CMU) informed the Committee of their agreement to the nomination of Mr. L. Devendra from the SLNSS as Workers' delegate. They contended that the CWC and the LJEWU were confined to the plantation sector, that the membership of the CWC had fallen considerably since 1994 and that they could not be regarded as representative of the Sri Lankan working people. Consultations with their organizations had been held prior to the nomination of the Workers' delegation and also with the CWC and the JSS. The Workers' delegation to the present session of the Conference had a broad representative character.

14. In a written statement to the Committee made at its request, Mr. B.A.B. Goonetilleke, Permanent Representative of Sri Lanka in Geneva, provided a list of the seven largest Workers' organizations in Sri Lanka based on the membership figures given by the organizations themselves. While this list confirmed the figures mentioned by the objecting organizations with respect to the three largest organizations (the CWC, the objecting organization and the JSS), the SLNSS was placed fourth with 163,000 (instead of tenth with 30,000). Whereas the two largest organizations on the list almost exclusively represented the plantations sector, the others (which together represented a membership of 714,000) covered a much wider cross-section of the economy. The Government also noted that the status of the CWC as the largest organization had been challenged by the former Secretary of the CWC. In addition, the CWC appeared to have repudiated the rotation system this year. Moreover, complaints had been made by the organizations that had been left out of the rotation system agreed in 1985, which they considered to be a violation of article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution. This year all seven organizations had been consulted on the nomination of the Workers' delegation, and all except the CWC and the objecting organization had agreed on the selection of the Workers' delegate from the SLNSS. Now six trade unions constituted the Workers' delegation as against the three which had monopolized the Conference for the last ten years, and 75 per cent of the work force was represented compared with less than 25 per cent in previous years.

15. At the Committee's invitation Mr. Goonetilleke, accompanied by members of his delegation, provided further information orally. He stressed the need for a change in the rotation system covering three trade unions, which had had affiliations with a former ruling party and represented less than a quarter of the total work force, primarily in the plantation sector, totally ignoring the other sectors of the economy. The government had achieved agreement with seven major unions, including the JSS, the third largest, which was a party to the 1985 rotation agreement. The government had appointed the CWC as adviser thus taking account of the plantation sector, which would have been overrepresented if another adviser had been appointed from the objecting organization. It had appointed representatives from other unions which had remained unrepresented for over a decade. It had acted responsibly, rationally and democratically in constituting the Workers' delegation in general and choosing the Workers' delegate in particular.

16. In reply to questions from members of the Committee, Mr. Goonetilleke confirmed that the CWC and the objecting organization had expected that the 1985 rotation system would continue to apply this year and that the abandonment or review of the system had not been discussed in the various consultations with the seven organizations.

17. The Committee also invited the objecting organizations to comment orally on the Government's statements. Their representatives said that all the Government had done was to request proposals from the various organizations. There had been no consultations with them. It was not true that the CWC had repudiated the 1985 rotation agreement, nor had the JSS. There had been no split in the CWC, as the Government had suggested. The material that the objecting organizations had submitted showed that the CWC represented several sectors in addition to the plantation sector. The JSS did not exclusively cover the plantation sector. The Government's statistics – and in particular the increase of the SLNSS to more than five times its size in the space of one year – were to be treated with great caution.

18. The Committee considered that there was no reliable factual basis available to the Government for assessing the representativity of the respective organizations apart from the figures in an official report for 1993 based on registration returns. Until this report had been updated, the three organizations that were party to the 1985 rotation agreement should therefore be assumed to continue to be the most representative. The Government's concern to give other major organizations an opportunity to be represented at the Conference and to widen the representativity of the delegation in terms of the sectors covered was laudable, but it did not justify the abandonment without notice of the rotation system that had been followed for ten years. This system had been accepted by the most representative Workers' organizations as the means of achieving the agreement required by Article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution. If, in the light of reliable evidence, the system did not reflect present-day realities concerning the representativity of the workers' organizations, it could be replaced either by an improved system agreed to by the organizations concerned or by another procedure for achieving agreement on the nominations.

19. The Committee accordingly concluded that the nomination of the Workers' delegation had not been made in accordance with article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution. However, trusting that in the light of the above the Government would no doubt wish to follow appropriate procedures in future, the Committee decided not to propose invalidation of the credentials of the members of the delegation.

Objection concerning the nomination of Workers' advisers of Romania

20. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of two Workers' advisers and substitute delegates of Romania submitted by the National Trade Union Confederation (Cartel ALFA), the National Trade Union Group (BNS) and the National Confederation of Free Trade Unions – Fratia (CNSLR Fratia), whose signatories included the Workers' delegate and one of his advisers.

21. According to the objecting organizations, the nomination of the two advisers – belonging to the Confederation of Miners' Trade Unions of Romania and the Moldova Noua Free Trade Union of Miners (Meridian Trade Union Confederation) – had been made in contravention of article 3 of the ILO Constitution as the organizations to which they were affiliated were not representative of the workers of Romania. In addition, these advisers had been nominated in the place of two representatives of the objectors' confederations, which were the only representative trade union organizations in Romania.

22. In a written statement to the Committee made at its request, on behalf of Mr. Dan Mircea Popescu, Minister of Labour and Social Protection and Head of the Romanian delegation at the Conference, the Government of Romania set out the most representative organizations, in terms of membership, as follows: CNSLR Fratia: 1,700,000 members; Cartel Alfa: 1,200,000 members; BNS: 750,000 members; Convention of Non-Aligned Trade Union Confederations (CCSN): about 1,000,000 members; Confederation of Miners' Trade Unions of Romania: 420,000; the Meridian Trade Union Confederation, including the Moldova Noua Trade Union Federation of Miners: 300,000. The organizations consulted were CNSLR-Fratia, Cartel Alfa, BNS and CCSN. During the consultations, no objection had been raised to the inclusion in the delegation, in addition to the representatives of CNSLR-Fratia, Cartel Alfa and BNS, of a representative of the Confederation of Miners' Trade Unions as an adviser for the item on "safety and health in mines". The acceptance of that inclusion was confirmed by the minutes of the meeting of 25 April 1995. The adviser had in fact participated last year in the first discussion of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines. Nor had anyone objected to the possibility that the metal mining sector would be represented. The person nominated belonged to the Meridian Trade Union Confederation, the most representative organization in that sector. The Government also informed the Committee that it had submitted to Parliament a bill on collective bargaining, drawn up jointly with the workers' and employers' organizations, which included criteria for assessing the representativity of the workers' organizations.

23. The Committee noted the Government's declaration that the most representative organizations, including the objecting organizations, had been consulted and had not objected to the addition of representatives of the mining trade unions to the delegation. In this connection, the complaint of the objecting organizations was in effect that they had not agreed to the nomination of the two advisers, who did not belong to the most representative organizations; they did not allege that the delegation as a whole had not been appointed in agreement with the most representative organizations or that they had not been consulted on the appointment of the two advisers.

24. The Committee considered it reasonable that the Government should have enlarged the representativity of the Workers' delegation, by including representatives of the mining trade unions, one of whom had attended the Conference last year. At the same time, the Committee had doubts concerning the appointment of the advisers as substitute delegates in view of their lesser representativity with respect to Romanian workers as a whole, but noted that, since the lodging of the objection, they now appeared only as Workers' advisers. The Committee accordingly decided not to uphold the objection.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Turkey

25. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Turkey submitted by the Confederation of Turkish Real Trade Unions (HAK-IS).

26. According to the objecting organization, there were in Turkey three most representative Workers' organizations within the meaning of article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution. Although this was recognized in statistics provided by the Turkish Ministry for Labour and Social Security, the Government had exclusively nominated the Workers' representative at the International Labour Conference from one Workers' organization, the Turkish Confederation of Trade Unions (TURK-IS). Furthermore, the Turkish Government had never held consultations with the other workers' organizations in an attempt to find solutions acceptable to all the organizations concerned in accordance with the conclusions of the Conference's Credentials Committees based on article 3, paragraph 5. As the Government had taken the same course of action this year – with the result that a considerable proportion of Turkish workers were not represented at the Conference – the objecting organization requested the Credentials Committee to draw the Government's attention to its failure to comply with article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution.

27. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. Kutlu Türker, Under-Secretary of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security and Government delegate at the Conference, provided information concerning the membership of the four workers' confederations in Turkey on 1 January 1995. TURK-IS had 1,978,350 members; the next largest was the Turkish Confederation of Revolutionary Trade Unions (DISK) with 329,895 members, followed by the objecting organization (HAK-IS) which had 286,733 members. The fourth confederation had 7,488 members. In order to seek the agreement required by article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution, the Government had consulted TURK-IS, as the largest organization, on the composition of the Workers' delegation to the Conference. Since TURK-IS was aware of the constitutional provisions, it could be assumed that it would not act in violation of them. Furthermore the Government traditionally consulted TURK-IS on the possibility of representation of the smaller confederations, but TURK-IS had always opposed such representation. Accordingly the Government had acted in good faith "to do its best", in accordance with the relevant international case law, to achieve an agreement among the various confederations.

28. While not expressing any doubts as to the Government's good faith, the Committee stressed that the obligation was on the Government – not TURK-IS – to hold consultations with all the most representative organizations, which – on the basis of the statistics provided by the Government – included DISK and the objecting organization in addition to TURK-IS. If no agreement could be reached during such consultations, the Government should then take a decision on the composition of the Workers' delegation giving due weight to the fact that TURK-IS was much larger than the two other most representative confederations.

29. Thus, while the Committee took note that the nomination had been made in agreement with the Workers' organization that was by far the most representative in Turkey, it concluded that the Government had not fully complied with article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution in so far as it was the Government's duty to seek agreement with all of the most representative Workers' organizations.

30. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Provisional Record

Eighty-second Session, Geneva, 1995

Fourth item on the agenda: Safety and health in mines

Report of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines

1. The Committee on Safety and Health in Mines was set up by the International Labour Conference at its first sitting on 6 June 1995. It was originally composed of 155 members (62 Government members, 35 Employers' members and 58 Workers' members). To achieve equality of voting strength, each Government member was allotted 1,015 votes, each Employers' member 1,798 votes and each Workers' member 1,085 votes. The composition of the Committee was modified several times during this session and the number of votes attributed to each Member was adjusted accordingly.

2. The Committee elected its officers as follows:

Chairman: Dr. A. Békés (Government member, Hungary);

Vice-Chairmen: Dr. J. Stewart (Employers' member, Republic of South Africa) and Mr. J. Maitland (Workers' member, Australia);

Reporter: Mr. R. McGinn (Government member, Canada).

3. At its fifth sitting the Committee appointed members of a Drafting Committee composed as follows: Mr. R. Kuggeleijn (Government member of the Netherlands); Mr. D. Lauriski (Employers' member of the United States); Mr. P. Benjamin (Workers' member of South Africa) and the Reporter of the Committee.

4. The Committee had before it Reports IV(2A) and IV(2B) prepared by the Office for a second discussion by the Conference of the fourth item on the agenda: "Safety and Health in Mines". The proposed Convention and the Recommendation submitted by the Office were contained in Report IV(2B).

5. The Committee held 11 sittings.

General discussion

6. The representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference, Dr. Chandra Pinnagoda, welcomed the delegates at the first sitting of the Committee and proceeded with the election of its Chairman and Vice-Chairmen. Thereafter, he recalled briefly the documents issued since the first discussion in 1994. The Office had received replies from 63 member States and, in addition, replies from 17 member States were received too late for inclusion in Report

IV(2A): these were available to members of the Committee who wished to consult them. The proposed Convention and Recommendation contained in Report IV(2B) had been drawn up by the Office to reflect the observations received. The representative of the Secretary-General pointed out that some minor drafting changes had been introduced to the conclusions which were adopted by the Conference at its 81st Session in 1994 to ensure full concordance between the English and French versions of the proposed instruments. He also drew particular attention to the several modifications which the Office introduced to the texts of the proposed instruments. The first such modification dealt with the word "participation" in the fourth paragraph of the Preamble of the proposed Convention. Since there was strong support for the Office's concern that this word needed clarification, the text was amended to state that workers needed to participate "in the preparation and implementation of safety and health measures" concerning the hazards and risks they faced. The second modification concerned the addition of the word "solid" before the word "minerals" in the definition of "mine" in Article 1 in order to exclude from this definition exploration for or mining of minerals such as oil and gas and water. Thirdly, the word "plant" was inserted in subparagraph (b) of Article 1 for the purpose of its coverage by the definition. The fourth modification concerned the inclusion of the concept of "subcontractor" in the definition of the employer in paragraph 2 of Article 1, which also ensured consistency with Article 11. The fifth modification involved the transfer of Paragraph 3 in the Recommendation and its insertion as paragraph 3 of Article 2 due to its relevance to this Article since it gave examples of criteria on which exclusion might be made, and did not entail any new obligation. This resulted in renumbering the Paragraphs of the proposed Recommendation and the replacement of the word "Scope" in the title of its Section I by the words "General Provisions". For the purpose of clarity, the sixth modification replaced the word "determined" in paragraph 2 of Article 4 by the word "identified". The seventh modification was an amendment throughout the proposed Convention (Articles 5, 9 and 12) to clarify that "dangerous occurrences" should be defined by national laws and regulations. The eighth modification concerned an amendment with regard to the word "facilities" in subparagraph (c) of Article 8 by stipulating that the term be defined by national laws and regulations. The ninth modification concerned the addition of the phrase "by the competent authority" in the new Paragraph 5 of the proposed Recommendation in order to delineate the State's responsibility for this provision. Other modifications were introduced to the text of the new Paragraph 17 concerning: the physical, chemical and biological hazards to which workers might be exposed; the obligation of the suppliers of mining equipment (in Paragraph 7); and coordination among several employers undertaking activities at the same mine (in Paragraph 21). The representative of the Secretary-General outlined the more recent work of the Office in the field of occupational safety and health with particular reference to the publication of the Code of Practice on the Recording and Notification of Occupational Accidents and Diseases and to the promotional activities aimed at the implementation of the provisions of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), the Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161), the Chemicals Convention, 1990 (No. 170), and the Convention on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents, 1993 (No. 174), and their ratification.

Regarding the implementation of the ILO Conventions that were applicable to mines as well, the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations continued to take measures within the framework of the ILO supervisory machinery on the application of relevant instruments, such as the Guarding of Machinery Convention, 1963 (No. 119), and the Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention, 1977 (No. 148), in order to ensure observance of the provisions contained in those instruments. Reference was also made to the Twelfth Session of the Joint ILO/WHO Committee on Occupational Health, convened in April 1995, and to its recommendation to the Governing Bodies of each organization to consider the launching of a joint programme of action towards the global elimination of silicosis, a scourge that affected approximately 20,000 miners each year.

7. The spokesperson of the Employers' members recalled that his group had emphasized three points during the first discussion in 1994: that the development of the international instruments on safety and health in mines should take account of the diversity of mines and economic realities; that the employers fully accepted their responsibility for safety and health matters and that cooperation with the other parties was essential; and that the employers were committed to the development of an instrument which could be widely ratified. He believed that these three points remained valid for the purposes of the second discussion. As regards the need for wide ratification, the instruments should not deal with social or environmental issues. Overloading the text with detail would work against ratification and thus against the interests of the beneficiaries themselves. He drew attention to the rate of ratification of similar instruments, such as the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), which after 12 years had now received only 24 ratifications. Although the Employers' members would have preferred the adoption of only a Recommendation, they did not plan to reopen that argument and were ready to work constructively towards the formulation of a Convention provided that it could satisfy three essential criteria: acceptance by the employers, widespread acceptance which would facilitate ratification by member States, and the long-term improvement of safety and health in mines. As regards the Employers' primary responsibility for safety and health matters, this was clearly specified in the texts and endorsed by them. However, ensuring safety and health at the workplace was a team effort and a shared responsibility and it was essential for this second discussion to establish a basis for effective cooperation by clearly covering the responsibilities of all the parties. Finally, as regards the diversity of mines, the Office reports of the previous year had drawn attention to the different sizes, types and depths of mines which could not be adequately addressed by instruments with specific provisions. The proposed texts were tending towards an instrument relating more to coal and deep underground mines. As regards the question of economic realities, mines were a key component of many economies and a major source of jobs. But to exist, they needed to be both safe and economically viable, two requirements which were both desirable and necessary. Neither of these two requirements would be assumed. The Employers reaffirmed their commitment to the development of a Convention and Recommendation which would reflect the combined wisdom of the Committee and have the necessary flexibility to ensure the widest ratification.

8. The spokesperson of the Workers' members reminded the Committee of its responsibility to refine the work carried out during the first discussion and to develop an instrument which would ensure the safety and health of mineworkers. He appreciated the concern expressed by the spokesperson of the Employers' members that the instruments should focus on matters of safety and health, to the exclusion of broader social aspects. He quoted the first two paragraphs of the Preamble to the Constitution of the ILO and emphasized the relevance of their concern to mineworkers and, in particular, the need to develop a Convention and Recommendation which addressed the safety and health needs of the industry. He recalled that a number of mining accidents had occurred in several countries since the last session of the Conference. Mining was one of the most hazardous industries and the Committee had a great responsibility in helping countries to fulfil their aspiration of ensuring the highest degree of protection for their workers. Countries should not be inhibited by any barriers which might limit their scope of action in this respect, and the ILO should provide technical assistance to help them establish such protection over time. A resolution adopted by the Coal Mines Committee of the ILO in January 1995 called on all member States to support the adoption of a Convention and Recommendation on safety and health in mines.

9. The Government member of Australia supported the proposed Convention and Recommendation. The changes introduced to the text should lead to a comprehensive and a flexible standard to ensure the protection of mineworkers. The necessity of developing such a standard had been reaffirmed following the mining accidents which occurred in countries such as Australia, where mining was the most important export-oriented industry but the most hazardous as well. The benefits derived from developing such a standard depended on its flexibility and on the commitment of each member State to ratify it.

10. The Government member of Canada referred to the numerous mining accidents and deaths that occurred worldwide and noted the significant amount of resources which had been invested by the Office and member States to develop these instruments. He urged governments to actively pursue the ratification of the Convention following its adoption.

11. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom, Member States of the European Union (EU), emphasized the need to protect the maximum number of mineworkers. The protection could be measured by a short-term criterion, which was the adoption of the Convention and a long-term criterion, which was the ratification of the future Convention by a large number of member States. A compromise between the two criteria was necessary for the optimum protection of mineworkers, which the instrument was designed to achieve.

12. The Government member of Mexico noted the value of developing the instruments, as his Government stood to derive benefits from the results during the revision and updating of its national regulations on safety and health in mines.

13. The Government member of India stressed the importance of developing instruments on safety and health in mines and the need for active collaboration between the workers, employers and governments. Participative management was crucial to the success of all aspects of safety and health.

14. The Government member of China emphasized the importance of developing a Convention and a Recommendation in protecting the lives of mineworkers. Mining remained the main export-oriented industry in a number of countries and required up-to-date and flexible laws and regulations.

15. A number of Workers' members reiterated their support for the development of a Convention and a Recommendation. The Workers' member of Sweden stated that 15,000 lives were lost each year in mining, tantamount to the loss of life in a civil war. The recent mining disaster in South Africa was a cruel reminder that much remained to be done in improving safety and health protection in this industry. A legally binding instrument was needed for the protection of mineworkers. The Workers' member of South Africa pointed out that the recent disaster in his country was not an isolated incident, and that over 6,000 workers were compensated each year for lung diseases. The Workers' member of France also believed that it was urgent to adopt a Convention. He hoped that it would be ratified by the largest number of countries, although it must be a real Convention which would effectively guarantee the health and safety of miners. The Workers' member of Canada said that mining workers had the right to be able to return home safely after their work and the Committee had a collective responsibility to ensure the respect of this right. The Workers' member of China said that unions in his country attached the greatest importance to the safety and health of miners, and that the labour law which was recently adopted in his country included specific provisions on this subject. The Workers' member of Germany said that decisive and swift action was essential to help prevent the continuing tragedies in the mines, and that the Committee could speed up the process by keeping its amendments to the strict minimum. The Workers' member of Saudi Arabia said that safety and health in mines was very important to workers, and could also help reduce absenteeism due to injury. The proposed Convention and Recommendation should therefore be supported by all Committee members.

16. The representative of the International Miners' Organization said that miners did not work in mines out of choice but out of need. Demands were often made of them by employers who justified such demands in terms of the market situation and the economic crisis. He asserted that there was a limit to such demands and that no price could be placed on the lives of mineworkers.

Consideration of the proposed Convention contained in Report IV(2B)

Preamble

17. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to insert the words "the Employment Injury Benefits Convention and Recommendation, 1964;" after the words "... and Recommendation, 1963;" in the fourth line of the third preambular paragraph was accepted.

18. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the fifth and sixth preambular paragraphs, that contained a reference to environmental protection by the words: "Recognizing that it is desirable to prevent any workplace fatalities, injuries or illnesses to workers or members of the public arising from mining operations, and". They maintained that the proposed Convention dealt with safety and health in mines and that there was no need to make reference to the environment. In order to adequately cover their concerns, the Workers' members subamended the text by deleting the word "workplace" on the grounds that it was restrictive, replacing the word "illnesses" by the words "ill health" to cover other aspects of health, and introducing the words "or damage to the environment" after the word "public". Following a discussion during which the Employers' members recalled that the Preamble to a Convention did not carry legal force, the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

19. The Preamble, as amended, was adopted.

Part I. Definitions

20. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to clause 1(a)(i) to replace the words "exploration for" by the words "extraction of", insert the words "except off-site exploration drilling" after the word "minerals" and to delete the words "or the extraction of solid minerals;". They believed that the proposed Convention should not include off-site operations, such as drilling for water, which in many countries were not part of mining. The Workers' members opposed the amendment, since "exploration" involving the mechanical disturbance of the ground was an essential part of the industry, and the exclusion of "off-site exploration" would substantially reduce the scope of the instrument. The Government members of the Member States of the EU opposed the exemption of "off-site exploration drilling", as such activities also included tunnelling, for example. The Government member of Australia pointed out that exploration was an integral part of mining in his country and one in which accidents occurred quite frequently, and he therefore opposed the amendment, as did the Government members of Canada, India and the United States. In the face of this opposition, the amendment was withdrawn.

21. The Government members of Czech Republic, India, Norway and South Africa submitted an amendment to delete the word "solid" from both lines of clause 1(a)(i). A similar amendment was also submitted by the Workers' members who emphasized that their amendment was not intended to bring the oil and gas industry within the scope of the definition of mines, which should be the subject of a separate instrument. They meant to prevent the exclusion of a number of mining operations, for example the mining of minerals such as salt and sulphur that involved fluid processes. The Employers' members replied that a literal reading of the text with the proposed amendment would include the oil and gas industry and believed that the reference to the word "solid" in the Office text did not mean that liquid mining techniques used for the extraction of minerals in natural solid state were excluded. The Government members of the Member States of the EU said that it was important for the provision to be as precise as possible and proposed a subamendment to delete the word "solid" and to insert the words ", excluding oil and gas" after the word "minerals" in both lines of the Office text. This was supported by the Workers' and the Employers' members.

Another amendment by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Mexico, Mozambique, New Zealand, Norway, Turkey and the United States was submitted to delete from clause 1(a)(i) the words "or the extraction of solid minerals" and to insert a new clause to read "the extraction of solid minerals" in the interest of greater clarity, which they now subamended in the light of the discussion to read:

"(1) exploration for minerals, excluding oil and gas, involving the mechanical disturbance of the ground;

(2) extraction of minerals, excluding oil and gas;"

This was supported by the Employers' and Workers' members, and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted. Based on the outcome of this discussion a similar amendment submitted by the Government member of China was not discussed.

22. Following the debate regarding the exclusion of the oil and gas industry from the scope of the instrument, the Chairman remarked that a similar discussion had arisen on "biological hazards" in 1993 during the preparation of the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention, 1993 (No. 174) and that the Committee had set up a working party which drafted a resolution on this matter. He added that the present Committee might wish to consider the possibility of setting up a similar working group on this occasion. The Chairman's proposal to set up a working group to discuss the possible steps to be taken for the handling of the special problems arising in relation to the oil and gas industry was opposed by the Employers' members who referred to the extensive work which has already been done by the Office, notably through the ILO's sectoral activities programme. The Workers' members supported the proposal to set up a working group since they represented not only mineworkers but also oil and gas workers, and support was also expressed by several Government members. After further debate and put to the vote, the proposal to set up a working group was adopted by 92,320 votes in favour, 69,296 votes against, with 6,832 abstentions.

23. At the sixth sitting of the Committee, the Legal Adviser, in giving his opinion on the manner in which the Working Group might present its findings, referred to the provisions in the Standing Orders with regard to the submission of resolutions on matters that were either related to or not related to agenda items of the Conference. The decision as to whether the exploration and extraction of oil and gas were related to the Conference agenda depended not on the definition ascribed to the term "mine" in the texts of instruments adopted, but on the understanding attached to the term in ordinary technical language. From the description of the term "mine" given in Report V(1) on Safety and Health in Mines that the Committee had examined during its first discussion in 1994, it could be construed that the exploration and extraction of oil were covered within the definition of a mine, while it appeared less clear whether coverage could be extended to gas. In these circumstances, he confirmed that the concerns of the Committee could be expressed adequately by incorporating the deliberations of the Working Group in the body of its report.

24. The Working Group was comprised of two Government members (the Netherlands and the United Kingdom) and two Workers' members (Egypt and Ireland). At the ninth sitting of the Committee, the Government member of the United Kingdom, speaking on behalf of the Working Group, stated that in developing a text for consideration, it had taken into account: (a) that the general view of the Committee was that workers in the oil and gas industry should have comparable standards to those employed in mines as defined in the proposed Convention on safety and health in mines; and (b) that the ILO had already initiated work in this area and that this should be developed further. He observed that the statement of their findings had been distributed to the Committee for its consideration. The Workers' members argued that there was an overlapping of responsibility between the mining industry and the oil and gas industry with regard to the provision of safety and health protection to workers and that the statement only invited the Governing Body to note that international standards needed to be developed for the oil and gas industry as well. The Workers' members and a majority of Government members supported the inclusion of the statement in the body of the report. The Employers' members expressed reservations about the competence of their group to assess the appropriateness of the conclusions arrived at by the Working Group, particularly the proposals for additional action by the ILO. They also felt that the competence for work, including safety and health matters, in the oil and gas industry rested with the relevant ILO Sectoral Activities Committee. Based on this they opposed the inclusion of the findings of the Working Group in the report and abstained from expressing any view on them. Following support by the majority of the Committee, it was decided to incorporate in the report the statement of the Working Group which read:

The Committee on Safety and Health in Mines, having proposed the exclusion of the oil and gas exploration and extraction industry from the proposed Convention and Recommendation on Safety and Health in Mines,

- noting that this decision to exclude the oil and gas exploration and extraction industry was based on the need for a separate consideration of the specific safety and health problems within the oil and gas exploration and extraction industry;
- considering that despite efforts by governments, employers and workers and their representative organizations to reduce risks, the nature and extent of safety and health problems in this industry require continued attention and further actions;
- noting that the Convention on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents, 1993, applies to major hazard installations in the oil and gas exploration and extraction industry;
- noting the conclusions of the tripartite meeting in 1993 on safety and related issues pertaining to work on offshore petroleum installations;
- recognizing that similarities exist between onshore and offshore activities with regard to safety and health in oil and gas exploration and extraction;
- considering the need for continued improvement of safety and health protection in all mineral extraction;

invites the Governing Body to note:

- (a) that the oil and gas exploration and extraction industry has been excluded from the proposed Convention and Recommendation on Safety and Health in Mines;
- (b) that additional action by the ILO should be pursued to enhance the safety and health of workers in the oil and gas exploration and extraction industry, including the development of relevant instruments.

25. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert the words "and waste" after the words "extracted minerals" in clause 1(a)(ii), to ensure that the provision covered components other than "minerals". The Employers' members opposed the amendment as unnecessary since the Office text was already very broad and included everything taken out of the mine. The Government member of Canada supported the amendment since "preparation" could include compaction and the placement of waste materials of an organic nature stripped from the mine. The amendment was also supported by the Government member of Mexico, who said that waste could also be dangerous and should thus be covered by the provision, and by the Government members of Australia, Czech Republic and China. The Employers' members proposed a subamendment to replace the entire clause by the words "preparation and processing of the extracted minerals", since "processing" was broad enough to include the handling of waste. A further subamendment by the Workers' members to replace the word "minerals" by the word "materials" was accepted by the Employers' members. Several Government members expressed concern about the use of the term "processing". The Government member of Canada said it was vague and member States would have to define its meaning; the Government member of Ireland said that the word would substantially extend the scope of the instrument, and include, for example, the processing of gypsum to manufacture plaster. Similar concerns were voiced by the Government members of Australia, the United Kingdom and France. In the light of these observations, the Workers' members proposed a further subamendment to retain the Office text with the addition of the words "and disposal" after the word "washing", which was opposed by the Employers' members, since it extended the scope to activities which might be carried out far away from mines. The Government member of Canada pointed out that the term might even include the sale and transport of such materials. Faced by this opposition, the Workers' members withdrew this subamendment. As a result their original amendment, as subamended, to replace the word "minerals" by the word "materials", was accepted.

26. The Government members of the Member States of the EU submitted an amendment to replace the definition of the term "employer" in paragraph 2 to read: "The term 'employer' means any physical or legal person who employs one or more workers in a mine, and as the context requires, the principal contractor, the contractor or the subcontractor" to ensure consistency with the definition of the term in the Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (No. 167). This was subamended by the Workers' members who sought to add the words "the operator" after the word "requires", and accepted as subamended. As a result a similar amendment by the Workers' members concerning the definition of the word "employer" in paragraph 2 was not discussed.

27. The proposal by the Employers' members to add a definition of the term "safety and health representatives" was the subject of an extensive discussion during which it emerged that the provisions of Article 12 covered the definition of the term. In the face of opposition the amendment was withdrawn.

28. Article 1, as amended, was adopted.

Part II. Scope and means of application

29. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete subparagraph 2(a) arguing that the Convention should apply to all mines without exception. Following opposition by the Employers' members and by several Government members on the grounds that the Office text offered the flexibility needed for wide ratification by member States, the amendment was withdrawn.

30. The Government members of South Africa and the United States submitted an amendment to replace subparagraph 2(a) by the following text: "may modify specific provisions of the Convention as applied to certain categories of mines so long as the modification provides no less than the same level of protection provided by the Convention" which they considered provided for more flexibility. This was further subamended by the Government member of the United States to delete the words "... of the Convention ...", as the provisions of a Convention could not be modified. The subamendment was opposed by the Employers' members who proposed the introduction of a text to allow for the exclusion of certain categories of miners from the application of the provisions of the Convention. The Workers' members opposed the subamendment and subamended it to safeguard that the provisions in Articles 12, 13 and 14 were not subject to any exemption. Following a lengthy discussion on the acceptability of the implication of the subamendments on the status of a Convention, the Government member of the United States introduced a new subamendment which read: "may exclude certain categories of mines from the application of the Convention, or certain provisions thereof, when the overall protection afforded in pursuance of national law and practice is not inferior to that which would result from the full application of the provisions of the Convention;". This was supported by the Employers' and the Workers' members, and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted. The amendment which was submitted by the Government members of South Africa and the United States to delete subparagraph 2(b) was subsequently withdrawn.

31. Two amendments were submitted by the Government members of South Africa and the United States and by the Workers' members to delete paragraph 3 that dealt with some criteria for exclusion. Based on the outcome of the revision of the previous paragraph that omitted any reference for criteria for exclusion, the two amendments were supported and accepted.

32. On the basis of a discussion on a previous amendment, the Workers' members withdrew, without discussion, an amendment they had submitted to delete paragraph 4.

33. The Government members of Australia, Canada, India, South Africa, Turkey and the United States submitted an amendment to replace the words "the first report" in paragraph 4 by the words "its reports" in order to allow member States the flexibility of reflecting progressively the coverage of excluded categories of mines in other reports. With the support of the Employers' and the Workers' members, the amendment was accepted.

34. Article 2, as amended, was adopted.

Article 3

35. An amendment to insert the words “which ratifies this Convention” after the word “Member” in the Article submitted by the Government member of China and seconded by the Government members of Zambia and Zimbabwe was withdrawn when the representative of the Secretary-General explained that Conventions were binding only on member States that ratified them.

36. Article 3 was adopted without change.

37. The Government members of Canada and Turkey submitted an amendment to end paragraph 1 with the phrase “or by other means of application in accordance with national conditions and practice”, and subamended it without discussion by altering the proposed new phrase to read: “or by other means of application consistent with national practice” in order to allow for more flexibility of the instrument and to enhance its ratification possibilities. Whilst the Workers’ members expressed their appreciation of the intent of the amendment, they decided it was more appropriate under paragraph 2 that dealt with subsidiary legislation, a view which was supported by the Employers’ members. Following a request by the Government member of Australia as to whether the word “national” applied equally to federal and state levels, the Legal Adviser replied in the affirmative. Following discussion, the amendment was opposed and rejected.

38. The Government members of Canada and Turkey submitted an amendment to insert the words “or other means of application” after the word “regulation” in paragraph 2 and subamended it without discussion by inserting the words “or other means consistent with national practice” after the words “shall be supplemented”. This was further subamended by the Workers’ members to insert “or other means consistent with national practice” after the words “or codes of practice”. With the support of the Employers’ members, the amendment, as subamended, was accepted. An amendment by the Government member of China to replace the word “authority” by the word “authorities” in paragraph 2 was not seconded and therefore not discussed.

39. Article 4, as amended, was adopted.

40. The Government members of Canada, Czech Republic, Japan and Turkey submitted an amendment to insert the words “or other means” after the word “regulation” in paragraph 1 and withdrew it without discussion. They also submitted another amendment to insert the words “or other means” after the word “regulations” in the opening line of paragraph 2 and subamended it without discussion by inserting the words “or other means consistent with national practice” after the word “regulation”. Following discussion the amendment, as subamended, was opposed by the Workers’ and the Employers’ members and subsequently withdrawn.

41. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to end subparagraph 2(b) by the words: "by inspectors independently of mine employers and mineworkers" in order to ensure the independence of the inspectors. The Employers' members argued that in cases where the size of the inspectorate was limited, the inspectorate relied on inspections undertaken by the employer. Following discussion, the Government member of Canada subamended the amendment by inserting the words: "by inspectors designated for the purpose by the competent authority" after the word "mines" in subparagraph 2(b). The word "designated" was supported by the Employers' members and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted while its formulation was left to the Drafting Committee.

42. An amendment submitted by the Employers' members to insert a colon after the word "investigating" in subparagraph 2(c) was subamended by them to reposition the words "as defined by national laws or regulations," after the colon for clarity; to delete the words "fatal and serious accidents and" in the first and second lines and to insert the words "fatal and serious accidents" after the word "regulations". This was supported by the Workers' members and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

43. An amendment by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Czech Republic, Japan, New Zealand, Poland, South Africa, Turkey and the United States to delete the words "and serious" in the first line and to insert the words "or other means, serious accidents," after the word "regulations" in the second line of paragraph 2(c) was withdrawn without discussion.

44. The Government members of Czech Republic, Japan, Switzerland and Turkey submitted an amendment to insert the words "the measures helpful for" at the beginning of subparagraph 2(d) so as to allow flexibility in implementing the provisions of the instrument with regard to the compilation of statistics of accidents in the workplace. This was opposed by the Employers' and the Workers' members and the amendment was rejected.

45. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the word "all" and to insert a colon after the word "on" in subparagraph 2(d), which they subamended in the light of the earlier discussion to read: "the compilation and publication of statistics on: as defined by national laws or regulations accidents, occupational diseases and dangerous occurrences". This was supported by the Workers' members, and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted. Another amendment to the same subparagraph submitted by the Government members of Canada, Czech Republic, Japan and Turkey was withdrawn in the light of the earlier discussion.

46. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to subparagraph 2(f) to replace the word "measures" by the word "matters". A subamendment by the Workers' members to insert the words "measures and" before the word "matters" was supported by the Employers' members and subsequently accepted on the understanding that the wording would be referred to the Drafting Committee.

47. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new subparagraph under paragraph 2 to read as follows: "the supply and maintenance in hygienic condition of sufficient sanitary conveniences and facilities to wash, change and eat". This was opposed by the Employers' members, who considered it too detailed a provision for a Convention covering a wide variety of mines, and that a similar provision was already contained in Paragraph 26 of the proposed Recommendation. The Government members of the Member States of the EU submitted a subamendment, by analogy with clause 3(b)(ii), to begin the subparagraph with the words “the obligation of supplying and maintaining”, which was supported by the Workers’ and opposed by the Employers’ members. Whilst two Government members opposed the subamendment, arguing that such a provision should be contained in a Recommendation, one Government member supported it. The Government member of Canada proposed a further subamendment, to insert the words “where appropriate” before the words “the obligation of supplying and maintaining”, which was opposed by the Workers’ members. The Employers’ members stated that although the addition of these two words did make a difference, the text was still drifting in the wrong direction. Following lack of support, the subamendment was not accepted and the discussion returned to the preceding subamendment submitted by the Government members of the Member States of the EU. The Employers’ members proposed a further subamendment to insert the words “where appropriate” before the words “the obligation of supplying and maintaining”, which was initially opposed by the Workers’ members, who subsequently withdrew their opposition following support for the subamendment from the Government members. The amendment to add a new subparagraph to paragraph 5.2, as subamended, was accepted and its text left to the Drafting Committee for finalization.

48. An amendment submitted by the Government members of Canada, Czech Republic, Japan and Turkey to insert the words “or other means” after the word “regulations” in the introductory line of paragraph 3 was withdrawn in the light of the earlier discussion.

49. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Zaire, seconded by the Government member of Australia, sought to insert the words “manufacturing, sale, importation” after the words “provide that the”, and to insert the words “or similar products,” in the first line after the word “explosives” in subparagraph 3(a). The two parts of the amendment were examined separately. The Government member of Zaire said that the first part was intended to enhance the protection provided by the instrument. This was supported by the Workers’ members and opposed by the Employers’ members, who stated that it went beyond the scope of an instrument on safety and health in mines. Following similar opposition by the Government members of the Member States of the EU and others, the Government member of Australia submitted a subamendment to delete the words “sale, importation” and insert the phrase “at the mine” after the words “initiating devices”. The Employers’ members said that they would support the subamendment on the understanding that the words “at the mine” applied to all the activities listed in the provision, which the Government member of Australia confirmed was his intention. The Workers’ members opposed the subamendment, since explosives were also manufactured by miners near but not at the mine, and submitted a further subamendment to insert the words “and their manufacture at the mine site” after the words “initiating devices”. This was accepted by the Employers’ members. The Government member of Canada remarked that although he supported the subamendment, the wording was not clear and would limit the reference of the words “at the mine” to only the word “manufacture”, which was clearly not the original intention. The Government member of the United Kingdom expressed similar views. In the light of these observations, the Employers’ members withdrew their support for the subamendment by the Workers’ members, which was then withdrawn. Following lengthy discussion and clarification that the words “at the mine” in the subamendment submitted by the Government member of Australia were intended to indicate that all such activities took place at the mine site, the Employers’ and Workers’ members voiced their support, and the first part of the amendment, as subamended, was accepted as follows: “provide that the manufacture, storage, transport and use of explosives and initiating devices at the mine shall be carried out by or under the direct supervision of competent and authorized persons”. The Government member of Zaire explained that the second part of his amendment sought to include substances such as ammonium nitrate used during the operation phase which although not explosives, did become explosives on contact with fuel. This was supported by the Workers’ members, but opposed by the Employers’ members who maintained that the word “explosives” would include such products. The Government member of Canada said the words “similar products” were vague and would broaden the scope to include ammunition or firecrackers and proposed a subamendment to replace the proposed words by the words “or oxidizing components of explosives”. Following lack of support for the subamendment from both the Employers’ and Workers’ members, the Government members of Czech Republic, Mexico, Australia and the United States said that the words “similar products” were too broad. The Workers’ members subsequently withdrew their support for the second part of the amendment, which was then rejected.

50. The Government members of Australia, Canada, Czech Republic, South Africa, Switzerland and the United States submitted an amendment to subparagraph 3(a) to replace the word “trained” by the word “competent”, since the concept of competency also included experience and the ability to perform work in a safe manner. Following support from both the Employers’ and Workers’ members, the amendment was accepted.

51. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to insert the words “and maintain adequate” after the word “provide” in clause 3(b)(ii), which was supported by the Employers’ members and accepted.

52. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment in two parts. The first part sought to replace the word “waste” by the words “hazardous substances used in the mining process and waste produced at the mine” in clause 3(b)(iv). This was accepted. The second part which sought to substitute the word “résidus” for “déchet” in the French text was referred to the Drafting Committee since it was of a linguistic nature. Another amendment to clarify the same word “waste” was withdrawn by the Employers’ members in favour of the Workers’ amendment, which was accepted.

53. An amendment submitted by the Government members of Canada, Czech Republic, Japan and Turkey to insert the words “or other means” after the word “regulations” in paragraph 4 was withdrawn in the light of the earlier discussion. Another amendment submitted by the Workers’ members on the same paragraph to replace the words “employers prepare” by the words “the employer in charge of the mine prepares” sought to provide consistency with the provisions of Article II. This was subamended by the Employers’ members, with the word “prepare” being replaced by “ensures that”, since it would be more appropriate to the wide variety of mines and modes of operation which would include the plans being prepared by a third party. The Workers’ members accepted that the subamendment enhanced the text and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted. The consistency of the wording was referred to the Drafting Committee.

54. Based on the result of a previous discussion, the amendment submitted by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Switzerland, South Africa and the United States to amend the text of paragraph 4 was withdrawn without discussion.

55. Article 5, as amended, was adopted.

Part III. Preventive and protective measures at the mine Responsibilities of employers

New Article

56. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to introduce a new Article after Article 5 to read:

“In taking the preventive and protective measures the employer shall comply with the following order of priority:

1. eliminate the risk;
2. combat the risk at source;
3. minimize the risk by designing safe work systems;
4. use personal protective equipment in so far as the risk remains.”

The purpose of this amendment was to give an order of priority and hierarchy in outlining the protective measures. Whilst several Government members supported the amendment, it was opposed by the Employers’ members who maintained that similar provisions had already been covered elsewhere in the proposed Convention. The discussion was followed by a subamendment which the Government member of Canada submitted to replace the word “comply” in the opening statement by the words “deal with the risks in”, and the word “combat” in item 2 by the word “control”. This was supported by the Workers’ members and by several Government members. The Employers’ members maintained their opposition for reasons similar to those they had forwarded earlier and submitted a subamendment replacing the word “taking” by the word “assessing” and the words “order of priority” by “prioritization” in the opening lines and eliminating the words “by designing safe work systems” in item 3. This was opposed by the Workers’ members and by several Government members. At this juncture the Government member of the Netherlands submitted a subamendment reintroducing the word “taking” after the word “assessing”, which was further subamended by the Workers’ members who reintroduced the words “by designing safe work systems” in item 3. Following support by the Employers’ members, the Government member of Canada remarked that it was difficult to understand the meaning conveyed by the combination of the assessment and the taking of preventive measures and proposed that the word “assessing” be dropped from the opening lines and that the list and sequence of priorities be headed by a new item 1 to read "assess the risk". At the request of the Chairman, to state the guiding principles for demarcation among the hierarchical order, the spokesperson of the Workers' members explained that the intent of their original amendment could be described by the phrase "reasonable, responsible and feasible, with due diligence and in accordance with best practices". The explanation was acceptable to the Employers' members who proposed the incorporation of the phrase as a separate item 5 with best practice being replaced by good practice in the light of the views of the Government member of the United Kingdom that reference should be made to "good" practice rather than "best" practice. Given the range of details provided by the text, the Workers' members opposed this proposal on the grounds that such language was more suited in the Recommendation. After a lengthy debate the Workers' members settled on a new text of a subamendment which read:

"In taking the preventive and protective measures the employer shall deal with the risk in the following order of priority:

1. assess the risk;
2. eliminate the risk;
3. control the risk at source;
4. minimize the risk by means including the design of safe work systems;
5. use of personal protective equipment in so far as the risk remains."

Following a reading by the Chairman of the text of Article 13 of the Chemicals Convention, 1990 (No. 170) that dealt with a similar order of priority for control measures, the Workers' members maintained their position which was supported by several Government members and subsequently supported by the Employers' members, subject to the elaboration of more detail in the related sections of the proposed Recommendation.

57. The new Article, as amended, was adopted.

Article 6

58. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to insert the words ", to the extent reasonably practicable," after the word "minimize" in the opening lines of the Article. The proposal sought to qualify the word "minimize" so as not to place on the employer an obligation which was impossible to achieve. The Employers' members referred to a similar text used in Article 4.2 of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155) and in the Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162) and subamended their amendment by replacing the text by the words: "so far as is reasonably practicable". The Workers' members opposed the subamendment on the grounds that this additional qualification was better suited to a Recommendation, or could be noted for the record in the report. Other Government members voiced their opposition to the subamendment on the grounds that the text would create confusion and might weaken the intent of the original Office text. Following this opposition, the Employers' members withdrew their amendment on the understanding that the matter be addressed in the Recommendation.

59. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words "secure safety in its operation" in subparagraph (a) by the words "provide conditions for safe operations” since it was not possible to guarantee results, but only the means to achieve them. This was subamended by the Workers’ members to replace the word “operations” by “operation”, which was supported by the Employers’ members, and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

60. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to delete the words “take steps to” from subparagraph (c). This was opposed by the Employers’ members who maintained a previous argument that it was only possible to guarantee means of action but not the results. Following further opposition by the Government members, the amendment was withdrawn.

61. An amendment by the Workers’ members to insert the words “at least” before the words “two exits” in subparagraph (d) was withdrawn without discussion.

62. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Zaire to insert the words “and related equipment” after the word “environment” in subparagraph (e) was not seconded and therefore not discussed.

63. Article 6, as amended, was adopted.

Article 7

64. Since no amendments were proposed, Article 7 was adopted without change.

Article 8

65. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to end subparagraph (a) with the words “and of relevant preventive and protective measures in a comprehensive manner”, which they subamended to replace the word “comprehensive” by the word “comprehensible”. This was supported by the Employers’ members, and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

66. The Employers’ members submitted an amendment in three parts to insert the word “and” before the word “clothing”, to insert the words “as necessary” after the word “clothing” and to delete the words “and other facilities defined by national laws or regulations” in subparagraph (c). They believed that the word “facilities” was an all-embracing term which would lead to confusion and that “protective equipment” was broad enough to encompass the concept. The Workers’ members submitted a subamendment to delete the word “and” before the word “clothing” and to insert the words “as necessary” after the word “clothing” and to restore the words “and other facilities defined by national laws or regulations”. They maintained that the concept of “protective equipment” did not cover everything that was required, and the facilities would be defined at the national level, if the need arose. The Employers’ members opposed the subamendment for the same reasons which had motivated their original amendment. Following support for the subamendment by several Government members, the Employers’ members withdrew their opposition and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

67. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment in three parts to subparagraph (d) to delete the word “injured”, to insert the words “who have suffered from an injury or illness at the workplace” after the word “workers” and to add the words "first aid at the mine and" after the word "with". The first two parts were taken together and discussed first. The Workers' members said the original provision was too restrictive and that injury and illness were two different concepts. These two parts were supported by the Employers' members. An amendment by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Czech Republic and Poland to insert the words "emergency first aid, with" after the word "with" in the same subparagraph was withdrawn in the light of the third part of the amendment submitted by the Workers' members, which was subamended by the Employers' members to delete the words "at the mine", so as to avoid delays in treatment. This was supported by the Workers' members, and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted. The amendment submitted by the Government members of Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe to add the words "and quickest" after the word "appropriate" in the same subparagraph was opposed by the Workers' members who said that the quickest transportation might not be the most appropriate, and by the Employers' members as redundant. As a result it was rejected.

68. The Government members of Australia, Czech Republic and Switzerland submitted an amendment to add a new subparagraph as follows: "undertake risk analysis and hazard assessment to identify risks to the safety and health of mineworkers and develop and implement appropriate systems to effectively manage these risks". The Employers' members opposed the amendment as superfluous following the earlier discussion on the hierarchy of control concept. The Workers' members supported the amendment as reflecting a growing trend in the industry towards the development of risk management systems. The Government members of the United States and Panama opposed the amendment as being too ambitious for global application. The Government members of the Member States of the EU pointed out that such management systems were very complicated and since it might not be possible to extend them easily to all countries, such a provision might be an obstacle to ratification. The Government member of Australia withdrew the amendment in the light of the discussion, although he emphasized that such systems did enhance long-term performance.

69. The Workers' members also submitted an amendment to add a new subparagraph as follows: "promote a suitable programme or system for the rehabilitation of injured workers so that their health is restored as quickly as is practicable". The Employers' members said that although the concept was good, and in fact reflected what was usual practice, the provision would be more appropriate in a Recommendation. The Government member of Australia supported the amendment, saying that early rehabilitation was a key factor in restoring workers' health and would also help employers protect their own investment. The Government member of Mexico said that employers in his country were already partially responsible for the rehabilitation of workers afflicted with work-related injuries. The Government members of Botswana and Pakistan also supported the amendment, as did the Government member of the United States, who pointed out that the amendment merely required the employer to "promote" a suitable programme or system. The Government member of Panama concurred, and said there was a need for employers to be involved in such measures. The Government member of Czech Republic opposed the amendment, as did the Government members of the Member States of the EU, who said that it was more appropriate for a Recommendation. Put to a vote, the amendment was rejected by 395 votes against, 349 in favour, and 25 abstentions.

70. Article 8, as amended, was adopted.

Article 9

71. The Government members of Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe submitted an amendment to subparagraph (a) to replace the word “for” by the words “at no cost to”. The Employers’ members opposed the amendment as being unnecessary. The Workers’ members submitted a subamendment to insert the words “at no cost to the worker” after the word “matters”, which would clearly indicate who the recipient was. The subamendment was opposed by the Employers’ members, who said it was still redundant. Following wide support for the subamendment from the Government members, the Employers’ members withdrew their opposition, and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

72. The Government members of the Member States of the EU submitted a two-part amendment, the first part of which sought to replace subparagraph (d) by the following: “all accidents and dangerous occurrences, as defined by national laws or regulations, are investigated and appropriate remedial action is taken”. This sought to ensure that accidents, and not just dangerous occurrences, should fall within the scope of national definition. While the Employers’ members expressed their support for part 1 of this amendment, the Workers’ members opposed it. Following an explanation by the Government members of the Member States of the EU that not all accidents and all dangerous occurrences would be investigated, the Government member of Australia opposed the amendment as he believed that all accidents should be investigated by the employer to determine the causes for the purpose of prevention. His view was shared by a number of Government members. The Employers’ members explained that national authorities should be able to define accidents in a way which was appropriate to their circumstances. In the light of this argument, the Workers’ members withdrew their opposition to this part of the amendment, which was accepted. Based on this outcome, another amendment submitted by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Czech Republic, Islamic Republic of Iran, Japan, Poland, South Africa, Turkey and the United States to delete the words “and a report is made to the competent authority” from subparagraph (d), was not discussed. Similarly, the amendment submitted by the Workers’ members to add the words “as soon as possible” at the end of the subparagraph and the Employers’ amendment to the text of the subparagraph, were not discussed.

73. In part 2 of their amendment, the Government members of the Member States of the EU sought to add a new text after subparagraph (d) to read: “a report is made to the competent authority on accidents and dangerous occurrences, as defined by national laws and regulations”, so as to grant the competent authority the flexibility of deciding which accidents and dangerous occurrences should be subject to reporting. They further subamended the text to read: “as defined by national laws and regulations, a report is made to the competent authority on accidents and dangerous occurrences”. This was subamended by the Workers’ members to end the phrase by the words “as soon as possible”. The Employers’ opposition to this amendment was shared by several Government members who explained that their national legislations adequately covered the conditions for reporting, which led the Workers' members to withdraw their subamendment, and part 2 of the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

74. The Government members of Australia, Canada, Czech Republic, Switzerland and Turkey submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph as follows: "Employers shall ensure compliance with the requirements of national standards relating to the safety and mining equipment and appliances, the labelling of products and the provision of comprehensible instructions." This was aimed at placing on the employer the responsibility of ensuring compliance with standards which would also result in pressure on the suppliers of mining equipment and appliances. It was supported by the Workers' members but opposed by the Employers' members who argued that the provision placed on the employer an administrative burden and an obligation which was not possible to achieve. The amendment was subamended by the Government member of France who proposed the text to read: "Employers shall verify that the requirements of national legislation related to the safety of equipment and appliances are complied with." This was further subamended by the Workers' members to read: "Employers shall not permit the use of machinery, equipment, products and other substances in their mines that do not comply with relevant legal instruments." Following continued opposition by the Employers and several Government members, the amendment was withdrawn.

75. Article 9, as amended, was adopted.

Article 10

76. The two similar amendments by the Government members of Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe and by the Workers' members to replace the words "workers' exposure" by the words "workers exposed" were supported by the Employers' members and accepted.

77. Article 10, as amended, was adopted.

78. The Government members of Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe submitted an amendment in three parts which sought to replace the word "they" by the words "the employer in charge of such a mine", to replace the words "The employer in charge of the mine shall undertake this coordination and" by the words "as well as be", and to end the Article as follows: "This shall not be deemed to relieve the individual subordinate employers from coordinating the implementation of all measures concerning the safety and health of their workers." Whilst the first two parts of the amendment received the support of the Employers' and Workers' members, and were accepted, the third part was subamended by the Employers' members to replace the word "coordinating" by the words "responsibility for". This was further subamended by the Workers' members to delete the words "be deemed to" and "subordinate" which the Employers' members supported, and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

79. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to add a new paragraph to Article 11 as follows: "Arrangements pursuant to Article 11(1) for coordination between several employers do not diminish the responsibility of those employers for the safety and health of workers under their authority or for any matter under their control" was withdrawn without discussion since the intent had already been reflected by a previous amendment.

80. Article 11, as amended, was adopted.

Rights and responsibilities of workers and their representatives

Article 12

81. The Employers' members proposed a motion of procedure for paragraphs 1 and 2 to be discussed after paragraph 3, which provided a framework for the rights established under the preceding two paragraphs. The motion was opposed by the Workers' members, who said that there had been a significant increase in the role of workers in most countries and that it was very important to know what kind of rights were being discussed. Following lack of support from the Government members, the motion of procedure was rejected.

82. The Government members of the Member States of the EU submitted an amendment to insert the words ", dangerous occurrences" after the word "accidents" in subparagraph 1(a), which was supported by the Employers' and the Workers' members and accepted.

83. The Government members of the Member States of the EU submitted an amendment to delete the words ", at the workers' request," from subparagraph 1(b). Although workers could request inspections and investigations, the employer and the competent authority should have the right to decide whether such procedures were justified. The amendment was withdrawn in favour of a similar amendment submitted by the Government members of Canada, Czech Republic, Japan, New Zealand, Poland, South Africa and Switzerland, to delete the words "have, at the workers'" and to delete the comma after the word "request", which also sought to protect the employer and the competent authority from being bound on demand to comply with all requests made. The Employers' members opposed the amendment as still establishing an absolute right, which needed to be qualified, and submitted a subamendment for the subparagraph to read: "to request, where there is cause for concern on safety and health grounds, inspections and investigations to be carried out by the employer and the competent authority". Although the Workers' members accepted the second part of the subamendment, they opposed the first part on the grounds that it sought to remove a very important workers' right. The Government member of the United Kingdom said that the intent was not to remove the right to request, but rather the right to demand that inspections and investigations be carried out. The Government member of the United States stated that he did not support the subamendment as such, since in his experience such a right had been used judiciously. He did, however, support the underlying principle of the second part concerning the qualification. The Workers' members submitted a subamendment, to add the words "and obtain" after the words "to request". The subamendment was supported by the Government member of Canada, who remarked that the qualification meant that the final decision would be made by the employer and the competent authority. In the face of similar views from several Government members, the Employers' members withdrew their opposition and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted so that the text of subparagraph 1(b) would read: "to request and obtain, where there is cause for concern on safety and health grounds, inspections and investigations to be conducted by the employer and the competent authority".

84. An amendment by the Government member of India to replace subparagraph 1(b) by the text: "to request that inspections and investigations be done by the employer and the competent authority", and another by the Employers' members to insert the words "where there is cause for concern on safety and health grounds" after the word "request" in subparagraph 1(b) were withdrawn in the light of the earlier discussion.

85. The Government members of Australia, Canada, Japan, New Zealand, Switzerland and the United States submitted an amendment to insert the words "as much" before the word "information" and the words "as possible" after the word "information" in subparagraph 1(d). The amendment was supported by the Workers' members and opposed by the Employers' members, who said that the additional words were an inappropriate requirement for a right, since their scope was potentially unlimited. Following lack of support from several Government members, the amendment was withdrawn.

86. An amendment submitted by the Government members of Canada and India to replace the word "or" after the word "employer" by the words "and if not available from the employer then from" in subparagraph 1(d) was opposed by both the Workers' and Employers' members and rejected.

87. An amendment was submitted by the Employers' members to replace the words "collectively select" by the words "democratically elect" and to add the words "from among the workers employed at the mine" in subparagraph 1(f). As a right, which would include for example access to property in terms of later provisions, such a provision should be restricted to workers employed at the mine, although this did not preclude other arrangements to be agreed and added on, over and above this provision. Both parts of the amendment were opposed by the Workers' members who believed there was little difference between "collectively select" and "democratically elect", while the addition of the words "at the mine" could be detrimental to small mines with few workers which might need outside expertise on safety and health matters. Several Government members pointed out that their legislation made no provision for the direct election of safety and health representatives, and as such, those functions were carried out by other bodies, such as works' councils. The Government member of the United States opposed both parts of the amendment, since the words "collectively select" were sufficiently wide in scope to encompass such bodies as works' councils, and the words "at the mine" would preclude the possibility of a person being a representative at more than one mine. The Government members of Australia and Egypt also preferred the words "collectively select" for the same reasons and thus opposed the amendment. In the light of the discussion, the Employers' members submitted a subamendment, to add the following after the word "mine":

“Alternatively workers at the mine may reach agreement with employers on some other arrangements for the appointment of such representatives”, which they said would address some of the concerns raised. The Workers’ members opposed the subamendment as unworkable, and following lack of support from Government members, the subamendment was withdrawn. In the face of continued opposition from the Government members, the Employers’ members withdrew their original amendment.

88. In answer to a question by the Government member of the Netherlands as to whether the term “collectively select” covered works’ councils in subparagraph 1(f), the representative of the Employers’ members replied that the answer could not be definitive since there were variations among countries with regard to the interpretation of the term “works’ council”, as well as the basis of the representation on those councils. The Workers’ members affirmed that other representations such as works councils would be covered. Most Government members did not express a view on this. The Chairman therefore concluded that the term “safety and health representatives” would carry the broad interpretation attached to it by the Committee. Following discussion, an amendment submitted by the Government members of Canada and India to delete the word “collectively” and to insert the words “collectively or according to local practice” after the word “select” in subparagraph 1(f) was withdrawn.

89. The Employers’ members submitted and withdrew, without discussion, an amendment to begin paragraph 2 with the words “Under national laws and regulations” in favour of another amendment submitted by the Government members of the Member States of the EU, which sought to insert after the word “shall” in the opening lines of paragraph 2 the words “in accordance with national laws and regulations”. The purpose of this amendment was to ensure that the workers’ rights referred to under this paragraph were governed by national laws and regulations. This was subamended by the Workers’ members who preferred to maintain consistency with the language used in paragraph 1 and proposed to begin paragraph 2 with the words: “Under the national laws and regulations referred to in Article 4”. The subamendment was opposed by the sponsors of the original amendment on the grounds that it restricted the text to the provision as stated under Article 4 which would also curtail the flexibility required for ratification of the Convention. Following a clarification by the Government member of the Netherlands who explained that in paragraph 12.1 the rights would have to be established, whereas in paragraph 12.2 the ratifying State had the power to have the rights established in accordance with national laws and regulations, the Workers’ members withdrew their subamendment. Subsequently, the amendment was accepted.

90. The Employers’ members submitted an amendment to insert the word “workplace” before the word “safety” in subparagraph 2(a) for clarity. This was supported by the Workers’ members and the amendment was accepted.

91. The Government members of Canada, Czech Republic, Switzerland and Turkey submitted an amendment to insert the words “as defined by national laws and regulations or other means of application” after the words “inspection and” in subparagraph 2(b), which they subamended by deleting the words “or other means of application” from the original amendment. This was supported by the Workers' members but opposed by the Employers' members for the reasons presented during a previous discussion, who reiterated that the subamendment gave the right to workers from outside the mine to conduct investigations and inspections in the mine. This, they further explained, could give rise to conflict with national practice. The Employers' members proposed a subamendment to read: "to participate in inspections and investigations conducted by the employer and the competent authority," which was opposed by the Workers' members since they believed it took away from the workers their right to inspect and investigate mines. Following this discussion, the Government member of Canada, while expressing his sympathy with the subamendment put forward by the Employers' members, withdrew the original amendment, which was then reintroduced by the Employers' members along with their previous subamendment. Faced with continued opposition by the Workers' members and some Government members, the amendment was put to vote and rejected by 712 votes against, 704 votes in favour and 48 abstentions. Upon the Employers' members' request, the amendment was put to a record vote and rejected by 736 votes against, 632 votes in favour and 96 abstentions.

92. The Government member of India withdrew, without discussion, an amendment which sought to delete the words "and the competent authority" from the text of subparagraph 2(b) in favour of an amendment by the Government member of the Member States of the EU which sought to insert the words ", when appropriate," after the word "and" in the second line of the same subparagraph. Following opposition by both the Employers' and Workers' members, the amendment was rejected.

93. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to add the words "at the workplace" after the word "authority" in subparagraph 2(b), which was supported by the Workers' members and accepted.

94. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to insert the words ", relevant to the area for which the safety and health representative has been appointed," after the word "receive" in subparagraph 2(f). Expressing their support for the underlying concept, the Workers' members submitted a subamendment to replace the last two words by the word "responsibility", which was supported by the Employers' members. The amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

95. The Employers' members submitted a seven-part amendment to paragraph 3 to insert the words "at the mine level" after the word "rights", to replace the word "by" by the words "within the framework of", to insert the word "and" after the word "regulations", to replace the word "with" by the word "between", to delete the comma after the word "employers" and then to add the word "and", to replace the word "and" in the third line by the word "or" and to insert the words "safety and health" after the word "their". They subamended it to read: "The procedures for the exercise of the rights at the workplaces referred to in paragraphs (1) and (2) above shall be established by and within the framework of national laws and regulations and after consultations between employers and workers and their respective representatives." The Employers' members said the subamendment, to which they attached much importance, was based on a two-tiered approach whereby national laws and regulations would establish a framework within which detailed procedures would be determined at the mine level. To attempt to establish procedures by national laws and regulations which could be applied in all mines would be both ineffective and impracticable. This subamendment was opposed by the Workers' members because they believed it did not capture the intent behind the concept of the hierarchy concerning the rights of the workers, a concern which was raised during the previous year's discussion, whereby national laws and regulations would establish such rights through consultations. They submitted a subamendment so that paragraph 3 would read: "The procedures for the exercise of the rights referred to in paragraphs (1) and (2) above shall be established (a) by national laws and regulations; (b) through consultations with employers, workers and their representatives." The Workers' members clarified, at the request of the Employers' members, that in the context of Conventions and Recommendations, the text referred generally to the workers and to their representatives and also to situations involving employers and their representatives. In response to a clarification sought by the Government member of the Netherlands, as to whether the text could still be interpreted to mean that the procedures could be established by either national laws and regulations or through consultations, they further reiterated that the rights of workers were established under national laws and regulations, and procedures to establish the implementation of those regulations were developed through consultations between employers and workers and their representatives. The suggestion by the Government member of Canada to insert a colon after the word "established", and a semi-colon followed by the word "and" before the word "through" was supported, and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

96. Article 12, as amended, was adopted.

97. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words "use of" by the words "care and use of protective clothing" in subparagraph (b). This was supported by the Workers' members and accepted.

98. The Workers' members submitted an amendment in two parts to replace in subparagraph (c) the word "forthwith" by the words "as soon as possible" and to insert the words "to their health and safety or that of other persons" after the word "risk". The first part of the amendment was opposed by the Employers' members on the grounds that it eliminated the sense of urgency required in the reporting of the risk, and was subsequently withdrawn. Since part 2 of the amendment aimed to ensure the safety of other workers, it was supported, and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

99. An amendment by the Employers' members to introduce a new subparagraph to read: "cooperate with the employer to enable duties and responsibilities placed on the employer by this Convention to be complied with" was supported and accepted.

100. The Employers' members submitted another amendment to introduce a new subparagraph to read: "carry out any lawful instruction which has been given in the interests of securing safety and health at the mine." This was opposed by the Workers' members who argued that the text involved legal complications and that its thrust had already been covered by Article 13(a). Following opposition from several Government members, the Employers' members withdrew the amendment on the understanding that their concern was reflected in Article 13(a).

101. The Government member of India, supported by the Government member of Zimbabwe, submitted an amendment in two parts to introduce a new subparagraph. The first part, which introduced a text to read: "obey instructions on safety and health measures given to them by their supervisors and mine officials", was withdrawn without discussion. The second part, to introduce the words: "make only legitimate use of the information obtained from the employers or the competent authority and be responsible for its inappropriate use" was subamended by the sponsor to delete the words "and be responsible for its inappropriate use". While this was supported by the Employers' members, it was opposed by the Workers' members who believed that the text implied the illegitimate use of information by the workers and restricted the dissemination of information. Following a discussion during which some Government members supported and most opposed the subamendment, the Employers' members withdrew their original support and the amendment was rejected.

102. Article 13, as amended, was adopted.

Cooperation

103. The Government member of India, supported by the Government member of Botswana, submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph as follows: "Employers and workers shall each share their part of responsibility in ensuring that prescribed safety and health measures are implemented" which he subamended, without discussion, by replacing the word "share" by the word "assume" and the words "part of" by the word "respective", emphasizing that the intention was to address the implementation of the safety and health measures. This was opposed by the Workers' members as an unnecessary complication and by the Employers' members as confusing, and was subsequently rejected.

104. Article 14 was adopted without change.

Part IV. Implementation

105. The Workers' members submitted an amendment as a new subparagraph to read: "take no measure, and ensure that employers take no action in pursuance of the Convention, which results in a reduction of the level of health and safety protection afforded to workers in mines under existing laws and regulations and practices at the time of ratification of the standards under consideration." The representative of the Secretary-General referred to paragraph 8 of article 19 of the Constitution of the ILO which states that: "In no case shall the adoption of any Convention or Recommendation by the Conference, or the ratification of any Convention by any Member, be deemed to affect any law, award, custom or agreement which ensures more favourable conditions to the workers concerned than those provided for in the Convention or Recommendation." The Workers' members stated that they too had intended to refer to the same provision and withdraw their amendment, which they did.

106. Article 15 was adopted without change.

107. In response to a clarification sought by the Government member of the Netherlands, the representative of the Secretary-General replied that the final provisions of the Convention were inserted by the Conference Drafting Committee. The Government member of the Netherlands remarked that several governments had problems with the long period provided for in denouncing a Convention. The proposed Convention, as amended, was adopted.

Consideration of the proposed Recommendation in Report IV(2B)

Preamble

108. The Preamble of the Recommendation, replaced by the text of the Preamble to the Convention that had already been amended and adopted, was adopted.

I. General provisions

Paragraph 1

109. Since no amendments were proposed, Paragraph 1 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 2

110. Since no amendments were proposed, Paragraph 2 was adopted without change.

111. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete subparagraph (1) as they believed the provision was covered by Article 3 of the proposed Convention, and that its repetition was unnecessary. This was opposed by the Workers' members who argued that its deletion would deprive Members which did not ratify the Convention from applying an important provision, if they so wished. Following an explanation by the Office that provisions appearing in Conventions are also repeated in accompanying Recommendations, the amendment was further opposed by other Government members as a result of which it was withdrawn.

112. The Government members of Canada and Turkey submitted an amendment to replace the word "should" after the word "Convention" by the word "could" in subparagraph (2) explaining that there could be situations where there was no need for consultation when the effect of working hours, night work and shift work on the workers' safety and health were not an issue. This was subamended by the Employers' members to insert the words "where appropriate" after the word "should" in order to deal with situations where there was need for consultations. The Workers' members opposed the subamendment, arguing that the words “where appropriate” added an unacceptable qualifier, following which the amendment was withdrawn.

113. On the basis that the issue of working time could be broad and involve other industries, the Employers’ members submitted an amendment to delete the second sentence of subparagraph (2). This was opposed by the Workers’ members who noted that the text belonged to a proposed Recommendation and was intended for guidance only. Their view was shared by several Government members, following which the amendment was withdrawn.

114. The Government of India submitted and withdrew, without discussion, an amendment to delete the word “daily” from subparagraph (2).

115. Paragraph 3 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 4

116. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to insert the words “in adequate number” after the word “staff” and subamended it by putting the word “number” into the plural. This was opposed by the Employers’ members and by several Government members on the grounds that it posed difficulty to the competent authority and was vague, and was subsequently withdrawn.

117. The Government member of India submitted and withdrew, without discussion, an amendment to replace the word “and” by the words “so as” after the word “Convention”, and to add the words “by the employer” at the end.

118. Paragraph 4 was adopted without change.

New Paragraph

119. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to add a new Paragraph after Paragraph 4 to read: “Inspectors appointed by the competent authority should be independent of workers and employers”, in order to ensure the independence of the inspector, a concept which they had attempted to introduce in the proposed Convention. This was opposed by the Employers’ members who argued that the provision was in some circumstances impracticable. Following discussion, the amendment was withdrawn.

120. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to add a new clause as follows: “programmes or systems for the rehabilitation and reintegration of injured and ill workers so that their health is restored as quickly as is possible and they are returned to suitable employment with their employer at no loss to the worker.” The Employers’ members opposed the amendment as going beyond the scope of the instruments and of national laws and regulations, and said that it might not be possible for a worker to return to the original employer. The Government member of Australia agreed that it would be difficult to apply the provision, especially since compensation pay for injured or ill workers might not be equivalent to their normal pay. The representative of the Government members of the Member States of the EU also opposed the amendment as falling outside the scope of the instrument. In the light of the discussion, the Workers’ members submitted a subamendment to insert the words “, where practicable,” after the word “returned” and to delete the words “at no loss to the worker”. The Employers’ members said that the law could not guarantee that workers’ health would be restored as quickly as possible, and submitted a further subamendment for the clause to read: “programmes or systems for the rehabilitation and reintegration of workers who sustain workplace injury or illness”. This was further subamended by the Workers’ members to replace the word “workplace” by “occupational”, which was supported by the Employers’ members and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

121. Paragraph 5, as amended, was adopted.

II. Preventive and protective measures at the mine

New Paragraph

122. The Employers’ members submitted an amendment to add a new Paragraph before Paragraph 6, under the heading “Preventive and protective measures at the mine”, as follows: “In taking the preventive and protective measures in accordance with Part III of the Convention, it is intended that the employers take those measures that are reasonable, diligent, feasible, practicable and in accordance with good practice.” Following informal consultations with the Workers’ members, the Employers’ members subamended the proposed text to read: “In taking the preventive and protective measures of Part III of the Convention, the choice of method or methods to be applied in respect of a particular hazard or risk should be determined having regard to what is reasonable, practicable, feasible, the exercise of due diligence and good practice, and with the risks being dealt with in the order of priority set out in Article 6(b)-(e).” This was supported by the Workers’ members because the text was the result of considerable consultations between them and the Employers’ members. However, they pointed out the need to place the new Paragraph in the right sequence and that consideration should be given to the translation into French and Spanish of the terms “reasonable” and “good practice”. The amendment, as subamended, was accepted. It was left to the Drafting Committee to determine where this new Paragraph should be placed or alternatively, the positioning of the heading “Preventive and protective measures at the mine” in either the Convention or Recommendation.

Paragraph 6

123. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to replace the word “could” by the words “should, where appropriate” in the introductory lines, which was supported by the Employers’ members and accepted.

124. The Government members of Canada, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, South Africa, Turkey and the United States submitted an amendment to delete the words “on behalf of the employer” from clause (b), which was supported by the Workers’ and Employers’ members and accepted.

125. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to add at the end of clause (c) the following: “and hazardous substances used in the mining process and waste produced at the mine.” The Employers’ members said that not all waste might be hazardous and submitted a subamendment to add the words “or produced” after the word “used” and to delete the words “and waste produced at the mine”, which was supported by the Workers’ members and accepted.

126. Paragraph 6, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 7

127. A two-part amendment was submitted by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Norway, Slovenia, South Africa, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States to insert the words “and Article 9, paragraph 2” after the words “paragraph 3(b)” and to insert the words “and installers” after the word “suppliers” in paragraph 7. In the light of an earlier debate, the first part was not discussed and the second part was withdrawn.

128. The Workers’ members submitted a two-part amendment to replace the words “mining equipment and appliances” by the words “equipment, appliances, products and substances to the mine” and to insert the words “information and” after the word “comprehensible”. The Employers’ members submitted a subamendment to the first part to insert the word “hazardous” before the word “products”, which was supported by the Workers’ members and accepted. The Employers’ members supported the second part, and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

129. Paragraph 7, as amended, was adopted.

New Paragraph

130. The Government member of India submitted an amendment to add a new Paragraph, which he subamended as follows: “The competent authority where it considers necessary may specify or approve the use of machinery, equipment, appliance apparatus or material for work or operations in the mine.” The amendment was opposed by the Employers’ members as inappropriate for a Recommendation, and following lack of support from both the Workers’ and Government members, it was rejected.

Paragraph 8

131. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to add the words “and appropriate medical facilities” after the word “aid” in the introductory lines. The Employers’ members opposed the amendment, as going beyond the concept of first aid and mine rescue requirements, and therefore contrary to the intent of this clause. They submitted a subamendment to insert after the word “Convention”, the following text “, and to appropriate medical facilities for emergency care,”. This was supported by the Workers’ members and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

132. The Government members of Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe submitted an amendment to replace in clause (g) the word “a” by the words “an effective” and to replace the words “assist in safe escape” by the words “alert of imminent danger”. The Workers’ members submitted a subamendment to delete the word “imminent”, which was supported by the Employers’ members and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

133. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to replace the word “team” in both lines of clause (i) by the word “teams”, which was subamended by the Employers’ members to read: “team or teams” in both lines. This was supported by the Workers’ members and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

134. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to add a new clause before clause (k) to read: “coordination with local authorities”. This was supported by the Employers’ members on the understanding that not everything could be included in this list, and the amendment was accepted.

135. An amendment by the Government member of India to add a new clause as follows: “observance of strict discipline and instructions by trained personnel”, was withdrawn without discussion.

136. Paragraph 8, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 9

137. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment in two parts. The first part which sought to insert the words “and standards” after the word “specifications” was supported by the Employers’ members and accepted. The second part which proposed to insert the words “and other mines where appropriate” after the word “outbursts” was amended by the Workers’ members without discussion to add a new sentence at the end of Paragraph 9 to read: “The development and deployment of wearable self-contained self-rescuers having sufficient duration to provide for workers to escape to a safe area should be encouraged.” This was opposed by the Employers’ members on the grounds that such a provision could not be incorporated into regulations. The Government member of the United States considered the text to be useful and supported the amendment as subamended. Following discussion, the Employers’ members proposed to retain the text of the original amendment and the Workers’ members withdrew their subamendment to retain part 2 of their original amendment. This was supported and part 2 of the amendment accepted.

138. Paragraph 9, as amended, was adopted.

139. The amendment submitted by the Workers’ members to insert the words “all necessary” after the word “take” in the introductory statement was subamended by the Employers’ members to replace the words “all necessary” by the words “all appropriate”. This was supported by the Workers’ members and accepted.

140. Paragraph 10, as amended, was adopted.

New Paragraph

141. The Workers’ members submitted a three-part amendment as a new Paragraph and subamended it without discussion to read only the third part to read: "Employers should undertake risk analysis and hazard assessment to identify risks and hazards and develop and implement appropriate systems to manage these risks and hazards." This was subamended by the Employers' members who recalled the debate relating to the Convention and the need for progress in technological development and proposed the following text: "Employers should undertake hazard assessment and risk analysis and then develop and implement, where appropriate, systems to manage the risk." Following the support by the Workers' members, the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

142. The new Paragraph, as amended, was adopted.

143. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert the words "best international standards, when they exist, and where higher with" after the word "with" in clause (a). The Employers' members opposed this amendment on the grounds that the text was the subject of discussion during the previous year's discussion, and explained that the international standards could be totally impracticable to mining conditions. The amendment was also opposed by the Government members of the Member States of the EU because of the difficulty of defining the word "best". It was also opposed by several Government members who argued that it was necessary to adapt international standards to suit local conditions in some countries. Following discussion, the Government member of Ireland submitted a subamendment to end clause (a) with the phrase: "or consider international standards where national standards do not exist", which was further subamended by the Workers' members to end the subamendment with the words "or are inferior". The Employers' members maintained their opposition by recalling that the original text meant that it was the responsibility of the competent authority to look for standards and that the text should be adhered to. Following a lengthy debate, there was agreement to accept the subamendment by the Government member of Ireland on the understanding that the Drafting Committee could adjust the wording of the text to suit the introductory words to paragraph 11.

144. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to add the words "pursuant to Article ..." after the word "minimized" in clause (b) was withdrawn in the light of the earlier discussion.

145. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete the words "while work is in progress" from clause (c). The Employers' members opposed the deletion, which they said would extend the provision to areas where no work was being undertaken and require those areas to be adequately ventilated. Following support for the amendment from the majority of the Government members and opposition by some on the basis of the inconsistency and weakening of the provisions, the Employers' members withdrew their opposition and the amendment was accepted. The French text of the amendment was referred to the Drafting Committee to ensure consistency with the English version.

146. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new clause, which they subamended to read as follows: "pursuant to Article 6(d) of the Convention, separate means of egress should be as independent of each other as possible; special arrangements should be made and equipment provided for the safe evacuation of workers in case of danger.” The Employers’ members submitted a subamendment to delete the word “special”, since it might not be necessary in all cases, which was accepted by the Workers’ members. The Government members of the Member States of the EU requested clarification as to whether means of egress which shared some common part would be considered as “independent”. The Workers’ members pointed out that although they would have preferred such means of egress to be totally independent, the provision in the Convention included the words “wherever practicable”. Furthermore, two physically separate shafts might well share the same source of power, or two separate paths might have the same ventilation circuit. Other examples were given by the Government member of the United States and the Employers’ members. The Government member of the United Kingdom pointed out that the means of egress should be totally independent and separate, since the egress was to the surface, and that the words “as independent ... as possible” in fact diluted the provision of Article 6 of the Convention, a view supported by the Government member of France. Since the subamendment had the support of the Workers’ members, the amendment, as subamended, was accepted. As proposed by the Government member of Greece, the decision to number the amendment as a new Paragraph was referred to the Drafting Committee.

147. Paragraph 11, as amended, was adopted.

148. An amendment submitted by the Workers’ members to add the word “explosions” at the end of clause (a), which they subamended to read “and explosions”, was supported by the Employers’ members and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

149. An amendment by the Government member of India, seconded by the Government member of Zimbabwe, to delete the word “underground” from clause (a) was supported by both the Employers’ and Workers’ members and accepted.

150. Another amendment submitted by the Government member of India, and seconded by the Government member of Zimbabwe, to add the words “and collapse of ground” at the end of clause (e) was withdrawn after opposition from both the Employers’ and the Workers’ members, who said the list was not intended to be exhaustive.

151. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to delete the word “extremely” from clause (g), which was opposed by the Employers’ members, who argued that some qualification was necessary since the Paragraph concerned special procedures. Following general consensus in the Committee to return some qualification, it was agreed to refer to the Drafting Committee the replacement of the word “extremely” in the Office text by the word “particularly”, following which the amendment was withdrawn.

152. An amendment by the Workers’ members to add a new clause to read: “loss of ventilation” was supported by the Employers’ members and accepted. As the amendment by the Government member of India to add another new clause was not seconded, it was not discussed.

153. Paragraph 12, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 13

154. Since no amendments were proposed, Paragraph 13 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 14

155. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new sentence to the opening lines to read: "The self-contained chambers should be easily identifiable and accessible so that they can be reached by workers under all circumstances, also in cases where visibility is extremely poor", and subamended it to replace the word "also" with the word "particularly". This was opposed by the Employers' members who explained that the requirement was impossible to achieve since the necessary systems were not available. They subamended the text to terminate after the word "accessible", which was further subamended by the Workers' members to add the words "particularly in cases where visibility is poor" after the word "accessible", explaining that this could be achieved by light lines and reflective material. Following elaboration, the Employers' members supported the amendment which was accepted.

156. Paragraph 14, as amended, was adopted.

New Paragraph

157. An amendment by the Government members of Australia and Canada to introduce a new Paragraph concerning the measures set in a previous Article in the Convention was withdrawn without discussion.

Paragraph 15

158. The Government member of India submitted an amendment to introduce a new clause in three parts as follows: (1) "refrain from carrying, possessing or consuming any intoxicating drug or be in a state of intoxication or drunkenness while on duty"; (2) "refrain from sleeping on duty"; (3) "refrain from obstructing others in discharge of their duties". This was opposed by the Workers' members and subamended by the Employers' members by deleting points 2 and 3. Faced with opposition by several Government members who argued that such matters were dealt with by national legislation, the Employers' members subamended the text further by replacing it with the following text: "refrain from being under the influence of any intoxicating drug or alcohol while on duty". The Workers' members and several Government members maintained their opposition for the reasons stated above. Put to vote, the amendment was rejected by 35,552 votes against, 29,920 votes in favour, and 1,408 abstentions.

159. An amendment by the Workers' members to introduce a new subparagraph to read: "Employers' should have a duty to provide workers with appropriate training and instructions so as to enable them to comply with these duties" was supported by the Employers' members and accepted.

160. Paragraph 15, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 16

161. The Government member of India withdrew without discussion an amendment to add the words “in the mine” at the end of clause (d).

162. Paragraph 16 was adopted without change.

163. The Government members of the Member States of the EU submitted an amendment to insert the word “natural” after the word “other” and to replace the words “noxious and other” by the words “and asphyxiating” in clause (b). This was opposed by the Employers’ members on the grounds that the original text was the result of an exhaustive deliberation during the previous year’s discussion, and by the Workers’ members for the same reason, and was rejected.

164. Based on the outcome of the previous amendment, the Government members of the Member States of the EU withdrew without discussion an amendment to replace clause (c) by the following: “toxic gases and vapours, and other man-made dangerous chemical substances introduced in the mine.” An amendment by the Government member of India, seconded by the Government member of Zimbabwe, to add the words: “noxious and toxic” at the beginning of clause (c) was opposed by both the Workers’ and the Employers’ members and rejected.

165. Clause (c) was also the subject of an amendment by the Workers’ members who proposed to replace the word “chemicals” by the word “substances”. This was supported by the Employers’ members and accepted.

166. An amendment by the Workers’ members to add a new clause as follows: “work in confined spaces” was supported by the Employers’ members following clarification by the Workers’ members that the term did not refer to large sections of the mine having narrow stopes. The Government member of Greece said that redrafting would help the amendment reflect its intention more clearly, and at the suggestion of the Workers’ members, it was agreed to insert the text of the amendment in clause (h).

167. An amendment by the Workers’ members to introduce the text: “hazard related to stress” as a new clause was opposed by the Employers’ members as a broad and vague concept. The Government member of Pakistan’s proposal to insert the text in clause (f) was rejected since the clause specifically addressed temperatures. The amendment was also opposed by the Government members of the Member States of the EU who explained that the notion of stress was not covered by Article 8 of the Convention to which the Paragraph under discussion was related and that clause (n) took care of the combined effects. Following similar opposition by several other Government members, the amendment was withdrawn.

168. Paragraph 17, as amended, was adopted.

169. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to add the following at the end of clause (b): “such protective clothing should at least include items such as: (i) overalls suitable to the conditions; (ii) gloves; (iii) protective footwear”. This was withdrawn following opposition by the Employers’ and several Government members.

170. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to replace the word “salary” by the words “remuneration and benefits” in clause (c) in order to reinforce the notion of no cost to the worker. This was opposed by the Employers’ members because the term “benefits” could refer to a broad range of bonuses. The Government member of Canada subamended the text by replacing the word “remuneration” by the word “salary”. This was supported by the Workers’ members but opposed by the Employers’ members for the same reasons they had stated earlier. Following further opposition by other Government members, both the subamendment and the amendment were withdrawn.

171. An amendment by the Government member of India, seconded by the Government member of Zimbabwe, to add the words: “including remedial action where necessary” at the end of clause (d) was opposed by the Employers’ and the Workers’ members and rejected.

172. Paragraph 18 was adopted without change.

New Paragraph

173. The Government members of Australia, Canada, South Africa and the United States submitted an amendment to introduce a new Paragraph as follows: “The types of protective equipment and facilities referred to in Article 8(c) of the Convention could include engineering or other means of control such as: (a) emergency safety showers and eye wash bays; (b) self-contained rescue chambers; (c) remotely operated dust collection systems; (d) roll-over and falling object protective structures; (e) equipment seat belts and harnesses; (f) fully enclosed pressurized cabins.” While the Workers’ members supported the amendment as a useful indicative list of the types of protective equipment and facilities, it was opposed and subamended by the Employers’ members to replace the word “could” by the word “might” which they agreed to refer to the Drafting Committee and to delete the text in (c), (d) and (e). Faced with opposition, the Employers’ members further amended their subamendment by restoring the text under (d) and (e) and deleting (c) only, which was supported and accepted.

174. The new Paragraph, as amended, was adopted.

175. The Government members of the Member States of the EU submitted an amendment to replace clause (a) by the following: “ensure appropriate inspections of each workplace at the mine, and in particular, of the atmosphere, ground conditions, machinery, equipment and appliances therein, including where necessary pre-shift inspections; and”. This was aimed at introducing the notion of pre-shift inspections. Supported by the Employers’ and the Workers’ members, the amendment was accepted. Based on this result, an amendment by the Employers’ members to add the words “, as appropriate,” after the word “and” in the same clause was not discussed.

176. Paragraph 19, as amended, was adopted.

177. The Employers' members submitted a two-part amendment to the introductory lines of Paragraph 20, the first of which sought to insert the word "unfair" before the word "discrimination". This was opposed by the Workers' members as suggesting that there could be "fair" discrimination, a view broadly supported by the Government members. On the understanding that it might sometimes be necessary to discriminate lawfully against a worker for health reasons, the Employers' members withdrew this part of their amendment. The second part of the amendment sought to replace the word "whatsoever" by the words "any person or party", to clarify that the retaliation might be in either direction between employers and workers. Following opposition from the Workers' and Government members, this second part of the amendment was also withdrawn.

178. The Workers' members submitted a two-part amendment to clause (a), the first of which sought to insert the words "related to the requirements of the tasks to be performed," after the word "examination". This was supported by the Employers' members and accepted. The second part of the amendment sought to insert the words "with medical records being accessible to workers only" after the word "basis". This was opposed by the Employers' members, who argued that such information sometimes needed to be provided to other bodies and might be necessary to the employer to ensure the safety of the same or other workers. Following wide opposition from the Government members, the Workers' members submitted a subamendment to replace the words "to workers only" by the words "according to national laws and regulations relating to privacy", which was opposed by the Employers' members as redundant. A further subamendment by the Government member of India to replace this phrase by the words "to persons authorized by national laws and regulations" was opposed by both Employers' and Workers' members and rejected, and in the face of continued opposition from Government members, the Workers' members withdrew the second part of their amendment.

179. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace clause (b) by the following: "provide programmes or systems for the rehabilitation and reintegration of injured and ill workers so that their health is restored as quickly as is possible and they are returned to suitable employment with their employer at no loss to the worker." This text was opposed by the Employers' and Government members and was withdrawn.

180. Paragraph 20, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 21

181. An amendment by the Employers' members to delete Paragraph 21 as redundant following an earlier debate was supported by the Workers' members and accepted.

182. Paragraph 21 was deleted.

183. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to the introductory lines of the Paragraph as follows: "Pursuant to Article 12 of the Convention, workers and their safety and health representatives should receive or have access to, where appropriate:". The Workers' members opposed the deletion of the word "include", which now made the provision into a closed list. The Employers' members said that this was not their intention and submitted a subamendment to replace the colon at the end of the introductory lines by a comma and to add the words "information which should include:". This was supported by the Workers' members and accepted. In the light of this discussion, another amendment submitted by the Government member of India to the introductory lines was not discussed.

184. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the word "authority" by the words "authorities, other organizations" in clause (c), which was opposed by the Employers' members, who argued that it was beyond the scope of the instrument to prescribe obligations for other organizations. Following similar opposition from Government members, the amendment was withdrawn and the matter of transforming the word "authority" into the plural was referred to the Drafting Committee.

185. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to delete the words "where practicable" at the beginning of clause (g) and to insert the words "upon arrival" after the word "notice" was also withdrawn after opposition from the Employers' and Government members.

186. Another amendment to the same clause was submitted and subamended by the Employers' members to insert the words "safety or health related" after the word "any". This was supported by the Workers' members and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

187. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to delete the word "health" in clause (h) was withdrawn.

188. Paragraph 22, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 23

189. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the word "danger" by the words "reasons for," in clause (e) and to delete the word "of" before the words "the fact that", since the perception of danger might have been unjustified. The Workers' members supported the amendment, which was accepted.

190. Paragraph 23, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 24

191. Since no amendments were proposed, Paragraph 24 was adopted without change.

New Paragraph

192. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to add a new Paragraph before Paragraph 25, as follows: "The safety and health representative should give reasonable notice to the employer of his or her intention to conduct inspections or investigations provided for in Article 12, paragraph 2(b)", as the rights provided in the Convention allowed that workers' representatives not belonging to the mine could also conduct inspections. The Workers' members submitted a subamendment to insert the words ", where practicable," before the word "give", which was supported by the Employers' members and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

193. The new Paragraph, as amended, was adopted.

194. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the words "and regular" before the word "inspections" in clause (a) as they considered it to be prescriptive. The Workers' members, noting that the emphasis in the provision was on the idea of joint inspections, supported the amendment, which was accepted.

195. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete clause (c) which they considered as redundant and covered by Article 9(a) of the Convention. After opposition from the Workers' members and several Government members, the amendment was withdrawn.

196. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert the word "ongoing" before the word "safety" in clause (d), which was supported by the Employers' members and accepted.

197. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert the word "regular" before the word "exchange" in clause (e). Following opposition from the Employers' and Government members, it was subamended to replace the word "regular" by the word "ongoing", which was supported by the Employers' members and the amendment, as subamended, was accepted.

198. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete clause (f) as they believed it was already covered by Article 12(2)(d) of the Convention. The Workers' members opposed the amendment, since clause (f) placed the initiative for consultation on the employer and was intended to ensure that there would be such consultation. Following opposition from the Government members, the amendment was withdrawn. Another amendment submitted by the Employers' members to delete clause (g) was withdrawn in the light of the debate.

199. Paragraph 25, as amended, was adopted.

200. The Government members of Australia, Canada, Czech Republic, Poland, South Africa, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States submitted an amendment to add a new Paragraph after Paragraph 25, as follows: "The requirements in pursuance of Article 6(a) and Article 8(c) of the Convention relating to the provision of electrical, mechanical, protective and other equipment should ensure that the suppliers and installers of such equipment comply with national standards on safety and health, label equipment clearly and provide information and comprehensible instructions for worker safety and health.” The Workers’ members submitted a subamendment to delete the words “in pursuance of Article 6(a) and Article 8(c) of the Convention”. Following an observation by the Government member of Greece that the provision was already covered by Paragraph 7 of the Recommendation, the Government member of Australia said the original amendment sought to provide a broader context beyond mine rescue equipment in which the employer would have certain obligations. The Employers’ members opposed the subamendment as inconsistent, since it now meant that it was the equipment which should comply with such standards. Following opposition from the Government member of the United Kingdom, who pointed out that in the mining industry the installer was often the employer, and that his duty was to comply with statutes, not standards, the Workers’ members withdrew their subamendment and supported the thrust of the original amendment, subject to clarification of the wording. The Employers’ members continued to oppose the amendment, which they subamended to read: “With regard to Article 6(a) and Article 8(c) of the Convention relating to the provision of electrical, mechanical, protective and other equipment, suppliers and installers of such equipment should comply with national standards on safety and health, label equipment clearly and provide information and comprehensible instructions necessary for worker safety and health.” This was subsequently withdrawn after the Government member of Mexico said that the provision was now setting standards for suppliers. Following continued opposition from the Employers’ members and from several Government members, the original amendment was withdrawn.

201. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to replace the introductory statement by the following: “Pursuant to Article 5.2(g), where appropriate, employers should provide and maintain at no cost to the workers:”, which was supported by the Employers’ members and accepted. Based on the results of this discussion, the amendment by the Employers’ members to the introductory statement was not discussed.

202. The Employers’ members submitted an amendment to delete clause (d), which they withdrew without discussion on the understanding that the matter would be referred to the Drafting Committee with a view to replacing the word “accommodation” in the Office text by the word “facilities”.

203. Paragraph 26, as amended, was adopted.

New Paragraph

204. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment which sought to introduce a new Paragraph as follows: “National laws and regulations should contain appropriate measures for the protection of workers working alone or in isolation; these measures should include: (a) methods of communication and reporting; (b) the conditions under which such work is authorized and monitored.” The amendment aimed at including particular types of hazards associated with mining which were not covered by the Convention. The Employers’ members maintained that the amendment was too detailed and subamended it by deleting the words “alone or” from the opening sentence and the text under (a) and (b). Their view was supported by the Government members of Member States of the EU for the same reasons, and due to the fact that the text did not relate to any of the Articles of the Convention. Following an explanation by the Workers’ members that working in isolation was not the same as working alone, a view which was supported by the Government member of Canada, and that the amendment was relevant to the provisions of Article 5, the Government member of France explained that it was difficult for national legislation to cover such provisions and subamended the text to read: “National laws and regulations should specify that appropriate measures should be taken by the employer to ensure the protection of workers working alone or in isolation; these measures should include: (a) methods of communication and reporting; (b) the conditions under which such work is authorized and monitored.” This subamendment, he explained, related to Article 5(3)(b)(i) which addressed rescue, safety and assistance measures. The subamendment did not satisfy the concerns of the Employers’ members who maintained that if a worker was working alone on a piece of machinery, that did not mean work in isolation. To overcome the confusion, they subamended the text further to read: “National laws and regulations should specify that appropriate measures for the protection of workers working alone and in isolation should be taken by the employer”, which was subamended by the Workers’ members to replace the word “and” after the word “alone” by the word “or”. Following a lengthy debate during which several Government members pointed out that such detail was for national legislations to define, this last amendment was supported by the Employers’ members on the understanding that the word “alone” incorporated an element of separation between workers, and was subsequently accepted.

205. The new Paragraph, as amended, was adopted.

New Paragraph

206. The Workers’ members submitted another amendment to introduce a new Paragraph to read: “National laws and regulations should prescribe, in pursuance of Article 5.4 of the Convention, that employers submit such plans and their revisions to the competent authority for approval.” This was opposed by the Employers’ members, who recalled that the issue was discussed extensively during the previous year’s discussion, as impractical and because it transferred the responsibility from the employer to the competent authority. This view was supported by the Government member of Canada who proposed to subamend the text to read: “National laws and regulations should prescribe, in pursuance of Article 5.4 of the Convention, that employers submit, on request by the competent authority, such plans and their revisions for examination.” The Workers’ members opposed the subamendment and highlighted the importance of having records at the mine in cases of inquests on disasters. They subamended the text by the addition of the words “where practicable” at the end of their original amendment. This was opposed by the Employers’ members and by several other Government members as an unnecessary provision, prompting the Workers’ members to withdraw their subamendment in favour of that which was submitted by the Government member of Canada. Faced with continued opposition, the Workers' members withdrew their amendment.

207. The third amendment by the Workers' members to introduce a new Paragraph to read: "National laws and regulations should prescribe measures for the safe use of remote control equipment; these measures should include: (a) the circumstances under which the use of such equipment is permitted; (b) the protection of workers servicing and maintaining such equipment, particularly in a hazardous location." was opposed by the Employers' members who explained that such details were not necessary and were in fact detrimental to the development of remote control equipment. Faced with opposition by several Government members for similar reasons, the Workers' members subamended the text by terminating the sentence after the word "equipment" in the second line and inserting of the words "and maintenance" after the word "use". This was supported by the Employers' members and accepted.

208. The new Paragraph, as amended, was adopted.

209. The Employers' members submitted an amendment which read: "There should be no discrimination or retaliation against any worker who exercises rights provided by national laws and regulations, or agreed upon by the employers, workers and their representatives.", which they subamended, explaining that there should be no retaliation in either direction, to replace the word "worker" in the first line by the word "person". This was opposed by the Workers' members, who said that it broadened the scope beyond the concept of workers' rights and might compromise the latter's right to strike over safety and health issues. Following opposition to the subamendment from Government members, the Employers' members withdrew it in favour of their original amendment, on the understanding that the concept of "worker" would also include that of "supervisor". This intention was acknowledged by the Workers' members and the amendment was accepted.

210. Paragraph 27, as amended, was adopted.

211. An amendment was submitted by the Employers' members to delete the Paragraph, which they said was unnecessary and broadened the scope of the instrument and introduced concepts which had already been addressed elsewhere in the text. The Workers' members opposed the amendment, since the mining industry was often considered as a threat to the environment and it would be unwise to delete a provision which stated only that "due regard" should be given to possible environmental consequences. The Government members of Member States of the EU said that although it was the general understanding that the protection of the population and the environment did not fall within the scope of the instrument, they opposed the deletion of the Paragraph, which was couched in mild terms following a lengthy debate last year. Following further opposition from the Government members of Australia and Zambia, the amendment was withdrawn.

212. The Government members of Australia and Canada submitted an amendment to insert the word “fly-rock” after the word “vibration”, which was supported without enthusiasm by the Employers’ members and supported by the Workers’ members and accepted.

213. Paragraph 28, as amended, was adopted.

New Paragraph

214. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to add a new Paragraph after Paragraph 28, as follows: “Member States and employers, in consultation with workers’ organizations, should promote systems, including planning control, to minimize the adverse effects of mining activity on the public and the environment, including those matters referred to in Paragraph 28.” The Employers’ members opposed the amendment, which would require national authorities to consult with workers before taking measures. Following further opposition from the Government member of Australia and the Government members of Member States of the EU, the amendment was withdrawn.

215. The proposed Recommendation, as amended, was adopted.

Adoption of the report, the proposed Convention and the proposed Recommendation

216. In the course of the consideration of paragraphs 1 to 215 of the draft report, some alterations with a view to clarifying, specifying, correcting or completing the text of some paragraphs were suggested by some members of the Committee.

217. Subject to modifications agreed on, the Committee adopted the report unanimously.

218. In examining the proposed Convention, the Employers’ members proposed to amend Article 6 by adding after subparagraph (d) the following text that applied to all the subparagraphs: “and having regard to what is reasonable, practicable and feasible, and to good practice and the exercise of due diligence”. This was to ensure that there were no impossible obligations placed on the employers. In supporting the amendment, the Workers’ members proposed to delete the word “and” from the beginning of the amendment, which was supported by the Employers’ members and Article 6, as amended, was adopted.

219. The Employers’ members also proposed to amend Article 13 by replacing the text of subparagraph 2(b) by the following: “b. to: (i) participate in inspections and investigations conducted by the employer and by the competent authority at the workplace; and (ii) monitor and investigate safety and health matters”. The Employers’ members argued that the right to conduct inspections rested with the competent authority and that the proposed text would remove any obstacle to the support and the ratification of the Convention as well as to conflict with the right to property ownership. Based on this explanation, the Workers’ members supported the amendment. They acknowledged that the proposed amendment would overcome concern of possible establishment of rival inspection systems and stressed the need for widest possible ratification of the Convention.

However, a few Government members expressed some concern about the amendment on the grounds that participation of workers in investigations as a right was not allowed under their national legislation and proposed the addition of a qualifier such as the words "where appropriate". Following an explanation by the representative of the Secretary-General that such concerns were addressed by the preambular text of "... in accordance with national laws and regulations, ..." the amendment was accepted, and Article 13 as amended, was adopted.

220. Subject to modifications agreed on, including concurrence between the English and the French texts, the Committee adopted the proposed Convention as a whole.

221. Based on the outcome of the discussion of Article 13 in the proposed Convention, Paragraph 12 in the proposed Recommendation was deleted. The Committee has also decided to modify Paragraph 30 in the proposed Recommendation to read as follows: "Safety and health representatives should, where appropriate, give reasonable notice to the employer of their intention to monitor and investigate safety and health matters as provided for in Article 13, paragraph 2(b) of the Convention." A subamendment by the Government member of Australia to delete the words "monitor and" was withdrawn after a clarification by the Employers' members that the word "appropriate" covered the concern. A further subamendment by the Workers' members to replace the word "and" by the word "or" after the word "monitor" was accepted.

222. Subject to modifications agreed on, the Committee adopted the proposed Recommendation as a whole.

223. The Government member of Australia said that the proposed instruments, which had been developed with a view to their wide ratification, would offer long-term benefits to the mining industry and he fully supported their adoption. He would pursue action to seek ratification of the proposed Convention by Australia.

224. The Government members of the Member States of the EU also emphasized the importance of wide ratification and said that it was now up to individual States to make the maximum effort towards that goal.

225. The Government member of South Africa, also speaking on behalf of the Government members of Botswana, Lesotho, Zambia and Zimbabwe, said that the proposed Convention and Recommendation would help improve safety and health in the mining industry, which was a vital component of the economy. In the case of South Africa, the texts would be particularly valuable in the drafting of the new Mining Act. Support for the instruments was also expressed by the Government member of Poland and by the Government member of the United States, who said that the provisions of the instruments were in keeping with his country's legislation.

226. The Employers' Vice-Chairman thanked the Committee as a whole for its contribution to the noble cause of improving safety and health in mines. He also congratulated the Chairman for the successful outcome of the deliberations, and to the Drafting Committee, the secretariat and the interpreters for their contributions.

227. The Workers' Vice-Chairman said that mining was a difficult industry and that there were different approaches to the subject of safety and health in different countries. He said that a number of sensitive issues had been successfully navigated, and that his group had tried to accommodate the views of both the Employers' and Government members. He now hoped that his tripartite colleagues would endeavour for their part to ensure the adoption of the proposed instruments. He expressed his appreciation to the Employers' Vice-Chairman.

228. The Reporter said that as Government member of Canada he would work diligently in his country, where mining was an important industry, to ensure ratification of the proposed Convention.

229. The representative of the Secretary-General thanked the Committee for the decorum which had characterized the debate. Working conditions in the mines had changed considerably over the years and the proposed instruments would, if followed by further tripartite consensus and ratification, lead to further improvements of working conditions in mines. He thanked the Vice-Chairmen for their collaboration, and expressed his appreciation for the manner in which the Chairman had steered the work of the Committee.

230. The Chairman also thanked the Vice-Chairmen and the Committee for the sense of dignity which had marked their discussions, and the Government members for their active and constructive participation. Although those discussions were necessarily held within an abstract, legal framework, their essential and practical objective, namely the improved safety and health of mineworkers, would be achieved only through ratification of the proposed instruments and their incorporation into national legislation.

231. The texts of the proposed Convention and the proposed Recommendation are produced below.

232. The report of the Committee and the texts of the proposed Convention and the proposed Recommendation are submitted to the Conference for consideration.

Geneva, 20 June 1995.

(Signed) Dr. A. Békés,
Chairman.

Mr. R. McGinn,
Reporter.

Proposed Convention concerning safety and health in mines

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,
Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Eighty-Second Session on 6 June 1995, and
Noting the relevant International Labour Conventions and Recommendations and, in particular, the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957; the Radiation Protection Convention and Recommendation, 1960; the Guarding of Machinery Convention and Recommendation, 1963; the Employment Injury Benefits Convention and Recommendation, 1964; the Minimum Age (Underground Work) Convention and Recommendation, 1965; the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Underground Work) Convention, 1965; the Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention and Recommendation, 1977; the Occupational Safety and Health Convention and Recommendation, 1981; the Occupational Health Services Convention and Recommendation, 1985; the Asbestos Convention and Recommendation, 1986; the Safety and Health in Construction Convention and Recommendation, 1988; the Chemicals Convention and Recommendation, 1990; and the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention and Recommendation, 1993, and

Considering that workers have a need for, and a right to, information, training and genuine consultation on and participation in the preparation and implementation of safety and health measures concerning the hazards and risks they face in the mining industry, and

Recognizing that it is desirable to prevent any fatalities, injuries or ill health affecting workers or members of the public, or damage to the environment arising from mining operations, and

Having regard to the need for cooperation between the International Labour Organization, the World Health Organization, the International Atomic Energy Agency and other relevant institutions and noting the relevant instruments, codes of practice, codes and guidelines issued by these organizations, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to safety and health in mines, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of an international Convention;

adopts this day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-five the following Convention, which may be cited as the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995:

PART I. DEFINITIONS

Article 1

1. For the purpose of this Convention, the term "mine" covers —
 - (a) surface or underground sites where the following activities, in particular, take place:
 - (i) exploration for minerals, excluding oil and gas, that involves the mechanical disturbance of the ground;
 - (ii) extraction of minerals, excluding oil and gas;

- (iii) preparation, including crushing, grinding, concentration or washing of the extracted material; and
 - (b) all machinery, equipment, appliances, plant, buildings and civil engineering structures used in conjunction with the activities referred to in (a) above.

2. For the purpose of this Convention, the term “employer” means any physical or legal person who employs one or more workers in a mine and, as the context requires, the operator, the principal contractor, contractor or subcontractor.

PART II. SCOPE AND MEANS OF APPLICATION

Article 2

1. This Convention applies to all mines.
2. After consultations with the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, the competent authority of a Member which ratifies the Convention:
 - (a) may exclude certain categories of mines from the application of the Convention, or certain provisions thereof, if the overall protection afforded at these mines under national law and practice is not inferior to that which would result from the full application of the provisions of the Convention;
 - (b) shall, in the case of exclusion of certain categories of mines pursuant to clause (a) above, make plans for progressively covering all mines.
3. A Member which ratifies the Convention and avails itself of the possibility afforded in paragraph 2(a) above shall indicate, in its reports on the application of the Convention submitted under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, any particular category of mines thus excluded and the reasons for the exclusion.

Article 3

In the light of national conditions and practice and after consultations with the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, a Member shall formulate, carry out and periodically review a coherent policy on safety and health in mines, particularly with regard to the measures to give effect to the provisions of the Convention.

Article 4

1. The measures for ensuring application of the Convention shall be prescribed by national laws and regulations.
2. Where appropriate, these national laws and regulations shall be supplemented by:
 - (a) technical standards, guidelines or codes of practice; or
 - (b) other means of application consistent with national practice, as identified by the competent authority.

Article 5

1. National laws and regulations pursuant to Article 4, paragraph 1, shall designate the competent authority that is to monitor and regulate the various aspects of safety and health in mines.

2. Such national laws and regulations shall provide for:

- (a) the supervision of safety and health in mines;
- (b) the inspection of mines by inspectors designated for the purpose by the competent authority;
- (c) the procedures for reporting and investigating: as defined by national laws or regulations, fatal and serious accidents, dangerous occurrences and mine disasters;
- (d) the compilation and publication of statistics on: as defined by national laws or regulations, accidents, occupational diseases and dangerous occurrences;
- (e) the power of the competent authority to suspend or restrict mining activities on safety and health grounds, until the condition giving rise to the suspension or restriction has been corrected; and
- (f) the establishment of effective procedures to ensure the implementation of the rights of workers and their representatives to be consulted on matters and to participate in measures relating to safety and health at the workplace.

3. Such national laws and regulations shall provide that the manufacture, storage, transport and use of explosives and initiating devices at the mine shall be carried out by or under the direct supervision of competent and authorized persons.

4. Such national laws and regulations shall specify:

- (a) requirements relating to mine rescue, first aid and appropriate medical facilities;
- (b) an obligation to provide and maintain adequate self-rescue respiratory devices for workers in underground coal mines and, where necessary, in other underground mines;
- (c) protective measures to secure abandoned mine workings so as to eliminate or minimize risks to safety and health;
- (d) requirements for the safe storage, transportation and disposal of hazardous substances used in the mining process and waste produced at the mine; and
- (e) where appropriate, an obligation to supply sufficient sanitary conveniences and facilities to wash, change and eat, and to maintain them in hygienic condition.

5. Such national laws and regulations shall provide that the employer in charge of the mine shall ensure that appropriate plans of workings are prepared before the start of operation and, in the event of any significant modification, that such plans are brought up to date periodically and kept available at the mine site.

PART III. PREVENTIVE AND PROTECTIVE MEASURES AT THE MINE RESPONSIBILITIES OF EMPLOYERS

Article 6

In taking preventive and protective measures under this Part of the Convention the employer shall assess the risk and deal with it in the following order of priority:

- (a) eliminate the risk;
- (b) control the risk at source;
- (c) minimize the risk by means that include the design of safe work systems; and
- (d) in so far as the risk remains, provide for the use of personal protective equipment;

having regard to what is reasonable, practicable and feasible, and to good practice and the exercise of due diligence.

Article 7

Employers shall take all necessary measures to eliminate or minimize the risks to safety and health in mines under their control, and in particular:

- (a) ensure that the mine is designed, constructed and provided with electrical, mechanical and other equipment, including a communication system, to provide conditions for safe operation and a healthy working environment;
- (b) ensure that the mine is commissioned, operated, maintained and decommissioned in such a way that workers can perform the work assigned to them without endangering their safety and health or that of other persons;
- (c) take steps to maintain the stability of the ground in areas to which persons have access in the context of their work;
- (d) whenever practicable, provide, from every underground workplace, two exits, each of which is connected to separate means of egress to the surface;
- (e) ensure the monitoring, assessment and regular inspection of the working environment to identify the various hazards to which the workers may be exposed and to assess their level of exposure;
- (f) ensure adequate ventilation for all underground workings to which access is permitted;
- (g) in respect of zones susceptible to particular hazards, draw up and implement an operating plan and procedures to ensure a safe system of work and the protection of workers;
- (h) take measures and precautions appropriate to the nature of a mine operation to prevent, detect and combat the start and spread of fires and explosions; and
- (i) ensure that when there is serious danger to the safety and health of workers, operations are stopped and workers are evacuated to a safe location.

Article 8

The employer shall prepare an emergency response plan, specific to each mine, for reasonably foreseeable industrial and natural disasters.

Article 9

Where workers are exposed to physical, chemical or biological hazards the employer shall:

- (a) inform the workers, in a comprehensible manner, of the hazards associated with their work, the health risks involved and relevant preventive and protective measures;
- (b) take appropriate measures to eliminate or minimize the risks resulting from exposure to those hazards;
- (c) where adequate protection against risk of accident or injury to health including exposure to adverse conditions, cannot be ensured by other means, provide and maintain at no cost to the worker suitable protective equipment, clothing as necessary and other facilities defined by national laws or regulations; and
- (d) provide workers who have suffered from an injury or illness at the workplace with first aid, appropriate transportation from the workplace and access to appropriate medical facilities.

Article 10

The employer shall ensure that:

- (a) adequate training and retraining programmes and comprehensible instructions are provided for workers at no cost to them on safety and health matters as well as on the work assigned;
- (b) in accordance with national laws and regulations, adequate supervision and control are provided on each shift to secure the safe operation of the mine;
- (c) a system is established so that the names of all persons who are underground can be accurately known at any time, as well as their probable location;
- (d) all accidents and dangerous occurrences, as defined by national laws or regulations, are investigated and appropriate remedial action is taken; and
- (e) a report, as specified by national laws and regulations, is made to the competent authority on accidents and dangerous occurrences.

Article 11

On the basis of general principles of occupational health and in accordance with national laws and regulations, the employer shall ensure the provision of regular health surveillance of workers exposed to occupational health hazards specific to mining.

Article 12

Whenever two or more employers undertake activities at the same mine, the employer in charge of the mine shall coordinate the implementation of all measures concerning the safety and health of workers and shall be held primarily responsible for the safety of the operations. This shall not relieve individual employers from responsibility for the implementation of all measures concerning the safety and health of their workers.

RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF WORKERS AND THEIR REPRESENTATIVES

Article 13

1. Under the national laws and regulations referred to in Article 4, workers shall have the following rights:

- (a) to report accidents, dangerous occurrences and hazards to the employer and to the competent authority;
- (b) to request and obtain, where there is cause for concern on safety and health grounds, inspections and investigations to be conducted by the employer and the competent authority;
- (c) to know and be informed of workplace hazards that may affect their safety or health;
- (d) to obtain information relevant to their safety or health, held by the employer or the competent authority;
- (e) to remove themselves from any location at the mine when circumstances arise which appear, with reasonable justification, to pose a serious danger to their safety or health; and
- (f) to collectively select safety and health representatives.

2. The safety and health representatives referred to in paragraph 1(f) above shall, in accordance with national laws and regulations, have the following rights:

- (a) to represent workers on all aspects of workplace safety and health, including where applicable, the exercise of the rights provided in paragraph 1 above;
- (b) to: (i) participate in inspections and investigations conducted by the employer and by the competent authority at the workplace; and (ii) monitor and investigate safety and health matters;
- (c) to have recourse to advisers and independent experts;
- (d) to consult with the employer in a timely fashion on safety and health matters, including policies and procedures;
- (e) to consult with the competent authority; and
- (f) to receive, relevant to the area for which they have been selected, notice of accidents and dangerous occurrences.

3. Procedures for the exercise of the rights referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2 above shall be specified:

- (a) by national laws and regulations; and
- (b) through consultations between employers and workers and their representatives.

4. National laws and regulations shall ensure that the rights referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2 above can be exercised without discrimination or retaliation.

Article 14

Under national laws and regulations workers shall have the duty, in accordance with their training, to:

- (a) comply with prescribed safety and health measures;
- (b) take reasonable care for their own safety and health and that of other persons who may be affected by their acts or omissions at work, including the proper care and use of protective clothing, facilities and equipment placed at their disposal for this purpose;
- (c) report forthwith to their immediate supervisor any situation which they believe could present a risk to their safety or health or that of other persons, and which they cannot properly deal with themselves; and
- (d) cooperate with the employer to permit compliance with the duties and responsibilities placed on the employer pursuant to the Convention.

COOPERATION

Article 15

Measures shall be taken, in accordance with national laws and regulations, to encourage cooperation between employers and workers and their representatives to promote safety and health in mines.

PART IV. IMPLEMENTATION

Article 16

Each Member shall:

- (a) take all necessary measures, including the provision of appropriate penalties and corrective measures, to ensure the effective enforcement of the provisions of the Convention; and
- (b) provide appropriate inspection services to supervise the application of the measures to be taken in pursuance of the Convention and provide these services with the resources necessary for the accomplishment of their tasks.

Proposed Recommendation concerning safety and health in mines

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Eighty-second Session on 6 June 1995, and

Noting the relevant international labour Conventions and Recommendations and, in particular, the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957; the Radiation Protection Convention and Recommendation, 1960; the Guarding of Machinery Convention and Recommendation, 1963; the Employment Injury Benefits Convention and Recommendation, 1964; the Minimum Age (Underground Work) Convention and Recommendation, 1965; the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Underground Work) Convention, 1965; the Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention and Recommendation, 1977; the Occupational Safety and Health Convention and Recommendation, 1981; the Occupational Health Services Convention and Recommendation, 1985; the Asbestos Convention and Recommendation, 1986; the Safety and Health in Construction Convention and Recommendation, 1988; the Chemicals Convention and Recommendation, 1990; and the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention and Recommendation, 1993, and

Considering that workers have a need for, and a right to, information, training and genuine consultation on, and participation in the preparation and implementation of safety and health measures concerning the hazards and risks they face in the mining industry, and

Recognizing that it is desirable to prevent any fatalities, injuries or ill health affecting workers or members of the public or damage to the environment arising from mining operations, and

Having regard to the need for cooperation between the International Labour Organization, the World Health Organization, the International Atomic Energy Agency and other relevant institutions and noting the relevant instruments, codes of practice, codes and guidelines issued by these organizations, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to safety and health in mines, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a Recommendation supplementing the Safety and Health in Mines Convention; adopts this day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-five the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Safety and Health in Mines Recommendation, 1995:

I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

1. The provisions of this Recommendation supplement those of the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (hereafter referred to as "the Convention"), and should be applied in conjunction with them.

2. This Recommendation applies to all mines.

3. (1) In the light of national conditions and practice and after consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, a Member should formulate, carry out and periodically review a coherent policy on safety and health in mines.

(2) The consultations provided for by Article 3 of the Convention should include consultations with the most representative organizations of employers and workers on the effect of the length of working hours, night work and shift work on workers' safety and health. After such consultations, the Member should take the necessary measures in relation to working time and, in particular, to maximum daily working hours and minimum daily rest periods.

4. The competent authority should have properly qualified and trained staff with the appropriate skills, and sufficient technical and professional support, to inspect, investigate, assess and advise on the matters dealt with in the Convention and to ensure compliance with national laws and regulations.

5. Measures should be taken to encourage and promote:

- (a) research into and exchange of information on safety and health in mines at the national and international level;
- (b) specific assistance by the competent authority to small mines with a view to:
 - (i) assisting in transfer of technical know-how;
 - (ii) establishing preventive safety and health programmes; and
 - (iii) encouraging cooperation and consultation between employers and workers and their representatives; and
- (c) programmes or systems for the rehabilitation and reintegration of workers who have sustained occupational injuries or illnesses.

6. Requirements relating to the supervision of safety and health in mines pursuant to Article 5, paragraph 2, of the Convention should, where appropriate, include those concerning:

- (a) certification and training;
- (b) inspection of the mine, mining equipment and installations;
- (c) supervision of the handling, transportation, storage and use of explosives and of hazardous substances used or produced in the mining process;
- (d) performance of work on electrical equipment and installations; and
- (e) supervision of workers.

7. Requirements pursuant to Article 5, paragraph 4, of the Convention, could provide that the suppliers of equipment, appliances, hazardous products and substances to the mine should ensure their compliance with national standards on safety and health, label products clearly and provide comprehensible information and instructions.

8. Requirements relating to mine rescue and first aid pursuant to Article 5, paragraph 4(a), of the Convention and to appropriate medical facilities for emergency care could cover:

- (a) organizational arrangements;
- (b) equipment to be provided;
- (c) standards for training;
- (d) training of workers and participation in drills;
- (e) the appropriate number of trained persons to be available;
- (f) an appropriate communication system;
- (g) an effective system to give warning of danger;
- (h) provision and maintenance of means of escape and rescue;

- (i) establishment of a mine rescue team or teams;
 - (j) periodic medical assessment of suitability of, and regular training for, the persons on the mine rescue team or teams;
 - (k) medical attention and transportation to receive medical attention, both at no cost to workers who have suffered an injury or illness at the workplace;
 - (l) coordination with local authorities;
 - (m) measures to promote international cooperation in this field.

9. Requirements pursuant to Article 5, paragraph 4(b), of the Convention, could cover the specifications and standards of the type of self-rescuers to be provided and, in particular, in the case of mines susceptible to gas outbursts and other mines where appropriate, the provision of self-contained respiratory devices.

10. National laws and regulations should prescribe measures for the safe use and maintenance of remote control equipment.

11. National laws and regulations should specify that the employer should take appropriate measures for the protection of workers working alone or in isolation.

II. PREVENTIVE AND PROTECTIVE MEASURES AT THE MINE

12. Employers should undertake hazard assessment and risk analysis and then develop and implement, where appropriate, systems to manage the risk.

13. In order to maintain the stability of the ground, in accordance with Article 7(c) of the Convention, the employer should take all appropriate measures to:

- (a) monitor and control the movement of strata;
- (b) as may be necessary, provide effective support of the roof, sides and floor of the mine workings, except for those areas where the mining methods selected allow for the controlled collapse of the ground;
- (c) monitor and control the sides of surface mines to prevent material from falling or sliding into the pit and endangering workers; and
- (d) ensure that dams, lagoons, tailings and other such impoundments are adequately designed, constructed and controlled to prevent dangers from sliding material or collapse.

14. Pursuant to Article 7(d) of the Convention, separate means of egress should be as independent of each other as possible; arrangements should be made and equipment provided for the safe evacuation of workers in case of danger.

15. Pursuant to Article 7(f) of the Convention, all underground mine workings to which workers have access, and other areas as necessary, should be ventilated in an appropriate manner to maintain an atmosphere:

- (a) in which the risk of explosions is eliminated or minimized;
- (b) in which working conditions are adequate, having regard to the working method being used and the physical demands placed on the workers; and

- (c) that complies with national standards on dusts, gases, radiation and climatic conditions; where national standards do not exist, the employer should give consideration to international standards.

16. The particular hazards referred to in Article 7(g) of the Convention requiring an operating plan and procedures might include:

- (a) mine fires and explosions;
- (b) gas outbursts;
- (c) rockbursts;
- (d) an inrush of water or semi-solids;
- (e) rockfalls;
- (f) susceptibility of areas to seismic movements;
- (g) hazards related to work carried out near dangerous openings or under particularly difficult geological circumstances;
- (h) loss of ventilation.

17. Measures that employers could take pursuant to Article 7(h) of the Convention should include, where applicable, prohibiting persons from carrying underground any item, object or substance which could initiate a fire, explosion or dangerous occurrence.

18. Pursuant to Article 7(i) of the Convention, mine facilities should include, where appropriate, sufficient fireproof and self-contained chambers to provide refuge for workers in the event of an emergency. The self-contained chambers should be easily identifiable and accessible, particularly when visibility is poor.

19. The emergency response plan referred to in Article 8 of the Convention might include:

- (a) effective site emergency plans;
- (b) provision for the cessation of work and evacuation of the workers in an emergency;
- (c) adequate training in emergency procedures and in the use of equipment;
- (d) adequate protection of the public and the environment;
- (e) provision of information to, and consultation with, appropriate bodies and organizations.

20. The hazards referred to in Article 9 of the Convention might include:

- (a) airborne dusts;
- (b) flammable, toxic, noxious and other mine gases;
- (c) fumes and hazardous substances;
- (d) exhaust fumes from diesel engines;
- (e) oxygen deficiency;
- (f) radiation from rock strata, equipment or other sources;
- (g) noise and vibration;
- (h) extreme temperatures;
- (i) high levels of humidity;
- (j) insufficient lighting or ventilation;

- (k) hazards related to work carried out at high altitudes or extreme depths, or in confined spaces;
- (l) hazards associated with manual handling;
- (m) hazards related to mechanical equipment and electrical installations;
- (n) hazards resulting from a combination of any of the above.

21. The measures referred to in Article 9 of the Convention might include:

- (a) technical and organizational measures applied to relevant mining activities, or to the plant, machinery, equipment, appliances or structures;
- (b) where it is not possible to have recourse to the measures referred to in (a) above, other effective measures, including the use of personal protective equipment and protective clothing at no cost to the worker;
- (c) where reproductive health hazards and risks have been identified, training and special technical and organizational measures, including the right to alternative work, where appropriate, without any loss of salary, especially during health risk periods such as pregnancy and breast-feeding;
- (d) regular monitoring and inspection of areas where hazards are present or likely to be present.

22. The types of protective equipment and facilities referred to in Article 9(c) of the Convention could include:

- (a) roll-over and falling object protective structures;
- (b) equipment seat belts and harnesses;
- (c) fully enclosed pressurized cabins;
- (d) self-contained rescue chambers;
- (e) emergency showers and eye wash stations.

23. In implementing Article 10(b) of the Convention, employers should:

- (a) ensure appropriate inspections of each workplace at the mine, and in particular, of the atmosphere, ground conditions, machinery, equipment and appliances therein, including where necessary pre-shift inspections; and
- (b) keep written records of inspections, defects and corrective measures and make such records available at the mine.

24. Where appropriate, the programme of health surveillance referred to in Article 11 of the Convention should, at no cost to the worker and without any discrimination or retaliation whatsoever:

- (a) provide the opportunity to undergo medical examination related to the requirements of the tasks to be performed, prior to or just after commencing employment and thereafter on a continuing basis; and
- (b) provide, where possible, for reintegration or rehabilitation of workers unable to undertake their normal duties due to occupational injury or illness.

25. Pursuant to Article 5, paragraph 4(e), of the Convention, where appropriate, employers should provide and maintain at no cost to the worker:

- (a) sufficient and suitable toilets, showers, wash-basins and changing facilities which are, where appropriate, gender-specific;
- (b) adequate facilities for the storage, laundering and drying of clothes;

- (c) adequate supplies of potable drinking-water in suitable places; and
 - (d) adequate and hygienic facilities for taking meals.

III. RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF WORKERS AND THEIR REPRESENTATIVES

26. Pursuant to Article 13 of the Convention, workers and their safety and health representatives should receive or have access to, where appropriate, information which should include:

- (a) where practicable, notice of any safety or health related visit to the mine by the competent authority;
- (b) reports of inspections conducted by the competent authority or the employer, including inspections of machinery or equipment;
- (c) copies of orders or instructions issued by the competent authority in respect of safety and health matters;
- (d) reports of accidents, injuries, instances of ill health and other occurrences affecting safety and health prepared by the competent authority or the employer;
- (e) information and notices on all hazards at work including hazardous, toxic or harmful materials, agents or substances used at the mine;
- (f) any other documentation concerning safety and health that the employer is required to maintain;
- (g) immediate notification of accidents and dangerous occurrences; and
- (h) any health studies conducted in respect of hazards present in the workplace.

27. Provisions to be made pursuant to Article 13, paragraph 1(e), of the Convention could include requirements for:

- (a) notification of supervisors and safety and health representatives of the danger referred to in that provision;
- (b) participation by senior representatives of the employer and representatives of the workers in endeavouring to resolve the issue;
- (c) participation, where necessary, by a representative of the competent authority to assist in resolution of the issue;
- (d) non-loss of pay for the worker and, where appropriate, assignment to suitable alternative work;
- (e) notification, to be given to any worker who is requested to perform work in the area concerned, of the fact that another worker has refused to work there and of the reasons therefor.

28. Pursuant to Article 13, paragraph 2, of the Convention, the rights of safety and health representatives should include, where appropriate, the right:

- (a) to appropriate training during working time, without loss of pay, on their rights and functions as safety and health representatives and on safety and health matters;
- (b) of access to appropriate facilities necessary to perform their functions;
- (c) to receive their normal pay for all time spent exercising their rights and performing their functions as safety and health representatives; and

(d) to assist and advise workers who have removed themselves from a workplace because they believe their safety or health has been endangered.

29. Safety and health representatives should, where appropriate, give reasonable notice to the employer of their intention to monitor or investigate safety and health matters, as provided for in Article 13, paragraph 2(b), of the Convention.

30. (1) All persons should have a duty to:

- (a) refrain from arbitrarily disconnecting, changing or removing safety devices fitted to machinery, equipment, appliances, tools, plant and buildings; and
- (b) use such safety devices correctly.

(2) Employers should have a duty to provide workers with appropriate training and instructions so as to enable them to comply with the duties described in subparagraph (1) above.

IV. COOPERATION

31. Measures to encourage cooperation as provided for in Article 15 of the Convention should include:

- (a) the establishment of cooperative mechanisms such as safety and health committees, with equal representation of employers and workers, and having such powers and functions as may be prescribed, including powers to conduct joint inspections;
- (b) the appointment by the employer of suitably qualified and experienced persons to promote safety and health;
- (c) the training of workers and their safety and health representatives;
- (d) the provision of ongoing safety and health awareness programmes for workers;
- (e) the ongoing exchange of information and experience on safety and health in mines;
- (f) the consultation of workers and their representatives by the employer in establishing safety and health policy and procedures; and
- (g) the inclusion, by the employer, of workers' representatives in the investigation of accidents and dangerous occurrences, as provided in Article 10(d) of the Convention.

V. OTHER PROVISIONS

32. There should be no discrimination or retaliation against any worker who exercises rights provided by national laws and regulations or agreed upon by the employers, workers and their representatives.

33. Due regard should be given to the possible impact of mining activity on the surrounding environment and on the safety of the public. In particular, this should include the control of subsidence, vibration, fly-rock, harmful contaminants in the water, air or soil, the safe and effective management of waste tips and the rehabilitation of mine sites.

Sixth item on the agenda: Extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) to activities in the non-commercial services sector

Report of the Committee on Convention No. 81

1. The Committee on Convention No. 81 was set up by the International Labour Conference at its first sitting on 6 June 1995. The Committee was originally composed of 160 members (68 Government members, 35 Employers' members and 57 Workers' members). To achieve equality of voting strength, each Government member was allotted 1,995 votes, each Employer member 3,876 votes and each Worker member 2,380 votes. The composition of the Committee was modified ten times during the session, and the number of votes allotted to each member was adjusted accordingly.¹

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairperson: Ms. A.S. Trosdahl Oraug (Government member, Norway) at its fourth sitting.

¹ The modifications were as follows:

- (a) 7 June a.m.: 164 members (71 Government members with 2,030 votes each, 35 Employers' members with 4,118 votes each, 58 Workers' members with 2,485 votes each);
- (b) 7 June p.m.: 166 members (73 Government members with 2,030 votes each, 35 Employers' members with 4,234 votes each, 58 Workers' members with 2,555 votes each);
- (c) 8 June: 164 members (75 Government members with 126 votes each, 35 Employers' members with 270 votes each, 54 Workers' members with 175 votes each);
- (d) 9 June: 150 members (79 Government members with 1,188 votes each, 27 Employers' members with 3,476 votes each, 44 Workers' members with 2,133 votes each);
- (e) 10 June: 153 members (79 Government members with 644 votes each, 28 Employers' members with 1,817 votes each, 46 Workers' members with 1,106 votes each);
- (f) 12 June: 151 members (80 Government members with 301 votes each, 28 Employers' members with 860 votes each, 43 Workers' members with 560 votes each);
- (g) 13 June: 150 members (81 Government members with 1,148 votes each, 28 Employers' members with 3,321 votes each, 41 Workers' members with 2,268 votes each);
- (h) 14 June a.m.: 143 members (83 Government members with 297 votes each, 27 Employers' members with 913 votes each, 33 Workers' members with 747 votes each);
- (i) 14 June p.m.: 144 members (84 Government members with 99 votes each, 27 Employers' members with 308 votes each, 33 Workers' members with 252 votes each);
- (j) 19 June: 140 members (84 Government members with 261 votes each, 27 Employers' members with 812 votes each, 29 Workers' members with 756 votes each).

Vice-Chairpersons: Mr. F. Diaz Garaycoa (Employers' member, Ecuador), and Mr. K. Tapiola (Workers' member, Finland) at its first sitting.

Reporter: Ms. E. Delang (Government member, Sweden) at its ninth sitting.

3. At its ninth sitting, the Committee appointed a Drafting Committee composed of the following members: Ms. E. Delang (Government member, Sweden), Mr. C. Platt (Employers' member, Australia) and Ms. B. Ashe (Workers' member, Australia).

4. At its first, second and third sittings, in the absence of a chairperson, Mr. Tapiola (Workers' member, Finland) took the chair.

5. The Committee held 14 sittings.

Introduction

6. The representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference presented Reports VI(1) and VI(2), which had been prepared by the Office to serve as a basis for the Committee's discussion on the extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81). The first was prepared following the Governing Body's decision in November 1993 to place the question on the agenda of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference, 1995. He explained that this decision had been taken after years of research, including preparation of law and practice reports on the issue; it was now appropriate and necessary that the Conference examine how best such an extension could be discussed.

7. The representative of the Secretary-General wished to stress three matters: first, he recalled the extraordinary job the Conference had done in 1947 in adopting the Labour Inspection Convention (No. 81) and Recommendation (No. 81), 1947. These instruments were as relevant and forward-looking today as they were in 1947. Convention No. 81 had been ratified by 116 countries. The Convention and Recommendation themselves and the influence that the ILO supervisory mechanisms had on countries having ratified the Convention to apply it in practice, as well as the technical cooperation programmes and advisory services based on these instruments, had all made an important contribution to the establishment, by many States, of systems of labour inspection in industrial and commercial workplaces. There could be little doubt about the continuing validity and influence of existing international labour inspection instruments.

8. Secondly, the representative of the Secretary-General noted that the proposal before the Committee to extend the protection afforded by Convention No. 81 to what the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations had called the "non-commercial services" (NCS) sector, did not in any way suggest that the substance of Convention No. 81 itself be revised. The NCS sector, which made up anywhere between 10 to over 50 per cent of the active labour force in member States, was a rapidly expanding domain. It would seem necessary to ensure that workers in this sector enjoyed the same protection against occupational hazards as was extended to workers in industrial and commercial workplaces. This principle should apply likewise to guarantees to ensure the application of other legal provisions regulating their conditions of work. The representative of the Secretary-General pointed out that nearly all of those member States which had replied to the Office questionnaire had agreed that action should be taken to correct the shortcomings in the scope of Convention No. 81, and to extend it accordingly.

9. He continued by explaining that both the Committee of Experts in its 1985 General Survey on the application of the labour inspection Conventions and Recommendations, as well as the Governing Body at its 258th Session (November 1993) had suggested that an appropriate way to deal with the issue was to extend Convention No. 81 to the non-commercial services sector by means of a Protocol. This issue would, of course, be for the Conference to decide.

10. Thirdly, the representative of the Secretary-General reminded the Committee that whatever its decision, this standard-setting exercise was an important one. It was the responsibility of the Committee to ensure that its decisions reflected the Committee's consensus as to the degree of protection which millions of workers should enjoy. Whatever was recorded on the ILO statute books, whether it be a binding Protocol, a Recommendation or, less likely, even both, the Governing Body had indicated that the question be dealt with under the single-discussion procedure provided for in article 38 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

11. He pointed out that international labour standards should not be rigid; they were, and should be, constantly examined and revised, and in some cases extended to bring ILO law into line with modern realities and social needs. Standards should be responsive to changing realities; they should be flexible enough so as not to hinder efficiency or economic growth; but they should always guarantee an adequate measure of protection for the workers concerned.

12. The representative of the Secretary-General hoped that the Office had, in its proposal, objectively reflected the general consensus that had emerged from the answers to the questions put to member States in the Office questionnaire. The proposition contained in Report VI(2) was meant to be one possible, effective response to the problems identified in Report VI(1). It was, however, the Committee's responsibility to reach its own conclusions as to what action should be taken. He was confident that the Committee would produce a solid, realistic and common sense instrument on this important topic.

General discussion

13. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson recalled that the Employers' group of the Governing Body had given its resolute support to including the extension of Convention No. 81 on the agenda of the International Labour Conference. This Convention, given the high number of ratifications, should provide equal protection to all workers. Exclusions from this protection should only be foreseen in particular circumstances, such as those envisaged in the proposed Office texts. The special features of some subsectors, however, could lead to difficulties in the application of the proposed new instrument. Although much time had elapsed since the adoption of the respective standards in 1947 and 1969 (the Labour Inspection (Agriculture), Convention No. 129), labour inspection in many countries still did not fulfil its major functions. The envisaged extension was bound to imply considerable additional efforts being made for labour inspection to be able to extend its coverage to this sector, which represented a high percentage of the labour force. In many countries, certain services were provided by both public and private organizations or undertakings, and this could lead to difficulties, as well as differences in treatment under the law. Therefore, the Employers' members considered that the proposed extension definitely did present an effort to increase equality and prevent disparities.

14. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the discussions in the Committee as well as the decisions to be taken were the culmination of many years of work, reflecting a change of attitudes towards workers regardless of where and by whom they were employed. Since the adoption of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), some member States had carried out reviews extending labour inspection to the non-commercial services sector. Others had moved more slowly.

15. The text prepared by the Office as a basis for debate was in the form of a Protocol, in effect, an appendix to the Convention, covering a large number of workers not included in the original Convention. The Workers' members believed that a Protocol was the most appropriate form for a number of reasons: (a) it was an extension of an existing Convention; (b) it had the same impact as a Convention, and governments who ratified the Protocol were subject to the same enforcement provisions as under a Convention; (c) it ensured equity of treatment across workplaces by providing for a global approach; (d) it was a step towards full coverage of the non-commercial services sector; (e) the workers in this sector were often exposed to significant health and safety risks at a higher rate, in many instances, than in sectors already covered by Convention No. 81.

16. She affirmed that the Workers' members were not seeking to reopen a discussion on Convention No. 81, which had served the interests of workers well since its adoption in 1947. She called attention to the fact that in recent years some employers and governments had argued for greater flexibility and weakening of ILO Conventions. To some extent, this had been taken into account in the text. There was considerable scope for exceptions, either through generic exclusions under Article 2, or through the provisions for special arrangements in Article 4.

17. While appreciating the desire for greater flexibility, the Workers' members viewed with concern any calls for flexibility which had as their objective the dilution of workers' health and safety, and referred in this connection to the EEC Directive on Safety and Health. The Workers noted with concern the apparent attitudinal shift in the implementation of standards as significant as EEC Directive 89/391.

18. The Workers' members wanted to discuss several issues: reference to other relevant instruments such as the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129); changes to the text of the Protocol; ways to ensure consultations with the workers' organizations; and limiting proposed exclusions in the text, which were particularly generous. The key to the debate was the need to ensure that flexibility did not adversely affect the workers' right to protection. Careful attention should be paid as to how protection through labour inspection could be provided in the non-commercial sector, in such special areas as national security, defence and rescue operations. There were many good examples of how this had been done successfully. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson closed by asserting that it was not the intent of the Workers' members to impose heavy burdens on employers or governments. It was, however, time to remove the anomalies and inequities which existed in the provision of labour inspection across different sectors.

19. The Government member of the Republic of Korea said that, in principle, his Government supported the extension of Convention No. 81 to the non-commercial services sector, but he raised two points. The new instrument should be flexible enough to accommodate conditions already existing in member States, both developed and developing countries. This flexibility should be reflected in the clauses of the new instrument. The Republic of Korea already carried out inspection in some parts of the non-commercial services sector, for example telecommunications, electricity services, private hospitals and schools. In these and other sectors, labour standards concerning occupational safety and health were in place. Compliance was predominantly an issue for the public sector, with the majority of workers in public services: civil servants, police, education, fire protection, armed services. In these cases, local laws for civil servants existed and took priority. He remarked that while the proposed instrument would be in the public interest, it would be desirable that it take the form of a Recommendation rather than a Protocol so that each country could take its particular conditions into account.

20. The Government member of Cyprus thought it necessary to first implement existing international standards. He also emphasized the need to eliminate conflicts with existing standards. His Government fully supported the proposed Protocol. However, given the particularities of the NCS sector, provisions in the proposed instrument should be balanced to allow ratification by as many member States as possible.

21. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union with the exception of Luxembourg, stated that they agreed on the need to adopt a new instrument extending Convention No. 81 to the NCS sector, as occupational risks for safety and health of workers existed in this sector also. He recalled that the European Directive 89/391/EEC dealt with similar issues. Nevertheless, two points of divergence were likely to surface in the forthcoming discussions: firstly, whether there should be a Protocol or a Recommendation; and secondly, whether certain reservations or exemptions concerning certain public services or administrations were acceptable. He underlined that the new instrument should be flexible in order to benefit from a large number of ratifications.

22. The Government member of Japan said that safety and health for workers in the NCS sector should be ensured through labour inspection. Such inspection could take various forms. His Government believed that the different inspection systems in Japan functioned effectively and impartially in both commercial and non-commercial sectors. The new instrument to extend Convention No. 81 to the NCS sector, however, should be flexible. It should take the form of a Recommendation having due regard to domestic laws and regulations.

23. The Government member of China stated that his country attached great importance to extending Convention No. 81 to the NCS sector. Developments in technology had had a growing impact on this area. In many aspects, industry and non-commercial services were becoming increasingly similar. He recommended that the proposed Protocol provide member States with the flexibility to exclude specific categories of sectors from its coverage. However, the scope of labour law in China was in accordance with the Protocol, as it provided protection for workers in commercial as well as non-commercial services. The Committee debate would be of assistance to the Government of China. By sharing experiences with other countries, China would be able to improve its own system. He noted that China had not yet ratified Convention No. 81 but was actively considering it.

24. The Government member of the Netherlands agreed with most of the points raised by the Government member of France, on behalf of certain Member States of the European Union, except that his Government preferred a Recommendation. The complex and diverse nature of the NCS sector with its specific requirements should be recognized. A flexible instrument, providing guidance rather than imposing obligations would be more suitable.

25. The Government member of Lebanon stated that in her country the private sector was covered by the Labour Code, 1946, and was subject to labour inspection. The public sector was governed by its own laws and regulations, and not by the Labour Code. Therefore, she suggested that flexibility was necessary. Coordination between public and private sectors on health and safety matters was important. Her Government would make known its reservations about the proposed Protocol in further discussions.

26. The Government member of the United States emphasized the need for a full, comprehensive discussion with all social partners on the issue of labour inspection in a global situation. His Government wanted to ensure that any instrument adopted by the Conference would attract tripartite consensus. It was concerned that the instrument be consistent with law and practice in each country, so as to ensure a maximum number of ratifications. He voiced certain concerns regarding the proposed Protocol's relationship with existing Conventions and Recommendations, and hoped that a full and lively discussion would address these issues.

27. The Government member of Turkey affirmed that the extension of Convention No. 81 to the NCS sector was in line with general principles of the ILO. Flexible implementation of the principles reflected in the proposed Protocol would be a positive step. Labour inspection in Turkey covered both industrial and commercial sectors, and certain categories of workplaces such as in fire fighting, postal and telecommunications services, and public transport were also covered. Specially authorized labour inspectors monitored workplace health and safety conditions of civil servants employed in the army. She mentioned that to increase the effectiveness of the labour inspection system, field surveys had been undertaken and close relations between the social partners and related institutions established. Special emphasis was placed on the training of labour inspectors, notably with respect to communication techniques. She concluded by re-emphasizing the importance of having the Protocol on the agenda of the International Labour Conference, and added that the ILO's unique tripartite structure and the development of country-specific frameworks for industrial action would enable the Protocol to reach its aim.

28. The Government member of Norway said that her Government favoured extending Convention No. 81 to workplaces not considered to be industrial or commercial. She congratulated the Office on the work done on the proposed text and stated that the new instrument should take the form of a Protocol.

29. The Government member of Australia expressed concern that workers in the NCS sector should have the same degree of protection as those in other workplaces. He pointed out that according to Report VI(1) a Recommendation alone would not ensure this. It would weaken the protective guarantees sought for the NCS sector, as binding obligations could only be achieved through a Convention or a Protocol. He further emphasized that Report VI(1) had established that workers in the NCS sector often undertook similar work and were exposed to similar risks as those in industrial and commercial undertakings. Therefore, they should be afforded the same binding protection. A Protocol was the best way forward to achieve such binding protective obligations. He invited other Government members to engage in an exchange of views to arrive at a reasonably coordinated position.

30. The Workers' member of Germany wished to offer some comments to help move closer to the idea of a Protocol. In the recent past a tendency had been noted on the side of public employers not to observe labour protection standards. Public services did not have to spend money on occupational safety and health. He referred to trends towards "lean" administration, leading towards reduction in protection. Certain public services were being provided in competition with commercial services, possibly even leading to cases of bankruptcy in the private sector since the public sector did not have to observe occupational safety and health standards. Costs incurred in the public sector due to industrial accidents or diseases were transferred to the taxpayer. Commercial services were thus at a disadvantage. Furthermore, if governments required young people to be subject to military service, they should ensure that the latter remain in full health and return to the economy free from disease or injury. It would, therefore, be important to consider whether peace-time military service should not be subject to occupational safety and health standards. He made an appeal to governments and employers to remember that they were dealing with the health of human beings.

31. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson noted that while many Committee members spoke of the need for flexibility, Governments and Employers without exception had agreed upon the need to extend labour inspection protection to the NCS sector. She also noted that quite a few governments favoured a Protocol, while some, in line with Employers, preferred a Recommendation. She asked those who favoured a Recommendation to reconsider their position in the light of the inequity that would otherwise result. It would be detrimental to the aims of the Committee to argue for different standards. Adopting only a Recommendation would create such a difference for workers belonging to different sectors but doing the same kind of work. Those in favour of such a proposal should review their position to ensure equity of protection for all workers. The majority of members seemed to support a Protocol, and a Protocol was in order.

32. The Government member of the Russian Federation expressed support for the proposed Protocol. Its substantive content was already implemented in his country. Labour inspection covered both commercial and non-commercial activities. His Government would have no problem with the proposed extension. Convention No. 81 was an extremely useful instrument for the protection of human rights. The Russian Federation did have problems in the field of labour inspection, but they were related to the size of the country rather than the scope of labour inspection legislation.

33. The Government member of Panama explained that in his country the labour inspection system covered the private sector, but only parts of the government sector. An extension of Convention No. 81 should ensure flexibility. A recurrent problem in the ILO was that member States discussed issues, reached consensus but did not subsequently implement the results of their agreements because of domestic constraints. The Conference should only adopt standards that could subsequently be ratified and implemented. This meant giving special consideration to the problems of developing countries.

34. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson replied that except for governments which had indicated that they already had a system of labour inspection covering the NCS sector, the majority of member States appeared to be in favour of a Recommendation. Thus, the Governments' position at present seemed divided. A similar situation in fact existed among the Employers' members. As there was presently no clear majority, the Employers' members wished to study the matter further when specific amendments were being proposed to the text.

35. The Chairperson then closed the general discussion on this agenda item.

Consideration of the proposed texts contained in Report VI(2)

A Proposed Protocol of 1995 to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81)

Preamble

36. Although the amendment submitted by the Employers' members to replace the word "Protocol" by the word "Recommendation" where it appeared in the title and in the text of the Preamble, was the most far-reaching, it was agreed to deal with it after discussion of the other amendments to the Preamble.

37. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add the following phrase, after the subparagraph referring to Convention No. 81: "Noting that the provisions of the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), apply to workplaces in agricultural undertakings, and". The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson explained that this short amendment would complete the Preamble by recognizing the importance of both Convention No. 129 and agricultural sector activities.

38. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson underlined the relevance of a specific reference to Convention No. 129, even though it dealt essentially with the same subject-matter as the Convention under review. He proposed a subamendment as follows: after the words "workplaces in" add the words "commercial and non-commercial". He indicated that Convention No. 81 was more restrictive.

39. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson asked the Office for confirmation that Convention No. 129 did not distinguish between commercial and non-commercial activities. This was confirmed, and the subamendment accepted by the Workers' members. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

40. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson put forward a further amendment to add after the words "Noting that the provisions of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), apply only to industrial and commercial workplaces, and" the following "Further noting that, by national laws or regulations, ratifying States may exclude mining and transport undertakings or parts of such undertakings from the application of the Convention; further noting that ratifying States may exclude commercial workplaces from the application of the Convention." Its purpose was to clarify and add precision to the scope of Convention No. 81 in that it would allow for the exemption of workplaces in mining and transport from the application of the proposed instrument, just as was the case for commercial workplaces. This disposition was of great consequence; it would therefore be useful to mention it in the Preamble, since many countries had made use of it when ratifying Convention No. 81.

41. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson argued that it was unnecessary to repeat, in the Preamble to the Protocol, words already contained in the Convention itself. She also pointed out that exemption for mining and transport undertakings had not been made by any significant number of member States. The Workers' members were unable to accept the amendment for two reasons: new standards should be kept as short as possible; and the proposed amendment did not add to clarity.

42. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, with the exception of Austria, indicated that on this amendment the Governments he represented would support the Workers' members. Besides, the amendment appeared to call into question the original construction of Article 2, paragraph 2, of Convention No. 81.

43. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson underlined that the Employers' members were not making a proposal that affected the Articles of the new instrument. Employers were usually spartan. But in this instance they had to insist that a pattern established by the Workers' members be followed. All relevant aspects of labour inspection should be included in the Preamble.

44. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson, while acknowledging the background to the Employers' arguments, asked them none the less to withdraw their amendment.

45. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson, with reference to the spirit of cooperation that appeared to reign supreme, thereupon withdrew the amendment.

46. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson then presented an amendment to replace the phrase "Noting the relevance of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155)" by the following: "Noting that the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), applies to all sectors of economic activities including the public service". He recalled that this illustrated the full scope of Convention No. 155 on occupational safety and health and the working environment.

47. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson indicated that the Workers' members had no problems with the proposed amendment and supported it.

48. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union except Austria, thought it inappropriate to refer only to the title of Convention No. 155. He insisted on the need for the Committee to adopt a more global view and ensure coherence between the general propositions of the Preamble and the provisions of the instrument itself. He also asked the Chairperson whether the amendment proposed by the Government members for whom he spoke should not be discussed first.

49. The Chairperson indicated that adoption of the amendment under discussion would have consequences for the amendment proposed by Member States of the European Union and that, in accordance with past practice, they should be treated separately.

50. The Government member of Lebanon sought clarification on whether or not Convention No. 155 applied to the public service. In response, a member of the secretariat referred to Article 3 of Convention No. 155 and confirmed that this includes the public service.

51. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of Member States of the European Union except Austria, felt that a reference to Convention No. 155 would be more appropriate and in keeping with the reference to Convention No. 81. He also pointed out that Convention No. 155 had not been the subject of ratification by the majority of European Union Member States. The Committee should not engage in an effort to define the scope of Convention No. 155 or other relevant instruments.

52. The Government member of the United States supported the amendment. He pointed to Article 3 of the proposed Protocol, which would extend occupational safety and health protection to all workers except when exclusions were foreseen. He indicated that discussion would be necessary on the apparent overlap between the various international instruments.

53. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of Member States of the European Union except Austria, wished to introduce the amendment proposed by the Government members he represented as a subamendment to the amendment under review. It read as follows: "In the seventh line, replace the words 'the relevance' by the words 'in particular the existence'."

54. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson declared that he could not agree with the subamendment because it would in effect invalidate their own amendment.

55. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson agreed with the Employers' members. She said that the subamendment proposed by the Government member of France, speaking on behalf of Member States of the European Union with the exception of Austria, would be unacceptable. Their amendment should not be treated as a subamendment to the Employers' amendment.

56. The Chairperson clarified that the amendment tabled by certain Member States of the European Union was not yet being discussed, but that the Employers' members' amendment had been subamended in such a manner as to cover much of the content of the amendment proposed by certain Member States of the European Union.

57. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union with the exception of Austria, thereupon withdrew the subamendment.

58. The Chairperson declared the amendment adopted. Consequently, the amendment tabled by the Government member of France, on behalf of certain Member States of the European Union, fell.

59. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson then introduced a further amendment. He wished to see the words: "Having regard to the special risks to which workers in the non-commercial services sector may be exposed, and the need to ensure that they are subject to the same or an equally effective and impartial system" replaced by the words: "Considering the need to subject workers in the non-commercial services sector to the same system of labour inspection or to an equally effective and impartial". The way the term "special risks" was used in the proposed text could give rise to the assumption that all workers in the NCS sector were affected by such special risks. If that were the case, consideration should be given to drawing up a separate Convention for that sector. If not, then such risks should not be qualified as "special". Of course, the Employers' members acknowledged that in special circumstances there could be special risks. But the Preamble should not speak about special risks in such a general manner.

60. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson stated that the amendment was unacceptable to the Workers' members for two reasons. First, she contended that it was inappropriate to suggest that workers themselves, rather than workplaces, be subjected to labour inspection. Second, she argued that Report VI(1) clearly established that special risks existed in the NCS sector. She cited the second full paragraph on page 7 of Report VI(1) as an example. She pointed out that the "special risks" referred to in the Preamble signalled one of several reasons why a Protocol was necessary. The proposed amendment sought to remove any reference to these special risks. None the less, the Workers' members were willing to discuss alternative terminology.

61. The Government member of Australia did not support the amendment for the reasons given by the Workers' members. She emphasized that special risks did exist, and the proposed Protocol should take account of them.

62. The Government member of Switzerland proposed a subamendment to delete the word "special", which was too specific, and replace it with the phrase "having regard to all risks to which ..."

63. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson asserted that if the Preamble merely referred to all risks, it would fail to recognize that some risks were special. To address concerns of terminology, she proposed that the word "particular" replace the word "special", as "all" risks did not sufficiently highlight the issue, which was that workers in the NCS sector were often employed in high-risk areas.

64. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson thanked the Workers' members for their efforts to compromise. The Employers' members original amendment had aimed at eliminating the reference to "special" risks. Of course these existed, and the Employers did not ignore this fact. They did, however, wish to ensure that the Preamble referred to all risks. Therefore, they were ready to accept the subamendment.

65. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson said that the Workers' members accepted the adoption of the amendment as subamended by the Government member of Switzerland.

66. The Government member of the United Kingdom underlined that since labour inspection should target workplaces, not workers, the subamendment to the amendment proposed by the Government member of Switzerland should be reworded to replace the words "they are" by "it is".

67. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson accepted the proposal of the Government member of the United Kingdom, who thereupon read the text of the amendment, including the subamendment, as follows: "Having regard to all the risks to which workers in the non-commercial services sector may be exposed, and the need to ensure that it is subject to ..."

68. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson accepted the proposed amendment as subamended by the Government member of the United Kingdom.

69. The Chairperson declared the amendment adopted, as subamended.

70. At the beginning of its fourth sitting, the Committee elected Ms. A.S. Trosdahl Oraug (Government member, Norway) as Chairperson. Ms. Trosdahl Oraug thanked the Committee for the confidence placed in her.

71. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson thereupon introduced the amendment referred to in paragraph 36 above. The new instrument should take the form of a Recommendation. In spite of the efforts undertaken by the Office, there was still no comprehensive definition of the NCS sector. Certain subsectors would in consequence be left outside the scope of the instrument. Therefore, the Committee should adopt a Recommendation, which would allow for a gradual transition from exclusion to full inclusion at a later time. It would thus act as a bridge, offering flexibility in application to all member States. This was in line with article 19 of the ILO Constitution. Report VI(2) indicated that only 37 governments were in favour of a Protocol. A Recommendation would be more than a declaration of intent. It could be implemented through national regulations and other means. Therefore, it was the proper form for an international instrument at the end of the twentieth century.

72. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson also congratulated the Chairperson upon her election. He went on to say that he appreciated the problems the Employers' members had with a Protocol, but hoped that their position was not totally rigid. There was nothing sinister about a Protocol. Report VI(2) indicated that while 37 governments were in favour of a Protocol, a further ten favoured a Protocol and a Recommendation. When the Governing Body had suggested ways to make the ILO more efficient, it had agreed upon a procedure for the revision of Conventions with a view to adapting them to social reality. The current exercise was in fact such a revision of Convention No. 81. The alternative was either to revise Convention No. 81 itself, or to revise it through other means such as this Protocol. However that was done, the outcome should legally be at the same level as the Convention. A Recommendation was clearly not at that same level. Recommendations expressed views not included in the texts of Conventions themselves; as a rule, they accompanied a Convention and gave guidance on how it should be interpreted. They were useful references, indicating how certain issues should be perceived. This was the case of Recommendation No. 81 to Convention No. 81. Recommendations were not instruments through which the scope of a Convention could be extended to areas not covered.

73. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson went on to state that a Recommendation only would weaken protective guarantees that were sought for the NCS sector. For the ILO it would in fact mean increasing inequality of treatment between workers in commercial and non-commercial services. The adoption of a Recommendation would not be a neutral step. It would go against what had already been expressed at this stage and what already was the practice in a large number of countries.

74. The Government member of India said his Government had ratified Convention No. 81 some time ago. He would welcome a Protocol instead of a Recommendation. Standards should be set by increasing the number of exclusions in Article 2. The Government of India wished to see other activities excluded, in particular the national, provincial and local government administrative services, fire brigades, postal services, etc. But his Government would support a Protocol.

75. The Government member of France indicated that Member States of the European Union, except the Netherlands, on whose behalf he spoke, supported a Protocol.

76. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic was of the opinion that workers in the NCS sector deserved as much protection as those in other sectors. This could only be achieved through a Convention or a Protocol. A Recommendation would not guarantee such protection. His Government therefore supported a Convention or a Protocol.

77. The Government member of Lebanon suggested the Committee leave the issue in abeyance until after the discussion of Article 2, where many of the points now under debate would come up again.

78. The Government member of Cyprus said that the instrument should take the form of a Protocol. This would encourage countries to ensure that appropriate legislation for the protection of workers in the NCS sector were introduced.

79. The Government member of the Russian Federation underlined that his Government favoured a Protocol. The issue was a question of equality of labour protection for a very large number of citizens. Report VI(2) indicated that, in all, 47 member States had expressed preference for a Protocol. Two-thirds of the member States having replied to the questionnaire thus supported a binding international instrument. This Committee should give a signal that governments were prepared to ensure equality of rights for all workers. The proposed text provided sufficient flexibility for each member State, for instance through Article 3. A Protocol should therefore be the final decision.

80. The Government member of the Republic of Korea expressed his country's desire that the instrument take the form of a Recommendation.

81. The Government member of Poland said that his Government could not accept the proposition of the Employers' members. Poland was in the process of transforming its economy, and labour inspection had an important role to play in this transition. For this reason, the Polish Government had recently ratified both Conventions Nos. 81 and 129. His Government was in favour of a Protocol because it constituted a legal instrument which would have an effective influence on national legislation and permit significant improvements of working conditions.

82. The Government member of Panama recalled that during the previous days' discussions the emphasis had been on flexibility and on taking into account the special conditions of member States. Panama had ratified Convention No. 81. But the issues raised by the proposed Protocol needed further study. A Recommendation would be a prerequisite for the implementation of the substantive elements of the new instrument.

83. The Government member of the United States wanted to see the discussion expanded. He asked the Office to explain briefly what impact a Protocol would have on the adoption of Convention No. 81 in a given country.

84. The representative of the Secretary-General thereupon clarified the differences between the various instruments — Protocol, Recommendation and Convention — under the ILO Constitution. A Protocol was, in fact, a Convention and once adopted by the Conference, contained legally binding obligations which member States which ratified it were bound to implement. It avoided the necessity of having to formulate a new Convention under the double-discussion procedure. It was a Convention itself in that it extended all the obligations contained in Convention No. 81, once adopted by a two-thirds majority of the Conference. On the other hand, a Recommendation, while containing useful guidelines for governments wishing to legislate on the subject, contained no obligations that could be enforced.

85. The Government member of Egypt supported the Protocol; it would be in compliance with her country's legislation. She would express certain reservations later in the discussions.

86. The Government member of Norway expressed her country's support for a Protocol.

87. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson thought that, given the explanations by the representative of the Secretary-General, there could be no more doubt as to the consequences in the choice of instruments. He also referred to the ILO Constitution. Recommendations were not mere appendices of Conventions. There were issues on which the Conference had adopted a Convention and a Recommendation, and others that had been regulated by a Recommendation only. The Employers' members were of the opinion that Conventions should stand by themselves, without the need for an additional Recommendation. There were situations that called for adopting a Recommendation only, as in the case before the Committee. The questionnaire to the Office Report VI(1) specifically envisaged adopting only a Recommendation, and this continued to be the Employers' members' preferred choice. If, however, the majority of the Committee were in favour of a Protocol, the Employers would prefer a Protocol and a Recommendation.

88. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson thought that the Employers' members appeared ready to accept a Protocol and withdraw their amendment. The proposal for both a Protocol and a Recommendation might not be feasible in the time available. The Committee should seek clarification on the possible preparation of a complementary Recommendation.

89. The representative of the Secretary-General affirmed that it was not feasible to discuss a separate, additional Recommendation since no such text was currently before the Committee. A Protocol had been drafted by the Office because the replies by member States, as reflected in Report VI(2), had revealed that this was the preferred instrument. He recalled that only a very small number of countries responding to the questionnaire had wanted to adopt a Protocol and a Recommendation. It would be possible, however, to recommend in the report of the Committee that, in the future, a Recommendation be discussed.

90. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson thought the Committee's mandate to adopt a Protocol extended also to the adoption of a Recommendation. The Office should therefore have prepared a separate text in case the Committee wished to discuss this alternative. The Committee was the place for decisions to be taken. Under the circumstances, however, the Employers' members would withdraw their amendment.

91. The Chairperson then declared the Preamble adopted, as amended.

92. The Government member of Lebanon presented an amendment to Article 1, paragraphs 1 and 2, seconded by the Government member of the United States. At the end of paragraph 1, she wished to add the words: "in a manner consistent with its national law and practice and in so far as the non-commercial services sector comes under the competence of the labour inspectors." Further, at the end of paragraph 2, she proposed to add the phrase: "as indicated in the general concept of paragraph 1". She stressed that if the extension of Convention No. 81 were enforceable by labour inspectors, it would obviously come under the competence of labour inspectorates. Every member State would have to consider enforcement procedures according to national law and practice. Therefore, there were other categories of workplaces in the NCS sector that should also be excluded.

93. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson was of the opinion that the text of the Protocol already contained the substantive elements of the first part of the amendment in Article 3, paragraph 1. It was therefore unnecessary. The proposed amendment at the end of paragraph 2 was redundant, as the text of the Protocol had to be read in its whole context. The Employers' members therefore did not support the amendment.

94. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson did not think that Article 1 was the place to discuss exclusions, if indeed the Committee were to consider exclusions in the Protocol at all. The Workers' members did not want to have exclusions applying to broad categories of workers in the Protocol. It was not logical to extend the scope of an instrument and to foresee exclusions in one and the same Article. The logic of the Committee's work was to extend the Convention. He therefore suggested that the amendment be withdrawn.

95. The Government member of Lebanon responded that if the amendment repeated a phrase in Article 3 of the proposed Protocol, this was consistent with the practice of recalling the content of other Conventions, and of making references for the sake of clarity. The Protocol should not extend the scope of the Convention to parts of the NCS sector which did not come under the competence of labour inspectors. However, there being no support for her amendment, she withdrew it.

96. The Chairperson then declared Article 1, paragraphs 1 and 2 adopted without change.

97. The Government member of France, on behalf of the Member States of the European Union with the exception of the Netherlands, exposed the motives which were at the origin of the amendment he had tabled. It proposed to replace the phrase: "included among industrial or commercial workplaces to which legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work apply that are enforceable by labour inspectors" by the words: "covered under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), subject to the exceptions foreseen in this Protocol." The amendment sought to simplify the Office text, which seemed complicated as it referred to definitions in Convention No. 81. At the same time, the amendment sought to retain the essence of the original text. Furthermore, it already anticipated Article 2 and other elements in the text concerning exceptions.

98. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said his members had examined the amendment and found it a good one. Everything the Office text said was in fact already contained in Convention No. 81. However, in the Spanish version of the amendment, the words "observados en" ("included in") should be replaced by "cubiertos por" ("covered by") which was more relevant.

99. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson invited any proposal that would improve the text. The Workers' members were prepared to give their support to the amendment. But there were other amendments foreseen later in the Protocol dealing with exceptions, and he would not like to see any reference made to them in this Article. He therefore proposed a subamendment to delete the words "subject to the exceptions foreseen in this Protocol".

100. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union with the exception of the Netherlands, pointed out that the amendment did in fact announce a number of exceptions to be embodied in other Articles of the Protocol. However, the Government members he represented could accept the Workers' subamendment, and would revert to the substantive issues later.

101. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson was concerned that the subamendment proposed by the Workers' members could give rise to misunderstandings. However, it seemed to be more a question of editing than of substance. As the Government member of France, speaking on behalf of other Member States of the European Union, had accepted the subamendment, the Employers' members would not oppose it.

102. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union he represented, felt there was a problem of translation in paragraph 3 of Article 1 concerning the French word "établissements". The appropriate translation of the English word "workplaces" would be "lieux de travail". He asked the secretariat to examine this point.

103. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that a formal Drafting Committee would be set up by members of the Committee to take care of any problems between one language and another.

104. Thereupon, the Chairperson declared the amendment to Article 1, paragraph 3, adopted as subamended, and in consequence, Article 1 was adopted, as amended.

Article 2

105. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete Article 2, though he wished to reassure the Committee that this would only change the construction of the Protocol. Substantive elements of current Article 2 (paragraphs 2, 3 and 4) should be retained but incorporated in a slightly different form elsewhere in the Protocol. The Workers' members would propose further amendments at a later stage because they recognized that special circumstances did exist, for example to avoid having labour inspectors follow fire-fighters into a burning house. However, the Workers' members could not accept that broad categories of workplaces be excluded from the scope of the Protocol and considered such an approach to be contrary to the aim of extending the coverage of Convention No. 81. Special procedures could be envisaged for special circumstances, but such considerations should not destroy the whole exercise. He encouraged the Committee to engage in a constructive discussion on the right place for noting any special circumstances that might call for special arrangements. Too many holes in the Protocol would make it look like Swiss cheese. He wanted an indication of other Committee members' opinions on what the Workers' members considered to be a major issue.

106. The Government member of India stated that the amendment was not acceptable.

107. The Government member of France, speaking also on behalf of other Member States of the European Union, underlined the great importance that Article 2 had for the Member States he represented. One should not see Article 2, paragraph 1, as an exclusion, although the text used the term "exclude". Rather, it should be read in its entirety. Paragraph 2 and, in particular paragraph 3, in fact envisaged modalities for allowing labour inspection systems to adapt to different circumstances, given their different structures and historic origins. It was not a question of exclusion, as many of the countries he represented already had effective and impartial alternative systems of inspection for the public service. The aim was not to deny workers in these workplaces the protection in safety and health which member States' legislation already accorded them. Furthermore, the amendment he had proposed would introduce an element of flexibility that could not but facilitate ratification of the Protocol.

108. The Government member of the United Kingdom offered a comment in support of his colleague from France. For the United Kingdom, as well as for several other European countries, exceptions such as those proposed in Article 2 were not necessary. But the Committee should take a long view on this issue. In the United Kingdom, it had taken 20 years to calm the fears of NCS sector employers, notably the police, the armed forces and the fire services, to accept that they would be open to a system of labour inspection which they did not readily understand. He expressed concern that the deletion of Article 2 would rekindle such fears. He added that Report VI(1) had shown that substantial changes in public sector labour inspection continued to take place. Therefore, the number of exceptions that member States would ask for should gradually decrease.

109. The Government member of Korea insisted that Article 2 was essential to the proposed Protocol.

110. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson regretted that he still did not know the mood of the Committee on this amendment. He suggested that some of the points made by the Government member of France, also on behalf of certain Member States of the European Union, supported the notion that special arrangements should be considered under the special mechanisms to be provided for in Article 4 rather than as exclusions in Article 2. As to alternative inspection arrangements proposed in Article 2, paragraph 3, the Workers' members did not accept, for example, that armed forces personnel should inspect themselves. The Workers' members suspected, on the evidence of the proposed amendments, that a number of governments were moving towards a significant expansion in the scope of exclusions compared with what was contained in the draft text of the Protocol. The sum of what was to be excluded would leave little else in the text. Report VI(2) showed that only 28 member States of those in favour of adopting a Protocol were also in favour of a general exclusion of certain categories of workplaces. He urged the Committee to explore the question further, and called for a clarification of the Employers' members' position.

111. The Government member of the Russian Federation was of the opinion that an amended Article 2 would not automatically give labour inspectors the right to inspect workplaces in, for instance, the armed services or the police. This would be settled by national legislation in accordance with Article 4. Nor did he think that Article 2, with the present exclusions, would deprive governments that considered it necessary to carry out inspections of the right to do so. In the Russian Federation, no problems had been encountered with such inspections. He felt that Article 2 was sufficiently flexible to accommodate specific situations in each member State. Therefore, it should be left as it was.

112. The Government member of the United States supported the remarks made by the Government member of France, also on behalf of other Member States of the European Union. He emphasized that flexibility was absolutely critical for most governments.

113. The Government member of Sudan commented that the Committee on the Application of Standards would address some of the concerns raised by the Workers' members in their presentation of this amendment. He agreed with other Government members who had spoken on the importance of flexibility in international instruments in order to ensure better application. He was in favour of retaining Article 2, and of later amending Article 4 to accommodate the concerns of the Workers' members.

114. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said the Employers' members had listened carefully to the Workers' Vice-Chairpersons' statements but could not see how, on procedural grounds, they could make concessions on questions related to Article 2, while the Workers' members' position on amendments to Article 4 was not yet known. More Government members should declare their intentions, and the Workers' members should be more precise when presenting future amendments.

115. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson reiterated that the exact wording on subsequent amendments to Article 4 was not yet available. However, he requested that the current discussion focus on appropriate ways of dealing with the issues raised in paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 of Article 2 in the context of special arrangements. The question before the Committee was in fact one of the structure of the Protocol. In general, the text should not speak of exclusions. He again asked that Employers' members state their position before a decision was made. If one group did not declare itself, such a decision was not possible.

116. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson thought that the statements made by the Workers' Vice-Chairperson should have been submitted as further amendments. The Employers' members could not decide on a matter to which no precise proposals had been made. They would abstain from taking a position, all the more so since the matter concerned the Government members first and foremost.

117. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson mentioned that he understood the problem raised by the Employers' members and pointed to the constitutional difficulty of submitting specific amendments to Article 4 at this point. What he had asked for was support for the Workers' members' position to focus more on special arrangements rather than general exclusions.

118. The Government member of Egypt affirmed that Article 2 was very important because of the need for flexibility.

119. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson re-emphasized the importance placed by his members on the issue before them. He suggested that since uncertainty existed, it might have been appropriate to proceed to a vote, and that such an approach would have been a legitimate means of addressing the evident uncertainties. However, in order to avoid sending the wrong signals and thereby creating a confrontational situation, and in the interest of engaging in constructive dialogue, the Workers' members would withdraw their amendment. He asserted that they would none the less continue to come back to the question of how the Protocol should be constructed and argued that the exclusions proposed now were too broad. In future, when the Workers' members presented subamendments, they should be received by the Committee in a constructive manner to facilitate consensus. But he cautioned that it would henceforth be difficult to even discuss any new extensions of categories of exclusions under Article 2.

120. The Chairperson accepted the withdrawal of the Workers' members' amendment and thanked the Workers' members for their cooperation. The examination of Article 2, paragraph 1 then began with a discussion of an amendment submitted by the Employers' members, to insert the words "at any time" after the phrase "which ratifies this Protocol may" in the first line of paragraph 1.

121. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that this amendment had one obvious reason: to make the Protocol more flexible and consequently to enable more member States to ratify it. The present text was very rigid. The solution contained in Article 25 of Convention No. 81 was preferable, and this was reflected in the amendment.

122. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson said that he had difficulties with the logic of the amendment. First, since the declaration allowed in Article 2 should be appended to the instrument of ratification, the amendment to add the words "at any time" would create an ambiguity. Second, he remarked that paragraph 4 of Article 2 already foresaw the kind of situation that the Employers' members' amendment sought to address. He then submitted the following subamendment: "A. Member which ratifies this Protocol may, by a declaration appended to its instrument of ratification, exclude from its scope of application certain categories, subject to the special arrangements outlined in Article 4 of this Protocol."

123. Thereupon, the Chairperson asked for an opinion by the Legal Adviser of the Conference on the admissibility of this subamendment.

124. The Legal Adviser of the Conference was asked to advise on whether the subamendment submitted by the Workers' members, to the Employers' members' amendment under discussion, was acceptable, or rather an amendment in itself and therefore inadmissible. He referred to article 63.6 of the Standing Orders of the Conference whereby a subamendment is considered to be an amendment to an amendment under discussion. It has, inter alia, the advantage of not being subject to deadlines. Therefore, in order to be receivable, it must refer to the text of the amendment and not merely to the original text. In the present case, the Workers' members' subamendment did not refer to the Employers' members' amendment but to another part of the Office text.

125. The Chairperson thereupon decided that the subamendment proposed by the Workers' members was a new amendment, and therefore inadmissible.

126. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson requested clarification regarding the limitations imposed upon Committee members in the use of subamendments. He asked whether there were any limitations to finding a different way of drafting a whole paragraph if the intention of the original amendment remained the same.

127. The Legal Adviser replied that if the aim of the subamendment were to change the text without changing its meaning, that would be acceptable. The wording could always be improved; any such suggestion could go directly to the Drafting Committee.

128. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson accepted the ruling and reaffirmed that the Workers' members could not agree to the amendment under review.

129. The Government member of Sudan asked for further clarification of the reasons behind the amendment.

130. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson asserted that the proposal introduced more flexibility and clarity to the text.

131. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson observed that the Employers' members seemed to be subamending their own amendment. He requested further clarification from the Office as to how the wording of this Protocol compared with usual practice.

132. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that the proposed Office text referred to, and was aligned with Article 25 of Convention No. 81.

133. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson commented that the Committee might have to go to a vote on several occasions, but wondered if the issues under discussion were sufficiently important to the Employers' members to do so on this amendment. He would have wished for more statements from Government members on the subject. He understood that many were seeking flexibility in this Protocol, but wondered if there were not another way to express it.

134. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that the Employers' members had originally submitted the amendment as a sign of support for the Government members, as the issue really concerned them most. If there were no support, then the Employers' members would withdraw it. The amendment was so withdrawn.

135. The Committee proceeded to discuss an amendment submitted by the Government member of France, on behalf of the Member States of the European Union with the exception of the Netherlands. He declared that its purpose was to introduce further flexibility into the structure of the instrument. Article 2, paragraph 1, as proposed by the Office, did not strictu sensu mention public administration, at any level. Their amendment therefore came in three parts: firstly, they proposed to add a new subparagraph (a) as follows: "the national, regional or local public administration"; secondly, to add the words "emergency and rescue" after the words "and other public" in subparagraph (b); thirdly, after subparagraph (c) to add the words "domestic services". He underlined the fact that the Government members, on whose behalf he spoke, stressed that supervisory systems for safety and health in public administrations could be arranged within the framework of specialized organizations. This would link up with Articles 2 and 3, which envisaged other inspection mechanisms for workplaces excluded from general labour inspection. The proposed amendment with respect to subparagraph (c) concerned quite a different problem: not the public service but rather the principle of freedom of the individual. Private households should not be subject to labour inspection, and labour inspectors should not be empowered, through the principle of universal coverage enshrined in the new instrument, to enter the homes of private individuals employing domestic servants to inspect conditions of work.

136. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson remarked that he was puzzled by the amendment. Referring to the first subparagraph, he pointed out that only two countries out of 58 having answered the Office questionnaire had suggested excluding these administrative services. He drew attention to Article 2 of EEC Directive 89/391 which stated that: "This Directive shall not be applicable where characteristics peculiar to certain specific public service activities, such as the armed forces or the police, or to certain specific activities in the civil protection services inevitably conflict with it." Thus, the amendment under discussion had been proposed by a group of Government members which had not excluded any government administrative sector from their own supranational legislation.

137. Referring to the second subparagraph, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson asked whether there was not an error in drafting, as the text of the proposal appeared confused. The amended phrasing would result in a sentence which read "(b) the police and other public emergency and rescue security services". He asked whether those proposing the amendment also wanted the word "security" to be deleted. Finally, he voiced surprise at the reference to domestic services.

He was concerned that the acceptance of such a formulation might permit such abuse as child labour; he feared that the Committee was dealing with subjects outside its competence, particularly since the issue of "Home work" was being discussed by another Conference Committee. He wondered what could be understood by "non-commercial" domestic services and added that more accidents occurred in the home than at any other location. For a multitude of reasons, the Workers' members would not agree to this amendment.

138. The Government member of the United Kingdom sought to clarify two points raised by the Workers' Vice-Chairperson in response to the latter's reaction to the fact that some Member States of the European Union had allied themselves with an amendment which went against their position as stated in Report VI(2). He suggested that the Conference had two options in extending labour inspection to the NCS sector. The first was to set a very high standard which could only be met by a handful of countries; the second was to allow for exemptions, which many member States would seek, and therefore commit a larger number of countries to ratification. The other point concerned domestic services. While he accepted the concern of the Workers' members that this Committee should not be debating issues which were discussed elsewhere, Article 1 of the Protocol sought to extend labour inspection in a uniform way, and this had not always worked in the United Kingdom. "Domestic services" was perhaps not the appropriate wording, but labour inspectors should be prevented from entering private employers' households and inspecting the conditions of domestic workers.

139. The Government member of Lebanon emphasized that her country had presented its own amendment, with another list of exclusions to be added to Article 2, paragraph 1. She challenged the Workers' members' suggestion that member States should be bound by their answers to the Office questionnaire; otherwise there would be no need for the Conference. The exclusions to the proposed Protocol offered more flexibility, which was absolutely necessary and would allow a greater number of member States to consider ratification.

140. The Government member of Sweden agreed with the Government member of the United Kingdom. In Sweden domestic service was defined as work in a private employer's house and nothing else.

141. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of other Member States of the European Union except the Netherlands, declared that the amendment was in no way intended to question the validity of EEC Directive 89/391. But this Directive did speak about an appropriate system of inspection. Thus, the amendment was aimed rather at the modalities of supervision. It was the concern of the Government members that had supported it to find more appropriate control mechanisms for the public administration sector.

142. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic supported the amendment proposed by the Member States of the European Union, with the exception of the Netherlands. It would be consistent with legislation in force in Syria regarding the application of labour standards in the public sector, including education and other public services. The proposed exemptions would help the Syrian Government ratify the Protocol.

143. The Government member of Algeria wished to note two points: first, in limiting the scope of Convention No. 81, Article 2 of the Protocol introduced considerable flexibility, allowing member States to adapt their labour inspection systems to their specific conditions; second, working conditions in the NCS sector, which consisted in the main of public agents governed by special statutes, were completely different from those of workers in sectors covered by Convention No. 81. It would therefore be useful to leave member States the latitude to define the scope of their labour inspection, either by limiting its functions to those referred to in Article 3, paragraph 1 of Convention No. 81 (working hours, wages, and safety and health) or only to safety and health. He emphasized that in Algeria the Law of 6 February 1990 concerning labour inspection ensured that inspection services covered the NCS sector, while leaving the question of their methods of intervention to special regulations.

144. The Government member of the Republic of Korea said the amendment contained the substance of an amendment that he had submitted which was to be discussed later. Therefore, he could support it. He asked the Committee to consider the ratification record in respect of other Conventions relating to labour inspection. He concluded that lack of flexibility reduced a Convention's chances of being ratified.

145. The Government member of China said that the amendment proposed by the Member States of the European Union, except the Netherlands, was necessary because it allowed for greater flexibility and would encourage more ratifications.

146. The Government member of Australia stated that her Government would not support the amendment. Australia would prefer not to list categories at all, but rather to accept the Office text whose proposed exclusions were sufficient.

147. The Government member of Poland expressed his support for the proposal in the amendment of certain Member States of the European Union to amend subparagraph (b), and to add the words "domestic services" after subparagraph (c). Since Polish labour inspection legislation already covered national, regional and local public administration, he would not like to see this sector excluded from the scope of the Protocol.

148. The Government member of Japan expressed his support for the proposed amendment.

149. The Government member of Egypt expressed her support for the amendment because she considered that it would add greater flexibility to the Protocol.

150. The Government member of Malaysia supported the amendment since in Malaysia public administrative services were well taken care of by special government machinery. He agreed with the exclusion of domestic services because he considered inspection of dwellings to be impossible from a practical point of view.

151. The Government member of India stated that the proposed amendment was fair and reasonable, and expressed his support for it. He affirmed that it gave considerable flexibility which would enable many member States to ratify the Protocol.

152. The Government member of Indonesia declared his support for the amendment. He asserted that the special regulations for the public administration in Indonesia were completely on a par with those in the private sector, and that special inspectors responsible for the public administrative sector carried out their jobs effectively.

153. The Government member of Mauritius supported the amendment, as the constitutional and legal system in his country applicable to public officials was completely different from that applicable to the private sector. The sanctity of the home was protected by the Constitution, therefore, it would be unacceptable to introduce a system of labour inspection in family households.

154. The Government member of Sudan held a different view. He requested clarification from the Office regarding the exclusions mentioned in Article 4 concerning special arrangements for the public sector. He did not think the amendment was necessary.

155. A member of the secretariat explained that the Office text of Article 4, paragraph 1 would allow for special arrangements to be applied in regard to the inspection of workplaces of "national (federal) government administrative services". Article 2, if amended, would allow for a generic exclusion of the entire national, regional or local public administration sector.

156. The Government member of Norway was not in favour of the amendment. Article 2 of the Protocol should stand unchanged.

157. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson reiterated that while flexibility stimulated ratification, the Employers' members were not in favour of flexibility at any cost. An analysis of the proposed amendment showed that it was appropriate to bring Article 2 into harmony with Article 4, where national (federal) government administration was already mentioned. Allowing for the possibility of an exclusion did not automatically mean exclusion. It was a permissive clause. The second part of the amendment, concerning emergency and rescue services, was imprecise. The Employers' members wished to table a subamendment to delete this part. Article 5 already referred to such services, allowing for a number of restrictions. The Employers' members were prepared to support the last part of the amendment concerning domestic services, but were unsure about its ambit. It would be preferable to use the term "household services".

158. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson remarked that even with the subamendment, the amendment was not acceptable to the Workers' members. He argued that although ratification should be encouraged, excessively low standards in international instruments would make them irrelevant. He was puzzled by the fact that the Employers' members had accepted the amendment, as it would mean that competitors in the public sector would not be held to the same standards as those in the private sector. As to allowing member States to exclude domestic services from the Protocol, he thought that the discussions of the Committee on Home Work would show that compatibility could be reached between the need for improved worker protection and concerns for privacy in the home. He expressed particular discomfort with this exclusion noting that it opened a Pandora's box of problems relating to child workers, migrants, etc. He suggested that the Committee seriously reconsider the implications of such an exclusion. He also thought that the proposed wording of subparagraph (b) of the amendment was unclear.

159. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of the authors of the amendment, withdrew subparagraph (b).

160. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson wished to know from the representative of the Secretary-General how many parts of an amendment could be withdrawn before the whole amendment fell. The latter called the Committee's attention to article 63.8 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. He remarked that the Legal Adviser of the Conference had confirmed that withdrawal of parts of an amendment was acceptable when the individual parts were in essence individual amendments. Whatever remained of the amendment should then be discussed and dealt with.

161. The Government member of the United Kingdom — also speaking on behalf of the Government members of Denmark, Finland, Germany and Sweden — announced that he and his colleagues had reflected carefully upon the previous day's interesting discussions and, having taken further advice from their Governments, now withdrew their support for the amendment under review. Their countries, by and large, did not require the flexibility sought for in this amendment. They had nevertheless supported it in a spirit of cooperation, a stance underlined by the degree of support of other Governments. Instructions from their own Governments, however, had now reversed this position. He added that previous concerns regarding subparagraph (c) were not founded and there was no longer a need for this exclusion.

162. The Government member of Switzerland argued that it would be necessary to define the term "domestic services" in subparagraph (c). He wished to know if it were the Employers' members' view that this concerned people employed in private households or, as the Workers' Vice-Chairperson appeared to imply, people working at home. Home work was undertaken by a worker in his or her private home through a contract with an outside employer. This was the subject on the agenda of the Committee on Home Work. If what was meant concerned house work or domestic services, such activities could not be considered non-commercial. His Government therefore did not support the amendment.

163. The Government member of Egypt indicated that the law in her country recognized two different categories of domestic servants. It would be difficult to accept the need to establish inspection services in either of these categories.

164. The Government member of Lebanon supported the exclusions suggested by the Government member of France, speaking also on behalf of other Member States of the European Union, and encouraged the Committee to consider other exclusions, as in the amendment awaiting discussion.

165. The Government member of France wished to insist on the importance, for his Government, of elements of flexibility in the Protocol. It should allow systems for supervising working conditions to be adapted to the specific context of different administrations. It was not his Government's intention or that of those for whom he spoke, to exclude workers in the different administrative services from all guarantees of protection. But one simply had to give these governments the possibility of organizing specific inspection services in line with their specific administrative systems. This did not mean that the Government of France would not strictly apply the provisions of Convention No. 81. He wished to allay any fears that Workers' and Employers' members might harbour in this regard. The Government of France had set up a very advanced, special inspection system which monitored regulations in all administrations. The basis of this rather unique system had been worked out through tripartite consultation. The Government of France would, therefore, have difficulties in ratifying the Protocol if this system would subsequently have to be changed. If, on the other hand, the amendment were adopted, it would lead to more flexibility and ratification by more countries.

166. The Government member of Belgium declared his continued support for the amendment. The problem in his country was to identify which inspection service should have responsibility for the NCS sector. He hoped that the Protocol would permit governments to set up inspection mechanisms distinct from, but equally effective and impartial as, those envisaged by Convention No. 81.

167. The Government member of Cyprus remarked that his country had legislation and mechanisms in place to effectively protect workers in public administration. His country recognized the problems that might be associated with the application of the Protocol to national, regional and local public administrations in other countries, but he affirmed that an independent system of labour inspection was indispensable in order to attain an adequate level of protection. Therefore, his Government did not support the amendment.

168. The Government member of the Republic of Korea expressed support for the full text of the amendment. However, if subparagraph (c) were dropped, subparagraphs (a) and (b) should still be adopted.

169. The Government member of Portugal continued to support the amendment for the reasons given by the Government members of France and Belgium.

170. The Government member of Malaysia supported the statement made by the Government member of France. The amendment should be accepted for reasons of practicality. ASEAN and other developing countries had urged the ILO to introduce greater flexibility in Conventions, so as to open more options for ratification. In Malaysia, the NCS sector had an elaborate and sophisticated system to regulate the relationship between Government, statutory bodies and local authorities on the one hand, and their employees on the other, in particular as regards terms and conditions of service and disciplinary procedures. A National Joint Council provided the machinery and the system to ensure adequate protection of civil servants. Therefore, workplaces in the federal and national government should be excluded from the Protocol. He was further of the opinion that domestic services were difficult to define. He interpreted the term as referring to people working in a home or dwelling, not in a trade. He agreed that inspection in this field would be impractical.

171. The Government member of Spain supported the amendment because it would permit a total or partial exclusion of specific areas, whereas the remainder of the guarantees in Article 2 were left untouched. In his country, the labour inspectorate had not encountered problems in monitoring occupational health and safety of employees in the public sector, so in that respect the Protocol could be applied. Matters were different concerning other elements of working conditions, as these were subject to other supervisory mechanisms under a separate inspection system.

172. The Government member of Botswana recalled that the objective of extending the Protocol was to subject workers in the NCS sector to similar standards of protection as those applicable in industry and commerce. In the general discussion, almost all members had insisted on the importance of establishing impartial systems of labour inspection for the NCS sector. Now these considerations were giving way to concerns for flexibility. The proposed amendment would deny workers essential protection and result in a travesty of equal treatment. Underlining the need to strike a balance between equity and flexibility, he supported the exclusion in subparagraph (a) only.

173. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson asked for clarification on the status of the amendment now that some of the Government members originally promoting it had withdrawn their support. He had been under the impression that item (c) had been withdrawn, but now it had been brought back into the discussion.

174. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that there was an amendment on the floor. Several of its authors had withdrawn their support, but that did not affect its status, as a number of Government members continued to support it. Further, there was a subamendment proposed by the Employers' members, to withdraw the words "emergency and rescue" from subparagraph (b), which seemed to have support from the Committee. The Committee would have to vote on the subamendment. Following that, it would proceed to vote on the amendment, or what was left of it.

175. The Government member of France — speaking also on behalf of the Governments of Belgium, Finland, Greece, Italy, Portugal and Spain — declared that he withdrew subparagraphs (b) and (c) of the amendment. The main issue was subparagraph (a), which should be accepted as proposed.

176. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson noted the change in the Government members' position. It obliged the Employers' members to change theirs also. They had supported the amendment with all three subparagraphs, but now that two of these had been withdrawn without prior consultation, this was creating a difficult position.

177. The Chairperson accepted the withdrawal of subparagraphs (b) and (c) of the amendment. She stated that unless consensus were now reached, the Committee would proceed to a vote on the remainder of the amendment.

178. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson affirmed that even in its rudimentary version, the amendment was unacceptable to the Workers' members. He argued that the proposed exclusion of national, regional and local public administrations was too broad and would leave the proposed Protocol with a drastically reduced scope of application. The Workers' members wished to propose a subamendment to the remaining text, to replace the words "national, regional or local public administration" in subparagraph (a) by "essential national (federal) government administration". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson mentioned that this proposal, if accepted, would also have to be included in Article 4.

179. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson repeated that the Employers' members had originally supported Article 2 as proposed by the Office. Then they had supported the amendment because they were of the impression that it had the support of most Government members, though to varying degrees. The amendment had gradually lost supporters, but the Employers' Vice-Chairperson felt it should not be rejected completely. There was still concern for flexibility, but they did not wish to see the impact of the Protocol completely placed in doubt. They were, therefore, now inclined to support the Workers' members' subamendment.

180. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson sought to clarify whether or not the Employers' members had reservations about the word "essential".

181. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson replied that he had made no reference to the word "essential". It was used nowhere else in the Protocol. He wondered what its implications were, in particular whether it referred exclusively to national administrations, whatever their scope. He asked the Workers' members for clarification.

182. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson explained that the word "essential" echoed a term current in jurisprudence on freedom of association. While the context was not entirely comparable, he asserted that in the jurisprudence under reference, coherent exceptions existed with respect to authority exercised in the name of the State, if it were essential to the functioning of the State at different levels.

183. The Government member of Lebanon did not support the insertion of the word "essential" in the subamendment. She insisted that all public services were essential.

184. The Chairperson observed that a consensus had been reached between the Workers' and the Employers' members.

185. The Government member of the Republic of Korea insisted that exclusions for national and regional public administrations should be retained in the Protocol. He maintained his Government's support for subparagraph (a) of the amendment without the Workers' members' subamendment.

186. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson asked for a clarification as there were problems in the Spanish version of the subamendment, which had been translated as "special" instead of "essential". Once it had been confirmed that it referred to essential national (federal) government administrations, the Employers' members supported the subamendment.

187. The Government member of India reiterated his Government's stance not to support any further dilution of the expression "national, regional or local public administration". He argued that instead of providing more flexibility, the subamendment tended to create confusion.

188. The Government member of France — speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Finland, Greece, Italy, Portugal and Spain — wished to know whether the subamendment submitted by the Workers' members also included local government.

189. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson repeated that the proposed subamendment read: "(a) essential national (federal) government administration". It did not include regional or local government.

190. The Government member of France made it clear that his Government could not support the subamendment. The introduction of the word "essential" risked creating delicate problems of management for French public administration, not to speak of the elimination of any reference to regional and local authorities.

191. The Government member of Lebanon reiterated her objections and reservations to the introduction of the word "essential".

192. The Chairperson then proceeded to take a vote on the subamendment proposed by the Workers' members to the amendment under discussion. Put to the vote, the subamendment was adopted by 95,887 in favour; 18,032 against; with 8,901 abstentions. The amendment as subamended was also adopted.

193. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson presented an amendment to subparagraph (c) of Article 2, paragraph 1, to insert the words "public and private" immediately before the words "prison services". The aim was to make its scope clearer. While prison services were generally run by the State, they could also be operated by the private sector. Thus the amendment would harmonize the text of the Protocol with social reality and avoid double standards in application.

194. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson thought that the amendment would confuse the issue by adding a reference to the private sector when this was clearly already covered by Convention No. 81. She proposed a subamendment to delete the word "private".

195. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson insisted that their aim had been to improve the Office text. If the subamendment were accepted, the Committee would be accepting a restriction and inequality of treatment. The fact that a service was provided by a private organization did not necessarily mean that it was commercial, even though the organization might receive payment. The Employers' members, therefore, wished to retain their amendment as proposed. If the word "private" were deleted, public prison services would be excluded, while private services would not. This would create unacceptable disparities.

196. The Government member of Sudan noted that the Protocol referred to prison services, and this implied both public and private prisons if the latter were non-commercial.

197. The Government member of the United Kingdom asked the Employers' members to explain further how private prisons could be considered non-commercial. He was inclined to support the position of the Workers' members.

198. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson, taking note of the point made by the Government member of Sudan, asked the secretariat whether the present text also covered private prison services.

199. A member of the secretariat stated that the term "prison services" itself included all forms of prison services, public and private. Workplaces of employees in private prisons were already covered by Convention No. 81.

200. The Government member of Sudan found this explanation to be consistent with his interpretation. He wondered whether the Employers' members could withdraw their amendment.

201. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson also found the explanation satisfactory and, therefore, withdrew the amendment.

202. The Government member of India presented an amendment to Article 2, paragraph 1, to insert the following text after subparagraph (c): "(d) national (federal) government administration services; (e) provincial, regional, district or local administrative services; (f) fire brigades and other rescue services; (g) postal services”; and in addition, to delete the words “if the application of the Convention to any of these categories would raise special problems of a substantial nature”. This amendment was seconded by the Government member of Lebanon. The Government member of India recalled that India had ratified Convention No. 81. His Government supported the extension of Convention No. 81 to the NCS sector, provided certain categories of workplaces were excluded. The exclusions in the proposed text were not sufficient. The Government member of India wished to exclude services that were vital to the State. Public servants in India were expected to maintain discipline and political neutrality. Labour laws for private sector industry were not applicable to any of the categories referred to in his amendment, for which alternative arrangements for the redress of grievances were guaranteed under the Constitution of his country. He concluded that the Protocol should be flexible enough to allow for ratification by as many member States as possible. If the additional exclusions he had proposed were not included in Article 2, the Government of India would find it difficult to ratify the Protocol.

203. The Government member of France supported the amendment except for the deletion of the last sentence. It was necessary to retain it in order to cover exceptional circumstances.

204. The Government member of the United States said that it was critical to address the question of flexibility. He recalled the discussion on the Night Work Convention, 1990 (No. 171). Many member States were not able to ratify Conventions because of relatively small differences in scope, points of detail or variations in national laws. It was desirable to take such differences into account. Governments would ratify Conventions if they were within the framework of their national laws and practice.

205. The Employers’ Vice-Chairperson asked for clarification as to whether the whole amendment was being discussed. He believed that the matter of national (federal) government administration had already been disposed of by the Committee’s decision to insert a new subparagraph (a) into Article 2, paragraph 1.

206. The Chairperson confirmed that the issues raised in points (d) and (e) of the amendment had already been dealt with. The only items still open to debate were subparagraphs (f), (g) and the proposal to delete the last sentence of Article 2, paragraph 1.

207. The Workers’ deputy Vice-Chairperson agreed. The same issues would come up again in further amendments, but the debate should not be reopened. The Committee should avoid shopping lists of exclusions. The Workers’ members could not agree to the exclusion of fire and other rescue services, the specific problems of which would be addressed in Article 5, nor to that of postal services, which in many countries were fully open to labour inspection, nor to the deletion of the last phrase. Exceptions should be related only to special problems of a substantial nature. She could therefore not agree to deleting this sentence.

208. The Government member of Belgium declared support for the views expressed by the Government member of France.

209. The Government member of Lebanon supported the proposal referring to fire brigades and other rescue services. They were generally public, but private associations could also run them. She also supported deletion of the final phrase. A sovereign State should have the right to exclusion without having to give reasons.

210. The Government member of the United Kingdom, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Denmark, Finland, the Netherlands and Sweden, supported the remarks made by the Workers' members.

211. The Government member of the Republic of Korea supported the amendment proposed by the Government member of India. The Government member of Japan also supported the amendment.

212. The Government member of Australia supported the position of the Workers' members.

213. The Government member of Panama supported the position taken by the Employers' and the Workers' members on issues regarding public services, which he believed had been resolved as a result of earlier discussions.

214. The Government member of Ireland also supported the position of the Workers' members.

215. The Government member of Egypt supported the amendment presented by the Government member of India, including paragraph (f) which referred to services carried out by special public servants. In Egypt, this also applied to the postal services. It would be difficult to ratify the Protocol without the proposed exclusions.

216. The Government member of Poland supported the exclusion of fire brigades and other rescue services, but not of postal services.

217. The Government member of India agreed to withdraw points (f) and (g) of the amendment.

218. The Government member of Malaysia expressed his support for the first part of the proposal. He echoed the statement made by the Government member of the United States on the need for flexibility. As to the last section of the amendment, to delete the whole phrase would be going too far. He proposed a subamendment to insert the phrase "in the opinion of the government concerned" before the word "would". Governments should have the option of proposing exclusions. However, there being no seconder, the subamendment was not accepted.

219. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson reiterated her group's position. The last part of paragraph 1 was an essential component of the Protocol, and would assist governments. The Committee had considered a series of exclusions. Labour inspection should cover all workplaces except where there were problems of a substantial nature. She requested that the Government member of India withdraw the amendment.

220. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson agreed with the Workers' members. The final phrase was important in maintaining the harmony of the text. It required governments to make a judgement regarding whether a special problem existed, and to justify the measures they subsequently proposed. The Employers' members were, therefore, opposed to the deletion.

221. The Government member of India thereupon withdrew the amendment.

222. The Chairperson requested that the amendment submitted by the Government member of the Republic of Korea, proposing to insert the words “(a) national (federal) government administrative services; (b) provincial, regional, district or local administrative services”, after the words “the following categories” in Article 2, paragraph 1, and to insert “(d) fire brigades and other rescue services” after subparagraph (c), be withdrawn, since it covered the same subject that had just been dealt with. For the same reason, she asked the Government member of Lebanon to withdraw her amendment intended to delete the words “if the application of the Convention to any of these categories would raise special problems of a substantial nature” from Article 2, paragraph 1.

223. The Government member of the Republic of Korea withdrew his amendment but stressed that without diversity and flexibility, uniform social justice could not be achieved.

224. The Government member of Lebanon withdrew her amendment, but asked the Office how the term “problems of a special nature” would be defined in every member State, and what criteria the Office would apply in accepting that they were “special”.

225. The representative of the Secretary-General replied that it would be the responsibility of member States which ratified this instrument to interpret it. However, under article 22 of the Constitution, they were responsible for reporting on its application in law and practice. These reports were examined by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, and there could be difficulties if the Experts disagreed with the view of a member State.

226. The Government member of Lebanon then proposed to amend Article 2, paragraph 1 by adding the following subparagraphs: “(d) the judiciary; (e) government administrations and municipalities which have special regulations and special inspectorate systems; (f) public agencies which have relevant inspectorate systems; (g) proprietors of establishments employing family members and administered by the father, mother or other custodians”, after paragraph (c).

227. The amendment was seconded by the Government member of Egypt.

228. The Chairperson observed that subparagraphs (e) and (f) had already been discussed. The Workers’ and Employers’ Vice-Chairpersons agreed, and discussion was then limited to adding subparagraphs (d) and (g).

229. The Government member of Lebanon argued that since the judiciary formed part of public administration, it should be possible to exclude it from the Protocol. With reference to subparagraph (f), she suggested that although public administrations had previously been discussed, public utilities had not. She also wished to add domestic servants to the categories that could be excluded. Subparagraph (g) was introduced because these establishments were excluded from the scope of the Lebanese Labour Code.

230. The Workers’ Vice-Chairperson noted that only proposed subparagraphs (d) and (g) remained to be discussed. He reminded the Government member of Lebanon that she could not subamend her own amendment and so could not add “domestic workers”. As to subparagraph (d), he urged the Committee to consider the logic of any such exclusion. Article 2, paragraph 1 applied to special concerns such as state security, or the special nature of the work. He saw no justification for refusing the protection contained in the Protocol to the judiciary. Its functions and the nature of the activities of those working in it did not prevent it from being subject to regular labour inspection. Regarding subparagraph (g), it had already been disposed of in the discussion of the amendment concerning “domestic services”, and the Workers’ members strongly disagreed with this proposed exclusion.

231. The Employers’ Vice-Chairperson also demanded that only subparagraphs (d) and (g) be dealt with. The Committee had already agreed that any potential exclusion be limited to essential national (federal) government administration. The judiciary was part of government, but not an essential service, and its possible exclusion from the scope of the Protocol was, therefore, not justified. Subparagraph (g) referred to proprietors of establishments, whereas the Committee had agreed that the Protocol should refer to workplaces. The Employers’ members, therefore, did not support the rest of the amendment either.

232. The Government member of Egypt proposed that the words “domestic work” be added to the list of potential exclusions. Both “domestic workers” and those categories described in subparagraph (g) fell outside the system of labour inspection in Egypt.

233. The Workers’ Vice-Chairperson reminded the Committee that the Protocol would apply to the NCS sector only. The activities being discussed formed part of commercial services and were covered by Convention No. 81. With reference to subparagraph (g), he reiterated the Employers’ members’ view that labour inspection applied to workplaces, not to proprietors. He suggested that the amendment be withdrawn.

234. The Government member of Lebanon asserted that she wished to pursue discussions, explaining that in Lebanon the judiciary and government administration had their own central inspection board that covered most, if not all, of the functions mentioned in Convention No. 81. She expressed support for the Government member of Egypt’s subamendment.

235. The Government member of Egypt said her subamendment would add another subparagraph after subparagraph (g), referring to domestic servants and related services.

236. The Chairperson ruled that the proposed subamendment was a new amendment and as such it could not be accepted. She also pointed out that neither the Workers’ members nor the Employers’ members were willing to accept the amendment, and suggested it be withdrawn.

237. The Government member of Lebanon withdrew the amendment due to lack of support. She also stressed that she wished her position on the issues of substance to be reflected in the report of the Committee.

238. The Chairperson then declared Article 2, paragraph 1, adopted as amended.

239. The Employers’ Vice-Chairperson proposed to amend Article 2, paragraph 2, by deleting the words “in the absence of such organizations”, and adding the words “in accordance with national laws and practice” at the end of the paragraph. The purpose was to allow governments sufficient flexibility to choose between consulting the most representative organizations or consulting directly with the representatives of workers without the conditional priority implied in the draft text. It did not intend to limit consultations just to avoid imposing a fixed order. The most representative organizations of employers and workers played an important role in the NCS sector; however, it was also important to put the workers concerned on an equal footing with government, particularly in the absence of most representative organizations.

240. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson indicated that she could agree to delete the words "in the absence of such organizations", but wished to subamend the amendment by deleting everything after the word "or". She referred to the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), which was pertinent to the situation foreseen in Article 2, paragraph 2, of the Protocol. Article 1 of that Convention defined "representative organizations" to mean "the most representative organizations of employers and workers enjoying the right of freedom of association".

241. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson did not agree with the subamendment. It would prevent any consultation with the representatives of workers concerned in many countries where representative organizations did not exist. There was a serious risk that in such circumstances the government would act unilaterally, without consultation, in violation of the Protocol. In Report VI (2), the Office had stated that on the question of consultation, no clear pattern had emerged from the replies. The Office had, therefore, indicated that it would prepare a text which left the matter open. However, paragraph 2 in fact did not entirely reflect this position. Therefore, the Employers' members wanted their amendment to be adopted.

242. The Government member of Egypt supported the Employers' members' proposal because it allowed more flexibility.

243. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic wished to see paragraph 2 retained as formulated, since workers' and employers' organizations might not exist in all countries. The reference to national law and practice would be more appropriate if included elsewhere in the Protocol. He did not support the Workers' members' subamendment.

244. The Government member of Sudan noted that the amendment had not obtained the support of the Workers' members. He agreed with the opinion of the Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic that paragraph 2 should be left unchanged, since it was well integrated.

245. The Government member of the Russian Federation opposed the amendment. The deletion of the phrase "in the absence of such organizations" did not allow for situations where there were no representative organizations. The Protocol should be universally applicable. The proposed reference to national laws and practice was redundant, since the phrase appeared in Article 3, paragraph 1, which applied to all provisions of the Protocol.

246. The Government member of Algeria supported the original text of paragraph 2 as it provided flexibility in situations where there were no representative organizations.

247. The Government member of Cameroon shared this opinion.

248. The Government member of Lebanon proposed a subamendment to insert the word “concerned” after the word “workers”. This was seconded by the Government member of Australia.

249. In response to a question by the Workers’ Vice-Chairperson, the Government member of Lebanon replied that apart from the insertion of the word “concerned”, no further change was being proposed.

250. The Government member of Australia withdrew her support for the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Lebanon, as it had been her understanding that a full stop would have followed the words “most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned”.

251. The Chairperson ruled that since the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Lebanon had not been seconded, it would not be discussed.

252. The Government member of Malaysia appreciated the Employers’ members’ call for flexibility, but paragraph 2 already contained the necessary flexibility and should be retained as it stood. It would enable government agencies to consult with the most representative organizations of workers or directly with their representatives. He called for sensitivity to differences in national circumstances. In the public service the government was the only employer. In Malaysia the most representative organizations of public service workers were clearly identifiable. The text should be left unchanged.

253. The Workers’ Vice-Chairperson considered that to add the words “in accordance with national laws and practice” would enable governments to negate the consultation requirements by arguing that national practice was not to consult. The subamendment proposed by the Workers’ members sought to remedy that problem, to ensure that consultation always took place. They could however accept the addition of the word “concerned”, so that the proposed subamendment to paragraph 2 would read as follows: “Before a Member avails itself of the possibility afforded in paragraph 1, it shall consult with the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned.”

254. The Employers’ Vice-Chairperson said that the amendment was a positive contribution to flexibility and recognized reality. They still wished to delete the words “in the absence of such organizations”. As to its second part, they had no wish to nullify the Protocol. However, it might be that, as a Government member had suggested, the matter was already adequately covered in Article 3. The first part of their amendment gave governments the choice of whom to consult. He wished to maintain this first part but, if allowed, to withdraw the second.

255. The Workers’ Vice-Chairperson observed that the Employers’ members’ suggestion to delete only the words “in the absence of such organizations”, had not addressed the ambiguity created by the word “or”. It would enable governments to choose either the most representative organizations or any other organization which they might happen to prefer.

256. The Government member of Cyprus proposed a subamendment to insert the words “and the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned", in the second line, between the words "workers" and "or". It was not seconded.

257. The Government member of the Russian Federation supported the Employers' members' position to delete the words "in the absence of such organizations", but suggested taking account of the Workers' members' concern by replacing the word "or" by the word "and".

258. The Chairperson proceeded to call for a vote on the Workers' members' subamendment. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson objected that he had submitted a subamendment. The representative of the Secretary-General, when asked, indicated that the Employers' members' action should be considered as a withdrawal of part of the amendment, rather than a subamendment.

259. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson commented that if the Workers' members were to lose a vote on this issue, they would support the Office text of paragraph 2.

260. The Chairperson then proceeded to take a vote on the subamendment. The results of the vote were as follows: 26,789 in favour; 28,122 against; with 3,612 abstentions. The subamendment was not adopted.

261. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson withdrew the second part of the amendment under review. This left only the first part, viz. to delete the words "in the absence of such organizations".

262. The Chairperson called for a vote, which produced the following results: 24,080 in favour; 29,197 against; and 7,826 abstentions. The amendment was therefore not adopted. With respect to an amendment proposed by the Government member of Cyprus, the Chairperson was of the opinion that its substance had already been discussed.

263. The Government member of Cyprus argued that it was still before the Committee. When a similar amendment had been discussed previously, it had been on the condition that the rest of the paragraph be deleted. He would, therefore, wish this amendment, seconded by the Government member of the United States, to be discussed.

264. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson, on a point of order, asserted that these same provisions had already been voted on, and that it would be inappropriate to continue the discussion.

265. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson agreed.

266. The Chairperson ruled that the amendment submitted by the Government member of Cyprus need not be discussed and declared Article 2, paragraph 2, adopted.

267. The Government member of Egypt submitted an amendment to delete paragraph 3 of Article 2. It was seconded by the Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic, who added a subamendment. The Chairperson reminded the Committee that amendments could not be subamended during seconding.

268. The Government member of Egypt presented the amendment, which aimed at providing greater flexibility in the Protocol. She said it would provide for alternative solutions and allow countries to describe their special difficulties and the special machinery that applied to these exclusions. She also wished to propose a subamendment.

269. The Chairperson ruled that it was unacceptable to change an amendment when presenting it. The Government member of Egypt accepted that the amendment be discussed as submitted.

270. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson declared that an amendment to delete a whole paragraph was rather radical. The Office text was important in the context of the ILO Constitution, the text of the Convention and that of the Proposed Protocol. The exclusions in Article 2, paragraph 1, were qualified. A member State that made such exclusions had to give reasons for doing so. The words "to the extent possible", furthermore, did not constitute an obligation. But in order to keep the text consistent, paragraph 3 was relevant. The Employers' members, therefore, did not support the amendment.

271. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson said that she supported the position of the Employers' members and therefore not the amendment. Paragraph 3 went to the heart of the issue, namely the supervisory mechanisms of the ILO. It was appropriate and essential, and should therefore remain in the text.

272. The Government member of France declared that he did not support the amendment because it would destroy the balance in Article 2, which opened the possibility to member States of setting up alternative inspection systems for the categories of workplaces excluded from the extension of Convention No. 81. Nevertheless, these sectors should not be left without any control system as regards occupational safety and health. He added that, contrary to what the author of the amendment appeared to think, the content of paragraph 3 was not excessive. It did not impose obligations that could not be readily met.

273. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic said that his support for the amendment had been based on the understanding that it would only apply to the second half of paragraph 3, which could be deleted since the reference to special arrangements for national (federal) government administrative services was contained in Article 4.

274. A subamendment was proposed by the Government member of Lebanon. In response, the Chairperson declared that it was not possible to subamend an amendment which sought to delete a whole paragraph.

275. The Government member of Lebanon withdrew the subamendment, noting that the interpretation which had been put forward by other members would not place governments under a commitment to provide alternative inspection systems for areas not already covered.

276. The Government member of the Netherlands supported the position of the Workers' and Employers' members. The mechanisms in Article 2, paragraph 3, were important and should not be paralysed. The Government member of the United Kingdom also added his support for the position of the Workers' and the Employers' members.

277. The Government member of Cyprus emphasized that the text should remain as it stood because it would oblige member States having excluded certain categories of workplaces to introduce alternative inspection arrangements. Furthermore, the Office text offered the flexibility that so many members had asked for.

278. The Government member of Sudan added that the Article lent credibility to the process of extending labour inspection to the NCS sector while providing flexibility through the reporting process. It did not prescribe undue burdens for governments.

279. In view of the fact that the Workers' and Employers' members, as well as several Government members, had agreed on the issue, the Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson wondered whether the Government member of Egypt would not wish to withdraw her amendment.

280. The Government member of Egypt withdrew the amendment.

281. The Committee turned to the discussion of an amendment submitted by the Government member of Lebanon which was, however, not seconded. The Government member of Lebanon withdrew the amendment but stated that governments should not be expected to make alternative inspection arrangements.

282. The Chairperson thereupon declared Article 2, paragraph 3, adopted. She then moved on to a discussion of an amendment to paragraph 4.

283. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson presented an amendment proposing the insertion of the words "in accordance with the provisions of this Article" at the end of the paragraph and said that it would contribute to clarification.

284. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson endorsed the position of the Employers' members.

285. The Government member of Australia also supported the amendment.

286. The Chairperson declared the amendment adopted, and Article 2 was adopted as amended.

Article 3

287. Three amendments were proposed by the Workers' members, the Employers' members, and the Government member of Cyprus, respectively. All three amendments related to matters that had already been discussed and voted upon under Article 2. The amendments were accordingly withdrawn and Article 3 was adopted unanimously.

Article 4

288. The Government member of Lebanon proposed an amendment to delete Article 4. This was not seconded.

289. The Government member of the Netherlands proposed an amendment to paragraph 1, seconded by the Government member of the United Kingdom, as follows: "In the first line, before the word 'inspection', insert the words 'equally effective', and in the third and fourth lines, replace the words 'so as to limit the powers of labour inspectors' by the words 'as far as these are required for the adequate functioning of such services or the security of the State'".

290. The Government member of France, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Belgium and Italy, supported the amendment.

291. The Government member of the Netherlands explained that article 4 of the Protocol referred to workplace inspection systems other than labour inspection. Article 12 of Convention No. 81, after which it had been modelled, however, referred to the powers of labour inspectors. The amendment sought to accommodate situations in which other bodies would be empowered to carry out inspection. Such special arrangements should have to be well justified and restricted to special circumstances. He had therefore proposed that the only acceptable justifications in the instrument would be to protect the adequate functioning of the services concerned and the security of the State.

292. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson confirmed that the Workers' members understood the principles outlined by the Government member of the Netherlands. However, she wished to raise several concerns. First, the Workers' members were not clear about the term "equally effective". Second, she noted that the amendment had been phrased in quite general terms and was thus open to misunderstanding. Third, she doubted whether it was consistent with the proposed wording of the first part of Article 4, paragraph 1. In that provision, as originally proposed, the reference to public security services had been linked to Article 12 of Convention No. 81, thus referring to labour inspectors. She suggested that the Committee seek clearer, more effective wording.

293. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that the Employers' members had studied the amendment. It raised certain doubts. He asked the secretariat to clarify whether the term "a Member" meant any Member having ratified the Protocol and/or Convention No. 81, or any Member of the ILO.

294. The representative of the Secretary-General responded that "a Member" referred to a member State which was subject to the obligations of the Protocol which it had ratified. He suggested that it would be redundant to add anything to that term.

295. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson noted this explanation but replied that other international standards used the phrase "a Member which has ratified ...". Therefore, the text under discussion should say: "a Member which has made a declaration according to Article 2 of the Protocol". This could not be considered redundant.

296. The Government member of the United Kingdom said that the amendment's intention was to provide a standard by which the special arrangements would be judged. He assured the Workers' members that it would not dilute paragraph 1, but would strengthen it. The reference to "equally effective" was an echo of the Preamble. With regard to avoiding some of the technical wording difficulties raised by the Workers' members he suggested that the reference to Article 12 of Convention No. 81 might be removed.

297. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson replied that considering the interpretation given of the words "equally effective", the Workers' members would accept that part of the amendment. Problems still persisted with the second part. She regretted that notions of state security had been raised at an inopportune moment in the discussions. She still preferred the reference to Article 12 of Convention No. 81, but expressed a willingness to consider the views of other Government members.

298. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that he did not consider the term "equally effective" to be pertinent. Paragraph 1 of Article 4 referred to labour inspection, not to any other inspection system. Labour inspection, albeit with the limitations listed; was understood to be effective. Therefore these words were unnecessary and could create ambiguity. In the Preamble they referred to systems other than, and substituting for, labour inspection. Concerning the second part of the amendment, the proposed insertion would also tend to create distortions and ambiguities. It was necessary to have congruence in the text. He asked the author of the amendment for clarification.

299. The Government member of the Netherlands indicated that in his country, labour inspectors coordinated their inspection responsibilities with other inspections, e.g. traffic inspectors controlling hours of work, etc., through agency agreements to ensure that the latter did inspections according to the standards of the labour inspectorate. But since it appeared that the flexibility proposed in his amendment was not considered necessary, and that other proposed amendments could convey the parts of its content of concern to him, he would withdraw it.

300. The Chairperson proceeded to the consideration of an amendment proposed by the Workers' members.

301. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson read the text of the amendment as follows: "In the second line, delete the words 'national (federal) government administrative services'; in the third line, delete the words 'and other public security services and of the prison services'; and in the third line replace the word 'limit' by the word 'regulate'." She pointed out that while the amendment came in three parts, its substance concerned the proposed deletions.

302. With regard to the first part of the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson sought clarification as to whether it referred to a Member which had ratified the Protocol, or only to a Member which had made a declaration in accordance with Article 2. He also noted that Article 4 contained restrictions, but not so as to impede effective inspection. He wondered why it was thought necessary to limit the possibility of undertaking inspections in public administration in general, if in fact only specific services were to be excluded. Furthermore, national administration should be dealt with on the same basis as the armed forces and prison services, subject to inspection but with restrictions. Finally, the deletion of the reference to other security services and prisons from this paragraph was not pertinent, because again they would be subject to inspection, but under restriction. In sum, the Employers' members rejected the amendment.

303. The Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson apologized for failing to comment earlier on the Employers' members' concern regarding the ambiguity surrounding the meaning of "a Member" in Article 4. She requested that the Drafting Committee deal with the issue.

304. The Government member of France, speaking also on behalf of the following Member States of the European Union: Belgium, Finland, Germany, Greece, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, and the United Kingdom, supported the last part of the amendment, to replace the word "limit" by "regulate".

305. As concerned the rest of the amendment, the Government member of France, speaking on behalf of France, wished to reject it. Article 2, as adopted, did not encompass all administrations, whether central, regional or local. It was all the more necessary for them to be covered by Article 4. Furthermore, he was not in favour of the deletion of the words "public security services" and "prison services".

306. The Government member of the Russian Federation agreed with the Government member of France to replace the word "limit" by the word "regulate" in the third line. This change could permit States to improve efficiency through the use of administrative levers by allowing the possibility of increasing the inspectorates' areas of authority. However, he could not support the first and second parts of the amendment. He agreed with the Employers' members that the paragraph needed targeting. He further requested that the Drafting Committee pay special attention to the translation of the subparagraph limiting entry to inspectors having appropriate security clearance. As to subparagraph (c), he wondered if this would include all manner of documents. He noted that subparagraph (d) covered a different matter with its reference to confidentiality. In the opinion of his Government, the restriction in this clause should be extended to non-confidential documents.

307. The representative of the Secretary-General drew attention to the Final Provisions in Part III of the Proposed Protocol which would be for discussion once the substantive Articles had been disposed of. Since these provisions were part of the text under consideration, they were, strictly speaking, open to amendment. However, the possibilities for amending these provisions were very limited since they had been drafted strictly in accordance with the Final Articles Revision Convention, 1946 (No. 80), the Final Articles Revision Convention, 1961 (No. 116), the ILO Constitution and the obligations of the ILO under the UN Charter. Any proposal to amend them would, therefore, have to be submitted to the Legal Adviser of the Conference for an opinion. Should there be anything further to amend or add to the Final Provisions, this could be dealt with by the Drafting Committee working with the Legal Adviser.

308. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson then proposed a change in wording to align the text under review with Article 2 as amended, by changing "national (federal) government administrative services" to "essential national (federal) government administration". The rest of paragraph 1 could stay the same, except for the word "limit" which should be replaced by "regulate". This appeared already to have been accepted.

309. The Government member of the United States agreed to subamend the Workers' members' amendment using the formulation of the Workers' Vice-Chairperson.

310. The Government member of the Netherlands seconded it.

311. The Government member of Sweden supported it.

312. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that he also accepted the subamendment.

313. The Chairperson declared the amendment to paragraph 1 adopted as subamended.

314. The Government member of the Netherlands then proposed an amendment to delete subparagraph (c) of paragraph 1. In the context of health and safety at the workplace, certain important documents were not for publication but fell under confidentiality arrangements of the labour inspectorate. He cited as examples enterprise policy on health and safety, annual reports on the execution of safety plans, risk evaluations, noise abatement plans, the inventory of dangerous substances at the workplace, etc. He argued that there was no reason why government services should not be obliged to produce such documents, as similar confidentiality arrangements existed in many countries.

315. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson seconded the amendment. Subparagraph (d) of paragraph 1 made subparagraph (c) redundant. The question of the retention of confidential documents on the premises was important. Article 12, paragraph 1, subparagraph (c), clause (ii) of Convention No. 81, requiring "the production of any books, registers or other documents, the keeping of which is prescribed by national laws or regulations relating to conditions of work, in order to see that they are in conformity with the legal provisions", was pertinent to this arrangement. It was clear that the documents in question would relate to conditions of work and thus did not call for restriction.

316. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the Workers' members had submitted an amendment to insert the term "confidential" into subparagraph (c), but were now seconding a proposal for the total deletion of that subparagraph. The Employers' members supported the retention of subparagraph (c) unamended, since it was simply a restriction or limitation which was appropriate to the special conditions of particular services. It was not a ban on the production of documents, but a provision which was convenient and logical and one which should be retained.

317. The Government member of the United Kingdom explained that he could not support the amendment of the Government member of the Netherlands, because the term "document" could be construed to have a wider meaning than the documents referred to in Article 12 of Convention No. 81. If that were the case, then there should be a restriction.

318. The Government member of France declared his opposition to the amendment. Subparagraph (c) provided flexibility, as it authorized governments to design more flexible modalities for the supervision of working conditions. He would prefer to see the restriction limited to confidential documents rather than to retain the original text or to delete the subparagraph altogether.

319. The Government member of the Republic of Korea supported the Employers' members' opinion that paragraph (c) of Article 4 was necessary.

320. The Government member of Lebanon opposed the amendment. Armed services, police and other public security services had their own regulations and were workplaces of a particular type subject to security considerations.

321. The Government member of Egypt endorsed what had been said by the Government member of Lebanon since the same situation prevailed in Egypt. Paragraph 1 should be implemented in accordance with national laws or regulations and should not be altered or deleted.

322. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson made a suggestion regarding the meaning of subparagraph (c). At the beginning of the paragraph there was reference to Article 12, paragraph 1, subparagraph (c) clause (ii), of Convention No. 81, which defined "documents" as "documents, the keeping of which is prescribed by national laws or regulations relating to conditions of work ..." In this context, the amendment to delete the whole subparagraph was better than the Workers' members' partial amendment to insert the word "confidential".

323. The Government member of Australia supported the amendment for the reasons given by the Workers' Vice-Chairperson.

324. The Chairperson then called for a vote. The results of the vote were: 110,208 for the amendment; 118,244 against; and 11,480 abstentions. The Chairperson declared that the amendment had not been adopted.

325. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson then introduced an amendment to delete subparagraph (b) of Article 4, paragraph 1, and in subparagraph (c) of the same paragraph to insert the word "confidential" after the word "produce". The first proposal stemmed from the fact that Article 12, paragraph 1, subparagraph (a), of Convention No. 81 provided for inspectors to be empowered to "enter freely and without previous notice ... any workplace liable to inspection" which was an important principle. Once it were accepted that this could be regulated or subject to limitations, it could have dire consequences for other sectors also. The Workers' members could therefore not accept a provision in the Protocol providing for inspection "only by appointment".

326. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson recalled that all the subparagraphs of Article 4, paragraph 1 involved restrictions. If it were possible to apply Article 12 of the Convention to the NCS sector without restriction, there would be no need for Article 4 of the Protocol. For inspection of essential or confidential areas it would be necessary to make an appointment. This did not reduce the impact of inspection, since there were many instances where inspection by appointment was more effective. The Employers' members did not therefore agree with the first part of the amendment. As to the second part, the Employers' members supported the insertion of the word "confidential" for the reasons already given.

327. The Government member of France, speaking also on behalf of the following Member States of the European Union: Belgium, Finland, Germany, Greece, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Sweden and the United Kingdom, said he was in favour of inserting the adjective "confidential" before the word "documents" in subparagraph (c) of paragraph 1. He was, however, not in favour of the deletion of subparagraph (b) concerning inspection only by appointment. He reminded the Committee that in paragraph 1 the word "limit" had been replaced by "regulate". In short, it was possible to allow greater flexibility by envisaging that inspection in these sectors would not be exclusively by appointment. For this reason, he would propose a subamendment to delete the word "only" from subparagraph (b) of paragraph 1.

328. The Government member of Austria indicated agreement with the views expressed by the Government member of France.

329. The Government member of Lebanon wished to retain subparagraphs (b) and (c) of paragraph 1 as originally drafted. She opposed the amendment.

330. The Government member of the Republic of Korea also opposed the amendment and stressed the importance of maintaining subparagraph (b).

331. The Government member of Egypt argued against the proposed amendment, since all the provisions of the Protocol would be implemented in accordance with national law or other means. There was no need to add more detail.

332. The Government member of Sudan pointed out that this amendment related to the title of Part II of the Protocol, namely "Special Arrangements". The issue was which special arrangements were appropriate in extending the scope of the Convention. The amendment, if adopted, would simply refer the matter back to Convention No. 81. He could not agree to the restriction in subparagraph (b), limiting inspection to being permitted only by appointment. He agreed, however, with the addition of the word "confidential" in subparagraph (c).

333. The Government member of Poland said that he could not support the Workers' members' amendment and would prefer to see the text as proposed by the Office retained.

334. The Government member of India also indicated that he did not support the amendment, arguing that paragraph 1, subparagraph (c), contained a sufficient degree of flexibility. He added that vital installations could not be opened for inspection without appropriate limitations. He considered that the proposal to add the word "confidential" to subparagraph (c) would only reopen a discussion that had already been closed.

335. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson said that the Workers' members would be amenable to retaining subparagraph (b) of paragraph 1, if the word "only" were deleted as already proposed.

336. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson wondered whether the subamendment proposed by the Government member of France to delete the word "only" was receivable.

337. The Chairperson decided that it could be accepted.

338. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson thought that the word "only" made the provision too rigid. In extreme situations, it could create problems. He was therefore content to accept the subamendment.

339. The Chairperson declared that general agreement had been reached, and paragraph 1 was adopted as amended.

340. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson then submitted an amendment to transfer subparagraph (a) of paragraph 2, to the end of paragraph 1, as a new subparagraph (e). He reasoned that the matter addressed in the subparagraph should more aptly be put in paragraph 1, since it related to the powers referred to in Article 12, paragraph 1, subparagraph (c), clause (iv), of Convention No. 81, and Article 4, paragraph 1, of the Protocol dealt with restricting the powers of labour inspectors under Article 12.

341. The Government member of France, speaking also on behalf of the following Member States of the European Union: Denmark, Finland, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Sweden and the United Kingdom, agreed that the proposed amendment was timely and reflected concern that the structure of the instrument should be clear and consistent. It was logical to link the subparagraph with the limitations in paragraph 1. He therefore supported it.

342. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson observed that paragraph 2 referred exclusively to the armed services, the police and other public security services so that if the subparagraph remained in Article 4, paragraph 2, it would not apply to inspection of essential national (federal) administrations or prisons. Since the intention was to extend rather than restrict the regulation of labour inspectors' powers, the Employers' members supported the amendment.

343. The Chairperson declared that since consensus reigned, the amendment was adopted, and Article 4, paragraph 1, was adopted as amended.

344. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson then submitted an amendment to Article 4, paragraph 2, to delete the words "and of other public security services" in the second and third lines; to replace the word "prohibition" by the word "restriction" in subparagraphs (b) and (c); to replace the word "tension" by the word "emergency" in subparagraph (d); and to delete subparagraph (e). He explained that the amendment sought to tighten the wording in the proposed text. He suggested that paragraph 2 should only refer to the armed services and the police, and hence the words "and of other public security services" should be omitted. He also considered that it was more appropriate to refer to a "restriction" rather than to a "prohibition" in the context of special arrangements contained in subparagraphs (b) and (c), since an outright prohibition was excessive. He suggested that it would be clearer to employ the term "periods of emergency" rather than the current reference to "declared periods of tension". The Workers' members failed to see any justification for retaining subparagraph (e), and he suggested that it simply be deleted.

345. The Government member of the United Kingdom expressed his opposition to the deletion of the words "and of other public security services". He considered that although the reference might be open to interpretation in some countries, in the United Kingdom it encompassed the intelligence and internal security services, both of which were subject to labour inspection, although necessarily restricted in some ways. He cautioned that since the matter was obviously a delicate one, it should be adequately regulated. He then endorsed the proposal to replace the word "prohibition" by the word "restriction", affirming that it was a broader, more sensible interpretation of the intent to cover sensitive actions rather than prohibit them altogether. As to the use of the word "emergency" over the word "tension", he expressed his preference for the text proposed by the Office because it encompassed situations in which an emergency might be envisaged but had not yet arisen, such as the threat of a prison riot. With respect to subparagraph (e) of paragraph 2, he submitted a subamendment that would insert the word "classified" before the word "explosives" to make clear that it applied only to transport of explosives for military purposes.

346. The Government member of France said he was also against deleting the words "and of other public security services". As to subparagraph (b), he was not opposed to replacing "prohibition" by "restriction". Concerning subparagraph (c), it was not conceivable to allow mere restriction. Prohibition should be retained. In the case of subparagraph (d), he preferred the Office term "tension" since the term "state of emergency", proposed by the Workers' members, was very restrictive and involved issues of constitutional law. Finally, he was opposed to deletion of subparagraph (e).

347. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson was opposed to deleting the reference to "other public security services", since they were treated in the same way as the police elsewhere in the Protocol; there was no reason to deal with them differently in paragraph 2. As to subparagraphs (b) and (c), the term “prohibition” might be too radical, but it did refer to very special circumstances such as manoeuvres, where it might be justified. He noted that in subparagraph (d), the Office had used the phrase “restriction or prohibition”, thus shading the meaning to create a well-balanced Article. The same words were appropriate to subparagraphs (b) and (c). In subparagraph (d), he favoured the original text, as “state of emergency” was a much more restrictive term requiring a formal declaration. Finally he was opposed to the deletion of subparagraph (e) considering that inspection should be restricted but not prohibited. In short, he did not agree with any part of the amendment.

348. The Government member of the Netherlands supported the amendment.

349. The Workers’ Vice-Chairperson indicated that he was ready to withdraw the part of the amendment which deleted the words “and of other public security services”. He proposed the following changes in the text: in subparagraph (b), replace the word “prohibition” by the word “restriction”; in subparagraph (c), before the word “prohibition”, add “restriction or”. In the light of the discussion on the term “tensions”, the text in subparagraph (d) should be left unchanged. The important thing was that periods of tension were declared. As to subparagraph (e), the subamendment presented by the Government member of the United Kingdom had merit. He wished to change it only slightly to read “limitations in respect of the transport of explosives and armaments for military purposes”, thus retaining its essence.

350. The Government member of the United Kingdom agreed with the Workers’ Vice-Chairperson on all the four proposals for changes in the wording of paragraph 2 now before the Committee.

351. The Employers’ Vice-Chairperson greatly appreciated the efforts of the Workers’ members to reach agreement. He reread the amendments now proposed, including the unchanged retention of subparagraph (d), and declared his acceptance of the subamendment of subparagraph (e). The Employers’ members were therefore in complete agreement with the changes summarized by the Workers’ Vice-Chairperson.

352. The Government member of Australia added her support to the changes proposed to the text of paragraph 2.

353. The Government member of the Republic of Korea also supported the changes proposed to the text of paragraph 2.

354. The Government member of Lebanon favoured maintaining the term “prohibition” in subparagraphs (b) and (c). She reasoned that in the case of military manoeuvres or exercises, or in the front line or during active service, it would be difficult to carry out an inspection. She would like to add the phrase “as the case may be” at the end of subparagraph (d). She also queried whether subparagraph (e) would apply to the transport of explosives and armaments, for instance for storage purposes, or only to transport for military purposes.

355. The Government member of France agreed with the changes proposed by the Workers’ Vice-Chairperson.

356. The Chairperson congratulated the Committee on reaching consensus on a difficult issue and declared paragraph 2 adopted as amended.

357. In light of the previous discussion, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment to replace "tension" by "emergency" in paragraph 3, so as to maintain harmony between the different passages of the text. He then presented a further amendment, namely to insert a new paragraph after paragraph 3 reading: "Before a Member avails itself of the possibilities afforded in paragraphs (1), (2) and (3), it shall consult with the most representative organizations of employers and workers." He explained that there was an omission in the Protocol in that it contained no proposed method as to how special arrangements should be arrived at. He would favour using the same wording as in Articles 2, paragraph 2, and 3, paragraph 2.

358. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson remarked that in Article 3, paragraph 2, the Committee had retained the words "or in the absence of such organizations, the representatives of employers and workers concerned". To maintain consistency the wording would have to be the same. In fact, however, the amendment was not necessary because Article 3, paragraph 2, already covered the matter since it applied to the whole Protocol. The amendment was redundant and therefore unacceptable to the Employers' members.

359. The Government member of Sudan agreed with the Workers' Vice-Chairperson in suggesting a supplement to Article 4 echoing Articles 2, paragraph 2, and 3, paragraph 2, which had already been adopted by the Committee, but also deemed valid the comments by the Employers' members that these earlier references were sufficient. Whilst he recognized that the Workers' members' amendment sought to ensure a harmonious Protocol, he offered an alternative subamendment to respond to the concerns of both Employers' and Workers' members, namely to insert the phrase "Taking into account the provisions in Article 3, paragraph 2," before the first word in Article 4, paragraph 1.

360. The Government member of Egypt considered the addition proposed by the Workers' members redundant, since the provision contained in Article 3, paragraph 2, covered the whole Protocol.

361. The Government member of France, speaking also on behalf of the following Member States of the European Union: Denmark, Finland, Germany, Greece, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Sweden and the United Kingdom, said he was in favour of the amendment which was timely and balanced the text.

362. The Government member of Panama agreed with the arguments of the Employers' members. The amendment was redundant.

363. The Government member of Australia supported the amendment for the sake of consistency.

364. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson sought clarification of the scope of this amendment. The consultation provided for in Article 2, paragraph 2, concerned members availing themselves of exclusions. The consultation provided for in Article 3, paragraph 2, was more general, concerning the means by which the whole Protocol was to be implemented. The amendment proposed consultation on restrictions and limitations. If it were accepted, governments would have to consult on each and every occasion of any inspection activity subject to such restrictions. There would have to be continued consultation, for instance, in respect of retention of documents, and this would result in paralysis. The Employers' members would not insist on their viewpoint, but would listen to the views of governments who would be responsible in the first place for the modalities of implementing Article 4.

365. The Government member of the United Kingdom failed to understand the position of the Employers' members. He did not agree that it would be difficult to consult workers' and employers' representatives about setting up special arrangements. He suggested that perhaps it would be better to replace the word "possibilities" in the amendment by the words "special arrangements".

366. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson agreed with the subamendment proposed by the Government member of the United Kingdom.

367. The Government member of Lebanon supported the subamendment as did the Government members of Sweden and the Netherlands.

368. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said the Employers' members would not press their view, since the Government members appeared to be content with the amendment as subamended.

369. The Chairperson announced consensus on the amendment as subamended, and Article 4 was adopted as amended.

Article 5

370. The Chairperson proceeded to an amendment to Article 5, proposed by the Government member of Lebanon.

371. The Government member of Lebanon wished to have the words "that fall within the competence of labour inspectors" inserted in the second line, after the words "fire brigades", and the words "as such" inserted after the words "rescue services". Certain fire brigades were outside the competence of the labour inspectorate in her country and should, therefore, be excluded from the scope of the Protocol. Other emergency and rescue services had already been discussed. They could also fall outside the competence of labour inspectors, so the phrase added by the amendment would serve to clarify this point.

372. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson had difficulty accepting the idea that certain fire brigades fell within the competence of labour inspectors while others did not. The addition suggested in the second part of the amendment would confuse rather than clarify the text, and he requested that the amendment be withdrawn.

373. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that the Employers' members could not support the amendment for the same reasons.

374. The Government member of Lebanon, noting the opinions expressed by the Workers' and the Employers' members, withdrew the amendment.

375. The Government member of Egypt presented an amendment, seconded by the Government member of Lebanon. In the fourth line, the word "concerned" should be inserted after "inspectorate" to allow governments to choose which inspection service should carry out the inspection.

376. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson said this was not necessary. When a government decided how it would apply the Protocol, it would also decide which inspection system would implement its provisions. He could not accept the amendment.

377. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson also said the amendment was not necessary, since the flexibility to operate according to national law and practice already existed in Article 3, paragraph 1. He could not, therefore, support the amendment.

378. The Government member of France, speaking also on behalf of the following Member States of the European Union: Denmark, Finland, Germany, Greece, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Sweden and the United Kingdom, declared that he was not in favour of the amendment, as it made the text more cumbersome.

379. The Government member of Egypt withdrew the amendment.

380. The Government member of the United Kingdom proposed an amendment, seconded by the Government member of Denmark, to insert the words "be able to" after "shall" in the fourth line of Article 5. He explained that Article 5 dealt with special arrangements similar to established practice which worked well in his country. The proposed amendment was a minor change to the wording which he believed went more to the spirit of this Protocol in being permissive rather than directive. This would allow the inspectorate to be able to review periodically or after an incident rather than directing it to do so, even though the direction given by the word "shall" was not very harsh because periodic review might be undertaken after extended periods of time, and there was no definition of "incident". Interpretation could therefore also be left to the discretion of the labour inspectorate.

381. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson hoped that the Committee was aware of the great difference between the text as it stood and as it would read if amended. No one questioned the notion that there should be periodic reviews of these operations, and that after any significant incident there should also be a review. What this amendment did, however, was to seriously weaken the text. The Article asked for a commitment which was logical in the light of its first sentence. The fact that restrictions were permitted indicated an understanding of the situations in which inspections could not be carried out. He was not convinced that the provision in the original text would constitute an undue burden on any service, and therefore it should not be changed.

382. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson agreed with the Workers' members on this point. The Article as drafted was wholly consistent. A Member might make special arrangements and if it did, then it should be subject to the obligation to carry out periodic reviews.

383. The Government member of the United Kingdom withdrew his amendment. The Chairperson declared Article 5 adopted.

384. The Committee began its discussion of Article 6 with an amendment to replace the words "formulating" by "advising on", proposed by the Government member of the United Kingdom, seconded by the Government member of France, speaking also on behalf of the following Member States of the European Union: Belgium, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal and Sweden.

385. The Government member of the United Kingdom introduced the amendment saying that while he supported the overall thrust of the Article, training for hazardous occupations, such as police work or fire fighting, required special consideration, and it was appropriate that the labour inspectorate played a part in this. The amendment dealt with an important point of principle: it was the employers' responsibility to devise adequate measures to control risks during training, or indeed any other risks. He was concerned that the word "formulating" came too close to this primary duty of employers. The amendment thus sought to preserve the proper distance between the employer and the labour inspectorate.

386. The Government member of France, speaking also on behalf of the Governments of the following Member States of the European Union: Belgium, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal and Sweden, said that the amendment's aim was to clarify the role of the labour inspectorate with regard to training for hazardous work that might expose workers to risk. This role was essentially to formulate opinions and give advice, but not to elaborate protection measures as indicated in the Office text. "Advising on", as mentioned in the amendment was more opportune than "formulate", since it was not in the competence of the labour inspectorate to be associated with setting standards.

387. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson did not share the concern of the Government members. The text should be understood to read that the inspectorate should be able to participate in the formulation of effective measures to minimize risk as this was both advisable and useful. The experience and knowledge of labour inspectors was important and beneficial for that process. For purposes of clarification, he suggested adding the words "advising on" between "formulating" and "monitoring".

388. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that Article 6 provided labour inspection with an exceptional possibility, which Article 12 of Convention No. 81 did not afford. The general principle in the Convention was that labour inspectors were not permitted to participate in the preparation of standards whose observance they subsequently had to monitor. Article 6 dealt with the exceptional situation of reducing risks during training. The amendment was therefore relevant, and the Employers' members were in favour of it. The term "participate" did not mean involvement in the actual design of what had subsequently to be supervised. It did, however, allow labour inspectors to give advice on implementation.

389. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson, noting that while there was no problem with "monitoring", doubts had been expressed as to the term "formulating", suggested the following alternative: "The labour inspectorate shall be able to advise on the formulation and participate in the monitoring of effective measures ..."

390. The Government member of the Republic of Korea supported the Workers' members' proposed subamendment.

391. The Government member of the United States disagreed, stating that it was absolutely critical for the labour inspectorate to maintain a distance from the formulation of effective measures with regard to enterprises. It was generally important to have impartiality in the inspection system. This was not an Article which applied to a specific area, but rather to all areas of hazardous work. Thus, in the United States several different inspection administrations could be affected. In a broad provision like this, it was important that labour inspectors be involved in advising and monitoring, but not in the formulation of measures to minimize risks during training.

392. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic voiced his concern regarding discrepancies in the Arabic text, which he requested the Office to re-examine. Further, he agreed with the Workers' members' position regarding the use of the word "shall" in the first line of the Article.

393. The Government member of Egypt supported the subamendment presented by the Workers' members. She also reiterated the observation of the Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic and stressed that the Arab version of the text should be corrected.

394. The Government member of Australia also supported the subamendment.

395. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that the Workers' members' subamendment clarified and specified the amendment under discussion. Therefore, the Employers' members agreed with it.

396. The Government member of France, speaking also on behalf of the following Member States of the European Union: Belgium, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal and Sweden, supported the subamendment.

397. The Chairperson declared the amendment adopted as subamended.

398. An amendment was presented by the Government member of Lebanon to insert the words "that fall within the competence of labour inspectors" after the words "fire brigades" in the first line and "as such" after the words "rescue services" in the second line of the Article. This was not seconded. Another amendment, proposed by the Workers' members, was withdrawn.

399. The Chairperson, therefore, declared Article 6 adopted as amended.

Article 7

400. Article 7 was adopted without change.

Article 8

401. Article 8 was also adopted without change.

Article 9

402. At the opening of discussions on Article 9, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson raised a point of order. He wished to have the opinion of the Legal Adviser of the Conference regarding the legality of the two amendments to reduce the number of years after which member States could denounce the Protocol from ten to five. It was the understanding of the Workers' members that the Final Provisions were standard and technical, and were determined by considerations other than the substance of the Protocol, which was what the Committee had the mandate to deliberate. He wished to know whether amendments to the Final Provisions were receivable, and if it were normal to have amendments on these parts of Conventions, Protocols, or other instruments.

403. The representative of the Legal Adviser confirmed that the Final Articles were normally not placed before a Conference Committee; they followed standard final provisions and were dealt with by the Drafting Committee. The reason for this procedure was to permit the Committee to concentrate on questions of substance. In this case, the Final Articles were included in the report to emphasize that the Protocol could be ratified and denounced separately from the Convention. The Final Articles would still have to be examined by the Drafting Committee.

404. She pointed out that the origins of Standard Final Articles lay in decisions of the Conference and in two ILO Conventions on Standard Final Provisions, which were in force for many member States. On the precise question of the interval for denunciation, the Conference decided in 1928 on standard language and noted that the normal interval was ten years, but it could be varied by the Conference for special reasons related to the particular subject-matter of the instrument under consideration. The Office had proposed an interval of ten years here because that was also the interval in Convention No. 81.

405. She stressed the need to avoid a situation of anarchy in regard to provisions in final articles and informed the Committee that the Governing Body of the ILO had set up a Working Group on the revision of international labour standards. One of the many issues it would examine was the interval for possible denunciation of Conventions. This question would be examined on a global basis by the Governing Body rather than in the context of a particular draft instrument. She noted that if the amendment had been properly submitted, it was receivable. The Conference had the power to decide upon an interval other than the normal ten-year period if there were special reasons related to the subject of the instrument under consideration.

406. Noting the explanation of the representative of the Legal Adviser, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson asked whether it was normal to deviate from the standard of ten years. He asked the Office to provide information on the last time such deviation had been made to Final Articles, how often this had occurred, and what were the parameters of such changes.

407. The representative of the Legal Adviser recalled that, in its early years, the Office did not specify any time limit for denunciation. A standard ten-year denunciation interval was introduced in 1928, when the Standard Final Provisions were adopted. She mentioned that certain Maritime Labour Standards contained periods for denunciation that were shorter than ten years. The most recent example of a standard with less than ten years was the Radiation Protection Convention, 1960 (No. 115). She cited the report of the 1960 Conference, which stated that since the evolution of the subject-matter dealt with in this Convention was difficult to predict, it might be appropriate to provide for periods of five years in the Standard Article concerning denunciation. This was clearly considered an exception.

408. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the Workers' members' had raised two questions. The first related to the receivability of amendments to the Final Provisions, and it was now clear that the amendments under discussion were receivable. The second referred to the frequency of similar cases concerning denunciation clauses. It was apparent from the answer of the Legal Adviser that there were no constitutional standards, no hard and fast rules. It could be done on a five-year basis. There had apparently been several such cases. The Conventions on Final Provisions contained no specific reference to the reasons. The ten-year clause was obviously not an immutable law. The issue was under review in the Governing Body, but this did not exclude a decision in this Committee. It did not affect the competence of this Committee or the Conference. The amendment should, therefore, be discussed.

409. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic emphasized that the Conference was a sovereign body, and any decision it took would be binding, unless later revised. The text of the Protocol was the responsibility of the Committee. The Drafting Committee had a different mandate. It would be up to the present Committee to decide what it deemed appropriate to put before the Conference.

410. The Government member of Lebanon considered that all texts were subject to amendment by the Committee, including the Final Articles. She referred to Convention No. 115, which defined the interval for denunciation as five years. She therefore supported the Employers' members' amendment.

411. The Government member of the Republic of Korea suggested that Article 9 pertained to general practices with regard to the ratification period, and only in exceptional cases should one deviate from such practices.

412. The Government member of Sudan considered that there was no legal obstacle to prevent the discussion, and he wished to proceed to debate its substance.

413. The Chairperson decided that the proposed amendment was receivable.

414. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson recalled that one of the main tasks of the Organization was to contribute to the development of international labour law through ILO standards. For many years now, however, the ILO had recorded fewer and fewer ratifications of instruments. This had preoccupied, in particular, the Governing Body which had embarked upon examination of the situation. One of the main reasons for non-ratification appeared to be that Conventions contained similar or identical provisions to those in Article 9. A ten-year denunciation period could be one of the main reasons why many governments abstained from ratification. Otherwise, it was difficult to understand why many governments approved new standards at the Conference, but did not ratify them. Governments which ratified Conventions with a ten-year time-frame for denunciation found they were not able to act when circumstances changed. The amendment therefore reflected progress and desire for change expressed by many ILO bodies. Finally, if governments did wish to denunciate, they would have to consult with the most representative organizations of employers and workers in line with Article 5, paragraph 1, subparagraph (e) of the Tripartite Consultation Convention, 1976 (No. 144). All these reasons were behind the amendment proposed, which was of paramount importance to the Organization.

415. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson responded that while it may be true that reforms start in small corners of the Organization and spread, chaos and anarchy could spread in the same way. The Committee had now been adequately informed of work going on elsewhere, particularly of the Employers' group's position on denunciation in the Governing Body. But these discussions were more appropriate in the plenary session of the Conference, and now they were carried out in the Legal Issues and Labour Standards Committee of the Governing Body. They wished to emphasize that whatever problems of ratification there were, they were not relevant to the extension of Convention No. 81 to the NCS sector. He recalled that this Convention had been ratified by 116 member States.

416. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson refuted the Employers' members' claim that the ten-year time-frame for denunciation was a serious discouragement to ratification. The Governing Body had not identified this as a major cause for the low number of ratifications. He pointed out that the rationale for the Employers' members' amendment did not lie in the Protocol but in the position of the Employers' group in the Governing Body on questions of ratification in general. They had not given any explanation why the time-frame should be five years for the instrument under review. He distinguished between the reasons in the Radiation Protection Convention, 1960 (No. 115), which dealt with a subject-matter that could change quickly within a short period of time, and the Protocol which, on the contrary, would possibly even require a longer period of time than ten years in which to work out issues of implementation.

417. Contrary to what the Employers' members had stated, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson noted that ten years was the general standard. He argued that it would be appropriate to allow the process of discussion in the Governing Body to take the time fully to address these delicate issues, and that it would be counterproductive to start changing the denunciation time-frame before that process had been completed. In fact, it would be difficult to discuss these issues seriously in the Governing Body if they were prejudiced by this Committee. Finally, he suggested that Government members be given time to consult the available documentation and their respective governments' official position in the Governing Body.

418. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic did not agree with the Employers' members' suggestion that the low number of ratifications was due to the ten-year interval for denunciation. In the principles of Islamic jurisprudence, custom was considered equivalent to jurisdiction. The majority of Conventions stipulated an interval for denunciation of ten years. Therefore, custom dictated that this norm should be respected, and he opposed the amendment.

419. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that he was convinced that the Government members of the Committee were very experienced and well informed on the issues. An identical amendment had been submitted by a Government member. In addition, Governing Body working documents were not binding on the Committee.

420. The Government member of Denmark stated that since the proposed amendment addressed an issue that was already being discussed in another ILO body, he could not support it. He suggested that, if the Committee wished to signal to the Governing Body its concerns about denunciation intervals it could include a statement to that effect in the report.

421. The Government member of Sudan said that implementing the provisions of the Protocol would require a long-term approach. He considered the ten-year denunciation period to be reasonable and, since the proposed period in the Office text conformed with that specified in Convention No. 81, he was unable to accept the amendment.

422. The Government member of Australia did not support the amendment because she did not consider the Committee to be the right forum to debate a matter that would have significant ramifications beyond its mandate. It should be referred to the appropriate ILO body. There were no special circumstances relating to the Protocol which warranted a reduction of the time for denunciation from ten to five years. Rather, the purpose of the Protocol was to achieve equity between industrial, commercial and NCS sectors regarding labour inspection, and this would need time. She therefore urged the Employers' members to withdraw their amendment.

423. The Government member of France declared that he was in favour of the amendment, which was identical to the one submitted by the Government member of the United Kingdom. Philosophically speaking this was also, possibly, a way of providing some flexibility which might assist ratification of the Protocol, even if the positive — and negative — effects of ratification were not sure. The debate was about a Protocol with unique characteristics as it affected the State as employer, and this could have a significant bearing on the time-frame. He added that the length of the denunciation period was also important in so far as States inclined to ratify the Protocol would need to establish effective inspection systems and therefore it was important to assess progress after five years.

424. The Government member of the Republic of Korea did not support the amendment as he considered it to be contrary to basic ILO principles.

425. The Government member of Sweden felt that this was a matter that should more appropriately be discussed in the Governing Body. Therefore, she did not support the amendment. For the same reasons, the Government member of Finland did not support the amendment.

426. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the Committee's report would clearly reflect all the positions taken during its sittings. A summary of Government members' views was already available in a Governing Body document of November 1994. Problems of ratification to be studied included the analysis of trends, causes of non-ratification, a review of submission periods, the consideration of entry into force, and denunciation periods. The Proposed Protocol should, accordingly, be aligned with Convention No. 81 and the amendment withdrawn.

427. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that an attempt had been made to cast doubt on fundamental aspects of the discussion, causing some Government members to change their position. The Governing Body would further discuss this issue among others, but in a much wider context. The tendency of the Governing Body was neither to increase nor maintain the ten-year period for denunciation, but rather reduce it. He referred to document GB.262/LILS/3 of April 1995 which, on page 13 (Spanish version), suggested an interim solution, namely a five-year period for most new Conventions, and ten years for new Conventions which were considered fundamental. The Protocol was an autonomous text, and not a document tied to the ratification or denunciation of Convention No. 81. A decision in this Committee would be a signal that the Organization was indeed changing. Therefore, the Employers' members continued to insist on the amendment.

428. The Government member of Belgium supported the amendment for the same reasons as those invoked by the Government member of France.

429. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson also referred to document GB.262/LILS/3, and quoted the following passage from page 12 (paragraph 30):

In the light of these precedents, the Governing Body might perhaps like to re-examine the desirable duration of the third period; an intermediate solution might be to bring it back to 5 years for most Conventions whilst retaining a period of 10 years for new Conventions considered to be basic or priority instruments.

430. He argued that the logical consequence of this reasoning was for a new instrument such as the Protocol to have a ten-year denunciation period. However, he reiterated that it would be unwise to pre-empt the discussions under way in the Governing Body. Moreover, the Proposed Protocol had to be seen in connection with Convention No. 81, since only countries which had ratified this Convention could ratify the Protocol. If there had been reasons to deviate from the normal time-frame, they would have been signalled in the Office questionnaire or in Report VI(2). He concluded that it was not appropriate to adopt the amendment.

431. The Government member of Portugal said that his Government supported the amendment for the same reasons as those of the Employers' members and the Government member of France.

432. The Government member of Lebanon said that the validity of an instrument could only be ascertained after it had been ratified. This Protocol had special characteristics that would justify a government's wish to reconsider its ratification in the light of unforeseeable circumstances. Because of the wide range of categories included in its scope, governments might be confronted with unexpected difficulties. A government might be more inclined to "test" a new instrument if its denunciation period were shorter. She supported the amendment.

433. The Government member of Egypt also supported the amendment. She insisted that it was the absolute right of any government to denounce the Protocol after five years. The decreased denunciation interval would inject more flexibility into the text, thereby encouraging a greater number of member States to ratify it.

434. With reference to the views expressed by the Government member of Lebanon, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson explained that Article 2, paragraph 4, already provided considerable flexibility, permitting member States to submit a declaration explaining certain authorized exclusions, and subsequently to modify or cancel that declaration at any time in the light of the national context. He suggested that the concerns raised by the Government member of Lebanon were not usually solved through the denunciation procedure.

435. The Government member of Ireland stated that he did not believe the Committee was the appropriate forum to discuss changes to the time-frame for denunciation. As a result, he indicated that his Government did not support the amendment.

436. The Government member of the United Kingdom reminded the Committee that he had submitted a similar amendment and therefore supported this one.

437. The Government member of Cyprus stated that he did not support the amendment since the issues it raised would be discussed in the Governing Body.

438. Noting the absence of a consensus, the Chairperson proceeded to a vote. The results were as follows: 9,801 in favour; 10,098 against; and 693 abstentions. The amendment was not adopted.

439. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that in order to deal seriously with this delicate subject, and in view of the close result of the first vote, the Employers' members called for a roll-call vote.

440. A roll-call vote was taken. The results were as follows: 9,900 in favour; 10,395 against; and 891 abstentions.²

441. The amendment was not adopted. Consequently, an identical amendment submitted by the Government member of the United Kingdom was not discussed.

442. Articles 7, 8, 9 and 10 were adopted without change.

443. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson then indicated that two Employers' members wished to make statements.

444. The Employers' member of the United States remarked that the ILO was the world authority on the adoption of labour standards. He suggested that the ILO itself should be held to the same standards internally that it advocated to its member States. He urged that the Office voluntarily undergo inspection by the Swiss Labour Inspectorate, stating that ILO employees should not be denied the protection of labour inspection just because they worked for an international organization.

445. The Employers' member of the United Kingdom said that the principle of labour inspection lay at the heart of the ILO since its foundation. A large number of its instruments covered different sectors of labour inspection activities, though one covered all. Therefore, the result had been the development of different standards. That, in turn, had necessarily resulted in a degree of uncertainty. But the core of Convention No. 81 was as sound as ever and had stood the test of time. There was, however, some uncertainty about overlaps. At this very Conference, two other Committees, on Mines and on Home Work, were also dealing with issues directly related to labour inspection. These questions

² The Employers' members voted unanimously for the amendment;

The Workers' members voted unanimously against the amendment;

The Government members of the following States voted in favour of the amendment: Belgium, China, Colombia, Côte d'Ivoire, Egypt, France, India, Indonesia, Japan, Lebanon, Lithuania, Panama, Portugal, Spain, the United Kingdom, the United States;

The Government members of the following States voted against the amendment: Australia, Brazil, Chile, Cyprus, Denmark, Finland, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, the Republic of Korea, the Netherlands, Nigeria, Norway, San Marino, Slovakia, Sudan, Sweden, Switzerland, the Syrian Arab Republic, Turkey, Uruguay; needed clarification, and the Committee should ask the Office to undertake this task. Fifty years after the adoption of the universal instrument, Convention No. 81, the ILO should again consider the need for a consolidating instrument.

446. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson agreed with the concern over working conditions of ILO staff which was a matter for discussion by the Governing Body. He supported all initiatives aimed at improving the working conditions in the Office. As to the second statement, follow-up to the work of the Conference would be discussed by the Governing Body, which in particular, would decide what further standard-setting or review measures might be necessary.

447. The Chairperson then declared the Protocol adopted.

Adoption of the report and draft Protocol

448. At its 14th sitting, the Committee met to examine its report, as presented by the Reporter. The Committee adopted the report unanimously, subject to a few changes requested by various members.

449. The Committee then adopted the draft Protocol that had been submitted by the Drafting Committee, Article by Article, and in its entirety, subject to minor changes proposed to improve the alignment of the French and Spanish texts with the English version.

450. Before doing so, the Committee was informed by the Reporter that, in accordance with its mandate, the Drafting Committee, assisted by representatives of the Legal Adviser of the Conference, had made a number of drafting changes to the proposed Protocol. Most of these were either linguistic or stylistic and were aimed at ensuring that the two authentic texts were in concordance, without modification of the substance or the intent of the draft Articles of the text. One addition had been made to the Final Provisions, concerning the entry into force of the proposed Protocol. The Drafting Committee had decided unanimously that the Final Provisions should follow the normal, standard ILO practice and therefore recommended the revised draft text for adoption by the Committee.

451. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson commended the Reporter, the Drafting Committee and the secretariat for a very sound and well-edited document, which faithfully reflected the discussions. As to the amendments of the draft text, he felt that in some cases they went beyond mere linguistic issues. The Employers' members accepted them but wished to invite the Legal Adviser of the Office in future to ensure that subsequent changes in a Drafting Committee be limited to the minimum.

452. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson shared the views of the Employers. A different procedure should be used in particular as regarded the drafting of Final Provisions. He also expressed satisfaction with the results of the Committee's work. The report was factually correct and a good piece of work.

453. After the adoption of the text of the proposed Protocol, the Government member of Switzerland stated that generally speaking, the draft Protocol covered areas that did not raise the need for legislation in Switzerland either at the federal or regional (cantonal) level. In addition, the Protocol, and in particular Article

2, paragraph 2, recommended consultation procedures that went beyond those which were possible under Swiss legislation and practice. In conclusion, since the Swiss governmental authorities agreed that a Protocol should be drafted, they did not plan to oppose the text. For this reason, the Government of Switzerland would abstain when a vote on the adoption of the Protocol was held.

454. The Government member of Lebanon wished to be on record that adoption of the draft Protocol did not imply consensus as to its content. She had raised objections and expressed reservations as to a number of issues and hoped they would be noted in the report.

455. The Government member of Panama explained why he would abstain in the final vote. First, his Government had indicated the need for a Recommendation. Second, the Committee had decided to adopt a Protocol, Third his Government recognized the efforts of the Committee to make the Protocol flexible. Finally the denunciation periods were too rigid. In his view, it would be necessary to review the whole of Convention No. 81.

456. The Government member of Australia thanked the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairpersons for adding so much clarity to the debates. She also wished to thank the Chairperson and the Drafting Committee for significant improvements of the proposed text. She announced her intention to vote for the draft Protocol.

457. In his final remarks on the work of the Committee, the Employers Vice-Chairperson thanked the Chairperson for her excellent way of dealing with her task. He also thanked the Workers' Vice-Chairperson for the spirit of consensus and the openness in which he, and also the Workers' deputy Vice-Chairperson, had intervened. He congratulated the Government delegates for their valuable contributions. Finally, he reiterated his thanks to the secretariat for a job well done, and to all members of the Employers' group.

458. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson also wished to thank the Chairperson, and hoped she shared a feeling of having done some very useful work. He extended his thanks also to the Reporter. He congratulated the Employers' Vice-Chairperson, who had shown efficient leadership before a solid group. He had yielded courteously when necessary, and reacted constructively to amendments when his position was strong. He went on to thank also the Government representatives for their constructive attitude. They had asked for, and obtained flexibility. Governments now had to take resolute steps towards ratification. He thanked the Workers' members. It had been easy to work with such strong backing from his group. Finally, he thanked the secretariat for their knowledge, assistance and good services.

459. The representative of the Secretary-General congratulated the Committee on the successful conclusion of its work.

460. The Chairperson, in closing, thanked all the members of the Committee for their interventions, their cooperation and the positive spirit in which the discussions had taken place. She thanked the Committee for the confidence it had placed in her, and for the honour shown to her and her Government. She wished to thank in particular the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairpersons for their kind cooperation and the excellent manner in which they led their groups. She also thanked all members of the secretariat for their good work and then declared the session closed.

461. The text of the draft Protocol is reproduced below.

462. The report of the Committee on the Extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) and the text of the draft Protocol are hereby submitted to the Conference for consideration.

Proposed Protocol of 1995 to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,
Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office and having met in its Eighty-second Session on 6 June 1995, and Noting that the provisions of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947, apply only to industrial and commercial workplaces, and

Noting that the provisions of the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969, apply to workplaces in commercial and non-commercial agricultural undertakings, and

Noting that the provisions of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981, apply to all branches of economic activity, including the public service, and

Having regard to all the risks to which workers in the non-commercial services sector may be exposed, and the need to ensure that this sector is subject to the same or an equally effective and impartial system of labour inspection as that provided in the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to activities in the non-commercial services sector, which is the sixth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a Protocol to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947,

Adopts this ... day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-five the following Protocol, which may be cited as the Protocol of 1995 to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947:

PART I. SCOPE, DEFINITION AND APPLICATION

Article 1

1. Each Member which ratifies this Protocol shall extend the application of the provisions of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (hereunder referred to as "the Convention") to activities in the non-commercial services sector.

2. The term "activities in the non-commercial services sector" refers to activities in all categories of workplaces that are not considered as industrial or commercial for the purposes of the Convention.

3. This Protocol applies to all workplaces that do not already fall within the scope of the Convention.

Article 2

1. A Member which ratifies this Protocol may, by a declaration appended to its instrument of ratification, exclude wholly or partly from its scope the following categories:

- (a) essential national (federal) government administration;
- (b) the armed services, whether military or civilian personnel;
- (c) the police and other public security services;

(d) prison services, whether prison staff or prisoners when performing work, if the application of the Convention to any of these categories would raise special problems of a substantial nature.

2. Before the Member avails itself of the possibility afforded in paragraph 1, it shall consult the most representative organizations of employers and workers or, in the absence of such organizations, the representatives of the employers and workers concerned.

3. A Member which has made a declaration as referred to in paragraph 1 shall, following ratification of this Protocol, indicate in its next report on the application of the Convention under article 22 of the ILO Constitution the reasons for the exclusion and, to the extent possible, provide for alternative inspection arrangements for any categories of workplaces thus excluded. It shall describe in subsequent reports any measures it may have taken with a view to extending the provisions of the Protocol to them.

4. A Member which has made a declaration referred to in paragraph 1 may at any time modify or cancel that declaration by a subsequent declaration in accordance with the provisions of this Article.

Article 3

1. The provisions of this Protocol shall be implemented by means of national laws or regulations, or by other means that are in accordance with national practice.

2. Measures taken to give effect to this Protocol shall be drawn up in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers or, in the absence of such organizations, representatives of the employers and workers concerned.

PART II. SPECIAL ARRANGEMENTS

Article 4

1. The Member may make special arrangements for the inspection of workplaces of essential national (federal) government administration, the armed services, the police and other public security services, and the prison services, so as to regulate the powers of labour inspectors as provided in Article 12 of the Convention in regard to:

- (a) inspectors having appropriate security clearance before entering;
- (b) inspection by appointment;
- (c) the power to require the production of confidential documents;
- (d) the removal of confidential documents from the premises;
- (e) the taking and analysis of samples of materials and substances.

2. The Member may also make special arrangements for the inspection of workplaces of the armed services and the police and other public security services so as to permit any of the following limitations on the powers of labour inspectors:

- (a) restriction of inspection during manoeuvres or exercises;
 - (b) restriction or prohibition of inspection of front-line or active service units;
 - (c) restriction or prohibition of inspection during declared periods of tension;
 - (d) limitation of inspection in respect of the transport of explosives and armaments for military purposes.

3. The Member may also make special arrangements for the inspection of workplaces of prison services to permit restriction of inspection during declared periods of tension.

4. Before a Member avails itself of any of the special arrangements afforded in paragraphs (1), (2) and (3), it shall consult the most representative organizations of employers and workers or, in the absence of such organizations, the representatives of the employers and workers concerned.

Article 5

The Member may make special arrangements for the inspection of workplaces of fire brigades and other rescue services to permit the restriction of inspection during the fighting of a fire or during rescue or other emergency operations. In such cases, the labour inspectorate shall review such operations periodically and after any significant incident.

Article 6

The labour inspectorate shall be able to advise on the formulation of effective measures to minimize risks during training for potentially hazardous work and to participate in monitoring the implementation of such measures.

PART III. FINAL PROVISIONS

Article 7

1. A Member may ratify this Protocol at the same time as or at any time after its ratification of the Convention, by communicating its formal ratification of the Protocol to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for registration.

2. The Protocol shall come into force 12 months after the date on which ratifications of two Members have been registered by the Director-General. Thereafter, this Protocol shall come into force for a Member 12 months after the date on which the ratification has been registered by the Director-General and the Convention shall then be binding on the Member concerned with the addition of Articles 1 to 6 of this Protocol.

Article 8

1. A Member which has ratified this Protocol may denounce it after the expiration of ten years from the date on which the Protocol first comes into force, by an act communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour

Office for registration. Such denunciation shall not take effect until one year after the date on which it is registered.

2. Each Member which has ratified the Protocol and which does not, within the year following the expiration of the period of ten years mentioned in the preceding paragraph, exercise the right of denunciation provided for in this Article, will be bound for another period of ten years and, thereafter, may denounce this Protocol at the expiration of each period of ten years under the terms provided for in this Article.

Article 9

1. The Director-General of the International Labour Office shall notify all Members of the International Labour Organization of the registration of all ratifications and denunciations of this Protocol.

2. When notifying the Members of the Organization of the registration of the second ratification of this Protocol, the Director-General shall draw the attention of the Members of the Organization to the date upon which the Protocol will come into force.

3. The Director-General of the International Labour Office shall communicate full particulars of all ratifications and denunciations of this Protocol to the Secretary-General of the United Nations for registration in accordance with Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations.

Article 10

The English and French versions of the text of this Protocol are equally authoritative.

Proposed Protocol of 1995 to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947	61

Provisional RecordEighty-second Session, Geneva, 1995

Second item on the agenda: Programme and budget proposals and other financial questionsSecond Report of the Financial Committee of Government Representatives

1. The Finance Committee of Government Representatives met on 8 June 1995 and was chaired by Mr. H.-M. Melas (Austria), Vice-Chairman of the Committee, who also acted as Reporter.

Status of collection of member States' contributions

2. The Committee had before it Provisional Record No. 3, containing information on the status of collection of member States' contributions as at 31 May 1995.

3. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) reported that since the preparation of the document, contributions had been received from the following member States:

Country	Swiss francs
Bolivia	46 380
Botswana	42 392
Uganda	33 889
Slovakia	429 226
Slovenia	299 572
Total	851 459

4. The receipt of these amounts meant that Botswana, Slovakia and Slovenia had now paid their 1995 contributions in full.

5. The Committee took note of the information in the document.

Assessment of contributions of new member States

6. The Committee had before it document F.C./D.4, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning the assessment of contributions for two new member States, the Gambia and St. Vincent and the Grenadines.

7. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Scales of assessment of contributions to the budget for the 1996-97 financial period

8. The Committee had before it Report II: Draft Programme and Budget for 1996-97 and other financial questions, and document F.C./D.4, each containing resolutions and draft scales for the assessment of member States' contributions for 1996-97. The Chairman pointed out that, consequent upon the Gambia and St. Vincent and the Grenadines becoming Members of the Organization, the resolution and draft scales of assessment contained in Report II had been superseded by those in document F.C./D.4.

9. The representative of Senegal said that a transfer was at present being arranged for the payment in full of his country's 1995 contribution. Because of exchange rate movements, the payment of contributions in Swiss francs was becoming increasingly onerous for many member States. For example, the African member States for which the CFA was the national currency would see a 40-50 per cent increase in their contributions in the 1996-97 biennium. This matter would be discussed in more detail when the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 were considered.

10. The representative of Ukraine observed that the rate of assessment for Ukraine in the UN system up to now was set in clear violation of the usual criteria. The rate of 1.84 per cent fixed for 1995 did not in any way correspond to the economic situation in the country or its ability to pay. However, during the last session of the General Assembly there had been an attempt to bring the scales closer to the ability to pay of many countries including Ukraine, and this eliminated to some extent the imbalances which had existed earlier. He urged that the rate of assessment for Ukraine to the ILO in 1995 should be altered so as to be in conformity with the scale of assessment fixed by the General Assembly.

11. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Review of the Financial Regulations governing cash surpluses and deficits

12. The Committee had before it Report II: Draft Programme and Budget for 1996-97 and other financial questions, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body for a temporary derogation from the Financial Regulations.

13. The representative of the United States wished to place on record its appreciation for the review of these proposals carried out by the External Auditor, but the scheme still did not reflect the level of financial discipline it would like to see in the ILO.

14. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization

15. The Committee had before it Report II: Draft Programme and Budget for 1996-97 and other financial questions, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning appointments to the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO.

16. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Appendices

17. Draft scales for the assessment of contributions for 1996 and 1997 are attached as Appendices I and II respectively to this report.

Geneva, 19 June 1995.

Vice-Chairman and Reporter.

Resolutions submitted to the Conference

Resolution concerning the assessment of contributions of new member States

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,
Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2 of the Financial Regulations, that the contributions of the Gambia and St. Vincent and the Grenadines to the ILO budget for the periods of their membership in the Organization in 1995 be based on an annual assessment rate of 0.01 per cent.

Resolution concerning the scales of assessment of contributions for 1996 and 1997

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,
Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2 of the Financial Regulations, to adopt, for the assessment of the contributions of member States in 1996 and 1997, the draft scales of assessments set out in column 4 of Appendices I and II respectively to this report.

Resolution concerning a derogation from the provisions of the Financial Regulations

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,
Noting the practical difficulties that have arisen in recent biennia by the non-application of the provisions of articles 18 and 21.2 of the Financial Regulations,
Decides, on a trial basis for the 1994-95, 1996-97 and 1998-99 financial periods only, that — notwithstanding the aforementioned articles — sums withdrawn from the Working Capital Fund to finance budgetary expenditure pending receipt of contributions in accordance with article 19.1(a) of the Financial Regulations shall, if they cannot be reimbursed from contributions received in the course of the same financial period, be reimbursed from amounts credited in subsequent financial periods against arrears of contributions.

Resolution concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,
In accordance with article III of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization, Decides to appoint as Judges of the Administrative Tribunal, for a period of three years, with effect from August 1995:

- Mr. Julio Barberis (Argentina);
- Mr. Jean-François Egli (Switzerland),

Decides to renew the terms of office of Mr. Mark Fernando (Sri Lanka) and Mr. Michel Gentot (France) as Judges from the expiration of their present terms until the end of July 1998.

Third report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives

1. The Finance Committee of Government Representatives met on 12, 13, 14 and 16 June 1995 with Mr. D.S. Boateng (Ghana) as Chairman and Reporter, and Mr. H.-M. Melas (Austria) as Vice-Chairman.

Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97

2. The Committee had before it the Director-General's Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 as submitted to the Governing Body at its 262nd Session (March-April 1995). The Committee also had before it Report II: Draft Programme and Budget 1996-97 and other financial questions, containing a report on the consideration of the Director-General's original proposals by the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body.

3. The Director-General introduced the proposals and recalled that the proposed budget had received wide support from the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee as well as the Governing Body. This support was not fortuitous as the draft programme corresponded fully to the desires expressed by the Organization's constituents at the 75th Anniversary International Labour Conference, and at various other events organized by both member States and employers' and workers' organizations to commemorate this Anniversary.

4. The financial objective of real zero growth had been achieved, to the satisfaction of many Government representatives, conscious that the rise in the number of member States and the considerable increase in requests for services made this a very difficult task. This had only been made possible because of the reforms asked for and implemented during the last few years, to make the Office more efficient while improving productivity and effectiveness, and to improve the impact and visibility of its activities.

5. The Director-General observed that few international organizations had undertaken so many important and wide-ranging reforms in recent years, some of which would be continued during the next biennium. Some figures would serve to illustrate this. The reform of the functioning of the International Labour Conference in 1996-97 would allow economies of 20.9 per cent to be achieved compared to its cost in 1990-91, to which should be added the savings of member States for their participation at the Conference. The reform of the functioning of the Governing Body had allowed savings of 22.8 per cent compared to 1990-91. Savings would be transferred to the regions, thus the share of the budget for the regions would be 19 per cent in 1996-97 compared to 14 per cent in 1990-91. During the same period, technical consultative services had risen to 5.1 per cent from 3 per cent, an increase of 70 per cent.

6. To fulfil the desire for reform requested by Governments, Employers and Workers, the technical services in the regions had been radically restructured and 14 technical multidisciplinary teams had been set up to work in partnership with constituents in their countries, thus being able to service their requests better and more quickly. This was the implementation of the Active Partnership Policy supported by the constituents of the Organization.

7. There were two other reforms which would bear fruit in the following biennium. The reform of sectoral activities would make them more pertinent and effective by shortening meetings and freeing up resources for follow-up actions in the member States which would be of benefit to constituents. Secondly, the important actions started under the control of the Governing Body to modernize the standard-setting activities of the Organization would continue.

8. Considerable efforts had been accomplished to continually improve the management of the Office and two examples of this merited attention. The first concerned the development and introduction of a rigorous system for supervising and evaluating the activities undertaken by the Office. This system aimed to improve the transparency of the Organization and make the results of Office activities more widely available. The second sought to decentralize to external offices administrative tasks where they could be performed more effectively and at reduced cost.

9. The Director-General recalled, in another respect, that many delegates to last year's Conference had wished for the ILO to become more visible at the international level and to command a greater following for its activities. Two examples would demonstrate how the Office had made efforts towards this end. The first was at the World Social Summit held in Copenhagen during the spring where, thanks to the support of the Governing Body and the considerable efforts made in preparing for it, the expertise of the ILO in matters of employment had been fully recognized, and resulted in it being assigned a special role in Summit follow-up activities concerning employment. The other was the publication of the World Employment Report which had received wide media coverage and had been warmly welcomed by the majority of member States.

10. The draft programme and budget reflected the priorities of Members. Consequently the resources of the Employment Department had been increased by 38 per cent and those devoted to enterprise development had risen by 14 per cent, while a considerable part of allocations for the regions would be used to find solutions for unemployment, notably by focusing on policies to encourage small enterprise development. Resources for the main technical departments had been increased in spite of financial constraints.

11. The establishment of 13 action programmes was a major innovation devised to provide usable results and answers to problems identified in member States, by working alongside the constituents themselves. In parallel, the Office had continued to reduce regular budget expenditure of the main support services such as internal administration and relations and meetings activities. In addition, these units would have to cope with a reduction of US$7,700,000 in agency costs in 1996-97.

12. The Director-General went on to explain that provisions in the budget for cost increases had been fixed only after a very careful analysis of each type of expenditure in each region. These figures corresponded to the most objective evaluation of cost increases which could be expected during the next biennium and were at the lower end of the range of forecasts obtained. As for the inflation rate in Geneva, the estimates were based on the normal criteria which were always established by the Geneva-based UN organizations in the preparation of their respective budgets. When these organizations met in 1994, their best estimate of the overall inflation rate for Geneva had been 3 per cent per year for the period from 1995 to 1997.

13. The Office had re-examined the assumptions of September 1994 in order to ascertain whether circumstances and events which had taken place justified a revision in the rate of cost increases. The most recent forecasts established by the main economic research institutes and by the main Swiss banking establishments indicated an inflation rate of between 2 and 2.5 per cent for 1995 and approximately 2.5 per cent for 1996. No forecast was currently available for 1997. The draft programme and budget had anticipated an inflation rate of 3 per cent for 1995, 1996 and 1997. On the basis of the latest estimates, the Office had revised the draft to take into consideration an expected inflation rate of 2 per cent in 1995 and 2.5 per cent rate for 1996 and 1997.

14. As a result, the amount of cost increases for the next biennium was reduced from 7.23 per cent to 6.26 per cent which corresponded to a reduction of US$4,500,000 in the overall budget. Thus the revised value of the draft programme and budget value was 672,220,000 Swiss francs at an exchange rate of 1.16 Swiss francs to one US dollar. The total amount in Swiss francs was approximately 4,200,000 less than the contributions for 1994-95, and the total level of contributions was therefore less than zero nominal growth.

15. These were the principal points of the draft programme and budget for 1996-97 which the Conference was asked to approve. The Director-General concluded his speech by thanking Government delegates for the numerous expressions of appreciation for reforms undertaken by the Office. Such tokens of appreciation were precious to the Office and would encourage it to continue determinedly with the reform process.

16. Mrs. Nieves R. Confesor, Chairperson of the Governing Body, said that the draft Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 had been approved by the 262nd Session of the Governing Body for submission to the Conference. In 1996-97 the ILO would continue to pursue the following priority objectives: the promotion of democracy and human rights, the alleviation of unemployment and poverty, and the protection of working people. It also would be confronting many more challenges arising from market forces operating within the framework of the expanded trade liberalization ushered in by GATT in 1994. As trade liberalization continued, competition would become more and more keen; and market forces were, on their own, oblivious of concerns of social justice.

17. The draft Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 not only took into account changing conditions throughout the world but reflected the wide-ranging contributions made in 1994, the year of the ILO's 75th Anniversary. These included the discussion in the Governing Body and in its committees on the future of standard setting, the social implications of trade liberalization, the future of the ILO's programmes on sectoral activities and the strategy for enhancing ILO technical cooperation activities. As well, the proposals reflected the action to be taken internally to continue and enhance the process of organizational reform. In accordance with the policy adopted by the Governing Body some years ago, this change would need to take place within the constraints of a budget of zero growth in real terms. The consequences of this policy were all the more severe against a background of increased demand for ILO services from an increased number of member States, as well as increased levels of population to be served by the Organization. ILO services were also required by a growing number of employers' and workers' organizations now developing and expanding their participation in the context of political and economic democracy and liberalization. Thus, the priority objectives pursued would be even more relevant in the next biennium.

18. The ILO would in the end be called upon to do even more, as the promotion of social justice had to keep pace with rapid developments in a world propelled by markets motivated by other considerations. In recognition of present-day realities the Governing Body had approved for recommendation to the Conference a budget totalling US$500,237,000, equivalent to 725,343,650 Swiss francs at a budget exchange rate of 1.45 Swiss francs to the dollar. These proposals represented zero real growth, as the 7.24 per cent increase over the 1994-95 programme and budget was attributed solely to inflation.

19. During the course of the discussions in the Governing Body some member States had expressed reservations concerning the extra cost which would result when the 1996-97 proposals were re-costed to reflect current exchange rates. The Finance Committee of Government Representatives faced a difficult task: on one hand it could not altogether disregard the difficulties currently confronting the governments of several member States, nor, on the other, could it predict with any certainty the conditions which would prevail in the next biennium, when governments would be called upon to pay their contributions to the ILO. Set against this was the continuing commitment of all member States to the ILO and the values for which it stood.

20. It was true that rallying cries could sometimes seem inane, perhaps through repetition in words but no fulfilment in action. But throughout history, and sometimes against almost insurmountable odds, nations and causes had responded to these cries. The member States should not let present fears stifle their legitimate aspirations and commitments for a better future for the ILO and more importantly for its constituents.

21. In closing, Mrs. Confesor wished to take the opportunity to place on record her appreciation to her colleagues in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee: Ms. Hartwell for the Governments, Miss Mackie for the Employers, Mr. Tapiola for the Workers, and Ambassador Vargas, her predecessor as Chairman of the Committee.

22. Miss Mackie, on behalf of the Employer Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, expressed full support for the statements by the Director-General and the Chairman of the Governing Body recommending adoption of the programme and budget proposals. On 6 April 1995 the Governing Body accepted the report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and decided with full tripartite support to propose the present draft Programme and Budget for 1996-97 to the Conference for adoption. Approval by the Conference was the last step in a long process of tripartite discussion which recognized the distinction between the programme and budgetary elements of the proposals. The budget was by no means perfect and the Employers believed that many more efficiencies could be achieved. Taken as a whole, however, the proposals were workable and realistic and had been supported by all three groups in the Governing Body. She recommended them to the Committee for adoption.

23. Mr. Tapiola, speaking on behalf of the Worker Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, said that he had already made a preliminary statement to the plenary of the Conference on 7 June 1995. However, he welcomed the opportunity to make some further observations because the member States who paid contributions to the ILO were in turn funded by taxes levied on corporations and workers. The social partners were not simply passive observers during discussions on programme and budget proposals. Between them they possessed 50 per cent of the voting power at the Conference and they had to find a way to ensure that they could support the programme and budget proposals with confidence. This they had done at the recent session of the Governing Body when they had reached a full tripartite understanding during the course of discussions lasting more than one week. The programme and budget proposals had been discussed in great detail and it was somewhat disappointing to see that they had resulted in a net change of only 0.7 per cent, but they were positive changes which had made it possible for the Workers to agree to them.

24. The Worker members had serious reservations about a zero real growth budgetary philosophy even though they recognized the special difficulties facing many member States. Despite the constraints of zero real growth, there had been a wide-ranging discussion on the future orientation of the ILO in the globalized labour market. The world expected the ILO to play its part in dealing with issues such as employment creation, the eradication of poverty and the improvement of working conditions. The recent World Summit for Social Development had clearly acknowledged the special contribution that the ILO could make. But there was much still to do, and to do it the ILO should be reaching to forums such as the G7 meetings and to organizations such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. The ILO could make particularly valuable contributions to the work of the World Bank, whose new Director would be visiting the different regions of the world to see what their needs were. He ought to be able to see the ILO already there and working in its own sphere of competence, rather than allowing a void to develop which others might fill. This was merely one example of the unique opportunities opening for the ILO after the recent World Summit for Social Development.

25. There were many interdependent issues where the ILO's competence had to be developed further, and this had been brought out in discussions over the last two to three years. Many areas of activity had been expanded, although in some cases not as much as needed. For example, much work had been done on international labour standards, freedom of association, employment generation, enterprise development and workers' protection and it was gratifying to see that a balance between all of these had been achieved in the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97, proposals which reflected the expressed priorities of the Conference in the ILO's 75th Anniversary year. The Worker members were in favour of the proposals as they stood now. They understood that the Governing Body discussions had resulted in a consensus which could be followed by this Committee and then the plenary of the Conference. He commended the proposals to the Committee for adoption.

26. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller), at the invitation of the Chairman, described the two main documents for the Committee's consideration. The first was the Director-General's Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97, which was the document considered by the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and the Governing Body. This document did not reflect the changes which had resulted from the Governing Body discussions. The second was Report II: Draft Programme and Budget 1996-97 and other financial questions, at pages 1-10. Table B, at pages 5 and 6 in the English document, contained the adjustments to the programme and budget proposals which had resulted from the Governing Body discussion in March-April. Annex 1 of Report II contained the report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee on the draft Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97.

27. The representative of Canada expressed appreciation for the introductory statements by previous speakers, which should remind member States of their commitment to the ILO and its objectives, and recalled their focus on the future role of the ILO. There had been a wide measure of support for the general orientation and balance of the programmes presented in the draft proposals and in the relative allocation of resources. Many member States had however expressed concern on the impact of exchange rates on their contributions for the 1996-97 biennium, and had requested that the budget be reviewed by this Committee and possibly by the Governing Body next November, in the light of exchange rate movements. All would recall the statement of the Government group in the Governing Body asking the Office to look for ways to absorb more of the cost increases proposed for 1996-97.

28. Members would also be aware of the recent views that there was likely to be a shortfall in contributions from a major contributor. These three factors, cost increases, exchange rate volatility, and income shortfalls, taken together constituted a major problem if not a crisis for this Conference. There would have to be a reduction in the 1996-97 budget because a shortfall was certain. The issue was whether it should be dealt with now, with member States acting in consultation with social partners to protect priority programmes, or let the reality be ignored and reduce expenditures on programmes, meetings and technical cooperation as the Director-General indicated he would do.

29. The ILO was at a watershed. The Director-General had put forward a vision of the ILO in the future, with a new and significant role for the Organization within the UN system, and a leadership role globally in addressing employment issues. The ILO constituents had expressed support and agreement that it should adapt its core principles of protecting workers' rights in the changes taking place in the global economy, and ensuring that the benefits of economic growth were shared by workers. The budget could also be a watershed budget because the ILO would need resources to fulfil its new role. However, all knew the reality of the budgetary situation, that there were no new resources. Indeed, the resource base was shrinking.

30. The member States appreciated the efforts made by the Director-General to reduce costs and redirect resources to the field, and for the management reforms which had been carried out. There had been no growth in programmes for several biennia because the ILO had followed a zero real growth budget regime. Ironically, this had had the effect of protecting administration and overheads, as cost increases were applied to administrative elements of the budget such as travel, staff and operations expenditure.

31. If the ILO was to continue to fulfil the role it had played in the past, it could not go on starving programmes and feeding overheads. The budget was finite, and in real terms was shrinking. The most expensive part of the budget was the 70 per cent that was spent in Geneva, most of which was overheads. The ILO could only achieve its goals if there was a significant restructuring of expenditure patterns which freed more funds for reallocation to priority programmes, those that were the traditional core programmes of the ILO, and those that were emerging as new priorities as it adapted to its new role in the UN system.

32. Reducing overheads inevitably meant reducing staff costs, and the unpleasant reality of reducing staff. However, many of the delegates themselves had witnessed or participated in workforce adjustment exercises. It was a reality for many governments and it was a reality for the social partners. There were many examples of big private sector companies such as automobile companies, airlines, and computer companies, that did not heed the signals of change and failed to adjust. Some no longer existed, some had drastically changed. But the one lesson shared by the public and private sectors was that the longer the delay, the more painful the adjustment.

33. The budget crisis for this Conference was not short term, it was a signal for the future. If it was ignored and dealt with as an ad hoc and one-time budget cut, it would be fair neither to the ILO nor to the member States. The problem facing the Committee provided the opportunity to begin the restructuring necessary to ensure that priority programmes were adequately funded and that there was room to build new ones.

34. In summary, there was a problem because a budget reduction was certain, and it should be dealt with now in full consultation with all member States and the social partners. The Committee should use the opportunity to begin the restructuring of expenditure patterns so that priority programmes were protected now, and so that there was room for programme expansion in future. This Committee, in conjunction with the social partners, had the responsibility to have the foresight in budgetary planning to match the future vision of the ILO that was the subject of this Conference.

35. The representative of Cuba, on behalf of the Americas group, said that member States from the region had held several consultations, and in view of the exchange rate between the US dollar and the Swiss franc, had reached a consensus in favour of zero nominal growth. Many member States from the region would have extreme difficulty in meeting their obligations unless the 1996-97 budget level was reduced. It was futile to make decisions if some member States were unable to pay, and the Americas group was fully prepared for consultations with other groups, including the employers and workers, to try to reach a consensus in favour of a reduced budget.

36. The representative of the United States said that the issues to be dealt with in budgetary problems could quite often not be solved merely by using ordinary planning and logic, and it was true that in recent days many delegates had expressed concern about United States intentions in regard to the ILO and its position on the Organization's budget for 1996-97. In the first place, delegates to the Conference could be reassured that the United States still believed wholeheartedly in the values and principles of the ILO, was committed to a strong ILO as an essential part of a multilateral system for the twenty-first century, and that the present Administration intended to continue its membership.

37. For many years now the United States had been calling for administrative reform throughout the ILO. The Director-General was to be congratulated on the important reforms that he had achieved, in policy-making and programme execution and management, but regrettably they did not go far enough. There was a limit to the savings that could be realized with conventional and incremental changes. Experience had shown that fundamental and radical reform yielded the greatest benefits.

38. Contributions by the United States to all international organizations, not only the ILO, would be reduced in the medium term. This would undoubtedly have an effect on the ILO's activities and it would be misleading to suggest otherwise. In recent budget discussions in the United States Government, funding proposals had emerged in both houses of Congress which would reduce US contributions to international agencies. There was no longer business as usual, and zero real growth was now but a fond memory. In the light of recent exchange rate movements, zero real growth still meant a significant increase in contributions for member States whose economies were geared to the US dollar.

39. The question might be asked why the ILO should undergo radical reforms, rather than merely allow for a reduction in the US contribution. Such a course was not honourable, nor would it meet the real needs of the Organization described so clearly by the representative of Canada. A more basic question for the ILO was how it might leverage its resources in order to be able to carry out all its high priority activities. As a first step, it should divert a higher proportion of its resources to field and technical programmes by carrying out a programme of radical administrative reform. In concluding, she expressed support for the views of the Americas group, and would be happy to join in discussions to find a consensus on how to reduce the Programme and Budget for 1996-97.

40. The representative of Senegal, speaking on behalf of member States of the CFA franc zone, expressed their concern on the effect of recent exchange rate movements. ILO activities in the fields of employment generation and eradication of poverty were invaluable to developing countries and member States that benefited from ILO technical cooperation activities would be extremely worried by the trend of the discussion so far. If the 1996-97 budget was to be cut, every effort should be made to protect field programmes.

41. The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic thanked the Director-General for his clarification concerning the budget proposals and said that he appreciated the impact on international organizations, including the ILO, of the changing world economic conditions as well as, in this case, the exchange rate fluctuations. Allocations for regional programmes in the Arab States were regrettably still at the same level as that of the previous budget, and in spite of continued requests for increased funding for this programme, the budget remained unchanged. He appreciated the importance of transferring the area office to Beirut and would like to see more regional and technical cooperation programmes for ILO activities, with increased financing for projects in the occupied Arab territories and Palestinian lands. He added that the "Safety and Health Compendium" should be translated into Arabic and that more allocations should be available for translation of ILO publications into Arabic.

42. The representative of Egypt hoped that the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 would be fully discussed and a consensus reached. After much discussion at the last session of the Governing Body, the proposed budget had been agreed upon and all members now hoped for an ideal solution given the tasks confronting the ILO today. In view of the ILO's mandate and its tripartism, there was an ever greater need for its activities. The United States and the Latin American countries should allow an opportunity for reflection on a reduction in budget levels during the next few years rather than making severe cuts in the 1996-97 programme and budget. While realizing the difficult economic situation confronting many countries, Egypt hoped for a consensus of all member countries and that the views of the tripartite groups and the Non-Aligned Nations Group would be considered.

43. The representative of Argentina thanked the ILO for the efforts made in preparation of the budget, the flexibility shown by the Office and the work accomplished. He also thanked Canada for outlining the issues facing the Finance Committee, and Cuba for expressing the consensus of the Americas group. The clear statement of the representative of the United States had clarified the context in which the discussions should take place. Many member States faced severe economic difficulties and the problems highlighted by Senegal were similar to those facing Latin American countries. While there was wide support for the programme and budget proposals shown by the Governing Body, certain compromises had been made but there were still reservations by the members of the Americas group and by a major contributor to the ILO. There was concern at the national level for the work of the ILO as it was poised to enter the twenty-first century with major budgetary preoccupations such as budgetary reductions, problems of fluctuating exchange rates, increases in cost due to inflation and increases in cost not directly related to increases in services. All governments were affected by constant budgetary increases for all UN agencies and these needed to be considered in the world context of unemployment, inflation and harsh competition. Cooperation would be needed with other countries to find solutions in favour of the policies outlined and to adjust to present times. As governments were having to make major changes in their economies and in their legal frameworks to face problems such as unemployment, inflation and increased competition in trade, similar changes would have to be made in the UN and other international organizations because governments could not give increased global contributions in the light of severe domestic budgetary restrictions. He agreed with the notion of zero real growth, but it should not be at the expense of regional and technical cooperation programmes and, although budget costs should be rationalized, the overriding principle should be for a budget which was sustainable and payable by member States. This would not be easy, but he expressed full confidence in the ability and in the leadership of the Director-General to achieve this objective.

44. The representative of Brazil reiterated his support for the ILO and other UN agencies, but stressed the need for a leaner budget whereby governments could meet their assessment obligations. The efforts of the Director-General to promote cuts and reforms were deserving of the fullest praise, but further adjustments on overhead costs should be made. He agreed with the statements of Canada, Cuba, the United States and others who had called for further cuts, and for constructive discussions with Members from other regions as well as the social partners to produce a budget of less than zero real growth. This would set a new trend for the future while maintaining the Organization's commitment to the fight against social injustice.

45. The representative of China said that his position regarding the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 had been fully expressed in April, and the ILO should give higher levels of resources to priority items such as promotion of employment, elimination of poverty and the realization of the role and activities assigned to the ILO in the follow-up to the World Social Summit.

46. The representative of Belgium reiterated the genuine commitment that his country had to the ILO since joining it as a founding Member in 1919. Its mandate and objectives were just as relevant today and formed an important element in his country's democracy and social structure. This interest was reconfirmed during the commemoration of the 75th Anniversary of the ILO and the 50th Anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia in 1994, and for this reason the ILO could not be treated in the same way as any other specialized agency of the UN. He fully supported the draft programme and budget proposals for 1996-97 which had been accepted by the social partners and which respected the principle of real zero growth. The development and employment priorities of this budget were especially important. Unfortunately, it appeared that some countries had accepted the budget with reservations and the results of such a compromise were now being seen. Deferring the decision on the exchange rate to be adopted in the hope that the dollar would climb would be a backward step as it was not at all evident whether the dollar would fall or climb before November. For all countries, the important rate was that applicable on the day their contributions were paid and as some countries might only pay in December 1996 at a dollar rate which could not be predicted now, it was not possible to defer this decision. The ILO was too important and valuable an organization to be made a victim of such a dangerous game and he supported the budget in its present form without reservations, even though some countries might not pay their full contribution. The Governing Body and the Director-General had always reacted to budget deficits in an exemplary manner in the past and they would do so again in future. It was most important not to jeopardize the Organization's procedures in this way.

47. The representative of Turkey thanked the Director-General for his introduction to the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 and confirmed that, like all other Members, Turkey was committed to a strong and efficient ILO under an able leadership as was currently provided by the Director-General. The challenges facing the ILO were expanding in the current economic and social climate, even though the capacity to meet those challenges was affected by the financial constraints that member States were facing. Turkey supported zero real growth for budgets in the UN agencies even though it would have to face increases in its Swiss franc budgetary assessment, an event beyond the control of the Director-General. In any case, the level of the ILO's programme and budget should not be subjected to the erratic behaviour of currency markets. The decision to switch to Swiss franc assessments in 1991 had been designed to protect the Organization against such currency fluctuations, and for this reason he fully supported the draft programme and budget at its current level.

48. The representative of India fully supported the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 which had been discussed at length and finally agreed in the Governing Body. The Asian and Pacific group also had endorsed the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 and were now heartened by the rationalization of costs being undertaken by the Organization. Budgetary changes caused by exchange rate fluctuations could not be accepted because they would effectively hold the Organization hostage to events beyond its control and affect its capacity to fulfil its mandate. While economic realities could not be ignored it was not the first time the exchange rate problem had arisen and a workable and acceptable solution which would not affect the work of the Organization had to be found. Any reduction in the budget would necessarily affect the programmes of the ILO and would have long-term repercussions on the effectiveness of ILO activities. For the longer term, discussion instead of surgery was needed but this could not take place while under threat. There could be no bargaining on the future of the ILO.

49. The representative of Morocco fully supported the Director-General in his efforts to adapt the ILO to the new realities in spite of various difficulties mentioned by previous speakers. Any cuts in the budget proposals of the Director-General should not be at the expense of technical cooperation programmes and the drastic and fundamental changes proposed by the largest contributor should not be to the detriment of services provided to developing countries. The ILO's role should be expanded to confront, among other problems, those arising from the globalization of the economy. He added, in conclusion, that there should be equal treatment for all official working languages of the ILO.

50. The representative of Pakistan stated that his Government had taken part in the preparation of the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 on which there had been a consensus for a budget based on zero real growth. These proposals were approved at the Governing Body in April 1995 and he continued to support them now even though there were concerns on the impact of exchange rate fluctuations. While the level of Swiss franc assessments remained the same as in 1994-95 and some countries would face difficulties in paying their contributions, these factors were totally beyond the control of the Office and it would not be reasonable to insist on programme reductions and thus subject the programmes of the ILO to the vagaries of the currency markets. He drew the attention of the Committee to the recognition of the role played by the ILO at the World Social Summit and its subsequent responsibilities for action in fighting poverty and unemployment, which might in fact need more funding to meet the expectations engendered. He supported the programme and budget proposals with no reductions.

51. The representative of Japan understood the difficulties of some member States, including the largest contributor, in meeting their assessments. Japan also would have problems, but the content of the programme should be discussed and agreed before fixing the final budget level. The draft proposals had been adopted by consensus in April although some countries had expressed reservations related to exchange rate fluctuations, but this question had been deferred until the Conference. The US dollar/Swiss franc exchange rate happened to be the same now as in April, even though the markets were continually changing. A system to minimize the adverse effects of these changes had been implemented a few years ago so it would be better to maintain the principal thrust of the draft budget proposals given that the amount of an eventual shortfall was not known. The cost increase of 7.2 per cent was, however, too high compared with that of other international organizations and it should be reconsidered, especially as there was still considerable room for savings in administrative costs.

52. The representative of Jamaica, speaking on behalf of the Caribbean Community (CARICOM), said there were some differences of opinion between the Americas group and her group. Her group expressed full support for the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 because of the role the ILO played, and must continue to play, in the Caribbean region. As well, the ILO had been given an enhanced role in the follow-up recommendations of the World Social Summit and would in fact need more resources, not less, to carry out those activities. Member States advocating budgetary cuts should reconsider their positions in the light of this wider responsibility, because it was in the interests of all constituents that the ILO remain strong and powerful and able to carry out its mandate.

53. The representative of New Zealand expressed his support for the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 and appreciated the efforts made by the ILO to maintain an effective level of operations and services in an environment of real zero growth. It was worth noting that governments had now accepted the principle of zero nominal growth in their own administrations and were providing services at reducing prices which, in the case of New Zealand, had been reduced by 8 per cent in real terms in the last three years. It would be difficult to justify a cost increase of 7.24 per cent, excluding exchange rate fluctuations, in the ILO programme and budget to national Parliaments at a time when domestic budgets were shrinking. He welcomed the Director-General's efforts to economize and raise productivity and efficiency in the Office and the structural reforms that were being undertaken, but the Office could seek still more fundamental changes to improve productivity further. A structured rather than ad hoc approach would yield greater benefits, and should be aimed at reducing administrative costs instead of draining technical programmes. Changes might be difficult, but they must be made.

54. The representative of Sudan, as a member of the Governing Body, had participated in the discussion of the programme and budget proposals, and considered that at present levels the regional and technical cooperation programmes were only at the bare minimum for the ILO to meet its responsibilities in the follow-up to the World Social Summit. Programmes could only be carried out if the budget was maintained at the current level, and although monetary fluctuations caused problems for some countries, the level of ILO activities should not be compromised. The ILO should play an effective role in implementing social justice and in the fight against poverty. He supported the draft programme and budget proposals as they stood.

55. The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran believed that discussion of the budget should aim at strengthening the role of the ILO. The allocation of the budget was more important than its size, and field activities should not suffer if the budget was restructured. The Office should look again at ways to make savings in administration and in the organization of meetings.

56. The representative of Norway expressed full support for the aims and activities of the ILO, and would support the budget as it had in the Governing Body discussions earlier in the year. Even though some member States had expressed doubts about their ability to meet their obligations, it was important to agree on a programme that would enable the ILO to fulfil its mandate.

57. The representative of Finland expressed full support for the budget as approved by the Governing Body. Any changes made at this stage ought to have full tripartite approval.

58. The representative of Guinea thanked the Director-General and the Chairman of the Governing Body for explaining the details of the budget. He would support the budget in spite of its zero real growth in view of the important role of the ILO in eradicating poverty and in the light of comments recently made at the World Summit for Social Development.

59. The representative of the Netherlands reiterated full support for the programme and budget proposals, and associated himself with comments made by the representatives of Belgium, Turkey and Pakistan. The representative of Jamaica had made an eloquent appeal for international solidarity. Furthermore, on many occasions there had been calls for strengthening the role of the ILO in the follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development, and this undoubtedly would have financial consequences. In any case, the programmes of the ILO should not be held hostage for fluctuations in the currency market.

60. The representative of Hungary observed that the major objectives of the ILO, the promotion of democracy, the alleviation of poverty and the protection of workers were highly relevant and showed the willingness of the ILO to adapt to a constantly changing environment. He welcomed the renewed emphasis on the provision of services at the field level, also the commendable initiatives on the launching of the Active Partnership Policy, and the setting up of the 14 multidisciplinary teams. Also deserving of support were the proposals by the Office relating to standard setting, the revision of international labour standards, and the technical cooperation activities proposed in the fields of employment, cooperatives and industrial relations. He expressed full support for the programme and budget proposals as they stood.

61. The representative of Chile acknowledged the changes made to the programme and budget proposals after the Governing Body discussions and would support the budget. However, the concerns expressed by the United States were understandable. In general he agreed with the comments made by the Americas group, and hoped that the discussions would lead to the approval of a realistic budget by the Committee.

62. The representative of the Russian Federation expressed general support for the programme and budget proposals, but was concerned at the effect of currency fluctuations which, in turn, would lead to an increase in contributions by member States. His own country was still facing problems in paying its contributions to the ILO in view of the difficult economic situation and had only recently paid US$5 million out of its contributions for 1993. Another US$5 million would be paid in the near future. He reiterated his support for the principle of a zero real growth budget and urged that any further reduction of the budget should not affect the basic programmes of ILO activities.

63. The representative of Austria, while expressing general support for the programme and budget proposals, observed that the concerns of large donor countries could not be overlooked and hoped that the discussions would lead to a consensus between the various groups.

64. The representative of Colombia endorsed the comments made by the coordinator of the Americas group. The budget should be used in a rational manner to strengthen the role of the ILO and the budget debate should be continued if necessary to achieve this objective. The opinions of all member States should be considered and a consensus reached in the light of discussions.

65. The representative of Germany said that the present Committee faced something of a dilemma. Lengthy discussions had taken place in the Governing Body to approve the Programme and Budget for 1996-97, but according to the statutes of the ILO, a formal decision on it had to be taken by the Conference. There could however be differences of opinion and, logically speaking, the representatives of the Workers and Employers should be party to all the decisions being taken here. A radically changed programme and budget might not have the approval of all concerned, and there should be some way of including the social partners in the final decision. He was prepared to approve the budget, but appreciated the difficulties facing some member States and would join in efforts to reach a consensus.

66. The representative of Uruguay pointed out that the general view was that everybody wanted to strengthen not weaken the ILO, especially in the field. It was true that some member States faced serious budgetary and exchange rate problems, but he hoped that the present discussions would lead to a consensus.

67. The representative of Peru supported the position of the Americas group. She hoped that this Committee would devise ways to reduce the budget and find a consensus that would reinforce the work of the ILO.

68. The representative of Tunisia recalled that the draft Programme and Budget for 1996-97 had been debated at length in the Governing Body. Some countries had expressed concern about their contributions in the light of exchange rate developments, but in fact all countries which paid their contributions in terms of US dollars had reason to be concerned. Many countries had expressed concern over the decrease in budget for the African region at a time when the demands on the Organization, especially in the field of employment, continued to increase. The Director-General had pointed out that in the light of the zero growth budget it would be difficult to introduce major restructuring of the budget, and the amendments to the original proposals were quite small. The programme and budget should be decided by consensus and concrete proposals to amend the programme should also be approved by the social partners within tripartite consultations. Reductions to the budget should not undermine assistance to developing countries, but there was no harm in studying the proposals for amendment if they were reasonable and if they would not hamper the work of the Organization.

69. The representative of the United Kingdom reiterated the support for the draft Programme and Budget for 1996-97 that the United Kingdom had expressed in the Governing Body discussions two months earlier. However, the warning signals that were now being heard from member States whose contributions represented almost 40 per cent of the total could not be ignored. He agreed with the representative of Germany that it would be useful to hold tripartite discussions in an effort to reach consensus in this Committee and in the plenary session. He also agreed with the previous speaker that proposals for budget reductions needed to be much more specific.

70. The representative of France pointed out that there were essentially two problems that this Committee had to face. First, a legal problem: what were the rights and powers of the Finance Committee to make amendments to the budget approved by the Governing Body, a question which would require legal advice from the Office concerning the powers of the Committee compared with those of the Governing Body. Secondly, a distinction would be needed between those who agreed with the programme and budget, those who did not, and those who wanted to agree but with conditions. The uncertainty with regard to the exchange rate was nothing new — exchange rate problems had existed in the Organization for a long time. This was not something within the ILO's control, and his Government had never worried about it when paying its contributions. It might be useful to have a vote to see how many governments accepted the budget which had been approved by the Governing Body. In the first place was it legal to take such a vote and if so, when could it be taken? Votes in the Finance Committee required a two-thirds majority in favour before they could be submitted to the plenary where Employers' and Workers' representatives were able to vote. Votes in the plenary on budgetary matters also required a two-thirds majority to be successful.

71. The representative of Mexico agreed with the position of the Americas group and in particular with the views expressed by Uruguay. The Committee should look for a realistic budget which would not jeopardize the effectiveness of the Organization. According to the estimates of one delegate, member States expressing serious reservations about the proposals paid about 40 per cent of total contributions, so they were entitled to be heard. The Americas group had rightly asked the Office to search for more savings so that the essential programmes of the ILO would be safeguarded.

72. The representative of the Philippines drew attention to the predicament of the smaller member States. Many had difficulties in paying their contributions, and it was sobering to compare the treatment they received with that being demanded now by some of the larger donors. It would be interesting to see what would happen if the exchange rate moved in their favour. Would they then turn around and show greater concern for the plight of smaller member States?

73. The representative of Italy thought that in view of the diversity of opinions already expressed it was clear that the only solution would be a compromise. As well as the legal question raised concerning the power of the Committee to make amendments to the programme and budget proposals, another equally important question was how would approved programmes be financed? The Director-General had made strenuous efforts to rationalize programmes by making modifications and reductions in the budget, but the problem still remained and had to be solved. The exchange rate problem was not something the ILO could control. A more important concern was to strive for consensus through negotiations and discussions — not an easy task.

74. The representative of Argentina expressed full support for the statements of the United Kingdom, Germany, Norway, Tunisia and Senegal. The formation of a special tripartite working group to examine budget priorities would be an excellent first move in efforts to find a budget level acceptable to all member States.

75. The representative of Nicaragua observed that even with the different positions emerging in the Committee there was evidence of a will to achieve consensus on the budget, and he supported the statements made by Cuba and Argentina. The Organization should aim at a zero growth budget in dollar terms, and he supported the proposal put forward by the previous speaker.

76. The representative of Switzerland said that the ILO was not only an international body for the multilateral solutions of problems in the labour and social field, but also a champion of values such as democracy, social partnership, social justice and social dialogue. Switzerland attached great importance to these values and therefore to the ILO, and was convinced that only a strong ILO would be able to fulfil its important mandate. Against this background Switzerland was prepared to endorse without reservation the programme and budget proposals for 1996-97 as discussed and agreed in the Governing Body. This decision was based on the fact that the proposals corresponded to the mandate of the ILO and the budget total conformed to the principle of zero real growth.

77. Many of the previous speakers had requested that the ILO take account of the particular difficulties facing many member States, especially the precarious economic conditions they faced, and some had declared that the difficulties caused by currency fluctuations prevented them from endorsing in full the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97. Exchange rate fluctuations were a special but temporary problem, which could be controlled neither by the Organization nor by individual member States. If the ILO were to assume the risk of currency fluctuations, the member States would in effect be divesting themselves of their responsibility for the work of the Organization because the decision on which programmes should be implemented would be left to the foreign exchange markets. This problem, however, had to be distinguished from the economic problems facing individual member States. Many national budgets were no longer able to maintain the goal of zero real growth and if anything had to contend themselves with zero nominal growth. The ILO could rightly be criticized that the cost increases of more than 6 per cent requested for the 1996-97 biennium contradicted the realities of many national budgets. The Director-General was now signalling a readiness to compromise with a revised budget which proposed a zero nominal growth compared to the present biennium. In real terms it meant that the Organization could expect 672 million Swiss francs for the period 1996-97, which was 50 million less than the Governing Body's proposals and indeed 4 million less than the 1994-95 biennium. The Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 should be adopted by consensus, in accordance with the spirit and tradition of the ILO. These new proposals by the Director-General represented a useful compromise deserving the full support of all member States.

78. The representative of South Africa supported the adoption of the draft programme and budget agreed by the Governing Body, which had been reached only after a week of extensive discussions. Some of the criticism being levelled at the Office was unfair. In the search for savings many of its administrative processes had been reformed and perhaps the Office should be explaining in more detail to the member States how it had been able to do so.

79. South Africa had benefited enormously from the services and activities of the ILO and naturally would like to see them maintained. Despite the call for budget reductions from member States facing difficulties because of exchange rate fluctuations, to base a budget on this criterion alone was a dangerous practice because there would always be some member States at a disadvantage. The budget should rather be based on consistent principles. In the present circumstances a mandate to the Governing Body to adjust the 1996-97 Programme and Budget as necessary, perhaps coupled with a medium-term review of ILO priorities, was a compromise South Africa could support. The ILO had to respond to calls at the recent World Social Summit for it to play a larger part in world affairs, and it would face many challenges in doing so. The 1996-97 Programme and Budget was the first step along this road and the Office deserved congratulations for a well-balanced set of proposals.

80. The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya expressed solid support for the aims and activities of the ILO and regretted that its contributions were not up to date because of deteriorating economic conditions in his country, caused in part by UN sanctions. His country would however continue its support for the ILO and a representative would meet the Office shortly to discuss the payment of overdue contributions. He urged member States to avoid reductions to the ILO budget for 1996-97 if at all possible.

81. The representative of Australia thought the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 were fair and reasonable and had expressed full support for them in the Governing Body discussions in March-April. The ILO faced many challenges following the recent World Social Summit in Copenhagen and also the call for ILO services from many of the new member States. The Office deserved credit for the many administrative reforms carried out recently and it was interesting to note that more were proposed for 1996-97. The coming biennium should be a period of consolidation, especially for the activities of multidisciplinary teams. The process of reform should also be continued as the ILO aimed to develop a sustainable and affordable budget. The Office should look closely at how it could implement a continuing programme of reform.

82. It would be necessary to move away from the cost-cutting practices used up to now and search for more efficiencies through a philosophy of continuing improvement. The national administrations of many member States had done just that in recent years and would be able to offer valuable advice to the Office. In the next biennium however the ILO should continue its efforts to reduce overheads. About 70 per cent of the ILO's budget was spent in Swiss francs, and it would also be necessary over the medium term to see what could be done to move part of this to lower cost centres. The priority for Australia was to support the programme and budget proposals as they stood, and over the next 18 to 24 months look at the issues raised during the course of the present discussion.

83. The representative of the Czech Republic expressed support for the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97, which had been discussed at length in the March-April Session of the Governing Body and reflected the reforms undertaken by the Office over the last few years. In spite of the fact that the ILO had to share problems faced by its member States, its programmes should be maintained by reducing administrative costs. In the case of possible future cuts the balance among different parts of the programme and budget proposals should be preserved. At the same time, he expressed his full comprehension of the reasons of the US delegation's approach.

84. The representative of Lebanon expressed full support for the draft Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97, and made a special plea for increased allocations for training and technical and cooperation activities in west Asia. The multidisciplinary teams were carrying out very useful work but in the Arab States this needed to be supplemented by studies on the issues of home work, unemployment, child labour and disabled labour.

85. The representative of Kenya expressed full support for the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97, as it had done in the recent Governing Body discussions. However, some of the expenditure items needed closer examination. For example, of the $38 million allocated for the African region, most was to be spent on technical cooperation activities and the work of multidisciplinary teams; very little was to be spent in the countries themselves. As well, a substantial proportion of the budget was spent in Geneva, but some of it, especially that relating to conferences, could easily be transferred away from headquarters.

86. The representative of Cameroon agreed with the statement by the representative of Senegal and expressed full support for the programme and budget proposals. The budget should ideally be maintained at its original level but, if reductions were necessary, the member States receiving technical cooperation should first be consulted.

87. The representative of France asked, in view of the discussion so far, what the proper role was for this Committee in relation to the programme and budget proposals. What were the limits of its authority, to what extent could it vary the recommendations from the Governing Body, and what would happen if its recommendations were not adopted by the plenary?

88. The Legal Adviser, in reply, said that the question concerned the extent and the limit of the powers of the Finance Committee in respect of programme and budget proposals approved by the Governing Body.

89. Article 13, paragraph 2(c) of the Constitution, which had resulted from a revision of the Constitution in 1945, provided that "the arrangements for the approval, allocation and collection of the budget of the International Labour Organization shall be determined by the Conference by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast by the delegates present, and shall provide for the approval of the budget and of the arrangements for the allocation of expenses among the Members of the Organization by a committee of Government representatives”.

90. This fundamental provision had institutionalized the coexistence of two opposing principles:

- on one hand, the supremacy of the Conference, that is the tripartite forum, which was made responsible for adopting the provisions concerning the approval of the budget; and
- on the other hand, the special and pre-eminent role of governments in budgetary matters; the Conference being constitutionally required to ensure, in the provisions which it adopted, that the budget was approved by a committee of Government representatives.

91. This special institutional balance was also to be found in the Financial Regulations, which constituted the “arrangements for the approval of the budget of the Organization” referred to in the Constitution.

92. Article 6 of the Financial Regulations assigned to the Governing Body, with its tripartite structure, the responsibility for approving the programme and budget proposals prepared by the Director-General. At the same time article 6 of the Financial Regulations provided, as required by the Constitution, that the programme and budget proposals prepared by the Governing Body had to be referred to the Finance Committee for examination and report (paragraph 5), that the decisions of the Committee were taken by a two-thirds majority (paragraph 7), and that the Committee had to submit to the Conference for adoption the programme and budget proposals as approved by it (paragraph 8).

93. Article 7 of the said Financial Regulations also specified that no additional expenditure could be added to the budget without being first considered by the Governing Body.

94. Within this overall framework there was no doubt that, while the Finance Committee was not able to add proposals for expenditure to the Governing Body’s draft budget, it could validly consider, under the general rules of procedure for committees which applied equally to the Finance Committee, proposals for amendments designed to reduce the budgetary proposals submitted to it.

95. In practice, however, the power of the Committee to amend proposals submitted to it was only exercised in very exceptional circumstances and acted essentially as a brake on the Governing Body. It was because the Governing Body, in particular the Employers’ and Workers’ groups, knew that the proposals that they approved still had to pass through the Finance Committee where in theory they could be amended, that they exercised self-restraint and strove to reach a consensus with the Government members in the Governing Body. Reciprocally, the Finance Committee, conscious of the fact that the budgetary proposals transmitted to it by the Governing Body represented a tripartite equilibrium with which it would be a very delicate matter to interfere, normally refrained from introducing reductions themselves to the income proposals to the extent that it implied also a reduction in programmes whose balance had to be discussed on a tripartite basis; in case of limited adjustments it would thus rather ask the Director-General to make proposals for such reductions after appropriate consultations. In case of more important adjustments, there was the possibility to refer the matter back to the Governing Body which was supposed to hold a session during the Conference in accordance with article 8 of the Financial Regulations. The Committee was aware that, if it ignored the tripartite equilibrium reflected in the budget proposals, this could lead to a reaction in the plenary of the Conference itself when it came to vote on the budget, and that changes made by the Committee could in theory be referred back to it for further consideration if the Conference considered them unacceptable.

96. The representative of France asked also what were the powers of the Finance Committee to set the budgetary exchange rate.

97. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller), said that the ILO had faced budgetary upheavals ever since the early 1970s, when fixed exchange rates for the major currencies had been abandoned. The size of the problem could be seen from the evolution of exchange rates in recent biennia: in 1980-81, 1.73 Swiss francs to the dollar; in 1982-83, 1.85; in 1984-85, 2.00; in 1986-87, 2.50; in 1988-89, 1.60. In 1990, the system was changed when the ILO moved to the assessment of contributions in Swiss francs, coupled with forward purchase contracts for requirements of US dollars. Until the introduction of forward purchase arrangements, the budget was unprotected against currency fluctuations. In 1988-89, the last period for which the Organization was totally exposed, each centime movement in the exchange rate between the Swiss franc and the US dollar implied a variation of approximately $1.8 million in the programme and budget. When the Organization faced a deficit it was usually financed by a withdrawal from the Working Capital Fund, authorized by the Governing Body. As a result of the large surpluses and deficits occurring through the 1980s because of exchange rate movements, culminating in additional financing of around $72 million for the 1986-87 biennium, the Governing Body requested that the Office look for a long-term solution to the problem.

98. Of the total ILO expenditures, about 70 per cent was in Swiss francs or currencies that moved in line with the Swiss franc, and the remaining 30 per cent was spent in US dollars or currencies related to it. To remove the exposure to currency fluctuations, from 1990 member States were assessed in Swiss francs and the 30 per cent of total expenditure related to the US dollar was bought forward in the currency markets. Under this arrangement, whenever US interest rates were higher than Swiss interest rates, a premium was receivable which was in due course refunded to member States. For 1996-97, preliminary quotations had suggested a premium of about 7 million Swiss francs. The final figure would not be known until the forward purchase contracts were executed but at present rates would be somewhat lower, perhaps about 5 million Swiss francs.

99. As some speakers had pointed out, if a currency was strong or weak it was always in relation to another currency, and this naturally meant that one country gained and another lost whenever exchange rates changed.

100. As the Director-General had stated earlier, if the exchange rate of 1.16 Swiss francs to the dollar prevailed, and after taking into account the revised forecast for Swiss inflation, the nominal value of the Programme and Budget for 1996-97 was less than the nominal value of the budget for 1994-95 by about 4,200,000 Swiss francs. Some speakers had suggested that discussions should be deferred until the dollar appreciated against the Swiss franc, but it would be to member States' advantage to adopt the budget at the low dollar rate and reap the benefit themselves of any appreciation in the value of the dollar. In reply to a query from the representative of the United Kingdom, the Treasurer advised that the forward purchasing was executed as soon as the Committee approved the proposed programme and budget. The Committee then reconvened for the formal adoption of the budget resolution which, at that point, would contain exact figures in both US dollars and Swiss francs.

101. The representative of France expressed appreciation for the statements of the Legal Adviser and the Treasurer. The exchange rate, as the Treasurer had explained, was a problem that affected different countries at different times. France had always met its obligations, even when the exchange rate was not in its favour, but it was clear that the ILO could not have a budget dependent on exchange rates. Even for countries linked to the US dollar, an appreciation in the value of the dollar was not always helpful to them. The main problem for the ILO concerned the timing of income receipts, which was linked to the goodwill of member States, but the situation of industrialized countries was not the same as that of less-developed countries, so it was not realistic to expect all member States to pay at the same time. Nevertheless, the recent World Social Summit in Copenhagen in effect expanded the role and activities of the ILO and they would probably be maintained at that level. The ILO had to adopt a realistic budget which took full account of its future responsibilities. In the light of the explanations given by the Office, the representative of France proposed the following motion to the Finance Committee:

- (a) The Finance Committee of Government Representatives approves the draft programme and budget as voted by the Governing Body, and adopts an exchange rate of 1.16 Swiss francs to one US dollar.
- (b) The Committee requests the Director-General to present, as appropriate, to the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and to the Governing Body, whatever adjustments might prove to be necessary.

To enable time for the Office to prepare the motion for distribution to the Committee, he suggested that the motion be considered and voted upon the following afternoon.

102. The representative of the United States also expressed appreciation for the clear explanations from the Treasurer, and supported the suggestion of the previous speaker to separate the discussion of exchange rate problems from the discussion of the Programme and Budget for 1996-97. The purpose of the present system of forward purchase contracts was to remove the exchange rate problem because many member States had complained beforehand about the unpredictability of currency movements. There was wide agreement that the Office needed protection against these movements but many members of the Americas group were not convinced that the present scheme was entirely successful. Amendments were still required to the present budget level. There was plenty of room for more cuts and the United States could simply not accept the budget as it stood. She expressed particular appreciation for the statement of the Legal Adviser and welcomed also the proposal put forward by the previous speaker, which would be studied with great care.

103. The Treasurer, in response to a query from the representative of the Philippines, confirmed that after the reduction to allow for the revised Swiss inflation adjustment, the budget total was now US$579.5 million which, at an exchange rate of 1.16 Swiss francs to the dollar, was equal to 672,220,000 Swiss francs.

104. The representative of Italy expressed appreciation for the motion put forward by the representative of France, which could be a part of the normal resolution for the adoption of the programme and budget submitted to the plenary.

105. The representative of Argentina said the Americas group still could not agree with the budget total and therefore could not vote in favour of the motion. Most of the member States would accept a compromise so the discussions should continue, but even if the 32 member States of the Americas group were excluded, the compromise still seemed some way ahead.

106. The representative of Cameroon accepted the motion put by the representative of France. The ILO was the only agency in the UN system involved in social issues, and in the present economic climate social considerations were not to be overlooked. The ILO must be in a position to fulfil its mandate, and this presupposed adequate resources and funds to deal with the problems of unemployment and underemployment. Further budget cuts would undermine the ILO's capacity to meet these objectives. For this reason the motion put forward provided a way out as necessary adjustments could be made at some future date. The motion deserved the fullest support.

107. The representative of Senegal requested clarification of the impact of an exchange rate of 1.16 Swiss francs to the dollar on budget assessments before any decisions were taken. Even at an exchange rate of 1.45 Swiss francs to the dollar the 14 countries in the CFA currency zone in Africa would see a 130 per cent increase in their contributions.

108. The representative of Canada was pleased that the Committee was looking for a solution in a spirit of compromise. While all possibilities for consensus had not yet been explored and although the Swiss franc level of the budget was still too high, members were now speaking of setting priorities and protecting programmes and continuing the search for savings. There was room for more absorption of costs, but the proposal for a 6 per cent cost increase was still before the Committee so further discussions were needed to examine fully the scope for compromise. The effects of currency fluctuations on the assessments of countries in the dollar zone were still not clear and she would reserve her position until a study had been made of the proposed motion.

109. The representative of Sudan considered that the main issue before the Committee was quite clear: the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 which were accepted by the Governing Body and were now being studied by this Committee would need the approval of a two-thirds' majority of members to be adopted. Many countries had expressed their willingness to adopt these proposals while others were against them, so it was by no means clear whether the required majority existed yet. As the Governing Body draft proposals had been adopted by the social partners, the motion proposed by the representative of France should be thoroughly discussed and the social partners consulted again before a definitive solution was chosen.

110. The Chairman advised that the motion proposed by France would be translated and distributed to the Committee before its next sitting.

111. The representative of France, at the next sitting of the Committee, asked for two corrections to be incorporated in the proposed motion contained in document F.C./D.6. In the first paragraph, the words "and adopts" should be replaced by the words "by adopting". The second referred to the French document only, where the verb in the last clause of paragraph 2 should be expressed in the conditional tense. The objective of paragraph 1 of the motion was clear enough and reflected the overriding concern of all member States that the ILO needed an approved budget so that it could continue to function. From recent discussions both in the Committee and elsewhere some member States did not consider paragraph 2 to be necessary. In effect, all that paragraph 2 said was that the Committee understood the difficulties faced by some member States and that the budget level would need to be revised. A vote on this motion would not be necessary at the present sitting. The main objective of this discussion should be to decide a mechanism for dealing with exchange rate problems.

112. The Treasurer, replying to a query, confirmed that for budgetary purposes the proposals were costed in two currencies, the US dollar and the Swiss franc. The US dollar element totalled $160.5 million which, at 1.16 Swiss francs to the dollar, equated to 186,180,000 Swiss francs. To this was added the Swiss franc component of a little over 486 million Swiss francs, giving a budget total of about 672.2 million Swiss francs.

113. The representative of Ghana thought that there was a growing consensus in favour of the budget after the amendment for the revised Swiss inflation figure. The proposals had already been examined by the Governing Body and appeared to be quite reasonable for what the ILO was trying to do. Some speakers had favoured a detailed review of the whole budget but they were outweighed by those who had spoken in favour. The Director-General had already indicated that cuts had been made and if the Committee wanted more they would have to be discussed very carefully.

114. The representative of Argentina expressed appreciation for the motion proposed by the representative of France which had been discussed carefully in the Americas group. He agreed with the previous speaker that there seemed to be an emerging consensus in favour of the proposal in paragraph 2 of the motion which would mean that the present proposals might not be fully implemented. The Americas group were concerned that their position might be misunderstood by the other members of the Committee. They were fully in favour of maintaining technical cooperation programmes, but adjustments should be agreed by consensus with contingency plans to adapt the programmes in an orderly fashion. The Employers and Workers should also participate in this process and it might be useful to set up a working party, with representation from all the regions, to take these discussions forward. The Americas group still adhered to its original position of zero nominal growth, with the proposals expressed at a realistic market exchange rate.

115. The representative of Italy had examined in detail the terms of the motion proposed by the representative of France. The draft Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 now before the Committee had been approved after lengthy discussion in the Governing Body and the Finance Committee would have to make proposals to the plenary of the Conference because the Organization could not function without an approved budget. Accordingly, there was no objection in principle to paragraph 1 of the motion. It was equally clear from the course of discussion so far that the level of the programme and budget would have to be adjusted, even though the reduction just proposed by the Director-General would reduce cost increases for 1996-97 from 7.23 per cent to 6.26 per cent. Paragraph 2 of the proposed motion was concerned with the level of the budget which in turn was a matter of priorities decided by the Committee. This would be affected by the level of contributions paid to the Office and the motion proposed a delegation of authority to the Governing Body to adjust the level of the budget as necessary. This would not be a simple process and, rather than a working group, it might be better to arrange for consultations with some Members of the ILO.

116. The representative of Canada appreciated the spirit in which the motion proposed by the representative of France had been put forward but it was clear that the budget level had to be reduced and a consensus reached on a final level. The original programme and budget proposals submitted to this Committee totalled US$466 million, or US$500 million after adjustments for cost increases. When recast at current exchange rates, this figure increased to $578 million. It was clear that the budget would not be funded at this level so these figures represented an expenditure ceiling rather than a realistic budget. If it was to be adopted at this level and adjusted later, all member States would face increases. The Committee had to look for innovative solutions to this problem rather than stick to the old ways of doing things. The objectives of its discussion should be to approve the budget, to reconcile the concern of member States concerning assessments and the impact of exchange rates, to confirm priority activities, and to reaffirm its support for the principle of tripartism. She expressed support for the proposal put forward by the representative of Argentina, who suggested that a working group should be set up to examine the budget level in detail.

117. The representative of Belgium observed that the revised proposals put forward by the Director-General totalled just over 672 million Swiss francs. Many member States had expressed support for the budget at this level, while some favoured a compromise based on consensus. Some member States had opposed the budget, but agreed to some sort of compromise without giving details. Some had argued against reducing the budget because it was for the Governing Body to decide priorities, not this Committee. A working group was surely not necessary because, even on its recommendations, there would be no full consensus in favour. A better course would be to adopt the amended budget put forward by the Director-General, and leave it to him and the Governing Body to make adjustments in future as required. He expressed support for the motion, which avoided pitfalls and seemed to be a reasonable step forward. Whether a working party should be set up could be considered later.

118. The representative of Cuba said that the Americas group had listened carefully to the statements made by other member States and was aware that its viewpoint was hampering the approval of the budget. The member States of the Americas group had never said that they were opposed to the budget. In the Governing Body discussions they had expressed support for it, but had warned of the need for review because member States of the region were likely to encounter difficulties in paying their contributions. It was important to reach agreement on a budget level that could be implemented in practice, rather than one where the Director-General would have to propose reductions to allow for income shortfalls. The Americas group was willing to support the budget but there had to be a strong consensus that it was set at a realistic and feasible level. They supported the suggestion put forward by Argentina for the establishment of a working group because it would help to clarify the issues.

119. The representative of South Africa said there seemed to be a complete turnaround now from the majority of views expressed the previous day, when almost all speakers had been in favour of the budget. Now, an element of compromise had crept in. If a working group was to be set up, it should begin with the idea of supporting the budget rather than looking for reductions. It was perhaps a fine distinction but it should be borne in mind.

120. The representative of Pakistan observed that there had already been a considerable amount of discussion on the programme and budget proposals and it would be right now to take the decision in paragraph 1 of the motion. Paragraph 2 also proposed a sensible solution for deciding the level of the budget and he urged its adoption by the Committee. Adjustments to the level of the budget could be made later by the Governing Body.

121. The representative of Nicaragua reminded the Committee that the Governing Body had accepted the draft programme and budget in April, in spite of criticisms related to an unrealistic exchange rate figure, and had now submitted it to the Conference for adoption. There was a consensus among members that a budget had to be adopted for the Organization, so the discussion should now focus on the recommendations put forward by Belgium and Argentina.

122. The Chairman recalled that the representative of France had indicated a preference for a consensus rather than a vote. There was a broad consensus emerging that the Organization needed a realistic and feasible budget to function and meet the aspirations of its Members, as well as take account of the concerns expressed about cuts in technical programmes. The Committee should now have wide-ranging discussions to find a mechanism for consensus, considering both the proposal for the creation of a working party and the proposal that the matter be left in the hands of the Director-General who would prepare submissions on budgetary adjustments to the Governing Body.

123. The representative of Sweden fully supported the statement by the representative of South Africa. It would not be a good idea to refer the budget back to the Governing Body without all members having agreed to it, and there was a need for a working party which could indicate to the Governing Body in November possible avenues to be explored.

124. The representative of the United States said that there would be a consensus in her Government that the Organization must have a workable budget rather than a "continuing resolution". The spirit of consensus that a tripartite organization could achieve made the ILO a unique Organization and discussions should move forward with this end in view. It was regrettable that her Government was unable to be specific about the level of the budget for 1996-97 which would be acceptable and for which assessments could be paid, as well as the level of contribution payments the Organization could expect for 1995. A vote had been taken in Congress the previous day concerning voluntary contributions for international organizations in which a requested amount of US$425 million had been reduced to US$225 million. This cut would affect all agencies, and while there would not necessarily be a parallel cut in the ILO budget, a reduction was highly likely. A number of speakers had made useful suggestions and a working party would be a useful initiative to help the Committee examine methods of meeting the concerns of governments and perhaps present submissions to the Governing Body before November. The Americas group position in the Governing Body was that the original cost increases of 7.2 per cent should be fully absorbed, and the subsequent reduction to 6.2 per cent was a useful first step. National administrations were facing even harsher cuts: in her own department funds had been reduced by 45 per cent in real terms within the last eight years and international organizations should face the same discipline.

125. The representative of Nicaragua indicated that the Committee could neither abandon the draft programme and budget proposals approved by the Governing Body nor ignore the French proposal, which would avoid the Committee itself having to reduce the budget. Some Latin American countries had, by their very presence in the group of non-aligned countries, which supported the budget, agreed to adopt the budget as proposed. The Committee should focus on the motion proposed by the representative of France and vote as necessary on the basis of a realistic Swiss franc/US dollar exchange rate value of 1.16. Many countries might not be able to cope with their assessment amounts, but the activities of the Organization should not be impeded as a result. The proposal for a working group did not mean that France's proposal should be rejected, and the Committee should get down to solid discussion because members wanted to adopt a realistic and workable budget.

126. The representative of France appreciated the frankness and honesty of the representative of the United States in describing her Government's position, especially on problems related to fluctuations of the exchange rate. The Treasurer had made it clear that the Office would make every effort to try to resolve this problem. Countries would encounter exchange rate problems when they paid their contributions but at present the Committee needed to know whether countries intended to pay. This would clearly be a continuing problem for the next few years, but the Office needed assurances that contributions would be paid. If there were to be problems they needed to be faced now as the Committee had to decide whether to vote for the draft budget, as proposed by the Governing Body, while knowing that adjustments would need to be made later. He was against any action to modify the budget because this Committee did not have the competence to decide such matters. If a tripartite group were to be set up after the adoption of the budget by the Conference to make proposals for adjustments to the Director-General, this would be acceptable, but the basic difference between the two motions was whether the budget should be adopted as it stood now.

127. The representative of Argentina referred to the remarks made by the representative of Nicaragua and agreed that there was a consensus on the need for a realistic budget for the ILO. His Government had had to follow strict financial policies and reduce the domestic budget because of today's international economic conditions, and he hoped that international organizations would do the same. His country was in a similar situation to that of the major contributor concerning its ability to pay contributions, although to a different degree as their levels of assessment were different. If the major contributor could not pay in full, what would happen if other countries also could not meet their financial obligations? The level of voluntary contributions which Argentina had made to United Nations organizations in the past to cover emergency situations would no longer be forthcoming as it had had to make stringent internal financial adjustments. It would be interesting to know what percentage of the proposed budget was likely to be implemented and whether the proposals for adjustments to be decided by the Governing Body would be valid, given that the representatives of developing countries did not always have a voice in the Governing Body. In relation to the setting up of a tripartite working group, and in response to the statements by the representative of France, the Committee should not reopen the budget debate entirely but should agree on a realistic level, knowing that some uncertainty still existed. The Committee should give the responsibility of deciding what should be done regarding budgetary changes to the Governing Body but it could suggest a budget level whose contribution assessments were in line with their ability to be paid. This would help immensely in the efforts to reach a consensus.

128. The representative of the United Kingdom suggested the Committee gauge the level of support of members for the proposal put forward by the representative of France before considering the proposal for a working party, in order to avoid a circular debate. Consensus was needed and a decision should not be reached on a take it or leave it basis. If the Committee decided in principle that the proposal by France should be taken further the motion could be adjusted to include the setting up of a Governing Body working party which could begin work immediately after the Conference. A working party of the Finance Committee would not be able to reopen the debate on the whole programme, whereas if it were only to be concerned with the level of the budget then this decision could just as well be taken by this Committee.

129. The representative of Germany shared the view of the United Kingdom that, in an effort to seek consensus, the Committee should discuss and perhaps amend the French proposal by including in it the creation of a working party to give due consideration to possible budgetary cuts and to look for a more acceptable level for the budget.

130. The representative of Bangladesh said that the Committee had to decide whether to support the proposed budget level, and, if not, what kind of changes it should accept. The budgetary problems were compounded by the difficulties that some of the larger contributors had in meeting their assessments as well as by the appreciation of the Swiss franc against the US dollar. If adjustments were to be made in the programme and budget proposals, what kind of mechanism should be used? The Governing Body had already discussed and agreed on the programme and budget proposals, so although a working party could not go into the same level of detail to examine and suggest changes, it could at least provide broad guidelines for the Director-General and the Governing Body on the type of adjustments which could be made. However, it should not propose radical changes — it should let the Director-General recommend a balanced package of adjustments.

131. The representative of Canada thought that the search for consensus should continue and warned that to precipitate a vote might cause division in the Committee. The proposed funding level was the basic problem and this would be, as pointed out by the Treasurer, about US$579 million at an exchange rate of 1.16. In principle, Canada could accept its share of the financial burden, as it has always done in the past by paying fully and in advance, and it was willing to do so again — but only its share of a realistic budget, not an expenditure ceiling. Before precipitating a vote there should be more effort to find solutions, perhaps in a working group, whereby mechanisms could be explored to help countries which had expressed concerns on their ability to pay their contributions.

132. The representative of Finland supported the first part of the motion proposed by France, and the possibility of creating a working party might be incorporated in the second paragraph. Any working party should limit itself to finding ways of setting guidelines for the Office rather than examining the proposals in detail again.

133. Miss Mackie, speaking on behalf of the Employer Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, expressed appreciation for the opportunity to address the Committee again. The need for the Conference to adopt a budget for the ILO was widely accepted by the Committee and the fact that the present budget did not meet the requirements of all member States might wrongly lead the Committee to conclude that it should not be recommended as proposed. If that were to happen, it would be procedurally very difficult to propose a programme and budget to the Conference which had received the necessary tripartite consideration. The proposal by France would almost certainly receive the support of the Employers' group. If the budget were to be adopted in due course by consensus, it would be the funding levels of the programme and budget proposals that the Governing Body would be asked to reconsider and not the priorities of the programmes defined in it. These priorities were aimed at reducing unemployment and executing field and technical cooperation programmes as agreed on by the Governing Body with its tripartite structure. It would be both necessary and logical for the programme priorities to be referred back to the Governing Body for judgement on how these could be accommodated once the financial limits of the budget were known. The possibility of a working party had been mentioned. That would be regarded with some anxiety. However, the Director-General should work closely with the officers of the Governing Body and of its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, in preparing adjustments for the Governing Body to consider. Despite the current level of the dollar against the Swiss franc she hoped that the Committee would accept the programme and budget proposals as amended because if they were to be accepted and the forward purchasing of dollars carried out, any subsequent increase in the value of the dollar would lower assessment rates expressed in dollars. Member States should not focus on the current exchange rate of 1.16 as the rate only became important at the moment they paid their contributions, which might not be for another 12 months or more. She believed that the tripartite partners would wish to support the resolution of the Financial Committee to the Conference, and hoped that a consensus would emerge for France's proposal because any other ad hoc changing of the budget would be difficult for the groups to support. She hoped also that the Committee would accept the spirit in which these suggestions were made and it should know that the Employers' and Workers' groups only had the interests of the Organization at heart.

134. The representative of France, asked by the Chairman to explain the motion and the amendments proposed, explained that there were two problems facing this Committee. One related to the continuing need for helping the Organization to perform its functions, and in this respect there was a consensus that the Committee needed a budget. A second question was, how would the Committee manage the financial difficulties in the near future? Since the representatives of the United Kingdom and the Netherlands had put forward amendments to the motion, he suggested that those representatives be asked to explain the reasons behind the new draft proposals.

135. The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that the first paragraph in the original draft remained unchanged. The Netherlands and the United Kingdom proposed an additional sentence in the second paragraph, and the addition of a third paragraph. In the discussions of the previous day, the representative of Argentina had proposed to the Committee to set up a working group to consider suitable adjustments. Certain representatives had supported the proposal in principle, but expressed reservations concerning its form and the time-scale for reaching conclusions before the end of the Conference. The United Kingdom felt that the idea of a tripartite discussion beginning sooner than the November Governing Body was worth preserving, and that therefore the officers of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee should meet in consultation with the Director-General. He was not wedded to this exact formula. The notion underlying the amendment was that the Governing Body should start thinking now rather than wait for its meeting in November.

136. There were two elements to the new paragraph 3: the first one was to request the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to evaluate the impact of exchange rate fluctuations. Several countries had earlier expressed concerns over their ability to pay their assessments because of fluctuations in the exchange rate. Exchange rates varied continually and there would always be a difference in rates between June and the time when the countries paid their contributions. By its very nature, the exchange rate would always be disadvantageous to some countries so it would not be sensible to make the exchange rate an excuse for altering the size of the budget. But he suggested that the Office could possibly examine how and to what extent it had been affected by exchange rate fluctuations in the past, and make suggestions in the light of such examination.

137. Looking at the second element of the amendment, there appeared to have been a great deal of confusion about the US dollar and the Swiss franc value of the budget. What exactly were the figures the Committee had talked about, and what was the effect of exchange rate variations on those figures? A characteristic feature of the ILO budget was that it was expressed in different currencies. Life would probably have been made much simpler for member States if the budget was decided and expressed in terms of only one currency. The Governing Body should examine this proposal. The representative of the United Kingdom was grateful that the representative of France was ready to support the amendments and expressed hope that the Committee would also accept the motion in its amended form.

138. The representative of India pointed out that on the previous day he had supported the proposal by France. However, it was important to take on board some concerns expressed by other members in the Committee. He agreed with paragraph 3, although he felt that still more remained to be done in that respect. With regard to paragraph 2, he was not in a position to agree with the text as presently worded, and was happy to note that the United Kingdom delegate was not insisting on the exact wording of the draft. The idea of this amendment was to make sure that this Committee would request the Governing Body to examine the budget changes so that a more representative group consisting of representatives from other regional groups and tripartite constituents could look into the proposals. He further proposed the following amendment to the text: the second sentence of paragraph 2 should read as follows: "The Committee requests the Governing Body to discuss at its meeting on 24 June 1995 the said adjustments without delay, in close consultation with the Director-General." The effect of such an amendment would be to leave it to the Governing Body to find suitable mechanisms for adjustment.

139. The representative of Canada pointed out that after complying with the Chairman's request to reflect on the deliberations of the previous day, Canada would agree that in keeping with the spirit of the French amendment, it was important to arrive at a real budget through tripartite consultations. The revised proposals by Canada met many of the concerns of the Americas group, especially on how to manage the exchange rate over the years. Many member States were concerned that due to the impact of the exchange rate, there was a 25 per cent increase in assessments. However, she recognized the view of this Committee that one could not set the budget on the basis of exchange rate fluctuations. The position of the Americas group was that they wanted a zero nominal growth budget, and this should be possible if the Office made greater efforts to achieve savings in administrative expenses.

140. The representative of the Russian Federation raised two questions pertaining to the motion. Firstly, with regard to the meaning of paragraph 1, he wanted to know if the Committee had taken into account the Director-General's proposal to reduce growth in the budget to 6.2 per cent. Secondly, he noted that the Finance Committee had before it a budget which was not voted on in the Governing Body. He suggested that it would be better to use another term, such as "endorsed" or "recommended" instead of "voted".

141. The Treasurer replied that it was his understanding that the proposal by the representative of France had already accepted the level as recommended by the Director-General. Regarding the second point, he noted that if the first paragraph of the motion put forward by the representative of France was accepted, the rest of the wording in the paragraph would automatically disappear and the usual resolution would be submitted to the plenary session. The text of this draft resolution could be found in paragraph 9 on page 2 of the English version of Report II.

142. The representative of Sweden pointed out that after listening to the previous day's debate, he was tempted to suggest a fourth paragraph to the motion put forward by the representative of France, to request the Governing Body to consider changes in the Constitution of the ILO in order to give the Finance Committee a real task or, if not, to abolish it. Every other year the Finance Committee met to hold discussions which in fact had no serious consequences. Furthermore, as had been pointed out by the Employers' representative the previous day, this Committee was not expected to make any alterations in the budget either. Having read the Financial Regulations, he therefore decided to support the proposal by the representative of France and not to table his amendment.

143. The representative of the Philippines asked if the proposals by France and Canada could be translated into budgetary amounts.

144. The representative of Canada explained that on the previous day the Committee started with a reduced figure of approximately US$500 million, representing a 7.2 per cent increase in cost. The revised Canadian proposal was to absorb the cost increase and not the impact of exchange rates, in which case the relevant figures would become US$542 million, equivalent to 629 million Swiss francs. She hoped that the above figures would become more precise once the exchange rate was known.

145. The representative of Egypt, while agreeing with the text of the motion, pointed out that the amendments were not meant to impinge on technical programmes and the technical cooperation activities of the Organization. The amended paragraph should highlight the concerns expressed by others in the Committee about which programmes would be affected.

146. The representative of France pointed out that in the Finance Committee it was important that they spoke about the precise figures. The counterproposal and the figures proposed by the representative of Canada were not realistic. The budget figure originally proposed by the Governing Body had itself been the subject of extensive discussion and had since been amended by the Director-General, with the 7.2 per cent increase in cost being subsequently reduced to 6.26 per cent. The effect of the proposal was to take away the cost increase, or in other words ask the plenary to cut the budget, which was previously accepted by the Governing Body, by as much as 6.26 per cent. Further, the motion would be authorizing more adjustments, meaning additional cuts to the budget. He asked the Office to clarify the implications of the Canadian proposal.

147. The Treasurer, responding to the query from the representative of the Philippines, pointed out that if the paragraph proposed by the representative of France was accepted it would include the reduced figure as recommended by the Director-General of US$579,500,000, equivalent to 672,220,000 Swiss francs. The figure proposed by Canada was just over 629 million Swiss francs which was about US$542 million at the exchange rate of 1.16 Swiss francs for one US dollar.

148. The representative of Mexico pointed out that a great deal of confusion arose because the budget was set in US dollars and converted into Swiss francs. The Committee should adopt a realistic exchange rate, and should also take into account the ability to pay of the many countries in the Americas who had expressed concern about the proposals. His own country was in a serious financial crisis at the moment, and its ability to pay international organizations was in jeopardy. The proposal by the United Kingdom and the Netherlands deserved full support and should be translated into a resolution and then submitted to the plenary. Referring to paragraph 1 of the resolution he agreed that the word "voted" should be replaced by the word "recommended". If this Committee established a realistic exchange rate it would be moving along the right track, since the difficulties facing many member States were in large part because of exchange rate fluctuations. In spite of those difficulties the Committee should, however, accept the budget and set a realistic exchange rate. He concluded by endorsing the Canadian proposal as supported by the Americas.

149. The representative of Belgium pointed out that the Canadian proposal meant deleting the 6.2 per cent increase in cost in a budget already at zero real growth. It would be interesting to know the rationale behind this proposal. A reduction of 6.2 per cent was quite substantial and could endanger ILO programmes and activities and perhaps also the valuable balance in the ILO's tripartite structure. There was also a risk in reopening a debate on the priorities in the budget, as the Employers' spokesperson had remarked. It was up to the Governing Body to amend its own priorities set in the budget and he therefore appealed to the representative of Canada to withdraw the amendment and work towards a consensus.

150. The representative of the United States was more optimistic now about reaching a consensus, and found the proposal put forward by the representative of Canada quite attractive. The Director-General had already proposed reductions which limited the increase over 1994-95 to 6.2 per cent to compensate for cost increases, but all the members of this Committee were aware that the cuts would go beyond this level. The budget should reflect this reality, and the Committee should accept the proposal by Canada. It was logical to have a mechanism through which the Governing Body could decide on how and where cuts should be made, and she expressed support for the proposal made by India. She shared also the concerns expressed by the representative of Egypt regarding the need to protect field programmes and technical cooperation activities.

151. The representative of Argentina supported the proposal put forward by the representative of Canada. This Committee had to make a recommendation to the plenary, so it was only natural that it should consider the proposals put forward by the Governing Body in some detail. In paragraph 1 of the motion put forward by France, amended by the United Kingdom and the Netherlands, it would be useful to include the figures given by the representative of Canada. The level of the programme and budget proposed by the Governing Body was not realistic in relation to forecasted income, but in a spirit of compromise a revised level could be agreed which recognized contributors' ability to pay. It was not at all clear whether the interests of developing countries had been given proper weight in the Governing Body discussions. Their main concern was to ensure that technical cooperation programmes were unimpaired, and this should be borne in mind in any review of budget priorities. The budget should also reflect more accurately member States' ability to pay, as was stated by the representative of Mexico.

152. The representative of Tunisia, as spokesperson for the group of non-aligned countries, had listened to all the views expressed and hoped a consensus could be found. The group supported the motion proposed by France, as amended by the United Kingdom and the Netherlands, with respect to paragraphs 1 and 3, and this proposal constituted, in itself, a compromise solution to meet the concerns of a majority of the Committee. The additional amendment of paragraph 2 proposed by the representative of India was a valuable suggestion, but could perhaps be recast in slightly different terms. He proposed that it should read: "The Committee requests the Governing Body to decide at its next meeting on 24 June 1995 on the appropriate procedure to be followed for examination without delay of these adjustments."

153. The representative of South Africa congratulated the French, Dutch and United Kingdom representatives and supported the spirit of consensus in their proposals. He was however worried about figures as there could be, with the proposed amendment of Canada, a double cut in the budget. If the Committee were to make a 6 per cent cut now and then if later on countries could not meet their assessment obligations, there would be more cuts on this lower budget level. This would surely mean that his country and others would see a reduction in the programmes from which they currently benefited. If the Committee did agree to the cuts requested, did this mean that the countries asking for them could then meet their obligations in full? It would be useful to hear a reply to this question from the countries concerned.

154. The representative of Cameroon supported the French proposal as it conformed to normal procedures in the ILO whereby the Governing Body proposed a programme and budget to which this Committee could propose amendments. The amendment put forward by the representative of Tunisia deserved full support because any cuts in technical cooperation activities would affect developing countries. The Governing Body was the proper place for these discussions.

155. The representative of Panama supported paragraph 2 as amended by India because it would take pressure off the Director-General as he would have a tripartite group to assist him with any reductions that had to be made. Paragraph 3 of the proposal was in line with the Americas group concerns of the effect of exchange rate fluctuations on the budget and would serve to give more control over this factor in future budgets.

156. The representative of the Netherlands, speaking also on behalf of the United Kingdom, supported the amendment proposed by the representative of Tunisia. He asked also whether the word "adjustments" in paragraph 2 was also to include the potential adjustments of the number of posts established by the budget of the Organization.

157. The Chairman confirmed that the adjustments did indeed also include the potential adjustments of the number of posts established by the budget of the Organization.

158. The representative of Germany thought the discussion was becoming rather complicated as no new figures had been given. He understood that the French proposal was no more than leaving the budget as it was and making adjustments in the autumn, whereas the Canadian proposal requested cuts now, an initial 6 per cent, and more cuts later on based on this reduced figure. This would be a dangerous move and he could not support this proposal. He supported the proposal by the representative of Tunisia that the Governing Body decide on the procedure to be followed in the autumn, and he reminded members that if they were to make cuts at that stage they should do so only after the most careful discussion. If resources were not available the Organization could not carry out its obligations.

159. The representative of Spain preferred the budget to be adopted as approved by the Governing Body as he thought this level of expenditure was quite acceptable. He was aware of the effect of exchange rate fluctuations on the United States and members of the Americas group but they were not alone. His own country, although not a major contributor, would also have problems in paying its contributions because of the devaluation of the peseta. However, because of the importance of the ILO to its Members, the Committee should accept the budget as proposed by the Governing Body but if there were to be cuts they should be agreed by consensus even though they would help many countries by reducing their assessments. On the other hand, if a 6.2 per cent reduction would enable the Committee to come to a realistic solution, he would support it.

160. The representative of Trinidad and Tobago on behalf of the CARICOM group supported the motion of France, the United Kingdom and the Netherlands as it met the concerns of the Caribbean community countries.

161. The representative of the Philippines was willing to support any solution which would ensure a budget level of 672 million Swiss francs, the level agreed to in the Governing Body. He was not in favour of the Canadian proposal for further reductions.

162. The representative of France thought the Committee, contrary to appearances, was close to a solution. There was general agreement on paragraphs 1 and 2 of the motion and he supported the amendments of Egypt and Tunisia. The sole remaining problem was the need for consultation on the Canadian subamendment as the only differences were in the figures. The French proposal did in fact have figures, those of the draft programme and budget proposals. Canada also had a figure of US$542,347,000 which was US$37 million, or 6.25 per cent, less than that of the French proposal. While this was a substantial amount, it was still less than the arrears of certain countries. If the Committee were to agree to a cut of US$37 million, this would be proposed to the plenary but there was no guarantee that it would be accepted. The Committee did not have the right to take a decision in such a unilateral way without tripartite consultation, as it could not cut technical cooperation or regional programmes, and it was up to the Governing Body to make proposals. He suggested that a vote be taken on the Canadian proposal for a cut of US$37 million.

163. The representative of the United States, responding to the question put by South Africa about the level of commitment concerning payment of contributions which could be expected on a reduced budget, said she could not make a dollar commitment just now as budget hearings were presently taking place in Congress. She assured the Committee however that a decision to accept the budget level proposed by Canada would send a positive signal to her Government that the ILO was an Organization committed to meeting its mandate, that it deserved its reputation for strong financial management and leadership, and that member States took their decision-making responsibility seriously. She did not believe that it was outside the realm of the Committee, even though it was a non-tripartite body, to decide on this reduction as it would in fact be the Governing Body which would decide on any changes to priorities concerning technical cooperation and regional programmes.

164. The representative of Pakistan pointed out that developing countries looked towards developed countries for assistance and that they themselves were used to having to make budgetary cuts. From the debate he was disappointed to note that UN bodies were also at the mercy of the developed countries as even these organizations could not function without the contributions of the developed countries. He thought that the amended motion of France, United Kingdom, Netherlands, Tunisia and India, which he supported, would satisfy the concerns of the developing world and hoped that it would be carried by consensus, which regrettably was not at all certain at the moment. One thing was obvious, a shortfall of US$37 million in the budget would be a heavy loss and would affect the programmes of the Organization. The motion spoke of making adjustments in consultation with the Director-General and the Governing Body, which should satisfy the concerns expressed by other countries, but he hoped that any adjustments would be made in a way that ensured the provision of funds for priority areas.

165. The representative of Australia agreed with the German representative but after listening to the intervention of the representative of France he agreed that the Committee should not make such decisions without hearing from the Employers and Workers. It was true that the reduction in dollar figures proposed by Canada was less than the arrears owed and he would support the motion as amended by the United Kingdom, Netherlands, India and Tunisia.

166. The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic supported the consensus on the French motion as amended by the United Kingdom, the Netherlands and Tunisia, and felt the Committee should adopt the draft budget as accepted by the Governing Body. An extraordinary situation required extraordinary measures and although exchange rate fluctuations were normal, wide fluctuations in the Swiss franc/dollar exchange rate were abnormal and he hoped the Organization would reflect on a solution to such a sensitive and technical issue. He supported the suggestion of the United Kingdom that in future the budget should be in one currency, so that the problem would not recur. As Committee members were only representatives of governments they were not qualified to make the proposed changes because they should be accepted by the social partners. Although this budget might be a heavy burden for some, it should be adopted so that programmes for the regions and other assistance to developing countries would not be affected by budgetary difficulties.

167. The representative of Costa Rica supported paragraphs 2 and 3 of the combined French, Netherlands and United Kingdom proposal, but supported paragraph 1 as amended by Canada. However, she could accept the French proposal on paragraph 1 on the understanding that the working party established to prepare guidelines concerning budgetary cuts for the Governing Body would contain representatives of the various regions, together with employers' and workers' representatives, and experts on technical cooperation activities.

168. The representative of Sudan thought that the Committee should try and reach consensus on the French proposal as amended by the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, Tunisia and India. The Committee was facing many difficulties in trying to take decisions on behalf of the Conference on the budget decided by a tripartite Governing Body, and the opinions of the Employers and Workers needed to be considered. His country supported the French motion as amended, but it should be quite clear that any future reduction in the budget should not cause cuts in technical cooperation and regional assistance programmes.

169. The representative of Ireland thought the Committee was near consensus, except for the difference of 6 per cent in the level of the budget. In the text as amended there was the safeguard of the Governing Body to review any budgetary cuts made by the Committee and, as the Committee was close to agreement, he wondered, in the spirit of consensus, if the members could meet half way.

170. The representative of Uruguay supported the Canadian proposal in paragraph 1 but supported paragraphs 2 and 3 as amended. He thought paragraph 1 was the best compromise even though it involved a cut in the level of the budget as the Committee could then adopt a realistic solution.

171. The representative of Brazil said that the position of his country was very similar to that of other Latin American region countries and during the last Governing Body some of them had expressed reservations on the budget. Had the Organization taken full account of these reservations? His Government would certainly do its best to meet its obligations but it was not sure to what extent it could pay increased assessments. The budget should be feasible for all countries, but whatever cuts were made should not affect technical cooperation programmes. The Committee should understand clearly that the Organization would have to operate on a lower budget, but this should not impede progress towards a consensus.

172. The representative of Chile agreed with the views expressed by members of the Americas group and supported the Canadian proposals on paragraph 1.

173. The representative of New Zealand supported the motion of France as amended by the United Kingdom, Netherlands and Tunisia. She understood the concerns of the Americas group and supported their call for the Office to absorb more of the cost increases. The Office deserved to be commended for the reforms it had already undertaken, and, as other speakers had remarked, the adjustment procedure specified in paragraph 2 of the motion would provide an opportunity to make further cuts in overhead costs while protecting technical cooperation programmes. The French proposal as amended deserved full support.

174. The representative of Honduras supported paragraphs 2 and 3 as amended by the United Kingdom but like other Americas group countries supported the paragraph as amended by Canada. Cutting the budget involved risks but the Office should be able to absorb cost increases without affecting technical programmes.

175. The representative of Peru supported Canada's proposal and the subamended paragraph 1 because it would allow scope for the Office to make administrative adjustments while finding innovative ways to protect technical cooperation and field activities. Paragraphs 2 and 3, as amended by the United Kingdom, the Netherlands and Tunisia, could be supported as they stood.

176. The representative of Bangladesh supported the amendment of Tunisia but stressed that the adjustments referred to in paragraph 2 should protect the field and technical assistance programmes of the least developed countries, especially those of sub-Saharan Africa. Programmes for the alleviation of poverty and unemployment should also be fully safeguarded.

177. The representative of Norway understood the difficult situation of some member States in relation to the sharp increase in assessments in dollar terms, but had some concerns regarding the Canadian proposal. If a cut of 6 per cent was made now, it was not clear what cuts would be made later or where they would lead to. He supported the motion as amended by the United Kingdom, the Netherlands and Tunisia.

178. A number of points of order relating to procedure were raised and the Chairman adjourned the meeting so that the Legal Adviser could attend.

179. The Legal Adviser informed the Committee that the list of speakers had been exhausted before it went into recess and it was appropriate now to consider the decisions that had to be taken. The correct procedure was to consider each subamendment of the first paragraph of the motion, before proceeding to the adoption of the final text for the paragraph, which itself could then be adopted or rejected. The same procedure would then be applied in turn to the remaining paragraphs of the motion.

180. The representative of Mexico observed that the total of the budget for 1996-97 was more than $110 million higher than that for the present biennium, and over the last four years had grown by about 40 per cent in dollar terms. It was clear from the points of order that had been raised that the text of the motion was not acceptable to all member States. The Americas group would prefer the text to be agreed by consensus rather than by vote and he suggested that the meeting should be adjourned at this point and discussions resumed the following afternoon.

181. The representative of France said that the purpose of this meeting was to vote on the motion that he had proposed. The representative of Mexico had now proposed an adjournment and this should be voted on immediately.

182. The Legal Adviser pointed out that article 15 of the Standing Orders of the Conference referred to the procedure for motions, resolutions and amendments in the plenary of the Conference. As far as Committees of the Conference were concerned, these matters were governed by article 63. Motions as to procedure could be moved without previous notice and it was therefore appropriate now to consider the motion proposed by the representative of Mexico.

183. The representative of France was not in favour of the motion put by the representative of Mexico because no useful purpose would be served by postponing the discussion.

184. The Committee then proceeded to a vote by show of hands on the motion put forward by the representative of Mexico. The result of the vote was as follows: in favour of the motion — 26; against the motion — 45; abstentions — 5; the quorum was 55 and the vote was therefore valid; the motion was lost for lack of a two-thirds' majority.

185. The Chairman then declared that the Committee could proceed to a vote by show of hands on the subamendment put forward by the representative of Canada. The text of the motion, including the subamendment, was as follows: "The Finance Committee of Government Representatives approves the draft programme and budget as recommended by the Governing Body, by adopting an exchange rate of 1.16 Swiss francs to 1 US dollar, but with full absorption of cost increases."

186. The representative of France said that this seemed to imply a reduction of about $37 million in the budget and he asked the representative of Canada to clarify exactly what was meant by the phrase "full absorption of cost increases".

187. The representative of Canada said that her intention was that the 6.26 per cent increase for inflation in the Director-General's revised proposals should be reduced to zero, in other words, that the Programme and Budget for 1996-97 should be based on $466,510,000, the same as for 1994-95.

188. The Treasurer said that the effect of the subamendment proposed by the representative of Canada would be to remove in full the original 7.23 per cent cost increase included in the draft Programme and Budget for 1996-97 approved by the Governing Body. The amended budget total, with full absorption of cost increases, would then be $545,368,000, which, at an exchange rate of 1.16 Swiss francs to the dollar, equated to 632,627,000 Swiss francs. The original figures were $579,500,000 and 672,220,000, giving differences of $34.13 million and 39.6 million Swiss francs respectively.

189. The representative of the Philippines observed that the original motion put forward by the representative of France proposed zero real growth, whereas the effect of the proposed subamendment would be negative real growth.

190. The representative of Canada said that the intention of the subamendment proposed was for zero nominal growth, which in the present economic climate equated to negative real growth.

191. The Committee then proceeded to a vote by show of hands on the subamendment put forward by the representative of Canada. The result of the vote was as follows: for the motion — 13; against the motion — 57; abstentions — 6; the quorum was 55 and the vote was therefore valid; the motion was lost for lack of a two-thirds' majority.

192. The Committee then proceeded to a vote by show of hands on paragraph 1 of the original motion proposed by the representative of France. The result of the vote was as follows: for the motion — 63; against the motion — 4; abstentions — 11; the quorum was 55 and the vote was therefore valid; the necessary two-thirds having been attained, the Committee therefore adopted for proposal to the Conference the original text of paragraph 1 of the motion proposed by the representative of France.

193. The Committee then proceeded to paragraph 2 of the motion contained in document F.C./D.7.

194. The representative of India observed that there might be some confusion with this paragraph in view of the subamendment that he had proposed, which had been followed by another subamendment proposed by the representative of Tunisia. In view of the subsequent discussion, he wished to express full support for the subamendment proposed by the representative of Tunisia. He formally withdrew his proposed subamendment and expressed appreciation to those who had spoken in favour of it.

195. The Chairman said that the text of paragraph 2 of the motion contained in document F.C./D.7 now read as follows: "The Committee requests the Director-General to present, as appropriate, to the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and to the Governing Body, whatever adjustments might prove to be necessary and that these adjustments should not affect the technical cooperation and field programmes; and further requests the Governing Body, at its next meeting on 24 June 1995, to decide on the procedures appropriate for examination without delay of the said adjustments."

196. The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran requested that the word "affect" should be replaced by the word "reduce".

197. The Chairman noted that there were no requests for the floor and declared paragraph 2 adopted after incorporation of the amendment requested by the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran.

198. The Committee then proceeded to a consideration of paragraph 3 of the motion contained in document F.C./D.7. There were no requests for the floor and the Chairman declared the paragraph adopted.

199. The Treasurer announced that paragraph 1 would not appear in a formal resolution to the Conference because it was subsumed in the normal resolution for the adoption of the programme and budget. Paragraphs 2 and 3 would appear but there would be minor editorial changes to show that the requests were being made by the Conference, not this Committee.

Resolution for the adoption of the Programme and Budget for 1996-97 and the allocation of the budget of income among member States

200. The Committee had before it document F.C./D.9, which contained details of the Programme and Budget proposals for 1996-97 and a draft resolution for submission to the Conference. At the previous sitting the Committee had authorized the Office to carry out the forward exchange contracts for the Organization's US dollar requirements for the 1996-97 biennium. These contracts had now been formally executed, and the appropriate figures now to be inserted in the formal resolution were:

Budget of expenditure	579,500,000
Budget of income	579,500,000
Budget rate of exchange	1.16 Sw.frs. to the dollar
Equivalent budget total in Swiss francs	Sw.frs.672,220,000

201. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt the resolution for the Programme and Budget for 1996-97, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Financial implications of holding a Maritime Session of the International Labour Conference

202. The Committee had before it Report II: Draft Programme and Budget 1996-97 and other financial questions, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning the holding of a Maritime Session of the International Labour Conference in January 1996.

203. The representative of the United States recalled that this subject had been discussed at the last session of the Governing Body, and her Government still maintained the same view that funds from one biennium should not be carried forward to cover expenditure in the next. If this resolution were to be approved, did it automatically follow that a Maritime Conference would be held in January 1996?

204. The representative of France had expressed approval at the last session of the Governing Body for a Maritime Session of the Conference in January 1996 and was still of the same opinion. Maritime Sessions should continue as a separate event and not be subsumed within the annual Conference. If funds were not available for a Maritime Session in January 1996 it should be postponed to the beginning of the 1998-99 biennium.

205. The Treasurer, in reply to the query from the representative of the United States, said that the resolution related only to the financing of the Maritime Session. It was for the Governing Body to decide whether the Maritime Session would be held, but if it so decided, it would be financed in the manner described in the proposed resolution.

206. The representative of Belgium agreed with the views expressed by the representative of France that in view of the financial situation it would be useful to study the possibility of postponing it until the 1998-99 biennium. To avoid needless expenditure this decision should be taken as soon as possible.

207. The Chairman recalled that the Governing Body would be meeting on 24 June 1995 to begin discussions on activities for the 1996-97 biennium. A decision on the Maritime Conference would be one of the matters for urgent consideration.

208. The representative of Tunisia agreed that the Maritime Session should be postponed given the costs involved and the financial difficulties facing the Office. There might be a procedural difficulty unless the date mentioned in the proposed resolution was deleted.

209. The Treasurer replied that the resolution could only be implemented if the Conference was held in January 1996 because of the timetable for closing the accounts for the 1994-95 biennium. This resolution would only apply if the Governing Body decided to hold the Maritime Session, otherwise it became redundant.

210. The representative of Germany also thought the Maritime Session was an important event in the ILO calendar but because of financial pressures it would be better postponed to 1998-99.

211. The representative of the United Kingdom agreed with previous speakers who had suggested postponing the Maritime Session to a future biennium. Since the financial picture was so bleak there were probably many other calls upon the Programme Flexibility Reserve so perhaps a resolution in these terms should not even be put to the Conference, and if it were not, how should the Conference be informed?

212. The Treasurer replied that perhaps the Legal Adviser could be asked to make the resolution more conditional before it was submitted to the plenary.

213. The representative of Denmark said it was several years now since the last Maritime Session was held and it would be better not to postpone the session planned for January 1996.

214. The representative of Greece agreed with the previous speaker and asked why the January 1996 Maritime Session should be postponed if it was to be financed from the current budget.

215. The Treasurer replied that the Governing Body would be given a mandate by the Conference to look at programme and budget adjustments and this was one it would examine. If the Maritime Session was to be held in January 1996 then the draft resolution now before the Committee would have to be passed by the Conference.

216. The representative of China recalled that the last session of the Maritime Conference was in 1987 and many speakers had expressed support for the session planned for January 1996. If it could not be held then because of financial constraints it should be held as soon as possible thereafter.

217. The representative of Belgium said there was widespread support for a Maritime Session in January 1996, both at the last Governing Body session and in the present Committee. A lengthy debate was unnecessary and the resolution should be adopted.

218. The representative of Egypt agreed that the Maritime Session should be postponed because of the financial situation in the ILO.

219. The Deputy Legal Adviser stated that the text of the proposed resolution related only to the financial arrangements for a session in January 1996 and therefore did not prejudice any decision that might be taken later as a result of the other resolution submitted to the Conference requesting the Director-General to propose adjustments to the 1996-97 programme and budget to the Governing Body for consideration. In order that there should be a clear understanding on this point, he suggested that the Chairman confirm that the draft resolution under discussion would be without prejudice to the other resolution just referred to.

220. The Chairman provided the suggested confirmation.

221. The representative of Russia thought that some possible misunderstandings might be avoided if the words "in January 1996" in the preamble to the resolution could be preceded by the words "if it is held".

222. The representative of Tunisia supported this suggestion because it would clarify the request to the Governing Body.

223. The Chairman, in reply to a query from the representative of Greece, confirmed that the resolution applied only to the funding of the Maritime Session if it was to be held. The decision on that point would be taken by the Governing Body.

224. The Treasurer, in reply to a query from the representative of Panama, confirmed that the figures in the table on page 2 of document F.C./D.9 were precisely the same figures that had been provided during the course of discussion. The two adjustments incorporated in this table were the reduction of about $4.5 million to allow for the revised forecast for Swiss inflation and the re-costing of the proposals from an exchange rate of 1.45 Swiss francs to the dollar to 1.16 Swiss francs to the dollar. The Office would be happy to provide more detailed explanations at any time if members of the Committee so desired.

Appendices

225. A table showing the proposed summarized budget of expenditure and income for 1996-97 is appended to this report (Appendix I), together with a summary of the proposed expenditure budget for 1996-97 by Major programme (Appendix II).

226. A statement showing the contributions due from each member State for 1996 is also attached (Appendix III).

Chairman and Reporter.

Resolutions submitted to the Conference

Resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for 1996-97 and the allocation of the budget of income among member States

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

- (a) In virtue of the Financial Regulations, passes for the 65th financial period, ending 31 December 1997, the budget of expenditure for the International Labour Organization amounting to US$579,500,000 and the budget of income amounting to US$579,500,000, which, at the budget rate of exchange of Swiss francs 1.16 to the US dollar, amounts to Swiss francs 672,220,000, and resolves that the budget of income, denominated in Swiss francs, shall be allocated among member States in accordance with the scale of contributions recommended by the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.
- (b) Requests the Director-General to present, as appropriate, to the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and to the Governing Body, whatever adjustments might prove to be necessary and that these adjustments should not reduce the technical cooperation and field programmes; and further requests the Governing Body, at its next meeting on 24 June 1995, to decide on the procedures appropriate for examination without delay of the said adjustments.
- (c) Requests the Director-General, the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and the Governing Body to evaluate the impact of exchange rate fluctuation upon the programme and budget, as well as the form in which the US dollar and Swiss franc values of the Director-General's future programme and budget proposals are presented.

Resolution concerning the holding of a Maritime Session of the International Labour Conference

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Noting that the cost of holding a Maritime Session of the International Labour Conference if it is held in January 1996 is estimated at $2,427,000,

Wishing to distribute this cost over the 1994-95 and the 1996-97 biennia;

Decides that, notwithstanding article 17.1 of the Financial Regulations, up to $1,961,000 of the cost of the Maritime Session be charged to the accounts of the 1994-95 financial period against programme 140.6, Programme Flexibility Reserve (up to $1,086,000) and Major programme 295, Unforeseen expenditure (up to $875,000).

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) – We shall begin this morning with the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. SHAMENDA (Workers' delegate, Zambia) – I wish to congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents on their election to guide the proceedings of this very difficult 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

Allow me also to pay tribute to the Director-General of the ILO for his brilliant Report, the theme of which is Promoting employment.

The Director-General could not have chosen a better theme. Employment is work, and is what creates the wealth of nations. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights recognizes work as a right, but how many countries attending this Conference have treated work as a right?

The employment problem is a growing reality which unfortunately most of the governments in developing countries tend to ignore because they are overwhelmed by its magnitude. Indeed, the structure of employment is to a large extent being influenced by changes in the world economy and in particular by the process of globalization. At the same time national economies are putting their forces together in order to form trading blocs. These two forces, globalization and trading blocs, are threatening developing countries with marginalization, especially Africa and its economy in the international economy. This is so because their participation in the international community remains very minimal and they continue to experience unfavourable terms of trade in the world market.

At the country level, the employment problem is not seriously addressed by the economic reform measures most developing countries are currently undertaking under the IMF and the World Bank via structural adjustment programmes. As a result these economies are still faced with serious employment problems characterized by high levels of unemployment, underemployment, child labour, inequality and poverty.

These problems are likely to persist in most developing countries for three main reasons. First, their current lack of policies on employment. Secondly, even where employment policies exist they do not form part of the overall macroeconomic policy, which means that the employment policy is not clear. Thirdly, the lack of consensus in policy formulation and implementation. Governments tend to sideline the other social partners, thereby negating the spirit of consultation as well as tripartism, even where the structure exists.

I am happy to note that the World Summit for Social Development recognized that poverty is on the increase at an alarming rate in countries where the IMF and the World Bank structural adjustment programmes are being implemented, and that unemployment is also on the increase. It is therefore important for the ILO to insist that governments implement the commitments of the Summit and in particular those concerning employment creation and broad-based consultation.

In my country, Zambia, the economy is faced with declining output and very low per capita income on the one hand, and high unemployment and accompanying poverty on the other, even though the Government is boasting that it has brought inflation down and that there is economic growth. One may ask, what economic growth can one boast about if the majority of citizens has been sentenced to absolute poverty? The majority of our people cannot even afford to buy new clothes and have been reduced to wearing second-hand clothes from developing countries.

Even using the Government's own statistics, a glance at our national income statistics show that between 1990 and 1994 economic growth occurred only in 1993. The real GDP growth in 1990 was –3.6 per cent, in 1991 it was –2.5 per cent, in 1992 it was –6.1 per cent, in 1993 it was +5.1 per cent and in 1994 it was –9.7 per cent. These figures confirm that there has been a general decline in the GDP averaging 0.5 per cent each year between 1991 and 1994.

With a population increasing at about 3.3 per cent per annum, the growth of real GDP per capita has averaged –3.4 per cent. This implies that per capita income has dropped by an average of 3.4 per cent per year, with the highest drop of 9.7 per cent in 1994. Looking at sectoral growth, vital sectors of agriculture, mining and manufacturing recorded negative growth in most of the years under review. In comparison with other developing countries undergoing structural adjustment programmes, the Zambian case is a disaster. Whereas the average growth in 1994 for all of Africa was 3.3 per cent, with countries going through structural adjustment reforms averaging 4.5 per cent and 2.9 per cent for non-reforming countries, Zambia recorded a 6.6 per cent decline.

The statistics on Zambia further reveal a drop in the standard of living, in spite of the so-called achievement vis-à-vis macroeconomic stabilization and the creation of an enabling environment. The income distribution patterns in Zambia mean that the backlash of economic decline is bound to be felt most by the low-income groups. The decline in the agricultural sector of 19.8 per cent in 1994 has obviously affected the income of the majority of the Zambian population, as most of them obtain their livelihood from that sector. The statistics also show some correlation between growth in the agricultural sector and overall GDP growth. Therefore, any meaningful growth-oriented adjustment programme will have to address the problems besetting the agricultural sector.

The employment situation in Zambia is now characterized by high levels of unemployment and underemployment, with extremely low wages, particularly in the rapidly expanding informal sector. Since employment in the formal sector has been declining, the larger portion of the labour force is employed in the informal sector, which is predominantly agriculture. In 1991, agricultural employment accounted for about 65 per cent of the employed labour force in the informal sector, while the informal sector as a whole accounted for about 78.2 per cent of the employed labour force. In 1991, the rate of unemployment was estimated at 22 per cent of the labour force, which is quite high by any standard.

Associated with the informal sector is the high prevalence of child labour, although this problem is being underplayed in my country. According to the report by the Government Department of the Central Statistical Office on "Employment trends", child labour has increased, particularly among children between the ages of 7 and 12 who are part of the labour force and are reputedly economically active.

The major cause of this phenomenon is the fact that due to economic hardships and the effects of the structural adjustment programme, many households find it extremely difficult to live on the earnings of the head of the household, thus children have to work to supplement the household income. On the other hand, employers find children to be less demanding and cheaper.

Between 1991 and 1994, employment in the formal sector declined by an average of 2 per cent per annum. While employment was declining, redundancies and retrenchments increased.

The decline in formal sector employment could be attributed to many factors. Ranking high on the list is the negative effect of structural adjustment reform measures which the Government is vigorously implementing in an attempt to resuscitate the ailing economy. The adoption of a stringent fiscal policy implies reductions in budget deficit through large cuts in government expenditure. A cut in public sector employment becomes one of the means to attain this.

Similarly, the policy of wholesale economic liberalization and privatization has aggravated the employment problem.

In short, the employment problem is real and constitutes a threat to the social fabric of society. This is so because the most affected groups are youth and women. Therefore, practical and workable solutions are required to remedy the situation. This also requires the concerted efforts of all social partners. The first step would be the formulation of a practical and workable employment policy, which should form an integral part of the overall economic policy. The employment policy should incorporate a clear labour market policy, able to address issues such as redundancies and retrenchment as well as cope with current labour market issues. Secondly, governments, particularly those implementing structural adjustment programmes, have to revise their current economic policies and move away from policies which tend to contract the economy in order to achieve balanced growth.

Finally, consensus and consultation on policy issues among the social partners are a necessity and very important. Social partners must be involved in the design and formulation as well as in the implementation of policies to ensure their success. Governments in developing countries must also ratify the ILO Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988 (No. 168) to enhance and support the respective employment policies to be implemented.

Original Russian: Mr. MAYKO (Employers' delegate, Ukraine) – Firstly, I should like to congratulate the President on his election to chair this session of the International Labour Conference. This confirms the authority he enjoys in the world community.

The Report of the Director-General reflects the attention paid by the International Labour Organization to the problem of employment in so far as it represents a crucial social and economic evil.

The Report considers the profound changes taking place in this area and in our opinion shows fairly conclusively that society as a whole, the authorities, employers and even trade unions do not fully appreciate the gravity of the employment problems appearing in today's economy, and are unable to give a long-term forecast of the development of employment and the social consequences of changes in employment.

Therefore, the emphasis placed by the ILO on this problem is timely and necessary and we are sure it will promote, if not the solution, then at least the right approach to the problem.

The problem of employment has increased over the last five years, as we see from the Report, both in industrially developed countries and developing countries. None the less, the new developments in these countries which go beyond cyclical variations in employment do not call for immediate alarm. The problems of employment in these countries can be solved by making better use of existing mechanisms, modernizing them in part and, at the same time, gradually introducing new mechanisms, if necessary.

The situation is quite different, however, in transition economies. The Report notes the difficult and strange employment situation that has arisen in countries with transition economies as a whole and in the CIS in particular, including in Ukraine. The situation is bizarre because although industrial production in Ukraine has fallen by more than 30 per cent as compared with 1991, registered unemployment is 0.3 to 0.4 per cent. These data which reflect the situation as at June 1994 are cited in the Director-General's Report.

Industrial production in Ukraine has fallen dramatically. In a number of sectors it is only 60 to 80 per cent of 1991 levels. However, the number of registered unemployed has not changed significantly.

Many enterprises stand idle for weeks and even months, while the staff are on unpaid leave.

Hidden unemployment has become a major characteristic of the economy in the CIS, and in Ukraine in particular. It is estimated that 20 to 25 per cent of those employed in industry are affected.

The Report has tried partially to explain this phenomenon. We agree that a person may want to maintain links with the enterprise to some extent because of the social benefits it may provide. However, these benefits are dwindling and their role is becoming negligible.

ILO reports which have been discussed at conferences in Ukraine have noted a further trend, namely a considerable fall in the number of people working in industry as a result of voluntary redundancies. At the same time, however, the workers involved are reluctant to register as unemployed. The difference in the number of persons dismissed and of persons registered as unemployed has, in a few years, reached 3 million. These people work in the informal sector or go abroad for temporary work.

In 1994, ILO experts started paying more attention to finding ways to speed up the integration of hidden unemployment into the official economy. In the Report of the Director-General, we see a more cautious approach to this problem. In our opinion, this change in the position of the ILO should be welcomed. Indeed it is precisely this hastening of reforms which has aggravated social problems in transition countries, including Ukraine, and has also squeezed Ukraine out of its traditional export markets, and caused a sharp drop in domestic markets.

We support the opinion expressed in the Director-General's Report, that an increase in unemployment would be "socially catastrophic" and "would surely threaten the social sustainability of the transition process and breed political instability".

We think the fears expressed in the Report are justified. Stimulating the wide-scale bankruptcy of enterprises until the market system becomes operational and until rational incentives begin to have an effect on operators will not necessarily lead to an obvious gain in effectiveness.

We support the Report's conclusion that there is plenty of justification for a more gradual approach to liberalization of trade, privatization and the restructuring of enterprises.

We are grateful to the ILO for the more realistic assessment of the reforms in the CIS countries. We also feel that the situation in transition countries requires particular attention. Perhaps the issue of partial employment in the transition countries should be studied separately – for example at the 83rd Session of the Conference.

The main way to solve the employment problem is by bringing about an economic recovery. As the industrialists and entrepreneurs of Ukraine begin to tackle this problem, they will be counting on at least the understanding, if not the support, of entrepreneurs in the West. Of course, we understand that it is up to us – the Ukrainian industrialists and the Ukrainian people – to solve these problems. The Ukrainian industrialists, together with employers of all types of entrepreneurial activity, have now set up the League of Employers. The aim of the League is to work on many of the problems raised in this Report.

Now I come to the problem of home work. In the sense used in the Report, in the years of the command economy, home work in Ukraine was virtually non-existent. It existed only in arts and crafts. Since the collapse of the command economy, the development of home work has been limited by the economic crisis. But in the future, this type of work might develop and it might help us to solve the employment problem. Therefore, discussion of this issue, in our opinion, is essential. It is important to share the experiences of many countries on this question.

I would like to share with you my opinion, which is based on my participation in the last two years at the sessions of the Conference. I think this is a kind of a school. It is a school where people with different opinions and countries with various economic situations, come together to discuss problems which are of interest to them all. One of these problems is social protection for their nations and for their working people. We are very happy that these problems are being solved through discussion and profound deliberations. It would be a very good thing if those experts who put forward proposals and recommendations on how to go about restructuring in the CIS, in Eastern Europe and in the newly developing countries, could discuss and analyse our problems as completely. Perhaps many of the ills and problems would not exist today if there were more discussion and help for us. Unfortunately the consultants sent from many of the developed countries to the CIS States and Eastern Europe see very clearly from their own point of view how we should restructure the economies of our countries. But they do not take into account the need for an in-depth understanding of the specifics of our countries. If you went to a doctor and said you had a stomach ache, and that doctor started cutting you up to see where the problem was, what would you think of that doctor? What would anyone think?

Unfortunately, the experts who come to transition countries issue recommendations, but the recommendations produce such painful results, that even those economic achievements which these countries had already obtained are threatened. The country then finds itself in a situation of utter misery, which was unprecedented before restructuring.

I think the ILO should try and work out exactly what the definition of restructuring is. It should have a correct assessment of restructuring. I think that any restructuring should be a way to improve the lives of people. Restructuring should not mean a drop in living standards which is so pronounced as to require decades to recover even to the levels which existed in these countries prior to restructuring. I think if a more correct assessment were to be given to these developments, then many government leaders who have brought restructuring to their countries and their countries to the brink of collapse would not be rewarded for the success of restructuring when their economies have completely fallen apart. I think the ILO's task here is very important. The ILO must take action. It enjoys a good deal of authority and can do much to help at least those countries now beginning to restructure to avoid the serious losses which we have seen in the past, thus avoiding social tension in those countries.

In conclusion, I should like to thank you for giving me the right to take the floor at such an important forum. I think that the issues which are discussed here are of vital importance to our countries, and I am sure that these discussions will be useful in dealing with these questions.

Original Spanish: Mr. GARRIDO MENDOZA (Government delegate, Venezuela) – I congratulate the President on his election to lead the deliberations of our Conference: it is an honour for Latin America and one more step in the incorporation of our peoples to the cause of social justice at the international level.

Never as now have the governments and the peoples had the opportunity to carry our social policies of benefit to the weaker economic classes. The commitments which were made at the World Summit for Social Development, which took place in March in Denmark, are of such importance for developing countries and for the States which have not been able to overcome the crisis, that the ILO has to do everything to carry them out as swiftly as possible.

Venezuela is going through a crisis of civic values, in education, in the social ambit and in many other areas, but above all in the financial sector. The crisis comes in the midst of a period of high inflation due to the immense fiscal deficit which the previous governments had incurred, and to the excessive enrichment of the business class, whose speculative frenzy knows no bounds. But the people and the Government are going about their business in the conviction that, in a short space of time, they will be able to exorcise the demons of recession.

We know that society is living in the dark shadows of a breakdown in financial and industrial relations, but repeated opinion polls show a great deal of trust and confidence in Dr. Rafael Caldera, our President, and in his Government.

The joining together of will and capacity shows that it is not in the character of the Venezuelan people to let themselves be overcome by misfortune and despair. Therefore the country is making progress towards the solution of its most pressing problems, with singularly positive results for its democratic institutions.

Much of the Government's effort has been devoted to dealing with the financial sector, whose collapse threatened to engulf the savings of the poor and the middle classes, to stabilize the economy and set it on a path to growth, to control inflation and implement poverty-reducing social policies.

The absence of effective laws meant that for a short time the Government had to suspend some individual economic rights, so as to overcome the crisis and control inflation. Nevertheless the Government did everything that it could to maintain the social safety net, and to overcome social conflicts through dialogue and consultation between employers and trade unions. Unemployment, underemployment and low pay in Venezuela are problems that we are not trying to hide, but the Government is trying to encourage solutions involving savings by the workers. Through management agreements among public bodies these funds will be invested in large-scale housing projects for purchase by the workers. In this way jobs will be created.

The Ministry of Labour which I am heading is now being restructured in order to adapt it to the problems which we foresee will arise for workers in the future. One important aspect of this restructuring is the improvement of the Employment Service which will improve the functioning of the labour market and thus make it easier for the unemployed to find jobs.

Small and medium-sized industrial enterprises have retained their access to credit. The Government has also proposed a law whereby foreign investors can invest in priority public works projects and retain management control until they have recovered their investment and made a profit.

At the same time, I would also like to highlight the "anti-inflationary commitment" jointly subscribed by the economic ministries and myself with the trade union organization, community organizations, the Central Bank of Venezuela and the employers' organizations in order to bring about recovery and create a competitive economy on the basis of equity, social justice and the control of inflation.

I congratulate the Director-General for the emphasis placed in his Report on employment promotion in the face of the harmful features of globalization and its troublesome concomitant social disintegration. Unemployment and the proliferation of poverty are extremely serious matters and they require new and radical policies, transcending the traditional framework. The cold war has been superseded by a climate of social and industrial anguish, anxiety compounded by a good dose of existential angst. The ILO must act in the international arena and, within each member State, through formulae which, in the image of the legal recognition of a person's identity, take into account the particular situation of each country, so as to allocate its technical assistance teams and its many specialized services on the basis of a new criterion of aid, namely international social justice.

The ILO should monitor carefully the activities of the WTO and study the formulation of consensual agreements which, by arbitrating their differences, could enable governments to support the so-called "social clause". By this is understood the need to harmonize and generalize basic social and labour rights in the different regions of the world in such a way as to reduce the effects of unfair competition. This way ahead must be accepted because development should be the result of tripartite procedures, but it should not thereby be assumed that the social clause on its own is the solution to all the workers' problems.

Full employment will not be possible so long as we live under the current harmful circumstances which stand against the principles underlying the place of labour in society, and of justice for the deprived, for children, for abused women, for the elderly left to their own devices, in circumstances of unspeakable sadness.

It is not enough that the United Nations should intervene in extreme situations to attenuate the violence of localized armed conflicts or the sorrowful exploitation of defenceless workers. The new social policy must have elements of compulsion so as to bring to an end, once and for all, the exploitation of man by man, and to prevent technological progress from devaluing work or financial gain from promoting production methods of a kind which ignore the demands of social justice.

Wealth cannot be an end in itself. To dignify wealth it must be understood that it should be at the service of man and of all men, as a legitimate security for the defence of dignity. To be sure, all governments agree on the need to adopt radical and revolutionary measures to fight unemployment and extreme poverty, but they must also be on their guard to ensure that such measures do not end up by violating the rights acquired by workers in all countries.

It is all very well that the World Trade Organization should encourage economic development, but those who lead it should not forget that labour, being as it is the accumulation of creative and positive human will, is an inexorable factor in production.

It is unacceptable that millions of women and children in many countries labour away without any protection whatsoever. It is a disgrace that there has been no fierce condemnation by international organizations like the ILO of the irresponsible indebtedness which burdens our peoples with the payment of well-nigh usurious interest payments, holding back our countries' development, or of the hunger and misery suffered by entire peoples, cities and nations, which was placed in full view at the World Social Summit.

If on the one hand the WTO is becoming the forum for a new multilateral diplomacy favouring the globalization of the economy, on the other hand the ILO should become a powerful tool of social justice to overcome poverty, indigence and the cruel inequalities affecting half the planet.

An entente is necessary between the WTO and the ILO on the basis of a pact conciliating economic advantage with a greater recognition of the efforts of the working population.

The twenty-first century should be the dawn of a new era, of a new social climate, a new outlook, from which solutions and relief will come forth for the daily sense of failure of those who cannot work because there are no jobs and those who do work, but under inhuman and cruel conditions.

To be sure, there is no rational proposal other than that which values and promotes well-paid employment offering opportunities to all men and women, young and adult. The chronic unemployment affecting the world is a dangerous and dramatic scourge which places at risk the destiny of humanity as a whole, as the twentieth century dies out amidst wars over localistic rivalries, nationalism, and religious fundamentalism.

We cannot allow the twentieth century to end on a note other than that of a solid hope for change in social structures. The new century and the new millennium must not be allowed to begin amidst tragic inequality or dramatic suffering. The future of humanity rests on international understanding, peaceful coexistence and the search for the ideals of international social justice and corresponding action as the fundamental values underlying sincere solidarity among all men. Only in this way will the peoples enjoy a future of stability, enjoyment and peace.

Original French: Mr. VITTORI (representative of Pax Christi International) – The major preoccupation of our era and one with which politicians claim to be obsessed is the struggle against unemployment. The Report of the ILO Director-General, Promoting employment, is therefore in keeping with the spirit of the time. We are happy therefore to associate ourselves with those who congratulated the Director-General and his colleagues on a document containing a wealth of information, comparative data, analyses and forecasts to which the Director-General has given a note of optimism, in spite of many factors of uncertainty.

Having said that, I should like to share with you our opinions on two issues which appear fundamental to us. They concern workers as people and work as an end in itself. We are still all imbued with the idea that work – of whatever type or purpose – is an activity, for which he or she who is doing it, is remunerated by a wage, fee or by profits. Experience has shown us that we have to be very careful about theories which are wrongly called “laws” even though there are no known legislators to whom we may appeal. Their mechanism necessarily seizes up when they find themselves incapable of integrating an unknown variable: the human factor.

Thus, the theory of supply and demand should necessarily be the outcome of spontaneous harmonies. The problem is that we do not know how many generations it will take for this to happen. Meanwhile, cruel and intolerable injustices prevail. First of all it was necessary to impose morality on conditions of work and to protect the health and dignity of workers, in particular children and women. In view of the rules of competition, this could not be left to the goodwill of the entrepreneurs. Any entrepreneur who, before the relevant protective legislation was introduced, had – in the textile industry – abandoned, for example, child labour or the 16-hour day, would surely have gone bankrupt.

The genius that instilled the pioneers of the humanization of working conditions after the First World War was that they brought the international community to accept that, as is stated in the Constitution of the ILO, the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries.

From the outset and up to the 1980s, harmonization of conditions of labour was targeted solely at improving these conditions and achieving their widespread adoption. Today, preserving social achievements is put in jeopardy by a hard-line liberalism which triumphed with the collapse of communism. Greatly fearing the risk of contagion from dictatorship by the proletariat – on whose behalf the Soviets took power in Moscow – tripartism fortunately gained acceptance as a reasonable substitute for class struggle. Paradoxically, the collapse of dictatorships, which in no country was a proletarian dictatorship, has brought the danger of others taking their place without any real counter-force. Money has no fatherland. It knows no boundaries be they physical or moral, and financial transactions are executed online at a global level. Is it possible to imagine the consequences of capital movements estimated at $1.2 billion a day. Following the nobility with their titles, the nineteenth-century captains of industry, who at least had a face, and the multinational corporations, who at least had a name, we are now entering a new era in which the economy is becoming dematerialized. Now, the power which never belonged to the workers is even slipping through the fingers of the bosses and – to an increasing extent – the governments themselves. Who can say that he really is the master of his own purse, that he can be free of corruption and can stand up effectively to drugs and weapons trafficking.

Faced with the danger that society will become dehumanized, there is only one value that should be defended because from it flow all the others. “The human being who is and must be the principle, the subject and the object of all institutions”. This statement by Pope Paul VI in Octagesima adveniens is in perfect symbiosis with the principles of the Declaration of Philadelphia, that "labour is not a commodity". And that it is not a commodity is precisely because man is not a capital asset – precious though he would be if he were one. I would therefore like to express my regrets that we find in an ILO document the phrase "human capital". It is certainly out of place. But what is man? That definition may vary depending on the culture we are talking about, but surely man is not simply a producer and a consumer. In that context, promoting employment could just be an end in itself.

According to the geneticist Professor Albert Jacquart, there is no difference, between human beings, in race or hierarchy, yet every person is unique. There are nearly 6 billion people living on earth today, but genetic imprinting, it is said, will permit reliable identification of each individual.

These two scientific postulates lead us to a universal system of morals, and ethics for labour. The abolition of apartheid in South Africa is a tangible success, and the ILO contributed to this through its weight in international public opinion. The second postulate makes unacceptable any solution which would sacrifice a person or a group or a category of persons against their will for what might be considered the greater good. Thus, in flagrant contradiction with ethics or humanism, or deep spirituality, certain financial institutions or intergovernmental organizations may – in political and macroeconomic decisions which appear to be reasonable – become by their consequences responsible for crimes against humanity. Economic science and trade mechanisms should not be independent of ethical requirements. How can we, in virtue of unconditional world trade liberalization, accept that prison labour – it is widespread in the world's largest country – child labour or production in countries which do not acknowledge freedom of association should lead to the loss of jobs in democratic countries? It may be understood that workers in poorer countries may temporarily accept labour conditions which fall below ILO standards, but if trade union rights and collective bargaining rights are granted them, then they will achieve improvement and progressively reach the social protection level of their brothers in the developed countries.

The second basic question which we mentioned earlier, is labour as an end in itself. Unemployment is often the consequence of technological progress which gives rise to increased production with less workers. Surely the best way to reduce unemployment would be to reduce the working week, and finance – through public authorities – activities which are useful and necessary to society, but which according to the laws of the private market are not marketable. The obstacle to these very simple solutions is uncontrolled international competition. This problem has to be resolved not by mean-minded protectionism, but by protection of human rights throughout the world.

Last June, Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, Secretary General of the United Nations, stated from this rostrum, "we have to rethink the basis of an international project for life". The work of the ILO could make an essential contribution to this challenge – a challenge which we must face; but the ILO must consolidate itself, demand its rightful place in the United Nations system, and not give up anything from its special calling. Those who weaken it will only bring dishonour upon themselves.

Original German: Mr. THÜSING (Employers' delegate, Germany) – I would like to stress what a good idea I find it that the Director-General decided to submit an abridged version of World Employment 1995 as his theme report to this session of the International Labour Conference. This sign, namely that employment issues will be given more importance in the work of the International Labour Organization in the future, is a positive sign of change.

Above all, the analytical part of the Report provides a sound basis for discussion. It tries to avoid describing situations in black and white terms and attributing things to single causes; it also distances itself from outdated clichés and, what is most significant, acknowledges that private enterprises, be they national or multinational, are indispensable vehicles for economic and social progress.

This for me is the central message of the Report. The globalization of the economy is not a scourge which must be checked; it is rather a driving force for economic growth in the world and therefore the most significant prerequisite for employment promotion.

This driving force needs to be harnessed; however, the extent to which it will generate additional jobs will depend upon whether stumbling blocks in the various policy areas are removed and other positive aspects are promoted. Here, too, the Report contains important aspects which deserve to be supported and meet with approval. I am making this very clear at the outset before I address some of the considerations and proposals which in my view require a more critical comment. They concern mainly the part dealing with the industrialized countries.

The Report does not exclude the effects of monetary policy on growth, employment and income; admittedly, it does mention in several places that there is a danger of inflation as a result of an expansive monetary policy. But the Report considers that a restrictive monetary policy constitutes a far greater danger as it can clearly only lead to deflation. Although it does not warn very strongly against an expansive monetary policy, it is far more adamant about the dangers of a restrictive monetary policy. Either, the Report says, a restrictive monetary policy leads to a lowering of the real income of the employers – as has been witnessed in the United States – or to a very high level of unemployment as in the European monetary system, especially in the Federal Republic of Germany.

This juxtaposition between inflation and deflation is too simplistic and detracts attention away from the vital objective – namely, monetary stability. Either the patient is suffering from fever or he dies from hypothermia; but the possibility that there might be some kind of state in between, namely good health, seems to be overlooked.

In fact, I would say that economic growth is only possible on the basis of long-term and reliable monetary stability. If, in the interest of short-term apparent successes the rules of monetary stability are ignored, the cure will be very painful. Inflation has adverse effects on everyone – but most of all on the weak who can least escape it. At least from this point of view, it should have been expected that the importance of monetary stability could have been given due recognition in the Report.

But this is not the only point I wish to make. There is a consistent tendency to avoid the basic conflict of objectives which consists of promoting jobs for jobseekers, on the one hand, and securing and even extending the level of income and social protection for those who have jobs on the other hand, by relying on the State.

If this approach were to be restricted to the short-term merely to serve as a means of assistance or trigger effect, it could be acceptable and even justify a temporary easing of strict budgetary terms. This is exactly what we are doing in Germany in the face of an unprecedented, special situation and a tremendous challenge. But we have very good reasons for not having chosen the easier path, namely, taking refuge in an easing of monetary policies. In the Report of the Director-General this is openly deplored and given as a reason for the recession in Europe. I would like to say that without the strict and stability-oriented monetary policy of the German Bundesbank, we would not now be in the midst of an economic upswing but much more likely at the beginning of a new recession.

Irrespective of this specific example in the Report, which I obviously cannot let pass, I feel that there should have been a clear statement to the effect that an excessive burden on the budget does not lead to the creation of jobs but in fact destroys them in the end.

Not only does the Report fail to say this but it is clearly sympathetic with the old recipe, namely, that it is better to subsidize jobs rather than finance unemployment. This recipe is very tempting; but we cannot expect it to lead to a cure. What is the difference between subsidizing unprofitable enterprises to maintain jobs and directly subsidizing jobs? In both cases scarce resources are removed from productive use and opportunities for self-financing the build-up of jobs are lost.

The idea that unemployment may be curbed by creating additional jobs in the public service sector is particularly problematic. Rather than overstaffing the public service, efforts should be made to adjust to areas which are truly necessary and can be financed. In the short term, this may be at the expense of jobs but in the medium term it will consolidate the basis for employment creation through economic growth. The employment rate cannot be raised by increasing public employment but by decreasing it – and this is not made very clear in this Report.

Indeed, it does not allow any further discussion on this matter because it considers given income and social protection levels as taboo subjects. Only on the issue of working time flexibility does it reveal a certain clear-sightedness. All other issues are closed in advanced because it advocates the theory that most job market regulatory forces are advantageous to the economy because they are a reaction to the failure of the market and therefore improve its efficiency. This kind of argument may be used to justify any kind of regulation of the job market. It is not the illness which dictates the therapy, but the therapy which is proof of the disease.

At the beginning of my statement, I pointed out that, in spite of my critical comments, I had a basically positive view of this Report. I would like to emphatically reiterate these words. In many respects, the Report is on the right path. And it is to be hoped, by the next World Employment Report, that we shall be even further along this path.

Original French: Mr. MUGABO (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Rwanda) – I should like to congratulate Mr. Rosales Argüello on his election to preside over the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. We are sure that given his wisdom, skill and clear-sightedness he will ensure that our work proceeds in a spirit of democracy and mutual understanding.

I should also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, on the clarity and accuracy of his Report which attests to the wisdom with which he has been guiding our Organization for the last few years.

My country, Rwanda, has recently suffered genocide and terrible, macabre massacres that have devastated us and whose painful, manifold consequences will be with us for a long time to come. This genocide had been long planned, and was carried out meticulously and cruelly. It was organized by a blood-stained, fascist, ethnic and regionalist government. Soldiers and armed militia men of the former regime were intensively trained to use the worst methods of inflicting slow and cruel death. For instance, severing joints in legs to prevent escape, and amputating legs and arms and leaving people to bleed to death.

These militia men received weapons, ammunition and millions of grenades. Barricades were erected at each street corner, the borders were closed and hills were surrounded so that nobody could escape. Worst still, people were ordered not to leave their homes.

At zero-hour the macabre stroke of death was struck and the whole country was faced with death in a single night. Places of worship, community halls and sports stadiums were transformed into slaughter houses, and Rwanda became an enormous open-air cemetery.

Rwanda continues to suffer from these hours of cruelty; the moral, physical and material repercussions are clear for all to see. Just a few examples: over a million deaths by genocide, an estimated 300,000 to 400,000 young orphans with no support; between 200,000 and 250,000 widows; many physically and mentally disabled persons; thousands of young girls who were cruelly raped and who are now mothers to children of the very men who executed their families; Aids finds here perfect conditions to multiply and will hence continue the genocide; and we have many refugees in neighbouring countries.

In addition to these mental and physical ravages, there are the material and economic repercussions, in particular the destruction of the economic infrastructure, the pillage of banks, houses, shops, the destruction of the environment, such as forests, rivers and lands which have been polluted by thousands of corpses.

This is the catastrophic heritage of the genocidal government of the Second Republic.

Faced with this disaster, we have not remained inactive. We set up the Government of National Unity on 19 July 1994 which solemnly committed itself to manage the country so that the people of Rwanda can have the hope of living together again, and to make every effort to reconcile the population, re-establish the institutions, revitalize economic and social activities and increase contacts with all social partners. In this framework we have already begun negotiations between the Government, the workers' associations and the employers' organizations in order to find solutions to the problem of unemployment and to initiate economic recovery.

In the area of public sector employment we have initiated a system open to all, namely, that all positions are open to all levels of the civil service and are all filled by competition. The principle is that the person is employed on the basis of his experience and skill.

In the private sector all categories of national workers are recruited by employers without any discrimination. The requirements to give ethnic information, a feature of the former government, on work cards and forms for declaring workers has been abolished. The people themselves are favourably responding to the Government's call and are courageously getting down to work.

In spite of this work by the Government and the people of Rwanda, much remains to be done. That is why we are appealing to the international community for help. Many countries, international organizations and non-governmental organizations support us already, and we should like to thank them. We are very grateful to them. But given the scale of our needs, we invite the international community to show yet greater generosity.

This appeal relates in particular to the following areas: revitalizing of socio-economic activities, vocational training since we have lost many trained executives, and the gradual reduction of unemployment through the development of the informal sector and the agricultural sector. In fact, employment promotion would be inconceivable in our country if these two sectors were not developed.

Now, coming to the agenda of the International Labour Conference, I can already assure you that we will accede to the extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), to activities in the non-commercial services sector. This is nothing new, because we already practise this form of inspection and the extension of the Convention will only confirm our practice.

As for safety and health in mines, Rwanda is prepared to ratify a Convention in this area.

Homeworkers constitute one of the largest and most worrying categories of workers, particularly in our country. We have to help these workers to establish or join trade unions so that they can defend their rights. Social security for this category of workers will be one of the concerns of our Ministry.

Rwanda greatly appreciates the aid and assistance which it is given. This aid began already in 1963 after the independence of our country and continued in various sectors until the interruption of activities when the genocide began. Many projects under way were suspended, and this is a source of great regret to us. In particular the projects to assist in consolidating training and advanced training structures, the construction and equipping of the national centre for vocational training and advanced training. This training is all the more urgent since our country lost many of its experienced, skilled executives during the genocide. The buildings of the centre were damaged and the equipment was destroyed or pillaged. We would like the centre to be repaired and equipped with the assistance of the ILO.

We should like the ILO to resume its activities in Rwanda, to assist us in restarting our projects. These projects have been developed and submitted to the ILO, and we hope the ILO will respond positively and promptly.

My country will not refrain from denouncing before the international community any policy based on oppression, racism, exclusion and exploitation of man by man.

Our country would also like Africa to be represented, within the ILO in particular, to a greater degree and to see a larger number of responsible posts being attributed to it.

I wish every success to the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

Mr. BERGE (Minister of Local Government and Labour, Norway) – I am honoured once again to have the opportunity to address the International Labour Conference. On behalf of the Norwegian delegation I would to join the previous speakers in congratulating the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election.

The high unemployment rates we see all over the world represent the most urgent challenge to the ILO. I strongly support the involvement of the ILO in today's important discussions of how to achieve increased employment and permanent reduction in unemployment. A high and stable rate of sustainable job creation is the basis for sound economic and social development.

The challenge to all of us is to obtain full employment. The lack of job opportunities entails an enormous waste of human resources. It also leads to exclusion and social disintegration. Unfortunately, there is no simple solution to this problem. The situation calls for sound national policies, reflecting needs and priorities in individual countries, as well as enhanced international economic cooperation.

For the Norwegian Government a main objective and priority is to achieve full employment and to secure social welfare. This requires continual economic growth, where employment considerations should be part of planning and budgeting in all sectors of society. This planning is based on sound public finances.

A second pillar is to tackle problems in the labour market by emphasizing active labour market measures, once unemployment has increased. International experience indicates that major efforts are required to prevent it from remaining at a high level. An active labour market policy requires economic resources, but most of these resources can be redistributed from passive benefits, where such measures exist.

The Director-General has produced documents that give a solid platform for the present debate and future work of the ILO. They clearly show the magnitude and complexity of the employment issue. I very much support the regular updating of the World Employment 1995 Report which gives a most interesting and useful survey of the employment situation and trends in various parts of the world. I fully support the ambitions of the Organization to play a major role in this field.

There are several reasons why the ILO should have an active role in employment issues:

- Strategies to increase employment and to get labour markets to function better should be viewed in a broad perspective, taking working conditions and social aspects into account. The tripartite structure of the ILO, with the social partners as active members, will often secure better and more balanced solutions.

- International labour standards are a major asset for the ILO, and should be part of all policies for economic development and job creation.
- High unemployment and underemployment have increased the need for professional advice to develop tripartite cooperation and industrial relations, especially in developing countries and countries with economies in transition.

The ILO has an important role to play in every international arena where employment and social issues are debated. The ILO should strengthen its collaboration with the Bretton Woods institutions, as an advocate for socially acceptable solutions as part of structural programmes. I consider the ILO's decision to strengthen its capacity in this direction a wise step. In addition, let me take this opportunity to congratulate the ILO for its very successful contribution to the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen. I warmly welcome the prominent role given the ILO in the follow-up to this Summit.

Creating new jobs is important, but they should be decent jobs, not forced labour or jobs where the safety and health of workers are neglected. Besides the employment issue, the ILO's mandate of fundamental human rights for workers must remain a sustained priority. A basic condition for securing decent working conditions is the freedom to organize trade unions and the right to collective bargaining. But the ILO must also continue to grant its highest priority to the fight against child labour, forced labour and discrimination in work on grounds of race, sex, etc.

With regard to the financial situation of the ILO, I would like to stress that it is more important than ever for the ILO to set clear priorities. As member governments, we have a responsibility to determine which programmes should be given priority whenever budget adjustments become necessary. In my opinion, the technical programmes should be kept at their present level of activity. The programmes on labour standards and human rights and on employment are particularly important. The activities within the programmes on industrial relations, working conditions, equality for women and all the field programmes should also be kept at their present level as far as possible. I think this approach is necessary to ensure that the ILO continues to carry out its basic mandate.

If necessary, possible consideration for budget cuts should first of all go to overhead costs, such as general management, personnel, internal administration, document services and meetings.

In conclusion, Norway will continue its support of the ILO and the reform process launched by the Director-General and the Governing Body. We will continue to pay our contributions to ILO in full and on time. I will take this opportunity to encourage all member States to do the same. No international organization can be guaranteed that they will not have to face budget shortfalls in the years to come. But we should do our best to ensure an economic basis for this important Organization so that we can maintain the ILO's priority activities at the present level.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE GRANTING TO CAMBODIA OF PERMISSION TO VOTE UNDER PARAGRAPH 4 OF ARTICLE 13 OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) - We shall now proceed to the record vote on the resolution concerning the granting to Cambodia of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, for which a quorum was not reached at yesterday morning's sitting.

(A record vote is taken)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) - The result of the record vote on the resolution concerning the granting of permission to vote to Cambodia in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization is as follows: 351 in favour; 2 against; 1 abstention. The quorum is 258. Since the required quorum has been attained, the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE GRANTING TO CHAD OF PERMISSION TO VOTE UNDER PARAGRAPH 4 OF ARTICLE 13, OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) - We will now proceed to the record vote concerning the granting of permission to vote to Chad in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) - The result of the record vote is as follows: 354 in favour, 1 against, 2 abstentions. The quorum of 258 having been attained, the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) - We will now return to our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. TABANI (Employers' delegate, Pakistan) - In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. Let me once again congratulate the President on his election to chair this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I also congratulate the three Vice-Presidents on their well-deserved election which shows the respect they enjoy in their respective groups. I am confident that under their able and dynamic leadership this session of the Conference will thoroughly discuss the issues before us to be able to set us on course towards positive results to ensure sustainable development.

I take this opportunity to compliment the Director-General on a very comprehensive Report on the theme of the ILO's role in Promoting employment so well described by him as "the primary challenge for economic and social policy in countries at all levels of development across the globe". As a follow-up to the conclusions of the World Summit for Social Development, this abridged version of the report World Employment 1995 will surely stimulate greater attention to employment issues in the work of the ILO.

The President set the pace of this session of the Conference in his opening statement when he spoke of the clear challenge presented to the ILO to devise new mechanisms for achieving social justice in the context of trade liberalization and the globalization of the economy and stated that "the ILO because of its tripartite structure and expertise, had a special role to play in the field of employment and social development".

His Excellency Zine El Abidine Ben Ali, President of Tunisia, in his address to this session of the Conference, went even further when he said that tackling the problem of poverty, exclusion, unemployment and social tensions has become a priority for all States and is of particular importance to the ILO's continuing work of confirming universal values which are inherent in human rights and in strengthening agreement and economic prosperity.

Promoting employment is an extremely delicate and indeed a priority issue given the present economic climate in both industrialized and developing countries. The Report has correctly analysed recent developments and stated the challenges facing the world today as well as the effects of these challenges on the labour market.

The Director-General in his Report points out that it is imperative for national and international organizations to increase their coordination and cooperation in order simultaneously to create and implement economic and financial policies, together with social policies, with particular emphasis on the generation of employment. In order to do this, countries will have to implement major changes and undertake action that will lead to sustainable economic growth, socio-economic recovery and stimulate private enterprise, thus attracting investment in capital and human resources. What is also required is flexibility in labour laws which should not protect only those who are employed, but particularly those who are not employed and are seeking work.

We agree with the Director-General that changes in employment conditions in South Asia have on the whole been positive although falling well short of the dramatic success of East Asia. It is also correct to say that growth has been of shorter duration, as South Asian countries have only recently embarked on economic reforms towards a more open and market-oriented economy. However, South Asian countries have a very large rural population. What is really impeding growth in South Asian countries is well explained in table 3 which shows that during the period 1965 to 1991 agricultural employment in developing countries dropped from 72 to 61 per cent. With agricultural employment now predominantly in low-income countries where productivity levels are low, no wonder world poverty is concentrated in the rural areas of these countries.

In the chapter on "The challenge of global full employment", the Director-General has recalled the three key features of the system that ensured full employment in the post-Second World War period until its collapse in the early seventies leading also to the collapse of the Bretton Woods institutions. There is no doubt that the whole world today is held captive by a group of speculators who indulge in foreign exchange transactions, with well over 90 per cent of all transactions being speculative, the daily flows of which now regularly exceed the combined foreign exchange reserves of all the G-7 governments. This speculation in exchange rates has resulted in the destabilization of the economies of both industrial as well as developing countries.

It is under these conditions that developing countries have taken up, in spite of being burdened with debts and problems arising out of structural adjustment, the challenge of ensuring productive employment for their expanding workforce. This challenge has acquired added urgency both for sustaining long-term growth and eliminating poverty.

We in Pakistan are fully alive to the challenges facing our economy. In addition to a policy of accelerated industrialization, privatization and deregulation, the Government of Pakistan is engaged in the creation of a climate conducive to attracting foreign private investment. An ambitious strategy to generate employment is under way. Sizeable investments in infrastructure, the energy sector, emphasis on export-led growth and increased absorption of manpower in both the agricultural and non-agricultural sectors of the rural economy are some of the important features of this strategy.

I would be failing in my duty if I did not express my thanks to the ILO Bureau for Employers' Activities, NIKKEIREN of Japan, the Nordic employers' federations and others who have cooperated with the Employers' Federation of Pakistan by contributing to our technical programmes on productivity improvement, occupational safety and health and so on, as well as the progressive elimination of child labour through IPEC. We also welcome the creation of an Enterprise Task Force under an Assistant Director-General for the promotion of enterprises, in particular small and medium-sized enterprises. This is a step in the right direction, namely that of employment creation.

In conclusion, allow me to say that we in Pakistan, along with other developing countries of the region, look towards the ILO for a positive direction to help us succeed in our efforts for sustainable economic development which is the only instrument to promote employment. The discussions and the ideas generated in this plenary session of the Conference may change the fate of millions who are otherwise stuck in the grip of poverty, never hoping to reach the decent living standards enjoyed by millions of their counterpart workers in the developed regions of the world. The frustration of the masses should not be allowed to reach a level wherein stability in the socio-economic sector so meticulously pursued by the ILO may have to be surrendered in favour of social anarchy. All of us have to make joint efforts to evolve a socio-economic world order which eliminates the imbalance between the haves and have-nots, the rich and the poor, the North and the South and the industrialized and the developing countries.

Mr. NYAMUHOKYA (Workers' delegate, United Republic of Tanzania) – First of all, on behalf of the Organization of Tanzanian Trade Unions, and on my own behalf, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the President, on his unanimous election to the presidency of this session of the ILO Conference. It is a very high and important responsibility for which I wish him every success.

Secondly, I would like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for his timely presentation of a comprehensive Report on Promoting employment. This important message is a true reflection of the deliberations by Heads of State and Governments at the Summit in Copenhagen. The deliberations were mainly focused on the eradication of poverty, the expansion of productive employment, and social integration. I believe the introduction of the agenda is timely, because the entire world is witnessing a very critical economic moment, especially in the developing countries where workers are losing their jobs daily in incredible numbers. Although the decline of the economy in some countries is aggravated by violence and sabotage, in most countries it is a result of structural adjustment programmes, leading to a massive retrenchment of workers.

The imposition of economic conditionalities by the Bretton Woods institutions on most of the developing countries has adversely affected workers' employment security.

In my country, Tanzania, the retrenchment process has claimed more than 100,000 jobs, both in the Government and the public institutions. It seems there is no quick solution to this problem, as the process is still continuing.

Although the government commitment was to create more jobs with the introduction of many private sector investments from local and foreign sources, and at the same time strengthen the informal sector to absorb more people in self-employment schemes, the plans have not succeeded as anticipated.

Unemployment and poverty are the major constraints prevailing in the world today, especially in the developing countries, and it is discouraging to see that these two social ills are increasingly spreading without an effective solution. The structural adjustment programme which was intended to revamp the economy in the developing countries has on the contrary accelerated a sharp rise in unemployment and poverty.

We are proud of the ILO and its tripartite structure. It is the only United Nations organ with this effective structure based on social partnership; however, the eradication of unemployment and poverty is still, and will continue to be, a problem.

However, the ILO and its tripartite membership have been assigned a special role to play by the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen in March 1995, which involves the implementation of the Summit's conclusions in the field of employment and social development. This implies that the ILO tripartite membership must be fully involved in the activities of the international system at the country as well as the global level.

Although the primary responsibility for employment-creation policies must be exercised by the concerned governments with the involvement of the social partners with whom they interact, the ILO must be ready to come forward to their assistance in formulating effective national strategies so as to achieve and expand employment and improve the quality of employment in full respect of workers' rights.

Together with the implementation of the above, efforts must focus on the ratification and implementation of the basic ILO Conventions and Recommendations. Although some Conventions and Recommendations have been ratified by certain governments, their implementation has always been a problem. It is the responsibility of the ILO to provide follow-up to ensure that minimum standards of the ILO are not jeopardized.

In view of the foregoing, I would like to call attention to the price of labour in my country where, in addition to the harm done to workers by retrenchment, the minimum wage is far too low to fulfil basic human requirements. The trade union movement is still fighting for a meaningful minimum wage. We are denied this important human right. The minimum wage currently stands at US$16 a month. By way of intensifying our protest against this low minimum wage paid to the workers in my country, the trade union movement decided to present its case against the Government before the Industrial Court of Tanzania. On the basis of the information presented, the Court recommended that the Government pay a minimum wage equivalent to US$135.50 a month. The Government's response to the Court, however, was to announce a minimum wage of only US$27.50 a month, effective July 1995. This is evidence of the extreme marginalization of workers in my country. As a result the workers, through their trade union movement, will continue fighting for achievement of this basic human right which they have been denied for many years.

Ms. PEDERSEN (Workers' delegate, Norway) – The Norwegian Confederation of Trade Unions welcomes the Report of the Director-General on the promotion of employment. The OECD and the European Union too have recently addressed the employment issue in major studies and white papers.

While the EU's studies are regional and the OECD's analyses are global, they to a large extent deal with the same problems and issues. While the international trade union movement has been troubled by the right-wing bias and hostility to trade union rights and goals of the OECD report, the ILO report has no such general bias. It thus constitutes a good basis for the further discussion on the problems ahead.

The report acknowledges the need for a global perspective and the futility of combating trade and openness by resorting to inward-looking and backward strategies such as protectionism. It rightly points out that the job potential of trade and economic progress outweighs the job losses if it is accompanied by progressive and adaptive strategies.

Such strategies include the protection of labour rights in the transition process, as well as the implementation of acceptable social standards. In this context the Norwegian Confederation of Trade Unions underlines its disappointment at the lack of progress made in the implementation of a social clause by the World Trade Organization and the OECD in international trade agreements. The lack of progress in this field will eventually lead to protectionist strategies. Therefore, we expect the ILO to put more pressure on the World Trade Organization and the OECD for the implementation of a social clause.

An error concerning the description of "the Scandinavian model", on page 75, should be addressed. The report describes this model as one which aims at "guaranteeing employment for all under satisfactory conditions by creating employment in the public sector, at the risk of building up inflationary pressures and depleting public finances". I am sorry to say that in Norway no such guarantee has been given. However, the three parties, the Government, employers and trade unions, have agreed on a joint national effort to create full employment. The public sector has been developed in areas such as health care, education and labour market institutions, where additional services were needed.

The social partners have taken the responsibility to cope with imbalances and lack of competitiveness by adapting the income policy. A larger part of profit increases in industry should be used for new investments and job creation. Through active labour market policies and a counter-cyclical budget policy, the Government has succeeded in minimizing the recession, and has restored growth and carried out structural adjustment. As a result, unemployment is relatively low, and it is decreasing in Norway.

The globalization of the economy means that there are new challenges for our economic and social policies. Traditional instruments, and especially national mechanisms aimed at regulating production, employment, prices and wages, have lost their power. Throughout the report, it is stressed that the globalization will require structural adjustment nationally and locally, with the social costs which this will entail, including, inter alia, a higher level of unemployment.

There must be another way of doing it. To balance national budgets by resorting to unemployment and increased poverty is socially and morally unacceptable. However, we need national policies which are adapted to the new economic framework. What such policies will entail in terms of changes compared with today's situation will vary from country to country. Here, the ILO report could be more specific. Solving the unemployment problem on a global scale also requires the establishment of new international institutions which can coordinate economic and social policies across borders, in particular when it comes to macroeconomic instruments and the regulation of trade with capital and currencies.

In order to ensure that development towards a more open and productive economy is not hampered, the industrialized countries, the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund must support the countries with the most serious problems, inter alia, by way of remission for countries with huge foreign debts.

Another concrete measure could be to orient general development assistance towards more direct assistance to export-related activities, to health care, education and training. Development assistance could, to a larger extent, be made conditional upon the actual implementation by the authorities of reforms, instead of promises about future reforms.

We need good international cooperation on labour standards. In the competition for foreign investment, many countries will be tempted to lower their minimum standards for wages, for the working environment and protection against dismissal, and for training, etc. Binding international cooperative action is needed to prevent "dumping" of labour and a deterioration of workers' rights.

The ILO must continue to play an active role both to ensure better conditions and to put pressure on individual countries to ensure that established standards are being implemented.

Bearing in mind last year's debate on the work of the ILO, I am pleased to note that about 115 ratifications of ILO Conventions took place in 1994. Countries from all continents were represented. This shows that the Conventions are usable, and that we have to draw up new Conventions for areas not yet covered.

Mr. EVANS (representative of the Trade Union Advisory Committee to the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development) – I would like to join others in congratulating the President and Vice-Presidents of this session of the Conference on their election. I am pleased to have the opportunity to address you on behalf of the Trade Union Advisory Committee to the OECD. The OECD is a governmental organization which looks at issues from an essentially economic point of view. It does not have a tripartite structure. Nevertheless, the views of organized labour and business are heard through two recognized advisory committees. The trade unions grouped in the TUAC cover 67 million workers in the OECD countries. They are also a substantial part of the Workers' group of the ILO which is perhaps one reason for the excellent relationship between the TUAC and the workers' group. In the future we feel that this could be mirrored by closer work between the ILO and the OECD themselves.

The Director-General's Report to this session of the Conference shows why the work of the ILO is of crucial importance to our societies and our economies in the years ahead. Many governments including those at the G-7 meeting in Halifax this past weekend appear to be saying that there is very little that we can do now in our globalized and internationalized economy to influence the development of employment and living standards. They appear to have lost sovereignty over economic and social policy to financial market operators who listen only to central bankers, and central bankers who listen only to financial market operators. In this "old pals club" no-one is concerned at the impact of economic policy on employment. Unemployment, they say, can only be reduced if rigidities such as workers' rights are removed. Market forces are supposed to "price" workers into jobs. TUAC and the trade union movement internationally rejects those ideas.

This new international technocracy is coming increasingly into conflict with the legitimate aspirations of electorates and working people. Governments both win elections on the basis of their commitments to fighting unemployment and lose elections on their inability to fulfil their promises. A situation in which democracy and internationalization appear in conflict with each other is highly dangerous. It is being accompanied by growing social exclusion in OECD countries. The globalized economy makes the situation of the poor in the OECD countries begin to resemble parts of the developing world. This may lead to the growth of nationalist and protectionist sentiments in which the weakest will suffer.

The only acceptable solution must be for governments to show leadership and to be prepared to restore, through international coordination, the sovereignty over policies which has been lost domestically. Both the ILO and the OECD have a crucial role to play.

I would like to mention three areas where ILO and OECD cooperation is essential in the months and years ahead. The first is the question of employment policy. The Secretary-General's Report and the ILO's World Employment 1995 report make a powerful and courageous plea for reintroducing the level of unemployment as a factor in economic policy decision-making. They also expose the myth that labour market deregulation provides some easy route to job creation. The ILO's view was echoed by the United States Secretary of Labour, Robert Reich, at the OECD Ministerial Council last month. He said that the creation of low-paying jobs and the growth of the working poor is as great an evil as structural unemployment. We have to be concerned at the earnings potential as well as the number of jobs created. TUAC is working with the OECD to try to shift the focus of their work towards the creation of high-quality employment. That means bringing back employment creation and not just inflation reduction as a goal of economic policy. It also means ensuring that other policies whether they be industrial policies, labour market policies or education and training policies are all geared to high-quality job creation.

The tripartite structure of the ILO gives an important example of how to manage change in labour markets in the future. In the trade union movement, many of our affiliates have resisted strongly efforts to impose negative labour market flexibility, a catchword for more unequal wage distribution, reduced employment protection and lower unemployment benefits. But trade unions have shown themselves to be proactive and dynamic in proposing a genuine agenda for managing labour market change and adaptability in a positive way. There will now be a new G-7 Jobs Summit to be held in France next year chaired by President Chirac. We will be making sure that our message and the ILO's message will be heeded and there will be some new thinking at that conference.

The second area where ILO and OECD coordination is essential is on trade and labour standards. Both the OECD and the ILO are working on the subject and a report is due to be presented to the OECD Ministerial Council in 1996. I listened to both meetings of the Governing Body's Working Party on this subject. I must say I was surprised by the speeches I heard from some governments and members of the Employers' group. There seemed to be little effort to listen to what the Workers' group was saying. It was interesting to hear how some governments who had criticized and attacked the ILO standards in the past now so praised this work so warmly.

To have a constructive discussion we should look forward rather than backwards. Whether we like it or not, we are in an increasingly globalized economy. That means that trade and investment systems will have to operate on the basis of certain common rules. It is not acceptable that those rules apply only to intellectual property rights, or the rights of investors, but not to the basic rights of labour. The ICFTU's annual Survey of Violations of Trade Union Rights showed the size of the problem. There seems to be a danger of policy competition between some countries to attract foreign investment through misguided policies of labour suppression.

The ILO has a strong interest in remaining at the centre of this discussion and in working closely with both the OECD and the World Trade Organization. The World Trade Organization is undertaking national reviews which begin to look at questions such as taxation policy and their impact on trade flows. Sooner rather than later they will have to start looking at social and labour policy. With the growing proportion of national production being traded between countries, and a growing proportion of producers being multinational, international rules on labour standards which are observed are essential. I would repeat the message of my trade union colleagues in the Workers' group, that the objective of this discussion is not to impose trade sanctions, it is to change behaviour through enforceable rules. We hope that the work of the ILO and the OECD will be mutually reinforced.

The third and last example I will give of the need for greater ILO and OECD cooperation concerns the changing membership of the OECD itself. For more than two decades the OECD has been a closed club. Some have described it as a rich man's club. This is now in the process of change. Mexico joined the OECD last year, the Republic of Korea, Poland, Hungary and the Czech Republic and Slovakia have all applied to join. Regular meetings and workshops also take place with a series of Asian countries and some Latin American countries. A programme of work is now beginning with China, India and Indonesia.

The question of OECD membership and its relations with non-member countries raise questions which go to the heart of the future of the OECD. Five years ago OECD ministers defined the common values of the OECD as being pluralist democracy, respect for human rights and a market-based economy. In the discussions on new membership much attention is being paid to the market economy aspects of the OECD membership. TUAC has a very simple view that equal weight should be given to the question of human rights and in particular the respect for core labour rights. In this regard we have said that respect for the core standards of the ILO should be a condition for OECD membership. We are insisting, for example, that the Republic of Korea before it can join the OECD should reform its labour legislation to bring it into line with ILO standards as proposed in last year's Report of the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association on Korea. It is quite frankly unacceptable that labour law reform keeps being delayed.

To conclude, the ILO's vocation set out 76 years ago is now more important than ever. We need core labour standards worldwide, and we need them to be implemented and taken seriously by governments and employers. Moreover, managing change in the tumultuous period ahead can best be done by drawing on the tripartite tradition embodied in the ILO.

Ms. FRANCE (Employers' adviser, United Kingdom) – On behalf of the Confederation of British Industry permit me to extend my congratulations to the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to chair this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

May I also commend the ILO's Director-General for recognizing the need for this Organization to focus on the problems of unemployment and job creation. As the Director-General states in his Report: "The task of creating sufficient new jobs to overcome unemployment and problems of low pay ranks as the priority challenge for economic and social policy in countries at all levels across the globe".

We welcome the fact that the Report acknowledges the completion of the GATT Uruguay Round and anticipates the positive effects of this on international trade and ultimately employment levels. The Report effectively dispels the myth that the liberalization of trade will drive down living standards to those of the levels of the cheaper labour economies. We agree that there are mutual benefits to be gained from trade and investment flows, and many examples of these are quoted in the Report. Of course no one is denying that there will be some difficult short-term adjustments to be made, but fear of implementing these should not be used as an excuse for refusing the significant benefits of taking part in a global economy. For this is the only road to sustainable employment growth.

In this regard, the ILO Report states that multinational enterprises are a potential source for job creation and highlights the positive knowledge on effect of indirect job creation. We would support this view. However, we do not agree that MNEs are footloose in their behaviour. Indeed, this assertion seems to ignore the evidence presented by this Office and UNCTAD reports which have emphasized the positive effect of MNEs on host country labour standards.

This leads us perhaps to one of the shortcomings of the ILO Report. It comprehensively outlines problems we are facing, and then offers an analysis of the issues which is sometimes at variance with the analyses already carried out by, in the case of industrialized countries, the OECD and the European Union.

Let me just pause briefly on the OECD Jobs Study. This is an ongoing piece of work aimed at developing a set of recommendations for removing the barriers to job creation, tailored to the individual circumstances of each OECD country. It stresses the need to have a sound macroeconomic policy which must be backed up by appropriate national micro-economic reforms including making wage and labour costs more flexible, removing disincentives to hiring, reforming unemployment benefits systems and improving the labour skills of the workforce. These recommendations have been supported by OECD member States. Last year my Federation embarked on a major piece of work entitled "Tackling long-term unemployment: A business agenda", which among other things, sought to identify the problems facing the long-term unemployed. It became apparent that while jobs do exist there are significant barriers preventing uptake of these jobs by the long-term unemployed such as skills mismatches, obstacles to effective job search and a benefits barrier. We are now in the process of suggesting a number of recommendations to follow up this work in the United Kingdom.

The OECD menu of policies is at variance with the solutions contained in the ILO Report. The latter minimizes the importance of wage restraint and the impact of the minimum wage on jobs. It also counters that inflexible labour laws do not impede job creation. We are not convinced that the ILO way will be enough to enable countries to respond to the twin challenges of global competition and creating an environment conducive to employment creation.

So how should the ILO move ahead? It is crucial that we build on the foundations which we laid at last year's 75th anniversary session of the Conference. The ILO can and should provide a unique forum for debate. It has a responsibility to ensure a greater sharing of the wealth of experience and information already in the hands of its constituents.

Second, the ILO must concentrate its efforts in supporting governments in developing coherent national policies by providing technical assistance and advice in those areas where it is specially competent.

Finally, the core mandate of the ILO has always been to promote improved working conditions worldwide. This must remain a priority. However, promotion should not always mean the creation and adoption of new, inflexible and sometimes unratifiable labour standards. In the future we need to consider how to achieve more up-to-date labour standards tailored to the realities of today and tomorrow, which promote, and do not hinder, employment growth and take account of the needs of the unemployed as well as protecting those already in employment.

Mr. MARSHALL (Employers' adviser, New Zealand) – I would like to congratulate the President warmly on his election and wish him every success for the remainder of the Conference.

This year the Director-General's Report is concerned with the very important topic of promoting employment, a topic which it introduces by noting that the level and structure of employment in the past few decades across the globe has been affected by changes in the world economy. That this is clearly the case goes without saying: the world is now a very different place from the world of 1919 when the ILO came into being, or even from the world of 1944 when the Declaration of Philadelphia was signed. It would indeed be surprising if the changes which have occurred had left the area of employment unaffected.

As the Report points out, the Declaration of Philadelphia, unlike the original Constitution, explicitly requires the ILO to further programmes to achieve full employment: full employment in 1944, as in 1995, was for most countries yet to be realized. The intervening years did, of course, sometimes and in some places, bring employment. This was often, however, more apparent than real. Frequently, what passed for full employment was, in effect, a form of underemployment, and many jobs were unproductive.

In New Zealand's case, underemployment was supportable when the country had its own guaranteed product market and competition was not a real issue. But losing this guarantee, plus a Keynesian response to the world oil shocks, saw the country headed for a situation of such indebtedness in which underemployment could no longer be sustained. Further borrowing to maintain the status quo became prohibitive.

At that point, the decision was made to remove the artificial protections of the past, and to turn from fortress New Zealand to a truly competitive economy. That way jobs could be created. It was essentially a case of sink or swim.

Reading the Director-General's Report, it is interesting to note that in its reference to industrialized countries, the New Zealand situation rates little, if any, attention. Noting the impact of slower growth rates in the 1970s and again in the 1990s, the Report, in the interests of simplification, defines three different ways of responding: the American (which is characterized by a lower unemployment rate but lower incomes), the Scandinavian (creating employment in the public sector at the risk of building up inflationary pressures and depleting public finances), and the European (characterized by income protection and an increased pool of unemployed). Rises in unemployment are attributed to both economic policies and differences in labour market regulation. These factors, we suggest, need not be mutually exclusive, but recent analysis has tended to focus on one or the other.

In New Zealand, both economic policy and an over-regulated market contributed to sluggish growth and so to an increase in unemployment. Neither factor could, therefore, be considered in isolation.

Nevertheless, reform of the New Zealand economy was somewhat belatedly followed by labour market reform. In 1991, the labour market bargaining emphasis was moved from national documents to contracts, either collective or individual, and relevant to enterprise circumstances. Employees were given a greater right of choice, and employers and managers were given the ability to negotiate on a realistic basis, their efforts being underpinned by a statutory minimum code. This code deals with matters such as unjustified dismissal, minimum wages, holidays, occupational safety and health, and so on, and is a guarantee against any fall in labour standards.

The consequence of economic and labour market deregulation has been a noticeable turnaround. Seasonally adjusted employment at March 1995, was 5 per cent higher than in the previous year, and seasonally adjusted unemployment was 25.5 per cent lower. Unemployment has dropped to 6.6 per cent from a 1991 high of 10.9 per cent.

No one would maintain that these outcomes are perfect. They are, however, noteworthy and much still remains to be done. There must be a major emphasis on education and training to improve the skills of those whose poor skill levels currently reduce employment prospects. There must also be a complete acceptance of the need for continuous learning. Technological change and changes in the nature of work have reinforced the demand for such developments. But the aim now is to ensure that employment is sustainable and that the jobs people do are not make-work but real.

This is not the European solution, nor the Scandinavian solution, nor the American solution (at least as viewed by the Report). New Zealand operated for many years with an industrial relations system which was notable for its extreme rigidity. It provided – and still does provide – a welfare base for those unable to find employment; it tried borrowing its way to affluence without success. Now it has deregulated, but not so that wages and conditions can be permanently reduced.

Today, a competitive, enterprise-based economy is seen as the best cure for unemployment. Benefit provision brings problems of its own and should never be seen as more than a stop-gap measure. Emphasis on individual rights, individual responsibilities, and freedom of choice enables a competitive economy to respond quickly to market signals. It is not, as the Report suggests, a matter of choosing between employment subsidies and pressing wages down through labour market deregulation. Rather, deregulation frees both enterprises and the economy to respond to change as change occurs. In this way, profits are generated, unemployment declines and real wages can increase. Economic and employment growth are interdependent.

It is too late to return to the interventionist policies of the era of full employment, so called. They reflected their times, and the Report can lament their passing. In the long run, they could not be sustained.

Obviously, full employment is desirable. However, it cannot be achieved by going back to a managed economy, centralized bargaining, or the injection into the employment relationship of extraneous third parties. Yes, reasonable labour standards are important, but they must reflect the circumstances of individual countries. Attempts to artificially raise standards serve only to impoverish further the countries on which those standards are imposed. An improvement in work and living standards is achieved through the ability to produce goods and services which others want to buy, and access to free trade. It is not achieved through the interventions of others, however well intentioned. Where third party help is given it must be by way of practical assistance.

Recently I came across the following statement: "It is always possible to make badly functioning economies worse by government initiatives. We must take care lest international initiatives produce a similar effect."

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) – I give the floor to Mr. Dantjie, Workers' adviser, South Africa, who wishes to reply to the statement made by Mr. Botha, Employers' delegate of South Africa, at Friday morning's sitting.

I would like to remind the speaker that his reply should refer only to the point under debate, should not exceed two minutes and should not give rise to any further remarks.

Mr. DANTJIE (Workers' adviser, South Africa) – I would like to start by congratulating the President on his election to chair this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like also to thank the Director-General for his Report Promoting employment.

As stated earlier by the Swedish Workers' delegate, the fight against unemployment ought to be a top priority for governments all over the world, and the efforts of the ILO in this regard are very important. The South African trade union movement has played a key initiating role in shaping the Reconstruction and Development Programme (RDP) in the new South Africa. The RDP has, as its primary aim, the promotion of a better life for all through development projects aimed at stimulating economic growth and jobs for all. The South African trade union movement does not merely act as a watchdog over the particular interests of its own members' jobs, but takes the responsibility for participating in development of economic policies which would be to the benefit of the wider working class, including all those employed in casual forms of work and those who have been unable to find work.

The RDP aims to bring the most marginalized South Africans – the black population disadvantaged through years of apartheid rule, women, youth, the people in the rural areas, the disabled – into the mainstream of the economy from which they have been excluded over the years. The trade union movement strenuously opposes privatization and deregulation measures which only drive these people further into the margins of society. The trade union movement also strenuously opposes the trend of creating lower wages, employment with no decent labour standards and with no prospect of contributing to the development of the workers and of their communities, which the employers are so keen to promote.

We cannot believe that we have to lower ...

(The President interrupts the speaker.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. HALLIWELL) – Sir, you have exceeded the time-limit and I have not yet heard any reference to the speech made last Friday by the Employers' delegate. This is not the time to make a speech of your own, so I am going to ask you to return to your seat.

That concludes our agenda for this morning.

Twenty-third sitting

President: Mr. Popescu

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (concl.)

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. POPESCU) – We shall proceed with the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original French: Mr. MAYAKI (Workers' delegate, Niger) – I should like to associate myself with all previous speakers in conveying to the President my heartfelt congratulations on his election to the Presidency of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

I should like to take this opportunity also to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO who kindly submitted for our consideration a number of important reports dealing with employment in the world.

The world's widespread unemployment situation, together with the intensification and aggravation of this problem addresses the conscience of all who are imbued with justice and equity and calls on them to help find solutions to stem this scourge. In the time between the Copenhagen World Summit for Social Development and this session of the International Labour Conference, voices have been raised against unemployment, underemployment, low wages, and calls have been for the eradication of poverty and of social exclusion.

In doing so, governments, employers and workers are all unanimous in recognizing that only full and freely chosen employment can restrain the dehumanizing pressures in today's society.

But, how can we promote full employment whilst at the same time we develop economic policies which result in redundancy and exclusion for thousands of workers?

The scale of unemployment today and the impoverishment of the masses, are the logical outcome of structural adjustment policies adopted by many countries in the 1980s and 1990s.

The revised versions of the first structural adjustment programmes that advocate adjustment with a built-in social dimension are merely a replastering job – once again doomed to failure.

When the new economic policies advocated by the IMF and the World Bank in several developing countries recommend for example emergency measures, trimming down the public service, widespread voluntary departure of workers, reduction of retirement age, early retirement, liquidation of enterprises, privatizations, restructuring of state companies – which are often of strategic importance – and a freeze on promotions, then we are inevitably heading towards increased poverty.

Similarly, the waves of labour code revisions in many developing countries are intended not to adapt national regulations to the spirit of ratified international Conventions, but merely to allow them to hire and fire whom they want and when they want.

This means that the miracle recipes which can be expected from the IMF or the World Bank – in view of the severe consequences they have on our jobs, our wages and our future – have come to their limit and if they were to be continued all hope for job creation and promotion would be shattered.

Other no less important factors also have negative repercussions on the structure of employment. Let me mention economic and trade globalization which also has a very real impact on employment.

Today we are witnessing enormous disparities between production structures and employment structures, and this strengthens and reinforces inequality and poverty in the world, particularly in developing countries. Although we are going through a period of net world production growth, its unequal distribution is making the people of the least developed countries poorer still, and further complicating relationships between countries, in particular in trade.

Much as we welcome today the opening up of international trade, we are worried about its repercussions on employment, since adjustments are being envisaged to restructure production. Hence, as is stated in the Director-General's Report, "Large numbers of workers will have to shift from declining to growing activities".

With trade globalization, developing countries have no alternative but to opt for export-oriented industrialization policies. In this sense, the Director-General's Report states that "the benefits of globalization can be captured through increasing and diversifying agricultural and other primary commodity exports and increased processing of these products".

Yet this path, whilst innovative and salutary, cannot be pursued without capital and massive investments, and it is precisely the capital shortage and the restrictive conditions governing access to capital from the international financial institutions which constitute the other bottleneck for any prospects of reorienting economic policies towards effective employment generation.

This provides a succinct description of the background to adjustment and trade globalization which explains the difficulties of developing countries such as ours.

You will understand that, in such a situation with various related constraints, promoting full employment may well be wishful thinking for developing countries. However, in view of the current renewed interest expressed by the ILO and its constituents in the creation and promotion of employment, there is still hope.

To my mind, this hope lies in the thought being given to various determining factors which have a potentially positive impact on employment in the world, particularly in the developing countries. Amongst those factors we should stress the importance of education, training and health. It is often stated that these sectors are not productive. This is a concept very frequently put forward by the international financial institutions but these sectors are and still remain the pillars of any action to fight poverty in the world. Similarly economic reforms advocated by the international financial institutions must be based on national consensus so that they can have the popular support and the need to achieve success.

It is imperative to include a social clause in instruments governing trade. This is a new opportunity for the ILO today to ensure ratification and ensure application of certain international standards governing fundamental human rights. The ILO should plead for better cooperation between States on human rights matters.

To promote employment, one of the most important emergency measures for all ILO member States is above all to fight to preserve existing jobs.

In conclusion, I express the ardent wish that the ILO will take action vis-à-vis the international financial institutions and the member States to ensure that there will be a more human development policy.

Original Spanish: Mr. AGUILAR (Employers' adviser, Guatemala) – Most of you are aware of the degree to which unemployment and poverty prevail in Guatemala. This has meant that the gap between the rich and the poor has become ever more pronounced. However, it should be made quite clear that no amount of statistical analysis of the problems afflicting Guatemala will solve those problems.

Generating favourable conditions for training, for forming new firms of every size, principally small and medium-sized firms, will facilitate the creation of new jobs. These in turn will become more numerous and better paid. Of course, this will not take place merely as a result of a decree or because of isolated policies.

Instead in a process of consensus amongst the various sectors of civilian society and government, it will be essential to create the necessary conditions to develop a national blueprint, a blueprint which has been lacking in Guatemala's history.

This national blueprint must be based not only upon the ongoing search for authentic democracy, not only in the holding of clean elections, but by taking those elections one step further, strengthening democracy day by day.

One of the pillars of this project for a Guatemala free of poverty and illiteracy is that of creating those conditions which will make it possible for the working class to be adequately and appropriately trained and for their skills to be upgraded. This will make it possible for them to aspire to and demand better working conditions and better wages. It is important to stress that because of the socio-economic and political crisis in Guatemala in the 1980s, most of our skilled manpower had to emigrate to other countries in search of new horizons. This meant that the wage differential between skilled and unskilled labour of which the latter are in the majority can be described as a yawning gap.

These conditions mean that there is a high level of worker turnover because it is all the same to them whether they earn the minimum wage in one firm or in another. All this explains how important it is to train the Guatemalan working class. It is also indispensable to rid the economy of the country of its mercantile characteristics inherited from and enhanced by economic growth models based upon import substitution policies imposed by the development model of ECLA in the 1960s and 1970s.

Given the globalization of the world economy, it is indispensable for large-, small- and medium-sized firms to be able to develop within a framework which will enable them to enter a true market economy where the dignity of the human being lies in the centre of that development.

The following are elements of a minimum framework for a correct and complete development of firms in a global economy:

- access to sources of finance where timely and early loans are fundamentally secured by firms' ability to carry out projects and to produce profitably. In this connection, it is important to point out that while credit and/or guarantee funds are provided by friendly countries in order to support the development of our firms, generally speaking in most cases it is not possible to obtain them since the corresponding requisite banking laws do not exist. One way of overcoming this obstacle could be to work in cooperation with employers' organizations;
- management training for business people, above all for those in small- and medium-sized firms, so that they can set up more profitable firms;
- technology transfer, perhaps through the various universities in the country which will make it possible for firms to join an increasingly globalized and competitive economy. We should not forget that developing our firms within a protected framework did not encourage many firms to modernize, resulting in a very marked technological backwardness;
- access to timely information in order to be up to date with market trends and therefore to avoid lagging behind in terms of quality and product type. For this purpose it is essential to set up regional, subregional and worldwide networks as well as to develop the necessary trade contacts through trade fairs and other means;
- consultancy for individual companies or for groups of similar companies is indispensable in order to give impetus to Guatemalan firms so that they can join international markets with Guatemalan products. Likewise we need to increase our competitiveness internally in the face of foreign products which are many times better in terms of quality and more numerous in terms of quantity than our own;
- it is important for this economic development process to take place with the understanding and support of developed countries. Of course, this cannot be achieved by paternalistic means. Instead, globalization of world markets needs to be a means of helping our firms develop and not of leading them to bankruptcy;

our Government must become a strong modern State characterized by subsidiarity and solidarity – a State with the ability to provide the indispensable infrastructure as also to provide health, education and security to its citizens in order to consolidate democracy and the overall development of all Guatemalans. It is important to point out at this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference that important sectors of the national economy, are endeavouring in cooperation with the Government and with the rest of civilian society, to create mechanisms which will enable the country and Guatemalan society to enjoy a better future for Guatemala and Guatemalans.

Original Spanish: Mr. ZAVALA COSTA (Employers' delegate, Peru) – Yet once more it is a great honour for me to be here with you yet again in this august 1995 session of the Conference representing the National Confederation of Private Enterprise Institutions (CONFIEP) in order to deal with a topic linked to social development and which calls for the attention and constant concern of governments, employers and workers.

Allow me to congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report Promoting employment which, apart from being inspiring and informative, calls upon us to think about a crucial problem of importance to all mankind. As well-stated by the Director-General in his Preface, “the task of creating sufficient new jobs to overcome unemployment, underemployment and problems of low pay ranks as the primary challenge for economic and social policy in countries at all levels of development”. For this reason we agree with the Director-General when he also affirms that it is imperative for the International Labour Office to step up its efforts to promote “action at both the national and international levels to improve the global employment situation”.

Let us remember that at the recent World Summit for Social Development held in the city of Copenhagen, the Programme of Action called upon the General Assembly to request the International Labour Organization, which, through its mandate, tripartite structure and experience, has a special role to play in dealing with matters pertaining to employment and social development, to contribute to the application of the Programme of Action. This Conference is, therefore, a suitable forum for the debate.

Today's challenge, from the viewpoint of the employers, is to pursue economic growth on the basis of full employment. We shall have full employment when economy and society are able to offer enough jobs for all available manpower, upgrading work and valuing it as the principal source of wealth creation and the overall fulfilment of the worker. For this purpose, as indicated by the Director-General in his Report, States should develop general guidelines for labour policy which seek to reduce unemployment and labour market segmentation, and to remedy the increasingly vulnerable situation of society's poorest members, promoting geographical, labour and industrial mobility and improving productivity.

In this sense, the globalization of the economy and the more flexible labour market should not be obstacles in creating new work posts; on the contrary, they are an effective means for workers and employers to have more scope for development without confining themselves to production and consumption needs within their own borders. In other words, we are faced with the challenge of competitiveness if we are to improve employment conditions.

However, in order to attempt to obtain major improvements in the struggle against underemployment and unemployment, the economic players are increasingly immersed in a process of reconverting the labour force by upgrading the training and skills of the workers so as to have access to the necessary skilled manpower. This investment in human capital is both an obligation and a responsibility on the part of States, employers and also workers who ultimately are the most directly affected.

In the case of our country, in order to cope with the challenge of competitiveness, several fundamental guidelines have been applied as of 1990. These guidelines have made it possible to bring inflation and terrorism under control, to rejoin the international financial system, to apply tax disciplines as also to restructure the State and firms, along with the streamlining of procedures giving greater freedom to producers by ensuring ownership rights. Nevertheless, we also need to upgrade production; we need increased value added in production to offset increased costs for imports and manpower. Only in this way will it be possible to improve the international terms of trade, to upgrade human resources, to improve wages and company profits. This can be made possible only by feeding into our culture a combination of science, technology and production as part and parcel of a basic long-term trio to ensure competitiveness, prosperity and the common weal.

Also the current increase in the supply of labour, particularly in poorer States, requires sustained investment in social welfare programmes. These should be focused on those persons who, as a result of economic change and the restructuring of the state apparatus, have gradually swollen the ranks of the unemployed. It should also be a source of concern that in many industrialized countries unemployment is jeopardizing progress towards labour market integration among States. The expansion in international trade should not necessarily lead those countries which have an unfair advantage as a result of inadequate social protection of their workers to grow at the expense of the industrialized countries, so long as the inferiority of labour conditions is a result of underdevelopment and not of trade policy or government will. This situation will gradually even out as the development levels of nations come closer together.

In Peru there has been an increasing demand for new jobs. According to the chief of the National Institute for Statistics and Data Processing, in the period 1995-2000 the labour force in the country will grow on average by 950,000 people per annum, at current rates of labour force participation. Owing to the current growth in the level of the Peruvian population, there will be continual pressure to create new job opportunities since a large number of young people will be joining the job market. If, furthermore, we assume that there will be an increase in labour force participation as a result of more women entering the labour force, the labour market will come under pressure to create 1,170,000 new jobs in the next five years. This will mean the creation of 234,000 additional new jobs annually in order to cover total employment demand.

This new workforce must enter the formal sector in order to obtain adequate protection from the State through the social benefit system enshrined in our legislation.

It is worth mentioning also that the experience of state reform and economic adjustment in other Latin American countries, like Peru, was initially negative for the labour market, in terms of both employment and income, involving huge social costs while raising the spectre of recession. It is thus worthwhile asking to what extent the magnitude of the social costs involved is caused by strategic errors on the part of governments or whether these costs are inherent in any process of restructuring and productive modernization.

For this reason, productive employment generation and poverty alleviation are issues of ongoing priority that must be dealt with by employers, workers and the State which are duty bound to settle them. The economic recovery of Peru, reflected in the control of inflation and the defeat of subversion set the scene for tackling the objective of full employment while bearing in mind the problems previously mentioned.

In order to consolidate the progress made during the five-year period now drawing to a close and to head towards a market economy, employers' institutions in CONFIEP consider that the Government during the 1995-2000 period should attach priority, inter alia, to the following activities and issues: greater value added for production and exports; the definition of a legal framework for the use and ownership of land and water resources; making private investment viable in the agricultural sector; promoting the micro-firm and also small firms; defining clearly a tariff policy for the adequate integration of common markets such as the Andean Group, MERCOSUR, NAFTA, and the free-trade area for the Americas envisaged at the Miami Summit.

By way of conclusion, it is worth repeating the appeal made by the representatives of various member States and delegations at last year's Conference, as picked up in the 1994 Annual Report of the International Organization of Employers (IOE), concerning the need to renew the ILO's standard-setting activity by adopting fewer new standards and instead by revising and updating existing instruments as a mechanism for promoting and protecting employment.

Original Spanish: Mr. VARELA (Employers' delegate, Uruguay) – Allow me to congratulate the President on his election and to wish him every success in guiding these debates.

The Report submitted by the Director-General for this discussion has the timely title Promoting employment. Indeed, this issue, which has been a constant in this Organization since its founding and a scourge for many countries for even longer, takes on tragic proportions at a time when unemployment is soaring in the developed countries and when mechanisms used by those countries to reduce unemployment are ineffectual.

The Director-General has given us a Report with far-reaching economic implications in which he explains the current situation of the world economy and the possible consequences if corrective measures are not taken, as well as the repercussions on employment.

We agree that this is a time of major changes and, as stated by the Director-General, it would be better to foster rather than delay them. However, it is also the time for decision-taking. The Report has the merit of making it clear that there is no easy path to seeking employment or to combating unemployment, each has its price and risks.

At any rate, the decisions that must be taken by governments should not omit the social players. We are accustomed to language which deals more with the labour world as such, yet we have observed that in this Report employers' and workers' organizations are not mentioned as participants in formulating and implementing solutions and changes.

This absence of any reference to employers and workers stands out; there is only the suggestion of greater participation by the latter in decision-making in enterprises, an issue which has been specifically discussed and which the Director-General knows is not accepted by the vast majority of entrepreneurs.

Even more noteworthy is the lack of any reference to the enterprise as a generator of wealth and employment. A Report that discusses promoting and creating jobs but leaves out any specific and unmistakable mention of the creation of enterprises and their development shows that the Office continues to be unaware of the enterprise's and entrepreneur's value to society.

Developing nations do not depend on political decisions or academic studies, but instead on the dignified work of their citizens in enterprises which make or market products, or provide services by which they can satisfy their needs.

We believe that the ILO has vast possibilities for labour, which go beyond dealing with the ethics of transnational companies. In our countries every day sees the creation of enterprises which are inspired by the ideas and enthusiasm of an entrepreneur who provides work to those who cooperate with him. The efforts made to strengthen employers and their organizations will lead to productive and long-lasting jobs.

However, it is not enough to count on the willingness of entrepreneurs in order to guarantee development. It is up to governments to create the conditions within which business activities can take place freely, in particular through standards which regulate but do not suffocate productive investment, international trade and the labour market.

With reference to international trade, States should attempt to fulfil the commitments they advocate, i.e., to do away with practices such as non-tariff barriers or export subsidies which stifle trade among nations, seriously damaging the poorer nations and the ones most scrupulous in fulfilling their international agreements.

In this regard, it is impossible to avoid referring to the proposed social clause in trade agreements. The fear that it could lead to a non-tariff barrier and a mechanism for sanctioning countries instead of being a vehicle to promote the rights of workers means that it is often viewed with doubt and mistrust.

At the internal level, States should adopt an attitude of subsidiarity and not attempt to do what the private sector is doing or can do, instead assuming the essential tasks of defence, justice and security, as well as others required by the common weal such as education and health. All of this should be carried out within a framework of efficiency and economy so as not to overburden taxpayers.

As to the question of flexibility in the labour market, too much talk and too little action has weakened the concept. The term "labour flexibility" is viewed with enthusiasm by some and with irritation by others long before any meaningful discussion of it takes place.

Basically, the only thing we ask is that certain labour standards be selected and adapted to the current experience of enterprises. The aim is not to modify the essential rights of workers, such as the right to strike, to engage in collective bargaining or to enjoy freedom of association, but instead to rethink certain benefits that were obtained at a time when firms were acting under an economic system with a high degree of protectionism and which now, with the opening up of the economy results in costs that hamper competitiveness.

Equal attention should be given to the doctrine of labour law. Standard practices such as sticking blindly to agreements, incorporating benefits freely granted to workers by employers into their individual contracts, and even the principle of in dubio pro operario should be reviewed in terms of a more dynamic economy that is more competitive, and consequently poses greater risks to enterprises.

We should not allow an excessive commitment to the right to work and to labour standards to prejudice this very right to work.

Indeed, the facts indicate that agreements are reached between enterprises and workers that often fly in the face of the more orthodox doctrine. There is nothing rare about agreements to lower wages, to give up benefits granted by regulations, and even to add an extra daily working hour without pay so as to store up the enterprise and keep the source of work alive.

It is only through harmonious labour relations, where mutual confidence is a fundamental condition in bargaining for new types of labour contracts, that we can guarantee the maintenance of competitiveness for many enterprises and consequently their survival, with subsequent benefits to productive employment.

In this way we will move from a culture of confrontation to one of conciliation and collaboration.

Here is yet another area where the ILO has a great deal to contribute through technical cooperation on the part of its experts and owing to its international experience.

As to specific measures to promote employment, the setting up of a National Employment Board in Uruguay has been a useful starting point for active employment policies.

This tripartite body, which administers a fund based on personal contributions from employers and workers, deals with the need to upgrade the skills of workers who receive unemployment compensation. The novel aspect of this experience currently makes it impossible to evaluate its results and to judge the merits of its activities.

The opening up of the economy, the process of integration into MERCOSUR and an unemployment rate which has grown in the last quarter stand as a challenge to the Uruguayan Government; an emergency solution is required.

The Report of the Director-General, which has fuelled this debate, offers no practical solutions, and in some cases leads to confusion.

By dividing the world into three classes of countries – the developing world, those with economies in transition, and the developed world – a barrier is erected between different realities as if there were no connection at all between them and as if the solutions for some were not applicable to others. When it analyses the characteristics most often pointed out as a cause of unemployment, such as economic policy, trade policy and various aspects of labour market regulations, the Report concludes that none of them acting alone causes unemployment.

Indeed, there is no single cause of unemployment but instead there are many which work together at the same time. To analyse them one by one in order to draw a conclusion for example, that we must not seek greater flexibility in the labour market, taking into account its relative effect on unemployment, is simplifying to the extreme and confuses the reader.

The final pages of the Report propose global measures for action. The creation, for example, of an institutional mechanism at the international level in order to come up with practical solutions, is one of them.

At the same time there is a suggestion for "coordinated recovery" for industrialized countries which could also be applicable to all countries as a whole.

The combination of both proposals seems consistent, and to provide the ILO with a mandate for becoming such an institutional mechanism is a proper step.

Its tripartite organization – the expansion of which we are opposed to – would seem to make it an ideal forum for discussing proposals and seeking solutions.

Lastly, the Director-General's statement that "institutional reforms to bring about a better coordination of economic and social policies would be an important means of ensuring that economic and social progress are mutually reinforcing rather than antagonistic" eliminates the false opposition between economic and social aspects, leading to the conclusion that economic progress without social improvement is unjust, while social improvement without economic progress is impossible. We are faced with the challenge. We are aware of the causes. The time to act is now.

Mr. NOAKES (Employers' delegate, Australia) – Please allow me, first of all, to extend my congratulations to the President and the Vice-Presidents both on their election and on the effective manner in which they have presided over the deliberations of this session of the Conference.

The Report of the Director-General which is the subject of this debate, is an abridged version of World Employment 1995 which was prepared and published by the Office.

Despite some careful redrafting during the abridgement process, the Report of the Director-General contains the same serious flaws to which the Employers' group drew attention during Governing Body discussions on World Employment 1995.

Indeed, while the Director-General's Report is an interesting document in terms of raising awareness and increasing understanding of a pressing social concern, it is a major disappointment as a guide to policy.

In this respect, I want to turn firstly to the issue of economic growth, to which the Report adopts a strangely ambivalent attitude.

There can be no question that serious prescriptions for reducing unemployment need to concentrate on means of ensuring faster rates of economic growth.

The Report does recognize the importance of economic growth, and the consequences of the reduction in the rate of growth since the period 1950-73.

But for the Report to go on to say that "international attention has been focused for too long on political and economic issues, to the unfortunate exclusion of vital social ones" is simply to minimize the importance of growth as the only effective means of tackling vital social issues, such as unemployment.

The Report's recommendations, in which this passage appears, give no effective prescriptions for increased economic growth.

The clear need, I suggest, if unemployment is to fall, is that there be sustained rates of economic growth over a number of years. Unemployment rates will not fall unless we can contrive to reignite economic growth. If industry is producing more, there will be a need for more employees. At its most basic, the level of employment will rise with the level of production.

But it cannot be stressed too often that production must mean activities which add value. There are some government activities which are value-adding, but they are limited in nature and are a very much oversubscribed field. There are only a limited number of opportunities for public spending to be associated with value-adding activity.

It is the private sector which is the key to higher levels of employment. For all practical purposes, employment will rise in a sustained manner only with growth in private sector activity. The crucial question to be answered is: what needs to be done to encourage private entrepreneurs to increase their level of activity and investment?

There can be no justification for a worldwide increase in public spending. It would be a foolish policy to attempt to raise economic growth by increasing the level of demand before there was an increase in production. This is the road to inflation and to a massive deficit on the current account.

And yet, the thinking behind the Report seems to be based on a prescription for global reflation, presumably through worldwide increases in budget deficits.

The Report appears to seek a worldwide increase in public sector expenditure in order to raise demand on a global basis. What would be folly for a single country can somehow become sensible if all countries practise the same policy together.

This Keynesian approach makes no sense whatsoever in today's world. It would be foolish to build public policy on a theoretical basis whose foundation lies in the notion that we have more savings than we know what to do with. This is not the situation today. The problem is that there is a worldwide shortage of savings and therefore of investment capital. We need more capital, and this capital must be made available to the private sector.

An important part of the solution to the problem is to lower interest rates without raising taxation. This is another way of saying that the solution lies in higher rates of national saving and reductions in public spending, so that more capital is made available to the private sector.

Turning to some specific areas of the Report, I have to say that I find the treatment of the issue of labour market regulation to be totally unconvincing.

The Report attempts to minimize the effects of labour market regulation by arguments which are not only selective, but are also designed to enable the conclusion to be drawn that "... it remains debatable whether it is regulation of the labour market that has been the main impediment to job creation".

Now, let me say unequivocally that so far as employers are concerned, i.e. in the view of those who actually make decisions to employ or not to employ, inappropriate forms of labour market regulation are a major factor which adversely affects those decisions.

Indeed, improving the workings of the labour market is one of the most important areas in which positive changes must be made if employment levels are to be increased. The real cost of labour must be contained and there must be far more flexibility in the labour market.

There are, without question, a number of institutional and legislative structures which we can all agree are valuable. Many of these exist with the full support of employers. But how many of them were introduced to raise employment or to reduce unemployment? On the contrary, they were introduced to provide greater equity for wage-earners, and if there were economic benefits, they were purely incidental to their introduction.

Greater labour market flexibility, less regulation and more appropriate regulation will improve the employment prospects of the unemployed. We need fewer regulations, not more. A less-regulated labour market is one of the ways in which employment growth can be encouraged.

In this respect, one of the areas of greatest concern to employers is regulation of employment security. The Report makes strenuous efforts to establish the alleged benefits of employment security. It asserts that employment security increases the propensity of firms to train, and that higher labour turnover would erode incentives to train. These assertions are so far removed from the real world that they would startle entrepreneurs. They amount to an argument that restricting the ability of an employer to make necessary labour force adjustments will be beneficial, since the employer will train workers more effectively, including those workers who are not required. And they ignore the fact that labour turnover does not occur only at the initiative of the employer.

There can be no doubt that in many countries employment protection legislation acts as a major deterrent which keeps employers from increasing employment levels. This is borne out by countless surveys of employers and statements by employers and their representative organizations. To deny it and to seek to preserve the status quo is to deny employment to many of those who are now unemployed.

The Report also claims that the protection of employment security as well as income can increase productive efficiency because of the pressures on employers that this creates. If this argument were correct, then it would be an argument that could be used to justify any form of regulatory impost, no matter how excessive and how costly.

Finally, let me say something about the issue of wages. The Report doubts the validity of the proposition that lowering wage levels will raise employment significantly. It argues that the bulk of empirical evidence largely finds the impact of minimum wages on employment to be insignificant, and it makes several supportive assertions which are unacceptable to employers.

If the Report seeks to argue that lowering the level of real wages has nothing to contribute to the reduction of unemployment, then I find myself highly suspicious of this analysis, particularly since the argument is based on selective and derivative material. Real wage restraint has an important role to play, and reductions in real wages are part of a full solution to the problem of unemployment. Let me be clear that I am speaking here about nominal wages rising more slowly than the price level. We should be giving attention to ways in which we can ensure that the real cost of labour is not pricing the unemployed out of jobs. There are undoubtedly large numbers of unemployed people who could get jobs and would be willing to take them at wages lower than the prevailing legislative minima. This is not an argument for the abolition of minimum wages or social safety nets, but an argument for a more realistic approach to their levels in a situation of acute crisis.

In conclusion, allow me to say that the Report has stimulated debate and caused us to give greater attention to a serious social problem. Much of the material in the Report is useful and uncontroversial. However, the basic premises underlying the Report cannot be supported by employers, and its prescriptions do not offer realistic solutions to the problem of unemployment.

Original French: Mr. BOUSSAT (Employers' adviser, France) – On this last day of our debate I should like to thank the Director-General for having taken the initiative to draft this Report, Promoting employment. It has the merit of embracing the results of work carried out by several international organizations – the OECD, the World Bank and also, for several years now, the Commission of the European Communities.

A report by the Director-General on employment should become a regular feature, and a framework in which permanently to analyse the situation in States and to experiment and take initiatives – in other words, to look at innovations in enterprises, or introduced by other socio-economic actors. But, the Director-General's Report prompts us to look afresh, at a world that is constantly changing.

Personally, I regret that the Report fails fully to take account of new elements. What do I mean?

First of all, the globalization of trade, as we all know, goes hand in hand with fiercer, even cut-throat competition, which in certain cases may prompt some people to put on the back-burner certain values and regulations to which the ILO attaches the greatest importance. I believe this is an area the ILO should monitor closely.

Moreover, technological progress is rapid and sustained. But it is also within the reach of most economies, which is a cause for celebration. As a result, occupations and, therefore, employment are undergoing and will undergo increasingly rapid and permanent change. This means that wage-earners will exercise different trades. This is already the case in many of our economies and will continue to be so throughout their working life. Flexibility is already the name of the game. I do not think that this is going to come as a shock to anyone in this room.

We cannot talk about employment without first considering education and training. That also raises the question of how far we are able to anticipate needs and therefore the action that needs to be taken, both in terms of training and job content. It is at this level we need to make a serious effort to anticipate situations and make adjustments in our economies.

But let us go back to the question of enterprises. Enterprises can only survive and develop if they are competitive – in other words if they are productive. Let us call a spade a spade. Whereas this is not always going to help to create jobs, and in some cases may even lead to job cuts, the economic benefits to an enterprise will generate wealth and needs, and consequently lead to the redistribution of employment.

To my mind, we cannot understand the enormity of the subject of employment if we think only in terms of micro-economics. This is again a sign of a radical change in the labour market and in the world of work. We are going to be beset by technological progress – we already are. We will have to get used to change, both employers and workers, and it is precisely here that we still have a lot to learn. These changes and developments must be reflected within our organizations, and in our own behaviour.

They should influence the way in which we operate and think, even within this institution. The Resolutions Committee is just one of our many committees. I am not suggesting that new commissions or committees should be set up but, after all, why should we not have an evolutions committee?

In this context, are the instruments we draw up here, which I must say, is a long, complex and exhaustive process, always and in every case really suited to the dynamics of the world of work? We may well ask ourselves.

In that regard, we should be clear on what we, as employers, think. Deregulation of labour, reduced wage costs and indirect social costs, which many of us talk about, do not necessarily mean an absence of regulation and no social protection. They mean renovation, adaptation and simplified argumentation. They mean greater responsibility for citizens with regard to social security systems. The world of business, and therefore the world of labour are not static. They are in a constant state of flux. All of us, governments, employers' or workers' representatives, are responsible for anticipating and promoting change. And, God knows, it is not always easy to be one step ahead in our economies or in our enterprises.

Let me illustrate this point. For decades, in some of our industrialized countries, employers and trade unions alike have devised collective agreements to encourage loyalty among workers in enterprises, which is why, for example, length of service bonuses were introduced. Those were the days when the labour force had to be concentrated around industrial units and therefore attracted to and encouraged to stay in these areas. Today, we have to do the opposite and facilitate and make provision for mobility, which does not mean to say that we want to cast all forms of security to the wind. Why, in some of our collective agreements, for example, do we not do away with length of service bonuses, and replace them with training, adaptation or change bonuses? Here too many people prefer to play ostrich.

Nowadays we therefore have to facilitate and make provision for mobility, which raises the stakes. This means at all levels; within the enterprise, at the national level, at the international level. We have to be careful not to rush to standardize because this may dampen the spirit of initiative and therefore, more specifically, prevent job creation and access to employment. It is true that we are tempted, to my mind, slightly defensively, to regulate and formalize situations and, in this way, put the blocks on many developments.

To sum up, employment has an economic and social dimension. This is why it is obvious there can be no employment without growth. But that also means that the context in which jobs are created must be improved. Many people before me have laboured this point, so I will say no more on the subject.

But, job creation and the will to generate employment depend heavily on mobilizing all the actors in our respective economies. In my country, for some years now, this mobilization has focused on helping young people to join the labour force by strengthening apprenticeships and alternating training. French employers recently signed agreements with the authorities to this end. In just the past few days, national goals have been agreed between trade union organizations and employers with regard to helping young people on to the job market. We are currently working on ways to help the long-term unemployed back into working life.

In conclusion, this mobilization which we are discussing and which is referred to so frequently in the Director-General's Report demonstrates that tripartism is not suffering from old age. Quite the contrary, tripartism can look forward to a new youth. In most of our economies we are now aware that we must mobilize our forces together.

Tripartism now faces a challenge of choice: employment or poverty. In this challenge, the ILO must now, more than ever, demonstrate its moral authority, and I emphasize the term moral, as it is used in some of our procedures. This moral authority has to be demonstrated by the ILO more strongly and more firmly in pursuing its objectives in the years to come.

Our discussion on the social dimension of the globalization of trade clearly shows that various quarters in some international bodies are looking to the ILO to be more involved and to provide more expert input.

In closing, I should like to refer briefly to the Copenhagen Summit. Our governments adopted a Programme of Action which clearly pointed to the ILO's responsibility, especially as regards training and employment.

All 15 members of the European Union unanimously lent their support to this mandate which has been given to the ILO. This is a specific responsibility for the ILO, and one which distinguishes the social partners from all the NGOs. Here, in my opinion, there is room for action in each and every one of our member States. These are the challenges we must now meet.

Original Arabic: Mr. BAKR (representative of the Arab Labour Organization)— In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. I am very proud to be speaking to you for the second time at this Conference. I should like once again, on behalf of the Arab Labour Organization, to congratulate the President for the very able way in which he is guiding the work of this session. Allow me also to take this opportunity to express my pride, as part of the Arab group, to have been present for the visit of His Excellency Mr. Zine El Abedine Ben Ali, President of Tunisia, who gave an outstanding address to this Conference – one of the most significant of this session.

Your Conference is being held at a crucial moment in history; at the beginning of this year, the Fifth Conference of Ministers of Labour of the Non-Aligned and other Developing Countries met in New Delhi and adopted a plan and programme of action, noteworthy both for their objectivity and wisdom. These documents will serve as a reference for the policies of non-aligned countries in the areas of labour and social issues over the next few years.

At world level, Copenhagen hosted the World Summit for Social Development which adopted a number of commitments, as well as a Declaration and Programme of Action setting out to alleviate, if not to limit, chronic and structural unemployment; indeed, unemployment has become the hallmark of our modern society and has led to further poverty and social marginalization. We hope that the commitments and Programme of Action adopted by this Conference do not remain idle words so that national and international development are not seriously undermined at the end of this century.

The beginning of this year also saw the birth of a new organization – the World Trade Organization – after a waiting period of half a century. Its role will be to ensure the respect of fair regulations in free-trade markets. This is bound, in the near future, to cause a conflict between the principles of free trade and the respect for international labour standards.

These important events would not have come together in such a coordinated way if humanity was not having to cope with one of the most crucial periods in the history of mankind; a period in which the employment situation has been seriously worsening, unemployment rates have been increasing and job opportunities have been declining in most countries of the world. At the same time, the globalization of the economy and liberalization of world trade are beginning to emerge, wreaking havoc on many values and principles and exerting pressure on basic rights acquired in the working world.

We are being urgently called upon to tackle the social aspects of global development in the same way as its economic aspects; this call must be heeded because it is based on logic and justice – especially as our world vitally needs a new social contract. The liberalization of world trade should not serve as a pretext to overlook basic requirements for economic development, of which the most important include, the right to work, the respect of human dignity at work and the establishment of appropriate social welfare networks. The wealth and well-being of some countries should not be guaranteed at the expense of other countries. We are all in the same boat and unemployment and poverty, wherever they are, threaten security, stability and social justice everywhere in the world.

We are in favour of the dismantling of borders, the liberalization of trade, growing mobility in investment and the increase in world databases. But, at the same time, attempts should be made to increase the capacity of developing countries so that they are able to absorb these changes and not be left out at world level. They should also be able to have an equal share in the fruits of economic progress and to benefit from the considerable technological progresses made – to avoid widening the gap between the poor and the rich countries. These countries should also not be deprived of their relative characteristics which allow them to play an appropriate role in the world of free trade.

We agree fully with the conclusions of the Director-General in the report he submitted to the Social Summit in Copenhagen and to this Conference. The gravity of the problem of employment – and the other side of the coin unemployment – fully justifies this issue being examined on two occasions. Indeed, unemployment has become the major concern of all nations and peoples. Job creation has become a priority in the electoral programmes of presidents and governments. We, in the Arab Labour Organization, have nothing to add to this Report because it contains many serious proposals with which we agree entirely – especially the proposal that ministers of labour and employment should participate in economic policy discussions at both national and international levels.

In this context, we believe that it is important to maintain the role of the State and its institutions in the public services. Furthermore, ministers of labour should be given a greater role in the area of planning, policy evaluation and the preparation of relevant studies. All of these national efforts have helped us adapt our joint action to improve employment at the national and Arab levels, to encourage investment in human resources and attach greater importance to conditions for success in development programmes.

Thanks to our exemplary relations with the International Labour Organization, we have achieved much during the past few years; we hope that these relations will continue to develop during the next few years. We are extremely pleased that the Arab regional office has returned to its original headquarters in Beirut. We see this as the sign of increased ILO activities in the Arab region and the strengthening of links between the ILO and the Arab Labour Organization. We should like to call for an increase in the number of ILO documents and studies translated in Arabic so that the parties to production in the Arab world may contribute even more to the humanist ideas propagated by the ILO.

The Arab Labour Organization has been at the entire disposal of the ILO during the past few years to implement the ILO plan of action in the occupied Arab territories. We should like to take this opportunity to request the ILO and the donor countries to provide adequate financial backing to carry out programmes in this area of the world and to create Palestinian infrastructures. We feel that steps taken until now have not been commensurate with the urgent minimum needs of the workers.

We should like to express our appreciation to the ILO for putting across its message clearly in Copenhagen and for showing the world its unique situation within the United Nations system. Let us not forget that this Conference was the ideal forum for defending basic human rights of working men and women and a world forum for studying problems of labour, social development and human development – and for proposing suitable solutions to these problems.

In the Arab Labour Organization, we feel that the ILO's activities will be strengthened if it steps up its cooperation with world and regional institutions in the areas of labour, social policy and human development. Indeed, regional and national organizations are much closer to their members and more apt to respond to their needs; all these organizations have their specific characteristics. And they must all cooperate at international level, which is vital if the peoples of the world are to attain their objectives of security, stability and social justice.

Mr. MAITLAND (Workers' delegate, Australia) – Today I want to concentrate my contribution on the issues raised by the Director-General in his Report to this Conference, and I wish to talk about two key issues.

Firstly, the inevitability of structural adjustment in all the member States of the ILO, and the urgent need to reassert the principle of equitable burden-sharing if that structural adjustment is to be a positive rather than destructive process.

Secondly, I want to discuss some of the measures suggested by the Director-General for shifting global macroeconomic policies and mechanisms to a more stable basis that will promote employment and sound economic growth.

Structural adjustment that leaves most people worse off today, with only a promise of wealth in the future, is a morally bankrupt position whether it be put in a capitalist or socialist society. Moreover, it is a recipe for social disintegration and upheaval, destroying not only individuals and communities, but also the conditions required for economic growth and wealth generation.

Today we live in a world where Western capitalist notions of competitive business and economic development are in the ascendancy. The evidence for the success of that model of development is based on the rising per capita incomes of some of the world's economies.

Yet everywhere we go we see unemployment and underemployment. The developed world continues to labour under unemployment rates that were unheard of in the 1950s and 1960s, and the leaders of those nations see no prospect of ever returning to such levels.

We now have an intellectual device which justifies the existence of human misery and the wastage of human resources that is caused by mass unemployment and is referred to as the non-accelerating inflation rate of unemployment. Some economists say the so-called natural rate of unemployment is 7 per cent or more, maybe 10 per cent. That is, government macroeconomic policies should be set so that 7 per cent or 10 per cent of the workforce should be denied a living, so that their desperate presence acts as a device to prevent the rest of the workforce pressing for a wage rise and thereby supposedly causing inflation.

We all know that inflation is bad for economic growth and political stability, and therefore, ultimately, for living standards. It should be controlled. But the fight to control inflation is not an end in itself.

Our ultimate goal is the betterment of our communities, that is, increasing living standards. The principal means of achieving this remains the creation of employment opportunities and high levels of employment.

When we talk about the need to keep 10 per cent or so of the workforce on the scrap heap of society just to fight inflation we are getting our priorities confused. We are promoting economic cures whose results are worse than the problems they attempt to solve.

We can pretend to ourselves that such costs can be privatized, that we can force individuals to adapt or perish on their own resources. But, aside from the moral repugnance of such a position, we are deluding ourselves if we think that society can be restructured with the underprivileged being made to pay the entire cost.

Those who are pushed out of society, those who are dispossessed, those who are told that they are worthless, or that there is no room for them, those people will exact their price. Those who have no stake in the community feel no obligation to it. Those who are denied the right to work and the right to be treated as citizens with economic as well as political rights, will feel free to take whatever they can from society, in any way they can.

We will end up with societies that are at war with themselves. It could be said that this is already happening in many corners of the globe. Money which we can save on structural adjustment packages and labour market programmes will be spent on police forces, armies and prisons. In many Western nations, Australia included, we are filling prisons as fast as we build them. It has no deterrent effect; people who have little or nothing to gain are not afraid to go to prison.

What we have to do – trade unions, business and government – is to decide whether we are going to pay collectively now in order to help our various communities adapt to economic change or whether we are going to pay a lot more later in terms of law enforcement and the loss of social cohesion and safety that comes with increased unemployment and poverty.

What I am saying is that public expenditure on labour market programmes, financed by taxes, is a necessary part of structural adjustment if we are to change to meet current challenges without disintegrating in the process.

The Australian labour movement has generally accepted that the liberalization of global trade is ultimately good for economic growth and for employment. We have also accepted the need for micro-economic reform or rationalisation of government-owned enterprises and infrastructure industries.

But we are not believers in the view that we will automatically produce a better deal for all. Rising national wealth and improvements in GDP per capita can and do hide increasing disparities in income.

In Australia the Labour Government has done its best to target social expenditures to the most needy. It has succeeded in ensuring that the poorest in Australia are now better off than they were a decade ago. But it has not managed to prevent or mitigate one of the major outcomes that is sweeping the developed world as a result of economic restructuring.

We are seeing the disappearance of middle-income earners. The vast bloc of people who are neither rich nor poor is disappearing. We are seeing our societies being divided into two separate worlds: the haves and the have-nots. Yet we in Australia are among the better off in the developed world, and working people in the developed world are still much better off than most of the working people of most developing countries. But the incomes of many are falling and poverty is increasing in the developed world and this should be of grave concern to us all.

If we cannot look after the poor and facilitate the smooth restructuring in developed countries, how much less are we capable of achieving more equitable global restructuring? How are we ever to achieve mutually beneficial global development?

It is time then for us to take a firm policy stance on the issue of economic restructuring and structural adjustment programmes. As a tripartite forum of labour, business and government, it falls to the International Labour Organization to be a major international voice that asserts the importance of equitable burden sharing and the inherent social policy dimension to economic restructuring.

There is a sound moral, economic and political argument that those who benefit from economic restructuring should shoulder the burden of social dislocation and unemployment that is a by-product of that restructuring.

If economic restructuring and globalization produce the net economic benefits that they claimed to, then there should be no problem in redistributing part of that new wealth. It should be considered a very small price to pay.

Government, business and the labour movements need to be unified in their stance that economic restructuring is not only inevitable, but is for the long-term good of all. Part of the/our responsibility in taking such a stance is to make a commitment to social policies and expenditures that will ensure that the whole community really does benefit from such restructuring.

I now turn to specific measures proposed by the Director-General in his Report.

The Director-General has argued that a central problem contributing to low economic growth and therefore low employment growth is the persistence of high real interest rates. He says that the volatility of international currencies and the huge volume of speculative foreign exchange transactions are causing high real interest rates, and are a barrier to international trade and growth.

The volatility of the Australian currency means that investors will only invest when their rates of return are very high. So we have the situation where productive investment in employment in Australia is stifled, and funds are redirected to speculative transactions that create only fragile asset-based wealth and which employ very few people.

At present we have a situation where global macroeconomic reform is undertaken in a vacuum. The policy-makers, which often are the unelected heads of central banks, formulate policy in a realm remote from the consequences of such policy.

The distance or remoteness is usually justified by the need for macroeconomic policy settings to be kept apart from sectional interests which would advance their cause to the detriment of others.

Macroeconomic policy cannot be timely or effective if it is not responding to the real needs of the day. Mechanisms need to be established that incorporate social policy needs into macroeconomic policy formation and systemically introduce these at international level.

I endorse the suggestions of the Director-General for alterations to international financial market mechanisms that will renew the conditions for economic and employment growth, and which bring back social policy goals to the centre of macroeconomic policy formation.

Original French: Mr. IBRAHIMA (Workers' delegate, Benin) – On behalf of the Workers of Benin, I should like to add my voice to all those who have spoken before me from this rostrum to congratulate the President on his brilliant election to the presidency of this session of the Conference. I wish him courage and success in presiding over the deliberations. I would also like to congratulate the other Officers in whom the Conference has also placed its trust. I am quite certain that thanks to their great skills the discussions at this session of the Conference will be brought to a successful conclusion. I would like to express my sincere gratitude to the Director-General of the ILO and his staff for all the intellectual and physical efforts which they have made to resolve the many problems which beset the lives of workers living in this world of ours, affected as it is by economic and social crises.

The Workers of Benin are proud of this tripartite organization of ours, whose leaders work without any discrimination as to race, sex or religion. This is the only body of the United Nations within which all States, large and small, enjoy the same treatment, as the promotion of social justice is the Organization's main vocation.

As far as the Director-General's Report is concerned, I would like to congratulate him both on the substance of the Report and the relevance of the theme selected for this year. All the issues and aspects in relation to the promotion of employment are studied in great depth in this Report.

However, the Report does leave me with a few questions.

For example, in a country such as Benin, is it not Utopian to speak of employment promotion knowing that the IMF and the World Bank are recommending the exact opposite of the philosophy of economic recovery?

Benin, like the whole African continent, is making no progress when it comes to putting the economy back on a sound footing. It is staggering under the burden of its debt. What sort of employment can an African country, and in particular Benin, offer when its only solution to the problems of development is a structural adjustment programme? As you know, these programmes consist only of measures to re-establish the macroeconomic balance. They are designed without the least concern for social measures for workers. Ever since an agreement was signed between the Bretton Woods institutions and Benin in 1981, the national economy has had a terribly hard time getting itself on track. The structural adjustment programme which is so ardently praised by the experts of the IMF and the World Bank merely adds to the poverty of the peoples of Africa, and in particular the people of Benin. Draconian measures have been taken. For instance, the salaries of civil servants have been cut, and an aggressive privatization campaign has been conducted, in which the most viable state enterprises have been privatized. As a result, workers have been dismissed in large numbers; they then join the ranks of unemployed graduates who are already being churned out by the national education system. Looking at the structural adjustment programmes drawn up and implemented in most African countries, I cannot help concluding that it is extremely difficult to promote employment at the same time as we are being urged to cut jobs.

Is it really possible to promote employment when the authorities shirk their responsibilities and allow companies, and even strategic enterprises, to fall in to the hands of multinationals, whose only concern is to accumulate profits without re-investing in jobs in the country? In our opinion, employment promotion must be a part of a coherent development policy, which necessarily must include both economic and social aspects, underpinned by a process of democratization. Today, we speak about the globalization of the economy. How can Africa hope to join in? We all know that as a rule the terms of trade tend to favour the developed countries, who have no qualms about fixing prices for raw materials produced by developing countries. So once again, the developing countries are having their resources exploited by the industrialized countries, which unfortunately have a monopoly on these resources. On the eve of the third millennium, Africa's future will once again be most uncertain if the developed countries cannot bring themselves to stop seeing the world in their own image. Given the nature of its political, economic and social problems, it is going to be difficult for Africa to follow the pace of globalization. This being so, I believe a special study is required on the promotion of employment in Africa.

For me, the action to be taken by this Organization for greater social justice, making man the focus of development for the next millennium, is a source of great hope.

Original Arabic: Mr. BAKHEIT (Employers' delegate, Sudan) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. May I first of all congratulate the President most warmly on his election to preside over this session of the International Labour Conference. I am quite certain that his experience and skills will enable him to guide the work of this Conference to a successful and satisfactory conclusion.

The theme selected by the Director-General for his Report to this session of the Conference is a topical and important one, Employment promotion forms the basis of human dignity and is the only way for human beings to increase income levels. It is also a factor of stability in society because it promotes the redistribution of the fruits of progress and economic growth.

In his Report the Director-General studies the world employment situation. He refers in particular to the difficulties confronting the less-developed countries and asks us to help them cope with these difficulties. We are all in favour of this, we know that the ILO tells us that there can only be peace on the basis of social justice, and we also know that everywhere in the world poverty is a threat to progress and growth.

The structure of the world economy, which is unfavourable to investment in the less developed countries, which have considerable natural and human resources potential, has without a doubt had a negative impact on employment opportunities in these countries. Sudan is just one such country which has suffered from the negative effect of these factors.

Thanks to God my country has abundant rich natural agricultural and livestock resources. We also have extensive mineral resources. All we need at the moment is political stability, investment and the appropriate technology.

The people of Sudan, which was the spark that ignited the national salvation revolution, had adopted a national strategy for the decade 1992-2002. This strategy is to promote the aspirations of the people of Sudan, in relation to political stability and economic and social progress, and peace in particular. This new strategy attaches a great deal of importance to the private sector by encouraging the spirit of enterprise and private ownership in the various sectors of the national economy with the exception of anything which touches on the strategic interests of the country and on condition that the private sector fulfils its social role in respect of the concept of social justice as upheld by Islamic law.

My organization, given the important role assigned to it by society and given the country's abundant wealth, must face enormous challenges to fulfil its role, particularly in this current economic situation characterized by the fact that there is precious little investment in the less-developed countries and also given the protectionist policies exercised by the rich countries against products from the poor countries. So the Federation of Sudanese Employers has taken initiatives and has adopted measures which will help it to perform its role, namely that of contributing to the setting up of an economic infrastructure which will allow for better growth.

May I sum up these measures briefly. First of all, the employers have taken advantage of freedom of association as guaranteed by the law on work associations, and have set up the Federation of Sudanese Employers, an organization of their own choosing. It includes the Federation of Chambers of Industry, the Federation of Chambers of Commerce, the Federation of Chambers of Agriculture, the Federation of Small Enterprises and Craft Enterprises, and the Transport Federation.

The Federation and its member chambers have set up bodies which keep track of the implementation of employers' policies and determine the role to be played by employers in the national economy. A balance must be struck between the responsibilities and duties of employers and workers. As the Prophet said, the worker must be given his pay before his sweat dries. Remuneration is a God-given right. Secondly, the Federation of Sudanese Employers, as an active social partner working through these institutions, has explained to the Government the types of difficulties which the private sector faces and which hamper progress. These include the lack of infrastructure as well as protectionism. In the light of the current economic difficulties, a number of measures have been taken in order to come to terms with these problems. We have taken these measures together with the Government at the national, regional and international level, so as to be able to ensure high levels of production and stability of employment.

Thirdly, the employers have benefited from the law to promote investment, enacted in 1990, which concentrated on investment in the cattle-raising, mining, agricultural sector, livestock, transport, housing and services. this legislation granted a certain number of facilities to foreign investors. As I mentioned earlier, my country has a vast potential in natural resources: it is therefore imperative that we should join forces with our partners to try to attract investment.

Fourthly, our Federation plays an active part in the Higher Wage Council, a tripartite body. This Council is working on a minimum wage standard to offset the negative effects of structural adjustment policies for the workers.

Fifthly, our Federation has also engaged in collective bargaining with the Sudanese Workers' Union. We have signed four agreements over the past three years, aimed at improving wage levels, raising them above the minimum wage level so as to mitigate the effect of inflation on workers' real wages. This is a good example of stable industrial relations.

Sixthly, our Federation encourages craft and small enterprises as a source of employment, and we have taken initiatives to encourage the growth of these craft and small enterprises.

The informal sector absorbs a large number of workers. Here we have a positive policy and we try to encourage informal sector workers to integrate into the normal economic structure.

We are in a difficult situation. We are hoping that trade liberalization will permit the less-developed countries to achieve their full potential, provide them with wider opportunities, enable them to benefit from trade liberalization and promote exports. We would like to join with these countries in calling for assistance in eliminating the debt burden. We also appeal for greater equity and fairness in investment flows so as to generate an atmosphere more favourable to growth and help bring about a fairer distribution of wealth. We hope that, in this context, the ILO will see fit to play the pioneering role that matches its competence and duties. We hope further that the ILO will do its utmost to promote employment, maintain it at an acceptable level and combat poverty. With the three components of the ILO combining their efforts, we are certain to succeed in our endeavours.

Mr. SIBANDA (Workers' delegate, Zimbabwe) – Allow me first to join with others who have spoken before me to congratulate the President of this Conference with his two Vice-Presidents on their election.

On the basis of the Report of the Director-General, I believe that the ILO should adopt a number of steps and measures to consolidate its leading role in the political and technical areas by directing all efforts at national and international levels, and harness resources to improve the situation of workers throughout the world. It should consider that productive employment is a major and essential factor of human dignity and not only a requirement for social and political peace, as some would have it. Globalization and restructuring of the world economy must not be at the expense of social development and justice. We should therefore continue to oppose vigorously any attempt to undermine social justice on the pretext of pursuing economic growth. It is unacceptable for any country to achieve an economic competitive edge over others on the basis of sub-human labour standards. It continues to be the workers' view that the ILO should play a decisive role in leading the quest to achieve and maintain civilized international standards.

Placing the employment issue at the centre of the international agenda is the most important step in the work of our Organization, particularly in the light of the tremendous changes in the world economy, changes that have gone beyond the globalization of production and investment and resulted in liberalization of world trade. All these developments have had negative repercussions on the economies of the developing countries, which were already struggling to create ways and means to overcome unemployment.

Economic growth needs to be promoted since it is the indispensable basis for the generation of productive employment. Similarly, a credible and durable full employment policy has to be reinforced by a sound industrial relations system through which the claims of the social partners are accommodated within fiscal and monetary policies consistent with low inflation. The policy must take into account the mutual relationships between employment objectives and other economic and social objectives.

Within the framework of these common principles, individual countries must pursue country-specific measures to enhance employment growth without jeopardizing the maintenance of an economic environment conducive to employment growth. The task of reconciling full employment with price stability should be done by developing sound industrial relations systems. An underlying cause of inflationary pressures is the failure to resolve competing claims for resources within the constraints of the real productive capacity of the economy. Such distributional conflicts are generally translated into price increases and are a symptom of an institutional weakness in the mechanisms of dialogue between governments, employers and trade unions. Thus full employment requires both sound monetary and sound industrial relations.

Finally, participatory democracy by all these peoples in a country is a prerequisite to economic growth and development. Poor governance characterized by abuse of power, maladministration, corruption, embezzlement, despotism and bribery, especially from the developing countries has gradually eroded people's initiatives and moral values – which, to a large extent, has contributed to the slow economic growth and stagnation of the African continent's economies. Moreover, the denial of individual and people's right to participate and to voice their views are a source of conflict and political instability which we see in many parts of Africa today. Participation in democracy is a necessary precondition for mobilizing human and material resources essential for economic recovery and development, enhancing productivity and ensuring industrial peace.

Original Spanish: Mr. DE ARBELOA (Employers' adviser, Venezuela) – We congratulate the President on his election, as a Latin American and even more so, as the representative of a country which, at great cost for all sectors, is carrying out an exemplary struggle to set up a democratic system and a regime of respect to human rights. We ask him to convey the solidarity of the entire Venezuelan people to his honourable President, Mrs. Violeta Chamorro.

For developing countries which have not yet completed consolidating their democracies and the majority of which are still faced with the difficulties of restructuring their external debt, the problem of employment creation has to be placed in the context of politics and economics which the Director-General of the ILO has drawn up on the basis of the documents of the IMF, UNCTAD, the United Nations, and other institutions.

Account must also be taken of the complex and difficult social implications of the successive adjustment programmes to which these countries have been subjected. Venezuela has not been spared. Until recently the State's income from oil was the driving force of our economy. Yet the crisis made it clear that the Venezuelan people had no preparation to face a certain degree of deprivation, nor was our civil society in a position to provide the leadership in a structural change designed to alter the basis of public revenue.

After unexpected changes in the presidency, which took place in strict compliance with the Constitution and following six years of adjustments, the facts have proved to be harsher than good intentions. It became clear that the Executive confined itself to a strictly managerial role while transferring responsibility for promoting a national project and a plan to achieve that project, not even to the Legislature, but to the judiciary.

Inconsistency in attempting to accomplish goals impaired government action, as witnessed in failed plans, ministerial changes, as also in opposing and contradictory declarations and opinions. This failure on the part of the State to guide macroeconomic policy, with much toing and froing, led to sclerosis in the productive apparatus, described by economists as stagflation.

Consequently, our country must urgently promote and attract private capital, not only to make the economy more dynamic but also for private capital to promote definite improvement as mentioned by the Director-General in his Report.

It is worth recalling at this juncture several variables mentioned by the Director-General in his Report and which have an impact on direct investment, such as economic stability, political stability, a positive attitude towards private enterprise in general, high-quality infrastructure, constructive macroeconomic management, a clear and transparent policy with respect to investors, and a trade and industrial system which enables firms to take action in internationally competitive conditions. In this general framework, we should specify that excess labour market regulation in our country inhibits development and therefore employment. We have only to review a few figures on unemployment, underemployment and informality to realize this. Above all, the politicization of the exchange rate, of public finance and of the money supply, have contributed to perpetuating the endemic evil of inflation – practically unknown until recently in Venezuela. Consequently, for 1994, the inflation rate was approximately 70 per cent and even higher figures are expected for 1995. If bold and courageous action is not taken in this field, these figures may get worse.

In Venezuela, we recently signed, on a tripartite basis, a Letter of Intent promoted by the President, Dr. Rafael Caldera. Its ultimate goal was to reverse the strongly inflationary trend and its consequences. This is a commitment entered into voluntarily and patriotically by Venezuelan employers, in common cause with the workers, and we trust that the Government will take immediate measures to comply with its ineluctable responsibility to put the public finances on a sound footing, and also undertake to promote those mechanisms and instruments which have been successfully applied in neighbouring countries in order to halt inflation which is destroying the quality of life of Venezuelans. We trust that, with the vigilant action taken by Dr. Caldera, this Letter of Intent will not become a mere piece of paper without consequence.

Our Government has publicly repeated that it will comply faithfully with its international and national commitments. This was no doubt the intention of the President of the Republic in giving his views clearly on this issue. Congress has followed up by ratifying important ILO Conventions. Venezuelan employers do not doubt these good intentions, yet we await achievements. Results convince, not words and presentations.

In this sense, we hope that Dr. Caldera, who now has good advisors, will restore a sincere and far-reaching social dialogue within the spirit of the Letter of Intent, thereby enabling the Government to fulfil its obligations towards the ILO.

Consequently, we hope and trust that our Government, without further delay, will keep its promise to comply with the conclusions of the Committee of Experts and of the Committee on Freedom of Association in response to the complaints of FEDECAMARAS (the Venezuelan Federation of Chambers and Associations of Trade and Production) and the IOE, concerning the Organic Labour Law. We also trust that there will not be a repeated violation of the Government's obligation to consult with social partners when appointing representatives in ILO activities. Similarly, we hope that in the future the Government will not ignore its constitutional obligation concerning tripartite delegations to the Conference.

In any event, Venezuelan employers consider that in order to make the Director-General's Report viable and to avoid it becoming a mere intellectual exercise in rhetoric, it is indispensable for Venezuela and indeed any other country which is a developing country and which is committed to the pressing need to create productive employment, to recognize the value of private enterprise, which constitutes the basic philosophy of one of the three parties to the ILO system by ensuring the application or existence of measures such as: the full rule of constitutional economic guarantees; the promotion and implementation of a bold policy of privatization; improvement and upgrading of the country's physical infrastructure; the promotion of citizens' security and safety; the respectful, consistent and sustained application of the tripartite principle as promoted by the ILO with respect to agreements reached with social partners; and the identification and urgent establishment of clear national objectives in order to overcome the negative situations which undermine democratic stability as well as the living conditions of the most needy citizens.

The task before us, particularly before us as Venezuelans, is by no means easy. Let us call upon the best brains available to unite our efforts for development within a democratic and pluralist system, which we have repeatedly chosen. Most of Latin America is already in the race and, to quote Confucius: "perseverance overcomes all obstacles".

I cannot let this occasion pass without putting on record the efforts and achievements of the multidisciplinary technical advisory team in our region based in Lima. It has among other things, made a positive contribution to the genuinely tripartite search for possible solutions to one of the problems most affecting job creation and the value of Venezuelan real wages, namely social benefits, which arise on dismissal or withdrawal of a worker from a firm.

In accordance with the Report of the Director-General at the last meeting between the multidisciplinary technical advisory team and the advisors and technical team of the most representative employers' association in Venezuela, FEDECAMARAS, it was by no means by chance that the top priority was set as being the struggle against unemployment and consequently the pressing need to find solutions in order to promote productive employment. On that occasion stress was also laid upon the need to dynamize youth training programmes, and to retrain those who have suffered from those who have lost their jobs as an unfortunate result of the necessary structural adjustment required to achieve competitiveness and to adapt to globalization. In this respect we reiterate our recommendation made to the Board of the Turin Centre placing emphasis on regional technical cooperation and the Centre's and the regional programmes of CINTERFOR (the Inter-American Research and Documentation Centre on Vocational Training).

We Venezuelan employers also strongly support the sustained promotion of and effective and timely stimulus to small and medium-sized enterprises since, as in other countries, they generate more jobs faster and the employment they generate is productive and dignified.

Let us not deceive ourselves. If we really and truly recognize the unquestionable priority of productive employment, as stated by the Director-General in his Report, we will achieve it by at the same time creating the conditions in which the quality of life of our citizens is optimized. This is the only way to dispel the spectre of social chaos, unemployment and underemployment which endangers democracy and our very survival. We will receive no thanks from the young, the unemployed, the marginalized, from those have been shoved aside into the informal sector – on the contrary, a legion of evil spirits will, more than justifiably, disturb our sleep and our consciences.

Therefore, I invite all the distinguished participants in this 82nd Session of the Conference – Governments, my Employer colleagues and Workers – to join the great crusade for employment promotion on the basis of the conditions which I have spelt out as being necessary to that end.

Mr. HOFF (Employers' delegate, Norway) – It gives me pleasure that a representative of Nicaragua has been elected President of this Conference, particularly as I know Nicaragua through technical cooperation with employers, workers, politicians, administration and the press in your country. It warms my heart that Nicaragua is now taking an active part in international work.

At last year's Conference and at Governing Body meetings during the year, many of us have been preoccupied by ideas and proposals to make the ILO more up to date, more relevant to its members and more attractive to its constituents.

The work of the Governing Body has been promising in this respect, and I particularly refer to the efforts of the Legal Issues and Labour Standards Committee (LILS) which point to a new understanding on what sort of Conventions we need in the future, and the obvious and unanimous wish to find ways of attracting greater numbers of ratifications.

However, I have difficulty in seeing that we have shown great talent to pursue that line at this Conference. The subject of home work stands out as an example, I would say. The Office made preparations for still another Convention full of detailed rules and regulations – exactly what the Conference, the Governing Body and the Director-General have all said they do not want any more. The Conventions are supposed to be sets of main principles with ample freedom for the ratifying country to reach the goals and apply the principles through the methods which are right for that country.

And what about the governments? Did they this year instruct their experts in the Home Work Committee to do their best in this direction? I am afraid that it was very difficult indeed to discover colleagues on the government benches who offered any help to get out of the old habits. It is therefore the appeal from the employers of the five Nordic countries – for which I have the honour to speak here today – that we all take the issue of modernization, relevance and simplification seriously when preparing for the next Conference and for all future meetings of the ILO.

We must not let ourselves be trapped into believing that the ILO lives a life isolated from the requirements of the world as it changes and develops round us. The ILO has to adapt to present future needs as everybody else. In fact, we have to make changes to safeguard the best that we have achieved in the past. Inevitably that also means leaving behind what is not useful and what is not wanted or demanded by sufficient numbers of people or member countries and federations.

Such is life – also for the ILO – if we want to keep the support and the contributions from the membership.

The employers wish for an efficient and successful ILO. We therefore invite governments and workers to find, together with us, a sound and realistic basis for future actions. Do not let us listen to people who have stiffened their thinking and imagination as if we were still living in the 1950s and 1960s. Let us come together and discover that there is today as much room for cooperation as there is for battle and antagonism.

Open minds are also necessary in our common striving for increased employment. Let us try not to be politically biased but accept the facts of life. Workplaces are not created by crisp resolutions. They emerge in an environment where people are efficient and where a product comes out with added value. The producer at the local level needs freedom to find his own way, most often in the real world in teamwork with his own workers. He must operate in a regime of healthy laws and regulations, taxes and obligations, and competence must be stimulated at all levels.

Labour market experience must be dealt with professionally and honestly as there is now data available on working time, on the experiments in the sharing of jobs, flexible time organization, the role of health and safety and the working environment generally. We know more about employment agency participation in the labour market and investment, etc. But we need to deal together with all this – and without undue suspicion.

The employers would like to cooperate more fully with the Office in the preparation of future reports. A more vivid tripartite brains-trust activity would probably bring surprises. Nothing beats real life experience.

In the conclusion of his Report Promoting employment, the Director-General states that an important area for greater international cooperation is that of labour standards. One way of financing this, in the areas of the most urgent problems, is to persuade governments to direct the resources which are already there for technical cooperation in this direction. I point as one example to the problem of child labour because it is now an imperative challenge to allocate means for education and alternative occupation for these unfortunate children from the funds of technical assistance of the rich countries. But the eternal truth is that none of us gets richer if we do not produce. First earn the money – then go on to social spending.

In concluding my intervention, I shall therefore point to the possible help from the ILO in convincing the governments of the industrialized world that the best help to developing countries is probably not to continue to give away money. Better trade than aid!

Therefore, we can no longer discourage developing countries from producing and selling what they are really good at. And what they are good at, we all know – the primary sector. To pour aid into such countries at the same time as we are blocking them from selling us agricultural goods is a colossal paradox, perhaps a tragedy. Who has the courage to change this? And here is a challenge for the two organizational colleagues in Geneva: the International Labour Organization and the World Trade Organization.

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. POPESCU) – We have now completed our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General. On behalf of the Officers of the Conference I would like to thank you all for your statements which we listened to with great interest.

(The Conference adjourned at 5.15 p.m.)

Credentials

Third report of the Credentials Committee

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of France

1. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of France lodged by the Workers' delegate of that country, Secretary for International Relations of the Confédération générale du Travail (CGT).

2. The author of the objection stated that, contrary to prior practice, the Minister of Labour had, at the request of one of the representative organizations, changed the composition of the Workers' delegation at the International Labour Conference to the detriment of the CGT. The change affected the distribution of the members of the delegation between the three trade union organizations represented (the CGT, the Confédération française démocratique du travail (CFDT) and Force ouvrière (FO)). Its effect was to allow the CGT, which hitherto had had three members, only two members in years in which the titular delegate did not belong to the CGT (two years out of three, according to the present rotation system). This decision undermined the representation of the objector's organization, and had been imposed without prior consultation, contrary to article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution. In view of the Government's implicit refusal to discuss this matter with the CGT, the Workers' delegate was obliged to contest the credentials of his delegation.

3. In a written statement to the Committee made at its request, Mr. Yvon Chotard, Government delegate to the Conference, stated that at the beginning of each year the international section of the Ministry of Labour held a meeting with the representatives of each of the representative trade union organizations. The purpose of the meeting was to present for collective approval the distribution of trade union positions in the delegations of France to the various ILO meetings. In accordance with the system in force for many years, the CGT had three representatives, the CFDT and CGT-FO had two each, and the CFTC and CGC one each. During the meeting at the beginning of 1995, one of the Confederations indicated its intention to write to the Minister with a proposal for a slight change in the system in force, under which – based on the idea that the titular delegate needed to be seriously seconded – the organization designating that delegate would also designate two advisers. With the exception of the CGT, the trade union organizations that were represented at the meeting agreed to the proposal. The Government delegate noted in addition that the representation of the CGT this year was identical to that of previous years.

4. The Committee noted that there was a difference of opinion between the objection and the Government's statement as to whether the CGT has been properly consulted on the proposal. However, since the CGT's disagreement related to an ancillary matter (the number of advisers for each organization) having no effect on the composition of the Workers' delegation at the present Conference, the Committee concluded that the Workers' delegate and advisers had indeed been chosen in agreement with the most representative Workers' organizations in accordance with article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution. It therefore decided not to uphold the objection.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Lesotho

5. The Committee had before it an objection, lodged by the Lesotho Trade Union Congress (LTUC), to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Lesotho, who belonged to the Lesotho Federation of Democratic Unions (LFDU). The objecting organization provided detailed figures indicating that the LFDU had eight affiliates totalling 14,650 members, whereas the LTUC had 13 affiliates totalling 21,743 members. It alleged that the Government had partly based its decision on conflicting figures and had refused to take account of membership figures for the first quarter of 1995 as required by the Labour Code. Moreover, at the meeting the Government had convened on 5 June 1995 to discuss the nomination of Workers' delegate, the LFDU had been represented by three supporters of the ruling party, which had influenced its decision. The objecting organization requested invalidation of the nomination as being contrary to article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution and to Lesotho law.

6. In a written statement to the Committee made at its request, Mr. N.M. Fanana, Labour Commissioner, Government of the Kingdom of Lesotho and Government delegate at the Conference, confirmed that the LFDU and the LTUC were the most representative workers' organizations in the country. The Government had asked both organizations to submit outstanding annual returns of their affiliates by 31 March 1995, but this had not been done. It had noted, furthermore, that one affiliated union had been claimed by both organizations. The Government had therefore based its assessment of repre-sentativity on paid-up membership returns as the figures provided by the unions could be checked against the financial statements that they were required by law to submit. In the case of the LTUC, those returns showed a paid-up membership of 12,059. The figures provided by the Government for the paid-up membership of the LFDU was 12,070. Since the LFDU had the larger membership, at the meeting of 5 June the Government had accepted its nomination of the Workers' delegate.

7. The Committee noted that the figures of the Government and the objecting organization coincided as far as the LTUC's membership was concerned: total 21,761 with 12,059 paid-up members, i.e., 55.4%. There was also no discrepancy in the figure for total of LFDU members: 14,650. However, the figure given by the government for paid-up members of the LFDU was 12,070, i.e., 82.4%, which the Committee found surprising having regard to the proportion of paid-up members of the LTUC. The Committee also did not understand why no consultation had taken place with respect to the nomination until the eve of the Conference. The Workers' delegate had been accredited only towards the end of the present Conference. Since there was therefore insufficient time to seek the necessary clarifications from the Government, the Committee was unable to reach conclusions concerning the objection. At the same time, it drew attention to the need for governments to do their best during the consultation process to seek to achieve the agreement of all the most representative organizations on the nomination of the Workers' delegate. This requirement was particularly important where the workers' organizations concerned were similar in size.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Malawi

8. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Malawi lodged by Mr. Eaton V. Laita, under the designation of Secretary ad interim of the Interim Committee of the Trades Union Congress of Malawi (TUCM). He alleged that the Workers' delegate was an employer in his capacity of Personnel Manager of a Hotel Company in Malawi. He concluded that he himself could ably represent the Malawi workers at the International Labour Conference.

9. The Committee had also received a letter signed under the designations of Vice-President, General Secretary and Treasurer of the Congress Committee of the TUCM, containing a "workers' response" to the objection. The signatories stated that the Workers' delegate was the workers' representative in Malawi, adding that he was the elected President of the Hotels Food and Catering Workers Union and also President of the TUCM Congress Committee, which had replaced the Interim Committee.

10. In a written statement to the Committee made at its request, Dr. Gadi GY Mgomezulu, Principal Secretary for Labour and Manpower Development of Malawi and Government delegate at the Conference emphasized that the Workers' delegate had been nominated by the leaders of various trade unions in Malawi that were affiliated to the TUCM. All registered trade unions were affiliated to the TUCM, which was the most representative body of the workers of Malawi. The Interim Committee had replaced the Executive Committee of the TUCM in February 1994, subject to confirmation by the Congress of Delegates of the TUCM. In April 1995, leaders of various trade unions affiliated to the TUCM informed the Registrar of Trade Unions of their decision to replace the Interim Committee and the Secretary of the TUCM (the author of the objection), alleging that he had walked out of a meeting that was to discuss the convening of the Congress of Delegates. When the TUCM had been consulted with respect to the nomination for the present Conference, the Government had chosen the Workers' delegate nominated with the support of the leaders of six trade unions, covering a total membership of 485,000, in preference to the author of the objection, who had nominated himself and whose union had a membership of 15,000. Concerning the status of the Workers' delegate, the Government noted that management and decision-making for the company employing the delegate as personnel manager were being done by a foreign management team for the group of hotels concerned and that in accordance with the legislation of the country, such a person could not necessarily be regarded as an employer. Finally, the Government said that elections for the TUCM would take place at its annual conference in July.

11. In the light of the information provided by the Government, the Committee considered that it had acted correctly in the present unsettled state of affairs concerning the leadership of the most representative workers' organization in Malawi. The Committee accordingly decided not to uphold the objection.

Communication concerning the travel and subsistence expenses of the Employers' delegation of Venezuela

12. The Committee received a communication from the Employers' Group signed by its Chairperson, four Vice-Chairpersons and a member of the Employers' delegation of Venezuela complaining that the Government had not paid the travel and subsistence expenses of any member of that delegation, indicating as a reason the absence of any obligation to pay these expenses as well as the lack of the necessary resources. The Government had however borne the expenses of a four-member Workers' delegation. In the communication, the Committee was requested to intervene with the Government so as to require it to explain the reasons for this course of action and to abide by its constitutional obligations in future.

13. The Committee invited the Government concerned to comment on the substance of this letter and to provide the information requested in the Memorandum of the Conference concerning whether or not the Government was paying the travel and subsistence expenses of the Employers' delegation and, if applicable, the reasons why those expenses were not being met. Noting with regret that the Government had not responded to this invitation and that the allegations in the communication were particularly serious, the Committee considered that the Government's attention should be drawn to the obligation on Governments to pay the travel and subsistence expenses of all the delegates and advisers in their country's delegation in accordance with article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the ILO Constitution, as well as to the importance that the Credentials Committee had always attached to avoiding an imbalance between Employers' and Workers' delegations. The Committee stressed that the failure to respect these constitutional obligations or principles could be detrimental to the tripartite composition of delegations at the Conference.

Payment of travel and subsistence expenses of delegations

14. The Committee received a communication from the Employers' Group, signed by its Secretary, Mr. Costas Karpatis, wishing to register the protest of the Employers' Group at the number of governments which had not respected their obligation under article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution to pay the travel and subsistence expenses of their Employers' delegations to the Conference. A survey carried out by the Group at the current session showed that only 40 out of 117 Employers' delegations had had their expenses paid and that nine countries had not offered any financial support at all for the travel and subsistence expenses of their Employers' delegates and advisers. The communication also expressed the Group's dissatisfaction with the continuing imbalance between Government and Employers' and Workers' advisers, which was mainly detrimental to the Employers, the number of their advisers representing only one-fifth of the total present at the Conference. Noting that the measures taken so far to improve respect for the constitutional obligations had not had any significant impact, the Group reiterated its appeal for effective action in this regard.

15. The Committee recalled that, following the request of the Credentials Committee in 1992 concerning the possibility of introducing an appropriate mechanism to evaluate the extent to which article 13, paragraph 2(a), was being complied with, the Memorandum for the Conference contained a request to Governments to provide information in this connection. This year, the Governments of 58 member States (as against 54 last year) had responded to the request for information when they issued the credentials of their delegations. Forty four of those Governments (as against 40 last year) had declared that they had paid the expenses of the whole of their delegations, and 14 (the same figure as last year) had said that they only covered the expenses of some members of their delegations or only part of the expenses of the delegations.

16. The Committee noted that article 5 of the Standing Orders of the Conference gave it the mandate of examining credentials and any objections relating thereto. This mandate, as it had been interpreted up to now, provided no remedy in the case where a Government nominated an Employers' or a Workers' delegate or adviser, without respecting its obligation to make the necessary financial arrangements for the delegate or adviser actually to participate in the Conference. Considering that the failure to respect article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution could cause harm to the tripartite composition of delegations in a way similar to non-compliance with article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution, the Committee concluded that the Governing Body of the International Labour Office should be requested to consider the possibility of amending or clarifying articles 5 and 26 of the Conference Standing Orders in a way which would set out the role and functions of the Committee with respect to such complaints of non-compliance with article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution.

Other communications

17. On 14 June 1995, the Committee received a communication from the Confédération démocratique du travail (CDT) of Morocco concerning the Workers' delegation of that country. The communication was to the effect that the Government had decided unilaterally to appoint the titular delegate from the Union marocaine du travail (UMT) to the detriment of the CDT. The Committee noted that, if that communication should be regarded as constituting an objection, it would be irreceivable under article 26, paragraph 4(a) of the Standing Orders of the Conference as the delegation concerned had appeared in the provisional list of delegations published as a supplement to the Provisional Record of 6 June 1995 and the communication had been received after the expiration of the time limit of 72 hours laid down in the provision referred to.

18. The Committee received a communication from the Employers' delegate of Cyprus, regretting that the entire Employers' delegation had been obliged to withdraw from the Conference as a result of strikes that had been declared in his country. The Committee considered that this communication did not call for action on its part.

19. This report was adopted by the Credentials Committee unanimously. It is submitted to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Provisional Record

Eighty-second Session, Geneva, 1995

Twenty-fourth sitting

Wednesday, 21 June 1995, 10.15 a.m.

President: Mr. Rosales Argüello

TWELFTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda today is the adoption of the twelfth report of the Selection Committee, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 4L.

If there are no objections, I shall take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

COMPOSITION OF THE GOVERNING BODY OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – I shall now call upon the Clerk of the Conference to read you a communication concerning the composition of the Governing Body.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I have received the following communication from the Employers' Electoral College:

The Electoral College of the Employers' group of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference was convened on 20 June 1995 starting at 9 a.m.

Mr. Hultin opened the meeting and requested the election of a Chairman. On the nomination of Mr. M. Nasr (Lebanon), the Group unanimously appointed Mr. J.J. Oechslin as Chairman.

Mr. Oechslin informed the Electoral College that in accordance with article 54, paragraph 5 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference, the Employers' group of the Governing Body confirmed the appointment of Mr. Erik Hoff (Norway) and Mr. Toshio Suzuki (Japan) as titular members of the Governing Body, replacing Mr. Goran Hultin (Finland) and Mr. H. Tsujino (Japan), respectively.

Furthermore, the Electoral College, in accordance with the provisions of article 54, paragraph 5, and following a proposal made by Mr. W.A. Hilton-Clarke (Trinidad and Tobago), elected Mr. Barrington Robinson (Jamaica) as a deputy member of the Governing Body to replace Mr. E. Millette.

The meeting adjourned at 9.08 a.m.

This communication is signed by Mr. Oechslin, Chairman of the Employers' Electoral College and Mr. Hultin, representative of the President of the Conference.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON CONVENTION No. 81: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – The next item on our agenda is the report of the Committee on Convention No. 81. I would like to invite the Officers of that Committee to come to the rostrum: the Chairman, Ms. Trosdahl, Government adviser, Norway; the Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Diaz Garaycoa, Employers' delegate, Ecuador, and Mr. Tapiola, Workers' delegate, Finland; and the Reporter, Ms. Delang, Government adviser, Sweden, whom I call upon to submit the report.

Ms. DELANG (Government adviser, Sweden; Reporter of the Committee on Convention No. 81) – I have the honour and pleasure of presenting to this session of the Conference the report and the Protocol on the extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), to activities in the non-commercial services sector.

The basis of the discussion has been two summary reports drawn up by the International Labour Office, inter alia, containing a questionnaire communicated to member States.

In 1947 the ILO adopted the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), covering industrial and commercial workplaces. Almost 50 years have elapsed since then and, during this time, the societies of all member States have changed considerably. Nowadays the non-commercial services sector constitutes one of the largest sectors of working life. There is no reason why employees in this sector should not be subject to the same labour inspection activities as employees in other sectors of working life, especially as occupational injuries and their cost are increasing.

The Committee that has been working on extending the provisions of the old Convention has had three key issues to deal with: whether the new instrument should be a Recommendation or a Protocol; what categories of services may be excluded wholly or partly from the scope of a proposed Protocol; what special arrangements may be made for the inspection of certain workplaces.

At the beginning of the Committee's work, the various parties had quite different views on these matters. However, all three parties – Governments, Employers and Workers – showed an admirable desire to reach acceptable solutions through compromise. This has made the resulting Protocol a very useful instrument for improving the working conditions of millions of employees in the non-commercial services sector. On behalf of the Committee, I ask you to bear this in mind when adopting the report and the Protocol.

I would like to thank everyone on the Committee, the Chairperson, Ms. Trosdahl, the Vice-Chairpersons, Mr. Diaz Garaycoa and Mr. Tapiola, and the representatives of Governments, Workers and Employers, for their valuable contributions during these three weeks.

I would also like to thank Mr. Simpson and his staff, as well as the staff not seen in the meeting room for having made this Conference not only an efficient but also a pleasant one.

Original Spanish: Mr. DIAZ GARAYCOA (Employers' delegate, Ecuador; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Convention No. 81) – As Employer Vice-Chairperson of the Committee on the extension of the Labour Inspection Convention (No. 81), to activities in the non-commercial services sector, I would like to point out that our Committee has satisfactorily accomplished the task entrusted to it. We have approved the Protocol, which reflects the conditions required to encourage that no service be excluded from inspection of its installations. The Employers' group of this Committee originally intended to propose that the subject be dealt with only in a general discussion because more consultations and studies were required in order to ensure that the proper decisions would be taken. This position taken by the Employers' group finally led to a tripartite proposal calling for discussion and approval of a Recommendation rather than a Protocol. However, inasmuch as the Committee gave preference to the idea of a Protocol, our group decided to cooperate so that the characteristics of the subsequent Protocol would be such as to favour its widespread ratification.

These characteristics included the following: flexibility and the ability to adapt to the most varied and changing circumstances. This is why we Employers, during the discussion, spoke out in favour of maintaining in the text an option for Members who ratify the Protocol to exclude from its application services such as the police, and security and prison services. These were included in the draft prepared by the Office, as well as including at least national (federal) government administration among the sectors which could be excluded, as was finally approved. We felt that to do otherwise would have imparted a very dangerous rigidity to the instrument.

On the other hand, our group gave its strong support to granting governments the option to introduce certain limitations and restrictions to labour inspections at places where services are carried out, in the previously mentioned subsectors, when there are reasons fully justifying such measures.

In the same line of thought, our group proposed an amendment which would reduce from ten to five years the period after which ratifying Members would be able to denounce the Protocol (the denunciation period). This proposal reflected a current prevailing trend of the ILO concerning the need to maximize ratifications of Conventions in the light of the disquietingly reduced numbers of ratifications during recent decades.

Along with this reduced period, our intent was to give Members additional means of denouncing the Protocol, if events subsequent to ratification made it advisable to change one's position.

Unfortunately our amendment failed by a narrow margin. We have the satisfaction of having sowed the seeds of concern; we hope that at upcoming Conferences this innovation will prevail, which, by the way, does not affect any constitutional provision or the Standing Orders of the ILO.

In short, we consider that the Protocol adopted by the Committee, submitted for consideration by the Conference, will be a positive contribution to eliminate current discrimination as regards labour inspection but, as we have said, without interfering with the particular characteristics of certain non-commercial sectors. This is why we have agreed to its adoption.

We would also like to point out that in the Committee there was a great spirit of dialogue which favoured tripartite consensus without prejudice to the natural differences among the groups.

We believe this is a good opportunity to express once again our gratitude to the Chairman of the Committee who led the discussions very astutely. We would also like to thank the Workers' spokesman, Mr. Tapiola, for his great skills and his evident desire to reach a consensus. I would also like to express my personal gratitude for the opportunity the Employers' group has given me to act as their spokesman.

Mr. TAPIOLA (Workers' delegate, Finland; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Convention No. 81) – The Workers' group endorses the report and supports the Protocol extending Convention No. 81 to the non-commercial service sector. This is an important step in standing setting on labour inspection which started in fact already in 1919, the very beginning of the history of this Organization. We appreciate the efficient way in which this issue was discussed in the Committee and this shows that revisions which improve international labour standards do work.

With this revision we extend much-needed protection to a considerable segment of the working population, many of whom are subject to special high and varied risks, and the form that we have chosen, a Protocol, is very appropriate. This Protocol has to be read and considered together with Convention No. 81, and I trust that it will be ratified by at least as many States as the Convention itself. It will now be up to the constituents to see that this happens.

Article 2 of the Protocol makes provision for certain exclusions. We from the Workers' side had reservations about excluding whole categories from the scope of Convention No. 81. We would rather have focused on special arrangements but the categories of exclusions which we now have enumerated are only possibilities, nothing is specifically excluded by the Protocol itself. These exclusions are possible in certain fields of activity, such as the military, the police and prison services, and also essential government administrations. I underline that this Protocol does not talk of exclusions of the public service as such and this is important as otherwise the exercise would not have been very meaningful. A maximalist exclusion line would have left hardly anyone covered by the extension Protocol and at one stage I was afraid that the Protocol might automatically cover only the employees of municipal zoos. But it is also important that the determination of exclusions must take place in consultation with representative trade unions or, as the case may be, the representatives of the workers concerned.

The other important article, article 4 of the Protocol, contains a section on special arrangements whereby it is possible to regulate the powers of labour inspectors. However this does not necessarily restrict or limit them. The keyword in this article is "regulate". We accept that sometimes it is not feasible either for labour inspection to be carried out, or for there to be certain constraints on inspection, but at the same time there are no blanket arrangements. Here also measures should be taken in consultation with trade union representatives.

As the report shows, there was also a discussion on the denunciation period and in the end we decided to follow the standard line which is a ten-year period. The Workers' group is always ready for a debate when a debate is being called, but I somewhat regret that the Governing Body discussion which we believe would be constructively pursued there, was brought into the Committee itself. The end result was that we had a one-day seminar on what is going on in different parts of this Organization, and discussed the future of standard setting which was perhaps a useful exercise. In any case, the Workers' group strongly felt that the special nature of this Protocol calls for maintaining the same ten-year denunciation period as we have for Convention No. 81 itself.

We have received the message which my Employer colleague has delivered. We could perhaps say that there might have been another time and place to have delivered it, but it has been registered and I am certain that we will discuss it on another occasion.

Finally, on behalf of the Workers' group, its deputy spokesperson, Ms. Ashe from Australia, and on my own behalf, I would like to extend our thanks to the Chairperson and the Reporter, my fellow Nordics who did a first-class job, despite being recruited at the last moment, or maybe because of that very fact. I also wish to express my thanks to the Employers' Vice-Chairperson and the whole Employers' group for the cautious and determined defence of their interests, and sometimes of the interests of governments also, and I thank the governments for showing their flexibility, which is often called for, and the secretariat for its customary efficiency. In fact our group's thanks are recorded in paragraph 458 of the report.

In short, our feeling is that this was a good committee. This was a revision according to the new system of how the Conference should work, and I repeat that it has resulted in an improvement of international labour standards and, as such, it is very welcome.

Ms. TROSDAHL (Government adviser, Norway; Chairman of the Committee on Convention No. 81) – Please allow me even at this late stage of the Conference to congratulate the President on his appointment and on the way in which he has guided the deliberations of this session of the Conference. I would also like to congratulate the three Vice-Presidents.

Norway has had the honour of chairing the work of the Committee on the extension of the Labour Inspection Convention to activities in the non-commercial services sector. This was the responsibility we accepted, knowing full well that the task would be a difficult one, in particular because the Governing Body placed this item on the agenda for a single discussion.

The purpose of the proposed Protocol is to extend the provisions of the Labour Inspection Convention to workplaces in the non-commercial services sector. The means for effecting the extension is the proposed Protocol, which would be open to ratification by any Member having ratified Convention No. 81. A Member not having ratified Convention No. 81 would be able to ratify it with or without the proposed Protocol.

The consideration of adding a Protocol to the Labour Inspection Convention started in fact when the Committee of Experts of the Application of Conventions and Recommendations produced its 1985 General Survey on labour inspection. It noted that there is a whole series of non-industrial sectors which in many countries are not considered as commercial. This was seen to be a shortcoming in the Labour Inspection Convention, and it was stated that this should be corrected since the application of social legislation may also give rise to problems in the non-commercial services sector, which was rapidly expanding.

Workers in the non-commercial services sector make up anywhere from 10 to over 50 per cent of the active labour force in member States. They are regularly exposed to virtually all traditional occupational hazards, including the most serious ones. They are exposed to the same risks of disabling injury or disease as are workers in other industrial, commercial or agricultural occupations. In addition, they are often exposed to certain hazards unique to the non-commercial services sector.

In order to prepare for the extension of the Convention, the Office drew up two reports and questioned all the countries concerned on their opinion on the matter. It drafted a text of a proposed Protocol on the basis of the replies received.

It is my great pleasure to announce that the Committee concluded its work very satisfactorily, and that we are now in a position to submit to this plenary a proposed Protocol which I consider a model of progress, and at the same time a model of realism, flexibility and balance.

To afford flexibility, a Member ratifying the Protocol would have the possibility to exclude, following consultations, specified categories of workers wholly or partly from its scope of application. In addition, a Member may make special arrangements for the inspection of workplaces in identified services of the non-commercial services sector, so as to limit the powers of labour inspectors in certain respects. These provisions have been proposed to take into account the special features of particular services within this sector.

It has been a pleasure to chair this Committee, which has had a difficult task. However, the work has been done with a very constructive spirit and I would like to stress this in the spirit of friendship and even complicity. Each and every one of us felt the responsibility for preparing an instrument worthy of the ILO. The result shows that we have been successful in this endeavour. We have been able to achieve this, thanks to the excellent disposition of all the members of the Committee, and first and foremost, to the personal qualities of our two wise chairpersons, Mr. Diaz Garaycoa from Ecuador and Mr. Tapiola from Finland, to whom I would like to express my very deep gratitude. I am also equally grateful for the valuable help of the secretariat of the Office, headed by Mr. Simpson and Mr. von Richthofen.

We have achieved a result which I am happy to present to this Conference. The plenary has before it the report of our work, which I invite the Conference to adopt, and the Protocol, which I invite the Conference to adopt in the vote which will take place tomorrow.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – The report is now open for discussion.

Mr. MOORHEAD (Employers' delegate, United States) – Let me state at the outset that the United States Employers' group will vote for the Protocol. We do so, however, with a belief that had the process been different, this could have been a much better instrument. I believe the Governing Body made a fundamental mistake by putting on the agenda a one-year technical discussion of a subject as important as labour inspection.

Last year there was a general discussion on the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of the labour market. This was an excellent discussion which resulted in a report that the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96) was obsolete and its revision was highly desirable. The Governing Body, as a result, now has scheduled the revision of Convention No. 96 as a technical item for a future conference.

Labour inspection is surely more significant in its importance to workers than are employment agencies. The ILO even published in 1991 International labour standards concerned with labour inspection. It details the provisions governing the organization of labour inspection systems as well as the prerogatives, powers, duties and obligations of labour inspector officials under various ILO Conventions and Recommendations. Over 60 Conventions and Recommendations are listed.

There is, I believe, little difference between the views of workers and employers over extending the labour inspectorate system to activities in the governmental and non-commercial services sector. A worker becomes no less important because he or she works in the government or in the non-profit sector. An employer has no right to provide less than decent conditions of work for his or her workers because the employer is a governmental entity or in the non-profit sector.

I believe it would have been far more productive to have had a general discussion on the topic with the full airing of views by all sides. As it was, our discussion was limited to reviewing the provisions of a draft Protocol prepared by the Office after a limited input from a questionnaire.

For example, Article 2, paragraph 1 of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) is a Convention applying only to workplaces covered by law which are enforceable by labour inspectors. Many governments exclude themselves from the application of workplace laws. Mine certainly did until just last year. We could have discussed how widespread this phenomenon is and in a Recommendation, for example, call upon governments to apply such laws to themselves. Such a provision of course is not a proper item for a Protocol. In our Committee review of the report, a number of governments said they would abstain in the vote on our report in plenary. Some did so because there were no laws in their countries concerning these workplaces, but most did so because the discussion was inadequate to ferret out the particular problems which concerned them.

A full ranging discussion could have produced a report which would have given the Office much better information on which to draft an instrument – be it a Protocol, a Recommendation, or even a revised Convention consolidating many of the diverse standards if the discussions had shown a reason to do so. We have been deprived of that opportunity by the process established by the Governing Body and I, for one, regret it. What we have done is better than nothing, but it falls far short of what could have been done.

My other reason for addressing you today is to call your attention to paragraph 444 of the report of our Committee on Convention No. 81. It notes that I suggested that the ILO voluntarily submit itself to the Swiss labour inspectorate system. There is no legal impediment to its doing so as long as the submission is voluntary. I asked for a tripartite consensus to this recommendation in our Committee, but we had run out of time and there was no opportunity for a discussion of my suggestion. Therefore, I renew my call today in plenary for the ILO to subject itself to labour inspection. As the world authority in proposing the adoption of labour standards, it is particularly appropriate for the ILO to apply to itself Conventions that it urges its member States to adopt. Certainly as we call for governments, through this Protocol we are about to approve, to apply the labour inspection system to themselves, there is no reason why the ILO should not set an example for the rest of the international organizations in the world to follow.

Original French: Mr. ELMIGER (Government delegate, Switzerland) – First of all, I would like to thank the Officers of the Committee, and, of course, the secretariat, for the excellent report which we have incorporated in Provisional Record No. 20. This is the text of the report itself, on which I have no comments to make, but the report does contain a draft instrument, namely a Protocol to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), which a priori, having read it through quickly, prompts the following comments from my delegation.

First of all, generally speaking, the draft Protocol deals with areas that are not covered by any legislation in Switzerland, either at the cantonal or federal level. Therefore, it would be difficult for Switzerland to accept it. Secondly, the Protocol recommends, particularly in its Article 2(2), consultation procedures which go beyond what is possible either through legislation or in practice. In conclusion, therefore, my authorities are in favour of drawing up a protocol to improve the protection of workers throughout the world. Nevertheless, my delegation will not oppose this text. But, in the light of the problems I have just mentioned, the Swiss Government delegation will abstain in the vote on the adoption of the Protocol before us.

Original German: Mr. MEYER (Workers' adviser, Germany) – Thank you very much for allowing me to speak on the report on the extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) to activities of the non-commercial services sector.

I should like to address myself to the second sentence of article 5, and to the statement made by the Employer member of the United Kingdom which is to be found under paragraph 445 of the report of the Committee.

On the first point, my interpretation of this sentence is as follows: a Member shall grant the labour inspectorate the right to observe exercises and activities; however, this does not oblige the inspectorate to intervene. However, at the end of the next paragraph, mention is made of observations and proposals for improvement. Second point: in 1976, the ILO Governing Body decided to establish a tripartite mission to review the effectiveness of labour inspections' inspectorates. Members from Belgium, Denmark, France, the United Kingdom and Italy were called upon to take part in this review. The resultant report contained criticisms, suggestions and proposals as to improvement, made by trade unions, those in question, and Government and Employers' representatives. My recommendation is that, in order to ensure that the suggestion made by the representative of the United Kingdom Employers is taken into account; all the proposals for improvements that have been put forward in the seven reports should be merged together. In this way, the Governing Body would have an excellent basis for updating the Convention in question.

Original French: Mr. RAMOND (Government delegate, France) – Like previous speakers, I would like to offer my congratulations on the excellent work which has been done by the secretariat of the Committee, by the Chairman and by the Reporter. The report is excellent.

However, my delegation will have to abstain, and I would like to explain why.

It seems to me that when a Convention raises specific difficulties for any government there are two possible attitudes to take, and a number of excellent colleagues and indeed friends from the European Union have adopted a position which is not ours which says, in effect: "We are not going to get in the way of the Bureau. We are not going to set ourselves up as an obstacle against those who want a Convention. However, we will vote for this Convention even in the knowledge that at least in the medium term we will not ratify it."

That is not our position. We think that there should not be a pseudo legislation in international labour matters. We think that the work of the ILO should be respected, not just for its aesthetic appeal, but because of its effectiveness, and if there is a mass of unratified Conventions then it will never be possible outside this hall to speak seriously of an International Labour Legislation, and that is why if we are not in a position in the medium term to ratify a Convention, our position is to abstain. Now, it so happens that French public law makes a very clear separation from all points of view, jurisdictional and other, between public administration, falling within the power of the State, and all the rest. Our basic provisions in law are such that the Labour Inspectorate does not have access to bodies falling within the public administration.

That being so, we cannot in the medium term ratify such instruments, and consequently, we shall abstain.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – As no one else has asked for the floor, we shall proceed to the adoption of the report. First, and in accordance with the established procedure, we will adopt the body of the report, from paragraphs 1-462.

If there are no objections, I shall consider that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted, paragraphs 1 to 462.)

PROPOSED PROTOCOL OF 1995 TO THE LABOUR INSPECTION CONVENTION, 1947

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We shall now move on to the adoption of the Protocol of 1995 to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947, beginning with the Preamble. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the Preamble is adopted.

(The Preamble is adopted.)

We shall continue with the adoption of the Protocol, article by article.

(Articles 1 to 10 are adopted seriatim.)

Finally, we shall proceed to the adoption of the Protocol as a whole. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the Protocol is adopted as a whole.

(The Protocol is adopted as a whole.)

In accordance with article 40, paragraph 7, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Protocol will be submitted to the Drafting Committee of the Conference for the preparation of the final text.

Before concluding, I would like to thank the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen, the Reporter, and all the members of the Committee for an excellent job done.

(The Conference adjourned at 11 a.m.)

Twenty-fifth sitting

SECOND AND THIRD REPORTS OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – Our first item this afternoon is the adoption of the second and third reports of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, which can be found in Provisional Record No. 21.

Mr. Boateng, Government delegate of Ghana and Chairman of the Committee will present the reports.

Mr. BOATENG (Government delegate, Ghana; Chairman of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the second and third reports of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives. These reports are published in Provisional Record No. 21 and contain the recommendations of the Committee concerning the matters placed before it. The resolutions recommended for adoption by the Conference in respect of these items appear at the end of the reports.

The Committee considered recommendations concerning the assessment of contributions of new member States, scales of assessment of contributions to the budget for the 1996-97 financial period, the derogation from the provisions of the Financial Regulations governing cash surpluses and deficits, and the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO. These are included in the second report of the Committee.

The main subject considered by the Committee was the Programme and Budget proposals for the 1996-97 financial period. The Director-General, in introducing the proposals, pointed out that the proposed programme budget had responded to the desires expressed at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference and had therefore received very broad support from the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee as well as the Governing Body. The objective of real zero-growth had been achieved, due primarily to the reforms introduced in the last few years. Two further reforms would bear fruit in the coming biennium; these were the streamlining of sectoral activities to free up resources for follow-up actions in the member States, and actions to modernize standard-setting activities. The Programme and Budget better reflected the priorities of members, particularly in the fields of employment and enterprise development. With regard to the cost increases, the Director-General had also reviewed the assumptions in the light of the most recent forecasts. He was able to reduce the cost increases for the next biennium from 7.23 per cent to 6.26 per cent. At an exchange rate of 1.16 Swiss francs to the US dollar, the revised level of the proposed Budget was 672,220,000 Swiss francs.

The Committee heard statements on the Programme and Budget proposals from Mrs. Roldán-Confesor, the Chairperson of the Governing Body, Miss Mackie, on behalf of the Employers' Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body and Mr. Tapiola on behalf of the Workers' Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body. Their statements are included in the third report of the Committee in paragraphs 16-25.

In the debate the largest contributor had indicated that in the light of budgetary reforms currently under discussion, there was uncertainty about the level and the timing of the payments of its contribution. Certain other member States had also indicated that they could experience difficulties in meeting their financial obligations in view of the strengthening of the Swiss franc against other currencies. The majority of the Committee, however, supported the adoption of the level of the budget as proposed by the Governing Body, taking into account the adjustments in cost increases made by the Director-General. In preparation for a potential shortfall in contributions, the Committee recommends that the Conference requests the Director-General to present to the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and to the Governing Body whatever adjustments might prove to be necessary. These adjustments should not lead to reductions in the technical cooperation and field programmes. The Committee further recommends that the Conference requests the Governing Body to decide at its next meeting on 24 June on the procedures for any examination of any proposed adjustments.

Given the impact of the exchange rate fluctuations on the budget proposals, the Committee further recommends that the Conference requests the Director-General, the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and the Governing Body, to evaluate this issue as well as the presentation of the Swiss franc and US dollar values of the Programme and Budget proposals.

The total budget amounts to US$579,500,000 which, at the exchange rate of 1.16 Swiss francs to the dollar, comes to 672,220,000 Swiss francs. A summary of the budget of expenditure and income is in Appendix I to the third report in Provisional Record No. 21. You will find in Appendix II a summary of proposed expenditure by major programme. Finally, in Appendix III, you will find a table showing the contributions due from member States for 1996.

The final item for consideration was a proposal for funding the costs of holding a Maritime Session of the International Labour Conference should the session take place in January 1996.

I would like to express my thanks to the Vice-Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Melas, the Government delegate of Austria, and to all the members of the Committee and the secretariat, all of whom helped me greatly in my task as Chairman.

Finally, in recommending all the resolutions to the Conference for adoption, I would make a special appeal in respect of the resolution concerning the 1996-97 Programme and Budget proposals, that all of you, governments, employers and workers alike, give it your unanimous support.

(The Clerk of the Conference makes an announcement concerning corrections to the Spanish version of the two reports.)

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – Discussion of the reports is now open.

Ms. CARON (Government delegate, Canada) – During the discussions in both the Governing Body last March and in the Finance Committee at this session of the Conference, the Canadian delegation consistently stated its support for the programme aspects of the proposed 1996-97 budget which, in our view, reflect the right priorities and future orientations that will position the ILO to assume a strong role within the United Nations system in its areas of comparative advantage. But the Canadian delegation, along with other delegations, has also voiced its deep concern over the level of the budget, which does not reflect the considerable income short-fall expected for the biennium, and which means that the proposed budget considerably exceeds the revenue which the Organization can realistically expect to receive. We continue to believe that there is considerable scope for more absorption of cost increases. This would in part reduce the impact of the exchange rate changes on member States' assessments. That impact is of particular concern to countries with dollar-based currencies. During the Governing Body discussion, the Americas group tabled a statement to this effect.

The resolution pertaining to the budget in the report before you meets, in part, the concerns expressed by the Canadian delegation. In reverse order, Part C acknowledges the need for reviewing the impact of exchange rate fluctuations and for more transparency in outlining the dual currency budget. Part B of the resolution implicitly acknowledges that the budget level as it now stands sets out an expenditure ceiling, and is not based on actual income. In addition, Part B reaffirms the principle that member States, in conjunction with the social partners, have the responsibility for programme adjustments.

We welcome and support these two provisions of the budget resolution. However, my delegation cannot support the level of the budget as proposed in Part A of the resolution, for two reasons. First, it contravenes the principle that budget levels should reflect actual prospects for income. To maintain the proposed level in the face of a significant short-fall in revenue will artificially inflate the contributions of member States. This is unacceptable to my Government, since it penalizes those States that pay their contributions in full and on time. Second, the cost increase incorporated in the proposal is unacceptably high. It does not represent maximum cost absorption, nor is it a serious attempt to reduce the large overhead costs inherent in the 70 per cent portion of the budget which is spent in Geneva.

For these reasons, the Canadian delegation is unable to support Part A of the budget resolution. We hope, however, when the Governing Body meets next November, to be in a position to support a revised budget based on adjusted income and expenditure levels, as well as programme proposals agreed to on a tripartite basis.

Mr. JONZON (Government delegate, Sweden) – I am sure you will agree that we can learn a lot from poetry and novels, and indeed also from children's literature. For example, I am convinced that many of you will remember from Winnie the Pooh by A.A. Milne that there is nothing as empty as an empty jar of honey.

However, this fundamental observation – not to say indisputable fact – is no longer valid; I fear the ILO budget is just as empty.

The only thing we in fact know about the draft budget is that it will be adjusted, but we do not know to what extent or how.

Therefore my delegation will vote in favour of the resolution, only in order not to stop the process, and today I will confine myself to three observations on what I hope to find in the adjusted budget.

Please do not interpret me as being negative. The Swedish Government is a very strong supporter of the ILO and we in the delegation do really care.

First, the process of reform of the United Nations specialized agencies over the past years originally had a twofold purpose. One was to reduce the involvement of the agencies in the practical execution of projects in the field. Not at all because the need for field activities was decreasing but because the United Nations agencies are better suited for other kinds of work.

The other purpose – and the most important one – was to make the specialized agencies centres of excellence with a clear focus on analytical and normative work, on policy advice and on collection and dissemination of information for the benefit of their constituents.

It is, however, unclear to my delegation to what extent such a shift in emphasis is emerging within the ILO.

One example could of course be the multidisciplinary teams. But in the absence of a firm multidimensional approach at headquarters, which could assist the teams in their difficult task, we fail to understand in what way the work of these teams really differs from the work of the previous field experts.

To our understanding, there is a need for more comprehensive analyses and thinking within the Office and the Organization to be able to really and fully utilize the potential that a multidisciplinary approach actually has.

There is a need for far-reaching analyses in order to be able to offer relevant advice when there are conflicting goals and when priority-setting becomes a difficult task. And the specific weight of such advice is determined by the intellectual capacity of the Organization – and not by the money spent on the spot in country X or on programme Y or Z.

My delegation's interpretation of the second paragraph of the resolution – where it says that the adjustment should not reduce the technical cooperation and field programmes – is therefore that this is not to be measured only in the way dollars and cents are distributed between various programmes and countries.

There should be no presumption that field activities by definition are of greater value than other work.

The heart of the matter is that the positive impact of different activities, wherever they are located, in terms of achieving the overall objectives should not be reduced. Of course it is desirable to place more emphasis on field activities – but they must be effective.

The adjustments that are necessary for budgetary reasons have to be of a structural and thereby lasting nature. Nothing should be looked upon as sacred if efficiency and productivity improvements are possible. Areas of concern include the service and support activities and the distribution between staff at P and G levels.

To imagine that there is room for productivity measures within all programmes has very little to do with how hard people work, and I want to underline that. According to science, productivity is determined mainly by two things – first of all management, and secondly organization.

My second observation refers to the approach to the most fundamental of all problems that the United Nations family is dealing with, and that is poverty. This complex issue was one of the themes addressed by the Social Summit.

What was stressed during the Social Summit was the inter-relation between the various problems and the multiple effects of various policies.

It is therefore of the utmost importance that the ILO also deal with poverty and general economic policy matters – but from its unique angle and perspective, namely employment, participatory involvement etc. After 20 years of experience of policy-making and fights with the Minister of Finance, I know that in order to have an impact on general economic policy, which is decisive from both the poverty and employment perspectives, we have to provide analyses and hard proof of what the effects of proposals are on macro- development.

And therefore the ILO must also be able to speak the language of the Bretton Woods people. Moreover, the ILO has political legitimacy and credibility as regards social and economic issues because of its representativity and tripartite constituency.

Rather than hiding under a patchwork quilt of beautiful words and ideas, the ILO, including you and me, should delve deeply into the questions of mutual interdependence between macroeconomic and social issues and contribute to the discussions on what to do to assist those people, those countries and those regions that in the eyes of today's markets are superfluous or next to superfluous.

Due to the interdependence between micro and macro it therefore goes without saying that the ILO has to look more at general economic issues.

This calls for a new paradigm of collaboration between relevant organizations, not just improved mechanisms of coordination. But it also requires a staff with the appropriate competence to play that role and that this staff be used for the right purpose.

My third and last observation refers to visibility. The ILO has to find an inroad to international debate, to reach out in order to have an impact on thinking and policy.

If, for example, the World Employment report is published yearly and is marketed appropriately, it has the potential to become one of those influential publications that policy-makers and others all over the world are waiting for.

In the information society marketing is decisive. It doesn't matter how excellent our ideas are if the decision-makers are unaware of them.

I also strongly support the idea that such a report be issued mainly under the authority of the Director-General, rather than after negotiations by the lowest common denominator of the tripartite constituency.

This might, perhaps, be risky from a political point of view, but in the long run, I am convinced that you all accept that it is better sometimes to disagree and argue with the Director-General than to gag him.

Mr. HILBURN (Government delegate, United States) – I appreciate the opportunity to comment on the Finance Committee report on behalf of the United States of America.

On this 50th anniversary of the United Nations, people are looking to the great international institutions to strengthen the global economy, improve living and working conditions and promote sustainable development.

At the same time, people are demanding change from their governments. In the United States there is an effort to lower the deficit and bring public spending under control. Funding for all public purposes can be expected to shrink. Our Government is not only restraining growth, it is down-sizing significantly. Other governments are experiencing similar challenges.

For international organizations, this means that most United Nations agencies will have fewer resources available. As a result United Nations agencies must refocus on their mandates, their priorities and their basic structure. We must develop a culture of management for results, protecting top priority programmes while reducing non-programme costs.

The United States is asking the United Nations, including the ILO, the same things it expects of its own public services. For a start, United Nations forums must meet less and do more. We must consolidate and streamline administrative functions. We must publish only critical reports. We must move the data collection and analysis function into the twenty-first century with the application of new technology, interactive multi-media programmes and Internet access. The consequence of a lower overall resource base will ultimately demand smaller bureaucracies with more focused agendas.

For the United Nations system to meet the challenge of the twenty-first century it will have to be smaller, more proactive and more flexible. During these past days we have worked hard to reduce the ILO budget level as well as the expenditure level. We are fully convinced that substantial savings can be found and costs absorbed in a biennium budget of over $500 million. Maintaining an artificially high budget and cost-binding income level only postpones the day, and increases the pain, when the Governing Body will have to prioritize the Organization's programmes.

As the report under consideration makes clear, there was a range of views expressed in the Finance Committee. At one point, it seemed possible that the Committee might reach a compromise on the budget level. However, the moment passed and with it any hope that the United States would be able to vote in favour of the 1996-97 Programme and Budget. We simply cannot, in good conscience, vote for a budget we cannot pay for.

I believe it is important also to address the concerns of those who question United States intentions with regard to the ILO. The Administration remains committed to active membership and participation in the Organization. We see the ILO as an essential part of the multilateral system of the twenty-first century. However, the Organization must restructure itself to meet the needs of its Members in the increasingly stringent budget environment we foresee. We look forward to working with the Director-General and ILO Members to review and sharpen the priorities of the Organization in order to ensure that they support the high objectives and principles on which the ILO was founded and which we support.

Mr. VAN HEERDEN (Government adviser, Republic of South Africa) – For the last week we have been conducting budget discussions in the Finance Committee, and these are never easy discussions. Talking about money is always a subject which is likely to raise emotions and bring out a number of vested interests which often clash. I would just like to share a few observations with you as a member State and client of the ILO, as I know all of you are, to try to draw together what I think is really the direction in we should take – the direction which we feel the ILO can act in our best interest.

We have heard a number of people say that the ILO budget is too high, but that raises for me a question. What do we mean when we say too high? Higher than what? Too high in relation to what? Is it higher than last year? Is it higher than ten years ago? As a matter of fact, some of you might know that the ILO budget today is still 10 per cent lower than it was in 1977 when the United States pulled out the last time. That withdrawal in the late 1970s precipitated an adjustment in the ILO budget which has since remained at a fundamentally lower level, so I do not think it is historically accurate to say that the budget is too high – certainly not just as a broad generalization. We might say that the budget is too high in relation to the programme but first, to conclude that, we would have to take the programme, analyse its contents and see whether the budget is appropriate to the programme objectives that we have all agreed upon.

Last year when we met for the 75th anniversary of the ILO we gave the ILO and the Director-General with an enhanced mandate. We decided that the ILO had to play an increased role in a world of work that is changing with ever greater rapidity. We asked the ILO to take more leadership, to help us to solve the problems we face in the world of work. Now, it cannot do that without greater resources. We all went to Copenhagen in March. We discussed key issues and key problems facing developed and developing countries – poverty alleviation, social disintegration, employment – and we decided again that the ILO had a fundamental role to play – a leadership role to play. We asked the ILO to take up that challenge. We cannot now deny it the resources that it needs to play that role.

So I am making a fundamental pitch for us to talk not just in generalized terms about a cut of 5 per cent, 6 per cent, or 50 million. I am asking us to look at the role that we want the ILO to play, to find those programme priorities and then come up with a budget that is appropriate. That may well mean an ILO that is smaller, more flexible, more decentralized – but let us get to that conclusion via the discussion of the programme, not simply by throwing around a couple of handy figures.

We have also heard a number of comments made about the size of the ILO's superstructure – the 70 per cent of the ILO budget which is spent in Swiss francs, basically here in Geneva. As someone who has had the privilege of working inside and outside the Organization I must say that on the basis of my personal experience, I do not think that the ILO is too large and I do not think that the bureaucracy is bloated. I worked in a pigeon-hole in the ILO. I can tell you that the resources and the facilities that I have at my disposal in my national Government far exceed the resources that I had at my disposal as an ILO official. So I think that we have to see that there is a relationship between the superstructure here in Geneva and activities in the field. I think that we could end up in a situation where we saw off the branch we are sitting on.

So, I am again making a pitch for us to analyse in a more rigorous, in a more programmatic way the role we see for the ILO. If that discussion leads us to conclude that there are activities in Geneva which are superfluous, which could be trimmed down without impairing or with even enhancing activities in the field, well and good, but let us avoid the generalizations, particularly when they verge on judgements about the staff and the abilities of the ILO headquarters.

The final point that I would like to make, and it is a point that I have discussed with my colleagues in southern Africa a lot in recent days, is that we of the ILO, when we talk about it, are not talking about a monolithic bureaucracy somewhere "out there", over which we have no control, we are talking about an Organization in which we take fundamental decisions, both in the Governing Body and at the sessions of the Conference. So if we see the ILO's programme and budget, or if we see the ILO's activities as inappropriate, the responsibility is ours; it is ours for having mandated it to play that role, it is ours for failing to intervene to change it. I would say that if we do feel – as many people do – that we are entering into a new phase of financial stringency, of down-sizing national and international governments, then let us work, as Members of the ILO, towards a medium-term adjustment of the ILO's activities. Let us set ourselves a five- or a ten-year objective of fundamentally refocusing the ILO, and in terms of that focus then come up with a budget that is appropriate. But let us start with the ILO's priorities, and end with a budget that is appropriate. For that reason I urge you all to vote for this programme and budget.

Miss MACKIE (Employers' delegate, United Kingdom) – I would like to remind the Conference of one or two matters: first, of timing and, second, of responsibility.

On the matter of timing, I think it is important to recognize that because of the timing of various decisions which need to be taken either by national governments or by the ILO at its annual session of the Conference, we are today faced with the problem which the preceding speakers this afternoon have made clear to us all.

It is not altogether unusual, unfortunately, but during the course of a biennium the ILO budget – which like most budgets has to be discussed and approved in advance of the time when it is applicable – from time to time has been found to be a trifle over-optimistic because of the delay in the payment of certain contributions, and the response has been entirely proper. The response has been indeed just that – a response. The ILO has responded to the problem once it has been identified and quantified, and where necessary, has adjusted programmes or economized in ways which were at that moment most available and most appropriate.

Now we have a draft Programme and Budget before this session of the Conference which, in order to comply with our Standing Orders, we need to approve. I think it is probably a coincidence. I certainly do not believe that any government times its budget discussions with any particular awareness of the timing that the ILO needs its Conference to respect when discussing the Programme and Budget, but it so happens that there are uncertainties. In particular, we are facing those uncertainties which the spokesman for the United States Government has set out before us today. I have to say that I fundamentally disagree with the reaction of the Canadian Government to those uncertainties. It seems to me that we would be creating still more uncertainties if we were now to make an arbitrary cut in the figures which are now before you. We cannot forecast the possible size of a cut which we are warned is likely to arise in the contribution, admittedly, of our largest contributor. It seems very much more sensible and practical, and also procedurally more appropriate, if we support the motion which is before us. Indeed, in that sense, the motion is an entirely proper one. I have every confidence we will be able to support all three parts – and when I say “we” I am speaking on behalf of the Employers’ group of this Conference.

During the discussions in the Finance Committee, which is, of course, a government committee and not a tripartite committee, I was privileged to be present. I am not a member of that committee. You have the record of the discussions in front of you. I believe that you will be able to agree with me that part (a) is primarily a response to that procedural or technical need to approve the budget which has been exhaustively discussed and agreed by the Governing Body. If for no other reason, it should be adopted so that there will be something on which to work when we have further information, be it good or bad, about the contributions which we may look forward to receiving. These are not separate diverse motions in front of you. It is one motion with three parts, and I believe that we must read it in that way, with the three parts together. Of these three parts, I would suggest to you that the second is the one on which you should focus if you are looking for realism and practicality. The Employers’ group in the Governing Body and at this session of the Conference has, for some time, endorsed the concept that the ILO needs to reform and to improve its efficiency in terms of the results it achieves for the income which its member States contribute. I think this particular second paragraph, paragraph (b), expresses the necessary and practical steps which I hope will be the first steps on a path which leads us not to a reaction, but to something proactive, where we can look at the structure and at the work of the ILO; one in which instead of cutting the budget on an ad hoc basis, we can recognize the need to consider reconfirming the priorities which the Governing Body has already identified. We need to consider how we can best use the money which we have every hope and reason to expect to receive. So I believe it is wholly appropriate to say that paragraph (b), which requests the Director-General to work through the Programme, Finance and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body to make those proposals and whatever adjustments may prove to be necessary, is a good paragraph.

I find it extremely significant and important that it includes the phrase “should not reduce the technical cooperation and field programmes”, and if I emphasize the word “programmes”, it is because I think that it deserves emphasis. This is not aimed at wholly preserving those programmes with the same figures attached to them, but it is making very clear that the programmes themselves must not be cut. That is something which again the Employers’ group supports. There is no doubt from the point of view of one who has sat on the sidelines of the Finance Committee that the way in which the budget is put before the Conference and the Committee is confusing for those of us who do not instinctively have the ability to read with one eye reading Swiss Francs, and the other eye reading United States dollars. It is confusing, and it does lead to all sorts of conversions going on in the middle of discussions. I think it is helpful, although I regard it as procedurally less important, that we have the recommendation in paragraph (c). So, in detail and in general, I commend this resolution to you. The Employers’ group has had a report on it, although we did not have the document very early this morning, and we do support it and I believe will vote for it.

I regret very much that paragraph (b) in particular is not sufficient to enable certain governments to join what I believe will be an overwhelming majority in support of the resolution before you this afternoon. These governments have, in my view, expressed opinions fundamentally not dissimilar from those that I have tried to express to you, namely that there is a need for reform and a need to recognize that we will not have the income represented by the figures in front of you.

Mr. BRETT (Workers’ delegate, United Kingdom) – I speak on behalf of the Workers’ group and in beginning I recall the Swedish Government delegate introducing A.A. Milne as the starting point of his contribution. I think that rather than an English author I will start with the premise of an Italian playwright, a writer of great farces, Dario Fo, who wrote a great farce which is entitled “Can’t Pay, Won’t Pay”. That, it seems to me, characterizes some of the ingredients in our debate. We contributed to the work of the Committee in a contribution by my colleague, Kari Tapiola, in which he rightly reminded the Committee that governments may dispose, but what they dispose of is taxpayers' money earned by workers, working for employers. Therefore I believe the social partners do have the right to voice views. Another of my colleagues, Leroy Trotman monitored closely the work of the Committee. For this he received a unanimous vote of sympathy from the Workers' group, recognizing the difficulty that the Committee had and the frustration of anyone who sat in the Committee and could not contribute.

There are a couple of comments in the body of the report I would like to refer to, one of which I think is wise and one is one which causes concern. The one I think which is wise is the reference to the contribution of the Government of Belgium which pointed out that the unique role of the ILO, the reconfirmation during the commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the ILO, and the Declaration of Philadelphia, were reasons why the ILO could not be treated in the same way as any other specialized agency of the United Nations. I think that is a wise contribution to remember. The one that causes me some concern, and I may do a disservice to the Canadian Government here, so if this text is not what was said I apologize in advance, but the text says in paragraph 29, second sentence: "The ILO constituents had expressed support and agreement that it should adapt its core principles of protecting workers' rights in the changes taking place in the global economy". I recognize no such change. It has not been the decision of the Conference to change at all or to adapt at all the core principles. We may have to adapt the means of arriving at the ends that are determined for us in our principles, but the Workers' group has no intention of being party to adapting the core principles.

The advantage of being the fifth or sixth speaker in the debate is that it is possible to hear echoes of what you are thinking in the contributions of others and I particularly refer to the contributions of the Governments of Sweden and South Africa. I agree with lots of what our colleague from Sweden said. The Workers are quite prepared to enter constructively into mechanisms for adjustments to the programmes to meet a shortfall in budget, and we recognize in the statement by the Canadian speaker a reference to the member States in conjunction with social partners making such changes. It is therefore slightly difficult to square that with paragraph (b) of the resolution, which clearly sets out two no-go areas, namely that the adjustments should not reduce technical cooperation and field programmes. I think my Employer colleague, Anne Mackie, put that in context, and it is a context with which we agree, namely that if we are to work as a tripartite body within the Governing Body, then it seems to me we look at everything but we recognize the emphasis that governments put on the technical cooperation of field programmes rather than see them as absolute no-go areas to seek efficiencies.

The other thing I would like to refer to is that three governments, two in contributions made from the rostrum, by the United States and Canada, and one in a contribution made during the debate, have asserted that there are considerable savings to be made in the administration. That is stated in the paragraph that refers to the Government of Japan's contribution in the Committee and was emphasized by the governments of Canada and the United States. All those three governments sat through the tortuous and difficult setting of the current budget. My memory is not infallible but I might have noticed if any of them had offered considerable savings that could instantly be made in the administration of the ILO, and as far as I recall, none did. What we have seen is a continuous squeeze in the name of reform on resources within the ILO, and the Workers' group has played a constructive role in reforming the Governing Body, and reforming the Conference. But there comes a point, I think, when we have to say as the Government representative of South Africa said, that it is not a question of how high the budget is. We clearly have governments with difficulties in making their contributions, either because of the economic state of their countries, or the political will, or lack of it, of their congresses or parliament. What I think we have to do is see how to retain the mandate, retain the effectiveness of the Organization, and I can offer the support of the Workers' group to this resolution tomorrow, and join with my Employer colleague in hoping that he will receive overwhelming support. I also offer the constructive involvement of the Workers' group in the difficult decisions that lie ahead. But we believe it is right to set the budget. It is right also to recognize the difficulties of member States. We do not believe we would have assisted by changing the budget at this stage, but we do recognize that there are difficult days that lie ahead.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL JARWAN (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, United Arab Emirates) – On behalf of the Arab countries, allow me to state that we are satisfied with the outcome of the work performed by the Finance Committee and the resolutions which are before us. We would like to thank the Chairman and the Officers of the Committee for their input in coming up with the resolution which represents a consensus adopted by the members of the Committee. As an Arab Government member of the Non-Aligned Group, we support any and all decisions taken by this group, although we know full well in advance that there will be considerable financial responsibility involved arising in connection with the budget. In particular this holds true for the question of exchange rates. However, it is necessary to have the best possible working conditions and the ILO must be able to survive, and this is why we are ready to support the budget and the other proposals which are now before us, hoping that our resources will be managed more efficiently in the future taking into account the most urgent needs.

Still, on behalf of the Arab group, I would like to voice our reservations concerning the Governing Body and the PFA Committee which failed to take into account the request put forward by the Arab group. I am not going into any specifics of Arab proposals. Let me simply recall that Arabic should be used more widely in the ILO's publications. This would certainly help to involve more closely all those representing more than 20 Arabic-speaking countries throughout the world. This would also enhance the efficiency of the ILO.

Then there is the need as we all see, to keep on an even keel for the years 1996 and 1997 in terms of the technical cooperation provided by the ILO to the National Palestinian Authority. This Authority is confronted with major tasks and challenges and will be called upon to meet the future needs of the Palestinian population. It is also imperative to increase the share falling to the Arab countries from the technical cooperation programme. Now looking at these two programmes and comparing them with the other regions, we feel that there is a certain imbalance.

In closing I would like to say once again that we support the proposals made by the Finance Committee, but we depend on the other bodies of the ILO for the future and we trust that they will take into account what we have just said.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – As there are no further speakers on my list, I think we are ready to adopt the second report.

If there are no objections, I shall consider that the body of the report, i.e. paragraphs 1 to 17 plus Appendices I and II, is adopted.

(The second report is adopted, paragraphs 1 to 17 and Appendices I and II.)

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ASSESSMENT OF CONTRIBUTIONS OF NEW MEMBER STATES

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – I now submit for adoption the resolution concerning the assessment of contributions of new member States. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE SCALES OF ASSESSMENT OF CONTRIBUTIONS FOR 1996 AND 1997

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – I submit for adoption the resolution concerning the scales of assessment of contributions for 1996 and 1997. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

RESOLUTION CONCERNING A DEROGATION FROM THE PROVISIONS OF THE FINANCIAL REGULATIONS

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – I submit for adoption the resolution concerning a derogation from the provisions of the Financial Regulations. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE COMPOSITION OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – I submit for adoption the resolution concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the third report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives. I submit for adoption the paragraphs 1 to 226 and Appendices I, II and III. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the report, paragraphs 1 to 226, plus Appendices I, II and III, are adopted.

(The third report is adopted, paragraphs 1 to 226, and Appendices I, II and III.)

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ADOPTION OF THE PROGRAMME AND BUDGET FOR 1996-97 AND THE ALLOCATION OF THE BUDGET OF INCOME AMONG MEMBER STATES

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – A record vote will be held tomorrow morning on the resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for 1996-97 and the allocation of the budget of income among member States.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE HOLDING OF A MARITIME SESSION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – I submit for adoption the resolution concerning the holding of a Maritime Session of the International Labour Conference. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

By way of conclusion, I would like to thank the Chairman, Vice-Chairman and Reporter, as well as the other members of the Finance Committee, for their outstanding performance.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON SAFETY AND HEALTH IN MINES: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – Our next item is the adoption of the report of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines, (which you will find in Provisional Record No. 19. I therefore invite the Officers of the Committee to take their places on the rostrum: the Chairman, Mr. Békés, Government adviser, Hungary; the Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Stewart, Employers' adviser, South Africa, and Mr. Maitland, Workers' delegate, Australia; and the Reporter, Mr. McGinn, Government adviser, Canada, whom I now call upon to submit the report.

Mr. MCGINN (Government adviser, Canada; Reporter of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines) – This afternoon I am both pleased and proud to submit to the Conference the Report of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines. The report, which can be found in Provisional Record No. 19, covers the proceedings of the meeting which, on the basis of the second discussion, has led to the proposed Convention and proposed Recommendation, and a Committee resolution inviting the Governing Body to note that additional action should be pursued by the ILO to enhance the safety and health of the workers in the oil and gas industries.

I should like to point out that in Provisional Record No 19, in the Spanish text, paragraph 222 of the report is missing. This reads as follows: "Subject to modifications agreed on, the Committee adopted the proposed Recommendation as a whole." It is an important section and will be revised in the Record of Proceedings.

Three years ago, the Office began the preparation of a law and practice report on safety and health in mines which, when considered by the Governing Body at its 254th Session in November 1992, led it to decide to place on the 81st Session of the Conference the question of safety and health in mines. The high level of participation of member States, after consultation with the most representative organizations of workers and employers at each step in this process of developing the proposed text, is a clear indication of the importance of the mining industry, in both industrially developed and emerging nations, and more importantly, the concern for the unique hazards of mineworkers' safety and health. Our Committee held 11 meetings over ten days and examined 168 amendments. In fact, the Committee considered and agreed on further amendments to the Convention yesterday during the adoption of the text. These changes were made with a view to substantially enhancing the ability of member States to ratify this important document.

Some of the amendments required lengthy deliberations and careful analysis prior to being incorporated in the final text. The work of the Committee was made easier as a result of the diligent effort during the first discussion and the universal concern of the Committee for the tragic loss of life and the debilitating illnesses suffered by workers in mines. As a result of this shared commitment to prevent occupational injury and disease in mines, and the natural common understanding of the significant problems, the Committee was able to arrive at a consensus for an acceptable compromise on the majority of the issues. Voting was required only on a few occasions.

Our task in the Committee was facilitated by previous ILO action, including the Conventions and Recommendations listed in the Preamble to the Convention, the six codes of practice dealing specifically with the mining industry, as well as the conclusions and resolutions of the meeting of the Coal Mines Committee and the Tripartite Committee for Mines other than Coal Mines.

The Committee also had the use of Reports IV (2A) and IV(2B) prepared by the Office subsequent to our first discussion in 1994. Part I of the proposed Convention, "Definitions", indicates that for the purpose of the instrument, the term "mine" covers both surface and underground sites where exploration and minerals extraction activities are carried out; it also includes the associated preparation plants, equipment and structures. A significant point in the discussion led to the exclusion of oil and gas extracting industries. Reference is also made to the definition of the term "employer", so as to ensure clarity and understanding in the application of the instrument.

Part II, entitled "Scope and means of application", although stating that the instrument applies to all mines, seeks to provide some flexibility through a means of excluding certain categories of mines or certain provisions of the Convention when the overall protection of mineworkers is not inferior to that provided by the provisions of the Convention. Reference is made to the progressive covering of all mines subject to such exclusion and the obligation to report to the International Labour Office the reasons for exclusion. This section also calls for member States to consult with employers and workers and to formulate, implement and periodically review a coherent national policy on safety and health in mines. Furthermore, it specifies provisions of national laws and regulations to ensure implementation, and to designate a competent authority to monitor and regulate the various aspects of safety and health in mines, procedures for reporting and investigating mine disasters, accidents and dangerous occurrences, and the publication of the relevant statistics. This latter provision is critical to monitoring worldwide changes in the horrific loss of lives to mineworkers.

We also include in these sections requirements relating to the provision of mine rescue, first aid and appropriate medical facilities; the obligation to provide self-rescue respiratory devices for underground mineworkers, provisions concerning the transport, storage and disposal of explosives, requirements for the safe disposal of waste and the protective measures for abandoned mine workings. Each of you, I am sure, has heard of several major accidents incurring large loss of mineworkers' lives each year. And you can therefore appreciate the importance of these rescue and preventive provisions, and the need for these to be addressed in national laws and regulations.

A primary feature of this section is the requirement for national laws and regulations to provide for the establishment of procedures to ensure respect for the right of workers to participate and be consulted in safety and health issues, and to ensure the rights of persons selected by workers to represent them in these matters.

In assuming rights, workers also assume responsibilities to take reasonable care for their own safety and that of others, to comply with prescribed health and safety measures and to report hazards to their supervisors. In order to be able to be held accountable, however, workers must be given effective training in the unique risks and work processes associated with mining activities.

Part III deals with preventive and protective measures at the mine and responsibilities of employers. Here the primary duty of the employers is clearly defined to take all necessary measures to eliminate or minimize the risks to safety and health of workers. The Committee, in recognizing that a mineworker faces a constantly changing combination of workplace circumstances both daily and throughout the workshift, spent significant efforts developing the priority in which identified risks should be dealt with in order to provide conditions for a safe operation and healthy working environment.

The specifics of risk control include technical measures regarding the design, construction, commissioning and decommissioning of mines, measures to monitor and maintain ground stability and the development of safe systems of work for areas susceptible to particular hazards such as mine fires, gas and rock outburst and rock falls. These of course are the risks that claim more than 15,000 mineworkers' lives each year, and account for the high fatality rate in the industry.

Catastrophic events such as fires, explosions and rock bursts led to the inclusion of requirements to provide two exits, self-rescue equipment, procedures, training and facilities. Since mineworkers are exposed to physical, chemical and biological hazards associated with their work, which can over time lead to debilitating diseases, such as silicosis and pneumoconiosis, employers' duties to regularly inspect and monitor the workplace environment, to inform workers of the health risks and to eliminate these or minimize them are specified.

Other duties include the investigation and reporting of accidents and dangerous occurrences, so as to assist the development of preventive measures and emergency response for industrial and natural disasters frequently experienced in the industry.

The next two sections outline the rights and responsibilities of workers, their representatives and the concept of material cooperation, which should be specified in national laws and regulations. Reference is made to workers' rights, to report accidents and dangerous occurrences, to request inspections and investigations, to know and be informed of hazards that may affect their safety or health, to remove themselves from circumstances which appear to pose a serious danger and the right to participate in matters affecting workers' safety and health.

Part IV, "Implementation", refers to the establishment of inspection services, appropriate penalties and corrective measures to be taken by member States to ensure effective utilization of the provisions. The proposed Recommendation provides further elaboration and gives examples and guidance concerning the measures to be taken to give effect to the provisions of the Convention. Substantive co-opted measures to prevent workplace entry into disease are provided and it is expected that these will have a real impact on reducing incidents.

Although the Committee's task was reasonably significant, given the number and substance of the proposed amendments, it was greatly facilitated by the strong guidance and sense of humour of our Chairman, Dr. Békés. Furthermore, the shared importance attached to the proposed instruments by Employer, Worker and Government members familiar with the high levels of tragic loss of life and the debilitating diseases associated with mining, created a strong desire to cooperatively complete the work. Additionally, we were fortunate to have two committed, tolerant and creative Vice-Chairmen: Dr. Stewart from the Employers' group and Mr. Maitland of the Workers' group. Government delegates and advisers are also to be commended for their active participation and high level of technical and common-sense expertise they contributed to the meetings. More than once the text of an article or paragraph was reconsidered and altered after being accepted by both Employers and Workers. This was based on the experience brought to the meeting by Government representatives.

In the end it will be these Committee members who will implement the provisions. It is important that I express the gratitude of our Committee members for the excellent assistance we received from the representative of the Secretary-General, Dr. Pinnagoda, and his team of experts, legal advisers, secretaries, translators, interpreters, clerks, typists and others. They responded to our workers' needs with efficiency and good humour. In summary, it gives me great pleasure to submit and recommend the adoption of the report of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines and the texts of the proposed Convention and Recommendation on this subject to the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

Mr. MAITLAND (Workers' delegate, Australia; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines) – I am greatly honoured and extremely pleased as the Workers' spokesperson and Vice-Chairperson of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines to assist in the presentation of the Committee's report to this plenary session. This report represents the completion of two rounds of discussions at the ordinary sessions of the International Labour Conference, and offers the opportunity to this Conference to adopt the Convention and Recommendation on safety and health in mines.

As most delegates know well, mining is one of the most – if not the most – important economic activities providing raw and processed materials that are crucial to every human endeavour. Yet this critically important industry remains amongst the most hazardous to workers. Estimates drawn from ILO reports put the loss of life in mining and mining-related accidents and illnesses at some 15,000 per annum. But, as the industry has a large informal sector, it is considered that the figure of 15,000 is very conservative.

You will note from the report that one of the Workers' delegates made the comparison between the loss of life in this industry and the loss of life through war. So it is very gratifying to know that at last something significant and of lasting benefit is now being presented to the industry in the form of these instruments.

If you have studied the report closely you will have to be impressed with the work of the Committee. This is in no small way due to the commitment of each of the groups and the individual members in developing mechanisms to improve safety and health in this industry. So, on behalf of the Workers' members, I congratulate all on the high standard of achievement. There are of course some special congratulations that must be conveyed. Our Chairman, Dr. Békés, Government representative from Hungary, conducted the business of the Committee in a most professional manner, and it is thanks to his exceptional skills that there has been such a positive result.

The Workers members thank Dr. Békés and the governments for their efforts. Mr. Stewart, Employers' Vice-Chairperson from South Africa, represented the interests of his group with the determination that has seen his nation's rugby team reach the Rugby World Cup final. However, he also showed his willingness to cooperate to resolve difficulties which I am sure he will not want his rugby team to do this coming weekend. So to he and his group, the Workers' members express their appreciation.

The representative of the Secretary-General, Dr. Pinnagoda and his staff are to be commended for their excellent service to the Committee as is also the Reporter Mr. McGinn, Government member from Canada for his dedication to his task, not only at this year's Committee Meeting but throughout the past year in helping to prepare this year's discussion document.

Finally I come to the Workers' group. Firstly, I wish to thank them for giving me the honour to be their spokesperson, and I hope that I have served them well.

Secondly, they must be commended for their contribution, dedication and unswerving discipline in pursuit of the ultimate goal of a Convention and Recommendation for the workers they represent. They can be justifiably proud of their efforts in helping to formulate this historic document. Workers of the world can be assured that their interests are paramount when being well represented by people of this calibre. Special mention must be made of Paul Benjamin from South Africa, for his work on the Drafting Committee, and also of Ali Ibrahim and Beth Goodson for their help from the ILO Office. A very special thanks to our comrade secretary, Damien Roland for his tireless efforts over the past two years.

The development of these instruments has not been an easy task. All delegates will note from the report that, at times, the discussions were difficult. They were, however, held in a spirit of cooperation, and compromises were found that have enabled each of the social partners to support the instruments. But, of course, the support of the Committee is not enough. We must have the support of this Conference for the instruments to become effective. Therefore, in commending the report to the plenary, I appeal to the governments and employers to place foremost in their considerations the most common good of workers in this most dangerous industry. I strongly urge you to vote for the adoption of the Convention and Recommendation tomorrow.

Mr. STEWART (Employers' adviser, South Africa; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines) – I am pleased to have the opportunity of joining the many who have already congratulated the President on his election to the Chair of this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference.

On behalf of the employers who participated in the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines, I have the honour to address this session on the important work of this Committee, and in particular on the Convention and Recommendation on Safety and Health in Mines which has been submitted to the Conference today.

Firstly, regarding the importance of the work of the Committee, it is a matter of fact that in mines there are many deaths and injuries around the world every year. There are many risks and hazards in mining and there is great diversity in mining methods and circumstances around the world. In developing a Convention and Recommendation for Safety and Health in Mines, it has been important to bear in mind not only these great differences, but also economic realities. In many countries, mining is a key element of the economy, providing not only many jobs, but also the basis for further development. To a large extent, I believe that the Committee has been successful in striking an appropriate balance in its consideration of these important and differing requirements.

Indeed, I believe that it is worth noting that as the work of the Committee progressed the desire to produce an instrument that would have the maximum beneficial effect internationally, by being ratified and adopted by the maximum number of countries, grew stronger. This common objective provided the basis for the strong spirit of understanding and cooperation which existed in the Committee, and which greatly facilitated its work. I believe that this spirit of understanding and cooperation was one of the special characteristics of this Committee.

In further reflecting on the work of the Committee, it is worth mentioning that the Employers committed themselves to the formulation of a Convention and Recommendation which would express the combined experience and wisdom of the Committee, in the form of widely applicable principles. The Employers' efforts were thus devoted to the formulation of a Convention which would satisfy the following three criteria.

Firstly, it would need to be acceptable to Employers, and of course to Workers and Governments, at the end of the 82nd International Labour Conference.

Secondly, in the medium term it would have to enjoy widespread ratification by member States.

Thirdly, and most importantly, in the longer term the Convention, in conjunction with the Recommendation, should have the effect of bringing about significant improvements in the safety and health of miners around the world.

Now that the Committee has completed its work, it is appropriate to attempt to stand back and review the Convention and Recommendation produced by the Committee against these criteria.

Regarding the first point, the cooperative and constructive spirit of the Committee allowed the necessary give and take from all parties. Inevitably, there are elements in both instruments that reflect compromises and which may cause discomfort to one or other of the three parties, but when each instrument is considered as a whole, I am able to say, on behalf of the Employers' Group in the Committee that the instruments now before the Conference deserve widespread support.

The instruments have the flexibility to be adapted to widely differing circumstances and they set out the rights and duties and responsibilities of three parties in reasonable terms.

I believe, therefore, that the Committee has produced an instrument which has the potential to be ratified by many members. Of course, the question of whether it will enjoy widespread ratification can be answered only through the passage of time. A similar comment is true also in respect of the question of whether or not the instruments will bring about significant improvements in safety and health in mines. To a large extent this last question depends on how member States give effect to the Convention in their national laws and regulations. It is to be hoped that the consultations associated with that all-important step achieve the same level of constructive cooperation that characterized the work of the Committee here in Geneva.

In the end, however, the achievement of improved safety and health in mines will be the result of actions taken at the mine. The success of these actions will, I believe, depend in large measure, on the extent to which people at the mine work together as a team. That is the key. To that end, the Convention and the national laws and regulations which give effect to the requirements of the Convention must provide guidance and an enabling framework for that team work to flourish. I believe that the Convention and Recommendation will adequately serve that purpose.

In conclusion, I would like to express my thanks to a number of people. Firstly, I must acknowledge and thank Mr. Pirie, the Employer representative from Canada who served as the Employers' Vice-Chairman last year. Together with Mr. Maitland, Mr. Pirie helped create the cooperative spirit which played such an important role in this year's meeting. His leadership was most important during last year's formative discussions.

Next, I must pay tribute to Mr. Maitland, the Workers' Vice-Chairman and spokesman. Throughout the work of the Committee over the past two years, Mr. Maitland has been a worthy advocate of workers' interests, while at the same time being constructive in the interests of formulating an effective Convention and Recommendation. He has made a most significant contribution, in a sincere and dignified manner, to the smooth working of the Committee.

Regarding the smooth working of the Committee, a special vote of thanks must go to the Chairman, Dr. Békés. His chairmanship has been simply excellent. He has been extremely efficient in helping to quickly sort out those problematic situations which did arise. His performance as a Chairman has been exemplary and contributed greatly to the tone and effectiveness of the Committee.

He was of course backed up by Dr. Pinnagoda and his team, who once again ensured the smooth running of the proceedings. They deserve our thanks.

Special thanks are also due to those who served on the Drafting Committee. They did an excellent job of work, as did Mr. McGinn who acted as the Rapporteur of the Committee this year.

I also wish to thank Mr. Lauriski, the Employers' representative from the United States and Ms. Barbara Perkins, who acted as the secretary to the Employers' group for their dedication and special contribution.

Lastly, I wish to acknowledge the contribution of the many members of the Committee and to thank them for sharing their knowledge and wisdom in the creation of the two international instruments. We all hope, I am sure, that these instruments will make a significant contribution towards improving the safety and health of miners around the world. They deserve to be supported.

Mr. BÉKÉS (Government adviser, Hungary; Chairman of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines) – As Chairman of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines and on behalf of all the members of that Committee, I would like first of all to express my appreciation to this session of the International Labour Conference for having placed the question of safety and health in mines on its agenda to be discussed for the second time by the Conference.

The importance of discussing this item has been reaffirmed by the unfortunate mining disasters and continuing heavy loss of life among mineworkers. With only 1 per cent of the workforce, mining accounts for almost 8 per cent of fatal accidents at the workplace each year and over 1 million miners suffer from occupational injury or disease each year.

In view of this, the second discussion of this important subject has reaffirmed the urgency of preventive action and the key role that the ILO can play in strengthening the efforts of member States in this area. I believe that all of us recognize and appreciate the magnitude and the complexity of the task of securing the safety and health of miners and the importance of a unified approach that embodies both national and international experience.

The Committee has deliberated thoroughly on the issues relevant to safety and health in mines. In the course of the discussions, the members of the Committee presented forceful arguments on matters of real substance. We have achieved our goal in the framework of tripartism and in a spirit of cooperation, goodwill and dialogue.

I am pleased to say that all the points raised in the Committee were made in a constructive spirit of collaboration. The arguments and the discussion are clearly expressed in the report of the Committee that is now placed before this session of the Conference. The report contains the texts of the proposed Convention and the proposed Recommendation concerning safety and health in mines which are submitted to this session for its consideration with a view to adoption.

These texts have been structured so as to provide the necessary degree of flexibility, with a view to their wide ratification by the member States and to enable them to apply appropriate and practical measures in accordance with national law and practice.

My task as Chairman would have been impossible to accomplish without the support and cooperation I enjoyed from all the Officers and members of the Committee. I would particularly like to thank the Government members, both as individuals and groups, for having put their vast professional knowledge at the disposal of the Committee.

My thanks also go to the Vice-Chairmen and the Employer and Worker members of the Committee. The Vice-Chairman from the Employers' group, Dr. Stewart is an excellent manager with extensive professional expertise. The Vice-Chairman from the Workers' group, deeply dedicated to the cause of mineworkers, Mr. Maitland, made many contributions to the work of the Committee by making effective use of the knowledge in his group. I would also like to extend my appreciation to the Reporter of our Committee, Mr. McGinn, for his considerable contribution throughout the long process of developing the instruments and for his very hard work in the Committee where he spared no effort in applying his expert knowledge.

Finally, my speech would be incomplete if I failed to acknowledge the role of the representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference, Dr. Pinnagoda, and his team of dedicated experts, secretaries, translators, clerks and support staff.

It gives me great pleasure to recommend the adoption of the report of the Committee on Safety and Health in Mines and the text of the proposed Convention and Recommendation on the subject. I am sure that the new instruments when adopted, will lead to significant and lasting improvements in mine safety.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – The discussion of the report of the Committee on Health and Safety in Mines is now open.

Original French: Mr. ELMIGER (Government delegate, Switzerland) – First of all, I would like to offer my congratulations to the Officers of the Committee and the secretariat for the excellent report which has been submitted for our consideration in Provisional Record No. 19.

The report contains a proposed Convention concerning safety and health in mines which, a priori and after brief consideration, has elicited the following comments from my delegation.

Generally speaking, the proposed instrument gives rights of consultation to workers in various areas which are not covered by legislation and practice in Switzerland. In this connection I would refer to Article 2, paragraph 2, and Article 13, paragraph 1(f), as well as Article 13, paragraph 2, in its entirety.

My authorities support the idea of the Convention and therefore they do not intend to oppose this text. However, given what I have just said, the Swiss Government delegation will abstain when it comes to voting on the adoption of the Convention submitted to us. My delegation, on the other hand, will be able to accept the Recommendation.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We will now proceed with the adoption of the report. First of all, I submit for adoption the body of the report, paragraphs 1 to 232. If there are no objections, I shall consider that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted, paragraphs 1 to 232.)

PROPOSED CONVENTION CONCERNING SAFETY AND HEALTH IN MINES

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – I would like to submit for adoption of the proposed Convention concerning safety and health in mines. We shall begin with the Preamble. If there are no objections, I shall take it the Preamble is adopted.

(The Preamble is adopted.)

I submit for adoption Part I: Definitions, Article I.

(Part I, Article 1 is adopted.)

I submit for adoption Part II: Scope and means of application, Articles 2 to 5.

(Part II, Articles 2 to 5 are adopted.)

I submit for adoption Part III: Preventive and protective measures at the mine, Articles 6 to 15.

(Part III, Articles 6 to 15 are adopted.)

I submit for adoption Part IV: Implementation, Article 16.

(Part IV, Article 16 is adopted.)

We shall now proceed to the adoption of the Convention as a whole. If I hear no objection, I shall take it that the Convention as a whole is adopted?

(The Convention as a whole is adopted.)

In accordance with paragraph 7 of article 40 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Convention on health and safety in mines which has just been adopted will be submitted to the Conference Drafting Committee for preparation of the final text.

PROPOSED RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING SAFETY AND HEALTH IN MINES

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We shall now proceed to the adoption of the Recommendation. I first submit the Preamble for adoption. If there are no objections, I shall consider that the Preamble is adopted.

(The Preamble is adopted.)

We shall now proceed to the adoption of the Recommendation, paragraph by paragraph.

(Paragraphs 1 to 33 are adopted seriatim.)

We shall now proceed to the adoption of the Recommendation as a whole. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the Recommendation as a whole is adopted.

(The Recommendation as a whole is adopted.)

In accordance with paragraph 7 of article 40 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Recommendation that has just been adopted will be submitted to the Conference Drafting Committee for preparation of the final text.

It remains for me only to offer my thanks to the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen, the Reporter and all the members of the Committee for the excellent work which they have done.

COMPOSITION OF THE GOVERNING BODY OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – The Clerk of the Conference will now read a communication concerning the composition of the Governing Body.

Original French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – The Director-General has received the following communication from the Secretary of the Workers' group:

I am writing to inform you that at its meeting on Saturday, 17 June, the Workers' Electoral College confirmed the replacement of Mr. Vanni (Italy) and Mr. Vera (Venezuela) by Mr. Bonmati (Spain) and by Mr. Ramírez León (Venezuela) respectively as members of the Workers' group of the ILO Governing Body.

The communication is signed by Guy Riders, Secretary of the Workers' group.

(The Conference adjourned at 5 p.m.)

Report of the Committee on the Application of Standards

PART ONE

GENERAL REPORT

A. Introduction

1. In accordance with article 7 of its Standing Orders, the Conference set up a Committee to consider and report on item III on its agenda: "Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations". The Committee was composed of 239 members (112 Government members, 38 Employers' members and 89 Workers' members). It also included 17 Government deputy members, 49 Employers' deputy members and 117 Workers' deputy members.¹ In addition, 21 international non-governmental organizations were represented by observers.

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chair: Mr. S. Gopalan (Government member, India).

Vice-Chairs: Mr. A. Wisskirchen (Employers' member, Germany), and Mr. W. Peirens (Workers' member, Belgium).

Reporter: Mr. J. van Blankenstein (Government member, Netherlands).

3. The Committee held 20 sittings.

4. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee considered the following: (i) information supplied under article 19 of the Constitution on the submission to the competent authorities of Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference; (ii) reports supplied under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution on the application of ratified Conventions; and (iii) reports requested by the Governing Body under article 19 of the Constitution on the Termination of Employment Convention (No. 158) and Recommendation (No. 166), 1982.² By decision of the Governing Body and the Conference, the Committee was also called on to examine the report of the Sixth Ordinary Session (July 1994) of the Joint ILO-UNESCO Committee of Experts on the Application of the Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers.

5. As usual, the Committee began its work with a discussion of general aspects of the application of Conventions (particularly ratified Conventions) and Recommendations and the discharge by member States of standards-related obligations under the ILO Constitution. It then discussed the report of the Joint ILO-UNESCO Committee of Experts. The last part of its general discussion dealt with the General Survey made by the ILO Committee of Experts on the

with the General Survey made by the ILO Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, on protection against unjustified dismissal. Finally, the Committee considered various individual cases relating to the application of ratified Conventions or compliance with the obligations to supply reports and to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent national authorities.

6. The examination of those cases, which was the essential work of the Committee, was based principally on the observations contained in the report of the Committee of Experts and on the oral and written explanations provided by the governments concerned. The Committee also referred to its discussions in previous years, comments received from employers' or workers' organizations and, where appropriate, the reports of other ILO supervisory bodies. In view of the short time available, the Committee made a selection among the Committee of Experts' observations and thus discussed a limited number of cases. The necessity of making this selection in no way affects the conclusion of the Committee of Experts in other cases that, in view of the problems encountered, it would be appropriate to ask the governments concerned to supply information. The Committee trusts that those governments will pay close attention to the requests of the Committee of Experts and will not fail to take the measures required to ensure fulfilment of the obligations they have undertaken. A summary of the information supplied by governments, the discussions in the present Committee and any conclusions it has drawn is set out in Part Two of this report.

7. The Employers' members stated that, as in previous years, there could never be an ideal list of individual cases as long as a selection had to be made. They had the impression that certain countries regularly appeared before the Committee. Next year it would be appropriate to examine attentively how the system could be improved. However, at this point the Employers' members stated that they could agree to the adoption of the proposed list. The Workers' members indicated that the list of countries in respect of which Government members were invited to provide information to the Committee was the result of a balanced choice, which allowed for discussion of the circumstances of countries of all regions of the world, regarding different Conventions, and covering numerous points of view. The choice was determined not by the desire to draw up a "blacklist", or to treat only the most flagrant violations. The Committee should also discuss some new developments, technical Conventions, the situation in industrialized countries and cases of progress. Being on the list is not a condemnation. The Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of several Government members, requested that in the future there be greater transparency in the process of choosing the individual cases. He considered that it would be necessary for the Committee to be quite tolerant with regard to those who were submitting information for the first time and that it would be appropriate to set out more clearly the reasons for including them on the list of cases to be examined.

B. General questions relating to international labour standards

Introduction

8. The Committee paid tribute to two distinguished members of the Committee of Experts, Judge José Maria Ruda and Judge Roberto Ago, who had died since the last session of the Conference. Judge Ruda was remembered in the present Committee particularly for attending its two previous sessions, in his capacity as Chair of the Committee of Experts, and for his contribution to improved understanding between the two bodies. Judge Ago had an extremely long and invaluable period of service in various capacities in the ILO, including as Chair of the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association. The members of the present Committee recorded their respect for the memory of both men, their gratitude for the contribution they had made to the standards-related work of the ILO, and their condolences with the families of each of them.

9. The Committee welcomed Sir William Douglas to its current session and congratulated him on his appointment to the Chair of the Committee of Experts. Sir William thanked the Committee, on behalf of the Committee of Experts, for the invitation extended to him to attend this session as an observer. The report of the Committee of Experts was an integral part of the whole scheme of the international supervision of standards prescribed in ILO Conventions and Recommendations. He referred to the monograph on methods of international supervision of human rights Conventions by Professor N. Valticos in which the author had emphasized that a balance should be maintained between the system of periodic reports and the complaints procedure. Both were essential in carrying out the supervisory function of the Organization. By reason of the sheer volume of reports, adjustments had to be made to how often a report was required on a specific Convention, but the intention remained to subject to periodic review the application of all Conventions, depending on their subject-matter and whether serious problems of application had arisen. By gaining a better understanding of the concerns of the Conference Committee, the level of communication between the two Committees would be raised for the benefit of the Organization which they both serve.

10. The Employers' members recalled that for various years the Experts, in their report, had been emphasizing the excellent cooperation with the Conference Committee. In this respect, they referred to paragraph 10 of the General Report which stated, amongst other things: "A spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility has consistently prevailed in the Committee's relations with the International Labour Conference and its Committee on the Application of Standards, whose proceedings the Committee takes fully into consideration, not only in respect of general matters concerning standard-setting activities and supervisory procedures, but also in respect of specific matters concerning the way in which States fulfil their standard-related obligations." However, the Employers' members noted that the Experts had about nine months to take note of the Committee's report. As a result, they did not think it was inappropriate to say that the Experts were not contradicting them as a number of their comments had not been the subject of criticism or reference. The Employers' members did not completely agree with the Workers' members' definition of the complementary role of the two Committees. They thought that, although the roles of the Committees in the supervisory system complemented each other, this however did not describe exhaustively the role of the Committee on the Application of Standards. This Committee had also its own independent role and mandate as laid down in article 7 of the Standing Orders.

11. The Workers' members emphasized that the two Committees were complementary to each other, as the Committee of Experts had demonstrated in an in-depth manner in its previous reports. By its composition and its working methods, the latter had brought a harmony and impartiality that were indispensable for the interpretation of Conventions and the evaluation of national situations. From its side, the Conference Committee, in view of its tripartite nature, ensured that the sensitivities of the parties directly concerned were taken care of. This complementarity should never fail to be underlined especially during the discussion of individual cases. Thus, the Workers' members regretted that the report of the Committee of Experts was silent with respect to the problems faced by the supervisory machinery, especially the differences of opinion concerning the respective roles of the two committees. The Experts could have contributed greatly by giving their point of view on the differences of opinion that persisted between Workers' members and Employers' members, especially regarding the right to strike.

12. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom stressed that the views of the Committee of Experts, based on the principles of objectivity, impartiality and independence, should not be treated merely as interesting observations in a wider debate, but as definitive for the formulation of the conclusions of the present Committee. He noted that the Committee of Experts had to operate under difficult circumstances during the cold war, but had always spoken courageously in favour of universal standards. It would be regrettable if the Committee of Experts were asked to renounce that role now.

13. Several Government members expressed satisfaction that any misunderstandings or differences of opinion between the present Committee and the Committee of Experts about their respective roles had been completely cleared up by paragraph 10 of the Committee of Experts' report. The Government member of the United States noted that the Conference Committee had a responsibility to continue the partnership of mutual respect, cooperation and communication that it had forged with the Committee of Experts.

International labour standards in a global context

14. The Committee considered the position of the ILO's standard setting and supervisory system taking into account the international debate on the so-called social clause and the question of human rights, and the phenomenon of "globalization".

15. The Workers' members noted that since the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the World Summit for Social Development, there had been a renewed interest in international labour standards. However, the discussions concerning the methods and procedures regarding the strengthening of the application of these instruments were often difficult. A considerable difference could be noticed in some countries between the ratification of an instrument, its application from a legal point of view, and its practical application, demonstrating an incoherent attitude on the part of these governments. International labour standards, fundamental values and the role of the ILO were discussed several times in the commitments and programme of action which were annexed to the Declaration by the Heads of State and Governments of the World Summit. Point (i) of the Third Commitment stated that the Heads of State and Governments "would pursue the goal of ensuring quality jobs, and safeguard the basic rights and interests of workers and, to that end, promote respect for relevant International Labour Organization Conventions, including those on the prohibition of forced and child labour, and freedom of association, the right to organize and bargain collectively and the principle of non-discrimination ..." . The statement also highlighted the importance of social protection, the respect and protection of all human rights and the objective of full, productive and freely chosen employment, in accordance with ILO standards. They considered that, in order to reach these goals, the ratification by all member States of at least the Conventions of fundamental importance and their full application in law and in practice were necessary. The Workers' members further recalled the final paragraphs of the last report of the Conference Committee in which it was stated that "workers' protection is the main purpose of international labour law" and the "importance of standard-setting activity in promoting development balanced in justice and freedom and inspiring social policies is still recognized". The Workers' members were convinced that the interest of governments remained in a universal and concerted approach, allowing them to exercise a political and democratic control over economic and social development so that this development was not subject to the requirements of the market forces, to speculation and to the sole interests of international and financial groups.

16. The Workers' members said that, as the World Summit of Copenhagen had pointed out, greater coherence in the objectives and in the giving of technical and financial assistance by different organizations and international institutions, especially the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) on the one hand, and the ILO on the other, would be necessary. The Workers' members were in favour of collaborating with other international organizations in order to reinforce the application of human rights and international standards in social and employment policy. This was the case especially with the globalization of the economy. They wanted the ILO to be closely associated with the follow-up to the Social Summit in Copenhagen and hoped the Governing Body would adopt the necessary decisions in this connection, attaching greater importance to standard setting, which should remain the priority activity of the ILO. At the same time, the Workers' member of the Netherlands expressed some fears as to a gradual marginalization of the ILO within the United Nations system: the value and importance of the ILO had been consistently underestimated in the preparations for the Social Summit; tripartism, which was considered within the ILO as one of its strengths, was seen differently by other United Nations organizations; and he regretted both that the Commitments were not binding and that no key follow-up role was given to the ILO.

17. The Employers' members observed that the ILO did not only have its own instruments and procedures to supervise and to promote compliance with its rules and standards; it also was in close contact with other international and regional organizations with whose work it became involved. For example, this was the case concerning important issues of general human rights, or specific matters, such as children's rights. The Employers' member of the Netherlands commented that the Employers were willing to discuss the promotion of human rights Conventions and were not very pleased when they were told the discussion would be conducted in the context of the follow-up of the World Summit for Social Development. She was of the opinion that the promotion of human rights Conventions was within the mandate of the Governing Body Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards. However, she was pleased that in November a discussion would start on that issue and promised that the Employers would submit a paper reflecting their points of view.

18. The Employers' member of Sweden stated that it was indeed important for the ILO and this Committee to draw the right conclusions from the United Nations Social Summit. Some speakers seemed to consider the outcome as something of a victory for the ILO. However, the ILO has not been given a key role and now risked to be marginalized. In fact, the adopted Declaration and Programme of Action only mentioned the ILO in one sentence, which gives the ILO the rather self-evident task to follow up within its own borders. Why this negligence towards the ILO? First, in the 100 pages adopted by the Summit, there was not the faintest hint at a social clause, in spite of trade union pressures during the two years of preparations. The great majority of governments were totally opposed. The Group of 77 even stubbornly refused to accept a recommendation to ratify the seven so-called fundamental ILO Conventions. They feared that it could be referred to as a first step towards a social clause. The final compromise was that the governments only were recommended to "strongly consider ratification". Thus the opposition of governments to a social clause became directed against the ILO and its standards. The second observation was that the United Nations Social Summit Declaration and Programme of Action proceeded from the idea that social development must be based on economic growth and that this could only be achieved through market economy, free trade, competition, entrepreneurship, private enterprises (small and big), privatization, decentralization, deregulation, more flexibility and higher productivity. There was nothing which the Employers would not be able to subscribe to. If the Social Summit policies were widely adopted, the world would have a brighter future. The authors of the United Nations Declaration, and not least the developing countries, were of course aware that the ILO, or rather the International Labour Office, as its views are reflected in the Director-General's Report and now the World Employment 1995 report, advocated nearly the opposite policies marked by negative attitudes towards market forces, privatization, decentralization, deregulation and flexibility. The outcome of the United Nations Social Summit could have been more favourable for the ILO if the Organization as a whole had had somewhat better control of the policies presented as those of the ILO.

19. The Government members of Belgium, France, Germany, Iceland (speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries), Italy, Portugal, United Kingdom and United States drew attention to the positive conclusions of the World Social Summit, particularly as regards the ILO's role in devoting special efforts to promotion of the fundamental rights — including the rights of children — within its mandate. The Government member of Belgium praised the recent action of the Director-General in calling on all member States to address themselves to the basic human rights Conventions.

20. The Workers' members noted that the Governing Body would continue its discussions on the social dimensions of economic growth and the globalization of the economy. They stated that the debate on the social clause was far from over, even if the discussions on sanctions had been suspended. This suspension allowed the ILO to advance in other fields such as the strengthening of the capacity of the Organization to ensure the full respect of workers' fundamental rights. They recalled that the social clause, as they perceived it, had nothing to do with protectionism. They were worried by repercussions of the changes brought about by globalization of the economy, continuing poverty and social exclusion on standards and the supervisory machinery. They considered that only the respect of fundamental rights and the application of standards could reinforce democracy and social justice, stimulate economic activities, and bring about a better distribution of the benefits of growth. They welcomed the conclusions of the Social Summit as well as the recent studies of international organizations with an economic vocation (for example, the Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), the World Bank) which concluded along the same lines. In this context, they were favourable to both the ratification of fundamental Conventions and the reinforcement of the supervisory machinery, since the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee too often faced an inertia which ended up by calling into question the credibility of the supervisory machinery. The Workers' members also drew attention to the fact that several countries, during the revision of their Labour Code or other legislation, invoked the need to adjust to the consequences of the globalization of the economy or structural adjustment programmes imposed by the Bretton Woods institutions in order to make their labour markets more flexible and to "deregulate". The Workers' members expressed their concern over this tendency which threatened to render meaningless national legislation as well as the impact of international standards. They invited the Committee of Experts to pay attention to these developments.

21. The Employers' members described the different elements of globalization of the economy which was a fact of life. A characteristic feature of globalization was the increased specialization of firms. This had resulted in considerable competition especially between countries themselves. The attractiveness of individual locations for investments depended of course on several factors. There was the political stability of the country to be considered. The stability of the currency was another factor as were the quality of the educational and professional training system, the infrastructure existing in a country, the level of taxation, labour costs and productivity. It was inevitable that capital and know-how were important factors in the creation of jobs. However, capital and know-how were very mobile, a tendency which had been increased by the opening up of markets and the new forms of communications technology. These new technologies had inevitably led to structural changes. If old structures were nevertheless propped up with subsidies then resources would definitely be lacking for building up more promising structures which were in line with these new technologies. All of these factors were what "globalization" was about and which could be advantageous to all concerned. Finally, the Employers' members noted that there was less discussion of the social clause than last year. They thought this appropriate because, while they did not wish to call into question the social targets that were trying to be achieved, they doubted whether such targets could in fact be reached through the social clause. Moreover, they considered that there were dangers inherent in the social clause which were rather important and which could be the cause of new forms of protectionism.

22. The Government member of the Russian Federation suggested better coordination between the ILO and other international organizations, especially in disseminating information on labour standards and human rights. The Government member of Italy recommended further consideration in the Committee of the relation between social concerns on the one hand and international trade and economic and financial policies on the other. She pointed to the need for clearer relationships between the different international organizations concerned and called in particular for improved contacts between the ILO and the Bretton Woods institutions, given the importance of tripartism and the ILO's standards for economic and social development. The Government member of the United Kingdom also encouraged the ILO to link its technical cooperation activities more closely with those of the Bretton Woods institutions. The Government member of the United States said that the ILO had a critical role to play in ensuring that economic growth and expansion of international trade were accompanied by social justice and the implementation of fundamental labour standards.

23. The Workers' member of Zimbabwe observed that the structural adjustment programmes imposed on African countries by the IMF and the World Bank had caused the disintegration of African society, at a time when those countries especially needed to observe international labour standards in order to address their social problems and strengthen both their democracies and their economies. The Workers' member of Zaire said that his union had recommended to his Government the rejection of any structural adjustment programme that was contrary to workers' interests, since it was up to the country to determine its own objectives. The Workers' member of New Zealand supported a continuing examination of the relationship between trade and human rights: the ILO should work with the IMF and the World Bank to promote social justice and the basic Conventions, but the nature of the global economy demanded honest reconsideration of what incentives might be necessary to ensure the respect of basic human rights, including the right to form free trade unions and bargain collectively, the right to safe and healthy working conditions and the rights of children subjected to bonded and forced labour. The ILO should in particular recognize the urgency of the plight of indigenous peoples, the United Nations General Assembly having declared 1994 to 2004 the International Decade of the World's Indigenous People, and the Committee should respond accordingly.

24. As regards the European Union, the Workers' members noted that the Economic and Social Committee had underlined, in an important document, the respect for tripartism and the need to ratify Conventions, including those on occupational safety and health, and working and rest time in road transport. With the consolidation of European directives in this domain, the Workers' members thought member States should be in a position to ratify the corresponding Conventions. In this respect, the Government member of Italy noted that the ILO's standards were an inspiration for the European Union; and, whilst the Government member of Germany pointed out that there were difficult questions of competence involved, the Workers' member of the Netherlands considered that these should not be raised as a pretext for not ratifying the Conventions.

25. The Government member of Iceland (speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries) remarked that ILO standards had been included intact or slightly amended in various international and regional arrangements, and he encouraged the ILO to participate fully in the supervisory work involved. In this sense, the European Social Charter had recently been revised in line with international labour standards. The Workers' member of Germany asked the governments concerned to ensure formal adoption and ratification of the revised European Social Charter.

Questions concerning the application of particular Conventions

Economic and social policy issues arising especially in relation to the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122)

26. The Employers' members reaffirmed what they had stated in detail in 1994, i.e., that an improvement in the employment situation was a central, indeed a vital, task of all those responsible in politics, economics and social affairs, and required a common strategy in which governments, employers and trade unions had to be involved together. However, in paragraph 63 of their report, the Experts criticized the extension of employment relations which they considered to be precarious. Without giving a general definition of precarious, it was clear that the Experts were referring to working relations or contracts which were limited in time. While the Employers' members also wanted it to be possible to employ more people as a result of economic growth, costs and other problems entailed by unavoidable staff adjustments could not be forgotten about. The desired employment dynamics were often held up by institutional barriers and regulations in the labour market system, and also in labour and social law. This had to be overcome. A number of other forms of employment were also being denounced as precarious. However, the Employers' members considered that new forms of employment were the expression of initiative and mobility and would bring about further developments in a modern, working society which would otherwise stagnate if things were to become fixed in a traditional sense. This was why, in a majority of member States, there were rules for employment contracts of a limited duration. In this respect, an employment policy was most decisive when those who were seeking jobs had no chance of actually obtaining a job and were not given an opportunity to prove their worth. However, when these workers had the necessary ability, employers had to have the possibility of recruiting them without entering immediately into long-term financial obligations. Therefore, a period of probation was something that could eventually integrate temporary workers into an enterprise. Thus, work contracts which were limited in time, part-time contracts or various other forms of employment were certainly not in contradiction with the idea of a progressive integration of young trainees. In fact, these different forms of employment had led to positive experiences for employers.

27. The Employers' members noted that, while the Experts had stated in paragraph 62 of their report that their general comments on employment policy were only to be made in December 1995, they also referred in very general terms in paragraph 64 to their report to World Employment 1995 and in this year's Report submitted by the Director-General to the Conference and entitled The promotion of employment. The Employers' members had considerable reservations on some of the statements made in these reports and also the way in which the World Employment 1995 report was produced. First of all, as far as the World Employment 1995 report was concerned, the Employers' members pointed out, as they had in the Governing Body, that this report was not produced in a way that corresponded with the tripartite nature of the Organization. Regarding the substantive issues, they agreed with the positive evaluation made in the report of globalization trends and with the assumed positive effects of foreign direct investment. For instance, this applied to developing countries. They also thought it was correct to mention the necessity for greater flexibility when it came to the duration and distribution of working time. However, they did not at all share the support for regulated labour markets which they saw throughout these reports. There was still too much faith in state intervention and subsidies. The clearly contradictory experience of the last few decades was simply not given sufficient attention and there was also insufficient differentiation between structural and cyclical unemployment. The Employers' members also considered that the excessive protection from dismissal, mentioned in paragraph 64 of the Committee of Experts' report, might be misunderstood, whereas other factors such as a very efficient educational system and a worthwhile training system are forgotten about. They felt that comments of this kind were inappropriate and disagreed with them.

28. The Employers' member of Argentina thought the development of flexibility did not reflect the destruction of the right to work, but rather the adaptation to new economic and social realities that are not always compatible with lifetime labour contracts. The Committee of Experts was pleased that the World Employment 1995 report underlined that deregulation did not have the effects on the level of employment that had been assumed. Unemployment in Latin America and Eastern Europe was not the consequence of adjustments, but was the necessary consequence of the crisis caused by excessive state employment (which amounted to a hidden subsidy) and of closed economic models. Nevertheless, without such adjustments the levels of unemployment would not only increase but explode. Deregulation or, rather, adequate regulation, was a consequence of the adaptation to reality. For example, temporary work was a form of entry into the labour market and was not "precarious". If a realistic focus was not adopted or measures taken to adapt the labour market, the situation would worsen and the levels of unemployment and irregular work would increase.

29. The Workers' members observed that, although the Committee of Experts did not this year make general comments concerning the application of Convention No. 122 on Employment Policy, 1964, it still dealt in its report with the fundamental question of the relation between employment and the regulation of work. The Committee of Experts underlined the importance of workers' rights for making social progress. This conclusion can also be found in its General Survey on termination of employment, in the Report of the Director-General on the promotion of employment, in the ILO's World Employment 1995 report, and in the work by the International Institute of Labour Studies regarding the role of labour standards in industrial restructuring. The Declaration by the Heads of State and Governments at the Social Summit also connected full employment to the respect of ILO standards. The standards on security of employment benefit the good functioning of enterprises, the economy and society as a whole. Security of employment encourages the enterprises to invest in the training of workers and to improve their capacity for innovation and adaptation, thus enabling the workers to be better involved in the development of the enterprises. On the contrary, the proliferation of new forms of temporary contracts, subcontracting or self-employment tended to exclude an important portion of workers from the protection offered by contracts without the limit of time and from protection against dismissal. These would have the consequence of aggravating the risks of social exclusion and poverty which the Social Summit precisely wished to fight against. It was appropriate to recall the negative consequences of liberalism pushed to the extreme. If the Employers did not see a worrying development in new sorts of employment contracts, such as temporary contracts, and if a social regulation of this type of work contract was conceivable, it was appropriate to point out that in practice the temporary workers in several countries were not covered by labour legislation. The Director-General had underlined in his Report on the promotion of employment that the advantages of a judicious regulation of the labour market were often underestimated. Thus employment security motivated enterprises to ensure that workers were trained as much as it encouraged the latter to improve their qualifications. One could not expect workers to be experienced in several fields and then to leave when demand or profits decreased. As the Director-General had pointed out, deregulation which had been adopted to ensure a greater labour market flexibility threatened to aggravate inequalities and poverty, which is what the Social Summit wished to combat.

30. Several Workers' members spoke of the negative impact on employment of recent "neo-liberal" economic changes. The Workers' member of Spain noted that such policies had been unable to make unemployment decrease and had instead raised levels of precarious employment: this meant that workers were more and more lacking in experience and training, which results not only in poorer quality and uncompetitiveness of the goods produced but moreover in higher levels of occupational accidents — as, for example, in Spain. The Workers' members of Egypt, the Republic of Korea and the United Kingdom also referred to the harm caused by deregulation not only in terms of unemployment and security of employment but also as regards wages, protection of trade union activities and criminality. The Workers' member of Singapore said that the economic changes should not only benefit employers, which would in any event be a short-sighted policy: vigorous tripartite consultations would certainly help to minimize hardship. The Workers' member of Pakistan supported the role of the ILO described in the World Employment 1995 report: labour was not a commodity, and an appropriate social safety net must be provided. The Workers' member of China called for concentration on economic development as the means to address unemployment and expressed Chinese unions' willingness to cooperate with unions worldwide to safeguard the interests of workers. The Workers' member of Zaire noted that the informal sector may provide employment for many workers. The Workers' member of Turkey observed that in the absence of a formal employment relationship — which is the basis for most national and international labour standards — informal sector, “pseudo-self-employment”, clandestine and “black” employment, as well as much of what is presented as “flexible working arrangements” might be used to evade protective provisions. The Workers' member of Argentina said that in Latin America, precarious employment went hand in hand with structural adjustment policies, the cost being borne by the workers.

31. The Government members of India and Kenya stressed the need to promote the employability of workers through improved education and training. Employee protection standards, in the view of the former, should not demand too much from enterprises, and national provisions were in fact often more rigid than ILO Conventions. The Government member of Germany understood the Employers' members' reservations as to the notion of precariousness, but did not share their criticism of paragraph 64 of the Committee of Experts' report as regards employment promotion: he warned against the “fetish” of deregulation.

Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140)

32. The Workers' members raised the Committee of Experts' comments on this Convention also in the context of employment policy. Those comments showed how stability and flexibility were interdependent. The indication that paid educational leave had been used more for the purpose of education in the wider sense than vocational training should be noted: the same view had been expressed by the Workers' members during the discussion of the General Survey in 1991.

33. The Employers' members noted that the Experts referred to four ratifications that had taken place over the last three years. However, the global number of ratifications had only reached the level of 28. The Employers' members considered that there was still a considerable number of problems concerning the practical application of this Convention. Although economic development in the future would require more properly trained workers, the considerable resources for comprehensive retraining could only be borne by a prospering economy. Moreover, demands for paid training leave were very often confronted with a lack of understanding and were not realistic. In addition, in the more developed States workers were entitled to more leisure time which could be used for further training.

Conventions concerning migrant workers

34. The Employers' members referred to the part of the Committee of Experts' report concerning standards that were applicable to migrant workers, particularly the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97), and the Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975 (No. 143). The Experts had reported an increase in the number of migrant workers, particularly in the countries of South-East Asia and especially as concerned domestic migrant workers. The Experts had listed the difficulties of the situation of migrant workers whom these Conventions were designed to protect. However, the number of States that were bound by these Conventions had not particularly increased. Convention No. 97 had been ratified by 40 States and Convention No.

143 by only 17 States. While there could be no doubt that there were problems in the situation of migrant workers, they were partly also the consequence of economic crises and destitution. These could not just be dealt with by standards, however well they were formulated. In fact, what was needed was a real economic policy which could bring about economic growth and create jobs. In this respect, the application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), played an important role.

35. The Workers' members fully shared the concerns of the Committee of Experts as regards the situation of migrant workers. The Committee of Experts first noted the increase in the migratory flows within South-East Asia as well as the persistence of migration toward the Middle East. Most of the receiving countries in these regions have ratified neither Convention No. 97 nor Convention No. 143. One could note at each session of this Committee the difficulties of working conditions and of life for migrant workers, as regards the restrictions on their freedom of association — if it was not completely denied — the insufficient protection of their wages, their working conditions, the discrimination against them, the unfair practices inflicted by employment agencies, or inhumane working conditions of migrant workers on board ships flying flags of convenience. The problems raised for many years in the application of the Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118), should also be highlighted. Governments should be urged to respect international labour standards concerning migrant workers and to make them respected by employers. The situation of domestic workers was particularly hard, especially when they were victims of a network of clandestine labour. The police and the courts of the receiving countries had the tendency to chase them rather than their employers and the networks of clandestine labour, who take advantage of their situation. The Committee of Experts also stressed that practices of massive expulsions were not in conformity with the Migration for Employment Recommendation (Revised), 1949 (No. 86) or the Conventions on basic rights relevant to migrant workers. Migratory flows could not be controlled without the full respect of human rights and consultation of employers' and workers' organizations. It was indispensable to listen to the appeal of the Committee of Experts to examine the ratification of Conventions concerning migrant workers. The ILO and other international organizations should be encouraged to continue their action of sensitization in this field and the debate should remain on the agenda.

36. The Employers' member of Turkey particularly pointed to the international instruments and resolutions adopted with regard to human rights, labour law, social security, education, and the cultural and health rights of migrant workers. He drew attention to the invitation from the Committee of Experts to governments to examine periodically the possibility of ratifying these two instruments. The protection of migrant workers against discrimination would not be guaranteed by legislation on the equality of opportunity and treatment alone. He called for international solidarity and frank and loyal cooperation between countries of emigration and countries of immigration in order to solve the root causes of migration. These actions should be based on economic, social and humanitarian considerations and should be carried out taking into account employment goals and in the context of Third World development aid. Ending illegal immigration for employment required international cooperation, as well as the protection of illegal migrant workers, in particular to ensure respect for fundamental rights and rights which form part of the employment relation, as migrants are often forced to accept clandestine work in conditions which would exploit them, as is the case with household migrant workers. It would be preferable to encourage the movement of capital and technology rather than that of workers, which would contribute to the improvement of the global employment situation.

37. The Workers' member of New Zealand supported the statement of the Employers' member of Turkey on the basic human rights of migrant workers even if they were illegal: migrant workers were especially vulnerable victims of the present economic environment. The Workers' member of the Republic of Korea described the labour shortage in countries such as his own, which had sucked in sometimes illegal foreign workers to do the most dangerous, dirty and demanding jobs, creating a potentially divided workforce: he too supported the commitment in Article 1 of Convention No. 143 to the respect of basic human rights for all migrant workers, regardless of their situation.

38. The Government member of Egypt agreed that there should be some means of guaranteeing wages and other rights to migrant workers, whilst the Government member of India recalled the need to create employment for workers preferably where they live. The Government member of the Russian Federation called for cooperation between the ILO and the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR), the migrant workers question being related to the question of refugees.

Conventions concerning child labour and minimum age for employment

39. Both the Employers' and the Workers' members referred to the important issues of human rights in general and children's rights in particular, and the ILO's mandate to pursue its activities in this area.

40. The Government member of Kenya agreed with the Committee of Experts' call on States to ratify the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138): he expressed his Government's sincere appreciation to the ILO and the Governments of Germany and Spain in particular for the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC) and urged countries with child labour problems to seek the ILO's assistance. The Workers' member of Singapore also endorsed the ILO's technical assistance activities in this regard. The Government member of the Belgium welcomed the continuing cooperation between the ILO and the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child.

41. The Workers' members of India and Pakistan underlined the need to devote greater resources to children's education. The former also considered that for historical reasons more time may be required to eradicate child labour: millions of children are involved, and in his country the Government was working with unions and employers to see that it was gradually eliminated.

42. The Government member of the United Kingdom questioned whether there was currently an adequate instrument to deal with child labour. Any difficulties in this area tended to be examined under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29). Convention No. 138 was not a suitable instrument to use for the investigation of this complex issue, as it had a very low ratification rate in comparison with other fundamental Conventions and clearly did not meet the needs of member States. It was flawed because it was not directly concerned with the exploitation of child labour. The speaker suggested something more focused, that took the form of a new promotional Convention or a radical revision of Convention No. 138.

Conventions relating to seafarers and offshore work

43. The Workers' member of Argentina regretted that the Committee of Experts' report contained no reference to work on offshore installations, as it had done previously. On the other hand, he welcomed the fact that it had addressed comments to more than 20 countries regarding seafarers or the fishing industry.

Standard-setting policy: Revision of standards

44. The Employers' members considered that there was a need for changes to be made in the standard-setting procedures. This was demonstrated by the fact that the average ratification rate per country had been decreasing for several years. The Conventions that had been adopted over the last 15 years had been ratified by only about 7.5 per cent of member States. So even revised versions of existing Conventions had only been ratified to a small extent. They therefore believed that it was time to take specific steps on the basis of the results of the discussion on reforms. Obsolete standards, of which there were many, should be rendered null and void. New standards should be elaborated in the future only when it became indispensable in the light of the already voluminous list of standards. The emphasis had to be the revision of older Conventions that had now become outdated. The revised standards had to be drawn up taking into account the different levels of development, legal traditions and cultures of ILO member States and consequently it was necessary to forego complex and over-detailed provisions. Their contents needed to be very clearly worded in order to avoid any future interpretations which would extend the scope of these Conventions.

45. The Employers' member of the Netherlands (who also speaks for the Employers' group in the Governing Body Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards) said the Employers were willing to discuss the subject with an open mind and thought consensus was within reach. She emphasized the need to set criteria when talking about the revision or creation of standards. Standards should above all be universal, applicable to all countries, and not of such a high standard that most member countries would not be able to implement them. Rigidity, complexity, and ambiguity in the texts should all be avoided. She described her surprise whenever she heard governments express the need to revise Conventions because they are not good: after all, they are adopted by the Conference and there are very rare occasions when governments do not vote in favour, even when they know in advance that they are not going to ratify. She believed that a vote to adopt at the Conference, although it does not impose a legal obligation on governments, clearly places a moral obligation on governments. The speaker referred to the "Sir John Forbes Watson list" (containing information, in particular, on the numbers of Conventions ratified by each Member and the numbers which governments had voted for on their adoption by the Conference but not subsequently ratified) and thought that this list should be revived. Furthermore, governments were not always careful before ratifying to make sure that application of the Convention was possible. Governments should not just ratify for the sake of ratification, but they should ask for advice beforehand, in particular from the Office, to see if their national legislation is in compliance. She referred to the Working Party set up by the Governing Body with a carefully drafted mandate laid down in paragraph 52 of document GB.262/9/2.

46. The Employers' member of Sweden emphasized the urgent need for a revision of ILO Conventions. One example concerned the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121), which has placed the ILO in the centre of Swedish politics. This Convention allows a country to have up to three waiting days for the payment of benefits, but only to the extent that the country had waiting days at the time of ratification. Unfortunately Sweden had no waiting day when it ratified this Convention. Because of Sweden's extremely serious economic crisis the previous Government introduced one single waiting day in the sickness insurance which also covers injury indemnities. After complaints by the Swedish unions, the Committee of Experts found that Sweden seriously violated Convention No. 121. The Committee's report expressed satisfaction that the new Government will abolish the waiting day from 1 January 1997. It should be informed, however, that the new Government afterwards has changed its first decision. The waiting day will be preserved in Sweden, which will continue to violate this Convention until Sweden has the possibility to denounce it in four or five years. Rigid and detailed provisions of this kind are detrimental not only to member countries, but also to the reputation of the ILO, which should be well aware of its responsibility to point out such possible difficulties to new member countries.

47. The Workers' members recalled the discussions in the Governing Body on the strengthening and the updating of the supervisory machinery, the promotion of standards and the possible updating of some of them. For the March-April session of the Governing Body, the Office had prepared a document in which it analysed at length the trends of ratification and the policies followed in the field of the revision of standards. This document showed that the rate of ratification of instruments classified by the Ventejol report (1987) as standards requiring priority promotion was slower than expected. General surveys published recently showed, however, that these standards, which defined basic principles, left countries with considerable room for manoeuvre and took account of the differences between countries, thus offering real ratification prospects, to the extent that there was a political will. It was indispensable to take account of the following criteria for the revision of a Convention: the existence of a climate of confidence between the groups; the revision should not serve to weaken or suppress the protection of workers; the revision should be based on an in-depth study; a consensus should emerge on the serious problems that ratification could bring about in a certain number of countries and that the supervisory bodies could not resolve; the emergence of a new situation on the economic and social levels. An objective approach and a climate of confidence were absolutely necessary. Furthermore, they considered that the attitude of the Employers' members in this respect was more objective and realistic than that of certain governments.

48. The Workers' member of Canada (who also speaks for the Workers' group in the Governing Body Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards) referred to the report presented last March to the Governing Body Committee and emphasized the difficult question of evaluation with regard to updating some standards and elaborating new ones in an Organization with more than 170 member States. The report of the Committee concluded that an evaluation can be made only on a case-by-case basis through an in-depth examination of each Convention or Recommendation, and that no general criteria can be established for this purpose. With regard to the ratification of Conventions, the same report stated that the revising Conventions had, on the whole, been less widely ratified than the initial Conventions, and in some cases initial Conventions continued to receive more ratifications than the revising ones, which clearly showed that the content of a Convention should not supersede the lack of political will either to ratify Conventions or to implement them. Taking the example of federal Canada, where 13 governments have to agree in order for a Convention to be ratified, many elements having nothing to do with the content of the Conventions interfere in the process. There were various other reasons why governments did not take the steps necessary to create a better world for the human race, to help women in particular, to eliminate poverty, or simply to implement Conventions. However, no compromise should be made in the content of the ILO's Conventions, which should address the real situation of workers who often have no standards to protect them. He welcomed the fact that the Working Party established by the Governing Body had agreed to look at the recommendations included in the report, which meant looking into the whole issue of the revision of Conventions.

49. The Workers' member of Tunisia considered that the call for the revision of standards was inspired above all by the desire to dilute the effectiveness of these instruments: this procedure was aimed at ensuring flexibility in the implementation of these Conventions, which would result in the setting up of societies based on the new world economic order. The Workers' members of Singapore and Zimbabwe stressed that revision should be aimed at strengthening the effectiveness of standards and the protection offered to workers, while addressing some of the concerns of practicality and relevancy which had been raised: it should not result in the erosion of the substance or impact of a standard so as to render it meaningless.

50. The Government member of Egypt said there was a need to review certain Conventions in order to adapt to contemporary developments throughout the world and to make sure that Conventions are more modern, more appropriate and easier to apply from the point of view of member States, so as to achieve what the Director-General mentioned in his Report, that is, a new feeling of vigour, a new breath of life with regard to the ratification of Conventions. The Government member of Kenya believed that future standards should be so designed as to encourage countries at different stages of development to ratify them: flexibility was lacking even in such revised standards as the Plantations Convention, 1958 (No. 110), with its Protocol of 1982. The Government member of Portugal called for greater participation by member States in standard setting, as regards selection of topics and replies to Office questionnaires, so as to ensure standards are sufficiently universal and flexible. The Government member of China underlined the value of a tripartite approach to standard setting, as well as the need to take account of regional differences and levels of economic development. The Government member of France favoured further consideration not only of the revision question but of all aspects of standards in the future: the Governing Body Working Party should be both moderate and daring in its proposals; the positions of the three groups would not converge spontaneously. The Government member of the United Kingdom proposed an early critical examination of the key Conventions, to confirm whether they could be regarded as embodiments of human rights, universal in scope and acceptable to a large proportion of the membership; there should also be an audit of all existing instruments to see whether Conventions could be consolidated and identify candidates for revision or ones which were obsolete, taking account of levels of ratification and over-complexity.

Ratifications and denunciations

51. The Employers' members observed that genuine difficulties in connection with revision of Conventions were manifested by ratification levels. However, it was not just the global overall figures that should be looked at. These did not give a very realistic picture of the situation since the number of Members of this Organization had increased dramatically in the last few years. It was necessary to establish a link between the rate of ratification and the individual member States and the individual Conventions with regard to the figures expressed as global figures or as a percentage; then this would give a completely different, rather negative picture. They also agreed with the Workers' members that there was a growing number of representations and complaints submitted to the ILO which was indicative of the difficulties in applying ratified Conventions. With reference to paragraphs 15 and following of the Experts' report regarding ratifications and denunciations, the Employers' members were of the view that ratification and denunciation did not formally require any detailed indication of grounds. However, it was opportune for a government to mention as a rule the most important reasons for a denunciation, since in this way one could gain useful knowledge for the future. This appeared to be the case concerning the declaration of the United Kingdom in relation to a denunciation of the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery (Agriculture) Convention, 1951 (No. 99), and the Holidays with Pay (Agriculture) Convention, 1952 (No. 101). As indicated in paragraph 17 of the Experts' report, the Government of the United Kingdom believed that the requirements of the Conventions restricted its scope for action in the field of agriculture. The Employers' members considered that the denunciation procedure of ten years was too restrictive since member States sometimes denounced a Convention as a precaution, although these member States had not necessarily set up a time-schedule to draw up their own regulations in the matter. The long cycle of ten years, therefore, often obliged member States to have recourse to this procedure while it was open. As a result, the Employers' members believed the standard denunciation period of ten years should be reduced to five years, since this would bring about the necessary flexibility. The Employers' member of the Netherlands considered that human rights Conventions should continue to be denounceable only every ten years.

52. The Workers' members noted that the number of ratifications had increased during the course of the last two years and averaged over 100 per year since 1955. This illustrated concretely and directly the support of member States and organizations of workers and employers for ILO principles and values. They nevertheless deplored the fact that a large number of countries had not yet ratified the fundamental Conventions. The Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts had launched an appeal during the last session to each country to ratify at least the Conventions on fundamental rights. The Social Summit reached similar conclusions. However, considerable differences appeared between regions of the world with respect to the rate of ratification and, in the follow-up to the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the Social Summit, governments were invited to ratify a larger number of these instruments and to apply them in practice. The Workers' members noted that the total number of "pure" denunciations, that is to say, without ratification of a revising Convention, were actually rather limited, after a wave of denunciations of the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89). Tripartism, as exemplified in the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), required an in-depth consultation of employers' and workers' organizations before deciding upon a denunciation. The Workers' members considered furthermore that a government which denounced a Convention without ratifying a revising Convention should provide information to the Conference. In this respect they considered that the arguments presented by the Government of the United Kingdom as grounds for denunciation were not convincing. Convention No. 101 enumerated in very flexible terms the principles concerning minimum paid leave in agriculture; the minimum length of service required and the duration of annual leave were only specified in the accompanying Recommendation. And Convention No. 99 defined in loose terms the principles concerning the methods of fixing minimum wages in agriculture. In this perspective, the explanations given by the Government of the United Kingdom in Part II of the Committee of Experts' report seemed even less well founded. The Workers' members considered that the attitude of the Government of the United Kingdom risked contravening the fundamental values of the ILO. The Workers' member of Singapore pointed out that a ten-year denunciation period ensured a certain stability.

53. The Government member of the United Kingdom said that when modern legislation might be introduced resulting in a Convention no longer being observed it was right for governments, after consultation, to denounce; the existing procedure was too inflexible, since Conventions could become prejudicial to the State's interests, and all restrictions on denunciation should be swept away. The Government member of Germany was against having a Conference discussion in cases of denunciation.

54. The Government member of India noted that inability to ratify did not mean a government did not intend to deal with the concerns of a Convention: the problem was often one of enforcement; unless the level of workers' organization and collective bargaining were taken into account it would not be possible for the supervisory bodies to assess the intent of member States.

The supervisory system

55. Several members of the Committee (the Government members of Iceland (speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries), Kenya and the Russian Federation and the Workers' member of Tunisia) stressed the importance of the ILO allocating adequate resources for international labour standards and human rights activities.

56. The Workers' members recalled that the reform of the supervisory machinery and especially the new provisions concerning the procedures for requests of reports on ratified Conventions were discussed at length during previous sessions. The new machinery was to enter into force next year and the Workers' members would monitor the way in which it was applied. This year, the Committee of Experts had indicated that incomplete reports had been submitted, in spite of an increase in the number of reports received. The Workers' members recalled that it was possible, where there were serious problems, to ask for reports outside the normal reporting cycle in order to examine cases during the Conference. The Committee of Experts was often led to use this possibility. The Workers' members considered that the cases of progress noted showed that the supervisory machinery had a real impact for workers. These cases of progress seemed to be relatively constant even if the report showed a certain decrease: 32 countries and 44 cases in 1993, 30 countries and 42 cases in 1994 as opposed to only 22 countries and 36 cases for this session. The Workers also remained vigilant with respect to the purely formal cases of progress which did not have any real impact in practice. The 2,070 cases of progress which were recorded illustrated that, even in the absence of a binding force, some countries finally adapted their legislation and practice. The close involvement of organizations of employers and of workers contributed a good deal to this success. The accumulated effects of technical assistance, the perseverance of the supervisory bodies and of tripartite dialogue thus led to positive results. The Workers' members nevertheless considered that the supervisory machinery should be reinforced. Very often the Committee of Experts, the Conference Committee and the Committee on Freedom of Association were forced to reiterate constantly their observations or conclusions, and this negative attitude on the part of certain countries weakened the authority of the supervisory bodies. It was inadmissible that the interests of workers and their organizations be harmed during an entire generation. When neither dialogue nor persuasion worked, the social clause should be applied to guarantee the actual respect of the principles of dialogue, collaboration, assistance and social justice.

57. The Employers' members were very concerned about the large number of shortcomings by member States in meeting reporting obligations. For instance, 43 governments had not fulfilled their obligation to report on ratified Conventions and overall there were 337 cases where no reply was given to direct requests for observations. They considered that this was a challenge for the supervisory system as a whole, and hoped that the modified reporting system would facilitate the situation for member States.

58. The Workers' member of the Netherlands remarked on a certain lack of continuity as regards the examination of cases by the supervisory bodies: some cases discussed previously in the Conference Committee did not appear in the Committee of Experts' report. The Workers' member of Tunisia considered that the Committee of Experts' report was too lenient and ambiguous in some cases when it came to violation of Conventions.

59. The Government member of Iceland (speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries) thought that governments should be involved in the selection of cases for examination in the present Committee; he noted also that an increasing number of Government members of the Committee now took part in the discussions of individual cases. The Government member of the United Kingdom stated that, if the work of the Committee was to be truly tripartite, the selection of cases should be more transparent and tripartite, according to clear criteria.

60. As regards obligations to report on ratified Conventions, the Workers' member of Japan emphasized that in the streamlined arrangements with a more selective approach, sight of the basic objectives of supervision should not be lost: there should be no greater flexibility in application, only in the formulation of standards. The Workers' member of the Netherlands observed that, while the preparation of first reports might not be easy, reporting in general was not so complicated, especially for governments of industrialized countries with access to modern information technology: in these conditions, poor reporting reflected lack of interest, and the new reporting system might not be a solution if this were true.

61. The Government member of France saw in the numbers of reports not received and the insufficiency of others — as well as in what he considered a small increase in numbers of ratifications — a slow decline of the system of standards. The Government member of the United Kingdom thought the changes in the reporting system overdue and felt they should be evaluated in a couple of years. On the other hand, the Government member of Germany noticed a slight improvement in reporting over the last two years. The Government members of Bangladesh and India stated that failure to report was not necessarily wilful, but was often due to real administrative and political difficulties, with various government agencies, as well as employers' and workers' organizations, involved in policy decisions: this was, as the former remarked, particularly the case in respect of the obligation to report on submission of Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference to the national competent authorities. The Government members of Kenya and Portugal recommended recourse to the Office, which offers technical assistance to member States experiencing problems in fulfilling their reporting obligations.

62. The Government member of Portugal pointed out the usefulness of general surveys under article 19 of the Constitution as a means of evaluating the application of Conventions and Recommendations. The Government member of the United Kingdom thought there should be a "rolling review" of human rights instruments by this means. The Employers' member of the Netherlands said that general surveys could be used to obtain an idea of what might be included in future standard setting.

Role of employers' and workers' organizations

63. The Employers' members noted that all governments had sent in their reports to the ILO after consultation with employers' and workers' organizations.

There had also been new progress achieved in this field; moreover, this year's report also showed that both social partners were fully involved in the ILO's work. This was reflected through the submission to the ILO of the largest number of comments by employers' and workers' organizations. Referring to paragraphs 20 and following of the Experts' report concerning the complaint, representation and other procedures available under the ILO Constitution, the Employers' members felt that considerable use was now being made of all the opportunities afforded under the Constitution.

64. The Workers' members welcomed the fact that certain Government members had underlined the importance of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). As indicated in paragraphs 20-40 and 78-83 of the report of the Committee of Experts, the numbers of observations, complaints and representations of workers' organizations were increasing, which, on the one hand, reflected the interest of workers and their organizations in standards, but, on the other hand, illustrated the extent of the problems with respect to application. The importance of the number of complaints, representations and observations proved that the system was working and close to the realities of the field. The Workers' member of Pakistan hoped the principles of tripartism and Convention No. 144 would be fully applied at the national level as well.

Sanctions

65. The Employers' members stated that, with respect to the Experts' request for the enforcement of sanctions in the event of non-compliance with obligations under the Conventions, they felt that such sanctions were a possibility for ensuring such compliance. However, there was an obligation to establish a sanction only if it was explicitly mentioned in a Convention and this was seldom the case. In the majority of cases the enforcement of sanctions was a domestic affair and not an international one. The Government member of Germany supported this position, whilst observing that an obligation to lay down sanctions could be included in a Convention.

Standards and technical cooperation

66. The Employers' members noted that, with respect to technical assistance in the field of standards, the Experts had listed the various measures that had been adopted by the ILO in order to acquaint member States with existing standards. The multidisciplinary teams (MDTs) were an example of such a measure and they were supposed to work in a more integrated form. The Employers' members welcomed this measure last year. They hoped that the MDTs would provide a better feedback for an improved and more realistic preparation of standard-setting activities. The work of these teams would bring about greater knowledge of the practical problems in the field and the rapid changes that were taking place in the day-to-day world of work. They hoped that this new knowledge would be fully taken into account.

67. The Workers' members considered that technical assistance in the field of standards was an important instrument and suggested using it regularly in individual cases. They deplored the fact, however, that certain countries had recourse to this solution as a manoeuvre. A constructive attitude on the part of governments vis-à-vis the ILO and organizations of workers and employers was an essential condition. It was within this framework that tripartite consultations had to take place at the national level. The Workers' members welcomed the establishment of multidisciplinary teams including standards specialists. They insisted however that this new system also worked in the interests of workers' organizations. The effectiveness of the supervisory machinery depended to a large extent on the ability of organizations of workers to have recourse to it. The changing in the procedures for requesting reports reinforced their role. The number of observations from organizations of workers and employers was increasing each year. The Office should support efforts to inform and assist organizations of workers, especially in the form of seminars. The Workers' members also suggested organizing a seminar on standards for new members of the present Committee. The representative of the Secretary-General stated that this would be done next year.

68. The Government members of China and Saudi Arabia drew attention especially to the need for technical assistance in relation to labour legislation, in order to make the implementation and ratification of ILO Conventions possible. The former wished the role of international labour standards to be strengthened in this respect, and referred to his own country's experience as regards workshops and seminars at the provincial and national levels, particularly on occupational safety and health.

69. The Government member of Egypt and the Workers' member of Argentina called for the strengthening of all multidisciplinary teams by the inclusion of a standards specialist.

70. The Workers' member of Pakistan stated the need for technical assistance to translate international labour standards into national languages. The Workers' member of Italy pointed out that economic and financial assistance were also wanted. And the Workers' member of New Zealand noted that some industrialized countries would benefit from technical assistance to ensure that economic growth is translated into social development.

C. Report of the Sixth Ordinary Session of the Joint ILO-UNESCO Committee of Experts on the Application of the Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers

71. The representative of the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) explained that the report of the Joint Committee (CEART) had drawn its conclusions not from a questionnaire methodology like the previous ones, but from a series of activities using an integrated approach, with the intention of making a normative instrument better known and applied. In conducting four subregional activities, the ILO and UNESCO had brought together representatives of governments, teachers' unions and the private sector to examine the 1966 Recommendation within the socio-economic and cultural context of the countries concerned. UNESCO had also adopted a tripartite methodology in examining certain aspects of the Recommendation of concern to it through 16 national case-studies. The validity of the 1966 Recommendation was examined by CEART at the request of the Executive Board and the General Conference of UNESCO on the basis of a paper on current trends affecting education and the status of teachers. The Joint Committee recommended that the 1966 Recommendation remained valid but suggested that the joint commentaries on its 146 articles elaborated with the ILO should be updated, work which UNESCO intended to pursue in collaboration with the ILO over the next term. The Joint Committee also examined the status of teachers in relation to the initial and continuing education and training that is provided to them, on the basis of a number of country case-studies. It concluded that the teacher education curriculum continued to be inadequate, that more coherent national policies to update teachers' knowledge in relation to rapid scientific, technological and societal changes were needed, and that directors of schools had to learn how to build partnerships with the community to reflect the changing role and functions of schools. UNESCO hoped to team up with the ILO during the next six years to build partnerships. The Executive Board of UNESCO had examined the Joint Committee's report and called for enhanced cooperation with the ILO, continuing the new working methodology without excluding the questionnaire methodology, and looking at ways and means to apply the Recommendation as a standard-setting instrument in keeping with the social, cultural and economic conditions of each country. The Executive Board had also invited the Director-General of UNESCO to examine, with the Director-General of the ILO, means of cooperating during the next International Conference on Education (ICE) in 1996 whose theme will be teachers. The Director-General of UNESCO is also authorized to invite the Joint Committee to attend the ICE, thereby providing more attention to the application of the Recommendation. The speaker concluded by emphasizing the importance of teachers as educators in meeting the challenges of education for tolerance and peace stressed by UNESCO and of improving schools for the children of tomorrow.

72. The Employers' members noted that the document concerns the meeting held in July 1994, whilst the Governing Body of the ILO decided to refer it to the Conference Committee only this April. The point of holding this discussion, last held in 1989, was that the status of teachers affected their activities and tasks — the passing on of knowledge and education in the form of lifelong training — to which the Employers' members attached the greatest importance. It is only this particularity of their role that justified a specific standard with its own supervisory system, since for the rest they were like other workers. The report before the Conference Committee was largely a report on activities endeavouring to disseminate the Recommendation and bring about practical implementation of its provisions. To ensure better observance, certain survey methods to obtain empirical data, including a new questionnaire methodology, were being developed, and case-studies had been carried out. The recommendations of this independent monitoring system based on a joint committee raised a number of interesting points, namely the surprising spread of illiteracy. A number of the Recommendation's provisions did not require revision for the moment, but improvements were required in teacher training and other areas. The Employers' members supported these proposals. In their view, status questions such as labour law and pay should be viewed against the background of what was best for education; according priority to material conditions of teachers over these concerns would gravely endanger future generations. Given their special functions to pass along knowledge and education, it was difficult to understand why the Committee on Freedom of Association of the ILO Governing Body had not considered the work of teachers as an essential service in which the right to strike could be restricted since the interruption of educational services would have future consequences more serious than the interruption of any other public service because it put the future of the next generation at risk. Moreover, such a strike was an extreme example of kidnapping; it hardly put the employer, the real opponent in such a strike, under pressure, while the students who were in principle unconcerned about it had to suffer. It was hoped that the ILO supervisory bodies would soon review their interpretation of this point. The Employers' members nevertheless agreed that teachers should enjoy conditions that matched their important functions, in particular proper training, and that their status should be improved in all fields. They fully supported the basic concerns expressed in the Joint Committee's report and hoped that the current discussion would contribute to improvements.

73. The Workers' members shared the concerns expressed in the Joint Committee's report. Although everyone agreed on the importance of education for human resource development, for enterprises and in the fight against social exclusion, and the Social Summit's conclusions had reaffirmed the international community's commitment to extending basic and general education, structural adjustment measures and public financial crises had diminished educational investments. This had impacted on the objectives of appropriate education for all children and on teachers' conditions and motivation. Financial difficulties and restructuring also hampered respect for international labour standards, as witnessed by violations of teachers' trade union rights, collective bargaining and employment and occupational discrimination. Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 concerning freedom of association, the right to organize and collective bargaining and Convention No. 111 concerning equal opportunities and treatment were applicable to teachers, as made clear by ILO supervisory organs. The number of allegations by teachers' organizations before the Joint Committee and the cases brought to the Committee on Freedom of Association were increasing, aggravated by the decentralization of organizational responsibility in education which considerably weakened collective bargaining. The general application of fundamental ILO Conventions should not be undermined by a specific standard for teachers. The ILO/UNESCO Recommendation supplemented basic rights guaranteed by these Conventions. Teachers took strike action as a last resort, not just to improve their own status but also over concern with the impact of economic policies on education as a vital investment for educational development and social justice. The Workers' members supported the Joint Committee's position that the principles of the Recommendation remained valid, and no revision should be undertaken for the time being. Though the Recommendation particularly provided for consultation with teachers and their organizations on educational issues, the report of the Joint Committee pointed out the frequent absence of consultation with teachers with regard to budgetary restrictions and structural adjustment measures which nevertheless had repercussions for educational quality and teachers' working conditions. The Workers' members supported the conclusions and proposals for future action contained in the report, in order to effectively promote the application of the Recommendation. To this end, the ILO and UNESCO should closely collaborate, respecting the ILO's mandate, tripartite structure and the viewpoints of its supervisory organs. Education deserved special attention from the ILO because of its strategic importance for employment, for the world of work and for society.

74. The Workers' member of Greece pointed out that teachers' conditions had deteriorated to the point where many sought additional jobs outside teaching, and that, if access to basic education of quality was to be ensured, governments would have to allocate the necessary resources. The Workers' member of Germany noted: first, that the increased number of allegations showed a deterioration of conditions in the teaching profession; second, the steps taken by the Joint Committee to deal more rapidly with allegations were positive, since the present interval of three years between meetings was far too long; and third, that his country was an example of the lack of consultation or collective bargaining in relation to teachers' working hours which had been increased in several Länder by legislative means. The Workers' member of New Zealand strongly opposed the suggestion by the Employers' members that teachers be denied the right to strike; she noted the positive example of collaboration among international organizations and thought that the innovative approaches shown in the Joint Committee's report might have benefits for the ILO supervisory bodies, since they reconciled systems of information in a way that reflected country realities.

75. The representatives of Education International welcomed the change in the Joint Committee's methodology and its view that the 1966 Recommendation remained as relevant as when it was prepared. The principles of the Recommendation largely depended on the rights to freedom of association and collective bargaining which were still denied to teachers in many countries. Without such rights teachers could not play their full role in the formulation of educational policies and ensuring the success of education reforms. As the Joint Committee's report outlined, the impact of restructuring in industrialized countries caused concern — collective agreements were overridden by legislation or extended beyond expiry — and new challenges had to be faced by the teaching profession as increased numbers of students, changing family structures and new information technology greatly modified teachers' activities. Ongoing studies were designed to elaborate strategies to address the issue of stress and burn-out among teachers. The impact of restructuring in developing countries had been disastrous, however. Teachers' salaries were in arrears or not paid at all. Low salary levels had contributed to a greater feminization of the teaching profession, while the Joint Committee's report also dealt with the necessity to focus attention on discrimination against women particularly with regard to their representation in scientific and technical fields and their access to posts of responsibility. Lessons should be learnt from failures in the policies of the Bretton Woods institutions which resulted in demotivation of teachers, and from decentralization policies which were used to lessen responsibility for state funding of education and to strip away collective agreement benefits. Free compulsory education was the most potent tool in the fight against child labour. Education International fully supported the recommendations of the Joint Committee and the work of the ILO and of UNESCO to promote the principles enshrined in the Recommendation, and it intended to participate actively in the work of the ILO's Standing Technical Committee for Educational Personnel in October 1995, and in the International Conference on Education to be held in October 1996.

76. The Committee took note of the report of the Joint Committee.

D. Reports requested under article 19 of the ILO Constitution

Termination of Employment Convention (No. 158) and Recommendation (No. 166), 1982

77. The Committee had an in-depth discussion on the General Survey of the Committee of Experts on the Termination of Employment Convention (No. 158) and Recommendation (No. 166), 1982. The Committee of Experts based the General Survey on the reports submitted under article 19 of the Constitution, as well as on the information provided in reports supplied under article 22 of the Constitution, by governments who have ratified the Convention. The General Survey also took account of the observations received from a considerable number of employers' and workers' organizations which were communicated with the governments' reports in accordance with article 23(2) of the Constitution.

Introductory statements

78. The Employers' members noted that the General Survey prepared by the Committee of Experts on the basis of reports supplied under article 19 of the ILO Constitution, showed as always, great variation of the regulations which were relevant to this field in the individual member States of the ILO. They had the impression, however, that the spectrum on this occasion was much greater than on many other subjects. However, that was not very surprising since the question of protection against dismissal was indeed an essential field of labour law. The majority of member States had some form of protection in this field, but the provisions of the relevant rules and regulations varied considerably. These provisions generally were beneath rather than above the standards set by the Convention.

79. First, the Employers' members noted in positive terms that the General Survey prepared by the Committee of Experts was a lengthy, empirical report. The survey made it possible to view the factual situation in many of the ILO's member States, measured against Convention No. 158. However, the Employers' members believed that the survey gave an incorrect impression that all the requirements of the Convention existed somewhere — indeed, everything demanded by the Convention did exist somewhere in the world in approximate form. But to conclude from this situation that there was real protection against unjustified dismissal as provided for by the Convention everywhere and across the board would be incorrect because the manner in which the member States were compared with their regulations showed that in fact hardly any State had actually done everything demanded by the Convention. Otherwise probably many more member States indeed would have ratified the Convention. The Employers' members also noted that in the area of unjustified dismissal, diverse traditions existed and a number of different developments had left their mark. Consequently, the results that had arisen differed considerably from member State to member State. An analysis of the Convention in particular on the basis of the interpretation given by the Committee of Experts, showed that the Convention did not just set minimum standards, but much more. The Convention as a whole set very high requirements. The Employers' members believed it was obvious that many member States do not or could not meet these high requirements. This inability was due to various reasons.

80. First, with regard to the low level of ratification of the Convention, the Employers' members referred to the example of one important member State in which only relatively little legal protection against dismissal existed. In that particular country, the trade unions were much more powerful than they had now become. In their powerful past, these unions could indeed have achieved such legislation, even forced it, if this had actually been seriously demanded by political circles. But the trade unions did not want to do so, because they did not wish for legislative regulations for all workers since they wanted collective agreements to provide minimum protection against unjustified dismissal. Legislation therefore would have extended this protection mechanism to all workers and would thus have reduced the incentive for people to join trade unions. More generally, protection against dismissal which goes beyond the simple prohibition of arbitrary dismissals, would complicate the capacity of enterprises to adapt to operational or general economic changes. These complications could result from delays due to certain mandatory procedures prior to dismissals. Furthermore, protection against dismissal increased operating costs for enterprises and the national economy in general. In the context of globalization and of increasing competition, flexibility and speed of adaptation were vital to the survival of enterprises. This flexibility for enterprises was not possible if the priority of personnel policy was to protect currently employed workers. An excessively rigid protection against dismissal would give rise to certain preventive action because it impaired the ability and willingness of enterprises to recruit new workers. Such an effect would occur especially when the duration of manufacturing or service industry orders was uncertain, or during subsequent periods when order books remained empty and long-term employment commitments could not be possible. The Employers' members believed that the counter-arguments were not convincing. The employers of course had an interest in keeping a well-experienced workforce and skilled workers, especially if they had invested in their training. The Employers' members believed that this was quite correct and thus a common interest existed between workers and employers. Consequently, there was no need for any regulations where employers and workers had the same interest since intentional voluntary self-detrimental action was really an exception. It was exactly because the employer and worker had a common interest that a regulation was superfluous.

81. The Employers' members found in this General Survey a general problem that they had been pointing out many times as regards others instruments of the ILO: there was a tendency to make extensive interpretations. It was legitimate to lay down fundamental principles of a general character for a market economy with social responsibilities, but when it came to giving expression to them in the labour laws of member States, the individual characteristics of the internal system should be respected. The interpretations given by the Committee of Experts did not go in this direction. Given the different circumstances of each member State, the Employers' members believed that it was very difficult to interfere in a State's system of labour legislation with over-detailed regulations. Such interference gave rise to contradictions and a rupture in the social structures of each country. Furthermore, hardly any country was willing to give up its own traditional order or impose a regulation originating from a foreign body. This applied to ILO regulations and standards and even more to the extensive interpretations of ILO texts. For example, it appeared superfluous to replace relatively clear terms by more complicated sub-terms. In paragraph 283 of the General Survey, the Committee of Experts explained what should be understood by the term “the opportunity for consultation”. The Employers’ members believed that the term “consultation” was so clear that it did not need any further interpretation. However, the Committee of Experts divided up this term by making a distinction between “an exchange of views” and “the establishment of a dialogue”. The Committee of Experts then referred to paragraphs 60 and 61 of the General Survey, which alluded to the explanation given to the term “consultation” in the 1992 General Survey concerning minimum wages. In the 1992 General Survey, paragraph 191 referred to the 1982 General Survey concerning Convention No. 144 on Tripartite Consultations (International Labour Standards). These references did mention something about consultations but provided no real explanation for the distinction between an exchange of opinions and the establishment of a dialogue. Moreover, totally different Conventions were alluded to which dealt with completely different issues. The Employers’ members therefore wondered why this term “consultation” had to be divided up into the terms “an exchange of views” and “the establishment of a dialogue”. The Employers’ members also considered that these sub-categories could indeed be translated into other languages, but they did have a traditional meaning only in one country. They questioned why these terms used in a particular national context were subjected to the term “consultation” for the whole world. The Employers’ members believed that if compliance with Convention No. 158 was to be examined in the future in a particular case, reference would be made to paragraph 283 of this year’s General Survey and there would be a conclusion that this particular term “consultation” must mean an exchange of opinions and the establishment of a dialogue. If, in a specific case, one element was missing, this would no doubt be considered as non-compliance with the Convention.

82. In the Employers’ view the General Survey provided other more serious examples of questionable interpretations. Paragraph 56 notes, once again, the well-known mistrust by the Committee of Experts of self-employment, which was regarded only as a means to escape the protection of the Convention. However, new forms of employment were developing all over the world, and not only in the 24 countries that had ratified the Convention. They corresponded to structural changes of great magnitude and there was no point in systematically meeting such developments with distrust or in being confined to the idea that a uniform labour law should be applied to a uniform category of employees.

83. The Employers’ members considered that some other passages of the General Survey attested the mistrust of the Committee of Experts regarding any form of flexibility. The Convention provided that the dismissal should be based on a valid reason and then refers to certain reasons which are not considered as being valid. The Committee of Experts dealt with these reasons extensively in the General Survey and indicated finally, in paragraph 93 of the General Survey, that dismissal should only be used as a measure of last resort. Another example existed where the Convention stipulates that the temporary absence from work because of illness or injury should not constitute a valid reason for termination. But the Committee of Experts in paragraph 137 of the General Survey gave such an interpretation to the notion of temporary absence that it could be without limit of time. Another extensive interpretation was the wish of the Committee of Experts expressed in paragraph 117 of the General Survey that effect be given in practice to Article 5(c) of the Convention in a certain manner, while admitting that the Experts were not talking about requirements made in the Convention.

84. The Employers' members considered that a key to some misinterpretations might be found in paragraph 203 of the General Survey. There the clear provision of Article 9 relating to the burden of proof was made unclear by the statement that the Convention distanced itself from traditional contract law and was based on common law. Such a statement could only make sense if the intention was to consider as well the other rules of a certain legal system when interpreting the Convention. They clearly opposed such an attempt. Otherwise, in the future, not the terms of a Convention, but the domestic law system actually or supposedly used as a model would decisively influence the interpretation of the provisions of a Convention. Such a result went, however, completely against legal certainty. The most serious misinterpretation could be found in the last sentence of paragraph 203 of the General Survey, stating that "in labour disputes legal provisions must be interpreted in favour of the worker". Such an interpretation was contrary to legal criteria because it would mean that, in all cases, the legal provisions were to be interpreted in favour of the workers.

85. In their view, aside from interpretations which were dubious or erroneous, it would be favourable in the general surveys to evaluate the experience acquired through the adoption of the Convention and, above all, the practice followed in countries. A realistic criteria of evaluation was examination of the modest number of ratifications of Convention No. 158, which contrasted with the fact that two-thirds of Conference delegates had voted in favour of its adoption. This ought to have been an object for reflection and to have served as the basis of the conclusions. In this sense the positive statements of the General Survey concerning the prospects of future ratifications clearly had limited validity.

86. With regard to the measures considered in the General Survey to avoid dismissals (paragraphs 315 et seq.), the Employers' members noted that certain ones were obvious and were practised by enterprises. But reading those paragraphs left an illusory impression that with enough good will and efforts it was possible to avoid dismissals even in situations in which it was necessary.

87. The Employers considered likewise that the General Survey presented certain economic notions that did not correspond to reality, above all when dismissals were necessary for economic reasons. At times it was necessary to take immediate measures to save those jobs which could be saved. Concerning the point of view of the labour market and of experience, the simplistic idea of sharing work between those affected in the enterprise as a solution when there were problems present did not correspond to reality. Similarly, expecting that in case of justified dismissals a severance allowance should be paid (Article 12 of the Convention) constituted an example of an inadequate provision of the Convention which was unrealistic about the allocation of resources. This static image contrasted with recent changes in the market of goods and services, and was prejudicial to workers.

88. The Employers' members regretted having to take such a critical position but indicated that they had only selected a few points for illustration. The General Survey included details and interpretations which established a level of protection for workers beyond that which was provided for in the Convention. As a final analysis, the Employers concluded that this Convention was one which ought to be revised as soon as possible.

89. The Workers' members took note with great interest of the General Survey. Although job security was a crucial aspect of the right to work, governments and employers had strong reservations against establishing employment security systems.

90. The Workers' members considered that the logic of the labour market theory had inspired certain governments, under pressure from the Employers and the Bretton Woods institutions, to weaken or to consider weakening laws concerning individual or collective dismissal. At the same time, such governments reduced the protection of unemployment benefits and related social measures which would favour the workers. Following this logic, the laws and regulations concerning employment security had negative effects on employment, since the costs of dismissal dissuaded hiring and excluded necessary restructuring. The defenders of this simplistic thesis also attempted to discredit labour standards or international standards as a whole. None the less, as had been concluded in the General Survey, both the Convention and Recommendation took into account national differences, contained flexibility clauses and emphasized the right of employers to dismiss workers for recognized and valid reasons.

91. The Workers' members did not accept any of the simplistic rationalizations which were based on prejudices. The critics of national and international standards did not base their analyses on the possibilities or limitations of the standards. Neither had these critics taken into account interrelationships and balances between the different elements of the different systems of employment security. For example, it was less appropriate to criticize the length of the dismissal process if a social security system did not provide — or provided only in a limited manner — for unemployment benefits or benefits for suspension of work.

92. The Committee of Experts had further noted in paragraph 274 of the General Survey that 163 countries had established social security schemes but that only 63 of them had created unemployment benefit systems. The Workers' members confirmed that a substantial number of countries still did not have a system of unemployment benefits, in spite of it being an essential element for guaranteeing income. In addition, in many of those countries that had introduced a system, including some which had the financial resources to establish a more developed system, it was only embryonic.

93. They noted that various recent reports demonstrated the importance of standards concerning employment security for the efficient functioning of economic enterprises and of society. The General Survey of the Committee of Experts and the Report of the Director-General on the promotion of employment both underlined the positive impact of standards on employment stability, as much for employers as for workers, and for the economy in general.

94. Concerning the introductory observations of the Experts, the Workers' members drew the Committee's attention to the following three points. First, the General Survey highlighted the important role the present Committee played in the adoption of the two instruments. After examining the General Survey on Recommendation No. 119 (the old standard on the termination of employment), the Committee concluded that the Conference should elaborate a new instrument on termination of employment (paragraph 4). This Committee also believed that the promotion of employment security was an essential aspect of the right to work. Second, the Committee of Experts recalled the fundamental standards concerning the termination of employment. It emphasized that the exercise of discretionary power had disparities in consequence for the various parties concerned in the termination of a contract (paragraph 2). The termination of the contract by the employer could result in the worker and the worker's family finding themselves in a situation of insecurity and poverty, especially in periods of massive unemployment. The structural changes in the international economy and structural adjustments of national economies had important repercussions for many workers and their families. The Convention and Recommendation concerning dismissals guaranteed income protection and assistance for affected workers and their families. Lastly, there was (paragraph 16 of the General Survey) a close interdependence between the Convention and the Recommendation and various fundamental standards, e.g. the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), in particular as regards protection against anti-union discrimination, as well as discrimination in employment and occupation, envisaged in the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). Those instruments completed and reinforced the general guarantees against unjustified dismissals. The Committee of Experts highlighted the great importance of these instruments concerning collective bargaining, including the one relating to dismissals. Collective agreements, together with the lawmakers, were the engine and source of labour relations. Upon analysis of the different situations, it was clear that collective agreements reinforced and complemented the basic legislation concerning dismissals.

95. Concerning the different methods of application and scope of application, the Workers' members recalled four points:

- (i) The Convention only covered the termination of the employment relationship at the initiative of the employer and not termination at the initiative of the worker, or termination as a consequence of an agreement freely negotiated between the parties (paragraph 19 of the General Survey). However, often terminations that apparently were at the initiative of the worker or due to force majeure were in reality dismissals provoked by the employer. The Committee of Experts had called attention to these disguised dismissals (paragraph 22). National legal systems should also protect workers against these disguised dismissals.
- (ii) The Convention and the Recommendation granted national systems wide latitude to decide the methods and sources of law for the application of the provisions. None the less, both instruments established a coherent system which included, in particular, individual and collective labour contracts, the protection of wages, and the promotion of an active employment policy. The application of the Convention and the Recommendation required a system that did not limit the payment of compensatory awards in the case of either unjustified or justified dismissal (paragraph 25). Governments, employers' and workers' organizations must develop a coherent and active policy.

- (iii) The Committee of Experts rightly called attention to the principle that workers should be covered by the various provisions, subject to the flexibility clauses. The scope of application of the Convention was wide, but permitted at the same time important exceptions (paragraph 34). For the Workers' members, the erosion of protection by exploiting these exceptions must be avoided at all costs. Numerous countries had adopted, for example, provisions tending to avoid recourse to successive contracts of fixed duration. But the Workers' members felt that more countries should reinforce the mechanisms of control and sanctions to avoid abuses (paragraph 46). During the last meeting of the present Committee, an individual case was presented which illustrated clearly the importance of introducing mechanisms to avoid abuses. In that case — Spain — one-third of the workers were on temporary contracts. This by far exceeded the normal level for this type of contract, even taking into account sectors of a seasonal character such as agriculture and tourism. The Committee of Experts also was concerned over the proliferation of new varieties of contracts of fixed duration, the utilization of excessively long training periods, invoking the status of self-employed, the questioning of the presumption of contracts of indefinite duration, and the liberal and practically total use of temporary contracts in export processing zones (paragraphs 56 and 42). Above all, when there were no collective agreements, flexible measures had tended to exclude the protection of large groups of workers. The Workers' members estimated that an external flexibility, gained through excessive recourse to temporary contracts, or by reducing protection against dismissals, would impair the ability of enterprises to be innovative, and would aggravate social marginalization and poverty. The workers affected feared vulnerability due to the considerable impairment of both fundamental rights and rights relating to freedom of association. The number of temporary contracts should be limited and compensatory measures should be taken to guarantee a level of protection at least equal to that provided by the Convention and Recommendation. During the general discussion, the Employers' members drew attention to the fact that temporary contracts did not necessarily exclude protection of the right to work and to social security. A certain number of countries had instituted mechanisms for protection which were relatively efficient for temporary workers. Unfortunately, the great majority of countries had not done so, and those were precisely the countries which at times made use of this type of contract to promote employment.

- (iv) The Workers' members also emphasized the importance of in-depth consultations with workers' and employers' organizations concerning both the use of flexibility clauses and the regular revision of their application.

96. As to the obligation that dismissals be justified by a valid reason, the Workers' members emphasized that the need to justify dismissals was fundamental, indeed the cornerstone of the provisions of the Convention and Recommendation. This was evident from the preparatory work, as well as the drafting and the structure of the instruments (paragraph 76 of the General Survey). The Workers' members agreed with the Committee of Experts that a large number of countries had implicitly or explicitly introduced protection against unjustified dismissals, independently of whether they had ratified the Convention (paragraph 80). The Committee of Experts had also noted that protection against dismissal due to certain motives, as well as protection against reprisals or the protection against discrimination, had been reinforced in the last few years. There had been at least a certain parallel between national practices and the principles of the instruments. None the less, the influence of the two instruments was negligible in the national systems of numerous countries which had not introduced a general obligation to justify dismissals. Justification was a component of the dignity of the worker and was the fundamental aspect of the right of workers to defend themselves. Also, the real impact of a system of protection against termination of employment should be assessed taking into account the interdependence of the various elements: as well as the length of notice, the amount of severance allowances, social security, the social measures connected, and consultation procedures. All of these made the justification for dismissal indispensable. When workers ran the risk of incurring a penalty as great as dismissal, which could also affect their professional future, they had the right to defend themselves (paragraph 93). Furthermore, the Workers' members noted that the Recommendation completed and specified the reach of the Convention, and numerous countries had been inspired to modify, supplement, or interpret their legislation accordingly. They also referred to the protection against dismissal in case of temporary disability due to sickness or accidents, particularly in relation to persons infected with HIV and AIDS (paragraphs 136-142).

97. Referring to the procedures for dismissal, the Workers' members noted in particular the provisions of the Convention which set forth guarantees concerning defence before the decision to dismiss and the right of appeal after the decision. Allegations should be clearly formulated and presented to the worker. The possibility to defend oneself must be real. The General Survey also pointed out in paragraph 156 that certain governments and employers criticized the length and the cost of the dismissal procedures. Without being able to evaluate the procedures in each case, it was clear that a correct defence of the worker facing unjustified dismissal or suspension needed to take account in each case of the dissuasive effects of procedures and sanctions. The position of the Committee of Experts, that the protection against unjustified dismissal provided in the Convention should not be denied to workers simply because of such costs, should be upheld (paragraph 156). On the other hand, effective procedures were not necessarily costly or elaborate, rather the contrary. Many countries had introduced administrative tribunals or specialized commissions into labour relations. Access in these cases was easy, making the procedures flexible, rapid and of limited cost. At times the legislation or collective agreements had instituted assistance to workers through delegations, unions, or personal representatives. The international instruments were not the cause of high costs or complicated procedures. On the other hand, individual cases had been discussed in previous sessions in more detail concerning anti-union discrimination (Convention No. 98) in countries where there were violations of the right to freedom of association; here long procedures existed which were complex and not very comprehensible.

98. Concerning prevention and measures related to the social dimension of dismissals (Chapters V, VI and VIII), the guaranteed protection of the two instruments provided a combination of preventive measures that eliminated or reduced dismissals and reparation measures of a social character. The basic national systems of protection against dismissal had been brought into focus even though there were considerable differences regarding the methods and levels of protection and concerning the importance of the preventative and compensatory measures. The Workers' members firmly underlined the strategic importance of the principle of prevention of individual and collective dismissals. The Committee of Experts often recalled this principle, for example in paragraph 320. Only in the last instance should recourse to dismissals be used to resolve problems. The Convention foresaw that every other measure possible should be considered first to avoid dismissals. Without over-generalizing, it could be said that enterprises increasingly practised the inverse policy. In such enterprises dismissals were conducted in a preventive manner (anticipated dismissals) with the object of preserving higher profits or distributing large dividends to stockholders. At the same time, the enterprises wanted to limit the length of advance notice and reduce the level of contribution to the system of unemployment benefits. These trends ran the risk of provoking an unprecedented proliferation of marginalization and poverty. This was true for all countries, regions, sectors and occupations facing important restructuring as a consequence of both the globalization of the economy and technological changes. The opposite policy, one of prevention guaranteeing social measures of reparation as well as a certain level of income and retraining of workers who were in danger of losing their jobs, or who already had lost their jobs, was more realistic. Collective bargaining and consultation were excellent measures to prevent dismissals or to counteract the social costs. None the less, recourse should be made to these tools before the decision to dismiss is taken. The public authorities also had an important role to carry out by supporting placement services for workers, mediating, financing and co-financing guarantees of wages, etc. The General Survey mentioned good examples of national legislation and national collective agreements which provided measures for prevention, reparation and relocation of workers. The Workers' members referred in particular to provisions made for previous notice, internal relocation, relocation in a subsidiary or related enterprise, work sharing, reducing work hours, partial unemployment, early retirement, etc.

99. Concerning the difficulties of application and the prospects for ratification, the Committee of Experts concluded its General Survey by stating that the two instruments were as relevant now as ever before (paragraph 371). The Workers' members completely shared this point of view, above all because no points in need of revision had been identified. Employment security, as set forth in the Convention, did not impede adaptation, for either enterprises or the labour market. The absence of ratifications was due instead to particular situations at the national level, or from misunderstanding of the Convention. Ratification was not an impossible social objective and there were real prospects for ratification. As the Committee of Experts stated in paragraph 350, general surveys often became reference instruments. It should be stressed again that governments must respond to the questionnaires and provide information on the practical application.

100. Lastly, the Workers' members again emphasized that the relevance of the two instruments also illustrated that their impact had not diminished in the context of globalization of the economy, of restructuring of numerous sectors everywhere and of structural adjustments (paragraph 372). The advantages of fair regulation of the labour market had been underestimated. Security of employment stimulated enterprises to invest in the skills and the development of workers. Consequently, the enterprises reinforced their capacity for innovation and productivity, and for internal adaptability. The workers, for their part, were able to contribute to the development of the enterprise when they felt really involved. This constructive activity would result particularly when wages and stability of employment were guaranteed. These instruments also preserved the right of employers to dismiss. In this context the Workers' members concurred with the conclusions of the Committee of Experts that flexibility and stability were mutually interdependent (paragraph 379). The right to work and labour law were reconcilable. Both were essential to promote social progress (paragraph 382). The Workers' members believed that the Convention and the Recommendation also had a place in the Programme of Action and the Declaration concluded during the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen.

101. The discussion that followed after the presentation from the spokespersons for the Employers and Workers centred around several subjects essentially concerning the content and value of the General Survey, the flexibility or rigidity of the provisions of the Convention, and their current relevance in the context of challenges which have resulted from economic globalization and increased competition, as well as prospects for the ratification of the Convention. Numerous members took into account the national legislation and practice of their countries concerning protection against unjustified dismissal.

102. A large number of Committee members noted the quality of the General Survey and underscored its importance. The Government member of South Africa stated that the transitional Constitution currently in force protected workers against unfair labour practices. This protection was the result of jurisprudence which, since the early 1980s, has been inspired by ILO instruments on unfair dismissal. The General Survey, which provides a bridge between the general terms of the Convention and the specific language of domestic law, would play an important role as a source of interpretation for tribunals in the application of national legislative provisions. The General Survey will help in the future development of jurisprudence concerning protection against unjustified dismissal.

He noted that currently his country had a complaints-based system which was moving towards codification in relation to protection against unjustified dismissal, and that the General Survey would be of great use in this process. In addition, the General Survey facilitated comprehension of the provisions of the Convention and helped governments in better understanding the consequences of ratification and in identifying the possible obstacles in domestic law. With reference to the General Survey's final remarks in which the Committee of Experts noted that flexibility and stability were mutually interdependent, he believed that the discussion on the General Survey should focus more on the issue of whether the Convention and its reflection in domestic law established an appropriate balance between efficiency on the one hand and fairness on the other. The Workers' member of Germany shared this view of the General Survey, which could serve in particular as a guide to national legislation and jurisprudence and which made a significant contribution to accelerate the application in practice of the Convention at the national level. The Workers' member of New Zealand likewise believed that the General Survey could play a useful role in focusing the attention of countries which had not yet ratified the Convention on the different issues raised, and in providing the discussion among tripartite parties with the examples of measures taken by different countries. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic noted the interest raised by the General Survey, notably, by the manner in which it dealt in detail with many topics, such as periods of notice and dismissal for technical or similar reasons. The Employers' member of Turkey also underscored the quality of the General Survey and the Workers' member of China recommended that it should be read as a comparative analysis of domestic laws and practices.

103. The Government member of Portugal noted the special interest which the General Survey presented given the extent of worldwide unemployment and the need to assess employment promotion policies. He believed that it would be helpful to have more information concerning the law and practice in 24 States which have ratified the Convention and the effect that employment protection had on the labour market as well as, in a very general manner, a comparison of the changes in employment in countries which protect workers against dismissal and in those which have reduced their systems of protection.

104. The Workers' member of Greece referred to the interventions from the Employers' members, and in particular, to paragraphs 60, 93, 117, 137 and 138 of the General Survey, and stressed that the matters dealt with in these paragraphs were not obligations. With regard to paragraphs 117 and 138, the Committee of Experts only expressed the desire for additional protection for certain victims of reprisals and where the period of absence from work because of illness or work-related injuries could be extended without any further obligations. Consequently, the pretext that Convention No. 158 was too restrictive and rigid was not a justified argument for not ratifying the Convention and applying the Recommendation, given the concessions made in 1982 and the language of the text adopted.

105. Some members of the Committee placed the General Survey in the context of the discussion on supervisory procedures and made certain suggestions. The Government member of Denmark believed that the general themes for discussion in the General Survey, which focused on individual Conventions, contributed to a better understanding of the implementation of the Conventions in different countries. This applied to the countries which had ratified the Convention as well as to those countries which had not ratified the Convention and which thus received the request for reports that gave rise to the present opportunity for discussion. She believed that the purpose of the reporting system was for Members to examine the reasons why a specific Convention could not be ratified. Awareness of these reasons probably would contribute more to achieving the objectives of the Convention than the discussion of individual cases, which were often specific to one country. The Government member of Germany believed that the General Survey provided very interesting comparisons of legal points of view among the practices of different member States. He recalled that during discussions in 1994 on the reform of the standard-setting work of the ILO, certain delegates made it known that the General Survey should be better used to detect the weakest links in the chain so that one could identify where intervention and alteration were required. This year's General Survey partly replied to this expectation, particularly Chapter VIII which highlighted the difficulties of certain countries with implementation. However, the report provided a selective approach as there was no systematic examination of problems which countries experienced.

106. The members of the Committee discussed the opportunity to adopt international standards on dismissal in the form of a Convention, as well as the timeliness of this topic and the prospects for ratification.

107. According to a Government member of the United States, who recalled the discussions on the adoption of Convention No. 158 and Recommendation No. 166, the effectiveness of these instruments should be measured against the original objectives to improve stability and quality of employment, to strengthen the system of protection against unjustified dismissal, and to discourage unwarranted governmental interventions in areas best left to private decision-making. In his view, superimposing a detailed, obligatory, and binding Convention on an unsettled and emerging topic had proven much less desirable than a promotional, principled instrument in a field simply not ripe for codification. He recalled the adoption, by consensus, of a United States amendment to insert the word "alone" in Article 9.2, which preserved an evenhandedness between employers and workers in proceeding with the burden of proof at various stages as an example of necessary reconciliation when conflicting details emerge in hotly disputed subject areas.

108. Several Workers' members intervened during the discussion to refute the arguments that the instruments under examination restricted the employers' freedom to end an employment relationship and due to this rigidity increased labour costs and resulted in inefficiency. In this regard, the Workers' member of Iceland noted that the principal standards set in the Convention were closely linked with the universal principle of due process and stressed the importance of the general principle contained in Article 4 of the Convention providing that any termination of employment must be based on a valid reason. The Workers' member of Singapore stressed that the provisions of the Convention did not present obstacles to the termination of employment, but rather prevented employers' abuse of this right and eliminated arbitrariness. She noted that the provisions do not restrict the employers' right to dismiss an employee for reasons such as those necessitated by operational requirements. The Workers' members of Spain and Greece also noted the Convention's flexibility; as a result of compromise, the Convention established a minimum balance between the employer and worker and based certain obligations on common sense.

109. The Employers' member of Turkey stated that nobody could negate the importance of the protection of workers in cases of termination of employment contracts, particularly in a period of massive unemployment. Many countries, irrespective of their level of development, were confronted presently with difficult economic conditions, high inflation, increased unemployment and low economic growth. The creation of new employment and the protection of workers in existing employment was of primary importance in such conditions, which was the aim of the instruments under examination.

110. Certain other Workers' members, including those of India and Pakistan, referred to economic globalization, policies of economic liberalization and structural adjustment, and the flexibility of the labour market. In this regard, the Workers' member of Nepal noted that the policies imposed by certain international financial institutions, had created in many developing countries problems in the legislation concerning export processing zones, job mobility, and anti-union policies which benefited the process of economic liberalization and structural adjustment policies. The Workers' members of China and India believed that it was necessary to oppose the pressure to reduce or eliminate protection against unjustified dismissal in aid of requirements of productivity and competitiveness. The Workers' member of Guatemala stated that, given the neo-liberal economic model's attempt to subject labour law to the rules of the market, it was vital to develop, reaffirm and apply effectively the instruments protecting workers against unjustified dismissals. The Workers' member of New Zealand referred to paragraph 379 of the General Survey which states that appropriate protection against unjustified dismissal is in principle not inconsistent with new forms of employment relations that allow enterprises to adjust their human resources to the changing economic environment. She believed that these two elements could be reconciled if adequate provisions existed or if appropriate measures were taken to help workers during the transition period with financial support, training and assistance in finding jobs. This required an active role for the State in the management of the labour market. She referred to the obligation of consultation set forth in the instruments as well as the interventions from the Employers' members on this subject. She believed that there was evidence that enterprises that respected this provision concerning consultation, far from being disadvantaged in the highly competitive economic environment, were able to make adjustments more effectively and with less disruption to production. She cited as examples two of the most competitive countries economically, which simultaneously had a high level of job security and protection against unjustified dismissal. In this regard, the Workers' member of Singapore believed that the measures suggested by the Recommendation, such as redeployment, reduced working hours, training, retraining and priority of rehiring, were not impossible to implement in practice with proper planning and would be expected of responsible employers.

111. In the context of deregulation and precarious employment, the Workers' member of France drew attention to the proliferation of fixed-term contracts, which, instead of encouraging recruitment, tended to make employment more precarious. Expressing the same concerns, the Workers' member of Guatemala believed that such forms of contracts threatened the right to work and freedom of association. Several other Workers' members also referred to the practice of subcontracting and voluntary retirement as a form of disguised dismissal, as well as the proliferation of contract work, casual employment and probationary periods. Several Workers' members referred to employment stability as a factor of social stability, as much inside enterprises as in society in general. The Workers' member of France believed that the ratification of the Convention was not an obstacle to the smooth running of enterprises, but rather ensured certain stability. According to the Workers' member of Pakistan, the principles of the Convention left workers with a sense of security which in turn led to a sense of participation in the enterprise which then generated team spirit which benefited productivity. The Workers' member of Guinea highlighted the deregulation trend in African countries and estimated that each job kept or created was an essential element in the quest for social balance.

112. The Government member of Portugal highlighted the General Survey's observation of the positive effects of employment stability, on social peace and investment in human capital by enterprises, while noting that such stability does not facilitate the awareness of workers and their trade unions of the need for internal flexibility.

113. The Employers' member of Panama believed that dismissal, whether justified or unjustified, represented a waste of resources by an enterprise. A detailed regulation concerning dismissal was not the best solution to the problem, which was caused by inadequate knowledge about the rights and obligations of workers as well as employers.

114. With respect to the prospects for ratification, a number of Committee members indicated the reasons why they believed that the Convention could not be ratified — be it for the considerations connected to the employment relationship, inflexibility for or non-compliance of the national legislation with the Convention. Other members wished for a greater number of ratifications. The Government member of Denmark noted that in her country dismissal was governed by collective agreements, which were to a large extent in conformity with the Convention. She also noted that, however, there was no protection for workers not covered by collective agreements, while the Government preferred to leave the highest possible level of responsibility to the social partners. The Government member of Germany believed that, if the General Survey had dispelled the concerns of governments, it also proposed new a interpretation of the terms of the Convention which again raised obstacles to ratification.

115. The Employers' member of Panama recalled that in Latin America labour legislation contained detailed regulations on dismissal and as examples cited Brazil and Venezuela, which had ratified the Convention. He also discouraged the ratification of Conventions that were too detailed.

116. On the contrary, the Employers' member of Turkey hoped that the ratification of the Convention would be promoted and that measures to revitalize the national economy and organize restructuring which could be taken by member States would respect the principle of employment stability with the need for flexibility. He expressed this hope while noting that the Convention was very detailed and that only the general principles should be retained in an international instrument to permit ratification. The Workers' member of Greece was disappointed with the meagre level of ratification, and the Workers' member of Germany believed that governments should actively intervene to eliminate national obstacles to ratification. The Government member of Portugal and the Workers' member of Colombia shared the hope of the Committee of Experts that new States would be able to ratify the Convention in the relatively near future.

117. Several members of the Committee described the situation concerning employment security in their countries, while highlighting different aspects of this protection from the perspective of the standards contained in the Convention or while criticizing the situation in their countries. The Government member of Namibia believed that it was difficult to define the concept of unfair dismissal. The Government member of Lebanon indicated that the provisions of the Labour Code were in conformity with most of the provisions of the Convention. The Workers' member of New Zealand described in a detailed manner the situation concerning dismissal resulting from the adoption of the Employment Contracts Act of 1991. She indicated that the situation in her country represented an extreme amongst developed nations in terms of its open and deregulated economy and labour markets. In this respect, the Government member of New Zealand contended that since the adoption of the Act all workers had access to procedures against unjustified dismissal. With reference to invalid reasons for dismissal set forth in the instruments which were the subjects of the General Survey, the Government members of Denmark and Portugal and the Workers' member of Iceland indicated that in their countries there existed statutory provisions protecting workers against dismissal on the grounds of pregnancy and maternity. The Government member of Portugal highlighted in particular the difficulty of protecting women workers against dismissals on the grounds of pregnancy in cases of fixed-term contracts. In this respect, he noted the reference in the General Survey to a decision of the Constitutional Court in Spain which held that the failure to renew a temporary contract due to pregnancy constituted discrimination based on sex. A number of Workers' members referred to the need to protect workers against dismissal on the grounds of trade union participation or trade union activities. The Workers' member of Iceland was disappointed over the absence in the national legislation of his country of provisions prohibiting dismissal based on certain other specific reasons listed under Article 5 of the Convention. The Workers' member of Greece noted with interest that the General Survey dealt with the difficult situation of handicapped workers, who were a vulnerable category of people often insufficiently protected by society.

118. Some members dealt with the dismissal procedures in force in their countries, as well as the legal recourse available to workers. The Government member of Bangladesh described the numerous legal procedures detailed in the legislation of his country, particularly the law applicable in the case of worker misconduct. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic referred to the requirement of written notice to the worker in the case of allegations of misconduct as well as the mandatory administrative authorization prior to dismissal. The Workers' member of France noted that his country had in 1986 ended the administrative authorization required prior to dismissal, and the promise to create new jobs was not kept: instead the number of dismissals had risen. The Workers' member of China stressed that dismissal procedures should provide the minimum safeguards of consultation and notice and indicated that in his country the period of notice to terminate was 30 days.

Final remarks

119. The Workers' members welcomed the many interesting contributions to the discussion on the General Survey. They found particularly interesting the Government members' interventions revealing, in diverse ways, the situations in their respective countries. They also considered that these contributions were especially helpful in the sense that they brought practical and constructive experience to bear on the subject-matter. They concurred with the Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic, who indicated that the General Survey provided explanations and salient clarifications concerning the terms of the Convention. Furthermore, they considered that while ratifications were important, they were not the be-all and end-all. They shared the opinion of the Government member of South Africa, who indicated that the value of a Convention was in institutionalizing fundamental principles and that, although Convention No.158 had not been ratified, it had inspired the jurisprudence in his country. The Workers' members noted that the Employers' members, on the other hand, believed that in an increasingly competitive world costs had to be constantly reduced in order to compete in a global market. The Workers' members believed that if there was so much belief in this global market, there should be belief no less firm in global standards. They concluded by indicating that the general idea contained in the General Survey, which must be insisted on, was that employment stability was beneficial as much as for capital investment as for workers' skills and provided an incentive for social peace. The primary aim therefore was to avoid dismissals. They hoped that the employers would henceforth talk about hiring and not about more dismissals.

120. The Employers' members understood that, while Article 2(2) of Convention No. 158 permitted, in certain circumstances, the exclusion of contracts for a specified period of time from the effects of the Convention, Article 2(3) restricted this possibility to the effect that, where appropriate, such contracts should not be used or invoked to circumvent the protection arising from the Convention. It was always difficult to determine whether a contract for a specified period of time had this characteristic solely to avoid this protection. Moreover, due to the interpretation of the Committee of Experts, this exception was extended even further, leaving very little of the original principle which allowed such limited contracts to be excluded from the scope of application of the Convention. They did not agree with the Workers' members that ILO standards had a stabilizing effect on employment. They believed that if such reasoning were to be applied in the context of Convention No. 158 the argument would be very weak, since only 24 countries had ratified. Even in those countries, there were considerable doubts as to whether the provisions of the Convention could actually be implemented. The Employers' members considered that it was naive to assert that the protection against unjustified dismissal, such as that provided in Convention No. 158, was something positive for undertakings and employers. If this were true, then employers did not need any regulations because they would voluntarily adopt behaviour in line with the Convention. Moreover, the Employers' members believed that, while the concept of universality of the ILO's standards was important, it was not entirely in line with reality, since there was such a low level of ratifications, as was the case for Convention No. 158. The ILO's mission was not to enable only a small number of countries to ratify the Conventions. These countries were certainly capable on their own of regulating these matters. Moreover, the Employers' members were disappointed that a large number of countries, mostly developing countries, had not actively participated in the drafting of the Conventions and consequently could not comply with the Conventions. Finally, the Employers' members highlighted that the world had undergone profound and radical changes since the adoption of this Convention and suggested that the appropriate conclusions had to be drawn from this when it came to framing labour legislation. If the ILO failed to learn the necessary lessons from the changed circumstances, then the discrepancy between standards and the real world would become wider and wider.

E. Compliance with specific obligations

121. The Committee decided that, in examining individual cases relating to compliance by States with their obligations under or relating to international labour standards, it would apply the same working methods and criteria as last year, as amended or clarified in 1980 and 1987.

122. In applying those methods, the Committee decided, on the proposal of the Workers' members supported by the Employers' members, to invite all governments concerned by the comments in paragraphs 91 (compliance with reporting obligations), 97 (supply of first reports), 101 (lack of reply to comments of the supervisory bodies), 126 (special problems relating to submission) and 132 (lack of reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations) of the Committee of Experts' report to supply information to the Committee in one half-day sitting to be devoted to those cases. The Committee considered that this approach should in no sense be understood by governments as dispensing them from the need to take part in the Committee's discussions.

Submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities

123. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee considered the manner in which effect is given to article 19, paragraphs 5 to 7, of the ILO Constitution. These provisions require member States within 12, or exceptionally 18, months of the closing of each session of the Conference to submit the Conventions and Recommendations adopted at that session to the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action, and to inform the Director-General of the ILO of the measures taken to that end, with particulars of the authority or authorities regarded as competent.

124. The Committee noted from the report of the Committee of Experts (paragraph 119) that considerable efforts to fulfil the submission obligation had been made in certain States, namely: Belize, Benin, Israel, Swaziland.

125. The Committee was informed by various other States of measures taken to bring Conventions and Recommendations before the competent national authorities. It welcomed the progress achieved and expressed the hope that there would be further improvements in States that still experience difficulties in complying with their obligations.

Failure to submit

126. The Committee noted with regret from paragraph 126 of the Committee of Experts' report that no indication was available that steps had been taken in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution to submit the Conventions and Recommendations adopted between 1986 and 1992 by the 72nd to 79th Sessions of the Conference³ to the competent authorities, in the cases of Algeria, Central African Republic, Djibouti, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guinea, Haiti, Jamaica, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Mozambique, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Saint Lucia, Seychelles, Solomon Islands, United Republic of Tanzania, Trinidad and Tobago, Zaire.

Supply of reports on ratified Conventions

127. In Part B of this report (General questions relating to international labour standards) the Committee has considered amongst other things the fulfilment by States of their obligation to report on the application of ratified Conventions. By the date of the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the percentage of reports received was 68.7, which is the highest for four years. Since then, further reports have been received, bringing the figure to 82 per cent (as compared with 77.2 per cent in June 1994, 75.8 per cent in June 1993 and 76.8 per cent in June 1992). This year, the Committee of Experts noted that some 62.5 per cent of the reports on Conventions for which information on practical application was requested contained such information, compared with 67 per cent in 1994 and 56 per cent in 1993. The Committee emphasizes the importance of sending practical information, without which it is impossible to know if a Convention is actually being applied. The Committee joins the Committee of Experts in appealing to governments to make every effort to include the necessary information in future reports.

Failure to supply reports and information on the application of ratified Conventions

128. The Committee noted with regret that no reports on ratified Conventions had been supplied for two years or more by the following States: Albania, Burundi, Chad, Equatorial Guinea, Haiti, Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Zaire.

³ The Conference did not adopt any Recommendations or Conventions at its 73rd Session (June 1987).

129. The Committee also noted with regret that no first reports due since 1992 on the following ratified Conventions had been supplied by Guinea (Convention No. 133), Liberia (Convention No. 133), Nigeria (Convention No. 133); or since 1993 by Luxembourg (Conventions Nos. 53, 68, 69, 73, 74, 92, 108, 147, 166) or Yemen (Convention No. 159). It stressed the special importance of first reports, on which the Committee of Experts bases its first evaluation of compliance with ratified Conventions.

130. In this year's report, the Committee of Experts noted that 35 governments had not communicated replies to most or any of the observations and direct requests relating to Conventions on which reports were due for examination this year, involving a total of 337 cases (compared with 354 cases last year and 318 two years ago). The Committee was informed that, since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, 21 of the governments concerned had sent replies, which would be examined by the Committee of Experts next year.

131. The Committee noted with regret that no information had yet been received regarding any or most of the observations and direct requests of the Committee of Experts to which replies were requested for the period ending 30 June 1994 from the following countries: Angola, Burundi, Central African Republic, Chad, Denmark (Greenland), Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Ghana, Haiti, Kuwait, Liberia, Madagascar, Mongolia, Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Yemen, Zaire.

132. The Committee noted the explanations provided by the Governments of the following countries concerning difficulties encountered in discharging their obligations: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Denmark, Ecuador, Ghana, Guinea, Haiti, Kuwait, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Mozambique, Nigeria, Papua New Guinea, Trinidad and Tobago.

133. The Committee stressed that the obligation to transmit reports is the basis of the supervisory system. It requests the Director-General to adopt all possible measures to improve the situation and solve the problems referred to above as quickly as possible. It expressed the hope in particular that the multidisciplinary teams would give top priority in their work in the field to the fulfilment of standards-related obligations. The Committee also bore in mind the new reporting arrangements approved by the Governing Body in November 1993, which will come into operation from this year.

Application of ratified Conventions

134. The Committee noted with particular interest the steps taken by a number of governments to ensure compliance with ratified Conventions. The Committee of Experts listed in paragraph 107 of its report new cases in which governments had made changes to their law and practice following comments it had made as to the degree of conformity of national legislation or practice with the provisions of a ratified Convention. There were 36 such cases, relating to 22 States and three non-metropolitan territories in all regions of the world; 2,070 cases of progress have been recorded since the Committee of Experts began listing them in 1964. These results are tangible proof of the effectiveness of the supervisory system.

135. At its present session, the Committee was informed of other instances in which measures had recently been or were about to be taken by governments with a view to ensuring the implementation of ratified Conventions. While it is for the Committee of Experts to examine these measures, the present Committee welcomes them as fresh evidence of the efforts made by governments to comply with their international obligations and to act upon the comments of the supervisory bodies.

136. The Committee thought it appropriate to draw the attention of the Conference to various important cases which it had to consider.

Cases of progress

137. The Committee noted with satisfaction that in a number of cases — including many involving basic human rights — governments have introduced changes in their law and practice in order to eliminate divergencies previously discussed by the Committee. It considers highlighting these cases, a positive approach towards influencing governments to respond to comments of the supervisory bodies. In this respect, it refers to the report of the Committee of Experts and the discussion of individual cases which appears in Part Two of this report.

Special cases

138. The Committee considered it appropriate to draw the attention of the Conference to its discussions of the cases mentioned in the following paragraphs, a full record of which appears in Part Two of this report.

139. As regards the application by Myanmar of Convention No. 29, the Committee took note of the statement made by the Government representative that measures were under way for amending the Village Act and Towns Act which contained provisions contravening Convention No. 29. It recalled that the Government had been told about this for nearly 30 years. It also recalled the adoption in 1994, by the Governing Body, of the recommendations of its tripartite Committee for the repeal of the offensive provisions. The Committee could not find a way to agree with the position of the Government, as reported to the Committee of Experts, that what was being alleged to be forced labour was actually voluntary labour. The Committee further recalled the report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on human rights in Myanmar and deprecated a situation in Myanmar as reflected in this report. In these circumstances, the Committee called upon the Government to urgently repeal the offensive legal provisions under the Village Act and the Towns Act to bring them into line with the letter and spirit of Convention No. 29, to terminate forced labour practices on the ground, to provide for and award exemplary penalties against those exacting forced labour, and to furnish a detailed report to the Committee of Experts on legislative and practical measures adopted to fall in line with Convention No. 29.

140. As regards the application by Myanmar of Convention No. 87, the Committee took note of the statement of the Government representative indicating his Government's commitment to harmonize law and practice with Convention No. 87. The Committee, however, felt serious concern that the Government had not acted on the observations of the Committee of Experts over many years despite mention of the matter in special paragraphs twice over, and that no trade unions in the true sense of the term existed. The Committee urged the Government to adopt, as a matter of urgency, the necessary measures to guarantee that in law and in practice workers and employers had the right to join organizations of their own choice and without previous authorization outside the existing structure, and that such organizations had the right to join federations and confederations and to affiliate with international organizations without impediment. The Committee expressed the firm hope that it would be in a position to register concrete and substantial progress in the application of the Convention in law and in practice, in the near future, considering the assistance of the ILO mission which had already taken place and it requested the Government to send a detailed report to the Committee of Experts about further developments on the matter. The Committee noted that a further request might be made for ILO technical assistance by the Myanmar Government, but it would leave the question of whether an ILO mission would be appropriate, and the timing of such a mission, to the Office.

141. As regards the application by Nigeria of Convention No. 87, the Committee took note of the statement of the Government representative of Nigeria. The Committee noted that though Nigeria ratified Convention No. 87 35 years back, there was considerable discrepancy between de jure and de facto conformity to the Convention. The Committee of Experts had also pointed out fundamental deviations in the national laws from the Convention. Legal stipulation for a single trade union system and governmental interference in the structuring of trade unions were matters of serious concern. The clarification of the Government representative that the Subcommittee of the National Labour Advisory Council was reviewing labour laws, was of a routine nature. The Committee further recalled the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association regarding replacement of officers of certain unions of workers by government administrators and considered this governmental act to be a flagrant violation of Convention No. 87. The Committee therefore urgently demanded the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the legislation and practice into conformity with Convention No. 87, to repeal the decrees dissolving unions issued in 1994 and to restore to the organizations concerned the right to elect their representatives in full freedom without any interference from the public authorities. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the Committee of Experts would be able to note significant progress of these matters in the very near future.

142. The Committee trusts that the governments concerned will take all measures necessary to correct the deficiencies noted and invites them to consider appropriate forms of ILO assistance, including direct contacts, to ensure that real progress is achieved by next year in the observance of their obligations under the ILO Constitution and the Conventions in question.

Continued failure to implement

143. The Committee recalls that its working methods provide for the listing of cases of continued failure over several years to eliminate serious deficiencies, previously discussed, in the application of ratified Conventions. This year the Committee made no mention in this respect.

144. The governments of the countries to which reference is made in paragraphs 139, 140 and 141 are invited to supply the relevant reports and information to enable the Committee to follow up the above-mentioned matters at the next session of the Conference.

Supply of reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations

145. The Committee notes that 202 of the 315 article 19 reports requested on Convention No. 158 and Recommendation No. 166 were received at the time of the Committee of Experts' meeting, and a further five since, making 65.7 per cent in all.

146. The Committee noted with regret that over the past five years none of the reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations requested under article 19 of the Constitution had been supplied by the following: Afghanistan, Albania, Antigua and Barbuda, El Salvador, Haiti, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mongolia, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Saint Lucia, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Venezuela, Yemen.

Communication of copies of reports to workers' and employers' organizations

147. Once again this year, the Committee did not have to apply the criterion "The government has failed during the past three years to indicate the representative organizations of employers and workers to which, in accordance with article 23(2) of the Constitution, copies of reports and information supplied to the ILO under articles 19 and 22 have been communicated".

Participation in the work of the Committee

148. The Committee wishes to express its gratitude to the 46 governments which collaborated by providing information on the situation in their countries and participating in the discussions of their individual cases.

149. The Committee regrets that, despite the invitations, the Governments of the following States failed to take part in the discussions concerning their countries' fulfilment of their constitutional obligations to report: Albania, Burundi, Central African Republic, Chad, El Salvador, Jamaica, Luxembourg, Mongolia, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, United Republic of Tanzania, Venezuela, Yemen, Zaire. It decided to mention the cases of these States in the appropriate paragraphs of its report and to inform them in accordance with the usual practice.

150. The Committee notes with regret that the Governments of the States which were not or were no longer represented at the Conference, namely Antigua and Barbuda, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Liberia, Saint Lucia, Solomon Islands, Somalia, were unable to participate in the Committee's examination of the cases relating to them. It decided to mention these countries in the appropriate paragraphs of this report and to inform the governments, in accordance with the usual practice.

151. Important questions of principle were discussed in the Committee, and there were some complex and even grave cases. But the spirit of the Committee was unfailingly constructive and the debates took place in good faith. All of this renews hope that solutions acceptable to all can be found. It should always be remembered that the legal instruments which it is the job of the supervisory bodies to see applied lead to the protection of the liberty, dignity and living conditions — even the life itself — of men, women and children everywhere.

152. The Committee noted that its discussions this year had shown there was consensus rather than conflict on many subjects: the place of the ILO in the international community in defending and promoting its principles and standards, the value of the supervisory processes, the complementary role of the Organization's technical cooperation activities, the undiminished need for vigilance and vigour in protecting and reclaiming basic human rights. In a world where security is generally less under threat from outside national borders than from within — both from the violation of human rights and from the fear and the reality of poverty and underdevelopment — it is in the final analysis by social progress that States and societies are to be judged.

PART TWO

OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING PARTICULAR COUNTRIES

I. OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING REPORTS ON RATIFIED CONVENTIONS (ARTICLE 22 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. General Observations and Information concerning Certain Countries

(a) Failure to supply reports on the application of ratified Conventions

The Employers' members noted that a dozen member States were listed under this paragraph but only Haiti, which had had many problems in the past, had provided an explanation. He hoped that in the future Haiti would meet its obligation to supply reports. The other member States would be mentioned in two places in the report, firstly for failing to supply the reports, and secondly because they had failed to attend the meeting of this Committee despite repeated invitations. They also intended to make this point in a statement to the plenary session of the Conference, which might help to improve the situation in the future.

The Workers' members indicated that they were fully in agreement with the statements of the Employers' members and emphasized that, in effect, non-compliance with this obligation rendered supervision impossible and could result in a blockage of the system. He indicated that if there were only 12 countries on the list it was because only countries that had not sent reports for the last two years were invited. They emphasized that in this paragraph the Committee of Experts mentioned 43 Governments rather than the 50 that were mentioned last year, which amounted to an improvement. However, he considered that this number was still too high in view of the importance of this obligation. Finally, he stressed the importance of requesting that these countries make a greater effort to fulfil the obligation.

A Government representative of Haiti stated that he shared the concern of the members of the Committee of Experts. However, it was the unusual situation that his country had experienced that had prevented it from fulfilling its obligations, rather than indifference or a lack of consideration on its part. He pointed out that as a result of the overthrow of President Aristide in October 1994 Parliament was dissolved, and the three years of havoc caused by the military had left his Government with much to reorganize. The Government was also hindered in this respect by the preparation of the next elections.

The Employers' members were in full agreement with the points made by the Workers' members. In some cases reports were submitted that did not provide any real information on either the law or practice in the country. In other cases reports were sent which did not actually provide the answer requested by the Committee of Experts. In both cases it was impossible to make a factual and realistic assessment of the situation, in the absence of which there could be no supervisory activity. For this reason they attached great importance to the fulfilment by governments of this obligation. They considered that 337 cases of non-compliance with this obligation was a frightening figure.

The Workers' members were entirely in agreement with the comments made by the Employers' members, and emphasized that separate reference should be made in the general part of the report of the Committee to the governments that had been invited but were absent from this meeting.

The Committee recalled the fundamental importance of the supply of reports on the application of ratified Conventions, not just of their supply as such, but of doing so within the stipulated time-limit. This obligation constituted the foundations of the supervisory system, and the Committee expressed its firm hope that the Governments of Albania, Burundi, Chad, Equatorial Guinea, Haiti, Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Solomon Islands, Somalia and Zaire, which had not to date submitted reports on the application of ratified Conventions, would do so as soon as possible and decided to mention these cases in the appropriate section of its General Report.

(b) Failure to supply first reports on the application of ratified Conventions

The Employers' members noted that following compliance with the obligation to submit newly adopted Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities, a decision was then to be made as to whether or not to ratify. The next obligation was to supply reports on the application of Conventions at regular intervals under article 22 of the Constitution. The first report was particularly important because only then was it possible to ascertain whether the situation in the member State was in compliance with the requirements of the Convention, and for this reason the supervisory bodies attached a great deal of importance to punctual and scrupulous compliance with this obligation. A too lengthy time period between ratification and the first report would result in an unrealistic evaluation, as the facts would no longer be reflected properly in the report.

The Workers' members were in full agreement with the statement of the Employers' members.

A Government representative of Guinea stated that his Government had taken note of the comments made by the Committee of Experts and assured this Committee that in the next report all the necessary replies would be provided. He added that since 1981 his Government had regularly prepared reports on this Convention, but was unaware that it was obliged to send a first report on Convention No. 133 for submission only in 1993. In this respect he stated that once his Government had received the information correctly it would prepare a detailed report as required by the Committee of Experts.

A Government representative of Nigeria apologized on behalf of his Government for its inability to submit a first report on the Accommodation of Crews (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1970 (No. 133), but pointed out that after having ratified 30 Conventions this was the only one for which a first report had not yet been submitted by his Government. The delay was due to the complex technical details required in the report. An interministerial tripartite committee had been established to monitor and compile the report, and once completed it would be given to the National Labour Advisory Council for consideration and approval and then submitted to the Office.

The Workers' members noted that of the five countries on the list three were absent from the Committee. With regard to the statement and explanation of the Government representative of Nigeria, they noted that last year before the Committee, the Government representative had stated that efforts would be made to send a report prior to the next session of the Committee of Experts. They asked for clarification as to why this promise had not been kept when everything seemed to have been dealt with at that time. In order to improve the situation, it was important that the Government be more precise in its reasons for not sending the first report.

The Employers' members said that regular reporting on ratified Conventions under article 22 of the Constitution was the very basis for the existence of this Committee, because without reports no supervision was possible. It was this supervisory system, which was regarded as effective, that made the ILO unique among other international organizations. Every year they noted that a large number of States failed to supply reports, and that sometimes countries failed to supply the reports due for two or more years in succession. If this were permitted to continue, it would detract from the credibility of the supervisory system, so it was of paramount importance that compliance with this obligation be examined to determine the reasons for failure to supply reports. They concluded by insisting most emphatically that countries refrain from failing to supply reports.

The Committee noted the information and explanations given by the Government representatives who took the floor. It reiterated the crucial importance of submitting first reports on the application of ratified Conventions.

The Committee decided to mention these cases: namely, Guinea (for Convention No. 133), Liberia (for Convention No. 133), Luxembourg (for Conventions Nos. 53, 68, 69, 73, 74, 92, 108, 147, 166), Nigeria (for Convention 133) and Yemen (for Convention No. 159) in the appropriate section of the General Report.

(c) Failure to supply information in reply to comments made by the Committee of Experts

The Workers' members indicated that there were only 20 countries on the list of countries that had not complied with this obligation, whereas the Committee of Experts referred to 337 cases in respect of which no responses or only incomplete ones had been received. Considering that the sending of clear and complete reports was a requirement of the Experts and was one of the key elements of examination and dialogue, they emphasized the importance of insisting that governments comply with this requirement, and of suggesting that they ask for assistance from the Office when necessary.

The Employers' members fully agreed with the points made by the Workers' members that a report which did not provide any concrete information on the law and practice of the country made it impossible to give a conclusive assessment of the situation. The figure of 337 cases pointed out in the report of the Committee of Experts, which was a frighteningly large number, left room for reflection.

A Government representative of Angola recognized that his Government had failed to supply two of the seven reports due, but emphasized that the five that had been submitted had been the fruit of a very considerable effort due to the lack of competent personnel. He undertook to submit the missing reports before the next session of the Conference and pointed out that some of the points raised by the Experts had already been dealt with through new legislative measures that had just been adopted.

A Government representative of Denmark, intervening for Greenland, recalled the special relationship between Denmark and Greenland and stated that the comments made by the Committee of Experts as regards Greenland would be taken into consideration and that her Government would provide the information requested as soon as possible.

A Government representative of Ghana, regretting that the information requested had not been provided to the Experts, gave his assurance that his Government would make every attempt to bring its national legislation into conformity with the observations of the Committee. A National Advisory Committee on Labour had finished the review of the legislation in force which took into account the solutions proposed in these observations. It was just a matter of time before the amendment bills would be submitted to the competent authorities for adoption and promulgation. In view of the action taken so far, the Government had not thought it convenient to supply any other information requested until the amendment bills had received the assent of Parliament. The above-mentioned bills would address the concerns raised in respect of Conventions Nos. 87, 94, 111 and some others. Furthermore, the information requested in respect of Conventions Nos. 22, 81, 148 and 149, amongst others, would be supplied. The speaker concluded by requesting the Committee to give his Government another chance to respect its obligation to supply the information requested by the Experts.

A Government representative of Haiti, without wishing to reiterate what he had previously stated, recalled that he had taken due note of the need to fulfil the obligation to supply information in reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts.

A Government representative of Kuwait stated that to his knowledge the information requested including statistics and copies of ministerial decrees on both forced labour and overtime had been sent in May 1995. He was therefore surprised that this information had still not been received.

A Government representative of Madagascar stated that his Government had undertaken to send the missing report as quickly as possible.

The Employers' members deplored what constituted a real "blacklist" given the lack of participation of the majority of the countries concerned. They invited the Government representative of Ghana to provide written and detailed information. They considered that the intervention of the Government representative of Denmark for Greenland was somewhat limited.

The Workers' members agreed with the views expressed by the Employers' members. They wished to recall that all governments had to send complete information so that the manner in which ratified Conventions were applied could be examined. The ILO could always provide its assistance to governments so that they could give more pertinent replies to the questions raised.

The Committee took due note of the various information provided and the explanations given by the Government representatives. It insisted upon the great importance, for the continuation of an essential dialogue, of communicating clear and complete information in response to comments made by the Committee of Experts. It reiterated that this was an aspect of the constitutional obligation to report. In this connection, it expressed its profound concern at the very high number of cases of failure to supply information in reply to comments made by the Committee of Experts. It further observed that assistance from the ILO could be requested by governments in order to overcome any difficulties they may be facing.

The Committee urged the Governments concerned, namely Angola, Burundi, Central African Republic, Chad, Denmark (Greenland), Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Ghana, Haiti, Kuwait, Liberia, Madagascar, Mongolia, Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Yemen and Zaire, to spare no effort to provide the information requested as soon as possible. The Committee decided to mention these cases in the appropriate section of its General Report.

(d) Failure to supply reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations

The Workers' members noted a slight improvement with regard to the sending of reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations under article 19 of the ILO Constitution. They pointed out that 17 countries had not provided any reports for the General Survey of the Committee of Experts which was regrettable since these reports constituted an indispensable basis to evaluate the situation in different regions of the world. As indicated during the general discussion, since this survey was focused on the revision, the updating and the use of standards, the reports were all the more useful as they reflected the difficulties encountered by certain countries. The Governments therefore had to do everything that was possible to fulfil this obligation.

The Employers' members were in total agreement with all that had been said by the Workers' members. They further pointed out that the 17 countries mentioned in the report of the Committee of Experts were only those which had not sent reports for five consecutive years. Given that the ratification rate had fallen during the last 20 years, it would be appropriate if general surveys could reflect the real situation in countries which had not ratified the Conventions under consideration. General surveys could provide important indications on the discrepancies between standards and practice in the areas under consideration in the different member States. For the future of the ILO's standard-setting activity, it was important to have reports that reflected as closely as possible the situation prevailing in the whole world, which would require that the greatest possible number of reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations be received.

A Government representative of Afghanistan evoked the problems of internal security which were linked to foreign intervention which had not provided the necessary stability for the preparation of reports. The reports that were due would be furnished as soon as possible.

A Government representative of Haiti stated that he had the impression of being faced with what constituted a "blacklist". He nevertheless reiterated the expression of goodwill on the part of this Government to regularize the situation.

A Government representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya reiterated the communication problems with international and regional organizations. A technical committee responsible for gathering the information requested would take the necessary measures to send these without delay.

The Employers' members stated that they understood some of the problems evoked by Government representatives. However they wished to emphasize the importance of this type of report for the future work of the ILO. Consequently, they wanted these failures to be referred to in the appropriate section of the General Report. They further wanted the countries who did not attend the meeting to be referred to separately.

The Workers' members endorsed what had just been said by the Employers' members.

The Committee noted the information and explanations supplied by Government representatives and other speakers. The Committee emphasized the importance it attached to the constitutional obligation to send reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations, the importance being in connection with the future work of the Committee. In fact, these reports made a better evaluation of the situation possible within the context of the general surveys of the Committee of Experts. The Committee insisted that all member States should fulfil their obligations in this respect and expressed the firm hope that the Governments of Afghanistan, Albania, Antigua and Barbuda, El Salvador, Haiti, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mongolia, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Saint Lucia, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Venezuela and Yemen would fulfil their obligations under article 19 of the Constitution in the future. The Committee decided to mention these cases in the appropriate section of its General Report.

(e) *Written information received up to the end of the meeting of the Committee on the Application of Standards*¹

Algeria. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent most of the reports due on certain Conventions and replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Antigua and Barbuda. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Bulgaria. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Cameroon. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Cape Verde. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Chad. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent replies to the comments of the Committee on Conventions Nos. 6, 29, 81 and 98.

Comoros. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the majority of the reports requested and replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Cyprus. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Dominica. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent most of the reports due on certain Conventions and replies to most of the Committee's comments.

El Salvador. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Gabon. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent most of the reports due on certain Conventions and replies to most of the Committee's comments.

Guatemala. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent replies to most of the Committee's comments.

B. Observations and Information on the Application of Conventions

Convention No. 17: Workmen's Compensation (Accidents), 1925

Portugal (ratification: 1951). A Government representative presented information on behalf of his Government in response to the three questions raised by the Committee of Experts with regard to the integration of protection against industrial accidents into the general social security scheme, the protection of workers' occupational health and safety, and compensation for industrial accidents.

(1) Integration of protection against industrial accidents into the general social security scheme

Employers were required to transfer their responsibility for compensation of industrial accidents to insurance institutions while paying the costs of insurance. However, the legislation authorized employers whose economic capacity was considered sufficient to assume the coverage of occupational safety hazards. In such a case, compensation for workers who sustained industrial accidents was paid for by the employers. However, several enterprises whose economic capacity was known to be sufficient preferred to transfer this responsibility to the insurance institutions. The criteria for establishing work disability benefits had a general application. They were applied either to insurance institutions or to enterprises which directly insured the payment of benefits for industrial accidents. The Act concerning the general social security scheme of 1984 provided for the progressive integration of protection against industrial accidents into the general social security scheme. This integration, whose effective date was not yet established, would occur in the future pursuant to a new Act. The present legislation provided for the organization by the Government of tripartite consultation prior to the integration of protection against industrial accidents into the general social security scheme. The Convention required States to guarantee victims of industrial accidents or those having the right to minimum conditions of compensation while providing that, in the event of incapacity, benefits allocated to workers could be paid by the employer or by an insurance institution or a social security institution. According to the Government, the Convention did not require the integration of protection against industrial accidents into the social security scheme, nor did it indicate any preference for such a system. Even if a decision had been taken to integrate protection of industrial accidents into social security, there was no obligation under the Convention to implement such a decision. Moreover, the Convention did not prevent a change of this decision. Systems provided for by Portuguese law were thus authorized by the Convention. Convention No. 17 only guaranteed minimum compensation to workers who were victims of industrial accidents. Technically complex reasons had delayed the implementation of the integration of protection against industrial accidents into the general social security scheme. However, as indicated above, this integration would be carried out taking into account the legal obligation to engage in tripartite consultation. In addition, the Constitution provided trade unions and workers' committees the right to participate in the preparation of labour legislation, including laws concerning social security. Moreover, negotiations could also be organized between the Government and the social partners within the Council for Labour Dialogue.

(2) Involvement of medical experts in the determination of the degree of reduction of working capacity

The courts were responsible for determining the degree of working capacity and the compensation to be given to workers as a result of industrial accidents. The reduction of working capacity was established, taking into account the national table for those disabled through industrial accidents, which had been revised in 1993 following an agreement between the Government and the social partners. Contrary to the observations of the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers (CGTP), the courts were responsible for determining the degree of reduction in working capacity with the objective of ensuring a fair decision for the worker. This determination of the degree of reduction of working capacity required very specialized knowledge. The court was assisted by medical experts responsible for evaluating the degree of reduction of working capacity on the basis of their skills and of a national disability table. The experts carried out their task with total independence. Although sometimes they were also carrying out functions as consultants to insurance companies, nevertheless they were required to make their decisions independently. However, if there was any well-founded suspicion on the part of the worker with regard to the medical expert, the worker concerned could ask for the appointment of another expert who would or would not be approved by the judge. Some workers did have sufficient resources to pay the costs of an expert of their choice and did so. In addition, trade union organizations were sometimes offered the services of a medical expert to workers who had insufficient funds. With regard to the request of the CGTP concerning the implementation of the integration of protection against industrial accidents into social security because of difficulties regarding medical experts, the alternative solutions for determining the degree of reduction of working capacity were either to give this competence to an administrative body, or to maintain the competence of the courts. In all cases the presence of a medical expert would be necessary and the worker would be responsible for engaging an expert of his own choice. However, as the Government had indicated to the Committee of Experts, the comments of the CGTP concerning the medical experts had been submitted to the Ministry of Justice, but it should be pointed out that the reference in the report of the Committee of Experts to carrying out an inquiry was not to be considered a compromise made on the part of the Government.

(3) The criteria for determining compensation for industrial accidents

Contrary to the interpretation of the Committee of Experts, the CGTP commented on the very low level of payments made to compensate for industrial accidents, but did not say that they "continued to decrease". In reality, the compensation in industrial accident cases was not decreasing, and was reassessed periodically on the basis of criteria determined by law. The Agreement on Occupational Health and Safety concluded between the Government and the social partners within the Council for Labour Dialogue provided for the revision of not only the national disability table, but also the means for calculating compensation for industrial accidents and occupational diseases. The revision of the methods for calculating compensation was under way and the Government would send to the Office the definitive text on the methods for calculating compensation as soon as it was adopted. The allegations of the CGTP regarding the low level of compensation for industrial accidents should be supplemented as follows. In the event of temporary disability, the workers received compensation amounting to two-thirds of their salary. In the event of permanent disability, the workers received pensions whose value depended on the degree of disability. In the most serious cases of total disability for whatever work, the pension was equivalent to 80 per cent of salary, increased to 100 per cent with respect to family allowances. In less serious cases of permanent partial disability, the pension was equivalent to two-thirds of the reduction of their working capacity. Sometimes collective agreements granted such workers higher benefits and pensions, up to 100 per cent of the salary, particularly in cases of temporary disability. Therefore, benefits and pensions were dependent upon the degree of disability and on the salary of the workers. For this reason, workers who did not have a high salary and had an assessment of a slight disability received modest benefits. However, the circumstances of workers who were victims of industrial accidents to a certain extent improved when the tax assessment of benefits and pensions was more favourable than it was with regard to salaries, and that the workers who sustained permanent partial disability maintained their employment and their salary. Under the law, employment contracts did not terminate in the event of permanent total disability. If this were not the case, employers would be obliged to transfer the worker who had a permanent partial disability to a compatible job. In addition, the law did not allow employers to reduce the salaries of workers taking into account the degree of work disability or pensions received.

The Employers' members commended the Government for its comprehensive, precise and detailed report which addressed all the points raised in the report of the Committee of Experts, and provided information in response and in addition to the allegations made by the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers (CGTP). As there had not yet been any evaluation or assessment by the Experts, it was not appropriate for this Committee to evaluate or assess the situation. They said that at this point the Government should submit in writing everything they had stated before this Committee. With regard to the intention of the Government to integrate protection against industrial accidents into the general social security scheme, they agreed with the Government that the Convention did not make such integration compulsory. The Convention provided that there must be protection in the case of insolvency on the part of a private insurance company, so that compensation was guaranteed, but it did not specify the kind of insurance that must be provided for that purpose. They noted that the Committee of Experts did not comment upon or come to any conclusion on that point, but instead simply referred to the complaint of the CGTP. With regard to the determination of the degree of disability or compensation to be paid for such disability, they considered it obvious that medical experts must have a major say in determining degree of disability. Physicians were bound by the Hippocratic oath, and courts were entitled to appoint another physician to provide a second opinion where there was doubt or uncertainty. With respect to the allegation that the level of compensation was constantly decreasing, they noted that this was denied by the Government which said that levels of compensation were increasing, and said that the Government should report on this in writing, and provide information about its plan to revise the table of compensation and the table of incapacity. They concluded by stating that the Government should report on all developments in detail.

The Workers' members appreciated the additional information provided by the Government in response to the observations of the Committee of Experts, as this was a good example of dialogue within the supervisory system. They pointed out the importance of compensation for industrial accidents in national legislation and of the discussion on new developments in the framework of the application of technical agreements. They referred to the comments of the Committee of Experts in 1986, 1990 and 1995 as well as the observations of the CGTP and the information communicated by the Government, and concluded by first insisting upon the implementation of the provisions in the preliminary tripartite agreement concerning occupational health and safety, particularly with regard to the revision of legislative provisions concerning methods for calculating benefits owing in the event of industrial accidents or occupational diseases. They also insisted upon the need for the Office to be informed about all progress that took place in this matter.

The Workers' member from Portugal noted that the Convention was binding upon all member States that had ratified it, including Portugal. He also recalled that the objective of the Convention was to guarantee to victims of industrial accidents and their direct descendants compensation conditions that permitted such persons to live with a minimum of dignity. However, he regretted the fact that Portugal had a higher percentage of industrial accidents and a greater number of fatal accidents than any other Member State of the European Union. In his view, the Government did not appropriately guarantee the conditions required by the Convention for the following reasons: (i) it had proven to be incapable of modernizing the legal framework established during the former dictatorship; (ii) the scheme for compensating industrial accidents was worse than those for other kinds of accidents (such as traffic accidents), which could be considered to be a depreciation of the value of the lives of workers; (iii) the pensions for victims of industrial accidents who were partially or permanently disabled only had a symbolic value because they were so low and had not been readjusted; (iv) the calculation of pensions was made on the basis of two-thirds of the basic salary although they should be based upon real salary, including regular benefits; (v) damage to mental health resulting from work accidents was not taken into account; (vi) the insurance companies were the primary beneficiaries of the system for compensating industrial accidents; (vii) the Government was not complying with the 1984 Social Security Act which required it to integrate compensation for industrial accidents into the general social security scheme; and (viii) the vulnerability of victims of industrial accidents was not taken into account in the courts at the time of establishing the appropriate pension. He hoped that the Government would not fail to ensure compliance with the Convention both through legislation and in practice and would take into consideration his comments.

The Workers' member of Greece subscribed to the statements of the Workers' representative of Portugal and referred to the insufficient attention that society gave to victims of dismissals because of industrial accidents. He said that Portugal did not mistreat victims of industrial accidents any more than other countries. He noted the great physical, psychological and economic difficulties suffered by such accident victims, who did not receive much assistance from society. He was not in favour of the possible integration of protection against industrial accidents into the social security scheme. Moreover, he said that the Government should provide more detailed information concerning benefits received after an industrial accident and he asked whether such benefits were established once and for all or were adjusted after a short period of time, because what was most difficult for a victim of an industrial accident was his later survival. With regard to the former kinds of benefits, there should be a state body or some other official body that would fix and guarantee them rather than private companies, given their financial insecurity. He indicated that the reply by the Government should be to state that there was a body capable of guaranteeing purchasing power for both the victims of industrial accidents and their families, and that to deny this was to fail to come to the point. He added that in dealing with this matter more account should be taken of human rather than strictly legal or statistical aspects, and advised the Government to deal with this matter in a better fashion.

The Government representative stated in reply to the questions raised by the Workers' members that the labour courts were competent to determine the degree of disability of workers who were victims of industrial accidents and the pension to be received by the workers. He added that from the legal point of view and according to the Government the situation with regard to the workers was completely clear. It was not the social security system that was required to pay benefits and pensions, but rather the insurance companies or those enterprises whose sufficient economic capacity was recognized. This system would continue until the implementation decree entered into force and the integration of protection against industrial accidents into the general social security scheme took place. With regard to the matter of the report of the Committee of Experts concerning the legislation which he considered was badly understood by the Employers' members, he pointed out that the amounts paid to the workers periodically increased on the basis of criteria established by law. He reiterated that his country was in compliance with the provisions of the Convention. With regard to the statement of the CGTP – that it was necessary for victims of industrial accidents to receive better protection – he considered this to be a request for negotiation with the Government. He emphasized that there were both such a determination and compensation of workers and that, pursuant to Section 23 of Act No. 2127 (published in the Legislative Series, 1965), the basic compensation, in the calculation of pensions, comprised the basic wage and all of the other benefits regularly paid to the workers. With regard to the relation between industrial accidents and dismissals referred to by the Workers' member of Greece, he noted that Portugal had ratified the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158) last year, and that the national legislation was entirely in compliance with this instrument. He concluded by emphasizing that the Convention did not establish any preference for a public system of protection against industrial accidents and that it was an internal decision for each State as to whether or not to include such protection in the general social security scheme.

The Committee took note of the observations of the Committee of Experts, the statement of the Government representative of Portugal and the discussion that took place thereafter. It felt that the information furnished by the Government representative was quite useful. Further, it took into account the report of the Government that it intended to integrate protection against industrial accidents into the social security scheme and that necessary tripartite consultation would be carried out in this context. The Committee also agreed with the Government representative that the Convention did not mandate integration of protection against industrial accidents with social security or any specific level of compensation. In the circumstances and considering that the Committee of Experts had not themselves made any evaluation of the issues involved, the Committee urged that the Government should furnish a full written report in confirmation of the oral statement. It further called for implementation of the reported Agreement with social partners on occupational safety, hygiene and health and furnished particulars thereof as well in its report.

Convention No. 26: Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery, 1928

Turkey (ratification: 1975). A Government representative first indicated, concerning the exclusion of home work from the scope of the Labour Act No. 1475 and consequently from the minimum wage-fixing machinery, that the Labour Act excluded from its scope "work performed at home by the members of a family or close relatives, involving handicrafts and without participation of anybody else from outside". He considered, therefore, that all other types of industrial work, as defined in Convention No. 26, were within the scope of the law and that the Convention was fully respected. He added that any international labour standards to be adopted in the future on home work would also be taken into consideration by the Government.

As to the question of fines, he emphasized that an employer who had not paid the statutory minimum wage would not be relieved from the full payment of this wage by having paid the fine, and that the worker would be entitled to recover not only the difference due but also any interest on delay. Referring also to the high inflation rate of about 80 per cent annually, which was causing a problem for any such fines, he stated that a draft amendment to raise the amount of fines concerning the implementation of the Labour Act, according to the present value of the Turkish lira, had already been submitted by the relevant commissions to the General Assembly of Parliament. He added that the minimum wage in Turkey was fixed by means of tripartite participation and assured that a detailed report would be submitted before 1 September 1995 as requested by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' members pointed out that the first question raised by the Committee of Experts was about the texts which regulate conditions of homeworkers and, in particular, the measures taken to fix the minimum wages for them, and that further information was necessary on this matter. They recalled that Convention No. 26 was of general scope including homeworking trades. The second point was about the measures to ensure the effective enforcement of the minimum wage. If the real value of the amount of fine decreased with inflation, the system of fines would not maintain its deterrent effect against violation of the minimum wage. Especially in the situation of inflation, the minimum wage needed to be reviewed, while the Turkish law provided for such reviews every two years. As raised by the Committee of Experts in the third point, effective consultation became necessary in this regard. Therefore, full information should be requested as to how the employers' and workers' organizations were associated in the operation of the minimum wage-fixing machinery.

The Employers' members considered that under Article 2 of the Convention, member States were free to decide which trades or parts of trades were to be covered by the Convention. As to the second question, they thought that Article 4 of the Convention required the member State to ensure that the wages were not paid at a lower rate than the minimum wage but did not mention the nature of the sanctions. Referring to paragraph 116 of the general part of the report concerning the level of sanctions and fines, they were of the view that only under Conventions which explicitly referred to such sanctions and fines could such demand be made: this was a matter for domestic law. Regarding the third question, they recalled that the actual level of the minimum wage was not laid down in the Convention and the question was how the social partners were participating in the procedure of minimum wage fixing.

Noting that the Committee of Experts had asked the Government to answer these three questions, they thought that the Committee should refrain from making assessment at this stage and should request the Government to provide answers.

The Workers' member of Turkey emphasized the importance of the protection of homeworkers, who were generally treated as self-employed workers in Turkey, because of the increase of informal and precarious employment. The authorities were aware of difficulties in the implementation of the minimum wage and data were necessary on the prosecutions on its violation. Given the importance of clandestine employment, 4 million in number, and 45 per cent of employees, effective measures were especially needed. He referred to the decrease of the minimum wage in terms of US dollars because of the inflation rate of 140 per cent, and urged the Government to ratify the Minimum Wage-Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131).

The Government representative explained the form of minimum wage-fixing machinery under section 33 of Act No. 1475: a tripartite body – comprising five persons with expertise, five workers' representatives and five employers' representatives – fixed the minimum wage, taking into consideration such factors as social and economic conditions, living indices, tendency in wages and economic branches concerned. The quorum was at least ten members and the decision was taken by majority vote.

The Committee took note of the statement of the Government representative, according to which, in his view, the exclusion of homeworkers from the Labour Act was consistent with Convention No. 26, that there was statutory protection as regards minimum wages, that proposals for enhancing the fine for non-payment of minimum wages taking account of inflation were already under tripartite consultation and that a full report would be furnished by 1 September 1995. Considering that the spread of homeworkers in Turkey was rather wide, the Committee urged the Government that, in the report promised by them within the deadline, they should give full information, supplemented by the relevant texts of the law, on all issues raised by the Committee of Experts, establishing that homeworkers were in fact covered by the Labour Act and that the tripartite consultations, reportedly initiated, were effective and meaningful.

Convention No. 29: Forced Labour, 1930

India (ratification: 1954). A Government representative of India, referring to the detailed reports supplied by the Government in June 1994 and February 1995, shared the concern shown by the Committee of Experts on the application of this very important Convention and continued by clarifying the various points made by the Committee in paragraphs 1-3 and paragraphs 42-48 of its observation. He assured the Committee that the well-founded critical concern largely expressed by the Committee of Experts would only spur the Government to intensify its efforts in the application of this Convention more effectively in his country. The method used in assessing a situation in a country, while having certainly its merits, had its own limitations too. For obvious reasons it could only refer to what had happened in the past or at best in the recent past, and it would never reflect the current position adequately. He therefore concentrated his presentation on certain current developments which showed that India was moving with a better pace and in the right direction with genuine intentions.

One of the very important and central observations made in paragraph 2, with reference to bonded labour, was that the situation in practice did not appear to have improved very much. Elsewhere, the Committee of Experts also said that systematic identification of bonded labourers under the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act of 1976, had been stalled in practice for several years. This observation, in his opinion, was based on the fact that the number of bonded labourers identified, released and rehabilitated was not increasing substantially beyond the 250,000 figure reported from 1991 onwards. This was certainly a very important issue. However, the administration and enforcement of this Act essentially lay with the state governments. Currently all of them had taken a stand that there were no more bonded labourers to be identified, released and rehabilitated in their states. To clarify this very significant stand taken by the state governments, the speaker referred to the interim order of the Supreme Court dated 6 March 1995, by which the Supreme Court appointed in 13 states the advocates and the voluntary organizations which had been assigned to determine whether the practice of bonded labour had actually been eradicated in the states concerned. Local administrations were ordered to provide these advocates and voluntary organizations with assistance in the discharge of their duties and state governments were required to bear their operational costs.

Another Supreme Court Order relating to a case of bonded labour inquiry in Haryana State, was referred to in the other paragraphs of the Committee's report. As it was alleged that there were 4,000 bonded labourers working the quarries neighbouring Delhi, the Supreme Court had appointed a committee to identify each of the bonded labourers. This committee could identify only approximately 2,000 labourers and had reported back to the Supreme Court saying that none of these labourers considered themselves a bonded labourer in need of any rehabilitation assistance. These two Supreme Court judgements had clearly demonstrated that on the part of some of the non-governmental organizations there was a propensity to exaggerate the figures of bonded labour. Everybody now was keenly awaiting the decision of the Supreme Court after the appointed advocates and agencies reported back to the Supreme Court on this question. These developments, however, did not prevent the issue of fresh surveys by the state governments to identify some more bonded labourers. One of the state governments, namely Karnataka, reported that the survey done in seven out of 20 districts had revealed that there was not a single case of relapse into bondage, and very few new cases could be identified in this exercise.

A number of positive developments had taken place as a consequence of the regional conferences which had been held at the highest level by the Cabinet Minister of the Union of India, with the labour ministers of all states. The rehabilitation assistance given to bonded labour was enhanced to Rs.10,000, from Rs.6,500 per individual. The target for the current year 1995-96 had been revised to about 7,000 to be rehabilitated, and approximately the equivalent of US$2 million was already earmarked to wipe out the backlog of the already identified bonded labourers. The states on their part were also improving their efforts in this direction. For example, in the state of Kerala, tribal bonded labour had been rehabilitated in very innovative ways by settling them in plantations relating to spices, tea and dairy farming. Similarly, Andhra Pradesh, one of the states with the highest incidence, had also provided the bonded labourers, wherever they have been rehabilitated, with the land and other inputs on cooperative farming wastes. The speaker hoped that this information reasonably answered the concern of the Committee of Experts about the apparent lack of improvement in the situation and the lack of increased identification, release and rehabilitation of bonded labourers.

Another central observation of the Committee of Experts in paragraph 2 said that a number of proposals and recommendations made by the National Commission on Rural Labour in 1991, with a view to improving the situation, had not so far been implemented. There were mainly two recommendations made by this National Commission. The first one was that in many non-agricultural occupations bonded labour elements had been noticed but had not been adequately identified by surveys and studies. In this respect the Act did not distinguish between bonded labour in agriculture and bonded labour in non-agricultural activities, and two Supreme Court judgements referred to earlier provided an interim answer to this recommendation. The second recommendation made by the National Commission on Rural Labour was that of setting up a national commission on bonded labour. This had also been recommended, as noted by the Committee of Experts, by a working group on contemporary forms of slavery in July 1990. The Government had examined this proposal very carefully and reported that a national human rights commission would perform this function. There was also the prospect of a number of state-level human rights commissions being formed very shortly. However, the Government had also appointed a committee, under the chairmanship of the Labour Minister of Madras, to study the need to form a national commission on bonded labour. Unfortunately, the report of this body was not yet available. These were the Government's responses to paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of the observation of the Committee of Experts.

With respect to paragraphs 42-48, which mainly dealt with child labour problems, the Government representative pointed out that India had ratified six ILO Conventions relating to child labour, and was pursuing a national policy on child labour, adopted by Parliament in 1987. This policy was designed with reference to the resolution of the ILC in 1979, and called for a three-pronged action to deal with this problem. Paragraphs 42-48 referred to two of those strategies, namely, legislative action and a focused action to eliminate child labour. The third strategy dealt with the overall development of the special groups from where most child labour came. In paragraph 42 the Committee of Experts asked for a comprehensive report on the situation of children in bondage. While the Government had supplied a report in February 1995, there had been significant developments from February 1995 until now.

Firstly, in the 11 to 12 states where the incidence of child labour was highest in the country, 100 districts were identified for immediate priority action and the heads of all these districts were called for a meeting in August 1995 to finalize districts' specific plans for elimination of child labour in hazardous employment. It was also proposed to associate the local ILO representative to assist in this meeting. The circular referred to by the Committee of Experts in this regard in paragraph 45, concerning the identification, release and rehabilitation of child labour, had been personally sent by the Prime Minister of India to all heads of state departments and to all chief ministers. The heads of state governments had given a positive response to step up their efforts and individual state governments had already drawn up their plans of action. A plan equivalent to US$300 million was approved for the elimination of child labour in hazardous employment by the year 2000 and, as an initial step, about US$15 million had already been placed at the disposal of the Ministry of Labour to tackle this problem in the first year. Already funds had been released for state-wide surveys of child labour in big states like Tamil Nadu, Uttar Pradesh and Ures. A massive awareness-raising campaign was under way in all print and electronic media all over the country.

With respect to paragraph 43, pending the adoption of the Bill referred to therein, executive instructions to that effect had already been given to the state governments, therefore now the fixing of lower wages for children compared with adults had been stopped. Process for the adoption of the Bill was under way with the Cabinet having to approve the proposal. Regarding law enforcement statistics, there had been a substantial improvement during the period 1994-95 and there was reason to believe that the number of offences detected, the number of prosecutions launched and the number of punishments given had substantially increased during the period 1994-95 as compared to the 1993-94 period. Concrete figures would be reported by the Government in due time.

Coming to paragraph 46, where the Committee of Experts wished to learn of the follow-up of the report of the subcommittee on the Elimination of Child Labour in the match and fireworks industry in Tamil Nadu, a copy of which had been supplied by the Government in February 1995, some very positive developments were also to be reported here. Welfare committees had been set up for the sake of children working in these factories and employers were contributing 10 rupees and the state government was also contributing 10 rupees towards this welfare fund for each child. The state government had since provided four vehicles, instead of two, for checking up on the health of the children working in these factories. The subcommittee also said that a certain basic diet was to be provided by the employers and it was being done. It had recommended that all these children should have a group insurance scheme provided for them and accordingly such a scheme was already finalized and was under implementation. The premium to be paid was now being revised and a committee under the chairmanship of the district collector had also been appointed to report to the authority on the happenings from time to time. These were the main steps taken as a follow-up of the report of the above-mentioned subcommittee.

The speaker then explained the third strategy adopted in India as part of the national policy on child labour, which concerned overall development programmes focused on the special groups. It was common knowledge that most of the child labour in India belonged to two groups of people called scheduled castes and scheduled tribes. On the whole they constituted 22 per cent of the population. They were identified as the weakest sections of the society and a number of constitutional safeguards were provided for their general upliftment. It was the overall economic development of these groups that could provide the real answer to the problem of child labour. Very many special schemes were afoot following these constitutional provisions all over the country for their betterment. For example, there was a reservation of seats on a rotation basis to these groups in all parliamentary assembly and local body elections all over the country. There were reservations for these groups, up to 15 per cent in the case of scheduled castes and 7 per cent in the case of scheduled tribes, in all employment at local government, state government and central government levels. Free and concessional education at all levels, including higher education, was provided. Free residential schools and colleges were established exclusively for these groups. There were special national-level and state-level commissions - National Scheduled Caste Commissions, National Commission on Scheduled Tribes - as well as national-level and state-level commissions exclusively to look after their welfare, and exclusive finance development corporations. In the area of rural employment and in the area of primary education in the last few years unprecedented levels of investments had been made. With a consortium of all international lending agencies roughly about US$15 to 25 million would go into each district for development of primary education which would help in reducing the incidence of child labour. There was exclusive earmarking of all budgets in the central government and state governments to these groups. Another important scheme which had a scale and magnitude unprecedented in the whole world was the Integrated Child Development Scheme which pre-empted the entry of the children into the world of work making them prone to reach schools. These points emphasized the fact that overall development policies were oriented towards the welfare of these groups to which most of child labour belonged.

In addition, with the assistance of the Governments of Germany and Belgium, an international programme for the elimination of child labour was already under way and about 55,000 children had already benefited from it. Similarly, with the assistance of the ILO, a Child Labour Action Support Programme was being implemented wherein the ILO supplemented the efforts made by the Government of India in this area. One of the innovative steps taken by the Government was that the Director-General of Employment and Training, who was responsible for the entire national vocational training system, had been made responsible to discharge the duties relating to the elimination of child labour with the view that the parents of these children were to be provided with some vocational training so as to reduce the need for them to send their children to work. In conclusion, the speaker expressed the hope that the Committee would make a finding that India was making sincere efforts and good progress in the areas under review.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for his detailed and forthright information. This case had been of continuing interest to the Committee since 1984, and it was the eighth time that it had turned its attention to the serious problems of bonded labour and, perhaps the most serious of all, the question of bonded child labour. This case was so serious in fact, that this Committee last year had found it necessary to put it in a special paragraph of its report. The full dimensions of the bonded labour problem, even to this date over ten years, were still unclear but, according to the available data, might range from a quarter of a million to several million children and adults.

There was a severe problem concerning the collection of information from state governments, and it was particularly disturbing, as reflected in the Experts' report, that the work of the National Sample Survey Organization to gather information on bonded labour was not scheduled to begin before 1998-99. This delay, for reasons that really had not been explained, raised some doubts as to whether the Government was really committed to eradicating bonded labour and child labour.

According to the Government and since at least 1989, there was no gap between bonded labour identified and rehabilitated. It appeared that the number of rehabilitated amounted to about a quarter of a million individuals and this was why the problem of identifying those in bonded labour was so very important. Part of this problem concerned the definition of bonded labour. For the Employers' group it was difficult to understand why the states, which in principle must follow the dictates of federal authority, did not seem willing to follow the definition given in the Bonded Labour System Abolition Act of 1976 as interpreted by the Indian Supreme Court in 1983. There was also the problem of the range of occupations where bonded labour was likely to occur and was not adequately surveyed. The Employers reaffirmed the view of the Experts that it was an urgent matter that necessary measures be taken at the national and state levels for the systematic identification of bonded labour under federal law.

For a number of years this Committee had also been concerned with the fact that vigilance committees, called for under the Bonded Labour System Act, either did not exist or were inoperative or ineffective, and this situation did not seem to have changed. It appeared that the Government was still of the opinion that the better implementation strategy of the Bonded Labour System Act was through state governments' action to eradicate the problem. While the Employers' group did not want to express any particular preference for one solution over another, problems with the surveys identifying bonded labour showed that the Government still did not have an effective centralized control of its system. The state-based strategy did not seem to be working, with the main question being why the states would object that a national authority was to supervise and coordinate at both the national and state levels the identification, release and rehabilitation of bonded labour. If the state-based system was not as effective as it could be, why not consider an alternative strategy? There was also the problem of the time-lag between liberation and rehabilitation leading to a return to bonded labour in some instances, and this problem was an urgent matter and needed to be corrected as well. And finally, there were very few prosecutions related to bonded labour given the large dimensions of the problem, which again raised the question as to whether the Government was really dedicated to eliminating the problem.

With respect to the Government's intention to take 2 million children out of bonded labour by the year 2000, the Employers questioned whether that estimate was realistic taking into account that, according to the reports received from state governments, only 1,400 child bonded labourers had been identified. Noting the establishment of the national authority for the elimination of child labour and the adoption at the beginning of this year of a blueprint for action that was to be adopted also at the state level, the Employers requested clarification on whether this blueprint was binding on the states and, if it was, whether it was being followed and, if so, in what time-frame the states could be expected to adopt and implement the child labour policy and pursue it as an urgent matter.

Noting the information provided on India's rural development programme, the Employers asked the Government to provide detailed information to the ILO so that the Experts might review this programme in the context of the implementation of Convention No. 29.

In conclusion, the Employers stressed that, notwithstanding the fact that since last year India had adopted some new programmes, no tangible real progress to date in eradicating bonded labour and bonded child labour could be clearly seen. They saw programmes, but what they did not see was progress. The Employers' members were not looking necessarily for more reports or for more policy statements, but they needed to see under some kind of federal/state strategy tangible evidence that bonded and child labour was being eliminated.

The Workers' members recalled that this Committee had discussed this case in 1986, 1989, 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994 and again in 1995, with the report of the Committee of Experts covering this case on nearly 13 pages. While for that reason the Committee decided to limit itself to paragraphs 1 to 3 and paragraphs 42 to 48 of the Experts' report, it was not ignoring the other paragraphs as being unimportant, but was simply trying to concentrate this year its attention on a specific aspect. The nature of the Committee's concern was that there had been a persistent failure in practice to get bonded labour and, in particular, children in bonded labour, under control. The measurement of the concern was shown by the discussion which had taken place in this Committee last year when it reached a conclusion which had been placed in a special paragraph.

It was also important to recognize that the problem of child labour, child servitude, could not be separated from the more general problem of debt bondage which was a persistent and consistent problem in India. In paragraphs 27, 37 and 40 the Experts explained the reason why there was a lack of progress: no network of agencies to supervise and consolidate the abolition of bonded labour (paragraph 27); no effective penal sanctions and enforcement procedure (paragraph 37); very slow enforcement procedures (paragraph 40). All those points were particularly relevant to the discussion today.

Paragraph 42 detailed the allegations which informed the UN Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities of the extent of child bondage and listed the range of occupations in which child bondage was a feature. However, it was not just child bondage that was being dealt with here, but also the facts of kidnapping, beating, sexual abuse, starvation – all the things associated with child bondage. That these things existed at all, there could not be any doubt, but the specific identification and some credible methods of establishing the size and the precise nature of the problem had not really been made available, not least because the collection of information failed to distinguish between child and adult bonded labour. In this connection, the Experts in their report had asked for measures specifically related to child labour and for a comprehensive report.

Paragraph 43 referred to the Indian Government's indication that it proposed to amend the Child Labour Act of 1986 so that the minimum wage fixation was abolished and, according to the Government representative, it had actually been abolished. However, it seemed that this particular issue in itself, although perhaps relevant, did not go to the heart of the problem. Nevertheless, if it was going to help in any way, the Committee of Experts should be informed when and how quickly this legislation, if it was passed, was going to be applied.

One of the ways in which the Committee could gain an insight into the practice in a country and measure a government's commitment to its own laws, was to obtain accurate information about prosecutions and the extent of the penalties which existed in a country for dealing with those who failed to obey the law. The Committee of Experts, as it seemed from paragraph 44 of their report, was rather unconvinced that the information provided was either accurate or convincing about this aspect of the Government's commitment. The state governments claimed to have identified 1,400 child bonded labourers against the estimates based on the surveys which pointed to a possible 17 million, 2 million of which were children in hazardous occupations. The figure of 1,400 represented one tiny part of the 2 million children that the ministers promised to take out of bonded labour by the year 2000, with the very substantial budget that the Indian Government had set aside for that purpose. There was no answer, however, as to whether these 2 million children represented the whole of the problem, a significant part of the problem, or a token gesture towards the problem. It might help if the Government representative would give some indications on that in his reply.

Paragraph 45 dealt with the action taken by the Government and the creation of a new body since last year's discussion – the National Authority for the Elimination of Child Labour – which had already sent out a circular with very laudable objectives. While the Workers' members expressed some scepticism of the ability of committees to solve problems through paperwork, they pointed out that the Government had not yet indicated any timetable for the work of this particular committee. Noting that India's economy was developing at a fairly rapid pace, the Workers considered it essential for the Government to ensure that with that rapid economic development there was, in fact, a priority strategy for dealing with child labour.

Paragraphs 47 and 48 concerning sexual exploitation were in contrast with the official view of sexual exploitation. The magistrates of three areas claimed that they had no knowledge of sexual exploitation, yet there had been 57 raids, and 131 cases had ended up with a conviction. Here again, there were reports of advisory committees being formed to eradicate child prostitution, and of conducting a survey in Pradesh in areas particularly involved in child prostitution, but indeed, the Workers wanted to see a little bit more real action.

The Workers' members expressed deep concern about the arrest of a prominent anti-child labour activist, Mr. Kailash Sathiyarti, the leader of the South Asia Coalition of Child Servitude. His arrest was connected with his denunciation of child labour in India's carpet industry, as a result of which there had been a cancellation by IKEA – a leading European carpet importer – of contracts with firms allegedly employing children in India. Prior to his arrest, he had been subjected to harassment and death threats by the Haryana State Police, and there were strong suggestions in newspaper reports in this particular case of collusion between the local carpet mafia and elements in the Haryana police. Persecution of people who were speaking up publicly about the nature of child labour in India was a new development which had not been seen before, and the Workers strongly hoped that the Indian Government would eradicate it fairly quickly.

The Workers' members concluded by pointing to the need for much more detailed information about the overall size of the problem of bonded labour and specifically in relation to the exploitation of children. They hoped that the Indian Government representative would take back to his Government the need for the figures on this case to be made available to the Committee of Experts so that it could make not only some judgement about the size of the problem, but as the years went by, could be able to see whether there had been any reduction in the problem.

The Workers' member of India referred to paragraph 4 of the report which gave diverse estimates of the figures of bonded labour. The confusion here was mainly due to two reasons: one was that the time lag between the years in which these estimates were given varied between 1970, 1979 to 1990, whilst we were in the year 1995; secondly, the figures given by the different organizations also varied widely. On the one hand, the Government said that the number was around 0.24 million, while the Bonded Labour Liberation Front of India had put the figure at 5 million adults and 10 million child bonded labourers. The figure given by impartial bodies such as the Subcommittee on Bonded Labour, set up by the central Standing Committee on Rural Organized Labour, was 2 million, but that was also in the year 1979. Therefore, the speaker supported the suggestion made by the Workers' spokesman that the Government should come out with the latest figures on this issue.

Referring to paragraph 22 on the involvement of trade unions in this question, he stated that the Government had taken the view that trade unions had not been involved in this issue because trade unions were concerned with organized labour and did not have much to do where bonded labour was employed. However, bonded labourers were working in industries like bricklaying and forestry and construction where trade unions did exist, and the Government should start to involve trade unions who were very active in these fields.

With reference to paragraph 32 on penal sanctions and enforcement, the speaker pointed out that prosecutions on these issues took a long time in India and in the meantime the bonded labour problem could not be solved. Therefore, he suggested that the Government should see to it that these prosecutions were decided speedily and penalties were a deterrent.

Another Workers' member of India asserted that this Committee, as well as the Committee of Experts, was confusing the issues of forced labour and child labour. The authorities of India had taken the decision to abolish the bonded labour system in 1976 and the Supreme Court had ruled in 1983 that engaging in bonded labour was not only inhuman but also illegal and punishable by imprisonment. While he recognized that the problem of child labour was prevalent in India, he did not accept that the situation of children in bonded labour existed. He was talking as a member of one of the biggest trade union centres in the country and as a representative of his national trade union organization. Referring to paragraph 44 of the Experts' observation, he pointed out that, according to statistics, about 1,400 child bonded labourers had been identified and that the number of child labourers was placed at 17.02 million, of whom 2 million were estimated to be engaged in hazardous occupations. Certain speakers had wondered how the Prime Minister of India could state that 2 million children were going to be removed from child labour by the year 2000. However, that was because the latter was referring to child labour and not to bonded labour. He indicated that after the land reforms and the rural development that had taken place in India, 99 per cent of bonded labour had disappeared. In his view, child labour was the major issue against which everyone in his country was struggling. It was a fact that some industries were using child labour. The workers were struggling against this phenomenon, including by going on hunger strikes. Moreover, since it was employers in the private sector who were employing this child labour, the Workers had to force the private sector management to see that it should not engage in such activities. It was inhuman and uncivilized. In addition, the workers were opposed to a minimum wage for children since they were opposed to child labour. This minimum wage was a way of regularizing child labour. However, the Government of India had to make greater efforts in the struggle against child labour. For example, by the middle of the year in primary schools there was a large decrease in attendance. This was because the children had to work to avoid starvation. Therefore, the Government had to start a midday meals programme for these schoolchildren so that they could receive both education and food. The Government had some sort of moral responsibility to ensure this. He concluded by assuring the Government of India of the workers' full support in the struggle to abolish child labour.

The Employers' member of India indicated that all employers and their associations were fully cooperating with the government policy to eliminate bonded and child labour. The employers' associations, through their own channels, were putting pressure for the non-engagement of child labour even on the industries that were engaging them. He emphasized that child labour was used only in the unorganized sector and not in the organized one, and that most unauthorized sector employers were not members of the associations at the apex level. Responding to the point raised by the Workers' member of India as to why there was such a decrease in primary-school attendance, the speaker replied that this was due to the fact that there was so much poverty. Parents did not send children to work for the sake of fun but because their income supported their families. While he did not support this, he had raised this point to illustrate that unless poverty was alleviated, it would be difficult to completely eradicate child labour. Many of the employers in India had taken positive initiatives in establishing schools to help spread education and also the rehabilitation of children at work. Even scholarship schemes had been initiated for children withdrawn from work and put in school. There also had to be an appreciation of the distinction between bonded child labour and child labour. There was no bonded child labour, but child labour obviously existed. This had to be clearly understood. Since India was a large democracy it might take some time to eliminate this evil, but he had no doubt that it would be fully eliminated in due course with the initiatives taken by the Government and supported by the employers and the NGOs. Moreover, he did not agree with the suggestion that products manufactured with the help of child labour should not be used. This could not solve the problem of child labour. Rather it could increase the problem so that, if children could not earn this, it would create other social problems. While employers did not support child labour employment, programmes for the limitation of child labour had to be looked into and effectively utilized to be successful. If children were not to work, adequate integration programmes had to be provided so that these children could be educated.

The Government member of Germany stated that in order to assess the problem in India correctly account should be taken of the comments made in the Experts' report as well as those made by the Government representative. Bonded labour, including child bonded labour, had a very long tradition in India and was thus not a phenomenon which had emerged in the last few years. With regard to the scope and size of the problem, rapid results and solutions could not be found. He agreed with the Employers' member of India that one could not proceed in an unplanned way and "try to send the police or the army into a factory and get the children out" because the children would be employed somewhere else the next day or new children would be brought into the factory. The first step was to try to raise awareness of the problem itself and then combat it. According to the comments made by the Government representative, the Experts, and also from what he knew from other sources, there had been considerable progress over the last few years with regard to awareness of the problem and plans to combat it. This could be traced back to the participation of India in the IPEC programme of the ILO. He had been impressed by what was being done on the legislative level, as reported by the Government representative earlier, although tangible results could not actually be found immediately. His Minister, who had visited India with a high-ranking ILO official, and who had seen some projects that had been carried out under the IPEC programme, had noted that a certain amount of success had been achieved. He welcomed the commitment of many Indian NGOs which were trying to do away with the worst aspects of this phenomenon. Finally, the speaker asked the Government representative to do something for the safety and security of the Chairman of the South Asia Coalition on Child Servitude (Mr. Kailash Satyarthi), who had been threatened by a carpet manufacturer in India with regard to the statements he had made concerning child labour in the carpet industry in India.

The Government member of Iceland, speaking on behalf of the Governments of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden, indicated that it was clear from the observation made by the Committee of Experts that this case concerned serious violations of Convention No. 29. These violations consisted, amongst others, of bonded labour, child labour and child prostitution. He wholeheartedly supported the long-standing request made to the Government of India by the Experts for urgent improvements so that the situation could be brought in line with the provisions of Convention No. 29.

The Workers' member of France regretted the confusion that had arisen due to the discrepancy in the figures from different sources. In spite of the efforts at persuasion by the Government representative of India, one was obliged to note that this country had ratified Convention No. 29 40 years ago, although it had decided to abolish bonded labour only 20 years ago. It was difficult to believe in these conditions that 2 million children could be removed from hazardous occupations by the year 2000. Paragraph 42 of the observation of the Committee of Experts highlighted an accumulated non-respect of ILO Conventions on forced labour, child labour and discrimination. It would be appropriate to channel current efforts made to eliminate forced labour and bonded labour in the wider process of eliminating child labour. Faced with the situation of children in bondage in the carpet-weaving industry, for example, what measures could the Government take, faced with internal opposition which claimed that such a system was justified? As for children employed in hazardous occupations, their numbers had been stable for some time, which was worrying. While one welcomed the adoption on 16 January 1995 of an action programme on the identification, release and rehabilitation of children who worked, it was doubtful that this programme was applied very meticulously. However, this problem called for a concrete solution without delay which necessarily had to be accompanied by a major battle against poverty and also by economic development and social progress. With the globalization of the economy, it was up to the international community to work to eliminate child labour. Furthermore, it would be appropriate to reinforce national legal instruments against forced labour, bonded labour, child labour and the sexual exploitation of children, since no economic system in the world justified the fact that children were subjected to such treatment. A child martyr was a child who had had his dignity taken away and for whom death would finally be a release. The boy of 12 years, murdered while he fought for the liberation of thousands of other children in bondage, as he had been himself, was in everyone's mind today. The Committee had the right not only to hope for but to demand concrete results, and very quickly.

The Government representative, after noting the apparent confusion in the minds of many speakers between bonded labour, children in bondage and child labour, read out one particular paragraph from his Government's national policy on child labour. This paragraph read that children often worked on the farm and in the fields, in artisan households, or in small, family-centred trade or service establishments where they most often acquired the skills which enabled them to become fully fledged workers in farming households, family establishments or trades. While work of such kind had its own problems, the Government's policy was to concentrate in those sectors or establishments where children were employed outside the family where their exploitation was most likely to arise. The speaker wished to clarify that the figure of 17 million children, referred to as "child labourers" by the Experts, consisted mostly of children working within family establishments, trades or in the agricultural sector. His Government's perception was that there were very few children in bondage, whereas there was a large number of children who were working while they should be at school. It was also the speaker's view that as his country had already ratified six Conventions relating to child labour, the issue of child labour should be discussed under these Conventions and not so much under Convention No. 29 in view of the existence of very few children in bondage in India.

Moreover, the 2 million children estimated to be engaged in hazardous occupations in the Experts' observation were those children who would receive the Government's attention first. It would then attend to the problems of those who were not in such hazardous employment. Another important point to be clarified was the question as to whether the programmes that were formulated by the central Government were binding on the state Governments. In the subject-matter of labour, both the central and state Governments jointly operated so that while the central Government's legislation had overriding power over the legislation of the state Government, the central Government would normally give the responsibility for implementing the legislation to the state Governments. Therefore, there was a need for tremendous coordination between central and state Governments since the latter would have to help in implementing and monitoring the federal legislation.

Referring to why the National Commission on Bonded Labour, as recommended by the National Commission on Rural Labour, was not being appointed, the speaker indicated that his Government felt that the National Human Rights Commission and the State Human Rights Commissions that might come up very shortly would be able to discharge their duties. However, a committee under the chairmanship of the Labour Minister had already been appointed to look into the need for a national commission on bonded labour and the Government would examine this report as soon as it was available.

Furthermore, while he had not stated that trade unions were not welcome in the process of eliminating child labour, he nevertheless considered that it might not be a workable proposition for this organized structure to take the responsibility of identification, release and rehabilitation of the children concerned. As the Government member of Germany had already pointed out, a lot of work was being done through the IPEC where trade unions were involved, not only in creating awareness but also in making sure that parents got to know of the ill-effects of sending their children to work. The speaker underlined that under the IPEC programme, 55,000 children had been brought out of the world of work into the world of education. Similarly, under the National Child Labour Projects about 15,000 children had left the world of work to join schools and to have some vocational training. He felt that the results were just starting to flow in and that more results would occur as these new large-scale schemes came into operation.

Referring to the concern expressed by certain speakers about the lack of prosecutions and convictions against those employing child workers, it was his view that it was a general investment in education and human resource development that would help to resolve the problem of child labour and not large-scale prosecutions and convictions. In this respect, he indicated that only 12-13 states out of the 32 states and union territories in his country had this problem. This was because the literacy rate in the remaining states was much higher compared to that in those states where there was a problem. For example, in the State of Kerala where the biggest employers were the plantations, children had worked in those plantations earlier on. However, the Plantation Labour

Act, which had provided not so much for prosecutions and convictions as it had provided for welfare measures and mandatory provisions for health and education, had most certainly helped in eradicating child labour in those plantations.

Finally, the Government representative assured the Chairman and the Committee members that with regard to the case of Mr. Kailash Sathyarti, an activist of the Bonded Labour Liberation Front of India, this case was filed by an individual exporter who had as much legal right as anybody to let the law of the land take its own course. This had happened on 1 June 1995, and although his Government did not yet have all the facts formally it had been ascertained informally that Mr. Sathyarti had already been released on bail and that the law would take its own course.

The Workers' members thought it necessary to clarify the definitions and distinctions, which could perhaps be requested to the Committee of Experts. Such clarification would also make it possible better to establish the number of children concerned. The number of about 17 million of children working simply in their family business of agricultural or artisan occupations had never before been referred to. The Government representative had also clarified that about 2 million children were employed in dangerous works.

The Workers' members welcomed the assurance made by the Employers' member of India since the employers and their organizations, like the workers' organizations, had an essential role to play. Further efforts must be made to discourage violations. Both the Committee of Experts and this Committee had reason to consider such measures as an indicator of the determination of the Government to solve this problem.

The Employers' members thought that the discussion had more or less confirmed their viewpoint initial. They received with scepticism the indication that no child bonded labour existed, especially because a joint programme of the Government and NGOs was precisely aimed at fighting against this phenomenon. This programme should help to accumulate statistics on the size of that programme.

The efforts for education were no doubt essential but, as the Workers' members pointed out, they could not substitute the effective application of the law. Although India had taken new important programmes in the field of child labour, significant progress could not be observed in the elimination of bonded labour or other forms of work of children. Given the apparent dimensions of the problem, the situation needed to be reversed as an urgent matter.

The Committee took note of the observation of the Committee of Experts and the comprehensive oral and written reports of the Indian Government representative. The Committee recognized the fact that the Government had expressed its readiness to cooperate and had proven this once more by providing the Committee with this information.

The Committee, however, was extremely concerned with regard to the scope and the seriousness of the problem of prohibited child labour, and the Committee considered the problem of child labour as the most important component of the overall problem of bonded labour and forced labour in India. An effective combating of this problem required the identification, release and rehabilitation of the children concerned. The plans and measures for eliminating this evil must, in the mind of the Committee, be considerably extended, strengthened and accelerated. That was particularly true because a serious violation of the fundamental Convention No. 29 had been going on for such a long period of time and because of the enormous number of children concerned. This represented an intolerable situation at the end of the twentieth century.

The Committee therefore urged the Government to improve and strengthen all possible efforts in this direction; in particular the Government at the national level should improve its coordinating activities and its supervisory activities in combating child labour. But, at the same time, the Government, as far as possible, should also make sure that the government authorities were more active at the local level.

The identification, release and rehabilitation of children working in this prohibited employment must, in the opinion of the Committee, be made more effectively and in greater detail and more comprehensively. Therefore, there had to be a greater possibility for sanctioning those responsible.

In the light of the discussion and the conclusions of this Committee over the last few years, and in the light of the inadequate degree of progress which had been made, the Committee was deeply concerned and urged the Government to adopt the measures already mentioned and to use all the resources available to them so that very soon and certainly well before the year 2000 a true degree of progress could be registered.

The Government was also urged to report in detail on all measures taken and any progress made.

Myanmar (ratification: 1955). The Government supplied the following information:

The Village Act and the Towns Act, the two laws in question administered by the General Administration Department of the Ministry of Home Affairs, are among the list of laws that were first reviewed on 29 January 1995, and again on 16 May 1995, by a Board comprising the Deputy Minister for Labour, as the Chairman, and representatives of the Prime Minister's Office, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Attorney-General's Office and the General Administration Department as its members.

The Board found that these two laws were no longer in conformity with the prevailing conditions in the country, besides not being in line with the provisions of Convention No. 29. This finding is in agreement with the conclusion drawn by the tripartite committee set up by the Governing Body of the ILO to consider the representation made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) under article 24 of the ILO Constitution alleging non-observance by Myanmar of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29).

Consequently, the Government of Myanmar, in compliance with the request from the Governing Body, "to ensure that the relevant legislative texts, in particular, the Village Act and the Towns Act, are brought in line with the Convention" and "to ensure that formal repeal of powers to impose compulsory labour be followed up in practice and that those resorting to coercion in the recruitment of labour be punished", has started the process of amending these laws.

In addition, a Government representative referred to the written information.

The Workers' members indicated that this case had been retained due to the seriousness of the violations of the Convention and because recent developments were worrying; these concerns could not be eased by the information given by the Government. For more than 30 years, the Committee of Experts had denounced the forced labour that was taking place in this country. This case had been discussed in 1992. Further to this, the Governing Body had adopted the report of the committee established to examine the representation presented by the ICFTU under article 24 of the ILO Constitution. In fact, in spite of the various situations condemned by the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Myanmar in his report, the Government confined itself to stating that it wished to amend its Village Act and Towns Act, without filing any information on tangible improvements. The situation of forced labour had continued to deteriorate since the authorities had recourse to forced labour to build a touristic infrastructure, on the fallacious pretext that these constructions were needed for the population. Contrary to what the authorities said, there was no question here of voluntary work within the meaning of the exception provided for in Article 2(2)(e) of the Convention, which was aimed at maintenance work performed in the direct interest of the community concerned, as the Committee of Experts had pointed out. The Committee had further noted that the Village Act and the Towns Act allowed the requisitioning of inhabitants. In this country, the army requisitioned men, women and children to carry out auxiliary military tasks for long periods of time and in terrible conditions. It was to be feared that the Government would not undertake any amendment of its legislation, as long as it considered that it had not finished carrying out its ambitious projects. Thus, it would be desirable that the Conference Committee, like the Committee of Experts, request in its conclusions that the legislation be amended, that recourse to forced labour be abandoned, both in public works projects as well as in compulsory portage services for the military and that the Government provide detailed information to the Committee of Experts.

The Employers' members concurred entirely with what had been stated by the Workers' members. They recalled that the Government had ratified this Convention nearly 40 years ago. They were concerned about the serious problems of compulsory portage that was permitted under the Village Act and Towns Act and of forced labour in public works projects. Although the Government had been stating since 1967 that the authorities no longer applied the compulsory portage provisions, it had blurred the distinction between what it considered to be compulsory labour and voluntary labour and had asked the Committee to believe that labour for public works projects was voluntary. Yet, it was reported in the Experts' observation that hundreds of porters had been killed by the military. The Experts had also commented on the existence of very poor working conditions and the numerous public works projects that had taken place in circumstances that were clearly less than voluntary. As a result, the Employers' members were somewhat sceptical about the real effect on ending forced labour of the Government's statement that the Village Act and Towns Act were being amended. While they urged the Government to amend these Acts as soon as possible, they considered that there was not going to be any real progress at all as long as the Government held the view that compulsory labour under the supervision of the public authorities and the military was really voluntary labour. The continuation of the Government's longstanding forced labour policies was clearly unacceptable and a violation of Convention No. 29 that had to be remedied as soon as possible.

The Workers' member of the United States indicated that while the Government representative had asserted that there was no forced labour in Myanmar there was ample evidence to the contrary, reflected in the voluminous documents examined by the Committee of Experts and other international bodies, such as the UN Commission on Human Rights. The Government representative had indicated that the Village Act and the Towns Act were in the process of being amended. However, only two days ago, according to a Reuters' report from a Thai military source, military authorities in south-east Myanmar were again rounding up civilians to work as porters in preparation for further attacks on ethnic minority rebels in the area. The speaker contended that there were similar stories about forced labour in Myanmar almost every week. Moreover, in the Experts' observation, the Government had stated that nearly 800,000 people had volunteered their services to build roads and railroads for little or no remuneration. However, the fact of the matter was that there were photographs of people in shackles, building what was now being called the "death railroad". There was also new information surfacing on the Government's $1 billion gas pipeline project paid for by the American corporation UNOCAL and its French counterpart, TOTAL. Villagers had not only lost their lands but had been forced to clear them to make way for the pipeline. Village after village was being razed in this manner by those who had lived in them their whole lives. This case reflected a vast system of forced labour which, to one degree or another, ensnared virtually every family in Myanmar. The stubborn refusal of the Government to dismantle its system of forced labour, as required by Convention No. 29, was an extremely serious matter.

The Workers' member of Australia pointed out that the recent resolution of the UN Commission on Human Rights, which expressed great concern at the continuing violation of human rights in Myanmar, and in particular forced labour, was sponsored by 27 governments and adopted unanimously by the 53 governments making up the Commission. It was therefore important that this Committee join with other international fora to add its weight to the condemnation of forced labour in contravention of Convention No. 29. Secondly, the current drive by the Government to promote tourism for 1996 required a range of infrastructure developments, including hotels, restaurants, tourist resorts and transportation, which meant that forced labour continued unabated. The Government, in a strategic and systematic way, was using forced labour to develop holiday resorts for tourists. For example, workers had been conscripted to clean out with bare hands the Mandalay canal, a canal ten kilometres long and more than three metres deep. Houses bordering the canal had been demolished and local people forced by military forces to work 24-hour shifts. A further 2,000 prisoners in chains had been brought in to assist. A BBC report in recent days had referred to hoards of men and women in Mandalay itself cleaning streets and historic buildings under armed guard. Some 30,000 workers had not been paid in the development of the new airport in Basang. These examples were but a few of the denial of fundamental and core labour rights of workers by the military government in Myanmar, in flagrant violation of Convention No. 29.

The Government member of the United States expressed her very grave concern about the Myanmar Government's application of Convention No. 29. While she understood the respected tradition of voluntary community service that existed in Myanmar, she pointed out that this case did not concern instances of true voluntary labour. Rather, people were being forcibly conscripted, taken from their villages and farms and being made to work, often without pay or food, under threat of heavy fines, and subjected to severe physical abuse. Some of these workers had died as a result of mistreatment and some had been murdered. The widespread and abusive use of forced labour in Myanmar was a phenomenon that was well documented by the international community. What was unacceptable and alarming was that not only had the Government failed to suppress the use of forced labour but apparently had even promoted the spread of this practice. While acknowledging that the Government had recognized that the Village Act and the Towns Act were not in conformity with Convention No. 29, and had embarked on the process of amending these texts, she stressed that these legal measures must be followed up in practice. It was absolutely essential that the Government issue the necessary orders to its military officers that compulsory portage and forced imposition of labour for public works must cease. Alleged violations must be investigated rapidly and thoroughly, and those responsible for these violations must be prosecuted and punished. She urged the Government to undertake, without delay, all necessary measures to bring its law and practice into conformity with Convention No. 29 and, moreover, in so doing, to take full advantage of the technical assistance of the ILO.

The Workers' member of Greece pointed out that there were discrepancies, on the one hand, between the Government representative's statement according to which there was no forced labour in the country and that people worked voluntarily, and, on the other hand, the reality as reflected by detailed testimony including the report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Myanmar. All these overwhelming facts reflected the conditions in which thousands of individuals were in fact obliged to work. Faced with the seriousness of the situation, the Conference Committee had to go beyond its customary moderation to denounce once again in very strong terms a situation which unfortunately did not constitute an isolated case.

The Workers' member of Italy considered that the political changes referred to by the Government representatives should be understood negatively if the reality of the situation was to be acknowledged. In this country, where persons from the opposition such as the Nobel Peace Laureate, Ms. Aung San Suu Kyi, were imprisoned, the military forced workers to work in public works projects which had cost innumerable human lives, as confirmed by the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in this country. It was appropriate to note that children were also forced to work and that the rate of enrolment of children in schools had dropped considerably, with 40 per cent of children not finishing compulsory education. The speaker concluded by calling on private enterprises and even on States to exert pressure on this Government so that the situation would change.

The Government member of Australia joined previous speakers in expressing his grave concern at the violations of human rights in Myanmar. He was particularly concerned about the cases of forced labour in public works and compulsory portage services for the military. He strongly urged the Government to guarantee full respect of human rights and fundamental freedoms and to meet without delay its obligations under Convention No. 29.

The Government representative pointed out that since Myanmar was a developing country and nearly 70 per cent of the population were agricultural workers, the Government was developing the infrastructure of the country in order to alleviate poverty and to improve the socio-economic conditions of the people. Indeed, many projects, such as the building of roads, railroads, bridges, dams, and reservoirs, were being carried out throughout the country, especially in the border regions where armed groups once operated. If the Government was really forcing the people to work in the projects as alleged, why had so many armed groups that had been fighting against successive governments for so many decades chosen to join hands with the Government for the development of their region? The answer could only be that the projects undertaken by the Government were really only for the good of the people. It was not for the Government and it was not for the military. In the tradition of using voluntary labour for the community development of each area or region, personnel from military units stationed in the area always took part in volunteering their labour. Government employees from the ministry concerned also participated.

The Government representative then referred to the UN Special Rapporteur mentioned in the Experts' observation. According to the Government representative, the Special Rapporteur who had visited a railroad project had indicated in his report that workers had been given work by the piece rather than by the day and that working hours were from 8 a.m. to 11 a.m. and from 1 p.m. to 4 p.m., and that each round of duty normally lasted one or two weeks. The workers were each paid 30 kyats for a piece of one cubic metre, which meant a working day for one or two persons. Wages were paid by the Government to the whole village at the end of the contribution. The Special Rapporteur had the opportunity to visit the dispensary built near the construction site to assist workers who were required to rest from work. When the illness of the workers was serious, the authorities released the sick worker from duty and sent him to an appropriate hospital. During his visit to Myanmar in November last year, the Special Rapporteur travelled to Magwe State to visit the newly completed Pakokku-Mying-Myo Soe section of the Pakokku-Gangaw-Kalay railway. The Special Rapporteur had the opportunity to speak with the people assembling around the railway station at which the train stopped. The Special Rapporteur had reported to the Committee as follows: "Apparently, the local population seemed to enjoy the opening ceremony and was happy to benefit from the new facilities." The speaker indicated that for their contribution towards community development, remuneration was given to voluntary workers by the Government, either on a piece-rate basis or at the prevailing wage rate. In some cases, the authorities disbursed a lump sum of money for the benefit of the whole community. The Government had, up to now, disbursed a total of 133.47 million kyats to the local population who had contributed labour in the various railroad projects. A medical doctor had been assigned to each of the sections by the Myanma Railways during the construction of the railway lines, and the Chief Medical Officer had toured the area at least once a month in order to provide health care for the local populace. In case of injuries and casualties arising from the construction work, compensation was paid by the Myanma Railways to the persons concerned. With regard to the use by the military of porters, the reason why the security forces had had to use such civilian labourers was that the Government had to deal with armed groups that had terrorized the lives of Myanmar citizens. However, the Government had been inviting the armed groups to join hands with it in developing their regions and 14 such groups had done so and the problem of having to use recruited labourers no longer existed in the areas once occupied by these groups. It was not true that porters were treated harshly and inhumanely. They were recruited and employed by security forces based on the following three criteria: they had to be unemployed, physically fit and a reasonable amount of wages had to be agreed on beforehand. Apart from daily wages and food rations, they were entitled to receive rail and steamer travelling warrants or actual money to cover the cost of transport to and from their homes, and the respective military unit had the responsibility of providing accommodation, medical coverage, etc. In the unlikely event of a loss of life or limb, they or their families were compensated in accordance with the Workers' Compensation Act.

With regard to prison labour, in a great number of countries throughout the world, sentences were passed by courts of law to include compulsory labour for serious offences under national law. In Myanmar, such sentences were part of the rehabilitation process. Furthermore, prisoners could enjoy reduction of sentences through contribution of labour. For example, on 25 March 1995, the Ministry of Home Affairs issued an order which stated that the sentences of over 23,000 prisoners, who had diligently contributed their labour at the various regional development work camps, had been reduced by one-third under section 401(1) of the Penal Code. As of April 1995, over 5,600 prisoners had been released. The Special Rapporteur had witnessed one of these voluntary labour worksites during his visit to Myanmar last year and had reflected this in his report to the 51st Session of the Commission on Human Rights, as follows: "Around 200 unchained prisoners were involved in the building of the moat by piling and transporting rocks. They seemed in good health. Prisoners were seen working hand-in-hand with armed forces personnel and local civilians. Generally, prisoners as well as soldiers worked eight hours a day on a voluntary basis. Once the defined part of the work was accomplished, a wage was distributed among the prisoners who were involved in the labour. Food was provided free and they were entitled to three meals a day." Another point the speaker wished to make was that disciplinary action was taken against those members of the security forces who had broken the law. Finally, the speaker pointed out that Myanmar had ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child on 16 July 1991 and that a Law respecting children had been promulgated on 14 July 1993. Committees concerning the right of the child, at the national, state and district level, had been formed and up to now there had been no complaints about forced child labour. Schools were opened in Myanmar and the children were attending them as usual. There was no evidence of any drop in enrolment. If a person was found guilty of forcing a child to work in life-threatening or dangerous conditions, or to engage in work that would result in contracting diseases, that person would be sentenced to six months' imprisonment or a fine.

The Workers' members suggested that the conclusions adopted by the Committee should appear in a special paragraph of its General Report, so as to have more of an impact, given the seriousness of the situation in the country and the absence of any progress with regard to forced labour.

The Employers' members summed up this case and the Government representative's view as "the end justifies the means". Economic development and development of infrastructure, in the Government's mind, justified the use of forced labour. However, Myanmar had ratified this Convention 40 years ago and it had an international obligation to respect. In this Committee, special paragraphs were reserved for very serious cases. This case, involving forced labour, was such a case and therefore the conclusions of this case should appear in a special paragraph in the Committee's report.

The Committee took note of the statement made by the Government representative that measures were under way for amending the Village Act and Towns Act which contained provisions contravening Convention No. 29. It recalled that the Government had been told about this for nearly 30 years. It also recalled the adoption in 1994, by the Governing Body, of the recommendations of its tripartite Committee for the repeal of the offensive provisions. The Committee could not find a way to agree with the position of the Government, as reported to the Committee of Experts, that what was being alleged to be forced labour was actually voluntary labour. The Committee further recalled the report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on human rights in Myanmar and deprecated a situation in Myanmar as reflected in this report. In these circumstances, the Committee called upon the Government to urgently repeal the offensive legal provisions under the Village Act and the Towns Act to bring them into line with the letter and spirit of Convention No. 29, to terminate forced labour practices on the ground, to provide for and award exemplary penalties against those exacting forced labour, and to furnish a detailed report to the Committee of Experts on legislative and practical measures adopted to fall in line with Convention No. 29. The Committee also decided to mention this conclusion in a special paragraph of its General Report.

Panama (ratification: 1966). A Government representative of Panama recognized that the draft law to repeal and amend various sections of the Administrative Code had been submitted for ten years to the Legislative Assembly for approval without any successful voting. However, the new national Government set up nine months ago was currently endeavouring to harmonize national legislation with the ratified ILO Conventions. Also, with the active participation of legal professionals and the Supreme Court of Justice, revision was going on of existing codification to guarantee due process of law. This would lead to greater guarantees for defence of the accused in the face of standards which dated from 1916, as was the case of the Administrative Code. She considered that the draft bill, which would bring the 79-year-old legislation into harmony with Convention No. 29, would be well accepted in the legislative body. Act No. 112 of 1974 gave the police authorities the power to make summary judgements and to impose sanctions, but now fines could be imposed instead. The situation had, therefore, been improved although not yet to the optimum. It was a part of the modernization of the judicial system in the country to abolish forced labour in accordance with Convention No. 29.

She added that the issue of employment was a great concern for Panama as it was for the ILO. The Government was aware of the need to consider work as a voluntary chosen means of earning one's living and not as a punishment or a penalty. It was for this purpose that the Government had taken action to submit the draft bill in question yet once more to the respective authority – the Ministry of Government and Justice. This had been done on 12 May this year by Note No. DM 263.95, so that it could be submitted to the Legislative Assembly for adoption. She concluded by hoping that the Government would be able to communicate to the ILO that the necessary measures had been taken to eliminate these provisions which should not be part of the national legislation.

The Employers' members recalled with regret that this was a long-standing case, although the substance was clear. They considered that the Committee should urge a rapid change and wondered if it was possible for the Government to provide a time schedule within which modifications to these legislative provisions would be expected.

The Workers' members also noted that no progress had been made for more than ten years. They pointed out that the Committee of Experts' remarks concerned not only the principle but also the practical protection from forced labour. The Government should be firmly urged to take the necessary measures within a certain time-limit and the case should be re-examined perhaps in a year to see the progress made.

The Workers' member of Panama regretted that a long time had passed without improvement and that the solution depended upon the Ministry of Justice and the Legislative Assembly but hoped that the Government would fulfil its obligation under this Convention.

The Employers' member of Panama noted that, after the dismantling of the national army, the police force in Panama was not empowered to impose forced labour on detainees. He, however, agreed to call upon the Government to take legal measures so that both law and practice could be brought into line with the Convention.

The Government representative responded that the adoption of the draft bill would depend upon Parliament and did not dare to give a specific deadline. She, however, emphasized that the Government would do its best and provide follow-up to the adoption of the draft bill.

The Committee took note of the oral information provided by the Government representative and of the discussion which took place in the Committee. It noted with regret that the draft bill to amend the Administrative Code under which police chiefs are empowered as administrative authorities to impose certain sentences, including labour on public works and detention, had not yet been adopted, although the Government had been referring to this bill for more than ten years and in spite of the information supplied at the 1992 International Labour Conference. The Committee urged the Government to bring about a rapid change in law and practice, preferably within a definite time-frame, to fulfil the relevant provisions of Convention No. 29.

Thailand (ratification: 1969). The Government supplied the following information:

1. Data and trends in the number of child labourers. According to education statistics collected by the Ministry of Education, during the period 1990-1994, 2.56 million children completed compulsory education at the age of 13 and then did not further their education at the intermediate and high school levels. According to the Economic and Social Development Plan No. 8 for the period 1997-2001, the trend in child labour exploitation is projected to decline to 1.4 per cent as a result of the birth control policy in effect during the preceding period. In addition, the policy to expand educational opportunities has led to a decreasing number of children outside the educational system, from 56 per cent in 1990 to 11 per cent in 1994. It is expected that in 1996, the last year of Economic and Social Development Plan No. 7, the Government will succeed in expanding compulsory education from six years (at present) to nine years, which will significantly enhance the opportunity for children to prolong their period of education until the age of 15. In pursuit of this goal, the Ministry of Education has prepared a draft of the Basic Education Act for submission to the Government and the Legislature for consideration. With regard to child labour in the non-agricultural sector, it is estimated that about 95,000 to 100,000 children are employed in small businesses (not over 20 employees) such as clothing, shoe, bag and decoration manufacturing, gem cutting and polishing, automobile and motorcycle repair, and gas stations and restaurants. According to labour inspection undertaken by officers of the Department of Labour Protection and Welfare, it was found that in small businesses, 85 per cent of child labour is from 15 to 18 years of age. No child labour was found in large businesses because they rely heavily on production processes and manufacturing technology that require more physically and mentally mature workers.

2. Child Labour Policy. The policy of the Government of Thailand at the legislative, administrative and operational levels is as follows. With regard to legislative policy, the policy of the Government toward protection of children is set out in section 82 of the Constitution of Thailand 1991: "Government should support the people of working age to obtain employment, and should ensure the fair protection of labour, especially women and child labour, and provide for the labour relations system including the settlement of fair wages". At the administrative level, Economic and Social Development Plan No. 7 for the period 1992-1995 adopts Government policy regarding child labour as reflected in various parts of projects such as the elimination of poverty which is the reason for exploitation of child labour; the expansion of economic and social growth in rural areas and the enlargement of educational opportunities in both conventional and non-conventional academic systems; the consideration of child labour as an economically underprivileged group in need of special treatment; the expansion of labour protection to the agricultural sector; and the development of the quality of life of employees. On 21 October 1992, Prime Minister Chuan Leekpai announced Government policy to Parliament in stating: "Encourage children to have more educational opportunities. Expand compulsory education from six years to nine years, so that children will enter the labour market when they are 15 years of age, which is the suitable age for beginning work because at that age they are considered mentally mature with grown and strong bodies so that they can protect themselves. In addition, they are able to understand how to survive living in the city and working in industry". In an address on 2 November 1992, he reiterated his explicit intention that there be "no exploitation of child labour". At the operational level, the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare announced the following policy on 23 September 1993: "Economically underprivileged groups, especially workers in the agricultural sector, workers paid low wages in cities, women and child labour and Thai workers abroad should have job security, receive fair wages and be sufficiently protected with regard to appropriate working conditions, and should have adequate and thorough welfare coverage".

3. Schemes and Implementation. The problem of child labour exploitation is clearly a social problem affected by imbalanced economic and social development. The Government has long been aware of the fact that children are one of the most precious human resources that will grow up and undertake responsibility for the economy of the country and the good of society. On this basis, the Government has applied its policy and implemented various measures through the Ministries concerned. The Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare has implemented systemized and sweeping schemes, beginning with campaigns to discourage children prior to maturity from entering labour markets, and increasing educational opportunities and options for child labour both in the course of their education and when working, to prevent them from being exploited and abused. Accordingly, three measures were designed to cover all possible aspects: prevention, protection, support and development. All are aimed at one single outcome: the elimination of child labour exploitation. They focus on cooperation among the appropriate offices, both inside and outside the Ministry, and include an effort to invite more involvement from local communities so that they can be part of the mechanism designed to solve the problem. These social measures are as follows:

3.1 Prevention of child labour exploitation. This measure is implemented in order to protect and resolve the problem at an early stage by offering proper direction for children in rural areas who plan to enter the labour market. Not only does this measure provide knowledge and understanding of employees' rights and responsibilities under labour laws, including preparedness and working skill, but it also encourages people's awareness at the village level to convince adults to become more involved and supportive with respect to the anti-child labour exploitation movement. In the year 1995, two significant projects will be implemented. The first is the Woman and Child Rescue Operation Centre, which began in 1994 and is continuing to this date. Its budget of 9.8 million bahts is directed to areas, activities and targets as follows: (1) Children who are outside of the educational system aged 13 to 18 years. (2) Targeted areas, focusing on where there is a low rate of intermediate education, and/or a heavy volume of child labour migration, in two districts of each province, except for Bangkok and the neighbouring five provinces. (3) Activities include: (i) establishment of the Woman and Child Labour Rescue Operation Centre in all 76 provinces, chaired by the governor and comprised of high-ranking representatives of the provincial office of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare and high-ranking representatives of other governmental offices concerned, as well as representatives of non-governmental organizations, if necessary; (ii) establishment of a training programme for village labour volunteers in 70 provinces (two districts for each province, and 85 villages in each district, amounting to a total of 11,900 training programmes); (iii) training of community leaders of 85 villages of both districts of 70 provinces; (iv) training on child labour for 40 school principals and two district education officers of each of 24 provinces, amounting to a total of 1,008 persons trained; (v) training of children regarding preparedness for working, involving 28,800 children (two districts of each of 24 provinces, and 30 students from 20 schools in each district covered); (vi) cooperation regarding occupational training programmes in 70 provinces, involving 30 participants in each province, amounting to a total of 1,008 participants.

The second significant project to be implemented in 1995 is referred to as "Prevention and Resolution of Child Labour Exploitation (Regional)". Cabinet granted approval in principle on 1 November 1994 to the improvement by the Department of Labour Protection and Welfare of the five-year project on the prevention and resolution of child labour exploitation (regional) under a budget of 210 million bahts. This project will be responsive to activities carried out by the Woman and Child Labour Rescue Operation Centre, focusing on child labour in rural areas. An application has been made to the Budget Bureau for the budget for the fiscal year 1995.

3.2 Anti-child labour exploitation scheme. Children who work in working premises ("destination child labour") would be entitled to working conditions and employment protection under the Labour Protection Act. In addition to the general provisions regarding hours of work and days of work, the Act also includes the following specific provisions regarding the exploitation of child labour: (1) Employment of children under the age of 13 shall be absolutely prohibited. (2) Children under 15 years of age but at least aged 13 would be permitted to work at commercial premises not involving the sale or consumption of liquor, newspaper delivery, sport-related services, collecting and selling flowers, selling tea and alcohol-free refreshments, and work involving lifting, carrying, supporting or pulling objects weighing not over 10 kilograms. (3) Children between 13 years and 18 years of age shall not be permitted to work in the five following premises: slaughterhouses, gambling places, dance floors, Thai local dance floors whether or not prostitutes are permitted to be present, places where food and liquor are served and prostitutes are present to take care of customers, brothels, and massage services with or without prostitutes offering sexual services. In order to implement the established schemes, the following activities were carried out: (1) District labour inspectors in Bangkok from 36 districts (a total of 100 officers), and provincial labour inspectors of 75 provinces (300 officers) launched an intensive labour inspection of working premises from January to September of 1994; 27,066 working premises throughout the country and a total of 1,399,176 employees (670,299 male workers and 719,971 female workers) were inspected; 230 of these employees were under 13 years of age; 1,184 were at least 13 but under 15 years of age; and 7,562 were at least 15 but under 18 years of age. In 23 cases, employers were prosecuted on the basis of allegations of child labour exploitation. (2) Letters were circulated to 904 trade unions that have a total of 240,000 members asking them to help by inspecting and reporting to officers if any kind of child labour exploitation was found in their areas. (3) A training programme was established for 2,000 professional bikers to encourage them to undertake surveillance to determine whether any form of child labour exploitation was occurring concealed in small and barely accessible areas such as commercial buildings in small roads (referred to as "soi"). (4) Letters were circulated requesting assistance from non-governmental organizations such as the Child Development Foundation (CDF). (5) A grievance centre was established that offered a 24-hour "Hot-Line Service", with numbers to be called during and outside hours of work. In 1994, there were 166 calls concerning complaints. When investigated, in seven cases the alleged working premises were not located; in 63 cases the alleged exploitation was not found; in 96 cases the alleged child exploitation was found but there was no child confinement; 830 child employees were found (two under the age of 13, 110 at least 13 but under 15 years of age; and 718 between the ages of 15 and 18; in 14 cases prosecutions were carried out; and in 36 cases written warnings were issued suggesting that employers comply with the law. Eleven child workers returned to their domicile, new jobs were arranged for eight child workers, and nine were sent to the public foster home. Forty child workers were represented by the officers for the purpose of obtaining rights and benefits withheld from them by their employers. (6) Cooperation with the Department of Employment Service to acquire additional information regarding the employment of child labour in order to be able to dispatch labour inspectors to determine whether there was any form of child labour exploitation. In October 1994 there were 892 children from 15 to 18 years of age employed by 421 employers. Of these children, 603 worked as salespersons, 39 as manufacturing staff, 18 as general staff, 44 as delivery staff, 48 as household workers, and 140 were involved in other activities. (7) An amendment of the Labour Protection Act is currently under consideration that would reduce the hours of work of child workers to six hours per day. A new regulation that would offer a reward to informants who disclose information leading to the prosecution of persons who exploit, confine, restrict or abuse child labour is also under consideration.

3.3 Development of anti-child labour exploitation schemes. The development of anti-child labour exploitation practised in the workplace ("destination labour") will be more focused on quality of life, creation of opportunities, educational options, and enhancement of working skill for child labour for the purpose of increasing quality of life, knowledge and working skill to assist them to obtain better jobs and higher incomes. The following activities and targets have been established for the fiscal year 1995: (1) Lectures on law, ethics, drugs, quality of life improvement and recreation for 1,920 child workers in working premises. (2) Establishment of a programme on the improvement of the quality of life of child labour. (3) Activities in accordance with the Support and Development of Child Labour in Working Premises Project in compliance with Cabinet Resolution dated 25 November 1994, funded by the 1995 fiscal year budget to carry out the following development of anti-child labour in working premises: (i) arrangement of compulsory education for 410 child workers in business premises; (ii) working skills training programme for 410 child workers in business premises; (iii) child labour corners in ten schools; (iv) recreation programme for 540 child workers.

3.4 Anti-Child Labour Exploitation Committee. This Committee was established by Cabinet Resolution in order to determine the approach and measures necessary for the protection and development of anti-child labour exploitation schemes. It is chaired by the Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, who is empowered to appoint four subcommittees: (1) The Subcommittee on the Elimination and Prevention of Child Labour Exploitation chaired by the Deputy Permanent Secretary, which held a meeting to consider the draft regulation of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare regarding the payment of rewards in child exploitation cases. (2) The Subcommittee on Cooperation regarding Anti-Child Labour Exploitation chaired by the Director-General of the Department of Labour Protection and Welfare, which held a meeting to consider and gather plans and projects regarding child labour implemented by governmental offices and non-governmental organizations in order to identify an approach to cooperation (networking). (3) The Subcommittee on Public Relations regarding Anti-Child Labour Exploitation, chaired by the Director-General of the Department of Public Relations, which held a meeting to consider the approach to preventing child labour exploitation. (4) The Subcommittee on Addressing Basic Necessities of Child Labour chaired by the Permanent Secretary of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare.

3.5 Cooperation with the International Labour Organization. Thailand, as represented by the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, has participated in the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC) since 1992 and implemented a pilot project to campaign for and encourage that all relevant factions be more concerned and involved in the programme of prevention and elimination of child labour. In 1995, there are plans to carry out the following tasks: (1) Improvement of the project management system by establishing the international project management bureau regarding elimination of child labour exploitation to be located in the Office of the Permanent Secretary of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, to function as a cooperative unit on data, planning, projects, budgeting, and cooperation among the governmental offices and non-governmental organizations to enable consistency and cooperation regarding information and news concerning the IPEC project. (2) Improvement of the National Steering Committee (NSC) functions in determining policies, direction of the anti-child labour exploitation movement, and consideration and approval of project operation plans applying for assistance from IPEC. (3) Improvement of a pilot project to determine the form and approach of child labour elimination and apply for financial assistance (15 million bahts) from ILO/IPEC to finance the following projects: (i) project to establish a child labour information centre; (ii) project to increase the effectiveness of child labour inspection; and (iii) project to support and develop anti-child exploitation in working premises.

In addition, a Government representative stated that the Thai Government had long been aware of the fact that children were a most precious human resource. The Government was promoting the opportunity for their higher education and was trying to abolish the abuse of child labour, and measures had also been taken to protect working children in establishments. The child labour problem had been recognized as a high policy priority. The Government, since 1992, had prepared a document to abolish the abuse of child labour. In November 1994, the Government approved a large budget for a five-year programme on preventing and eliminating problems in rural areas, and to improve the working conditions of children in establishments.

He referred to the assistance provided by the ILO and the International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC), starting from July 1992, composed of various action programmes, including the participation of various actors, such as government agencies, NGOs, employers, teachers and the media, to tackle the problems of child labour and of children in prostitution. The contribution of IPEC strengthened the role of the Ministry: for example the Ministry had a national information centre on child labour, conducted training for labour inspectors and operated pilot programmes in provinces. IPEC's initiative also developed alternative education such as skills training and informal education to overcome the risk that girls in the north of Thailand would fall into prostitution. Teachers had also been mobilized to play an active role in creating awareness among schoolchildren in the rural areas. For the next few years the Ministry of Education intended to develop a curriculum at the secondary school-level for girls at risk.

The Government had conducted a review of national policy and programmes on child labour in cooperation with the ILO and IPEC and had used it as one of the inputs to the technical workshop conducted last month, where Government, NGOs, employers' and workers' organizations and academics were invited to propose a plan of action. As a result, a five-year Plan of Action 1996-2000 was prepared and would be utilized by the Government as a framework to tackle the problems.

Measures had also been taken regarding labour inspection: for instance, measures to encourage the disclosure of information leading to the prosecution of those who exploited child labour, and the creation of centres to receive complaints so that immediate inspection could be undertaken to help abused children. In 1994, more labour inspection had been carried out than in previous years, especially in small-scale enterprises, and it had found that the number of employed children had been reduced significantly.

Apart from the deliberations of legislation and enforcement, the Government had made arrangements to ensure that child labour would be prevented at the community level before children entered the labour market. Most children working in Bangkok and in big cities were from rural areas. The Cabinet approved in November 1994 a programme on the prevention of violence against children and to provide children with information and knowledge on their rights, duties and work discipline. The speaker referred to the activities and programmes mentioned in the written information provided. He added that children who continued their studies at the secondary level had increased from 45 per cent to 83 per cent in 1994. The figure further increased if those who were in informal education were included. Success in this regard was due to intensive measures, such as the exemption of tuition fees, free transportation, provision of school uniforms and stationery, free lunches, etc. - measures that were focused especially on rural areas.

The speaker concluded by emphasizing the good intentions and sincerity of the Government to tackle child labour problems, as a means of promoting social development, and assuring that further details would be provided in 1996 as requested by the Committee of Experts.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative of Thailand for the information provided, which gave a fairly good historical review of the developments in the law and practice with respect to child labour in Thailand and, in particular, dealt with aspects of the 1994-95 programme.

This was really a case of whether the glass was half empty or half full. The present Committee had been discussing this case since 1985; this year was the seventh time that this case had been discussed; in 1991 this case was placed in a special paragraph; and in 1993 there was a direct contacts mission by the ILO that immediately followed the restoration of democracy in Thailand. The Employers' members underlined the positive facts that the Government had not denied that child labour existed and that, since 1993, the Committee had seen some improvements in the law prohibiting child labour, particularly with respect to children under the age of 13 and to limits on the kind of work that could be done between the ages of 13 and 15. There were also some indications of government plans to extend compulsory education to grade-7 in the immediate future, but that had not been done yet.

While there was legislation that prohibited child labour, the Employers' members doubted that the inspection process and the prosecution of violations were really effective. Based on the data available it seemed that inspections were somewhat superficial. The low number of prosecutions reported indicated that in most of the cases in which inspectors found violations, prosecutions were not actually carried out. It was hard to determine if the Government had the will because it had programmes and legislation, but did not take the necessary action, including prosecuting those who violated the child labour laws. The Government had good intentions, but it was not aggressive enough in solving the problem of child labour. Concrete steps were needed urgently to improve labour inspection and enforcement of the child labour prohibition.

The Workers' members recalled that the case of Thailand had been discussed frequently by the Committee in relation to the application of the Convention and in particular in 1990, 1991, 1992 and 1994. Likewise, it had been mentioned in a special paragraph in 1992 and a direct contacts mission had taken place in 1993. They also recalled that the conclusions of the present Committee at its last meeting had been very firm. The present Committee had hoped to verify in this year's session a real improvement in the extent to which there was conformity with all provisions of the Convention, and likewise to observe the application of measures and promises announced in the different declarations of the Government to eradicate child labour. The present Committee asked the Government to take all measures, with the help of the ILO if it were necessary, to eliminate child labour. The Government had explicitly expressed promises relating in particular to the education of the population concerning the problems stemming from child labour and to giving priority to the problem; and had promised to send all necessary information to permit the assessment of a real improvement.

The Workers' members stressed that they had hoped for real progress. Unfortunately, the written and oral information provided by the Government did not indicate a change in either thinking or attitude. For numerous years, the Government had acted as if speaking of the abolition of child labour would effectively abolish it. For example, in the written information, the Government had mentioned numerous statistics concerning the effective controls which had resulted in only 23 employers being prosecuted in a country which had thousands of enterprises. There was no indication of the outcome of these prosecutions; furthermore, the Government could, at any time, drop the prosecutions pending before tribunals. The Committee of Experts referred to this point in its report. The Government also reported that there were 36 written warnings issued suggesting that employers comply with the law. The Workers' members asked if the Government could provide precise information on the outcome of these prosecutions. The Government and the Prime Minister had announced for several years that the age for compulsory education would be extended, but stated this in a vague formulation which did not promise anything concrete.

The legislation prohibited child labour; none the less, the sanctions were ridiculous. Only in the case of the death of a child or grave physical or mental abuse, could the employer be sentenced to one year of imprisonment. Likewise a prison sentence could be reduced to a fine, and the Government or certain officials could remove a case from the competence of the court. In the case of a conflict between the Labour Code and the Penal Code – as frequently occurred concerning child labour – the provisions of the Labour Code governed, whose sanctions were very trivial. The Government also referred to social assistance programmes for women and children. The number of children covered by these programmes was extremely limited, considering the magnitude of the problems. The budget allocation for the execution of the Five-year Programme for the prevention of the exploitation of children was in the order of 210 million bahts for the whole five-year period (approximately 10 million Swiss francs). Given the magnitude of the problems, this budget allocation was almost ridiculous. Observing the commitments which had been made and the practice, the Workers' members concluded that the statistics given in the report were unrealistic from the point of view of the magnitude of the problems which were acknowledged, and that the approach that had been taken to the problem was too bureaucratic and too superficial. Child labour did not appear to be a political priority for the authorities. This was the principal conclusion that was taken from the observations of the Committee of Experts. The measures that had been adopted, such as the creation of a Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare or the execution of certain assistance programmes, went in a positive direction but were totally insufficient and were not integrated into a coherent and sustained policy. Measures such as the extension of the age of compulsory education, the reinforcement of sanctions, the improvement of prosecutions, and the education of the public were not sufficient.

In agreement with the Committee of Experts, the Workers' members considered that fundamental rights must be respected by all countries, irrespective of the level of economic and political development. The Committee of Experts called attention to the fact that Thailand had attained a spectacular level of economic growth, and was an emerging industrialized country. This development was positive, but unfortunately widespread poverty, and profound inequalities between the rich and the poor had been aggravated. Equitable distribution of the wealth which came from world economic markets did not exist, in particular given that there was a lack of fiscal and social policy and of an effective education policy.

Lastly, the Workers' members thought that the Government should: (1) take into account the observations, requests and suggestions of the Committee of Experts; (2) immediately apply a coherent and sustained policy and take concrete measures, such as establishing a complete and operative judicial framework which included effective prosecutions, sanctions, inspections, and action to combat child labour; (3) develop coherent and credible programmes and take sufficient budgetary measures for the reintegration into society of children who were the victims of forced labour, of dangerous jobs, of jobs which harmed their health, and of sexual exploitation, all in collaboration with the ILO; (4) proceed with the extension of compulsory education; (5) conduct education campaigns for the public to combat child labour and fraudulent recruitment; and (6) guarantee the application of a coherent social policy with the aim of promoting the distribution of the fruits of economic progress throughout the population.

The Workers' members requested that the conclusions of the Committee include a special paragraph, given the gravity of the problems and the overly formal and bureaucratic approach, with the objective of signalling that the time for reflection and half measures had ended.

The Workers' member of Italy agreed with the statements of the Workers' members. He indicated that, although Thailand had been a democratic Government since 1992, had taken action at the legislative level and had cooperated with the ILO (in the framework of the Committee of Experts, by accepting a direct contacts mission and by participating in IPEC), the persistence of child labour and sexual exploitation, and of forced labour in general, offered a gloomy picture. The penalties provided for in legislation against such violations were lenient and were also open to negotiation between the guilty parties and the authorities, with the imaginable consequence of corruption. A political determination to confront the problems in question did not exist. A grave situation existed in which thousands of children were forced into prostitution, where the spread of AIDS increased and children were increasingly being born infected by the virus transmitted by their mothers. This past year the Committee learned that several million children under the age of 12 were working in enterprises in the country. Eradicating this tragedy required intensive work at the national level since these practices were rooted in society and authority, in particular following a period in which democracy did not exist. At the international level everything possible must be done to produce a positive change in the sense indicated by the Committee of Experts concerning concrete action, measures and strategies. The International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour should be strengthened. The Government should collaborate with the ILO to improve the legislation, with the Committee on Human Rights, and with the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child. Governments and interested social groups should be invited to adopt a code of conduct which would apply to tourist agencies and which would prohibit those services that promote the sexual exploitation of children. Regional organizations such as the European Union and the international organizations for economic planning which exist in Asia, and in the Pacific in general, should elaborate programmes in the framework of their activities and economic relations, to eliminate forced labour and the exploitation of children in the world.

The Workers' member of Korea drew the attention of the Committee to the fraudulent recruiting, kidnapping and trafficking of girls in the north-eastern border region of Thailand and from neighbouring countries, for sexual slavery. Sexual slavery of young girls was clearly the most serious and intolerable criminal act which should be prevented and, if done, be punished most severely. A meagre fine or a maximum one year prison sentence was not sufficient.

The Workers' member of Japan noted that, unfortunately, child labour and abuse still persisted not only in Thailand, but also in many other countries. But this case was particularly serious because the systematic organization of child labour had been left largely unabated. The Government representative provided detailed information on measures taken, but actual progress had been slow and the achievement so far was not substantial enough. The present Committee should request the Government of Thailand to take more stringent measures against those who had broken the law, and emphasize the need to strengthen the law and legislation so that those people who were engaged in organizing child labour could be brought to justice more effectively. Furthermore, the Government must embark upon a comprehensive programme with the cooperation of the ILO and other UN agencies operating in the field of child protection. The Government should also invite other countries, particularly those countries which have invested heavily in Thailand, or who are extending assistance to Thailand, to take part in such a programme. The speaker stressed that the elimination of child labour must be the prime responsibility of the country concerned but at the same time the international community as a whole must shoulder greater responsibility.

The Government representative of Germany recalled that in 1991 a special paragraph had been devoted to this case in the general part of the report. Since then, there had been at least a change in the awareness of the people responsible for the state of affairs, but that was not enough. The problem in this case was not so much a matter of the legislation as of enforcement of existing legislation and of prosecution and appropriate sanctions. However, the ILO-IPEC evaluation carried out in Thailand identified a number of non-governmental projects which gave a glimmer of hope. The conclusions of the present Committee should encourage the Government of Thailand to take additional measures concerning effective law enforcement and cooperation with IPEC. Likewise, the Committee should continue to support IPEC projects. Regarding the sexual exploitation of children, it was difficult to point a finger only in one direction. Prostitution was a market, with supply and demand. In this situation the supply came from Thailand but the demand usually did not come from Thailand.

The Government member of Finland, speaking also on behalf of the Governments of Denmark, Iceland, Norway and Sweden, observed that Thailand was one of those East Asian countries whose gross national product had increased significantly during the past few years. The state of human rights in that country should be improved accordingly. She hoped that the Government would, with the assistance of the ILO, UNESCO and UNICEF, take all the necessary steps in order to abolish all forms of forced child labour and to give exploited children the possibility to go to school and thus have a future and human dignity.

The Workers' member of Greece indicated that this was a very grave case, and was not limited to legislative aspects. The diplomatic language of the Committee of Experts left out the picture of the situation that had not improved over the past year and which was shameful for humanity. This phenomenon also occurred in other countries. It was intolerable that in Thailand an employer who was guilty of child labour or sexual exploitation would incur a penalty of only one year of imprisonment, which could be reduced to a simple fine. He stressed that sexual exploiters, in place of being judged for violations of the Convention on forced labour, should be judged for premeditated murder. Although there was no doubt that the Government had good intentions and had acted in good faith, it should be underlined that the Government's statistics on convictions did not match its professed intentions. In this regard, he asked the Government representative to clearly state the number of convictions and types of penalties that had been faced by the exploiters of children and their clients. Had any of these people been detained and sentenced? Had anyone been condemned for these sex tours and had a finger been pointed at the agencies which organized them? The speaker indicated that he didn't have much hope that the situation would improve. Public opinion must be mobilized through communication measures and publicity so that all the world would know what was going on in Thailand and other countries, and would stop, with a unified voice, this market which shames humanity.

The Workers' member of Zimbabwe observed that most of the countries in which this type of problem was prevalent were very poor, but Thailand had made very significant developments in terms of its economic growth. The report of the Committee of Experts, based on evidence from mission reports, indicated that there was a clear reluctance on the part of the Government of Thailand to enforce the laws to eradicate child labour, and it was reluctant to use its newly acquired resources to eradicate this very serious problem. Inequalities in the distribution of the fruits of economic growth were the reason why the Workers' members had called for a social clause to be linked to trade. The speaker called on the Government to take note of the points that had been raised by the Committee of Experts to enforce the laws which called for the eradication of child labour.

The Government representative replied that, first, as concerned compulsory education, a system was currently being implemented but it could not be done in a short time. Second, as was mentioned earlier, the percentage of children in school was almost 90 per cent. Third, the abuse of child labour was decreasing. Violations of child labour laws constituted a serious penal offence and information had been provided about 33 cases. The speaker thanked the Committee members for their comments which the Government would consider very seriously, and stated that the Government would report back to the Committee of Experts in 1996.

The Workers' members, after evaluating the discussion which had taken place, indicated that, despite the initiatives adopted, this case should be included in a special paragraph with the objective of calling attention to the importance of the case and the realities which existed, since an approach which was too formal and bureaucratic would be insufficient. A special paragraph would draw attention more effectively; time for reflection and for taking moderate measures had ended. If the Employers' members took another point of view on the special paragraph, then the Committee should clearly adopt firmer conclusions than last year.

The Employers' members declared that they evaluated the case in a manner not very different to the Workers. What was needed was to determine which was the better approach to improve the situation. Given the proportion of the problems created, the conclusions of the Committee should be very vigorous and should ask the Government to eliminate child labour, in particular making labour inspections more effective, as well as increasing the prosecution and sentencing of those who exploited child labour. The Committee should ask the Government to decisively resolve the aforementioned problems. If the Government did not do this, in the following year this case should be put in a different part of the present Committee's report.

The Committee noted the detailed information furnished by the Government in writing, as well as the supplementary oral presentation made by the Government representative. The report of the Government seemed to indicate the good intentions of the Government, as well as certain steps taken in the right direction. While certain changes in the laws had been implemented by the Government, the Committee regretted and was deeply concerned that law enforcement was inadequate, levels of prosecution of offenders were negligible, and penalties rather non-deterrent. In these circumstances, the Committee strongly urged the Government to assign absolute priority to the elimination of child labour. For this purpose, the Government should bring under implementation a coherent, consistent and sustained policy, and follow up the same by immediate measures within an efficient and operational framework supported by meaningful and convincing levels of budgetary allocation. In particular, the Government should establish very strong measures for effective enforcement, severe penalties and exemplary prosecutions that would really serve the objective of eradication of child labour. The Committee further called upon the Government to furnish full information on the measures taken to this effect, as well as on the follow-up of the various plans and schemes referred to in the Government's report so as to enable the Committee to note real progress in the very near future. The Committee also observed that it reserved the right to opt for a special paragraph on the matter after reviewing the performance of the Government next time.

Convention No. 35: Old-Age Insurance (Industry, etc.), 1933

Chile (ratification: 1935). A Government representative recalled that the Committee of Experts had been making observations on Conventions Nos. 35, 36, 37 and 38, which were all adopted in 1933 and ratified by Chile in 1935. He dealt with each point of the observation.

Employers' contribution to the financial resources of the insurance scheme. The pension scheme introduced in 1980 was based on individual capitalization constituted by a compulsory contribution that the employer deducted each month from the worker's wages and a voluntary savings contribution by the worker. Legislative Decree No. 3501 provides in addition that the employers must increase the remuneration of the workers in proportion to the amount of the pension contribution. The net amount available to the worker was thus maintained and the change of legislation did not entail financial consequences. The employers' contribution to the resources of funds was constituted by the payment agreed upon individually or collectively, of the amount into the individual account so as to increase the necessary capital to finance early retirement pension or to increase the amount of the pension. This was an obligatory contribution under the law.

The pension fund was increased in 1994 by 2,600 million pesos (US$6,500,000); in 1993, by 2,500 million pesos (US$6 million), and in 1992 by 1,700 million pesos. This meant that over three years, from 1992 and 1994, employers contributed more than US$15 million. In addition to this, under section 15 of Law No. 16744 on social security against the risk of occupational accident or disease, a basic general contribution was to be paid by the employer, that is, 0.90 per cent, and an additional, variable employer contribution according to the activity and the risk of the firm, which is 3.4 per cent of the worker's remuneration. These obligatory and exclusive contributions of the employer were of a permanent nature.

Contribution of the public authorities to the financial resources of benefits of the insurance scheme. He emphasized that the State did actively participate in the new system. (a) The Chilean Constitution in article 19, section 18, laid down the right to social security as a constitutional guarantee. The administration of a branch of social security, i.e. pensions, was delegated by the State to private bodies called "Pension-Fund Administrations (AFPs)". The State kept a watchful eye through the Administrative Pension Fund Supervisory Board, which was a central state body. This supervision has a monitoring and standard-setting role: standard-setting because it gave instructions with respect to obligatory processes for all the institutions supervised, and monitoring with respect to verifying compliance with the legal obligations imposed on AFPs. (b) Legislative Decree No. 3500 of 1980 laid down the State's participation in the constitution of resources by means of the state guarantee. It guaranteed minimum old age, disability and survivors' pensions to the beneficiaries and over and above this, and financed a voucher system (bono de reconocimiento) for former payments made under the old pension fund system. The state guarantee, which took the form of so-called programmed retirement and temporary pensions, worked once the resources of the individual accounts were in fact depleted, and also in the case of the so-called "life pension", when its level was lower than the minimum state pension. This state pension was uniform for all workers, regardless of the pension scheme that they were covered by, and its amount was in fact adjusted regularly by the law. The law also established the state guarantee for the additional contribution (that is, for the contribution, for example, to disability pensions, survivors' pensions and life pensions). The amount of the state guarantee was the equivalent of 100 per cent of the shortfall to complete the payment of the benefits, with certain exceptions. For 1994, the State made a contribution equivalent to US$7,334,891 in state guarantees. The State further guaranteed cases of cessation of payment or declaration of bankruptcy of an AFP, or an insurance company being unable to fulfil its obligations as to the pensions. (c) The financial participation of the State in the issue of and payment of vouchers (bonos de reconocimiento) meant a commitment of future payments by the State of approximately US$15,232 million by the year 2037. From all the above explanations, it emerged that the financial participation of the State was not occasional or exceptional but direct, real, concrete, specific and calculable.

Administration of the insurance scheme. The AFPs could be created on the initiative of the workers or their organizations and the statutes could provide that any profits obtained must be used for the payment of other social benefits to the worker/shareholders themselves and to their families. The individual capitalization system established in 1980 entrusted the administration of the system to AFPs – limited companies which had the right to remuneration in the form of commissions paid by the members in respect of the effective administration of the pension funds. The profit-making nature of the private administration of the pension systems has encouraged competition among the AFPs in offering better services to members, greater return on the investment of the pension funds that they administer, and lower costs for the membership in the form of lower commissions in order to attract contributions. The Government has made considerable progress towards greater transparency with regard to the information which must be provided to members concerning the return obtained by each pension fund and the commissions which each AFP charged so that the members were properly informed when they opted for the body which was to administer their pension savings. Competition between the various AFPs, far from harming the members, has encouraged efficiency in the system. Furthermore, trade unions were also legally entitled to establish AFPs under section 220 of the Labour Code. In fact, there were AFPs established by trade unions and workers' organizations in the banking sector and among teachers. The sectoral organizations of employers have also set up some AFPs in such sectors as commerce, construction, agriculture and bakery.

Participation of insured persons in the administration of insurance institutions. The pension system allowed the participation of members of the pension institution by the creation of AFPs on the initiative of the workers or their organizations and they could also establish in their statutes that the profits must be used to improve the benefits established by law. There was no mandatory machinery for members of AFPs to intervene in the administration and management directly of the pension fund that was administered, but such participation was not prohibited either. Legislative Decree No. 3500 did not envisage traditional machinery for the direct participation of members in pension fund administration and management, but established a different form which was the right of each worker to join the AFP of his or her own choice. While a minimum amount of social capital was initially required amounting to 20,000 development units, this quantity was reduced to 5,000.

The traditional pay-as-you-go system was totally underfunded and technically bankrupt and had serious administrative problems. It was for this reason, and with the sole objective of saving the pension funds of workers and enabling the workers to obtain decent pensions, that the Government created a pension system under private administration, with strong state supervision and contribution by means of the state guarantee of the minimum pension.

Finally, the speaker stressed that the Government did not wish to appear not to be complying with its obligations under the Conventions, especially in a period when it had ratified seven Conventions and was considering the early ratification of others. He wished to inform the Committee that the Government would initiate a process of consultations in the tripartite committee established in accordance with Convention No. 144 in order to adopt, with regard to Conventions Nos. 35, 36, 37 and 38, the necessary decisions to resolve the problems raised by the supervisory organs.

The Workers' members recalled the history of the case including a representation made under article 24 of the Constitution. They noted that there had been enormous sophistication in pension schemes since 1933. They noted on the first point, the statement of the Government representative, that employers did contribute, and wondered whether there was a confusion of terminology arising from a 1933 Convention as regards the contribution of employers by law. Secondly, regarding the contribution of public authorities, in many countries governments made provision in accordance with Article 9, paragraph 4, of the Convention in a form of guarantee. On the third point, concerning the administration by profit-making limited liability companies, if the profits were directed towards the people in the scheme in a different form, it could be argued whether or not these were non-profit-making organizations. As to the limited liability of companies, the important thing was that the Government was actually guaranteeing the pension provision.

They thought that if the Government were to denounce some Conventions then, it should be accompanied by the ratification of more modern Conventions. But if they were to continue with Convention No. 35, technical assistance of the ILO could help.

The Employers' members emphasized that, although they were technical in nature, the problems raised by the Committee of Experts were nevertheless elements of non-conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The initial compensation of wages did not amount to a permanent contribution of the employers to the formation of financial resources of the insurance scheme within the meaning of Article 9, paragraph 1, of the Convention. The financing of a state guarantee could not be included as financial participation of public authorities under Article 9, paragraph 4; under Chilean law, the administration of insurance could be dealt with by profit-making bodies, but this was in violation of Article 10, paragraph 1, of the Convention; and finally, even if the participation of representatives of insured persons provided for under Article 10, paragraph 4, was possible, it was not compulsory. At a time when it was determined that a certain number of governments were introducing similar systems, particularly in Latin America, it was appropriate to wonder whether each of the technical conditions must be respected in order to ensure conditions that were "at least equivalent" as provided for under Article 1 of the Convention. They expressed their view that the Convention needed a revision in view of the evolution during the last 60 years in the shared responsibilities between the State and the market mechanism.

The Government representative thought that the denunciation of the Convention and the ratification of some other Conventions was only one of the possibilities. He indicated however that the matter would be examined by a tripartite committee in accordance with Convention No. 144. He agreed with the Employers' members in saying that the ILO should consider adopting new standards taking into account the present situation. He emphasized that the US$25,000 million of the fund that they were administering was under strict supervision as to investment and could not be expropriated.

The Workers' member of Argentina noted that similar systems existed in certain other countries and thought that the investment in foreign countries in fact provided certain guarantees.

The Employers' member of Chile emphasized that a system such as the Chilean one, which had achieved in so few years of existence an accumulated fund of US$25,000 million, was one that not only demonstrated its success but also showed that it had many more possibilities to overcome whatever crisis arose.

Moreover, the successful experience of the Chilean social security system, the purpose of which had been achieved equally in other countries, to adapt their systems to the realities of the modern world, presented an excellent opportunity for the ILO to conform to the challenge established by the Director-General in his Report for 1994 to adapt the ILO to the new times and to the modern world. The possibility should be analysed to restudy the Convention on social security to make it respond better to the challenges of the world today in such a manner without losing its spirit.

The Workers' member of Guatemala expressed the deep concern of all workers in the region about this system since the Chilean model of social security system was spreading to other countries. This model, which should be regarded in the context of new liberal policies of structural adjustment and of the reduction of the State's functions, was threatening the fundamental principle of solidarity, which should be the basis of any social security system.

Another Government representative assured that the Government would provide the necessary legislation and information concerning the system to make further examination possible.

The Workers' members thought that the Government should be urged to conduct tripartite discussions on the matter and to make a report on it.

The Committee took note of the statement of the Government representative. The Committee also took note of the observations of the Committee of Experts that the new pension system, brought into force by the Government in 1980 was inconsistent with Convention No. 35 in that it did not legally mandate employers' contributions; that the State's financial participation did not strictly correspond to the contribution to the financial resources of the funds as envisaged; that the law did not preclude administration of the funds by non-profit-making institutions and that a compulsory mechanism for participation and management in the funds by the insured persons had not been legally established. While the Committee felt that the clarifications furnished by the Government representative were seemingly indicative of substantial compliance with the Convention, none the less, the technical comments made by the Committee of Experts could not be ignored. In this context, the Committee also felt that Convention No. 35 itself needed to be revised. In the circumstances of the case, the Committee advised the Government to further examine the recommendations of the Committee of Experts for the purpose of working out modalities of bringing their new pension system within the technical framework of the Convention. The Committee also advised the Government to hold tripartite consultations in this context and report the results thereof.

Convention No. 53: Officers' Competency Certificates, 1936

Argentina (ratification: 1955). The Government supplied the following information:

The Government addressed the questions raised in the communications made by the Union of United Maritime Workers (SOMU), dated 29 March 1993 and 2 December 1994, with the most complete and exhaustive information available. The letter dated 5 January 1995 referred to by the Committee had not been received at the time of the preparation of this report, despite the requests made to the ILO Buenos Aires Office, and as a result it was not possible to refer to it in the submission. In order to deal with the matters raised in the communications of the SOMU, the Government made the appropriate inquiries in the many areas involved in maritime transport. At the same time, the Government considered it appropriate to concentrate in the reply requested on those points expressly emphasized by the Committee, while noting the difficulty involved in giving a precise response in view of the diffuse and general nature of the submissions of the SOMU. The Government concluded that the trade union organization did not provide the specifications necessary for the points raised by the SOMU to be considered possible contraventions in practice of the Convention. Those points were the following:

(1) "The new regulations on the training of ships' personnel in the merchant marine (REFOCAPEMM), allows foreign seafarers with less training than their Argentine counterparts to work on ships registered in Argentina." If this assertion were accurate, it would imply that there was an incompatibility between internal regulations and the Convention. This was not the case, as from a simple reading of sections 1.06 to 1.10 of the Regulation on the training of ships' personnel in the merchant marine (REFOCAPEMM), it is apparent that national and foreign officers must submit accreditation, which must be confirmed with respect to foreigners, and additional qualifications (fire course in order to have access to tanker-ships, among others) and a physical fitness examination. Within the national context, the procedure for the supervision of the competency of officers is carried out under the supervision of the Argentina Army which grants and/or confirms qualifications, and the Argentina Naval Prefecture which grants accreditation to crew members (in this case, the officers). This is supported by section 2 of Act 17.371 which clearly establishes that all engagement of crews of ships flying the flag of Argentina is subject to the sole requirement of technical-occupational accreditation of the crew by the competent authority and their registration in the register kept by the harbour captains in national ports. None of the provisions cited contravene international labour standards and, in the absence of more specific details, the allegations made by the SOMU were incorrect.

(2) "Granting of embarkation documents to minors." In the absence of any indication of specific violations detected by the trade union, this irregularity asserted in the submissions of the SOMU was rejected by the competent authority. There does exist a category of apprentices who, from the age of 16, join the "Escuela de Formación y Capacitación para el Personal de Marinería" (Training and Competency School for Marine Crew) under the Argentina Naval Prefecture and undergo practical training, but as of recently seafarers have only been able to obtain qualifications once they have reached 18 years of age (section 2.02, item 1 of REFOCAPEMM). In the event that any irregularity of this kind is found, the Government, pursuant to its power to supervise the administrative authority, immediately proceeds to put ashore the crew concerned while applying the appropriate penalties.

(3) "Granting of embarkation documents to foreigners with very dubious qualifications." As stated above, REFOCAPEMM does not contain provisions that allow foreign seafarers with less training than their Argentine counterparts to work on ships registered in Argentina. Considering that the SOMU is making an allegation of a general nature, it is pointed out that the scope of the application of the standard covers "officers" as defined in Article 2 of the Convention.

It is necessary that the crew of a ship conform to security manning requirements, which guarantee that Argentine crew or those with the required knowledge of the national language are the only persons involved in steering the ship. Specific regulations to this effect have been issued. The operational manning requirements (necessary particularly with regard to fishermen) involves certification and the requirements specified under the regulations in effect; inspections have occurred (detection of crew who are not on the list or improperly embarked) which have resulted in the putting ashore of such persons, the deaccreditation of the captain, the immobilization of the ship and very serious monetary penalties for the shipowner. With regard to the specific reference to the ship "Revolución Productiva", the understandable concern of the trade union that the supply of work for its members be maintained should not be confused with non-compliance with the Convention. In this case, the standards with regard to safety manning were respected. With reference to "embarkation documents for enterprises", the Government is not aware of what the SOMU is referring to in alluding to such a "supposed" class of embarkation documents, since the National Prefecture is the only authority to issue embarkation documents and to determine that the crew on board are exactly the same as authorized by the embarkation documents.

In compliance with the request in the comments of the Committee and in order to provide additional information to support this submission, the Government considers it useful to send an account, divided by headings, of the inspections carried out by the administrative authority during the last year which points out the existing concern for compliance with the Convention in practice.

In addition to this, meetings have commenced within the relevant areas to evaluate periodically the level of efficiency of supervision, and the Argentine Naval Prefecture has been available to the trade union that made the submissions in meetings held previously to receive any properly detailed accusation that that organization considers it necessary to communicate.

In addition, a Government representative stated that the observations provided by the Union of Maritime Workers (SOMU), which were the source of the comments of the Committee of Experts, were very ambiguous and vague. For this reason, it was very difficult for the Government to provide a precise explanation to the allegations which were taken up by the Committee of Experts with regard to compliance with Convention No. 53.

She referred to the great effort made to bring together the necessary information in order to provide adequate replies, which appeared in the written information. She then referred to the regulations on the training of ship's personnel in the merchant marine (REFOCAPEMM) (Decree No. 572/94), governing internal procedures, which include the conditions required in Articles 3 and 4 of the Convention. Chapter 2 of the REFOCAPEMM, entitled "qualifications", provided in detail which seafarers on board ship were covered by the Convention. Foreign officers serving on board ships were required to have accredited certificates of competency as well as qualifications confirming additional training and physical fitness examinations. As to the competent authorities, they met the standards with supplementary regulatory provisions, such as that of the Argentina Naval Prefecture No. 7 of 17 June 1993 which was submitted to the ILO together with the written reply which was available to this Committee and the Committee of Experts. Pursuant to this provision, accreditation of officers was granted only to those who were able to verbally communicate in Spanish and who were familiar with the applicable standards concerning safety in navigation and pollution prevention. Therefore, no one who was unable to speak Spanish or lacked the proper qualification could serve as an officer on board ship under the terms of the Convention.

Second, she noted that the application of the standards was ensured by frequent inspections carried out by the Argentina Naval Prefecture, either on a selective basis or through special inspections when there was a risk of danger or failure to apply the relevant regulations. In this regard, she noted that last year there were more than 18,000 inspections. Since an inspection system could always be improved, the meetings concerning inspections, which were periodically held, served the purpose of evaluating the cases of non-compliance, especially those which could be described in a precise and detailed manner and were referred to by the SOMU.

She further stated that the Government reassured this Committee that the trade union (which comprised all maritime workers except officers) that had submitted complaints to the ILO was entitled to present any detailed information or complaint which it believed pertinent, not only to the competent authorities but also to the tripartite body established following the ratification in 1987 of Convention No. 144. At no time had this tripartite Committee received any complaints from the trade union nor any request for a hearing.

She noted that the competent authorities in her country were willing to address any complaint brought by the trade union. This approach would be much more effective than bringing forth a vague complaint concerning non-compliance with the Convention. In this way the ILO would be able to dedicate more time to addressing topics of utmost importance to fundamental rights.

The Workers' members emphasized that this case was put on the list of cases to be dealt with by the Committee because of the footnote requesting information for the Conference. The written and oral information must be further examined by the Committee of Experts which had noted that the Government had not replied on several occasions to communications from the SOMU. It was clear that if this information had been provided earlier it might have avoided the footnote. However, in its written information, the Government totally rejected the foundation of the observations of the seafarers' union. Moreover, this information gave the impression that the Government was trying to discredit and even to ridicule the allegations made by the SOMU. The Workers' members could not accept this way of behaving. Moreover, the information provided was too general and seemed to indicate that there was no problem and that the number of inspections was sufficient. This remained difficult to believe, especially when the communications had gone unanswered for such a long time.

The Workers' members insisted that the Committee requests the Government to provide complete information on the three points indicated: the qualification of foreign seafarers, the conditions for granting embarkation documents to minors and foreign seafarers, and the question of the constitutionality of Decree No. 817/92 and of the REFOCAPEMM.

The Employers' members observed that the Committee had not dealt with this question before and according to their documentation there were no observations from the Committee of Experts on this problem. It was really a question of complaints and accusations put forward by the trade union in the last two or three years and the Government was called upon to answer them. The complaint was that Argentina was allowing ships to be crewed by people who were not adequately qualified and whose training was not in accordance with the Convention. For example, seafarers were hired who did not speak Spanish, thus increasing the possibility of accidents, while the purpose of this Convention was to try to reduce accidents. In general, it was also indicated that as far as the fishing fleet was concerned, there were many complaints that Chilean citizens were being hired who did not have adequate qualifications and the example cited, however, was a ship with a crew made up almost entirely of Russian nationals. The Government replied that all the regulations conformed with the standards.

They thought the only thing to do was to ask the Government to provide written information on all these points and then the Experts would have their first opportunity to decide on this kind of case and, if they felt appropriate, make known their observations. At a later date they would decide whether they wanted or needed to deal with this case again. They observed that it was not possible to consider the substantive matters at this time.

The Workers' member of Argentina stated that the Government's reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts was inadequate as it only partially dealt with the points raised in the communications from the SOMU. Moreover, it should be underscored that the Government had failed on three occasions to reply to these communications.

In order to better understand the question, he emphasized that it was about basic facts, meaning the Government's decision to allow Argentine shipowners to fly foreign flags, while retaining Argentine registration, and the promulgation of Decrees Nos. 817 and 1264, both of 1992. According to these Decrees, 62 collective agreements were suspended. They contained clauses on training of seafarers and the supervisory mechanisms guaranteeing the embarkation of seafarers in conformity with the required qualifications.

Moreover, article 36 of Decree No. 817/92, which established that collective bargaining in the maritime sector was subordinated to certain conditions linked to the necessities of economic transformation, was held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. This was relevant because it was the absence of rules which facilitated hiring foreign workers who were non-residents in Argentina and whose qualifications were very inferior to those of the majority of Argentine seafarers, which explained why these workers were inclined to accept very poor working conditions and very low salaries. Thus, while in theory capacity certificates were required, in practice there was considerable flexibility in this regard.

Concerning the embarkation of workers who were minors, the speaker stated that they were hired as "apprentices", but that once on board they were given professional tasks and worked for 12 or more hours per day. Moreover, they were often employed to replace crew normally required to complete these tasks, especially in the fishing industry. It was deregulation which was at the origin of these violations, some of which had been acknowledged by the Government in its written reply.

Finally, he emphasized that, at present, Argentine unions had only been able to discuss informally with the Government and that no conclusive solutions had been found. He pleaded with the Committee to request that labour relations in this sector be regulated.

A representative of the International Transport Workers' Federation stated that, under the pretext of flexibility, the Argentine maritime sector was today in an anarchic situation in which seafarers' contracts were precarious. According to the speaker, this precariousness was due to the entry into force of Decrees Nos. 1772/91, 817/92 and 1493/92, among others. He then reviewed articles 1.06 to 1.09 of the REFOCAPEMM in order to underline that these standards, not only allowed the employment of people not meeting the required qualifications, but moreover discriminated against Argentine seamen, compared to foreign seamen. This was due to the very broad character of these texts which failed to provide guarantees of effective application. He then wished to emphasize that the SOMU had reported individual infractions to the competent authorities, especially concerning the granting of embarkation documents to minors, who often carried out difficult tasks ill suited to their age, and to foreigners who did not speak either English or Spanish, and to persons with dubious qualifications which could not be properly evaluated based on certificates issued abroad. Moreover, he drew attention to the title of article 1.08 of the REFOCAPEMM dealing with "employment without requirement of qualification". In addition, crew requirements were quite simply defined by the shipowner, according to the repeal of article 142 of the law on navigation No. 20094 by Decree No. 817/92, which provided that requirements should be jointly set by the shipowner and the unions.

As for the granting of embarkation documents by companies, it was indicated that this practice was widespread in the fishing industry, especially for foreign seamen. This reality could not be denied, all the more so as, as an understaffed crew, as was most often the case, meant that the on-board seafarers must perform additional work. In this regard, he referred to the case of the vessel "Revolución productiva" mentioned in the Committee of Experts' report.

The Government representative stated that she had noted all the comments of the Committee which she would communicate in due course to the Government. She regretted that the Government's response was interpreted to be a mockery of the observations from the trade union representatives. She also emphasized that her Government had complied with the request for information by the Committee of Experts, which was to evaluate these replies.

The Employers' members observed that a vast quantity of information was provided on which the Committee could not take a decision. As this information had not been reviewed by the Experts, the Employers' members reiterated that the Committee of Experts must await the Government's report to assess the situation.

The Workers' members stated that the conclusions could be general but it was necessary to insist that the Government continue to provide all information requested.

The Committee noted the statement of the Government representative and felt that it was in rather general terms. This did not help in the examination of the complaints on merits. The Committee further noted that there had been no written statement from the Government on the matter, and this was the reason for the comments of the Committee of Experts. The Committee urged in the circumstances that the Government should furnish a full report to the Committee of Experts covering exhaustively all the issues, specifically as concerned conformity with the prescribed qualifications of the seafarers concerned and circumstances of the granting of embarkation documents to them, as well as the constitutional aspects of Decree No. 572/94.

Convention No. 78: Medical Examination of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations), 1946

Cameroon (ratification: 1970). The Government supplied the following information:

As there have been no new legislative or regulatory provisions adopted during the relevant period, the Government maintained its previous statements and asked that the Committee refer to its previous reports.

In addition, a Government representative noted that the Committee of Experts recognized in its observation that the legislation of Cameroon included provisions giving effect to Convention No. 78, namely, Order No. 17 of 27 May 1969 concerning child labour, which requires medical examination of the fitness for work of children and young persons who are employees or apprentices. But the Committee of Experts asked for the extension of this requirement to children and young persons exercising an independent activity.

Although recognizing the good reason for this request, the Government already explained, in its earlier replies to the Committee of Experts, the difficulties of extending such examination to the informal sector. The activities of the informal sector, by definition, tend to escape any form of control. Paragraph 14 of Recommendation No. 79 referred to by the Committee of Experts provides that children should obtain a licence issued by a service under the labour department: this is an obligation to which the concerned persons would not be ready to adhere. Apart from some raids on street vendors, which would be neither desirable nor effective, it was difficult to expect the success of labour inspection in a sector where the tax office failed.

The Government was aware of the necessity of this examination and applied it to the employees and apprentices in the modern sector. It was also concerned about working children in the informal sector and was making efforts to reintegrate them into the education system or to provide them with training. In addition, the Government was at present discussing with the ILO a project under the International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC).

The Workers' members explained the reasons why they proposed to discuss this case: first of all, the protection of the health of children should not be considered as a technical question but as a major preoccupation; further, the lack of protection of health at work was often a sign of the lack of interest of the Government in social policy.

The explanations in the form of excuses presented by the Government were understandable in a sense but not fully acceptable, because the protection of safety and health should be ensured in all sectors including the informal sector. It was regulated by its own mechanisms which could be used to guarantee the health of children who worked within it.

They thought it appropriate to request, as did the Committee of Experts, that concrete and immediate measures be taken. As to the practical difficulties emphasized by the Government representative, they would justify the suggestion of a call for the technical assistance of the ILO.

The Employers' members largely shared the viewpoint of the Workers' members. They pointed out that the Committee of Experts was obliged to repeat its previous observation because no report had been received. The Government stated that it was willing to solve this problem without knowing how. This would therefore make a typical case in which the ILO should be called to bring its technical assistance, which should be advised to the Government in the conclusions.

The Workers' member of Cameroon supported the proposal of the Workers' members. In addition, the Committee should emphasize that the informal sector should be regulated in Cameroon.

The Workers' member of Senegal pointed out that, in discussing the question of child labour in the informal sector, the Committee was treating an important question for the whole of Africa. Accelerated by the crisis, the informal sector was growing and tended almost to overwhelm the modern sector. This situation presented a challenge for the ILO which should pick up this problem so as to find the means to ensure the social protection of children and also of adults who worked in this sector.

The Committee noted that the report of the Government had not been received in advance but written information was supplied at the Conference. The Committee also noted the oral statement made by the Government representative and the discussion which took place. Taking into account the difficulties explained by the Government, in the matter of organizing medical examinations of children and young persons in the informal sector, the Committee urged that the Government should establish practical measures to organize such medical examinations availing of technical assistance of the ILO. The Committee further called upon the Government to furnish its full report on the specific measures designed and brought into implementation to comply with Convention No. 78.

Convention No. 87: Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize, 1948

Bangladesh (ratification: 1972). A Government representative stated that the Government of Bangladesh had replied to all the issues raised by the Committee of Experts last year and understood that the Committee of Experts had examined these replies as well as some further queries which appeared in this year's report. The Government had received a direct request and would attempt to reply by the required date. As to the observation made by the Committee of Experts, he noted that Bangladesh had a law allowing workers and employers to form trade unions without requesting prior authorization. Union membership was open to persons working in factories, businesses, industries, shops and public sector corporations. Public servants of the Department of Telephone and Telegraphs and the Department of Railways were also covered by this law. Public servants of other government offices were not covered by this Industrial Relations Ordinance.

The Committee of Experts had raised six objections, the first of which concerned persons performing managerial and administrative functions: they could not join workers' trade unions. These white-collar employees, comprising approximately 2 per cent of the workforce, could form associations for the advancement of their rights or interests. Due to their small numbers, they did not form associations in each establishment, but rather at the national level or along professional lines, such as the Institute of Chartered Accountants or the Institute of Engineers. In this way, the guarantees provided under Article 2 of Convention No. 87 were exercised by persons in this professional category. He noted that the Committee of Experts had requested the Government to provide the legislation which allowed these groups of managerial staff to form their associations. The speaker confirmed that his Government would provide this information with its report in due time.

He then commented on the Committee of Experts' observations on freedom of association for public servants, who were excluded from the scope of the industrial relations law allowing workers and employers to form trade unions. There were, however, associations of different levels of cadres through which they promoted their own causes. The Bangladesh Civil Service Administration Association had the largest number of members, while another association existed for the non-cadres. Some staff, such as accountants and stenographers also had their own associations. These committees held meetings, discussed problems faced by members and formulated a charter of demands for submission to the Government for negotiation.

Recently, the speaker noted, the Government had been in contact with associations of public employees, both towards meeting demands and implementing government decisions regarding salaries and other benefits recommended in 1991. He then referred to the observation of the Committee of Experts concerning restrictions on eligibility for holding office in a trade union. Except for workers dismissed for misconduct or convicted of embezzlement of union funds, moral turpitude, or unfair labour practices, each worker was eligible to join a trade union of his choice and to hold elected office in the union, regardless of age, sex, caste, etc. The speaker noted that a worker dismissed for misconduct might seek revenge against the management. He considered that the admission of such dismissed workers, either as union members or officers, might hinder normal union activities as well as industrial peace and productivity. This might also defeat the very purpose of the union and of collective bargaining. In practice, in Bangladesh, dismissed workers were not elected to office in trade unions. The speaker considered that section 7-A(1)(b) of the Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969, promoted rather than restricted the right of workers to choose their representatives.

In reply to the Committee of Experts' observations on external supervision, the speaker noted that, in Bangladesh, the Industrial Relations Ordinance conferred certain quasi-judicial functions on the Registrar of Trade Unions. Any act of the registrar could be challenged in a court of law. He further noted that the Registrar of Trade Unions was not allowed to revoke a union's registration without prior authorization from the labour court.

With regard to the 30 per cent requirement for initial or continued registration of a trade union, the speaker noted that the Committee of Experts had been informed on several occasions that this practice was necessary to check the multiplicity of trade unions in Bangladesh. Nevertheless, in an establishment meeting the 30 per cent requirement, up to three unions could be registered and there were provisions for determining a collective bargaining agent. The speaker considered that the multiple union registration provision brought the legislation into conformity with Convention No. 87.

The speaker then referred to the observation in which the Committee of Experts noted with regret that the law did not cover workers in the export processing zones. He noted that the National Labour Law Commission 1992 submitted a report on this question which was still being studied by the Government. Ultimately, this report would be submitted as a bill to Parliament.

The speaker concluded by mentioning that his Government would try to reply as accurately as possible to the points raised by the Committee of Experts this year.

The Employers' members stated that it was the first time that Convention No. 87 was being discussed in the case of Bangladesh and thanked the Government representative for having addressed directly the seven points raised by the Committee of Experts. They referred to the information contained in the report of the Committee of Experts concerning a review of labour legislation by a National Tripartite Commission, as well as the draft of a new Labour Code dealing with specific questions that had raised some doubts.

With reference to the seven points raised by the Experts they indicated that they continued to pose problems. As to persons carrying out managerial or administrative functions who were permitted to form their own associations, these persons were still subject to restrictions. Consequently, it was necessary to know whether this category of employees had, in reality, the possibility to freely form their own organizations. The Employers' members therefore hoped that the Government would provide detailed information in this regard in its report.

In addition, they requested that the Government indicate the specific restrictions on the rights of public servants to issue publications, as well as the extent of these restrictions in light of the comments of the Committee of Experts.

With respect to restrictions on the categories of persons who could hold office in trade unions, they believed that the text was too general and it was unacceptable that all dismissed workers were prevented from holding office.

In relation to excessive external supervision by the Registrar of Trade Unions to supervise trade union activities, they understood that the State would want to maintain some form of control such as supervision over the finances of trade unions. However, the general control should not be too broad. They requested further information on the legal recourse available to trade unions if such control had been too extensive.

In relation to the 30 per cent requirement, they noted that when workers wished to form a trade union organization in an establishment or in a group of enterprises, the Government believed that there was a danger of multiplicity of trade unions and this was the reason for the 30 per cent requirement. With regard to the risk of such proliferation, Convention No. 87 did not speci-cally address this issue but did provide that workers were free to set up organizations of their own choice. If workers formed too many organizations, they would weaken their own positions. The Employers' members wondered to what extent a State had the duty to protect workers from themselves. In a free society, such state protection should be strictly limited. The Government should review this issue and consider the recommendations made by the National Tripartite Commission in this regard.

As to export processing zones, they noted that the Government added very little to this issue and therefore it was necessary to wait for the information that it would provide in its report.

With regard to restrictions on the right to strike, which in the opinion of the Experts went beyond the envisaged situations and categories of workers, the Employers' members believed that the criterion of "essential services was too narrow". The State was responsible for the welfare of its citizens, and in developing countries, especially in difficult periods, a strike could cause unacceptable consequences even if the strike would not endanger life. For this reason a democratic State should assume its responsibilities and set the restrictions on the right to strike when essential services were jeopardized. Furthermore, Convention No. 87 did not contain any provisions in this regard.

Lastly, there were matters which needed careful thought and required legislative revision. For this reason, the Employers requested the Government to provide in its report detailed information on all of the points raised and stressed how important it was for the Office to provide Bangladesh with assistance.

The Workers' members emphasized that even if the Committee were examining the case of Bangladesh for the first time on the application of Convention No. 87, the Committee of Experts has been commenting on important points as to the limitations on trade union freedom in Bangladesh for quite a number of years. These were points that every country must respect, regardless of its degree of economic development.

The legislative review in progress which was given to a national tripartite committee along with the preparation of a new Labour Code undoubtedly marked the beginning of a positive change in attitude. Nevertheless, two major concerns were expressed. First of all, the effective implementation of the conclusions of the national tripartite committee should help to revise national legislation and practice as indicated in the remarks of the Experts. In this respect, there was a second concern as the Committee of Experts had taken note that while the new draft code satisfied some of its criticisms, it nevertheless included significant parts of the present code which the Experts had indicated, violate trade union freedom. In this respect, the comments of the Experts had been the same for quite some time.

The Workers' members then commented on the state of trade union freedom in Bangladesh, as described in the report of the Committee of Experts and in light of the information supplied by the Government representative. Concerning freedom of association for persons in managerial positions, they insisted on the necessity of guaranteeing that these categories of workers might enjoy and effectively exercise the right to form unions and to join the union of their choice, including unions of other categories of workers. Moreover, it was necessary, as the Committee of Experts had noted, that the concept of "managerial functions" be defined strictly in order to ensure that other unions were not weakened. As for the intervention of public authorities in the setting-up, creation and operation of unions, the Workers' members emphasized the risks of arbitrary supervision. Excessive limitation on the setting-up and maintaining of unions posed problems, especially in terms of organizational recognition based totally or for a large part on company unions in which workers of small and medium-sized businesses risked being excluded. They insisted on the need to adopt procedures and texts facilitating freedom of association.

As for export processing zones, the Workers' members stated that the guarantee of effective exercise of freedom of association was not assured and this constituted a major concern for the national and international union movement.

As for restrictions on the right to strike, the Workers' members felt, on reading the report of the Committee of Experts, that the procedures for exercising this right were such that, in practice, the very principle of the right to strike was called into question. They declared that it was unacceptable that the Government was able to ban strikes if it judged that the strike was contrary to the national interest or would harm the economy of the country. Fundamental rights should be guaranteed regardless of the political system and degree of economic development of a country. The concerns and the points of view expressed by the Committee of Experts on this point were shared by the Workers' members.

They requested that the Labour Code and other relevant legislation be reworked in order to take into account all of the comments of the Experts and the conclusions of this Committee, as the violations mentioned were significant and had very serious repercussions on the exercise of the fundamental rights of workers.

The Workers' members joined with the Employers' members in requesting that all information provided by the Government representative, as well as other additional information, be forwarded shortly for review by the Committee of Experts. They suggested that the Government call upon the assistance of the Office in order to settle the remaining problems.

The Workers' member of Japan believed this was a case of serious and complex restrictions on freedom of association. He agreed with the Committee of Experts' concern over the draft Labour Code which still apparently excluded a wide section of workers from the scope of the right to organize. Among those who were denied full freedom of association were public servants whose right to issue publications was subject to restrictions.

He pointed out the need for further information on measures the Government has envisaged to amend the Industrial Relations Rules which grant government officials excessive power – not subject to any judicial review – in supervising trade unions. He also requested more information on a union's right to appeal administrative decisions.

The speaker then focused on the denial of the right to organize in export processing zones (EPZs), in contravention of the Convention which guarantees freedom of association to all workers regardless of where they work. Citing an ILO survey, he noted that EPZs were an issue not only in Bangladesh but also in an increasing number of countries, particularly in Asia, where EPZs employed more than three-quarters of all workers. A market economy was acceptable as long as it respected human rights, trade union rights and fair rules of competition. This was not the case of export processing zones in general and in EPZs in Bangladesh in particular.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands drew attention to the fact that all of the questions discussed last year concerning the application of Convention No. 98 arose again this year in regard to the application of Convention No. 87. Consequently, this year the Committee of Experts had not raised any new issues.

Last year the Workers' group called for cautious optimism with regard to the proposed changes in the labour legislation and expressly requested that this year there be changes with respect to the external supervision of trade union affairs and export processing zones. Last year the Government expressed the hope that the problems would be solved in 1995. This year, however, the Government stated that it was in line with ILO standards and that the remaining queries were under review. The speaker believed that since the same problems continued, in essence, the Government was not willing to take concrete action to solve the problems. He asked for clarification on the existence of a tripartite labour committee headed by the Minister of Labour and Manpower and a parliamentary standing committee on labour matters which the Government referred to last year.

Noting that there had been no major changes in the legislation, he requested the Committee to address this insufficiency. He believed that the Workers' group wrongly expressed their cautious optimism and that the Employers' group was correct in stating that amending the relevant law would take time. He believed the Government had not been forthright last year, nor this year, and again referred to the available option of technical assistance to overcome difficulties in applying the Convention both in law and in practice.

The Government representative stated that he might have been misunderstood. His Government attached great importance to the observations of the Committee of Experts and intended to comply with its requests.

As concerned the Labour Code, he observed that it had not yet been passed by Parliament and there was, at present, just a recommendation by the National Law Commission to draft a Labour Code.

The Committee noted the observation of the Committee of Experts, the statements made by the Government representative and information provided on the application of the Convention, as well as the discussion that took place thereafter. The Committee observed that a tripartite National Labour Law Commission had begun to review the labour legislation. While welcoming this information, the Committee continued to be concerned with the situation both in law and in practice regarding trade union matters. The Committee urged the Government to adopt, at a very early date, the necessary measures to bring this legislation into conformity with the Convention. In particular, the Committee urged the Government to guarantee the right of managerial and administrative employees to organize, to assure judicial review of intervention by public authorities in unionization, to remove the restrictive provisions on registration of trade unions, and to ensure that modalities and procedures as regards strike action do not nullify this basic right. It also insisted on the necessity to apply the Convention in export processing zones. The Committee expressed the firm hope that it would be able to take note, at its next examination of the case, of substantial progress in the application of the Convention, if necessary, with the technical assistance of the ILO and asked the Government to furnish more detailed information on all these matters and report to the Committee of Experts.

Bolivia (ratification: 1965). A Government representative of Bolivia stated that the points raised in the observation of the Committee of Experts referred to specific situations and legislation prior to August 1993. The new Government, which had assumed its functions on 6 August 1993, had nevertheless the responsibility of replying to the comments of the Experts. The speaker referred to each of the points raised in this observation. The denial of the right of public servants to unionize: in practice, the majority of public servants were affiliated to recognized trade union organizations which carried out their activities under the protection of the General Labour Act (GLA). Teachers, and workers from the health service, who represented 80 per cent of state employees, as well as employees of state enterprises, were members of trade unions. Officials in legislative positions, as well as those in the judiciary and in municipalities, were members of trade unions. The only workers who were not trade union members were those officials who came directly under the President of the Republic; they only represented 7 to 8 per cent of all the workers in the administration of the State. In fact, the employees of the executive branch were, for a large part, joining the public service through competitive examinations which allowed them to obtain contracts of at least five years. Section 104 of the GLA had fallen into abeyance during the process of modernizing the public sector, which had started on 6 August 1993.

The impossibility of setting up more than one union in an enterprise: neither section 103 of the GLA nor the Ministry of Labour made it impossible to set up more than one union in an enterprise. The existence of a single union in an enterprise was due to a preference expressed by workers' organizations themselves in their by-laws.

The wide powers of supervision of the Labour Inspectorate over the activities of trade unions: section 101 of the GLA was not applied. Neither the Labour Inspectorate nor any state organ exercised any control, given that trade union activities were protected by Convention No. 87, as well as the Bolivian Constitution itself.

The prohibition from holding trade union office placed upon persons who do not normally work in the enterprise: section 6(c) of the Legislative Decree of 1951 had only reflected what already existed and did not contain any legal obligation. The Ministry of Labour did not call into question the possibility of such workers belonging to a trade union. It was the workers themselves who had included such provisions in the by-laws of their organizations.

The termination of the mandate of trade union leaders when they retired from their job: such a situation could arise in practice when workers themselves decided on this but section 7 of the Legislative Decree of 1951 did not have any legal effect.

The requirement that members of the governing board had to be of Bolivian nationality (section 138 of the Regulatory Decree issued under the GLA): the fact was that political activity was closely linked to trade union activity. Since foreigners did not participate in political activities, they did not participate in trade union activities either. Of course, there was the case of foreign trade union leaders, such as in the university (which was an autonomous institution); the trade union of university teachers had three professors of different foreign nationalities. This was due to the specific nature of the university.

The possibility of dissolving trade unions by administrative authority: this possibility, provided for by section 129 of the Decree issued under the GLA, was only a precautionary measure. It was not an unrestricted possibility. In a democratic regime, it was a precautionary measure in the face of militant politico-trade union activity.

The excessive number required to call a strike: section 114 of the GLA and section 159 of the Decree issued thereunder only regulated the right to strike without running counter to the exercise of this right.

The prohibition of strikes in all public services: this prohibition had a constitutional base, a concept adopted to protect the right of all citizens and inhabitants of Bolivia without running counter to Convention No. 87.

Compulsory arbitration: section 113(c) of the GLA allowed for compulsory arbitration only after an arbitral decision had been handed down; this decision was then compulsory. In fact, this provision was not applied.

General and solidarity strikes: general and solidarity strikes which ran counter to the constitutional order of Bolivia were contrary to Convention No. 87. Democratic governments did not apply the penal sanctions provided for in the provisions mentioned by the Experts.

The Government was fully disposed to review the existing legislation, a process which would require the political will of the Confederation of Bolivian Workers and the Confederation of Private Sector Employers in order to determine, by way of consensus, the provisions of the GLA that had to be amended.

The Workers' members recalled that, for several years, the Committee of Experts had been reiterating its comments on the points raised, which were manifestly in contradiction with Convention No. 87. The same 11 points raised in this observation had already been discussed in 1993. In this respect, the intervention of the Government representative was quite surprising: in 1993, he had stated that the first three points would be dealt with through the imminent adoption of a new general labour Act. As for the other matters, it had been stated that these provisions were not applied in practice. Now, the Government representative had stated that all of the provisions mentioned, including the first three, were not applied and that, in any event, Bolivian legislation was not contrary to Convention No. 87. However, for the Workers' members, the problems raised by this legislation with respect to Convention No. 87 were serious.

The Workers' members stated that they were very worried by the fact that a state of emergency had been declared on 18 April 1995, resulting in a violation of trade union rights. The Minister of Labour had treated the Bolivian trade union organizations in a derogatory manner in his intervention before the plenary of the Conference.

The Workers' members evoked the negotiations undertaken by the Confederation of Bolivian Workers with the Government, within the framework of which this organization had presented a series of claims which reflected the points raised in the observation of the Committee of Experts. However, the Government had not wanted trade unions in the public sector and had not wanted to engage in social dialogue either. An intervention by the Catholic Church had allowed for a preliminary agreement to be reached. Just as the Confederation of Bolivian Workers was ready to apply the agreement concluded, the Government had intervened violently, arresting the leaders of this organization and declaring a state of emergency.

For the Workers' members, the state of emergency was a flagrant violation of Convention No. 87 and ILO principles. The Bolivian Government should respect its obligations, possibly through the intermediary of the Catholic Church, and should respect the preliminary agreement that had been concluded. Trade union rights should be re-established. Similarly, the legislation in force should be modified in order to reply to all of the points raised by the Committee of Experts. The Government was urged to lift the state of emergency.

The Employers' members stated that seven of the points raised in the observation of the Committee of Experts were very important, given that the provisions in question did not guarantee the exercise of freedom of association. It would appear from the arguments developed by the Government representative that the situations that were contrary to Convention No. 87 had a legal basis. The situation on the practical level seemed quite unusual, due to the fact that, according to the Government representative, the provisions in force had fallen into abeyance. As for the example given of foreign trade union leaders within the university, this manifestly was not representative of the general situation. The Employers' members considered that the observations of the Committee of Experts relating to the restrictions on the right to strike did not justify detailed comments, given that Convention No. 87 was silent in this respect. The Employers' members noted that, according to the declaration of the Government representative, it would be necessary to amend the legislation. Given that, for a long time, this legislation was not in conformity with Convention No. 87, they urged the Government to take into consideration the seven relevant points raised in the observation of the Committee of Experts and to take the necessary measures. They trusted that the next report would contain information on progress made in this respect.

The Workers' member of Bolivia indicated that the state of emergency had suspended all trade union and political rights. The Confederation of Bolivian Workers, of which he was on the Executive Board, had submitted petitions to the Government which reflected the points raised in the observation of the Committee of Experts, in particular the possibility for public servants to exercise trade union activities. It would be appropriate to repeal section 104 of the GLA which denied this right to these categories of workers and which constituted a restriction on freedom of association. Faced with the Government's refusal, the organization had exercised its right to demonstrate and its freedom of expression, rights which were set forth in the Bolivian Constitution. His organization had also asserted its professional and wage claims. When a state of emergency had been declared, a trade union meeting had been interrupted and violent acts had been carried out against men, women and even minors, as well as journalists. The speaker himself had been detained in a military barracks near the border with Chile for 20 days due to his participation in the said trade union meeting. As long as the state of emergency lasted, an authorization had to be obtained from the Ministry or the competent prefecture in order to be able to exercise the right to hold meetings.

The speaker recalled that the Organization of American States had called on the President of the Republic to lift the state of emergency. Similarly, a mission from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) had visited the country but had had to leave without having accomplished its task. These facts constituted a violation of the exercise of the right to affiliate with international organizations of workers. The speaker requested the Committee to ask the Bolivian Government to lift the state of emergency in order to allow political, trade union and civic liberties to be re-established. He invited the ILO to send a fact-finding mission to the country and pointed out that, in any event, amendments had to be made to the labour legislation with a view to protecting workers without losing the acquired social rights.

The Workers' member of Argentina agreed with the points developed by the Workers' member of Bolivia and added that the workers of Argentina, as well as of all of America, were strongly concerned by the state of emergency in Bolivia. The seriousness of the violations of the fundamental rights of workers enshrined in Convention No. 87 could be noted by an ILO mission to the country. It would be appropriate for the Conference Committee to give the Government specific indications as to the measures to be taken in order for the legislation, that had been the subject of comments by the Committee of Experts, to be amended in conformity with the requirements of Convention No. 87.

The Workers' member of Uruguay stressed, like the Workers' and Employers' members, that the issues raised by the Committee of Experts had already been pointed out in 1993 and that no satisfactory reply had since been received. On 1 May of this year, the member States of MERCOSUR had adopted in Montevideo a resolution in favour of Bolivian workers. A delegation of several trade union centres had visited Bolivia to request the release of imprisoned trade unionists and the re-establishment of democratic institutions, which had only resulted in the expulsion of one of the delegation. This Committee should clearly ask the Government to put an end to the violations of Convention No. 87 and to lift the state of emergency. In addition, a mission should visit the spot to study the situation.

The Workers' member of Senegal considered that laws that were rejected by the workers could not be considered valid to have a selective application. In such a case they must simply be repealed. He thought the Government of Bolivia was going in the wrong direction. It was not for going into a political debate that the violation was pointed out regarding the freedom of association since the imposition of the state of emergency. He thought it important for the Committee to request in its conclusions that good sense be demonstrated and the state of emergency lifted.

The Government representative stated that, since 1993, a draft modification of the Labour Code had been prepared following a mission of the ILO and of the Inter-American Bank for Development. Since the Government wished to make this reform in consultation with those concerned, it was for Bolivian workers to make their comments on this draft so that it could be submitted to Parliament. The Workers' members should ask their Bolivian colleagues the reasons why they had not responded to this offer of consultation.

Allegations were made of violations of human rights. But human rights had a collective dimension, and did not relate only to the interests of trade unionists. When a general strike deprived children of their right to education and blocked freedom of movement, questions could be raised whether it was not the trade unionists who violated human rights. As regards the incident mentioned by the Workers' member of Uruguay of a trade union delegate from Latin America who visited the Government, the speaker added that these trade unionists publicly criticized government policy, which justified their being returned to the border. The state of emergency was an indispensable measure to re-establish public order without affecting freedom of association or human rights. It had been imposed in conformity with the Constitution and with the consent of Congress.

Freedom of association had been preserved during the state of emergency and the trade unions continued to have meetings. An agreement had been signed on 23 May of this year with the Bolivian Workers' Central, a copy of which had been communicated to the Standards Department of the ILO. The present accusations were without basis and of a purely political character: they reflected the resistance of certain interests and privileges to the large-scale democratic transformation which was taking place.

The Workers' members agreed that the discussion should be strictly limited to the elements of the case noted in the report of the Committee of Experts. However, the general context could not be ignored, especially in the field of freedom of association. This was not an academic debate but a discussion based on the reality of the world with the objective of achieving progress in the application of Conventions.

They thought that the situation was confused and clear at the same time: confused as to the state of legislation, and as to an agreement with trade union organizations; but clear in the absence of a response to the questions raised for a number of years, and in the existence of violations of the freedom of association. The Committee should insist in its conclusions that the Government take all the necessary measures to guarantee fundamental rights and freedom of association, both in law and practice. It could also be suggested that a direct contacts mission or assistance be called for.

The Employers' members also noted that the provisions in force were not in conformity with the Convention. If there was a draft law taking account of the observations of the Committee of Experts, it should be quickly adopted with or without consultation of the social partners, since it was the responsibility of the Government to honour its international commitments.

They did not think that the question of the state of emergency was directly related to the application of the Convention, as long as it did not have the aim of withholding such application. Since the Committee of Experts had not had the occasion to comment on this issue and since this Committee did not have sufficient information, this question should not be included in the conclusions.

For the other points, the Employers' members agreed with the Workers' members in urging the Government to take measures to ensure conformity with the Convention in law and practice.

The Committee took note of the oral information provided by the Government representative and the discussion that ensued. The Committee noted with regret that, in spite of the fact that the application of this Convention had been discussed at length within the present Committee in 1993, and that the Government at that time had given assurances that the draft law under preparation, with the help of the technical assistance of the ILO, was to be adopted in the near future, the Committee of Experts stated in its report that it was not able to note any progress with regard to the application of the Convention. It recalled that the numerous questions at issue included the denial of the right to unionize to public servants, the impossibility of setting up more than one union in an enterprise, the wide powers of supervision of trade union activities by public authorities and the restriction on the right for workers to elect their own leaders in full freedom.

The Committee, while taking note of the assurance of the Government representative concerning the continuing efforts in the area of legislation, felt that the oral information provided in regard to these various matters was not sufficient to prevent violations of the rights protected by Convention No. 87. The Committee, therefore, called upon the Government to examine urgently all of the issues mentioned in the report of the Committee of Experts, and to modify, if necessary with an ILO consultative mission, national laws and practice to guarantee full freedom of association as envisaged in the Convention, and to furnish a detailed written report.

Colombia (ratification: 1976). A Government representative highlighted the mechanisms of labour participation in the elaboration of national policies, referring in particular to the creation of the National Competitiveness Council, the Sectoral Competitiveness Committees, the Tripartite Advisory Committee for Productivity, the Tripartite Follow-Up and Evaluation Committee for the "More and Better Jobs" Project, as well as the National Council for Planning.

She referred to the progress achieved in her country in connection with the social consensus, which was related to the observations made by the Committee of Experts. Last December, in Colombia, the Tripartite Productivity, Prices and Wages Social Pact was signed with the participation of the Government, employers and organized workers. In this forum for consensus and agreement, there was a discussion about common topics. Among the many agreements reached within the Social Pact, one that could be highlighted was the agreement to establish the Tripartite Committee for Trade Union Development, as an advisory body to the Government, in which employers, workers and the Government were represented. This Tripartite Committee temporarily replaced the Standing Tripartite Committee for Consensus on Labour and Wage Policies whose draft legislation is currently before the Congress of the Republic.

The Committee for trade union development analysed the articles of the national Constitution related to trade union rights and guarantees; provided recommendations concerning plans and programmes for education and training of workers and management in aspects related to trade union rights and the incorporation of new technologies; prepared the study and proposal for actions necessary to strengthen the trade union-management relationship with a view to improving the quality of work and to increasing employment; and proposed the adoption of an institutional campaign to promote a new culture for labour management relations.

In the Tripartite Committee for Trade Union Development, the national Government agreed to develop certain topics of a constitutional nature, such as the regulation of the guarantee of trade union rights for public employees. In addition, there was an agreement to set up committees to study collective bargaining in the public sector, and the regulations under article 56 of the Political Constitution related to strikes and essential public services.

As part of this fundamental agreement, the Government further agreed to implement the Dissemination and Training Programme for the Establishment of a New Culture of Cooperation in Labour Relations, which could count on the support and cooperation of the ILO at the request of the signatories.

The speaker then specifically referred to the observations made by the Committee of Experts. In connection with the suspension, for up to three years, with loss of trade union rights, of trade union leaders who have been responsible for the dissolution of their unions, she clarified that the legislation in force sets forth that only judges of the Republic are empowered to impose such sanctions. Section 380(3) of the Labour Code contains this provision. In this regard she mentioned paragraph No. 122 of the 1994 General Survey of the Committee of Experts on Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining which provides that any removal or suspension of trade union leaders which is not the result of an internal decision of the trade union, a vote by members or normal judicial proceedings, seriously interferes in the exercise of their functions as trade union leaders.

She indicated that in connection with the issues related to the prohibition on more than one trade union in an enterprise, the supervision of the internal management and meetings of unions, the requirement that, in order to form a union, two-thirds of its members must be Colombian, and the requirements for eligibility for election as a trade union leader, the Government proposed to study these questions on a tripartite basis within the Standing Committee on Labour and Social Policy.

As to the right to strike, she indicated that the issue concerning the prohibition of the right to strike in public services, would be discussed by a tripartite committee set up as a result of the agreements reached in the Committee for Trade Union Development. There would be an analysis, in particular, of regulations concerning essential public services, before the Government submitted a draft law to the Congress of the Republic.

With regard to the possibility of dismissing trade union leaders who had participated in an illegal strike; the presence of the authorities at general assemblies gathered to vote on the calling of a strike, or the convening of an arbitration tribunal; the prohibition on federations and confederations from calling a strike; and the power of the Minister of Labour to refer a dispute to arbitration when a strike lasts for 60 calendar days, she indicated that the right to strike was a legal institution which had made considerable progress in terms of labour standards and jurisprudence in Colombia. The possible limitation or regulation of this right was based upon the collective interest of a country which was insufficiently developed and which had to protect its economic and social infrastructure for the benefit of the workers themselves, as a way of protecting their source of income, and any breakdown in the social structure which can affect the essential services of the community should be avoided. In this regard, she noted paragraph No. 151 of the previously mentioned General Survey to underscore that the right to strike could not be considered as an absolute right. The establishment of regulations and the setting of parameters and limits to the right to strike permitted a balance of opposing interests, preserving the general interest.

The Workers' members observed that the case of Colombia concerning Convention No. 87 was discussed in 1990, 1991, 1992 and 1993 and it was important to recall previous discussions with regard to this case as the situation in Colombia was still extremely serious. The disappearance, murder and imprisonment of trade unionists in Colombia continued unabated. They noted that, according to the Amnesty International report on Colombia, the Government had taken an important step in acknowledging the extent of the human rights violations and the responsibility of members of the security forces. The new Government had stated that human rights would be a priority issue. Nevertheless, throughout 1994 and the first half of 1995, extrajudicial executions, disappearances, torture and death threats carried out by members of the security forces and the paramilitary forces have continued. They referred to the annual survey by the ICFTU of violations of trade unions' rights worldwide. In the opening paragraphs of the report dealing with Colombia, it was noted that, during the first two months of the new presidency, 27 trade unionists were murdered; it was reported that at least 187 trade unionists were killed during 1994.

The Committee of Experts' report referred to a number of laws which were not in conformity with Convention No. 87, and many of these points had been outstanding for years. They observed that it was encouraging that the tripartite committee was now dealing with a number of issues contained in the Committee of Experts' report. They hoped that the tripartite committee would have before it the report of the Committee of Experts on Convention No. 87, that they would be addressing the issues contained in this year's and previous years' reports, and that they would be reporting promptly to the Government recommending legislative changes which could be made to bring Colombia into conformity with Convention No. 87.

They further observed that the ban on more than one trade union was regarded in the past by this Committee as a very important issue. From the Government's past point of view, it was thought that authorizing other trade unions would weaken the trade union representation. They observed that the Committee of Experts had stated that the Convention did not impose trade union diversity on a country. It stated that, if the members of trade unions, or individual workers, want to form trade unions, then the Government should not prevent them from so doing. They recalled that many years ago there were a number of States in the Communist bloc where single trade unions were imposed by law on the workers of a country, and something like that has persisted in Colombia. They noted that it was very difficult for a new trade union to be created due to the prior legal formalities required, and that this was a violation of the Convention.

The Workers' members then referred to the strange and threatening practice of public servants supervising management and the meetings of trade unions, as well as the presence of authorities at meetings called by trade unions to decide on arbitration or a strike. These "authorities" were in fact the security services. They observed that this sort of supervision was unhealthy, interfered with the work of trade unions and should cease. They observed that, if the Government were willing to put this to the tripartite committee, thus indicating a willingness to change these laws, no one would be more pleased than the members of this Committee.

They then referred to the obstacles for those who wished to hold trade union office: the Government preferred Colombian nationals with work experience, at least six months' experience in the work of the trade union or in the work covered by the trade union, and persons not in the process of being sued for ordinary offences at the time of their election. They considered the last point very dangerous since all that was required to disqualify someone was to sue him. Moreover, they observed that in many trade unions throughout the world people become trade union leaders who do not have a specific professional relationship with the trade union they are heading.

With regard to strikes, they noted that it was never argued that the right to strike was absolute, and there must be restrictions on the right to strike. Indeed, the Committee of Experts does not recognize an absolute right to strike: there must be restrictions, but the Experts have laid down the restrictions. The Workers' members noted that the right to strike has been defined over the years by the Committee of Experts which considers that it is a fundamental part of the right to organize and the right to collective bargaining. To the extent that there must be some restraint in some areas and under some circumstances, the right to strike is less than absolute. They observed that, in the case of Colombia, strikes are not banned generally, although they are in certain areas.

In concluding, they observed that this year the report of the Government was more helpful than it had been in the past, and that if the indications provided on the issues could mature on the basis of tripartite consultation, this would be positive.

They observed, however, that perhaps nothing would be solved in this stricken country of Colombia until it could deal with the internal strife and violence. Those problems, of course, were not going to be solved under Convention No. 87, but unless those problems were solved then Colombia would not have free trade unions or free employers' organizations.

The Employers' members emphasized that the Commission was already quite familiar with the details of the case since it had been examined on several occasions. They felt that finally the situation was no longer static and were pleased that a permanent tripartite committee had been set up which could look after problems raised by the Experts and recommend solutions.

Concerning the requirements that two-thirds of the members hold Colombian nationality in order to form a union and that they must belong to the profession in question or have exercised it for at least six months, they were led to believe that the tripartite committee had considered these requirements and that they would soon be abolished.

As for the presence of representatives of the authorities in general assemblies held to vote on arbitration or strike declarations, governed by Decree No. 2519 of 14 December 1994, they insisted that this constituted an excessive and flagrant intrusion in the internal affairs of a union, thus undermining its independence.

Concerning the ban on more than one union in the same company or establishment, the Employers' members saw no change forthcoming. They considered that for unions, as well, competition had its place. They firmly hoped that the restrictions imposed on the union movement would be withdrawn when the permanent tripartite committee resumed its work.

They recalled their position concerning the right to strike. They believed that detailed rules governing the right to strike were not part of the Convention. Among the many reasons for this, they recalled that no explicit proposal to introduce the right to strike in the Convention had been formulated during its elaboration. This question was to be addressed by another instrument yet to be prepared. Consequently, rules concerning the right to strike remained an internal affair on which the Employers' group could not commit itself, even if from their point of view an unlimited right to strike would be extreme. The permanent tripartite committee was entirely free to draw up strike legislation which corresponds to the wishes of the parties. However, the Government could not be criticized if this right was not recognized in Colombia.

In conclusion, the Employers' members considered that the situation in law and in practice seemed to be moving in the right direction, but the Government's efforts must be encouraged and strengthened so that genuine progress could be recorded in the application of the Convention, particularly due to the work of the tripartite committee.

The Workers' member of Colombia acknowledged that the Government had adopted a different approach to the question of human rights and the rights of workers. However, this attitude was insufficient and on certain occasions state agents carried out contradictory activities. In his country there were de facto and de jure violations of Convention No. 87 making the exercise of the right to organize a highly dangerous activity. Last year, more than 170 workers and union leaders were murdered with total impunity. The life and the physical integrity of trade unionists were threatened by various forces: sometimes by state agents and the paramilitary which, in many regions, acted with the complicity and help of the authorities. Special circumstances prevailed in the banana plantation of Uraba where guerrillas had assassinated, in recent years, more than a hundred workers and trade union leaders. This is not a situation unknown to the ILO. During the last ten years, the Committee on Freedom of Association has noted the numerous cases of trade unionists who have been murdered, who have disappeared and been tortured, and has requested the Colombian Government to take action to punish those who have perpetrated these crimes. The Committee on Freedom of Association, in its 265th Report expressed its disappointment on the absence of punishment of these criminals. The speaker noted an official document of the National Department of Planning of Colombia indicating that the possibility for an offence to be punished is 3 per cent, this meant that officially, impunity is 97 per cent. As to crimes against trade unionists, this impunity comes close to 100 per cent.

He also noted that the national legislation does not recognize Convention No. 87, as repeatedly pointed out by the Committee of Experts. In its latest report, the Committee set forth a long list of inconsistencies between the Colombian legislation and the Convention. For example, the authorities still have to be present at assemblies convened to vote on a strike; there was the continued prohibition of strikes in all public services, even if they were not essential, and a prohibition on federations and confederations from calling a strike. In its observations, the Committee drew attention to the fact that the national legislation – in contravention of Convention No. 87 – granted the Minister of Labour the power to end a strike when it had continued for 60 or more days. The legislation also empowered the President of the Republic to end a strike when, in his view, and in consultation with the Court of Justice, it affected the economy, also in contravention of Convention No. 87. Furthermore, strikes against the economic and social policy of the Government, as well as solidarity strikes, were forbidden.

He noted that, as in previous years, workers have complained that the Government systematically denied consultations. But today, he welcomed the measures taken pursuant to the Social Pact signed by the Government, employers and workers. In this framework, these parties worked on draft legislation, in line with the provisions of the Political Constitution which addressed the provisions of the Convention guaranteeing freedom of association and the right to strike.

The speaker then referred to the Tripartite Committee for Trade Union Development which met recently as an extension of the agreements reached in the Social Pact. There were agreements on several points relating to the Convention, such as: the Government agreed to submit a draft Law to Congress to recognize the so-called minority trade unionists and their right to strike and effectively to guarantee trade union rights to public employees.

There was also an agreement to create committees to study the trade union rights of public employees, such as the right to strike, as recognized in Convention No. 87.

Lastly, he expressed the trust that progress would continue in his country to avoid situations such as the one in which a teachers' strike was declared illegal or when workers were denied social security benefits and the authorization to form assemblies. He also hoped that the policy of consensus would continue in order to encourage a true culture of tolerance, of respect for the opinion of others, for tripartism and to overcome the anti-union culture and violence so as to bring about internal peace.

Another Workers' member from Colombia was satisfied with the changes that had occurred in his country with regard to human rights and reaching agreement with the social partners. Nevertheless, it was necessary to note specific events which had taken place in the course of the last year which had not been brought to the knowledge of the supervisory bodies of the ILO, and which to some extent violated Convention No. 87. These events concerned the dismissals of workers who formed trade unions. In three important cases – in the undertakings "Tejidos El Cóndor" in Medellín, and "Alfa" and "Protelas" in Bogotá – workers who formed trade unions were dismissed from their jobs. This conduct was a violation of the Convention. In addition, strikes in the banking sector, such as in the case of the Bank of Bogotá, were declared illegal on the grounds that the strike involved workers in the public sector who were denied the right to strike. Furthermore, in the last month state university professors had been victims of police repression for staging a protest against the wage policy of the Government.

In addition, there was a concern over judgements from certain tribunals which legitimized certain violations of the Convention within the constitutional framework. He referred specifically to the judgement of the Constitutional Court which held that the authority to end a strike when it affected the economy, was constitutional. Another judgement from the Supreme Court which held that the decision concerning the right to strike which was questioned by the Committee of Experts, was justified. The speaker also was concerned that the Supreme Court of Justice had found that despite the mandate to incorporate the provisions of the Convention into the Colombian legislation, various provisions of the Labour Code which should have been repealed were still in force.

Lastly, he noted that the tripartite committee had still not been established and that the draft legislation which had been submitted to Congress contained many difficulties preventing its adoption. A transitional committee existed which had taken positive action and which functioned outside the scheme of the future committee. The transitional committee would attempt to overcome the deficiencies resulting from the Congress's failure to adopt the standard that would create the standing tripartite committee.

The Government representative from Colombia again referred to the system of reaching agreement, particularly the Tripartite Committee. In this regard, she added that the draft legislation, establishing the Standing Committee, had been submitted to Congress and had been already approved by one of the Chambers and was awaiting approval by the other Chamber.

She also reiterated that the Tripartite Committee for Trade Union Development had been created on a temporary basis and progress had been achieved on the legislation concerning the dissemination of information, the training and development of the trade union movement. Within that same Committee, subcommittees had been established to deal with, among other things, a study on the problems concerning the right to strike, and in particular, collective bargaining in the public sector. The Tripartite Committee for Trade Union Development has been operational for four months and has given rise to these previously mentioned subcommittees. She hoped that the Tripartite Standing Committee would shortly be created to reach agreements which would take into account the interests of the different parties involved in the production process and the general interest of the country. With respect to the Bank of Bogotá, she stressed that no strike had been declared illegal. There also was no prohibition on declaring strikes in certain regions in the country.

She then referred to the topic of human rights violations, which had to be analysed in the context of widespread violence prevailing in her country for many years. There were many causes of that violence with victims from all sectors, among those, the trade union movement, whose members had often been a target for this violence.

She noted that the Government had achieved progress in upholding human rights and in implementing a practical policy on humanitarian law. The Government has given priority to this policy, as recognized by the Human Rights Commission. She also indicated that Protocol No. 2 was adopted by Congress and legally reviewed by the Constitutional Court. In this regard, it was important to also note that United Nations Rapporteurs and the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights had visited Colombia at the invitation of the Government. One of the Commissioner's representatives, in collaboration with the interested sectors, proposed measures to protect human rights. In addition, the Constitution of 1991 included the right to legal recourse on an expedited basis to redress human rights violations, which has been used by thousands of citizens including trade unionists and educators.

The speaker further highlighted the official acknowledgement of the responsibility of state agents in massacres such as the Trujillo massacre, adopting measures to compensate victims. The Human Rights Section of the Attorney General's office has been strengthened and measures have been implemented to continue the struggle against the problem of impunity.

She gave assurance that the Government was not complacent to nor an accomplice with paramilitary activity. A Committee was already working on draft proposals to reform the military penal system, and strict and far-reaching measures have been adopted to purge the national police and to improve internal control of excesses carried out in that institution.

Lastly, she stated that if the previously mentioned measures were successful, general violence would be reduced for everyone's benefit including trade unionists. The Government was working continuously to achieve peace which had been eroded by guerrillas, drug trafficking, paramilitary activities and some state agents. To achieve this, the Government counted upon the cooperation of workers and employers.

The Workers' members were pleased with the confirmation from the Colombian workers indicating that the new Government was trying to bring about change, although there was still a long way to go. They noted that the President had acknowledged that there was a very serious problem, that things have been very bad in the past, and that government elements, including the police, were responsible for this situation. The Workers' members considered this a very important first step in dealing with the difficulties of the past. They looked forward to the prospect of tripartite discussions, resulting in changes in the legislation where it was not in conformity with Convention No. 87, and noted that they would return to this case in the future, but with the belief that the number of issues involved might be far less than at present.

The Employers' members stated that they shared in condemning the generalized state of violence in Colombia which concerned those involved in union activities. They had no advice or recommendations to give to the Government, but they launched an appeal that it do everything possible and take all necessary measures in its power to combat this violence, particularly in terms of affording legal recourse. In this respect, in cases of unfair dismissal, the injured party must have recourse to the courts and be able to receive compensation. Likewise, misdemeanours must be punished and eliminating violence must figure among the main concerns of the Government.

The Committee noted with interest the presentation made by the Government representative in regard to the new cultural dialogue introduced in terms of a social pact and a series of national tripartite committees on productivity, trade union development, the enterprise labour relations, etc., and felt it to be a hopefully good sign.

It hoped that these tripartite bodies would go into the various issues mentioned by the Committee of Experts. The Committee, however, felt that the various factors mentioned by the Committee of Experts, including legislative stipulation of a single union, supervision of trade unions by public authorities and practices pre-empting free election to trade union offices, constituted a plain contravention of freedom of association and they should be removed from statutes and discontinued in practice.

In these circumstances, and in the light of the detailed discussions, the Committee urged the Government to furnish a detailed report on further measures taken to address all the issues raised by the Committee of Experts and to bring the national law and practice in line with Convention No. 87.

Côte d'Ivoire (ratification: 1960). A Government representative considered that the comments of the Committee of Experts concerning the application of the Convention were positive, and found that the direct contacts mission made to his country in September 1994 was effective. This mission enabled several issues to be clarified during a tripartite meeting, and subsequently there was a follow-up of the adviser responsible for standards at Abidjan. According to the speaker, there were no problems at present relating to the formation of trade unions or to the exercise of trade union rights. In addition, he indicated that the draft law referred to by the Committee of Experts had been adopted on 12 January 1995, and had been in force since its publication in the Journal officiel on 8 February 1995 as Act No. 95-15 providing for the Labour Code. This rectified various problems with regard to the application of this Convention in Act No. 64-290 of 1 August 1964 providing for the Labour Code. The new Labour Code, whose implementing texts were being prepared, explicitly covered trade unions in the five chapters of Title V of the Code. Moreover, the provisions of sections 51.1 to 51.9 concerning freedom of association and the formation of trade unions seemed sufficiently clear and did not make any reference to the Act on Associations. For this reason, in his view there was no ambiguity in that all matters concerning trade unions were covered by the Labour Code and not by Act No. 60-315 of 21 September 1960 on associations. The latter Act did not apply to trade unions and, as a result, did not require amendment. He concluded by stating that trade unions continued to be established without difficulty in various sectors and without being impeded in any way by the provisions of the relevant legislation.

The Workers' members began by recalling that the comments of the Committee of Experts concerning the application of the Convention were made following complaints introduced in 1992, in particular at the time of the 79th Session of the Conference. These complaints concerned a large number of practices that involved repeated violations of trade union rights. Subsequent to deliberations by the Committee on Freedom of Association, a decision was made to send a direct contacts mission to Côte d'Ivoire in view of the importance of the case and the seriousness of the matters concerned. The conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association referred to by the Experts determined that, in addition to questions of the adequacy of legislation with regard to trade union pluralism, there were a series of unjustifiable practices. These included, in particular, imprisonment of trade unionists, their dismissal for trade union activities, expulsion from their homes, exclusion of their children from schools, and damage to their health to the extent that several workers and members of their families died. As noted by the Committee of Experts, there clearly was a spirit of cooperation shown by the Government and an apparent willingness to remedy the gaps that had been found, which was shown in particular by the useful direct contacts mission as well as by the announcement made by the Government according to which the draft of the working group referred to by the Committee of Experts was adopted and became law. It was thus important that the new legislative text be sent to the Office so that it could be the object of an in-depth examination by the Committee of Experts. This would require confirmation of the announced revision of the draft Labour Code, which in the meantime apparently had been adopted, as well as the amendment of the Act on associations in order to eliminate any ambiguity with regard to its non-application to trade unions. However, the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association left unanswered a number of questions. In contrast to the 1995 observations of the Committee of Experts, violations of the Convention in practice had been addressed in the report of the Committee on Freedom of Association which "nevertheless drew the attention of the Government to the danger that existed for the free exercise of trade union rights because of imprisonment and conviction of workers' representatives within the framework of activities connected to the defence of the interests of their constituents". The Workers' members could not understand why, within one month after the direct contacts mission, the Secretary-General of "Dignité" was once again arrested. In addition, they asked about the fate of Mr. Sawadogo Nikiema, a militant member of "Dignité", who had been imprisoned since 17 January 1995 under the most severe conditions that were usually reserved for dangerous criminals. These two trade unionists were imprisoned for the simple so-called offence of having defended the dignity of their striking colleagues. They also recalled that the Committee had asked the Government to keep it informed regarding negotiations for the re-employment of workers who had lost their jobs following labour disputes related to the recognition of first-level trade unions that were affiliated to "Dignité" and to the holding of elections of trade union representatives in six enterprises. It was therefore important to have, together with positive changes in legislation, information on the practice and in particular on the follow-up given to the recommendations of direct contacts missions and of the Freedom of Association Committee, such as the measures taken to resolve the labour conflict concerning port workers who were members of "Dignité" in order to ensure that they were not dismissed or excluded from the list of port workers because of their trade union membership or their participation in trade union activities. In addition, they asked to what extent guarantees were given that the militant trade union members and officials would be re-employed, as requested by the Committee, and that the conditions for trade union elections would be established. It was therefore important that the Government respond to the questions raised by the Committee on Freedom of Association while implementing its recommendations in legislation and in practice, as well as follow the suggestions of the Committee of Experts, in particular with respect to freedom of association in practice.

The Employers' members stated that this case was an illustration of how the ILO supervisory machinery could work in a normal and positive way, assisted by the Government's positive attitude and by the 1994 direct contacts mission, which achieved positive results with regard to the obligations of this country under the Convention. The enactment of the new Labour Code (Act No. 95-15) addressed some of the concerns raised by the Experts, and clearly important changes had been made. The new legislation needed to be implemented in practice and it was hoped that from the outset there would be a positive application of the provisions of the Labour Code. With regard to possible conflict between the Labour Code and Act No. 60-315 of 21 September 1960 on associations with respect to their application to trade unions, they noted that while the Government insisted that only the Labour Code would apply to trade unions, the Committee on Freedom of Association questioned whether this would always be the case. As apparent conflicts in laws were sometimes not easily resolved, the Government might need ILO technical assistance to resolve any ambiguity. They asked that the conclusions stress the fundamental importance of implementation of Conventions in practice, and that all reasonable steps be taken to resolve the ambiguity concerning the application to trade unions of the Labour Code and the above Act on Associations.

The Workers' member of Côte d'Ivoire indicated that the difficulties with regard to "ambiguity" had already begun in his country in 1990, the year in which the country returned to a multi-party political system. It was normal that this multi-party policy instigated an interest in trade union pluralism. In the absence of relevant texts concerning trade union organization and practice, everyone thought that they could establish their own organizations as they liked. With regard to the provisions referred to by the Government representative, he said that although they existed they were not in themselves sufficient. He pointed out that the Experts had requested the amendment of Act No. 60-315 of 21 September 1960 on associations and youth movements because there was real ambiguity that was detrimental to the promotion of trade unionism. He was convinced that his country, as a State governed by law, intended to broaden measures concerning trade unionism in this respect and he asked whether it would not be appropriate that the Government, in view of the ambiguities that had been found, gather all provisions concerning trade unions in one trade union act, as had been done with regard to associations and political parties. He said that frequently associations called themselves trade unions and trade unions called themselves associations, and for this reason the Act on Associations was often wrongly considered to be an Act on trade unions, and as a consequence the terms "trade union" and "association" were confused. However, a trade union was a specialized association and could not be compared with youth movements that formed to carry out a specific activity and were referred to as "non-governmental associations".

The Workers' member of Togo outlined the history of French-speaking African trade unionism which began at the time of colonization and particularly after the 1944 Brazzaville Conference. These trade unions were called "cover-all" because they covered both employers, who were solely Europeans, and workers, who were called "natives". The struggle of the latter ended in independence in 1960, at which time this Convention was ratified by all French-speaking African States. However, the question was raised regarding the evolution of the application of the Convention in these countries. The second stage of French-speaking African trade unionism began in the 1970s in the framework of "trade unionism involving responsible participation" with single federations whose secretaries-general were members of governing bodies of single parties and vice-presidents of the National Assembly at the same time; this compromised the defence of trade union rights as well as of other rights of workers. In the 1990s, the fall of the Berlin wall initiated a third stage of trade unionism which became pluralist with the beginning of the democratic process in Africa. The return to trade union pluralism allowed the establishment of other independent trade union federations who were joined by a wave of members, who were supporting independent trade unionism. This scenario existed in several countries, including Côte d'Ivoire. The advent of this new trade unionism involved, and continued to involve, imprisonment and dismissals of trade unionists. He recalled that with regard to the application of the Convention the problems of "Dignité", the confederation of free trade unions of Côte d'Ivoire, began a long time ago. Several missions had previously been sent to Abidjan, including that of the World Confederation of Workers, of which "Dignité" was a member. The arrest of the Secretary-General of "Dignité" raised in general the problem of the application of ratified Conventions to legal, representative and independent trade union organizations. He concluded by asking the Government to respect freedom of association and ratify ILO Conventions. This would be a credit to the democracy to which the Government constantly referred.

Another Workers' member of Côte d'Ivoire said that the arrival of the direct contacts mission that took place from 24 to 30 September 1994 was a relief to him and his trade union organization "Dignité" – of which he was Secretary-General – which was established in 1988. With regard to the report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, the reason for sending a direct contacts mission to Abidjan was related to the problem of recognition of first-level trade unions of "Dignité", and the dismissal of trade union militants in several enterprises. With respect to the independent port of Abidjan, the recognition of the basic trade union "Dignité" did not take place until 28 May 1995. However, this recognition was in his mind incomplete in view of the fact that even if the trade union in question could participate in elections and negotiations, its officers did not have the right of access to the port. With regard to the workers of Irho Lamé, he said "Dignité" had been reproached for the absence of permission accorded by the Ministry of the Interior, as well as the fact that it had not sent a letter of apology to the political authorities and to the director of the enterprise for having conducted a strike. The direct contacts mission was therefore able to make clear that obtaining a receipt for filing the text of the constitution of the trade union was sufficient and that there was no need to wait for the permission referred to above. In addition, the mission asked the Government to no longer ask for letters of apology and to re-employ workers, taking into account their interests and those of the enterprise. He added that they had had only one meeting with the employer and the Government since 14 October 1994, as a result of which the employer had suggested the re-employment of 25 of the 618 workers between October 1994 and January 1995, and 75 others at the end of 1995; the others had been summarily dismissed on the basis of serious misconduct. "Dignité" had suggested the replacement by new employees of 122 striking workers who were at retirement age and 32 other striking workers who had died, as well as re-employment according to the needs of the enterprise of 464 other strikers. Since that time, there had not been any tripartite follow-up, and a serious incident occurred on 17 January 1995 at Irho Lamé when the employer deliberately armed the new workers with hunting rifles which they then fired at the former workers at a sit-in in front of the enterprise. He said that he had proof of this which he had sent to the Government, but without result, as the Government preferred instead to chase away the strikers who, since 17 January 1995, had been hiding in the bush with their families. Since that time, the primary school of the village had been closed. With regard to trade union elections, he pointed out that in enterprises where "Dignité" was authorized to present candidates, it succeeded in registering 458 elected delegates as opposed to 56 for the other confederation. Since then, the Government also had permitted "Dignité" to participate in all collective bargaining. He asked the Government to make an effort so that elections would be organized in enterprises referred to as the "heart of the economy", such as the independent port of Abidjan and the airport of Abidjan, etc., where such elections had not taken place for five years. He also regretted that since the departure of the direct contacts mission, no negotiations had been undertaken to resolve the problem of the dockers of Irho Lamé, as well as of the representatives and workers of several other enterprises referred to in the mission report. These problems were reflected in the Workers' members' request that the new Labour Code actually be applied. With regard to the misappropriation of trade union cards and funds of which he had been accused, he stated that he had just been acquitted by the courts, which implied that he had been arrested unfairly and without any basis. He also expressed concern about the fate of two members of "Dignité" who had been detained since 17 January 1995 in a high security prison in Abidjan set aside for murderers and persons who had committed serious crimes. He added that he would file a report with the Committee on Freedom of Association concerning the dismissal of workers for trade union activities or strikes; this report was also available to the Committee. He concluded by expressing great concern for his trade union organization, which must depend upon the effectiveness of ILO supervisory mechanisms.

The Government representative made it clear that the sombre picture painted of his country did not represent reality. He stated that aside from the problems of "Dignité" there was actual freedom of association in his country, including three trade union confederations having a total of about 300 trade unions. With regard to the restriction on trade union leaders from entering the independent port of Abidjan, he clarified that the reason for this was that there was a labour dispute before the Labour Court and that until this case was decided, nothing could be done. He stated in addition that it was not the Government but instead former members of "Dignité" who had commenced the judicial procedure against their Secretary. Moreover, the Government was not involved in the organization of elections of personnel delegates. With regard to the comments of the Worker member of Togo and of the Secretary-General of "Dignité", and the incidents that occurred during the 17 January 1995 sit-in, he referred to the reports sent by the Government to the ILO. While taking into account the suggestions for the improvement of national legislation, he considered that there was no possible ambiguity with regard to Act No. 60-315 of 21 September 1960 with respect to associations and the new provisions of the Labour Code concerning trade unions.

The Workers' members once again insisted on the need for the Government to provide replies and concrete information concerning the application of the Convention in practice as well as on all the points examined that were referred to in the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The Employers' members expressed concern regarding what they had heard concerning the application of labour legislation in practice, and stated that a written report from the Government to the ILO was necessary on how the new Labour Code would be implemented in practice.

The Committee noted the report of the Committee of Experts and the oral information given by the Government representative as well as the discussion that took place thereafter. The Committee took note of the direct contacts mission that went to Côte d'Ivoire in September 1994. The Committee welcomed the Government's information that the new Labour Code, which was promulgated on 23 February 1995, contained provisions in line with some previous comments of the Committee of Experts. The Committee, however, insisted that implementation of law and practice was of fundamental importance and called upon the Government to adopt at a very early date appropriate measures to bring the legislation and practice into full conformity with the Convention. In particular, it urged the Government to amend Act No. 60-315 of 21 September 1960 on associations, so as to remove ambiguities and to provide that it did not apply to trade unions and to abstain from any interference in the internal affairs of the trade unions. The Committee exhorted that if necessary, with technical assistance from the ILO, the Government would implement the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association and give effect to the points raised by the Experts. The Committee trusted that it would be able to take note at its next examination of the case of substantial progress in the application of the Convention and asked the Government to report in detail to the Committee of Experts in due time.

Greece (ratification: 1962). A Government representative of Greece recalled the efforts made by her Government during the last years to modify the legislation to bring it in line with the provisions of ratified Conventions, taking into account the observations made by the Committee of Experts. In reply to the Committee's request inviting the Government of Greece to provide information on the situation, the Government representative dealt successively with the three points raised in the Committee's report.

Concerning the determination of the minimum service to be provided in the event of a strike in the public services, article 2 of Act No. 2224 of 1994, in force since October 1994, empowered the social partners the right to negotiate an agreement on the designation of security staff and the staff required to provide the minimum service in the event of a strike. In case of a disagreement between the social partners, the matter was referred to mediation and, in the event of the failure of mediation, the matter was brought before a permanent bipartite (employers-workers) Commission presided over by a judge responsible for arbitration.

With respect to the finances of trade union organizations, Act No. 1915 of 1990, which was the subject of the complaints made by the General Confederation of Greek Workers (GSEE), was amended by Acts Nos. 2091 of 1992 and 2224 of 1994. In conformity with the latter Act and with the ministerial decision No. 50262 of 17 March 1995, the GSEE and its member organizations (professional federations and departmental unions "Ergatika Kentra") received from the "Foyer ouvrier" finances for their operational costs, such as rent, remuneration of staff, costs of organization of election congresses, etc. The amount of these allocations to trade unions was calculated in proportion to the number of their voting members. As to the first level organizations representing less than 500 members, they could also benefit from subsidies after consultation with the GSEE. The administrative council of the "Foyer ouvrier" was a tripartite body which constituted a real guarantee of objectivity and transparency.

Concerning the freedom of association of seafarers, the Pan-Hellenic Federation of Seafarers was functioning freely and independently of the Government. The Government acted to suppress the exclusion of seafarers from the application of Act No. 1264 of 1982. Moreover, the seafarers' trade unions, the shipowners and the Government were engaged in dialogue and the Ministry of Labour made all the necessary efforts to ensure that seafarers could benefit from the same trade union freedoms as other workers.

In addition, in Greece, in agreement with the social partners, the Economic and Social Committee had been created recently on which were represented all the organizations concerned. It was a consultative institution chaired by a person enjoying the full confidence of the employers' and workers' organizations, and the role of which was to give opinions on all the questions relating to the economic and social life of the country.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for providing information on all the three points raised in the report of the Committee of Experts. With respect to the determination of the minimum service to be provided in case of strikes in the public services and the risk of financial interference by the State in trade union affairs, the Experts had taken note of the legislative modifications introduced by Acts Nos. 2091 of 1992 and 2224 of 1994, and had not expressed any precise criticisms in this respect. Therefore, the Employers' members considered that these questions were settled.

As regards the third point, namely the freedom of association of seafarers, the Experts strongly regretted that this problem had not yet been definitely solved. The Government representative here had confined her comments strictly to the general observations that a consensus had to be reached between the interested parties. For the Employers' members, therefore, this question had been left open and they expressed the hope that it would also be solved.

The Workers' members had recalled the negative and positive changes in the trade union situation in Greece over the last decades as well as the observations made by the Committee of Experts for many years and the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos. 1584 and 1632. The Committee of Experts had noted in its last report the modifications introduced by Act No. 2224 of 1994 and the Government representative had recalled these amendments and provided details. On the designation of security staff and the staff required to cope with the essential needs of the life of the community in the event of a strike, the new system placed the accent on the collective negotiations between the social partners. The Workers welcomed this development, stressing that the right to strike was a fundamental aspect of freedom of association, as the Committee of Experts had reaffirmed in its General Survey of last year. As to what concerned the independence of trade unions in their finances, the same Act modified the Act of 1990 which had a negative effect on the internal financial management of trade unions.

Finally, as to the question of freedom of association of seafarers, the Workers' members had noted the information provided by the Government representative, according to which this problem would be solved. Therefore, they requested the Government to provide detailed reports on the decisions taken and on the development of the situation in the light of the observations made by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' member of Greece recalled that if after the adoption of Act No. 1915 of 1990 the situation was very unfavourable for Greek workers, it had since developed in a positive manner. Workers could negotiate collectively with the employers' organizations on a completely normal basis. Moreover, new laws were adopted that had already been referred to by the previous speakers. There was however scope for further improvements, particularly as to what concerned the guarantees to be provided for the sustainability of this system irrespective of the government in power.

Concerning the problem of seafarers, this problem had existed for many years due to the particularity of this category of workers. The General Confederation of Greek Workers had never accepted that seafarers were excluded from the application of the legislation which covered other categories of workers. This question concerned first of all the Seafarers' Federation which was a member of the Confederation and functioned in a free and democratic manner. The Seafarers' Federation had participated and voted at the last congress held by the General Confederation of Greek Workers in March, thus having the possibility to elect its activists to the Direction of the Confederation with the promise that its statute would be modified and brought into conformity with the relevant legislation. The speaker expressed the hope that legislation covering land-based workers would be fully applied to seafarers and port workers.

The Government representative stated that she would make a report to her Government with the aim of providing next year precise and detailed information on developments in the situation.

The Committee noted the oral information supplied by the Government representative as well as the discussion which took place thereafter. The Committee also noted with interest that some positive developments had taken place in the legislation in relation to the agreed determination of minimum services to be provided for in the event of strikes in public services and in respect of the question of finances of trade unions.

However, the Committee noted that for a number of years the Committee of Experts had referred to the exclusion of seafarers from the legislation of 1982 and 1990 concerning trade unions. The Government, in its report to the Committee of Experts, had stated that the trade union status of seafarers had to be the subject of a broad consensus of the parties. Having noted this, the Committee felt that the future in regard to this issue was still unclear and that freedom of association should be guaranteed to seafarers in a sustainable fashion.

Guatemala (ratification: 1952). The Government supplied the following information:

Article 2 of the Convention (Right of workers and employers to establish and join organizations). The Government indicated that the substantive and procedural conditions are contained in Title 6 of the Single Chapter of the Labour Code and in Government Agreement No. 639-93. There is no specific legal provision covering special categories of workers.

Article 3 (Right of workers' and employers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules, to elect their representatives in full freedom and to organize their administration and activities). The law provides that trade unions are permanent associations of workers or of employers or of self-employed professionals or tradespersons established exclusively for the study, improvement and protection of their economic and social interests.

Article 4 (Dissolution and suspension of organizations by administrative authority). Dissolution is governed under sections 226-229 of the Labour Code.

Article 5 (Right of organizations to establish federations and confederations and to affiliate with international organizations). Section 233 of the Labour Code provides for the establishment of federations and confederations, and states that they can be at the national or regional level or according to branch of activity. This provision does not provide for membership of international organizations.

Article 6 (Rights of federations and confederations of workers' and employers' organizations). The establishment of federations and confederations is governed by the same provisions as those concerning the establishment of trade unions (Title 6, Single Chapter of the Labour Code).

Article 7 (Legal personality of workers' and employers' organizations and of their federations and confederations). This matter is dealt with under Title 6, Single Chapter of the Labour Code.

Article 8 (Exercise of the rights of workers, employers and their respective organizations). The requirements under this Article are taken into account particularly under the following constitutional provisions: articles 5, 24, 28, 29, 33, 34, 35, 138 and 139.

Article 9 (Trade union rights in the armed forces and the police). There is no relevant legislation in force. In accordance with custom and national practice, there is a presumption against the establishment of trade unions in the armed forces and police. With regard to the 1993 comments of the Committee of Experts, the Government will take action shortly to eliminate the divergencies indicated. However, the legislative function is exercised exclusively by Congress.

A Government representative referred to the written report provided by the Government. She expressed her appreciation and recognition for the work developed by the ILO, particularly by the present Committee. She indicated that she had appeared personally in order to demonstrate the Government's commitment to obtaining a solution to the difficulties which persisted in this matter, notwithstanding the efforts already realized. Guatemala had been affected by a terrible armed conflict during the last 35 years, as a consequence of the cold war and of internal conditions. The Government was seeking peace through the signing of accords to resolve differences. In this difficult process, Guatemala was being assisted by friendly nations and by the United Nations, which were acting as mediators in the process and which moreover were collaborating through MINUGUA in the monitoring of the global accord on human rights. During his recent visit to Guatemala, the President of Mexico recognized, on behalf of the friendly countries involved in the peace process (Norway, United States, Spain, Mexico, Colombia and Venezuela), the reconciliation work of the Government of the President of the Republic of Guatemala, and emphasized the importance of counting on the help of the international organizations and agencies to consolidate the desired peace in Guatemala. Additionally, the speaker described the importance of the presence of the ILO regional office in Central America which had permitted the improvement of relations with the ILO and at the same time enhanced the use of consultants and technicians to modernize the Ministry of Labour and make it more efficient.

Moreover, the Government emphasized the valuable work of the direct contacts missions to Guatemala, the results of which were appropriately recognized. The mission provided the opportunity for dialogue with the different sectors and evidenced the policy of the President of the Republic to open the country to collaboration with the international community in order to develop together solutions to the social problems of the country.

Concerning the observations of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, the speaker stated that Guatemala had already completed the reports which were referred to in the report of the Committee of Experts. Those reports had been delayed due to the lack of employees in the Ministry of Labour who were familiar with this specialized area. In the future, the Government would take measures to ensure that the reports arrived on time.

Concerning the observations formulated in relation to the Convention, the speaker stated that since the 1970s four attempts had been made to develop a new Labour Code in Guatemala, in place of the Labour Code of 1947, and that committees had been formed to develop each of these drafts, but without results. In December 1992, the modification of certain articles was achieved with the promulgation of Legislative Decree No. 64-92. Nevertheless, such modifications were minimal and in non-controversial areas, in comparison to the total reforms proposed. Regrettably, the propagation of a new Labour Code or reform of the existing Code always encountered opposition in a polarized society such as Guatemala. Consequently, it was difficult to complete accords, largely due to the persistence of internal armed conflicts. In spite of that, the modifications introduced in 1992 were elaborated with the participation of the workers' and employers' sectors, and of the Government. The Government believed that this exercise needed to be repeated. After the failed coup, which occurred in May 1993, a process to streamline the machinery of the State was initiated and in 1994 there was an excessive purge of Congress. The present delegates were due to turn over their posts in January 1996, making it difficult to adopt legislative reforms in the immediate future. None the less, the Ministry of Labour would convene a meeting with the employers' and workers' sectors to analyse the recommendations of the Committee of Experts. Such a situation should not be an obstacle for the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, which had already taken measures to promote freedom of association. In October 1993, only two months after assuming its duties, the Ministry sponsored various seminars and exercises intended to reduce the administrative steps required to obtain authorization for unions, and eradicated unnecessary formalities which had amounted to over 127 bureaucratic steps. The procedure was simplified significantly and eliminated the obligation to comply with the statutes propagated by the President of the Republic. Moreover, new reforms were introduced recently to facilitate a more straightforward procedure. This reform established a process requiring approximately 55 days to obtain legal recognition of a union (in accordance with the provisions of the revised Labour Code).

Lastly, the speaker reiterated the political will of the President of the Republic to continue taking measures and adopting actions to facilitate the existence of a culture of tolerance and to consolidate a lasting and firm peace through political accords based on dialogue and compromise. Only then would it be possible to dedicate all of the resources of the country, human as well as material, to solve the significant challenges which stem from underdevelopment, such as health, work, education and the modernization of production. Guatemala needed the understanding and help of the international community because it was easy to confuse the scarcity of resources with the absence of policies. Success must be obtained in cooperation, because peace was not only the absence of war.

The Workers' members appreciated the information provided by the Minister of Labour concerning the difficult political situation of the country and the initiatives taken to adopt a new Labour Code. It was recalled that the case had been discussed in 1991 and 1993, and that a special paragraph had been adopted firmly insisting that the Government send detailed information on measures taken to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention; that it eliminate the discrepancies between legislation and practice on the one hand, and non-compliance with the Convention on the other; and that it take the necessary measures to prevent serious attacks on freedom of association, such as had occurred. At that time, the Government representative made promises to that effect. Nevertheless, the Committee of Experts did not receive the Government's report on time; and when it did report, the Government did not provide any new information but rather limited itself to expressing vague intentions to take steps to eliminate the aforementioned discrepancies. This was regrettable, given the grave problems which existed in the lack of conformity of the legislation with the Convention. Furthermore, the Committee on Freedom of Association, upon examining various cases, had identified the flagrant violations of freedom of association in practice: the difficulties unions faced in organizing and operating; dozens of cases of threats, aggression, assassinations, disappearances and dismissals of union activists. Paramilitary groups, police, and directors of national and international enterprises were clearly responsible, but were allowed to act with impunity. The sectors most affected were agriculture, forestry, and the free enterprise zones. Additionally, the employers promoted the creation of "solidarist associations" to weaken trade union organizations and undermine the right of collective bargaining (reference was made to the case of four enterprises in particular); and it was estimated that the members of such "solidarist associations" numbered in the thousands.

In addition, the Workers' members emphasized the gravity of the problems, which were highlighted in the report of the Committee of Experts, which made difficult the creation of unions, the free election of representatives (a worker must have been active in the enterprise and without a prior criminal record), and the exercise of the right to strike (the excessive requirements made impossible the lawful exercise of the right). Although in 1992 improvements had been made in the law, the formation of unions still tended to be a complicated process. The Committee should adopt firm conclusions, given the gravity of the situation and the fact that the Government had not completed the promises which it previously made to the present Committee. It was also necessary to: guarantee and protect the physical and moral integrity of union activists; increase the number of labour tribunals; reinforce labour inspections; facilitate the system for forming unions and eliminating administrative procedures; and collaborate in the development of a stable and efficient system of labour relations, where freedom of association was not violated by enterprises or the public authorities. The Workers' members hoped that in the near future tangible results could be obtained.

The Employers' members agreed with most of the points made by the Workers' members. This case had been dealt with a total of six times in the course of the 1980s, and then again in 1991 and 1993. This year, the Committee of Experts did not have any report from the Government and therefore had no option but to reiterate its previous observation, despite the fact that in 1993 the present Committee had concluded by asking urgently for a full report on any progress made. On that occasion, the Government had promised that things would change very soon, but these promises were linked to the appointment of the new President of Guatemala, who was to personally ensure the fulfilment of the changes.

In fact, not very much had changed since then. The comments made by the Government representative on the whole dealt with the general political situation and the problems the country had encountered over the past 30 years. It referred to some changes which had occurred but which were not the object of observations of the Committee of Experts. The Workers' members had already listed the main points of concern: supervision of trade union activities; the nationality requirement for exercising union office; the requirement that workers be active in the enterprise in order to exercise union office; and the requirement that workers demonstrate that they did not have a criminal record. These demands certainly could not be reconciled with the terms of Convention No. 87, so here too the Employers' members supported the call for change, which was made in 1991, in 1993, and repeated now.

The Employers' members clarified that it did not support the demands made in connection with the right to strike because they could not be derived from the terms of the Convention and contemplated the right to strike in a very specific way which the Employers' members could not accept. But as for all other points, the Employers' members agreed fully with the Committee of Experts.

So what had become of the promises which were given in 1993? The present Committee said at the time that it hoped that the new political leadership would introduce changes for the better because the new President had the reputation of being somebody who was a great defender of human rights. But the Committee of Experts had not even received on time a detailed report from the Government and the information received later, which had been provided to this Committee, was not very impressive and did not provide any concrete information, and again contained a vague promise to act in the future. The Government representative stated that it was extremely difficult to achieve any change in the short term. This was less than what had been promised in 1993. Undoubtedly, the Government had good intentions, but it was evident that change came about very slowly. The Committee should adopt very firm conclusions, as the Workers' member had demanded, and should demand a report on any measures taken. The Employers' members indicated that they reserved the right to request examination of this case next year.

The Workers' member of Guatemala declared that the statement made by the Workers' members fitted reality and that violations of the Convention at the level of the legislation had existed since 1952, the date of Guatemala's ratification. Furthermore, the Government had not submitted a report on time to the Committee of Experts, and when it did (in May 1995) it did not consult the workers' organizations. The criticisms of the Committee of Experts concerned restrictions on freedom of association, on the right to strike, and on collective bargaining, all of which existed in legislation as well as in practice. The speaker referred to various recent cases of attempts on the lives of union activists, and cases which illustrated the ineffectiveness of the labour courts concerning problems of collective bargaining. The Committee of Experts should continue to examine these problems on an ongoing basis. This would be a significant help in the actual peace process, which required respect for economic, social and political rights, to be able to solve the causes of the armed conflict.

The Workers' member of Colombia expressed solidarity with the Guatemalan union movement and observed the painful situation which the workers endured. It was disturbing that the Government had not sent its report on time, and that it had sought to excuse itself by invoking the search for peace. Peace required respect for the lives of workers and union activists, and respect for other rights pertaining to the organization of workers. The protection of the right of unions to organize, which existed in Guatemalan legislation, was more formal than real. It should be observed that the Government had failed to act firmly when enterprises proceeded with massive anti-union dismissals, or when obscure forces repeatedly assassinated or kidnapped activists. The speaker referred to specific cases of assassinations and kidnapping of union activists. The speaker concurred with the statements of the Workers' members and firmly requested that the Committee formulate stronger declarations. Lastly, the speaker requested that the ILO continue to follow all of the issues related to freedom of association.

The Workers' member of the United States stated that the observation of the Committee of Experts concerning Guatemala appeared relatively bloodless in its legalisms, but the facts in Guatemala were anything but bloodless. There existed a horrible record of the role of police, paramilitary and death squads in what the archdiocese in Guatemala City had described as the "systematic practice" of repression against the trade union movement. What amendments had been made to the 1947 Labour Code had rarely been enforced so that the protection for organizing that appeared in print was either ignored or misapplied. There existed a practice of repeated and horrific reprisals. For example, since the present Committee last met, the leader Edi Conde was abducted by four armed men in police uniform and interrogated, beaten and threatened with death unless he left the country. The AFL-CIO, with the Postal Telegraph and Telephone International, helped the Secretary-General of the Energy Workers' Federation of Guatemala to go to El Salvador to seek refuge and safety. In March, the Finance Secretary of the union at the "PCA Maquiladora" enterprise was cruelly murdered. UNSITRAGUA alone had lost eight leaders and members since mid-1994. When the Coca-Cola bottling plant or other employers claimed that the workers lacked the majority necessary to form a union, the present Committee should not focus only on the fact that the Labour Code required a two-thirds majority for a strike, in violation of the Convention, but also on the existing atmosphere of violence and intimidation so extreme that it did not require a cynic to say that many killings of union members prevented unions from reaching the required quota for registration. In light of the lack of freedom of association, it was time for this Committee to firmly insist that Guatemala bring its legislation and its practice into conformity with the Convention.

The Workers' member of Iceland, speaking on behalf of the Nordic Workers' members, stressed that everyday reports were received on acts of violence aimed at disturbing the functions of trade unions in Guatemala. While this was going on, it was confirmed time after time that no action was being taken by the authorities in order to combat the paramilitary groups, such as the "Jaguar Justiciero", which were responsible for these acts of violence. Guatemala had ratified a total of 67 Conventions, 62 of which were supposed to be in force, including Conventions No. 87 and No. 98. While reading the list of Guatemalan trade unionists who had lost their lives in the last few years as a result of their struggle to better the condition of workers in Guatemala, and observing that nothing was being done by the authorities to prevent it, it was almost impossible to see that the Government of Guatemala had meant a word of what it said by ratifying the human rights Conventions. Freedom of association had little meaning under circumstances such as this. Ratifying Conventions without taking action to implement them in practice was an abuse of the ILO and a disgrace. However, the speaker noted that the representation of Guatemalan workers at the present Committee this year included an independent trade union organization, and expressed the hope that this was a sign of better times.

The Workers' member of Panama condemned the situation in Guatemala relating to labour and union rights; the difficulty of maintaining unions under such conditions, and, above all, the crimes committed against union activists. The speaker indicated that the workers' organizations from Panama had visited the Embassy of Guatemala to demand respect for the right to life of the workers, as well as the protection of other rights. The ILO should continue to examine all of these issues to ensure that the Government fulfilled the commitments which resulted from the ratification of the Convention.

The Government representative took note of the statements which were made and regretted the cases of violence referred to by various speakers. Many of those cases were being examined by the direct contacts mission which visited the country, and would be examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association, whose conclusions the Government awaited. The speaker indicated that the Government had already submitted all of the reports required by the Committee of Experts. She reiterated the Government's wish to convene a meeting with workers and employers to examine the recommendations of the Committee of Experts concerning the Convention, with the objective of bringing the legislation into compliance with the Convention as soon as possible.

The Committee noted the written communication and oral explanations provided by the Government representative, as well as the discussion that took place thereafter. The Committee regretted that, in spite of the discussions before the present Committee in 1993 and the assurances given by the Government at that time, the Government's report was not received in time to be examined by the Committee of Experts. The Committee of Experts and the present Committee had, for a number of years, urged the Government to eliminate the discrepancies between national legislation and practice and the Convention, particularly regarding the need to lift the limitations imposed on the right of trade unions to organize their activities and to elect their representatives. The Committee emphasized that these matters had already been discussed many times, had been examined by direct contacts missions, and had been the subject of a special paragraph in a previous report. Consequently, the Committee urged the Government to adopt in the very near future the necessary measures, in legislation and in practice, to ensure that this fundamental Convention, ratified more than 40 years ago, was applied in letter and spirit. It called upon the Government to report in detail to the Committee of Experts on the actual progress made in terms of specific steps taken to bring both legislation and practice into conformity with the requirements of the Convention.

Japan (ratification: 1965). The Government supplied the following information:

With regard to the issue of the right to organize of fire defence personnel, the Ministry of Home Affairs, the Fire Defence Agency and the All-Japan Prefectural Municipal Workers' Union (JICHIRO) have held consultations strenuously in order to find an appropriate solution to this issue since the submission by the Government of Japan of its report in December 1994. The consultations continued even in the extremely difficult circumstances caused by the recent Kobe earthquake, a natural disaster of unprecedented devastation, in respect of which the Japanese fire defence system was required to mobilize all its resources in order to cope. As a result of the consultative efforts, an agreement was reached recently that was the solution accepted by consensus of the Japanese people. This solution was the introduction of a new system to guarantee the participation of fire defence personnel in the process to determine their working conditions and improvement of such conditions.

The specific content of this new system is as follows: (1) a fire defence personnel committee (provisional name) will be established in each fire defence headquarters throughout the nation; (2) the committee will discuss opinions to be presented by fire defence personnel on improvement of working conditions or other subjects, and the committee will present its observations to the fire chief; (3) the committee will be formed by fire defence personnel, half of whom will be appointed on the basis of recommendations of members of the respective unit; (4) the fire chief will respect the intention of the committee's observations and strive to improve working conditions or other matters regarding fire defence personnel.

The Government will prepare legislative amendments to institute this new system. In this new system, the process to improve working conditions or other matters regarding fire defence personnel will be conducted with their participation at the respective fire defence headquarters where they are assigned, and problems concerning working conditions or other matters regarding specific individuals will also be handled. This new system will therefore guarantee the participation of fire defence personnel in the process to decide their working conditions, and is consistent with the spirit of protection of their rights.

This solution is based on the agreement that was reached through in-depth discussions among all parties concerned throughout the nation, and both the Government and workers greatly appreciate its significance.

In addition, a Government representative of Japan stated that with regard to the issue of the right to organize of fire-fighting personnel, consultations had been held since 1990 between the Ministry of Home Affairs and the All-Japan Prefectural Municipal Workers' Union (JICHIRO). These consultations continued even in the wake of the Kobe earthquake, a disaster of unprecedented devastation, which the Japanese fire defence system coped with by mobilizing all of its resources. As a result of these consultations, the two parties recently reached an agreement providing a solution which would be acceptable to the Japanese people. The measures agreed on were, in short, to introduce a new system by revising the Fire Defence Organization Law. The new system was to be made up of fire defence personnel committees which would be established in all fire defence headquarters. These committees would discuss opinions concerning the improvement of working conditions or other subjects which would be proposed by the fire defence personnel.

The important points of this system were the guarantee of "locality" and "participation of personnel" in deciding the working conditions of fire defence personnel, which JICHIRO had demanded throughout the consultations. Regarding locality, this system would be established in each of the 931 fire defence headquarters across the country. With respect to personnel participation, all personnel could put forward opinions to the committee concerning improvements in their working conditions, individual outfits or other matters. All members of the committee would be fire defence personnel and half of these members would be appointed on the basis of recommendations made by the personnel themselves. The fire chief would act on the results of the committee's discussions, thereby giving consideration to the proposals of the personnel for improving their working conditions. Thus this new system would guarantee the participation of fire defence personnel in the process of deciding their working conditions and would be in line with the spirit of the protection of their rights. The Government and trade unions had agreed that both would make their utmost efforts to have this system firmly established and operating effectively so that fire defence personnel could further improve their economic status and other conditions. The Government considered that the manner of restricting the fundamental rights of workers for the sake of public welfare could be changed depending on a change in the consensus of the Japanese people. Accordingly, the Government considered that discussions on the right to organize of fire defence personnel, which was a fundamental right of workers, would be made in the future by the parties concerned.

The Workers' members expressed satisfaction that a certain amount of progress had been made with respect to this case which was one of the oldest cases before this Committee. Progress had been made mainly due to dialogue within the Committee, the assistance of the ILO and discussions held in Japan between the union concerned and the Japanese Government. While these discussions were not over, the first stages of an agreement had been reached on a very difficult case which had been outstanding in this Committee for a long time.

The Employers' members, referring to the problem of the denial of the right to organize of fire-fighting personnel, agreed that they were very pleased with the agreement that had been reached between the Government and the union concerned since this was indeed an old case before this Committee. It was important, here, that dialogue had not just been embarked upon, but that this dialogue had actually produced results which were acceptable to both parties. While further progress was possibly still needed, this first step would probably be followed by others, since in this case agreement had been reached after so many years of dialogue.

The Workers' member of Japan, who spoke on behalf of the Japanese Trade Union Confederation and the All-Japan Prefectural Municipal Workers' Union, first of all expressed his appreciation to the two high-ranking ILO officials who visited Japan last year to help the parties find a solution to this long-standing problem. The issue of the right to organize of fire-fighting personnel had been before this Committee for more than 20 years and it was therefore to be welcomed that the Government had finally agreed to make a step forward to solving this matter. The proposed introduction of the new system to the fire defence service was quite significant in terms of participation of fire-fighters in the determination of their working conditions, since at present there was no machinery for joint discussion or consultation. His organization would make utmost efforts to utilize the new system for improving the working conditions of fire-fighters through their representatives at their workplaces. However, the new system was not the final solution of this issue; therefore, whilst due note should be taken of the positive steps made so far, there was still a long way to go before Convention No. 87 was fully complied with, in law and in practice. In this respect, the supervisory machinery of the ILO could and should continue to play its constructive role in this process by asking for reports from the Government on further positive developments in this respect. On behalf of fire-fighters in Japan who had patiently striven for progress in this domain, the speaker expressed his sincere gratitude to both the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee for their efforts to solve this problem. These fire-fighters were fully aware of the responsibility they had in carrying out essential services to the community and their commitment would not change even after they obtained their freedom of association.

The Government representative of Japan thanked the delegates from the Workers' and Employers' sides for the various comments made of which due note would be taken and reported to his Government.

The Committee noted the written communication and the oral information supplied by the Government representative, as well as the discussion which took place within the Committee. Recalling that, for many years, both the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee had called upon the Government to take appropriate measures to find a solution satisfactory to all parties concerned to ensure the right to organize for fire-fighting personnel, the Committee noted with interest that the public authorities and the municipal workers' union had held consultations even in the difficult circumstances caused by the recent Kobe earthquake and had agreed to the introduction of a new system to guarantee the participation of fire-defence personnel in the process of determining and improving their working conditions. The Committee welcomed, with satisfaction, this important step towards the application of the Convention and encouraged the public authorities and the municipal workers' union to continue their dialogue. It also called upon the Government to amend the law and practice, truly reflecting the agreement already reached, and in a way that was consistent with Convention No. 87. The Committee asked the Government to report to the Committee of Experts on any further developments with regard to the application of the Convention.

Kuwait (ratification: 1961). A Government representative of Kuwait indicated that the demographic composition of Kuwait was different from that of other countries in the world in that the economically active population was made up of 80 per cent foreigners who were from 138 different countries. This had a considerable influence on the country.

The Committee of Experts was asking for section 2 of the Labour Code (Act No. 38 of 1964) to be amended. However, the exclusions provided for in this provision did not imply that the workers mentioned therein were excluded from the law. They were instead covered by other Acts such as the Act on Public Services. A certain number of workers were governed by statutes under the Ministry of the Interior. As for the exclusions respecting contractual workers, he emphasized that they had not been applied for a long time. Indeed, the necessary measures had been taken recently to repeal that provision.

As regards the requirement of at least 100 workers in order to establish a trade union and ten employers to form an association, this was applicable to foreign workers who were in Kuwait for a certain period of time and who would return to their countries once their tasks had been completed. As to the number of employers necessary to form an association, this provision would shortly be amended. Concerning the requirements of having a minimum residence period of at least five years in Kuwait as well as obtaining a certificate of good reputation and conduct before being able to join a trade union, this was stipulated to ensure that there would be stability in trade union membership since non-Kuwaiti workers were not stable residents. The minimum number of 100 workers was quite small. Otherwise there would be trade unions with a very small number of workers from a given nationality. Regarding the prohibition on the establishment of more than one trade union for a particular establishment or activity (section 71), Kuwaitis in tens of thousands of establishments amounted to only 700,000 workers.

With regard to section 73, which contained a prohibition on trade unions from engaging in any political or religious activities, the Government representative wondered what the objectives of trade unions carrying out such activities would be. After all, freedom of religion and expression was guaranteed in Kuwait through newspapers and magazines. He considered moreover that the differences in the economic and social situations of various countries should be taken into account by the Committee when examining these issues. Concerning the devolution of trade union assets to the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour in the event of dissolution, the Ministry gave support to trade unions in practice, which was why if a trade union was dissolved the assets quite naturally reverted to the Ministry. Finally, he asserted that there were no legal provisions which restricted the right to strike. Workers in the oil sector had gone on strike recently. Negotiations had taken place between the Government and trade union representatives further to which section 88 had been applied. As a result, the matter was submitted to a chamber of the Court of Appeal in which employers and workers were represented.

The speaker concluded by informing the Committee that a large number of observations concerning Convention No. 87 and other ratified Conventions had been taken into account in the current amendments to the Labour Code. The new Act would be submitted to the institutions provided for under the Constitution of Kuwait.

The Workers' members pointed out that one of the reasons why this case was on the agenda of this Committee was that there had been a complete failure by the Government to supply reports containing new information since 1992. Indeed, even in 1992, the Government representative had stated that his country had set up a committee in order to carry out a final study on the possibilities of drawing up a draft Labour Code, taking into account the observations of the Committee of Experts. That committee had finished studying the draft Code which had been submitted to the legislative authorities three years ago. The Government representative then had talked about a draft Labour Code which would be introduced to the competent authorities. The Workers' members expressed their concern as to the nature of this draft legislation which was why they considered that it should be submitted for examination before being adopted.

Referring to the various problems posed by the Labour Code, which were mentioned by the Committee of Experts in its observation, the Workers' members first of all wondered whether the new Labour Code would cover the workers currently excluded from the scope of the Labour Code or whether they would be dealt with by other legislation. Concerning the minimum requirements placed upon certain workers in order to establish trade unions, the Workers' members pointed out that under Convention No. 87 there could not be any doubt that bodies of people should be entitled, if they so wished, to set up a trade union. In relation to the requirement of a minimum residence period for non-Kuwaiti workers to join a trade union, this was again for the trade union to decide upon. It was not for the Government to tell trade unions who they could or could not recruit. The same argument was applicable for unions which wished to federate.

With regard to the general discrimination against workers who were not of Kuwaiti nationality, the Workers' members considered that the Government representative's argument that a substantial part of the workforce were foreign nationals was an argument as to why the Labour Code should be applied to them. Furthermore, it was their view that ILO assistance could be sought by the Government in resolving its problems, particularly with respect to foreign nationals. Finally, it was undesirable for a trade union's assets to be reverted to the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour in the event of dissolution, since it implied the Ministry had been helping/financing trade unions prior to their dissolution.

The Workers' members concluded by hoping that the Government representative would seek the technical assistance of the ILO and that he would confirm that he would be able to send the draft Labour Code shortly for examination by the Office. The Workers' members also hoped that copies of other laws affecting the public sector and domestic workers, amongst others, would also be sent shortly.

The Employers' members referred first of all to the exclusion of certain workers from the scope of the Labour Code. Since the Government representative had stated that they were covered by other laws, they wished to be informed of what exactly these rules or regulations were in order to see whether sufficient protection was granted to them. They were also waiting for information in the Government's report on the issue of the minimum number of employers and workers required to establish associations, which the Government representative had indicated would be taken into account in the new Labour Code. They considered that the requirement for non-Kuwaiti workers of a minimum five-year period of residence in Kuwait before being able to join a union was an issue to be settled by the unions themselves. The denial of the right to vote and be elected of trade unionists who were not of Kuwaiti nationality also constituted excessive interference in the organizational freedom of association.

Consequently, the Employers' members felt that the Government should be called upon to report in detail on all the individual points raised in the Committee of Experts' observation; it should also, if possible, send a copy of the draft Labour Code and, if required, draw upon ILO technical assistance in this matter.

The Workers' member of New Zealand regretted the comments made by the Government representative of Kuwait which confirmed that his Government comprehensively controlled and systematically constrained any trade union activity. While Kuwaiti nationals generally were severely restricted in their ability to form and join unions, other groups, especially migrant workers, were singled out for even worse treatment. Along with Indian and Pakistani citizens, domestic workers were excluded from the Labour Code. Yet, domestic workers, almost all of whom were both migrants and women, were the most vulnerable of any group of workers. They were isolated in private homes and their passports were usually held by abusive employers. By denying them their freedom of association the Kuwaiti Government was in fact legitimizing the abuses that they faced. In this respect, the speaker referred to a report by a human rights group which recorded the plight of nearly 2,000 women who had taken refuge in their embassies after fleeing from Kuwaiti employers. Nearly all told stories of forced labour, non-payment of salaries, oppressive working conditions and rape. Yet, the authorities had not only failed to prosecute abusive employers but in some cases had actually returned women to such employers. Since the Government had failed to protect such workers from physical and sexual violence and at the same time denied them the right to freely associate and organize through a union to protect themselves, the speaker felt that the Committee should at the very least positively request the Government to accept technical assistance from the ILO or, alternatively, accept an ILO fact-finding mission. That was the very least it could do for the thousands of migrant domestic women workers for whom it should be trying to make some real change.

The Workers' member of India indicated that whenever private employers from Kuwait hired workers from foreign countries they confiscated their passports so that the workers could not complain. Whenever they complained, they were expelled to their native country without receiving any compensation. The workers were further not entitled to any compensation in case of an accident at the workplace. The Government of Kuwait refused to allow foreign workers, who were facing an abnormally difficult situation, to join trade unions. It further insisted on a requirement of a minimum five-year period of residence to join a trade union. In addition, they had no right to form a separate union. Finally, only Kuwaiti nationals could be elected to trade union office. However, there was no reason why migrant workers should not have a right to form a union; at least they should have the right to present their own grievances. The speaker appealed to the Kuwaiti Government to introduce legislation allowing migrant workers to enjoy freedom of association.

The Employers' member of Kuwait contended that the report referred to by the Workers' member of New Zealand contained mere allegations. Moreover, the Labour Code did not ban the right to strike; however, there were no restrictions on the right to strike in the oil sector, even though it was an important strategic sector of the State. He proposed to set up a special committee to investigate what had been said. He indicated that he was one of the members of the committee set up by the Government to draft a new Labour Code. However, any new law had to go through the constitutional channels which took time. According to what had been stated by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, the draft law would soon be submitted to the legislative authority. It would then be discussed therein and it was up to the Parliament to decide when to promulgate the new Bill.

The Workers' member of Greece, referring to the intervention made by the Employers' member of Kuwait, stated that the Conference Committee was not a tribunal but an assembly carrying on a social dialogue at an international level. Kuwait was a rich country and if it did not apply Convention No. 87 this was because it did not have the political will to do so. The persons affected by the provisions concerned were foreign migrant workers who did not constitute a threat to the Government. The speaker recalled his personal experience as a migrant worker in Belgium where he belonged to unions whose members and leaders included foreign workers. However, they did not constitute a threat to the Belgian Government. Democratic countries accepted that foreigners have the right to exercise their trade union rights, as demonstrated by the fact that one of the leaders of a large German trade union was a Turkish national. Migrant workers should have the right to be treated in the same way as national workers and should be able to exercise the same trade union rights.

The Workers' member of Spain considered that the issue raised was not complicated. It was not special cases nor specific sectors that were being discussed here, but more generally the free exercise of trade union rights. The Government of Kuwait did not have the right to restrict freedom of association, as indicated by the Committee of Experts in its observation. It had the political and moral obligation of ensuring the respect of Convention No. 87, without any restriction, having recourse if necessary to the technical assistance of the ILO. The speaker agreed with the views expressed by the Workers' members according to which it would be appropriate to urge the Government of Kuwait to ensure respect of Convention No. 87.

The Government representative emphasized that they would respect human rights and spare no effort in attempting to guarantee those rights, particularly following the trials and tribulations of the invasion. He said Kuwait was a democratic State. Admitting several shortcomings, he thought they needed time. They were following the right path: they were serious in their wish to promulgate the new Labour Code; they were confident in making progress step by step. He denied the allegations concerning domestic workers. Even though they do not have trade unions, Kuwait was a State ruled by law.

Referring to some speakers' suggestions that the Government seek the technical assistance of the ILO, the Government representative stated that the consultative multidisciplinary team visited Kuwait in December 1994 and made observations, which the Government noted carefully, concerning especially the new Labour Code. As for the right to strike, he repeated that there was no law in Kuwait restricting the right to strike. He assured that the opinions of the members of the Committee would be conveyed to the Government and that the Government would spare no effort to ensure the application of the Convention, at least most of it.

The Workers' members agreed with the Government representative that they were at the beginning of the road and stressed the length and difficulty of the road. The map was provided by the Committee of Experts. They repeated that it would be helpful if the draft laws were submitted to the Office before their adoption, rather than afterwards. They hoped that the Government found the discussion useful.

The Employers' members pointed out that it was up to the governments whether they would first send a draft law for examination or whether they would adopt a law and then make a report upon it. They again hoped for changes in line with the comments of this Committee and also of the Committee of Experts.

The Employers' member from Kuwait noted that there was no provision in the Constitution of the ILO obliging member States to submit their draft Labour Codes before their adoption.

The Workers' members clarified that the suggestion was often made by the Committee of Experts for draft laws to be submitted to the Office. It was not a requirement and governments were free to take or leave the service offered by the ILO.

The Committee took note of the comprehensive statement of the Government representative in respect of the issues raised in the report of the Committee of Experts in the discussion that followed thereafter. While the Committee also took note of the assurance of the Government representative in regard to the respect for human rights and the will to guarantee workers' rights, it regretted that the Committee of Experts had been unable to note any progress in the application of this important Convention for want of any new information. It recalled that the Committee of Experts was concerned about the substantial divergencies between the national legislation and the Convention in particular in regard to the universality of coverage of workers by the Labour Code, free and uninhibited formation of trade unions and affiliation to federations, and the autonomy of unions in regard to organizational and internal affairs.

The Committee recalled the earlier reported effort at the establishment of a revised Labour Code and expressed disappointment at the absence of any information on progress in regard to the matter. The Committee urged the Government to demonstrate its will to conform to Convention No. 87, especially by scrapping the present exclusions of certain categories of workers from the scope of the Labour Code, especially domestic workers, who are mostly women, requiring special protection, removing the restrictions on formation of unions and desisting from intervening in the financial and other internal affairs of unions.

The Committee also called upon the Government to furnish a full report to the Committee of Experts in respect of harmonization of the national Labour Code and practice with the provisions of Convention No. 87 and in respect of other collateral laws which contain provisions reflecting substantial conformity with the Convention. The Committee further expressed the hope that the Government might like to draw upon the expertise available in the ILO, including through further technical assistance especially to ensure that the revised Labour Code conforms to the Convention.

Mexico (ratification: 1950). The Government supplied the following information:

While taking into account the observations of the Committee of Experts requesting additional information on the application of the Convention, the Government confirmed its willingness to comply with its obligations under ILO Conventions, and in particular those under this Convention. According to the Government, the full exercise of freedom of association and the right to organize provided for under this Convention contributes to the strengthening of occupational organizations while favouring appropriate industrial relations. The Government is studying in detail the observations of the Committee of Experts concerning possible divergencies of the Federal Act on State Employees from the provisions of this Convention in order to take them into account within the context of the political, economic and social modernization process that is affecting both labour institutions and occupational organizations.

In addition, a Government representative referred to the comments of the Committee of Experts indicating that the Government's last report on Convention No. 87 did not provide new information, but included only points that had been made in previous years by the Federation of Unions of Workers in the Service of the State (FSTSE).

He noted that, in the framework of the process of modernization in which his country was immersed, the competent authorities were studying in detail the observations of the Committee in relation to the discrepancies between some provisions of the Federal Act on State Employees and the requirements of the Convention in order to find solutions to the matters raised. The success of this process would depend on the Government's ability to reconcile the different interests of productivity factors and taking advantage of the international cooperation mechanisms, such as this important forum of the ILO.

He noted how welcome were the new programmes of technical cooperation of the ILO and the innovative policy of active partnership due to the multidisciplinary teams. In this context, he reported that the Government intended to carry out, with the participation of the multidisciplinary team of the ILO headquartered in Costa Rica, a tripartite seminar on labour standards. Lastly, he noted that his Government would provide information in its next report.

The Employers' members noted that in the case of Mexico, the questions posed by the Committee of Experts had been around for decades. They noted that there was a considerable difference in the legislative situation when Mexico ratified the Convention in 1950 and today. They further noted that the problems concerning compliance with the Convention were obvious and wondered why they had not been looked into decades ago. The report mentioned the prohibition of more than one union in a given state body, the prohibition for state employees to leave their union, the prohibition of re-election of trade union officials, etc. They noted that these were very clear violations in which the State was interfering with the freedom of trade unions and the Government representative made no excuses, nor was there any suggestion that this should be viewed differently. The Government representative spoke of the modernization process that Mexico was undergoing, but the Employers' members considered this a rather indefinite concept the outcome of which remained uncertain. The Employers' members hoped the Government representative would have recognized that these regulations were not and had never been in compliance with the requirements of the Convention. He continued noting that the Government must eliminate these discrepancies as quickly as possible and then inform the ILO of the legislative changes.

The Workers' members stated that the attitude of the Government, consisting in not replying to the comments of the Committee of Experts and which, moreover, was the source of the footnote, complicated the operation of the supervisory system. If the reply of the Government was closely scrutinized, it could be seen that its attitude consisted of simply stating that it was going to examine the comments only concerning possible discrepancies in the federal law on workers and the comments of the Committee of Experts. However, there were important discrepancies between the legislation and the terms of the Convention. In this regard, they emphasized that the above-mentioned law contained, firstly, texts which normally should elevate the internal status of unions such as the prohibition on re-election in unions and, secondly, the prohibition on having two unions in the same state body or the prohibition on members of civil servants' unions joining workers' or agricultural unions.

The Workers' members insisted that the Committee request the Government to promptly take all necessary measures to bring both law and practice into full compliance with the Convention. In addition, the Government must be requested to provide detailed information for examination by the Committee of Experts on the measures undertaken.

The Workers' member from Uruguay stated that, despite the changes announced in Mexico, the situation remained the same. He was concerned by the absence of a solution to the problems observed by the Committee of Experts as well as by the Mexican Government's considerable anti-union sentiment. For example, in the public transport company "Ruta 100" there was an endeavour to restructure, but this cloaked an attempt to destroy trade unions, resulting in a violation of Convention No. 87. It was necessary to investigate this situation promptly, since once a union was broken up another trade union might be formed in conformity with Mexican legislation but not with ILO Conventions. In connection with the fishing sector, the Ministry of Mexican Fisheries had experienced the same situation when it had become the Department of the Environment. He also noted that as a result of this restructuring the trade union structure would be dissolved and there would exist only one trade union affiliation for public employees. For these reasons it was necessary for the ILO to adopt a firm position. Without such a stand, nothing would change and there would be no possible solution to the matters; on the contrary, the situation would grow much worse.

The Government representative from Mexico stated that, in reality, two issues had been raised: when would the legislation be amended and what would be the results. As to the first point, he had already referred to the modernization process which his country was experiencing. As to the second point, he noted that everything depended on the willingness of the workers which should be expressed as their sovereign right, to avoid the situation where it resulted from state intervention as had been said. He stated that the Committee of Experts had been making comments on his country in relation to this Convention for years. Nevertheless, he believed that in reality the issues were basically of a technical nature and they consequently required a technical/legal response. Lastly, he reiterated that his Government would fulfil its commitment to continue to report on the progress achieved.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative and of the discussion that followed. The Committee recalled that for a number of years the Committee of Experts had expressed concern about the union monopoly imposed through the Federal Act on State Employees. It referred in particular to the prohibition of the coexistence of two or more unions in the same body, the prohibition on workers in the service of the State from leaving the union to which they belonged, the prohibition of the re-election of trade union officers and the extension of the restriction applicable to trade unions in general to the single federation of unions of workers in the service of the State.

The Committee welcomed the invitation to ILO authorities to propose a tripartite seminar on standards but felt that it would not be sufficient by itself. It also welcomed the indication from the Government that it would consider all the comments of the Committee of Experts, and expressed the firm hope that it would be in a position to note progress towards the full application of the Convention at an early date, including in terms of freedom for the state employees to form and join unions of their choosing outside the existing trade union structure if they so wished. The Committee asked the Government to report in detail to the Committee of Experts in due time.

Myanmar (ratification: 1955): The Government supplied the following information:

Recent developments with regard to the application of this Convention included an ILO mission by the international labour standards specialist for the Asia region in May 1994. The Ministry of Labour decided to take steps to translate into English the draft Trade Unions Act which was written in the national language in order to facilitate discussions between government authorities and experts from the International Labour Office. The Government sought further assistance from the International Labour Office to obtain technical advice with regard to its efforts to apply this Convention. A further ILO mission was carried out by the Director of the ILO Office for the Asia region and a specialist from the International Labour Standards Department in January 1995, at which time meetings were held with the Minister of Labour and the Director-General of the Department of Labour. The Government regretted the cancellation of a further ILO mission, which might have provided advice with regard to the amendment of the Trade Unions Act of 1926 to adapt the Act to the new political and economic system, and hoped that discussions with the International Labour Office regarding the Act would take place at a later date.

In addition, a Government representative stressed that the Government had a genuine desire to cooperate with the ILO whose technical assistance would be welcomed in the drafting of the new trade union law. Further to the mission led by the Technical Adviser of the Asian region of the ILO on matters relating to Convention No. 87 in May 1994, the Ministry of Labour had decided to take steps to translate the draft trade union law into the English language to facilitate discussions between the Myanmar authorities and the ILO. A follow-up visit to Yangon was carried out in January 1995 by officials from the ILO Bangkok office. During the course of discussions with the ILO mission, Myanmar authorities were informed that another ILO mission from the Freedom of Association Branch would be arriving in Yangon in April or May 1995. The Ministry of Labour had been looking forward to welcoming this mission. Unfortunately, this mission could not visit Myanmar as scheduled. However, the Government was of the view that further contacts should be continued with the ILO in order to obtain technical advice that would contribute towards its effort to apply freedom of association principles. The authorities hoped that discussions in this respect would take place at a mutually convenient date. The speaker stressed that significant progress had been made by the National Convention whose task it was to lay down basic principles to be embodied in a new Constitution. Currently, the contents of the chapters on the state structure, heads of state and self-administered areas had been agreed upon. Chapters on the legislature, executive branch and judiciary would be discussed in October 1995 when the National Convention reconvened. As proceedings followed their course, basic principles in connection with citizens' fundamental rights, as well as the rights of workers, would be discussed in detail. Amongst the basic principles to be enshrined in the new Constitution, the following dealt with workers from different sectors: in connection with workers in general, it was laid down that the State would enact the necessary laws to protect the rights of workers; in connection with rural and farm workers, it was laid down that the State would enact necessary laws to protect the rights of the peasantry; in connection with intellectuals, it was laid down that the State would help promote their interests; in connection with civil servants, it was laid down that (a) state service personnel would be free from involvement in party politics while retaining the right to vote for the party of their own choice, and (b) the State would enact necessary laws for state service personnel to have due security in service and sufficiency of food, clothing and shelter.

The Workers' members recalled that this case had been in existence for almost 40 years. There had been 11 observations by the Committee of Experts, seven long discussions in this Committee, and two special paragraphs on this Convention in 1982 and 1983. Year after year there had been promises of new constitutions, new labour laws and courts. This year the Committee of Experts had additionally drawn attention to the Committee on Freedom of Association's Case No. 1752 of November 1994 concerning seafarers. However, there was no point in going into detail about the nature of the various infringements at issue. The very simple and plain point was that there were no trade unions in Myanmar at the present moment. There were some bodies under the total control of the Government which under no circumstances would ever qualify as trade unions.

With regard to the National Convention which was drawing up a new Constitution, the Workers' members pointed out that the Workers' group within this Convention and, indeed, the Convention itself was selected and totally controlled by the Government. As for the request by the Government representative for an ILO technical mission to his country, it was the view of the Workers' members that extreme caution should be exercised by the Office before it sent further missions to this country. Until there were material changes, requests for a mission should be ignored since there were no trade unions and the minimum conditions for a mission were just not there. Any ILO mission could be exploited or abused by the Government in order to be seen in a better light by the world. ILO staff should not be put in this position and exploited, for example, by having anything they said quoted out of context. The Workers' members considered that there was no point in discussing this case any more since the Government was not going to be convinced by words. Its persistent refusal over many years to do anything at all about the observations made by the Committee of Experts with regard to the application of this Convention meant that a special paragraph was justified.

The Employers' members considered that the serious differences between national law and practice in Myanmar and the requirements of Convention No. 87 had been a continuing preoccupation of this Committee since 1981; this would be the ninth time that the case had been discussed here. They considered, however, that as long as the Government's request for ILO technical assistance was not a delaying tactic but a sincere effort to correct the situation, then the possibility of a technical assistance mission could be looked into. Of course, it remained to be seen whether there was actually a piece of legislation that had been drafted and submitted to the legislature and whether this legislation would be enacted. They wished to establish a real legal basis for freedom of association which currently did not exist. They thought that it was a fundamental matter that both workers and employers be entitled to form organizations of their own choice and be able to affiliate with federations and confederations.

The Workers' member of Japan believed that at the heart of the matter lay a fundamental lack of respect for human rights by the Government of Myanmar. As Amnesty International had reported in detail, the infringement of human rights in Myanmar was such that it damaged human dignity itself. This was well demonstrated by the house arrest of Ms. Aung San Suu Kyi. He further referred to the list of the Workers' delegation from Myanmar to the Conference. The fact that the Workers' delegate was not a member of any kind of union clearly showed the current situation of the trade union movement in that country. He called on the Government to change its oppressive political stance and to fully guarantee freedom of association as an essential basis for democracy.

The Government member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the five Nordic countries and the Netherlands, noted with interest the Government's statement that deliberations relating to labour issues, including the right of association for workers, would be undertaken. He therefore expressed the firm hope that, with the assistance of the ILO, the necessary measures would be taken as soon as possible to bring the country's law and practice into conformity with the Convention.

The Workers' member of Sweden considered that in view of the total lack of freedom of association in Myanmar and the fact that basic human rights were continuously violated, this Committee should ask itself if in reality there existed a political will of the Government to change the current situation and to conform with Convention No. 87. The Committee of Experts had noted with concern the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 1752, approved by the Governing Body in November 1994. Here the right of seafarers to form independent trade unions or to affiliate with an international federation was just another example of the manner in which freedom of association was denied in Myanmar. Myanmar's seafarers on flag-of-convenience ships were under the strict control of the State and had to sign contracts obliging them not to contact international trade union organizations. In addition, if these seafarers' wages were to be raised to a more decent level, their contracts stipulated that such additional wage increases should be handed back to the State upon their return, otherwise they risked being penalized. In view of this and the long and serious neglect of granting freedom of association in Myanmar, this Committee had to express its strong dissatisfaction with the present situation in a special paragraph.

The Workers' member of Greece pointed out the discrepancies that existed between the Government representative's statements, according to which real progress had been made, and the reality. In this country, trade unions did not even exist, and the Government was obviously trying to buy time through meaningless speeches. As in all military regimes, it allowed itself to suppress the liberty of others. While it was appropriate for the Committee not to rule out any other alternative by refusing a new ILO mission, it was not appropriate either to leave the door open in giving too much credibility to a government which persisted in violating the most elementary rights and freedoms.

The Government representative, referring to Case No. 1752 of the Committee on Freedom of Association, pointed out that recent developments had taken place, as had been indicated in a letter by the Director-General of the Department of Labour of Myanmar, to the Director of the ILO International Labour Standards Department. These developments included the following points. Since the Government had been very concerned about the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Ministry of Transport had taken the following steps with regard to Myanmar seafarers. The Seamen's Control Department, under the Ministry of Transport, had promptly revoked the requirement of Myanmar's seafarers to sign an affidavit before leaving the country, with effect from 9 February 1995. Moreover, 25 per cent of Myanmar seamen's salaries, which they had previously been required to remit to their families back home, would no longer be deducted with effect from 1 December 1994. In addition, according to Notification No. 146/94 of the Ministry of Finance and Revenue, issued on 16 November 1994, Myanmar's seamen and overseas workers were liable to pay only 10 per cent as income tax on the declared total foreign exchange earnings with effect from the same date mentioned above.

The Employers' members concurred with the Workers' members' proposal that this case should be placed in a special paragraph since it clearly met the Committee's traditional criteria for serious, long-standing cases that did not seem as if they would be resolved without additional attention being given to them. However, they did think that the ILO could provide technical assistance which in turn should be converted into tangible, concrete and legislative action by the Government of Myanmar in the near future.

The Workers' members considered that the information on the recent developments regarding Case No. 1752 should be sent to the Office for examination by the Committee on Freedom of Association. They considered that if a government request was made to the Office for a technical assistance mission then it could be carried out provided the Office considered that this was worthwhile.

The Committee took note of the statement of the Government representative indicating his Government's commitment to harmonize law and practice with Convention No. 87. The Committee, however, felt serious concern that the Government had not acted on the observations of the Committee of Experts over many years despite mention of the matter in special paragraphs twice over, and that no trade unions in the true sense of the term existed. The Committee urged the Government to adopt, as a matter of urgency, the necessary measures to guarantee that in law and in practice workers and employers had the right to join organizations of their own choice and without previous authorization outside the existing structure, and that such organizations had the right to join federations and confederations and to affiliate with international organizations without impediment. The Committee expressed the firm hope that it would be in a position to register concrete and substantial progress in the application of the Convention in law and in practice, in the near future, considering the assistance of the ILO mission which had already taken place, and it requested the Government to send a detailed report to the Committee of Experts about further developments on the matter. The Committee noted that a further request might be made for ILO technical assistance by the Myanmar Government, but it would leave the question of whether an ILO mission would be appropriate, and the timing of such a mission, to the Office. The Committee decided to mention this conclusion in a special paragraph of its General Report.

Nigeria (ratification: 1960). A Government representative from Nigeria stated that the Subcommittee of the National Labour Advisory Council on the Review of Labour Laws had concluded its review of the principal labour legislation and had submitted its report. This tripartite council would examine the report and make subsequent recommendations to the federal Government for the promulgation of new labour legislation. The speaker referred to a new national labour policy and affirmed that the federal Government would not deliberately abandon its obligations in the observance of the Convention. He continued noting that the restructuring legislation approved in Gazette No. 24, of 31 August 1993, was cancelled in Government Notice No. 2 (Extraordinary Official Gazette No. 2, Volume 32, of 8 February 1995).

He further recalled the circumstances regarding the dissolution of the executive councils of the Nigerian Labour Congress (NLC), the Petroleum and Natural Gas Senior Staff Association of Nigeria (PENGASSAN) and the National Union of Petroleum and Natural Gas Workers (NUPENG) under Decrees Nos. 9 and 10 of 1994 following a protracted political strike, during which the unions never raised any labour disputes and all attempts to seek dialogue were rebuffed by them. These decrees, he noted, were promulgated because of the threats to national security. While the executive council of the union was dissolved, the union was not disbanded although it acted in contravention of the unions' constitution and the laws of Nigeria. He insisted on the transitional character of Decrees Nos. 9 and 10, intended to maintain law and order during national emergency. These laws were based on the principle of national expediency and the doctrine of necessity.

He stated that the trade unions had constituted committees to work out the modalities of restoring the unions' National Executive Councils within the shortest possible time. He further noted that elections had already been held at unit and branch levels of NUPENG and PENGASSAN and that the 31 state councils of the Nigerian Labour Congress were never dissolved and were being run by the elected leaders. Once the six committees, namely the Constitution Review Committee, the Congress Policy and Programme Committee, the Congress Secretariat Restructuring Committee, the Congress 1995 Budget Committee, the Congress Consultative Committee and the Delegates' Conference Committee, set up by the trade unions, have completed their assignment on election arrangements, and on conclusion of the elections at the national delegates' conference of the affected unions, he confirmed that Decrees Nos. 9 and 10 will be repealed.

The Government representative further assured the Committee that all steps would be taken to protect freedom of association in the proposed amendments to Nigerian labour law. He felt that the degree of compliance with Convention No. 87 could be assessed from the fact that 82 of 85 registered trade unions in Nigeria were operating freely under the principles of freedom of association.

The Employers' members observed that Nigeria had ratified Convention No. 87 35 years ago and the Committee of Experts had repeatedly expressed its concern at the considerable discrepancies between the Convention's requirements and the deteriorating legal and de facto situation. In essence, the Government had imposed a uniform trade union system through repeated cases of intervention and interference in the trade union structure.

They likened the Government's statement to what had happened in 1991. Once again, the Government representative stated that everything would be dealt with by the Subcommittee of the National Labour Advisory Council. They recalled the justification for the restructuring of trade unions in Nigeria mentioned in the preamble of Gazette No. 24 of 31 August 1993, as observed by the Experts. They then referred to the imposition of the union monopoly as well as the dissolution and the disbanding of several unions, all of which was incompatible with Convention No. 87. They felt the Government representative's statements were too general and vague on concrete solutions.

They concluded by referring to frightening developments in Nigeria which also concerned freedom of association and which necessitated the intervention of the Director-General of the ILO. They noted that Nigeria had totally failed for several decades to meet its obligations; in essence, there was no freedom of association in the country, there has hardly been any change and in some instances only a deterioration of the situation.

They called for conclusions expressing sincere regrets and strongly urging the Government to meet its obligations under Convention No. 87.

The Workers' members referred to the matters observed by the Experts and noted that the Committee of Experts had always had serious problems with the Government of Nigeria in respect of this Convention. However, all these violations paled in comparison to the events of last year, and this was probably among the worst cases the Committee has had to deal with on Convention No. 87. They further noted that Nigeria was now threatened with suspension from the Commonwealth because of its human rights record, and its failure to observe principles of democracy. They referred to the report of the Committee on Freedom of Association on Case No. 1793 and highlighted some of the worst abuses revealed in it: senior trade unionists jailed, raids and confiscation at the headquarters of the Nigerian Labour Congress, union functions taken over by the Government, etc. They stressed that no union congresses had been authorized despite the Government's promise that this would occur before the end of March 1995. Concerning branch elections, terror prevailed.

They finally expressed their deep concern and considered a special paragraph for this case. Consequently, the conclusions should reflect its seriousness.

The Workers' member of South Africa recalling the apartheid period, expressed his empathy and solidarity with Nigerian workers in their struggle against the denial of basic human and trade union rights. He called for a special paragraph condemning a regime which was anathema to democracy, union rights and social progress.
