The Workers' member of the United States observed that the situation of Nigerian trade unions had literally gone from bad to worse, as noted in the recent freedom of association case against Nigeria. He further noted that in July 1994, Frank Kokori, General Secretary of NUPENG, was arrested and remained in custody without having been publicly charged or tried. The speaker noted that five labour leaders were known to remain in government custody while other senior labour officials are in hiding. On 2 August 1994, the Nigerian Labour Congress filed suit challenging the Government's dissolution of the Federation's Executive Council. On 6 September 1994, the press announced that this action was effectively blocked by Decree No. 12 of 18 August 1994 stating that "no action of the federal military government may be questioned henceforth in a court of law". He concluded that the military rulers of Nigeria had removed their country from the civilized world and, to ensure its isolation, the regime had forbidden free and independent union activity.

The Workers' member of Zimbabwe joined in the remarks made by previous Workers' speakers and referred to the four key points raised by the Committee of Experts as among the most serious violations of human dignity. He recalled the address of the Nigerian Minister of Labour before the Governing Body in November 1993 promising a return to normal by the following March; it was now June 1995 and nothing had been done and these were just more empty promises.

The Government representative of South Africa observed that the situation in Nigeria recalled to him the authoritarianism of South Africa under apartheid. The language used by the Nigerian Government was even reminiscent of those times when the Government categorized strikes as political and invoked the terms of "national emergency and maintenance of law and order" to justify the imposition of an undemocratic order in his country. While the ends were different in the two countries, the means used were the same. Although one wanted to support measures that ensured orderly collective bargaining, those measures must never interfere with the right of workers to join and form their own trade unions. That right ensured that the unions themselves were democratic. It was impossible to accept the explanations of the Government: the case called for a strong reaction.

The Workers' member of Ghana (coming as a Workers' delegate from the West African subregion who had had the opportunity to lead a Workers' delegation to Nigeria) felt himself compelled to make a brief intervention on the issue of the serious violation of trade union and human rights in Nigeria. The naked attack on trade union rights in Nigeria had serious implications for trade unions in the subregion, if not in the whole of Africa. It constituted a very dangerous precedent which should not be allowed to stand. The Committee of Experts in its report confirmed that by decrees the Government of Nigeria removed from office the national executive council members of NLC, NUPENG and PENGASSAN and put in their place government-appointed administrators, which constituted a clear violation of the rights of these trade union organizations.

In response to universal condemnation of these violations, the representative of the Government of Nigeria sought and obtained permission to address the Governing Body session in November 1994, where he committed the Nigerian Government to take necessary measures to purge itself of these trade union violations before the March 1995 Governing Body meeting. March came, and the situation remained unchanged and, up to date, the Government of Nigeria has not considered it necessary to provide any information to the Governing Body on why it was not possible for it to fulfil that promise.

The Government's attempts to find excuses for these violations should be dismissed by the Committee as frivolous and totally unacceptable. Nigeria has a competent judicial system in place. Therefore, if labour leaders were going against the laws, they should be dealt with according to the laws of their land. It was totally unacceptable to detain labour leaders in the name of state security without any charges being proffered against them.

The speaker therefore invited the Committee to condemn the Federal Republic of Nigeria's violation of Convention No. 87 in the strongest possible terms and to call on it to take its hands off the unions in the energy and the oil sectors. He suggested that the Committee's conclusions should be put in a special paragraph to serve as a deterrent to governments in Africa which may be seeking to follow this shameful example.

The Government member of the United States recalled that in 1991 this Committee expressed concern at the fact that the Government of Nigeria did not seem to have made any progress towards bringing its law and practice into conformity with the requirements of Convention No. 87. In the intervening four years, notwithstanding the presentation made by the Government representative, it appeared that the situation had still not improved but, on the contrary, had worsened. Despite the Government's obligations under Convention No. 87, which it had undertaken in 1960, the Government of Nigeria had embarked upon a campaign of interference and harassment, with the clear purpose of making it impossible for free and independent trade unions to operate in Nigeria. The Government's actions had taken the form of public decrees, arrests, intimidation, and the obstruction of due process under Nigerian law. These drastic measures had been described fully in the Committee of Experts' observations and in the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 1793, and most especially, in the very eloquent and moving presentations that had been made by previous speakers. Suffice it to say that recent events in Nigeria were extremely disturbing because they demonstrated that rather than moving to bring its law and practice into conformity with Convention No. 87, the Government was instead intent upon crushing an independent labour movement in Nigeria.

If the pledges made by the Government representative of Nigeria were not just empty words, this Committee must insist that these words needed to be matched by concrete actions to restore full democracy and freedom of operation to the Nigerian trade union movement without delay.

The Workers' member of Côte d'Ivoire, supporting the declarations of other speakers, indicated that the situation in Nigeria was not exceptional and that other developing countries were faced with the same problems. There were questions to be asked in this connection. Why did States ratify this fundamental Convention, while knowing of the wide scope of its provisions? When would there be in Africa a really democratic and social policy? Democracy meant not only free elections, it should also be reflected inside the societies and enterprises. It was for this reason that the speaker was preoccupied by the frequent intervention of the military. He concluded by pointing out the importance of the negative example provided by Nigeria for other African countries.

The Workers' member of Greece supported the interventions of other speakers from the Workers' side and particularly those of the African Workers which demonstrated the gravity of the situation in Nigeria. It was a classic case of the flagrant and continuous violation of the trade union rights and of human rights. The Committee of Experts commented in a polite manner on the provisions of the national legislation which were not in conformity with the Convention, and invited the Government to remedy the situation. The Government responded by letters and speeches of various lengths. But the situation was aggravated and there was no indication to hope for a better future. It was pitiful to note that the leaders of this country did not understand that no country in the world could progress by stepping down on their workers who constituted the majority of its people. The speaker insisted that this case should be put into a special paragraph.

The Workers' member of Senegal stated that the situation in the Nigerian trade unions was painfully felt by their homologues over the whole African continent, and that violations of trade unions' freedoms had never attained such a level. Noting the complexity of the trade union system in Nigeria, he wondered what were the reasons for the government interference in their affairs, as obviously no government should undertake to restructure trade unions. In Senegal, this was an exclusive right of the legally constituted trade union central bodies. The system established in Nigeria favoured the interference of the public authorities in trade union affairs, on whatever pretext. Nigeria was characterized by the absence of a civil government that had been brought to power by universal elections. A whole generation in Nigeria lived without having such a government. The trade union movement of all colours demanded the re-establishment of the freedom of association in Nigeria, of the civil regime and the organization of free democratic elections. Associating himself with other speakers who condemned the present situation in Nigeria, the speaker concluded by supporting the proposal to put this case into a special paragraph.

The Government member of Senegal was preoccupied by the repeated violations of trade union rights in Nigeria. Taking into account the demographic, political and economic weight of the country, Nigeria could influence negatively the internal development of certain States as well as the subregional geo-political situation. He supported the previous speakers in condemning the tyrannical methods to regulate problems of trade unions, and in demanding of the Nigerian authorities to urgently conform to the provisions of the Convention.

The Workers' member of Cameroon, associating himself with the condemnations expressed by the previous speakers, concentrated on two points. The first concerned the negative influence which Nigeria could exercise on its neighbours by systematically violating trade union rights, and the second point consisted in the need to ensure the possibility for the trade unions to protect the interests of the workers in a free and independent manner.

The Government representative of Nigeria said that ILO delegations were always tripartite and in all situations workers who were directly affected were also given a chance to take the floor. It was unfortunate that the Nigerian Workers' delegation, which arrived late, had been denied the opportunity of telling the world what happened in their own country. It therefore meant that all other speakers were speculating because they did not know the true position in Nigeria and many did not seem to understand clearly what they were talking about, using some inappropriate comparisons. Moreover, a human rights commission which sat here in Geneva had already looked into human rights and other abuses with which Nigerians were charged, and the Government was therefore surprised that another United Nations agency could come in and put Nigeria a second time on trial. With respect to what the Committee of Experts have observed about Nigeria, definitely in Nigeria things were not deteriorating. On the contrary, there was every action towards complete democratization of the trade unions in Nigeria. There were about 85 accepted trade unions in Nigeria which were still operating freely, apart from the three which engaged in criminal acts and in the wanton destruction of property in a country which was already saddled with heavy debts.

The international community should look more closely at Nigeria's peculiar situation, at its teeming population, at the complexity of the country, and at its own march forward. The unions were still there, they were working out a programme towards democratization of their own organizations, and that dispelled that impression that Nigeria has deteriorated to a stage that every worker was being haunted.

On the issue of political strike, the speaker explained that Frank Kokori was arrested because he used his own position as the General Secretary of NUPENG to promote his own personal political ambition as the Financial Secretary of the Social Democratic Party, and, in doing so, he had used the workers to involve massive destruction of property, lives, petroleum pipelines and so many other things. So, most of those who were being detained because of their trade union activities were not being detained because they have participated in political activities, but because of criminal acts. That was the position about the political strikes and detention of some of the union leaders.

Concerning the issue of the Nigerian Labour Congress, it was paradoxical that the ILO, being against the establishment of a single central labour organization, was now complaining that it has been dissolved. When it said that you cannot have one central labour organization by law, it needed to look at the genesis of the establishment of the central labour organization. And in Nigeria, the unions decided on their own, not the Government, that they would like to come together. Furthermore, there were records to show that the unions themselves wrote and asked the Government to assist them in their restructuring. Now, when this had been done, the Committee of Experts came up with their findings that it was improper for the Government to establish trade union unity by law. The country obeyed and dismantled the restructuring as demanded by the Committee of Experts. There was an element of compliance and one would not say that the Government had not complied.

It was also erroneous to believe that all unions in Nigeria were affiliated to the Nigerian Labour Congress. Out of the 85 registered unions in Nigeria, only 41 were affiliated to the NLC. So, the impression that was given here that Nigeria had one central organization and everybody was forced to be there was not true.

It has also been established here that the registrar of trade unions had the power to supervise the accounts of trade unions. This was not true. The registrar of trade unions had no business in supervising or administering the accounts of unions. The trade unions, under their own constitution, had provision whereby the accounts must be audited every year and members must be informed how the contributions were being expended. The federal Government made a check of this law, so as to ensure that the unions were properly funded. If the Government should make a law to ensure that workers' money was deducted at source and paid to trade unions, such a Government should also ensure that the money was properly utilized. In this concept it had to look at the unions and their objectives and ensure that there was no question of financial impropriety. The annual audited accounts of the trade unions were meant for the Committee of Management of their respective unions to deliberate and approve of the ways and manner that workers' contributions had been expended. Copies of the audited accounts were then sent to the Registrar of Trade Unions for information and scrutiny to ensure that the management and expenditure of trade unions' funds were in conformity with the objects of the unions as prescribed in their constitutions. This arrangement was meant to serve as checks and balances for the purposes of probity and accountability by the leadership of trade unions in Nigeria. The unions elected their own chartered accountants to audit the accounts on their own without any interference by the registrar of trade unions. So, this other issue about interference with the accounts of unions was also incorrect.

As to what concerned the issue of democratization, the Government was not interested in the running of trade unions, in fact, it was an additional headache. The federal Government appointed sole administrators because of the erring attitude of the leaders of these unions and it was only a transitory arrangement, it was not a permanent arrangement. The Nigerian Labour Congress had virtually been run by the workers themselves. About nine committees had been set up and all these committees were headed by the workers themselves. When the Committee set up by the 41-member trade unions of the Nigeria Labour Congress (NLC), and other Committees set up by the elected branches' executive councils of NUPENG and PENGASSAN had been established, the national executive councils of these unions would be elected in the Special Delegates' Conferences organized by the affected Unions.

The whole discussion which implied that the federal Government was so much against trade unionism and was out to destroy it, was not true. On the contrary, the federal Government has done a lot in an effort to promote good and strong federal unions in the country. The Nigerian Labour Congress at the time that it was established in 1977, received from the Government a fund of 1 million naira; between 1992 and 1994, the federal Government gave the Nigerian Labour Congress the sum of 100 million naira to enable it to invest in its transport company. That was to encourage the mobility of workers to go to work and back and so that they could pay cheaply rather than being exploited by other transporters. When the Nigerian Labour Congress decided that it would like to move to the new federal capital of Nigeria, the federal Government gave it the sum of 50 million naira to enable it to build their secretariat. Again, to encourage investment so that unions would not run out of funds or so that they may be able to recruit a high calibre of people to work for them, the Government gave them 80 million naira for them to invest in the Urban Development Bank. Apart from the financial aid, the Government had established the National Institute for Labour Studies for the training of trade union leaders in the country. The Government had promulgated a decree on the checking of dues which were deductible at source and paid to the unions to ensure that they have proper funds. Apart from this, the law on recognition of trade unions by employers has been made mandatory by the Government and sanctions were placed against any employer who failed to recognize a duly registered trade union. A law has been made protecting trade unionists in their jobs to avoid unfair dismissals. All these issues, among many other things which the federal Government has done, showed that it was not interested in the destruction of unions. He then referred to the additional information which had been given in the paper prepared and submitted by the Government in response to the ILO's Committee of Experts, where it assured this Committee that all trade unions would soon conclude their elections and that new national officers would be elected into the national executive councils so as to enable the unions to run their own affairs.

Another Government representative added, in the continuation of the Nigerian position, that if the Nigerian Government was being accused of gagging Nigerian workers, this Committee should have allowed the Nigerian workers who were here to speak for themselves. But besides that point, it should also see the complexity of Nigeria, which was a country of 100 million people and 250 ethnic groups. Those who understood Nigeria, knew that even under the so-called military Government, Nigeria was even more democratic and more open than so-called democratic governments.

It was important that the efforts of Nigeria to move towards constitutionalism and democracy should be encouraged, not discouraged. Punitive statements, punitive pronouncements would not help. If through these so-called punitive actions Nigeria were moved to such a complex situation as to produce refugees, the refugees would not only overwhelm West Africa, they would overwhelm the whole of the continent and Europe would be a recipient of the refugees.

Nigeria did not want to be a case of those countries that had broken up, and that was why it was asking to be allowed to solve its problems and, indeed, intended to solve the problems very quickly. The constitutional conference in Nigeria would be finalizing its work by the end of this month and there would be a move towards constitutionalism and democracy. Therefore, the Government representative appealed for an understanding of the Nigerian position and of its commitment to a democratic State and democratic and free trade unions.

The Workers' members recalled the procedure according to which every speaker had to register in order to have the right to take the floor in this Committee. There was no representative of the workers of Nigeria in this Committee as, unfortunately, no such person had registered. There was no censorship involved, and it was purely a matter of procedure which permitted the Committee to function properly.

The Workers' members then thanked all the speakers taking the floor and particularly their African colleagues. They pointed out that the members of this Committee seemed to unanimously condemn the situation which prevailed at present in Nigeria and considered that the information provided by the Government representatives was a smoke-screen. They concealed more than they revealed. The Workers' members could have no sympathy for a government who was not doing anything to stop the repression of the workers. They insisted also that an individual who was arrested and detained because of his trade union activities was entitled to be judged impartially, and the judiciary in a country could not make impartial judgements when the government was consistently changing the laws to suit its own convenience. They have also pointed out that Nigeria could provide a negative example for the other African States, and that it was important that the Committee should dissuade other countries from following this deplorable example. For these reasons they commended that this case deserved a special paragraph.

The Employers' members stressed the fact that only those registered in the Committee were entitled to the right to speak according to the established procedure. They deplored the absence of concrete indications on the actions which might be taken to improve the situation and have noted the ambiguity of the declarations made by the Government representative as regards the dismissal of trade union leaders and the criminal acts that they allegedly committed. The Employers' members concluded by insisting that this case should be treated under a special paragraph through the unanimously adopted conclusions highlighting the dimension of the discrepancies accumulated up to date.

The Committee took note of the statement of the Government representatives of Nigeria. The Committee noted that though Nigeria ratified Convention No. 87, 35 years back, there was considerable discrepancy between de jure and de facto conformity with the Convention. The Committee of Experts had also pointed out fundamental deviations in the national laws from the Convention. Legal stipulation for a single trade union system and governmental interference in the structuring of trade unions were matters of serious concern. The clarification of the Government representative that the Subcommittee of the National Labour Advisory Council was reviewing labour laws, was of a routine nature. The Committee further recalled the conclusions of the Freedom of Association Committee regarding replacement of officers of certain unions of workers by government administrators and considered this governmental act to be a flagrant violation of Convention No. 87.

The Committee therefore urgently demanded the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the legislation and practice into conformity with Convention No. 87, to repeal the decrees dissolving unions issued in 1994 and to restore to the organizations concerned the right to elect their representatives in full freedom without any interference from the public authorities. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the Committee of Experts would be able to note significant progress on these matters in the very near future. The Committee also decided that this conclusion be placed in a special paragraph of the General Report.

Pakistan (ratification: 1951). The Government supplied the following information:

1. With regard to the observation of the Committee of Experts concerning the ban on trade union membership and activities for employees of the Pakistan Television Corporation (PTVC) and the Pakistan Broadcasting Corporation (PBC), it is pointed out that the workers of the PTVC and the PBC have exercised trade union rights in the past. During the martial law regime, television stations were occupied by the former trade union leadership. This was found to be contrary to the discipline enforced by the former Army regime, and as a result the employees of both PTVC and PBC were excluded from the provisions of the Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969 by a legislative amendment on the basis that they were involved in the sensitive field of information. This matter recently was placed for deliberation before the tripartite Task Force on Labour constituted by the Prime Minister of Pakistan to suggest ways and means of bringing national labour legislation into conformity with ILO Conventions. A subcommittee established by the Task Force recently heard the representatives of workers and employers of both PTVC and PBC who favoured the restoration of trade union rights for these employees subject to appropriate conditions to reinforce discipline in view of the sensitivity of information media. The Government may decide to restore such rights to employees of these corporations. The recommendations of the Task Force are actively under consideration by the Committee. The Ministry of Labour will inform the Committee of the outcome of the decision of the Cabinet on this matter.

2. With respect to the observation of the Committee concerning denial of the rights guaranteed by this Convention for workers in Export Processing Zones (EPZ), although these Zones have been exempted from the application of certain labour legislation, the conditions of employment of such workers are regulated by the Export Processing Zone Authority (Control of Employment) Rules 1982 which provide a separate system of rights for workers and for resolution of their grievances. Moreover, the benefits accruing to these workers are superior to those of other workers. At present only one EPZ has been established, the Karachi Export Processing Zone (KEPZ), which employs less than 6,000 workers, 80 per cent of whom are women. Since the cultural climate in Pakistan is not in practical terms in favour of unionization of women workers as a result of social taboos, these women workers do not themselves demand restoration of their trade union rights within the meaning of the Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969. However, they are not prevented from forming an association. EPZs were exempted from certain labour legislation because of arrangements made by the Government with foreign investors. This matter is under consideration by the Government to determine how labour legislation can be applied equally to all workers without discrimination. With regard to the KEPZ case, withdrawal of such an exemption must be considered while taking into account the arrangement made with foreign investors who invested in this Zone on the basis of certain exemptions provided to them. It was reiterated that employment conditions in the KEPZ were no less favourable than those under existing labour legislation. The labour force of this Zone has never complained in any manner about their rights, and instead seem to be content and satisfied with the above arrangements. In view of its electoral mandate, the Government is more committed to the labour cause than the previous Government, and is thus determined to redeem its promises to protect the rights of labour in the light of ILO Standards. The terms of reference under consideration by the Task Force on Labour provide for simplification, consolidation and codification of labour legislation. The deliberations of the Task Force in this regard may culminate in its recommending the establishment of a permanent commission for the codification of labour legislation, with the additional responsibility of ensuring that all labour legislation is adopted in accordance with ILO Conventions. The ratification by Pakistan of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 has established a climate that has been conducive to a democratic approach to resolving labour problems and disputes concerning employer/employee relationships on a collective basis. Fundamentally, this is a positive development in the field of industrial relations. Since Pakistan is a newly created State, it must rely to a greater extent on its economic activities while taking initiatives to build up its national infrastructure. In such circumstances no nation can easily afford the costs of social programmes when measured against economic viability. However, the initiatives of Pakistan in the social sector is proof of its intention and will to bring change to the living standards of the poor and the working community. Any restriction that is imposed or any practice that may be seen to be a deviation from the path that it is committed to is a result of the inherent interest of the Government in raising the living standard of the average person. Change will be inevitable as soon as circumstances are improved so that the affairs of the country can be administered at the same level as those of nations that have already passed this transitory phase. While bearing in mind the concessions made by the Government for the establishment of Special Industrial Zones (SIZ) to attract foreign investment, the matter of exemption of such Zones from the application of certain labour legislation was considered by the tripartite Task Force on Labour, and its recommendations are being actively considered by the Cabinet Committee.

3. As a result of the Administrative Reforms of 1973, all civil service associations representing services that existed prior to 20 August 1973 have ceased to exist. However, civil service associations other than those referred to above have been permitted to continue to function as previously. There is no prohibition against the formation of associations of different categories of employees, which is fairly in consonance with the provisions of this Convention. However, the employees of the federal Government and of all four provincial governments are subjected to certain restrictions to prevent activities that are harmful to the basic aims and objectives of their establishments, such as their involvement and that of their organizations in political activities, the issuance of periodical publications, or publishing representations of their members without prior approval of the Government. This is purely an administrative matter to maintain discipline and the smooth functioning of public establishments, which cannot in any way be considered a contravention of Articles 2 and 3 of this Convention. Rights provided to the employees under the above Articles are exercised in full freedom. However, the restrictions referred to above are in the vital interest of public establishments as well as of the employees in order to achieve the goal of efficiency leading to greater productivity and production. For the purposes of the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952 "Essential Service" means an employment or class of employment which is essential in the opinion of the federal Government for securing the defence or security of Pakistan or any part thereof or for the maintenance of such supplies or services as are essential to the life of the community. It is in all respects consistent with national considerations and objectives that the above criterion be followed in applying the law in question to employment that is by nature essential. The Government noted that the report of the ILO mission to Pakistan had considered the issue of essential services to be a complicated matter to which generalizations were difficult to make and apply, and that in general terms the basis for exclusion must be a serious matter for health, safety and law and order. If this is taken as an ILO criterion, Pakistan has acted very carefully in extending the application of the above law to certain organizations. It is not correct that the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952 has been applied broadly to employers such as the Post and Telegraph Services, the Railways, Airways and Ports. While extending the application of this law to any organization for any limited period of time, due care is taken and for that purpose requests of the employers are thoroughly examined by the Ministry of Interior and the Ministry of Labour. Only those requests that meet defence needs or concern the life of the community can be considered for coverage by the above law, which does not prohibit trade union activity. The Interior Division recently issued an explanation in respect of the application of this law:

... the application of this Act to an organization does not take away workers' rights of collective bargaining. The provisions of the Essential Services Act and the rules made thereunder empower the Chairman, NIRC to regulate the wages and other conditions of service of persons or classes of persons engaged in any employment or class of employment to which the Act/Rules apply. Accordingly the settlement reached between the management and the CBA are authenticated by the Chairman, NIRC and forwarded to the Ministry of Interior for notification in the Gazette of Pakistan. Furthermore, the Act also does not impose any ban on trade union activity.

The main goal of the Government is to ensure economic viability of its national priorities programmes. For this reason the country cannot afford industrial action including strikes or lockouts to continue for an indefinite period, and it is in the national interest to restrict the rights to engage in such activity. This restriction presently acts as a deterrent, but workers have seldom resorted to a strike or lockout for a period of even as long as 30 days. Restrictions on industrial action that may be more undemocratic do not exist within the legal system.

4. The management of Pakistan International Airlines Corporation (PIAC) is implementing the terms and conditions of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 as applied by various labour laws. As a result of the amendment of section 10 of the PIAC Act, 1956, the applicability of the Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969 has been restored and formation of trade unions of PIAC employees has already been permitted. As a result of the existence of trade unions of employees in the PIAC, the collective bargaining agent (CBA) has been determined by the National Industrial Relations Commission for a term of two years ending in 1994 through a referendum conducted during 1992. The CBA and management have signed an agreement on the revision of wages and allowances on the review of terms and conditions of employment taking into consideration the welfare of the employees. The withdrawal of application of the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952 to certain other establishments referred to above is under consideration by the tripartite Task Force on Labour, and its recommendations on this matter were submitted to Cabinet for approval. The list of establishments covered by this Act is expected to be modified in accordance with the decision of the Cabinet and will be reported on in the next annual report.

5. With regard to the right of representation of minority trade unions, the federal and provincial governments have not yet faced any problems in this regard as their rights are adequately protected under the Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969 and their grievances if any, redressed by courts of law. Their interests are properly looked after by their respective CBA trade unions, as collective agreements entered into by CBAs are binding on all kinds of workers and as such, benefits under such agreements are granted to non-CBA members as well. However, the Government has taken note of the observation of the Committee and is taking all possible measures under the Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969 which are in consonance with this Convention to protect the rights of the minority trade unions.

6. The Government reiterates its previous explanation with regard to the allegations made in the complaint (Case No. 1534) by the Pakistan National Federation of Trade Unions (PNFTU) against the alleged anti-union policy of multinational companies in Pakistan. It affirms that Section 15(i) provides protection against anti-union acts and that if in effect false promotions occurred whereby the employees received higher wages but there were not the corresponding change of task to a supervisory role, employees could resort to the unfair labour practice provisions of Section 22(A)(8)(g) of the Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969, and eventually proceed to the labour court for redress. The PNFTU has lodged no complaint against the Government as such, and is instead aggrieved by certain decisions of the management of some of the multinational companies operating in Pakistan. As the complaint is against one civil person by another, the aggrieved party can obtain redress by approaching judicial bodies established for this purpose. This matter was also discussed at length during the visit of the above-mentioned ILO mission. The law on this matter is quite clear, and the complainant can resort to its provisions to attain justice if they are of the view that there has been an infringement of any of their trade union rights. This is a matter between the management and workers, and the Government should not intervene in their relations. Promotion of workers to a higher level job is also considered to be their right, and if a law is adopted to restrict this, even if it were to exclude workers from the worker category, this would be taken to be a measure affecting their legitimate interests. However, if a court considers such a matter to be bad faith, it would be dealt with differently. There would be very few cases determined by the courts on such ground, and no relevant statistics are available. However, this matter was considered by the tripartite Task Force on Labour in the light of all existing legislation, and it made certain recommendations which are being actively considered by the Cabinet Committee. The Task Force has also considered broadening the definition of workman, which may provide a solution to the problem as indicated.

7. It is incorrect that employees working in the public and private sector hospitals and clinics are deprived of the right to organize and form trade unions. However, these services have been declared essential to secure the defence of the security of Pakistan or any part thereof and to maintain such supplies or services which are essential to the life of the community pursuant to the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952. The application of the above Act does not deprive workers of the right to organize as provided under this Convention, and they therefore have the legal right to form associations.

In addition, a Government representative referred to the written information provided, and stated that he would limit his intervention to the progress made with regard to trade union rights since the last sitting of the Committee. He first recalled the promises that the Government had made with regard to workers: (1) all labour legislation would be revised to guarantee trade union and employers' rights; (2) democratic trade unionism would be promoted by implementing international labour standards that governed relations between the Government, employers and workers;

(3) bonded labour and child labour would be abolished; (4) rights recognized under ILO Conventions would be guaranteed. He indicated that the Government had prepared a new policy in the area of labour that was based on the recommendations of the tripartite Task Force on Labour and on the result of the direct contacts mission that had recently taken place. This new policy, which provided for important reforms at the level of labour administration and the guarantee of trade union rights, was presently being examined by the Cabinet for approval. With regard to the application of labour laws to workers in export processing zones, the Government would examine the possibility of eliminating, over a period of five to six years, the exemption of the application of labour legislation to those zones. With respect to the application of the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act of 1952, he indicated that the number of enterprises covered by this Act had been reduced from 16 to eight, and that the list would be regularly examined. In relation to the application of the Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969, he explained that the only employees excluded were those employed by railways that had been classed as defence-sensitive, in that they were essential for the purposes of the Ministry of Defence. At that time, there were 20 railway lines of this kind. Two of the lines had been deleted from the list. In other cases, railway workers were free to form trade union organizations. These examples were evidence of the willingness of the Government to apply the provisions of the Convention. He asked the Committee to be flexible, considering that the new labour policy would permit a response within a reasonable period of time to the concerns indicated by the Committee of Experts.

The Employers' members expressed appreciation for the oral and written information, but emphasized that it was difficult for the Committee to examine the merits of the alleged changes because of the extensive written and oral information provided by the Government. This case had been examined on ten occasions since 1981 and was the subject of special paragraphs in 1987 and 1988. They noted a gradual improvement during this period and indicated that they were pleased to learn that the Government would continue in this direction. In the meantime there were problems that persisted, particularly with regard to the prohibition against employees in the telecommunications sector from joining a union or carrying out trade union activities; the denial of rights guaranteed by the Convention to workers in export processing zones; the exclusion of a considerable number of public servants from the application of the Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969, and restrictions on their recourse to strikes; prohibition on minority trade unions from representing their members in relation to individual grievances; artificial promotions used as an anti-union tactic in the banking and finance sector; and the denial of the right to form trade unions for employees in public and private sector hospitals. The Employers' members noted in particular the reduction in the applicability of the Essential Services Act, and said that it was for the Committee of Experts to determine whether the problem of the right to organize and the right to strike had been resolved.

The Workers' members said that they had been unable to adequately examine the extensive amount of written information provided by the Government. For this reason, the extent of their intervention on this matter was limited to several points. Firstly, they wished to receive information on the views of the Task Force on Labour and its influence on changes to labour legislation, in particular with regard to the restoration of the rights of freedom of association for employees of the Pakistan Television Corporation and Pakistan Broadcasting Corporation. Secondly, they wished to have more detailed information on the implementation by the Government of the recommendations of the 1994 direct contacts mission. Thirdly, they were concerned about restrictions on the right to organize in a number of sectors. They asked whether hospital workers had the right to organize, and about the percentage of railways that were considered to be defence-sensitive which meant that employees of those railways were prohibited from striking. A distinction was drawn between the right to organize and the right to strike, and they asked that the Government not confuse these two rights when extending trade union rights to workers. They hoped that in view of the existence of the Task Force on Labour, a tripartite organization, the Government would be able to introduce its recommendations as soon as possible.

The Workers' member of the United States expressed disappointment that the Committee would only be discussing point 2 of the Committee of Experts' comments, in view of the many important issues that were contained in the other points of the report. If the other points had been dealt with, he would have mentioned the recent arrest of three workers of the Bonded Labour Liberation Front as well as the detention of 13 relatives of Iqbal Masih, the child rights labour activist who was murdered in April 1995. He stated that the requirement under the Convention that all workers, without distinction whatsoever, had the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing had been made needlessly complicated by the Government. He questioned the motives of the Government which continued to exempt or partially exempt many different groups of workers from exercising this basic right to organize. He hoped that the Government representative would assure the Committee that the prohibition against railway employees and forestry workers, as well as any other groups of workers, from exercising their fundamental right to establish and to join unions of their own choosing would be unequivocally removed.

The Government representative reiterated that some time would be needed before his Government could withdraw the exemptions from provisions of the Industrial Ordinance concerning collective bargaining for the export processing zone (EPZ) because when the investment was attracted for the EPZ, investors were given certain assurances regarding labour activity, so that there was now a contractual obligation between the Government and the investors from which it could not withdraw arbitrarily. However, the policy of the Government was no longer to allow such exemptions for any particular area of the country. With regard to the restriction of freedom of association in hospitals and clinics, persons working in private hospitals and clinics other than government hospitals were not subject to any such restrictions. The employees of government hospitals were not covered under the Industrial Relations Ordinance. However, they could form associations to safeguard their interests. Employees of private hospitals and clinics could form their own unions.

The Committee noted the observations of the Committee of Experts, the statement of the Government representative and the discussion that followed. While the Committee appreciated the information in regard to the proposal for a new labour policy and the gradual improvement that had come about, it felt that there were multifarious groups of workers who stood denied freedom of association by law and practice, that is the workers of Pakistan Television and Broadcasting Corporations, workers in export processing zones, civil servants, railway employees, hospital workers and those engaged in forestry operations. This was rather wide-ranging and pervasive and needed to be corrected for compliance with the Convention. The Committee also felt concerned about certain practices such as the granting of artificial promotions and manipulation of definitions so as to effectively exclude workers from the purview of the Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969. Recalling that in 1994 the Government had welcomed a direct contacts mission which went to Pakistan in January 1994, and the creation of the tripartite Task Force on Labour to solve difficulties in the application of the Convention, the Committee trusted that the Government would take the necessary and concrete measures which would give effect to the recommendations made by the direct contacts mission and the Committee of Experts. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the Government would indicate in its next report any decisive progress made in relation to the application of the Convention, in particular, with regard to the right of all workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, in the private as well as the public sector, including export processing zones. The Committee also hoped that the new labour policy would serve to address the recommendations of the national tripartite Task Force on Labour made from time to time, and all the issues raised by the Committee of Experts, and asked the Government to furnish the texts of the relevant policy documents for examination of issues of conformity to the Convention.

United Kingdom (ratification: 1949). A Government representative started with the overview of the background of the case and pointed out that the Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ) collected and monitored information for intelligence purposes and formed an integral part of the United Kingdom intelligence system. He emphasized the change in the legal status of the GCHQ under the Intelligence Services Act of 1994 and the fact that GCHQ provided government departments and military command with vital signal intelligence, and had close and vital links with the intelligence services in many other countries. The Act made it clear that GCHQ's intelligence production functions were exercisable "in the interests of national security with particular reference to the defence and foreign policies" of the Government. In the Act, the expression GCHQ referred to the Government Communication Headquarters and to any unit or part of a unit of the armed forces which was for the time being required by the Secretary of State to assist the Government Communication Headquarters in carrying out its functions. The speaker repeated that these were functions carried out directly or indirectly by the military in many countries. He explained, referring to the requirement that GCHQ's work maintain continuity of operations, that the action which the Government took to restrict staff representation at GCHQ was in response to the disruption caused between 1979 and 1981 when 10,000 staff days were lost through industrial action. The Government believed that it had an overriding responsibility to safeguard national security and therefore could not allow the continuity of GCHQ's operations to be threatened by industrial action.

As the first main problem of the case, the representative of the Government indicated that, in Britain, agreements reached between trade unions and employers were not legally enforceable and that, therefore, any offer of a no-strike deal from trade unions could never guarantee that future disruption would be avoided. In fact, a draft no-disruption agreement proposed by the Council of Civil Service Unions (CCSU) in 1984 was subsequently repudiated by two of the main unions. This risk of disruption would be inherent in any proposal to allow GCHQ staff to rejoin national unions.

The speaker thought that the second main problem was the difference of view between the United Kingdom Government and the Committee of Experts about the exemption of GCHQ staff from Convention No. 87 under Article 9. He emphasized that GCHQ staff included civil servants who come under the authority of the Foreign Secretary, as well as military personnel who come under the authority of the Secretary of State for Defence. If Britain suddenly imposed full military status upon these who had always enjoyed civilian status, it would be an arbitrary and unacceptable change for the individuals concerned, who regarded themselves as civilians and not as military personnel. He nevertheless considered that this was a difference of definition and not a real difference of function. He referred to the case of the European Court of Human Rights, which found in 1985 that the Government's action over GCHQ was not in breach of article 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights regarding freedom of association, since GCHQ was "a special institution whose purpose resembles to a large extent that of the armed forces and the police in so far as GCHQ staff directly or indirectly, by ensuring the security of the respondent Government's military and official communications, fulfil vital functions in protecting national security". He thought that the Committee of Experts had endorsed this view in practice in the 1994 General Survey on Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining by noting that the exceptions authorized by Convention No. 87 were "justified on the basis of responsibility for the external and internal security of the State" (paragraph 55).

The Government believed that GCHQ was covered by the provisions of Convention No. 151, which allowed governments to decide on the extent of rights to trade union membership for public servants whose duties were of a highly confidential nature. It was therefore disappointing that the Committee of Experts dismissed this argument without specific grounds.

For the above reasons the Government representative considered that the position of staff at GCHQ needed to be regarded as an unusual and special case that fell outside the normal scope of freedom of association.

The Government representative further indicated the developments since the discussion of this case at this Committee in 1992, following the Government's assurance to continue the dialogue with the trade unions seeking an acceptable solution: there was a series of detailed and constructive discussions between the Secretary of the Cabinet and the head of the whole civil service, and the general secretaries of the national civil service unions; the Government Communications Staff Federation (GCSF) was formed and recognized by GCHQ management for all negotiating purposes, and now had membership of over 50 per cent of GCHQ staff; GCSF has been listed by the United Kingdom Certification Officer for Trade Unions and Employer Associations since 1985 and is recognized by the Certification Officer as operating largely in the same way as many other small trade unions in representing its members' interests. As regards the affiliation of GCSF to the CCSU, the speaker emphasized that the Government was prepared to make such affiliation possible but that the civil service unions were not prepared to accept it. Since the meeting between the Prime Minister and the unions in December 1993, there had been no formal proposals submitted by the trade unions but informal contacts had been continuing on this issue.

The speaker thought that the Government had thus clearly demonstrated its willingness to find a solution to this matter by pursuing a genuine dialogue. The proposals put forward by the Prime Minister represented a considerable change in the Government's position from 1984. The Government had taken note of the most recent observation of the Committee of Experts, thought that there was still scope to examine new possibilities for making progress and expressed its willingness to give consideration to any new proposals for the resolution of the problem.

Referring to the recent press information, the representative of the Government emphasized that no decision had been made to withdraw from the ILO and that no threat had been issued. He explained that the evaluation of membership of the ILO was part of the continuous evaluation which the United Kingdom Government undertook of its membership of all international organizations and the expenditure associated with them.

The Workers' members first clarified that only point 1 of the observation of the Committee of Experts was dealt with in this discussion. Referring to the long history of this case, they thought that its continuation without any resolution was a threat to the whole standard-setting machinery. The Committee of Experts' views had been clear and unequivocal from the beginning: denial of the right of GCHQ staff to join a union of their own choice is an infringement of Convention No. 87. The Government, however, consistently refused to accept the observations of the Committee of Experts and insisted on its own interpretation of Convention No. 87. As regards the interrelationship of Conventions Nos. 87 and 151, nothing overrode Convention No. 87. As to the second argument that GCHQ should be treated as a military establishment, if the Government could not put them in uniform, they were not military personnel in the context of this Convention. Regarding the question of a conflict of loyalty in the case of strike, the right to strike was a separate issue from the issue involved in this case. Referring to the Government's indication that the existence of GCHQ had recently been publicly admitted, the speaker noted that it should also be publicly revealed that trade unions had existed in that organization for about 40 years before the right to organize in that area was taken away. He also stated that despite the number of hours lost through strikes the full coverage of the operation was ensured because the trade union members in GCHQ were loyal citizens to the country.

In the 1992 discussion of the case, not only the Workers' members but also Government members and Employers urged dialogue between the United Kingdom Government and the trade unions. The Committee then "expressed its deep concern at the continuing refusal of the Government to implement the Convention as regards the situation of workers at GCHQ who still did not enjoy the right to join a union of their own choosing". Stressing that three years had elapsed since the Committee's hope for substantial progress, the Workers' members thought that the conclusions and how they should be expressed should be made only after the discussion as to how this case should be concluded.

The Workers' member of the United Kingdom continued the second part of the statement of the Workers' members. He first pointed out that in Britain agreements between unions and employers could be legally enforceable if the union concerned and the employer so wished, and that the trade union did suggest it as one of the contributions in meetings with the Cabinet Secretary. Secondly, there was nothing unusual about a mixture of civilian and military personnel working together. Thousands of members of his organization worked in the Ministry of Defence, worked with military personnel, managed military personnel as serving officers or are themselves managed by serving personnel.

Referring to the assurance made by the Government in 1992, he noted first that the conclusions of the Committee were reported to the Government, second, the dialogue with the trade union was resumed and remained open. The third point was that the Government would continue to look within the dialogue for a solution safeguarding the security of the country and acceptable to the parties involved. He agreed with the Government representative that the discussions with the Cabinet Secretary and the meeting with the Prime Minister were in good faith. During such meetings, the issue remaining between the two sides was a question of conflict of loyalty. As regards the offer of affiliation of GCSF to CCSU, the speaker explained the reasons why the workers rejected it. Firstly, the workers asked if GCSF would be free to affiliate to the Trades Union Congress or if it would be free to undertake transfer engagements. The answer appeared negative because of the possible conflict of loyalty, while the Government was prepared to consider the removal of the veto that the Director effectively had. The GCSF was thus not independent as it was supposed to be. Secondly, it would not have provided a solution in conformity with Convention No. 87 since there is no freedom of choice. Thirdly, it would bring no benefit to anybody, as the CCSU was no longer able to negotiate with the Government, except for the question of pensions, because the Government was ending national bargaining.

At the meeting with the Prime Minister, on the technical items on national security, workers did make proposals which would be acceptable to Government. As for the no-strike agreements, they offered to look at having legally enforceable contracts but the Ministers in the Government believed that there was a conflict of loyalty in being a national trade union member and being employed at GCHQ. Therefore, in spite of the willingness of the Government to continue dialogue, there seemed to be no proposals that workers could make to overcome this perceived conflict of loyalty.

Referring to the threat concerning membership of the ILO and a special paragraph, the speaker noted a direct press interview by the responsible Minister saying that if there was a special paragraph, then the position of Britain in the ILO was in jeopardy, which caused workers in the United Kingdom great concern. He added that in recent discussions with Ministers and the Cabinet Secretary, the Ministers said that special paragraphs were for military dictatorships. The same rule should apply to every country irrespective of its state of development, of its contribution to the ILO and of its size. The question was how to bridge the gap with the Government when the problem was only in Ministers' minds. The Government had no proposals and said that the trade unions should have them. So there had to be a solution or a special paragraph. The speaker concluded by recalling the fact that 11 years ago members of his organization, some of them for 30 years, were taken away by a sudden decision by the Government in contravention of Convention No. 87.

The Employers' members did not think it necessary to recall the details of the well known history of a case which first appeared on the agenda of the Committee in the middle of the 1980s. In addition, they were not directly concerned with a problem which did not involve private employers. This case was characterized by an unusual attitude of the two parties to stick to their respective positions.

Few new elements had been brought since the last discussion of this case. Discussions and negotiations took place, including at the highest level with the Prime Minister, but without reaching an agreement. The proposal by the Government of an independent staff association was rejected, while the Government did not want staff at GCHQ to join the TUC. The problem would have perhaps been resolved if this organ had been put under the authority of the Ministry of Defence or if the workers had been given military status, as was the case for activities of this type in certain countries. However, in the present situation of the case, it could only be resolved by conciliating two positions of principle, as recommended by the Committee on Freedom of Association: the Government's will to ensure that the service of GCHQ was not interrupted on the one hand and the determination of the workers that Convention No. 87 should be fully applied to them on the other.

They noted the Government's indication of their willingness to continue the dialogue and hoped that sufficient common sense and goodwill would be shown there so that a satisfactory solution could be found. Concerning the so-called "threat" referred to by the Workers' member of the United Kingdom, which the Government representative stated was without basis, it had no more to do with the work of this Committee than the prospective elections.

The Employers' member of Sweden pointed out that the Committee of Experts itself recognized that the staff at GCHQ ensured functions identical to those provided in other countries by military institutions, and that the exclusion of armed forces provided by Convention No. 87 would have been fully applicable to them, had they been administratively placed under the authority of the Secretary of State for Defence. The entire case should therefore be regarded as a purely administrative issue and not one of human rights.

He thought it regrettable that this case was treated, both in the United Kingdom and in the international sphere, as a main preoccupation of the ILO in the field of human and trade union rights, also taking into account the relatively small number of persons concerned. The attacks on the United Kingdom Government for a decade were particularly incomprehensible, taking into account that the ILO was practically silent for nearly a half century concerning the enormous and systematic violations of human and trade union rights in the Soviet bloc. Where were the proportions? He also found it obvious that it was for political purposes against a particular government or certain types of policies that the Workers' group had given the case such proportions. The speaker thought that it was not good for the ILO to be used for such purposes.

The Workers' member of the United States regretted that, after 11 years, the only new thing was the pressure from the Government on this Committee, threatening the withdrawal from the ILO if its rules were applied to the United Kingdom. It was without precedence that a country used such a threat of financial and diplomatic consequences to challenge the very integrity of this Committee and also the ILO itself. The rules should be the same for everybody, even for the rich and powerful.

The Workers' member of South Africa thought that this case concerned not only the United Kingdom but also a question of principle. In South Africa, the Government had proposed to deprive workers in the National Intelligence Service of their trade union rights. This was stopped by the workers who were determined to bring such violations of Convention No. 87 before the ILO if necessary.

He stressed that the Government of the United Kingdom did not comply with the recommendations of the Committee of Experts and even made the intolerable action of threat. To another country, this Committee did urge today that Convention No. 87 be fully respected. This was no doubt a particular case, but the principles were the same and should be applied equally. In contrast with the United Kingdom Government, the workers at GCHQ were not asking for special treatment. This Committee should maintain its consistency and strong will as to its principles.

The Workers' member of Germany deplored that a strong country with such a long tradition of democracy ignored the recommendations of the ILO. The situation of trade unions in the United Kingdom probably caused less problems than in other countries outside Europe. But if an interpretation was made to justify a special treatment for this case, it would ruin the principles of objectivity and universality in the supervision of standards' application, and it would also give the impression that special paragraphs were only for developing countries. It was true that these countries do not have the same means of influence and pressure.

The question of a special paragraph had already been discussed by the Committee at the end of the 1980s but so far these warnings have not led to a constructive solution. It was incorrect to think that the two parties were equally insistent in maintaining their principles: the workers had demonstrated their willingness to take account of the requirements of their security. In addition the problem should not be reduced to a purely administrative question since it was the very principle of the freedom of association that was challenged. The employers should consider the consequences upon their own right to organize if such a restriction was to be tolerated. For all these reasons the speaker thought that the Committee should take a firm position on this case.

The Workers' member of Canada first reacted to what appeared as a form of threat that the United Kingdom Government would withdraw from the ILO if it was treated like any other governments. Referring to the statement of the Government representative that no decision had been made to withdraw from the ILO and that such a decision would require careful evaluation, the speaker felt that it was obvious that the Government should have evaluated carefully their statement to the media. It was not the workers but the Government who had made this case a high profile one in the media.

In addition, some Government members expressed their irritation by this case coming back again. But all the members of this Committee had good reason to be irritated by the attitude of a government that insistently refused for 11 years to follow the recommendations of the authoritative bodies of the ILO.

Therefore, the speaker thought that the Government of the United Kingdom should not be discriminated against: after all the procedures exhausted during the last 11 years without the Government's complying with the requirements, a special paragraph was warranted.

The Workers' member from India summarized the principal problems. He indicated that he agreed with the declarations made by the Workers' members and that this case demonstrated an unfair and unreasonable practice on the part of the Government which violated trade union rights. Furthermore, a trade union was acceptable to the Government only if it was recognized as independent from the TUC. During the past 11 years the Government had been negotiating, but the delay in reaching solutions was also a denial of justice. The United Kingdom was wealthy and influential. Therefore the ILO should be careful not to apply a double standard or give special treatment in favour of the United Kingdom which would not also apply to developing countries. The present Committee always asked developing countries to immediately remedy violations of the Conventions. An inequality of treatment in favour of the United Kingdom would give rise to suspicion and damage the image of the ILO. Consequently, the case should be mentioned in a special paragraph, unless the Government gave assurances that it would resolve these problems in the near future, that the TUC can resume its presence in GCHQ, and that the original statute concerning the workers at GCHQ will be restored. The argument that a special paragraph would be used in the coming elections against the Government was totally unacceptable in this case.

The Workers' member of France stated that in the last few years the Government had made few credible arguments and that it was contradictory to have a civilian status if, as had been demonstrated, the workers at GCHQ carried out military functions. The United Kingdom was an important democratic country which formed part of the OECD and the G7; none the less, the Government exempted itself frequently from the social standards of the European Union and had violated the union rights of workers at GCHQ over the past 11 years. Furthermore, the Government had threatened to withdraw from the ILO if the Committee adopted a special paragraph. The Committee should not give in to such a threat. The statements of the Government representative gave a bad impression of the United Kingdom in the world. If this country continued to violate the social standards and the Conventions of the ILO, it would be converted into a free enterprise zone and unfair competition would exist. The contradiction between the United Kingdom's actions in promoting a social clause at the international level while at the same time reducing the rights of trade unions in the United Kingdom, an industrialized country which was one of the wealthier countries, warranted that the Committee adopt firm conclusions.

The Government member of the United States noted that this was one of the most difficult cases the Committee had ever discussed. She explained that, on the one hand, it was impossible to deny that freedom of association, including forming and joining a trade union of one's choice, was as basic a right in industrialized countries as it was in developing countries. On the other hand, this particular case had an extremely narrow scope, involving a relatively small number of highly technical employees dealing with matters of national security which were military in nature, and the potential conflict between loyalty to one's employer and loyalty to one's union was a very real concern. On the two previous occasions the Committee had discussed this case, her Government had joined in a strong, tripartite recommendation that the United Kingdom Government engage in substantive, frank and constructive dialogue carried out in good faith, so that a mutually satisfactory solution could be found that would be in conformity with the Convention. She regretted that the problem still had not been solved. She hoped that the present Committee would once again send a clear and strong message to the Government, and that the message would once again be unanimous. Such a unified signal was the best way for the ILO to encourage continued, genuine and intensified dialogue on the matter of freedom of association at GCHQ, so that once and for all this case could be resolved.

The Workers' member from Argentina expressed his concern over the attitude of the Government concerning this case for the last 11 years, and the fact that it had done nothing beyond making unfulfilled promises. The Committee on Freedom of Association had strongly urged the Government to strengthen its efforts to comply with the Convention. In previous years the Government had repeatedly defended the universal application of ratified ILO Conventions, without exception. In this case, a violation of Articles 2 and 4 of the Convention continued to impede the right to organize for a group of workers who had not been excluded by the Convention. Measures had been taken against their freedom of association; and in 1983 almost all members of the union had been dismissed. He considered that the Committee should adopt a special paragraph to demonstrate impartiality, independence and the need to apply the same rules to all countries.

The Government member of India stated that liberty came with certain obligations; therefore application of certain reasonable restrictions on fundamental rights of liberties was well recognized. What was a reasonable restraint was a matter of policy evolved in a specific ethos. In the particular case of GCHQ, the workers were not denied a right to representation through a grievance-registering mechanism. And the employers in question clearly performed functions flowing from the exercise of the sovereign power of the State, making them distinct. For these reasons, the restrictions imposed by the Government of the United Kingdom were reasonable, and this case was an example of the need to make the interpretation of ILO Conventions more flexible. The real functions of these employees should be taken into consideration instead of merely their civil or military status. ILO bodies must avoid a legalistic and rigid interpretation of Articles 2 and 9 of the Convention. Therefore the Committee should recommend that dialogue should continue, and the parties should be more flexible, but a special paragraph in the case of the United Kingdom was not only inappropriate, but unfair.

The Workers' member of Japan noted that the Committee of Experts had consistently asked that measures be taken by the Government concerning this case. Unfortunately, the measures had not been taken, leading to a double standard where the Government asserted its own interpretation of the Convention. If the Committee gave in to one government under mounting pressure, it would set a negative precedent. In this case the principles of independence, objectivity and fairness of the ILO supervisory machinery were at stake.

The Government representative of Germany set out the problems in this case and summarized the position of the Committee of Experts and the Committee on the Application of Standards in the last years. He recalled that the Committee of Experts had noted that this was an exceptional case. It had not asked directly that the legislation or practice in the United Kingdom change, but rather that the discussions be resumed in order to comply with provisions of the Convention. However, the situation had not improved and the parties could have done more. Therefore, the Committee should ask for other measures, but it should not adopt a special paragraph. The adoption of a special paragraph required the existence of both a sustained violation and a certain measure of gravity. Although there had been a sustained violation, the violation was clearly not so grave in comparison to other cases in respect of which the Committee had adopted a special paragraph. In the present case, involving 13 employees working at the GCHQ (at least as of three years ago), who had not made use of three options available and had not suffered either physically or financially, the question was whether they had been granted the full freedom of association rather than the right to organize. It was never alleged that any of these employees suffered any physical, or even financial, detriment. It had been mentioned numerous times that there would be no failure to comply with the Convention if the United Kingdom Government simply decided that these employees should be placed under the Ministry of Defence, indicating that the real issue in the case was the nature of the functions performed. Therefore, a clear difference existed in this case, as far as gravity was concerned, which made it difficult and impossible to support a proposal for a special paragraph. There was a danger that the special paragraph would lose its meaning and importance if it was adopted in this case. While recognizing that the Government did not seem to be ready to take all the necessary measures, the speaker hoped that there would not be a vote on this matter and indicated that, if there were, he would vote against a special paragraph.

The Workers' member of Finland, speaking on behalf of the Workers' members of the Nordic countries, stated that the United Kingdom Government's delay tactics had called into question the effectiveness of the ILO supervisory bodies. By opposing conclusions of the ILO supervisory bodies in this case, the United Kingdom Government had behaved contrary to both the Constitution of the ILO and the basic rules on which the ILO supervisory machinery was based. Taking into consideration the length of this case, strong actions and a special paragraph should be taken in order to secure the observance of Convention No. 87 in the near future.

The Government representative of Canada observed that the possibility of GCHQ workers joining other organizations created a risk which was a legitimate concern for the Government, and which was recognized as such by the Committee of Experts in its observations. It was perfectly within the realm of Convention No. 87 to prohibit the right to strike to workers in such sensitive and security-related areas. In other countries, public or civil servants engaged in similar duties were usually exempt from the scope of that Convention because they were usually included in the military or defence department. For this reason, a special paragraph clearly was not appropriate in this case, although the Committee should once again call upon the Government to resume dialogue. She stated that this case was not so serious as to warrant such attention in the light of so many other cases of much more grave violations but noted that it had existed for too long a time.

The Government member of Uruguay noted with concern that despite the observations of the Committee of Experts and the present Committee the parties had not arrived at positive results after such a long time. He was surprised that the Government representative had alluded to possible doubts concerning the loyalty of the civil servants in question toward the employer, since he believed that the issue of loyalty was set aside in 1991, given the statement by the Worker member of the United Kingdom in this respect. A solution to this problem could be reached by making a clear distinction between the possibility of freely affiliating with a union and the question of eventual limits on the right to strike. The speaker hoped that the democratic tradition of the United Kingdom would permit it to avoid a possible vote by the present Committee, and would assist in resolving the problems in question in the coming year. None the less, the Government must accept a definite compromise. Lastly, the speaker indicated that it was not good that this type of discussion on such a problem had been prolonged for so many years.

The Workers' member of Turkey stated that some governments of the developing world which did not fulfil ratified Conventions in their countries, when criticized by the present Committee, had tried to discredit the ILO by alleging that the ILO was an organization dominated by industrialized countries, which humiliated poor countries. This case was important for refuting these accusations. Therefore, he urged the Committee to resist any attempts to apply a double standard and to adopt a special paragraph.

The Government representative of Australia, after summarizing the problems and the position of the Committee of Experts and the Committee on the Application of Standards in the last years, noted that the United Kingdom case was only one of 59 observations by the Committee of Experts on Convention No. 87, covering countries from all regions and at various levels of development. This demonstrated the rigour of the ILO supervisory processes in seeking to protect the fundamental rights of workers. The speaker concluded by stating that the protection of workers' rights in this case should be made with a positive approach, seeking that the parties reach agreement.

The Government member of France indicated that this was an important and delicate case since it involved the principles of freedom of association which governments should respect, above all if they have ratified the Convention. The United Kingdom should be treated the same as all States and impassioned debates on this issue should be avoided. The options available to the present Committee made it less urgent to adopt a special paragraph. Following a jurisprudence, developed from considerable experience, the special paragraph procedure applied to all member States, regardless of their geographic location or their level of economic development, whenever two circumstances existed: when a grave failure of application persisted, or when there was a belligerence on the part of member States which resulted in grave violations of human rights, such as imprisonment, violence, arrests and assassination of union activists. The speaker believed that both conditions did not exist in the present case and summarized the position of the Government member of India favouring dialogue and discussion between the parties to resolve the serious but limited conflict.

The Government representative of the Netherlands suggested that the United Kingdom Government could accept an advisory mission of the ILO to facilitate negotiations between all the parties concerned.

The Government representative of South Africa supported the proposal made by the Government of the Netherlands, based on the length of the problem and its own experience of how very difficult disputes could be successfully resolved and reconciled by an ILO direct contacts mission.

The Government representative of the United States concurred with the proposal to request the United Kingdom Government to invite an ILO consultative mission to the United Kingdom to help seek a solution to the problem. Her Government would support Committee conclusions in this direction.

The Government representative of Turkey expressed objection to the inclusion of this case in a special paragraph.

The Government member of the United Arab Emirates, speaking also on behalf of the Government members from Saudi Arabia, Oman and Kuwait, supported the recommendation of the Committee of Experts urging the Government to adopt measures to resume dialogue with the trade unions with the objective of reaching a satisfactory solution for all of the interested parties. In order to arrive at a solution, it must be taken into account that this was a limited problem which should be considered in its appropriate dimensions. A clear distinction should be made between the right to organize trade unions and the right to strike. The status of the workers in question also must be taken into consideration, whether civilian or military. Furthermore, all of these points should be considered with regard to the context, culture and tradition of the United Kingdom. The Committee should find a solution by urging both parties to resume the discussions, but this case did not require a special paragraph.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands referred to the statement made by the Government member of France and indicated that the second criteria mentioned to adopt a special paragraph – the existence of gravity and problems involving questions of human rights – was not correct. He asserted that other types of violations also could be the subject of special paragraphs, and that was the criteria the present Committee followed. Otherwise, special paragraphs could only be addressed to military dictatorships.

The Government representative of the United Kingdom welcomed the debate which he followed with much interest and expressed his agreement with the statement made by the Government member of France on the climate which had surrounded the debate which had made it a sober and responsible discussion. Many speakers had recognized the complexity of the situation and the difficulty in finding solutions. He emphasized that there was no truth to the suggestion that the United Kingdom had decided to withdraw from the ILO if a special paragraph were to be adopted. The Committee should decide the case on its merits and not on extravagant press information. Regarding the circumstances for adoption of special paragraphs, it was fundamental that all countries be regarded as equal concerning compliance with ILO standards. The United Kingdom Government did not want to be treated differently from other countries. However, special paragraphs must be reserved for serious cases. The issue of proportionality was important here, as had been noted by various speakers. In this respect, the situation at GCHQ was very particular. Workers had the right to join a union in the great majority of workplaces in the United Kingdom and if they were dismissed or their rights violated, legal redress existed. The speaker rejected the idea put forth by various speakers that the rights of workers in the United Kingdom were trampled under foot. The Government representative concluded by indicating that the proposal to send a mission to the United Kingdom was not for him to decide. None the less, if this proposal was adopted it would be considered by the Government.

The Workers' member of the United Kingdom noted that there were a number of errors in some of the statements, starting with the Employers' member of Sweden who failed to realize that the transfer of civilian staff of GCHQ to the Ministry of Defence would have created the same problem because the latter organization is unionized by civil service unions and would have resulted in the same loss of rights. He further noted that his union and all civil service unions in the United Kingdom are apolitical and are proud of serving governments, whatever their politics.

The speaker referred to the statement of the Government representative of Germany concerning the situation at GCHQ and noted that 7,000 people lost freedom of association rights in 1984; the figure 13 apparently came to mind because 14 people were dismissed.

He took exception to the Government representative of Canada's statement concerning the desire of GCHQ staff to join other unions. He emphasized that for the past 11 years they had had no rights to belong to any union, only to the staff association. No previous guarantees had been broken by the unions. Two of the civil service unions had repudiated agreements in 1984, but he recalled that the first party to repudiate such agreements in 1984 was the Government itself.

The speaker endorsed the Netherlands Workers' member's point and was straightforward concerning the need for a special paragraph: what he wanted was the restoration of trade union rights guaranteed under Convention No. 87 which were taken away from GCHQ staff 11 years ago. He renewed his willingness to engage with the Government in meaningful dialogue, although he noted that the Government failed to suggest any way in which it could be meaningful. He observed that everyone in Britain has legal recourse against individual dismissal, except those people employed at GCHQ who no longer have access to industrial tribunals. They had been forced to accept £1,000 in exchange for losing their rights.

The speaker then welcomed the proposal by the Government representative of the Netherlands to send an ILO fact-finding and conciliation mission to the United Kingdom if this would stimulate meaningful dialogue.

The Workers' members congratulated the Government representative of the Netherlands for his suggestion that an ILO mission might be helpful and regretted that this suggestion came so late in the debate. They felt that such a mission might change the Workers' feelings with regard to a special paragraph.

The Workers' members observed that notwithstanding a certain sense of drama surrounding this case, it was a part of a slow procession of cases before the Committee. It had elements in it, however, which the Workers believed to be important and wished to emphasize in the debate.

Indeed, taking most of the Governments' statements into account, it was the Workers who should be threatening to leave the ILO and not the United Kingdom Government, because some of the statements made on this case were at their best, malign, and at their worst, mischievous, so that the discussion in this Committee stumbled from equivocation to downright misrepresentation. The whole issue was bedeviled by the special paragraph – the whole question of the special paragraph influenced the debate.

In the first place, the Employers attempted to play the issue down as an embarrassment that should go away. They made a valuable point, however, in reminding the Committee of the two points raised by the Committee on Freedom of Association when it first considered the case: firstly, that there should be an uninterrupted service at GCHQ if there was to be a settlement of this case and, secondly, that there should be a right to join a union for the staff, a union of their own choosing. This had also been the view of the Committee of Experts throughout, fully shared by the Workers who could not be accused therefore of taking an extreme position. They believed, however, that a boil, this particular boil included, had to be lanced if a cure was to be effected. Incidentally, the Workers' members rejected the insulting and false remarks made by the Employers' member from Sweden that the Workers' group stood by silently when the Soviet Union and the Eastern bloc were abusing human rights.

With respect to the comment of the Government representative of the United States emphasizing the small number of people at GCHQ and the fact that they were professional and technical staff, the Workers stressed that professional and technical workers were just as entitled to trade union rights as anyone else and one should not thrust them aside merely because their numbers were small.

Referring to the interventions of the Government representatives from Germany and France, the Workers' members argued that the key issue for a special paragraph was sustained violation, consistent refusal of the Government either to take notice of the Committee of Experts or of the conclusion of this Committee, or both. Special paragraphs, historically, had been given on a variety of cases including on purely technical cases involving no deaths, no outrage, no human rights violations. It was important, as far as this Committee was concerned, to clear up this confusion, which was used as an excuse to prevent any discussion of a special paragraph in connection with GCHQ, and not to have in any future discussions on this case, or any other case, the argument that special paragraphs had a special character because they should only be proposed when major human rights violations were concerned.

With respect to the arguments advanced by the Government representative of Canada that the GCHQ had got a union and therefore had nothing to complain about, the Workers' members pointed out that it was in fact a government-sponsored union, a house union, which was under the complete control of the Director of GCHQ. They also pointed out that the argument according to which Convention No. 151 had to override Convention No. 87, already very long ago had been rejected by the Committee of Experts as totally irrelevant.

Concerning a number of other government contributions which were helpful, they singled out one question which was strung through the debate, and this was about the military nature of the operation. According to one Government representative, for example, had GCHQ staff been under the Ministry of Defence it would have escaped. The Workers' members stressed that it was not possible because people working there were not military, they did not wear uniforms, they were not under service traditions and they did not get service pay, so this confusion should also be put out of the way. Indeed, there were trade unions throughout the Ministry of Defence where civilians worked with the military – only GCHQ staff were excluded.

Coming to the issue of the special paragraph, the objective of the Workers' group was not a special paragraph for itself. The Workers did not believe, in the light of the attitude of the Government representative from the United Kingdom, that a special paragraph would change the situation. The issue has become a sort of political football within the governing party in Great Britain and the Workers did not want to play any part in political manoeuvring. This was not a political issue as far as the Workers were concerned, but the Workers' group, like everyone else, wanted a solution and a special paragraph in itself was not a solution, it represented at its best a spur to action or the ultimate frustration of the Committee. While on that basis a special paragraph in this case would be more than justified, the Workers' group supported the suggestion made by the Government representative of the Netherlands, and supported by others, for a conciliation mission, which might represent a road to a solution. In this connection, the Workers' group stressed the need for such a conclusion as to be virtually unanimously accepted by this Committee – Workers, Employers and Governments – and which should firmly invite the United Kingdom Government to accept the mission offered. There was no humility involved in them accepting this offer, but it should be recognized that a subsequent refusal either to accept the request when it was made or failure to take into consideration any suggestions which might emerge, will be viewed by everybody on this Committee as undermining the standard-setting aspects of this Committee's work. The Workers did not want to threaten anybody, nor to set time-limits, but time was running out on this particular issue and they hoped therefore that a mission, if accepted, could take place as quickly as possible and that conclusions could be reached in sufficient time for any discussion that might take place in this Committee next year, in sufficient time for it to have the knowledge that the mission had taken place and that the conclusions and the helpful nature of what they had done had produced a solution. On that basis, the Workers agreed to draw up a conclusion on this case for this year which would not be included in a special paragraph.

The Employers' member of Sweden, referring to his previous statement, explained that he did not accuse the Workers' group for not having criticized the Soviet bloc, but had talked about the disproportionality of this case.

The Workers' members accepted his apology.

The Workers' member of the United Kingdom, speaking on a point of order, repeated the comments he had made during the previous sitting in rejecting the accusations that there was a political motivation to the TUC bringing a complaint about the GCHQ at the request of the Council of Civil Service Unions who were the unions in GCHQ prior to the ban. All the unions in the Council of Civil Service Unions were trade unionists who did not affiliate to the Labour Party in Britain and were proud of being non-political in order that the British civil service should be non-partisan and serve efficiently governments of whatever political colour.

The Employers' members refrained from commenting on what had been said by individual delegates because those persons would not have the opportunity to react again. Nor would they be used to making conjectures on the sense to be given to an intervention. They would hold to what had been said but still wished to make some remarks of substance on two subjects. On several occasions, reference had been made to the question of the authority of the supervisory machinery and some people felt that this authority was being called into question. This was not totally appropriate because it overlooked the difference between domestic law and the way in which domestic law was implemented, and international law. International law was based on the wish of a country to be a member of an international organization, on the voluntary pursuance of the rules of an organization by a State. There were no ways of enforcing such legislation apart from trying to convince countries to obey the rules, and the ILO had a very well tried and tested procedure for supervising its Conventions, which was exemplified by the many hours of discussion on this case.

A second point which played an important role in this debate concerned the question of equal treatment; this was raised on several occasions, particularly in connection with a special paragraph. Equal treatment in the special terminology of the ILO meant the avoidance of any double standards. The emphasis with which this point was made seemed to be rather exaggerated because nobody would say they were not in favour of equal treatment. However, one could not establish what was equal treatment with some kind of a ruler or with a stopwatch, there were certain aspects to be taken into account, including the length of period that a case had existed and was being discussed. In this Committee there had been a whole number of cases which were dealt with at greater length than the case of the United Kingdom. Some of the cases had a tradition of more than 20 years and in most of them, in fact, there had been no special paragraph because what was decisive was certainly not the length of a case, but the content, the weight to be attached to a particular case. The Employers believed that the case of the United Kingdom was a very special case and for the Convention it was an atypical case. It was of a relatively limited dimension, it was not about freedom of association being called into question for a whole country, but about a small group of people in a semi-military profession. Nevertheless, the Committee had to find a solution for this case also, and the Employers regretted that up until now no solution had been found. They were demanding that serious efforts be made in order to bring about such a solution, which must be found basically by the parties to this dispute themselves. They must have to accept it and must be able to implement it. But it could also be useful to have a mission sent to the United Kingdom to provide additional assistance in bringing about the solution.

As regards the question of the special paragraph, on which there were many theoretical comments on the usefulness and on the harm which could possibly be done by such a measure, the Employers did not need to adopt a position because nobody had requested this special paragraph.

The Committee noted the oral information supplied by the Government representative, as well as the wide-ranging discussion that took place thereafter. In the discussion concerning this case, many references were made to the length of time which had elapsed since the case first came before the Committee and to the views expressed by the Committee on previous occasions.

The Committee deeply regretted and deplored the fact that the Government had not taken action to resolve the issues underlying the case.

In these circumstances, the Committee had given some consideration to the adoption of a special paragraph concerning this case. While a significant number of members of the Committee were disposed towards the adoption of a special paragraph, the majority were prepared to extend to the Government a final opportunity to resolve the issues.

In this respect the Committee had noted the Government's statement that further dialogue was possible and desirable.

The Committee hoped that it would be possible, with the exercise of common sense and goodwill, for a satisfactory resolution of this case to be reached in the near future. The Committee invited the Government to receive an ILO advisory mission to help this process.

Venezuela (ratification: 1982). A Government representative considered the situation to be unusual due to the fact that the points raised had been made by an association of employers. He recalled the negotiation that had precluded the adoption in 1990 of the new Organic Labour Act (OLA) with the active participation of organizations of employers and workers in Venezuela. The Congress of the Republic had adopted the OLA without any dissenting vote. As deputy, he had then accepted the proposal of a person mandated by the Venezuelan Federation of Chambers and Association of Commerce and Production (FEDECAMARAS) so that the period of residence required for foreign workers in the initial Bill (two years) be increased to ten years (section 404 of the OLA). He recalled that the relationship between the President of the Republic and the ILO was very close, as well as the responsibility that he had assumed in the drawing up of the OLA. He then referred to the other points raised in the observation of the Committee of Experts:

- The list of attributes and purposes required for workers' and employers' organizations was too extensive and detailed; sections 408 and 409 of the OLA only had the purpose of guiding those who wished to set up organizations of workers and employers. These provisions had to be placed in the context defined by sections 401 and 403 of the OLA which guaranteed the free exercise of freedom of association protected by the Convention. Moreover, these provisions had not prevented employers from establishing their associations - FEDECAMARAS was in fact a civil organization.

- The number of workers (100) required to form unions of self-employed workers was too high (section 418): Freedom of association, the cornerstone of collective rights, was only one aspect of labour legislation. The latter governed individual relations and collective relations of dependent workers. Consequently, the provision in question of the OLA tended simply to confer a specific protection to one category of workers - those who were self-employed - who were naturally not covered by labour legislation.
- The number of employers (ten) required to form an employers' organization was too high (section 419). While the legislation of 1936 had prescribed a smaller number of employers to establish such an organization, there had only been one organization of employers that had been registered in the history of Venezuela (SINTRA Bares, distributors of spirits). FEDECAMARAS had not taken the trouble to register itself as a sectoral organization under section 405 of the OLA. The civil associations of employers were reticent about the idea that the Labour Minister conferred on them legal personality.

Venezuela respected the obligations flowing from ILO Conventions and even public sector workers enjoyed all rights of organization and association. In any event, the Government would study ways to harmonize the presumed content of the Convention and the intent and content of the OLA. It would engage in a social dialogue to this end and would also include FEDECAMARAS to examine the problem. However, in the absence of sufficient parliamentary support, it was to be feared that the proposals to amend the OLA touched upon other matters than those raised by the Experts.

The speaker added that a recent ruling of the Supreme Court confirmed that international labour Conventions prevailed over the OLA. In these conditions, legally, there were no difficulties to impose the application of the Convention. It would also be appropriate to look into the possibility that the National Executive, in conformity with section 13 of the OLA, take the legal measures through the administrative channels to meet the claims of the complainants and to bring Venezuelan labour legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Employers' members thanked the Minister of Labour for coming. They pointed out that, although the Employers had requested a discussion of this case, it had been the decision of the entire Committee to take up the case. The Minister had said that he was not familiar with the procedures of this Committee but the Employers' members pointed out that he had always been welcomed to come to the Committee in the past as he would be in the future. In any event, depending on the outcome of this discussion and the results achieved in the coming month, the Minister might well be asked formally to come before the Committee each year. The Minister should understand that freedom of association applied to both workers and employers, not just to workers. The Employers' members indicated that it was very unusual for them to ask for a case to come before this Committee and it was only done in the most serious cases in which the interests of employers were at stake. From their point of view, there was something fundamentally wrong in Venezuela regarding the application of the Convention with respect to both employers and workers. Since 1988, there had been 18 cases filed before the Committee on Freedom of Association which was a record. One of those cases was Case No. 1612, a representation presented to the Committee on Freedom of Association by the International Organization of Employers (IOE) and FEDECAMARAS. The Committee's conclusions on this case were approved by the Governing Body at its session in May 1993. The Employers' members recalled that four of the Committee's conclusions concerned the points raised by the Experts in its observation. These matters concerned interference with the rights of workers and employers to form organizations of their own choosing.

In the Employers' members' view, these were fundamental violations of the Convention. However, the Government of Venezuela had undertaken during the Governing Body session of March 1995, that it would engage in tripartite consultation to correct the problems identified in Case No. 1612. The Employers' members pointed out that the Government representative had stated that the Supreme Court of Venezuela had ruled that Conventions prevailed over national legislation. Therefore, the lack of parliamentary support which the Government representative had also given as a reason for not having these problems resolved, was not relevant. Moreover, it was not enough to state that regulations implementing the Organic Labour Act were in the process of being elaborated since this Act had become effective on 1 May 1991.

Finally, the Employers' members, referring to the terms of Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention, insisted that the Government should meet its obligations in law and in practice by amending its legislation in consultation with workers' and employers' organizations.

The Workers' members first of all emphasized that there was no difference between employers and workers with respect to the right to organize under the Convention. The rights of both employers' and workers' organizations to organize under the Convention were important, and the interference by governments in that right to organize could be serious in both cases. If employers' organizations raised issues concerning workers' rights in a country, this was sometimes because they had more knowledge of these rights or, sometimes, because workers' organizations did not exist or, even sometimes, because these organizations were controlled by the government. Referring to the Government representative's argument that the labour law in force was adopted by the majority of people in Parliament and the workers, the Workers' members indicated that this was not the point. The point was to listen to the expert advice of the Committee of Experts as to whether particular laws were in conformity or not with the Conventions concerned. Referring to another point made by the Government representative that most employers in Venezuela did not want to join an organization, the Workers' members indicated that once again this was not the point. The point was that the law should not place undue restrictions which would prevent employers from forming organizations if they wished to do so. The Convention did not lay down a rule that employers must form organizations; what it stipulated was that undue restrictions should not be placed on them if they were indeed formed. The same principle applied as far as workers were concerned.

They suggested that since the executive branch had powers to regulate labour laws, this was perhaps one way for the Government to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention, since there were sometimes difficulties in getting legislation through Parliament. They concluded by stating that it did not matter whether the workers or employers in the country had not opposed a certain law. If a country had ratified the Convention, it had agreed to observe the obligations in that Convention and it was the Committee of Experts which established impartially and independently whether the country was doing so. And what was important for this Committee was to see whether the terms of the Convention were being observed. Quite clearly, they were not being observed at the present moment in Venezuela.

The Employers' member of Panama recalled the representation presented by the International Organization of Employers (IOE) and FEDECAMARAS in July 1991 under article 24 of the ILO Constitution alleging the non-respect by Venezuela of several international labour Conventions ratified by this country, including Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. In the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association (Case No. 1612), the Government of Venezuela was invited to review various provisions of the OLA, in particular sections 398, 404, 405, 406, 408, 409, 418, 419, 425, 446, 448, 473 and 513. The discrepancies between the OLA and the Convention were confirmed in the report of the Committee of Experts as well as the other issues relating to the application of other Conventions mentioned in this report. The OLA was a classic example of excessive, strangling and paternalistic regulation which tended to model organizations of employers and workers according to the image of successive governments. In February 1995, the Government proposed to examine the recommendations made. It had, however, in the meantime committed new violations of ILO standards and had not shown any will to introduce the modifications suggested in its labour legislation, modifications that were vital for the initiative and dynamism of employers.

The Workers' member of Venezuela agreed entirely with the points made by the Workers' members. Trade union organizations of Venezuela had good relations with employers' organizations when collective agreements had to be concluded by branch of activity or at the enterprise level. Most of the disputes concerned the State and its quality as an employer. The Ministry of Labour was certainly trying to keep up the negotiations, which was the best way to find answers to the questions raised by the ILO supervisory bodies. According to his personal experience as a trade union leader, the speaker confirmed that section 404 of the OLA was not applied vis-à-vis organizations such as the federation that he had once chaired, close to the border with Colombia, since trade unionists of Colombian nationality not having resided for ten years in Venezuela had held trade union office. The speaker added that trade unions enjoyed complete independence concerning the drawing up of their internal rules. As had been suggested by the Workers' members, it was through this negotiation that the necessary amendments had to be made to the relevant provisions of the OLA in order to bring this legislation into conformity with international labour Conventions, in cases of infringements.

The Workers' member of Greece pointed out that when a country adopted legislation regulating the right to associate, it was hardly a good sign since this right was guaranteed by the constitution in democratic countries. For a country having ratified the Convention, the social partners had to have the possibility to negotiate on all matters without restrictions. They did this by respecting the legislation in a democratic country. It was therefore not necessary that a country legislated on the matter, since this could lead to a risk of interference by the public authorities in this freedom of association.

The Employer member of Venezuela stated that the Government representative's tone was not in harmony with the customs of the ILO. In a document submitted to the 262nd Session of the Governing Body (GB.262/7/2), the Venezuelan Government provided its response to the Committee on Freedom of Association, officially indicating its willingness to comply with the recommendations of supervisory organs. Regrettably, however, the facts showed that this had not been done. Besides, what the Government representative said about the representation of FEDECAMARAS at the Congress was not true: the said Congress was elected by direct popular vote, without representing specific sectors in any manner. As to the discussion and adoption of the Organic Labour Act in force, FEDECAMARAS had pointed out that this had been done without sufficient and effective consultation required under ILO standards on these matters. The speaker added that the Venezuelan employers had established and maintained the position of agreeing to the call presented with the IOE that the Government should assume its commitments deriving from the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association. He referred also to the basic spirit of the tripartite document ("carta de intención") signed on 5 June of this year, between FEDECAMARAS, the Venezuelan Confederation of Workers (CTV) and the Government, trusting that the Government would not maintain a position denied by the ILO standards. The Venezuelan employers had a deep respect for President Caldera, a personality closely linked to the ILO and national democratic institutions, but they requested that the rights of the social partners be respected in this manner. Thus, it was unacceptable to the Venezuelan employers that the Government not only had not taken the measures called for in the Organic Labour Act, but also, for the first time in the democratic history of the Government-FEDECAMARAS-ILO relationship, granted improperly the right to designate the employer member of Venezuela for the recent tripartite meeting on the chemical industry, which made the situation even worse. In addition, relevant obligations respecting the participation of the employers' delegation to this 82nd Session of the Conference had not been complied with. In exercising the rights of FEDECAMARAS before the ILO, the Venezuelan employers, far from wanting to damage the country's image, as the Government representative had mentioned, were trying to protect it as shown in the statement made by the employer speaker at the 262nd Session of the Governing Body, a copy of which had been sent to the Government and was available to those who were interested. The speaker concluded by emphasizing that FEDECAMARAS did not ask for the indulgence of the Government, as the Government representative had said, but requested the Government to comply with its commitments to the ILO and with tripartism, renewing and ensuring its responsibilities before this international organization.

The Employers' members indicated that there was no reason for the Government representative to be surprised that this case had in fact been brought before the Committee and that the Employers had asked for this discussion. It was the decision of the Committee to discuss the cases under discussion here. However, if the Employers had taken the exceptional initiative as to the list that was drawn up, this should not be construed as a problem since then one would be overlooking the tripartite nature of this organization.

The Government representative expressed his support for the proposal made by the Workers' members, including the Workers' member of Venezuela. It was up to the Venezuelan social partners to assume responsibility for amending the points that had been raised by the ILO supervisory bodies.

The Committee noted the oral information supplied by the Government representative and the discussion that took place thereafter. The Committee noted with concern that the Committee of Experts had to state in its report that no progress had been made by the Government to remove the numerous restrictions and conditions that continued to exist, inhibiting the free formation of organizations of employers and workers and which contravened freedom of association as envisaged in the Convention. It recalled that both the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association, in the course of the examination of the representation made by the International Organization of Employers (IOE) and the Venezuelan Federation of Chambers and Association of Commerce and Production (FE-DECAMARAS), had insisted on the measures that had to be taken by the Government with a view to removing the discrepancies in the legislation that conflicted with the Convention. The Committee strongly urged the Government to scrap the provisions stipulating more than ten years of residence in the country in order for foreign workers to be eligible for trade union office, imposing extensive and detailed lists of attributions and purposes on employers' and workers' organizations and laying down too high a number of self-employed workers to form a trade union and too high a number of employers to form their organizations. In this context, the Committee noted with interest the observation of the Government representative that according to judicial pronouncement, the Convention would prevail in the event of an inconsistency with the national law. It hoped that the Government would immediately do its utmost to bring its laws and practice into conformity with the requirements of the Convention in consultation with employers and workers, and requested it to report in detail to the Committee of Experts on progress made in this regard. The Committee noted the promise of the Government representative to convene a tripartite meeting to seek a resolution of the problems under the Convention and hoped that substantial steps to resolve these problems would be taken in the coming year.

Convention No. 95: Protection of Wages, 1949

Mauritania (ratification: 1961). A Government representative of Mauritania recalled that in the report of the Committee set up to examine the representation made by the National Confederation of Workers of Senegal (CNTS) the Mauritanian Government was requested to take the necessary measures with a view to a final settlement of all the wages due to the persons who were obliged to leave Mauritania following the events of April 1989. He indicated that the Mauritanian Government was keeping open all the judicial channels recognized under national legislation, and that the process of normalizing relations with Senegal had been under way since 1992. He wished to point out, however, that the workers concerned who were not on Mauritanian territory could not lay claim to their wages being paid since they were considered as having abandoned their jobs. He added that there were no obstacles to these persons returning to their country where their security and freedom were guaranteed on the same basis as for other Mauritians. The position of his Government was that since it was not possible to force these workers to come back to their country, an employer could therefore not be expected to pay wages to workers who were absent. In any event, Mauritania was willing to receive technical assistance from the ILO, particularly through its multidisciplinary team based in Dakar.

The Employers' members noted that this case concerned a problem of wage arrears due to Senegalese workers who had been obliged to leave Mauritania. The Committee of Experts had stated that Mauritanian law did provide for the settlement of wages due before the expiration of a contract. They noted the statements made by the Government representative on this matter and on the issue of the resumption of friendly relations between the two countries, but observed that the Government continued to state that these arrears in the payment of wages were not due because the workers in question were not on Mauritanian territory. However, it was undeniable that this concerned arrears in the payment of wages that had already been earned. The Employers' members therefore suggested, as the Government had indicated itself, that the ILO furnish its technical assistance with a view to the final settlement of this issue.

The Workers' members recalled that this case, which was a result of a representation made by the National Confederation of Workers of Senegal under article 24 of the ILO Constitution, had led to a direct contacts mission in 1992 which had also covered the application of other Conventions. It appeared that the issue of arrears in the payment of wages was indeed covered by Mauritanian legislation, but that this legislation was not applied in the present. The Committee of Experts had made it clear that the amounts due should be settled. The Workers' members suggested that the Conference Committee follow this approach and adopt conclusions in which the ILO would be invited to provide its assistance rapidly with a view to the final settlement of the totality of the wages due.

The Workers' member of Niger stated that, in spite of the general declaration of goodwill on the part of the Mauritanian Government, nothing had been concretely undertaken to try to solve this problem. The Government of his country had only stated that the workers in question could not be paid since they were not on Mauritanian territory, a position that was obviously a denial of the principle that all work merited a wage. It would be appropriate to count the workers who should be compensated, and to count the amounts due, eventually, with the technical assistance of the ILO, in order to reach a final settlement of this issue.

The Government member of Mauritania declared that, according to what his Government had understood, the arrears in the payment of wages were due only to workers who were Mauritanian in view of the fact that all Senegalese workers in this situation had returned and had obtained the payment of their wages. The Government was not aware of any complaints which could have been submitted to it by other Senegalese workers in the same situation. The speaker reiterated therefore that, to his knowledge, this case concerned Mauritanian workers who had left the country in 1989 and who had not returned.

The Employers' members pointed out that, according to the observation made by the Committee of Experts, the situation was without ambiguity and the arrears in the payment of wages in question were due to Senegalese workers in conformity moreover with what had been provided for in Mauritanian legislation. It would therefore be desirable that the Mauritanian Government clarified this issue.

The Government member of Senegal stated that he was astonished by the declaration of the Government representative of Mauritania in view of the fact that the Committee of Experts had clearly described the situation. This case concerned Senegalese workers who had been in Mauritania and who had returned there after the regrettable events of 1989, and in whose name the National Confederation of Senegalese Workers had intervened to re-establish their rights. During this series of population movements, Senegalese workers had been expelled and it was because of the closer relationship between the two countries today that it was possible to resolve the problem.

The Workers' member of Senegal recalled that it was his organization, the National Confederation of Senegalese Workers, that had submitted a representation against Mauritania in this case, which concerned Senegalese workers residing in Mauritania who had been expelled from this country in 1989 without having been paid their wages. With the normalization of relations between the two countries, and with the efforts undertaken by the workers at the union level between his organization (the CNTS) in Senegal, the UTM in Mauritania and the UTM in Mali, a settlement of this issue could be hoped for, to which could be added the problem of Mauritanian workers who had taken refuge in Senegal.

The Workers' members appreciated the clarification provided by the Government member of Senegal on this situation. They suggested that the Conference Committee ensure that the issues at stake be in effect unambiguous for the Government representative of Mauritania.

The Government representative of Mauritania reiterated that his Government had understood that the issue concerned Mauritanian workers. Noting that the case concerned Senegalese workers, he could only reaffirm that Mauritania was a State of law and that the judicial channels provided for under legislation were open to them. The Mauritanian enterprises as well as the public authorities of this country, in this instance its administrative and judicial bodies, were entirely at their disposal to examine any claims.

The Committee noted the information furnished by the Government representative with regard to the final settlement of all the wages due to the persons who left Mauritania following the events of April 1989. Having taken into consideration the difficulties and problems expressed by the Government representative in the matter of settlement of wages, as the concerned workers were not currently domiciled in Mauritania, the Committee urged that serious and meaningful efforts be made by the Government of Mauritania to settle the wage entitlement of the aggrieved workers by taking technical assistance from the ILO in the matter of enforcement of the national law, which did provide for the payment of wages due. The Committee further urged that the Government furnish information on the progress made in this matter.

Russian Federation (ratification: 1961). A Government representative stated that, while it was the first time that the Government of the Russian Federation had to report before this Committee, it regarded this reporting as a normal phenomenon.

Payment of wages for labour performed was one of the most important prerequisites for normal labour relations; it must be regular and timely and in accordance with the labour performed. The problem of the late payment of wages in his country illustrated, above all, the fact that the situation regarding labour relations was far from ideal. The main causes of this were the continuing fall in production and in the services sector, the breakdown of the system of mutual payment between enterprises and the destruction of the technological and economic networks in the country. On the other hand, some directors of certain enterprises were taking advantage of this difficult economic situation by avoiding paying wages and thus using this money for the purposes of enriching themselves and their own families and friends.

The Russian authorities were undertaking measures in order to eliminate the problem of unpaid wages. In the report of the Committee of Experts mention was already made of decrees passed by the President of Russia on this subject. In addition to this, the public prosecutor's office had been asked by the President to increase its supervision of the compliance by enterprises and organizations, regardless of the form of ownership, with the labour legislation and to pay particular attention to the problem of wages. On the initiative of the Russian Government and the state Duma – the lower house of Parliament – a Bill has been adopted on the introduction of changes in the Labour Code concerning sanctions for violations of the Labour Code, in particular in case of unpaid or late paid wages. The Ministry of Labour of Russia had elaborated a draft law on the compensation of material loss because of late or irregular payment of wages, which contained provisions concerning the time at which wages must be paid, the mechanism for indexing unpaid or late paid wages and the liability of those managers who were responsible for violating these rules. The state Duma, in third reading, had adopted the law concerning the compensation for material loss for late paid or unpaid wages, pensions or other social benefits which should be paid to the citizens of Russia. On the instructions of the Government, the Ministry of Finance had prepared a draft Presidential Decree on the temporary possibility of using cash resources which were paid into the current account of enterprises. This draft allowed enterprises and organizations to allocate for the payment of wages up to 30 per cent of the resources paid into their current account or their foreign currency account.

The Ministry of Finance of Russia, on 20 March this year, approved a schedule for debt repayment on the Defence Procurement Financing Programme for 1994, with an allocation of cash resources for the payment of wages. Finally, in the draft law on protecting the rights of workers to the regular payment of wages, all the measures mentioned above were provided for. The adoption and the implementation of all these measures should help to a considerable extent to deal with the problem of late paid and unpaid wages.

However, the solution of the problem of unpaid wages or late paid wages could only be found once there was a complete reform of the economic mechanism in the country, the elimination of old debts, the improvement of the effectiveness of production, the acceleration of the turnover of cash resources and the increased responsibility and liability of directors and managers at all levels in solving these problems. One should bear in mind that this country was going through a very difficult period of state reorganization and reform of the economy as a whole, and this process was being accompanied by certain political complications. The Government was seeing the dialogue with the ILO and its supervisory machinery and, particularly the interest being shown in its problems by the Experts, as an effort to help it to bring about constructive solutions, and therefore it welcomed this interest and this dialogue.

The Employers' members thanked the representative of the Government of the Russian Federation for coming to the Committee and discussing the case of Convention No. 95, which was a normal case engaging the Government's constitutional obligation. In the Committee of Experts' report, certain specific issues had been mentioned and a general situation described of late payment or non-payment of wages, and sometimes the considerable period of time during which wages had not been paid at all, or only part of the wages had been paid. For the workers involved, it was a very difficult situation and for that reason it was appropriate to deal with the question here.

Of course, it was easy to imagine the reasons and origins of the problem. The Government in its report indicated, inter alia, that the country was in transition to a market economy, and it was not a typical feature of a market economy that wages were not paid, on the contrary. The Employers recognized, however, that there were many difficulties in transitional phases, and it would only be helpful if the transition to a market-based economy could take place even faster and was implemented in a more effective way. This would help with many of the aspects of this case, as it would also if the law, including fiscal law and all other forms of economic law, were upheld in all parts of the economy. There had to be some kind of stability, some kind of confidence, which was important in any economy.

As far as the wages problem was concerned, the Government was not trying to pretend that things were better than they were, and it had indicated certain measures that had been adopted, a decree passed by the President as well as pieces of legislation, including penal provisions to underpin the decree. Obviously, at the present time, there seemed to be enough legislation, at least a very good legislative basis for tackling these problems. Now it was really a question of the practical implementation of these legal provisions, on which things would depend in the future. The Government should further strengthen its measures along the lines recommended by the Committee of Experts and should enhance the supervision of their implementation, so that there were prosecutions for non-payment of wages, and so that the workers involved were given adequate opportunities to stake their claims and have their claims satisfied as quickly as possible. The Employers' members asked the Government to report on everything that happened in this area in the future, on what the Government was doing, and on the practical impact of these measures, and hoped to see considerable progress in the near future.

The Workers' members emphasized that the non-payment of wages was an important problem in the Russian Federation as well as in other, maybe in all, the countries in the Commonwealth of Independent States. There were many workers who suffered from non-payment or very late payment of their salaries having to support all the consequences of the degradation in the conditions of life for them and their families. Information provided by the trade unions and the observation of the Committee of Experts showed that non-payment or late payment was not only widespread, but contravened both the national legislation and Article 12 of Convention No. 95, which was a priority Convention.

According to the Government representative, these problems were caused by the transition to a market economy. However, the Government also admitted that there were serious problems concerning the effectiveness of the national legislation and of the judicial system. The Government mentioned, as reflected in the report of the Experts, the adoption of additional measures by Presidential Decrees No. 1005 of 23 May 1994 and No. 458 of 10 March 1994, as well as other initiatives yet to be taken. In this connection the Workers' group supported the Committee of Experts' request that the Government continue to inform the Committee on the measures taken to implement these new legal instruments.

In the context of the Russian Federation, and elsewhere, this problem was spreading partially due to the economic situation but also, and this was perhaps even more preoccupying, because of the weakness of the legal framework in establishing the state of law. Too many groups and persons were benefiting from those weaknesses to abuse workers who already lived in very difficult conditions. It was therefore absolutely necessary to reinforce the implementation of rights through the system of supervision and penalties. This was the reason why it was necessary to insist in the conclusions that the Government took effective measures to have a real impact on ensuring respect of the Convention. The Experts had underlined the three crucial elements to guarantee the application of the legislation: supervision, appropriate penalties to prevent and punish infringements and steps to make good the prejudice suffered. The Workers' members insisted, in full agreement with the Employers' members, that the Government provide to the Committee of Experts all the information on the practical application of the Convention, including extracts of the reports on investigations made, infringements observed and penalties imposed.

The Workers' member of the Russian Federation welcomed the effort being made by his Government to turn for assistance to the International Labour Organization and to continue this dialogue. However, in the Russian Federation, violations of the right to receive wages for labour, one of the most fundamental human rights, had become a chronic and widespread problem. There were many facts which had been confirmed in communications from trade unions throughout the country and in those sent in to the International Labour Organization, to the effect that many provisions of Convention No. 95 were not fully implemented in practice, that the Government did not provide for the observance of these provisions, and that the President and Parliament were slowing down the adoption of additional and supplementary legislation which would help to implement international standards.

The main thing was the violation of Article 12 of the Convention on the regular payment of wages. These violations happened in all branches and on the territory of all the republics of the Russian Federation. Wages for millions of workers were held up for several months in conditions of permanent inflation and were becoming worthless. In the Primorski Krai, for example, unpaid wages had doubled over the last year and were now about US$15 million. Throughout Russia, according to official statistics, unpaid wages at 1 June 1995, in round figures, amounted to US$1.2 billion, and had increased by 10 per cent in the month of May alone.

The real wages paid to workers were not in accordance with the concept laid down in Article 1 of the Convention. Not only the minimum wage, but very often the average wage in a particular branch was not even up to subsistence level. There were many cases when the payroll documentation was not kept properly, contrary to Articles 1 and 15 of the Convention.

Articles 3 and 4 of the Convention were also violated since wages were paid not only in cash, but also in prohibited forms, such as promissory notes, coupons and also in kind, which was undesirable and inappropriate for the individual consumer. The workers did not always get treated as the privileged creditor with regard to the payment of wages, which was required in Article 11 of the Convention. Despite Article 15 of the Convention, the Russian legal system did not contain the necessary sanctions concerning legal liability for violation of labour rights of workers, including for late payment of wages. A fine imposed would only be roughly 22,000 roubles which amounted to about US$4 now. Workers and trade unions had to wait a very long time in order to have their claims for unpaid wages met because the courts were overloaded. Even when a judgement was handed down by a court, often it was not implemented.

Much of the legislation remained in the form of pious projects. Much-needed legislation had been held up for more than a year by Parliament. To put it on the agenda, trade unions had had to organize national demonstrations of protest in October 1994 and in April 1995, but in May of this year the President of the Russian Federation had nevertheless still rejected one of these draft laws approved by the Federal Chamber which would provide for strengthening responsibility and liability for the violation of trade union rights. The proposals which were now being put forward by the President could only give rise to surprise. He suggested reducing the number of people who were responsible for supervising labour legislation, as well as to introduce sanctions against trade unions for their "participation" in collective bargaining. The authors of these proposals from the President's administration who were putting these measures in one package with measures which would strengthen responsibility for the timely payment of wages, or non-payment of wages, understood that this would give rise to extreme protests in the trade unions and give them an excuse to postpone once again the adoption of this legislation. This all proved the seriousness of the question which had been brought before the Conference. The Russian trade unions hoped that the measures taken by the Government following this decision would be re-examined at the next meeting of the Committee.

The Workers' member of Belarus expressed his full support and solidarity with the position of the Workers' group on this particular case and with the justified demands of the independent trade unions of the Russian Federation. When people did not get any remuneration for their labour for months, it concerned not just violations of Convention No. 95, but it was a systematic violation of the Constitution of the Russian Federation which enshrined fundamental human rights such as remuneration for labour. He recalled that the former Soviet Union had ratified this Convention more than 30 years ago, and that it had never been called before this Committee to give this kind of explanation.

The Government of the Russian Federation was explaining this problem by referring to difficulties in the economy and of the transition period. However, people whose social rights were being violated would not be likely to help the Government move on its path to a market economy. The violations of this Convention were having a negative impact not just on the workers of the Russian Federation but also on the workers of other countries belonging to the CIS, such as Belarus. Belarus was also experiencing late payments of wages, but of course not on the same scale as was happening in the Russian Federation. The economies of Belarus and Russia were very closely integrated, and if there was a systematic non-payment of wages to workers and trade unionists in Russia and they had to fight for their rights by work stoppages and strikes, this had an automatic impact on the economic and social position of the workers in Belarus. He considered that the information provided by the Government of the Russian Federation was not satisfactory and hoped that the Committee's conclusions would reflect this and would provide a possibility to come back to an examination of this case next year.

The Workers' member of Ukraine stated that the observance of this Convention on the protection of wages was extremely important because it concerned a fundamental human right for the majority of the population who were only living from one wage packet to the next, some of them well below the subsistence level. Non-payment or late payment of wages created a terribly difficult situation for the workers and the non-working members of their families. Therefore, he supported the demands of the trade unions of the Russian Federation that the Government should take on its full responsibility with regard to observing this Convention. A similar situation had also arisen in Ukraine, but under the pressure of the trade unions the Ukrainian Parliament had recently adopted a law providing for compensation in cases of non-payment of wages. In conclusion, he hoped that the measures which were mentioned by the Government representative to implement and observe this Convention would become effective and would provide a good example for other countries in the CIS to adopt similar legislation.

The Employers' member of the Russian Federation stated that the question of irregular and late payment of wages was a widespread phenomenon. The Government said that the managers of a number of enterprises were deliberately withholding wages, which was true. But it was quite obvious that they were tempted to do this because of the weak legislation which left them unpunished. The Association of Employers of the Russian Federation was in favour of increasing the liability and the responsibility of the managers of enterprises because it was in favour of the conscientious running of enterprises, but it was equally convinced that the radical reasons for late payment of wages could be found elsewhere in the crisis situation which pertained in the economy.

Of course, the reference to the transition period which had been mentioned on many occasions was obvious, but it was not necessary to have all these phenomena in the period of transition. There was a paradoxical situation in Russia: production had dropped by half over the last five years, productivity of labour had also considerably decreased but real monetary incomes were being maintained and in a number of cases were actually increasing in relative figures. This was because wages in Russia had become some kind of a social subsidy rather than real remuneration for labour and they were no longer operating as an incentive to work. To cope with this situation and to stabilize production, the Association of Employers of Russia considered that it was necessary to strengthen the role of the State in the transition period, in the legislative sphere as well as in the executive sphere, including strengthening responsibility for sustaining economic and legal environments which provided for decent labour relations. The State and the Government were also the biggest employers and the biggest buyers of a wide range of products and goods and they also were the largest debtors because they did not pay for the goods, energy, transport and other kinds of products and they did not pay wages.

In conclusion, he said that the problem of observing and implementing this Convention was one of the key problems and its examination by the International Labour Organization would hopefully stimulate the work of the Russian structures and, above all of course, the Government in putting an end to this crisis situation throughout the economy of the country.

The Workers' member of Côte d'Ivoire supported comrades of the trade unions of the Russian Federation. The family budgets of workers based on very low salaries did not permit workers to economize enough to face even the period of one month without wages. Thus, if one month of arrears in the payment of wages could be explained by the lack of conscience on the part of the employer, it was only by their criminal attitude that arrears for three, four and even ten months in the payment of wages could be explained. The dramatic situation in which numerous workers' families had to live was even more shocking in view of the fact that their enterprises often continued to function normally and to produce profits. The speaker drew attention to the fact that such practices were sources of grave tensions in the world of work, including his own country. In addition, he considered that when an enterprise was forced to have recourse, even for as short a time as possible, to the non-payment of wages, these arrears should bear interest as any other financial debt, as a right and from the very first day when the payment was due.

The Government representative of the Russian Federation thanked all the speakers for their comments and criticisms which would be taken into account in the future. With respect to the reference made by one speaker to the example of the former USSR which had never had to report to this Committee on this particular Convention on payment of wages, he reminded him that the USSR, on the contrary, had usually had to report on the Conventions concerning freedom of association, forced labour and discrimination.

The problems of late payment or non-payment of wages existed not just in his country but in a number of countries which were experiencing the same period of transition. Problems of non-payment had become a phenomenon which was characteristic of a country moving from one way of organizing its economy to another, and certainly all the comments which had been made in this room were right in that the country needed stability and an effective legal system. The Government was providing for legal reforms but the courts, for example, were still unfortunately too weak. There were also problems linked with retraining of legal experts in areas of human rights and economic matters.

Everything that was going on as far as the non-payment of wages was concerned constituted not only a violation of the Convention but was also a violation of the national legislation, and the measures taken were aimed at combating these violations, introducing increased liability and even including new articles in the Penal Code.

However, whilst the law might help, economic problems could only be solved by economic means. And, in fact, there was another way which existed in many countries of the world, and that was bankruptcy. Enterprises who were not in a position to pay their workers, and who were in a serious economic situation, stopped production. But in Russia that might mean even worse problems caused by increased unemployment. The Government was taking measures in order to introduce a more stringent economic policy and to put the economy back on its feet and to combat inflation. Had it adopted a purely legalistic approach, it would end up with lots of bankrupt enterprises, and then come up against much greater problems and more difficulties. The Government was fully aware of the need to fulfil its international obligations. It would take into account the comments which had been made here. It intended to continue this dialogue taking it as proof of a constructive approach helping the Government to overcome the very unusual, not to say unique, situation which the country was passing through at present.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative with regard to various measures taken to ensure the regular payment of wages and to reinforce payment obligations. While the Committee recognized that there did exist a sound legislative framework in the Russian Federation for tackling the problem, non-payment and delayed payment of wages for work done were matters of serious concern, particularly considering that what was contravened was not merely national legislation, but Convention No. 95, which was a priority Convention. The Committee also felt that conformity to this Convention would in fact strengthen the role of the State in speeding up economic transition.

In the circumstances, the Committee called for enhanced supervision for securing unflinching and prompt payment of wages. The Committee also urged the Government to furnish full information on legal implementation and on the practical steps taken against infringement of the law.

Convention No. 98: Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining, 1949

Croatia (ratification: 1991). The Government supplied the following information:

Section 95 of the Labour Relations Act of 1992 provides that where two or more trade unions have been formed, the right to represent workers in collective negotiations is laid down by a joint agreement of all the trade unions concerned, and that if no such agreement is reached, representation shall be settled by discussion between the workers of the union which refuses to negotiate and the other unions concerned. Since there are no provisions providing for a mandatory procedure in this respect, Section 95 grants full freedom to trade unions to initiate discussions independently and for trade union members with whom no agreement has been reached to give statements. In their statutes, trade unions shall independently determine means of reaching mutual agreement and of taking statements from their members in the event that no agreement has been reached. If the competent authority were to impose an obligation on trade unions to carry out these proceedings in a manner prescribed by law, this would constitute direct interference by the Government with the relations between trade unions and with their internal structure, as well as limit the freedom to bargain collectively. It is in the interests of trade unions to reach a mutual agreement through collective bargaining as provided for under this Act.

The new draft Labour Act is under consideration for enactment by Parliament. This law will cover collective labour relations comprehensively, ensure the representative role of trade unions in collective bargaining, and will be entirely in accordance with the principles contained in this Convention.

Article 1 of the Convention (Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination). Under Section 87 of the Labour Relations Act, 1992, workers are free to become members of trade unions in order to realize, promote and protect their rights and interests. Workers must not be in a less favourable position because they are members of a trade union or participate in the activities of a trade union. This general provision relates to the prohibition of discrimination and to the protection of all workers, regardless of whether they are or are not members of a trade union, in relation to all work-related rights, such as protection from transfers or dismissal. In view of this general protective provision, such protection need not be particularly emphasized in all cases. The Government referred to its report on the application of the Workers' Representatives Convention (No. 135), 1971, which stated that in addition to the above general provision, additional protection is given to trade union officers. Penal provisions in existing legislation as well as the Labour Relations Act, 1992, that prescribe the amount of fines have been periodically amended because of inflation and the change in the official currency. The Government considered the suggestion of the Committee of Experts to be appropriate, and would take it into consideration when drafting the new legislation.

Article 2 of the Convention (Protection against acts of interference). Under the draft Labour Act, Chapter XIX on trade unions and employers' associations proclaims the right to freedom of association of both workers and employers, and section 176 prohibits supervision by employers and their associations of the establishment and activities of trade unions and of their higher level associations. In the above manner, the future Labour Act will comply with Article 2 of the Convention. Under section 227, item 68 of the draft Labour Act, an employer who attempts to supervise or actually supervises a trade union or a confederation of trade unions shall be punished with a fine of from 5,000 to 20,000 kunas. Trade unions or their confederations are prohibited from attempting to supervise or actually supervising the activities of employers and their associations, but there is no penalty equivalent to that which is assessed against employers and their associations for the corresponding activity.

Article 4 of the Convention (Promotion of collective bargaining). The statement of the Committee with regard to the application of Article 4 of this Convention was not accurate, either because of an incorrect interpretation or an incorrect translation of the Government's report. The Croatian Chamber of Commerce Act, which provides that the Chamber of Commerce has the power to negotiate collectively on behalf of employers, is in force. As the Labour Act has not yet been enacted, present legislation does not regulate the establishment of employers' associations. However, the prerequisites for the creation of an employers' association based on the principle of freedom of association exist by direct implementation of this Convention and in particular of the Constitution. On this basis employers are free to become members of the Croatian Association of Employers, which has entirely replaced the Chamber of Commerce in the area of collective bargaining. The new Basic National Collective Agreement for the Business Sector and Public Enterprises (the Agreement), which follows both in word and spirit this Convention as well as the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention (No. 87), 1948, was entered into by trade union associations and the Croatian Association of Employers, and in practical terms excludes the Croatian Chamber of Commerce from collective bargaining. Articles 3 and 4 of the above Agreement provide for freedom of association and activities of both workers and employers as well as the right to become a member on a voluntary basis of any of the organizations that are party to the Agreement. Under article 4 of the Agreement, favourable treatment of a trade union by an employer or pressure by an employer on employees that aims to influence them to become members of a particular trade union or cease to be members of a trade union shall constitute a violation of a right to organize. The Agreement also prohibits interference by any party to the Agreement with the organization and activities of any other party. In this way, the application of Article 2 of this Convention has also been provided for under the above Agreement.

Section 96 of the Labour Relations Act, 1992, provides a procedure for registration of collective agreements which is solely for the purpose of maintaining records of these agreements and examining whether they are in basic accordance with national laws and ILO Conventions. No other examination is to be carried out and no interventions are to be made with respect to the content or scope of the right to bargain collectively. In practice, if a collective agreement is not registered it does not necessarily mean that it cannot be implemented.

With regard to the Government's statement in its report on this Convention to the effect that collective agreements are implemented which have not been registered in accordance with the Labour Relations Act, 1992, the competent Government authorities do not intervene and do not request registration of the agreements if collective agreements reflect the will of the parties that have signed the agreements, and the parties to the agreements are duly fulfilling their obligations under the agreements. This approach is entirely in accordance with the principles of freedom of collective bargaining. Collective agreements that are not registered include the Collective Agreement for Seamen and the Collective Agreement for Health Care. As the Government does not insist on registration of collective agreements, it is unable to determine the precise number of such agreements.

In addition, a Government representative first pointed out that the Republic of Croatia accepted obligations under 54 Conventions of the ILO to which the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had been a party, including Conventions on basic human rights, such as Nos. 87 and 98. In spite of the situation of Croatia, under aggression the war imposed on it, and a part of its territory temporarily occupied, the Government had never brought into question the constitutional guarantee of freedom of association either of workers or of employers, the right to bargain collectively or the right of trade unions and their confederations to use all the legal means to achieve their aims, including strikes.

She noted that the manner in which freedom of association and the right to bargain collectively was regulated in the former Yugoslavia legislation, which Croatia had temporarily adopted with some amendments, was not yet completely in accordance with the standards of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. Therefore, the Government had introduced, through a social dialogue, a radical change in the entire labour and welfare legislation of Croatia, the most eminent of which was the Labour Act. The Government was convinced that social peace was the most important prerequisite for the stability of the State, which comprised 1,240,000 employed workers, 240,000 unemployed, 840,000 retired and about 600,000 displaced persons and refugees.

Regarding the work on passing the new draft Labour Act mentioned in the written information, as a consensus of the social partners on the content of the provisions of this law had been reached, Parliament passed the new Labour Act on 17 May 1995. The legislation referred to in the observation of the Committee of Experts was therefore outdated. The new law was based on the fundamental assumption of freedom of association and collective bargaining, while it left plenty of space for the parties to a collective agreement to determine all the rights and obligations among themselves. Because of the protection of the employees regarding collective bargaining, the law contained only the provisions which determine the guaranteed level of rights below which the parties to collective bargaining could not go. The comments of the Committee of Experts on the application of the Conventions served as helpful guidelines in the making of this law.

As to the first point of the observation of the Committee of Experts relating to the procedure to establish the representation of the unions where there were two or more unions in the field in which the collective agreement had to be signed, she repeated the Government's view that representation in such a case had to be decided by the unions themselves, and that the interference of the State in this sphere would limit the freedom of collective bargaining. The Government had suggested that the trade unions define the provision themselves and the text proposed by all the union headquarters became the provision of Section 186 of the new Labour Act. Trade unions had independently determined the procedure to establish their representation so that, in the case of the representation of several trade unions or union confederations in the field in which a collective agreement had to be signed, an employer, several employers, an association of employers, or a confederation of employers could negotiate the collective agreement only with a negotiating committee made up of the representatives of those trade unions. The number of members and the composition of the negotiating committee would be decided by the trade unions, but it could not have less than five or more than 11 members. If trade unions could not agree upon the number of members of the negotiating committee, this would be decided by the President of the Economic and Social Council (a national tripartite council) taking account of the number of trade unions in the given field. If the trade unions could not reach agreement on the composition of the negotiating committee, the number of the representatives of each trade union in the committee would be determined proportionally to the number of votes which each of them received in a secret voting of all the members of the trade unions active in the field in which the collective agreement had to be negotiated. The rules and the procedure of election of the negotiating committee would be determined by the trade unions in agreement but, if they did not reach agreement by the date of passing the decision to carry out the elections, these rules would be determined by the Economic and Social Council.

Only trade unions registered for at least six months before passing the decision to carry out the elections had the right to propose candidates for the members of the negotiating committee. Trade unions might agree that, instead of electing the candidates for the negotiating committee in the manner mentioned above, the composition of this committee might be decided by arbitration. The negotiating committee had a mandate to work for the period of time for which the collective agreement had been reached, but not for longer than three years, and it had the authority to determine independently the manner of its work and decision-making. The Government representative emphasized that the above procedure had been defined by trade unions themselves.

As to the second point of the observation of the Committee of Experts concerning the Decree on Wages, the Government representative repeated the explanation on the aim and the reasons for passing this Decree: it was based on the Constitution of the Republic; the social and economic circumstances and the surroundings were characterized by such factors as the situation of neither war nor peace, war damage of tens of billions of dollars, stagnation of production, a constant increase in the number of refugees and displaced persons (10 per cent of the whole population), unemployment and very high inflation. The Government established monetary reforms and carried out programmes of stabilization and economic recovery by cutting inflation to accomplish a real increase in salaries. Another factor was that the collective agreements prescribed by the earlier legislation to be valid for all the employees concerning certain rights, had ceased to be valid. Due to some unrealistic demands and expectations, new collective agreements could not be reached and left a certain void on such matters as salaries.

She stressed that the Decree on Wages had a limited application both in time and in scope. The Decree, which had ceased to be in force on 31 October 1994, contained a provision to become invalid when and if collective agreements were reached. In addition, the Decree referred only to the wages of the employees financed from the state budget. She emphasized the effect that the Decree had in the stabilization of inflation, which justified the decision of the Government. She noted also that the Government had, at the same time, implemented a special social programme to support those with lower incomes. In addition, the Constitutional Court ruled that the Government did not violate the provisions of the right to organize and bargain collectively, or Convention No. 98.

With all the above reasons, she thought that there was no violation of Convention No. 98 and assured that the Government would submit a new report on the Convention by 1 September this year, as well as the text of the new Labour Act.

The Employers' members noted that the Government of Croatia seemed to be there for the first time to explain the application of a Convention which was complex and of a rather promotional character. The legislation regulating collective bargaining used to be very detailed and somewhat confusing, in particular regarding the cases where several trade unions represented the workers in a given sector. This legislation had been abolished but the new provisions also appeared slightly too complicated. This certainly did not suffice for putting an end to a violation of the Convention, which the Committee of Experts explicitly noted. The Government should communicate a report containing information on the application in practice of the new system, together with the new texts.

As to the other point of the observation, concerning a Decree on Wages, the Employers' members noted the Government's explanation that it applied in fact only to the wages financed by the state budget. In view of the probable importance of the public sector in Croatia, it could still cover a large number of workers and seemed to be a form of interference in collective bargaining. The provisions of Article 4 of the Convention were however quite flexible. As to the circumstances and conditions which would authorize, according to the Committee of Experts, a provisional derogation from wage fixation by free collective bargaining, this seemed to be a case of such circumstances. The Government had provided a satisfactory response to the question of the Committee of Experts as to the period of validity of the above Decree, which had ceased to be in force last October. The Government should communicate a report together with the pertinent texts so that the evolution of the situation could be followed.

The Workers' members thought that this case showed the difficulties of the rapid transformation of the economic systems which used to be centralized. Such difficulties were not only a question of practice but could also partially relate to a certain passive mentality.

The first problem concerned the manner in which collective bargaining was, perhaps in too much detail, regulated, which was not to be criticized in itself, although the balance between the establishment of the rules of the game and interference was sometimes delicate. The Committee of Experts should therefore keep a close eye on legislation on the matter.

The Committee of Experts had many times examined the circumstances which would justify a government unilaterally imposing a wage rate without collective bargaining, and usefully clarified them again in this observation. The Workers' members were pleased to note that the Decree on Wages was no longer in force but considered it useful to receive information on the practice that the Government envisaged adopting in future. The Committee of Experts should be attentive to the case until it was fully assured of conformity with the Convention in law and practice.

The Workers' member of Croatia welcomed the abrogation of the 1992 Act, which had contained atrocious provisions and allowed manipulations. The new provisions had been adopted following an agreement with trade union organizations and the explanation given by the Government representative was exact. The trade unions chose to have a unique representation in collective bargaining in order to avoid splitting the organization into pieces while permitting participation of small unions at the same time. The ILO should monitor the practical application of these provisions.

The problem of the Decree on Wages was more complex. It had been promulgated while collective agreements were still in force, and they had not been cancelled in the predicted period. Recourse to the judiciary could not correct the situation because of the slow and inefficient court procedure. This situation of blockage had brought about several strikes in 1994. Parliament had adopted in October 1994 an Act obliging the Government to negotiate wages in the public service but the Government had violated these provisions and the wages of public servants had stagnated, if not decreased. The speaker hoped that, on the basis of the new Labour Act, labour relations would develop in a more positive direction.

The Government representative explained, as regards the Decree on Wages, that even though the collective agreements were in force, the basic wage had never been fixed in them and the Government therefore had to take this measure. She emphasized again that Section 186 of the new Labour Act had been prepared by trade unions and hoped that it was in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention.

The Committee took note of the observations of the Committee of Experts, the statements of the Government representative and the discussion that followed. The Committee noted that the old legal provisions stipulating the modalities of collective negotiations were no longer in existence, and that the new Labour Act had been introduced so as to be consistent with Convention No. 98. The Committee further noted that the Decree on Wages imposing a wage rate was limited in scope and time and that this Decree was no longer current either. The Committee called upon the Government to furnish to the ILO the text of the new Labour Act so that its consistency with this Convention could be examined. The Committee also asked the Government to furnish a report on the practical aspects so that further developments could be observed. The Committee further recalled the observation of the Committee of Experts that a prohibition on fixation of wage rates through collective bargaining would be warranted only as an exceptional measure, limited in scope and time and supported by guarantees of effective protection of living standards of workers, and hoped that the old Decree in question would not influence the Government's attitude and policies any longer.

Indonesia (ratification: 1957). A Government representative, referring to Case No. 1756 before the Committee on Freedom of Association, stated that the Government had sent its responses to the ILO dated 23 March, 10 May and 23 May 1994, and continued to pay the greatest attention to the protection and welfare of the workers. Under Act No. 3 of 1992, the social security programme for workers and its implementation had been expanded, while Act No. 11 of 1992 required employers to include their workers in their company's pension fund scheme. Each company was also under the obligation to set up a committee for occupational safety and health. Regional wage committees had long been established in each province whose members were derived from tripartite elements. The role of these committees was to conduct surveys on the minimum physical needs (MPN) and to make recommendations on the setting of the regional and sectoral minimum wage. Based on those recommendations, the regional minimum wage was raised from time to time. Thus, the average minimum wage has increased from 48.5 per cent of the MPN in 1990 to 63.6 per cent of the MPN by the end of 1993 and reached around 100 per cent of the MPN on 1 April 1995.

The existing labour laws and regulations provided adequate protection to the workers' rights to organize and to bargain collectively. Workers' and employers' organizations in various institutions have developed steadily. Their participation and role at national, regional and company levels were continually increasing, such as in the bipartite institutions, national and regional tripartite bodies, national and regional committees for labour dispute settlements, national and regional committees on occupational safety and health, national and regional productivity councils, national and regional wage councils, national and regional training councils. At the same time, the workers' unions had been actively exercising their rights through the formulation of collective labour agreements in each respective company.

In the framework of facilitating the growth of trade unions, the Minister of Manpower issued Regulation No. 1 on 17 January 1994. Based on that regulation, workers may establish an independent, democratic and genuine union in each respective company free from any obligation to be affiliated to other trade unions such as SPSI. During the last 18 months, about 800 independent and democratic trade unions had been established at company level. Each newly established trade union was required merely to submit information on its organizational status and the members of its executive to the Ministry of Manpower. At the same time, soon after the union was established, it was able to perform its functions and to negotiate with employers for the drafting of a collective agreement. In other words, those trade unions were not subject to any restrictions with regard to the number of their branches or their membership in order to be qualified to conduct negotiations and collective bargaining. The Government, the employers' organizations and the workers' organizations in Indonesia had been successful in establishing close cooperation through their own programmes and activities to promote, develop and draw the community's attention to the industrial relations system, with a view to creating industrial peace and to promoting the development of the company. A wide opportunity was given to workers at the plant level to establish trade unions enabling them to negotiate collective labour agreements. In the absence of a trade union or collective agreement, each company was required to have company regulations, approved by the Ministry of Manpower. With the steady increase in the number of unions and of collective negotiations, more company regulations would be replaced by the collective labour agreements.

Finally, the Government of Indonesia, in cooperation with the ILO, had formulated a five-year work-plan in the field of employment training and of industrial relations as well as of workers' education. The tripartite elements would be involved in each activity. The Government looked forward to the ILO's contribution to the realization of this plan in the very near future. Through this combined effort, it hoped to speed up the establishment of more independent, democratic and genuine trade unions in Indonesia.

The Workers' members regretted that the Government representative of Indonesia had not provided the sort of information which the Committee of Experts required in their report. They recalled that the Committee of Experts had been raising observations concerning the application of this Convention since 1979, and the case had been discussed in the Conference Committee in 1986, 1991, 1993, 1994 and again in 1995. In addition, a direct contacts mission was undertaken in November 1993 with a view to advising on measures to be taken to improve the application of Convention No. 98, and at that time the Committee of Experts indicated that the Office was ready and willing to provide technical assistance with respect to matters raised concerning this particular Convention.

Coming to measure the Government's response to the points raised in the Committee of Experts' latest report, the Government representative merely repeated what was contained in last year's report. But since then, there had been the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association which were approved by the Governing Body in November 1994, and the issues raised by the Committee of Experts. First of all, concerning the protection against acts of anti-trade union discrimination, it was quite clear that according to the Committee of Experts, the measures taken by the Government to settle cases of workers' dismissals did not guarantee adequate protection to workers where anti-trade union discrimination was involved. The employer was allowed under the law to invoke "lack of harmony in working relationships", and this vague concept had been used to justify the sacking of workers who were merely exercising their right to organize. The Experts recalled that one of the recommendations of the direct contacts mission was to guarantee by fact and by law protection against anti-trade union discrimination by employers. The Government promised last year to amend that legislation and to invoke the assistance of the ILO. However, the Workers' members did not get any impression whatsoever that in fact the promise that was made last year to commence amending the legislation with the help of the ILO had commenced. They wanted a clear indication from the Government that the present legislation was going to be amended and they had not had such an indication.

In the second part of the Committee of Experts' observation concerning protection against acts of interference by employers, a number of points were raised for which there was no reply from the Government representative.

The third point raised concerned a whole series of restrictions placed by the Government on unions regarding the membership requirements that they must reach before they were allowed the right to bargain. All these restrictions were in contravention of Convention No. 98 and should be removed. But again there was no indication from the Government except the reference to the Minister of Manpower Regulation No. 1 of 1994 about which this Committee already had full details last year, and it was not convinced that it dealt with the situation as revealed by the Committee of Experts.

In addition, there was only one recognized trade union in Indonesia, and while there was nothing wrong with that if that was what the workers wanted, one must not, however, legislate on that point or insist by creating such complicated regulations so that it became impossible for any union to be formed because of the restrictions and the interference of the military. For many years, the Workers' members had a distinct impression that the role of free trade unions in this country was severely restricted. There had been trials of trade unionists, charged with incitement to disobey government orders following labour demonstrations, and there was a widespread belief, supported by Amnesty International, that these trials fell far short of widely accepted international standards of fairness.

The Workers' members were encouraged to learn from the Government's statements that there had been various measures introduced, that the minimum wage was raised, that social security was being improved and that a five-year programme of training and education was being implemented. However, what was missing from that statement was some positive evidence or even some promises which would be kept that there would be changes in the legislation recommended by the Committee of Experts, and, more importantly, that there would be a change in practice because the Workers' members were seriously disturbed by what was taking place in this country at the present moment.

The Employers' members, in recalling that this case had been before the Committee on several occasions in the past, noted that the Government representative reported on general developments in her country, on changes as far as social policy was concerned, but gave very little indication on those points which were raised by the Committee of Experts in their report: the absence of provisions to protect workers against acts of anti-union discrimination; the absence of sufficiently detailed legislative provisions to protect workers' organizations against interference by employers; and restrictions on free collective bargaining.

The Employers' members were concerned in the first instance that workers could be dismissed because of a lack of harmony in the working relationship. Indeed, this was a very broad and general statement, and in practice it was resorted to in cases of union membership of the worker. The Government had for some time been drawing attention to a Ministerial Decree, dating back to 1992, which explained that trade union membership was not a ground for dismissal. Last year the Government representative accepted a suggestion made by the Experts that this should be strengthened and clarified in law, so that it should be expressly stated in a piece of legislation that union membership must not be a ground for dismissal. This involved turning into a statutory provision something which was already covered in a Decree, and then seeing that this was actually also implemented in practice. The question remained open in this connection as to whether the International Labour Office's technical assistance might be required all the more so, as from what the Government stated last year, its aim coincided with what the Committee of Experts was asking it to do.

As regards the possibility and the extent to which employers could interfere in trade union activities, the Government again stated that there was a Ministerial Decree which made this interference impossible, but the Experts were asking for information on the extent to which this ministerial decision was actually applied in practice and for the strengthening of the legislation in this regard. So it was not a situation where there was no protection whatsoever but rather there was a request for clarification and strengthening of rules and regulations, and a request to ensure that what existed on paper was actually applied in practice. However, on this point, no further information had been given by the Government representative.

The third point of concern for the Committee of Experts was the various requirements for a trade union to be able to engage in collective bargaining or to be registered. Convention No. 98 did not contain any detailed provisions in this regard but a number of standards could be derived from it, since the aim of the Convention was to promote free collective bargaining wherever possible. It was known exactly how many workers and what sort of percentage of membership was required in Indonesia in order for a trade union to be allowed to engage in collective bargaining. The comparison of these figures with those contained in the report of the Committee of Experts for 1991 revealed a considerable change in the right direction. For example, in 1991, the requirement was that a union had to be represented in 20 provinces and 100 districts, and now it was only five and 25 respectively. As for company units, the requirement in 1991 was 1,000 and that had now dropped to 100. The Employers' members requested the Government to submit the specific figures in a written report and to indicate whether it was planning any further change in this connection.

The members of this Committee had always agreed in the sense that a single trade union was always a breach of the Convention, if it was prescribed by law, and an indicator of that would be, for example, if one specific trade union was referred to in the law. However, there was no comment on this particular subject in the report of the Committee of Experts, and according to the Government representative, there was a large number of newly established trade unions which could readily be registered without undue complications and could proceed to engage in collective bargaining virtually immediately.

All in all, there was clearly still need for change in the situation, for greater clarity and strengthening of legislation and for better controls as to actual practical application. Therefore, the Employers' members requested the Government representative of Indonesia to deal with these specific points in a written report and to provide replies to these questions and, above all, to indicate whether the Government was planning any further change and improvement in the near future along the lines of what this Committee had asked it to do, because the Employers believed it to be necessary.

The Workers' member of Indonesia provided information about developments in the All-Indonesia Workers' Union (SPSI). In early October 1994, SPSI conducted its Second Convention which adopted the new structure of SPSI from one that was unitarian to a federation consisting of 13 industrial unions. Two of them were already affiliated to international trade secretariats: the All-Indonesia Seafarers' Union, affiliated to the International Transport Workers' Federation, and the All-Indonesia Timber and Forestry Workers' Union, affiliated to the International Federation of Building and Woodworkers' Union. The other 11 industrial unions had already contacted respective international trade secretariats and would invite them to their own national Congresses, which would be held between July and October of 1995 before the Congress of SPSI.

On the other hand, workers who were not interested in affiliating to SPSI also had, on the basis of Ministerial Decree No. 1/1994, the right to organize and bargain collectively through established independent, democratic and genuine trade unions in their respective companies.

In the case of SBSI, the All-Indonesian Prosperity Workers' Union, the speaker recalled the statement made by the group leader of the ICFTU mission to Indonesia, that SBSI was not a real trade union movement, but only a group of people who were very sympathetic to the struggle of the workers.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands supported the statement made by the Workers' spokesman and particularly insisted that the law should not recognize any one trade union by name. With the changes recently made by the Indonesian Government on the right to organize, the new law made it possible to establish the enterprise-level unions which were not affiliated to the SPSI, but if they wanted to form federations, it was in that law that they should affiliate to the SPSI, which was mentioned by name in contradiction to the classical principle which had been established by the Committee of Experts, by this Committee, by the Committee on Freedom of Association, and supported also by the Employers' members.

The speaker regretted that the Committee of Experts left a couple of points out in the report as compared to the report of last year. He considered that there was no reason to leave out the question of the military because interference of the Government and of the military in labour conflicts and in trade union affairs was a basic illness of the Indonesian trade union movement. As long as that key problem existed, the Committee of Experts should pay attention to it.

Another point which was left out was compulsory arbitration. One of the bad things about the arbitration system in Indonesia was that, when trade union leaders or activists dismissed for their defence of workers' interests won their case in arbitration courts, they were never reinstated in their jobs and the most they obtained in Indonesia was compensation and for the rest they were usually put on a blacklist without the possibility of finding another job. That was the real situation, and therefore it was very important that the point of the Indonesian arbitration system was kept under surveillance by the Committee of Experts. The speaker strongly urged the Experts not to drop these two points, unless they had good reasons to do so, which were not present in the report this year.

The Experts' report made it clear that there were definite and long-standing weaknesses in Indonesian labour law. There were also definite efforts of the Indonesian Government to improve the minimum wage, for example, and that should be noted by this Committee. On the other hand, it should remain aware of the possibility that much of the changes advertised by the Government might be window-dressing and the Workers' members would take a position giving them the benefit of critical doubt, a wait-and-see attitude, first see and then believe.

Despite all the shortcomings in labour law criticized by the Experts, the basic weakness in Indonesia was the enforcement of the law, and if it came indeed to protection against anti-union discrimination, interference by employers in internal trade union affairs, restrictions in collective bargaining, there were many examples of non-enforcement. The basic problem was that the Government did not make a great effort to see that legislation was being enforced, and that had been the main reason for an enormous wave of strikes against non-payment of the legal minimum wage in the past few years. As in the past, it was very important that the Committee of Experts continued to take a close look at that. The same applied to the right to organize and bargain collectively, the heart of this Convention, which the speaker illustrated by two examples. By the end of last year journalists in Indonesia set up an independent journalist association, the AJI. That organization by its mere existence came into competition with the official government-controlled journalists' organization, the PWI, and was severely repressed. Several of the leaders were arrested and put in jail, a long list of people mentioned by name were dismissed or deprived of membership in the PWI because the membership of the PWI was declared incompatible with the membership of this independent association. The editors of the newspapers and magazines had been instructed by the Indonesian Government to dismiss people who were members of the AJI. The AJI was a professional organization wanting to represent the interests of workers in their profession, and it should not have been possible to suppress an organization only because it was parallel to the official government-recognized one.

The second example concerned the SBSI, which, in the eyes of the two trade union internationals represented at this Conference, the ICFTU and the WCL, was a genuine trade union. However, this organization was meeting with fierce repression of the Government which had refused to recognize it. It had warned employers and local authorities not to deal with this organization, which meant that it practically could not function at the enterprise level, and each and every worker declaring himself or herself to that union faced enormous risks, one of which was immediate dismissal. Despite all these obstacles the SBSI had definitely acquired a following, although, as was proved in the documentation underlying Case No. 1773 before the Committee on Freedom of Association, it was not a large organization.

Labour relations, as had been stated in this Committee previously, were seen by the Indonesian Government primarily as a security issue. Therefore, the Government wanted to strictly control the trade union movement and labour relations. This was why the police and the military interfered so often, and the retired military officers, many of them, were planted in the structure of the SPSI, the official union, at the regional and at the local level. This stemmed from an official state doctrine ["Dwi Fungsi"] which specifically said that the military not only must have a role in the defence of the country but should also participate in the larger organizations in society. As long as this government doctrine existed, the military would remain in these positions. So the Government should be asked to withdraw this doctrine which would perhaps cure, in due time, one of the main diseases of the country's labour relations system. Was it ready to do that in due time?

The speaker addressed two other concrete questions to the Government of Indonesia: "If, under the new legislation, where workers can set up unions through their own choice, the SBSI sets up a union in a plant which is not yet organized, will that SBSI union have the right to organize and to bargain a collective labour agreement? In view of the future congress of the SPSI and of SPSI unions, will for once the Government refrain from interference in trade union elections?"

With respect to the conclusions that might be formulated by the Committee, he hoped that they would include the points concerning the military interference and the compulsory arbitration, and that the next report of the Committee of Experts would draw attention to the enormous gap in Indonesia between legislation and implementation of the law.

Finally, he hoped that the Committee would express strongly and firmly – as strongly and firmly as the Committee on Freedom of Association did – that the right to organize and bargain collectively should also indeed be open for other organizations than the official state-controlled organizations and that a strong appeal would be made here so that the Government would ensure that military intervention and its own intervention in any internal trade union affairs and labour matters as a whole would be stopped.

The Workers' member of Japan adopted the statement made by the Workers' spokesman and the Workers' member of the Netherlands. Having listened attentively to the statement made by the representative of the Indonesian Government, he noted that the promises given still stood largely as empty words, and some of the promises and some of the changes had brought very little improvement in view of the magnitude of the problem referred to in the report.

As regards the question of protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, the absence of such protection became even clearer in the light of the waves of strikes and demonstrations which took place last year in Indonesia. In fact, the lack of such protection was partly a cause of these industrial disputes. As regards protection of workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers, the complaints contained detailed examples not only of interference with workers' organizations by the employers but also by the Government itself. With respect to restrictions on collective bargaining, particularly in public services, the problem was that, in Indonesia, in the event that the Government owned more than 5 per cent of a company's stock, the company was considered to be a national enterprise and therefore workers had no right to form trade unions. A vast section of workers did not have freedom of association and were completely left out of any collective bargaining process.

While there were confusingly many so-called ministerial orders governing labour relations, the real problem arose from the absence of a single clear-cut labour law which complied with the ILO Convention: The speaker concluded that he was more pessimistic this year because of the statement made by the Government representative which had a very different tone from her speech last year.

The Government member of the United States noted that last year she had stated before the Committee that the situation in practice in Indonesia was far more serious than was apparent from a reading of the report of the Committee of Experts. She noted that once again the Government planned to cooperate with the ILO to bring its legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention, and welcomed the Government's indication that a number of legislative measures had been taken in cooperation with the ILO, but emphasized that the Government's intentions must be met with adequate and speedy action. She hoped that the specific recommendations made in reports of the Committee of Experts, the Committee on Freedom of Association and by the direct contacts mission would be taken very seriously and that changes far beyond those of a merely cosmetic nature would be made, thus leading to conformity with the Convention in the very near future.

Another Government representative, in responding to the observations of the Workers' members, pointed out that significant progress which occurred through gradual improvement over a period of time sometimes was more difficult to detect by those who had been witnessing the gradual progress through the entire period than by those observing only the difference between the circumstances at the beginning and the end of this period. In his view, this was what had occurred with respect to his country, which had been indicating examples of progress at the last two meetings of this Committee. For example, last year his Government had reported that the minimum wage was sufficient for 70 per cent of basic needs, and now it met 100 per cent of these needs. Last year, the number of independent company unions was about 100, but now it was about 800, an increase of 700 per cent. He asked whether any country in the world had experienced such great progress in such a short time. He then emphasized the amount of time that was needed in order to introduce new legislation. In 1991, it was indicated to the Government that it should review existing legislation, but only after 1992 was it able to begin this review. In 1994 Ministerial Decrees Nos. 1 and 15A were adopted, which represented great change, and he noted the reference by the Employers' members to the fact that some improvement had occurred. In outlining the process for preparing legislation in his country, he stressed the time needed to conceive of an idea for new legislation, to engage in tripartite consultation, to redraft legislation taking into account input from employers and workers, and to ask for further comments from them on the draft. The lengthy process involved in preparing new Conventions, which were adopted four to five years after the idea for a Convention was raised, was likened to the procedure involved in adopting new labour legislation in his country. For this reason he considered it unlikely that his Government would report on a new Labour Act in this Committee at next year's Conference. Five years ago three new bills were submitted to the Cabinet Secretariat. One of these, on Social Security, was adopted in 1992, but the remaining two bills were returned for refinement, and had recently been submitted once again to the Cabinet Secretariat. With the strong commitment of the Minister responsible he hoped that the redrafted bill would be selected as a matter of national priority among the approximately 50 other bills under consideration, but he said that it was unlikely that it would materialize as a law by next year's Conference. With regard to the restrictions on collective bargaining, he stated that it was now clear that where company-level unions had been formed and an executive established, they were not restricted from collective bargaining and entering into collective agreements. He drew a distinction between dismissal for engaging in trade union activities and dismissal for misconduct. The former was protected by the Trade Union Law, while the latter was not. The Committee of Disputes Settlement, composed of five employer, five government, and five worker representatives, was responsible for deciding whether dismissal was appropriate or not. With regard to demonstrations and strikes, he pointed out the difference between the practice elsewhere and in Indonesia, and gave as an example the announcement by the KLM crew during his flight from Indonesia that it would be engaging in a strike at a specific later date, and for a duration of from six to eight hours. In his country they had never experienced such a well-organized demonstration or strike, although they followed similar regulations on conducting strikes and demonstrations. This exemplified, in his view, the need for regulations that had clear objectives and clear demands of which both employers and employees were informed. In this way it would be clear what action should be taken to protect employers, workers and society. With reference to the invocation of a "lack of harmony in the working relationship", he pointed out that in many cases the workers themselves raised this question. He then reiterated that every trade union when established could engage in collective bargaining and negotiate collective agreements. With respect to the five-year plan, the minimum wage and pension funds, he noted that his Government would accelerate the realization of objectives for these activities and hoped to continue to make progress. In response to the observations of the Workers' member of the Netherlands regarding the naming of a particular trade union in the Regulation, he considered that there was nothing wrong with this as after a period of one year a new trade union could choose whether or not it wished to join the SPSI. If it felt that there was no need to do so, the trade union was free to make the decision not to join the SPSI. As stated before the Committee in 1991, 1993 and 1994 regarding military involvement, there had been a division of work between the country's security apparatus and the Ministry of Labour. If workers in their activities went beyond industrial relations matters, the security of the country became an issue. In this respect, it was not concerned at all with the industrial relations system, but was a matter of the role of the military in security aspects and national development. With reference to the requirement of a permit for conducting meetings, he said that such permits were needed so that the security apparatus would be informed. To explain the need for such permits, he gave an example of a church meeting held in 1992 which could have resulted in the death of many persons if the security apparatus had not been present. Although the security apparatus should not be present at meetings, it should be aware that they were taking place so that it could quickly settle down any problems that might arise. With respect to the enforcement of labour legislation, from 1994 to 1995, 183 companies were brought to court regarding violations of regulations of minimum wage legislation and, of these, 21 employers were penalized. He then emphasized that the Government did not have a list of workers dismissed from companies for engaging in trade union activities. He did not know whether employers who interviewed potential workers were actually aware, during the recruitment process, of the practices and backgrounds of employees, and stated that the Government had no information regarding dismissal for such reasons and discrimination against such workers who sought re-employment. On the other hand, when an employer violated labour legislation, the Government published this information so that society was aware. For this reason, he suggested that, if a blacklist did exist, it was of employers rather than of workers. With regard to the establishment of AJI as a competitor of a recognized trade union of journalists, he was unaware of this matter and noted that the AJI had never reported to the Ministry of Manpower regarding its existence. He suggested that the Workers' delegates of his country might give relevant information. The Government had already communicated information to the Committee of Experts concerning the SBSI and the riot in Medan, and he had documentation on this matter available to all those who wished to have further information. He noted that information had already been given on the public service to this Committee in 1991, 1993 and 1994. He emphasized the very particular relationship that existed between his country and the United States, and noted the intensive communication that had occurred in 1992 at which time a total of 25 kg of documentation was provided. In the past, the Government had invited a delegation of the Government of the United States to come to Indonesia on two or three occasions. Another mission from the United States was expected at the end of June or early July 1995, and his country would be pleased to provide as much information as necessary. In response to the statement of the Workers' member of the Netherlands regarding the involvement of the military in the executive of the SPSI, the latter would hold a congress by the end of this year prepared by all branches and regional executives, and he thought that they had certain criteria on who could be elected to the executive of the SPSI and how such elections were to be conducted.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands asked the Government representative again whether, under the revised legislation, a non-SPSI trade union could be established at the enterprise level, choose to join the SPSI and then proceed to negotiate collective agreements on behalf of workers in that enterprise.

In response, the Government representative stated that he had not yet considered whether workers could set up a central union other than the SPSI. If they were to do so pursuant to a democratic decision, and it was their right to do so, it was possible. From his personal point of view, as this type of trade union was just beginning to develop, little was known in this area. Such trade unions needed to be mature enough to do this. The Government wished to see leadership of this kind of trade union grow from within to accommodate this, and for this reason it was making considerable efforts to prepare leadership of trade unions through workers' education. He considered that they should be allowed to decide on the above matter later.

The Workers' members agreed with the suggestion of the Employers' members that a written report on all the issues raised in the report of the Committee of Experts and in this Committee would be helpful. They were grateful for the contribution made by the Government member of the United States, but remarked that it would have been helpful if this report had been given at the commencement of the discussion on this case, so that there would have been time to prepare a proper response, as the report could open up a new debate. They stressed that there had not been a satisfactory reply by the Government representative to the questions raised. The nature of the three bills submitted to the Cabinet Secretariat five years ago was unclear. They assumed that in addition to the bill on social security there was a bill on collective bargaining and on trade unions. They suggested that the reference by the Government representative to the 50 other bills pending was made to provide the Government with an opportunity to return next year to explain that it was unable to announce progress because the bills had been sent back. In their view, the example given of the need for the security apparatus to be present at the church meeting gave the Committee an understanding of the situation in that country. They noted that there had been no promises made by the Government to institute changes of the substantial nature required. Although the Employers' members and the Government member of the United States had noted some small changes, and the Workers' members agreed that one or two tiny changes had been made, the Workers' members stated that the situation had basically not changed and was not going to change. They said that the Committee could not change the nature of a society of a country, or bring about fairness, reason and democracy in it, but it could indicate the manner in which Conventions were to be applied and what might be the democratic role that could be adopted in respect of this Convention. They suggested that the Government representative tell his Government that these issues must be dealt with during the next year. They stressed that they were seriously disturbed and deeply concerned about the way trade unionism was practised in his country, and hoped that the Government would provide a detailed written report in reply to the Committee of Experts and to this Committee. They hoped that the conclusions would convey the deep concerns of the Workers' members on the issues raised and the apparent failure of the Government to meet the requirements of the Committee of Experts not just this year but for many, many years.

The Employers' members noted that there had been a very extensive and detailed debate which in parts was highly interesting, and had given a great deal of insight into these issues, which went well beyond those contained in the report of the Committee of Experts. They noted the readiness of the Government representative to address some of the points in some depth, although he did not have a solution to offer for all of the problems.

The Committee noted the report of the Committee of Experts, the information provided by the Government representative on the application of the Convention, as well as the discussion. The Committee felt deeply concerned that, in spite of the direct contacts mission that went to Indonesia in November 1993, the discussion within the present Committee last year, and the technical advisory mission that went to Indonesia in January 1995, much progress was yet to be achieved to ensure in law and in practice the full application of the Convention. The Committee felt encouraged by the information furnished during the meeting by the Government representative, inter alia, on the formation of more trade unions. However, the Committee urged the Government to take specific measures to guarantee protection against anti-union discrimination in fact and law, to ensure de facto non-interference by the employers in workers' organizations, and to establish a regime of laws, rules and practice by dismantling all restrictive registration requirements and thereby creating a free environment for formation of unions without hindrance. The Committee further called upon the Government to furnish a detailed report to the Committee of Experts on specific further measures taken by it with reference to the matters mentioned in the report of the Committee of Experts and to fully comply with all the parameters of Convention No. 98 and to guarantee collective bargaining.

Turkey (ratification: 1952). A Government representative, regarding the first question raised by the Committee of Experts, repeated that the Government was continuing its efforts for the removal of the requirement of at least 10 per cent of the membership of workers for a trade union to bargain collectively in spite of the objections made by organizations of employers and workers.

Regarding the trade union rights of civil servants, the parliamentary commission debating the proposal of a law regulating the issue had held that the proposal was not compatible with the Constitution as such. A proposal had been eventually prepared with the consensus of all the political parties to amend the Constitution, submitted to Parliament and passed through the relevant commissions only a week ago. One of these draft amendments aimed at securing trade union rights of public employees. The draft Bill was pending debate.

As to the third point concerning section 33 of Act No. 2822, the Government representative emphasized, quoting the provision of the said section, that it only concerned a case that was likely to be prejudicial to public health or national security, and was therefore in full conformity with the views of the Experts. He added that any decision of the Government was subject to the supervision of the independent judiciary. The interested parties could, at any state, also have recourse to voluntary arbitration. Furthermore, the Government could withdraw its decision if circumstances that justified the postponement no longer existed.

The Employers' members recalled that this Committee had treated this case many times in the past. The facts were therefore well known. The first point was the numerical requirement for trade unions to bargain collectively. The Government indicated their readiness to modify it but said that the social partners had last year expressed their wish to maintain things as they were. Besides, the Committee of Experts did not indicate from what level of the numerical requirement it would become abusive, and the Convention did not lay this down. It would be useful if the Government supplied in its next report information on the areas in which collective agreements existed and their number. If such data showed collective bargaining taking place everywhere, this first point would lose its importance.

The second problem concerning the denial of collective bargaining rights of public servants was not new either. A draft Bill had been submitted and it was for Parliament to adopt it. The next report of the Government should indicate any new measures that had been adopted.

The third question concerned compulsory arbitration in certain circumstances. The Committee of Experts reiterated its interpretation that compulsory arbitration should only apply to essential services in the strict sense, that is, services the interruption of which would endanger the life, safety and health of the whole or part of the population: on this interpretation, the Employers' members had been making reservations. In view of the guarantees of procedure, the possibility of recourse and the involvement of the social partners, it would appear that the problem was getting resolved, at least in terms of Convention No. 98. The recent ratification of Convention No. 87 by Turkey should also bring about new improvements. The Government should be requested to supply in its next report detailed information on any new evolution.

The Workers' members pointed out that this case had already been discussed in 1988, 1989, 1991, 1993 and 1994, and could not share the patience of the Employers' members. Although the Government referred last year to the Bill being discussed, the Committee of Experts this year could only reiterate its observation on each of the three points raised. It was also noted that the Government had not responded to the comments made by the Confederation of Turkish Trade Unions (TURK-IS).

As regards the Bill in question, this Committee had last year requested the Government to take measures to "adopt specific legislative provisions to accord to workers in the public sector, covered by the Convention, the right to form trade unions so as to enable them to bargain collectively on the conditions of their employment". Now this Bill had not been adopted and the Government seemed to be preparing a new Bill which would no longer cover the right to bargain collectively. This change in the Government's position should be explained.

The Bill concerning the double criteria to recognize trade unions for the purpose of collective bargaining was still under examination. As they had done on several occasions, the Workers' members recalled that an equilibrium should be sought between the requirement of pluralism and of effectiveness. The double threshold of 10 per cent of the branch and 50 per cent of an establishment would exclude many workers from collective bargaining.

The obligation to promote collective bargaining was violated both in law and practice by the procedures of compulsory arbitration. The Workers' members fully subscribed to the observation of the Committee of Experts that recourse to compulsory arbitration should be strictly limited to essential services. It was indispensable that detailed information should be examined again by the Committee of Experts.

The Government should be asked to supply specific information on each of the points raised by the Committee of Experts and to reply to the comments of the TURK-IS. By ratifying several fundamental Conventions recently, Turkey had demonstrated its interest in the principles enshrined in those instruments. It was for the Government to show its willingness to respect these international commitments in practice by making necessary changes.

The Workers' member of Turkey recalled that this case had been discussed almost every year since 1983, when a special paragraph had been formulated. The first question of the numerical requirement required a complete revision of the legislation on the basis of tripartite consultation and with the technical cooperation of the ILO. As to the second point concerning the denial of collective bargaining rights for public servants, the perspective had become worse since last year. While the Government had promised to recognize this right, its attitude had changed radically. In terms of the constitutional amendment which was under discussion in Parliament, negotiations would be authorized but the concluded agreement would have no binding force. In addition, the decision of 25 May of this year of the Court of Appeal threatened the very existence of trade unions of public servants. As regards compulsory arbitration, it was imposed upon a very wide variety of activities, most of which did not correspond to essential services. On all these points, the situation had not improved but rather appeared to be deteriorating even further.

The Committee took note of the statements of the Government representative as regards the issues mentioned by the Committee of Experts on the numerical requirement for unions to bargain collectively, the denial of collective bargaining rights of public servants and compulsory arbitration in certain cases. The Committee called upon the Government, having gone into the contents of the statement, to furnish full information on further developments as regards removal of restrictions on collective bargaining, and hoped that the proposed law for extending collective bargaining rights to public servants would truly reflect the suggestions of the Committee of Experts made earlier. The Committee also urged the Government to limit further, as advised by the Committee of Experts, the scope of compulsory arbitration to be truly harmonious with Convention No. 98 and furnish information on this as well in its report.

Convention No. 111: Discrimination (Employment and Occupation), 1958

Brazil (ratification: 1965). The Government supplied the following information:

The Government has the pleasure of informing the Committee that Bill No. 229/91, mentioned in point 2 of the 1995 Observation on Convention No. 111, Report III (Part 4A) of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, has become Act No. 9029 of 13 April 1995, already in force in the country. This shows the Government's genuine concern for the adoption of anti-discrimination policies.

In addition, the Government is seeking an understanding with the social partners so as to develop joint action which would allow the broadening of the real fight against discrimination. In this context, the Government is repeating its request for the ILO's technical cooperation for the development of an effective policy of concrete action, with the objective of better implementing the provisions of this Convention. Discussions for this purpose are currently underway with the workers' and employers' organizations.

As outlined in the meeting held on 12 June between members of the Brazilian delegation to the Conference and officials of the Department of International Labour Standards, the technical mission of the ILO would, as one of its main purposes, cooperate with the Brazilian Government in holding a tripartite seminar in Brazil on the subject. In principle, the activities of the technical mission and the holding of the seminar would be developed between September 1995 and May 1996.

In addition, a Government representative confirmed the commitment of his Government to the rule of equality, a paramount principle of the Constitution of Brazil and its national law. In addition to having ratified the Convention, Brazil was also a party to other important international instruments regarding discrimination, such as the Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination and the Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women. With regard to discrimination based on sex, Bill No. 229/91 was approved, and became law under Act No. 9029 of 13 April 1995 and was presently being enforced. This law forbade discrimination based on gender as well as any other discriminatory practices or restrictions to job access or to maintenance of employment based on grounds such as race, colour, civil status, family situation or age. A copy of this law had been sent to the Office in May of this year. Employers or their representatives and public employees responsible for any discriminatory practice as defined under the Act were subject to one to two years' imprisonment, or fines and prohibition from borrowing from official financial institutions. Among other measures to strengthen the enforcement mechanism of this Act, the Ministry of Labour had consulted representatives of trade union federations to discuss improvement of supervisory mechanisms such as complaint procedures in order to more effectively enforce its provisions. In addition, enforcement of labour standards in this and other fields had been strengthened by the hiring last year by public examination of more than 600 additional labour inspectors who were now in the process of being trained. The Government was in the process of shaping more effective national policy on job equality, and intended to use programmes to be developed with the assistance of ILO technical cooperation. An official request to this effect had been forwarded to the Office, as indicated in the written documents furnished by the Government. These technical cooperation activities were expected to begin in September 1995 as agreed in a recent meeting between the Brazilian delegation to the Conference and the Office.

The Workers' members noted that this case had been considered in 1993 and 1994, but that since then the Government had provided further information and indicated that they had made arrangements to obtain ILO technical cooperation. The matter of employers requiring sterilization certificates or gynaecological examination of women as a condition of employment had concerned the Committee of Experts and affronted some members of this Committee. They welcomed Act No. 9029 of 13 April 1995, which prohibited such discrimination, but expressed the hope that the Government would keep the Committee of Experts informed on how the Act was being implemented, what penalties would be imposed, and on any prosecutions that took place, in order for the Committee to be assured that a practice committed in the past had been eliminated. They were pleased that additional labour inspectors had been hired despite the cost of doing so because these were absolutely essential for an entire range of aspects that concerned this Committee, and in particular the question of discrimination. Although discrimination must first be addressed with legislation, changes would require not only the application of legislation but also a change of cultural attitude, and measures against discrimination. The Government could set the tone not only with laws but also by emphasizing and giving priority to the elimination of discrimination, which would indicate that such measures were central to the attitude of the Government. Trade unions and employers' organizations could encourage the Government to take the necessary measures, and influence the public and their members through publications and discussions by also attaching priority to the problems of discrimination. In their view, by accepting ILO technical assistance, the Government indicated that it understood that anti-discriminatory measures were necessary. The independent and highly skilled advice and experience of the Office regarding this particular area of discrimination would be of immense value to a government genuinely seeking help. Rather than accepting such assistance merely to avoid criticisms in this Committee, there must be a genuine will to accept and act upon the assistance given. Seminars were useful, but the most valuable assistance would be to help the Government to establish a legal framework where discrimination could no longer apply. They looked forward to further reports of the Government following the technical assistance mission as well as discussions in this Committee that would hopefully lead to a resolution of this problem.

The Employers' members considered that this was a case of progress, an altogether too infrequent occurrence in this Committee. They noted that the Government now understood that it must effectively implement this law, and they applauded the Government's request for ILO technical assistance, and in particular the fact that the mission would have a broader scope than only legislative matters. They urged that the Government enact the legislation concerning non-discrimination with regard to access to vocational training, and asked for an indication of when this might occur. They also said that the Government should submit a report to the ILO responding to the requests of the Experts for information concerning the role of work organizations, measures prohibiting discrimination based on colour, and the work of the National Labour Council (CNTB) in this area. They suggested that the conclusions state that as an urgent matter the Government must effectively implement its non-discrimination legislation in practice, but that the Committee should note with satisfaction the positive legislative development, particularly with respect to sterilization certificates, and the Government's willingness to accept technical assistance provided by the ILO.

The Workers' member of Brazil recalled that for a long time there had been serious and violent discrimination with respect to women and blacks in various parts of the country. In addition, blacks were not accepted in the labour market, and when they did obtain employment they received a lower salary even if they performed the same work as whites. Pursuant to policies established by the Government, the black population remained the primary victims of unemployment, and suffered from a high rate of illiteracy because of discrimination against black children in schools. There was also discrimination by the public security forces against blacks who endured charges and imprisonment based on their race. He stated that black women suffered from discrimination both as women and as blacks. In spite of the existence of legislative provisions to curb the practice of racial and sexual discrimination, such as Bill No. 229/91 adopted as Act No. 9029 dated 13 April 1995, discrimination in his country was hidden and subtle and its perpetrators generally were not aware that they were engaging in it. Nevertheless, he said that the above law was an important and positive step in the struggle against discrimination and that it should, at the same time, be accompanied by a great effort to make Brazilian society conscious of this problem, in particular workers and employers, and by severe penalties for contraventions. From this point of view, the search for a consensus between the Government, employers and those engaging in the struggle against all forms of discrimination proved to be very difficult. In this respect, the offer by the Office of technical assistance was welcomed. Preparation of seminars to promote the implementation of the Convention and of national legislation had already begun in his country. He concluded by expressing the hope that between now and the next session of the Committee progress would be made that would permit a better evaluation of discrimination based on race or on sex in his country.

The Government representative pointed out that the request by his country for technical cooperation had been made last year, and then had recently been repeated. This ILO technical cooperation was for the overall enforcement of the Convention, rather than for the verification of enforcement mechanisms under the Act, as it would be premature to verify the enforcement mechanisms of the new Act because at this time no complaints had been submitted. With regard to racial discrimination, he noted that his country had already adopted laws against racial discrimination in 1953, followed by a reinforcement of this legislation in 1989. He stressed that the legal framework to prohibit racial discrimination was in place and the relevant laws were being enforced in his country.

The Committee noted with satisfaction the enactment of Act No. 9029/95. It also urged that measures against discrimination should continue to be central to the attitude of the Government and priority should be attached to the same. The Committee further hoped that the ILO technical mission for which arrangements had already been made would be the basis for the development of a positive plan for actual implementation of the laws. It further asked the Government to keep the Committee of Experts informed on arrangements for implementation and on guarantees against discrimination.

Cuba (ratification: 1965). A Government representative of Cuba stated that the Committee of Experts took note with interest and satisfaction of the measures adopted by the Government, inter alia, the amendment of some legislation and other practical measures so as to avoid erroneous interpretations departing from the principles of equality enshrined both in the Constitution of the Republic and in the Labour Code. When the Committee of Experts evaluated the information submitted by the Government, as a case indicating progress, it was recognizing the will expressed by the Government to fully comply with Convention No. 111. None the less, the Committee of Experts requested additional information on some aspects for which the Government representative expressed the following:

Paragraph 1. The changes which had occurred in the country, including the reorganization of the bodies of the central administration of the State, meant that those directly related to some of the measures subject to observation had to be analysed.

In an ordered and gradual way the labour and wages law was being overhauled to adapt it to new, existing and future conditions. It was necessary to take into account that the process of adapting labour and wages legislation could not take place overnight, it had to be done through a careful analysis and through consultations with organizations, companies or undertakings and trade unions.

Paragraph 2. The Committee noted with satisfaction one of the important measures adopted by the Government which showed the will expressed by the Government to delete anything that could be interpreted erroneously as being in conflict with equality of opportunity and treatment underlying the educational system of the country.

Paragraph 3. In addition to the qualifications required for each speciality, another of the essential requirements to be a teacher was to be accepted by the college of teachers and the student body. In the present case, the assembly of workers of the institution, in two meetings of the teachers and at the students' assembly, had adopted an agreement to request the rector to dismiss the person in question from the teaching corps. The procedure adopted was that laid down in Legislative Decree No. 34 of 1980 which provided that the dismissal of teachers may be decided upon by the rectors of universities and was subject to appeal to the Minister of Higher Education. This was an exceptional procedure, only applied to teachers in teaching centres with direct relationship to students because an ordinary procedure existed for the final dismissal of workers for disciplinary reasons, contained in Legislative Decree No. 132 of 9 April 1992 which regulated the workings of the organs of labour justice and provided that an appeal may be made to the Labour Court of the Supreme Court.

Paragraph 4. This paragraph repeated the arguments in respect of Legislative Decree No. 34 of 1980 and, as already mentioned, important aspects of the labour law needed to be revised to bring it into line with the new conditions existing in the country. When this was done, the Committee of Experts' comments would be taken into account in respect of Legislative Decree No. 34 of 1980.

Paragraph 5. The Committee of Experts noted with interest the repeal of resolution No. 50 of 1987 by resolution No. 17 of 16 November 1993 and requested additional information as to the practical application of section 3 which listed the indicators used in evaluating the results of the work of journalists, in particular paragraph (c), which dealt with the scope and repercussions among the public of their activities. The Committee of Experts' report stated that the text of resolution No. 17 of 16 November 1993 contained in its annexes extensive information on the practical application. In Annex 3 it set out the indicators for evaluating the work of journalists. Regarding the information requested on the scope and repercussions among the public of their activities, Annex 3 explained that an element for consideration was whether the journalists contributed to solving or rectifying errors and therefore merited public recognition by society. This information had been transmitted to the Committee of Experts in the form of annexes to resolution No. 17 of 16 November 1993.

Paragraph 6. As soon as there was a new regulation on employment policy it would be handed to the Committee of Experts. None the less, it was confirmed that changing the content of professional records did not depend on the new regulation to be adopted. The contents of these professional records had already been amended in resolution No. 1 of 1993 in line with the specific request of this Committee. The text of resolution No. 1 and the format of the professional record had been sent to the Committee of Experts in the previous report.

Paragraph 7. The Committee of Experts had been extensively informed about the procedure contained in resolution No. 1 of 11 March 1994, explaining that entry to higher education was done on the basis of the academic index and the marks obtained in the entry exams, the role of the teaching institutions and the part played by the student body. The practical application of the resolution had not contained any of the prohibited elements listed here. The consultation mentioned in the resolution between the rectors of the universities, the provincial directors of education, the Communist Party and the trade unions was intended to support the dissemination and application of the activities governing this resolution in respect of entry exams and also the responsibilities of the teachers in this respect. As a part of these consultations, no criteria were applied which differed from those used in qualifications as established in the resolution itself.

Paragraph 8. Concerning access to employment, no internal rules had been issued which violated the Convention. The nature of the measures adopted was to check compliance with the principle of equality in employment enshrined in the Labour Code, although there had been no infractions reported in this respect.

Paragraph 9. As can be seen, the posts mentioned in this paragraph were directly connected with the policy of the State, as pointed out by the Committee of Experts in its General Survey.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for the precise information relating to each of the points in the Committee of Experts' report. This was the fourth time since 1991 that this case had been discussed and each time there was only minor progress. The fundamental problem was the various definitions and criteria that were applied concerning employment or access to training which, given the history in this particular country, could be abused in practice. The Employers' members noted some improvement, relating to entries in school records, and that each year the observations by the Experts indicated that in some new area there was improvement. Furthermore, it was clear from what the Government representative had said that the Government had a clear understanding and appreciation for the Experts' comments. But looking at the totality of the observations, there were eight areas of the Government's law and practice which were not in line with the prohibition of Convention No. 111 relating to political opinion discrimination.

The Employers' members concluded by stating that although the report of the Committee of Experts contained some encouraging indications, vestiges of political opinion discrimination continued to exist in law, and that substantially more was required by the Government to bring both its law and practice into line with the requirements of Convention No. 111.

The Workers' members agreed with the Employers' members that small steps had been made slowly, but hoped that the end result would be positive. However issues remained, some of which required more clarification than change, and others which still required action. Furthermore, they agreed that the problem in dealing with this case was that there had perhaps been too much concentration on the precise nature of the law and not enough on the point raised by the Employers' members concerning the actual practice. As the Committee of Experts observed, the accumulated school record problem seemed to have been solved and perhaps did not need further investigation. Concerning conditions of employment, there were one or two issues of concern. First, the Workers' members requested clarification on what in practice was meant by essential qualities required for teaching and whether these qualities included political conformity. Second, they asked the Government to confirm its statement that there was some independent judicial appeal beyond the Ministry of Education for people who were dismissed from teaching jobs.

The Workers' members were also concerned about the possibilities of dismissal for activities that were contrary to social morals. They noted that major changes were under way, and that the Government would provide copies of the appropriate amendments that had been introduced. They noted the repeal of resolution No. 50 of 1987 regarding the evaluation pay of journalists, but were slightly worried about the application of section 3 of the new regulations and wanted to know how the regulations operated in practice, including any examples of when it was used. Regarding access to employment and training, the Workers' members shared the Committee of Experts' concern about the consultations between the university authorities and the Communist Party; whether these consultations included matters other than professional qualifications and ability. They also requested information on this point.

Finally, the Workers' members were concerned about criteria for placement in administrative posts. It was understandable that ministers and top people in government departments might have to follow the political faith of the party, although that was not true in many countries; but the level at which political conformity with the party in power was a justification for holding the job must be limited to very few people. They hoped that the precise nature of the posts involved in this area could be established to the Committee of Experts' satisfaction. The Workers' members underlined that the Committee of Experts was less concerned about the laws and more concerned about whether the practices of the past still prevailed, and requested that information continue to be provided until all the problems were finally resolved.

The Government representative expressed her thanks and took note of the comments of the Employers' and Workers' members. She observed in particular that basically it was a question of continuing a dialogue to exhaust all small points on which there were still doubts. A copy of the legislation which had been mentioned would be transmitted once adopted. The opinions expressed during the discussion would be communicated to the appropriate authorities and the next report of the Government would contain the information requested.

The Committee noted the observations of the Committee of Experts and the statement of the Government representative. The Committee felt that in respect of conditions of employment, access to employment and access to training, seemingly there was scope for discrimination based on political opinions of individuals. The Committee urged that a further report be given by the Government clarifying that in fact discriminatory practices militating against Convention No. 111 did not exist. The Committee further asked the Government to provide practical information on the implementation of the legal provisions relating to conditions of employment so that the Committee of Experts could further examine that Convention No. 111 was being complied with.

The Government representative made a reservation concerning the part of the conclusions of the Committee in which it considered that there was scope for political discrimination in access to training and employment. That did not accord with the observations of the Committee of Experts, or with the discussion maintained in the present Committee. In this respect, she recalled that the Committee of Experts had noted this as an area of progress in the application of the Convention, and that now, it was only necessary to make certain modifications and to send the required information.

Pakistan (ratification: 1961). The Government supplied the following information:

With regard to the observation of the Committee of Experts concerning the exclusion of establishments in newly created industrial zones from the application of labour legislation, the Committee may wish to refer to the reports of the Government in response to comments of the Committee concerning the application of Convention No. 87. With reference to the observations of the Committee of Experts, it may be stated that minorities in Pakistan enjoy all fundamental rights equally together with other citizens as provided for under the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973. They are treated both justly and generously by the Government. Their legitimate rights and interests have been adequately safeguarded in the Constitution.

The substantive impact of the restraints in the Anti-Islamic Activities of the Qadiani Group, Lahori Group and Ahmadiis (Prohibition and Punishment) Ordinance, 1984 (No. XX) on the Ahmadis is not onerous. The restraint applies only to the public exercise of certain practices. In many non-Muslim countries, restraints are applied to the public aspects of Islamic religious practices for lesser reasons. For example, in the city of Geneva, Muslims are not allowed to make a public call for prayers, presumably to avoid disturbance of its inhabitants. The Ahmadis may continue to practice their religion in their religious places which are separately maintained by them. Even religious practice can be observed as long as this is done in private without causing affront to the Muslims. The provisions of Ordinance No. XX of 1984 do not disqualify Ahmadis/Quadianis from any employment or occupation, and therefore are not relevant to employment opportunities on the basis of religion or belief.

However, it may be added that the exercise of a right is never absolute. While proclaiming freedom of religion or belief in article 18, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights stipulates under paragraph 3 of that article that: "Freedom to manifest one's religion or belief may be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary to protect public safety, order, health, morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others." These conditions are repeated in paragraph 3 of article 1 of the Declaration of the elimination of all forms of intolerance and discrimination based on religion or belief. In the same spirit, the Constitution of Pakistan provides in article 20 that: "Subject to law, public order and morality, every citizen shall have the right to profess, practice and propagate his religion and to establish, maintain and manage religious institutions." It is further stated that Ordinance No. XX of 1984 has been declared in July 1993 to not be ultra vires with respect to the Constitution of Pakistan, 1973.

Under the provisions of section 10 of the Pakistan Army Act, every citizen of Pakistan has the right to join its Armed Forces. Article 27 of the Constitution of Pakistan, 1973 provides clear safeguards against discrimination in employment on the basis of race, religion, caste, sex, residence or place of birth. Article 36 of the Constitution further provides that the State shall safeguard the legitimate rights and interests of minorities. Adherence to a particular religion has never been a prerequisite to joining the service in the Armed Forces of Pakistan, promotions therein and release therefrom. For this reason the request of the Committee for statistics regarding the number and percentage of Ahmadis/Quadianis serving in the Army is not considered relevant.

It should also be pointed out that the information of the United Nations special rapporteur is exaggerated. There is no discrimination in employment or in practising any faith among personnel of various sects in the Armed Forces. With regard to the dismissal of a first-class technician of the Pakistani Armed Forces, it may be pointed out that the person was dismissed from service not for belonging to the Ahmadi faith but rather for some other offence and in the interests of the service. This can best be proved by the fact that many minorities including Ahmadis are serving in the Armed Forces in accordance with their quota and the Constitution. The Military Law of Pakistan fully safeguards the interests and rights of minorities (which include Ahmadis) including their representation in the services of Pakistan. There is therefore no discrimination in employment or discharge from the Army on the basis of religion, race, colour or creed, etc. The Ahmadis continued to pose as Muslims. For this reason, it became necessary to prevent non-Muslims from obtaining passports indicating their religion to be Muslim. The declaration with the passport application form has proved to be a deterrent differentiating Muslims from Ahmadis. An applicant describing himself as an Ahmadi in the religion column is not required to sign the declaration. This has no relevance with regard to employment opportunities on the basis of religion. It is reiterated that discrimination on the grounds of religion or faith is not allowed against minorities including Quadianis; the Constitution of Pakistan provides equal opportunities in employment to every citizen of Pakistan regardless of faith and religion and Ahmadis/Quadianis are eligible to compete for all posts in all categories of the services in Pakistan. The Ahmadis/Quadianis who are willing to migrate for employment opportunities are simply required to indicate their religion in the application form and are not required to sign the declaration attached to the form. They are issued passports like other citizens without any other condition or hesitation, and therefore there has been no contravention of Article 1, paragraph 1(a) and (b) of the Convention.

With reference to the direct request of 1994, it is stated that minorities in Pakistan enjoy all fundamental rights equally together with other citizens as provided for under the Constitution of Pakistan. They are not only treated justly but generously by the Government. Their legitimate rights and interests have been adequately safeguarded in the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973. Six per cent of all vacancies in the Federal Services other than those of merit quota are reserved for the scheduled caste community in order to provide an incentive to eliminate their economic and social backwardness. No discrimination in these services occurs on the ground of race, religion and caste. No such law exists in our country which violates the above provision of the Constitution. All citizens are entitled to equal protection of the law. Some members of the Ahmadi community have important positions in both the civil and the military services of Pakistan. No Ahmadi has been dismissed from government employment on religious grounds.

Ten seats are reserved in the National Assembly for the minorities as follows: Christians (4); Hindus and persons belonging to scheduled castes (4); Sikh Buddhist and Farsi communities and other non-Muslims (1); persons belonging to the Qadiani Group of the Lahori Group (who call themselves Ahmadis) (1). Moreover, the number of seats allocated to non-Muslims in the provincial assemblies of the Provinces of Baluchistan, Punjab, NWFP, and Sindh are as follows:

Province	Christians	Hindus and persons belonging to the scheduled castes	Sikhs, Buddhist communities and other non-Muslims	Persons belonging to Qadianis Group or the Lahori Group (who call themselves Ahmadis)
Baluchistan	1	1	1	—
NWFP	1	—	1	1
Punjab	5	1	1	1
Sindh	2	5	1	1

An Advisory Council for Minorities Affairs including MNAs, PMAs and leaders of minority groups has been established by Minorities Affairs. Meetings of this Council are held annually to advise the Government on matters concerning the welfare of minorities. District Minority Committees have been established in all districts to examine daily problems faced by minorities and to resolve them at the local level. Meetings of these committees are held regularly and chaired by Deputy Commissioners and/or Additional Deputy Commissioners.

The Government has introduced a "Cultural Awards Scheme" exclusively for minorities for the promotion and preservation of their cultural heritage. Under this scheme, cultural awards of a considerable value (Rs.50,000) are granted annually to talented persons who are members of minority groups in the fields of literature, performing arts, fine arts and folk arts. The Government also created a permanent fund for the welfare and promotion of minorities in 1985-86 in the amount of Rs.20 million. Thirteen per cent of the amount available in this fund on an annual basis is reserved and placed at the disposal of the Minorities Affairs Division to provide financial assistance to needy persons who are members of minority groups in cases received in the Division through the Secretariats of the President or Prime Minister, or directly.

The Government established on 27 September 1993 a National Commission for Minorities to examine the problems of minorities and make suitable recommendations on their behalf. This Commission has held three meetings, and at its inaugural meeting, the following three Committees were established to provide reports about the assignments entrusted to them: (1) Committee on Rules and Procedures; (2) Committee on Education to examine the problems faced by the minorities in this sector; and (3) Committee on Legislation to examine the laws reported to be discriminatory towards minorities. The Commission has approved the report on rules and procedures. The report submitted by the Committee on Education is being actively considered by the Government. The Committee, inter alia, has recommended denationalization of 22 schools of the Roman Catholic Dioceses and the Church of Pakistan in the Punjab. The Committee has also recommended that one Christian teachers' training college be permitted to be opened.

With regard to legislative issues, a programme is under way in the Ministry of Law and Justice to reform and update the personal laws of minorities. The issue of delimitation of minority constituencies for the national and provincial assemblies following the pattern of Muslim constituencies is also under consideration in the Law and Justice Division. The above clearly indicates that the Commission is performing its functions independently and effectively to help redress the grievances of minority groups by making suitable recommendations to the Government. The Commission is an influential body and its recommendations are given high priority by the Government. No discrimination in employment is made on the grounds of race, religion or caste. All including the minorities can compete for services on merit. Further, the Government has also reserved 6 per cent of all vacancies to be filled by direct recruitment made on an all Pakistan basis, for the scheduled castes within the respective provincial/regional quota.

Seventh Five-Year Plan, the measures taken to follow up the Plan and the results achieved in promoting equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women in employment and occupation: Constitutionally and legally, gender equality is guaranteed in Pakistan. In practice, however, this equality is not perfectly reflected in society mainly because of socio-cultural constraints that have endured over centuries. The Seventh Plan acknowledged the low status of women and their neglect in the past and provided for the full integration of women in development by providing them with improved equality of opportunity in education, health, employment and all other spheres of national life. The Plan also provided for establishing awareness among leaders of public opinion and the public at large regarding the need to eliminate discrimination against women and its economic and social consequences. Following these imperatives, the Plan envisaged the expansion of opportunities for women's education, health and employment. The Plan provided for removal of gender disparities in education and the opening to women of all branches of learning, including physical and social sciences, as well as professional, technical and vocational subjects. Specifically, the employment programmes included skill development and credit facilities for women, the securing of a larger share of employment for women in professions which are more suited to them, such as teaching and nursing, and encouragement of women's cooperatives. During the Seventh Plan (1988-93), the role of the Ministry of Women's Developments and Youth Affairs in the sectoral programmes had been that of a financier and coordinator. The Ministry sponsored a variety of small projects for development of women in collaboration with federal and provincial line departments and non-governmental organizations. These projects primarily consisted of community welfare centres, mother-children health centres, eye units, gynaecological wards, day-care centres, hostels for women, industrial homes, skill training centres, water supply schemes, women's cooperatives, credit schemes, literacy/education centres, libraries, the strengthening of female educational/technical institutions and grants-in-aid to non-governmental organizations for women's programmes. The Ministry of Women's Development has encouraged non-governmental organizations to incorporate women's development programmes by giving them funds and assistance in addition to assisting the line departments to undertake developmental projects for women. Special credit facilities for women entrepreneurs have been arranged through the First Women Bank under which the Ministry of Women's Development had deposited Rs.30 million in that Bank. During the financial year 1992-93, Rs.18 million were provided to the First Women Bank in addition to the Rs.30 million. As of 31 March 1994, the Bank had distributed Rs.49 million to 2,163 needy women. According to an interim evaluation, the women had borrowed for a variety of purposes. In rural areas, funds were used for the purchase of cows and buffaloes, Karyana Stores, stationary and general items stores, fish farming, etc. In urban areas the loans were used for operating units to produce ready-made garments, stitched and leather products, spinning, etc.

The sectoral and provincial distribution of these products under the Seventh Plan is as follows:

Sector	Punjab	Sindh	NWFP	Baluchistan	AJ & K, NA/FA	Total
Agriculture	2	1	-	-	5	8
Community development	38	16	14	11	17	96
Education and training	42	32	21	22	21	138
Health	40	22	13	8	9	92
Social welfare	18	22	17	14	10	81
Industry	-	2	-	-	-	2
Total	140	95	65	55	62	417

The above projects in the public and private sectors have helped to increase the employment potential of women and created opportunities for their self-employment leading, inter alia, to promoting equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women in employment and education.

Amendment of laws regarded as discriminatory against women: The recommendations of the Legal Rights Committee on this matter were pursued with the agencies concerned (the Ministry of Justice and Parliamentary Affairs, Ministry of Religious Affairs, and Council of Islamic Ideology), and the Ministry of Women's Development is constantly promoting them before the Council.

Establishment of a Women Computer Training Centre in Islamabad: The Women Computer Training Centre project was approved at a cost of Rs.3.864 million (including a recurring cost of Rs.2.863 million) for a period of three years. In October 1989, the departmental development working party decided that the recurring costs of the project may be spread over five years with effect from the date of commencement of the project. The project began functioning in January 1990, and completed the initial three-year period in the financial year 1992-93. The Centre has thus far conducted 28 courses giving computer training to more than 500 female trainees. On the basis of the above decision of the Departmental Development Working Party, the Secretary of the Ministry of Women's Development has agreed to the extension of the project for a period of 12 to 18 months. The Women Computer Training Centre is the only public sector organization providing computer training facilities exclusively for women. The clerical staff of the Centre is female, and the instructors engaged during 1992-93 are also females. This exclusively female environment of the Centre results in an ideal homogeneity of trainers and trainees, and has a positive bearing on skill development.

Preparation of a draft "First National Policy for Women" in collaboration with ILO and UNICEF: The Ministry is preparing a draft National Policy on Women. When ready, the draft will be discussed at seminars and workshops at both the regional and national levels. The policy will be announced after it has been approved by the Cabinet.

Establishment of women's study centres in various universities: Five centres of excellence have been established in five universities with the following objectives: (1) to introduce and promote the discipline of women's studies in Pakistan; (2) to develop some introductory or foundation courses in women's centres for university students; (3) to promote both academic and action-oriented research on women's development; (4) to critically examine concepts, theories, models and methodologies that have contributed to scientific investigation and scientific development; (5) to identify, replicate and translate the relevant material from other languages; and (6) to redefine curricula at the university, college and high-school level with a view to incorporating knowledge on women and the contribution of women scholars. All the centres are working at varied levels and pace of achievement. The best performance has been achieved by the Karachi Centre.

In addition, a Government representative referred to the written information provided. He reiterated that the Constitution of Pakistan strictly prohibited any discrimination on the basis of religion, race, sex or caste. All minorities could compete for employment. The Government had also reserved a 6 per cent quota in the public service for minorities, who were treated equally under the law. Some members of minorities were holding important positions in the public service, and there were ten seats reserved for them in the National Assembly and 23 in the Provincial Assemblies. In addition, minorities were free to contest elections for general seats. The fact that there were some ministers both in the federal and provincial governments who were members of minorities was evidence of the tolerant and harmonious atmosphere in his country. The Government had established an Advisory Council for the welfare of minorities comprising official and non-official members including members of the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies. A fund had also been created for their welfare and the improvement of their situation. A National Commission had also been established to examine the problems of minorities and make recommendations to solve them, which had held three meetings. With regard to special industrial zones, he referred the Committee to his comments in response to the observation by the Committee of Experts on the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

The Workers' members expressed appreciation for the comprehensive written report provided by the Government, but acknowledged that they had not examined it as thoroughly as they would have wished to because of the difficulty in evaluating complex documents during the course of the Conference sittings. They noted that in paragraph 1 of the report of the Committee of Experts it was stated that two Pakistani trade union organizations had transmitted comments on the application of the Convention, particularly with regard to religious minorities and women workers. They had expected that the Government would comment on these observations, but as no reference was made in the report to what the observations were, they were unable to determine precisely whether the Government had replied satisfactorily or not on that particular point. They asked whether the tripartite Task Force on Labour established by the Government had examined the exclusion of the application of labour legislation to the special industrial zones (SIZs), or whether the council that he had referred to had been given this task. They concluded by noting the difficulty in making judgements on issues of discrimination, and suggested

This year the Committee decided to discuss part of the Spanish situation and Convention No. 122 on Employment Policy in Spain. The general topic is important at present, the discussion in plenary is about this very subject and it is also very important to us. However, I cannot fail to mention with respect to this Committee and the Committee of Experts' report, the first paragraph of the observation in which the Committee again thanks the Government for having provided very specific and documented replies to most of the points that were raised in its previous observation and also thanks the Government for the fact that it has engaged in a well-founded dialogue with supervisory bodies concerning the application of the Convention. The situation in Spain is quite well known here in this House and is particularly important for this discussion to consider the report which covers nearly 100 pages of information and is quite recent. It dates from only a few months ago and covers all of the changes that have taken place in Spain to date. There have not been any major changes in legislation. The Committee of Experts has already studied all of the legislative texts and these have been well covered in the observation. What is worth stressing, however, in terms of the measures that have been taken is that in the first few months of 1995 there has been a positive trend and an improvement in the employment-unemployment ratios. According to the last report that was provided to me here in Geneva, which dates from May 1995, in 1994 the number of registered placements in the National Employment Institute was 5,939,207 people which is a new historic high, 22 per cent higher than the figure of the previous year. The data for the first quarter of 1995 confirmed the positive trend in job placement that took place with 1,897,535 placements, 44.6 per cent higher than in the same period of the previous year. In this trend towards placement the new measures that were introduced through the reforms have undoubtedly had considerable impact. Another important variable that also had a positive impact in 1994 was the unemployment in the national employment agencies since 1994. In March of this year unemployment has been reduced by 214,146 people, which is a 7.6 per cent reduction. The current unemployment rate is 16.4 per cent, which is well below, as you can see, the 24 per cent, slightly above 24 per cent, of the previous period.

Another important point to stress is that the reduction applies above all to young people in March of 1995. There were 117,446 fewer people under 25 years of age who are unemployed than in the same month of 1994. This positive trend in terms of employment, as registered by the National Employment Institute, is corroborated by the data coming in from the social security affiliates. During 1994 the social security affiliations went up by 200,600, whereas in 1993 it had fallen to 530,000. The corresponding data from March 1995 shows an increase of 2.4 per cent (291,600), compared to the previous year's statistics for social security. This is just some of the statistics that show the general trend of employment in Spain, which complements the information contained in the report up to March of 1995, and one hopes that this positive trend will continue as a reflection of an incipient but clear economic recovery. We should not forget that in economics the results can determine the effectiveness of the measures. Still, there has been criticism from the Committee of Experts of some of these same measures. Let me say that the employment policy, as a primary objective of our general economic policy in Spain, is carried out in a coordinated fashion, as indicated by the Experts and the Convention itself.

The Minister of Finance, in particular, together with the Minister of Labour and Ministries of Social Affairs, Industry and Economics are working together, which means that the specific measures taken in terms of labour relations unemployment are discussed not just in a single Ministry, such as the Labour Ministry, but rather – and here I am quoting Convention No. 122 – come from the determination and regular review of the employment policy as an integral part of an economic and social policy which is well coordinated in order to achieve, as the first Article of the Convention says, the objectives set out in Article 1.

The second point is that such measures have managed to achieve a certain balance between the position of Spanish employers and that of trade unions. This reflects the provisions of Article 3 of Convention No. 122. In the Committee of Experts' report, the observation mentions a position taken by a Spanish trade union, which as everyone knows, therefore, is opposed to the measures that have been taken, but it also must be known that the Spanish employers have said that the measures are insufficient. The purpose of the measures is to improve employment, even when clearly there is disagreement on both sides. This means that the changes that have been produced, which are already familiar to the Committee of Experts, are part of this whole balance which has to be achieved, with some difficulty at times, between the twin goals of employment and economic development. The measures taken, however, are not just taken by the Government and the Ministry of Labour, but rather are the result of the attempted and desirable coordination of all shades of opinion achieved through dialogue, and in the end, achieving broad support in the entire spectrum of views.

Following these general considerations, it is necessary to consider the specific social measures that have been adopted. The details and the statistics can be found in the reports, which are only a few months old:

1. In a free market economy, employment feels the effect of the expansion or shrinkage of enterprises which seek an appropriate balance between current income and future prospects. As we have said and is well known, at this point in our economic development, achieving this balance is rather difficult.
2. Transparency of the labour market is required in order to promote initial employment. Therefore, employment agencies and temporary-work agencies have been authorized, and these, together with the National Employment Institute, work together to try and reduce the bureaucracy involved in contacts between workers and enterprises. Regulations governing both are limited in relation to the pertinent legislation, and up to now it is not known whether these restrictions might not impede the free establishment in the Spanish market of such agencies. We have to achieve a balance. On the one hand, we have broken the monopoly of the National Employment Institute in order to reduce bureaucracy, but on the other hand, there has been considerable supervision exercised over the new agencies. We do not know yet whether we have achieved the necessary balance, given the characteristics of Spanish society. All of this is open to the readjustment that will come in time. What we cannot do is criticize in principle the measures adopted because this is an experiment which has proved successful in most free market countries. These agencies, which are now operating, tend to stress temporary employment and are sometimes criticized therefore as creating precarious employment. The contracts that may come from these agencies are the same as those which enterprises can sign directly with workers. Therefore, these agencies are neither restricting nor expanding the measures governing labour under Spanish law. All they do really is to increase transparency in the labour market, and they are governed by labour legislation.
3. Contracting, as a legal instrument, has undergone some changes which reflect the considerable care that has been taken in trying to seek the balance between the interests of workers and employers, the balance which has been referred to repeatedly.
 - (a) Only classic temporary contracts remain – specific working hours or fixed-term contracts, indeterminate contracts, contracts for new employment and the temporary contracts. We have indeed tried to respond to the concerns of the workers and to the situation in the market and this led indeed to temporary employment. The measure that was taken is now having an impact on employment policies in enterprises but we have tried to mitigate any negative impact.
 - (b) On the other hand, we have changed, though not to the extent that would be wished by the trade unions, the apprenticeship contracts – these are strictly traditional under Spanish legislation. There is nothing new in this area. In the changes that have been made we have tried to reaffirm the characteristics of the contract, that is apprenticeship, with lower minimum wages but without in any way prejudicing the bargaining that might take place in the enterprise and in the sector, and providing minimum social security guarantees. And this, everyone knows. There is a study under way now trying to modernize our social security system. Because of the youth of these workers, the social security benefits that they receive have to do with accidents and diseases in the workplace and general medical assistance, disability benefits, pregnancy benefits and protection of wage levels. They are not given any protection for loss of employment or for temporary disability.
 - (c) In terms of contracts, let us also stress the positive measures that have been adopted as part of our employment policy in order to promote stable and permanent contracting but, given the existence of the temporary contracts for promoting employment, all of the other temporary contracts, which are those which are generally found under all labour legislation, are given financial incentives to be turned into permanent contracts. This is not a question of seeking balance between employers and workers, but rather is a public measure that tries to benefit both sides in order to create stability in employment and the cost of this is paid by the entire society. Temporary contracts as a means of promoting employment are at present reduced or limited to the most disadvantaged groups of workers, that is people with disabilities, those over 45 years of age and that the written information be referred to the Committee of Experts for a thorough examination and its comments.

The Employers' members noted that this case was qualitatively different from that concerning Convention No. 87. In the latter case, gradual progress could be detected so that the resolution of the problem was in sight. However, with regard to the matter of religious discrimination they could see no immediate prospect of a resolution to the problem, because the Government this year and in 1987, 1989 and 1993 maintained the basic position that minorities were protected in Pakistan under the Constitution. However, the existence of this legislation was clearly not providing protection for certain groups of individuals. They observed that the Anti-Islamic Activities of the Qadiani Group, Lahori Group and Ahmadis (Prohibition and Punishment) Ordinance, 1984 (No. XX) continued to provide sentences of up to three years for religious groups who were propagating their faith, and that there was still discriminatory termination of employment of members of different communities serving in the public service and the armed forces. With regard to the statement that adherence to a particular religion had never been a prerequisite to joining the armed services, and that therefore the provision of statistics requested by the Experts was not required, they emphasized that in the area of discrimination one way in which discrimination could be assessed was to examine statistics regarding the composition of minorities in relation to the general population. Such statistics would be helpful to the Government in resolving this question and would provide information to the Experts that might resolve one of the problems with regard to the application of this Convention. With regard to religious discrimination when issuing passports, the inability to obtain a passport did provide a limit on employment possibilities and, therefore, they suggested that the Government should look at this issue once again. As this had been a long-standing and difficult problem, they said that the Government should take the necessary action in both law and practice to resolve it in the near future.

The Workers' member of New Zealand strongly supported the Pakistan National Federation of Trade Unions and the All-Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions who had asked that the Committee of Experts urge the Government to take measures to give practical effect to the Convention, and particularly to eliminate discrimination on the basis of religion, promote equality of opportunity, especially for women workers, and increase the awareness of all categories of society in this respect. With regard to the legal position, particularly with reference to the Anti-Islamic Activities of the Qadiani Group, Lahori Group and Ahmadis (Prohibition and Punishment) Ordinance, 1984 (No. XX), she found that the response of the Government in its written comment and before the Committee, to the observations of the Committee of Experts, was disturbing because the Government of Pakistan had absolutely rejected any need for change. It stated that minorities in Pakistan enjoyed all fundamental rights equally together with other citizens; that they were treated both justly and generously by the Government; and that the substantive impact of the restraints of Ordinance No. XX on the Ahmadis was not onerous. In its 1994 report, Amnesty International described the case of five Ahmadi journalists who were charged with blasphemy. In page 3 of the report it was stated that over a number of years various laws had in effect made it "a criminal offence for Ahmadis to profess, practise and propagate their faith". The report also referred to Ordinance No. XX and Ordinance No. XXX concerning the West Pakistan Press and Publications, sections of the Pakistan Penal Code and decisions of the Federal Shari'ah Court. The cumulative effect of these laws was clearly to deny genuine freedom of religious practice and to create an environment of hostility to Ahmadis so that attacks on Ahmadis might be carried out without the authorities in Pakistan moving to protect the lives and physical safety of members of this minority community. She then referred to the attack on 9 April 1995 of two Ahmadis, Dr. Rashid Ahmad and his son-in-law Riaz Khan, as they were about to attend a court hearing in Shab Quada in the North West Province. Riaz Khan was stoned to death and Dr. Rashid was seriously injured. She also noted that persons as young as 12 could be sentenced to death for blasphemy. In her view, non-discrimination in employment could not exist in a vacuum. If the environment in the community as a whole was discriminatory, employment practices would reflect that discrimination whether or not such discrimination was prohibited under legislation. She emphasized that this Committee must reinforce in the strongest possible terms the position of the Committee of Experts and the Pakistan Human Rights Commission which sought review of Ordinance No. XX. With regard to passport procedures, she said that she could not imagine what possible valid purpose a declaration with regard to the applicant's religion could have if there was no intention to discriminate. In her view, the statement of the Government representative before this Committee confirmed that even on this issue there was no willingness to accept ILO technical assistance. She concluded by endorsing the request of the Committee of Experts for statistics on the employment of Ahmadis and other minorities in the public service and the armed forces. Without such statistics, there was no means of confirming the accuracy of the claim of the Government that no discrimination in these services occurred on the grounds of race, religion and caste. Comprehensive statistics and data indicating that members of minority communities were distributed across all sectors of the labour market in proportion to their numbers in the population were essential to corroborate that no discrimination had occurred, particularly in view of the claims from reliable sources that Ahmadis were prevented from entering the management levels in the public service. It was her experience that governments declined to collect and publish such statistics usually when they had something to hide.

The Workers' member of Italy stated that discrimination affected women in Pakistan both because of national legislation and the customs of the country. Only 23 per cent of women over ten years of age were literate, as opposed to 50 per cent of men. Women were also subject to violence and abuse in society, and they had difficulty gaining access to employment in certain sectors such as teaching and health. In his view, in addition to the very active role of the Committee for the Defence of the Rights of Women in Pakistan and important government programmes, better legislation could bring an adequate solution to the problems encountered by women with regard to discrimination. He hoped that the fact that a woman was Prime Minister would contribute to eliminating such discrimination.

The Government representative pointed out that although a special law had been adopted that permitted the establishment of special industrial zones (SIZs), none of these zones had yet been established. The new labour policy under the consideration of Cabinet recommended that SIZs should not benefit from any exemptions with regard to labour legislation. With regard to the complaints reportedly received from two trade union organizations, he stated that these complaints were not correct because in his country there was no discrimination on the basis of creed, religion or sex, although the Constitution did contain certain provisions regarding ideology and religion. The Ahmadis professed to be Muslims, but this question was adjudicated by the Supreme Court of Pakistan which held that they were not Muslims. With regard to the passport declaration, all citizens of Pakistan who applied for passports were required to state their religion. However, this did not mean that there was discrimination with regard to job opportunities or any other matter in society. The census taken more than 14 years ago might not be very relevant, as it might not incorporate the requisite information. However, the Government would soon take a census throughout the country, and he hoped that upon completion of the census most of the relevant information regarding minorities and their involvement in various fields would be available. He stated that he would be pleased to supply this information to the Office. With regard to discrimination against women, he pointed out that the Prime Minister was a woman which in itself would create awareness about the rights and social status of women in the labour context. The Task Force on Labour recommended that a special committee be appointed to give recommendations on the socio-economic status of women and suggest immediate measures on how to improve their condition. They hoped that once the labour policy had been finalized, meaningful results would be achieved. While reiterating that although his country was an Islamic State, there was no discrimination on the basis of religion, caste or creed, he nevertheless assured that all steps would be taken to bring about further harmony in this respect.

The Committee took note of the statement of the Government representative. It also took note of the extensive observations of the Committee of Experts which had indicated the serious implications of the Anti-Islamic Activities of the Qadiani Group, Lahori Group and Ahmadis (Prohibition and Punishment) Ordinance No. XX of 1984 and the conditions for the issue of passports to Muslims for discrimination based on religion. The Committee also felt that non-application of labour legislation in special industrial zones would be a violation of the Convention. Having taken into account that the Government had furnished a report containing a plethora of details, the Committee decided to transmit the report to the Committee of Experts for a careful evaluation. The Committee also asked the Government to furnish statistical data and other information requested by the Committee of Experts. The Committee further advised the Government, as the Committee of Experts had done, to avail itself of technical assistance from the ILO for finding ways of securing total non-discrimination in law and practice.

Convention No. 122: Employment Policy, 1964

Spain (ratification: 1970). A Government representative of Spain made the following statement:

long-term unemployed whose contracts are also promoted by incentives involving social security.

(d) Provision of contracts and stability in employment is closely linked to vocational training. In this area there are no serious differences between workers and employers. However there are limits that result from the economic possibilities of the system. The three stages of training, that is basic, occupational and for promotion, which we call ongoing training, have undergone major changes in order to improve them further. With respect to the first two types of training, there has been a unitary approach to both subsystems. We have set up a national institute for professional qualifications which is the basis of providing diplomas from the Ministry of Education and Science and professional certificates that come from the Labour and Social Security Ministry. We have specified the powers of each of the two ministries involved and this shows a tremendous amount of coordination that is involved in trying to attain the objective of full employment. With respect to the third type of training, that is ongoing training, there are no real changes. Rather, we have created this on the basis of the 1993 Law on Ongoing Training and what we want to do is to finance measures and programmes for ongoing training in enterprises, otherwise as through apprenticeships. This indeed was a matter that had been criticized by the trade unions and had been a matter of concern to the employers as well. So we have paid attention to the content of the apprenticeship contracts and the training programmes which take place in the enterprises of a foundation which has been set up, which is directed by workers' and employers' organizations, which administers the public funds that are assigned for this purpose on the basis of training programmes developed by the enterprises, which then apply for funding. Here, we can talk about a lack of resources but this as well depends on the general economic situation and the report that we have recently sent contains full specific detailed information on all of these measures in the area of vocational training.

(e) We refer to regular activity in the enterprises and in this area of labour relations we have paid particular attention to finding a balance between the positions of workers and employers. The former felt that there were insufficient changes, whereas the other side felt that there had been considerable deregulation in labour legislation; and I refer to this because this was also mentioned in one of the observations of the Committee of Experts.

But let me give you a basic overview:

1. We have gone to collective bargaining for certain elements of enterprises that move from one place to another with protection for workers' rights, some of which are protected under law reducing public intervention which tended to limit the flexibility for an enterprise which, given the difficult economic situation, is essential.
2. We have also entrusted to collective bargaining certain aspects of wages and working hours but we have protected the basic aspects and the fundamental limitations increasing regulation in other areas of public protection for workers, for example, in relation to night work.
3. In terms of suspension of contracts, and an end to worker employment relationships, there have been major differences of opinion here between workers and employers. The three ways in which a contract can be ended – general or individual, because of the general economic situation, or dismissal for disciplinary reasons – have been fully regulated by the administrative authorities. Therefore, any change that was not based on major concepts was mentioned by the workers, whereas the employers felt that really nothing very important had changed. We have tried to give more power to the two parties but have safeguarded the ultimate ability of the authorities to mediate were that necessary whilst still reducing bureaucracy. It is necessary, for example, in a critical economic situation to be specific about the economic situation of the enterprise but we have tried to ensure that individual situations would not interfere with general collective results. Any dismissal for disciplinary reasons has to be carefully specified and we have always protected the basic rights of the workers. This is a broad concept which means that throughout this disciplinary procedure the Constitution provides us with considerable protection for workers on the basis of standards and possibilities for appeal by workers.

There has been some reference to deregulation but rather than deregulation we would call it reassignment of responsibilities and an attempt to adapt our regulations to the current economic situation of Spain and the need for employment and economic development.

The Employers' members thanked the Government for the information it had provided. This case had been discussed in 1988 and indirectly last year during the discussion of Convention No. 158. A distinction was drawn between Convention No. 122, which was a promotional Convention, and Convention No. 158, which regulated the conditions for termination of employment. The Employers' members questioned the relevance of connecting Convention No. 158 with Convention No. 122 when they had different objectives, merely leading to confusion.

Convention No. 122 did not set forth any precise actions for governments to take. Instead it set forth objectives for employment promotion and left room for differences in application due to varying circumstances in individual countries. Given that there was a close link with other economic and social policies, it was hard to assess the degree of the Government's accomplishments concerning the Convention. Employment promotion was a dynamic and ongoing process, particularly given the current global nature of the marketplace. Unemployment at one point had reached 22 per cent in Spain, which was quite high, but appeared to be decreasing, indicating some success in the Government's policies. This high unemployment was due in part to labour market rigidities concerning contracts, which appeared to have been relaxed, as the Government representative had mentioned in his statement. Concerning temporary contracts, these were necessary in light of the high unemployment rate, and played a role in providing employment and training opportunities to workers otherwise excluded from the labour market. The other strategies mentioned by the Government representative were a complementary part of a comprehensive approach to employment promotion. Lastly, they stressed that vocational training also played an important role, particularly in light of widespread structural adjustments.

The Workers' members indicated that they had proposed to include Spain in the list of individual cases for discussion for various reasons: to promote dialogue concerning this Convention; to call attention to the disturbing evolution of the situation of employment; to make the Government aware of the need for coherence between the general economic policy and the execution of the objective of full employment; to discuss the relationship between the functioning of the labour market and the measures adopted concerning regulation of labour and employment (concrete measures concerning labour contracts to promote employment and the conclusion of contracts of indeterminate duration); and to underline the importance of consultation with employers' and workers' organizations on all aspects of economic policy concerning employment. The Committee of Experts had underlined that the employment situation had deteriorated in the last few years. Despite certain improvements concerning flexibility which had been adopted, unemployment had reached 22.7 per cent. The number of temporary contracts amounted to a third of all contracts, which was the highest level in all of the European communities. This was an exorbitant number. Likewise, the statistics relating to the efforts of enterprise investment in the training of workers (0.6 per cent of payroll) was not encouraging. This was a preoccupation because the systems of stability in employment had a positive impact on the training and qualification of workers and reinforced enterprises' capacity for internal adaptability. In its report, the Government indicated that it was promoting employment through contracts of indeterminate duration inconsistent with the views of the present Committee. None the less, the Workers' members indicated that they wished to see more convincing results from the policy announced by the Government representative, and requested that the ILO be kept informed of the evolution in the number of contracts of indeterminate length.

Concerning social regulations (coverage for social security, the right to work, training, etc.) the Workers' members insisted that the Government guarantee to workers with temporary or part-time contracts a protection which was equal to that enjoyed by workers who had contracts without limit of time. The Government should also guarantee that the number of temporary contracts be limited and controlled in order to avoid abuses, and that measures for promotion of employment, such as contracts to facilitate entry into the workforce and apprenticeships, did not stray from their objective.

The Workers' members also indicated that the report submitted to the Committee of Experts did not contain the information requested concerning the manner in which the measures adopted in the principal areas of economic policy contributed to the pursuit of the objective of full employment. The Committee of Experts had always insisted that the economic, financial and monetary policies all be linked to the objective of full employment. This was very important. Other policies also should be developed with the objective of the pursuit of full employment. The Workers' members asked the Government to send detailed information in this respect. Lastly, they underlined that, by virtue of Article 3 of the Convention, the Government should genuinely consult the workers' and employers' organizations concerning the employment policy and its relationship to the economic policy.

The Workers' member of Spain joined in the statements of the Workers' members. He indicated that this case was brought before the Committee in 1988 and subsequently in 1990, 1991, and 1993. On these occasions the Government representative had claimed that the policies were on the right track, that positive aspects of the employment policy existed, and that many temporary contracts with beneficial results had been created. The unions, on the other hand, had denounced the 16 per cent unemployment level of 1988 (which reached 23 per cent in 1995); the danger of the general use of temporary contracts; the precarious situation for more workers as they replaced those with permanent contracts, etc. For its part, the present Committee had requested that information be provided and that measures be taken, and had insisted that the Government develop its employment policy in cooperation with the social partners. However, the Government responded by promulgating a decree in 1992, without negotiating with the unions, from which it had preferred to distance itself in the last few years. The results regarding unemployment all these years showed that the Government had followed the wrong policy. Convention No. 122 was a promotional Convention in which trends, directions and, above all, results were important. In this respect, the statistics given earlier on unemployment (23 per cent) should be considered in relation to the number of workers with precarious employment (35 per cent). These percentages should be compared with the average in the European Union (between 8 and 11 per cent unemployment) in order to arrive at the conclusion that something grave had occurred and that the employment policy did not comply with the Convention. Concerning the statistic alluded to by the Government representative that 5 million positions had been created in 1994, it must be pointed out both that "position" meant temporary contracts of short duration, in many cases as short as one or two months; and that the active labour force in Spain was 12 million, of which 5 million were contracts of short duration. The problem of massive numbers of workers losing contracts of determinate length also existed. Furthermore, the Government representative stated that the law governing the use of temporary contracts to promote employment had been derogated; but this was not correct. In 1994, six months after this "derogation" the law was reinstated. To achieve full employment, it was important to develop an effective policy which took into account social and economic factors. He insisted that the Government take account of this in the near future.

Lastly, he stated that the speech concerning employment which the Spanish Minister of Labour gave in the plenary of the Conference was perfect and could be the basis for negotiating a plan for effective employment in Spain. Since he did not believe that this was an electoral speech, he could not fail to observe that the speech did not coincide with what the present Government representative had just said.

The Employers' member from Sweden noted that there were opposing views on the legal obligations imposed by Convention No. 122. Although there was consensus that the goal of the Convention was the promotion of full and productive employment, opinions differed everywhere sharply as to the policies and measures which were best suited to achieve this goal in the long run. Therefore it was impossible to make incontestable legal assessments on the requirements following from Convention No. 122. The Committee of Experts rightly considered it necessary to look at the entirety of all the policies that touched upon employment promotion in order to make an assessment (including finance, taxation, investment, trade, prices, incomes, wages, training, labour market and social policies). Full and reliable information on each country – including all the factors which might influence employment in the long run – would also be necessary. The Committee of Experts had asked for a little more information here and a little less there. Even if the Committee received and was able to digest all the information needed, the speaker still doubted that the Committee would be able to draw any valid conclusions concerning the financial and other policies which a country was legally required to pursue, according to the Convention. Aware of these problems, the Committee had limited itself to certain isolated comments and pointers on labour market measures in Spain. This case demonstrated the need to review ILO standards, including the abolition of Convention No. 122, against which the Employers' group voted unanimously when it was adopted in 1964. In the meantime, the Committee was obliged to make comments, but should restrict itself to as few as possible.

The Committee noted the extensive statement of the Government representative. Having carefully taken into account the various aspects of the statement, the Committee called upon the Government to implement its policy so as to promote full, freely chosen, and productive employment as envisaged in Convention No. 122, maintaining consultations with the employers and workers on the matter from time to time. The Committee also called for a further full report on the consequences of their policies including in terms of developments in the employment situation.

Zambia (ratification: 1979). A Government representative of Zambia expressed appreciation for the observations and concern of the Committee of Experts. Whilst the objective of the Zambian Government's policy was promotion of full employment, the trend had been unsatisfactory over recent years, due to various factors. These ranged from a depressed economy to rising population. During the second republic, many parastatal enterprises survived on government subsidies. However, the new Government, installed in 1991, had adopted a policy not to subsidize any parastatal companies. Consequently, some companies had had to go under, in the process throwing many people out of jobs. The thrust of the government effort to create more employment had been to establish an environment in which both local and international investment could thrive. In this connection measures such as trade liberalization, deregulation of the market, strengthening of the financial sector, privatization and public reform programmes had been set up to contribute towards macroeconomic stability, with the objective of expanding the economy and employment opportunities. The effects of these measures would begin to show only later. In the immediate future the effects of the structural adjustment programme and the conditions placed on the financial assistance being provided had exacerbated the unemployment situation and the standard of living generally.

Employment in the formal sector had been contracting; on the other hand, the informal sector had grown. The informal sector was estimated to have accounted for 2.1 million people in 1993 and for 2.3 million people in 1994. In 1993 the public sector, which included the central government, local government and parastatal companies, accounted for 312,000 people, whilst the private sector accounted for 203,000; in 1994 there were 280,000 in the public sector and 202,000 in the private sector.

With regard to the distribution of jobs within the public and private sectors, before 1991, only 20 per cent of the economy was in private hands and 80 per cent was governmentally controlled, either directly or through parastatal companies. The policy of the new Government established in 1991 was to dismantle the large parastatal sector through a privatization programme, but employment continued to be dominated by the public and parastatal sectors. Various social safety nets had been put in place to soften the impact of the effects of structural adjustment. In the Ministry of Community Development, funds had been put aside for the purpose of assisting the poor and vulnerable groups. In the Ministry of Labour and Social Security a safety net had also been established to assist primarily workers who were retrenched or retired, in the form of counselling on self-employment prospects, establishment of small-scale and cottage industries, and resettlement. For the public service employees, a programme existed to assist in an alternative employment search, counsel on self-employment programmes, etc., conducted through specially organized workshops and seminars.

Concerning Article 3 of the Convention, organized labour was consulted through the Tripartite Consultative Labour Council established under the Industrial and Labour Relations Act. On this Council both the Zambia Congress of Trade Unions and the Zambia Federation of Employers were represented. The other consultative body was the National Economic Council which had much wider representation including from trade unions, employment associations, non-governmental organizations, industry and other pressure groups. From time to time other representatives participated in the Council in order to secure maximum cooperation and support.

Concerning action taken as a result of the ILO technical cooperation projects on employment, labour-intensive public works in the area of road rehabilitation had mushroomed, particularly in the rural areas. Discussions were going on with the ILO and the donor agencies to expand these activities.

Lastly, the speaker expressed the Government's wish to work closely with the ILO in fulfilment of the obligations undertaken by ratification of various Conventions including the one under discussion, and to take full advantage of the regional multidisciplinary advisory team in this connection.

The Workers' member thanked the Government representative for his precise statement, which addressed all of the questions raised by the Committee of Experts in their report. During the lengthy discussion on Convention No. 122 in respect of Spain, many of the principal and controversial issues on No. 122 were discussed, and further deliberation on the value and use of the Convention and the precise nature of the Government's responsibilities was not necessary. The Workers noted that this was the first African country discussed concerning Convention No. 122; that most often Committee discussions of cases concerning Convention No. 122 involved industrialized countries; and that it was useful to get a feel for the position in Africa, Asia and South America on the application of Convention No. 122. The Committee of Experts' observation indicated that Zambia had many of the same problems as other countries throughout the world.

The Workers' members took positive note of the existence of a framework for tripartite discussions through the National Economic Advisory Council and the Tripartite Consultative Labour Council, as tripartite consultation was particularly important. The Committee of Experts had noted that these bodies were competent to deal with matters concerning the development and utilization of manpower, but added that the importance of the rural and informal sector areas in the country demanded that workers in these areas should be involved in the tripartite discussions and requested information on the manner in which these workers were consulted on employment policies. The Workers' members pointed out that the Government representative had stated that apart from the tripartite consultation body, the National Economic Advisory Council existed which could include other interested bodies, and therefore asked the Government to confirm that the other interested bodies included representatives of both rural areas and the informal sector.

Paragraph 2 of the Committee of Experts' observation had expressed concern that the Government seemed to be accepting perhaps too calmly the massive disruption which was taking place in the restructuring of the economy. When a country was involved in a structural reorganization of its economy involving a whole series of movements from public sector to private sector work, the Convention demanded that ratifying governments take into account the very poorest in their communities. The Government representative indicated that this was precisely what the Government was trying to do. The Workers' members asked that more positive information be provided in the Government's next report on the measures taken to mitigate the impact that these policies had on the population.

The Workers' members drew attention to the Government representative's statement that many of the ILO technical cooperation projects were taking place in rural areas on public works. The Workers' members particularly welcomed this because so often only public sector projects could alleviate the poverty of some areas in the country and could assist in dealing with the structural transition of privatization and the movement of work from the public to the private sector. The Workers' members asked that in its next report to the Committee of Experts the Government give more details of the practical achievements resulting from the ILO technical cooperation projects.

The Employers' members also expressed appreciation for the information provided by the Government representative, and agreed with most of the points made by the Workers' members. They pointed out that it had been helpful to be able to have a discussion of two different cases on Convention No. 122 because they demonstrated two points quite clearly. First, there were differences in the circumstances of a developing country versus one that was somewhat more developed, and yet, there was some commonality in terms of the overall problems faced. All countries were having to deal with structural adjustment as a result of rapid and constant change throughout the world. Second, specific information as to the results of the various programmes that the Government had engaged in was required in order to have concrete discussion. One of the fundamental differences which distinguished this case from the case discussed earlier related to the very large and apparently growing informal sector, which called for quite different measures than were applicable in the earlier case. All countries sought to mitigate, where possible, the social consequences of structural adjustment, and there were two different examples of the government policies in this area in this case, especially with respect to training and education programmes targeted at ensuring some sort of distribution of the effects of structural adjustment. However, the Employers' members believed that too much emphasis could be placed in that area resulting in labour market rigidities that could result in further unemployment and urged the Government to keep this in mind.

The Workers' member of Zimbabwe stated that this case was a benchmark for Africa. Most African Governments, especially in the southern region, had embarked on the IMF and World Bank structural adjustment programmes, which were put in place primarily to create employment; but in reality, no employment policy had been put into place which promoted job creation. Because the structural adjustments emphasized the monetary side, they emphasized the shedding of excessive labour; consequently in almost all the countries, retrenchment was increasing and no new jobs had been created. The devastating effects of these structural adjustments programmes were destroying the whole fabric of African families and poverty was on the increase. Although consultation was taking place it was limited and needed to be widened, and more emphasis needed to be placed on employment creation. Full employment required both sound monetary and sound industrial relations. Participation by the whole population in the design and implementation of economic structuring and development was a precondition for mobilizing the human and the material resources essential for economic recovery and development which would enhance productivity and ensure that people's initiatives and their moral values largely contributed to the economic approach which was necessary for employment creation. The speaker called upon the Zambian Government to widen its consultation to include rural and informal sector workers and to put in place those policies that would promote employment creation.

The Government representative affirmed that consultations in the formation of policy on human resources went much wider than the employers' and workers' organizations. He took note of the views expressed, thanked all those who spoke on this case and promised to provide in its next report to the Committee of Experts all the information requested.

The Committee welcomed the statement of the Government representative indicating the safeguards taken in the context of structural adjustment to alleviate likely distress on the employment front. The Committee noted that there existed a framework for consultations with the employers and workers in the tripartite Labour Consultation Council and that the National Economic Advisory Council also could be recognized as a forum for consultations. The Committee also wanted the rural and informal sectors to be associated with such consultations. The Committee called for more positive information in its next report on the practical aspects of consultations and consequences of reform, in particular it asked for information on the impact of ILO technical cooperation on rural areas and training programmes for improving the employability of the people. The Committee particularly urged that the targeted programmes should result in the distribution of the fruits of reform amongst the poorer sections so that the objective of Convention No. 122 could really be achieved.

Convention No. 135: Workers' Representatives, 1971

Côte d'Ivoire (ratification: 1973). A Government representative referred to Act No. 92-573 of 11 September 1992 concerning termination of employment for economic reasons, which provided that all provisions in collective agreements concerning collective dismissal that were not in compliance with the Act were null and void. The procedure under this Act was confirmed by Circular No. 7585/EFP/CAB of 20 July 1993 of the Minister of Employment and the Public Service which called into question the protection of trade union representatives. It was quite understandable that the General Workers' Union of Côte d'Ivoire (UGTCI) and the Free Confederation of Côte d'Ivoire Trade Unions ("Dignité") were concerned about this situation. He was pleased to report that the new Labour Code had resolved this problem. Unlike the 1964 Labour Code, it provided for the designation, mandate and protection of trade union representatives. Under section 62.3 of the new Labour Code, trade union representatives had the same protection against termination of employment as personnel delegates. Former trade union representatives were protected for six months after the expiration of their term of office. As a result, the proper implementation of the Convention was assured both in law and in practice.

The Employers' members noted that at least some of the issues were resolved as a result of the direct contacts mission that followed the filing of the complaint before the Committee on Freedom of Association (Case No. 1594, 296th Report of the Committee approved by the Governing Body at its 261st Session, November 1994). They stated that it was necessary for the Government to submit the relevant provisions of the Labour Code to the Office regarding the issue of trade union pluralism and the question of allowing all representatives to stand for election (even at the enterprise level), to determine whether they addressed the concerns of the Experts. On some of the issues it appeared that the appropriate law did exist, but it was also necessary to be sure that such law was applied in practice, which in their view there was reason to doubt in this case. They concluded by asking that the Government describe in its next report how it intended to fully implement the above provisions of the Labour Code.

The Workers' members once again noted the willingness shown by the Government to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention, a matter which seemed to have been dealt with by the new legislation that had been in force since the beginning of the year. They joined in the remarks made by the Employers, and emphasized that it was important that the Government submit new texts for the examination of the Committee of Experts. However, they stated that trade union pluralism should also be recognized in practice through dialogue among all the parties concerned and the adequate protection of all representatives of workers. It was important that the Government send in its next report information about concrete results that had taken place pursuant to the new legislation, and regarding the re-employment of trade union delegates who were arbitrarily dismissed. The Workers' members concluded by expressing the hope that the Government would supply the information requested and that measures would be taken to avoid the recurrence of practices contrary to the Convention in the future.

The Government member of Germany stated that he was in agreement with the statements of the Employers' and Workers' members. He raised a legal question for the Office regarding the penultimate paragraph of the report of the Committee of Experts, which referred to Article 6, paragraph 2(f) of the Workers' Representatives Recommendation, 1971 (No. 143). In his view, this reference might give the impression that in order to define obligations arising under the Convention, the Committee of Experts had quoted parts of the Recommendation. This would be more than was intended by article 19, paragraph 6, subparagraph (d) of the ILO Constitution.

The Workers' member of Senegal drew attention to the threat that existed to all workers and their representatives with regard to labour protection since the Bretton Woods institutions had imposed conditions on African governments to no longer provide legal protection for workers or for their representatives. For this reason, in Senegal and in all French-speaking Africa, there no longer existed legal protection from dismissals based on economic reasons of delegates and trade union representatives and, in this regard, he added that surely the freedom to dismiss would then extend to workers and their representatives. In this sense, he asked whether it would be possible to imagine that workers' representatives and their officers would no longer be protected by the law. If this were the case, in the future neither trade union organizations nor associations of workers would continue to exist.

The Workers' member of Côte d'Ivoire was surprised at the statement that the application of the law had precedence over the existence of the law. But if a law did not exist, it was impossible to apply it. In this regard, he referred to Act No. 60/290 of 1 August 1964, the first Labour Code of his country, which was already in existence at the time of the adoption of Act No. 92/573 of 11 September 1992, which was referred to in relation to the Convention. He asked whether it would not be appropriate for the Government to gather all provisions in one single law, that would administer and regulate everything related to trade unions.

The Government representative stated that he had taken note of the suggestions made during the discussions. He pointed out that the new Labour Code had been given to the Office, so that the Committee of Experts could consult it and make any necessary comments. He reiterated that the Labour Code now dealt with all employment and labour matters, including those concerning trade unions. He did not agree that it was necessary to enact separate legislation on trade unions, as the relevant provisions were in the Labour Code. If the provisions of the Code were not adequate in this respect, proposals could be made to supplement them. He assured the Committee that the Labour Code implemented the provisions of the Convention, and that the Labour Inspectorate would supervise the application of the relevant provisions of the Code.

The Committee noted the report of the Committee of Experts, the oral information given by the Government representative, as well as the discussion that took place thereafter. The Committee took note of the direct contacts mission that went to Côte d'Ivoire in September 1994 and welcomed the Government's information that the new Labour Code had been formulated. The Committee, however, called upon the Government to adopt at a very early date appropriate measures to bring the legislation and practice into full conformity with the Convention, particularly in the matter of extending to workers' representatives full protection against prejudicial action in the context of union activity. The Committee also urged the Government to remove the provision in Act No. 92-573 of 11 September 1992 concerning dismissal for economic reasons. The Committee expressed the hope that, on the basis of the report of the Committee of Experts, it would be able to take note, at its next examination of the case, of substantial progress in the application of the Convention.

Convention No. 147: Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) 1976

Italy (ratification: 1981). The Government supplied the following information:

Article 2(a)(i) of this Convention: The Government stated that the legislation of Italy is fully in compliance with the Convention. All questions concerning hours of work, the period of time on board, accommodation of crew, remuneration, compensation, food, holidays, days of rest, conditions of employment, sickness and accident insurance etc. are regulated exhaustively and in detail by national collective agreements which bind the contracting parties. For this reason, the intervention of the Government is not necessary.

Article 2(g): Inquiries into maritime accidents are carried out in accordance with section 578 and the provisions that follow of the Shipping Code and by section 475 and the provisions that follow of the Regulations under the same Code. Inquiries into occupational accidents that are not related to a maritime accident are carried out in accordance with section 55 of the Single Text concerning occupational accidents approved by Decree No. 1124 of the President of the Republic dated 30 June 1965. The conclusions of the inquiry are sent to the judicial authorities for the appropriate penalties and to the IPSEMA (Welfare Institute for the Maritime Sector with respect to consequences for insured persons). The official results of the inquiries into occupational accidents are available to all the parties concerned.

Article 2(f): With regard to inspection, Italian regulations provide for two supervisory bodies: the Central Committee and the local committees provided for in sections 80 to 82 of Act No. 1045 of 1939. The Central Committee examines the technical documentation of the ship concerning its conditions and provides the shipowner with the appropriate comments. The local committees which operate in connection with the peripheral maritime authorities have responsibility for carrying out periodic inspections every six months or as requested in order to verify the application of the relevant provisions and, at the same time, observance of the directives made by the Central Committee. Supervision of foreign ships that dock in national ports is carried out in compliance with the Paris Memorandum. If the local maritime authorities determine that irregularities exist, they make a record of their visit, and send a copy to the competent consular authorities as determined by the nationality of the ship, and to the ILO Director-General. In this respect, within the scope of the Community a Directive, which is in the process of being approved, concerns international labour standards for the safety of ships, the prevention of contamination, and the regulation of living and working conditions on board ships. This Directive, which also includes as a reference standard ILO Convention No. 147, sets out the procedures for inspection and supervision to verify that international labour standards are respected, and must be complied with by the Government of Italy.

In addition, a Government representative referred to the written comments provided by the Government. She also stated that whatever the present Committee concluded would be communicated to the competent authorities for a detailed examination, as well as to the tripartite committee charged with consideration of questions relating to the ILO. The Italian technical administrations considered that the Convention was applied already in Italy, but agreed with the Committee of Experts that a better application was always possible. The Government respected the interpretations of the Committee of Experts.

Concerning the need to adopt legislation on the hours of work for full application of Article 2.1 of the Convention, it should be recalled that in 1991 Italy had ratified Convention No. 109, which in its third part dealt with the question of the duration of work. Although this Convention had not yet entered into force, Italy was ready to guarantee its application. In fact, hours of work for the sector covered by the Convention was regulated by collective contract which bound the parties which signed it. Respect for collective bargaining was general in both the public sector and the private sector, and there had been no indications of violations, not even on smaller ships. All shipowners adhered to the collective contract in force between the employers and the unions representing the workers covered by the Convention.

Likewise, both the maritime code and the regulations for application which established that the maritime authority controlled the composition of the crew, guaranteed the security of the crew and the ships. The "tableau d'armement", established by ministerial decree, provided for the respect of rotation of shifts as established by collective agreement. In this way the collective contract applied indirectly, and also covered provisions of the International Maritime Organization and its Conventions. Likewise, the State subsidized national state contracts awarded to enterprises, which required the approval of the Minister of Transport and the Minister of the Treasury through interministerial decrees; consequently, the substantive content of the collective contract relating to the duration of work had practically a general application. Lastly, the hours of work in this sector would also be regulated at the European level in the near future. Although some countries felt that this issue should be excluded by directives relating to the hours of work, Italy was not in favour of this exclusion. In the absence of a collective agreement, the European Commission had promised to present a specific legal instrument; and as is well known, Community standards were obligatory for all Member States.

Concerning the system of publicizing reports on the investigation of accidents, the conclusions of the investigations were sent to the Institute concerning security in the maritime sector, which published annual statistical bulletins on accidents which were widely circulated and which reached interested social groups. In the cases in which the investigations did not end in a stage of summary instructions the reports were sent to the judicial authority for consideration of criminal charges. In such cases, the sentences handed down were made public. Likewise, the Minister of Public Transportation gave an accounting each year of serious maritime accidents involving Italian ships or foreign ships in Italian ports. None the less, the Government had taken due note of the observation formulated by the Committee of Experts on this question.

The system of inspection of serious maritime accidents was regulated by the maritime code. Two levels of investigation were provided; the first was summary in nature and the second inquiry was formal. The system of inspection provided that the competent authority at the local level was the Captain of the port who conducted the commissions of inquiry. At the ministerial level, the Central Inspection of Maritime Defence before the Ministry of Transportation was the competent authority. When a serious maritime accident resulted in injuries to the worker, a system of urgent intervention existed in which the maritime authority, through an inquiry commission, carried out a preliminary summary inquiry concerning technical, administrative, and judicial aspects. The results of this inquiry were transmitted to both the Ministry of Transportation and the judicial authority to take pertinent decisions. The system of inspection in Italy was also regulated by a decree of 1991, which controlled the environment and the conditions of work on ships.

The Workers' members welcomed the information provided by the Government representative and the spirit of cooperation demonstrated, and emphasized that the Government had accepted the comments of the Committee of Experts. Concerning the points made by the Committee of Experts, the Government did not appear to have changed its position despite what the Experts had explained and clarified in the General Survey of 1990. The Government's report did not contain important information which had been requested concerning merchant marine labour standards.

Regarding the first points of the Committee of Experts, countries which ratified the Convention must adopt legislation concerning hours of work (Article 2(a)(i)). These obligations should be considered in the context of the requirements for security and the safeguarding of lives on board ships. The Experts had indicated in the General Survey of 1990 that it was essential to fix normal and reasonable hours for a working day at sea. This duration could be determined by collective agreements, but this presupposed that the collective agreements applied to all seamen. When this was not the case, it was necessary to widen the scope of application of the existing collective agreements by introducing legislation to supplement one or the other. The General Survey clarified the application of the Convention in this regard. The Government's written response was not clear since it was limited to a discussion of collective agreements between the parties concerned, without specifying the scope of application to individuals. The Government should report to the ILO on this issue.

Concerning maritime accidents, Article 2(g) of the Convention provided in part that reports on accidents be communicated to the parties concerned and the conclusions be made public. The Convention therefore imposed two conditions, but the Government had discussed only the first of these conditions, which was the communication to the interested parties. The General Survey of 1990 explained that the Convention was flexible; it was sufficient to announce publicly the final conclusion of an investigation without also publishing the full report or the intermediate reports.

Concerning the functioning of the system of inspection, the Government's report did not contain the required information on this fundamental aspect of the Convention. Written and oral information had been furnished on the instances and the procedures of control, as well as on the elaboration of a European directive concerning shipping. The Committee of Experts should analyse this information to verify if the Italian system of inspection functioned in an efficient manner.

The Employers' members indicated that the Government representative had given a lot of information but few details relating to the points raised by the Committee of Experts. The General Survey concerning the Convention demonstrated that this was one of the most difficult and interesting fields in international law; but the questions raised by the Experts in this case were relatively simple. In the first place, the Convention clearly required legislation since the question of the duration of work was regulated in Italy by collective agreements which did not apply generally. Concerning the second point (the publicizing of reports on maritime accidents (Article 2(c) of the Convention)), the Government indicated that these reports were made available to everyone but that publication was not required. This was different from the Experts' interpretation of the measures required. It was evident that the conclusions of such reports were of interest to the public, which explained why it was a provision of the Convention. Given that the attitude of the Government had not changed concerning this point, it should be asked to examine anew the Experts' point of view and should take the measures which were indicated. Concerning the functioning of the system of inspection (Article 2(f) of the Convention), the Government's report submitted to the Committee of Experts did not contain information, whereas the report form for the Convention requested very precise information. In conclusion, the Employers' members agreed with the Workers' members that the Government should examine anew the questions posed by the Experts, and they hoped that the Government would demonstrate the will to comply with the provisions of the Convention.

The Workers' member of Italy agreed with the statements made by the Workers' members, and expressed general satisfaction with the statement of the Government representative. Concerning the duration of work, collective bargaining occurred at the national level as well as within enterprises, but it was important to also protect workers in more vulnerable situations. Concerning the question of publicizing the conclusions of reports on maritime accidents, it was important that the Government apply the provisions of the Convention. It would be very useful if the Ministry of Labour convened the Italian tripartite committee charged with the questions, together with experts in the field of merchant marine before the 1996 Maritime Conference, with the objective of overcoming the problem of jurisdiction of the different ministries and of formulating legislation which would be consistent with the Convention.

The Employers' member of Italy stated that collective bargaining in Italy covered all workers in all sectors; furthermore, it applied indirectly to the labour force in every sector. The provision of the Convention specifying that the duration of the workday be regulated through legislation intended that all maritime workers be protected. This was substantially applied since the system of labour relations in Italy functioned well, and the hours of work were regulated both by a law of 1923 and by collective bargaining at the national and enterprise levels.

The Government representative took note of the statements of the different speakers. The interventions of both the Workers' member and Employers' member from Italy indicated that tripartism existed in Italy. She promised that discussions on the application of the Convention would continue in Italy and announced that the requests for information would be fulfilled, and that a report would be sent to the ILO as soon as possible.

The Committee noted the statement of the Government representative in respect of the recommendations of the Committee of Experts concerning the legislative stipulation of hours of work on board ship, the publication of accident reports and inspection arrangements. On the first two items the Government reiterated the position it had taken earlier. The Committee felt that fixation of working hours by collective agreements was not adequate and that in view of clear and mandatory legal stipulations the same should be subjected to legislation. The Committee further called upon the Government to arrange for publication of reports of inquiries into marine accidents to be truly in line with the Convention. The Committee also called for reports on further action on these matters and also on details of inspection arrangements.

Convention No. 169: Indigenous and Tribal Peoples, 1989

Mexico (ratification: 1990). The Government supplied the following information on points 4 and 5 of the observation made on this Convention:

Mexico was the first Latin American country to ratify Convention No. 169. In this way, it reiterated recognition of the country's multicultural composition, originally based in its indigenous peoples, and assumed all its responsibilities to protect and promote the development of its languages, cultures, usages, customs, resources and specific forms of social organization. This Convention has been ratified by only seven States and entered into force, upon Mexico's ratification, on 5 September 1990.

By virtue of the Convention, the Government has adopted the measures necessary to assure, on an equal footing, the rights and opportunities that the national legislation grants to other members of the population. Account was taken in the reports to the ILO of the fulfilment of the international obligations undertaken, and the Committee of Experts has noted this with satisfaction and interest, as expressed in its last report.

The Government states, in relation to point 4 of the observation, that it has begun consultations with the National Indigenous Institute, the Directorate of the Labour Inspection Service of those States of the Federation which have indigenous populations and interested organizations with a view to preparing the report which will be submitted in due course to the Committee of Experts, within the normal time period. This information will be supplementary to that already given in previous reports and will provide a broad view of the practical results obtained.

In point 5 of the observation, it is stated that the absence of basic protection for indigenous workers' rights and working conditions was one of the origins of the outbreak of violence in the State of Chiapas in January 1994. In this respect Mexico has maintained, and has been supported in this by various independent sources, that the basic cause of the conflict was the conditions of extreme poverty and economic backwardness that, unfortunately, still prevail in this zone despite the Government's efforts to remedy them.

Chiapas is the State of the Federation which has the highest level of needs for improvements in the well-being of its population. It is more than double the national average rate. More than half the inhabitants are minors under 14 years of age. The various indigenous groups that live in this State are dispersed throughout 12,000 localities which average less than 100 inhabitants.

With regard to the technical observations given in the previous report relating, among other things, to labour inspection among indigenous populations, the Committee of Experts itself recognized that "it is aware that a situation of the kind outlined in the previous report will take time to correct" and that "it hopes that the Government will keep it informed of the situation of indigenous workers in this region and elsewhere, and of the practical steps taken to improve the situation". The Committee concludes by encouraging the Government "to continue the efforts it has already made to improve the working situation". With regard to this question, the Government has begun to collect the necessary information for, on the one hand, the preparation of the next report, and, on the other hand, the adoption of the corresponding measures to give adequate attention to the problems referred to.

The Government is pleased to note that the information presented in its previous report has been described as encouraging by the Committee of Experts and it wishes to repeat to the Conference Committee on Standards its constant concern for the rights of indigenous workers, as well as their conditions of work. It is studying all the practical measures which could guarantee these rights and improve these working conditions. In addition, it is considering whether it would be useful to have recourse to the technical collaboration of the Office through its multidisciplinary team situated in San José, Costa Rica, with a view to finding the most appropriate solutions to the technical problems which might arise under this, or other, ILO Conventions ratified by Mexico.

In addition, a Government representative reiterated the written information provided.

The Workers' members emphasized that it was the first time that a case had been discussed under this Convention, which was aimed at protecting the rights of indigenous peoples and at guaranteeing their integrity. The Committee of Experts in points 4 and 5 of its observation noted that very serious problems existed with respect to the elementary protection of the rights and conditions of the workers in the rural sector, most of whom were indigenous people. It had underlined, as had other authorities, including the National Indian Institute, the absence of protection in practice for the rural workers, pointing out to the coercive recruitment practices, denial of trade union rights, non-payment of wages, etc. These practices were due notably to the total absence of labour inspection while Article 20(4) of the Convention highlighted the importance that the Government should attach to the creation of adequate labour inspection services, in particular in the rural sector.

The Workers' members noted on the basis of the information provided by the Government that there were modifications and improvements in the legislation. However, they were preoccupied with the concern that it was not enough to provide for principles in the legislation, if the legal framework and the social infrastructure were not really operational and if not enough initiative was being applied to remedy the situation. In these circumstances, the Workers' members considered that it was not really surprising to see that the population, such as the indigenous people of Chiapas, revolted against social exclusion and poverty. Referring to the Declaration and the Programme of Action adopted by the World Summit for Social Development, the Workers' members recalled that the fight against social exclusion and poverty in order to strengthen social peace and social justice should be an absolute priority of each government. To achieve this, sustainable and coordinated policy should be developed.

The Workers' members noted that, according to the Government representative, his Government wanted to apply the Convention in practice. It was important in this respect to ask the Government to implement a strong and coherent policy to guarantee, in law and in practice, protection for the workers in the rural sector and in the areas of indigenous population, as well as to insist that the Government organize an efficient system of inspection, provide detailed information on the application in practice of the Convention and, finally, that it avail itself of the technical assistance of the ILO in this area.

The Employers' members concentrated their comments on the two issues raised in paragraphs 4 and 5 of the observation of the Committee of Experts. Concerning paragraph 4, this observation was based on the report presented by the National Indian Institute which denounced serious abuses against indigenous people, such as the non-payment of wages and the denial of the right to organize. They expressed the hope that the Government would very soon take the appropriate measures to eliminate such abuses.

In respect of paragraph 5, which dealt with the acute problem in the Chiapas State, the Employers' members agreed with the Government representative that the causes of this manifestation of violence lay in the extreme poverty and the backwardness of those regions where the indigenous peoples lived. While the Employers' members recognized that the solution to this problem would require a certain time, they insisted on the fact that all efforts should be deployed in order to remedy the situation, including having recourse to the technical assistance of the ILO, and to provide detailed reports in this respect.

The Workers' member of New Zealand underlined the importance of the Convention which provided an excellent framework in order to understand the situation of indigenous and tribal peoples throughout the world. She commended the Mexican Government for ratifying this crucial Convention, providing a strong example to most other countries with indigenous peoples. In considering the report of the Committee of Experts in the case of Mexico, one had to bear in mind that the Convention recognized the aspiration of indigenous peoples to exercise control over their own institutions, ways of life and economic development and to maintain and develop their identities, languages and religions within the framework of the States in which they live. The Convention also acknowledged that in many parts of the world these peoples were unable to enjoy their fundamental human rights to the same degree as the rest of the population of the States within which they lived and that their laws, values, customs and perspectives had often been eroded.

It was clear from the report of the Committee of Experts that this was indeed the case in Mexico, in terms of evidence of serious abuses against workers in the rural sector, most of whom were indigenous. The Government had responded by saying that it had begun consultations with the National Indigenous Institute, the Directorate of the Labour Inspection Service of those States of the Federation having indigenous populations, and interested organizations with a view to preparing a report. The speaker hoped that the Government would provide detailed information on the matter.

However, not only governments had failed up to now to recognize and promote the rights of indigenous peoples but also trade unions had only recently begun to understand and incorporate indigenous peoples in their membership in ways which ensured compliance with the requirements of the Convention. For that reason, she insisted on the vital role of the labour inspectorate. By way of concluding remarks, she urged, as did the Workers' and Employers' groups, the Government, not merely to consider, but indeed to have recourse to the technical collaboration with the ILO with a view to tackling these serious problems.

The Government representative thanked all the speakers for the comments they had formulated and pointed out that the Government had developed, with the participation of indigenous communities, a systematic and coordinated programme to protect their rights and to ensure respect for their integrity. Only a month ago the President had submitted to Parliament the National Development Plan which contained five fundamental objectives for the period 1995-2000. The second of these objectives was the consolidation of a system of social conviviality with equal justice for all and resolution of conflicts. On the basis of the Plan appropriate programmes paying special attention to the problems of indigenous and rural populations should be considered. A number of chapters in this Plan were dedicated to indigenous problems. The Government indicated that it wanted to establish a new relation with the indigenous peoples to be based on the respect and the recognition of cultural diversity, and to promote the participation of indigenous peoples in the planification, definition, application and administration of programmes for the improvement of health, welfare and education of the indigenous communities.

The Committee noted with interest the written and oral information provided by the Government, as well as the discussion which had taken place. It welcomed the changes that had been made in the National Constitution and legislation to take account of the ratification of the Convention.

The Committee, while taking into account the National Development Plan of the country, noted that there were real problems in the implementation of the national labour legislation to the rural Indian populations of the country, and it was concerned that this appeared to have contributed to the unrest in the Chiapas State beginning in 1994. It also noted the indication that the Government was undertaking consultations with a view to finding solutions to these problems but regretted that the last report contained no information on the ground situation. It hoped that the Government would soon agree to receive a technical advisory mission from the Office to explore ways of improving the situation. It looked forward to receiving information for its next session indicating the achievement of substantial progress on the practical situation concerning protection for the indigenous people, including through the strengthening of inspection, which had been called for by the Committee of Experts.

II. OBSERVATIONS CONCERNING THE APPLICATION OF CONVENTIONS IN NON-METROPOLITAN TERRITORIES (ARTICLES 22 AND 35 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. General Observation

France (French Southern and Antarctic Territories). A Government representative reaffirmed that the 21 international labour Conventions applicable to the French Southern and Antarctic Territories (TAAF) applied to vessels listed in the Registry of the TAAF and to their on-board crews regardless of their nationality. In the reports due for 1992, the French Government made known the conditions under which the Conventions in question took effect. This applicability was either automatic, or in virtue of Law No. 52-1322 of 15 December 1952 setting up an Overseas Labour Code, or according to national texts which ensure the transposition. The speaker also referred to Law No. 83-581 of 5 July 1983 and to its implementing Decree of 31 August 1984 incorporating the essential standards from Conventions Nos. 92 and 133. He also specified that the Ordinance of 23 November 1987 concerning safety of vessels and annexed regulations which constituted indispensable texts in applying the aforementioned law and decree in the TAAF were presently being updated. A copy of this document would be forwarded immediately to the ILO. He then mentioned a Bill concerning the modernization of transportation which was adopted by the National Assembly on 18 November 1994 and which had still to be presented in the Senate. Article No. 27 of this Bill dealt specifically with labour rules for crews on board vessels registered in the TAAF and was based on two principles. First, that all seafarers on board these vessels were subject to the Overseas Labour Code, 1952, as well as to certain parts of the Maritime Labour Code and, second, that if the seafarers did not reside in France, the parties to the labour contract could apply the law of the residence of the seafarer to set the conditions of engagement, remuneration, leave and repatriation, as well as the regime of social protection. He emphasized that this disposition was in conformity with the International Convention concerning the Law Applicable to Contractual Obligations, which entered into force on 1 April 1991 in all French territories. Concerning the question of the applicability of the Maritime Labour Code instead of the Overseas Labour Code, the Government was of the opinion that this would not be the case. In this respect he specified that the decision in the case of Vendier vs Port autonome de Bordeaux of the social chamber of the Supreme Court on 12 January 1993 to which the Confédération Générale du Travail - Force Ouvrière (CGT-FO) referred, in no way affirmed that the Maritime Labour Code applied to the TAAF. This case involved the application of the Labour Code for metropolitan France to questions not expressly covered by the Maritime Labour Code. On the basis of the opinion of the Council of State on 27 February 1990 which indicated that, unless otherwise stated, the Maritime Labour Code did not apply to overseas territories, the Government had begun the legislative process to apply certain parts of the Maritime Labour Code to the TAAF. The speaker emphasized that litigation between the Government and the CGT Federation of Maritime Unions on the legality of Decree No. 87-190 of 20 March 1987, as amended, concerning the registration of vessels in the TAAF and in particular its conformity with international Conventions ratified by France had been before the Council of State since 1988. The decision, which would be rendered shortly, would have the value of precedent erga omnes and would be immediately forwarded to the ILO. His Government deferred until now sending the requested reports while awaiting the end of this procedure but he assured the Committee that these reports would be forwarded to the ILO in due time to allow the Committee of Experts to examine them in its next session.

The Workers' members emphasized the seriousness of this case as well as its complexity. In their opinion, it was a case of resorting to flags of convenience with foreign seafarers hired under discriminatory conditions in comparison with French seafarers who thus became unemployed. In this respect, they recalled that the National Federation of Maritime Unions (FNSM) referred in 1987 to a decision of 17 June 1986 which provided that vessels registered in the TAAF must have crews with at least 25 per cent French citizens, which allowed shipowners to hire 75 per cent of the crew at lower conditions of employment. He recalled the previous comments of the Committee of Experts as well as the discussion which took place at the Conference Committee in 1992. In addition, they referred to comments by the FNSM on 17 January 1995 concerning the non-application of international labour Conventions to vessels registered in the TAAF, as well as the observation of the CGT-FO which considered that, on the basis of the decision of the Labour Chamber of the Supreme Court on 12 January 1993, the Maritime Labour Code applied to these vessels instead of the Overseas Labour Code. They highlighted the fact that the TAAF was an uninhabited territory, except for seals and seagulls. That was sufficient to settle any doubt as to the true reasons for this registry - the application of less protective legislation than for seafarers on board vessels registered in metropolitan France. However, the case involved very complex legal questions.

Initially, the Employers' members emphasized that the problem of the unsent first reports dated from 1992 and that the Government representative provided no information on this subject. In addition, the applicability of the Conventions did not seem obvious from the information provided; in fact, the Government representative shed no light by indicating that application was ensured, according to the case, by article 55 of the French Constitution, the Maritime Labour Code or the Overseas Labour Code. This legal complexity became further complicated by the references to decisions taken or which were to be taken by the judicial institutions mentioned, such as the Supreme Court and the Council of State. For all these reasons, it was essential that the French Government provided the relevant information in writing as soon as possible so that the Experts would be able to more clearly identify the issues and decide so that the Conference Committee could get to the essence without getting lost in the complexity.

The Workers' member from Argentina emphasized that this registry, known as the "Kerguelen Registry", did not amount to a Government decision which, in order to allow shipowners to be competitive, concerned reducing the registry fees for vessels while guaranteeing the same social and labour conditions as for vessels registered in metropolitan France. On the contrary, it was a question of offering French or foreign shipowners the possibility of exploiting workers through the use of a flag of convenience. The legal entanglement here was just a smokescreen to avoid the sanction that must apply to countries which offered their flags in order to better exploit their own or foreign seafarers.

The Workers' member from France went through the background of the case, emphasizing that the Committee of Experts had been making observations on the question of TAAF registries since 1987. He highlighted the problem of discrimination, particularly concerning wages, which was brought before the Committee of Experts. The difference in salary was between four and five times less for foreign seafarers, which constituted a violation of Convention No. 111. Moreover, this practice was contrary to the Maritime Labour Code and to the Overseas Labour Code, the latter was applicable to the TAAF and established equality of salary regardless of the origin of the worker. The speaker also insisted that this territory was uninhabited and emphasized that half of the French fleet was registered there. It was a registry of flags of convenience without limitation of tonnage. The crews of the vessels which were registered there were made up of seafarers who did not benefit from the same conditions of employment and wages. These conditions were significantly lower than those for French seafarers with the same qualifications performing the same work. The speaker emphasized that the Government had created the second registry in order to put pressure on the wages and guarantees of seafarers, and he placed the responsibility on the social partners for the lack of collective bargaining for vessels registered in the TAAF. He wondered, moreover, who could negotiate on behalf of the workers on these vessels since the territory was uninhabited. In addition, the unions of French seafarers could not accept to negotiate collective agreements which would constitute discrimination based on the national origin of the seafarers. The decree of 1987 creating the Kerguelen Registry was challenged in the Council of State by the seafarers' union of the CGT, along with the officers' union of the CGT, and they hoped that the aforementioned decree would be annulled by July 1995. In any case, the Committee was not required to wait for the decision of the Council of State to decide on whether or not France respected the relevant international labour standards. He considered that in particular with regard to Conventions Nos. 98 and 111, it was necessary to appraise the setting up of a second registry for the TAAF. It was only by ending a second registry that Conventions would be respected. Moreover, the conclusions of the Committee would undoubtedly help to enlighten the Council of State on the consequences of TAAF registry and the international engagements undertaken by France. In addition, he emphasized that the conclusions of the Committee could also alert the countries concerned as to the foreseeable effects of setting up a European registry allowing discrimination between seafarers of the European Union and those of third countries in the crew of a single vessel.

Given the number of years this had been going on and the seriousness of the case, which concerned human rights and fundamental Conventions, he considered that the conclusions of the Committee should be particularly firm and request that France bring its law and practice into conformity with ratified Conventions very soon.

The Government member stated that he would forward the information from this debate to his Government which was following the matter closely.

The Chairman stated that the Committee took note of the detailed information provided by the Government representative and also of the discussion which followed. The Committee expressed its concern about the absence of detailed reports on the manner of application of the 17 Conventions mentioned in the observations of the general report, particularly in view of the ambiguity about the status of the registration of ships in the French Southern and Antarctic Territories and the legal and practical consequences thereof. The Committee urged the Government to send reports without delay and to provide full particulars to the Committee of Experts on the various comments made. It also particularly urged that the decision of the Council of State of France be sent as soon as it was made, as requested by the Committee of Experts.

III. SUBMISSION TO THE COMPETENT AUTHORITIES OF THE CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS ADOPTED BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE (ARTICLE 19 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

Observations and Information

(a) Failure to submit

The Workers' members emphasized the importance of the examination of the cases concerning countries that had not fulfilled their basic obligations under the ILO Constitution. These concerned governments that had not supplied any information indicating that the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference since the last seven sessions had been submitted to the competent authorities. They shared the concerns expressed by the Committee of Experts in paragraph 126 of the General Report not only with regard to the large number of countries concerned (20) but also the risk that those countries would find themselves in a situation involving great delays and practically insurmountable difficulties. The Constitution provided an obligation to submit newly adopted instruments within a prescribed time in order to draw to the attention of the authorities and public opinion the existence of these instruments. The Workers' members stated that paragraphs 121 and 122 of the report of the Committee of Experts indicated that many countries were late with regard to submission and in other cases submission was not accompanied by proposals on the action to be taken. They recalled that such submission was not equivalent to ratification, as all governments submitting new instruments to the competent authorities remained entirely free to either propose immediate ratification or a subsequent examination. Therefore, this submission was primarily aimed at promoting a quick but thoroughly considered decision by each member State with regard to Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference. From an examination of the list they determined that 14 of the countries mentioned were on the list last year. Like the Committee of Experts, they insisted on the need to fulfil the obligation to submit and hoped that the Governments would take the necessary measures, if necessary with the assistance of the Office and the multidisciplinary teams, to improve the situation, in particular in developing countries.

The Employers' members subscribed to the statement made by the Workers' members. They stated that once a Convention and Recommendation had been adopted, the first obligation under the Constitution was to submit the instrument to the competent authorities, and at that point it was immaterial whether the country had decided to ratify the Convention or not. This constitutional obligation was not subjected to very stringent controls, in that the Committee of Experts addressed such a failure to submit only after Conventions and Recommendations adopted at seven sessions had not been submitted. If such cases of failure to submit were addressed immediately, there would be a very large number to deal with in this Committee. The question of who the competent authorities were was no longer a contentious issue, but as a rule it was the parliament of a member State. They shared the view of the Workers' members that the Committee must be emphatic in requiring member States to comply with this obligation, and asked that the Governments in question immediately begin to consider how and when they could deal with their failure to submit to the competent authorities so that they would not reappear on the list again next year.

A Government representative of Algeria noted the comments made by the Committee of Experts, and stressed the importance attached by his country to respect of obligations of member States under the Constitution. However, he indicated that 1992 had been marked by the dissolution of the Popular National Assembly, which was the only body that had legislative powers, and its replacement by a National Advisory Council and later by a National Transitional Council in 1994. Since then, the implementation of economic reforms involved a process of preparation and modification of a significant number of legislative and regulatory texts with the involvement of all of the competent national institutions. With regard to submission, the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection regularly kept the ministerial departments informed with regard to instruments adopted during the various sessions of the Conference, and requested that they incorporate the substance of these instruments into their areas of competence. Moreover, the Ministry in question had taken the initiative of submitting the instruments concerned to the Secretariat-General of the Government for consideration by the National Transitional Council. He concluded by pointing out that this information had been communicated to the Office.

A Government representative of Ecuador said that his Government was known for attempting to comply with the various obligations that it had undertaken as a member State of the ILO. Until now his Government had complied with the obligation to submit reports and information on the application of the Conventions in his country. However, he recognized that his Government had not complied with its obligations to submit the instruments adopted at the various Conferences to the National Congress, because those standards related to a number of very different matters. In addition, since 1987 there had been three different governments, which had hindered the appropriate departments in their submissions of Conventions to Congress, as this latter body approved Conventions prior to their ratification, pursuant to the Constitution of Ecuador. The present Government clearly intended to comply with this obligation of submission and several Conventions were being studied for ratification. In this respect, the Convention adopted at the 73rd and 74th Sessions of the Conference was in the final stages of examination, and he indicated the intention to continue this process. In addition, he referred to the assistance given by the ILO through technical cooperation, and he requested the continued technical assistance of the Office to help his Government comply with this obligation. He concluded in assuring the Committee that, prior to the next Conference, Ecuador would refer to Congress most of the instruments adopted that had not yet been submitted by the competent authorities.

A Government representative of Guinea stated that his Government had taken into consideration the comments made by the Committee and that in the near future measures would be taken to give effect to this obligation. Despite the suspension of the National Assembly in 1984, at which time the Army took power, the Government had been able to study the question of submission of the instruments adopted up until the 70th Session of the Conference. He promised that once the Legislative Assembly established through elections on 11 June 1995 was in place, the Government would not fail to submit the relevant instruments.

A Government representative of Haiti emphasized the importance that his Government attached to the principal obligations under the Constitution. However, he indicated that the special situation of his country – marked in particular by the return only six months ago of the Government that had been in exile, followed in January 1995, by the end of the Parliamentary Mandate and new elections to be called between June and July 1995 – had prevented them from fulfilling this obligation. While promising that his country would fulfil this obligation once the new Assembly was in place, he once again requested the technical assistance of the Office.

A Government representative of Lesotho drew the attention of the Committee to the fact that his Government had submitted Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities previously, and apologized for its failure to submit all outstanding Conventions and Recommendations. He assured the Committee that all necessary measures were being undertaken to submit the rest of the Conventions and Recommendations to his Government's Cabinet as soon as possible, and promised the Committee that it would soon be able to note progress made in this regard.

A Government representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya began by commending the Committee of Experts for its excellent report. He then pointed out the difficulties which his country was facing because of measures imposed against it which had caused great harm in many areas, and in particular to transport and communication. For this reason his Government was deprived of its full capacity to communicate with regional and international organizations, and it was very difficult to submit and receive documents on schedule. In spite of these difficulties and hardships, he had submitted the reports required as mentioned on 8 June 1995.

A Government representative of Madagascar stated that the Government recognized its failure to comply with this obligation. He promised that it would be respected in the near future, and said that the National Assembly was already in a position to meet to consider the matter.

A Government representative of Mozambique stated that in the context of the consolidation of the peace process, of national reconciliation and of democratization, her country had ratified important ILO Conventions on freedom of association. However, the public administration had been preoccupied since the October 1994 elections by important duties that were part of this process, and this had resulted in some delay in complying with its obligations under the Constitution. In fulfilment of the promise that it had made last year, the Government had supplied a considerable number of reports and replies due to the Committee of Experts. She repeated her promise that her Government would fulfil its obligations to submit instruments adopted between the 72nd and 80th Sessions of the Conference.

A Government representative of Papua New Guinea informed the Committee that his Government would be submitting the required reports after the Conference.

A Government representative of Trinidad and Tobago was pleased to report that there had been progress in principle, and that the matter of submission to the competent authorities with regard to the Part-Time Work Convention (No. 175) and Recommendation (No. 182), 1994, had recently been addressed by the Cabinet of his Government, which had decided to place these instruments before a tripartite committee for study and recommendation with regard to ratification. He was confident that the Cabinet would also address the question of ratification of the other Conventions in the near future. He noted that his Government had recently ratified the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), which would provide an ongoing mechanism for tripartite consideration of the desirability or feasibility of ratifying the Conventions concerned. He concluded by expressing his appreciation for the assistance which had been afforded to his country as a result of the presence of the ILO Caribbean Office in Port-of-Spain.

The Workers' members, while noting the encouraging nature of the number of intentions expressed and promises made by governments with regard to submission, noted that some countries, having made promises last year that they had not kept, had not responded to the invitation by the Committee to attend the Committee. They recalled the difference that existed between the obligation to submit to the competent authorities and the proposal that a Convention be ratified, and suggested that technical assistance of the Office should make this distinction clear in order to end the confusion. While regretting that half of the countries concerned were absent from the discussion, they proposed once again that these countries be referred to in the general part of the report of the Committee.

The Employers' members noted the various explanations for the failure to submit, such as the dissolution or non-functioning of Parliament, and a change of government preventing submission to the competent authorities. However, such circumstances usually only related to a limited period of time and did not account for the failure to comply with this obligation over a fairly extensive period of time. He noted that there was a great difference between submission of adopted instruments to the competent authorities and their possible ratification; it was not necessary for these different steps to be taken concurrently. It was also not necessary to conduct a study of submission to the competent authorities, and for this reason the explanation given by one Government representative was not entirely realistic. However, if technical assistance were necessary they were sure that it would be available from the Office. In most instances they thought the failure to comply could have been prevented because there were no hardship cases. They considered it remarkable that one Government representative had said without further explanation that all instruments would be submitted immediately after the Conference, as the question then arose why his Government had failed to do so in the past. They deeply regretted the fact that so many countries mentioned under this paragraph had not attended the discussion on this point before this Committee although invited to do so, and said that these countries should be mentioned in a separate part of the report of the Committee, and that details be given in the appropriate part of the report regarding all the countries that had failed to comply with this obligation.

The Committee noted the information supplied and explanations given by the Government representatives. It also noted the specific difficulties encountered in complying with this obligation, mentioned by various speakers. Lastly, it took due note of the commitments made by several Government representatives to comply with their constitutional obligation to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities in the shortest possible time. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the countries mentioned, namely, Algeria, Central African Republic, Djibouti, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guinea, Haiti, Jamaica, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Mozambique, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Saint Lucia, Seychelles, Solomon Islands, United Republic of Tanzania, Trinidad and Tobago, and Zaire, would in the near future send in reports containing information relating to the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities. Delays and failures to submit and the increase in the number of such cases were of great concern to the Committee because these were obligations emanating from the Constitution and were essential to the effectiveness of standard-setting activities. In this connection, the Committee reiterated that the ILO could provide technical assistance to help comply with this obligation. The Committee decided to mention all these cases in the appropriate section of its General Report.

(b) Information received

Bangladesh. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has supplied information on the submission to the competent authorities of Conventions and Recommendations adopted between the 70th (1984) Session of the International Labour Conference and its 80th (1993) Session.

Congo. In response to the 1994 comment of the Committee of Experts, the Government once again indicated that the great delay in its submission to the competent authorities of various instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference was essentially related to reasons of an administrative and a material nature. The Government therefore requests the technical assistance of the Office so that it may surmount the relevant difficulties.

Costa Rica. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has supplied information on the submission to the competent authorities of Conventions and Recommendations adopted between the 71st (1985) Session of the International Labour Conference and its 81st (1994) Session.

El Salvador. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has supplied information on the submission to the competent authorities of the Convention and Recommendation adopted at the 80th (1993) Session of the International Labour Conference.

Kenya. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has supplied information on submission to the competent authorities of Conventions and Recommendations adopted between the 65th (1979) Session of the International Labour Conference and its 80th (1993) Session.

Malawi. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has supplied information on submission to the competent authorities of Conventions and Recommendations adopted between the 55th (1970) Session of the International Labour Conference and its 80th (1993) Session.

Fifth item on the agenda: Home work

Report of the Committee on Home Work

1. The Committee on Home Work was set up by the International Labour Conference at its first sitting on 6 June 1995. It was originally composed of 194 members (71 Government members, 56 Employers' members and 67 Workers' members). To achieve equality of voting strength, each Government member with the right to vote was allotted 268 votes, each Employers' member 335 votes and each Workers' member 280 votes. The composition of the Committee was modified ten times during the session and the number of votes attributed to each member was adjusted accordingly.¹

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairperson: Mrs. L. Samuel (Government member, Cyprus);

Vice-Chairpersons: Mr. A. Wild (Employers' member, United Kingdom), and Mrs. I. Van den Burg (Workers' member, the Netherlands).

Reporter: Mr. F.V. La Ruffa (Government member, United States).

¹ The following adjustments were made:

- (a) 7 June: 193 members (70 Government members with 268 votes each, 56 Employers' members with 335 votes each and 67 Workers' members with 280 votes each);
- (b) 8 June: 191 members (74 Government members with 570 votes each, 57 Employers' members with 740 votes each and 60 Workers' members with 703 votes each);
- (c) 9 June: 183 members (77 Government members with 53 votes each, 53 Employers' members with 77 votes each and 53 Workers' members with 77 votes each);
- (d) 10 June: 181 members (79 Government members with 51 votes each, 51 Employers' members with 79 votes each and 51 Workers' members with 79 votes each);
- (e) 12 June: 184 members (80 Government members with 135 votes each, 50 Employers' members with 216 votes each and 54 Workers' members with 200 votes each);
- (f) 13 June: 172 members (80 Government members with 13 votes each, 40 Employers' members with 26 votes each and 52 Workers' members with 20 votes each);
- (g) 14 June: 163 members (83 Government members with 782 votes each, 34 Employers' members with 1,909 votes each and 46 Workers' members with 1,411 votes each);
- (h) 15 June: 164 members (84 Government members with 391 votes each, 34 Employers' members with 966 votes each and 46 Workers' members with 714 votes each);
- (i) 16 June: 154 members (84 Government members with 10 votes each, 30 Employers' members with 28 votes each and 40 Workers' members with 21 votes each);
- (j) 21 June: 136 members (84 Government members with 225 votes each, 27 Employers' members with 700 votes each and 25 Workers' members with 756 votes each).

3. At its 14th sitting the Committee appointed a Drafting Committee composed of the following members: Mrs. L. Caron (Government member, Canada), Mr. A. Wild (Employers' member, United Kingdom), Mrs. I. Van den Burg (Workers' member, the Netherlands) and the Reporter of the Committee.

4. The Committee held 15 sittings. The Committee had before it Reports V(1) and V(2), prepared by the Office on the fifth item of the agenda of the Conference: "Home Work".

Introduction

5. The representative of the Secretary-General presented Reports V(1) and V(2), which had been prepared by the Office as a basis for the Committee's discussions, and in particular the Proposed Conclusions at the end of Report V(2). He emphasized the importance of the subject. Home work was a primary means of earning an income for a great number of workers throughout the world, it was on the increase in many countries, it took many forms ranging from industrial work to telework, and, in most countries, most homeworkers were women. He reviewed the advantages that home work offered to employers, workers and national economies: flexibility and reduced labour costs for employers, an opportunity to balance gainful employment and family responsibilities for workers (particularly women), its role in combating unemployment and, in some countries, its significant contribution to gross national product and export earnings. But there were also problems. Because of the isolation and weak bargaining position of homeworkers, home work often led to abuse. The most critical problems for homeworkers were low remuneration, often long hours of work, inadequate social protection and uncertain legal status. The proposed instruments reflected the ILO's long-standing concern for this often "invisible workforce". A Meeting of Experts on the Social Protection of Homeworkers had been convened by the ILO in October 1990, and its conclusions had stated the importance of national policies to improve the conditions of employment of homeworkers and afford them legal protection. The Governing Body of the ILO had endorsed the conclusions of the Meeting of Experts, and subsequently in November 1993 had placed the question of home work on the agenda of the Conference, with a view to adopting new international labour standards.

6. In commenting on the Proposed Conclusions, the representative of the Secretary-General pointed out that very few ILO instruments made any specific reference to home work. While some covered all workers without exception, thus including homeworkers, others permitted the exclusion of certain categories of workers or limited their scope to workers in enterprises or establishments. For this reason, it seemed appropriate for the Conference to address the problems of homeworkers systematically, by setting specific standards for their protection that would take account of their special characteristics. It was very important to combat the different causes of the vulnerability of homeworkers, while at the same time safeguarding the economic advantages of those who relied on home work for their livelihood.

7. To achieve these aims, the Office had drafted a short Convention made up of a few basic principles that would provide a framework for protecting homeworkers. It offered significant flexibility for member States to define and implement particular measures. Care had been taken to find formulations that were sufficiently flexible to be accepted by the Committee and by the Conference in view of comments by ILO constituents in recent discussions on international labour standards at the Conference and in the Governing Body that Conventions should establish general principles in terms sufficiently flexible to facilitate wide ratification.

8. At the time that the Proposed Conclusions in Report V(2) had been prepared, replies to the questionnaire included in Report V(1) had been received from 76 governments, and eight more had responded too late to be included. In addition, the Office had received separate replies from 29 employers' organizations and 36 workers' organizations. Concerning the form which the standards should take, the form of a Convention had been endorsed by 56 per cent of the replies from Governments, most of which supported a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. A strong minority of government replies had favoured a Recommendation only, and the employers' organizations had likewise indicated that, if there were to be new standards, they should take the form of a Recommendation. The final decision would of course lie with the Conference.

9. In addition to the form of the standards, a second important matter was the definition of "home work", which would determine the categories of workers for whom the proposed new standards were intended. This would be difficult because the definition would have to be sufficiently precise to clearly distinguish homeworkers from independent artisans or professional freelance consultants while being global in its approach and covering all homeworkers in need of protection. Having received many conflicting replies to its questionnaire, the Office had redrafted the definition to be as brief as possible, stating only the basic elements which characterized all types of home work: work that was carried out for remuneration in the home or other premises chosen by the homemaker and that resulted in a product or service specified by the employer, as long as the person performing the work did not have the degree of autonomy and did not fulfil other conditions necessary to be considered an independent worker under national laws, regulations and court decisions. This definition conformed to the majority of views expressed that the instruments should provide the basic definition of home work, but allow flexibility to take account of other criteria under national law which would distinguish homeworkers from truly independent workers. It also reflected the view that the definition should be as inclusive as possible.

10. A third important point concerned the focus of the proposed Convention, which was the obligation of member States to adopt, implement and periodically review a national policy on home work aimed at improving the situation of homeworkers. The policy was to promote equality of treatment between homeworkers and other wage-earners, taking into account the special characteristics of home work, with reference to freedom of association, protection against discrimination in employment, occupational safety and health, remuneration, social security and access to training. Once that objective was clearly established, the nature of the measures adopted to attain it and the pace of their adoption would rest with each member State. It went without saying that governments would have to consult with the employers' and workers' organizations concerned, including those of homeworkers.

11. The representative of the Secretary-General called attention to the fact that two new Points had been introduced into the proposed Convention in response to the comments received. One required national laws and regulations to specify the types of work which should be prohibited from being given out to homeworkers for reasons of health and safety. It had been brought forward from the proposed Recommendation because it was considered important to protect homeworkers from clearly dangerous work that should not be carried out in the home. The other Point concerned the use of intermediaries between the employer and the homeworker, as many of the replies had emphasized that the use of intermediaries was one of the major sources of problems for homeworkers and that in several countries the use of intermediaries had been prohibited by law. While leaving governments flexibility as to specific provisions, the Point required them to address the issue through national laws and regulations.

12. Finally, the representative of the Secretary-General noted that the proposed Recommendation included provisions that were intended either to facilitate the implementation of the proposed Convention or to provide protection in areas not covered by the Convention. It was hoped that the Proposed Conclusions adequately reflected the diverse views expressed during their formulation, and that they successfully combined recognition of the different forms of home work that existed in member States with the global relevance necessary for their successful adoption.

General discussion

13. Introducing the position of the Workers' members on the Proposed Conclusions, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson recalled the work of the Committee on Part-Time Work at the two preceding Conferences, as well as its very positive results, and likened its objectives to that of this Committee's work: to respond to the evolution in forms of employment that had left a growing number of workers outside existing means of protection. This demonstrated the topical nature of the Committee's work. The ILO was trying to provide a global matrix of social protection in harmony with the globalization of economic activity. The Workers' members believed that the setting of standards for otherwise neglected forms of employment fit well with the conclusions of the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen from 6 to 12 March 1995.

14. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson expressed surprise at assertions that had been made that standard setting was premature, given the situation that there were large numbers of homeworkers in the world. Whole industries, for instance, textile and clothing, were transferring into home work and a rapidly evolving "information society" was leading to new forms of home work, such as telework. For the Workers this subject was very topical, and the ILO very up to date in handling this phenomenon. She recalled that the discussion of the instruments on part-time work had begun with resistance from the Employers' members and a hesitant stance on the part of several Government members, but that consensus had been achieved in the end. She saw the same situation at the outset of the present deliberations, and assured the Committee that the Workers' members had no more interest in drafting unratifiable instruments than did the Government members. She emphasized the advantages of adopting a Convention. ILO procedures for supervision of implementation and follow-up would apply, there would be tripartite participation in monitoring of compliance, and ILO technical cooperation and assistance would be available to member States to facilitate implementation. The Workers' members thus supported both a Convention and Recommendation. She declared that blocking consideration of the Proposed Conclusions which contained formal instruments would serve no one's interest, and expressed confidence that a balance would be achieved between the positions of the Government, Employers' and Workers' members of the Committee.

15. The Workers' member of India stated that the number of homeworkers was increasing in the industrialized as well as in the developing world. Homeworkers often suffered from bad working conditions and the vulnerability that came from falling outside the scope of protective legislation. The sometimes invisible link between the employer and the employee was another source of vulnerability. Home-based workers were rarely covered by statistical services. None the less, information did exist on the extent of home work and showed that this form of employment concerned a considerable number of workers. He noted that home work was found in both traditional and modern industries, such as the garment, textile, leather, food and electronics sectors, and that women made up 80 per cent of homeworkers. He underlined the problems of repugnant working conditions, low pay, lack of legal protection, inaccessibility of medical treatment and child care, and lack of the right to organize and thus to be recognized. A Convention supplemented by a Recommendation was needed to adequately address these problems. Such instruments would have to be different from those covering factory workers. They should concentrate on social protection, have tripartite mechanisms of implementation and promote employment.

16. The Workers' member of Canada added that although home work was considered to be especially associated with the manufacturing and service sectors, its conditions and terms were often those of the informal sector. For example, many garment workers in her country earned less than the minimum wage. She cited telework as an example of a form of home work in industrialized countries which could lead to poor working conditions and exploitation, especially when the employment relationship was severed. Resorting to home work as a measure to assist workers in balancing work and family should not be seen as a substitute for lack of a national child-care strategy. She pointed out that the homeworker was the smallest unit of production, and frequently the last stage of a subcontracting chain. Whether a telecommuter in an industrialized country or a seamstress in a developing country, the homeworker was alone and in need of protection. She emphasized that telework must be part of the discussion, thus the definition needed to be broad enough to encompass it.

17. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson expressed the strong opposition of the Employers' members to the adoption of new standards on home work. They doubted whether this was the correct response by the ILO to what was indeed an important issue. It was not an appropriate time to take formal action on home work, which was fast changing. Data did not exist to adequately describe and analyse home work. He outlined six main themes he would discuss to explain their objection: the variety of home work and situations in which it was carried out; the inadequacy of relevant data; the adequacy of the existing legislative framework, nationally and internationally; the importance of home work to both employers and employees and the problems that would be created if premature and inappropriate regulations were adopted; initiatives which have worked in improving the situation of homeworkers; and implications of ILO activity to date and the 1990 Meeting of Experts on the Social Protection of Homeworkers.² On the first Point, he asserted that there were four distinct types of home work — “pre-industrial” home work, home work in industrialized societies, and newer forms, including telework and the work of mobile professionals — work which not only differed significantly in content but was done by different people, in different circumstances and with very different motivations. Though telework was much studied, the available data suggested that it was not yet widely practised. The Employers’ members were reluctant to see an ILO instrument enshrine a definition of home work which included evolving forms of work when such forms were not sufficiently understood and when the potential impact on society was not known. It could easily become irrelevant and cripple appropriate action in the future.

18. Expanding on the second Point, the issue of adequate data, the Employers’ Vice-Chairperson quoted from Report V(1) that better statistics on the number and characteristics of homeworkers could become available over the next five to ten years, provided national statistical agencies were informed of the need for such data. He questioned how home work could be regulated when there were no reliable statistics. He recalled that the Meeting of Experts in 1990 had not called for international instruments, but rather that the ILO should collect statistics, study ongoing changes in home work in depth, assess changing trends in international trade and its impact on homeworkers, and carry out other research, dissemination of information and technical cooperation activities. He stated that the compilers of the background paper submitted to this Meeting had been able to obtain data from only five of the 70 countries polled, and the present Report V(1) had only been able to add one survey from Algeria. In addition, the recent Fourth Tripartite Technical Meeting for the Clothing Industry (1-9 February 1995) had passed a resolution calling for more data to establish the true extent and nature of home work in the industry. Even the Statistical Office of the European Communities (EUROSTAT) was on record as saying that its own data on home work were not particularly accurate. Even in view of this lack of sufficient data from the ILO, there had been new data and publications issued since 1990. For example, a publication by the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) on Africa and an Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) publication on micro-enterprises within the institutional framework of African countries showed the difficulty of embracing different types of informal sector workers and homeworkers in one category. According to the latter study, micro-enterprises in the informal sector in Africa provided opportunities for employment, including home work, especially for the young, unskilled and those in rural areas, and thus home work was a matter of integration, not marginalization. Such emerging businesses should not be impeded or be driven underground with regulation.

19. Concerning his third Point on the existing legal framework, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson added that homeworkers were already covered by other Conventions. He referred to Report V(1), which had identified Conventions applying to home work, including the instruments on basic human rights. He questioned which issues outside this list needed to be covered (i.e. Conventions on freedom of association, forced labour, equality of opportunity and treatment, minimum age, minimum wage fixing, maternity protection and old-age insurance in industry, and Recommendations on vocational rehabilitation for the disabled and workers with family responsibilities), and wondered how many countries would be ready to ratify a broad Convention. The only purpose for a Convention on home work would be either to grant additional protection to homeworkers above those awarded to other workers or to broaden the scope of the Convention beyond those listed. He doubted that the Committee wanted to take either of these courses of action.

20. Referring to the experience of countries which had adopted legislation covering home work, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson argued that application of the legislation was difficult and, in fact, was counterproductive. The more home work had been regulated, the more underground and informal it had become. He drew attention to a statement by the Commission of the European Union, which noted that there was no evidence that distinct legislative instruments to control home work had effectively regulated home work. He added that, in Europe, where differences in economic maturity and industrial organization were least pronounced, the governments of the European Union were considering guidelines only. The situation at the ILO was more difficult, where the contrasts in member States were much more marked in forms of economic organization and evolution. In the opinion of the Employers' members, a Convention would not only be unratifiable but, if ratified and implemented, would drive home work underground and impede its development.

21. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson turned to his fourth theme and referred to the positive aspects of homeworking outlined in Report V(1): for many people, home work was the only realistic opportunity to earn a living and often provided the only employment opportunities for women with family responsibilities, recent immigrants, and for the rural and urban poor. The Employers' members acknowledged that some homeworkers might be employed in unacceptable circumstances and conditions, but since regulation did not work, the Committee should be discussing what would help to improve the lot of homeworkers. Paraphrasing the conclusions of the report of the Meeting of Experts on the Social Protection of Homeworkers (1990), he noted five areas for action: (a) understanding better who homeworkers were and where they worked; (b) developing a strategy and taking action at the local level to promote existing regulations and deal with complaints; (c) raising awareness amongst homeworkers of their rights and the services available to them, and providing them with training and support; (d) facilitating exchange of information on policies which worked; and (e) studying the evolution of telework and best practices. The Employers' Vice-

Chairperson referred to the ILO regional project on home work covering Indonesia, the Philippines and Thailand described in Report V(1). He noted the positive experience of this project, launched in 1988 and funded by the Government of Denmark, which showed the concrete progress which could be made through means other than a regulatory framework.

22. Commenting again on Report V(1), the Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that it painted a negative picture of home work and that the conclusions were not based on evidence. Data were particularly lacking for Africa. More importantly, the Report did not make an attempt to provide a cost-benefit analysis or impact analysis of the effects of regulating home work on job losses, on costs to the exchequer and on fiscal liabilities required. For these reasons, the Employers' members opposed the adoption of a Convention on home work, which they considered as inappropriate and premature. The adoption of a Convention would drive home work deeper into the informal sector and would be counterproductive. Positive steps, such as those underlined in the report of the Meeting of Experts on the Social Protection of Homeworkers, could be taken outside a regulatory framework.

23. The Government member of Australia stated that homeworkers, due to their vulnerability, required special attention and considered it important that the ILO aimed at adopting a Convention and a Recommendation. The adoption of new standards on home work was not premature. A Convention would ensure protection on a legally binding basis. She said that the Convention should be flexible enough to allow for differences in situations and to be widely ratified.

24. The Government member of Japan considered it important to adopt new standards on home work. He referred to the experience of Japan, where there were specific regulations and various measures applying to homeworkers. He noted that basic labour law was not sufficient. He added, however, that in view of the wide variations in home work and national circumstances, the instrument had to be flexible. The Committee should not aim at adopting a detailed Convention, but rather the appropriate instrument could take the form of a Recommendation.

25. The Government member of Sweden noted that home work represented an important part of the working population in many developed and developing countries, and existed in a wide variety of job situations. Industrial-type home work still predominated especially in the developing countries. In many industrialized countries, too, home work was on the increase, including telework, which covered a vast range of different occupations, from professional staff to low-skilled workers. She added that while home work could be an acceptable and useful type of work, it could also lead to abuses in terms of employment and working conditions and to exploitation of vulnerable groups. Furthermore, historically, many types of home work had been undervalued. The lack of legislation or other instruments concerning homeworkers in many countries called for action. For these reasons, the Government member of Sweden agreed that international instruments in the form of a Convention and a Recommendation could contribute to rectifying the situation. She added that the Swedish tripartite ILO Committee, in its reply to the Office questionnaire, had expressed concern that a Convention with the suggested content might duplicate existing instruments, and, in practice, turn out to work to the detriment of homeworkers by excluding them from, or neglecting them in the implementation of the general ILO Conventions. She thus welcomed the inclusion of Point 11 in the Proposed Conclusions which stipulated that the Convention should not affect more favourable provisions applicable to homeworkers under other international labour Conventions. She stressed that if the Committee decided to adopt two instruments, i.e. a Convention and a Recommendation, the Convention should be limited to general basic provisions, while detailed guidelines could be included in the Recommendation, as suggested in the draft texts. She agreed with the key principle in the Proposed Conclusions that homeworkers should have the same protection and rights as those employed in enterprises.

26. The Government member of India reported that homeworkers constituted a sizeable portion of the workforce in India. He agreed that homeworkers were not getting social protection, and welcomed the discussion on home work, which would contribute to the understanding of the problem and of solutions. He emphasized, however, that home work occurred in the context of growing unemployment in many countries and therefore the regulatory framework should not diminish employment opportunities for homeworkers. He agreed with the views expressed that over-regulation of home work should be avoided as this was likely to drive home work to the underground economy. He added that it might be difficult to define the employer-employee relationship in the context of present arrangements for home work. In the present circumstances, flexibility was needed and the Government of India, therefore, supported the adoption of a Recommendation only.

27. The Government member of China thought Report V(1) was a thorough and practical report which gave a good summary of different views of developed and developing countries and of governments, employers and trade unions, and provided a good basis for the discussion of international standards on home work. The analysis of the advantages and disadvantages in Report V(1) were consistent with reality and should help in obtaining consensus on the adoption of international standards. Referring to the situation in China, he noted that since the 1980s, China had experienced a continuous expansion of employment in the context of economic restructuring and home work had made a major contribution to that expansion. Although precise statistics were not available, it was estimated that out of 120 million workers in rural China, more than 20 million were engaged in home-based processing and service industries. Home work provided employment opportunities, especially in the rural and poverty-stricken areas, and made a valuable contribution to satisfying the needs of society. For these reasons, the Government of China encouraged and supported home work. It was expected that home work in China would further expand, hence legal protection of homeworkers had become more and more urgent. However, the implementation of standards should not affect the expansion of employment opportunities. He also stated that low levels of remuneration were an important issue for research; international standards on health and safety should specify the types of work prohibited for homeworkers and the awareness of governments, employers and workers should be raised in this respect; the issue of social security for homeworkers deserved further study; and training and support programmes should be promoted according to national circumstances. In conclusion, the Government member of China supported the adoption of new international standards on home work, but in view of differences in the conditions of countries, believed that they should take the form of a Recommendation. He added, however, that if a flexible Convention acceptable by most member States were worked out by the Committee, his Government could give it further consideration.

28. The Government member of Morocco noted that home work was a widespread and expanding phenomenon in many countries. In view of the opposing positions presented, especially with regard to the form of the proposed new standards, the Committee should take due account of all positions expressed and of specific characteristics of home work in different countries. On the basis of the conclusions of Report V(2), the Committee should determine criteria to address the issue of home work, which would constitute the basis for the elaboration of flexible and clear standards that all member States could adopt in the second discussion in 1996.

29. The Government member of the United Kingdom considered that working arrangements were best left to employers and workers to determine. Accordingly, the United Kingdom had a wide range of different working patterns which best suited individual employers' and workers' needs. One of these patterns was home work. However, in view of the diversity of tasks and work, it was not possible to refer to homeworkers as a single group. He noted that many homeworkers were highly skilled, well paid and well trained. In 1994 in the United Kingdom, some 640,000 people were working from home, of which 51 per cent were in managerial, professional or technical occupations. Over the years, the proportion of homeworkers in manufacturing jobs had decreased from 21 per cent in 1981 to 13 per cent in 1994. One reason for this change was the expansion of teleworking. The Government of the United Kingdom agreed that homeworkers should have protection in areas such as occupational safety and health, but that this should be achieved through general legislation. He reported that, in the United Kingdom, homeworkers were covered by occupational health and safety legislation, enjoyed the same employment protection as other workers, and had equality of treatment for social security. If the Proposed Conclusions in the Office text were adopted, they would be difficult to apply. He agreed with the Employers' members that many of the provisions were already covered by existing international Conventions. For these reasons, the United Kingdom considered it premature and inappropriate to adopt new standards on home work.

30. The Government member of Mexico stated that home work was a real and expanding phenomenon, regardless of the inadequacy of available information, and argued that the need for further research did not replace the need for social protection for homeworkers nor for new international standards. He considered that these standards should be flexible, take the form of a Recommendation and provide guidance for each country to act consistent with its general policies and particular conditions.

31. Replying to the concerns expressed by the Employers' members on the inadequacy of data on home work, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson maintained that, on the contrary, there was considerable information, data and documentation on experiences with home work. She referred to a list of literature which included over 100 studies on home work, and quoted statistics available on the extent of home work and telework in a large number of countries. Due to the inadequacy of statistical instruments used to collect data, the number of homeworkers was underestimated. She emphasized that a crucial factor underlying the difficulties in data collection was lack of proper registration of homeworkers, which, in turn, was a result of the absence of legislation. She quoted a conclusion in a report of the Council of Europe that legislation was a precondition for registration and better data.

32. Referring to other points made by the Employers' Vice-Chairperson concerning standards, she believed that there was a misunderstanding of the conclusions of the report of the Meeting of Experts on the Social Protection of Homeworkers (1990). She quoted the last conclusion, which said that the Governing Body should weigh the importance of the issues involved to decide on appropriate action. This did not mean that the ILO should not attempt standard setting. The Governing Body had, in fact, decided to put home work on the agenda in view of adopting standards. Regarding the existence and applicability of other ILO standards to homeworkers, she agreed that these standards applied to home work, and welcomed the same interpretation from the Employers' members. Existing standards would be the starting point, but new standards would recognize the need for specific measures on home work. This did not necessarily mean preferential treatment, but rather meant taking account of gaps that might exist because an existing standard did not take due account of the possibility that work might be done at home. For example, the regulation of hazardous substances might be sufficient to protect their use in an enterprise, but their use at home would be too dangerous. She reminded the Committee that the same Point on existing Conventions had been discussed in the Committee on Part-Time Work. About the assertion that regulation was ineffective, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson argued that, just because a regulation was not completely effective, it was no reason to reject all regulation. She referred to the Director-General's Report to the Conference in 1995, Promoting Employment, which gave a nuanced view of regulation. She agreed that over-regulation might not be effective, but that some regulations actually created favourable conditions for social and economic progress.

33. As to the issue of flexibility raised by the Employers' members, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson asserted that the proposed Convention provided optimum flexibility and was more promotional than regulatory. The main thrust was adoption of a national policy by governments according to national law and practice, taking account of national circumstances. Only some specific points, such as on occupational safety and health and inspections, entailed specific obligations. She concluded that it was important that the Committee took the time to discuss the contents of a Convention.

34. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson reiterated some of his points to clarify what he believed to be misunderstandings. First, about statistics: although something was known about the quantity of home work, it was not well understood, and there was no consistent definition. As stated in Report V(1), better statistics would only become available over the next five to ten years. Governments knew the data they had, and could judge what additional data were needed. Second, there was no correlation between real and effective protection of homeworkers and its regulation. Detailed regulation would only drive home work underground. Third, given the many kinds of home work and the differences among countries, a proper definition and appropriate international regulation could not be devised on which to base national laws. The Employers' members were not saying that nothing should be done, but efforts should be focused on promotion, education, training and the provision of information. Referring once again to the report of the Meeting of Experts on the Social Protection of Homeworkers in 1990, he stated that there had not been agreement on the need for the international regulation of home work. The Employers' members had not supported the agenda item on home work in the Governing Body, but now that the decision was with the Committee, it was premature to adopt standards in view of inadequate data and the diversity of situations, and an attempt at a "one-size-fits-all" definition of home work was inappropriate.

Consideration of the Proposed Conclusions contained in Report V(2)

A. Form of the instruments

35. On advice of the Legal Advisor that this amendment was not receivable, the Employers' members withdrew an amendment to replace Point 1 by the following text:

The International Labour Conference, noting the conclusions of the Meeting of Experts on the Social Protection of Homeworkers in 1990, calls upon the Governing Body of the ILO to request the Office to carry out the full work programme and analysis contained in the conclusions of that Meeting under "Future ILO Action". Following this the Governing Body of the ILO should reassess the need for action by the ILO in respect of home work.

36. Point 1 was adopted without change.

37. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment to delete Point 2.

38. The Government members of Canada, the Czech Republic, Hungary, Japan, the Russian Federation, Swaziland and the United Kingdom, the Government member of Egypt and the Government member of Mexico submitted amendments to delete the words "a Convention supplemented by", so that the new proposed standards would take the form of a Recommendation only.

39. The Government member of Canada recalled that when home work as a possible agenda item was discussed in the Governing Body, Canada and other member States had expressed reservations because they did not like sectoral Conventions that referred to particular categories of workers, unless there were clear reasons why such categories could not be dealt with by general and universally applicable legislation. Moreover, the discussion was premature, because of the diversity and complexity of home work, the rapid evolution of new forms and the lack of reliable data on homeworkers. But since the Governing Body had placed the item on the agenda, Canada would support new standards, but preferred a Recommendation only. The Government member of Mexico supported the statement of the Government member of Canada, as it reflected the position of Mexico. The Government member of Egypt added that if an instrument were desired by the majority of members, it should be in the form of a Recommendation, which should be extremely flexible and take account of the diversity of national situations and the different characteristics of home work.

40. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and Sweden, supported a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation, and thus opposed the amendment. Home work was increasing and homeworkers did not have the same protection as other workers, in part because they belonged to the informal sector. He rejected the argument against regulation based on the lack of information about homeworkers. Since homeworkers were in an unregulated area, not enough was known about them. Without regulation, the lack of information would be reinforced. The Government member of Norway also opposed the amendment and supported a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. Since a Convention was binding, it would provide better protection. None the less, it should be sufficiently flexible to allow the greatest number of countries to ratify.

41. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson was not convinced by the argument against a sectoral approach. Home work as a category of employment had a universal character even though there were different types and means. She stressed the importance of investigating the possibility of a Convention and a Recommendation, and noted that the Committee was not making a final decision this year on the form which the new standards should take. She reiterated the advantages of a Convention, including the supervisory and monitoring procedures in the ILO, the active measures that were linked to technical cooperation for developing countries and countries in transition, and the involvement of the social partners. She called on the Employers' and Government members to reject this amendment, and not to block the possibility of designing a flexible Convention. The proposed Convention created an obligation to have a national policy and to report on it, but did not describe the content of the policy in detail. Contrary to an implication by the Employers' Vice-Chairperson characterizing the definition of home work as a rigid box containing all sorts of homeworkers, the definition did not give obligations but described who came within the Convention. A definition was also useful for statistical purposes.

42. The Employers' members supported the amendment. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson explained that they disliked a matrix approach to Conventions which mixed sectors and different categories of workers. Home work was covered by existing Conventions. Conventions were not flexible instruments in the sense that they were legally binding and must be specific enough to be implemented in national law. Therefore the definition was crucial, since it determined who fell within all terms of the Convention. If the instrument were a Recommendation, the Employers' members could be more relaxed about the definition of home work. In a Recommendation, the definition could be the basis for an examination of the incidence of home work around the world, for example.

43. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by 53,580 votes in favour and 57,000 votes against, with 2,280 abstentions. The Employers' members then requested a record vote. The amendment was rejected by 51,190 votes in favour and 58,140 votes against, with 1,140 abstentions.³

44. Point 2 was adopted without change.

B. Definitions and scope of application

Clause (a)

45. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to insert the word "similar" between the words "other" and "premises" in sub-clause (i), to limit the types of premises where work could be done and still be considered home work since the Office text, for example, would incorrectly cover workers on their employers' premises if they freely chose to work there. The other part of the amendment was a drafting change. The Workers' members opposed the amendment because it would exclude such typical workplaces for homeworkers as garages, the streets and places in the open air where work, such as bidi rolling, was done in India.

46. In response to questions from the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairpersons on the meaning of home and premises, the representative of the Secretary-General stated that, in drafting the proposed text, the Office had taken "home" to mean the place where the worker lived, ate and slept, while "other premises" was anywhere else other than the premises of the employer. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson asked if a person would be a homeworker if he or she freely chose to work on the employers' premises. The representative of the Secretary-General indicated that the clause was not meant to cover that situation, that workers on the employer's premises were generally employees and, as such, the employer's premises were not chosen by them in the sense of the clause. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson believed that the Point did not express that intent.

47. The Government member of Canada remarked that the discussion had brought to the surface an important fact: that the organization of work and the employer-employee relationship were much different in home work than in work in an enterprise. The issue was one of the place of work being under the control of the employer. "Other premises" did not seem to exclude places under the employer's control, but the Office might be able to clarify the meaning of the text. The representative of the Secretary-General replied that it was intended to exclude the premises of the employer.

³ The Employers' members voted unanimously for the amendments. The Workers' members voted unanimously against the amendment. The Government members of the following States voted in favour of the amendment: Brazil, Canada, China, Colombia, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Germany, Honduras, Indonesia, Japan, Lebanon, Malaysia, Mexico, Morocco, Nicaragua, the Russian Federation, Thailand, Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates, the United Kingdom, the United States. The Government members of the following States voted against the amendment: Algeria, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Benin, Central African Republic, Chile, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Greece, Italy, Kuwait, Luxembourg, Malta, the Netherlands, Norway, Oman, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Slovakia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia. The Government members of the following States abstained: Argentina, Cyprus.

48. The Government member of the United States suggested language which would refer to similar premises of the worker's choice, not under the control and management of the employer. The Government member of Swaziland expressed concern that such an alternative risked making the proposed Convention too restrictive for many developing countries. He pointed out that tens of thousands of families lived in compounds provided by employers; while the husbands worked in the employers' enterprises, their wives might engage in remunerative work in homes that were actually the employers' property. These women should be covered by the proposed instruments. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson objected to the word "similar" in the amendment as originally submitted by the Employers' members and also in the version suggested by the Government member of the United States, but suggested excluding the workplace of the employer. After some discussion, the Government member of Canada proposed a subamendment so that sub-clause (i) would read: "in his or her home or in other premises of his or her own choice other than the workplace of the employer". The Workers' members supported it, while the Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the Employers' members still had concerns but could live with it if the Government and Workers' members accepted it. The amendment as subamended was adopted.

49. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to strike the reference to service in sub-clause (iii) and to designate that "product" would be "defined by national law or practice". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson explained that "product" did not refer only to material objects, but could refer to other outputs of home work. Since services were more likely to be performed by independent workers, inclusion of the term could extend the definition of "homeworker" to consultants and others who should not be covered. The amendment would place on national governments the obligation to define the term "product", with the possibility that services which were legitimately home work could come within the definition. The amendment was opposed by the Government member of France, who agreed with the principle of distinguishing homeworkers from independent workers, but felt that this distinction was not the same as the distinction between products and services. He gave examples in France of services that were provided by homeworkers, such as proofreading and secretarial work. The Workers' members also opposed the amendment, and believed that the amendment would leave the Point structurally flawed since national law and practice did not define products. The Government member of Canada was not inclined to support the amendment. Although in a generic sense "product" could be read broadly, the word "service" was useful as a reminder of the two kinds of home work, especially in view of the new types of home work. This amendment did not achieve the objective of distinguishing home work from independent work and would add unnecessary government regulation. The Government member of Germany supported the amendment, not because it was a question of independent versus dependent work, but because some governments had a problem with considering the provision of services as home work; thus it should be left to governments to define what "product" would include. The Government members of Algeria, Portugal and the United States stated their opposition to the amendment. In view of the opposition, the Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

50. The Government member of Egypt introduced an amendment to sub-clause (iii) to add that home work would be without the direct supervision of the employer. She explained that the definition should contain this phrase because it was the main criterion that characterized home work. The Employers' members supported the intent of the amendment, which was what they had been trying to do earlier in making a distinction between homeworkers and independent workers. Some homeworkers might have a high degree of supervision and others very little. However, he preferred to address the issue in a later amendment. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson also stated that the Workers' members did not oppose the intention of the amendment, but found it superfluous and out of place in the provision on work resulting in a product or service. She asked the Office for clarification of the intention. The Government member of Germany supported the amendment, noting that her country had a long tradition of home work and specific home work legislation. She believed it was important to specify that there was no supervision because, otherwise, under German legislation, these workers would be considered employees. The representative of the Secretary-General stated that the Office had decided not to include such a phrase in the definition, because in the more modern forms of home work, for example, telework, the employer could have direct control of the work done at home. In view of this possibility, the Government member of Canada opposed the amendment. The Government members of Australia, Norway and the United States also opposed the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn.

51. Amendments were introduced by the Employers' members and the Government members of Australia and the United States to delete the phrase referring to equipment, materials and other inputs in sub-clause (iii). The Employers' Vice-Chairperson justified this deletion by stating that whether the worker provided equipment, materials and other inputs was a factor in determining the degree of autonomy referred to in the last three lines of clause (a). In agreement, the Government member of the United States believed that the definition stood without the additional phrase, as did the Government member of Australia.

52. While agreeing that they did not want to complicate the definition too much, the Workers' members preferred to retain the phrase and thus opposed the amendment. In many countries, the question of equipment was crucial, since some workers were not considered homeworkers because they used their own equipment. This fact, however, did not make them independent. The Government member of Canada stated that it was important to minimize ambiguity in the definition so that a ratifying country would know what actions to take. Without the phrase, a question about the effect of which party provided equipment could arise in implementation, thus it was better to retain it. If the amendment had strong support, she would not oppose it, but otherwise agreed with the Workers' members.

53. The Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom opposed the amendment. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

54. The Government members of Austria, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom presented an amendment to modify the reference to "intermediary", by adding the words "if such intermediary is foreseen under national legislation or practice" at the end of sub-clause (iii). In response to a question about the intended meaning of "intermediary" in the text, the representative of the Secretary-General replied that the term referred to a person who acted between the worker and the employer, which was the common understanding of the term. The Government member of Italy then introduced the amendment, noting that legislation in Italy, as well as in some other countries, prohibited the use of intermediaries. The addition of this phrase would provide the appropriate safeguards for countries that had such legislation, as well as for the adoption of mechanisms of flexibility in the labour market. On this latter point, she noted that there was a vast debate in Italy and the topic had also been addressed by the International Labour Conference last year during its general discussion on private employment agencies. Though a sponsor of the amendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom had reservations about the drafting. While it had been the intention to take due account of the situation of countries which prohibited intermediaries, it was not meant to justify the use of intermediaries, or to imply that countries that did not have legislation on intermediaries should have it. The Government member of Italy interjected that there was no intent to require legislation; the amendment referred to legislation or practice.

55. The Government members of Mexico and the Syrian Arab Republic supported the amendment. The Government member of Mexico explained that the use of intermediaries was also prohibited in Mexico. Though this issue was also addressed in Point 9, it should be included here, too. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic added that the amendment would facilitate ratification by taking account of national legislation. The Employers' members also supported the amendment and suggested "permitted" might be a better word than "foreseen". The sponsors did not accept the suggestion. The Government member of Canada opposed the amendment and thought that there had been some confusion between the illustrative and the operational requirements of the clause. Her interpretation of Point 3(a)(iii) was that it was illustrative to cover a range of cases, but that it did not create an operational requirement. The amendment could be restrictive and create an operational requirement and, thus, be an obstacle to ratification for certain countries.

56. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson argued against the amendment since it would not cover the situation where there were illegal intermediaries. The use of the term intermediary in this part of the definition was not intended to define or justify the use of intermediaries, but merely to acknowledge that they did exist and might provide equipment or materials to homeworkers. She suggested adding at the end of clause (iii) the words "if any" instead of those proposed in the amendment. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said the suggested change would not meet the concern of the sponsors since it did not include a reference to legal status. The Government members of Japan and the United States also opposed the amendment since the issue was covered by Point 9 of the Proposed Conclusions.

The Government member of Norway stated that if the amendment introduced an obligation for governments to have legislation on intermediaries, she would not support it. The Government member of Italy insisted that it could not be predicted what would happen to Point 9, or whether it would clarify the use of the term intermediary within the definition of home work.

57. In response to a request for clarification, the representative of the Secretary-General stated that the Office shared the interpretation that had been presented by the Government member of Canada on the use of the term intermediary in this Point. It would not affect countries that prohibited intermediaries. The amendment was put to a vote and rejected with 5,011 votes in favour and 5,088 against, with 713 abstentions.

58. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to delete the last three lines of paragraph 3(a) and an amendment to add a new sub-clause to 3(a), which would provide another criterion for determining home work, that it be by a person: "in a position of economic dependence on one or more employers as defined by national laws, regulations or court decisions". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson requested that these two amendments be considered together as they aimed at clarifying the distinction between homeworkers and independent workers. The Chairperson ruled that they could be discussed at the same time, but would be voted on separately. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson explained that the Workers' members did not intend that the Convention cover all workers in the informal sector, but believed that the borderline between homeworkers and independent workers should be clearly drawn and realistic. Only truly autonomous work not done in economic dependence on employers should be considered independent. Thus, the purpose of the amendment was to ensure that persons working at home and in a situation of economic dependency on one or more employers would not be considered as independent workers and thus excluded from the scope of the proposed new standards. With that addition, the last three lines of clause (a) would not be needed. It was feared that the last three lines could lead to confusion and act as an escape clause where homeworkers would not be considered as such if national laws and regulations considered them as independent workers. In some countries for example, national legislation considered workers who used their own equipment or who had registered with the Chamber of Commerce as independent workers, while, in reality, they were homeworkers. The amendment text nevertheless could allow national law to define economic dependence or independence and thus distinguished freelance writers, journalists and the like, from homeworkers.

59. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson, speaking against the amendments, considered that the Office text provided a very broad definition of home work in sub-clauses (i), (ii) and (iii), which was then limited by the last three lines. Such a limit was necessary as it was essential to draw a distinction between homeworkers and independent workers. The Office text had left the definition of independent worker to national laws and regulations. The amendments proposed by the Workers' members, however, would make this distinction based on economic dependence. Persons such as freelance journalists, writers and consultants would fit all the criteria in sub-clauses (i), (ii) and (iii) and the criteria of economic dependence. There was no independent worker who was not economically dependent on employers except those who were independently wealthy.

60. The Government member of Canada considered that the main issue was to provide a practical definition that could be put into operation at the national level. It should designate what constitutes home work, as was done in sub-clauses (i)-(iii) in the Office text, and what does not constitute home work found in the last three lines of clause (a). Having considered the concerns of Workers' members, Employers' members and other Government members, the Government member of Canada said that she opposed the amendment to delete the last three lines in clause (a). She was prepared to support the other amendment to add a new sub-clause with some modifications, if the Workers' members withdrew the first amendment. The subamendment suggested by the Government member of Canada consisted of deleting the words "as defined by national laws, regulations or court decisions" from the proposed new sub-clause (iv).

61. The Government member of France considered that this Point was fundamental for the rest of the Convention. The scope of the proposed new standards should be defined in such a way that it clearly excluded real independent workers from its coverage, and, at the same time, found a solution to the problem of "fake" independent workers who should be covered. He recognized that it was difficult to address these two objectives simultaneously, and agreed with the Employers' members that the concept of economic dependence was too broad. He considered that the two amendments submitted by the Workers' members were vague and, therefore, opposed them.

62. The Government members of Australia, the Czech Republic, Japan, Norway, Switzerland and the United States supported the proposal by the Government member of Canada to consider the amendment to add a new sub-clause (iv) with some modification. They opposed the amendment to delete the last three lines of clause (a). The Government member of Swaziland similarly opposed the amendment on the deletion of the last three lines of clause (a), as this weakened the definition of home work, but supported the amendment to add a new sub-clause (iv).

63. In reply to the observations by the Employers' and Government members, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized the linkage between and the cumulative effect of the two amendments submitted by the Workers' members, which aimed at strengthening the definition of home work. Referring to the concern of the Employers' members about the concept of economic dependence, she agreed that everybody in its broadest sense could be considered as economically dependent. What mattered, however, was the combination of all the criteria specified in clause (a) with the concept of economic dependence which, she believed, would establish a clear distinction between independent workers and homeworkers. Regarding concerns expressed by Government members, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson said that she was ready to consider the modifications suggested by the Government member of Canada and supported by other Government members. She suggested that all amendments referring to this Point could be considered as a package.

64. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson opposed the suggestion of merging all amendments relating to this Point. He added that the Employers' members could consider the suggestion by the Government member of Canada, but shared the concern that the concept of economic dependence was too broad and meaningless in legal language. The Employers' members were opposed to the amendment to add a new sub-clause (iv) to clause (a) unless it was clear that it referred only to persons working at home who had employee status. In view of emerging support for a possible alternative wording of the last three lines, the Workers' members withdrew both amendments but announced that they would subamend an upcoming amendment.

65. An amendment was introduced by the Government members of Australia and the United States to make it clear that independent contractors were not included in the definition of homeworkers by including only those with status of employee. The Government member of Australia presented a subamendment so that only the words "does not fulfil other conditions" in the Office text would be replaced by the words "economic independence". This meant that persons meeting the conditions in sub-clauses (i)-(iii) would be covered as long as they did not have the degree of autonomy and economic independence necessary to be considered independent workers under national laws, regulations or court decisions. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson, noting that it was important to define who was not a homeworker because of the expansiveness of sub-clauses (i)-(iii), opposed the subamendment, stating that the Employers' members preferred the original amendment. The last three lines of clause (a) were extremely important as a basis for distinguishing customers and employers of persons working at home, for example. He believed that the two criteria of autonomy and economic independence were not sufficient indicators of an independent worker. He gave examples to illustrate that any number of factors were unreliable when applied in a specific situation; for instance, autonomy or control over work, the number of customers or employers, time for completion of work, and prices were not necessarily determinative as to whether someone was a homeworker or an independent worker. Countries should therefore make their own decisions, under their respective national laws and regulations.

66. The Workers' members supported the subamendment, as did the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Canada, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Egypt, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, the Russian Federation, South Africa, Spain, Swaziland, Sweden, Switzerland and the United Kingdom. The Government member of Canada pointed out that it was traditional in legal texts to have parameters on which to base legal interpretation. These two criteria were indicative of at least two factors — autonomy and economic independence — to analyse when determining whether a person was a homeworker or an independent worker.

67. The Employers' members introduced a subamendment to the subamendment to add the phrase "and relationship with the final customer" so that degree of autonomy, economic independence, and relationship with the final customer would be considered. The first two factors alone would not minimize confusion. This subamendment to the subamendment was opposed by the Government members of Canada, South Africa and the United States, as well as the Workers' members, who felt it was not practicable. The Employers' members withdrew the subamendment to the subamendment, but voiced grave concerns about whether the degree of autonomy and the degree of economic independence were the key indicators of whether or not a worker was independent. The amendment as subamended by the Government member of Australia was adopted. As a result of this decision, an amendment by the Employers' members to delete the reference to degree of autonomy was dropped.

68. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to insert the words "self-employed person, contractor, subcontractor or supplier" after "independent worker" to give examples of independent workers that were clearly not homeworkers. They wanted to make it clear that there were commercial and labour relationships, and a commercial one should not be considered a labour one. The Government member of Canada was prepared to support the amendment since it illustrated kinds of independent workers and did not affect the essence of the text. However, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the terms would only complicate the definition, and would create more problems by introducing other words that would need to be defined. The amendment was not supported by the Government members of Australia, South Africa, Swaziland and the United States, since it could cause new definitional problems, or narrow the definition too much. In view of the opposition, the Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

69. The Employers' members introduced an amendment to delete clause (b), the definition of employer. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson argued that this was not the normal definition of employer, which was one side to an employment contract, and could cause confusion between employers and customers, and between labour disputes and commercial disputes. He also questioned the role of the intermediary and when an intermediary would become an employer. In strongly opposing this amendment, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson considered that it was important to have a clear definition of employer in the text, otherwise the text would be unbalanced. If homeworkers were already employees in all national laws and regulations, the concept of employer in relation to a homeworker would not be problematic and, therefore, standard setting would not be necessary. Since this was not the case everywhere, this part of the definition was also crucial. The problem of labour contracts versus commercial contracts was already addressed in clause (a). On the question of intermediaries, she referred to Point 9. In this definition of employer, it was only important to acknowledge that home work might be given out through an intermediary. However, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson asked the Office to clarify the term. The representative of the Secretary-General stated that an intermediary was someone between the employer and the homeworker and thus would never be considered the employer of the homeworker.

70. Opposition to the amendment was voiced by the Government member of France, on behalf of the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom, and joined by Italy. He insisted that one of the most important problems in connection with home work was that it was hidden, and that some employers sought to evade their obligations by declaring a homeworker to be independent, or by hiding behind intermediaries. The Government member of Kuwait also opposed the amendment since it was important to mention the intermediary and omitting the definition might lead an employer to evade responsibility. Government members of Canada, Egypt, Japan, South Africa, the Syrian Arab Republic, Swaziland and Turkey also opposed the amendment. The Government member of Canada believed that the Convention should not attempt to define intermediary, which should be left to national laws and regulations. In any case, some reference should be made to employer and clause (b) was only descriptive with no operational effect. The Government member of Swaziland would have preferred that the Employers' members put forth an alternative definition if they did not like the Office text, rather than propose to delete it. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson agreed that perhaps a definition of employer was necessary but he voiced grave concerns for the possibility of ratification with the definition as proposed in the Office text. He withdrew the amendment.

71. The Government member of Egypt introduced an amendment to add language to make it clear that the employer bore the risks of economic activity. This was seconded by the Government member of Portugal on the basis that it showed how the homeworker fit into the economic context, which was dominated by the employer. The Government member of Egypt explained that when the employer supplied materials and equipment, the homeworker did not run the economic risk. Who had autonomy to make decisions and face the risk of failure was a basic distinction between homeworkers and independent workers. The Government member of Italy also supported the amendment, but asked the Office to clarify the use of the term "intermediary". The representative of the Secretary-General replied that the amendment went only to clarify the concept of employer and added nothing to the meaning of intermediary. He repeated the reason for the decision by the Office to delete the definition of intermediary suggested in the questionnaire. It had not added much given that the common meaning was someone acting between the parties. Since responsibility was placed on the employer as the giver of work, it did not seem necessary to be more specific on the range of persons who might act as intermediaries.

72. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Malta, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the amendment. The Employers' members also opposed it, while the Workers' Vice-Chairperson thought it was superfluous. The amendment was withdrawn.

73. A further amendment submitted by the Government member of Egypt proposed to provide that an employer was a person who gave out work "on the basis of a contract". The intention of the amendment was to see that homeworkers had a work contract that would spell out the working relationship and conditions of work from the outset since homeworkers generally were not covered by collective bargaining. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson directed the Government member of Egypt to other parts of the proposed Convention and Recommendation concerned with providing homeworkers with information. The definition was not the right place to insert the reference to a contract. To do so would restrict who was an employer. The Government member of Canada opposed the amendment, along with the Government members of Australia, the Czech Republic, Malta, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States, noting that a contract was more the exception than the rule when allocating home work, and agreed that its insertion would restrict the definition. Referring to the comment by the Workers' Vice-Chairperson, the Government member of Egypt agreed to withdraw the amendment, but indicated that she would place it somewhere else, since her goal was to provide the same protection as other workers had and to ensure that homeworkers were aware of their rights and obligations.

74. Point 3 was adopted as amended.

75. Two equivalent amendments were submitted, one by the Employers' members, and the other by the Government members of Austria, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom, to explicitly link Point 4 on the scope of the proposed new standards, to the definition of homeworkers in Point 3. The amendment by the above Government members, hereinafter under this Point referred to as the Government amendment, sought to add only that homeworkers were those "as defined under clause 3(a)". In contrast, the Employers' members offered a subamendment so that the standards would apply to homeworkers as defined in Point 3 above "for the primary part of their working time". The Workers' members objected to this subamendment on the grounds that it would exclude part-time homeworkers. The proposed new standards should apply to all homeworkers as defined in Point 3, irrespective of the number of hours a person carried it out. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson did not oppose the Government amendment, though it should have been evident that when the term "homeworker" was used, it had the meaning given it in the adopted definition. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson denied that the intent of the subamendment was to exclude part-time workers, since it referred to the proportion of time spent in home work, not its duration. The Employers' members were concerned about the impact of the instrument on persons who were primarily employees or independent contractors when part of their work fell within the definition of home work. He called attention to the fact that the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation called for the establishment of registers of employers of homeworkers, and that they objected to a possible obligation to register regular employees who chose to work at home on an occasional basis. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson replied that society was too complicated to permit the assignment of a person to a single work category, and that the Office text took account of the fact that a person might be an employee working in the workplace of the employer at some times and a homeworker for another employer at others. Without giving preferential treatment to homeworkers, the proposed instruments did not prevent individuals from being covered by employee-oriented Conventions when they were acting in that role.

76. The Government member of Canada supported the Government amendment, but opposed the subamendment of the Employers' members. She pointed out the difficulties that her Government would have in implementing an instrument with the suggested wording, and believed that national law and practice in member States was capable of dealing with any problems posed by an individual's having different forms of employment at different times. The Government member of Austria added her support for the Government amendment, remarking that it was important to make an explicit link between Points 3 and 4. The Government member of Switzerland opposed both the Government amendment and the subamendment, while the Government members of Algeria, the Czech Republic, Norway, South Africa, Swaziland, Turkey and the United States supported the Government amendment and opposed the subamendment by the Employers' members. The Employers' members withdrew their subamendment. The Government amendment was adopted.

77. Point 4 was adopted as amended.

C. Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention

78. After withdrawing an amendment to delete Point 5 entirely, the Employers' members submitted one to replace it with text that they explained differed from the Office text in three significant ways: the policy on home work would be within the framework of a larger national employment policy, the aim of the national policy would not be "improving the situation of homeworkers" but "maximizing job creation and eradicating poverty", and consultation would be with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, rather than including consultations with organizations concerned with homeworkers and employers of homeworkers.

79. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson, in opposing the amendment, asserted that the amendment involved a fourth change, which was to reduce the formulation and implementation of a national policy to a mere review of the situation of homeworkers. This would seriously weaken the text. Referring also to the amendment that had been submitted by the Government member of Italy, she argued that a policy toward a given issue, such as home work, could, of course, form part of a broader policy. The Workers' members believed that the Office text was adequate, using as it did the flexibility of the word "policy" to permit implementation by local action, collective bargaining or other means that did not necessarily involve direct intervention by national governments. Likewise, the concept of improving the situation of homeworkers included elements, such as the protection of their health and safety, that were missing from the amendment's focus on job creation and poverty elimination. By using "where these exist" to qualify "most representative employer and worker organizations", the proposed amendment contradicted a fundamental assumption of ILO practice, that there were "most representative" workers' and employers' organizations in member States. The use of "where they exist" to refer to organizations concerned with homeworkers was appropriate because they might not exist and it made sense to include them because the most representative organizations were not always concerned with homeworkers.

80. In response to a question from the Workers' Vice-Chairperson on the meaning of "policy", the representative of the Legal Adviser said that there was no general definition in ILO Conventions, and that the phrase "national policy" was defined by the context within which it occurred in a given instrument. She noted that, in the Office text, there were references to "national policy" under Points 5, 6 and 7 of the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention and Point 12 of the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation, and that the expression would have to be understood in terms of its use in these proposed instruments. She added that Recommendations might contain more precise indications of what a national policy should include, but in any case the meaning of the expression was flexible. In an occupational safety and health instrument, for example, it would be within the context of promoting safer and healthier conditions; in an instrument on employment policy, it would be within the context of promoting employment, and so on. The Government member of Canada asked two questions. First, did the policy have to be a separate sectoral policy or could it be part of an existing policy, such as a larger labour policy; and second, in a federal State was it the case that the policy could be developed and implemented by the authority at whatever level who had the legal competence to act. To the first question, the representative of the Legal Adviser said that the text did not predetermine this, thus it was possible to have a policy on home work within the context of other policies. To the second question, she confirmed that the ILO used "national" in contrast to "international" and did not intend it to refer exclusively to the highest level of government in member States.

81. With the clarification provided by the representative of the Legal Adviser, the Government member of Canada, speaking for the Government members of Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Switzerland, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States, opposed the amendment and preferred the Office text.

82. The Government member of France agreed that employment creation was important, and asserted that the Committee was working not only to protect homeworkers but to organize home work. He felt, however, that the Employers' formulation was perhaps too extreme in emphasizing the need to maximize job creation and eliminate poverty, and proposed the wording "with a view to creating jobs and eradicating poverty". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson considered that the expression "improving the situation of homeworkers" already included the idea of eradicating poverty, and that if more specification were needed they would like to add such other goals as raising the status of homeworkers. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

83. The Government member of Italy submitted an amendment to replace, in the second line, the words "a national policy on home work" by "within the framework of a general national employment policy, appropriate strategies". She asserted that the Office text seemed to call for the adoption of a sectoral policy that did not accord with the situation and with concrete measures addressing the labour market in Italy, as well as in many other countries.

84. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson observed that there was in fact nothing in the Office text that would force a particular policy on member States, and declared that "appropriate strategies" was too vague for a Convention, given the obligation of ratifying countries to report on their implementation of its provisions. It seemed questionable to link policy on home work exclusively to employment policy. As the Government member of Italy herself had noted, not all countries had employment policies, and there were many aspects of the protection of homeworkers that fell outside employment policy, such as equal rights between men and women and occupational safety and health. While she agreed that a policy on home work should be related to the employment policy, she stated that the Workers' members strongly opposed the proposed amendment as too restrictive.

85. The Government member of France agreed that the proposed amendment might be too restrictive, and offered a subamendment to insert the word "notably" before "within the framework" to indicate that there were other frameworks in which to place the adoption and implementation of strategies on home work. The Employers' members supported the subamendment, but suggested a subamendment to the subamendment to add the protection of homeworkers as a policy goal. This did not meet with the approval of the Workers' members. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the enumeration of elements of policy could include a large number of other items, and drew the conclusion that it was better to leave such definition to governments and retain the Office text on a national policy on home work without subordinating it to other policies.

86. The Government members of Canada, Japan, Norway, South Africa, Spain, Swaziland and Sweden all preferred the Office text. The amendment and subamendments proposed would obscure the thrust of the proposal and there was sufficient flexibility in the Office text to place home work in the policy contexts deemed appropriate. Although the Government member of Algeria supported the subamendment of the Government member of France, he found the Office text acceptable. The Government member of Italy withdrew the amendment.

87. The Employers' members reintroduced the same amendment and the subamendment that had been proposed by the Government member of France on the grounds that an explicit statement on the goals of job creation and poverty elimination provided the ILO the opportunity to give effect to the conclusions of the recent World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen from 6 to 12 March 1995. However, the Government member of France hoped to see his concerns addressed in a reformulation of the Proposed Conclusions before the second discussion in 1996. In view of the lack of support expressed by the Committee, the Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

88. Point 5 was adopted without change.

Point 6

89. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment to delete this Point.

Paragraph (1)

90. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace paragraph (1) by the following:

Any measures should, bearing in mind the special characteristics of home work, emphasize the education, training and protection of homeworkers within the national employment policies and practices.

When introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson considered that it was difficult to put the two concepts of "equality of treatment between homeworkers and other wage-earners" and "taking into account the special characteristics of home work" together. Home work, which presented special characteristics, did not lend itself to the application of the principle of equality.

The amendment, rather, emphasized the kinds of action which would help homeworkers. Such measures as education, training and protection of homeworkers would be addressed in national employment policies and practices which could be adapted to national circumstances.

91. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson observed that the Office text in Point 6(1) had a promotional character and did not entail direct obligations for governments, but rather elements that could be taken into account. It provided the opportunity and the necessary flexibility for governments to promote the principle of equality of treatment, while the amendment submitted by the Employers' members took away the principle of promoting equality of opportunity. She considered that the principle of equality of treatment and the comparison between homeworkers and other workers was an important element of the Convention, as reflected in the answers provided to the Office questionnaire. She reminded the Committee that the wording of the text was changed to take into account the answers received from governments. It established the same principle as that in the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994 (No. 175), which sets the principle of equality between part-time workers with comparable full-time workers. For these reasons, the Workers' members considered it fundamental to keep the concept of equal treatment, and were strongly opposed to the amendment submitted by the Employers' members. She further added that the proactive approach to promoting education and training for homeworkers was already included in sub-clause (f) of paragraph (2).

92. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Norway, the Russian Federation, South Africa, Swaziland, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States expressed their preference for the Office text, as did the Government members of Finland and Sweden, who opposed removing the concept of equality of treatment.

93. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson explained that, in view of the special characteristics of home work, there would be problems in applying the principle of equality of treatment. The types of activities to be undertaken for home workers, such as, for example, training, would be entirely different as compared to regular workers. What was required were fair conditions for homeworkers. He therefore suggested a subamendment to replace the word "equality" by "equity", which in his view conveyed better this concept of fairness.

94. In response, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson maintained that the Office text provided sufficient opportunity and flexibility to take into account the special characteristics of home work. She considered that fairness and equity were vague concepts. Referring to the amendment and subamendment proposed by the Employers' members, the Government member of Canada expanded on the reasons why the Government members listed above had opposed the amendment. She said that equality of treatment would not mean "identical" treatment. There were sufficient safeguards in the Office text with the expressions "to take into account special characteristics of home work" and "where appropriate" to allow for flexibility and for recognition of special circumstances of homeworkers. In addition, the amendment introduced specific requirements which would be difficult to make operational. For these reasons, she also opposed the subamendment and preferred the Office text. The Government members of Algeria, Australia, Austria, France, Poland and the United States agreed with the views of the Government member of Canada and preferred the Office text of paragraph (1). The Employers' members withdrew their amendment.

95. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete the words "where appropriate" from paragraph (1), considering them to be unnecessary as the text was sufficiently flexible without them. The Government members of Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Norway, Swaziland, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the amendment, as did the Employers' members, who believed that especially with the requirement for equality of treatment and in view of the many conditions that could apply, "where appropriate" should be kept. After not getting support for a suggestion to replace "where appropriate" by "if any", the Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

96. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment to delete in the first line of paragraph (2) the words "Equality of treatment should apply".

97. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to replace in the first line of clause (a) in paragraph (2) the word "and" by "or" was referred to the Drafting Committee.

98. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add at the end of clause (a) the following: "in particular, the right to bargain collectively and the right to act as workers' representatives". These were fundamental rights which were also recognized in the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994 (No. 175). The Government member of France said that he had been convinced by the argument of the Workers' members. The equality of treatment referred to in the proposed Convention should also apply to collective bargaining. A similar Point had been included in the Convention on Part-Time Work, 1994 (No. 175), thus it would be advisable to do the same in this Convention. The Government member of Portugal also supported the amendment.

99. The Employers' members opposed this addition which they thought would be more appropriate in the proposed Recommendation. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Norway, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, Switzerland, Turkey and the United Kingdom also opposed the amendment. The Government member of Australia explained that they were not opposed to the principle of the amendment, but their opposition was purely in the spirit of having a Convention which would be broad enough and suited to different national conditions. The Office text would help in obtaining wider ratification.

100. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson stated that there was a difference between joining organizations and participating in activities and undertaking collective bargaining or acting as workers' representatives. It was not sufficient to have the right to establish and join organizations. The Government member of Australia said that the Office text was sufficiently flexible but implicitly recognized the concerns of the Workers' members. The Government member of Canada added that the opposition expressed was not to the principle, but was of a pragmatic nature. In Canada, for example, the right of freedom of association was a fundamental right and a constitutional right. However, the system of collective bargaining was part of another body of legislation. Therefore, the amendment implied an absolute right over and above what was already included in clause (a) of paragraph (2). The right to join organizations did not give automatically the right to bargain collectively. She therefore considered that the amendment shifted from freedom of association, which was a general principle and a basic human right, to specific requirements and an absolute right where national law might impose conditions, such as recognition requirements for exclusive collective bargaining agents. This therefore could inadvertently lead to an obstacle to ratification. Besides, the Office text presupposed that homeworkers could participate in all activities, including collective bargaining, according to the collective bargaining system in a country.

101. In reply, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson said that this was not an absolute right, but a right within the principle of equality of treatment between homeworkers and other workers who had such rights. In response to a request for a clarification, the representative of the Secretary-General explained that the phrase "to participate in the activities" was sufficiently broad to include the concerns of the Workers' members. The Workers' members withdrew their amendment on the understanding that their concerns were implicitly covered by the Office text.

102. The Government members of Norway and Sweden submitted an amendment to delete clause (d), "remuneration", in paragraph (2). The Government member of Norway explained that equality of treatment between homeworkers and other wage-earners should be promoted and thus they did not disagree with the principle in paragraph (1). However, paragraph (2) could be understood as an obligation for competent authorities to ensure that equality of remuneration between homeworkers and other wage-earners was implemented by government actions. In countries such as Norway and Sweden, the questions of remuneration and wage determination were left to the social partners to be determined by collective bargaining or individual agreement. This was a well-established tradition and government interference in this system was not desirable. They feared that they would be required to change their system to ensure such control. It seemed the principle of equality was taken care of in paragraph (1) and the question of remuneration was duly addressed in the Recommendation. She asked for confirmation by the representative of the Legal Adviser, that clause (d) in paragraph (2) should be considered in conjunction with Points 5, 6(1) and 7, and that it did not imply an obligation on governments to control or interfere with established collective bargaining systems for remuneration nor with the autonomy of the social partners. She added that, if the Office confirmed that the provision would not be incompatible with the collective bargaining system in their countries, they were prepared to withdraw the amendment.

103. The representative of the Legal Adviser confirmed this interpretation. Point 6 was to be analysed in view of Points 5 and 7. The national policy was to promote equality of treatment and Point 6(2) made it clear that it applied in particular to remuneration, among other subjects. Both Points 5 and 7 foresaw roles for workers' and employers' organizations as well as governments in developing and implementing policy. Therefore, the government could promote equality of treatment in relation to remuneration in a manner consistent with the normal role it played in its labour relations system in relation to remuneration. In view of this, the Government members of Norway and Sweden withdrew the amendment.

104. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert the word "statutory" at the beginning of clause (e) in paragraph (2) so that the reference would be to statutory social security protection. He said that, in view of different systems of home work and pay and award packages and the fact that homeworkers might not work for a fixed period or might work during the same period for more than one employer, it would be difficult to allocate responsibility and thus it was inappropriate to include occupational social security benefits not provided by statute. Furthermore, it could damage job creation by increasing the cost and the complexity of creating new jobs, inhibit flexibility and restrict the freedom of employers as well as homeworkers. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson said that the explanation of the Legal Adviser in relation to remuneration was also relevant here. She emphasized that clauses (a) to (f) in paragraph (2) should be considered under the general heading of promoting the principle of equality of treatment. Promotion was the key word. Especially in countries where there was no statutory social security protection, promotion of occupational social security schemes should be made possible. The Government member of Canada said that she could support either the Office text or the proposed amendment. The Government members of Algeria, Egypt, Germany, Swaziland and the United States supported the proposed amendment. The amendment was adopted.

105. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new clause (g) in paragraph (2) on minimum age for admission to employment or work. Since the principle of promoting equality of treatment did not mean direct obligations, there were other important areas that should be included. Minimum age was one. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the Employers' members adamantly opposed child labour, therefore they supported this amendment. However, if particular areas were to be highlighted in paragraph (2), it was preferable to confine them to a small number. The Government member of France supported the amendment. The amendment was adopted.

106. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new clause (h) to include maternity protection. In view of the fact that homeworkers might have different employers and thus it would be difficult to identify who should bear the responsibility for maternity protection, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson, suggested that at least this amendment should refer only to statutory maternity protection and suggested a subamendment to that effect. The Workers' members opposed the subamendment. They observed that statutory maternity protection referred only to the social security part of maternity protection, while other aspects, such as safety and health, should also be considered. Further, employers should also provide equality of treatment for homeworkers with respect to other workers. She reminded the Committee that when discussing the Convention on Part-Time Work, the same Point had been raised, and the Committee on Part-Time Work had decided to include maternity protection without limiting it to statutory maternity protection.

107. The Chairperson sought an explanation from the Office on the meaning of statutory maternity protection. The representative of the Secretary-General said that it included what was in laws and regulations and could be more than social security benefits, such as laws on paid leave. Put to the vote, the subamendment to insert "statutory" was rejected by 8,586 votes in favour and 12,825 against, with 1,620 abstentions. The amendment was then adopted.

108. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new clause to extend the principle of equal treatment to protection against unfair termination of employment. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that the Employers' members would not support such a provision in the Convention, asserting that the definition of home work adopted earlier went beyond the normal employer-employee relationship. The amendment therefore had serious consequences for countries where national law and practice on termination covered only employees.

109. The Government member of Japan called for clarification of the scope of the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No.158), asking if it protected homeworkers. The representative of the Secretary-General responded that Convention No. 158 applied only to employed persons. Concluding that this meant that the proposed amendment would indeed entail a broadening of national legislation designed to implement Convention No.158, the Government member of Japan opposed the amendment, as did the Government members of Germany and the United States. The Government member of France favoured the principle of equality of treatment in this field too, but had problems with the term "unfair" and thought that the proposed amendment was too broad and ill-defined. He suggested reworking the idea before the Conference's second discussion.

110. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson acknowledged the broad scope of the amendment, and asked if subamending it to specify statutory protection would allay the Government members' concerns. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that the concern was not about the provisions of Convention No. 158 where protection against unfair termination applied to people in an employment relationship, but the fact that the definition of this Convention extended to persons outside the employment relationship. The Government member of Germany stressed the need to distinguish between statutory termination and statutory notice of termination. Given the existence in her country of a substantial body of law on termination, she could agree to the application of law concerning the period of notice to homeworkers, but not to a call for legislation on termination that would be extended to homeworkers.

111. The Government member of Switzerland favoured a wording of the French version of the amendment that would render the word "unfair" of the original English as "abusive" rather than "sans juste cause". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson agreed with a possible re-formulation. However, the Government member of Canada said that there could be unjust dismissal without it being abusive. In any case, she could not support the amendment because unjust dismissal provisions of termination of employment legislation were still evolving and there were variations within the various jurisdictions in Canada. In addition, there was a provision in the proposed Recommendation on termination of employment. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

112. Point 6 was adopted as amended.

New Point after Point 6

113. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new Point after Point 6 so that the national policy would ensure that homeworkers were included in basic national labour statistics. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson referred to the general discussion of the Committee which had noted the invisibility of homeworkers in statistics. The replies to the questionnaire used as the basis for Report V(2) had indicated that a large majority of countries were in favour of improving statistics on homeworkers. The Committee's discussions had also demonstrated the importance of statistics. Further, homeworkers were not explicitly mentioned in the relevant ILO Convention, the Labour Statistics Convention, 1985 (No. 160). The text of the proposed new Point was sufficiently flexible so that each country could specify the aspects that were important for national statistics. The Government members of Algeria, South Africa and Turkey also supported the amendment. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment. To effectively enforce the provisions in the Convention, it was indeed necessary to know the nature and extent of home work.

114. The Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom, opposed the amendment. The Government member of Belgium stated on their behalf that although they fully understood the need for statistics, they thought that the proposed new Point, which was not directly protecting homeworkers, would be better in the Recommendation. Some countries did not have the means to produce statistics on homeworkers, thus they would not be able to ratify the Convention even though they wished to protect homeworkers. The Government member of the United States also believed that this Point could be included in the Recommendation, for instance under the present Point 13. This view was shared by the Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Hungary, Japan, Norway, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, Switzerland and the United Kingdom.

115. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson asked the Government members to clarify the problems they had with putting the proposed new Point in a Convention. She did not want the formulation of this Point to be a barrier to ratification and was prepared to find another formulation that was more suitable. The Government member of India stated that it would be very difficult to collect and update statistics on home work since the costs would be very high. His Government did not have the resources and was already overburdened. Noting that even though her country already collected statistics that would meet the provision if included in a Convention, the Government member of Australia considered that given the wide variety of practices around the world, the Convention should be as flexible as possible to allow for as many ratifications as possible. Details should be left in the Recommendation.

116. Since both the Workers' and Employers' members supported the original amendment, it was adopted. In view of the opposition from various governments, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson announced that she would try to meet their concerns in the second discussion.

117. The new Point was adopted.

Point 7

118. Point 7 was adopted without change.

119. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment to replace the Office text, which they felt was too strict, with the text of Point 29 of the Recommendation. They would instead favour two amendments to come on this Point. They noted that, with regard to health and safety issues, the problem was not the types of work done by homeworkers, but the circumstances and conditions under which work was carried out.

120. An amendment submitted by the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and Sweden, and an amendment submitted by the Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Malta, Norway, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, Switzerland and the United States proposed to replace Point 8 by the following:

National laws and regulations should establish conditions under which for reasons of safety and health certain types of home work may be prohibited.

The Government member of France explained that the amendment was aimed at the concerns of a number of countries that did not have a practice of establishing lists of work prohibited for safety reasons. They fully supported the principle in the Office text, but preferred more general language. Agreeing with the previous speaker, the Government member of Canada added that a listing would soon be out of date, and a broader-based approach was more appropriate.

121. In an attempt to understand better why the Governments had introduced the amendment, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson suggested that there might be a problem with the word "specify" in the Office text. She knew from European experience that there were lists of dangerous substances specified in regulations, not necessarily in laws, with procedures for updating, which were less onerous than amending legislation. The Government member of France argued that if the Office text were maintained, it would be difficult to ratify. There was already a reference to safety and health under clause (c) of Point 6(2). The amendment referred to the establishment of prior conditions under which certain types of home work might be prohibited. This was more consistent with the approach of countries which preferred to proceed step by step, rather than to establish such lists. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson agreed, emphasizing that health and safety concerns were very important, but it was the conditions under which work was carried out, not necessarily the type of work, which would cause a safety and health concern.

122. The Government member of Italy preferred the Office text. She sought an explanation on the implications of Point 8. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that when this Point was included, the aim was to cover the situation where work could be done in a factory but where it would be too dangerous to be done in a home. For example, work involving explosives might be safe at a factory, subject to factory regulations, but should not be done at home. Therefore, some types of home work should be prohibited. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson then queried whether, according to the formulation in the present Office text, this could only be done through legislation or whether there were other methods of establishing such lists. The representative of the Secretary-General stated that there were several possibilities, such as by regulation, in an annex which could be easily amendable, or in a law itself.

123. The Workers' members proposed a subamendment so that "determine" would replace "specify", and so that in addition to determining conditions, national laws and regulations would also determine certain types of work which should be prohibited as home work. After some discussion, the representative of the Secretary-General pointed out the difference between the amendment and the proposed subamendment. The subamendment reintroduced the idea of a list of the types of home work that should be prohibited for safety and health reasons, an idea which the amendment proposed to delete. Put to a vote, the subamendment was rejected by 1,118 votes in favour and 1,547 against with 13 abstentions. The amendment was then adopted.

124. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert a reference to "substances" which should be prohibited in home work. It was not only work but the use of certain substances which could be too dangerous for home work, such as lead and explosive chemicals. The Government member of France supported this amendment. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson agreed with the intent of the amendment, but thought that it was already implicit in the concept of conditions that would make work unsafe and thus adequately covered by the amendment that had just been adopted. The Government member of Australia subamended the amendment, to read as follows: "certain types of work and the use of certain substances may be prohibited in home work". The amendment as subamended was adopted.

125. Point 8 was adopted as amended.

New Point after Point 8

126. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to insert a new Point referring to a minimum age for home work, as it had already been added to Point 6(2).

Point 9

127. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete Point 9 because intermediary had not been defined in the text and there was not a clear understanding of its meaning. Such uncertainty could drive homeworkers underground as a consequence of driving intermediaries underground. There was no reason to have this requirement.

128. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson opposed deleting this Point from the Convention. It was known that intermediaries existed, there was considerable variation in national practice, and it was up to national governments to determine how they should be treated. In opposing the amendment, the Government member of France, speaking on behalf of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Sweden, thought that the occasional abusive use of intermediaries by employers to evade their relationship to homeworkers justified mentioning them. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

129. The Government members of Australia and Canada withdrew an amendment to provide that national laws and regulations should “specify the responsibilities of employers and their intermediaries” rather than determine whether and under what conditions intermediaries could be used. They, instead, favoured an amendment submitted by the Government member of Germany meant to make the text more flexible. The Workers’ members asked for clarification on how the amendment submitted by the Government member of Germany would change the Office text. The representative of the Secretary-General replied that the Office text stated clearly who should determine whether and under what conditions intermediaries could be used, i.e. the competent authority in each country through national laws and regulations, while the amendment said “it would be determined” in accordance with national laws and regulations which made it difficult to know whom would be requested to take action. The Employers’ Vice-Chairperson agreed with the interpretation just given, and opposed the amendment. However, the Government member of Germany asked the Office to confirm that national law would not necessarily be required. The representative of the Legal Advisor explained that under Point 9 a country would have to have some legal provision that determined whether intermediaries could operate and, if so, under which conditions. The Office text presupposed that there would be intermediaries actually operating in a country, whether legally or not, before there would be such a requirement. The Chairperson then asked if a country that had a legal provision prohibiting intermediaries could ratify the Convention and be in compliance with this provision. Given the affirmative reply from the representative of the Legal Advisor, the Government member of Germany withdrew the amendment.

130. The Government members of Finland, Norway and Sweden submitted an amendment to indicate that laws and regulations on intermediaries would be required “where appropriate”. The Government member of Sweden explained that, like Germany, the legislation in their countries did not include the concept of intermediaries. She asked the Office to clarify whether the Office text of Point 9 entailed an obligation for governments to determine the concept of intermediaries through legislation. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that in any country where intermediaries existed, de jure or de facto, legislation was necessary to determine the cases and conditions under which the employer could use them. If intermediaries did not exist or were prohibited, legislation was not required. The Employers’ members supported the amendment, while the Workers’ members considered the Office text to be satisfactory and the amendment unnecessary. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Italy, Japan, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States, supported the amendment. The amendment was adopted.

131. The Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom withdrew an amendment to add at the end of Point 9 the following words: “if such intermediaries are foreseen under national legislation and practice”. In view of the adoption of the previous amendment, this amendment was irrelevant.

132. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph (2) as follows:

National laws and regulations should ensure that the employer and the intermediary, if any, are jointly and severally liable for payment of remuneration and other pecuniary obligations due to homeworkers.

In introducing the amendment, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson explained that the concept of intermediary was extremely important in relation to remuneration and to pecuniary obligations. Homeworkers often knew only the intermediaries and not the final employers. If homeworkers were not paid, it was very difficult for them to find the ultimate person responsible, hence the amendment proposed joint and several liability for payment. She added that this Point was based on Point 28 of the Recommendation. Its importance was also reflected in the replies to the Office questionnaire, thus it was proposed to include it in the Convention.

133. The Employers' members opposed the amendment for two reasons: since intermediary was not well defined, governments would have to define it to make the provision effective and it would create difficulties in the case of disputes where there needed to be one responsible person. The problem of establishing responsibility and liability would be compounded where there were multiple intermediaries or more than one employer.

134. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the words "if any" were included in the amendment to address different situations with respect to intermediaries in the national law and practice. She emphasized again that the main reason for the amendment was to ensure that homeworkers got paid. If there were a question of liability for payment between the employer and intermediary, the problem should be resolved between them, and the homeworker should not be made the victim.

135. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Malta, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, Turkey, South Africa, Swaziland, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the amendment and preferred the issue to be in the Recommendation. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom, opposed the amendment. He explained that these members were not opposed to the principle contained in the amendment, but considered that the amendment might impose major changes in national legislation, which would create difficulties for some countries and pose an obstacle to ratification. He therefore suggested that this Point be retained in the Recommendation and recommended that, before the second discussion, the Office ask governments if legislative changes would be required and whether they would pose a problem. Although the Workers' Vice-Chairperson was not entirely convinced about the problems raised, she agreed that the Committee should return to the issue in the second discussion. In the meantime, the Office could investigate the nature of these problems, if any. The amendment was withdrawn.

136. Point 9 was adopted as amended.

New Point after Point 9

137. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new Point after Point 9:

National laws and regulations should require that homeworkers, when given work, should be informed of their specific conditions of employment in writing or by any other means consistent with national law and practice.

In introducing the amendment, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson explained that it was important that homeworkers be provided with information on their conditions of employment. To allow flexibility for governments, the proposed text did not make detailed prescriptions.

138. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that this amendment was in fact a modified version of Point 14 of the Recommendation. While the Employers' members had no difficulty with it in principle, it should be left in the Recommendation. The Government member of Canada, speaking on behalf of Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Norway, Malta, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States, also thought that this type of provision was more appropriate in the Recommendation and therefore opposed the amendment. The Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom also opposed the amendment. They supported the idea, but a similar provision had been included for part-time workers in the Part-Time Work Recommendation, 1994 (No. 182), thus it should also be in a Recommendation for homeworkers. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson regretted that, since the provision was so widely supported, it could not be integrated into the proposed Convention. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

Paragraph (1)

139. An amendment was withdrawn by the Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Malta, Norway, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States to replace paragraph (1) by the text of Point 17 of the Recommendation concerning inspections of parts of homes or private premises where work was carried out, since subsequent amendments acceptable to them were to be considered.

140. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment to replace the words "respect for" by the words "compliance with", since it was compliance with the law that was being sought. The Workers' and Employers' members supported the amendment and it was adopted.

141. The Chairperson suggested examining two similar amendments together which proposed to add at the end of paragraph (1) the phrase "in accordance with national law and practice". The amendment submitted by the Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Malta, Norway, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States sought only to add this phrase. The amendment submitted by the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Spain and Sweden made a second change to replace the phrase "by a system of inspection" with "by a system of labour inspection". The discussion focused first on this second change. The Government member of Portugal supported this amendment. The Government member of Italy explained that, in Italy, reference should always be made to labour inspection to avoid confusion with other types of inspection undertaken by responsible authorities, such as the police. The Government member of Egypt supported the views expressed by the Government member of Italy and considered that the term "labour inspection" covered a wide range of issues, such as health and safety, conditions of work, and so on. Without specifying labour inspection, other systems having nothing to do with home work would be implicated.

142. The Government member of Spain also agreed with the statement by the Government member of Italy that it was necessary to refer to labour inspection only. She took labour inspection to mean the kinds of inspections provided for under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), which included health and safety inspection. She requested the Office to confirm this point. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that Conventions Nos. 81 and 129 spoke about labour inspection. However, in a number of countries, other types of inspection for home work were foreseen in national legislation. Furthermore, there should be coherence with Point 17 of the Recommendation, which foresaw other types of inspection. For example, in some countries social security was monitored by social security inspectors. The Government member of Canada said that different types of inspection existed in member States. Labour inspection might, or might not, include safety and health inspection, for example, and thus she preferred the broader reference to a system of inspection. The Government member of Swaziland also opposed the reference to labour inspection. He observed that there was a problem in qualifying the type of inspection. National legislation and practices varied in this respect and, in some countries, labour inspection was limited to a narrow range of issues, such as wages and hours of work, while health and safety issues were within the competence of other authorities. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that the Employers' members would not support any amendment which diluted the enforcement mechanism of the Convention.

143. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson said that, on the one hand, it was important not to restrict inspection systems to labour inspection only, given the variety of practice, but, on the other hand, there were fears that inspection would involve police and immigration services. The Workers' members preferred a terminology which conveyed a broad concept of inspection, but excluded the types of inspection which were not meant to protect homeworkers.

144. The Government member of Norway opposed the amendment. She explained that responsibilities were divided amongst various authorities under their system of internal control, such as environment, for example, and therefore inspection should not be restricted to labour inspection.

145. The representative of the Secretary-General emphasized that the matters to be supervised were all working conditions of homeworkers. He explained that, in some countries, the meaning of labour inspection was very narrow. For instance, in a number of English-speaking African countries, labour inspection was concerned only with those conditions of work other than safety and health issues, which were controlled by the factory inspectorate. Sometimes there was a special inspection service for home work. For these reasons, the Office had proposed the term "system of inspection" which was a broader concept and covered all situations, including labour inspection. The Government member of Turkey agreed with the explanation provided by the representative of the Secretary-General and preferred a broader concept of inspection.

146. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson suggested a subamendment to add after the words "a system of inspection" the words "enforcing provisions concerning the protection of homeworkers". She observed that this subamendment allowed a broader concept of inspection, but also ensured that inspection did not refer to other types of inspection, such as by the police or by immigration authorities.

147. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson opposed the subamendment; the Office text was clear. Employers' members agreed with the explanation of the representative of the Secretary-General. The types of inspections were thus for the protection of homeworkers. The Government member of Spain reiterated that the function of labour inspections had been set out in Article 3 of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81). The proposed amendment made it clear that the reference was to the areas covered by the system of guarantees contained in Convention No. 81.

148. The Government member of Austria said that she understood the concerns about the narrowness of the concept of labour inspection and could support the subamendment proposed by the Workers' members. The Government member of Norway wondered whether this Point implied the introduction of a system of inspection for homeworkers if this was not already in the national practice. In view of the opposition from many Government members to the subamendment and to the amendment, they were withdrawn.

149. Debate then ensued on the amendment which proposed to add "in accordance with national law and practice". The Government members of Italy and Sweden supported the amendment. The Government member of Sweden did so because, according to some systems, it was the parties to a contract which had the responsibility for taking legal action against breaches, not necessarily the competent authority. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson repeated that the Employers' members did not support any amendment that diluted the enforcement of the provisions of the Convention and, accordingly, did not support the proposed addition to the text. The Workers' members supported the amendment to take account of the different approaches to inspection, thus providing needed flexibility. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson sought a clarification from the Office on the implications of the amendment. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that, when a Convention was ratified, it had to be strictly applied. If there was an obstacle in the national legislation to the strict compliance of a specific provision of this Convention, the above-mentioned expression did not provide a safeguard and the national legislation would have to be modified accordingly.

150. The Government member of Australia agreed with the point of view of the Employers' members as to not to dilute inspection. She added, however, that the sponsors of the amendment wanted to ensure that there would be compliance with privacy laws. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson asked the representative of the Secretary-General whether privacy laws could stand in the way of inspections where home work presented a public danger. For example, could homeworkers who posed a danger to themselves and their neighbours refuse entry to a safety inspector. The representative of the Secretary-General replied that the Point under discussion was about the general principle of an inspection system, not about the limitations that might be imposed on it. Also, as explained in the intervention of the representative of the Secretary-General on Point 17, the right to privacy could be subordinated to public safety.

151. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson observed that the Committee did not have to examine particular hypothetical cases, as had been brought forward by the Employers' Vice-Chairperson. In many instances, there could be conflicting provisions in the legislation and it was up to the governments and courts to decide which one would prevail. The proposed amendment, in fact, referred this decision to national authorities and to judges for decision. The representative of the Legal Adviser called the attention of the Committee to Article 2(1) of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), which specified that labour inspectors had power to inspect workplaces in respect of which legal provisions were enforceable for them; this would also take into account the privacy laws in the countries concerned.

152. The Workers' members supported the amendment and observed that it provided good protection for homeworkers and flexibility for governments. In view of the additional broad support from most Government members, the amendment was adopted. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that if the addition of "in accordance with national law and practice" was an attempt to be evasive in the implementation of the Convention, it would be ineffective.

153. The Government members of the United Kingdom and the United States submitted an amendment to replace the word "penalties" by the word "remedies". The Government member of the United States explained that the proposed amendment did not imply only a semantic difference. There were a variety of remedies which could be envisaged as a result of the violations of laws and regulations, such as fines, orders for payment of back wages and job reinstatement. Penalties were only one type of remedy. The Employers' members supported the amendment, but the Workers' Vice-Chairperson considered that it weakened the text and suggested that "sanctions" also needed to be included. In view of the discussion, the Chairperson suggested a subamendment to add "including penalties". The amendment as subamended was adopted.

154. The Government member of Spain submitted an amendment to change the order of paragraphs (1) and (2) in Point 10. She believed it to be more logical to put the paragraph on penalties first and then the paragraph referring to the inspection system, which would be entrusted with verifying breaches to the law and if these were the case, proposing the remedies or penalties that should be applied. The Committee referred the amendment to the Drafting Committee.

155. Point 10 was adopted as amended.

156. Point 11 was adopted without change.

D. Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation

I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Point 12

Paragraph (1)

157. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment to refer to "review" instead of "national policy" since it was no longer relevant.

158. The Government members of Austria and Germany submitted an amendment to add the words "according to national legislation or practice" after the words "each Member should", as a reflection of their concern that the original text could be taken to require the designation of an authority at the level of the central government, which would not necessarily be compatible with the federal structures which exist in several countries. The Workers' and Employers' members supported the amendment. Although the Government member of Canada thought the addition superfluous, she had no objection. Also with the support of the Government members of Spain and the United States, the amendment was adopted.

159. On receiving confirmation from the representative of the Secretary-General that "an authority" could be designated at any level of a federal State, in conformity with the principle enunciated during the discussion of Point 5, i.e. that the word "national" was a collective term referring to a member State and that its use made no assumptions about the internal distribution of authority, the Government members of Austria and Germany withdrew another amendment to specify the possible levels at which a competent authority could be designated.

160. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add the words "making use, as far as possible, of bodies of a tripartite nature" at the end of the paragraph. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson stated that they wanted to take account of the fact that several countries had already instituted tripartite structures for the protection of homeworkers. Such collaboration of the social partners would greatly facilitate the acquisition of the data on home work that all parties had stated they lacked. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that Point 5 had already stipulated consultation of workers' and employers' organizations by the competent authority. The proposed amendment was superfluous; if it were to be retained, it should use the same wording as Point 5. The Government member of Canada agreed with the Employers' Vice-Chairperson. She noted that "tripartite" meant only "consisting of three parts" and did not intrinsically imply that there were governments, workers and employers. This was relevant to countries such as Canada where the word "tripartite" referred to different groups in different legal texts.

161. The representative of the Secretary-General called attention to the fact that Point 12 was intended to be read together with Point 5. After consultation with the designated organizations, it was the government who was responsible for the formulation and implementation of the national policy on home work.

162. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson responded to the remarks of the Government member of Canada by observing that, in the ILO context, the meaning of "tripartite" was unambiguous: governments, employers and workers. He also disagreed with the assertion of the Employers' Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Canada that the proposed amendment was superfluous. The fundamental responsibility of governments was clear, but the Workers' members wished to make it possible to go beyond mere consultation set out in Point 5, along the lines of the tripartite structures already mentioned.

163. The Government member of the United Kingdom agreed with the Government member of Canada and the Employers' Vice-Chairperson, noting that the Office text did not exclude tripartism, but the proposed amendment could be interpreted as meaning that the decisions would have to be agreed upon by the workers' and employers' organizations, when policy formulation was the government's role. The Government member of Denmark, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Austria, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Sweden, supported the amendment. As many Government members supported the amendment, the amendment was adopted.

164. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment no longer relevant as it referred to review rather than policy.

165. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the first phrase of paragraph (2) with the words "In the absence of representative employers' or workers' organizations concerned with homeworkers". They felt that the intent of this paragraph was to provide for the case when no formal employers' or workers' organizations existed, and that the Office text opened up the scope of consultation beyond that defined by Point 5. The Workers' members asserted that the spokesperson of the Employers' members had not done justice to Point 5, which also mentioned homeworkers' organizations where these existed. The Government member of Canada did not formally object to the amendment, but did question its rationale. In view of the lack of support, the Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

166. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace "or" by "and" in the phrase "to permit these homeworkers or employers to express their opinions", on the grounds that there was an implicit "either" associated with "or" when it was both parties which should be permitted to express their opinion. The representative of the Secretary-General stated that "or" was not exclusive, that both the homeworkers and their employers would be given the possibility to express themselves in the absence of both the organizations concerned with homeworkers and the organizations of employers of homeworkers. However, the Government member of France indicated that the choice of "or" versus "and" still posed problems in French. The Workers' members preferred the Office text, whereupon the Employers' Vice-Chairperson suggested "and/or" might be the proper formulation. It was decided that the question would be dealt with by the Drafting Committee.

167. Point 12 was adopted as amended.

168. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment referring to a review rather than national policy.

169. The Government members of Australia, Canada, Japan, Malta, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States submitted an amendment to insert the words "to the extent possible" at the beginning of the Point. In introducing the amendment, the Government member of Canada explained that the discussion had made clear the importance of adequate data for defining and regulating home work. However, without this amendment, the proposed Recommendation would put a heavy administrative burden on governments. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that, as part of a Recommendation, Point 13 would not be binding in any event, even on countries that would have ratified the Convention. Data gathering was such an essential activity that this Point should not be weakened. With no support forthcoming, the amendment was withdrawn.

170. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to add the word "factual" to qualify the "detailed information" called for in this Point. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson recalled that much of the available data on home work were anecdotal or estimated. He noted that the quality of data was as important as its quantity, and explained that this amendment was intended to stress that fact. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson offered no objection. He thought in any case that the kind of information to be gathered was self-evident. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson explained that the word "factual" had been taken from the Conclusions of the report of the 1990 Meeting of Experts on the Social Protection of Homeworkers, which spoke of the collection of detailed factual information. The Government members of Swaziland and the United States supported the amendment, but the Government member of Australia expressed concern that the amended Point would prohibit the use of statistically sound estimation. She pointed out that even anecdotal information could be useful, if it were clearly identified as such. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson agreed with this point of view and preferred the Office text. The Government member of the United Kingdom suggested that "meaningful" might be preferable to "factual" if a qualifying word were necessary. This suggestion was accepted by the Employers' members but not by the Workers' members. Since no further support was forthcoming from the Government members, the Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

171. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add the words "by gender" after the words "detailed information". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson noted that many governments were already accustomed to breaking down their statistical data by sex, and often by other factors, such as age. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson agreed with the principle of the amendment, but felt that it should be redrafted to ensure that the grammatical position of "by gender" was clear. He proposed a subamendment to insert the words "which includes data" between "detailed information" and "by gender", and to add "and where possible by ethnicity and/or national origin and disability". The Workers' members originally supported this subamendment, but in view of subsequent reservations made by Government members on the possible negative implication of such categorization, opposed it.

172. The Government member of Canada reported that several Government members had been prepared to support the original version of this amendment, and expressed the expectation that they could support the subamendment as well. The Government member of France did not object, but suggested that there could be serious ethical problems connected with the collection of this kind of information. The Government member of Germany opposed the amendment and subamendment, as it conflicted with German regulations on the collection of data. The Government members of Algeria and South Africa objected to the mention of ethnicity or national origin in the subamendment.

173. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson offered to modify the subamendment from "when possible" to "where appropriate". He asserted that data on ethnicity or disability would be important for monitoring progress in the improvement of the situation of homeworkers, because these characteristics were often the ones on which discrimination was based. He hoped that the change in wording would remove any implicit obligation from those countries which had sound reasons for avoiding the collection of such data, while justifying the gathering of relevant information in those countries where it was necessary. In view of the objections, the Employers' members withdrew the mention of ethnicity, national origin and disability from the subamendment, leaving the wording "which includes data by gender", but noted that it was to the detriment of equal opportunity. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

174. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment regarding the drafting of this Point, which proposed to move the phrase about keeping information up to date to a second sentence to emphasize that information should be collected and then should be kept up to date. The Workers' members and the majority of the Government members preferred the Office text.

175. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add a sentence to the Point, which would provide that the information should be published, made publicly available and translated into the relevant community languages. He explained that in countries with several official languages, it was important that workers be informed of their rights. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson remarked that it would pose a monetary burden on governments and the Employers' members would prefer that the resources be spent on job creation.

176. The Government member of Italy, speaking also on behalf of Austria, Belgium, France, Luxembourg, Portugal and Sweden, supported the amendment. In supporting the amendment, the Government member of South Africa noted that, in the past, two official languages had been imposed, but the Constitution of South Africa now provided for equality of all languages. The Government member of the United Kingdom pointed out that the explanation of the Workers' Vice-Chairperson referred to "official" languages, when the amendment used the term "community" languages. He could support the former but not the latter, which could place a great burden on governments. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson explained that they wanted to cover both official languages and different languages when a country had a large group of foreigners.

177. A lengthy discussion took place around the drafting of the Point. The Government member of Brazil suggested a change in the sequencing of the phrases in the sentence so that the translation of the information preceded publication and dissemination, which seemed more logical and consistent. The Government member of the United States proposed a subamendment to add the phrase "to the extent possible" at the beginning of the sentence; the Employers' Vice-Chairperson suggested "practicable" instead of "possible". The Chairperson summarized the various suggestions and proposed that the Point read, as follows: "This information should be published and made publicly available. Where possible, it should be translated into the relevant community languages." This was accepted by the Workers' members and supported by the Government member of Canada. The amendment as subamended was adopted.

178. Point 13 was adopted as amended.

179. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to provide that instead of informing the homeworker of "his or her specific conditions of employment in writing or in any other appropriate manner", the homeworker would be informed of "the terms of the home work arrangements in an appropriate manner". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson referred back to the definition of home work that had been decided on by the Committee for the proposed instruments. One definition that had been rejected, wrongly in their view, had been based on the employee/employer relationship. The definition now extended to homeworkers who were not employees in national legislation, and for whom the use of the term "conditions of employment" would be inappropriate. Furthermore, a number of items of importance to homeworkers, such as delivery of materials and standards on output, would not be expressed in a statement on conditions of employment, but would be part of the arrangement for home work.

180. The Workers' members opposed this amendment which proposed to delete the reference to "in writing". The Office text, which had been taken from the Part-Time Work Recommendation, 1994 (No. 182), was acceptable. He questioned why part-time workers, but not homeworkers, should be entitled to written information. He did not understand the Employers' interpretation of conditions of employment, and asked the Office for clarification.

181. The representative of the Secretary-General replied that, in using the term "specific conditions of employment", the Office had tried to cover not only traditional conditions of employment, such as remuneration, paid holidays and social security, but also conditions specifically relevant to homeworkers, such as how to deal with homeworkers who use their own equipment or who provide the materials. In a broad or generic sense, the phrase referred to all conditions that applied to this type of work.

182. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson understood why the Committee on Part-Time Work had talked about conditions of employment, because all part-time workers were employees. According to the definition of home work that had been adopted, this was not the case. He asked the Office to confirm whether all homeworkers were employees as defined in Point 3. In reply, the representative of the Secretary-General considered that the definition as adopted by the Committee would cover not only persons who were employees, but also those whose status was unclear, but none the less more closely resembled an employee rather than an independent worker. In response, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson mentioned that conditions of "engagement" or conditions of the home work "arrangement", was more accurate.

183. Finding the Office text acceptable, the Government member of Canada also considered that the proposed Convention would apply not only to homeworkers in a regular employer/employee relationship, but also to those whose status was in a "grey zone". The term should be understood in the context of the Convention. In that context, its use was generic and referred to conditions of employment in a broad sense.

184. While he understood the argument that it should be read in the context of Point 3, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the meaning being given was not commonly held by most people, in particular those who had not had the benefit of hearing the debate of the Committee. This would pose a problem for those who had to implement the Convention. The Government member of Japan agreed with the change proposed by the amendment, confirming that, in Japan, homeworkers did not have employee status; however, he believed that the part of the Office text referring to written information should be maintained. Consequently, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson acknowledged that there were two issues: the change from "conditions of employment" to "terms of the home work arrangements" and the question of providing information in writing. He proposed a subamendment to add that the homeworker should be informed "in writing or" in an appropriate manner. The Government member of the United States supported the amendment. Several Government members requested from the Office an explanation of what was meant by the word "employment". The representative of the Secretary-General stated that, in ILO instruments, the term "employment" had been used not only to refer to employees, but also to the self-employed, depending on the context in which it was used. The term "employment" was not synonymous with wage employment and did not apply solely to wage-earners. Despite expressing grave doubts about the correct understanding of the terms "employment" and "conditions of employment", the Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

185. The Workers' members submitted an amendment which had two components: to delete the reference to the "first" time that a homeworker was given work, and to add a list of the conditions of employment that should be provided to the homeworker. They explained that, unlike in a usual workplace, homeworkers were isolated and their conditions of work could be subject to frequent changes. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson doubted how this requirement could work in practice, since many homeworkers got work on a daily basis or every few days. The amendment was too prescriptive and detailed, since conditions would vary by the nature of home work and the country. Some of the items listed were already addressed in the Recommendation, and what was not already addressed could lead to homeworkers having access to more detailed information than regular employees.

186. In reply, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the first time work was given to a homeworker, the employer should provide all information listed and, again, any time that there was a change of conditions. He also emphasized that it was the first three conditions on the list that were essential: the name and address of the employer, the scale or rate of payment and the methods to calculate these, and the type and description of the work. Furthermore, he remarked that it was not appropriate to compare homeworkers with regular employees. The latter had access to the employer and trade unions, for example, and thus better access to information.

187. The Government member of Swaziland suggested a different drafting of the amendment that would leave the Office text as paragraph (1) of Point 14, with the amendment becoming paragraph (2). The Workers' Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to insert the phrase "or each time conditions change" after "first", instead of deleting "first"; and to create a new paragraph (2) that would begin with "This information must include, in particular", followed by the list in the original amendment. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson reiterated that the items were covered in other parts of the proposed Recommendation, for example in Point 16, paragraph (2), and Point 32. The Workers' members modified their subamendment so that only the first three items on the list were retained. For reasons of style, the representative of the Secretary-General proposed that the Office text be retained and a second sentence added, as follows: "In the case of changes in these conditions, the employer should keep the homeworker informed", which was accepted. The Government members of Germany, Ireland, Italy, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the second part of the subamendment, while the Government members of Japan and South Africa supported it. Put to a vote, the subamendment was adopted by 82,238 votes in favour and 78,200 votes against, with 1,564 abstentions. Thus, the Office text of Point 14 became paragraph (1) with the addition of "In the case of changes in these conditions, the employer should keep the homeworker informed". The following new paragraph (2) was added:

"This information should include, in particular:

- the name and address of the employer,
- the scale or rate of payment and the methods to calculate these, and
- the type and description of the work."

188. Point 14 was adopted as amended.

II. SUPERVISION OF HOME WORK

Point 15

189. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete this Point for conceptual and practical reasons. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that legislation on registration of homeworkers and employers of homeworkers had posed problems in European countries, and referred to the example of Hungary, where this legislation had resulted in most homeworkers now operating underground. What was important was to encourage job creation, but, in fact, Point 15 imposed a permit for creating jobs and would result in unneeded bureaucracy.

190. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. Numerous countries had legislation on home work and registration systems. Registration was a useful mechanism for knowing where homeworkers were and would ease implementation. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the register referred to in Point 15 concerned employers of homeworkers and their intermediaries, not the homeworkers.

191. The Government member of India supported the amendment. He observed that the total number of the workforce in India was around 315 million, the majority of whom were engaged in the informal sector. It would be impossible to register all workers concerned due to a lack of resources. In short, in a country like India, with millions of homeworkers, the implementation of this provision would be unrealistic, costly and cumbersome. Finally, it did not allow flexibility to governments. Points 14 and 16 already provided for sufficient procedure for data collection and compilation. The Government member of the United States agreed and supported the amendment. In any country with a large workforce, the registration referred to in Point 15 would be a budgetary nightmare.

192. The Government member of Switzerland, however, opposed the amendment. He reported that Switzerland had a system of registering employers of homeworkers. Point 15 similarly required only the registration of employers. Such registration would serve the collection of data which was necessary for the implementation of the Convention, especially in view of the fact that inspections on home work were generally not systematic.

193. The Government member of France, also speaking on behalf of Austria, Belgium, Finland, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, Portugal and Sweden, opposed the amendment. He argued that Governments had managed to find the means to require registration of employers when the matter was important to them, for example for the purpose of taxing companies. So, he did not see why registering employers of homeworkers needed to be seen as such a burden. He understood, however, the apprehension of the Employers' members about the bureaucratic implications, and wondered whether a less bureaucratic-sounding word than "registry" could be found. The Government member of the Netherlands also opposed the amendment.

194. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson expressed interest in hearing the views of other Government members from developing countries. Referring to the observations made by the Government member of France, he noted that registers of employers, of course, existed, but in the case of home work, an employer could be just one person who gave out home work to one or two persons. The definition of home work also complicated the matter for large enterprises, for example, which would not be registered as employers of homeworkers but which might have some employees who worked at home some of the time.

195. The Workers' members maintained that registration could be a simple matter. Employers who were already registered could just indicate that they also gave out home work. There might be problems in developing countries in view of the large numbers of small employers, but it was important to be able to reach them to provide information about regulations on home work. In India, homeworkers were already counted in the census. Furthermore, the Beedi and Cigar Workers (Conditions of Employment) Act 1966, which applied to homeworkers engaged in rolling bidi cigarettes, contained a provision for registering employers which had worked well. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

196. Point 15 was adopted without change.

Point 16

New paragraph

197. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert before paragraph (1) a new paragraph as follows:

Employers should be required to notify the competent authority before they give out work, directly or through an intermediary, to homeworkers, for the first time.

The Workers' Vice-Chairperson, referring to the concerns expressed earlier by the Employers' members, emphasized that the obligation to notify the competent authority did not amount to a permit to employ homeworkers.

198. The Employers' members opposed the amendment. They argued that it would amount to a requirement for a permit. In addition, each time a different homeworker was engaged or an employee wanted to work at home, another notification would be required. Further confusion was created by the amendment where it appeared that there would first have to be a list kept of all potential employers, because the amendment said notification would be "before" home work was given out, and then a list of those who actually gave out work to homeworkers. Another problem was that in many countries the competent authority could be far away and thus make notification difficult. The only positive effect of such a bureaucratic approach would be job creation for civil servants.

199. The Workers' members believed that the amendment was not being interpreted correctly. Employers would give notice only the first time that they gave out home work. In addition, the competent authority would not necessarily be at the national level; it could very well be at the local or district levels, close to the location where home work was carried out. The amendment was also meant to assist in the provision of information on regulations on home work to employers of homeworkers.

200. The Government member of the United Kingdom opposed the amendment because it was an unacceptable interference in the functioning of the labour market. While the Government member of Swaziland agreed with the intent of the amendment to require employers to communicate their intention to engage homeworkers, the formulation was too rigid.

201. The Government member of Switzerland supported the amendment. Notifying the competent authority the first time home work was given out would not be an additional burden on employers. It would facilitate informing employers of the regulations which applied to homeworkers and the updating of the register required in Point 15. Such a requirement existed in Switzerland's national legislation. The Government members of Algeria, Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, France and Germany supported the amendment.

202. The Government member of Uruguay emphasized the need for a more flexible formulation of the amendment. She observed that, in some countries, it was difficult for employers to register prior to giving out work. It would be easier if a time-limit for the registration was envisaged. The Employers' members supported this suggestion, and proposed a subamendment to replace the word “before” by the word “when”, so that notification could be required when, not before, home work was given out for the first time. The Workers’ members supported this subamendment for practical reasons; the national authority would decide the exact time. The amendment as subamended was adopted.

203. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to insert before paragraph (1) a new paragraph, as follows:

Only registered employers and intermediaries should be authorized to give out work to homeworkers.

The Workers’ Vice-Chairperson said that this stated the general principle and that practical details would be left to governments.

204. The Employers’ members opposed this amendment. It went way too far and was another in a series of amendments to increase bureaucracy and restrict the autonomy of employers. In response to the statement by the Workers’ Vice-Chairperson that, with the amendment just adopted, notification was when home work was given out, not before, the Employers’ Vice-Chairperson said that if an employer had to be registered to give out home work, that meant prior to giving out home work. The Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom opposed the amendment. They agreed that it went beyond registration and thus went too far. The Workers’ members withdrew the amendment.

Paragraph (1)

205. The Employers’ members submitted an amendment to replace the word “register” by “list”. It had less bureaucratic implications and sounded less “high-faluting”. The Workers’ members opposed the amendment and preferred the word “register” because it was more of a legal term. The Government members of Algeria, Egypt, South Africa and Swaziland also opposed the amendment. The Government member of the Netherlands, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Ireland, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, supported the amendment, as did the Government member of the United States, who thought “list” was less formal.

206. The representative of the Secretary-General read the definition of the two terms from the Concise Oxford Dictionary. There seemed to be little real difference between these two terms. The Employers’ members withdrew the amendment. They were just trying to avoid a more complex word.

207. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to provide that registers of homeworkers would be kept “by gender” for similar reasons that a change had been introduced earlier to provide that statistics on home work would be collected by gender. The Employers’ members opposed the amendment. It had been appropriate in relation to statistics, but not in relation to registers. The Government members of Algeria, Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Norway, South Africa, Swaziland, the United Republic of Tanzania, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States supported the amendment. The amendment was adopted.

208. The Employers' members submitted an amendment aimed at obtaining that only homeworkers "who primarily work at home" would have to be covered by the register kept by the employers. Having failed to limit the definition of home work to those who solely or primarily worked at home, they wanted to make the distinction in this Point. Otherwise, employers would be required to keep a register of those who may occasionally take work home.

209. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. They understood the concern about having to register workers who normally worked in an office or enterprise, but who could at times take work home. However, these were normally supposed to be employees and thus covered by the provisions for employees, whereas the proposed amendment would exclude, for instance, regular part-time workers who were also engaged in home work for the same or another employer. They suggested a better formulation be found. A few possibilities were discussed along the line of "except for those who were regular workers of the employer who sometimes carried out work at home". But this was not satisfactory to the Employers' members either, because there would be a problem when there were several employers.

210. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom, said that the word "primarily" was not acceptable because it went beyond the definition of home work which the Committee had agreed upon. Because the issue was a problem of definition, it should be taken up in the second discussion related to the definition of home work. It was inappropriate in this Point. The Employers' members agreed with the analysis of the Government member of France. The definition should be reconsidered next year.

211. The Workers' members viewed the situation differently. The relevance of how much time a person spent on home work was different for the purpose of definition than for the purpose of keeping a register. The previous discussion showed that there was agreement on avoiding too much bureaucracy for the purposes of keeping registers of homeworkers. This did not mean that the scope of the definition would have to be changed. The amendment was withdrawn by the Employers' members.

212. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to add at the end of paragraph (1) the following text: "The information required should be specified in national law and practice". They wanted it to be clear which information employers were required to keep in a register. The Workers' members opposed this amendment since it seemed to be linked to a subsequent amendment proposed by the Employers' members to delete paragraph (2), which outlined what should be in records to be kept by employers. The Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom, opposed the amendment. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

213. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete paragraph (2), which listed what information employers had to record, because the list was only relevant to industrial home work. It referred to terms, such as “batch of work”, which was not relevant to much of telework, or to services, such as child care. Therefore, if paragraph (2) were to be retained, it needed rewording.

214. The Workers’ members opposed the amendment. They wanted an opportunity to have an amendment to this paragraph considered. They basically wanted the kind of information comparable to what was normally included in a payslip to be in a record given out to the homeworker.

215. The Government member of the United Kingdom supported the amendment because he considered that paragraph (2) went beyond what would normally be included in the pay slip. The Government member of the United States agreed with the point made by the Employers’ members that paragraph (2) was in the context of industrial home work, and therefore it had to be deleted or completely rewritten. The Government member of Ireland stated that, while he was not opposed to the principle of paragraph (2), he supported the amendment for the reasons that had already been stated and because the clauses were not in line with common law practice. He could support paragraph (2) without clauses (a) through (e) detailing what should be in the record.

216. The Government member of Egypt, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Norway, Poland, South Africa, Swaziland, Switzerland, the United Republic of Tanzania and Turkey, opposed the amendment. The Office text indicated clearly what should be included in the record. Such information was very important for safeguarding the rights of homeworkers in the event employers failed to fulfil their obligations. The Government members of France and Hungary also opposed the amendment. The Government member of France insisted that the Committee had to be consistent. When the topic of registration had been discussed, two issues had been considered. First, not authorizing employers to give out home work unless they were registered. This had been rejected. Secondly, recognizing the usefulness of registration of employers of homeworkers for informing them about the regulations on home work. The Committee had accepted this and therefore the provision on records should be as specific as possible. The details were not superfluous. The Workers’ members pointed out that the record would be kept by employers and would not need to be given to the competent authority. The record would also serve in the interest of employers. The Employers’ members withdrew this amendment, but still considered that the text of paragraph (2) should be entirely rewritten.

217. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to replace the introductory part of paragraph (2), and clauses (a) and (b) by the following:

Employers should be required to keep a record which shows for each homeworker:

- (a) each batch of work given out;
- (b) the rate of remuneration and, in the case of piece-rates, the time allowed for each piece or batch.

Records given to homeworkers should include information on each batch of work, thus the reference should be placed within the list of clauses. They suggested a subamendment to add in clause (a) of the amendment “and the time allocated”, and suggested substituting “quantity of work” or “unit of work” for “batch”.

218. The Employers' members opposed the amendment and subamendment. Both still reflected a purely industrial view of home work, whereas the Committee had agreed at the outset of its deliberations that the concept of home work was much broader. He asked that the Office record the objections and observations made during the discussion so that it could propose alternatives for the second discussion. It was necessary either to narrow the definition of home work or to broaden the measures in the Recommendation to achieve consistency. Although the Employers' members were not comfortable with the Office text, they tried to make it more satisfactory by proposing a subamendment so that paragraph (2) would read as follows: "(2) Employers should also be required to keep a record of the work allocated to a homeworker which shows:". This would be followed by clauses (a) through (e) as in the Office text.

219. The first part of this subamendment, not including clauses (a) through (e), was considered first. The Government members of Canada, Norway, the United Kingdom and the United States supported this part of the subamendment, as did the Workers' members. It was adopted.

220. The Government member of Germany asked for the Office's interpretation of the expression "the time allocated". The representative of the Secretary-General explained that it was intended to signify both the time per unit in piece-work as well as the total length of time allocated to complete a given order or batch of work.

221. The Workers' members still wanted to retain the part of their subamendment which revised clause (b) to read as follows: "The rate of remuneration and, in the case of piece-rates, the time allocated for each unit of work". The Government members of Austria, Portugal, South Africa, Turkey and the United States supported the subamendment, while the Government members of Algeria, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and Uruguay preferred the Office text. The Workers' members withdrew their subamendment. The amendment as subamended by the Employers' members was adopted, including the retention of clauses (a) through (e) of the Office text.

222. The Government member of Swaziland submitted an amendment to the effect that each batch of work given out by the employer should be acknowledged by the homeworker. This was intended to protect both the homeworker and the employer if there were a disagreement about the amount of work given out and returned. The worker would have had the chance to check that the work given corresponded to the declaration of the employer. The Employers' members opposed the amendment. This added a third concept to Point 16, the worker's acknowledgement, whereas paragraphs (1) and (3) already obliged the employer to keep a record and give a copy to the homeworker. The issue of giving information to workers had been adequately dealt with under paragraph (3) of Point 14. The present amendment was superfluous. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson observed that Point 14 concerned conditions of employment, while Point 16 focused on additional issues and was intended for inspection purposes. While the Workers' members agreed with the principle of the amendment, they preferred an alternative which they were proposing in a subsequent amendment. The Government member of Swaziland withdrew the amendment.

223. The Government member of Lesotho submitted an amendment to delete clause (c), which specified that amounts reimbursed for costs assumed by the homeworker be included in the employer's records. He argued that paragraph (2) referred to data to be recorded when work was given out, whereas the costs in question would be unknown until the work had been completed. He also noted that reimbursement of costs was not necessarily part of remuneration or wages, and could expose the worker to income tax on the sum in certain countries. He was open to the idea that his concern could be addressed by Point 26. The Employers' members supported the amendment, but the Workers' members opposed it. The Government members of Canada and France also opposed the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn.

224. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace clause (c) with the stipulation that the "costs assumed by the worker, if any, and the amount reimbursed in respect of them" be included in the record provided by the employer. It made sense to mention both so that the real net costs were clear. It could also be important for tax purposes to indicate costs as well as reimbursements.

225. The Employers' members opposed the amendment. Clauses (a) through (e) of the Office text made a neat formula that corresponded to the calculations on a typical pay slip: $a \times b + c - d = e$. The amendment disrupted this relationship. While costs were easy to identify in the case of raw materials, it would be very difficult to determine what fraction of such indivisible costs as domestic heating, lighting or water could be imputed to the employer. The problem would be even more acute when one person worked for several employers. The Government member of Canada reminded the Committee that Point 16 had to do with the record to be kept by the employer and given to the worker and wondered if the proposed amendment were germane. However, the Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Germany, Finland, France, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and Sweden, supported the amendment. Their support reflected the conviction that costs should not always be borne by the homeworker. The Government member of the United States agreed that it was a good idea to clearly record costs incurred and what was reimbursed by the employer, and suggested a subamendment to replace the word "assumed" by the word "incurred". This subamendment was adopted, and the amendment as subamended was adopted.

226. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace clause (e) with the language from the Office text preceded by "the gross remuneration due, and", thus both gross and net remuneration would be included. The Employers' members did not object, but stated that the original logic of the paragraph had been lost and serious reconsideration would need to be given to this Point in the second discussion. The amendment was adopted with the support of the Government members of Australia, Austria, Belgium, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Egypt, Finland, France, Greece, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, the Russian Federation, South Africa, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, the United Republic of Tanzania, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States.

227. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment to delete paragraph (3) which required the employer to give the homeworker a copy of the record described in paragraph (2), but announced that they planned to seek revision of the text in the second discussion.

228. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to provide that a copy of the record referred to in clauses (a), (b) and (c) should be handed to homeworkers in advance, while the copy of the record referred to in clauses (d) and (e) should be given upon the completion of the work. It was hoped that this might address the concerns expressed earlier by the Government member of Swaziland about the fact that some information was not available until after the work had been completed. Although clause (c) might be appropriate at either time.

229. The Employers' members opposed the amendment in that it doubled the work for employers. A practical solution would be to allow employers to show both remuneration and deductions for past work and the terms of future work on the same sheet. Requiring separate records was too much. In addition, calculations of costs incurred by workers would require estimates followed by reconciliation. Although there were elements of Point 16 that were worth retaining, the proposed amendment was excessive.

230. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson claimed that the Employers' members were exaggerating the complexity of the record that would be required. One salary slip could contain both advance information and reports for previous work. The Government member of the United States believed that the amendment was too burdensome and preferred the Office text. However, he suggested that the word "furnished" was more appropriate than "handed", since the record could be furnished to the worker without it being in person. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, Spain, Switzerland, the United Republic of Tanzania, Turkey and the United Kingdom all preferred the Office text with the suggested change of the word "handed" to "furnished". The amendment was withdrawn. The Committee agreed to accept the change from "handed" to "furnished" in paragraph (3).

231. Point 16 was adopted as amended.

Point 17

232. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to list in detail the conditions under which an inspection could be carried out in the homeworker's home and private premises. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson recalled that the issue of privacy had already come up during the discussion of the proposed Convention. The additional precision of the present amendment was intended to prevent conflicts between the instruments on home work and national privacy legislation, and to indicate specific restrictions on inspections to protect homeworkers. She asked for clarification of the Office's interpretation of the Office text and of the treatment of privacy in existing Conventions on labour inspection.

233. The representative of the Secretary-General responded that Point 17 provided that entry by labour inspectors into private homes or premises must be compatible with national law and practice concerning respect for privacy. The consent of the worker might or might not be required, depending on national law. The inviolability of the home might be expressed in the Constitution of the country or be among more general privacy rights. There was always a balance to be struck between competing interests and rights. For example, if a person threatened a whole neighbourhood by working with explosives at home, that person's right to privacy would certainly be subordinated to public safety. It should also be clear that the inspectors referred to in this provision would be enforcing regulations applicable to home work, the kinds of provisions contained in the present instruments, and would not have authority to enter homes for other kinds of inspections or investigations or, once inside, to inspect anywhere and for any purposes other than for the enforcement of the provisions on home work. Concerning ILO Conventions on labour inspection, the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), spoke only of "workplaces", while the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), said specifically that an inspector could not enter a private home without the consent of the person or a special authorization issued by the competent authority.

234. The Workers' members found that the explanations were consistent with how they had interpreted the relationship of the Office text to other laws, and that it was appropriate to insert in this Point conditions under which inspections could be conducted, as had been done in Convention No. 129. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson remarked that the Office's explanation would also have been very helpful during the previous discussion on privacy in relation to the Convention. He expected difficulty from the conditions set out in the amendment, such as that inspections only take place within defined hours, because homeworkers tended to define their own working hours, for example. There was also a drafting problem with the amendment in that the inspection could take place without the presence of the homeworker. Finally, in view of the explanation from the representative of the Secretary-General, the Employers' members opposed the amendment as unnecessary. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, the United Republic of Tanzania, Turkey and the United States opposed the amendment. The Office text was clear, concise, wellbalanced, and flexible enough to recognize the different circumstances in various countries. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

235. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to the effect that inspection in the parts of the home or other private premises in which home work is carried out would be allowed "when no other appropriate means of enforcement is available, or on the request of a homeworker or of the homeworker's organization". It was important to explicitly restrict the inspectors' power of entry with well-defined conditions. Although the possibility for a homeworker to request an inspection was not excluded by the Office text, it was better to state it.

236. The Employers' members opposed the amendment. The right of the homeworker to request an inspection was indeed implicit in the Office text, though there was no objection to that part of the amendment. However, the first part required the inspector to demonstrate in every case that there was no other appropriate alternative to inspection as a means of enforcement. This was too restrictive, and would mean that inspectors would have to devote inordinate amounts of time in justifying their interventions rather than actually carrying out inspections.

237. The Government member of Canada, also speaking for the Government members of the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, Switzerland, the United Republic of Tanzania, Turkey and the United States, also preferred the Office text. She noted that the second part of the amendment was implicit in the Office text, especially in light of the foregoing discussion of privacy, while the first part seemed to oblige the inspector to seek other methods of enforcement. These members had difficulty in visualizing enforcement without the possibility of inspection. The Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom opposed the amendment. Its implementation would pose legal problems for many member States. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson suggested that examination of an employer's records would be one means of enforcement besides inspection of the homeworker's premises. If the Workers' members could assume that both parts of the amendment were implicit in the Office text, the amendment would not be necessary. The representative of the Secretary-General said it depended on national law and practice. The amendment was withdrawn for lack of support.

238. Point 17 was adopted without change.

239. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the phrase "the continuation of home work should be prohibited" with "appropriate measures should be taken to remedy this situation". In some cases prohibition was appropriate, but the amendment referred to a whole series of measures that might be taken by the authorities to remedy the situation, either by a resolution of the problem or prohibition. The Government member of Canada proposed a subamendment, since there was no harm in keeping the reference to prohibition, to add at the end of the Office text "until appropriate measures are taken to remedy the situation". This was acceptable to the Employers' and Workers' members, and the amendment as subamended was adopted.

240. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to provide for the right of a homeworker to refuse dangerous work. To make it simpler, they suggested a subamendment so it would read as follows: "A homeworker should have the right to refuse or cease work without sanctions if there is, in the opinion of the homeworker, such an imminent danger". This was similar to a clause in Article 13 of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), and was also in the Chemicals Convention, 1990 (No. 170).

241. The Employers' members agreed with the sentiment, but suggested an alternative subamendment derived from Articles 13 and 19(f) of Convention No. 155, which could be the basis for continued consideration of the issue in the second discussion. The Office text as already amended would become paragraph (1). A new paragraph (2) would read as follows:

(2) A homeworker who refuses to carry out work which he or she has reasonable justification to believe presents an imminent and serious danger to his or her life or health shall be protected from undue consequences in accordance with national conditions and practice. The homeworker should report this situation, in the first instance, to the employer.

The Workers' members agreed with the substance of the subamendment. The Government members of Australia, Canada and the United States also supported this subamendment, which was adopted. The amendment as subamended was adopted.

242. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to provide that "In the case of suspension of home work or of the giving out of home work, the homeworker should be compensated for lack of earnings". Since the situation covered in this Point would not be the fault of the homeworker, the burden should be borne by the employer or intermediary. The Employers' members opposed the amendment, and argued that homeworkers could sometimes be at fault, for example, because of the way the person chose to go about the work. In such cases, compensation would be inappropriate. The amendment also introduced a new area that had not been touched by the Office text. In his view, it was already covered in existing laws relating to contracts, a point echoed by the Government member of Algeria. The Government members of Canada, France, Norway, Swaziland, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the amendment. It went beyond some of their laws or would raise legal questions, and it was not necessarily limited to the situations covered by Point 18. The amendment was withdrawn by the Workers' members, who stated that it would be brought up again in the second discussion in relation to types of contracts and the information that should be given to homeworkers.

243. Point 18 was adopted as amended.

244. Two identical amendments to delete this point were submitted by the Employers' members and by the Government members of Canada, Japan, Norway, Swaziland and the United Kingdom. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the two previous Points provided adequate remedies and penalties to deal with health and safety issues. This Point was too broad-brushed, and crossed over laws and regulations of member States, some of which had such provisions and others not. The Government member of Canada agreed that it went too far and was too rigid, making it almost a principle. Point 10, paragraph (2), in the proposed Convention spoke of remedies, including penalties, which meant that prohibition of home work could be used. In contrast, the Workers' members opposed the amendment and thought that the Point elaborated further on the Convention text and made sense in a Recommendation, where severe penalties for such actions could be provided. While agreeing with the Government member of Canada that it was too rigid, the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom opposed the amendment because they wanted the opportunity to amend the Point but did not wish its deletion. Put to the vote, the amendment was defeated by 39,491 votes in favour, 42,228 votes against and 3,519 abstentions.

245. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the text which prohibited an employer or an intermediary from giving out home work by the phrase "appropriate measures should be taken in accordance with national law and practice". The effect was to remove what they termed a single blunt instrument, and to leave a range of options open to suit the specific needs of each case. However, the Workers' members opposed the amendment because it would have the same effect as deleting the Point.

246. The Government member of France proposed a subamendment to reinsert a phrase which would add after "appropriate measures" language something like: "concerning, in particular, the possible prohibition on giving out home work". He reported that, in discussing the amendment, the Government members of the countries which belonged to the European Union had wanted to ask the Legal Adviser if it would have the effect of creating new obligations on member States. He also wondered, in view of what the representative of the Secretary-General had said earlier about the use of the phrase "in accordance with national law and practice", whether the phrase had any meaning any more. The representative of the Secretary-General recalled that a Convention imposed obligations, while a Recommendation did not, thus the phrase could not be used in a Convention to avoid obligations. Point 19 was intended to be included in a Recommendation. If a country had legislation covering the case of repeated violations, which did not include such a prohibition, it could be influenced by this Point to amend its legislation or could choose to ignore it.

247. The Government member of Canada added that the phrase should be considered in the context of either form of instrument. Depending on the wording of the provision, the phrase could mean that the decision to take the proposed action or not would depend on the compatibility of that action with national practice and legislation. In the case where the obligation was more precise and the phrase were added, it would not lessen the obligation but would give flexibility in the way in which the member State could apply this obligation. Anything in a Recommendation was not binding. She supported the subamendment suggested by the Government member of France. After considerable discussion over alternative drafting of the subamendment, a subamendment was adopted, which would make Point 19 read as follows:

In cases of serious or repeated violations of the laws and regulations applicable to home work appropriate measures should be taken, including the possible prohibition of giving out home work, in accordance with national law and practice.

As a result, the Workers' members withdrew an amendment which sought to add "in addition to other appropriate penalties" at the end of the Point and the Employers' members withdrew an amendment to include "homeworkers" as possible violators.

248. Point 19 was adopted as amended.

New Point after Point 19

249. The Workers' members submitted an amendment, which read as follows:

In the case of suspension or termination of home work for one of the reasons referred to in Points 18 and 19, the homemaker should be properly compensated for loss of earnings, and receive protection against victimization.

The amendment was subamended to read as follows:

In the case of suspension or termination of home work for one of the reasons referred to in Points 18 and 19, the homeworker should receive protection against victimization. The Employers' members opposed the amendment, as its reference to "victimization" was particularly inappropriate and troublesome. The Government member of Algeria also opposed it and said the issue should be in the contract between the employer and homeworker.

250. The Government members of Austria, Belgium, Finland, France, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, and Sweden opposed the amendment. The term "victimization" was too subjective. They proposed a subamendment so that the new Point would read as follows:

In the case of suspension or termination of home work due to serious violation due to the employer, the homeworker should be compensated in accordance with the modalities envisaged by legislation and national practice.

The Workers' members proposed a subamendment to this subamendment to insert "and protected" after "compensated", but later withdrew it. While they at first opposed this subamendment because they wanted to retain the reference to Points 18 and 19, after discussion they said they could support it.

251. On behalf of the Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States, the Government member of Canada expressed a firm preference for the Office text. Speaking on behalf of Canada, she opposed the subamendment offered by the Government member of France and others. While there might be legislation in some countries to provide for such compensation, this was not the case in every member State of the ILO. Although the sentiment was good, it could amount to a sectoral provision for homeworkers only, where such a provision did not exist for workers in general.

252. The Employers' members opposed the subamendment as well. If support for it were forthcoming, they would bring in another subamendment to refer to violations due not only to the employer, but also to the intermediary and the homeworker. The Government members of Ireland and Sweden also opposed the subamendment. The subamendment was rejected. The Workers' members then withdrew the amendment.

III. MINIMUM WAGE

Point 20

253. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the words "where this is not already the case" which they considered superfluous. The Government member of Germany noted that perhaps Point 20 could even be deleted because minimum age for admission to employment or work was already covered in Point 6(2).

254. In response to a request for clarification from the Workers' Vice-Chairperson, the representative of the Secretary-General admitted that the phrase "where this is not already the case" was not necessary. As to the distinction between Point 6(2) and Point 20, Point 6(2) provided that minimum age for admission to employment or work should be among those priority areas to be considered in promoting equality of treatment between homeworkers and other categories of workers. In Point 20, a recommendation was made to member States which had laws and regulations concerning minimum age for admission to employment or work to expand the scope of such laws and regulations so as to cover also home work. Member States which did not have such laws and regulations would not be affected. The amendment was withdrawn.

255. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph to Point 20:

With a view to progressively reducing the use of child labour, programmes should be devised and directed to children and their families aimed at diminishing the families' dependence on child labour. Such programmes should include information on nutrition, education and vocational skill training.

The Employers' members opposed the amendment and emphasized that, while the sentiments contained in the amendment were laudable, they were not germane to the proposed Recommendation. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, Switzerland, the United Republic of Tanzania and the United States also opposed the amendment.

256. The Government member of Spain, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and Sweden, introduced a subamendment so that the amendment would read as follows: "Special programmes should be drawn up to reduce progressively child labour in connection with home work." They believed that the need to sensitize countries about child labour remained a priority. The Workers' members supported the proposed subamendment.

257. The Government members of Algeria and the United Kingdom noted that the amendment and subamendment were not appropriate in this instrument because the problem of child labour was not confined to home work. The Government member of Germany, citing the statement on child labour of the Minister of Labour of Germany to the Conference, thought it would highlight that children were engaged in home work in many countries. The Government member of Canada appreciated the assistance provided by the German Government to the ILO's International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour, but reiterated that the amendment did not belong in this instrument. Child labour was a serious problem, the Governing Body was continuing to discuss it in various committees, and it was found in all sectors of the economy. Points 6(2) and 20 already reflected the Committee's commitment against child labour in home work.

258. The representative of the Secretary-General expressed strong reservations about the phrase "to reduce progressively". International labour standards should clearly reflect the ILO's principal objective to eliminate child labour and there should be no ambiguity created about the ILO's position. The Government member of Spain then suggested to delete the word "progressively". As there was no agreement, the amendment and subamendment were withdrawn. However, the Workers' members considered that it was important that the Committee had recognized child labour as a serious problem in home work and that there was a commitment to eliminate it.

259. Point 20 was adopted without change.

IV. THE RIGHTS TO ORGANIZE AND TO BARGAIN COLLECTIVELY

Point 21

260. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace this Point by the following:

Homeworkers should have the right to establish their own organizations or to join organizations of their choice. Organizations of homeworkers should have the right to join trade union federations or confederations.

They believed that this was essentially a positive reformulation of the Office's text, in line with the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

261. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. Point 21 brought into sharp focus the restrictions or other obstacles that existed to making effective the rights to organize and to bargain collectively. These restrictions and obstacles were a reality in several countries. The Government member of Canada also opposed the amendment. She had similar concerns to those of the Employers' members; that the objective of the Office text was good, but that it could impose an administrative burden. But, the Workers' members also had a valid point. Since the principle of freedom of association was already in Point 6 of the Convention, it was appropriate that the Recommendation amplified on it and drew attention to obstacles that might exist, thus she preferred the orientation in the Office text.

262. The Government member of the United States supported the amendment. It was a clear, crisp, policy statement. The Government member of Swaziland also supported the amendment, but felt that it dealt with only one aspect. It did not convey the specific idea that was in the Office text of identification and elimination of obstacles. He introduced a subamendment to retain the text of the amendment, which would become paragraph (1) and to add a new paragraph (2), as follows:

(2) Any obstacles that have been identified as impeding the process under paragraph (1) above should be eliminated.

The Workers' members opposed this subamendment. The nature of the obstacles were more clearly identified in the Office text. The subamendment was withdrawn, as was the amendment.

263. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert, after the word "choice", the phrase "and to participate in the activities of such organizations". It was to bring the text in the proposed Recommendation into line with Point 6(2)(a) of the proposed Convention. The Employers' members had no serious objection, but queried whether the phrase would have implications for employers in terms of financing certain activities. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson said that would depend on national law and practice. The representative of the Secretary-General agreed. For example, in some countries, workers could take paid leave while on trade union business. The Government of Nigeria saw no need to insert the phrase, since allowing homeworkers to join organizations entailed their participation in the activities of the organizations. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Poland, Norway, the Russian Federation, South Africa, Swaziland, Switzerland, the United Republic of Tanzania, Turkey and the United States supported the amendment. The amendment was adopted.

264. Point 21 was adopted as amended.

265. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to add "promote" after "encourage", so that measures would be taken both to encourage and promote collective bargaining.

266. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment to insert after "collective bargaining" the words "or any other methods in accordance with national law and practice".

267. Point 22 was adopted without change.

V. REMUNERATION

Point 23

268. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Malta, Norway, the Russian Federation, South Africa, Swaziland, Switzerland and the United States submitted an amendment to replace this Point by the following: "Minimum wage legislation should apply to home work." The Government member of Japan supported the amendment, since the new text would only affect countries having minimum wage legislation. He added that it had been difficult to implement Japan's home work legislation. The Government member of Germany opposed the amendment.

269. The Workers' members proposed a subamendment, which attempted to merge elements of various subsequent amendments and the Office text, to read as follows:

Minimum wage legislation, where it exists, should apply to home work and, where absent, minimum rates of wages on a time or piece basis should be fixed, in accordance with national law and practice.

270. The Employers' members opposed both the amendment and the subamendment. The Office text addressed one concern, that there should be minimum rates of wages for homeworkers. It did not specify by whom, or at what level, they should be fixed, thus leaving open the possibilities. The amendment, however, would apply minimum wage legislation to home work. Since the Committee had adopted a definition of home work which encompassed categories of persons who were not employees, an extra legislative obligation and burden of implementing the existing legislation on minimum wages would be created. In certain countries, like Japan, minimum wage legislation was restricted to employees.

271. The Government member of the United Kingdom shared the concerns of the sponsors of the amendment. The part of the subamendment which referred to legislation "where it exists" might prevent a new obligation on governments, but the entire formulation encompassed too many issues.

272. The Government member of Canada opposed the subamendment. The principle of not excluding homeworkers from minimum wage legislation was a good one, but not the provision relating to fixing minimum wage rates by sector. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson did not think that the subamendment meant that the fixing of minimum wages would be by sector and sought clarification. The Government member of Canada replied that, in the context of an ILO instrument for one sector of the labour market — home work — the subamendment could lead to the situation where there would be minimum wages for homeworkers, but not necessarily for other categories of workers.

273. The Government member of France thought that, whereas the Office text might have said too little, the subamendment submitted by the Workers' members went too far. The Office text signified either that minimum rates of wages would be for all types of home work, in which case it meant the same thing as the subamendment, or that rates could be set for different types of home work, depending on the product, etc. In that case, the amendment was much clearer.

274. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson remarked that he had not interpreted the Office text to mean that there could be minimum wages for homeworkers fixed by sector. If that were the case, the Employers' members were more comfortable with the amendment. The Workers' members repeated that it seemed to them that the Office text had left open the level at which rates would be fixed, incorporating the possibilities of collective bargaining, wage councils, etc., but that it did not imply that rates would be fixed for a specific sector of homeworkers. In the amendment and subamendment, where minimum wage legislation existed, the idea was to have it apply to homeworkers. They asked the Office to explain the meaning of its text in Point 23. The representative of the Secretary-General stated that the Office text did not identify at which level minimum rates of wages for home work should be fixed. Nor did it identify how the minimum rates of wages were to be fixed: it could be through legislation, collective bargaining or any other means consistent with national law and practice. The Office text was also different than the amendment on another aspect. The recommendation contained in Point 23 was directed to all countries, irrespective of whether or not they had minimum wage legislation, whereas the recommendation in the amendment was intended only for countries which had such legislation. The Workers' members maintained their subamendment and emphasized that it included the phrase "in accordance with national law and practice". Finally, in view of insufficient support from the Government members, the subamendment was withdrawn. The Employers' members stated their preference for the Office text in view of the explanation of the representative of the Secretary-General. The amendment was rejected.

275. The Government members of Austria, Belgium, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, Portugal, Spain and Sweden submitted an amendment to insert at the beginning of the Point the words "Within the framework of equality of treatment". In introducing this amendment, the Government member of France recalled the earlier discussions on Point 6. He said that two issues should be clearly set out. First, minimum rates of wages for home work should be fixed in reference to other types of work. Second, this provision should not be understood as applying only to countries which already had a legal system for fixing minimum wages, but also as a commitment for other countries to promote the establishment of such systems. He proposed a subamendment to add the words “provided for in the Convention” at the end of the amendment so that the reference was to the framework of equality of treatment in the Convention.

276. The Workers’ members supported the amendment and subamendment. The Employers’ members, however, opposed both. The principle that equality of treatment applied to remuneration was already in the Convention. Inserting the amendment here implied putting in the principle of equal pay for equal work. It also interfered with the operative parts of the provisions on remuneration included in Points 24 to 28. In reply, the Government member of France noted that Point 23 was the only Point which covered the issue of minimum rates of wages, thus the amendment did not affect the rest of the Points on remuneration. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Norway, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States opposed the amendment. The amendment, while well-meaning, did not add much and could lead to confusion. The amendment was withdrawn.

277. The Employers’ members submitted an amendment to insert after “wages” the words “on a time, piece or other basis”, but were willing to withdraw it if the Workers’ members were opposed to it. The Workers’ members could accept only time and piece, but not “other basis”. Though the Employers’ Vice-Chairperson observed that there were other bases for fixing wages, the amendment was withdrawn.

278. The Employers’ members and the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, Portugal, Spain and Sweden submitted an identical amendment to add, at the end of Point 23, the words “in accordance with national law and practice”. It was to take account of the wide variety of national law and practice and allow the minimum rates of wages to be set in accordance with the way it was done in each country. The Workers’ members supported the amendment, but with the understanding that the minimum wage rates would be fixed. The amendment indicated only that the way of doing it would be in accordance with national law and practice. The latter phrase did not mean that, if national law and practice did not provide for any minimum wage fixing for home work, there would be none. The amendment was adopted.

279. Point 23 was adopted as amended.

Point 24

280. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Hungary, Norway, South Africa, Swaziland, Turkey and the United States submitted an amendment to replace in the first paragraph the words “actually payable to” by the word “of”. The term “actually payable” was confusing. It included elements of gross and net remuneration. Deductions at the source varied, for example, for the purposes of taxation and social security and statutory deductions from remuneration were outside the framework of collective agreements. The Employers' members supported the amendment.

281. The Workers' members read Point 24 as making a distinction between minimum wages, which were covered in Point 23, and real wages, and not between the concepts of gross and net remuneration. The Workers' members sought clarification from the Office on the term "actually payable". The Government members of Austria, Belgium and Germany had a similar understanding and did not want to impede the ability of homeworkers to agree to remuneration above the minimum wage rate. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that the minimum rates of wages mentioned in Point 23 meant the amount of basic remuneration below which no homeworker could be paid, whereas the rates of remuneration actually payable mentioned in Point 24 meant the amount of basic remuneration which homeworkers actually got or were supposed to get and which could be superior to the minimum rates of wages.

282. The Government member of the United Kingdom supported the amendment, as it took away the confusion in the Office text. The Workers' members also supported the amendment. The amendment was adopted.

283. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete in the introductory part of the Point all the text following the words "fixed by", and to insert a new clause (a): "collective bargaining". They noted that the formulation of this Point had been changed from that in the Office questionnaire. They were concerned that the new formulation might be interpreted in a restrictive way to mean that only if collective bargaining existed in a member State, whether or not collective bargaining agreements were actually reached which applied to homeworkers, existing clauses (a) and (b) would not come into play. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that the change in the formulation was based on replies to the questionnaire, in which many governments had emphasized the importance of fixing rates of remuneration by collective bargaining. "In the absence of such bargaining" had to be read in conjunction with the first sentence of Point 24. "Such bargaining" referred to the collective bargaining which fixed the rates of remuneration payable to homeworkers. Where these rates had not been fixed by collective bargaining, then other methods in clauses (a) and (b) would be used.

284. The Employers' members submitted a subamendment to add the words "individual or" before "collective bargaining". This was to take account of the reality that often there was no collective bargaining and rates of remuneration were fixed in individual agreements between the employer and the homeworker. The Point therefore should recognize all three ways of fixing rates of remuneration: individual or collective bargaining, decisions of the competent authority or other appropriate wage-fixing machinery. Since the definition of home work was broad and encompassed many persons working at home who were not real employees under national law, it was very likely that the rates of remuneration of these persons would be in individual agreements with the employer and not in collective agreements. In view of the nature of home work, recognition of individual bargaining was important.

285. The Government member of Canada supported the amendment but not the subamendment. Based on the replies to the Office questionnaire, the Point now flagged a preference for collective bargaining. Individual bargaining was a reality, but the present clause (b) in Point 24 could be interpreted to cover it. The Workers' members fully agreed with the comments of the Government member of Canada. The idea was not to promote individual bargaining, but to promote collective bargaining. Individual bargaining existed and would continue to exist, but this fact was not explicit in any part of the Convention or Recommendation. While they wished to withdraw the amendment based on the discussion, they asked for clarification from the Office on the interpretation of clause (b), since it was not clear whether individual bargaining was covered by it.

286. The representative of the Secretary-General replied that clause (b) was not meant to include bargaining between the employer and the individual homemaker. If that was what the Committee wished, it would have to be implicitly included. The Employers' members maintained their subamendment. The Government member of the United Kingdom supported the subamendment, which reflected reality, but did not preclude collective bargaining. The Government member of Japan also supported the subamendment.

287. The Government member of France, also speaking on behalf of the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom, opposed the subamendment. He observed that individual bargaining was one modality among others for fixing rates of remuneration and therefore understood the concern of the Employers' members. However, there was a problem in putting individual bargaining on the same level as collective bargaining, which conflicted with the substance of the ILO's work which related to collective relations.

288. The Workers' members, too, strongly opposed the subamendment. In this Recommendation, which specified measures to be promoted within the framework of the national policy on home work, it made no sense to promote individual bargaining. However, if the Committee wanted to mention the existence of individual agreements, it would be better to say that: "Realizing that rates of remuneration are often fixed by individual agreements, it is preferable to determine them by collective bargaining, or ...".

289. The Government member of Canada proposed a subamendment to the subamendment so that the amendment would read as follows: "collective bargaining or by agreement between the homemaker and the employer". This would become new clause (a), rather than be inserted after clause (a).

290. The Workers' members opposed this proposal as it still placed individual bargaining on a par with collective bargaining. The concept of collective bargaining should not be weakened within the framework of this Recommendation, since it was such an essential element of the principles of the ILO. The Employers' members insisted that if the ILO wanted to begin setting standards on new and non-industrial forms of employment, it was important to recognize the existence of individual agreements and the preference that many of the workers in these forms of employment had for individual agreements. The Recommendation did not allow this flexibility, especially considering the broad definition of home work. They could support the subamendment to the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Canada.

291. Referring to the Workers' members observations, the Government member of Japan said that the issue of promoting collective bargaining was already covered by Point 22, and there was no need to repeat the same in Point 24, which dealt with wage fixing. It was right to recognize the various ways in which wages were fixed. The Government member of the United States said that individual bargaining had to be recognized as a reality, despite what wording was finally agreed.

292. The Government member of France reiterated the two main objections that the Government members on behalf of whom he spoke had to the subamendments being discussed; the use of the term "bargaining" was inappropriate when referring to individual relations. First, it entailed a connotation of comparability to collective bargaining which was not acceptable. Second, the subamendments did not establish any hierarchy between individual and collective bargaining. Taking into account the new realities in the world did not imply abandoning the key principles of the ILO.

293. Referring to the concerns expressed by the Workers' members, the Employers' members and some Government members, the Government member of Canada withdrew her subamendment to the subamendment of the Employers' members, and proposed the following, which would make Point 24 read as follows:

Rates of remuneration of homeworkers should be fixed by collective bargaining. In the absence of such bargaining, they should be determined by:

- (a) decisions of the competent authority, after consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers, the organizations concerned with homeworkers and those of employers of homeworkers, or where the latter do not exist, representatives of homeworkers and of employers of homeworkers;
- (b) other appropriate wage-fixing machinery at the national, sectoral or local levels; or
- (c) by agreement between the homeworker and the employer.

The Employers' members agreed. The Workers' members agreed, but only for this year, and with strong reservations. This subamendment was considered as replacing the earlier subamendment. The amendment as subamended was adopted.

294. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert the word "preferably" in the first line of the Point after the word "fixed". It seemed clear from the discussion that there was agreement on giving priority to collective bargaining, and thus "preferably" was already read into the text. If that interpretation were confirmed, the amendment could be withdrawn. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Norway, Poland, South Africa, Swaziland, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the amendment. The Employers' members also opposed the amendment, and considered that the issue was already covered in Point 22, which stated that measures should be taken to encourage collective bargaining as a means of regulating the terms and conditions of work of homeworkers. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment, and accepted the reference to Point 22 as being consistent with what they were trying to do with the amendment.

295. The Employers' and Workers' members agreed to withdraw several pending amendments in view of the amendments that had already been adopted to Point 24. The withdrawn amendment of the Workers' members would have inserted, after "In the absence of such bargaining", the phrase "or in so far as homeworkers are not sufficiently covered by such bargaining". They emphasized that their interpretation of the Office text was that the intent of the amendment was already there. There was thus the possibility of applying wage-fixing machinery, other than collective bargaining, if the latter provided insufficient coverage of homeworkers.

296. Point 24 was adopted as amended.

297. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment to delete the Point.

298. The Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, the Netherlands, Spain and Sweden submitted an amendment to make, in case of specified work paid by the piece, the rate of remuneration of a homeworker "comparable to" the rate received by a worker in the enterprise of the employer, rather than "the same as". The Government member of Ireland explained that this added flexibility. The Employers' members supported the amendment, as the Office text was too rigid. The Workers' members offered a subamendment to add "and at least equivalent to". The Employers' members opposed this. It could result in augmentation of salaries to match the highest in the region, since the comparison, when there were no workers in the enterprise of the employer, extended to other enterprises in the region. The Government member of Ireland also opposed the subamendment, noting that it was a contradiction in terms to speak of "comparable to" and "at least equivalent to" at the same time. The Government members of Germany, Swaziland and the United States also opposed the subamendment. The subamendment was rejected. The amendment to replace "the same as" by "comparable to" was adopted.

299. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to specify that the worker in the enterprise of the employer, with whom the rate of remuneration would be compared, should be "engaged in the same or similar type of work or occupation" as the homeworker, it being considered already in the Office text.

300. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph to Point 25, as follows:

Where homeworkers are paid by the piece, their remuneration should:

- (a) be established after an impartial assessment of the time needed to complete the piece;
- (b) take into account the amount that workers in the enterprise who are paid on a time basis would receive for the time fixed in this assessment.

They wanted to ensure equal treatment between homeworkers and enterprise-based workers and to indicate how piece-based rates could be translated into time-based rates. This was not to say that the remuneration had to be the same. Sometimes a homeworker would take longer to complete a task than a worker in the enterprise due to the absence of sophisticated equipment, for example.

301. The Employers' members opposed the amendment. The proposed assessment seemed to be a job-creation scheme for job assessors. The differences in working techniques and levels of investment in the factory and in the home, and other factors like location of the work, rendered it impossible to make a meaningful correlation between piece-based and time-based remuneration. The Government member of Canada shared the concerns of the Employers' members, and offered a subamendment to delete clause (a) of the amendment and to modify clause (b) to read as follows: "take into account the amount that workers in the enterprise who are paid on a time basis would receive for the time established for the completion of that piece". The Workers' members agreed. The Employers' members and a substantial number of Government members opposed the subamendment. The amendment and subamendment were withdrawn.

302. Point 25 was adopted as amended.

Point 26

303. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the first line by the following: "The terms of employment for homeworkers should take into account reimbursement of legitimate expenses and/or remuneration for:", to distinguish reimbursement for expenses from remuneration for work. They recalled the previous discussion of the possible disadvantages for homeworkers of mixing reimbursement and remuneration. The Workers' members acknowledged that the amendment addressed a problem that had troubled them, too. They considered the word "reimbursement" to be a better formulation than "compensation" or "direct compensation" as they had proposed in another amendment. Nevertheless, they preferred a stronger statement than "take into account". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson explained that the wording reflected the potential complexity of the situation of a homeworker with more than one employer, especially concerning the difficulty of dividing costs, such as for heat, light and water. The Government member of Canada asked for clarification of the word "compensation" used in the Office text. In her view, it need not be the employer who compensated the homeworker for certain expenses, such as those listed in clause (a). The representative of the Secretary-General responded that the phrase "homeworkers should receive compensation" was not limited to compensation from employers, though it was anticipated that more often than not it would be from the employer. It corroborated the view of the Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Hungary, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States, who opposed the amendment and announced that they opposed all subsequent amendments to the Office text on Point 26. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment and similarly opposed subsequent amendments. The Workers' members withdrew the following four amendments: (1) to replace "compensation" in the first line by "direct compensation from the employer"; (2) in clause (a) to replace the words "maintenance of machinery and equipment" by "maintenance and installation of machinery and computer and other equipment and workstations"; (3) to add at the end of clause (a) "transport, rent and provision of space, insurance and materials"; and (4) add a new clause after (b): "capital costs for the purchase of tools and machinery".

304. Point 26 was adopted without change.

Point 27

Paragraph (1)

305. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to add the words "and should be properly enforced" at the end of the sentence.

Paragraph (2)

306. The Government members of Denmark and Germany submitted an amendment to delete paragraph (2). They thought it was too detailed for the Recommendation, went beyond what applied to other workers and could limit the liability of homeworkers, even when they produced useless work. The Government members of the Republic of Korea and the United Kingdom supported the amendment. However, the Government members of Canada and Turkey opposed it; the former noted that the Point was appropriate in the Recommendation given the reality that abuses occurred in deductions from homeworkers' pay. The Employers' members supported the amendment, while the Workers' members opposed it. As little further support was forthcoming from Government members, the amendment was withdrawn.

307. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to further restrict deductions from the remuneration of homeworkers. It sought to replace paragraph (2) by the following:

Deductions from the homeworker's remuneration to cover the cost of spoilt materials or defective work should not be allowed, unless on specific grounds and after written specification by the employer, and should not exceed pre-established limits.

They then proposed a subamendment to delete "and after written specification by the employer". The Employers' members and the Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Hungary, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, Turkey and the United Kingdom opposed both the amendment and the subamendment. The amendment and subamendment were withdrawn.

308. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to add the words "in accordance with national law and practice" at the end of the paragraph, to reflect the fact that many countries already had laws in this area, and that new procedures should not be required. The Government member of Canada stated that this phrase was superfluous in this context. The Government members of Australia, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Norway, Poland, Switzerland and Turkey opposed the amendment, as did the Workers' members. The amendment was withdrawn.

309. Point 27 was adopted without change.

310. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete this Point. Given that the meaning of intermediaries was unclear and that there was the possibility that a long chain of intermediaries could exist between a homeworker and the ultimate customer for the homeworker's product or service, establishing liability would be a nightmare. This should be left to national law on the resolution of contractual disputes. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. They had tried, but failed, to introduce this Point into the proposed Convention. At that time, many Governments had argued that the provision would be better placed in the proposed Recommendation. The aim of this Point was to ensure that homeworkers had someone against whom they could claim their remuneration if it went unpaid. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Egypt, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Ireland, Japan, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Portugal, the Russian Federation, Spain, South Africa, Swaziland, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the amendment. They preferred to amend the Point rather than to delete it. The amendment was withdrawn.

311. The Government members of Australia, Canada, South Africa and the United States submitted an amendment to replace “and the intermediary, if any” with “and any other person jointly responsible under national legislation,”. They were sensitive to the fact that abuses could occur when there was no clear responsibility and when employers could hide behind intermediaries, but the Office text went too far. It did not take account of the differences in how this problem was dealt with in various countries.

312. The Workers’ Vice-Chairperson interpreted the Office text of Point 28 as a recommendation directed to all member States, irrespective of whether or not they had legislation that fixed responsibility for the payment of the remuneration due to homeworkers. If the existence of relevant national laws was a precondition for the application of this Point, it would be too limited. The Government member of Canada explained that the object of the amendment was to fix responsibility on persons who were responsible under national law. This needed to be read in relation to Point 9 of the Convention concerning national laws and regulations on intermediaries. The Workers’ Vice-Chairperson replied that this Point of the proposed Convention did not say how responsibility for remuneration was to be fixed, however, and so it did not cover the same issues as Point 28.

313. The representative of the Secretary-General stated that the Office text said that intermediaries were to share responsibility for payment of remuneration which was due to homeworkers even if such responsibility were not prescribed by national legislation, whereas the text proposed by the amendment would only apply in countries where there was legislation defining the responsibility of intermediaries or other persons jointly responsible. The Government member of the United States explained that the amendment was intended to remove responsibility from employees acting as intermediaries under the orders of the employer. The Workers’ members preferred the Office text. The Employers’ members also opposed the amendment. The Government member of Canada stressed that “intermediary”, whose common meaning was anyone coming between the parties, could refer to a person simply transporting materials from the employer to the homeworker. Joint and several liability in such cases was too far-reaching.

314. The Chairperson observed that the Point was especially concerned with the case of intermediaries who had been given money by employers to pay homeworkers but had not in fact done so; the employers should not be excused from their responsibilities just for having disbursed the money. The Employers’ members observed that, in this scenario, the homeworker had recourse against the employer, and the employer against the intermediary.

315. The Workers' members asserted that the Point responded to the situation described in Report V(1): many homeworkers knew only intermediaries and had no idea who their real employer was. To meet some of the concern which had been expressed, they submitted a subamendment to replace "intermediary" by "any person acting on behalf of the employer". The Employers' members objected; it still went too far. The Government member of Switzerland opposed the subamendment and interpreted it to mean that an employee who concluded a contract with a homeworker in an employer's name would be liable, while a subcontractor who concluded a contract in his own name would not be liable, which was contrary to the desired result.

316. Put to the vote, the Workers' subamendment was rejected by 130 votes in favour and 1,130 votes against, with 930 abstentions. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by 980 votes in favour and 1,050 votes against, with 110 abstentions.

317. On the understanding that the Committee would return to the question of liability for remuneration during the second discussion, the Workers' members withdrew an amendment to insert the words "and other pecuniary obligations" after the word "remuneration".

318. The Government member of Germany submitted an amendment to add the words "in accordance with national law and practice" at the end of the Point. She noted that many countries already had well-developed systems of liability law that defined the recourse of homeworkers against employers and intermediaries in different cases, and that these should be recognized. The Government member of Portugal supported the amendment and gave the example of the embroidery workers of Madeira: some of them acted as intermediaries between their fellow workers and their employers, but they should not be subject to the same liability as employers. The Workers' and Employers' members supported the amendment. The amendment was adopted.

319. Point 28 was adopted as amended.

VI. OCCUPATIONAL SAFETY AND HEALTH

Point 29

320. The Government members of Australia, Canada, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States, and the Employers' members, submitted identical amendments to replace the words "should draw up, publish and disseminate guidelines" by the words "should ensure the dissemination of guidelines". This would take into account new technologies for transmitting information and, while leaving the responsibility on the competent authority, would allow it to ensure dissemination of guidelines without having to bear full administrative burden. The Workers' members supported it. The amendment was adopted.

321. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to insert, in the first line after "authority should", the following: "in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers and organizations of homeworkers". Their other amendment to add, at the end of the Point, "to ensure the same level of safety and health as for comparable workers in the enterprise” was also withdrawn, being contained already in the provisions of the Convention.

322. The Employers’ members withdrew an amendment to replace the words “that should be observed by” by “applicable to”.

323. Point 29 was adopted as amended.

Point 30

324. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment providing that the employers should, in addition to those things required in clauses (a), (b) and (c), “ensure that the work given out to a homeworker, or the work process used by a homeworker, does not cause risk to the safety and health of the homeworker, or his or her family or the environment”. The intention was to expand on the coverage in the Recommendation of safety and health issues, but they withdrew this amendment, as well as their other amendment to add a new clause after clause (c), as follows: “to provide homeworkers with a list of dangerous or non-authorized substances and products and specifications on how to handle these”. They preferred to have a text that better linked this Point to the Points on supervision of home work, such as Points 17, 18 and 19. They asked the Office to prepare such a text before the second discussion.

325. The Employers’ members introduced an amendment to insert the phrase “so far as is reasonably practicable” after “required” in the first line. They agreed wholeheartedly with the principle involved. However, there were two sides to the safety and health issue: the responsibility of the employer and that of the employee. Homeworkers were distant from the employer and without direct supervision most of the time. Although employers would do everything they could to ensure these provisions, there were limitations given the special characteristics of home work. The Workers’ members opposed the amendment, as did the Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Malta, Poland, Norway, the Russian Federation, Slovakia, South Africa, Swaziland, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States. The amendment was withdrawn.

326. The Employers’ members submitted an amendment to refer to “specific” hazards, rather than “any”, which was too broad in this context. An employer might not even be aware of all the hazards due to the homeworker’s environment or methods of working. The Workers’ members, as well as the Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Malta, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, Slovakia, South Africa, Swaziland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States, opposed the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn.

327. The Employers’ members introduced an amendment to refer to those hazards “directly” associated with the work given to homeworkers. The requirements on employers would be way too extensive otherwise. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Malta, Poland, Norway, the Russian Federation, Slovakia, South Africa, Swaziland, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn.

Clause (b)

328. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to refer to machinery, tools and other equipment "used by" homeworkers, rather than to those "provided to" homeworkers. There were many situations in which homeworkers owned their equipment and it was also useful in those cases, too, for the employers to ensure the safety of the equipment. The Employers' members opposed the amendment. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Malta, Poland, Norway, the Russian Federation, Slovakia, South Africa, Swaziland, Switzerland, the United Republic of Tanzania, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States also opposed the amendment. The Government member of France opposed the amendment and remarked that the situation of a homeworker was in between that of a regular worker and an independent worker. This was an example of where the employer could not be asked to have responsibility for the equipment supplied by the homeworker. The amendment was withdrawn.

329. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment to insert "where appropriate" in the second line after "devices and".

Clause (c)

330. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the clause on providing protective equipment free of charge to homeworkers. Although the principle was appropriate, it was not so in the case of homeworkers where there was the possibility of multiple employers. The requirement would be extremely burdensome. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. They argued that in most cases, only simple protective equipment was involved, such as ear plugs. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Malta, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, Slovakia, South Africa, Swaziland, Switzerland and the United States preferred the Office text. The amendment was withdrawn.

331. Point 30 was adopted without change.

New Point after Point 30

332. The Employers' members introduced an amendment to insert a new Point after Point 30 that would refer to the homeworker's responsibility for safety and health, as follows:

The homeworker should be required to:

- (a) comply with prescribed health and safety measures;
- (b) take reasonable care for their own safety and health and that of other persons who may be affected by their acts or omissions at work, including the proper use of facilities and equipment placed at their disposal.

The Employers' Vice-Chairperson commented that the Office text was not balanced: the responsibilities of employers were mentioned but not those of workers. Homeworkers had to take personal responsibility for safety and health as they were not supervised and often had more autonomy than employees in an enterprise. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Malta, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, Swaziland, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States supported the amendment. The Government member of Norway affirmed that countries already had such legislation, and agreed with the point about the balance of responsibilities between employers and workers. The Workers' members opposed the amendment, on the basis that the recommendation made therein was not a priority. The Government member of Austria agreed that the personal responsibility of the homeworker was important, but since this had not been fully discussed, especially with regard to sanctions, they could not support the amendment. After many Government members indicated their support, the amendment was adopted.

333. The new Point was adopted.

VII. HOURS OF WORK, REST PERIODS AND LEAVE

Point 31

334. The Employers' members withdrew the following two amendments: to insert, at the beginning of the Point, "So far as is reasonably practicable" and to add, at the end of the Point, the words "taking into account national law and practice".

335. Point 31 was adopted without change.

336. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to provide homeworkers with the same entitlements, and at least the statutory minimum, as those for comparable workers in the enterprise concerning paid public holidays, annual holidays with pay and sick leave. As no support was indicated, the amendment was withdrawn.

337. The Employers' members introduced an amendment to delete the reference to paid sick leave. This was a social security issue and not like the other items in this Point. The Government member of Swaziland commented that this might be the case in industrialized countries, but was not the same for developing countries. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Malta, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, Slovakia, South Africa, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States opposed the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn. Two other amendments submitted by the Employers' members were also withdrawn: insert, at the beginning of the Point, "Taking into account the specific conditions of home work"; and insert the words "where appropriate" after the word "should".

338. Point 32 was adopted without change.

VIII. SOCIAL SECURITY AND MATERNITY PROTECTION

Point 33

339. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete this Point, because statutory social security schemes were already covered in the proposed Convention. Moreover, the problems related to occupational social security, the effect on job creation and the complexity of administration had been discussed. This amendment was opposed by the Workers' members, who recalled that they had themselves submitted two amendments in order to clarify and reinforce the Office text. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Malta, Norway, the Russian Federation, South Africa, Swaziland, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States wanted to retain the Office text, and thus opposed the amendment. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

340. The Workers' members then presented an amendment so that the text would read as follows: "Homeworkers should have access to and should benefit from adequate social security protection." This Point went beyond what was in the proposed Convention so that homeworkers would have protection even where no statutory schemes existed. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Malta, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, Slovakia, South Africa, Swaziland, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the amendment. The Government member of France was perplexed by the word "adequate" which could lead to different interpretations and was a value judgement. He indicated that his Government had had a problem with ratifying the Convention on Part-Time Work, 1994 (No. 175), specifically because of the provisions on social security. The Government member of Ireland questioned whether the amendment added anything: "access" was implicit in "should benefit", and "adequate" was subjective. The Government member of Portugal also preferred the Office text, as it was unrealistic to think that social security protection could be extended to homeworkers when it was not even available to all employees. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

341. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add the following to the Office text:

(2) Social security schemes should be adapted so that homeworkers enjoy conditions equivalent to comparable workers in an enterprise.

(3) Where such schemes are not available or applicable, special schemes or funds should be developed for homeworkers.

The purpose of the amendment was to fortify the Office text. Noting the problems of Government members with words like "adequate" and "equivalent", the Workers' members proposed a subamendment to remove the reference to conditions equivalent to comparable workers in an enterprise, and said that they were also willing to add a phrase "according to national law and practice".

342. The Employers' members opposed the amendment and subamendment. The Office text was burdensome enough, and this went even further. The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Malta, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, Slovakia, Swaziland, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States preferred the Office text. In contrast, the Government member of South Africa supported the amendment as subamended, noting that homeworkers tended to be left out of most social security schemes. This was especially true in developing countries, but was also true in industrialized countries.

343. The Government member of France recognized that the subamendment was clearly different and that everyone had agreed that homeworkers should benefit from social security protection. It was important to mention not only the principle, but also the means by which it could be implemented. Each member State would follow the course that best suited them. He proposed a subamendment to combine all paragraphs in a single sentence, and to change the final paragraph to read "either by adapting existing schemes or by the creation of special schemes". The Government member of India did not support the idea of adapting existing social security schemes to cover homeworkers, but supported the suggestion for special schemes or funds. The experience in India had illustrated that special funds could be successful, especially where the employer was easily identifiable. This had been the case with the welfare fund for bidi workers, where funds had come from a levy on the product. Experience with a plan for handloom and coir workers, however, had not been encouraging because employers had failed to contribute.

344. The Government member of Canada proposed to add a second sentence to the Office text, which read as follows:

This could be done by:

- (a) extending existing social security provisions to homeworkers;
- (b) adapting social security schemes to cover homeworkers; or
- (c) developing special schemes or funds for homeworkers.

This proposal was supported by the Government members of France and India and the Workers' members, and was adopted.

345. Point 33 was adopted as amended.

Point 34

346. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment to delete this Point.

347. Point 34 was adopted without change.

New Point after Point 34

348. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to add a new Point, as follows:

Where homeworkers work on many separate contracts, their total hours of work, contributions or earnings should be taken into account in determining whether they meet threshold requirements in social security schemes and other employment benefits.

The Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the aim was to address the issue of homeworkers who worked for multiple employers, and hoped that the provisions on social security would be expanded in the second discussion.

IX. PROTECTION IN CASE OF TERMINATION OF EMPLOYMENT

New Point before Point 35

349. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to add a new Point, as follows:

Homeworkers should enjoy equal protection concerning termination of employment with workers in enterprises performing the same or similar type of work.

Point 35

350. The Government members of Australia, Canada, Egypt, Norway, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States submitted an amendment to replace the entire Point by the following:

Homeworkers should benefit from the same protection as that provided to other workers with respect to termination of employment legislation.

In introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United States stated that the amendment was a positive policy statement without unnecessary detail. The Employers' members supported the amendment.

351. The Workers' members introduced a subamendment to add the following sentence: "A homeworker whose employment is to be terminated should be entitled to a reasonable period of notice."

352. The Employers' members stated that reasonable periods of notice were generally covered in legislation on termination of employment. If they were not, the subamendment could be interpreted as offering a better condition for homeworkers than for other categories of workers. The Workers' members said that they were concerned about when notice was not in legislation, because notice could also be provided in collective agreements, for example, and without the amendment, such a possibility was not recognized. The Government member of Germany indicated that she had difficulty with the subamendment. If it meant extending legislation on employment termination beyond what was available for other workers, she could not agree.

353. The Government member of the United States proposed a subamendment to delete the word "legislation" from the amendment.

354. The Government member of the United Kingdom opposed the subamendment introduced by the Workers' members, but supported the subamendment of the Government member of the United States.

355. The Government member of France agreed with the principle of the subamendment of the Workers' members, but not the wording, since the term "reasonable" was too subjective. He proposed a subamendment to the subamendment of the Government member of the United States, which would add at the end of the amendment "particularly in regard to the matter of notice". The Government member of Algeria preferred the Office text because the amendment went beyond notice requirements to include other aspects of protection in the case of termination of employment. He, however, could support the suggestion of the Government member of France.

356. The Workers' members withdrew their subamendment. The Government member of France withdrew his subamendment to the subamendment of the Government member of the United States. The amendment of the Workers' members, as subamended by the Government member of the United States, to delete the word "legislation", was adopted.

357. Point 35 was adopted as amended.

X. RESOLUTION OF DISPUTES

Point 36

358. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to insert, before the word "mechanisms, the word "appropriate".

359. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to add, in the first line after the word "should", the words "in consultation with workers' organizations".

360. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment to add, at the end of the Point, the words "within existing national laws and practices".

361. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to add, at the end of the Point, the sentence: "Homeworkers should be informed of the establishment and procedures of such mechanisms".

362. Point 36 was adopted without change.

XI. PROGRAMMES TO ASSIST HOMEWORKERS

Point 37

Clause (b)

363. The Government members of Australia, Canada, Norway and the United States submitted an amendment to replace the word "educate" by "inform". The amendment was adopted.

Clause (c)

364. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to add, at the end of clause (c), the words "in organizations of their own choice" was adopted.

New clause after clause (d)

365. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert, after clause (d), a new clause, as follows: "prevent or remedy possible negative effects of changes in production and technology on the employment opportunities of homeworkers". The Employers' members opposed this amendment, as did the Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Malta, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, Slovakia, South Africa, Swaziland, Switzerland, the United Republic of Tanzania, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States. The amendment was withdrawn.

366. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert, after clause (d), the following new clause: "increase and improve access of homeworkers to qualitatively good and safe equipment and tools, raw materials and other essential materials". The Employers' members supported the amendment. The amendment was adopted.

Clause (e)

367. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert, at the beginning of clause (e), the words "where possible in cooperation with workers' organizations". The Employers' members opposed it. If it were to be supported by a majority, it should also refer to employers' organizations. The Government members of the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn.

New clause after clause (e)

368. The Government member of the Philippines submitted an amendment to add a new clause after clause (e), as follows: "provide developmental and technical assistance in order to improve the safety, health and productivity of homeworkers". The Employers' members and Workers' members supported the amendment. The amendment was adopted.

369. Point 37 was adopted as amended.

Proposed new Points after Point 37

370. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to add a new Point, as follows:

Members should adopt programmes, where appropriate, which encourage the growth of home work in order to eradicate poverty by the creation of new jobs.

This amendment recognized that, in certain places, home work had a key role to play in the eradication of poverty and in job creation. It was also an opportunity for an ILO instrument to reflect the concerns raised and commitments made at the World Summit for Social Development (Copenhagen, March 1995). The Government members of Australia, Canada, the Czech Republic, Egypt, Hungary, Japan, Malta, Norway, Poland, the Russian Federation, Slovakia, South Africa, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the amendment. The Workers' members also opposed the amendment.

371. The Employers' members emphasized that the amendment was their attempt to align the active work of the Committee with the statements made during the World Summit for Social Development. The Workers' members had a different interpretation of the commitments made in Copenhagen. They were not meant to encourage poorly remunerated and protected forms of labour like home work. The Government member of the United Kingdom agreed with the sentiment behind the amendment, but believed that the proposed Recommendation was not the appropriate instrument for implementing the outcome of the World Summit for Social Development. There were other opportunities within the ILO for follow-up action. The Government member of Norway echoed these views. The Government member of France commented that, had the amendment been introduced earlier in the Committee's deliberations, it would certainly have provoked a lengthy discussion. He was fully aware of the attempt made by the Employers' members to find some link between job creation and home work. The amendment, however, was the wrong formulation because it made an automatic link between the growth of home work and the creation of jobs. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment and asked note to be made on the record of the Employers' members' disappointment with the views of the Governments' and Workers' members.

372. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to add a new Point as follows:

All communications with homeworkers provided to implement this Convention and Recommendation should be made available in languages spoken by affected homeworkers.

Adoption of the report, Proposed Conclusions and a resolution

373. At its 15th sitting, the Committee adopted its report, subject to the changes requested by its members. At the same sitting, the Committee adopted the Proposed Conclusions as presented at the end of the report.

374. Before adoption of the report, the Reporter informed the Committee that, according to its mandate, the Drafting Committee had considered drafting questions that had been raised by the Committee and had dealt with other purely linguistic and stylistic issues in the Proposed Conclusions that did not affect their substance. He emphasized a few of the changes. A sentence in Point 4 relating to homeworkers had been amended by the Committee to add "as defined under clause 3(a)", when clause 3(a) in fact defined home work rather than homeworkers, thus the sentence had been redrafted to read: "These standards should apply to all persons carrying out home work as defined under paragraph 3(a)." Two phrases, which had been thought to be unclear, had been left unchanged, to permit further reflection and clarification during the second discussion of the proposed instruments: "bodies of a tripartite nature" in Point 13(1), and "relevant community languages" in Point 14. Also in Point 14, the words "which includes data by gender" had been changed to "including data classified according to sex" for consistency with other ILO instruments; similarly, "gender" had been changed to "sex" in paragraph 17(2). The sentence that the Committee had added at the end of Point 15(1) had been simplified to read as follows: "The employer should also inform the homeworker of changes in these conditions." The most important change had been the transfer of Point 19, concerning the right of homeworkers to refuse to carry out work that presented an imminent and serious danger to their life or health, from Part II of the proposed Recommendation to Part VI. Part II dealt with the supervision of home work, while Part VI dealt with occupational safety and health. As Point 19 had related only to safety and health, it seemed better placed under the latter heading. It became Point 32. Finally, the wording of Point 39(e) had been improved to read "increase and improve homeworkers' access to equipment, tools, raw materials and other essential materials that are safe and of good quality".

375. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson felt that the report of the Drafting Committee overemphasized the difficulty posed by the expression "relevant community languages".

376. Commenting on the adoption of the report, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson acknowledged that the report reflected accurately the debate and the resulting texts, but reiterated that the Employers' members had grave reservations about the nature and content of the proposed instruments.

377. The Committee also adopted a resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Home work" for a second discussion regarding the proposed adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation concerning home work.

378. In closing remarks, the Government member of Canada thanked the Chairperson for having guided the Committee through its work and procedural problems with fairness and firmness, and expressed the gratitude of all the Government members for her willingness to assume the Chair on very short notice. She also appreciated the contributions of the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairpersons and thanked the secretariat for an accurate report, which allowed it to be adopted without delay. Her sentiments were echoed by the Government member of France, on behalf of many Government members, and by the Government members of Italy and Australia. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson associated herself with the foregoing expressions of appreciation. She hoped that the Government members would come to the next Conference with a willingness to debate amendments fully since it was such an important part of the process, and not automatically to align themselves with the Office text. She noted that the Workers' members had submitted many amendments with a view to improving and clarifying the wording of the proposed instruments and not necessarily to change their substance, and hoped that the second discussion would be approached with a constructive spirit. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson likewise thanked the Officers of the Committee and the Office staff for the efficiency with which the work had been carried out. The content of the Office text, as he had stated throughout the debate, had not been to the liking of the Employers' members, but they appreciated the work of the Office. Finally, the Government members of France and Australia stressed the importance of the double-discussion procedure in the elaboration of high-quality standards for the protection of this vulnerable group of workers.

379. In reply, the Chairperson thanked the members of the Committee for their kind words, and for their role in making the Committee's work successful. She was also grateful for the work of the Reporter, the representative of the Secretary-General and his staff, the Legal Adviser and the interpreters for their unwavering support.

380. The report of the Committee, the Proposed Conclusions and the resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Home work" are submitted for consideration.

Geneva, 21 June 1995.

Chairperson.

PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS

A. Form of the instruments

1. The International Labour Conference should adopt standards on home work.
2. These standards should take the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.

B. Definitions and scope of application

3. For the purposes of these standards:
 - (a) the term "home work" should mean work carried out by a person, to be referred to as a homemaker,
 - (i) in his or her home or in other premises of his or her own choice, other than the workplace of the employer;
 - (ii) for remuneration;
 - (iii) which results in a product or service as specified by the employer, whether the equipment, materials or other inputs used are provided by this person, the employer, or the intermediary,as long as this person does not have the degree of autonomy and of economic independence necessary to be considered an independent worker under national laws, regulations or court decisions;
 - (b) the term "employer" should mean a person, natural or legal, who, either directly or through an intermediary, gives out home work.
4. These standards should apply to all persons carrying out home work as defined under paragraph 3(a).

C. Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention

5. Each Member which has ratified the Convention should undertake to adopt, implement and periodically review a national policy on home work aimed at improving the situation of homeworkers in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers and, where they exist, with organizations concerned with homeworkers and those of employers of homeworkers.

6. (1) This national policy should promote equality of treatment between homeworkers and other wage earners, taking into account the special characteristics of home work and, where appropriate, conditions applicable to the same or a similar type of work carried out in an enterprise.

(2) Equality of treatment should apply, in particular, to:

- (a) the homeworkers' right to establish or join organizations of their own choosing and to participate in the activities of such organizations;
- (b) protection against discrimination in employment and occupation;
- (c) protection in the field of occupational safety and health;
- (d) remuneration;
- (e) statutory social security protection;
- (f) access to training;

- (g) minimum age for admission to employment or work; and
 - (h) maternity protection.

7. The national policy referred to above should ensure that homeworkers are included in national basic labour statistics.

8. This national policy should be implemented by means of laws and regulations, collective agreements, arbitration awards or in any other appropriate manner consistent with national practice.

9. National laws and regulations should establish conditions under which, for reasons of safety and health, certain types of work and the use of certain substances may be prohibited in home work.

10. National laws and regulations should, where appropriate, determine whether and under which conditions the employer may use intermediaries.

11. (1) Compliance with the laws and regulations applicable to home work should be ensured by a system of inspection in accordance with national law and practice.

(2) Adequate remedies, including penalties, for violation of these laws and regulations should be provided for and effectively applied.

12. The Convention should not affect more favourable provisions applicable to homeworkers under other international labour Conventions.

D. Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation

I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

13. (1) Each Member should, according to national legislation or practice, designate an authority entrusted with the formulation and implementation of the national policy referred to in Point 5, making use, as far as possible, of bodies of a tripartite nature.

(2) In the absence of organizations concerned with homeworkers or organizations of employers of homeworkers, the authority referred to in paragraph (1) should make suitable arrangements to permit these homeworkers and employers to express their opinions on this national policy and on the measures adopted to implement it.

14. Detailed information, including data classified according to sex, on the extent and characteristics of home work should be compiled and kept up to date to serve as a basis for the national policy referred to in Point 5 and for the measures adopted to implement it. This information should be published and made publicly available. Where possible, it should be translated into the relevant community languages.

15. (1) When a homeworker is first given work, the employer or the intermediary should inform the homeworker of his or her specific conditions of employment in writing or in any other appropriate manner consistent with national law or practice. The employer should also inform the homeworker of changes in these conditions.

(2) This information should include, in particular:

- (a) the name and address of the employer;
- (b) the scale or rate of payment and the methods of calculation; and
- (c) the type and description of the work.

II. SUPERVISION OF HOME WORK

16. The competent authority at the national level and, where appropriate, at the regional, sectoral or local levels, should maintain a register of employers of homeworkers and of intermediaries used by such employers. For this purpose, such authority should specify the information employers should submit or keep at the authority's disposal.

17. (1) Employers should be required to notify the competent authority when they give out work, directly or through an intermediary, to homeworkers for the first time.

(2) Employers should be required to keep a register of all homeworkers, by sex, to whom they give work.

(3) Employers should also be required to keep a record of work allocated to a homeworker which shows:

(a) the time allocated;

(b) the rate of remuneration;

(c) costs incurred, if any, by the homeworker and the amount reimbursed in respect of them;

(d) any deductions made in accordance with national laws and regulations; and

(e) the gross remuneration due and the net remuneration paid, together with the date of payment.

(4) A copy of the record referred to in paragraph (3) should be provided to the homeworker.

18. In so far as it is compatible with national law or practice concerning respect for privacy, labour inspectors or other officials entrusted with enforcing provisions applicable to home work should be allowed to enter the parts of the home or other private premises in which the work is carried out.

19. In cases of serious or repeated violations of the laws and regulations applicable to home work, appropriate measures should be taken, including the possible prohibition of giving out home work, in accordance with national law and practice.

III. MINIMUM AGE

20. Where this is not already the case, national laws and regulations concerning minimum age for admission to employment or work should apply to home work.

IV. THE RIGHTS TO ORGANIZE AND TO BARGAIN COLLECTIVELY

21. Legislative or administrative restrictions or other obstacles to the right of homeworkers to establish their own organizations or to join the workers' organizations of their choice and to participate in the activities of such organizations, as well as to the right of organizations of homeworkers to join trade union federations or confederations, should be identified and eliminated.

22. Measures should be taken to encourage collective bargaining as a means of determining the terms and conditions of work of homeworkers.

V. REMUNERATION

23. Minimum rates of wages should be fixed for home work, in accordance with national law and practice.

24. Rates of remuneration of homeworkers should be fixed by collective bargaining. In the absence of such bargaining, they should be determined by:

- (a) decisions of the competent authority, after consulting the most representative organizations of employers and of workers, the organizations concerned with homeworkers and those of employers of homeworkers, or where the latter do not exist, representatives of homeworkers and of employers of homeworkers;
- (b) other appropriate wage-fixing machinery at the national, sectoral or local levels; or
- (c) agreement between the homemaker and the employer.

25. For specified work paid by the piece, the rate of remuneration of a homemaker should be comparable to that received by a worker in the enterprise of the employer, or if there is no such worker, in another enterprise in the branch of activity and region concerned.

26. Homeworkers should receive compensation for:

- (a) costs incurred in connection with their work, such as those relating to heating, lighting, water, maintenance of machinery and equipment, postal, telephone and facsimile communications; and
- (b) time spent in maintaining machinery, changing tools, sorting, unpacking and packing, and other such operations.

27. (1) National laws and regulations concerning the protection of wages should be applicable to homeworkers.

(2) Deductions which may be made from a homemaker's remuneration to cover the cost of spoilt materials or defective work should not exceed pre-established limits.

(3) Homeworkers should be paid either on delivery of each batch of completed work or at regular intervals of not more than one month.

28. The employer and the intermediary, if any, should be made jointly and severally liable for payment of the remuneration due to homeworkers, in accordance with national law and practice.

VI. OCCUPATIONAL SAFETY AND HEALTH

29. The competent authority should ensure the dissemination of guidelines concerning the safety and health precautions that should be observed by employers and homeworkers.

30. Employers should be required to:

- (a) inform homeworkers of any hazards associated with the work given to them and of the precautions to be taken, and provide them, where appropriate, with the necessary training;
- (b) ensure that machinery, tools or other equipment provided to homeworkers are equipped with appropriate safety devices and properly maintained; and
- (c) provide homeworkers free of charge with any necessary personal protective equipment.

31. Homeworkers should be required to:

- (a) comply with prescribed safety and health measures;
- (b) take reasonable care for their own safety and health and that of other persons who may be affected by their acts or omissions at work, including the proper use of facilities and equipment placed at their disposal.

32. (1) In the event of an imminent danger to the safety or health of a homeworker, his or her family or the public, as determined by a labour inspector or other official entrusted with enforcing provisions applicable to home work, the continuation of home work should be prohibited until appropriate measures are taken to remedy the situation.

(2) A homeworker who refuses to carry out work which he or she has reasonable justification to believe presents an imminent and serious danger to his or her life or health should be protected from undue consequences in accordance with national conditions and practice. The homeworker should report the situation, in the first instance, to the employer.

VII. HOURS OF WORK, REST PERIODS AND LEAVE

33. A deadline to deliver a batch of work should not deprive a homeworker of the possibility to have daily and weekly rest comparable to that enjoyed by other workers.

34. National laws and regulations should establish the conditions under which homeworkers should be entitled to benefit, as other workers, from paid public holidays, annual holidays with pay and paid sick leave.

VIII. SOCIAL SECURITY AND MATERNITY PROTECTION

35. Homeworkers should benefit from social security protection. This could be done by:

- (a) extending existing social security provisions to homeworkers;
- (b) adapting social security schemes to cover homeworkers; or
- (c) developing special schemes or funds for homeworkers.

36. National laws and regulations in the field of maternity protection should be applicable to homeworkers.

IX. PROTECTION IN CASE OF TERMINATION OF EMPLOYMENT

37. Homeworkers should benefit from the same protection as that provided to other workers with respect to termination of employment.

X. RESOLUTION OF DISPUTES

38. The competent authority should ensure that there are mechanisms for the resolution of disputes between a homeworker and an employer or an intermediary used by the employer.

XI. PROGRAMMES TO ASSIST HOMEWORKERS

39. Members should promote and support programmes which:

- (a) raise awareness of home-work-related issues among employers' and workers' organizations, other non-governmental organizations and the public at large;
- (b) inform homeworkers of their rights and the kinds of assistance available to them;
- (c) facilitate the organization of homeworkers in organizations of their own choosing;
- (d) provide training to improve homeworkers' skills and expand their employment opportunities and income-earning capacity;
- (e) increase and improve homeworkers' access to equipment, tools, raw materials and other essential materials that are safe and of good quality;
- (f) facilitate the creation of centres and networks for homeworkers in order to provide them with information and services and reduce their isolation; and
- (g) provide developmental and technical assistance in order to improve the safety, health and productivity of homeworkers.

Twenty-sixth sitting

SECOND AND THIRD REPORTS OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – The first item on the agenda this morning is the noting of the second and third reports of the Credentials Committee, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 18, page 33, and Provisional Record No. 22, page 40, respectively. I give the floor to Mr. Jonzon, Government delegate of Sweden and Chairman of the Credentials Committee, so that he can present the reports to the Conference.

Mr. JONZON (Government delegate, Sweden; Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – I have the honour to present the second and third reports of the Credentials Committee, appearing in Provisional Records Nos. 18 and 22, respectively.

Because of the heavy workload of the Conference, I shall highlight only two issues. In the second report the Committee concluded in the case of two countries that the nomination of the delegates or advisers had not been made in accordance with the provisions of the ILO Constitution. The cases were similar. In both of them the Committee found that the Government had without notice departed from the system of rotation agreed between the most representative organizations in the country concerned. An agreement of this kind relieves the Government of the headache of having to persuade several different organizations each year to reach agreement on the nomination of the Employers' or Workers' delegation in accordance with article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution.

Of course, after some years the rotation system may no longer reflect reality. The parties to the original agreement may become less representative while other organizations may become more representative. Two problems were identified by the Committee in the present cases: first, the governments concerned concluded that the agreements were no longer valid without a sufficient factual basis for doing so. Second, the governments simply took a decision without sitting down with the organizations involved and trying to see if an agreement could be reached on an alternative arrangement.

The other issue concerns what the Committee felt to be a loophole in the constitutional protection of tripartism in the composition of delegations. In accordance with the Constitution, governments should not only nominate the tripartite delegation on paper, but should also provide the necessary financial means for the Members nominated actually to take part in the Conference. Neither the Constitution nor the Standing Orders provide for a remedy if the government does not respect this obligation. Credentials Committees have been faced with this problem over a number of years, mainly in response to protests from the Employers' group. Three years ago it suggested that a mechanism should be devised to deal with the problem but the procedure adopted has not worked well. The present Credentials Committee recommends in its third report that the time has now come to consider an appropriate amendment or clarification of the Standing Orders.

The work on the Credentials Committee has been a very rewarding experience and I am very grateful to the Committee's very competent experts. They are, of course, as you know, my Employer colleague, Mr. Daniel Funes de Rioja, my Worker colleague, Mr. Charles Gray and indeed from the Secretariat, Mr. Dominick Devlin and his team. I would like to thank all of them.

Original French: Mr. TIXIER Workers' adviser, France – As regards the third report of the Credentials Committee, in Provisional Record No. 22, the Workers' delegation of France has strong reservations about the conclusion contained in paragraph 4. It is based on a declaration by the Government representative mentioned in paragraph 3, which does not correspond to the actual facts. We therefore reserve the right to follow up our protest with all appropriate measures, within the ILO and nationally.

We believe that the question of the number of Worker technical advisers is not a subsidiary issue, particularly in countries such as France where trade union pluralism does exist.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – Since the reports were unanimously adopted by the Credentials Committee, the Conference is simply required to take note of them.

I would like to express my thanks to the Chairman and the Officers of the Committee for the excellent quality of the work they have done.

(The reports are noted.)

RECORD VOTE ON THE PROTOCOL OF 1995 TO THE LABOUR INSPECTION CONVENTION, 1947

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – I would now like to move on to the second vote on the Protocol of 1995 to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947, the text of which can be found in Provisional Record No. 20A.

(A record vote is taken.)

The result of the record vote is as follows: 330 votes in favour, 7 against, with 62 abstentions. The quorum is 253.

As we have reached the quorum and the required two-thirds majority, the Protocol of 1995 to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947, is adopted.

(The Protocol is adopted.)

RECORD VOTE ON THE RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ADOPTION OF THE PROGRAMME AND BUDGET FOR 1996-97 AND THE ALLOCATION OF THE BUDGET OF INCOME AMONG MEMBER STATES

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – As was announced yesterday when we examined the second and third reports of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, we will now take a record vote on the resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for 1996-97 and the allocation of the income of budget among member States, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 21.

(A record vote is taken.)

The result of the voting is as follows: 383 votes in favour, 8 against, with 18 abstentions. The quorum is 253.

As we have reached the quorum and the two-thirds majority, the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

I give the floor to Mr Benitez, Government delegate, Argentina, for an explanation of the vote.

Original Spanish: Mr. BENITEZ (Government delegate, Argentina) – Based on our statement to the Governing Body and the Finance Committee of this Conference, my delegation voted against the resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for 1996-97.

We welcome the programmes submitted by the ILO Office, which in general receive our full support. We are in favour of increasing the strength and prestige of the ILO. We believe that its services to the international community are extremely important at the moment, as has been the case since it was founded.

Our country, which has always been an active and enthusiastic Member of this Organization, reiterates its faith in the principles of tripartism, solidarity and social justice which are the driving force for the ILO. It is specifically for these reasons that my delegation finds it impossible to vote in favour of this resolution, particularly paragraph (a).

My delegation considers that a budget represents a balance between foreseeable income and corresponding expenditures for specific purposes.

Therefore a budget has to be realistic, balanced and in line with its objectives. That is how the national budget of my country is drawn up, and it must conform to limits determined by the actual amount of state revenues obtained, in order to balance the budget and create a surplus to be used in servicing our foreign debt.

Therefore you should not be surprised that we do not wish to give our support to a budget that fails to respect these same principles, with increases that would be unacceptable for our own budget. We are pleased to see that the Group of 7 meeting in Halifax has endorsed these same principles for administering the budgets of international organizations.

We have listened carefully to the arguments in favour of approving this budget, essentially, the formal need to adopt a budget, the technical and procedural impossibility of totally reviewing what has been submitted to us by the Office, and finally the alleged difficulty of quantifying the deficit, which is unavoidably bound to occur.

We are conscious of the formal need of the Organization to have a budget adopted on time and in accordance with the procedural rules of the Financial Regulations. In short, we believe that this principle should not contradict the principles of realism, balance and transparency that I referred to above, without which we would not just be approving a budget but also would be engaging in a bit of wishful thinking, our hopes for the Organization, the impossibility of complying with which would become immediately evident. This is exactly what we have just done by creating a budget in the amount shown in paragraph (a) of the resolution, at the same time being aware that estimated income does not tally with foreseeable income. We informed the Governing Body of this previously and it was recognized in one way or another by the majority of the delegations that participated in the Finance Committee, where these differences were in fact quantified.

In that respect, we firmly believe that the uncertainty reflected by this contradictory resolution does not stem from the actual facts on hand, but instead comes from our difficulties in determining the principles of administration and adjustment called for in these circumstances. I would not be surprised if the Office had already envisaged some cuts in spending, which the Director-General will announce shortly. I regret that he did not do so at the beginning of the Conference. In the light of a realistic budget and for the benefit of delegations that do not belong to the Governing Body, we would have liked to have had a broader and more democratic discussion on the priorities and guidelines for adjustments that will have to be made.

The Director-General has told us that the cuts would have to involve variable expenditure, in other words, cooperation programmes and technical assistance in the field. We disagree entirely. As many other delegations have stated at this Conference, we are convinced that the Office still has a broad margin for absorbing cost increases without affecting these programmes and assistance, which have been defined as the main priorities by the constituents of this Organization.

We do not want a bureaucratic ILO, but rather one that reflects solidarity and cooperation. Accordingly, we give our full support to paragraph (b) of this resolution, which provides for the need for an adjustment of the budget under the guidance of a tripartite group within the Governing Body, respecting the priorities universally recognized at this Conference.

We hope that this will be an interactive group which will orientate, and not merely analyse, proposals presented by the Office.

We would also like to place on record our support for paragraph (c) of this resolution, which is aimed at solving a recurrent problem in drawing up ILO budgets.

RECORD VOTE ON THE CONVENTION CONCERNING SAFETY AND HEALTH IN MINES

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We will proceed to the record vote on the Convention on Safety and Health in Mines, the text of which appears in Provisional Record No. 19A.

(A record vote is taken.)

The result of the vote is as follows: 378 votes in favour, 9 against, with 34 abstentions. The quorum is 253.

Since we have reached the quorum and the two-thirds majority, the Convention concerning Safety and Health in Mines is adopted.

(The Convention is adopted.)

RECORD VOTE ON THE RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING SAFETY AND HEALTH IN MINES

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – We will now move on to the record vote on the Recommendation concerning Safety and Health in Mines, the text of which appears in Provisional Record No. 19B.

(A record vote is taken.)

The result of the record vote is as follows: 377 in favour, 6 against, with 26 abstentions. The quorum is 253.

Since we have reached the quorum and the two-thirds majority, the Recommendation concerning Safety and Health in Mines is adopted.

(The Recommendation is adopted.)

REPLY BY THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL TO THE DISCUSSION OF HIS REPORT

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – I now have the honour of inviting Mr. Michel Hansenne, Secretary-General of the Conference and Director-General of the International Labour Organization, to respond to the general discussion of his Report.

Original French: The DIRECTOR-GENERAL – In my opinion, two aspects of this session of the Conference which is now drawing to a close stand out above the rest. The first is the debate on employment which took place both in plenary and at the Informal Tripartite Meeting at the Ministerial Level. It was an opportunity to try and define the future approach of the work of our Organization following our anniversary session of the Conference and the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen. The second was the debate that accompanied the vote on the Programme and Budget for the 1996-97 biennium and the financial problems that are going to have to be faced by this Organization.

These two aspects taken together make us aware firstly of the magnitude of the task before us and secondly of the very strict limits on our actions. I venture to hope that in the near future we will be able to overcome this contradiction and that our task will not turn out to be an impossible one.

I do not, however, wish to begin my statement without welcoming some positive events. Firstly, the accession of two new countries: the Republic of the Gambia and Saint Vincent and the Grenadines; the presence of 120 Ministers as well as many eminent people representing employers and trade unions which shows their keen interest in the work of our Organization; and the resounding vote in favour of the Programme and Budget for the 1996-97 biennium. I would like, finally, to recall that we have had the honour of welcoming Mr. Ben Ali, President of the Republic of Tunisia. His presence and his statement illustrated his support for our action in favour of social justice.

As you know, our action is based mainly on promoting international labour standards. As in previous years, we have heard a certain amount of criticism of these standards and heard, at least some of them, labelled as out of tune with the modern world. I think we need to remember that substantial work has been undertaken including by the Governing Body, to overhaul our standard-setting machinery to make it more attractive and more relevant. Nevertheless, standard-setting activities are part of our raison-d'être and the overhauling process should not, in my opinion, be carried out to the detriment of our basic values and their universal nature.

With this in mind, the Committee on Home Work laid down the foundations for the adoption next year of a Convention and a Recommendation. This new Convention will take into account your comments on the need to promote wider ratification in accordance with our continued efforts to modernize our standard-setting system.

This session of the Conference has also seen the adoption of new Convention and Recommendation concerning safety and health in mines, which are particularly welcome when you consider the number of tragic accidents that occur in this sector. I note with satisfaction that this Convention promotes tripartite consultation for the drafting and implementation at the national level of policies to improve safety and health in mines.

Lastly, this year we have also been able to finalize a Protocol to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), which will help to improve the labour inspection system and for workers in non-commercial services.

I am also happy with your very positive response to the Report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. The Governing Body, as you know, has decided that there will be no more special sittings on this subject. Nevertheless, we shall continue our efforts to bring about peace and improve the situation of Palestinian workers, including through technical cooperation.

I would also like to announce that, at the invitation of both the delegations of Palestine and Israel, I shall soon be visiting the region. This dual invitation in my opinion is a very eloquent symbol of the obvious change in favour of peace that has taken place in those countries despite the many remaining difficulties. Last year, the 75th anniversary of this Organization provided an opportunity for an in-depth debate on reforms undertaken, those to be undertaken, and those which still need to be put into practice, to ensure that the ILO is in a position to respond effectively to the major transformations which are taking place in economic and social spheres.

The major conclusion reached was undoubtedly to refocus the activities of our Organization on an essential plan, on a fundamental ambition, namely the protection of employment and the dignity it implies. The French Minister of Labour, Mr. Barrot, said from this very rostrum, that employment was a categorical imperative, it was not only an individual right, it was also a collective duty. Everyone had an interest in others also being employed.

In order to carry out this task properly, I have asked our multidisciplinary teams, our field offices and the services at headquarters to mobilize their efforts for our constituents around this common objective.

Internationally speaking, the major stages which have already been undertaken were the drafting by the ILO of the report entitled World Employment 1995 which was widely circulated and discussed, particularly at the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen. The Summit was the second stage. It gave the ILO, and I think we all welcomed the fact, a major role in employment promotion. Finally, the third stage is this very Conference which has made it possible to evaluate the activities undertaken in this area and to compare experiences.

First and foremost I would like to thank you for the positive response you gave to the Report and I welcome the fact that it was a useful working tool for you. I hope that the wealth of your comments and suggestions on this complex issue of employment promotion is, at least in part, the result of the strengths of the Report.

Many of you reiterated the message of the Copenhagen Summit, namely that free trade is not an end in itself but a way of improving the well-being of mankind. This is something that we have forgotten far too frequently in recent years. Apart from the reiteration of principle, you have emphasized that it is urgent to draw the relevant consequences in terms of specific action to be taken. The unprecedented increase in unemployment and in low-quality employment leads us inevitably, or will if nothing is done, to what some people have called societies based on segregation or divided societies. It is therefore reassuring to note that many countries have endorsed ILO policy by placing employment policy on an equal footing with financial and budgetary policy, or even at the core of their economic policy, so as not to promote a type of growth which will simply accentuate the differences between social groups, as Mr. Arrate Mac Niven, the Chilean Minister of Labour, stated.

However, some people put the question of whether keeping employment as the prime objective of economic development did not mean returning to a Keynesian policy of which Mr. Katz, Employers' delegate to the Governing Body, has spoken and which we know to be difficult to apply nowadays in a context of economic globalization, and at a time when the level of autonomy of national policies has fallen.

There are two answers to this paradox and they have emerged very clearly from your discussions.

First of all, in each nation, you highlighted the existence of procedures and reforms based on micro-economic and micro-social mechanisms of a sectoral and local nature which ensure development of employment despite a restrictive macroeconomic context. In this you have shouldered your responsibilities, as Mr. Brett, Workers' delegate of the United Kingdom, urged us to do.

Furthermore, international action can make it possible better to manage budgetary and financial restrictions which, individually, are a burden on national policy.

For each of your countries you have of course all come to the same conclusion as Mr. Tan, Employers' delegate of the Philippines, and Mr. Shmakov, Workers' delegate of the Russian Federation, who stated that economic growth was a prerequisite for increased employment. Even favourable macroeconomic conditions, however, are not enough in themselves to maximize job creation. That can only be achieved by taking active, innovative measures. Your comments were extremely valuable in your analysis of the procedures likely to lead to solutions to this problem.

In this connection, you emphasized the effectiveness of tripartism. Encouraging the contributions of each of the social partners provides the greatest opportunities to achieve realistic results adapted to local situations.

Employment solutions usually require particularly delicate compromises and a great amount of solidarity, for example when discussing job-sharing, wage costs, and the development of the informal sector with the problem of social protection that goes hand in hand with it, as Mr. Edström, Workers' delegate of Sweden, reminded us. This is why the participation of all the social partners is a sine qua non for success. This was emphasized by Mrs. Kovács Kósa, Hungarian Labour Minister, who said that "In the world of work as elsewhere, the development of democratic institutions is the key to all forms of progress".

The role that the ILO should play is thus quite clear. We should follow the recommendation of Mr. Mboweni, the Minister of Labour of the Republic of South Africa. He said that as far as employment is concerned, "tripartism is one of the major comparative advantages of the ILO and its power should be used to the maximum".

Many speakers raised the basic question of the role of the State. No one doubts today, faced as we are with an economy which requires permanent adjustment, that the labour market should be in a position to respond flexibly and quickly to changes. Thus, as Mr. Rosales Argüello, the President at this session of the Conference indicated in his opening statement, the State cannot be just a spectator on the sidelines. Given the scope of employment problems, the majority of you insisted on the need for implementing active labour market policies which, according to Mr. Blanco Villegas, Employers' delegate of Argentina, and Mr. Parrot, Workers' delegate of Canada, the State must initiate.

In a nutshell, everyone involved in social matters and economic activity must be mobilized in an approach which, as Mr Blüm, the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Germany said, reconciles economic progress and social progress, competition and social justice.

But your discussion was not simply limited to a study of principles. There were very many specific examples which illustrated, and breathed life into, such an approach. State assistance in several countries takes the form of measures aimed at promoting employment in new sectors, such as community work, or aimed at creating jobs through the relocation of productive investment, as emphasized inter alia by Ms. Simpson, the Minister of Labour, Social Security and Sports of Jamaica. There are also measures to promote self-employment and others which are intended to set up active employment placement services, etc. Of course, the responsibility of the State together with social partners is all too clear in areas such as training, and particularly in providing training for the long-term unemployed. Over and above the cases of the countries I have already referred to, the signature of employment promotion agreements in Australia, the Netherlands and Ireland illustrated the importance of tripartism. These examples demonstrate that the campaign for employment can, and indeed should, take many forms which should be adapted to the actual situation in each individual country; in a word, that approach is, and must remain, a practical one.

In this area, the ILO can make a considerable contribution to strengthening and increasing understanding of the experiences of each country. Mr. Elamawy and Mr. Mramba, respectively the Minister of Manpower and Employment of Egypt and the Minister of Labour and Youth Development of Tanzania, and indeed many other speakers, emphasized the need for World Employment to present more factual data to show, as Mr. Ito, Workers' delegate of Japan suggested, the progress made by countries in implementing the conclusions of the Copenhagen Summit. These observations will of course be taken into account in the next issue of the report. Similarly, as Mr. Alemany, Employers' delegate of the Dominican Republic had hoped, the multidisciplinary teams will, by comparing their experiences, be able to provide their technical assistance to those countries which request it for the preparation of employment programmes.

Lastly, many of you and particularly Mr. Jordan, the General Secretary of the ICFTU – and Mr. Aagaard Jakobsen, Workers' delegate of Brazil, said that job creation should not take place in a way that leads to the deterioration of the quality of employment. As Mr. Owuor, Employers' delegate of Kenya said, the ILO should not be an organization which promotes the sharing of poverty. We should bear this in mind when conducting our standard-setting activities for fundamental rights. As Ms. Widdecombe, the Minister of State for Employment of the United Kingdom, said “the ILO exists to promote improved standards and conditions of work and to encourage productive employment throughout the world”.

Mr. Moorhead, Employers' delegate of the United States, seemed to consider that standards tend to prevent change. I find it somewhat difficult to agree with him on this point, but I do feel that we should adopt a less dogmatic approach in this area – one which is more effective. Although we cannot claim that all of our standards are relevant and properly adapted, it is not time to say that they prevent any economic growth and job-creation. Here again, we should adopt a pragmatic approach, particularly as regards the consolidation and improvement of our standards supervisory machinery. The Office should continue with its efforts to carry out a systematic analysis – in the field and at headquarters – of the impact of certain standards on the quality and quantity of jobs created. This activity should be undertaken with the assistance of our partners on the spot which, as Mr. Sangma, the Indian Minister of Labour said, might prompt the trade unions and employers to develop a new solidarity between themselves. As you are aware, I have sent a letter to all Labour Ministers on behalf of the Governing Body, urging them to ratify the seven basic ILO Conventions. We are therefore forging ahead with our work in this area.

And what about the international level? You have all stressed the need for the ILO to respond to the challenge of the Copenhagen Summit and be fully worthy of the responsibility it entrusted in us. Some action has already been carried out but we still have a long way to go.

Our informal meeting on the follow-up to the Social Summit clearly indicated that one of the essential ways of promoting employment is to strengthen the ILO's work with international organizations which work out economic and monetary policy, particularly the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. Indeed, as pointed out by Mr. Oechslin, the Employers' delegate from France, they should not be allowed to lose sight of the social consequences of their recommendation.

And for this, the ILO must build up its credibility which consists, not so much in following the proposals of others, but in firmly stating its own values. Our credibility is also contingent upon the quality of our analyses and the relevance and innovation of the solutions we propose. Finally, our credibility depends on our ability to convince everyone that social development constitutes the most fertile soil for economic development.

But this will doubtless not be enough. New forms of cooperation, between the international institutions – those of the United Nations and the Bretton Woods – are vital. In a few days, in Geneva, there will be a meeting of ECOSOC. Perhaps, on that occasion, a few voices might be raised, inspired by the 50th anniversary of the United Nations, to make new proposals to lay the foundations for the sort of international system we need today. We shall try to make our contribution.

The fact that the next meeting of the Group of 7 will be devoted to the question of employment is another sign of the increased interest that is being shown in this issue. I hope that, in one way or another, we can be linked with this initiative.

But will we have the financial resources we need to implement our policy? Here I come, of course, to the delicate and contradictory discussions which have this year been the key feature of the debate on the budget for the next biennium.

An important decision taken with an overwhelming majority by this Conference was to adopt the proposed Programme and Budget for 1996-97 that had been recommended by the Governing Body. This is a strong political signal that it was important for us to broadcast today, and I must thank you for having done so.

As in earlier years, the proposals submitted to you were, as requested by the Governing Body, based on zero real growth. However, because of the level of the Swiss franc, the total amount of contributions requested for 1996 and 1997, will in fact, be about 4.2 million Swiss francs, lower than the corresponding figure for the present biennium.

I am, of course, fully aware of the position taken by certain governments which consider that the drop in the value of their currencies against the Swiss franc will impose on them additional efforts that may be difficult for them to make. I understand perfectly their position. I think that it is appropriate for me, on your behalf, to thank them all the more warmly, for their positive vote in spite of these difficulties. Unfortunately, this position was not a unanimous one, and some of them had already told me a few months ago that they were not going to be able to pay their contributions, in full, even in the event of a reduced budget.

We must, therefore, expect serious financial difficulties starting this year and continuing during the next biennium. That is why, in accordance with the resolution that accompanies the budget, I will be proposing to the Governing Body tomorrow that it take the measures needed, during the next biennium, to make savings of US$34 million. During this financial period I will do my best to protect technical cooperation, the ILO field programmes, and the capacity of the headquarters' technical departments. The adjustment measures will be duly examined by your Governing Body – a tripartite body, which is the essential basis of our legitimacy. I think that you should bear in mind that, over the last four years, we have been able to agree on a large programme of savings to be made here in Geneva, aimed at financing increased services in the different regions for the benefit of our constituents. Today forced as we are to go even further, we will be compelled to review the whole series of reforms on which no consensus proved possible between the members of the Governing Body. Let us hope that tomorrow we will be able to overcome our personal interests and antagonisms in order to preserve the essential components and guarantee the relevance and effectiveness of our Organization.

The Office will cooperate actively and fairly in preparing and implementing the austerity measures asked for. Here I would like to address all the ILO officials who have been working so hard and have spared no effort to meet the challenge of modernizing our Organization. I would like publicly to thank them. Additional efforts will still be necessary. Unfortunately for some it will mean the loss of their jobs. I would like this to be borne in mind by those who only too often refuse to put forward the slightest positive proposal and do no more than make unfounded accusations against what they call international bureaucracy. More than ever, confronted with such a serious situation, we will all need to summon up our strength to meet the task ahead. This is the price that must be paid if we are to maintain the world action for social justice that the ILO has been pursuing for 76 years now.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT – Thank you very much, Mr. Director-General, for what you have said. We would all like to thank you very sincerely for your statement.

It is true that, in the light of recent world events, it seems contradictory to be asking the International Labour Organization to play its role, to transform itself and to adjust to world circumstances, on the one hand, while at the same time listening to speeches calling for cuts in the budget.

Quite obviously, on many occasions people think, like Mandel, that, within a vision of the dialectics of the partial achievements of bureaucracy, some organizations in fact accentuate the bureaucratic process.

One does indeed hear the kind of observations to which you referred at the end of your intervention. We in the developing countries, the Third World countries, the Non-Aligned, believe that the only way in which the ILO can play its role is precisely with resources, and that only within the framework of a positive conception, looking forward to the twenty-first century, in the pursuit of social justice will the ILO really be able to find its proper calling. That is why the Non-Aligned always vote in favour of the budget for this Organization.

We would like to say to you, Mr. Director-General, on behalf of the countries present here, that we will always support the Organization and although it may be true that within the Organization's democratic framework, we have had abstentions and votes against, that does not mean that the governments present here are going to abandon the International Labour Organization.

We have but to recall the statement made by the Group of 7 which in the relevant section appeals to their own governments to pay their contributions in good time to United Nations bodies, to see that the Group of 7 itself is setting an example to be followed by each Member of this Organization within the near future with respect to their participation.

Once again on behalf of all the governments present here and on behalf of the whole of this gathering of Employers and Workers who elected me to the presidency, I would like to thank you for your words and to say that you will always be able to count on the support of those of us who believe that social justice is the best way of preventing war, and of those who believe that poverty and deprivation lead only to violence and that the only way forward is to have a vision of a twenty-first century with a human face.

(The Conference adjourned at 11.45 p.m.)

Report of the Committee on the Application of Standards:
Submission, discussion and adoption

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT — Our first item this afternoon is the adoption of the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 24.

I therefore invite the Officers of the Committee to take their place on the rostrum: the Chairman, Mr. Gopalan, Government delegate, India; the Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Wisskirchen, Employers' adviser, Germany, and Mr. Peirens, Workers' adviser, Belgium; and the Reporter, Mr. Van Blankenstein, Government adviser, Netherlands.

I call on Mr. Van Blankenstein to present the report.

Mr. VAN BLANKENSTEIN (Government adviser, Netherlands; Reporter of the Committee on the Application of Standards) — This is going to be a report by a reluctant Reporter. When at school I saw a movie "Reluctant heroes" which was far from edifying. I assure you; no heroes and much reluctance. I found much reluctance when looking for a candidate for the post of Reporter; I never found a hero so I had to volunteer myself.

I present to the Conference the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards. This Committee was set up under article 7 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference to consider a report on item 3 of its agenda. The Committee unanimously paid tribute to two distinguished members of the Committee of Experts who have died since the last session of the Conference — Judge José María Ruda and Judge Roberto Ago. The former attended the last few sessions of our Committee and we will miss him. Judge Ago of course was well-known for his recent chairmanship of the Governing Body Committee on the Freedom of Association. Moreover it gave the Committee great pleasure to welcome the new Chairman of the Committee of Experts, Sir William Douglas, in its midst during the general discussion of the Committee.

As in previous years the Committee found the report of the Committee of Experts to be an invaluable ingredient for its discussions. In accordance with tradition the Committee started its work with the general debate on the state of the world concerning labour standards. I do not intend to go into all aspects of discussion, but it might be useful to mention some salient features.

In the first place it is interesting to note that there was no explicit discussion about the Committee of Experts and our Committee. Whether this means that the relationship between the respective committees has stabilized remains to be seen. Dialogue should also be possible in the future to contribute to the effectiveness of the supervisory system. In this context it is encouraging to note that general support was expressed for the existing supervisory system. The Committee has very much in mind the fact that this year's session of the International Labour Conference takes place in the wake of the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen. For us the whole question of the ILO's role in the follow-up to that Conference led to consideration of general economic and social policy issues arising especially in relation to the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122).

Although there may be differences in emphasis between those who underline the need to create employment and those who are preoccupied by the conditions of such employment, I think the ILO will in the future play a positive role in this discussion.

Another feature which received attention was the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97), and the Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975 (No. 143). As we know the ILO Conventions on this subject have not been widely ratified. This I must add also goes for the United Nations Convention on this subject which would seem to demonstrate the complexity of the issue. There was also some discussion on human rights including the scourge of child labour. Tribute was paid to the ILO's work through the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour, IPEC. I think it is right to say that there was indeed strong consensus on the importance of the ILO's work in the area of human rights, including the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), and the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29).

Considerable attention was paid to the revision of standards. And I think I represent the opinion of the Committee in wishing the members of the Governing Body Committee concerned wisdom and fortitude. Apart from these subjects the Committee dealt with the traditional points such as ratification and denunciations, the role of employers' and workers' organizations, and standards and technical cooperation. Next followed the discussion on the report of the Sixth Ordinary Session of the Joint ILO/UNESCO Committee of Experts on the Application of the Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers. The debate hinged on the priority which should be given to the status of teachers on the one hand, and to the interests of education on the other hand. If there is such a contrast, one thing was made clear, that if we are to fulfil the promise of Copenhagen to aim at full employment, the role education and teachers will play in the future is vital. This exercise also shows that it is useful and fruitful for the ILO to cooperate with other United Nations organizations.

The general survey this year dealt with the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), and Termination of Employment Recommendation, 1982 (No. 166). This is a Convention only ratified by 24 countries, and it has always been controversial. The discussion on labour flexibility was highlighted, and the divided opinion on the merits of job security was one of the issues discussed, and I presume that the Vice-Chairman will have some comments here. The debate, as well as the general survey itself, should however be useful to governments which are considering ratification.

It was regrettable that a number of countries did not show up at the special session on so-called "automatic cases". In this the Committee deals with non-compliance with specific statutory obligations. The supervisory system cannot function if Conventions and Recommendations are not submitted to the competent authorities, reports are not supplied, the Committee of Experts' observations and direct requests are not answered. On the more optimistic side, Mr. Chairman, the Committee noted with satisfaction the considerable number of cases of progress. The Committee devoted much of its time to the discussion on individual cases. As it appears from the annexes to the report, it was not necessary to take a vote on any individual case. This in accordance with the consensus system of the Committee which is based on an open and positive dialogue with countries on the problems they face when implementing standards. If we had no votes this does not mean we had no discussion. Sometimes discussions were lengthy and it was too hard to fit the discussions into the 20 meetings allotted to the Committee.

Night sessions are traditional in our Committee but having to work beyond 8 p.m. last Saturday put an unreasonable strain on the Committee members, the Chairman and the Officers. It is my duty to draw attention to paragraphs 139, 140 and 141 of Part 1 of the report. In paragraph 139, special attention is given to the dialogue between the Committee and Myanmar on the question of the application of Convention No. 29 on Forced Labour. Paragraph 140 gives the conclusions of the Committee on the implementation of the Freedom of Association Convention 1948 (No. 87), also by Myanmar.

Finally, paragraph 141 gives the conclusion also in respect of Convention No. 87 for Nigeria. It must however, be clearly understood that these paragraphs should not be seen as a condemnation by a tribunal but as a part of open dialogue between the Committee and the countries concerned.

If we cannot describe our meeting as a historic occasion, we can at least describe this report as part of its historical process. History is sometimes said to be defined as the writing down of something that never happened by somebody who was never there. But this report is a wonderful primary source in which everyone will be able to read about what happened in our Committee. How else will a historian know that this Committee was chaired by a representative from the largest democracy in the world? Not only is India a populous country with around 1,000 million inhabitants but in Ghana it has a figure which has contributed enormously to the world's wisdom. Historians will be able to see what difficulties our Chairman faced in his task of chairing the Committee. So if you found my explanation too short, please read the report. I assure you it is worthwhile.

We owe this piece of primary historic evidence to the endeavours of the secretariat. But let us not forget the people behind them who worked day and night to prepare the report, the office taking the minutes, the typists, the translators, all intent on doing a good job. I want to pay a tribute to the splendid contribution they made to work, acting as a reluctant, but unresigned Reporter.

Original German: Mr. WISSKIRCHEN (Employers' adviser, Germany: Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Standards) — The Committee on the Application of Standards had a very heavy workload. It had to make use of the available time to the best extent possible. The Report which is now before you highlights all the salient points; although it does not give all the details of its work, it is correct.

The Reporter, Mr. van Blankenstein has just referred to a few important findings.

At times, we still continue to discuss in our Committee the question whether our Committee is not just an insignificant appendix of the Committee of Experts. Of course such a claim cannot be taken seriously.

It goes without saying that the Committee uses the Report of the Committee of Experts as an important basis for its discussions; but it also uses much other information, especially the views of governments as well of the Employers' and Workers' groups. And it is just as normal that the experts in their subsequent report refer to and drawn upon the discussions and findings of our Committee. Consequently, it is fair to say that all bodies involved in the supervision of standards complement our activities. However, what cannot be denied is that our Committee has a specific and independent role in the highest instance of this Organization, namely the Conference, conferred upon it by article 7 of the Standing Orders.

As an indication that the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts are trying to improve their cooperation, I should like to mention the presence here this year of Sir William Douglas, who has been appointed to the Chair of the Committee of Experts.

This year, contrary to previous years, there was no item on the agenda providing for an extraordinary discussion on the reform of the ILO especially a reform on the standard-setting procedures. But in our Committee, there were even more signs than usual that such a reform is vital. This was revealed when examining a number of specific details, of which I should like to give some examples.

We dealt with the question of the very long denunciation period of 10 years. This extremely long period prompted some member States to denounce a Convention as a precaution, because any domestic adjustment of their own legislation would otherwise be blocked for an unduly long period. The situation appears to be an anachronism in a world which is undergoing rapid change — a world in which, however, ILO standards are only adjusted with considerable delay.

In the context of the discussion on the need for reform, we also noted that detailed, demanding and sometimes highly complex standards prevent many governments from ratifying such Conventions. This has been reflected in the dramatic decline of the number of ratifications over the last two decades. The average rate of ratification per country has been stagnating for some years now, at 36 Conventions — which account for only 20 per cent of all existing Conventions. Of particular concern is the low ratification rate of new Conventions.

The Conventions adopted during the past 15 years have only been ratified by 7.5 per cent of member States. Even the revised versions of old Conventions have been endorsed at a very low rate. And finally, those standards described by the ILO as “priority”, thus extremely important, continue to be ratified by less than a quarter of the member States of this organization.

We often extol the universal character of the ILO’s standards — but this will become a dead letter unless we are able to reverse this trend soon. Apart from the actual content of the standards, another factor contributing to the present situation is the very extensive interpretation by experts. Quite a few member States tend to be increasingly cautious. During the debate we had to discuss quite a few individual cases relating to unjustified interpretations which were not helpful in terms of acceptance. One example I would like to mention is the consistent request by the experts — which they have been making for some time now — that member States should pay severe fines if they fail to comply with obligations under the Conventions. Such a demand can be justified only in a very few exceptional cases, in which the Convention specifically provides for such sanctions. In addition, rights can be enforced only within the framework of national legislation.

Support for more realistic standards may also lie with the multi-disciplinary teams. We welcome the setting up of these teams as we feel that they afford an opportunity to provide a synergy effect of various ILO activities. However, we hope that experience gleaned in the solution of practical problems in the field will be fully utilized through a feedback system.

In short, as far as a reform of standard-setting activities is concerned, we should only draw up new standards when this is absolutely necessary — given the vast and complex catalogue of standards. Obsolete, outdated provisions should be rescinded. Preference should be given to Recommendations rather than Conventions. As a rule we should focus our standard-setting activities on the revision of old and outdated Conventions. New standards should respect the various developments, legal traditions and cultures of ILO member States and forgo complex and detailed provisions. What we need is a clearly formulated content — which would avoid the Committee having to make any excessive interpretation of the instrument in the future.

In this regard, it should be pointed out that the Committee, during its discussion of a specific individual case, called for a revision of the Old-Age Insurance (Industry, etc.) Convention, 1933 (No. 35), which has only been ratified by 11 member States.

This year the experts did not go over the subject of employment policy, i.e. the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). They confined themselves to just a few remarks and referred to the so-called World Employment 1995 report and this year’s report of the Director-General before the Conference. It is obvious that improving the employment situation is a central and priority task for all of us with responsibilities. To attain this objective we need a plethora of measures; amongst others, we need to remove institutional and statutory obstacles to make the labour market more flexible and more dynamic. Apart from indefinite contracts of employment we see that new forms of employment have emerged. It is really not helpful to denounce this type of new employment as being "precarious" — as the experts have done. These new forms of employment indicate that there is a trend towards greater initiative and mobility. In terms of employment they often provide an opportunity to those seeking employment for the first time, helping them to bolster their confidence and efficiency; even the employers are encouraged to show greater flexibility for this type of employment without entering into any permanent statutory or financial obligations. These graduated types of integration or employment should be considered as a realistic bridge leading eventually towards other types of employment.

The aforementioned two reports, to which the experts draw attention in general terms, also analyse correctly the trend towards globalization in the world and the positive effects of foreign and direct investment; they rightly insist on the need for greater flexibility as regards the duration and distribution of work. Conversely we do not share the manifest sympathy in favour of regulated labour markets. We believe that there still continues to be an excess of faith in government intervention and state-run action and subsidies. The experience of the past few decades points clearly to the contrary and is not duly taken into account.

Every few years the Governing Body requests our Committee to examine a report prepared by the Joint ILO-UNESCO Committee of Experts. This report relates to the application of the Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers (1966). This is the first time since 1989 that our committee had before it a comprehensive report on this subject. It is proof of the Joint Committee's many activities; but we should be aware that this is a very particular case. On the basis of a mere recommendation, a special and highly elaborate supervisory mechanism has been established. Although teachers are basically workers like everybody else, we accept that teachers receive this extraordinary special treatment for one reason — that they are agents transmitting know-how and knowledge. And in any humanistic society, this transmission of know-how and knowledge must enjoy the highest priority. We therefore find it totally incomprehensible and unacceptable that the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Committee of Experts, do not consider the activities of teachers as "essential services in the strict sense of the term" which, in keeping with their definition, means that no restrictions may be placed on their right to strike. We believe that this is a "topsy-turvy" logic. Knowledge and education are just as important as food and drink. However, anyone who feels that the social standards of teachers is more important jeopardizes the chances for the future of the next generation. A teachers' strike is therefore an extreme form of hostage-taking because the employer is hardly under pressure. The real damage is incurred by the third parties, i.e., children and young people. We trust that the ILO bodies will seriously reconsider this and other interpretations of the definition of the right to strike they have developed.

In another, separate part of our discussions we dealt with the question of Conventions and Recommendations relating to the termination of employment by the employer. Basically, this has to do with the protection of workers against dismissals in an employment relationship. There can be no question that this is a very important and vital question. The General Survey undertaken by the experts, under article 19 of the ILO Constitution, clearly shows that regulations vary widely in member States. It also points out that the obligations under the Convention are hardly ever fulfilled. The Convention does not just contain minimum standards; on the contrary, its requirements are quite high and demanding. The experts were unable to convince us with their arguments to the contrary. These arguments were also not borne out by the fact that the number of ratifications is quite low — i.e. 24. I think all of us should accept this litmus test. The high level of protection against dismissal, provided for under the Convention, is based on the wording of the instrument because the text does not just lay down a few general and broad principles; it covers quite a few details which are sometimes interlinked. As is often the case, the impression that its provisions are demanding is considerably increased by the many extensive interpretations of the instrument by the experts. During our discussion in the Committee we drew attention to at least a dozen of these examples. Most of these examples are listed in our report. Let me just concentrate on two of them.

Article 2, paragraph 2 of Convention No. 158 stipulates that workers engaged under a contract of employment for a specified time may be excluded from its scope. In paragraph 3, there is a somewhat vague restriction of this principle. However, the experts in their interpretation extend the restriction of this principle to such an extent that it becomes virtually meaningless. This causes uncertainty from a legal standpoint and does not exactly encourage ratification. (See also under paragraph 47.)

Another example may be found in the last sentence of paragraph 203 of the General Survey, where it is stated that “in labour disputes legal provisions must be interpreted in favour of the worker”. Such a phraseology is meaningless for the ILO and the interpretation of international treaties; if it were employed, most of our discussions would be brought to a speedy conclusion because in cases of doubt — and doubts can be raised at any time — the workers would be right every time.

On balance, the prospects of further ratifications of Convention No. 158 are not favourable. Statements of principle rather than arguments do not help us along this road. It seems rather naive to claim that protection against dismissals are an advantage for the employer; in this case, we do not need regulations. And even the claim that this protection would, in the same way as other ILO standards, have a stabilizing effect on employment, is merely theoretical. In view of the low rate of ratification, it would certainly not apply to Convention No. 158.

All of those who have critically read the study will have seen once again that there is an increasing discrepancy between the rapid change in the goods and services sector and the fairly static protection of workers. The longer they are delayed, the more painful the adjustment measures will be. We believe, therefore, that Convention No. 158 should be revised as speedily as possible.

As for compliance with constitutional requirements by member States, we believe that there is still cause for considerable and grave concern. In the light of the statistical data available to the experts, we would like to focus on just two examples. For example, 43 governments have failed to comply with their obligation to report on ratified Conventions; and out of a total of 337 individual cases there was no reply to comments or requests for information by the supervisory bodies. These figures are truly frightening. The obligation to report continues to be an inalienable basis for the efficiency of the whole supervisory machinery. Part of this problem is examined in our Committee and we refer to such cases as “automatic” — a harmless enough expression. Dealing with these cases this year, we saw quite plainly that more than half of the countries concerned did not even feel it necessary to accept the invitation extended to them to take part in the discussion. This is why we had to list these countries in the general part of our report in specific paragraphs. The situation might improve in the future. After all, the modified reporting system, which is starting this year, will be a relief for everyone — including the member States! We hope that this new system will have a positive impact.

The main task of our Committee has always been to deal with the so-called individual cases. Here we verify the extent to which member States have complied with their obligations stemming from ratified Conventions. This core function of our Committee kept us busy last week for six days — from morning until often late into the night. Unfortunately, the details of such a discussion cannot be condensed in this short report here in the plenary. However, the discussion and its findings have been correctly reported in the second part of our report. It will certainly be worth your while to have a closer look at these findings. This part of the report is a mine of information for all those who are interested in knowing more about the actual application of ILO standards.

This year we had to single out two countries in the general part of our report because of the long-standing and serious discrepancies between existing obligations and their compliance. These two cases involved Myanmar, in connection with the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) and the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and Nigeria, in connection with the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

To conclude, I would like to thank all those who have been instrumental in facilitating the work of the committee, thus paving the way for its positive results. This includes both the visible and less visible staff members. As customary, Mr. Bartolomei de la Cruz and Mr. Zenger were the driving forces behind the scene. There was also good cooperation between us and the Workers, especially their spokesperson, Mr. Peirens.

This cooperation is something we cannot do without if we wish to be successful on our committee. Finally, I would like to thank all Employers' delegates for their confidence and their support and I would like to mention once again, as in previous years, Mr. Ed Potter.

Original French: Mr. PEIRENS (Workers' adviser, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Standards) — The central focus of our general debate was the future of standards, despite the fact that the same item appeared on the agenda of the previous session of our Committee.

We have observed that there is unanimous recognition of the importance of standards. For the Workers' group, standard-setting is the priority activity in the ILO.

Moreover, we have witnessed new interest in international labour standards, due inter alia to the Copenhagen World Summit for Social Development and also to the celebration of the ILO's 75th anniversary. We welcome this and give our full support to Commitments Nos. 3 and 4 adopted by the World Summit and to the appeal made by the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, on behalf of the Governing Body to ratify the fundamental Conventions.

The Employers' group has also announced that it is prepared to discuss the promotion of Conventions on human rights and that it will be taking an initiative in this respect over the next few weeks.

In his Report, Promoting employment, the Director-General emphasizes that the social and economic advantages and the advantages for society at large of judicious job-market regulation, are often underestimated.

The Director-General also warns us against deregulation which, although designed to bring about greater flexibility in the job market, may aggravate inequality and poverty. Several governments have also explicitly upheld this point of view.

Despite this new show of interest in standards, we are at the same time confronted with developments which are moving in quite the opposite direction. We would like to make several comments to illustrate this contradiction.

First of all, the number of complaints, objections, and observations submitted to the supervisory bodies is very high. This fact illustrates on the one hand the interest shown by workers and their organizations for standards and, on the other, the magnitude of the problem of application.

Secondly, we see all too often a considerable discrepancy between the formal ratification of standards on the one hand, and their practical application on the other. However, cooperation between States, the supervisory bodies and the ILO's technical assistance should make it possible to resolve a large number of application problems if the governments involved have the political will to do so.

Thirdly, many countries are in the midst of revising their social legislation and their labour codes. They are doing this, so they say, to update their social policy, to adapt to the consequences of economic globalization, or in order to implement the structural adjustment programmes imposed upon them by the Bretton Woods institutions. In reality, without any real consultation they merely impose a simplistic deregulation of the labour market. By acting this way, they run the risk of taking the real substance out of national legislation and in time, of international labour standards. We would urge governments and the Employers' group to abandon the cult of blanket deregulation.

Fourthly, the discussions on procedures for drafting new standards and the possible revision of existing standards are often difficult and ambiguous in respect of their objectives.

Consequently, it is too easy to describe the Conventions adopted over the last 15 years as rigid and complex and to say that the social objectives of ratification are just a pipe-dream.

The different general surveys including the one produced this year on the Termination of Employment Convention, (No. 158), and Recommendation, (No. 166) 1982, do however demonstrate that these standards, by defining essential principles, give considerable leeway to national systems.

As far as the Workers' group is concerned, the prerequisites for revision are approaches based on objective analyses and an atmosphere of confidence between the groups.

We have seen that during the general debate in our Committee, the spokesperson of the Employers' group in the Governing Body Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards developed a constructive and subtle position on this.

We hope that the Governing Body Working Party will make constructive progress.

As far as the Workers' group is concerned, we believe that, first and foremost, it is necessary carefully to establish the objectives of reforms, or possible revisions and to keep sight of the ILO's fundamental values.

Obviously, the Workers' group also realizes that we are facing changes, new requirements and new challenges, such as economic globalization, continued poverty and social exclusion.

But we remain convinced that it is only via respect for the fundamental rights of workers and the effective application of standards that we will be able to strengthen democracy and social justice and ensure a more even distribution of the fruits of growth and thus stimulate economic activity and international trade.

Our Committee has noted that the supervisory system has produced positive results as the success stories show. This has been done thanks to dialogue and also continuity in the follow-up action taken by the supervisory bodies and technical assistance.

However, the Workers' group is concerned at the cases where dialogue and cooperation have not produced any results. The supervisory bodies are all too often forced to go on repeating the same observations and comments.

We can no longer accept that a whole generation of workers and their organizations should be wronged in this way and that the credibility of the supervisory system should be called into question.

If dialogue and persuasion do not produce results, and if the government concerned refuses to take a constructive approach to standards, then the social clause system should guarantee effective respect for the principles of dialogue, cooperation, assistance and social justice. The social clause and dialogue are not diametrically opposed approaches as some people would lead us to believe.

The social clause, in the form we advocate, has nothing to do with protectionism. We would like to emphasize this once again.

The discussion on the social clause is by no means over, even if the discussions on sanctions are in abeyance at the moment in the Governing Body.

We have also debated international standards in relation to migrants. The Workers' group fully shares the concerns voiced by the Committee of Experts in respect of the treatment of migrant workers in host countries. First, migratory flows are continuing unabated, most particularly within South East Asia and into the Middle East.

Second, the majority of host countries have not ratified the Conventions which address the situation of migrant workers. Even the application of Conventions on fundamental human rights, such as freedom of association and prohibition of occupational discrimination give rise to serious problems in respect of migrant workers. In certain host countries, migrant workers are excluded from trade union activity. We drew attention to these issues, including several individual cases.

Third, the situation of domestic workers is also a major problem. They are often the victims of clandestine labour syndicates. They have no papers or passports and are, therefore, afraid to try to defend themselves or make any form of complaint. Moreover, the authorities of host countries are often more likely to prosecute the victims, in other words the migrant workers, than the dishonest employers or those running the clandestine labour syndicates.

Fourth, mass dismissals resulting from the economic situation and armed conflict in certain regions are a manifest violation of human rights. Admittedly, as emphasized by the Employers' group, the problems of migration are closely linked to a shortage of jobs, economic crises and poverty. In this context, the employers referred to the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122).

The management of migratory flows and the working and living conditions of migrant workers should be organized in keeping with fundamental rights and in consultation with workers' and employers' organizations.

We support the appeal made by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations urging member States to consider the ratification of Conventions on migrant workers. We would also urge all member States to apply the Conventions on fundamental rights and the most important Conventions relating to aspects such as the protection of wages of migrant workers.

Employment was also a major theme of our debates. We discussed this subject at length, both in respect of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and also in respect of the general survey entitled Protection against unjustified dismissal.

The relationship between employment and labour regulation was at the very heart of our discussions.

The right to work and labour law are both essential elements in terms of promoting social progress. This point of view was also shared in the Director-General's Report, Promoting employment. The Declaration and the commitments adopted by the World Summit for Social Development also linked the priority of full employment to respect for ILO standards.

Standards on employment security such as the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158) do indeed have a positive impact on the functioning of enterprises and of society as a whole.

Employment security encourages enterprises to invest in the upgrading of skills and training of workers so as to enhance their adaptability within the enterprise.

In this context, workers will contribute to the development of the enterprise, as well as feeling involved and that their contribution is appreciated.

The objective of the Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140), is quite similar.

On the other hand, the proliferation of temporary contracts, subcontracting and "pseudo-self-employment" threatens to destabilize the social situation for major categories of workers.

The general survey on protection against unjustified dismissals has demonstrated that the outlook is good for the ratification of Convention No. 158, and neither this Convention nor the Termination of Employment Recommendation, 1982 (No. 166), has by any means lost its relevance.

Instances of non-ratification mainly result from specific national situations and a lack of knowledge of the scope of the Conventions.

The two instruments provide for a combination of preventive measures which are designed to reduce or avoid dismissals and offer remedies involving social accompaniment.

The general survey has shown that this approach can be found in a number of national systems and that the Convention includes sufficient flexibility clauses and alternative approaches so that it is possible to take national differences into account. It is therefore by no means naive to set standards that establish as universal principles the positive practices seen in many countries.

Our committee also devoted one sitting to a discussion of the application of the 1966 Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers. The discussion was based on the report of the Sixth Ordinary Session of the Joint ILO-UNESCO Committee of Experts.

Despite the importance that everybody appears to attach to education in order to develop human resources, to bring about economic growth and to act against social exclusion, investments in teaching have dropped considerably in a number of countries.

Teaching far too often is the first victim of a crisis in public finances and of economizing measures for implementing structural adjustment programmes.

These developments have undoubtedly had a negative impact on motivation and the working conditions of teachers, as well as in terms of respect for fundamental rights such as the freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining.

The fundamental Conventions, including the right to strike, are also applicable to teachers. This has been clearly recognized by the ILO supervisory bodies, such as the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The Recommendation supplements the fundamental rights guaranteed by ILO Conventions. The Workers' group supported the position adopted by the Joint Committee on the validity of the principles contained in the Recommendation, based on the fact that it is not necessary to envisage any revision for the time being.

Our Committee had a good discussion of individual cases as well. Both the Workers' and the Employers' groups worked together very constructively. All the conclusions were adopted with the agreement of both groups. The working methods and the decision-making machinery are different from those of other Conference committees. The position taken by the Employers' and Workers' groups is decisive when it comes to arriving at and approving the conclusions.

We are obliged to draw the Conference's attention to the specific nature of our Committee, since several of its new government members, particularly the Chairman of the Committee, were not acquainted with our working methods which have been in force for many years.

We are pleased by the publication of a new manual on procedures for Conventions and Recommendations. We are also pleased that the Office has taken into account our wish to organize an orientational seminar for new members of our Committee at the beginning of the Conference, which will be done starting with the next session.

We discussed 37 individual cases concerning 32 countries, and with reference to 14 different Conventions. The list of cases reflected a well-balanced choice, and it allowed us to cover the situation in countries all over the world in regard to various Conventions.

As in the previous session, some governments, directly or indirectly, raised questions about the way in which these cases were selected.

As pointed out in paragraph seven of our report, the choice is not determined by the wish to draw up a "blacklist". We do not limit our discussions to the most flagrant violations of fundamental rights.

We follow up new developments in the application of technical Conventions, and we also discuss the application of Conventions in industrialized countries. The draft list is therefore a proposal made by the Officers of our Committee, and we have mentioned the conclusions for three cases in separate paragraphs of our report (paragraphs 139, 140 and 141).

First is Myanmar, regarding the Forced Labour Convention 1930 (No. 29), and the absence of freedom of association (the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87)) and Nigeria, for persistent violations of Convention No. 87.

These countries have not shown any constructive attitude concerning the requests and the conclusions of the supervisory bodies.

No progress has been noted and the situation has even deteriorated. In Myanmar the use of forced labour is on the rise, particularly for building a tourist infrastructure in order to accommodate tourists comfortably, since 1996 has been proclaimed the Year of Tourism in Myanmar.

In Myanmar freedom of association is non-existent.

In Nigeria, despite the observations and conclusions of supervisory bodies, direct or indirect Government intervention in the internal affairs of trade unions persists. Union leaders in the oil and gas sectors have been removed by the Government and replaced by Government-appointed administrators.

We have also had to adopt firm conclusions involving the compliance by the concerned Governments with their commitments.

We refer to certain other specific cases: the United Kingdom, for the violation of the freedom of association at the GCHQ in Cheltenham (intelligence centre); Thailand, for the exploitation of children; India, for the persistence of bonded labour and the exploitation of children; Guatemala, for flagrant violations of the freedom of association; Indonesia, for violations of the right to collective bargaining and serious shortcomings in respect of protecting workers against anti-trade union discrimination; and Pakistan, for persistent violations of the freedom of association, and employment and occupational discrimination against minorities and women.

We also held in-depth discussions on other cases. We strongly advise you to read our report carefully and focus upon the commitments called for.

Our Committee also held a sitting on countries that have failed to comply with their constitutional obligation to send reports or to submit Conventions to the competent authorities for possible ratification. More than half of the Governments concerned did not attend the discussions that concerned them.

We hope very much that the new system of reporting will improve the situation. The Governments concerned should also draw upon the possibilities afforded by ILO technical assistance.

The Workers' group also stresses the fact that the supervisory system should have appropriate means — in terms of financing as well as human resources — to carry out its tasks.

It is not consistent to emphasize the importance of standards, as was noted at the Copenhagen Social Summit and, at the same time, to limit the means of supervising compliance with them.

In conclusion, I would like to thank our Chairman, Mr. Gopalan, and the Reporter, Mr. van Blankenstein. Owing to the latter's experience, his impartiality and his firm attitude, he made a fine contribution to keeping the decision-making process of our Committee intact.

I would like to thank the Chairman of the Committee of Experts, Sir William Douglas, who attended the general debate and the discussion on the general survey as an observer.

The Committee also asked the Chairman of the Committee of Experts to join us at the next session.

We would like to thank the representative of the Director-General, Mr. Bartolomei de la Cruz, Mr. Zenger, Mr. Gernigon, and Mr. Swepston, as well as the entire Office team, Mr. Gregor of ACTRA and the interpreters. I would also like to thank all of the members of our Committee, the Government delegates, the Employers and, most particularly, their spokesman Mr. Wisskirchen for his willingness to engage in dialogue and his steadfastness, which contributed to consolidating the decision-making system of our Committee.

I also extend my heartiest thanks to the members of the Workers' group, above all, to the Officers Ken Thomas, Rosslyn Noonan, Ahmed, Joyce, Sibanda, Padalinski and Venturini.

Our report was approved unanimously by the Committee, and I would request the Conference to act likewise.

Mr. GOPALAN (Government delegate, India; Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Standards) — I offer my felicitations to the President on the delightful manner in which he has guided the proceedings of this session of the Conference. I have great pleasure in presenting myself before this plenary to recommend the adoption of the reports of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

The righteous and magnificent obsession of the Committee on the Application of Standards has been the Forced Labour Convention, which is more than three score years old; the Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining Conventions, which are nearly half a century old, and the anti-discrimination Convention which is almost four decades old.

The Committee has called upon more than 20 countries to bring law and practice in line with the standards of these Conventions. In the context of certain cases concerning Convention No. 111, the Committee urged too that no scope whatever should be given for discrimination based on political opinions and religious faith. The effect of economic reforms on employment and wage protection came up for discussion in some detail. The Committee advised that we should not lose sight of the objective of full, freely chosen and productive employment in the process of economic reforms. The Committee also advised that labour and wage protection should be seen as strengthening the role of the State in a smooth economic transition. The Committee further advised that joint dialogue with the social partners should take place from time to time in the context of economic reforms. The Committee also expressed the wish that the fruits of reform should be shared equitably, so that justice is ensured in the distribution of wealth, including for the rural poor. The General Survey report on protection against unjustified dismissal was discussed in the broader context of the right to work and economic advances.

In examining conformity to standards, the Committee went into underlying problems as well, apart from legal and technical aspects. The objective clearly was to treat the diseases rather than the symptoms.

In evaluating conformity to standards, the Committee also kept in view the proportionality of infractions. Drawing conclusions and recommending remedial action, the Committee laid emphasis on preemptive measures as well. For example, in the case of the elimination of child labour the Committee appreciated the preventive value of improving the quality of education. The Committee felt deeply concerned, as has been pointed out by the previous speakers, about the non-fulfilment by many member States of constitutional obligations as regards standards. There has been some failure to submit instruments to the competent authorities, to furnish reports and to make an appearance before the Committee.

This phenomenon was characterized by our Employers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Wisskirchen, as the erosion of the existing shell of the Committee on the Application of Standards. Indeed, it erodes the existing shell of the ILO itself.

The ILO simply cannot afford to be kept in the dark about normative work within the member States. I called the names of countries in the world, in the so-called automatic cases, once, twice, thrice, wielding the wooden hammer. I found that many had not made an appearance, and I felt like an auctioneer trying to settle the final bid.

So far as the institution of final paragraphs is concerned, Mr. Van Blankenstein, our Reporter, has pointed out that they should not be seen as a condemnation by a tribunal, but rather, as the distinguished Worker member, Mr. Thomas, pointed out, as the ultimate expression of frustration on the part of the Committee of Experts and on the part of the Committee on the Application of Standards. As Mr. Thomas pointed out, these special paragraphs need only be seen as a spur to action. That is, of course, the iniquity of a system in which countries that do not furnish reports are simply urged to fulfil their constitutional obligations in future, while countries furnishing elaborate and transparent reports run the risk of being slapped with a special paragraph or two. By definition, national laws and practice should conform to norms. At the same time, the norms should be of such a nature that it is possible to conform to them. The formulation of norms should be informed by practical realities, too. This is essentially to be addressed as part of the task of the review of standards by the member States and by the social partners in the ILO, without preconceived rigid positions.

In this context, the Minister for Labour of my country, Mr. P.A. Sangma, the employers and the workers should demonstrate a new solidarity amongst themselves and strengthen the hand of the ILO.

The Employer Vice-Chairman, Mr. Wisskirchen, the Worker Vice-Chairman, Mr. Peirens, and Mr. Porter and Mr. Thomas, distinguished Employer and Worker members, respectively, who have often acted as spokespersons, extended to me their wholehearted support and understanding. I thank them. I thank too Mr. van Blankenstein, the Reporter, Mr. Bartolomei de la Cruz, Mr. Zenger, other secretariat staff and the patient interpreters who were a tower of strength for me.

By a genuine mistake yesterday, I failed to meet the Officers of the Committee at a social event. Mr. Bartolomei hosted a post-committee luncheon for them. To atone for this serious, although unintentional breach of courtesy, I submit my apologies to Mr. Bartolomei and to the other invitees to this lunch. I thank each and every member of the Committee for the confidence they showed in me.

Now I have the honour to submit the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards for adoption by the Conference.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT — The discussion on the report is now open.

Mr. SALAM (Workers' adviser, Nigeria) — On behalf of the Nigerian Workers' delegation to this Conference, we wish to thank you for this special opportunity to address this important gathering.

We indeed appreciate the overwhelming solidarity and concern expressed by this Conference for the state of industrial relations in Nigeria.

We wish to point out that our late arrival at the Conference, just a few hours before the presentation of the Nigerian case, did not permit us to register in time. This technical problem was then used to restrain us from giving an informed opinion on the Nigerian situation, particularly in the Committee on the Application of Standards. This unjustified denial has deprived all the workers of Nigeria of the fundamental right to be heard, even though our views, we believe, would have been of importance to the Conference, especially as this specific Committee would have contributed to a more balanced and appropriate decision.

Therefore we are compelled to observe that the concept of tripartism, which is the fundamental basis ruling the ILO's goals and objectives, should not be sacrificed on the altar of bureaucratic arrangements.

We wish to underline that, whenever one of the social partners intends to contribute to an important issue affecting its community and labour movement in particular, he should not be denied the opportunity to express himself.

Mr. AHMED (Minister of Labour and Productivity, Nigeria) — An accusation is being made in paragraph 141 of the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards against my great country, Nigeria. The report accuses Nigeria of a number of inadequacies. Firstly, that our legal system stipulates a single trade union system. This claim is contrary to the facts which we submitted to the Committee. The labour law of Nigeria is as follows: it has 85 registered unions, of which 41 are affiliated to the Nigerian Labour Congress. The remaining ones are not national unions. These facts have been submitted to the Committee on the Application of Standards, and we are reiterating them now in case any doubts remain. Secondly, our Government has been accused of interference in the restructuring of trade unions. It was the unions themselves that invited the Government to assist them in the restructuring. And when the Committee of Experts of this great body raised objection to our assisting the unions, we complied and we issued a decree. I have here a copy of the decree cancelling the restructuring. This copy was made available to the Committee on the Application of Standards.

My Government has been accused of running the NLC and two other unions. We wish to state that the affairs of the unions are being run by the union members themselves. We have presented documented evidence to this effect to the Committee. I have here the attendance list of all the trade unionists who attended the meeting in question and chose their own committees without a single Government representative being present.

We are asked to repeal the decrees dissolving unions. We have informed the Committee, and have transmitted copies of all our laws to it, that of the 85 registered unions in Nigeria, not a single one has been proscribed or dissolved. Not a single one. In theory, all the evidence tendered by the Government of Nigeria was taken into consideration by the Committee in its final decision. We informed the Chairman that we feared the report had been written before we were heard. Regrettably, those fears remain unallayed. We can now understand why speaker after speaker from the Committee insisted on the justification of not giving us details of information made available to them because, with the benefit of hindsight, we can now say that the revelation of some of these details, like the ones from the Nigerian Government, if put side by side with their conclusions, could have been very embarrassing to them and could have triggered indignant consternation in this great hall. It is only natural that the Committee of Experts' view of Nigeria, as contained in paragraph 141 of the final report, is totally based on prejudice of one kind or the other, on unfairness, injustice, untruth and with total disregard to the dignity of truth and justice. It is therefore our contention not to accept such a conclusion or our inclusion in that paragraph.

I do not want to quote the Reporter, and it is paradoxical that it is the Reporter of this Committee who is calling on posterity to judge, for it is a good judge. I pray that we are all judged by posterity, as we most certainly will be.

Mr. SHARMA (Government adviser, India) — I thank you for the opportunity given to me to make a statement on the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards. At the outset, allow me to compliment you, Mr. President, on the elegant manner in which you are conducting the proceedings of this Conference.

While generally appreciating the quality and the contents of the report of the Committee on Application of Standards, I wish to draw the attention of this august body to a legal and technical issue which has serious implications for the practices in dealing with the issue of child labour. The representatives of both the workers' and governments have made significant remarks regarding certain problems associated with the definition and concept of child labour, as well as the inadequacy of Convention No. 29 to deal with all aspects of child labour. Having expressed a similar concern during our presentation to the Committee, we wish to emphasize here in this plenary the need to have the entire issue of dealing with child labour under Convention No. 29 re-examined by the Committee of Experts.

Let me make it clear that it is not correct to treat all child labour as forced labour. Indeed, it is in recognition of this indisputable fact that the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), provides for the exclusion of child labour from its ambit under certain circumstances, including family-based employment, non-commercial agriculture, and light work not injurious to health and development.

Therefore, the conclusion drawn by the Committee that “it considered the problem of child labour as the most important component of the overall problem of bonded labour and forced labour in India” is, I submit, not only patently inappropriate but also in contradiction with Convention No. 138. There is every need to distinguish between child labour that is forced and that which is not forced. The fact that many developed countries have excluded agriculture and family-based labour of children from their own laws relating to minimum age proves this point beyond doubt.

Hence, we have serious reservations about the conclusion of the Committee that brings all types of child labour within the ambit of Convention No. 29. We reiterate our submission that this issue may be referred to the Committee of Experts consisting of eminent jurists from all over the world. Unless these ground realities regarding different types of child labour are recognized and the ambiguities in the definition are removed, we feel that it will only contribute to a serious credibility gap.

Original German: Ms. ENGELN-KEFER (Workers' delegate, Germany) — As Workers' representative on the Committee on Freedom of Association, I have followed very attentively but also with considerable concern, the proceedings of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and I have read its report. I would now like to make the following remarks:

A climate hostile to trade unions has been increasingly gaining ground in the post Cold War era and has been the impetus behind unprecedented attacks against the rights of workers and trade unions.

In recent years the number of assassinations, arrests, dismissals of workers as well as the use of violence has increased against those who use their trade union rights. There has been systematic repression by governments against trade unions, they have been denied recognition, there have been more or less violent repressions of strikes and demonstrations.

Let me express my very deep concern about the fact that even during this Conference political pressure was used to prevent one of the highly-developed industrial countries from being placed on the so-called “black list” of those countries which have violated the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

It would be devastating indeed for the credibility and the authority of the supervisory procedure of the ILO if we were to apply a double standard through the use of political pressure, whereby developing countries would be sanctioned severely if they were to violate ILO standards, whereas influential industrial countries would be given another chance. What are we to think of the country with the longest democratic tradition if its Minister of Labour repeatedly threatens to the media that it will withdraw from the ILO if it is included in a special paragraph? The higher the degree of economic development of a country, the more demanding the social criteria should be. This applies in particular to the implementation of Convention No. 87, the very core of trade union rights.

All I can do is appeal urgently to industrialized and developing countries alike to take seriously the conclusions of the supervisory machinery of the ILO and to implement them.

This year's discussion in the Conference Committee showed once again that the independent Committee of Experts and the tripartite Conference Committee are dealing with and have to deal with various tasks and functions. Whereas the Committee of Experts is in charge of assessing objectively and impartially where obligations have been complied with, the Conference Committee makes it possible for those involved directly to take a look at the situation and to suggest solutions. This multiple layer of supervisory functions must be kept in force.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT — If there are no further speakers, I shall take it that the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

I would like to thank the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen and the Reporter, as well as the other members of the Committee, for their excellent performance.

Report of the Committee on Home Work: Submission, discussion and adoption Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT — We now move on to the adoption of the report of the Committee on Home Work, which can be found in Provisional Record No. 25.

I therefore invite the Officers of the Committee to come up to the rostrum: the Chairman, Mrs. Samuel, Government adviser, Cyprus; the Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Wild, Employers' adviser, United Kingdom, and Ms. Van den Burg, Workers' delegate, Netherlands; and the Reporter, Mr. La Ruffa, Government adviser, United States.

I call on Mr. La Ruffa to submit the report.

Mr. LA RUFFA (Government adviser, United States; Reporter of the Committee on Home Work) — I have the honour to present to this assembly the report of the Committee on Home Work and the conclusions reached by the Committee.

The Committee was assigned the difficult task of developing new international labour standards on home work, which would aim to improve social protection for homeworkers.

The discussions took place under the diligent and skilful chairmanship of Mrs. Samuel, Government adviser of Cyprus, who was assisted by wise guidance from Mr. Dumont, the representative of the Secretary-General, and the hard work of his team. Valuable assistance was also provided by the Conference's legal advisers and experts from various technical departments of the Office. I would like to thank all of them for contributing to the successful conclusion of this first discussion on home work.

The subject of home work provokes diverse opinions as to how far regulations should go, and for this reason it was not possible for the Committee to reconcile all points of view. However, once the question of the form of the instrument was decided by a record vote, in which the Workers' members and the majority of Government members voted in favour of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation, all the members of the Committee worked together in a spirit of cooperation and the work proceeded well. I would like to pay tribute to our two Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Wild and Ms. Van den Burg, for their constructive attitudes despite their representing different points of view, and to the many Government members who contributed with well-informed, often decisive, interventions.

Members of the Committee were well aware of the fact that the subject they were discussing was of vital importance to millions of workers through the world. For many workers, mainly women, home work may be the only means of earning an income because they do not have access to regular employment, be it due to a shortage of jobs in the area where they live, or the lack of skills that make it difficult for them to compete in the labour market, or family responsibilities which prevent them from leaving the home. Whatever the reason, it is important to recognise that a large proportion of the labour force relies on home work for its livelihood.

Many interventions during the Committee meetings, particularly by the Workers' representative, emphasized the many problems that homeworkers face due to their lack of legal protection, their isolation and weak bargaining position, as well as the fact that often they are not even recognized as forming part of the labour force. The Employers' representative, on the other hand, drew attention to the advantages of home work, not only because of the flexibility it offers to employers and workers alike, but also as a means of combating unemployment. Many members of the Committee believed that home work was a widespread phenomenon and that it could be expected to increase further in the years to come, as more and more production processes are fragmented and new forms of home work, such as telework, are developing. The majority of members therefore considered that setting international labour standards on home work was important, as well as timely.

The definition of home work was the subject of intense debate and rightly so, since the scope of the proposed instruments will depend upon it. There was agreement on the core part of the definition — that it is work carried out for remuneration in the home or other premises chosen by the homeworkers but other than the workplace of the employer, and which results in a product or service as specified by the employer. However, there were divergent points of view on how wide the definition should be. One issue related to non-industrial forms of home work, such as telework and various services. No changes were made to exclude such forms. Because the definition did not exclude any particular type of home work, many members of the Committee felt that the proposed instruments would need to be re-examined with a view to modifying provisions which seem to refer primarily to industrial types of home work. Other members felt the definition needs to be restricted to homeworkers who solely or primarily carry out home work.

A key discussion took place on where the line should be drawn between homeworkers and independent workers. The Office text did not limit the definition to those persons already considered as employees, since in many countries homeworkers do not have the status of employee but are not truly independent either, or else they have a special status. Instead, the Office text had provided that homeworkers who met the requirements in the core part of the definition of home work would be considered as homeworkers unless they had the degree of autonomy or fulfilled other conditions necessary to be considered independent workers under national law. There were several attempts to clarify the criteria, ranging from giving broader discretion to national law and practice to putting more specific criteria in the instruments themselves. The Committee finally adopted a formulation which mentions additional criteria in addition to the core definition: a person working at home, for remuneration and whose work results in a product or service as specified by the employer can only be denied the status of homeworker if he or she has the degree of autonomy and economic independence necessary to be considered an independent worker under national laws, regulations or court decisions. It is clear that the issues surrounding the definition will be revisited in the second discussion.

Another problem area for many members of the Committee was the lack of a definition of intermediaries. The Office text had left this to national law and regulation, preferring to speak primarily of the employer as having responsibilities toward homeworkers. However, intermediaries were given joint responsibility with employers in the proposed Recommendation for payment of wages, and were referred to in other contexts. While a point on intermediaries is retained in the proposed Convention, which provides that national laws and regulations should determine, where appropriate, whether and under which conditions an employer may use intermediaries, this is another issue that the Committee will have to re-examine carefully during the second discussion.

As for the content of the proposed Convention, the main thrust is retained, which is the requirement of member States to adopt, implement and periodically review a national policy on home work aimed at improving the situation of homeworkers. This policy is to promote equality of treatment between homeworkers and other wage earners, taking into account the special characteristics of home work. In this regard, several items are listed for particular attention: freedom of association, protection against discrimination in employment, protection in the field of occupational safety and health, remuneration, social security and access to training. To this list, the Committee added minimum age for admission to employment or work and maternity protection. It also limited the reference to social security protection by inserting statutory social security protection.

As to the rest of the proposed Convention, the Committee modified a provision which would require national laws and regulations to prohibit certain types of home work for safety and health reasons. The Committee decided that conditions should be established for making such determinations and the provision should apply both to types of work and certain substances which might be prohibited. The issue of reliable information on home work had been raised throughout the discussion, and a point was added to the proposed Convention to reflect this concern. To this end, national policies on home work should ensure that homeworkers are included in basic labour statistics. The means of implementing the national policy are flexible and include laws and regulations, collective agreements, arbitration awards and other national practice. To ensure compliance with laws and regulations on home work, the proposed Convention calls for systems of inspection in accordance with national law and practice, and adequate remedies, including penalties, for violations. Finally, since other international labour Conventions have application to home work, it is clearly stated that the proposed Convention will not affect the more favourable provisions applicable to homeworkers contained in these other Conventions.

The Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation provide more details as to provisions which are intended either to facilitate the implementation of the proposed Convention or to provide protection in areas not covered by the proposed Convention. Several points were discussed at length and, whereas most of the Office text was retained, some important amendments were introduced. I would like to mention them briefly.

In the General Provisions of the proposed Recommendation, reference is again made to the need to compile and keep up to date detailed information on the extent and characteristics of home work; and it was added that such information should be made publicly available and, where possible, translated into the relevant community languages. In respect of the information to be provided by the employer to the homeworker on his or her specific conditions of employment, it was decided that this should take place not only when the homeworker is first given work, but also in case of a change in these conditions.

The question of supervision of home work and remuneration were discussed at length. It was felt important to add that, in the absence of collective bargaining, the rates of remuneration of homeworkers could be fixed by decisions of the competent authority, other appropriate wage-fixing machinery and agreement between the homeworker and the employer. Another important point that resulted from the discussion was added under the heading "Occupational safety and health" because it established the right of homeworkers to refuse to carry out work which they believed presented an imminent and serious danger to their life or health.

The part dealing with social security was amplified to indicate ways in which social security protection could be extended to homeworkers. It was also decided by the Committee to recommend that homeworkers benefit from the same protection as that provided to other workers with respect to termination of employment. Finally, the last part of the Recommendation aims to promote and support programmes which assist homeworkers to improve their situation generally. Seven such programmes are listed; two of them, concerning access to safe and good quality equipment and raw materials, and technical assistance to improve safety, health and productivity of homeworkers, were added.

This then is a brief summary of the report of the Committee and the Conclusions it proposes for your consideration. I am sure that the Conclusions as adopted by the Committee will serve as a sound basis for next year's discussions. Let me take this opportunity to express my sincere appreciation to the Officers of the Committee and the Office for all the hard work and dedication to the task that faced us.

I now invite the Conference to adopt the report and Conclusions of the Committee. I also invite you to adopt the resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the International Labour Conference an item entitled "Home work".

Mr. WILD (Employers' adviser, United Kingdom; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Home Work) — On behalf of the Employers' group permit me to summarise our views on this first discussion on home work.

In the general discussion which commenced our work in the Committee, the Employers made it very clear that we saw the international regulation of home work as both premature and inappropriate. The text given to us to consider had little to do with home work as a vehicle for job creation and the alleviation of poverty, and had everything, in our view, to do with creating machinery and bureaucracy to hold back progress. This view has not only not changed; it has been reinforced by our discussions this year.

The task facing the Committee on Home Work was an extremely difficult one. Although a large number of people put in many hours of diligent and conscientious effort, the text we have before us today is, in the Employers' view, both confused and confusing. If this document were today a Convention and Recommendation, it would be totally unratifiable in our view. For anybody who attempted its implementation, it would be at best unenforceable and at worst seriously damaging to the maintenance and creation of jobs.

To begin, let me briefly take a step back into the ILO's history as regards home work.

In 1990, an ILO Committee of Experts concluded that an international instrument on home work should not be prepared. That group was critical of the lack of reliable data upon which crucial decisions were to hang. They were concerned also that over-regulation would drive home work underground and prevent its full integration into the legitimate world of work.

This point is best reinforced not by an employer view but by the views of DG V of the Commission of the European Union in 1989, which said that there is no evidence that distinct legislative instruments to control home work had effectively regulated home work. "On the contrary, inflexible or over-rigid controls may unintentionally drive home work into the underground economy."

The experts, having considered the subject of home work, asked the Office to undertake further and better research. Almost none of this work has been done and our Committee was no better equipped to study home work in 1995 than the experts were in 1990.

Today, we are faced with exactly the inflexible and over-rigid formula feared by the Commission of the European Union. The draft Convention we have before us today was staggeringly voted for by 11 of the 15 EU Member States in the opening vote of this Committee. In that opening vote, had only four of those countries considered their judgment differently, we would today be looking, quite rightly in the Employers' view, at a Recommendation only.

Governments obviously had serious reservations on this subject, and how right they were. Let me turn to the texts before us, which Mr. La Ruffa has gone through in some detail. Not only are they inflexible and over-rigid, but they are at the same time badly and loosely defined in fundamental areas; areas where a Convention will call for governments to enact legislation.

I will focus on two areas as examples of why this text simply will not work as it stands: the definitions which prescribe the scope of the instrument, and the registration requirements in the recommendation. In sectoral Conventions, which by their very nature do not enjoy universal coverage, the definitions of the scope to whom the Convention is applicable are absolutely crucial.

There are three key players envisaged in the Convention. The homeworker, an intermediary and an employer. There are huge problems with the definitions of each of these.

First, as regards the homeworker: this is someone, as Mr. La Ruffa said, who carries out work, either in his or her home or in another place of his or her choice other than the workplace of the employer; for remuneration; and which results in a product or service as specified by the employer, providing this person has neither the degree of autonomy or economic independence necessary to be considered an independent worker. Now, the ability to identify independent workers from homeworkers, entrepreneurs from employees, is absolutely crucial. This Convention gives us just two clues on how we should make this decision: the degree of autonomy, and economic dependence. I know of almost no consultant or professional or even entrepreneur who is economically independent of his or her clients, and has a high degree of autonomy. Would you employ a consultant who was not going to follow your instructions precisely, and who did not care whether or not he or she got paid? You will note in the definition the absence of time spent at home doing work as a proportion of working time. Anyone who works at home for the smallest amount of time on the most irregular basis is a homeworker. Given that this room is now full of homeworkers, bear this in mind when I talk about registration shortly.

If I may still speak about definitions, I should like to draw your attention to the definition of employers. This is an important definition — not least because of the responsibilities which fall on the employer from a health and safety point of view.

An employer is a person, natural or legal, who, either directly or through an intermediary, gives out home work. Quite obviously, this definition places in the ranks of employers people who we would normally on a day to day basis call either customers or clients.

When you commission a piece of work, be it making furniture or clothes, or when you give a brief to a lawyer or an architect who works from home, you are now not a customer, but an employer. You will be responsible for a range of health and safety issues in addition to meeting severe registration requirements. Having already established all of you as homeworkers, I now suggest that most of you are also employers.

It is crazy that the Convention does not allow us to distinguish adequately between a commercial contract and an employment contract. The instrument talks about employment conditions, when in many cases the real relationship between the parties is a commercial agreement. Not only do the remedies vary between these two kinds of issues; so does the legislative machinery which is used, and so do the courts that would have jurisdiction.

Finally, let us take a look at the definition of intermediaries. In the instrument, the word intermediary is used seven times. This person will be held jointly responsible in law for debts to the homemaker. The intermediary is not defined at all. He or she could be an employer, an employee of an employer, a subcontractor or even a homemaker. Clearly, a supervisor working for an employer could be held financially liable for the debts of his or her boss in the event that that person could not pay his or her bills.

Definitions are the cornerstone of a Convention. Who does the instrument cover? That is a fundamental question, particularly in a sectoral instrument without universal applicability. The definitions I have gone through with you are confused, confusing, misleading or non-existent.

Let me turn briefly to the over-regulatory nature of the Recommendation. This is an instrument designed to apply to millions of employers and employees in the developed and the developing world: first, all employers who may at some time want to give out home work must register this intent with a competent authority. Intermediaries, whoever they are, must also register this intent to employ homeworkers; secondly, when this employer actually begins to give out home work, he or she must notify the authorities once more; thirdly, they must then keep a complete record of all homeworkers, by sex, and record for each element of home work issued the time allocated, the rate of remuneration, the total cost incurred by the homemaker, any amounts of those costs or other costs to be reimbursed, any statutory reductions made, gross remuneration and net remuneration to be paid.

Clearly, in some circumstances much of this information is useful. Now set that requirement against the definition and the breadth of coverage that I have debated with you. It is interesting, is it not? Let us come back to this audience.

You are all irregular homeworkers. Before you can take work home, your employer must register as an employer of homeworkers. He must then let the authorities know that you are about to do home work. He must then itemize the cost that you incur in carrying this work out at home, and the time he has allocated you to do particular tasks.

Now this is just one, if perhaps I admit the worst, example of over-bureaucracy in the instrument. Before I conclude, though, I should like to express a brief word of criticism about the Committee. We had opportunities in the Committee both last Saturday and Monday to discuss these issues on normal and scheduled working days. Unfortunately, the Governments elected to stifle debate and to implement the Office text solution by late on Friday evening. Now, I cannot say whether this occurred because the employers and workers simply could not agree between themselves on difficult problems, which is true, or because of the fact that the Office text was impeccably drafted in the view of the Governments, or because of the impending weekend or because the problem was just too difficult.

But it is a shame. Not only are we left with what is, in our view, such a mess; we did not use all of the time allotted to us to explore these questions further.

In summary, in our Committee we were given the task of resolving the irresolvable, to reconcile the irreconcilable. We have to force into an internationally-binding standard the oldest and newest jobs and professions in the world, the least and the most advanced working conditions in the world, the most flexible and occasionally the least-flexible working arrangements in the world and the most skilled and the least-skilled working populations.

We are attempting to use the Office text to regulate telework, for example, with language from the 1920s which refers to piece-work, batches of work and permits to work.

This Committee in total has spent seven work-years looking at this problem. We present to you an impossible and unsatisfactory text, not because of a lack of commitment to our effort, but because we have no clear picture of the nature of the issue or of the people involved. It gives me no pleasure at all to state that as Employers we are unable to commend the text to you. The Employers find it inconceivable that this subject, using the current language, will ever lend itself to an international Convention capable of implementation and enforcement, without doing serious damage to entrepreneurialism and to job creation.

Ms. VAN DEN BURG (Workers' delegate, Netherlands; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Home Work) — I have no problem being confused with the Employers' spokesperson because I am also an employer, so if you want to be more confused then this could also compound the confusion that Mr. Wild wants to spread.

I would like before I start my speech to applaud the very good work of the Committee and especially the Officers of the Committee, in the first place Mrs. Samuel who was at the very last moment appointed to be the Chairperson of this Committee and did a very good job. The Reporter, Mr. La Ruffa; to Ms. Caron who, with her bilingual knowledge, assisted us very much in the Drafting Committee, and of course Mr. Dumont and his excellent staff of the ILO Office who prepared everything for our Report and drafted everything as we wanted it to be. As we have stated to him already, we would be very sorry if he could not be with us next year, but of course would also allow him the pleasure to take his pension, but it would be something that we would miss in the Committee. Of course, besides the team of Mr. Dumont we would also like to thank the Legal Adviser who from time to time assisted us in the work of the Committee.

During the work in the Committee, several times reference was made to the commitments that the international community made in the final document of the United Nations World Summit on Social Development in Copenhagen in March this year. This has been confirmed by several speakers in this plenary room, and brought into relation with the Director-General's Report for this Conference on Promoting employment. Balanced views about the objective of full employment and the social policy necessary to prevent and alleviate social exclusion and poverty have been brought forward.

I fully agree with those who have stressed that the ILO is the specialist in these issues and would like to emphasize that this is not in spite of, but thanks to, its standard-setting activities.

The ILO started 75 years ago at a time that was also marked by great unemployment, poverty and exclusion leading to the nightmares that we all know. One of the main instruments that the ILO developed was the setting, promoting and monitoring of universal labour standards all over the world. These standards and the accompanying procedures are on crucial aspects different from general United Nations commitments and resolutions drawn up in international conferences.

First, because they are developed and monitored in a tripartite context that means that the commitment is (or at least could be) broader compared to what they would be if they came only from governments; and the implementation is also more critically followed.

Second, the development, implementation and monitoring of standards is closely linked to the technical assistance, development aid, training and information activities of the ILO, which means that they are more down-to-earth and less abstract and that there is really an educating and promotional effect in them. They are not just paper tigers in a drawer of the Ministry of Labour!

I want to focus the Conference's attention on these general remarks, because also in the discussion on home work we were confronted with mixed feelings and doubts by governments, and even with huge opposition from the employers, as you have heard, to the proposals for standard setting. I want to explain why the Workers' group in the ILO is very happy with and fully supports the Governing Body's decision to place the item of home work on the agenda of this Conference with a view to standard setting in a two-year discussion procedure, and with proposed conclusions to develop an instrument which contains both a Convention and a Recommendation. This was in line with the conclusions of the tripartite expert group that met in 1990. Not, as Mr. Wild claimed, that the conclusions of that meeting of experts were that there should not be standard setting. I will give you two quotations from this report adopted by the Meeting of Experts on the Social Protection of Homeworkers. Point 19 of the Conclusions says "In view of the widespread nature of home work throughout the world and given the need to improve the working and living conditions of homeworkers, the ILO should give increased attention to the problems of homeworkers and the promotion of policies and programmes aimed at the provision of adequate protection." And the last point of the conclusions is as follows: "Considering the wide variety of conditions in which home work is carried out, and its diversity, the Governing Body of the ILO should weigh the importance of the issues involved in order to decide on appropriate action by the ILO in this regard." So it was a compromise text upon which it was up to the Governing Body to make a decision, and the Governing Body decided to put it on the agenda of this Conference. I think we should decide to continue this activity at the next Conference.

It is especially through Conventions that may be ratified in relation to Recommendations that give guidelines to member States and the accompanying supervisory mechanisms that a commitment at the international level may get real effectiveness, may get "hands and feet" as we say in the Dutch language.

That is why the Workers' group is happy with the result of this first year's discussion in the tripartite Committee where already, right at the beginning, in a vote on the form of the instrument, a decent majority of governments shared with us the opinion that the proposed instruments to be discussed in the Committee should be a Convention and Recommendation, and not merely a Recommendation, precisely because of the advantages that I have just mentioned.

I think we can be confident that this majority will grow, after the first year's discussion and I would like to tell the Conference why.

Right from the start, there turned out to be some doubts with respect to the proposed conclusions. Was the scope of the instrument clear? Were not there too many different forms of home work? Could home work be clearly distinguished from independent work? Were new forms of home work related to the development of the information industry to be covered? Could they be covered in the same instrument that should cover forms of home work that have existed for more than a century? Should not homeworkers, if they were not self-employed, independent workers, just be seen as employees and thus be covered by already-existing instruments?

All these questions reflected the invisibility of and the unacquaintedness with home work at policy levels, but also the actual complexity of the issue. I must say that I appreciate the diligence and efforts of the Committee to take up the challenge to get more clarity and to bring more clarity to the problems that we faced. Such an attitude is more difficult than merely declaring that the issue is too complicated and too premature, and also more sophisticated and more challenging. If you have been sent here to participate for at least ten days in a Technical Committee of the ILO Conference, it seems to me that a debate is more interesting than only expressing opinions on whether or not you support an amendment, is it not? Once again, I appreciated the constructive approach of some government members in this respect, encouraged by the Chairperson, Mrs. Samuel.

The Workers' group of the Committee on Home Work had, I am proud to say, a lot of expertise on the specific subject in its ranks. I say that not to be immodest or to tease the Employers' group who started the discussion with explaining they did not have enough information and knowledge to treat the subject, but I mention it especially because in a lot of literature and research on home work, it is stated rather bluntly that trade unions are not involved or interested in home work.

I think that we have proved here that we as trade unionists really have affinity with the issue and although it is fully true that in most cases we do not organize large numbers of homeworkers, we have been able to form the necessary, I would rather say intermediary, link between specific groups concerned with home work, the international trade union movement and these activities in the ILO.

In spite of this expertise also from the workers side we have the need to get clarification on several points in the proposed conclusions. And as the process of discussion of Technical Committees in this Conference normally goes through submitting and discussing amendments, this also led us to get clarifications through amendments, and to make proposals for improvements in the Office text.

This does not say, let us be very clear about that, that in general we did not agree with the proposals in the Report. We did not query the basic outline and approach offered by the Office, we only sought slight alterations and improvements.

And after these two weeks I can say this with even more conviction than when we started, the Office has prepared a very good document. The proposed conclusions, as they lie now before the Conference, can really cover and answer all the questions that were initially raised.

Of course I will not go into details but allow me to explain the broad outline hoping to convince you that the draft conclusions that will be brought to your attention in a new questionnaire in some months, and that will come back for final discussion next year, are well considered and can take into account all the worries that were mentioned in the Committee and here in the Plenary.

The definition of homework developed by the Office and further refined by the Committee in our opinion is a good one. It gives three cumulative criteria that in combination classify types of work as home work. The Reporter has mentioned them already. It should be done in his or her home or in other premises of his or her choice, other than the workplace of the "employer". It should be done "for remuneration", and it should result "in a product or service as specified by the employer, whether the equipment, materials or other inputs used are provided by this person, the employer or the intermediary", and thus not be in the free creation of a producer, in which case it would be a free profession.

These cumulative decisive criteria are followed by a clause that intends to distinguish the homeworker rather precisely from an independent worker through the criterion of having a certain "degree of autonomy and economic independence, necessary to be considered an independent worker under national laws, regulations or court decisions". That means that the Convention text does not prescribe the exact criteria for national governments to define an independent worker, but at the same time restricts the opportunity to simply define homeworkers as independent workers, so as to avoid the applicability of the proposed provisions on homeworkers in the ILO standards to independent workers. This was not meant to be an escape clause and with the drafting that came out of this first discussion, this is avoided, so we are happy with this clear definition.

Another important thing concerning the instrument in general is its scope. Also this paragraph is very clear: no exceptions, no thresholds, no restrictions like having homework as a major source of income, working full time or whatsoever.

Important in this context is to keep in mind that some or maybe, in some key cases, many homeworkers, like for instance teleworkers, already have an employee-status and are covered by labour legislation and collective agreements. Even for these categories however, the proposed Convention and Recommendation concern certain additional provisions that are important and necessary to take up by national policy and to be developed by the member States, like for instance provisions on safety and health.

The proposed Convention and Recommendation, however, are of most importance for all those homeworkers, be it in traditional work or in new forms of telework who do not have such a clear employee status. For them it is of the utmost importance that in national policy, whatever the precise details, they get employee status or at least get the elementary protection that is outlined in the proposed text.

So there are no exceptions in the scope as far as the home work falls under the criteria of the definition. Different forms of home work are covered and there is the flexibility that allows governments to distinguish homeworkers from independent workers and to just consider homeworkers as overall employees as is the case in some legislation, or gradually give them the status that will afford them to meet the provisions that have been outlined in the proposed Convention text.

Concerning the provisions contained in the proposed Convention text, let me stress that the whole instrument is drafted as a promotional instrument. It gives hardly any directly binding provisions and it gives full space for national accents and methods. The central obligation is that governments should develop national policies, and then it gives some guidelines for these policies. It does not prescribe, though, the form of this policy: parts of it could be integrated in employment policies, in general health and safety regulations, in policies for equal treatment for men and women, in education policies etc., and it could also be a specific policy for this specific group. It is fully up to the governments how to proceed and how to find and design policies that cover the interests involved.

The rather short Convention is laid out from the central provision that the national policies should be adopted, implemented and periodically reviewed. The other provisions are connected with that policy and also outline in a very general manner some of the aspects that should be taken into account in such a national policy. Equality of treatment between homeworkers and other wage-earners on some particular aspects and health and safety provisions specifically for the difficult situation of work done at home.

A new provision has been added on labour statistics expressing the importance that the Committee attach to making home work more visible and to get accurate figures of fact. But that is all contained in the proposed Convention text.

The proposed Recommendation contains some more elaborate guidelines but these are also of a very general character, as is the registration section. They only give some registration provisions that are the basis for supervisory measures and very simple provisions for individual employers to be compared with simple salary slips that normally are given to employees.

Some simplifications have been adopted in this Recommendation. For this purpose the Government group did not want to have too much detail in the Recommendation and if this makes the Convention and Recommendation more acceptable we from the Workers' group do not have many problems with it.

The last remark I want to make concerns the last part of the proposed Recommendation. It contains some promotional measures recommended to national policies with respect to specific programmes set up to improve, inter alia, employment opportunities, and the productivity and the income-earning capacity of homeworkers, who are often women. These provisions can be linked directly to the commitments that our Governments made in Copenhagen. Also the creation of centres and networks to provide homeworkers with information and training and to reduce their isolation follows the commitment to fight social exclusion. Together with the recommendation to facilitate the organization of homeworkers which is clearly outlined in the instruments along the lines of the ILO tradition, as a fundamental basic right also for homeworkers, the last parts of the Recommendation show that this proposed standard-setting instrument on homework is not only focused on regulation and legislative measures.

I can recommend to you the document with ten case-studies on such programmes for homeworkers around the world that has recently been published by the ILO (Homeworkers of Southeast Asia: Silent no more, 1993). Practical measures such as those presented in this document are very necessary to really emancipate the invisible, marginalized and isolated homeworkers.

I would like to underline what is stated in the introduction to that report. It says "neither regulation alone, nor trade union activity alone, nor community action alone can be effective. Working on several fronts at once is necessary". No community action alone can be effective. Working on several fronts at once is necessary. The Workers' group fully agrees with that and hopes that the ILO can make essential contributions to all of these aspects. The results of the discussion in the Committee provide, in our opinion, a firm basis for activities on all these aspects. I recommend you to accept and adopt the report wholeheartedly.

(Mr. Popescu takes the Chair).

Mrs. SAMUEL (Government adviser, Cyprus; Chairman of the Committee on Home Work) — Thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak on this important occasion. So much has been said from all angles that there is not much left for me to say. I promise you that this will only take about five minutes.

It has been an honour and a pleasure for me to have been the Chairperson of the Committee on Home Work. I would, however, like to confess that it was only after much hesitation that I accepted this honour. I had heard from several people on different sides that the Committee on Home Work would be a very difficult one. While the phenomenon of home work is increasing in both developing and industrialized countries, it is an extremely complex and controversial issue. The Committee did not have an easy task before it. Admittedly we had difficult and lively debates but this contributed to the richness of the discussions as noted in the report presented by the Reporter.

I would like to mention three factors which enabled the Committee to accomplish its work efficiently. First, the composition of the Committee. Copying Mr. Rood, the Chairperson of last year's Committee on Part-time Work from whom I have learned a lot, I would like to describe the members of our Committee as he did, as the nicest group of people who one could ever meet in the world. In fact, it was in some ways a meeting of old friends as many were also in the Committee on Part-time Work and this made the work environment more familiar and comfortable. Second, the Employers' and Workers' groups have excellent Vice-Chairpersons, Mr. Wild, Mrs. Van den Burg. They certainly had done a lot of homework before coming to this session of the Conference. They expressed their respective views with firmness and clarity yet with courtesy and humour. Thirdly, the Committee was fortunate to have Mr. Dumont as the representative of the Secretary-General. His knowledge, fairness, good humour and positive attitude well known to many for the years he has been involved in ILO standard-setting activities, greatly facilitated the work of the Committee and made for an excellent atmosphere.

Turning to the substantive work of the Committee, I must say that the first sittings were rather difficult. This was to be expected. In particular, the definition of home work was extensively discussed, as it would determine the category of workers for whom the proposed instruments were intended. Great effort was made to come to a definition which would be sufficiently precise to clearly distinguish homeworkers from genuinely independent workers, was global in its approach and covered all homeworkers in need of protection. The definition reached in the end was the result of various compromise proposals. Whether it will be satisfactory to all sides remains to be seen in next year's discussion.

Once the difficulty surrounding the definition of homework was overcome, the work continued more smoothly, with efforts being made by all sides to find solutions which could make the proposed instruments acceptable and ratifiable. In short, the proposed conclusions with a view to a Convention focus on a few key issues. The most important provision is that which refers to the need for member States to adopt, implement and periodically review in consultation with the social partners and homeworkers' organizations, a national policy on home work aimed at improving the situation of homeworkers and promoting equality of treatment between them and other wage earners in a number of fields, such as freedom of association, protection against discrimination in employment, occupational safety and health, remuneration and maternity protection. The proposed conclusions with a view to a recommendation include more detailed provisions, either to facilitate implementation of the proposed Convention or to provide protection in areas not covered by it. As the Reporter of the Committee, Mr. La Ruffa, has already very briefly summarized the key issues covered by the debate in the Committee, I shall refrain from going into this myself.

I should conclude by stating that the Committee on Home Work strongly and resolutely expects to continue next year the constructive discussions started this year. As noted by all the previous speakers, there are still issues which remain to be resolved in the second discussion. Finally, I wish to express my warmest thanks to the two Vice-Chairpersons, Mrs. Van den Burg and Mr. Wild, to the Reporter, Mr. La Ruffa, to the members of the Drafting Committee and to all the members of the Committee who through their active and constructive participation enabled us to finish our work on schedule. I would also like to express my deep gratitude to Mr. Dumont and his able staff and to the Legal Advisers for the assistance and support given to the Committee. Last but not least, thanks are due to all those behind the scenes, especially the interpreters and the typing pool who work hard to facilitate our work.

I wish everybody a happy resumption of their own home work which must have been somewhat neglected during their stay in Geneva.

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. POPESCU) — The general discussion of the report is now open.

Mr. ZILONY (Workers' adviser, Israel) — First of all, in spite of the deep dispute between the Workers and the Employers, I would like to congratulate the members of the Committee on Home Work on their work on their important report which is vital to millions of people. The report and the disputes are a mutual experience to tackle the new phenomenon in time. I am sure it will promote and pave the right way to better understanding on the subject. There are some aspects of the report that I would like to commend and focus on during my presentation.

Home work is a new phenomenon which has entered the lexicon of types of occupation. As technology advances and machines become more and more compact, we will find more and more people working in their homes. This might be less evident in the conventional industries but more in the developing occupations and those professionals where the personal element is strong, such as journalism, computers, book-keeping and also fashion and textiles. This is a new system of labour relations in which the direct contact or the confrontation if you like, between workers and employers has disappeared, just as the element of representation has disappeared or at least has diminished significantly. The collective agreement has become superfluous since the worker has taken on the new status of worker-subcontractor which now fits the definition of an employee in the normal sense of the term, but which does not reach the status of contractor since he does not have full autonomy and cannot do just anything he wants. He is under the control of another employer. The phenomenon of home work means that workers' organizations must reorganize themselves in all methods concerning this new category of worker, but even more so in respect of the manner of ensuring the social rights of this category of worker which is made up of contractors of labour or providers of services. It would be very easy to plan the end of the twentieth century as a time of modern slavery, camouflaged by saying that the worker is a contractor with responsibility for his work time, conditions of labour and social conditions, and then he would be able to work without any of the restrictions of work hours or social security. This is the essence of the challenge we are faced with if we are to avoid a return to the conditions of the nineteenth century.

In Israel the phenomenon of home work is marginal, but I am convinced that in principle, apart from the subject of work discipline, regulations and works committees, etc., or in other words, labour relation in the customary meaning, which are standard to the accustomed ways of employment but not existing in home work. All other social aspects, including wages, must be applied in order to say that work implies dignity and freedom. I would like to believe that plain common sense will guide us correctly, and not minor considerations of how to exploit the workers whose type of occupation has changed technically but not instantly.

The trade unions and the government must be interested in working towards a situation in which all homeworkers will not be considered, from the point of view of their taxes, as being self-employed. This is the best solution at this initial stage, a stage that might, in the long run, or in the case of a crisis, cause real headaches to the family, and be a burden to society if a homemaker finds himself without work and without social security. If the unions are not capable of dealing with this subject, where sometimes the temptation or self-fulfilment and debt of being self-employed is great, the authorities must guarantee by means of legislation the foundation for social security and the relevant arrangements, exactly as occurred in the past when governments initiated labour legislation, and when the ILO, which was a pioneer before the governments, proposed Conventions which were approved by the various countries.

True, this is a new method of employment which provides many advantages for employers and, in the fashionable idiom, much flexibility. Experience has taught us that beyond the word "flexibility" lie many hidden meanings, like desperation to pay less, fewer social obligations and less social welfare. This might be natural for the employers, but it is certainly not acceptable among the trade unions. Even if there is a readiness to deal with a new kind of employment, it must not become an instrument to exploit minorities or sectors such as women or children, or distant areas in economic distress.

Trade unions cannot oppose human nature when there are individuals who seek self-fulfilment by working at home, which is apparently to them an expression of their independence. But society cannot stand by and see how new ways are developing which incorporate danger for freedom and union dignity, and if we do not know how to ask the right question and put the right barriers at the right time, in the end society will be harmed.

Due to the short time available I will mention just a few of the problems which must be tackled so that this matter can be considered in good time.

We must prevent, by way of legislation, home work developing into a grey economic system, competing with organized labour, organized workplaces, and avoiding payment of just taxes to the State. The temptation to make this kind of connection between a worker and an employer is great. The money might dazzle and weaken people's eyes. Since this money appears to be instead of paying income tax, and is usually instead of future welfare benefits, in the event of crisis this worker will become a burden on society and his family will remain without security.

We must ensure that home work will not affect other people living in the home such as children, and if we do not designate clear and fixed standards for home work, such as necessary working hours, prevention of noise, etc., ecological and social damage can result.

We must ensure the prohibition of forms of work which should not be allowed in the home, including work which may harm people's health or ageing, and this may mean some kind of inspection.

We must ensure freedom of association in order to safeguard fair social conditions, opportunities for further education, and job training, and incorporate in suitable laws the conditions of responsibility of employer and contractor, in the event of occupational accidents occurring in the home.

The creation of an agreed arbitration body must be considered, which would include representatives of the government, workers and employers to permit speedy and inexpensive litigation without the need for lawyers or complicated procedures.

This is the tip of the iceberg. The discussion which has been initiated by the ILO is correct and to be commended since it has put this developing subject on the agenda. But the proposal is not enough. The generalities constitute a danger where there is insufficient knowledge in those countries where the phenomenon is in its early stages. The most careful attention must be paid to stimulating the concern of governments, employers and the trade unions. I am sure that Histadrut will support any comprehensive proposal which will provide an adequate and satisfactory solution for homeworkers and for the welfare of their families.

Ms. KABIR (Employers' delegate, Bangladesh) — I have followed the discussion on the proposed Convention and Recommendation on home work with interest, particularly because in my country, as in many other developing countries, home work offers an opportunity of remunerative employment to a very large number of poor home-bound women who lack education and mobility for economic, social and cultural reasons.

In the Convention and Recommendation on home work the assumption seems to be that home work is regular work done away from the workplace of the employer. A body of regulations had been formulated to regulate this kind of work, which may be common in the industrialized countries, many of which already have legislation to deal with it. But in our context, home work is not regular work. It is work done from time to time by persons who would not normally be employable. This kind of work actually relates to the informal sector, along with micro-industries and self-employment. At this stage of our economic and social development, generation of employment in the formal sector is seen to be the most effective way of eradicating poverty. Application of standards in home work in this sector would inhibit creation of jobs and would also take away existing jobs and therefore would be counterproductive.

In Bangladesh, as in other developing countries, a vast majority of women are marginalized. Providing employment for them is the quickest way of improving their status in the family and integrating them into society. Regulating home work in our situation will only drive such work underground and deprive many women of the opportunity of social integration.

Although the proposed Convention has been formulated for protection of homeworkers from exploitation, its implementation in developing countries at this point in time will in fact expose them to harassment and further deprivation. This aspect of the matter merits much more serious consideration.

Mr. JOHANNES (Government adviser, South Africa) — We in the Government of South Africa very much welcome the theme of the Report of the Director-General to this session of the Conference, namely Promoting employment. However, as already mentioned by our Minister of Labour, Mr. Mboweni, we strongly oppose the creation of employment which makes use of cheap labour and sub-human working conditions.

South Africa is currently trying to reform an economy which in the past was based on cheap labour policies and on statutory race discrimination. Now we are in the process of developing economic policies aimed at the redistribution of the country's wealth to benefit the majority of our people who have been disadvantaged by decades of racist apartheid rule.

It is therefore essential that we have international standards to regulate the so-called untypical forms of work which appear to be on the increase, whilst unemployment, underemployment, child labour, inequality and poverty are increasing.

In South Africa a recent survey of four typical working-class areas showed that 69 per cent of all households had at least one person involved in home-based work. The majority of these people do not voluntarily choose such work, but have no other occupational choices available. The majority of homeworkers in South Africa, as in most countries around the world are women. The universal under-evaluation of women's work and the marginal position of women in the labour market further undermine the already unacceptable conditions under which the most predominant types of home-based work are carried out.

It is therefore of the utmost importance that the ILO continues to consider these forms of so-called untypical work which are becoming more and more common and to develop international standards to prevent this type of work which contributes to the further impoverishment of the world's working populations.

We would like to urge those employers who have positioned themselves as being strongly opposed to an instrument on home work to seriously review the points we have highlighted, and to reconsider their stance. We would like to urge them, as well as governments, to contribute to the process which has been initiated this year.

We need to develop a suitable and strong Convention backed up by a detailed Recommendation containing international standards which will ensure that once the Convention is adopted and ratified, home work will really develop rather than progressively underdevelop the working people of the world.

We congratulate the ILO for putting this item on the agenda of this 82nd Session of the Conference, and we look forward to the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation on home work next year.

Mr. OLANIYI (Employers' adviser, Nigeria) — I am speaking on behalf of the employers of Nigeria, in particular, and of Africa in general. I have participated actively in the discussions that produced the document being tabled, that is to say the Convention and Recommendation on home work. Let me praise the Office for the study on home work, but a practitioner like myself will conclude that the Office has succeeded in armchair research. Any ILO instrument on home work will make home work in Africa go underground. As it is now, it is more a luxury than a necessity. The definition of home work is inadequate. Is the homemaker a subcontractor, a supplier, an employer in the sense in which we know it? Or is he perhaps a customer? Who is the intermediary? Where do you place him? Can the contract for service apply in the case of the intermediary, as defined in the text? The instruments as they appear in this report are full of bureaucracy, and cannot be helpful.

Employers of homeworkers have to register their workers. Inspectors have to visit homeworkers, even in areas where outsiders are not allowed to go. Do you think an ILO instrument is going to allow a person to inspect the home of a homeworker?

The instrument seeks equality of treatment but does not pave the way for equity. If the developed countries can accept these instruments I can say categorically that the developing countries cannot. The developing countries are battling against unemployment and underemployment. They will not support any instrument that will curb the efforts of millions of people to earn a living. People first need to learn and to understand how skills are transferred to the children and relations in Africa.

We hear talk of abuses, exploitation of children, slavery, the marginalization of women. But what we really need is more research. I urge the ILO to do more of that research, and thus carry the developing world along.

Original German: Mr. MAASSEN (Government delegate, Germany) — Mrs. Van den Burg, in expressing the hope that more governments would speak out in favour of this instrument, is going to be disappointed.

I am obliged to dampen her enthusiasm.

The German Government already expressed its reservations when it was decided to include the subject of home work on the agenda of this year's Conference. The federal Government did not, it should be stressed, feel that homeworkers did not need protection. Its reservations were rather based on the fact that labour legislation on home work varied considerably throughout the world. It therefore believed that it would be extremely difficult to set minimum standards worldwide.

The discussions within the Committee on Home Work and the outcome of these discussions have further confirmed the concerns of the German Government. This is particularly true with respect to the definition of the concept "home work". There is a fundamental difference between the national regulations in Germany and those in most other member States — upon which the definition drawn up by the Committee is based.

In most member States homeworkers enjoy less protection in their employment relationships than other workers. In Germany, the situation is exactly the opposite; homeworkers are self-employed but because of their economic dependence on one or several contractors, they receive particular protection which can be compared with any other worker. And the inclusion of telework in the scope of the planned instrument is problematic from the German point of view.

On account of this and other discrepancies between domestic law and the fundamental principles for a future instrument which are contained in the report of the Committee, the German Government cannot support the conclusions of the work of the Committee. However, we do not wish to stand in the way of a consensus. When the report is adopted we would have preferred the Committee to confine itself to a Recommendation.

Whether the federal Government will be able next year to agree to a Convention which contains a definition of the concept of "home work" as included in this report, is however more than questionable.

Mr. ANAND (Employers' adviser, India) — I crave your indulgence in recording my somewhat very strong feelings, and the reservation of the Indian Employers in respect of the instrument which has been placed before the plenary session for adoption.

Reports V(1) and (2) and the preceding circumscribed thought process, hurriedly deciding on the articles of the instrument to be adopted, as against the full debate envisaged in the first discussion procedure, constantly reminded me of a childhood story of nine blind men exploring the size and dimension of an elephant, one conceiving it to be a trunk, another the tusk, a third as pillar-like legs, the fourth as a pony tail, and so on, none having a comprehension of its total size or dimensions to be an engine-like vehicle of the beast world, worthy to be the kingpin of the forest. It was not appreciated at all that conceptually home work is also the cradle and kindergarten of enterprise; it paves the road to and stabilizes entrepreneurship. Again, it is the fountain spring for small and medium enterprises which spring from the spirit which guides home work. To nip home work in the bud amounts to throwing the baby away with bath water.

As to its relevance, after the Copenhagen Declaration and Programme of Action, to our region, Asia Pacific, where home work supplements the income and contributes to the eradication of poverty, we have no doubt. It is an essential but certainly not a core issue. In South Asia, only sporadic inquiries have been made which, to use ILO jargon, could not be considered "atypical work" due to the extent and diversity of home work prevalent there.

Apart from the impracticability of registration and social security considerations and other provisions, I have no doubt that the scope of inspection and monitoring outlined in the proposed instruments and the concept of adequate remedies, including penalties for violation of any provision, has the potential to reopen the floodgates of corruption and crime in the informal and rural sector. Unbridled, these provisions would interfere with and jeopardize the genius and culture of domestic establishment, particularly involving women workers. Mafia and feudal elements would find support from new petty bureaucracies, namely the inspection authorities. This could, as well, cause not only harassment but even communal bickerings and riots, thwarting peace and socio-economic progress.

I wish the Workers' spokesperson had not only quoted point 19 of the report of the Meeting of Experts, but also points 20, 21 and 22, which dealt with and suggested on what lines ILO action should thereafter be carried on. I personally feel that she is very clever, intelligent and worthy of political appointments in her own country where you can vote as suits you and not as suits others.

The experts, I maintain, did not make a specific recommendation for international common action in the very first instance. Thus in 1993 the Governing Body decided to place the question on the agenda for 1995. Delegates here from the regions, obviously were supposed to debate the issue in view of its diverse and all-embracing character. The Governing Body did not issue any direction in our perception to the Office to propose international action by way of a draft instrument as formulated in the very first instance. The Office's action is neither fair nor credibility-promoting among our colleagues. The Committee has inadvertently pre-empted the Governing Body in conducting an independent evaluation of the first discussion at this Conference. I say this with a full sense of responsibility as a Governing Body member.

Much reliance has been placed on replies received in response to the questionnaire mentioned in Report V(2). The basic issue is covered in points 1 and 2. Out of 170 Members of your Organization, the Office received replies only from 76. On point 1, 74 parties answered, and on point 2, 72 only, both a minority of the total membership, though significant in numbers. On the question as to whether ILO may adopt the instrument, 66 were affirmative, again a minority; should it be a Convention, a Recommendation or both? Of the 72 responses, 29 were for a Recommendation, three for a Convention and only 37 were for both.

On principles of democratic working I maintain a substantial majority of ILO membership, like the Employers, has not been involved in sponsoring or settling the twin documents under consideration. The Employers' well-motivated amendment on points 1 and 2 was wrongly objected to on frivolous technical grounds. The rejection was neither socially desirable nor otherwise, in prudence, sustainable. Given some patience and cooperation we could have perhaps negotiated a way out. Active social partnership was given, in my opinion, a "goodbye". Voting on the articles in the Committee was imperfect and somewhat garbled. I maintain that many governments who were absent or even voted in favour of adoption may have cold feet when it comes to ratification.

Concluding, as it is, the twin documents will neither be implemented nor be implementable by many States. This will bring no glory nor contribute to the much-needed credibility of ILO amongst all levels of employers or, I dare submit with humility, amongst functionaries of several governments when approached for advice on ratification. We, in India, propose to resist it at subsequent discussions here and at subsequent conferences and committees, and at the National Conventions Committee in India, and I deem it my duty to record our reservation to the adoption of this report today in advance. We are not against a broader social purpose, but the manner, blanket-like style and thoughtless haste in which it is being prematurely done is not acceptable to us in India as employers. Since our local state governments have concurrent jurisdiction in labour legislation, there has to be flexibility as well as diversity in consensus for our local-cum-national level. I would not like, moreover, to commit or embarrass the many local employers who have to deal with their situations realistically in the hinterland.

My discordant reservation gives me no joy. My faith and democratic behaviour and principles of peace and progress in the workplace oblige me that I do so, which I hereby do.

Mr. ROUYNEKOV (Employers' delegate, Bulgaria) — On behalf of the Bulgarian employers' organizations, I feel I must inform you that we are not in favour of adopting a Convention on home work next year. The reasons are as follows: this Convention will not solve the problems of employment and will go against the spirit of the Director-General's Report. The approach adopted is incorrect and will only damage society. The version, as it stands will achieve nothing. It is a road to nowhere. We have gone down this road and from there went into a period of transition. That led us in the wrong direction. The strategy applied is incorrect because the possibilities for both the workers and the employers are limited; it merely punishes them.

By taking the place of work out of enterprises we will not create new posts or expand job markets and incentives. The Convention in its present form provides only for bureaucracy and administration, not for ways to improve industrial relations. The workers are deprived of self-respect, creativity, responsibility and independence. There will be no job satisfaction, the worker will have no feeling of being involved, and the employer will be punished for creating jobs outside the enterprise. This will reduce productivity and undermine the quality of the working process and progress. Nor will it stimulate competitiveness.

When unemployment exists, the best way to solve the problem is to promote employers' initiatives. Our markets are already saturated, and cannot provide further employment, either within or outside the enterprise. The job opportunities are closely connected with market productivity, incentives and profit. If the strategy is flawed the correct decisions cannot be reached, a new type of proletariat may be created, and employment problems will remain unsolved.

The practical implementation of home work will only make the general picture worse. This Convention will have such a distinct and specific objective, that we could not support it. The strategy must be changed.

(Mr. Rosales Argüello takes the Chair.)

Mr. BOATENG (Workers' adviser, United Kingdom) — First, Mr. President, let me be among the last to congratulate you on your election. I should also like to take the opportunity to thank our spokesperson, Mrs. Van den Burg; Mrs. Samuel, for her able chairing of the Committee; the ILO staff for their support and in particular Mr. Dumont to whom I extend thanks and best wishes of the TUC General Council.

It is my pleasure and honour to speak today on behalf of the British Workers' delegation and the TUC General Council in support of the adoption of the report of the Committee on Home Work.

I wish to make a few brief points. First, despite expected differences between the Workers' group, some Governments and Employers we have worked amicably and constructively to create a draft text which we firmly believe will fulfil the criteria set by the Governing Body for new standards. The texts we have adopted are flexible, relevant and ratifiable. Home work is a truly international issue, there are homeworkers in every country of the world, most of course are women. They are biddy rollers, garment workers, toy makers, and sweatshop trades of different descriptions in every country across the world. They need and deserve the protection of an international labour standard. Without protection they are open to abuse and deception from unscrupulous employers and intermediaries who refuse to pay monies owed, and to working conditions which would be forbidden in the enterprise.

The British home work labour market includes many of those sweatshop trades, but in Britain and elsewhere there are new forms of homeworking too. Teleworking, a particular concern of my union, the Communication Workers' Union, and of other British trade unions representing workers in banking, insurance and other white-collar professional employment is growing rapidly. We estimate that in Britain there are at least 60,000 employed homeworkers and 60,000 mobile teleworkers. These numbers are predicted to rise to millions early in the next century. We believe that teleworkers whose employment relationships are not the same as those of their colleagues working in the enterprise itself are covered by the current text. But we feel that it would aid member States if that coverage were to be made explicit when we engage in our second discussion next year.

No one attending this Conference can be unaware of the discussion about the future of ILO standards. It has unfortunately been reflected in attempts by some to introduce amendments which were properly the province of the Governing Body. But the TUC is familiar with the option that standard setting, the protection of working people through international labour standards, remains the core mandate and means of action of the ILO. The TUC is proud to have been among those trade union organizations which campaigned over several years for the inclusion of items on part-time work, home work and contract labour on the agenda of the International Labour Conference. We believe that they have a great value in protecting vulnerable working people in each area. Together they will form a body of modern up-to-date standards on a typical employment relationship, which will show that the ILO is able to keep pace with the rapidly changing international labour market. Thus, the changing realities have made them. Thus you have to keep ILO where it belongs, at the top forefront of the protection of working people, making their links between economic and social developments, proving its relevance to working people throughout the world.

Mr. JOHNSON (Employers' adviser, Zimbabwe) — Please permit me to offer our congratulations to the President on his appointment. As you can see I have no papers with me, and so it will be a very brief speech. I want to draw two points to your attention.

In the first record vote that was called in our Committee, the governments which voted against a Convention included all the governments of the world which have, in their countries, a large number of informal workers and homeworkers. They voted against the Convention.

Secondly, in developing countries we have between 40 and 90 per cent of our workers who are in the informal sector, with the highest percentages in African developing countries. Work in the informal sector is a lifestyle for survival. If we adopt the Convention, or even the Recommendation, with the kind of controls and regulations that are being proposed, we will drive these jobs underground and they will never become part of the economy of those countries. But if we modify the Recommendation, and if we accept only a Recommendation next year, it could be the motivator to the massive expansion of employment which is what the Director-General of the ILO requests of us.

Mr. GARREN (Workers' adviser, United States) — I would like to make two points. First that the ILO should move forward towards adopting a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. Secondly, I believe that one particular part of the Recommendation should be deleted.

Homeworkers around the world are among the most vulnerable workers. They are overwhelmingly women, they are isolated and many are immigrants and are from ethnic minorities. Millions of homeworkers around the world have few or no skills. It is these workers, more than any, who need the protection of international labour standards, yet we find in country after country that homeworkers are deprived of the legal protections that other workers enjoy, including legal protection for collective bargaining, for minimum wages, for child labour, for health and safety, and for social security. In issue after issue, homeworkers are deprived of the same rights that other workers enjoy, and this is the essential reason for the Convention and the Recommendation that are being proposed. There is nothing so very complicated, nothing so very tricky, nothing so very horrible. The essence of these instruments is that workers who work at home should enjoy the same rights as workers who work in the workplace.

Now, there is one portion of the proposed Recommendation that I believe undercuts and undermines the rest of the Convention. That is clause 24(c), that states that one desirable manner to set wages for homeworkers is through individual agreements between homeworkers and employers. That clause, unfortunately accurately describes the way wages are set for millions of homeworkers every day. It is because wages for home work are set in that manner, using individual agreements between employers and homeworkers, that homeworkers receive lower wages universally than workers in workplaces.

The reality of a so-called individual agreement is that employers unilaterally set wages, and they set wages at the lowest possible level that the market will bear. There is no real bargaining between homeworkers and employers. I would draw your attention to Report V(1) which explains the situation in detail. It explains that homeworkers are afraid even to ask for higher wages for fear that their work will be taken away from them. It talks about the homeworkers who are punished and deprived of work because they complain, and of the employers and the intermediaries who have a policy of not giving work to any homeworkers who seek to improve their condition. It tells us about the homeworkers who do not even know the prices and the piece-rates for the work they are doing. That is the reality that homeworkers face. That is the reality of the so-called agreements between employers and homeworkers, which is nothing but unilateral dictating of terms by the employers.

So, in conclusion, I would like once again to say that I believe we need a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation to protect workers. But we need one that clearly disapproves of individual agreements, which is a code name for the unilateral setting of wages.

Mr. MOORHEAD (Employers' delegate, United States) — These remarks are the remarks of Kevin Becraft, a United States Employers' adviser who was assigned to the Committee on Home Work. He had planned to give these remarks tomorrow according to the normal schedule. The way we are going, he almost could have done so. In any event, these are the remarks he asked me to deliver on his behalf.

On behalf of the United States Employers' delegation, I am compelled to register our strong reservations regarding the proposed Convention on home work.

To begin, I would like to call attention to the fact that in the recorded vote of the Committee on the question of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation, versus a Recommendation only, the decision to proceed with a Convention was supported by only a slim majority of Governments, with the Employers' group strongly opposed to a Convention. Among the Governments, the majority of developing nations were opposed, as were the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada, among others. This is significant in that the former group represents those nations with the greatest majority of traditional homeworkers and the latter group the bulk of the world's growth in the new forms of home work, such as telework, mobile professionals and other forms of technologically enabled work.

The Governments opposed to a Convention and the Employers' group felt that it was premature, if not entirely unwise, to attempt to define and regulate an area where facts and data are in short supply and, where they do exist, of questionable validity. I might add at this point that an Employers' amendment to ensure data in this area was factual and meaningful was defeated in the Committee, by what logic, one can only guess. In the case of the new forms of technology-based work, almost daily dynamic and fast-moving changes make it problematic to envisage what if any regulatory mechanisms might be appropriate.

Let me now turn to the report before us. Many concerns exist that would make it unwise to consider a Convention and Recommendation based upon this report. I will try to address a few key elements here.

First, the definition of home work is so broad and so vague as to make it almost meaningless. For example, home work does not even have to be performed at home under this definition. The definition makes no attempt to distinguish between the vast difference that exists between various kinds of home work or even to distinguish between persons who are primarily homeworkers and those who as an adjunct to their jobs occasionally work at home. Under the existing definition, everyone in this room is a homeworker, as are almost all managerial, professional and sales people I have ever met, including teachers, government officials and I even suspect, many trade union officials. Another significantly important issue regarding the definition is the very real risk of turning what are essentially commercial disputes between independent parties into labour disputes. This risk is greatly enhanced by the introduction of the new and even more poorly defined party called an intermediary. I would strongly suggest that all parties and in particular Governments pay close attention to the chaos that the introduction of this concept could very well create. The definition of employer which we have come to understand with some clarity also suffers in this report and has been expanded in such a way that many persons and enterprises who have up to now considered themselves customers could find themselves redefined as employers of persons who are in reality employees of their vendors and suppliers.

I will close on what may be an even more fundamental point and that is the tone running through this debate and the attitude of some participants that home work is an evil that must be either controlled or eliminated, rather than an opportunity to spur economic growth, create jobs, eliminate poverty, increase productivity and provide real options to the traditional workplace. This is ironic considering the lip service paid by the ILO to employment at the World Summit for Social Development, and in view of the Director-General's statement in the opening pages of his Report to this Conference that "the ILO should seize this opportunity to provide political and technical leadership in mobilizing action at both the national and international levels to improve the global employment situation".

To end, let me say that this report deserves the closest and most critical review over the next year. I have had many comments made to me by Employers' and Government delegates from developing countries that if this text is incorporated into a Convention it would not be ratified in their countries for the simple reason that it would be impossible to implement and any serious effort to implement could have severe economic consequences.

If the work of this Committee is not to become another exercise in adopting unratifiable Conventions that have no positive effect and serve only to provide ammunition to those who believe that this Organization is not prepared to adapt itself to the reality of the modern world, major changes must be made.

Mr. TIAGI (Workers' adviser, India) — A strong need has been felt for the adoption of international labour standards on home work. The reason for this is that the number of such workers is increasing every day in developing and industrialized countries. Very often home work is carried out in conditions offending to human dignity. By adopting these standards, the ILO aims to combat the main causes of the vulnerability of homeworkers.

Their invisible nature, their precarious legal status, the fact that they are being ignored by labour legislation, their lack of organization, their dependence on intermediaries and the ineffectiveness of any existing machinery to supervise their conditions of work, all these factors highlight the situation and circumstances under which a decision was taken by the Governing Body of the ILO that some labour standards had to be developed for home work.

Home work is encountering difficulties in the sense that it is not distinguishable, so what this Committee has done is to create a distinct personality for the homeworker. He has had no specific definition. There has been no protection, there have been no safety measures. It has provided some protection measures, some conditions under which the remuneration and further remuneration can be paid, and in which the right to organize and to join organizations of their choice and the right to collective bargaining have been incorporated. In addition, social security measures should also be provided to the homeworker.

Some of my friends have objected, they are Employers but it is as if they were speaking on behalf of the State. I also come from South-East Asia, but in India the majority of workers happen to be in the informal sector and are basically homeworkers. If some legislation is to be brought out, if some international instrument is to be taken out, it is no crime; what is all the concern about? As long as we provide some safety measures to faceless workers, we will have achieved something, we will have given them some hope, and given them a little bit of a face.

In all humility, I am requesting and appealing to this august assembly of representatives that by adopting this document, you are not only adopting an instrument, but you are bringing a smile to the unfortunate faces of those who have never been given any hope or real face.

Ms. FOULKES (Workers' delegate, New Zealand) — The first discussion of this Convention and Recommendation is a major step in identifying and protecting an often invisible workforce. It is very significant this year. It is significant because it is the year of the Fourth World Conference on Women to be held in Beijing, and women are often homeworkers. It is significant because the ILO is continuing its work on child labour and migrant labour, and children and migrants are often homeworkers. It is significant because it is the role of the ILO to reinforce the dignity of work, and homeworkers are a group who have for too long been ignored, excluded and forgotten by national strategies, protections and enforcements.

But most important, there is a new phase of home work that is emerging in all countries as the provision of services and technological support moves from the workplace to the home, whether it is an industrialized economy or not.

Finalizing a Convention on home work for a wide range of countries will not be easy but, as a community, we cannot walk away from that difficulty because we want weekends off or easy discussions.

The report and the Proposed Conclusions are all significant — as are also some of the omissions that Workers will return to next year, as will no doubt Governments and Employers. But the report is important in that it puts the issues firmly in front of us. And puts the majority view that there should be a Convention and Recommendation firmly in front of us. I have a belief that there is one issue which is significantly more important than the others in both the conclusions and the honesty of the process for standard setting nationally and internationally. This is the paramount place given to collective bargaining in paragraphs 22 and 24 of the report — which I strongly support; and the relevance of individual agreements to homeworkers — which I would question. Like my brother from America I believe the use of individual agreements for homeworkers will in fact undermine the strength of the Recommendation.

As a New Zealander, I have experienced first hand the effects on isolated and vulnerable workers, often women, that result from the giving of state recognition to individual contracts. Moreover, support by the State for parity between individual and collective bargaining has been disastrous for women in isolated workstations in my country. Indeed, using the word “agreement” or “bargaining” for those workers is dishonest. The relationship is one that is often based on disempowerment and fear. Especially, it is increasingly the wages of those workers that are the difference between hunger and want for their families and a barely adequate living standard. But I would not claim that the pressures on workers in New Zealand in any way match the life and death decisions that homeworkers make in many of my sister countries in Asia or elsewhere in the world. To suggest individual bargaining is an equitable option for many of those people is an obscene misuse of the English language.

As Governments and Employers and Workers reflect on the work of our Committee over the coming months, strengthening and reinforcing those sections of our work that give real access to organization and collective bargaining to homeworkers everywhere must be a priority, or we risk adopting an instrument next year that is unenforceable. But adopt an instrument we must. It would be a breach of the faith put in this Organization by working people around the world if we walked away from establishing guidelines for a form of work that we all acknowledge is growing, which has been around for centuries, and which deals significantly with the most vulnerable. As the last person to speak and the last woman to speak for a long time, I would point out that women do not work at home for pleasure, do not work at home because it is their preferred option. They do it from economic necessity and, as an organization, we must protect them in their hour of economic need.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT — We shall now move on to the adoption of the body of the report, paragraphs 1 to 380.

If there are no objections, I shall take it that the report is adopted, paragraphs 1 to 380.

(The report is adopted, paragraphs 1 to 380.)

Conclusions proposed by the Committee on Home Work

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT — Let us now move on to the adoption of the Proposed Conclusions submitted by the Committee, point by point.

(The Proposed Conclusions are adopted seriatim.)

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Home work"

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT — We shall now proceed to the adoption of the resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Home work".

Mr. ANAND (Employers' adviser, India) — I would like the dissent of the Indian Employers to go on record.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT — Your statement will be included in the record.

If there are no further objections, I shall take it that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Before concluding this item of business, I would like to congratulate the Chairman, the Vice-Chairman, the Reporter and the other members of the Committee on Home Work on the excellent work that they have done.

Closing speeches

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT — The final item on our agenda is the closure of the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference. I invite Mr. Popescu, Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Romania, Vice-President of the Conference, to come to the rostrum.

Original French: Mr. POPESCU (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Romania; Vice-President of the Conference) — I would like to ask your permission to depart from the general practice of the Conference and to delay offering congratulations to the end of my speech. I would like to begin with some comments on the work that we have just finished. Aside from any approval or criticism addressed to the ILO in speeches presenting general or pragmatic approaches, in my view the Conference this year has been marked by an awareness of the fact that we are going to have to take action quickly, effectively and in concert so that social problems will not be a global beginning of the end; that is, what was called in Copenhagen a true social bomb.

This year, perhaps more than in past years, we have felt the desire of the three social partners to go beyond explicitly or implicitly expressed good intentions and to join together so that the rigorous application of standards will become reality. The instruments that have been adopted in an exemplary atmosphere of responsibility and constructive compromise clearly demonstrate the willingness to ensure adequate social protection for more and more extensive categories of workers and to ensure an appropriate working environment in more areas of activity.

The delegation of Romania has, with full conviction, cast its vote in favour of the proposed international instruments.

We are very pleased with the work that has been achieved. It is now up to all of us — governments, employers and workers — to see to it that these instruments' spirit and letter are respected.

The choice of employment as the central theme at this session of the Conference was quite timely and important. Employment and unemployment are issues of major concern and they are among the most urgent problems of our times. They have always been important, but never as serious as today. This topic is very important and timely as well because new technology has made the question of employment and unemployment all the more serious, and almost critical.

Our Conference presents the advantage of making a positive contribution to clarifying the way in which our societies can make use of technology to meet the challenge of international competitiveness. Our societies will surely have to redefine their basic concepts, including the economic structures which have served as foundations up to now. It is our hope that the ILO, as it has done so far, will be able to find innovative solutions in order to ensure economic and social progress.

All of these are good reasons to further congratulate the Director-General, who through his activities, has ensured that our Organization will be deeply involved in dealing with the most serious problems of international life in all countries.

Convinced of the truth behind the saying, "The most noble concern of man is man himself", we are convinced that at 75 years of age the mission of the ILO is all the more important. We are quite convinced that the values and principles of the ILO will be a central part of the multilateral system in the twenty-first century.

I would like to thank you for the honour that was accorded to my country in electing me to serve as a Vice-President, and I would like to warmly and sincerely congratulate the President and the other two Vice-Presidents on the very convincing way in which they have carried out their tasks and on the fruitful spirit of cooperation which they have demonstrated. And I would also extend my congratulations to the secretariat of the Conference for their effectiveness in providing us with immeasurable assistance.

Finally, I would like to thank all of the participants in the Conference for their work.

Mr. HALLIWELL (Employers' delegate, Canada; Vice-President of the Conference) — As the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference draws to a close, it is, I believe, appropriate to offer only a very brief comment.

Over the past three weeks there has been an excellent exchange of ideas and viewpoints. The opinions of large and small nations have been carefully weighed in each Committee. Of course it is this kind of dialogue that eventually paves the way to consensus and to the formulation of instruments that are achieved in a true spirit of tripartism.

The shortened version of this annual session of the Conference has, I believe, proven to be a marked improvement and I hope that it points the way to improved efficiency and helps to eliminate further unnecessary and time-consuming activities.

There is still room for improvement in this international event. I think the scheduling could be more precise, particularly in the final days when reports are presented. Delegates should not, if at all possible, be kept in suspense as to the eventual date and time of conclusion of the session of the Conference. Travel plans should be made with confidence that the work will be completed by a specified time. I also note with some concern that while tripartism is at the very heart of the ILO, there are governments that still do not pay the expenses of duly appointed non-governmental representatives. This situation must be addressed. Delegations from all member States are to exercise as their right of participation the independence that is absolutely critical at these Conferences.

I am satisfied that the 82nd Session was productive and that it resulted in final reports that in general were satisfactory to this international Conference. Of course, it is clear that the last report, the report of the Committee on Home Work, was not satisfactory to employers. I would also like to note the high quality of many speeches made in the plenary over the past several days and to thank each speaker that took part.

It has been an honour to serve as Employers' Vice-President, to work closely with the President and with the other Vice-Presidents these past few weeks. I would particularly like to thank the Clerk of the Conference and the capable staff at the Office for their patient assistance.

Finally, I wish all delegates a safe journey home.

Original German: Ms. ENGELEN-KEFER (Workers' delegate, Germany; Vice-President of the Conference) — As the Workers' Vice-President of the Conference, I would like to join with other speakers in stating as follows: this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference has worked well and produced some good results.

Against a background of the devastating mining accidents, most recently in South Africa, the adoption of the new international standards on occupational safety and health in mines is of special significance for the workers. It has been made quite clear that among the 25 million or so persons employed in mines worldwide, some 15,000 mineworkers lose their lives every year as the result of an accident. I therefore believe that the standards on safety and health in mines adopted by this Conference will form a solid foundation for effectively controlling accident and health hazards in this industry.

I would like to call on the member States to ratify this new Convention and ensure its implementation as rapidly as possible.

We also attach great importance to the adoption of the Extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), to activities in the non-commercial services sector. This will eliminate serious deficiencies and extend the safety and health functions of inspection to employees in the non-commercial services sector. It does not cover all areas. Nevertheless, we believe that this is a very useful further extension of Convention No. 81 and we hope that the Convention and its extension will be widely ratified and applied.

Against a background of the increasing use of home work in both industrialized and developing countries, we believe that the adoption of the report which we have just looked at, suggesting that there be two new standards to protect homeworkers is of considerable importance. This is all the more significant since, in this area, there is a considerable amount of discrimination against and exploitation of women who account for 90 per cent of homeworkers.

We believe it is important that home teleworking, which is growing rapidly, should be covered by the safety and health provisions of the proposed standards.

After the discussion which we have just had, I think it is all the more important to appeal to the participants of this Conference in particular the Employers and the Governments to review their positions over the year leading up to the second discussion, so that at the next session of the International Labour Conference we can arrive at the adoption of a satisfactory Convention and Recommendation on home work.

In addition, I should like to make some comments on the discussion of the outstanding Report of the Director-General on the subject of Promoting employment. In the plenary, I have heard no speaker who was prepared to disassociate himself from the need to combat mass unemployment, poverty and destitution, that has been expressed so clearly in this report. However, the conclusions that have come out of the debate are less unanimous.

Once again, on behalf of the Workers at the Conference, I should like to firmly emphasize that, as far as we are concerned, close and binding collaboration between the international economic and financial institutions and the ILO is an essential requirement.

Just as indispensable for us are the social clauses in international trade agreements. In response to the speakers in the plenary discussions of the Conference that reject this point of view, I would like, once again, to emphatically underscore — so as to dispel all misunderstanding: this is not a matter of new protectionism. This is not a question of inadmissible interference in another country's affairs, neither is it our intention to make impossible demands on the developing countries. Our one and only concern is to prevent the most blatant forms of exploitation which affect primarily women and children. The same also applies to discrimination against and persecution of trade union workers. Consequently, social clauses such as these should be limited to fundamental human and trade union rights: elimination of childhood labour, prohibition of forced labour, guarantees that trade union representation may be undertaken without reprisals in any of their diverse forms.

When I hear the Minister of Labour of Goa expressing the fear that this will bring about confrontation within the ILO, I would like to reassure him. We are in no way ignoring the social conditions under which childhood labour takes place. Neither do we harbour any illusions that childhood labour can be eliminated at a single stroke. We recognize every effort made by his Government to take up arms against childhood labour. And above all, we support all ILO activities aimed at improving the social framework in order to have a realistic chance of being able to abolish childhood labour. However, these are efforts which need to be considerably intensified. In this respect, these efforts are required primarily in the countries in which childhood labour is employed. However, the industrialized countries must make a considerably larger contribution both inside and outside the ILO. An urgent matter here is the joint efforts of the industrialized and developing countries in combating one of the most revolting forms of childhood and forced labour, and childhood prostitution.

Last but not least, it is necessary to heighten public awareness of the deleterious effects of childhood labour. We consider it essential that trade unions be given greater involvement in the IPEC programme. Similar comments also apply to the increased involvement of women and mothers so as to ensure increased long-term success for this programme.

We must try to reduce the high level of debt amongst the poorest developing countries, limit the population explosion and slam the door on international foreign exchange speculation. And my last words will be to say: we welcome the decision of the Conference to adopt the budget for the upcoming biennium as proposed by the Governing Body. With the current advice we have on possible savings — as provided for in the decisions taken on the ILO 1996-97 budget in the second part of the Conference — under no circumstances should there be any savings made in technical programmes for developing countries. On the contrary: in the build-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women to be held in Beijing in September of this year, it would be appropriate for the ILO to bolster its activities to enhance the working and living conditions of women, and consequently those of their children.

I should like to express my thanks to the President and the two other Vice-Presidents, Mr. Halliwell and Mr. Popescu. The collaboration they have provided was excellent. I should also like to express my thanks to all of you who contributed to the very successful outcome of our Committee work. I should also like to thank the interpreters and the Conference services who have helped us throughout. Finally, I should also like to thank all those who have been working behind the scenes to make sure that the Conference ran smoothly.

Original French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL — As in other years it is my honour to thank, on behalf of you all, the President and the Vice-Presidents of this Conference for the very effective way in which they have guided the work of this session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to give the President a souvenir from this Conference, by giving him the main working tool which he has used during these three weeks.

Original Spanish: The PRESIDENT — Thank you, Mr. Hansenne, for this gift. It has been an enormous honour and a pleasure for me to chair this 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference, above all at this critical juncture for humanity when the myths and paradigms of left and right are being questioned. As a Central American, and in particular as a Nicaraguan, I hope that we will not have to wait another 76 years of the ILO for a President from our region to be elected again. I wish to express my thanks to all the Officers and to all of you for your support in the conduct of our meetings.

I would also like to thank the interpreters and all those here who have worked to assist my staff — those who have worked in the Committees, those who are drafting, who often have to correct and re-correct our texts.

After three weeks' hard work we have reached the end of our journey. We have adopted a budget for our Organization. In this respect we have reason to congratulate ourselves because the Group of 7 industrialized nations have announced their decision to urge prompt payment of dues to the United Nations and its specialized agencies. Unfortunately we seem to have spent more time on this issue than on the very serious issues arising from the world of work. We should be pleased that we have adopted a Protocol broadening the scope of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) to activities in the non-commercial services sector, and a Convention and a Recommendation concerning safety and health in mines, as well as starting work on an examination of standards on home work.

On this point, and with no desire to pontificate or indulge in obiter dicta, I would like to recall certain basic principles of labour law. When one speaks of the individual work relation in terms of its juridical nature, one invokes three basic criteria which have been on the table throughout this debate. These three criteria, taken up by the makers of labour law ever since Paul Durant, are those of juridical subordination, economic subordination and technical subordination. Where the three are clearly present, we have a work relation. That is why some have stated ironically "we are all employers here". Evidently the employers had to react in the way they did and their reaction was quite logical because often behind a mercantile relation a work relation is hidden. In 1991 the Director-General devoted his Report to The Dilemma of the Informal Sector, and those of us here who were there on that occasion will recall that we discussed precisely how to provide protection to workers in that sector who have no vocational training, no access to social protection or social security.

Therefore I believe that we should not only welcome the resolution we have passed placing this subject on the agenda of the next session as a central theme, but finally face up to it with all the seriousness which it deserves and, when the time has come, give to any action carried out by the ILO in order to regulate home work, the support which it deserves, for it is one of the forms of exploitation which liberalism is imposing in all sorts of countries at this time.

I do not know how many times we have heard the phrase "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere". I ask myself whether its incessant repetition turns it into a truism. Poverty is reduced through capital investments which generate durable employment freely chosen; poverty is fought with solidarity and a distribution of benefits throughout society. For example, class solidarity, as the Germans have shown, by cutting the working week to 32 hours, earning less by working less if necessary, but avoiding condemning others to unemployment. Solidarity must not become an empty, hollow word. That has been the central theme of our discussions. I call on us all not to forget that quality employment is the best tool for the eradication of poverty and social injustice.

The currently dominant economic model based on free trade, and the freedom to enter into industrial and commercial contracts, gives pride of place to the market as the basic policy instrument to solve society's problems. It reminds me of the joke which asks: "How many economists do you need to change a light bulb?" The answer is "None: the market will see to it". Poverty and unemployment have become like the light bulb of the joke. Are we going to allow the market to solve the problems of poverty and unemployment? Can we rely on the "hidden hand" to establish social justice? Much as markets may fulfil indispensable functions, they are no panacea. Likewise, economic growth does not necessarily lead to social development. The one does not in the least necessarily follow from the other. The State, workers and employers all play a role in the forefront of the search for lasting social justice in which employment necessarily has to play a central part. Responsible social dialogue is an indispensable condition for an efficiently functioning economy.

I therefore would like to share with you my impression that there is some improvement in processes of consultation. Workers are ever more aware of the need to increase an economy's competitiveness. For their part, employers are expressing increasingly frank and active support for social justice and the struggle against unemployment and poverty. But this support in no way constitutes a reason for attenuating the fundamental rights of workers. As the two sides come to share common objectives, so dialogue and collective negotiation between them will become more fruitful. The ILO has a dual role to play: it must offer the social partners the necessary opportunities to learn how to analyse the outcomes of different policies and, secondly, it must help to change labour ministries into institutions which have a constructive influence over economic decisions. They should set aside their role of regulators and standard-setters, and join in the development and application of job-creating projects. In other words, they should move from diagnosis of the problem to its cure.

Participation should be practised at home as well as preached to others. I must here mention that in this Organization it is not practised sufficiently. The ILO staff union has sent us a statement on this. We therefore call on the Office to improve its own mechanisms of participation.

The contributions we have heard in the past three weeks have had certain points in common. First, the interdependence of the economic and the social, which go hand in hand; a new realism is perceptible in the political process, in the sense that we realize that we must not make vain and illusory promises. The private sector, private firms, play a fundamental role. But we must not concentrate all our efforts on the economic sphere, sacrificing the rights of workers and the unemployed. Second, the increasing depth and speed of change is affecting all our economies. Globalization is reducing the State's margin of manoeuvre and produces pressure to achieve ever-increasing levels of productivity. At the same time, the exponential progress of technology forces us to pay serious attention to the development of human resources. In developing countries the emphasis in education must be on the primary and secondary levels, as well as on occupational training for workers and permanent and continuous vocational training of basic and middle level technicians.

We must redouble our efforts to counteract the negative effects of these changes, while at the same time taking pains to make these changes operate for the benefit of the poorest people in our society. The challenge before us is straightforward enough: the design of new economic and social policies for full employment. It is not enough to bring structural adjustment programmes to a successful conclusion in a more or less distant future. The sustainability of the transformation process will depend on the participation of all the forces of society, and this is only possible if the fruits of progress are equitably distributed.

Inequality is not only a matter of concern within countries. Some countries are in a very strong position because they have higher incomes and more appropriate resources to adopt new technologies. I call upon the leaders of those States both to open their markets to the products of poorer countries and also to encourage non-speculative investment in those countries. I ask neither for charity nor for altruism. Rising incomes in poor countries generate rising demand for goods and services, which in their turn bring about economic expansion and thus additional jobs and incomes. Social justice is an overall necessity for humanity as a whole, not merely a matter of charitable deeds.

The Social Summit has given labour ministries, workers' and employers' organizations and the ILO the chance and the responsibility to deal with our social problems. We must demonstrate with practical actions that we have the ability to create sustainable employment. Neither governments, nor workers nor employers can elude this responsibility. To carry forward and bring to fruition the tasks which the Copenhagen Summit and this Conference have placed on the shoulders of the ILO, the Organization will need the support of each and every one of us. If we cannot develop dynamic and effective cooperation we run the risk that others will adopt policies without any recourse to consultation, relegating social justice to secondary status.

With these words I offer you all my very best wishes and declare the 82nd Session of the International Labour Conference closed.
