We also consider that the Philippines has demonstrated sincere dedication to the preservation and protection of freedom of association. The Government's recent actions are a clear indication of its commitment to establishing an environment that facilitates the free association and collective bargaining of workers.

We consider that the Government is not the sole entity responsible for implementing these changes. In order to guarantee the success of these initiatives, it is imperative that workers and other stakeholders also take concrete actions. The Philippine tripartite stakeholders should collaborate to establish a shared objective that is governed by mutual trust, respect and good faith. Genuine social dialogue should be prioritized, with transparency and consensus-building as the guiding principles. Stakeholders can guarantee that their concerns are exhaustively investigated and that the appropriate measures are implemented by participating in a dialogue-based approach.

In summary, we urge the Philippines to continue its efforts to safeguard and advance freedom of association. The Government and social partners should be given the required space and support to collaboratively resolve the recommendations of the high-level tripartite mission and we should recognize the progress that has been made so far. Building upon the principles of justice, fairness and freedom, we can collectively secure a more promising future for the Filipino workforce.

Worker member, Republic of Korea – Korean workers express strong solidarity with Filipino workers and join their call for the Philippine Government to take concrete actions to fully implement the Convention immediately.

Until today, cases of violation of freedom of association and even violence continue to pile up. As our colleagues from the Philippine labour movement have complained, DOLE has wasted time cherry-picking and diluting every recommendation of the high-level tripartite mission to the point that it has been weakened.

Regarding the tripartite road map to implement the 2019 Committee conclusions and achieve full compliance with the Convention, the Government reported to the Committee of Experts that it submitted a draft road map on freedom of association to the NTIPC in September 2023. However, the draft road map has yet to be agreed upon. Reportedly, without the support of the majority of workers' representatives in the tripartite committee, the road map remains incomplete.

The Government also reported that it created an inter-agency committee on freedom of association. The high-level tripartite mission recommended working with the social partners: I wish to emphasize this. However, the Executive Order was issued without prior tripartite consultation, without tripartite representation and without the special investigation and prosecution powers that a presidential body should have to end, once and for all, the long dark history of impunity in the country.

Regarding legislation, the Committee of Experts has repeatedly recommended since 2009, and the 2023 high-level tripartite mission also urged, that the Philippine Labor Code be amended to bring it into conformity with the Convention. And yet, the struggle to advance labour legislation for long-overdue amendments, especially to make it easier to form unions, limit the unbounded power of the Labor Secretary in assuming jurisdiction over labour disputes, and decriminalize strikes and lockouts considered illegal, is continuing in Congress.

In conclusion, we join our colleagues in the Workers' group in urging the Government to finalize the road map on freedom of association, to abolish the NTF-ELCAC, to elevate the Omnibus Guidelines into an executive order and to prioritize aligning the laws and practices with the Convention. Otherwise, impunity will continue unabated, unionism and collective bargaining will continue to decline, and tens of millions of Filipino workers will continue to endure inhumane conditions with no security of tenure, no living wages, and no labour rights, in a situation of life and death.

Worker member, Guatemala – The various forms of violence committed in the Philippines against trade union activists such as murders, disappearances, surveillance, threats and intimidation for simply exercising their legitimate rights recognized in the Convention, as well as the violent dispersion of strikes and raids of trade union offices by the military and police, remain unpunished, despite the repeated efforts of the ILO supervisory bodies, which have expressed regret over these events and called for this impunity to stop. They have collaborated through initiatives such as tripartite missions and various other forms of assistance in gaining an overview of labour relations in this country.

The situation calls to mind the worst moments of violence in the 1970s in the Southern Cone of Latin America with regard to trade union activists. It also seems similar to the current reality of certain countries on the continent which have not been able to channel labour relations towards forums of tolerance, genuine social dialogue and, fundamentally, full respect for the most basic human rights.

Of particular concern is the absence of significant progress regarding the tripartite road map. Investigations have not been included, violence against trade unions has not been taken into account and the Government has not provided sufficient information on the status of the investigations under way (as if that were not enough to warrant strict monitoring of serious and repeated non-compliance).

The 2023 report of the Committee of Experts refers to new cases of violence, such as the murder of Alex Dolorosa, an official of the network for outsourced workers in enterprise processes, as well as the disappearance of four persons between May and July 2022, and the abduction and interrogation of other leaders, and the unfounded accusations of theft against two trade union leaders during a demonstration in June 2020.

Overall, the Philippine people are facing an extremely serious period with regard to enforcement of the principles and rights of freedom of association, coupled with the Government's passive and unwilling stance to recognize the role of tripartism and social dialogue, which are essential components for any truly democratic and peaceful resolution, and any enclave of justice against any attacks on the rights of workers.

Government member, Indonesia – Indonesia would like to support the Philippines. We are of the view that the explanations given by the Government of the Philippines provide a comprehensive and encouraging overview of their proactive measures and unwavering commitment to upholding the principles of the Convention. This dedication is evident through a series of well-documented and strategically implemented actions that reflect both the spirit and the letter of international labour standards. The Government's acceptance of the high-level tripartite mission on 26 August 2022 underscores its openness to international scrutiny and collaboration. This willingness to engage with ILO mechanisms demonstrates transparency and accountability. The prompt submission of comments on Case No. 3185 to the Committee of Experts on 21 August 2022 highlights the Government's responsiveness and its commitment to addressing specific issues in a timely manner. The submission of nine regular and supplementary reports, including the latest detailed report on 20 May 2024, is particularly noteworthy. This ongoing communication with the ILO not only provides a clear picture of the country's progress but also signifies the Government's dedication to continuous improvement and adherence to international standards.

One of the standout elements of the Government's strategy is the establishment of the EO23 IAC. This initiative is a proactive step towards ensuring better coordination among various government agencies, thereby streamlining the processes of investigation, prosecution and resolution of relevant cases.

The strengthening of partnerships with the CHR further exemplifies the Government's commitment to human rights. This partnership is crucial in providing assistance to victims and their families, thereby fostering a more just and humane society. The explanation also highlights the Government's efforts to foster tripartism and social dialogue, particularly through the establishment of tripartite bodies in ecozones and the conduct of multisectoral dialogues. These initiatives are vital in promoting a common understanding of freedom of association among all stakeholders, which is a cornerstone of democratic labour relations.

The operationalization and strengthening of tripartite monitoring bodies, along with the continuous engagement with sectoral partners, reflect a sustained commitment to improving labour conditions.

The development of a road map on freedom of association and the amendment of guidelines related to trade union rights are significant steps towards creating a more enabling environment for workers. Moreover, the Government's seriousness in addressing allegations of harassment and violence against trade unions is commendable. Lastly, the establishment of a Special Committee on Human Rights Coordination underscores the Government's holistic approach to human rights.

Overall, the Government of the Philippines today has provided us with a positive and detailed account of its commitment to upholding the Convention. The strategic initiatives, collaborative efforts, and transparent reporting mechanisms are commendable and indicative of a genuine dedication to improving labour conditions and protecting workers' rights.

Worker member, Canada – I speak on behalf of the Canadian Labour Congress, and the Australian Council of Trade Unions also aligns with this statement.

Seven years ago, the Philippines celebrated the ratification of Convention No. 151. The Philippines was the first Asian country to do so, marking the end of a nine-year campaign by the labour movement. However, freedom of association for public sector workers in the Philippines remains elusive.

The Committee of Experts has repeatedly highlighted the lack of full trade union rights for public sector workers.

Large sections of public sector workers are excluded from union membership. Workers hired through job orders or contracts of service, as well as firefighters, prison guards and others, cannot join or form unions.

Workers who are allowed to unionize still lack the rights to bargain collectively.

Elected labour representatives in the Public Sector Labor Management Council are relegated to observer status and are barred from attending council meetings, despite the Council's mandate to regulate the exercise of government employees' right to self-organization.

Despite ratifying Convention No. 151 seven years ago, there is still no enabling legislation in place. The Public Sector Labor Relations Bill remains stalled in Congress. This Bill seeks to reform labour laws to address the Committee of Experts' long-standing observations and align national laws with Convention No. 151. Key reforms include: ensuring the right to organize and bargain collectively, for all government workers, including non-regular employees; overhauling the labour adjudication system for public sector workers; and guaranteeing public sector union representation in policymaking.

The Government, despite being the largest employer, is the biggest violator of workers' constitutional right to security of tenure. According to the Presidential Communications Office, 29 per cent of the total government workforce, or more than 800,000 workers, are either contract-of-service or job order employees. The amended Executive Order No. 180 explicitly prohibits these employees from joining unions.

Approximately 300,000 Barangay health workers, who provide crucial community care, are not clearly classified as public or private sector workers. They lack sufficient support, remuneration, and training, making them one of the most vulnerable groups in the government workforce. Further, public sector trade unions still face red-tagging, threats and harassment initiated during the Duterte administration.

The Philippine Government cannot claim to respect workers' rights unless it demonstrates commitment to upholding the trade union rights of its own workers. Therefore, we strongly urge the Government to treat the Public Sector Labor Relations Bill as an urgent measure.

Government member, Tunisia – We welcome the delegation of the Government of the Philippines and express our appreciation for the information provided on the efforts of the Philippines to implement the requirements of the Convention and the recommendations of the Committee of Experts.

Tunisia appreciates the Philippines' full cooperation with the supervisory bodies of the ILO and its commitment to the resolution of the issues related to implementation of the Convention.

We particularly take note of the Government's continuous communication with ILO bodies and its effort to implement the recommendation of the high-level tripartite mission.

We take good note of the measures undertaken by the Philippines, in particular the establishment of an inter-agency committee to ensure better coordination across government agencies and the holding of multisectoral dialogue to promote a common understanding of freedom of association.

We also appreciate the Government's engagement to develop, in consultation with the social partners, a road map on freedom of association, and we recommend that it pursues this endeavour in a timely manner.

In view of the commitments made, my delegation congratulates the Philippines on the progress made and encourages it to continue its efforts to implement its national policy of enhancing freedom of association, taking into consideration the observations and conclusions of this Committee and the Committee of Experts.

Government member, United States – I speak today for the workers of the United States and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

Once again, this body is discussing the case of the Government of the Philippines' long-standing non-compliance with the Convention. We stand in complete solidarity with Filipino workers in their continuing struggle to exercise their right to organize trade unions free from violence and other forms of intimidation.

Last July, leaders from the Filipino trade union movement travelled to Washington DC to receive the AFL-CIO's 2023 George Meany-Lane Kirkland Human Rights Award for their bravery and courage to continue organizing in the face of red-tagging and other forms of violence. During that visit, they met with high level officials in the Biden Administration to highlight these egregious violations of workers' rights.

In 2021, US and Filipino trade unions co-filed a petition calling on the US Government to withdraw special trade preferences granted to the Philippines due to the Duterte Government's pervasive violations of workers' rights. This petition remains under review and we are sad to say that, thus far, the Marcos regime has not taken sufficient action to end red-tagging and the broader culture of impunity.

Indeed, at least two trade union leaders were killed in 2023 right after the high-level tripartite mission. We demand full investigations into the murder of Alex Dolorosa and Jude Thaddeus Fernandez and do not accept the Government's contention that these heinous crimes were unrelated to their trade union activity.

Moving forward, we echo the demands of the workers' spokesperson and call on the Marcos administration to collaborate with social partners to finalize the road map on freedom of association, abolish the NTF-ELCAC, and elevate the Guidelines on Freedom of Association into an executive order to ensure full compliance by security forces.

In addition, we will continue to oppose further trade and commercial benefits for the Government of the Philippines until it addresses these serious violations of workers' rights.

Government member, Türkiye – First of all, we welcome the fact that the Government of the Philippines has submitted a total of nine regular and supplementary reports or replies since the date of its acceptance of the high-level tripartite mission. It demonstrates that the Government is taking concrete steps to address the problems arising from the implementation of the Convention. We appreciate the Philippine Government's intention to continue to provide updated and verifiable information in a timely manner.

The Philippine Government has demonstrated a sincere commitment to the promotion and protection of freedom of association by accelerating coordination and legal processes in the public sector through the establishment of the EO23 IAC; strengthening partnership with the CHR; establishing multidimensional social dialogue; infrastructural strengthening of tripartite monitoring bodies; and ensuring continued improvement of the Guidelines.

We appreciate the decisions taken by the Philippine legal bodies against red-tagging and other violations to protect trade union freedoms.

The establishment of the Special Committee on Human Rights Coordination by Presidential Order, with the aim of strengthening existing mechanisms for the promotion and the protection of human rights, in particular investigation and accountability, and continuing data collection initiatives on alleged crimes, should be acknowledged by the Committee of Experts as an important development.

Türkiye supports the Philippine Government's proactive and collaborative approach through the strengthening of tripartite bodies and the consultation process.

Worker member, Belgium – I am speaking on behalf of the workers in France, the Netherlands and Belgium.

Since 2014, the Philippines has benefited from the Generalised Scheme of Preferences Plus (GSP+) of the European Union. This scheme enables its participants to benefit from full removal of customs duties for goods of around 66 per cent of tariff lines of the European Union. It should be highlighted that the European Union is the Philippines' fourth largest trade partner. Total trade between the European Union and the Philippines amounts to €18.4 billion.

The GSP+ aims in particular to reduce poverty and create jobs based on international values and principles. Participation is subject to the ratification and respect of 27 international conventions on human rights, labour rights, the environment and good governance, which should be commended. These texts comprise the ILO fundamental Conventions, including the Convention being discussed.

The European Commission ensures the follow-up of the effective implementation of the conventions in question. Preferential treatment may be temporarily withdrawn in the event of serious and systematic violation of the conventions.

In 2022 and 2023, the European Parliament, the European Union special representative for human rights and the European Parliament Subcommittee on Human Rights emphasized very slow progress and a still worrying human rights situation. They referred to extrajudicial executions, harassment, and arrests of and violence against journalists, human rights defenders and trade unionists. They considered that much remains to be done to ensure the effective implementation of all the conventions, which is a requirement for participation in the GSP+.

This year's report of the Committee of Experts also highlights the persistent serious human rights violations against trade unionists.

We support our Philippine colleagues and regret that, despite the ongoing violence and impunity, and the absence of a road map agreed with the social partners to put an end to such events, the Philippines continues to benefit from the GSP+.

In March 2024, the European Union and the Philippines officially announced the resumption of negotiations with a view to concluding a free-trade agreement.

It is fundamental that this agreement does not allow for any laxity in respect of the GSP+. We request the inclusion in this agreement, and more generally in all trade agreements, of the requirement of ratification and effective implementation of the ILO fundamental Conventions.

It is crucial to ensure that adequate guarantees are given by the Philippine Government to show real, specific and measurable progress with regard to human rights, social justice and democracy.

Government member, Islamic Republic of Iran – The Islamic Republic of Iran welcomes the steps taken by the Government of the Philippines to address the issues related to the application of the Convention. We acknowledge the Philippines' engagement with the ILO supervisory bodies, including accepting the high-level tripartite mission and providing regular reports to the Committee of Experts. The Islamic Republic of Iran recognizes the Philippines' demonstration of commitment through concrete actions aimed at implementing the ILO's recommendations. The establishment of an inter-agency committee, the strengthening of partnerships with independent human rights bodies, the setting-up of tripartite bodies in economic zones, the conduct of multisectoral dialogues and the operationalization of tripartite monitoring bodies are commendable efforts.

While recognizing the progress made, we encourage the Philippine Government to sustain its efforts in promoting social dialogue and strengthening tripartite mechanisms and creating an enabling environment for workers to freely associate and collectively bargain. Continued collaboration with all the stakeholders, including trade unions and civil society organizations, is crucial for achieving lasting progress.

Government member, Bangladesh – Bangladesh commends the Philippine Government on its cooperation with the ILO's supervisory bodies, within the framework of the special examination procedures, in addressing the issues arising from the application of the Convention. We acknowledge that the Government has accepted the in-country high-level tripartite mission. We would like to underscore that the Government has submitted a total of nine regular and supplementary reports or replies on the development of accomplishments in the country's application of the Convention pursuant to the recommendations of the ILO. Bangladesh believes that these actions demonstrate good faith and commitment to implementing the recommendations of the high-level tripartite mission.

Bangladesh would also like to highlight that, through the establishment of the EO23 IAC, the strengthened partnership with the CHR, the setting-up of tripartite bodies to foster tripartism and social dialogue in ecozones, and the conduct of multisectoral dialogue to promote a common understanding of freedom of association among stakeholders, the Philippine Government has shown a genuine and strong commitment to upholding and safeguarding freedom of association.

We have come to know that, recently, the Government has approved the Omnibus Guidelines on the Exercise of Freedom of Association and Civil Liberties and Guidelines on the conduct of stakeholders relating to the workers' exercise of trade union rights. The Government has further strengthened tripartite monitoring bodies to promote a common understanding of freedom of association. The Philippines is committed to investigating incidents of harassment and violence to ensure that perpetrators are brought to justice. Recent reports were investigated immediately, and some court proceedings are ongoing under national criminal procedures.

As it has been reported, President Marcos issued Administrative Order No. 22, establishing a Special Committee on Human Rights Coordination to enhance existing mechanisms for the promotion and protection of human rights, particularly to sustain initiatives on investigation and accountability, data-gathering on alleged human rights violations by law enforcement agencies, and expanded civil space and engagement. This also provides us with further assurances that the Government is on the right track and committed to ensure full implementation of the Convention. We encourage the Government to continue such pragmatic steps to close the case immediately.

Bangladesh urges this august forum to recognize the commitment of the Government and support its action to ensure more progress and the closure of the case.

Government member, Namibia –My delegation has taken note of the Committee's report and welcomes the continuing efforts and concrete measures made by the Government of the Philippines to implement the recommendations of the high-level tripartite mission. As a result of its commitment to the implementation of the recommendations of the high-level tripartite mission, the following actions were taken by the Government:

- approval of the Omnibus Guidelines on the Exercise of Freedom of Association and Civil Liberties;
- strengthening of tripartite monitoring bodies;
- promotion of a common understanding of freedom of association;
- issuance of resolutions by the Supreme Court reinforcing protections against red-tagging and other violations;
- statement by the ATC reiterating its sole and exclusive authority to designate individuals or groups as terrorists under the Anti-Terrorism Act of 2020;
- issuance of Administrative Order No. 22 establishing a Special Committee on Human Rights Coordination.

We commend the Government for its commitment to upholding the principles of freedom of association and its willingness to work towards creating an environment that enables workers to freely associate and collectively bargain. At the same time, the Government is encouraged to continue safeguarding the right to freedom of association. We acknowledge the Government's pledge to investigate the allegations of killings and harassment of trade union members and to ensure that the perpetrators are brought to justice.

In conclusion, we encourage the Government to continue addressing the outstanding issues, and consider that all the efforts taken by the Government should be valued by the Committee in its conclusions.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Egypt – We have taken note of the measures and procedures taken by the Government of the Philippines concerning the Convention. All these measures are concrete and tangible. Tripartite bodies were set up to enhance tripartite negotiations and the EO23 IAC has also been set up to ensure that there is coordination and to deal with pending issues.

The Government of the Philippines also set up the CHR in accordance with the Philippine Constitution. This Committee is tasked with investigating violations and providing assistance to victims and their families.

The Government has also helped tripartite bodies through the provision of resources, and this has led to the road map on freedom of association and the guidelines that were issued in 2011 and 2012, which have paved the way for the exercise by workers of freedom of association. We would like to commend the Government for its efforts to ensure that there is a multilateral approach to dealing with this issue.

We note that the President of the Philippines has issued Administrative Order No. 22, with the aim of enhancing human rights' mechanisms, including freedom of association, examining investigation processes regarding extrajudicial killings, and ensuring that there is the widest participation possible.

We would like to welcome the measures taken by the Government of Philippines which aim to apply the recommendations of the high-level tripartite mission.

In conclusion, we would like to commend the Government for continuing to make these efforts. We encourage it to continue with this approach and we hope that this Committee will take all these measures into account when preparing its report.

Government member, Pakistan – We appreciate the measures taken by the Government of the Philippines to enhance its overall engagement with the ILO and express confidence that the constructive engagement between the parties will help to address all issues under consideration amicably.

Pakistan has taken positive note of the Philippine Government's commitment to upholding and safeguarding freedom of association. We support the Government's ongoing efforts to foster collaboration and address concerns. This commitment is evident in the strengthened tripartite bodies, which play a vital role in investigating and resolving cases. We acknowledge the steps taken by the Government of the Philippines towards the implementation of the Convention within the ILO's tripartite framework.

Observer, Building and Woodworkers International (BWI) – On behalf of the BWI, the International Transport Workers' Federation (ITF), IndustriALL and the International Union of Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers' Associations (IUF) but, most of all, as a Filipino concerned about the risks my trade unionist brothers and sisters back home face, I wish to make a statement regarding the application of the Convention by the Government of the Philippines.

Since the high-level tripartite mission, reports show that 24 trade union leaders are still in jail on trumped-up charges. Two of the leaders were arrested after the mission, there are three new cases of abduction, and a large number of representatives of SENTRO and other sectoral unions continue to be subjected to red-tagging, surveillance and profiling. In April 2023, Alex Dolorosa was reported missing and his body was found days later with multiple stab wounds. Jude Thaddeus Fernandez was gunned down in September 2023. This amounts to a total of at least 72 murders of my fellow trade unionists since the Duterte regime took office.

Under the new Government, there has been a decline with regard to trade union killings and extrajudicial killings. The apparatus put in place by the Duterte regime is still intact and operating within a culture of impunity.

Finally, I want to highlight the most significant barrier to workers exercising their trade union rights: the widespread use of contractualization. The Secretary of Labor continues to refuse to use their power, mandated by the Labor Code, to regulate all forms of precarious work arrangements, which is essential for allowing workers to fully exercise their constitutional rights to organize, collectively bargain and strike. There are 23.5 million contractual workers across the sectors, that is 47 per cent of the total workforce.

Considering these ongoing realities, it is imperative that the Government immediately address and investigate labour rights violations, as well as implement effective reforms to protect trade unionists in the country and workers' right to organize.

Observer, Education International (EI) – I speak on behalf of the 32 million education workers represented by EI. Workers from France, Italy and Switzerland support this statement.

Teachers, like all public servants, need a commitment from public authorities to respect, promote and realize their rights at work, including their right to unionize without persecution and fear for personal safety.

However, in the last year, the following teacher union leaders from the ACT have suffered surveillance and abductions: Rora Santiago, union coordinator in central Luzon, Eco Dangla, union coordinator in Pangasinan, Dyan Gumanao, union coordinator in Central Visayan, Erlinda Alfonso, union president in Cason City, and Raymond Basilio, the General Secretary of the ACT, who escaped abduction from a union meeting he was addressing in September 2023 in Padagyan.

All of them are alive, but they live under constant threat of surveillance, tailing and abduction. Police and military personnel also continue to visit schools to request lists of names of union members and search for evidence when teachers are known to be unionized. Such military intervention into public schools aims at spreading unfounded accusations – the famous red-tagging – and communicating hostility and fear among school communities. This has resulted in teachers refraining from speaking out or joining unions. On 14 June 2023, when our ILO Committee was in session, the National Department of Education released a memo requiring all educational regional offices to provide lists of all education union members.

This was the third time the ACT was illegally profiled. The Committee of Experts notes that of the cases of extrajudicial killings of eight education unionists, the Government reported that four cases were still pending before the court, the prosecutor had dismissed one case and three are still under investigation. We deeply regret that accountability is so slow for the killings of education union leaders dating from before 2020. Impunity must be eradicated and activists like trade union leaders must be protected, not harassed, abducted or killed.

Chairperson – There are no more requests for the floor. I now invite the Government representative of the Philippines to take the floor for his final remarks.

Government representative – First of all, I would like to thank all the speakers, both the speakers who made encouraging remarks, as well as the speakers who made critical remarks. All of this will be taken into account seriously by the Philippine Government. The Philippine Government, particularly the DOLE, regrets that it has been accused of misrepresentation. Therefore, my closing remarks will focus on setting specific facts straight.

First, on the status of the tripartite road map: there is an approved road map. I repeat that there is an approved road map that has been finalized after thorough tripartite consultations with no less than the ILO providing technical assistance in the process. This road map consists of numerous action points, many of which are now being implemented and some of which imply the participation of both employers and workers. The point about the withdrawal of signatories to the road map is a matter that should be addressed to those who withdrew their signatures or who claim to have withdrawn their signatures because, as far as the DOLE secretariat is concerned, there is no formal withdrawal of the signatories. Therefore, as a matter of course, we consider that the road map is a legitimate instrument which has been guiding us since its adoption.

Second, on the issue of the MOA between DOLE and the Department of Trade and Industry, the workers in particular pointed out that it was formulated without consultation with the sectoral partners. That is true, but if you read the MOA, it is an agreement between two government agencies, setting the conditions or the preconditions for the implementation of a particular provision in the law creating the Philippine Economic Zone Authority, which was enacted almost 30 years ago but which has never been implemented. This provision relates to a requirement that tripartite committees for industrial relations shall be set up in the economic zones. So, what the MOA does is to lay down the procedure for setting up the economic zones at an administrative level while recognizing that the final decision to set up such a tripartite committee shall reside with the sectors themselves. It has been stated that in a particular economic zone, the Mactan economic zone, an ecozone tripartite committee was established without worker or employer representation. It was a worker spokesperson who pointed this out. I would just like to express before this body that that ecozone has two worker representatives. I will name them for the sake of clarity. The first one is Carlito Vilia Gonzalo, who is a member of the TUCP, the second is Maria Christina Vistal, also a member of the TUCP. I think that that organization, an Associated Labor Union, has representatives in this body right now. So it is not true that there is no worker representation in the economic zone tripartite councils.

In the case of Manny Asuncion, it was mentioned that there was a claim that the case should be reopened. Actually, the case remains open. The case was transferred to the investigators so that they can build up the case more properly in the ongoing investigation by the National Bureau of Investigations.

In the case of Jude Thaddeus Fernandez, this case was referred to the CHR and the initial evaluation of the CHR is that the identity of this person cannot be established with certainty because he appears not to have been registered in our official registry of birth when he was killed. He carried at least six identity cards, so the identity of this person is not yet established, much less, the union affiliation or whether he is affiliated with any organization.

On the matter of legislation, the Government later laid out its position, stating that it stands ready to cooperate or to engage within the framework of the NTIPC to look more closely and revisit the legislation or the Bills that have been previously filed in Congress.

The Committee has repeatedly noted, and we acknowledge this fact, that some of the Bills, particularly those seeking to strengthen freedom of association and the right to organize, have been filed and refiled in various congresses.

We would like to revisit how those Bills are designed or formulated. Perhaps there is a better way of formulating them so that they have a better chance of passing through the legislature and in that regard, we welcome the expertise of the ILO in providing guidance in that effort. With those remarks, the Philippine Government, as we say, rests its case.

Employer members – The case we have been listening to has a long history and it has developed over various stages and most importantly via the results of the tripartite mission and the subsequent Committee session last year, which created a very comprehensive framework of recommendations or measures, of which the creation of the tripartite road map on freedom of association was of particular importance.

It seems to me, speaking for the Employer members, that the road map is at the heart of all this because it is the basic mechanism, the basic framework, within which pretty much everything else takes place.

There are a large number of issues to be resolved, there are a large number of cases yet to be investigated and it is concerning that some of these things take far longer than many countries might deem reasonable. Be that as it may, the important thing that we are hearing is that these things are not lost. They are not necessarily finished, but they are not lost.

What we would like to see of course is that these things are brought to a conclusion. It is heartening to see that there is a lot of work being done, but it is the finishing of that work, the results that are created by that work, that we would like to see more of. And, in that regard, we would simply call upon the Government not only to expedite the work that is set out in the framework resulting from the recommendations of the high-level tripartite mission and the road map, but also to put to bed the sorts of doubts that creep in when, for instance, there are claims by some that the road map did not have quite the agreement that it is purported to have. That doubt is itself not necessarily helpful. So, taking into account what the Government has said about the status of the road map, it would be helpful for it to clarify, internally with the social partners, precisely what concerns there might be in relation to the road map's status and so on, because I think that it is more important that the road map is in fact endorsed and embraced by all parties. Whatever the doubts are and whatever the legal status of those doubts, any such doubts really do need to be resolved because the road map is the platform on which all of these things will move forward.

We look forward to hearing from the Government regarding information about the updates to the matters that I have raised and that have been raised here, in time for them to be considered at the next session of this Committee in 2025.

Worker members – I thank all who have contributed to the discussion today. It has been good to see the deep interest in this very important case. What remains clear, however, is that extremely serious and systemic violations of the right to freedom of association in the Philippines remain unaddressed and continue apace under the new administration. These include threats and harassment, surveillance, and arbitrary detention and arrest of union members for their legitimate union activity. Red-tagging remains a grave concern, in part due to the failure to revoke previous policies that encourage this practice, which affects union leaders throughout the country. Mechanisms to address impunity for anti-union violence and other violations of labour rights are woefully underfunded, understaffed and unsuccessful. They fail to either hold perpetrators accountable or provide any justice to the victims.

It is both concerning and disappointing that the Government has failed to consult with trade unions at all, and certainly not meaningfully, on a wide range of issues, and that it appears to have no plans to do so, as I noted in my opening intervention. It should go without saying that trade unions are an essential partner in addressing violations of freedom of association, and on finding a way forward to prevent the recurrence and to create an environment in which trade unions can flourish without fear.

We are also deeply troubled that the tripartite road map on freedom of association fails to enjoy the support of most trade unions. The Government must, as a matter of urgency, consult with trade unions to address their concerns and to find an agreed framework for moving forward in order to fully implement the recommendations of the 2023 high-level tripartite mission.

Furthermore, to the extent that the MOA between the DOLE, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Philippine Economic Zone Authority impacts the exercise of trade union rights, the trade unions which are thus affected must also be consulted. And to these already significant concerns, we must of course add that there are several aspects of the Labor Code affecting workers in both the public and private sectors which have been identified, by the Committee of Experts over the course of many years, as not being in line with the Convention, without any action in response by the Government. The Bills before the legislature must become law.

It is this inaction, in the face of repeated supervision, that has brought this case once again to the Committee and why we are all here today. We fully expect the Government to comply with these recommendations, and to do so in full consultation with the social partners. We also urge the Government to accept the technical assistance of the Office in the implementation of legal and institutional reforms necessary to fully respect the Convention. This is in our view the surest way to avoid the case returning to our Committee.

For these reasons, we make the following recommendations: put an immediate end to acts of violence and intimidation against union members for the legitimate exercise of their rights under the Convention, as well as violations of freedom of association, in line with the recommendations of the high-level tripartite mission; immediately undertake effective investigations into the allegations of violence in relation to members of workers' organizations with a view to establishing the facts, determining culpability and punishing the perpetrators; make the monitoring bodies fully operational, including by providing adequate resources; provide regular information on these mechanisms and on progress on the cases assigned to them; ensure that all workers, without distinction, are able to form and join organizations of their choosing; and address long-standing issues with the law.

We urge the Government to finalize an agreed road map, in consultation with the social partners, to effectively address all outstanding issues. We further urge the Government to accept an ILO technical mission to assist with the implementation of the conclusions of the high-level tripartite mission and the road map that will be adopted. We request that the Government transmit a report on progress made on these conclusions to the Committee of Experts.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted the long-standing nature and the prior discussion of this case in the Committee, most recently in 2023.

The Committee deplored the new allegations of murders of trade unionists and anti-union violence, including red-tagging, since its previous discussion, as well as a lack of effective and expeditious investigations into these allegations.

The Committee noted with deep concern the ongoing, serious and systemic violations of the right to freedom of association in the country.

The Committee regretted that the social partners were not consulted in the drafting of EO23.

Taking the discussion into account, the Committee requested the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to:

- take immediate and effective measures, in line with previous recommendations of the Committee and the ILO high-level tripartite mission to put an immediate end to any violation of freedom of association, including threats and harassment, surveillance, arbitrary arrest and detention, and extrajudicial killings, against union members for the legitimate exercise of their rights under the Convention;
- undertake, without delay, effective and independent investigations into the new allegations of violence against members of workers' organizations and expedite those that are pending with regard to all allegations reported since 2015;
- take measures to ensure the effective prevention of any violence perpetuated in connection with the exercise of workers' and employers' organizations legitimate activities and ensure that such organizations can exercise their activities within the framework of a system which guarantees the effective respect of civil liberties and freedom of association rights;
- address as a matter of urgency all concerns relating to the status and content of the road map with the social partners and ensure their full participation in its monitoring and implementation;
- ensure the effective functioning of the monitoring bodies and provide regular information to the Committee of Experts in this regard;
- continue to promote comprehensive training activities, with a solid focus on freedom of association and collective bargaining, among government agencies with the help of ILO technical assistance;
- ensure that the Anti-Terrorism Act is not implemented so as to restrict legitimate union activities and related civil liberties contrary to the Convention;
- ensure that the following legislative matters are promptly addressed with a view to bringing national legislation into conformity with the Convention as soon as possible: House Bills Nos 1152 and 4941; and
- ensure that all workers without distinction are able to form and join organizations of their choosing in accordance with Article 2 of the Convention.

The Committee requested the Government, in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, to submit a detailed report to the Committee of Experts by 1 September 2024 containing information on the implementation of the above measures and progress made in this regard.

Government representative – Thank you, Chair, for this opportunity given to the Philippine Government to comment on the draft conclusions. Let me start my comments on the preamble of the draft conclusions.

Paragraph 3 of the preamble of the conclusions refers to new allegations and an alleged lack of effective and expeditious investigations into these allegations.

We take exception to this conclusion. While this paragraph does not specify what these new allegations are, we take it to mean that these include the case of Alex Dolorosa. As expressed in our submissions to this Committee and other supervisory bodies, the case has been promptly investigated, and it is now undergoing trial. We wish to emphasize that the reports and updates on this case, submitted to the supervisory bodies, were processed through the regional tripartite monitoring bodies, with the participation of the worker representative.

Paragraph 4 of the preamble speaks of the ongoing, serious and systemic violations of the right to freedom of association in the country. The Government registers its unequivocal protest to this statement as it depicts the Philippines as if it is in a state of lawlessness and chaos. This is not the case. It is in no one's interest, advantage or benefit – not to this Committee or to the ILO – to unduly tarnish the reputation and international standing of any country with such a sweeping, gratuitous and unfair statement.

Systemic allegations are violations of humanitarian law. If there is an allegation of such a systemic nature, Republic Act No. 9851 provides for the judicial remedy to inquire into the factual basis of such allegation and provides the appropriate remedies and relief if such violations are established.

I will now go to the bullet points of the draft conclusions. On points 1 and 3, the Government has taken and continues to take immediate and effective measures to prevent violations of freedom of association and the right to organize. These have been reported to the supervisory bodies.

On point 2, investigative bodies have taken action and will continue to take proper action concerning the new allegations, as already reported to the supervisory bodies. The Government, through the tripartite monitoring mechanisms, will continue monitoring the progress of these cases and provide updates as appropriate.

As to old cases, the Government has closely monitored these cases and has been religiously submitting the relevant status reports and updates to the ILO supervisory bodies. We will continue to do so. And we will take prompt and appropriate action should new developments and new material evidence be discovered, to move forward with the investigation and prosecution of these cases. We should also add that even the ILO's special examination procedures recognize the difficulty of investigating and prosecuting cases that took place many years ago.

On point 4, we reiterate the fact that a road map has been adopted through a resolution of the NTIPC. The Government appreciates and will take serious consideration of the recommendation in the draft conclusion to settle any issue on the matter through existing mechanisms within the country.

On the remaining points in the draft conclusion, the Government has taken measures and is committed to taking additional measures as necessary and appropriate, to ensure the following:

- the effective functioning of monitoring bodies, including provision of budgetary support for their operations;
- training and capacity-building activities for promoting a common understanding and respect of freedom of association and the right to organize, to include the government agencies and stakeholders concerned;

- the Anti-Terrorism Act shall not be used to undermine trade union rights as, in fact, on 30 April 2024 the Anti-Terrorism Council issued a memorandum to all agencies concerned, stating that the indiscriminate designation of individuals or organizations as terrorists or as lawless elements is prohibited and cannot be carried out except upon substantive grounds, after observance of due process, and with full respect to fundamental civil rights and liberties.

Finally, the Government, with its social partners, will continue to work with the ILO and benefit from its knowledge and expertise to address the issues raised, based on verifiable facts, in a manner that is constructive and fair for everyone concerned.

Spain (ratification: 1984)

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144)

Written information provided by the Government

Spain has been included in the list of individual cases based on a series of observations made some years ago by the social partners on the application of the Convention.

First, reference is made to an observation of 2017 by the social partners in which they requested the inclusion of the Confederation of Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises (CEPYME) in the tripartite consultation procedures on the preparation of reports on ratified ILO Conventions. This matter has been resolved as the CEPYME is traditionally part of the consultation procedures. This was specified in the report on the Convention presented by Spain in 2022 after the Government had ensured, in consultation with the social partners, that this issue had been effectively resolved. This can be verified in the observations on the reports prepared by the employers, where the CEPYME is included as a participant.

Second, reference is made to a request by the Committee of Experts to provide updated and detailed information on the manner in which consultation is guaranteed with the social partners in the procedures required under the Convention.

In this respect, it should be highlighted that in the case of Spain, the Government and the social partners have made efforts in recent years in the area of social dialogue, including in relation to the consultations to be carried out with the social partners on international labour matters.

More generally, social dialogue agreements have been reached on important matters such as the short-term work scheme regulations during the coronavirus (COVID) pandemic (2020), the labour reform (2021), which changed the recruitment model in Spain, and the Fifth Agreement for Employment and Collective Bargaining (2023). In this regard, the Committee of Experts 2024 General Survey, entitled Labour administration in a changing world of work, states that “in Spain, the Spanish Confederation of Employers’ Organizations (CEOE) and the Spanish CEPYME indicated that business organizations have considered social dialogue to be an extraordinarily useful tool for dealing with difficult situations. For instance, during the COVID-19 pandemic, the social partners reached an agreement in record time which established a series of urgent measures to address the consequences of the crisis in the labour and business sphere.

This drive towards social dialogue showed up, in previous years, in the willingness to continue improving consultation procedures with the social partners on matters relating to ILO activities.

With regard to the consultation procedure with the social partners concerning reports on ILO Conventions, since 2017 work has been carried out to extend the timelines for trade unions and employers' organizations to enable them to analyse the content of the reports effectively, and prepare comments and observations on them.

Further, the final published texts of the reports on ILO Conventions have included, since 2017, the observations of the social partners and the Government's replies to those.

In addition, it should be noted that consultation with the social partners in the process of both preparing reports on ILO Conventions and their ratification is ensured in the following way: first, the Government prepares the documents and files, then sends them to the social partners for their comments and observations, giving enough time for this process. Once the comments and observations of the social partners have been received, they are distributed to the executive bodies competent in the relevant areas, where they are closely examined and the response to these observations is prepared. That response is included in the report documents together with the comments of the social partners.

In the case of files for the ratification and submission of international labour instruments, the social partners receive the administrative file and can make comments on it, and their views are included in the submission and ratification files sent to the Cortes Generales.

As regards the International Labour Conference, the Government holds an annual meeting with the social partners regarding preparation of the items on the Conference agenda. In addition, after consultations with the social partners, a series of procedural modifications are being implemented with the aim of further improving reinforced tripartite consultation procedures with the social partners on ILO matters.

Thus, in 2024, for the consultation procedure on reports relating to ILO Conventions, the Government will send the social partners the observations of the other partners so that all parties are apprised of the various contributions throughout the process and not just once it has been completed.

Moreover, the final drafts of reports will subsequently be sent to the social partners, immediately before their dispatch to the ILO, in order to receive any final reactions before the end of the process.

Furthermore, a meeting will be held before the final documents are sent to the ILO to enable an exchange of information and views between the social partners and the Government.

Regarding the timelines for the procedure, the Government will continue to send the draft reports on ILO Conventions in sufficient time for validation by the social partners and the formulation of observations.

These specific improvements will be applied to the processes for the preparation of reports on both ratified and unratified Conventions, without distinction, and also to reports relating to ILO Recommendations.

In addition, in a meeting held with the social partners aimed at improving these procedures, it was agreed that the Government was prepared to convene additional meetings to deal with any other matters referred to in Article 5 of the Convention:

- (a) government replies to questionnaires concerning items on the agenda of the International Labour Conference and government comments on proposed texts to be discussed by the Conference;
- (b) the proposals to be made to the competent authority or authorities in connection with the submission of Conventions and Recommendations pursuant to article 19 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization;
- (c) the re-examination at appropriate intervals of unratified Conventions and of Recommendations to which effect has not yet been given, to consider what measures might be taken to promote their implementation and ratification as appropriate;
- (d) questions arising out of reports to be made to the International Labour Office under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization;
- (e) proposals for the denunciation of ratified Conventions.

In these meetings, it will also be possible to raise other matters, such as those covered by Paragraph 6 of the Tripartite Consultation (Activities of the International Labour Organisation) Recommendation, 1976 (No. 152): ILO technical cooperation activities; resolutions and conclusions of ILO conferences and other meetings; or promotion of a better knowledge of ILO activities.

Thus, this constantly evolving consultation procedure demonstrates the manner in which account is being taken of the views expressed by the representative organizations of workers and employers on the functioning of the effective prior consultation procedures required by ILO Convention No. 144, and also on the updating of procedures in a form which responds to the concerns expressed by the representative organizations in their observations.

In light of the above, our Government considers that, although improvements are needed in the tripartite consultation procedure, account should be taken of the constant efforts being made in relation to social dialogue to conclude the major social agreements which have enabled our country to progress.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I have the honour to invite the representative of the Government of Spain, the Secretary of State for Labour, Ministry of Labour and Social Economy, to take the floor.

Government representative – It is a great honour for me to be in this Committee, even though clearly no one ever likes being included on the short list. For a country such as Spain, which sets as a political priority its relationship with the ILO and its membership of an Organization that disseminates fundamental principles and rights at work and standards, and which flies the flag of decent work, social dialogue and the ILO model of tripartism. This examination of Convention No. 144 also gives me the opportunity to address a specific case and, in particular, in one way or another, allows me to make use of the meeting to emphasize the importance of maintaining a close relationship with the Organization, as well as with the ILO supervisory bodies and standards system.

Spain ratifies ILO Conventions with a view to giving effect to them faithfully and to the letter. It therefore has no problem in appearing before this Committee to show the progress made in compliance with Conventions, in giving effect to Recommendations and in social dialogue in general. For us, this is an opportunity to explain that submission to ILO supervision and its cases and to strict compliance with all ILO Conventions is a priority for the Government of Spain.

Spain is the country that has ratified the most ILO Conventions in the world, with the number standing at 139 ratified Conventions following the two ratifications that will certainly be deposited tomorrow by the Second Vice-President of the Government in this building. We will be ratifying the Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (No. 167), and the Safety and Health in Agriculture Convention, 2001 (No. 184). And we will also announce the ratification of the Maternity Protection Convention, 2000 (No. 183).

We have ratified decisive and important Conventions, such as the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), for which I feel special pride, as it has been transposed through the recognition for domestic workers of all the protective social rights enjoyed in any other common labour relationship.

We have ratified the Home Work Convention, 1996, (No. 177), the Work in Fishing Convention, 2007 (No. 188), and the Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190).

The history of Spain and its relations with the ILO is therefore an exemplary story. But, I should tell you that a decade ago Spain froze its policy of the ratification of Conventions and we have now reactivated the ratification policy because it was no longer acceptable for a country that shares the values of decent work and fundamental standards and principles at work, and which proclaims through its academic institutions, legal doctrine and administrative bodies that fundamental principles and rights at work have to be given effect whether or not the respective international Conventions were ratified. The country therefore had to continue offering the example of the ratification policy, which had been provisionally suspended for over a decade.

It is a country that, over the past four years, has carried out an intense policy of social dialogue based precisely on the relations between the social partners through the trade unions and employers' organizations in my country.

I believe, and I am sure that the national social partners that are with us in this room will not let me lie, that I have spent the best part of my life over the past four years sitting round the social dialogue table in the Ministry of Labour, where we have achieved over ten agreements with the social partners. Indeed, in one way or another, with all the social partners, employers, unions and the Government. On other occasions, it has only been with the unions, following a very intensive process of social dialogue which has also taken into account the contributions of employers' organizations, as was the case with the inter-occupational minimum wage and, for example, unemployment, where we also reached bipartite agreements. The past four years in Spain have been marked by almost 20 social dialogue agreements.

I would like to take advantage of this forum to give thanks to the social partners in my country for the very great contribution that they have made to saving our country during the worst crisis that we have ever experienced.

Today, Spain has record employment levels, with stable work, and more women working than ever before, more stable and decent work, with rights, than ever before. This is a result of the social partners in Spain and the Spanish Government, through tripartite agreements, overcoming the crisis of the pandemic. We reached a whole series of agreements following many hours of negotiation, through which we managed to find appropriate mechanisms to overcome the great difficulties affecting labour at that time.

The major agreement on the labour reform in Spain has changed the Spanish labour market, which used to be characterized by very acute instability in employment and very high levels of temporary work. It has been changed radically due to a major agreement on the labour reform, in which the social partners, unions and employers' organizations also participated.

We have just concluded an agreement a few days ago guaranteeing the rights of lesbian, gay, transexual, bisexual and intersex (LGTBI) persons in enterprises. It is a major agreement to prevent discrimination against this group in Spanish enterprises, which has also been subscribed to by employers' organizations and unions. That is, we have made very much progress through social dialogue and we will continue to do so.

At the moment in Spain, there are currently three social dialogue forums that are open. One is for the prevention of occupational risks, as we want to reform our occupational safety and health legislation through agreement and social dialogue.

There is a decisive forum that is open on a very important debate, namely the reduction of working time. The Spanish Government wishes to reduce statutory working time through social dialogue to ensure better well-being for workers with a view to addressing a special kind of poverty, time poverty, suffered by most people who do not consider that they have time to live. This is also the subject of social dialogue. And, as I told you a very short time ago, there is the subject of the protection of LGTBI persons at work, which reflects collaboration with the ILO, with which we worked closely to produce the first guide on LGTBI persons at work.

So what actually happened in the case that is bringing the Spanish Government here today in relation to Convention No. 144. It is a case that has dragged on in Spain for over a decade and in relation to which we have made significant progress, which I would like to describe to you.

First, we had a problem with the Convention. One of the Spanish employers' organizations, the CEPYME, felt excluded from consultations. This is something that we can consider perfectly substantiated and settled, as there is no tripartite process in Spain that does not include the employers' organization for small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs).

Not only do we do this regularly under the Convention, but we also do it in all social dialogue forums.

Social dialogue forums in Spain, on the employer side, always include the CEOE, as the representative of large and medium-sized enterprises, but also regularly include the CEPYME, as the representative of SMEs.

There are no communications from the Spanish Government that do not include both employers' organizations. As a result, this criticism, which was already explained in the 2022 report, can be seen as totally resolved.

Second, details were requested on how consultations are held with employers' organizations within the framework of the Convention. With regard to this tripartite consultation, which had normally always been raised by trade unions, it was a little surprising for the Spanish Government that employers' organizations also felt excluded from the system of tripartite consultation, as the issue had not normally been raised in internal communications. But we have taken it very seriously that the procedures under the Convention are in scrupulous compliance with ILO tripartism.

We have improved the time available so that workers' and employers' organizations can have sufficient time to analyse the reports.

We have included in the reports the comments made by both employers' and workers' organizations, which we also do in the files for the ratification and submission of Conventions. In Spain, no Convention is ratified without first opening tripartite dialogue with the most representative social partners, which we also do for the preparations for the Conference, for which we hold an annual meeting with our national social partners on the preparations for the Conference.

But we have made further progress in clarifying the operation of the Convention, which in practice had not been operating adequately for over ten years. We prepared a paper which was submitted for consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, which we call the reinforced information and tripartite consultation mechanism for ILO matters.

What does this mean? Not only are we improving the time limits, so that we are not only providing the information beforehand, but we also share with all the social partners the comments that they each make. We send out the draft reports before they are submitted to the ILO and we hold a meeting before sending the report to the ILO, which allows any appropriate comments to be made.

This shows that the Spanish Government feels an absolute commitment to the Convention, as it feels towards the other fundamental principles and rights at work.

For Spain, there is no less important Convention. All ILO Conventions are equally important. And if what is at stake in a country that is characterized by respect for social dialogue, its commitment to the ILO and its commitment to fundamental principles and rights, if there is any shadow of doubt that the social partners are not present in any of the procedures that relate to the ILO, we will be absolutely delighted and willing to resolve those problems.

In the specific case of the Convention, we have succeeded in resolving all of these problems through a paper that has been the subject of dialogue, with an improvement in the time available and ensuring the exchange of information, and holding a prior meeting in which the social partners can express their views on the report before it is sent to the ILO.

And so, once again, I thank you for this opportunity, not only to participate in this meeting, but also to hear that to a large extent the case involving the Convention has been or is being fully resolved. And therefore, I would like to express my thanks to you and assure you that the tripartite spirit of the ILO, respect for fundamental principles and rights at work and for decent work is a banner for the world, and continues to be a banner that brings together States and the social partners, and I would like to thank the ILO for leading this noble civilizing endeavour.

Employer members – The Employer members have taken note of the oral and written information on this case provided by the Government and would like to thank the distinguished representative for the explanations.

Spain ratified the Convention in 1984. The Committee of Experts has made observations on this case in 2014, 2017 and 2023. Today is the first time that the Committee on the Application of Standards has examined the application of the Convention by Spain.

From the outset, the Employer members want to highlight the importance of the Convention, which is one of the four ILO governance Conventions, which has received 157 ratifications. The Convention promotes at the national level the application of the principle of tripartism through effective consultation with representative employers' and workers' organizations on international labour standards.

The case consists of two parts. The first is about the effective consultation of representative employers' organizations. The representative employers' organizations in Spain are the CEOE and the CEPYME. The Employers argue that the Government did not apply the Convention correctly, as the SME organization was not included on the Government's report on international labour standards as a consulted organization. On 5 July 2022, the CEOE and the CEPYME requested the Government to include the SME organization in the Government report on ratified ILO Conventions.

The request was based on Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention according to which States must operate procedures which “ensure effective consultations” between representatives of the Government, employers and workers on issues covered in Article 5, paragraph 1. In addition, under the terms of Article 3, Paragraph 2, of the Convention Employers and Workers must “be represented on an equal footing on any bodies through which consultations are undertaken”.

The General Survey on Convention No. 144 and Recommendation No. 152 of 2000 stressed that, for consultations to be meaningful, they should not be merely a token gesture, but should be given serious consideration by the competent authority. In order to be “effective”, consultations should take place before final decisions are taken, irrespective of the nature or form of the procedures adopted. The General Survey highlighted that the effectiveness of consultations presupposes in practice that employers’ and workers’ representatives have all the necessary information far enough in advance to formulate their own opinions.

Regarding the frequency of the consultations, Article 5, paragraph 2, of the Convention foresees that “consultation shall be undertaken at appropriate intervals fixed by agreement, but at least once a year”. The purpose of the wording “at least once a year” in this respect is to ensure against the possibility that no consultations are held for years at a time. According to the report of the Committee of Experts, the Government argued that it sent copies of the report on ratified Conventions to the CEPYME. However, according to Recommendation No. 152, Paragraph 2(3)(d), consultations through written communications should be undertaken only “where those involved in the consultative procedures are agreed that such communications are appropriate and sufficient”. In this case, the Employers believe that it is not sufficient for the Government to send to employers’ and workers’ organizations copies of the reports they send to the ILO Office.

It should also be noted that the Committee of Experts in 2023 and the 2000 General Survey recalled that the obligation to consult the representative organizations on the reports concerning the application of ratified Conventions must be clearly distinguished from the obligation to communicate these reports under article 23, paragraph 2, of the ILO Constitution. Instead, consultations with the representative employers’ and workers’ organizations have to be held during the preparation of the Government’s reports

For all these reasons, the Committee of Experts requested, in its recent report, the Government to provide updated and detailed information on how consultation is guaranteed with employers’ organizations, including the Confederation of SME enterprises, in the procedures required by the Convention.

The second part of this case deals with effective tripartite consultations. The Trade Union Confederation of Workers’ Commissions (CCOO) and the General Union of Workers (UGT) argued that the Government continues to conduct consultation procedures in writing, despite the opposition expressed by the workers’ organizations in this respect. Also, they claimed that employers’ and workers’ organizations are not aware of the other parties’ observations and the Government responses to those until they receive the final version of the reports. They considered it useful to explore procedures to guarantee effective tripartite consultations. The Committee of Experts noted the detailed information provided by the Government concerning the consultations held with the social partners between June 2017 and June 2022 on matters relating to international labour standards. The Employer members welcome such information and urge the Government to resume such social dialogue and double its efforts regarding tripartite consultations on international labour standards. Specifically, the period given to workers' and employers' organizations to analyse the texts of reports effectively and prepare comments on them should be sufficient. However, last year the Government sent 24 reports to the social partners in the months in which many workers enjoy their vacation period, more specifically: nine reports dated 26 June, requesting observations before 7 August; five reports on 11 July, asking for contributions before 16 August; ten reports on 19 July, asking for observations before 18 August. The Employer members emphasize that employers' and workers' organizations must have sufficient time to analyse the reports and prepare relevant and quality observations and to carry out consultations with their respective member organizations, which takes a fair amount of time. Already the General Survey in 2000 highlighted that governments should "ensure effective prior consultations within reasonable time limits" with a view to the preparation of reports on the application of ratified Conventions.

Moreover, as already mentioned, according to the Recommendation No. 152, Paragraph 2(3)(d), consultations through written communications should be undertaken only "where those involved in the consultative procedure are agreed that such communications are appropriate and sufficient".

To conclude, the Employer members would like to stress that for this part of the case the Committee of Experts recommended in its recent report the following: first, the Committee of Experts requests the Government to indicate how it takes into account the opinions expressed by the representative workers' organizations on the working of effective prior consultative procedures provided for in the Convention, as well as on the possibility of establishing amended procedures in response to the concerns expressed by the trade union organizations in their observations. Second, the Committee of Experts also requests the Government to continue to provide detailed and updated information on the content and outcome of the tripartite consultations held on all matters related to international labour standards covered by the Convention. Third, the Committee of Experts also requests the Government to indicate whether, in accordance with Article 6, it has consulted the representative organizations to draft an annual report on the working of the consultative procedures provided for in the Convention and, if so, to indicate the outcome of these consultations and provide a copy of the relevant report.

Worker members – We have the opportunity today to discuss the application of Convention No. 144 by Spain. As we know, this Convention sets out clearly and precisely the subjects that have to be covered by tripartite consultation. In the present case, the report of the Committee of Experts essentially raises two issues.

The first relates to the participation of the CEPYME in tripartite consultations. The Committee of Experts notes that it is not sufficient to merely communicate reports to this organization.

However, it should be recalled that this confederation is a member of the CEOE. There is no question that the CEOE participates fully in tripartite consultations, as is well known. Article 1 of the Convention provides that, when reference is made to representative organizations, that means "the most representative organisations of employers and workers enjoying the right of freedom of association".

The question can therefore arise as to, in view of its affiliation with the CEOE, the CEPYME is not duly consulted under the Convention. We leave it to the Committee of Experts to assess the consequences and draw conclusions. In any case, we have taken due note of the Government's statements indicating that this issue has been resolved.

The report also refers to a second issue. Indeed, in recent years, Spanish unions had expressed concern at the manner in which tripartite consultations were undertaken.

The Worker members have noted with interest the explanations provided by the Government of Spain. In particular, we wish to emphasize certain elements relating to improvements in the consultation procedure. Several changes have been introduced to improve the process. For example, the Government has indicated that it will communicate to the social partners the comments made by the other social partners. In that way, all the parties will be aware of the various contributions made throughout the process, and not only when it is completed. Similarly, it should be noted that a meeting will henceforth be held before the final documents are sent to the ILO so that the social partners and the Government can exchange views and information.

The Worker members are convinced that the Government will make every effort to put these commitments into practice.

Employer member, Spain – It is an honour for me to take the floor in my capacity as Employer delegate for Spain, on behalf of the CEOE and the CEPYME. Spanish employers also have a fundamental commitment to the principles and values of tripartism that inspire the ILO and are proud of the 17 agreements concluded through tripartite social dialogue in our country since 2020, to which reference has been made earlier.

We have worked loyally in situations of the greatest difficulties, first to maintain employment, and then to improve conditions of work and the competitiveness of our enterprises. And yes, together we have managed to make the Spanish labour market more resilient, stable, inclusive, secure and diverse.

They are very different types of agreements, ranging from occupational safety and health, to remote working and innovatory regulations on the use of algorithms and the rights of platform workers. The latest, as already indicated, concluded only a few days ago, covers LGTBI persons in enterprises.

In the final analysis, agreements that are very laborious and extraordinarily difficult to conclude.

Bipartite social dialogue has also been productive for everyone. I will refer to the Agreement on employment and collective bargaining concluded with the unions in 2023, for which I take the opportunity to express our consideration in public. An agreement for the period 2023–25 on which, as we hoped, tremendous leadership was deployed to promote the modernization of collective bargaining in Spain and wage increases in a highly inflationary context.

We feel proud of the legitimacy earned through loyalty and endless work, which today have led us to this discussion of the Convention adopting a constructive approach of constant improvement.

As the Employer spokesperson said in his statement, there can be a broad variety of procedures and methods for tripartite consultation which are in compliance with the objectives of the Convention, but to be effective they cannot be confined to merely formal procedures and, as provided in Article 2(1), they must receive the full attention of the representative organizations of employers and workers.

What is clear is that, in relation to the reports on ratified Conventions requested from Spain by the Office, the current Government has only given effect in formal terms to the requirement of consultation. I am sad to say so, but that is how it is.

The time limits set are very short and prevent us from consulting our organizations and our advisory bodies in a manner that would allow the development of a collective position, as should be done by our organizations, which defend and represent the interests of enterprises in all the regions and sectors of the country.

For example, in 2023, over 24 summer days, 24 reports for the ILO, amounting to almost 1,000 pages, were sent out for comment between the last two weeks of July and the first two weeks of August, which are traditionally holiday periods in Spain.

Individual and separate consultations were held with employers' organizations and the unions. In no case are we aware of the comments made by the other social partners, nor the responses by the Government. Nor are we provided with the final report, for which reason it is difficult for this procedure to be considered effective tripartite consultations within the meaning of the Convention.

The Government has informed the Committee of a new strengthened information and tripartite consultation procedure with the social partners that it was intended to introduce as of 13 May, but a few days later consultations were once again overlooked on the content of its submission to the International Court of Justice in relation to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

We would not be here if this had not been the Government's usual practice since 2022.

The selective and optional use of social dialogue, including consultation procedures, has become common practice for the Government in the final stages.

Since the objectives related to the Recovery and Resilience Plan have been achieved, which tied the Spanish Government to Europe, there have been around 30 legislative texts that have not been subject to social dialogue, or even consultation. And when, on an exceptional basis, this has been done, the time limits set have been very short.

By way of illustration, consultations were not held on the texts modifying the provisions on justification which have substantially altered the rules governing termination of employment, or those creating a new criminal liability for enterprises in relation to recruitment.

Another example, particularly in light of its clear importance, was that we were only given eight days to make comments on the Act on recruitment incentives.

But the most surprising recent case has been the imminent modification by the Government of the texts governing the validity of collective agreements set out in a Legislative Decree published on Wednesday 22 May this year, and which came into force the next day.

The national media reported this occurrence, which was denounced by the employers' organizations which I have the honour to represent, as well as by the unions:

"On 23 May, the Government muddled the social dialogue process for the finalization of the unemployment subsidy."

"On 21 May last, employers and unions attack the Government for approving changes to collective agreements that had not been negotiated."

This interference by the Government in the independence of the social partners gives priority to independent agreements, and regional agreements in certain circumstances, instead of sectoral agreements at the State level and national agreements, despite the fact that the approach had been explicitly refuted by the social partners during the work on the labour reform agreed in 2021.

This amounts to unprecedented interference by the Government in collective bargaining, which is in clear contravention of Article 7 of the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154), ratified by Spain in September 1985, which specifies that: "Measures taken by public authorities to encourage and promote the development of collective bargaining shall be the subject of prior consultation and, whenever possible, agreement".

As if that was not enough, the same Legislative Decree amends the composition of the employers' group on the Economic and Social Council through the inclusion of organizations which, although may be more representative at their level, are in violation of the requirements set out in the Workers' Charter, once again without consulting the social partners or the Economic and Social Council, despite being prescriptive, as indicated in its regulations.

The Economic and Social Committee (CES) has criticized the unilateral action taken by the Government for the modification of its internal rules.

I will close my intervention with the conclusions of the Resolution concerning the second recurrent discussion on social dialogue and tripartism, adopted by the Conference in 2018, which specify that: "Social dialogue, based on respect for freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining, has a crucial role in designing policies to promote social justice. It is a means to achieve social and economic progress. Social dialogue and tripartism are essential for democracy and good governance." "Free, independent, strong and representative employers' and workers' organizations, together with trust, commitment and respect by governments for the autonomy of the social partners and social dialogue outcomes are key conditions for effective social dialogue."

Social justice and social and economic progress are shared objectives of the social partners and the Government of Spain, as are the principles that inspire the ILO. But it is important to understand that social dialogue and tripartism cannot be selective or subject to the interests of Governments, as they are essential for democracy and good governance.

We therefore urge the Government of Spain to comply with ILO Conventions and to improve consultation procedures so that tripartism can be truly effective in accordance with democratic principles.

Worker member, Spain – We thank the Committee of Experts for having received the repeated complaints that Spanish trade unions have been making systematically since 2012 in their observations on the action taken and effect given to the Convention. We are also very grateful to the Employer spokesperson for his surprising and praiseworthy interest in the complaints made by the unions.

More than 12 years ago, the conservative Government engaged in the absolute destruction of tripartism, social dialogue and collective bargaining, which was examined here. The same Government that restricted the participation by workers in ILO Conferences, and led to the Credentials Committee intervening.

In the comments provided by my organization in 2022, we noted an improvement in relation to previous years, when we indicated that we could not even make any comments on the reports provided by Spain. We indicated that since 2017, the Government has been providing us with the reports so that we can make our comments and attach them. However, it is true that the full implementation of the spirit and content of the Convention lacks a regulated mechanism which, for example, goes beyond written communications, as already indicated, and establishes the mechanism indicated in the Tripartite Consultation (Activities of the International Labour Organisation) Recommendation, 1976 (No. 152), which indicates that consultations should only be carried out through written communications in certain circumstances.

We understand that the regrettable situation of social dialogue and collective bargaining in Spain at that time made it necessary to focus on the national situation, even though the Government should not have disregarded, as has been recalled, the obligations arising out of the ratification of an ILO Convention.

But it would not be just if, in relation to this criticism that goes back to the time of the devastating conservative Government, we did not add that the quality of social dialogue and collective bargaining in my country has changed radically, as indicated by the Director-General of the ILO, and the Employer delegate of Spain just now. And in relation to the Convention, as already indicated, a mechanism was introduced in May this year, when it became known that Spain was one of the countries that could be selected for examination by this Committee, which not only restored the system of tripartite consultations covered by the Convention, but also, as a result of the process of information and consultation, I would dare to say goes beyond that.

By way of illustration, where proposals are made by trade unions, any of the social partners may call a meeting to examine not only any ILO matter that they consider appropriate, including instruments, initiatives and proposals made by the organization.

The introduction of this mechanism, which had been called for by the unions for so many years, will ensure full compliance with the Convention and the case that is being examined here should therefore be considered satisfactorily resolved.

I recall that the quality of social dialogue in Spain has improved enormously following almost a decade during which it shone by its absence. And as a result of the labour reform that has been agreed, the social partners have engaged in dialogue on a daily basis, as will be explained.

We consider that there is still room to continue making progress and I take this opportunity to remind the Government loyally that information and consultation, on matters beyond ILO subjects, must govern each and every one of its political acts, especially those directly affecting trade unions, so that they do not consider that the Government is engaging in what could be considered as interference in their independence and activities.

If it is well understood that through collaboration we can ensure that all our efforts are going in the same direction, my country will continue to achieve admirable figures in many areas.

In this spirit, and as the instigators of recurrent complaints on the failure of the Government to comply with the Convention, I call on the Committee to consider the subject of this complaint as already being resolved.

Worker member, Spain – The Spanish trade unions wish to make reference in this session of the Committee to the very recent decision issued by the Ministry of Labour and Social Economy of Spain, which was delivered to the ILO on 16 May 2024. We refer to it due to its crucial importance in relation to the subject that we are discussing here today. The decision establishes a strengthened mechanism for tripartite information and consultation with the social partners on matters relating to the ILO, which resolves the deficit that existed in compliance with the ILO Convention in relation to effective tripartite consultations on the activities of the Organization, which we had called for repeatedly in our comments on the reports submitted by Spain.

The women and men workers of Spain who are represented at the 112th Session of the Conference therefore consider that the Government of Spain has taken a very innovative step forward in the application of the Convention which meets our expectations in this regard, that is if we are really discussing the application of the Convention, and not other matters that go beyond the scope of this Committee.

The satisfaction lies, in the first place, in the fact that this mechanism responds to the requirements set out in the Convention. Second, it is characterized by continuity in time. And third, it provides for meetings at the request of any of the parties to address any of the matters covered by Article 5 of the Convention.

It is essential to emphasize to this Committee that the Government of Spain has implemented a mechanism, through prior information and consultations with the social partners, which responds to the concerns raised by the unions when expressing our views on effective consultation procedures.

It is necessary to give its true worth to the institution of social dialogue in Spain.

Tripartite agreements, and I repeat “tripartite”, in our country have contributed to the achievement of social progress, improvements in the labour market and living and working conditions, and at the same time improvements in the economy.

Although there are still difficulties and improvements can be made, social dialogue in Spain offers an example for other countries around us.

Many tripartite agreements have been concluded in recent years in Spain, ranging from emergency measures to respond to the crisis caused by the pandemic, and thereby maintain economic activity and employment, to the social pact that provided a basis for the labour reform, which has proved to be very positive for workers, through the improvement of employment, and particularly the quality of employment contracts in Spain, and which has at the same time contributed to an increase in enterprise profits.

Without overlooking the successive improvements in pensions, the regulation of remote working, platform sharing work and the control of algorithms, among many others.

The social partners and the Government are currently engaged in negotiations, as already indicated, on the reduction of working hours.

For all of these reasons, we reiterate that the tripartite consultation envisaged in the Convention is already guaranteed in our country, and accordingly reinforces the benefits of social dialogue that have already been acquired.

Employer member, France – What are we doing here? We are obliged to meet every year, because too many Member States are still negligent in applying ILO standards. Today, we are examining the case of Spain, in violation of Convention No. 144. The legal aspects have already been explained, so I shall simply make a few observations. The Convention, ratified by Spain in 1984, covers tripartite consultations on international standards that are binding on all Member States. What is tripartism, if not the ILO’s DNA? To ignore the rules of tripartism is to trample underfoot a fundamental principle.

First, Spain is excluding the organization representing SMEs, the CEPYME, from the consultations, and the CEOE, the other employers' organization, is calling for it to be included in the tripartite consultation procedures. The Government of Spain confined itself to replying that it had sent copies of the reports on the Conventions to the CEPYME. However, the Committee of Experts recalls that the obligation to communicate to employers' organizations the reports provided to the Office under article 23(2), of the ILO Constitution must not be confused with the obligation to consult representative organizations to enable them to participate actively in the formulation of their respective views. Why then sideline the organization representing SMEs, when we know that SMEs account for 95 per cent of enterprises in all the economies of the world?

Second, the Government is continuing to conduct written consultation procedures, despite the objections expressed by employers and workers. Clearly, this model is by no means tripartite, as it does not allow for discussion on an equal footing between the three parties, as employers and workers are not informed of the comments made by the other party, or of the Government's responses, before the final version of the report. The Committee of Experts recalls that, in accordance with Article 2(3)(d) of Recommendation No. 152, written consultations, if deemed appropriate and sufficient, are only possible with the consent of the parties, which is not required in this case.

In short, we request Spain to include all representative organizations, in particular the one representing SMEs, and to establish effective tripartite consultation procedures, with the agreement of the other parties.

Worker member, Finland – I am speaking on behalf of the workers in the Nordic countries and the French trade union (CFDT). As enshrined in the ILO Constitution, tripartite cooperation at the international level presupposes that it is supported by analogous dialogue at the national level. The established interpretation of government obligations to communicate their reports to the representative organizations of employers and workers does, at the very least, favour the active role of the social partners in supervising the application of standards.

It is not a coincidence that the Convention is to be considered a priority one. Tripartism within the meaning of the Convention is drawn, in essence, from the spirit of the ILO and transformed into a legally binding instrument concerning tripartite consultation on international obligations.

In comparison with the obligations deriving from the Constitution, however, the Convention goes much further. Consultation can be established in law and practice in different ways. What is required is that the methods chosen by the governments are considered acceptable and appropriate by the parties involved, which is, with respect to the current circumstances in Spain, materializing to a large extent. In other words, the States are expected to consider the opinions of the parties and here the Government of Spain is currently succeeding.

While the present-day consultation procedures in Spain should be considered satisfactory, we would like to use the opportunity to emphasize the importance and proper application of these principles. There are effectively no consultations unless they take place before final decisions are taken, irrespective of the nature or form of the procedures adopted. Under national practice, consultation can translate into exchanging communications, the active formulation of proposals by tripartite bodies, or other means considered appropriate by the parties. The essential element is that the consultations must exist prior to the final decision of the Government.

Unfortunately, and usually when inadequacy is detected, it is at the expense of the trade unions. In fact, this is well demonstrated by the situation under the previous Government and which is reflected in the report of the Committee of Experts concerning this case, basically describing the situation as it existed in Spain only a few years ago. It is not enough to issue statements on behalf of Member States if the process is deficient and does not take into account the views, opinions and concerns of the most representative social partners.

We welcome with gratitude the recent positive developments, as reported by the CCOO and the UGT, the major trade unions in Spain. Nevertheless, we would like to note that, as expressed during the time of the reporting period and thus reflected in the report of the Committee of Experts, that the very existence of tripartite consultation cannot be taken for granted. Active promotion and recognition from governments is not automatic. And, as we have regrettably witnessed in certain occasions lately, circumstances can deteriorate quickly and thereby endanger the purpose and legitimate aims of the Convention.

Employer member, United States of America – I speak in my capacity as the Employers' delegate for the United States of America. This case involves Spain's voluntary ratification of Convention No. 144. The Convention is a governance Convention that very much underlies all of the tripartite work done here in the ILO and it enshrines those principles of effective tripartite consultation on the implementation of international labour standards under national law. Non-compliance with this Convention jeopardizes the ability of national employers' and workers' organizations to meaningfully conduct their good work on international labour standards.

This case, as our able spokesperson has explained, focuses on what it truly means – in law and practice and per the text of the Convention – to “ensure effective consultation” with representative employers' and workers' organizations. Having voluntarily ratified the Convention, the Government was and is obliged to meet this standard.

The representative employer organizations in Spain are CEOE and CEPYME.

We align with our Employer colleagues that “effective” consultation did not previously occur here, at least in part because it is not sufficient for the Government to simply send to employers' and workers' organizations copies of the reports they sent to the ILO Office. Simply sending reports (without more) is not sufficient, as the Committee of Experts has opined and as the basic tenets of common sense and mutual respect should instruct.

Proper and effective consultation deserves and demands more. We should always recall that we can do rich work in this House. But we need to go further and always recall that this rich and meaningful work requires us to engage with one another with respect and humility and, of course, that every effort be made to comply with the Convention.

Employer member, Canada – I present this statement on behalf of Canadian employers. Tripartism is a foundational principle of our work here at the ILO. This institution is built on a shared understanding of the critical importance of cooperation between governments, employers' and workers' organizations, in fostering social and economic progress. We therefore note with concern the comments of the Committee of Experts with respect to the apparent lack of meaningful tripartite consultation by the Government of Spain with its social partners, including the most representative workers' and employers' organizations in that country.

The Committee of Experts, in its report, highlighted in particular the important distinction to be made between mere communication and real consultation. Consultation with employers' and workers' organizations requires their active participation in the formulation and communication of their respected views, before the Government finalizes its work.

As emphasized in paragraph 92 of the General Survey, 2000, on tripartite consultation, and I quote, the obligation to consult the representative organizations on the reports to be made concerning the application of ratified conventions, must be clearly distinguished from the obligation to communicate these reports under article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution. To fulfil their obligations under this provision of the Convention, it is not sufficient for governments to communicate to employers' and workers' organizations, copies of the reports that they sent to the Office, since any comments that these organizations may subsequently transmit to the Office on these reports cannot replace the consultations, which have to be held during the preparation of the reports.

We, therefore, urge the Government to develop sustainable procedures to facilitate meaningful, active and robust consultations with the most representative workers' and employers' organizations in the country regarding, at a minimum, matters concerning the activities of the ILO, in compliance with the Convention.

Employer member, Norway – In this particular case, the Norwegian employers wish to highlight the importance of social dialogue as a factor for economic progress and social cohesion. Tripartite social dialogue in Spain has led, in the past, to far-reaching agreements in the socio-labour field that have enabled progress towards a more dynamic, equal and inclusive labour market. This demonstrates that social dialogue is the key tool for reaching consensus that builds trust and leads to policies that contribute to creating favourable conditions for the creation of decent jobs, inclusive economic growth and sustainable development. We encourage the Government to resume the path of social dialogue with the most representative employers' and trade union organizations in the country, to honour agreements and to implement effective tripartite consultations on national labour issues. We stress the need for the Government to respect and safeguard the representativeness of the employers' organizations, both the CEOE and the CEPYME, in order to achieve effective social dialogue that will allow to continue forging compromises between the tripartite partners in a context of great complexity and uncertainty.

Worker member, Republic of Korea – Convention No. 144 is a priority governance Convention. To date, it has been ratified by 157 States. The Convention is based on the principle that the proper functioning of tripartite cooperation on international labour standards requires similar tripartite dialogue at national level. Tripartite consultations on international labour standards also need the development of institutional procedures for regular social dialogue, which can help the social partners to resolve conflicts and consolidate democracy.

In its General Survey of 2000, the Committee of Experts noted the wide dissemination of these procedures, including in countries that had not ratified the Convention. In particular, the Committee of Experts cited the questions linked to the choice of the most appropriate forms of consultation, and the determination of the representativeness of employers' and workers' organizations, such as those posed today in the case of Spain.

In its observation on this case, the Committee of Experts points out that the consultation of representative organizations must allow for the active participation of the social partners and must take place at the stage when the report is being drawn up by the State concerned. This should not be just a formality, but must be a genuine process which should be done before making the final decision. Providing information and sharing a report to be sent to the Office is not sufficient to satisfy the obligation of effective consultation, given the already definitive nature of the Government's position. The form of consultation should be determined in accordance with national practice, after consultation with representative organizations.

Recommendation No. 152 proposes several examples: via a committee specially set up for ILO matters; via a body with general competence in the economic, social or labour field; via several bodies with special competence; or by means of written communications where these are accepted as appropriate and sufficient by the participants. In most cases in the Republic of Korea, for example, prior consultation with the social partners on matters related to the ratification and application of international labour standards is done by written communication. The Spanish workers have expressed the view that the solution recently adopted in Spain, consisting of organizing a tripartite meeting before sending the final documents to the ILO, is appropriate.

We take note of the technical solutions and improvements implemented and wish to stress once again the importance of ensuring effective tripartite consultations in accordance with the Convention.

Employer member, Colombia – I would like to refer to the comments of the Committee of Experts on the need for effective tripartite consultations. In this regard, we would like to underline that effective consultations are based fundamentally on social dialogue and are an essential tool for the formulation of joint proposals, between workers, employers and Governments, that promote growth, peace and general well-being.

Effective consultation involves not only the written communication of information and the Government's position on compliance with Conventions, but also genuine dialogue with the most representative social partners, in which the different views can be presented and tripartite discussion take place on fundamental labour-related matters.

According to the Committee of Experts, in order to comply with the obligations under this provision of the Convention, it is not sufficient for the Government to communicate to workers' and employers' organizations a copy of the reports that it sends to the Office. The consultation of workers' and employers' organizations implies their active participation and the formulation and communication of their respective views. In this regard, a climate of trust, based on respect for employers' and trade union organizations, is required to achieve genuine dialogue and effective consultations.

We therefore call on the Government to ensure the establishment of mechanisms for tripartite social dialogue and the holding of effective tripartite consultations, with recognition of the most representative employers' organizations.

Employer member, Argentina – The employers of Argentina welcome the information provided by the Government of Spain, and the commitment indicated with regard to compliance with the Convention under discussion. However, now that we have heard from the social partners, we understand that there are still shortcomings in the application of the Convention.

Through its work, the Committee has repeatedly indicated that the recognition of the most representative workers' and employers' organizations, and their involvement in effective mechanisms for consultation and social dialogue, are fundamental factors in the functioning of the ILO's standard-setting and standards review mechanisms.

The definition of strategic priorities at the national level should only be undertaken after discussions with representative workers' and employers' organizations, in order to identify challenges, opportunities and needs related to the application of international labour standards.

In this regard, we reiterate the Committee of Experts' observations on how the obligation to consult the representative organizations on the reports that must be communicated on the application of ratified Conventions must be clearly distinguished from the obligation to communicate these reports under article 23(2) of the Constitution.

The written communication of reports, together with an invitation to comment in writing, does not amount to effective consultation under the terms of the Convention.

The quality of the supervision of international labour standards is related to recognition of the experience and views of constituents on the subjects covered and the building of general consensus on the strategy for the application of a Convention in the country.

In the present case, it is of paramount importance for genuine and effective consultations to take place through institutionalized tripartite dialogue bodies where the organizations are represented on an equal footing. In particular, it is necessary to heed the request by the CEOE for the inclusion of the CEPYME in the consultations, as the representative organization of the country's SMEs.

We hope that, in light of this discussion, the Government of Spain will take appropriate measures for the holding of effective consultations under the terms of the Convention and will provide detailed information on such consultation processes. In particular, we encourage the Government to take measures to ensure the functioning of institutionalized and transparent consultation mechanisms, with the participation of representative workers' and employers' organizations represented on an equal footing, to ensure compliance in law and practice with the Convention.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Employer member, Portugal – The Portuguese employers fully support the arguments of the Spanish employers, the CEOE and the CEPYME concerning the interpretation of the Convention. This Convention has been ratified 157 times and was ratified by Portugal in 1981. As a result of this Convention and the integration of the European Social Model, which is based on a set of fundamental principles, Portugal created the Standing Committee for Social Dialogue (CPCS) in 1984.

The tripartite social dialogue model serves two purposes: it enables consultation on national and international reports, and also tripartite social dialogue. This role in dialogue presupposes the collective autonomy and independence of the social partners and the credibility of institutions, as well as mutual trust between the social partners and Governments. This means that the participation of the social partners in the design of policies must be such as to ensure that these measures are realistic and pragmatic. Only in this way can the social partners, from their position near to the grassroots, negotiate solutions for tripartite social dialogue.

Solutions agreed between all the parties are more likely to be accepted than solutions imposed without consideration of the parties' respective interests. Tripartite dialogue cannot be detached from national strategies.

The social partners must establish programmes and assume their commitments with the Government. This is essential for social peace.

Employer member, Mexico – First, we thank the Government of Spain for the information provided in this case and, in view of the significance of the Convention, we note that Spain ratified it on 13 February 1984.

In relation to this case, it should be emphasized that one of the aspects relates to an observation made in 2017 by the social partners requesting the inclusion of the CEPYME in the tripartite consultation procedures for the preparation of reports on ratified ILO Conventions.

On the official website of the CEPYME, there is a publication entitled, “The CEPYME’s proposals for the new Government”, and in the press release related to this publication, the CEPYME calls for enterprises to be considered when drafting legislation, and for the development of a more SME-friendly fiscal, labour and administrative context, in order to facilitate greater investment in support of production, business growth, employment and the welfare state.

Regarding social dialogue, the press release also indicates that, “in labour matters, the CEPYME advocates promoting social dialogue and collective bargaining as pillars of the modernization of the labour market, and improving active and passive employment policies, and considers it necessary to place greater emphasis on vocational training, reskilling and continuous training to address the problem of labour shortages affecting key sectors of the Spanish production system”.

Clearly, the CEPYME is expressing concern for the strengthening of social dialogue and, despite the fact that the Government of Spain, in the information previously provided to this Committee, indicated that the complaint is considered to have been resolved, as the CEPYME is traditionally part of the consultation process, a number of measures still need to be taken in order to generate effective social dialogue.

As the Mexican employers have previously indicated, it should not be forgotten that social dialogue is a means of harmonizing conflicting interests and, as both employers and workers are the main providers of goods and services, and creators of wealth, they are two important stakeholders in any market economy and should be given due consideration.

In light of the above, and in view of the importance of strengthening tripartite consultation and thus social dialogue, we respectfully request the Government of Spain to review the time afforded to trade unions and employers’ organizations to enable them to examine the texts of the reports on ILO Conventions.

Employer member, Costa Rica – Employers in Costa Rica are concerned at the violation by the Government of Spain of the Convention, which the ILO considers to be a governance Convention.

The purpose of consulting the most representative employers’ organizations in boards, committees and other forums within government institutions is to contribute to the development of countries through monitoring and accountability, transparency and democracy. It also contributes experience and knowledge, enriching discussions and providing solutions to various issues.

Regarding the consultation of reports, the Committee of Experts has requested the Government to provide updated and detailed information on the manner in which consultation is guaranteed with all the representative employers’ organizations, including the CEPYME, in the procedures required under the Convention. The CEPYME plays a fundamental role in representing SMEs, which are the productive base of our countries and important generators of decent work. The CEPYME defends, represents and promotes the interests of SMEs and self-employed workers and is recognized as the country’s most representative business organization.

Tripartite consultation can boost productivity and competitiveness, while ensuring decent work. We therefore respectfully request the Government of Spain to take the necessary measures to consult the most representative employers' organizations in the country, taking into consideration the necessary logistical aspects to ensure that this consultation guarantees the effective and genuine participation of Spanish employers. Undoubtedly, respect for social dialogue through tripartite consultation is a basic element for the development of any democracy.

Employer member, New Zealand – I want to emphasize the importance of the Convention, which promotes at the national level the application of the principle of tripartism through effective consultation with representative employers' and workers' organizations on international labour standards. Tripartism is only effective when it exists in an environment of free and open social dialogue.

However, this appears to be somewhat lacking in that the CEPYME was not systematically informed or consulted on the Government's reports on international labour standards, while the CEOE was. And this was despite the CEOE having requested the inclusion of the CEPYME in the tripartite consultation process. The Convention sets out clear requirements about the quality and frequency of consultation. These requirements have already been enunciated so I will not repeat them here.

Here we note the Committee of Experts observation that the Government sent copies of the report on ratified Conventions to the CEPYME. However, while sending reports is informative, it cannot be considered to be consultation. We recall earlier comments by the Committee of Experts that the obligation to consult representative organizations on the reports concerning the application of ratified Conventions must be clearly distinguished from the obligation to communicate these reports under the ILO Constitution. We accordingly urge the Government to consult the representative employers' and workers' organizations during the preparation of Government reports.

In relation to concerns that employers' and workers' organizations have not been aware of the other parties' observations and the Government responses to these until they receive the final version of reports, we similarly urge the Government to be proactive and inclusive in its consultation with the social partners over international labour standards.

In this regard, the Employers' group also emphasize that employers' and workers' organizations must have sufficient time to analyse the reports and prepare relevant and quality observations and to carry out consultation with their respective member organizations.

Observer, Confederation of Workers of the Universities of the Americas (CONTUA) – The role of the trade union movement is to identify situations in which there is a serious and manifest violation of international labour standards so that the cases can be dealt with by this Committee. We were therefore surprised that Spain was chosen for examination in relation to this Convention. The reason is that we believe objectively that if we were to make a weighted global ranking of the 157 countries that have ratified the Convention since 1976, Spain would be among the most select group in matters of social dialogue and tripartite consultation, despite the oscillations of its Government over the past decade.

If the criteria consisted of countries without consultation and dialogue, countries with consultation and dialogue deficits, countries with acceptable levels of compliance and countries that are in compliance, Spain would definitely rank among the latter. However, over and above this initial observation, international labour standards, including this Convention, form part of human and labour rights as they relate to the protection of the right to freedom of association. As such, we must always strive for better compliance with and the improvement of standards.

Perhaps, then, this discussion is about how, even in a country where social dialogue and tripartite consultation are functioning acceptably, we must always work together to deepen the democratic decision-making process and active, timely and enabling social participation practices.

The Convention is based on the principle that effective and functional tripartite cooperation requires the implementation of tripartite dialogue mechanisms at the national level. At the international level, we agree to submit to consultation and dialogue processes. We consult the information available, share it and engage in dialogue to understand each other's positions, reach agreements and design road maps to overcome the problems identified.

Compliance with the standard does not end with the procedural formality of the communication of documents.

It should be emphasized that these consultations also foster the development of social dialogue through the establishment of regular tripartite dialogue procedures. They can also contribute to resolving conflicts and consolidating democracy, a value that we must promote and protect.

In my country, Argentina, if we had the situation that prevails in Spain, we could talk about a case of progress. We are still several steps behind, but paradoxically, at least until the arrival of the present Government, we were among the countries in the region with the greatest dialogue.

The Spanish workers considered that the solutions recently adopted in Spain, consisting of holding a tripartite meeting before communicating the final documents to the ILO, were adequate. We believe that, while it is always possible to improve the situation, the case we are examining here does not involve serious aberrations.

We note the technical solutions and improvements implemented and wish to emphasize once again the importance of ensuring effective tripartite consultations in accordance with the Convention.

Chairperson – I can see no more requests for the floor, so I now invite the Government representative of Spain, to take the floor for his concluding remarks.

Government representative – I would like to say that I have the strange feeling of a vacuum as if my initial intervention had not been heard by any of the speakers, especially the employer representatives, who all referred to defects in the application of the Convention that the Government of Spain has resolved.

And I am going to insist briefly on focusing on the Convention, as reference has been made to many other Conventions. In the specific case of Spain, in practice it is possible to refer to nearly all ILO Conventions because, I re-emphasize, we are the country in the world that has ratified the most Conventions.

But I would like to insist that the CEPYME is not excluded from any system of consultations in Spain, and that it is included and participates fully at the same level as the CEOE in social dialogue, and particularly in the tripartite consultations held under the Convention. It is therefore our understanding that this has absolutely been resolved and that there is no such exclusion.

All the employers who spoke reiterated the importance of substantive and effective consultations. The Government of Spain agrees. Consultations are not a mere formality, not a mere delivery of papers or files. Consultations are real, and it is necessary to listen carefully and take into account what is said by the social partners and, in so far as possible, integrate it. This also occurs in Spain under the Convention, with the report that is negotiated, and the comments that are made by the social partners are shared so that everyone knows what the others are saying. Draft papers are shared before being sent to the ILO, the comments of the partners are incorporated and a meeting is held before the reports are sent to the ILO.

The Government of Spain does all this and has been doing it in recent years. The time limits set in July and August are almost necessary in view of the schedule of the ILO meeting, which is held immediately after the summer period. And holidays in Spain do not last for two months. We have ratified the Holidays with Pay Convention (Revised), 1970 (No. 132), and we guarantee one month of paid holidays for all workers in the country. But we cannot consider July and August as non-working months during which the social partners do not work.

I honestly believe that this is a closed case and, as some of the speakers said, it has been resolved. But the Government of Spain will listen carefully to any recommendations that the Committee may make which can help us improve still further the effect given to the Convention.

Look at the last four years, when the Government and the country that I am representing here, in the social dialogue agreements that have been concluded with unions and employers' organizations, has respected social dialogue to such an extent that what has been agreed through social dialogue has been reflected precisely in the Official Journal. That is to say that social dialogue agreements have been transposed into legislation.

In all humility, I believe that it constitutes a model of agreed labour legislation, which is unusual in all countries, because there has basically not been any public influence. The agreements concluded in a tripartite context have been converted into rules, legislation, laws, with amendments to the Workers' Charter. The first law has been adopted setting out the labour conditions governing work on digital platforms, we have created an Act on remote work, we have introduced a system for the reduction of working hours to address enterprise crises and the health crisis, and we will transform into legislation the measures to prevent discrimination against LGBTI persons. I insist that we place great value on what we negotiate with the social partners that we have converted the agreements directly into public rules, regulations and binding texts applicable to the whole of the production system.

What I would really like to say, and repeating once again what I said in my intervention, is that Spain has a constant and permanent commitment to social dialogue, based on real and effective social consultation through which agreements are reached. Moreover, Spain has a particularly intense commitment to the ILO, and therefore has no difficulty in submitting whenever necessary to examination by the supervisory bodies in order to be able to learn and improve its social dialogue systems.

Indeed, Spain has a firm commitment which it sees as a specific characteristic of the country to human labour rights, as indicated by the last Workers' representative.

Human labour rights are what separate us from barbarity, they are the foundation of civilization in the world, a world that guarantees human labour rights in all countries, which prevents the race to the bottom for working conditions, and which in the final analysis flies the flag for the ILO and its Declaration of Philadelphia.

Spain shares the idea that labour is not a commodity, and that for labour not to be a commodity there has to be social dialogue, which acts as a guarantee for human rights and for all the fundamental principles and rights at work.

And let me finish, moreover, as the case of Spain has given rise to such interest for all employers throughout the world, by saying that one of the elements of the social dialogue that will be undertaken in Spain over the next few weeks will be something that was recommended by the Committee of Experts in a very important report a year ago, namely the development of public policies for the reduction of working hours and that we are starting to ensure healthy labour standards that allow people to reconcile their private and family lives with their working life.

This has to be done within the context of social dialogue, and we hope that the employers, who today are so concerned by effective consultations, will participate, as I am sure they will do in Spain, in reducing the working day so that we can go forward towards a world of greater well-being at work

I will end here, and I will not use up all the time available to me, but I would once again like to thank you for the opportunity that you have given us to be heard and to say in all humility that the Government of Spain is ready to learn from any recommendations that are made by the Committee of Experts. We firmly believe in tripartism, we believe in the ILO system, we believe in social dialogue and we believe in human labour rights above everything. You can always find an ally in Spain for the implementation of ILO policies.

Unfortunately, a case of a certain urgency requires me to return to Madrid. I have to catch a flight in around 50 minutes and I will not be able to listen to the replies of the Employers and Workers. I offer sincere apologies, and it will be for the Spain team to listen to them carefully. I once again thank them and I am fully at their disposal because we believe that it is a closed case, which in any case has given us the opportunity to renew our commitment to the ILO, which we will do once again tomorrow with the ratification of the new Conventions by the Second Vice-President of the Government.

Worker members – I would first like to thank all the speakers for their participation in this discussion. I particularly welcome the many interventions by the Employers' group, who have recalled the value that they place on the comments of the Committee of Experts and who have made plentiful references to General Surveys. I also thank the Government for its clarifications and constructive approach.

We would also like to react to some of the issues raised. Certain speakers criticized the Spanish Government for its involvement in the collective bargaining process. These comments are worthy of interest, but fall outside the scope of the Convention and therefore of today's discussion.

The same applies to the reflections on the intervention of Spain to the International Court of Justice concerning the right to strike. This is not one of the subjects listed under Article 5 of the Convention. Indeed, as I said at the beginning, this provision makes a precise enumeration of the various subjects, and the positions taken by Governments in the ILO Governing Body are not in that list. I repeat, they do not include the positions taken up by Governments in the ILO Governing Body.

In contrast with what seemed to be said by some speakers, the Convention does not cover tripartism and the promotion of social dialogue in general terms. Its objective is more limited. As its title clearly indicates, it specifically covers tripartite consultations on international labour standards. We may regret or deplore that, but, in the meantime, it is the real situation to which we have to adapt.

No one here can deny the existence of social dialogue mechanisms in Spain. The discussion that we have just had was able to illustrate the efforts made by the Government to give effect to the Convention in law and practice. The Government has also made specific commitments in relation to the matters raised by the Committee of Experts. The Committee will have the occasion to assess the situation when it receives the next report from the Spanish authorities. In the meantime, we encourage the Government to continue its efforts for the implementation of the Convention.

Employer members – The Employer members would like to thank the Government and the various speakers who took the floor for their interventions and the information provided, of which we have taken full note.

We reiterate the importance of Convention No. 144 as one of the four governance Conventions with a very high ratification rate, which promotes the application of the principle of tripartism through effective consultation with representative employers' and workers' organizations at the national level. Tripartism is one of the pillars of the ILO, which distinguishes the ILO from any other international organizations.

The Employer members recall that it was within this Committee that the possibility of adopting an instrument dealing specifically with the creation of national tripartite bodies was first suggested in 1972, with the aim of involving more closely employers' and workers' organizations in the standard-setting process. The Convention has the merit of including flexible elements. However, to be effective, consultations should not be limited to purely formal approaches, and representative employers' and workers' organizations should receive full attention. The Employer members consider it essential that the input of employers' and workers' organizations should be given serious consideration by the competent authority. Therefore, we welcome the willingness of the Government to further improve the process of tripartite consultation and encourage the Government to report on the progress made.

The Employer members recommend that national authorities take the necessary and appropriate measures to ensure that effective consultations are carried out with the representative employers' and workers' organizations.

Specifically, we recommend that the Government:

- first, guarantee effective consultation with representative employers' organizations;
- second, proceed to implement the announced mechanisms;
- third, adopt other complementary measures so that effective and permanent consultations are held on issues related to international labour standards; and
- finally, provide information to the Committee of Experts before its next meeting on the issues discussed and the frequency and content of tripartite consultations.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee recalled that tripartite consultation to promote the implementation of international labour standards is of paramount importance.

Taking the discussion into account, the Committee requested the Government to continue to guarantee effective consultation with representative employers' and workers' organizations in the procedures required under the Convention and to provide information on the frequency of those consultations and working methods.

The Committee requested the Government to provide the information requested as well as information on the measures taken to implement the above recommendations in accordance with the regular reporting cycle.

Government representative – We thank the Committee for these conclusions, which request the Government to continue to guarantee effective consultation with representative employers' and workers' organizations in the procedures required under the Convention.

Spain wishes to affirm as a matter of principle its respect for the ILO supervisory system. We recognize and support the independence of the Committee of Experts. We have at all times defended its mandate and functions in the ILO supervisory system, and we consider the role of the Committee of Experts to be indispensable in undertaking an impartial technical examination of the manner in which Member States apply Conventions in law and practice.

Our country wishes to continue being a reference point in defence of the standard-setting mandate of the ILO in the context of multilateral cooperation, which the Organization of course represents through its tripartite composition, and as also demonstrated by the tripartite agreements concluded at the national level in recent years between Governments and the social partners.

We wish to give thanks to the Workers' Group and the Employers' Group for their interventions, and to the members of Spanish unions and employers' organizations.

We have taken note of the conclusions in relation to the provision of information in accordance with the regular reporting cycle on the frequency of tripartite consultations and the working methods, as well as information on the measures adopted.

In light of the above, and in our conviction that human rights and labour standards are fundamental for relations between persons and nations, we thank all those who through their presence have contributed to the achievement of the Organization's objectives of social justice and its standard-setting mandate.

Tunisia (ratification: 1957)

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

Written information provided by the Government

Further to the observations of the Committee of Experts concerning the violation of the right to organize, it should be noted that Tunisia has never failed in its ILO-related obligations concerning the effective application of the International Labour Conventions. It has always strived to ensure the proper application of ratified Conventions, which currently total 64, including Convention No. 87, the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135).

Further to the observations of the Committee of Experts concerning the violation of the right to organize, it should be noted that Tunisia has never failed in its ILO-related obligations concerning the effective application of the International Labour Conventions. It has always strived to ensure the proper application of ratified Conventions, which currently total 64, including Convention No. 87, the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135).

It is also important to note that the Ministry of Social Affairs applies equal treatment for all social partners, including occupational organizations and unions, respecting neutrality, transparency and the preservation of social peace, as part of strengthening the right to organize and upholding the law in a work environment that is free from violence, pressure and threats of any kinds, all in the national interest.

I. Arrest of the Secretary General of the Tunisian motorway trade union, Anis El Kaabi

The Secretary General of the Tunisian motorway trade union, Anis El Kaabi, was arrested on 31 January 2023 and detained as part of an open investigation into the exploitation of a public servant aimed at undermining the administration or agreeing to prevent the exercise of public service through collective resignation. In accordance with sections 96 and 107 of the Criminal Code, Anis El Kaabi was released on Thursday 18 April 2024. The indictment chamber of the Tunisian Court of Appeals therefore decided to release him under the current conditions – free but with a travel ban – and on 5 March 2024 the Court of Cassation rendered null and void the decision of the indictment chamber to refer him to the criminal chamber.

II. List of essential services

Section 381 ter of the Labour Code has reproduced the definition of the notion of “essential services” adopted by the Committee on Freedom of Association, that is, “to determine situations in which a strike could be prohibited, the criterion which has to be established is the existence of a clear and imminent threat to the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population’s interests”. Section 381 ter therefore stipulates that “a service is considered essential where the interruption of the work would endanger the life, safety or health of the whole or part of the population”. This definition has in practice not given rise to any problem or difficulty, mainly owing to the deeply rooted tradition consisting of the resolution of collective labour disputes and all related issues, by means of social dialogue and consensus. This consensual approach, taken by the social partners (employers, workers’ unions, public authorities) has continuously resulted in the signing of agreements between employers and workers on the achievement of minimal work in the essential services, particularly in the public services (hospitals, water and electricity providers, and so forth). This practice has allowed us to avoid using the compulsory arbitration provided for in section 381 ter of the Labour Code, nor the requisition mentioned in section 389 of the Code.

III. Amendment of the Labour Code

Our country is currently undergoing a legislative overhaul in the area of labour and industrial relations, aimed at progressively amending the labour legislation, strengthening conditions of work and workers’ fundamental rights, eradicating all forms of precarious labour and reinforcing job security, which are all currently part of our overarching priorities. In this framework, and in accordance with the instructions of the President of the Republic of Tunisia, Mr Kais Saied (February 2024), and with the objective of providing decent working conditions to workers in the public and private sectors, and eradicating precarious jobs while ensuring institutional continuity and sustainability, the Ministry of Social Affairs has undertaken an updated and urgent inventory of outsourcing agencies, and has stepped up campaigns on precarious work by monitoring compliance with the decent work principles, aimed at setting out visions for legal mechanisms and reforms to address this type of employment. To this end, two committees have been appointed at the level of the Cabinet and the Ministry of Social Affairs, responsible for preparing a Bill on the amendment to the Labour Code to put an end to all forms of precarious work.

1. Affiliation of children to trade unions

Concerning section 242(2) of the Labour Code which stipulates that minors over the age of 16 may join a trade union unless their father or guardian objects, it should be noted that the legal age of majority has been standardized in Tunisian legislation to 18 years. Likewise, the legislator adopted the age of 18 as the starting point for majority in a number of areas, such as marriage, which is 18 years for both sexes under section 5 of the Personal Status Code, or for obtaining a driving licence and identity card. Further, the ratified international labour standards have contributed to the progressive establishment of a system to protect against child labour and uphold the values of humanitarian law. The original framework of this system is in the 1966 Labour Code, the provisions of which, from certain perspectives, have been strengthened based on the 2022 Constitution, and have been further incorporated into other provisions included in texts for general application. In addition, the ratified international labour standards have been seamlessly introduced into Tunisian law. The Labour Code, moreover, has enabled children to enter working life, with conditions for special protection and, in this context, it should be noted that trade union membership for children under 18 years is not a restriction, given that the legislation constitutes an indivisible whole and cannot contain conflicting provisions. Hence why the legislator insisted on the status of “worker” for membership of a trade union and section 242 of the Labour Code stipulates that trade unions or occupational associations or unions of persons exercising the same occupation, similar trade or related occupations leading to the production of specific products, or the same liberal profession, may be formed. This section does not include the requirements for the membership of workers in trade unions, in accordance with which they have to be at least 18 years old, but instead provides for the possibility for minors to join trade unions unless their father or guardian objects. In addition, in the case of persons who have not reached the legal age of majority, most of their obligations are considered null and void and inappropriate as they do not yet have legal capacity, all of which benefits minors who have not reached puberty and legal maturity. Likewise, the Labour Code classifies this category of children as young workers as it considers them, within the meaning of section 353 of the Labour Code, to be apprentices and not workers. They receive compensation and not a wage. Under section 353, any person found to have knowingly employed, as an apprentice, worker or employee, young people under the age of 18 who do not fulfil the terms of their apprenticeship contract, or who have not been duly released, shall be liable to pay compensation to the head of the abandoned establishment or workshop. In accordance with the foregoing, the national legislation is wholly consistent in this regard and is in line with the interests of minors and protection of children.

2. Access of foreigners to the functions of trade union leadership

Regarding the prior approval that must be granted to foreign nationals to exercise trade union functions, this does not limit foreign workers’ right to organize, as they can be trade union members and exercise the right to strike in the same capacity as Tunisians, even if they do not have the possibility of participating in trade union leadership. Likewise, Chapter II of the Labour Code establishes the conditions for the recruitment of foreign labour. Section 258 stipulates that “The provisions of this chapter establish the conditions for the recruitment of foreign labour in Tunisia, in accordance with the agreements concluded between the Tunisian Republic and foreign countries and with specific legal provisions.” In addition, section 278 of the Labour Code stipulates that the declaration of establishment shall necessarily include the nationality of the foreign workers employed, which requires verification of the residence permit numbers, the date of issue and the period of validity. These sections are designed to protect foreign workers against abuse and non-compliance with the principles of decent work, on the one hand, and to maintain general order and social peace, on the other. Likewise, the Government considers that the five-year period provided for in section 251(1) of the Labour Code is a reasonable period. The same period is required, for example, for European Union citizens to obtain the right of permanent residence in another European Union country after having resided there legally and continuously for five years.

3. Restrictions to the right to strike

In this respect, Tunisian legislation complies with international labour Conventions, including the Convention, even though it does not explicitly provide for the right to strike. Thus, the provisions of Article 3(1) of the Convention are formulated in such a general manner that they are open to wide interpretation. These provisions do not specifically deal with the conditions for exercising the right to strike, but essentially deal with the rights of workers' and employers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules, to elect their representatives in full freedom, to organize their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes. National legislation has enshrined freedom of association and has attempted to close this loophole. It even includes provisions that are broader than those contained in the Convention and in the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). Freedom of association in our country is thus a constitutional freedom, the Constitution guaranteeing the right to organize and the right to strike. Article 21 stipulates that "All citizens have equal rights and duties, and are equal before the law without discrimination. The State guarantees the individual and collective rights and freedoms of all citizens". In addition, article 40 of the Constitution requires that "the freedom to form political parties, trade unions and associations is guaranteed. Political parties, trade unions and associations undertake in their regulations and activities to respect constitutional provisions and the law, and financial transparency and non-violence". Both the right to organize and the right to strike are guaranteed by article 41, which stipulates that "The right to organize, including the right to strike, is guaranteed". It can therefore be said that the protection of the right to strike does not pose any problem in national legislation or in practice, and considering that Tunisia has acceded to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, in accordance with Act No. 30 of 29 November 1968, section 8 of which provides that the right to strike is guaranteed, provided that it is exercised in accordance with the legislation of the country concerned. Likewise, the Labour Code has codified this right through provisions that are fully in line with those contained in the Convention, in particular Article 3 of the Convention, which provides that "Workers' and employers' organisations shall have the right [...] to organise their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes", and Article 8, which provides that "The law of the land shall not be such as to impair, nor shall it be so applied as to impair, the guarantees provided for in this Convention". Regarding the approval by workers' trade union federations of a strike or work ban, to date the Government has not received any comments or complaints from active occupational associations of employers or workers in Tunisia. Even the rules of procedure of employers' and workers' organizations include the requirement that their central authority approve strikes or work bans, in accordance with the Labour Code. Consequently, strike action in our country does not pose any problem and national legislation does not therefore violate the provisions of the Convention, which has not, as mentioned above, established the right to strike, thus opening the way to various interpretations. In order to address this vacuum and ambiguity, the Governing Body decided to raise the matter before the International Court of Justice to seek its advisory opinion. The Government therefore considers that sections 376 bis, 376 ter, 387 and 388 of the Labour Code are consistent with the interests of occupational associations of employers and workers in Tunisia.

IV. Representativeness criteria

The Government, (the Ministry of Social Affairs) is working with the social partners to develop a vision of a system of trade union representation that is compatible with the parties, and in line with the particularities of the economic and social situation and the system of industrial relations, with the support of the International Labour Office in Tunisia. In the context of setting standards for trade union representativeness, and in order to close the legal loophole in the legislation defining these standards and regulating trade union pluralism, and in accordance with the provisions of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), and following the seminars organized with the ILO on potential representativeness standards, the Ministry, with a view to ensuring that the determination of representative organizations at the sectoral and enterprise level is based on clear, pre-established, objective criteria adopted after consultation with all the concerned workers' and employers' organizations, invited in writing the occupational associations, namely, the Tunisian Union of Industry, Trade and Handicrafts (UTICA), the General Federation of Tunisian Workers (UGTT), the Tunisian Federation of Agriculture and Fisheries (UTAP), the Tunisian Labour Organization (OTT), the Tunisian Federation of Insurance Companies, the Tunisian Federation of Newspaper Directors, the Tunisian Professional Association of Banks and Financial Institutions, the occupational association of Tunisian enterprise owners, the Tunisian Farmers' Union (SYNAGRI), the Tunisian General Confederation of Workers (CGTT), the Tunisian Workers' Union (UTT), the Confederation of Citizen Enterprises of Tunisia (CONNECT), the Tunisian Hotel Trade Federation, the Tunisian Workers' Federation, the Tunis transport union and the National Union of Tunisian Journalists, in order to examine the proposed standards and express their opinion. Our departments received a number of related responses from the following occupational associations: CONNECT, UTAP, SYNAGRI, OTT, UTT, CGTT, the Tunis transport union and the occupational association of Tunisian enterprise owners. The others did not furnish any response. Likewise, the Ministry invited the most representative organizations to attend a working meeting for this purpose, but they did not attend. To address this situation, the Ministry is currently considering renewing the dialogue with all concerned parties, with the support of the ILO in Tunisia, and drawing on a wide range of comparative experiences planned as part of upcoming training programmes. We recently examined and shared documents and studies on the Algerian experience of legislation on trade union representativeness.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the Government representative of Tunisia, the President of the General Committee for Labour and Professional Relations at the Ministry of Social Affairs, to take the floor.

Interpretation from the Arabic: Government representative – At the outset, I would like to thank the Committee for giving us the opportunity to speak in this room. This is the first time that Tunisia has appeared before this Committee. We know the significance of this Committee and welcome the opportunity to provide information on the observations made and on our practices and legislation, which are fully in line with international labour standards, particularly those relating to fundamental rights at work and decent work.

Tunisia respects its commitments to the ILO both in law and in practice. It implements the ILO Conventions and respects its obligations in this respect. Tunisia intends to implement the 64 Conventions it has ratified in good faith, including this Convention, the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135). We endeavour to ensure that our legislation complies with ILO standards in all areas.

Tunisia defends fundamental rights at work and guarantees the application, in practice, of these principles enshrined in our national legislation on freedom of association. This right is clearly enshrined in the Constitution of Tunisia, and there are no laws that undermine or restrict these principles. This is guaranteed in our Labour Code and through collective bargaining and framework agreements.

The Constitution clearly guarantees the rights set forth in the Convention. Workers can form or join a trade union without prior authorization. I wish to recall that Article 8 of the Convention stipulates that workers and their organizations must respect the law when exercising their rights. I emphasize that the exercise of these rights must not interfere with public order.

With regard to the arrest of Mr Anis Kaâbi, the Secretary-General of the trade union representing officials of the Tunisian Motorway Association (STA), the details of this arrest are too complex and we will not go into them here. We have provided all the details with the relevant information to the Committee. In the interest of upholding the law, the enterprise concerned lodged a complaint for "exploitation of a public servant's function aimed at undermining the administration, or plans to obstruct the exercise of a public service by mass resignation". This case has been brought before the courts in accordance with national law and we would not have learned of it but for the request for details of the arrest. Allow me to recall the fact that Mr Kaâbi was released on 18 April 2024.

Regarding the right to strike, I wish to inform you that in 2023, 47,924 workers participated in strikes in various branches in Tunisia without being prosecuted.

On the revision of the Labour Code, our country is currently making efforts to invest in labour institutions and promote a decent and sustainable work model. We are also committed to using digital transformations intelligently to improve the well-being of workers. Our approach is to gradually amend the law to improve working conditions and fundamental rights of workers. Our main priority is to guarantee and increase stability and to ensure occupational safety and health. The President of the Republic has asked for the legislation to be overhauled, focusing on labour law and social justice. Decent work conditions must be guaranteed for workers, in both the public and private sectors, by eliminating all forms of precarious work. A review of the subcontracting situation in enterprises has been undertaken and campaigns against precarious employment have been stepped up. Decent work requirements are being closely monitored and Tunisia is considering adopting a legal procedure to combat these forms of employment. A committee has been set up to examine a Bill amending the Labour Code to strengthen decent work taking account of the structural reorganization taking place in the working environment and new forms of employment.

With regard to children's membership in trade unions, section 242(2) of the Labour Code sets out that minors over the age of 16 may join a trade union, unless their father or guardian objects. It is important to note that the legal age of majority has been standardized in Tunisian legislation at 18 years. National legislation is therefore consistent and protects children's and minors' interests in accordance with international agreements. Trade union activities are important activities which lead to heavy responsibilities, such that those who carry out such activities must know how to act and take complex decisions. Hence why the legislation provides that authorization must be obtained from parents or guardians for their children's membership. After that, these minors can take on heavy responsibilities.

Turning to the right to strike, our legislation is aligned with the ILO Conventions in this regard, particularly Convention No. 87, even though this Convention does not mention specifically the right to strike and this matter has been referred to the International Court of Justice. Freedom of association is also enshrined in our national legislation, which contains more extensive provisions than those contained in Conventions Nos 87 and 98. Freedom of association is at the heart of Tunisia's fundamental principles and labour law, and is a prerequisite for social justice. It is a right enshrined in the Constitution, which guarantees that all individuals shall exercise public freedoms, the right to join or form a trade union and the right to strike. Further, Tunisian legislation guarantees the exercise of the right to strike without limitation by avoiding a narrow definition of the term, thereby allowing for a broad interpretation, and a limitation of the objectives. Trade unions can therefore decide on the duration of a strike. The purpose of the requirement to report the duration of a strike, under labour law and the Labour Code, is to prevent a work stoppage in a particular branch and to give both parties the opportunity to settle their differences peacefully.

With respect to the approval of strikes by the trade union confederation authorities, the Government has not received any comments or complaints from workers' occupational organizations on the conditions for the approval of strikes by their union authorities. On the contrary, their rules of procedure include such conditions for approval. Are these conditions also considered an obstacle to the exercise of the right to strike by the trade unions themselves?

Concerning the ability of foreign nationals to exercise a trade union function, this is not limited to the right to organize, as they can be members of a trade union and exercise their right to strike in the same way as Tunisian nationals. Foreign nationals may hold leadership positions five years after acquiring Tunisian nationality. After that period, they may hold other positions under the supervision of the Ministry of Social Affairs. These conditions are designed to protect foreign nationals from abuse and non-compliance with the principles of decent work, and also to protect workers against any exploitation for purposes unrelated to trade unions and the exercise of trade union rights. This is why the Government verifies the status of foreign workers wishing to carry out trade union leadership functions – to protect the country's stability and security.

In the context of standard-setting for trade union representativeness, and to fill a gap in the legislation by specifying these details, including with regard to the regulation of trade union pluralism, and in accordance with the provisions of Convention No. 144 on tripartite consultation and following the meetings organized with the ILO on the rules governing the determination of representative status, the Ministry organized a round of negotiations with all the workers' and employers' organizations, inviting them to provide their views. To date, we have received only a few responses. The Ministry is therefore envisaging a dialogue with all parties involved with the support of ILO Tunisia. We have also shared a document from other trade unions. As the Ministry of Social Affairs, which covers trade union representation, is one of the main areas of cooperation with the ILO regional office, we received a letter from the regional office on 19 May 2024 confirming these priorities and stating its willingness to pursue technical cooperation. I will stop here as I have run out of time and I will intervene later

Worker members – We have before us the case of Tunisia's compliance with Convention No. 87. We still remember the ban imposed last year on the International Trade Union

Confederation (ITUC) and the European Trade Union Confederation (ETUC) from visiting the country to help their members. This ban is not in line with Articles 5 and 6 of the Convention.

The Committee of Experts noted a number of aspects that amount to interference in trade union activities. We recall, for example, in 2021, a court ruling to annul a decision to convene the congress of the Tunisian Trade Union Confederation (UGTT). The Government explained that the Court of Appeal overturned this decision. It nevertheless appears to us that this legal procedure shows a lack of protection for the independence that trade union organizations should enjoy.

This precedent shows us that it is generally quite easy to challenge the functioning of trade union organizations before the courts. The possibility of appeal and the final court decision are not likely to dampen this observation. Indeed, the existence of an appeals procedure does not mean that damage is not done and that the trade union is not prevented from carrying out its activities.

This regrettable situation does not stop there. As noted by the Committee of Experts, several trade union leaders have been, and continue to be, intimidated and arrested. There have also been criminal proceedings and administrative sanctions. Other speakers will illustrate several of these facts in detail. But at this stage, I would like to underline the inextricable link between trade union freedom and civil liberties.

In this regard, I recall the content of the resolution adopted by the 54th Session of the International Labour Conference. In particular, it emphasized the right to personal freedom and safety to protection against arbitrary arrest and detention. More than ever, we must reaffirm that the right to organize can only flourish in a climate free from violence and intimidation.

The Committee of Experts also made a series of observations on certain legal provisions that should be reformed. The Government must make efforts to undertake this and to initiate a reform process. This reform must, of course, unfold within the framework of a genuine social dialogue involving trade unions and employers; and such a dialogue is currently lacking. We regret that the Government has not been holding genuine social dialogue consultations for several years. This situation is of course damaging. It feeds instability and prevents the protection of workers' rights.

We invite the Government to take today's discussion as an opportunity to relaunch the inclusive dialogue mechanisms and bodies.

Employer members – This case of Tunisia deals with the application in law and in practice of Convention No. 87. Convention No. 87 is a fundamental Convention which Tunisia ratified in 1957. The Committee of Experts made observations six times in this case: 2011, 2012, 2015, 2018, 2022 and 2023. The Committee is discussing this case for the first time, however.

We have taken note of the written and oral information submitted by the Government on this case. The latest observations of the Committee of Experts are mainly in respect of three areas:

The first relates to the arrest and criminal prosecution of the Secretary-General of the Tunisian Motorway Association. We note, however, the Government's information that the Secretary-General has since been released on 10 April 2024 after a judicial process in Tunisia.

The second set of observations relate to the Labour Code. Here, the Committee of Experts have highlighted three areas in which Tunisia's Labour Code is not in conformity with the Convention, particularly Articles 2 and 3, at least according to the Committee of Experts.

The first area of concern is section 242 of the Labour Code, which requires children who have reached the age of admission into employment to obtain the consent of their parents or guardians in order to exercise their trade union rights.

The second relates to section 251 of the Labour Code, which does not permit foreigners to hold leadership positions in trade unions, even after a reasonable period of residence in the country. As you have heard, they need to have been in the country for a period of five years.

The third area relates to sections 376 bis, 376 ter, 387 and 388 in respect of strikes.

The Employers' group agrees with the Committee of Experts that legal provisions that restrict minors from exercising their trade union rights, when they are able to work legally, are not in conformity with the Convention. We have noted the Government's information that the legal age to be admitted into employment has been revised to 18 years, and that workers below that age are only considered apprentices and not workers in a real sense. However, to the extent that apprentices are performing work as workers and should be entitled to trade union rights, we call on the Government to ensure that the Labour Code's provisions are harmonized with the Convention.

With respect to foreign workers, we note the Government's response that its legal requirement for such workers to qualify for trade union leadership after five years, is not in conflict with the Convention. To the extent that the Government may benefit from ILO technical assistance in harmonizing its laws with the Convention, including on the reasonableness of the qualifying period, we urge the Government to seek such assistance.

With respect to the provisions on strikes, the Employer members would like to recall their disagreement with the Committee of Experts' views concerning the Convention and the right to strike. They wish to emphasize that neither Convention No. 87 nor any other ILO Convention contain rules on the right to strike. This fact has been highlighted by the Government group in their position statement of March 2015 according to which "the scope and conditions of this right are regulated at the national level". As a consequence, governments can legitimately determine their own approach to the right to strike, freely guided by their national needs and priorities, and are not held to follow the Committee of Experts' recommendations. It is in this light that the Employer members are addressing the case of Tunisia.

With regard to the third area of observations, the representativeness of workers' organizations, the Government's information is that they are still in the process of consulting. The Committee of Experts has made it clear that there should be criteria that are "clear, pre-established and objective" for determining an organization's representativeness. The Government's position is that pending any consensus on this issue following consultation, the matter of the representativeness of any workers' organization is still to be determined by the Secretary of State for Young Persons, Sports and Social Affairs under section 39 of the Labour Code. While this may achieve a determinative effect in any particular dispute, it is unfortunately not consistent with what is required and we would, therefore, urge the Government to expedite the process of consultations, and of review of the Labour Code to make sure that indeed issues of representativeness of organizations are determined or settled through clear, pre-established and objective criteria.

Interpretation from Arabic: Worker member, Tunisia – Firstly, I would like to thank the Committee for accepting the report of the UGTT on violations of trade union rights in Tunisia. We would have liked to see this case addressed last year in order to prevent the violations, which have worsened over the past 12 months.

In this context, we wish to recall that the Tunisian trade union movement was born two centuries ago, adhering to the principles of liberty and independence. Our movement took part in the national battle for Tunisia's independence and, during the post-independence period, participated in many struggles to defend freedom of association, the independence of the UGTT and democracy. The Tunisian working class, represented by its trade union leaders, has paid dearly in terms of martyrs and prisoners tortured and deprived of their work. Despite the numbers of victims and tragedies, we have learned from these experiences that freedom of association is workers' most valuable asset and that security, stability and a country's progress depend entirely on the existence of strong trade unions that prize their liberty, their independence, regardless of the political regime or the labels attached to successive governments.

Against this backdrop, the UGTT played a major role in the Revolution of Dignity that took place from December 2010 to January 2011 and overthrew the dictatorship. The union subsequently assumed significant responsibilities in ensuring a peaceful transition to democracy and, as you know, we also led the 2013 national dialogue between all political and social actors which protected Tunisia and spared it from conflict and civil war, allowing, moreover, the Tunisian people to choose their representatives and President through free elections witnessed by the whole world in 2011, 2014 and, most recently, 2019.

The UGTT and its partners supervised national dialogue and received the Nobel Peace Prize in 2015, illustrating the world's acknowledgement of, and support for, our role in consolidating the values of democracy, human rights and social justice in Tunisia.

Many steps have been taken in the areas of freedom of expression, the right to organize and the development of law and practice in line with international standards on freedoms and human rights.

There have also been significant developments in social dialogue over this period thanks to its institutionalization through the National Social Dialogue Council and the extension of its scope to include social, economic and general development matters.

The social partners have also respected the deadlines set for the revision of wages, amendments to collective agreements and the resolution of labour conflicts. This has all been done in a timely manner and on the basis of negotiation, dialogue and a sincere desire to find solutions.

For some years, however, social dialogue in Tunisia has seen a real regression, a serious decline and a loss of what had been achieved over decades of perseverance, struggles and sacrifices. This decline has coincided with gross violations of trade union rights and severe restrictions on freedom of association. The UGTT and its leaders have been targeted, and its organization has experienced difficulties.

Allow me to list some of the infringements of the right to dialogue and negotiation and trade union rights, in gross violation of international treaties, particularly the Convention under discussion and Convention No. 98.

Firstly, the National Tripartite Council has been frozen. The Council, which was responsible for social dialogue, has been unable to resume its work after the Government refused to publish the names of its representatives as required by law. The National Social Dialogue Council, created with the support of the ILO, has been prohibited since October 2021, impacting social dialogue and policies on consultation and participation, and opening the way to unilateral decisions by the Government.

Secondly, the Government published Circular No. 20 of 9 December 2021 imposing severe and unjustified restrictions on collective bargaining and social dialogue within institutions by deliberately complicating procedures and requiring the agreement of the Prime Minister prior to any negotiations among institutions, their management and trade unions. This has rendered negotiation virtually impossible from a practical standpoint. The restrictions and complications imposed by the Circular are tantamount to restrictions on the right to organize. They violate the right to organize and Convention No. 87, and they infringe the right to collective bargaining as set out in Convention No. 98, which was ratified by the Tunisian Government in 1957.

Third, the Government has failed to respect its commitments to, and agreements with, the UGTT. The Government has violated a great number of those obligations under many agreements, including agreements reached in 2015, October 2020 and on 6 February 2021 and 15 September 2022. The last of those agreements includes seven points, of which just two have been implemented. Many agreements reached between ministries or public bodies and sectoral trade union associations affiliated to the UGTT have also been frozen. These agreements were reached as a result of trade union struggles, after long discussions with the parties concerned, but they were subsequently abandoned, and no commitment has been made to implementing them. The Government intends to undermine the credibility of trade union activities among the membership, stir up frustration among trade unionists and reduce the credibility of social dialogue.

Fourth, the Government makes unilateral amendments and changes to labour law without involving or consulting the UGTT.

Fifth, in addition to the lack of consultation, the Government has taken unilateral decisions that limit freedom of association and refuses to respond to the union's calls. The Government is therefore attempting to suppress trade union activities and does not allow for the settling of conflicts. One example of such action is the dismissal of all the regulations that the State should consider so as to facilitate trade union activities, that have been guaranteed for decades. Freedom of opinion has been trampled. All the regulations and restrictions have blocked trade union activities. We have documents that prove that trade unionists have been arrested arbitrarily, including Mr Anis Kaâbi, the Secretary-General of the trade union representing officials of the Tunisian Motorway Association, who has finally been released. Similarly, another individual was arrested the day after the President gave a speech at the factory at which he worked and has been tried. Regrettably, the violations of the right to organize harm independence and occur against a backdrop of general violations of rights and freedoms that began some time ago and that continue to cause harm to democracy, of which Tunisia was a pioneer in the region. We supported initiatives to uphold and embed democracy in order to improve the socioeconomic situation which led to the revolution, freedom and dignity in Tunisia. It is also important to highlight that the UGTT assisted in the fight for liberation, it received the support of trade unions in America and Africa in promoting peoples' right to self-determination, and it is the organization that contributed to the national dialogue that saved the country from war. The UGTT won the Nobel Peace Prize and yet, unfortunately, is today being punished for defending rights and freedoms and supporting lawyers, journalists, bloggers and prisoners of conscience.

This is the general context that we have presented to you in our report on violations of freedom of association in Tunisia. We support all trade union representatives in the world who are attacked and repressed. And I would like to call on all of you, once more, and on the Government to comply with international Conventions, to align our laws with those Conventions and to reopen dialogue.

Interpretation from Arabic: Employer member, Tunisia – The majority of cases that come before this Committee concern Convention No. 87, demonstrating that tripartite dialogue at the international level has not borne fruit and has not met its objectives. That failure is embodied by this international Committee's inability to resolve the question of the right to strike, leading the Governing Body to refer it to the International Court of Justice, when in reality it is a tripartite matter concerning the constituents.

Indeed, the Convention makes no mention of the right to strike or the suspension of work by employers. Similarly, there are no international standards on the exercise of the right to strike, related rights or obligations towards others when exercising that right. That is the reason why the matter has been referred to the courts and is now subject to legal interpretations, and why the only references are national legislation and bilateral and trilateral agreements between States.

The most difficult and delicate aspect of this is avoiding confusion between, on one hand, the legal right to organize – a right of employers and workers – and, on the other hand, the framework of criminal and civil law. Most of the cases submitted to this Committee, at this session and many others, relate to modalities for the exercise of the right to strike and the suspension of work by employers. This shows that it is indispensable to define a legal and practical framework that achieves a balance between freedom of association and the right to express views and defend interests peacefully, and the need not to restrict the freedom of work and activity of persons not involved in a strike and to ensure free access to workplaces and public services. Moreover, it should be recalled that the exercise of this right must not entail non-peaceful activities or the occupation of workplaces.

That is where the role and importance of tripartite social dialogue lie in this instance. Indeed, it is this dialogue that allows for a balance between rights and obligations. It is also this dialogue also allows a line to be drawn between the exercise of the right to organize and political activities. And, in the course of such dialogue, it should be established that those responsible for infractions must be held to account.

With regard to the position of the employers, we have no problem with representative pluralism and representativeness in trade unions. It is true that the UGTT is the most representative trade union in the economic sphere and that it is our main partner in labour relations. There are, however, other trade unions in other sectors with which we have relationships, such as the Tunisian Union of Industry, Commerce and Craft Trades and unions representing workers in travel agencies, hotels, pharmacies, insurance agencies and banks, as well as lawyers. This ensures true pluralism in trade union representation. Since 2016, the Government has undertaken consultation with us and with the UGTT on pluralism in trade union activity and trade union representativeness. A study on this subject has been carried out by an international expert under the auspices of the ILO, and a workshop was organized by the ILO with the social partners in March 2017. A tripartite commission was set up to draft an agreement on trade union representativeness, although, regrettably, the coronavirus (COVID-19) pandemic put paid to those efforts.

We do not view the requirement for parental authorization for minors' membership of trade unions as a hindrance to trade union activity or the right to organize, and we have not received any complaints in that regard. We believe that the decision to join a trade union should be linked to the legal age of majority, which is 18 years in Tunisia, in line with the decision taken in 2010.

We have not received any reservation or complaint from the UGTT in relation to the approval of the Confederation of a decision to strike or the suspension of work by an employer.

The social partners are of the view that the UGTT, which represents workers and employers, safeguards strike activities and supervision. We believe that the notice period presents an opportunity for conciliation and mediation. Three quarters of labour conflicts are managed by the UGTT and resolved peacefully and amicably.

After listening to the various speakers and taking note of the observations of the Committee of Experts and the Government's responses, we would like to make the following remarks:

Firstly, we are extremely happy at the court-ordered release of the Secretary-General of the trade union representing officials of the Tunisian Motorway Association, Mr Anis Kaâbi, on 18 April 2024. Nevertheless, despite the large amount of information communicated to us, we will not enter into this discussion of the case of Mr Anis Kaâbi or of other trade union officials since we believe that this Committee is not a courtroom in which appeals may be lodged, and we are convinced that matters concerning justice in Tunisia are for the Tunisian judicial system to address and should be resolved in line with Tunisian law. Lastly, we are surprised at Tunisia's inclusion on the list of individual cases on the application of Convention No. 87 since the facts as presented do not, in our view, constitute a violation of workers' fundamental rights. We believe that shortcomings may be resolved through dialogue and social consultations.

Worker member, Italy – I take the floor on behalf of the Italian trade union confederations: the Italian General Confederation of Labour (CGIL), the Italian Confederation of Workers' Trade Unions (CISL) and the Italian Union of Labour (UIL), as well as the French trade union confederations: the French Democratic Confederation of Labour (CFDT) and the General Confederation of Labour (CGT).

The Committee of Experts noted with concern the observations of the UGTT and the ITUC alleging violations of trade union and human rights committed by authorities, in particular arbitrary arrests, threats and intimidation, and criminal and administrative prosecutions taken against trade unionists.

In Tunisia, in 2021 the Government further restricted civil liberties and harassed and persecuted trade union leaders. The authorities adopted and applied with rigour Decree No. 54, of which the UGTT has repeatedly demanded the withdrawal. This law penalizes all expressions of dissent, protest or demand with a prison sentence of up to five years and administrative fines. With this penalty, trade union activists daring to carry out their normal duties are at constant risk of arrest and harsh sentencing.

Italian and French workers are deeply concerned with the imprisonment and red targeting of trade unionists and escalating judicial harassments against civil society activists and trade union members.

This perpetuates a climate of fear, undermining the fundamental rights of workers to organize their activities and advocate their interests, free from interference and intimidation, in total disregard of the provisions of the Convention.

In addition to a complete lack of social dialogue in Tunisia, we are also concerned about the continued violations of collective bargaining rights and severe violations of civil liberties and denial of the right to international trade union solidarity.

In this repressive context, Mr Anis Kaâbi, the Secretary-General of the trade union representing officials of the Tunisian Motorway Association, was arrested because of a strike organized in January 2023. At the end of the same year, in the Sfax district, dozens of trade unionists were reported and at least four UGTT members were arrested including the union's regional Secretary-General, Mr Youssef Aouadni.

These and other incidents have earned Tunisia the reputation of being one of the ten worst countries in the world for workers, according to the Global Rights Index 2023 compiled by the ITUC. On 29 February 2024, Taher Mezzi, Deputy General-Secretary in charge of the private sector in the UGTT, was arrested before a scheduled protest movement in La Kasbah with the clear purpose of weakening and threatening the independent trade union movement.

We urge the Tunisian Government to drop all the pending charges and cease the political imprisonment of trade unionists and activists for exercising their fundamental rights and freedoms.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Saudi Arabia – Saudi Arabia wishes to commend the progress made by Tunisia to the implementation of the Conventions ratified by that country in accordance with international labour standards. We also commend Tunisia's cooperation with the supervisory mechanisms. Further, we applaud the efforts made by Tunisia in seeking to enhance the fundamental rights of workers, as well as efforts undertaken to create decent working conditions in the public and private sectors.

In addition, we are happy to note that Tunisia is seeking to foster social justice by putting in place legislation that takes due account of social policies and protects the rights of workers. In conclusion, we once again thank the Government of Tunisia for all that it is doing.

Interpretation from Arabic: Worker member, Bahrain – I am speaking on behalf of the Workers' Federation of Bahrain, Libya and Morocco. I represent all of those workers and we of course stand in solidarity with our brothers in Tunisia.

Convention No. 87 is the bedrock for free, independent and democratic trade unions, that respect workers' choices while guaranteeing the safety and security of trade unionists and their organizations.

In Tunisia today, the trade union movement, and more particularly the UGTT, is a one that has a proud history of struggle, and that is today being attacked as an organization. Members of that organization are repeatedly alleged of wrongdoing such that prevents them from working in a way that is conducive to trade union activities flourishing in the country.

The UGTT is a national organization in Tunisia. It represents workers and with reference to the Convention, we know that it has to be able to work in a way that allows those elected to represent the interests of the workers. We, the workers of Bahrain, stand in solidarity with workers in Tunisia and with the UGTT. We call for application of the Convention to be guaranteed in Tunisia. We call for all necessary steps.

Government member, Nicaragua – The Government of Reconciliation and National Unity of the Republic of Nicaragua notes and is grateful for the information provided by the Tunisian authorities. It also recognizes the efforts, initiatives and achievements of the Tunisian Republic in complying with its ILO obligations relating to the application of international labour Conventions, the harmonization of its national legislation with international labour standards and its full cooperation with the ILO supervisory bodies.

Nicaragua recognizes Tunisia's efforts to amend its labour legislation, including the Labour Code, to promote workers' fundamental rights, provide decent working conditions for workers in the public and private sectors, and eliminate all forms of precarious employment.

Achieving social justice is a top priority for the Tunisian Government, which strives to promote it through the development of legislation and the implementation of social policies safeguarding workers' rights. At the international level, Tunisia has confirmed this approach by joining the Global Coalition for Social Justice launched by the ILO.

We also acknowledge Tunisia's initiatives and efforts in working closely with the ILO to regulate trade union pluralism by defining criteria for trade union representation.

We congratulate Tunisia for its continued commitment to pursue a path to social justice, with a view to respecting the labour rights of workers and the Tunisian people.

Worker member, Spain – I am speaking on behalf of the Spanish trade unions: the Trade Union Confederation of Workers' Commissions (CCOO) and the General Union of Workers (UGT). Today, the Committee is considering the case of Tunisia regarding the violation of the Convention, ratified by Tunisia in 1957, particularly Article 3(2) of the Convention, establishing that the public authorities shall refrain from any interference which would restrict this right or impede the lawful exercise thereof.

In 2023, the Tunisian Government expelled the Secretary-General of the European Trade Union Confederation (ETUC) during a visit to Tunisia to support the UGTT. Other trade union members from Europe were likewise returned to the Tunisian border. Further, an ITUC delegation was informed that it could not enter Tunisia.

A defamation campaign was launched against the UGTT leaders, accusing them of seeking outside assistance, thereby disregarding the values of international trade union solidarity and the right of trade union organizations to mutual support in times of crisis. This undermines the provisions of the Convention, which set forth non-interference in trade unions' affairs and protection of the right to organize.

The Tunisian authorities are duty bound to protect the right to organize and facilitate the situation of trade unions. However, they withdrew from the UGTT the right to allow its leaders to dedicate themselves entirely to trade union activities, obliging them to perform their usual duties instead of devoting themselves to trade union work, a practice that has been in place for over fifty years. The Tunisian Government did not stop there and brought many trade union leaders before the courts and many were dismissed from their posts.

As the violations committed by the Tunisian Government to isolate the UGTT are multiple, we ask that the ILO intervene as thoroughly as possible in the case of Tunisia in order to address the serious incoherence with the road map that the Tunisian society designed as part of an exemplary democratic transition, which has since been halted and which was an example worldwide, even being awarded the Nobel Peace Prize.

The ILO must also guarantee the participation of the trade unions and associations involved in this process and return hope of a better future to the Tunisian people.

Government member, Pakistan – Pakistan appreciates that Tunisia is engaged with the ILO in the implementation of the Convention. We encourage the Tunisian Government to further extend its cooperation within the ILO's tripartite framework. We emphasize that dialogue and engagement remain the best vehicles to address any concerns and to promote labour rights and standards. We are confident that continued collaboration between Tunisia and the ILO will pave the way for amicable resolutions.

Worker member, South Africa – I take the floor on behalf of the workers of South Africa to inform the Committee that the trade union movement is being exposed to a major, unjustified and unprecedented attack by the executive authority in Tunisia, which was prepared by the legal texts: Decree No. 117 of 22 September 2021 and Decree No. 54 of 2022. The decrees restrict trade union activity and freedoms in general and fabricate cases against the trade unionists, isolate many of them, withdraw the career plans of some of them, and suspend the status of those who devote themselves to union work on behalf of all the leaders of the national, regional and sectoral organizations.

We have no doubt about the ferocity of the attack carried out by the authorities against the UGTT. We have followed this through many reports received, since the UGTT and the three national organizations announced the launch of a national initiative to find solutions and consensus between the various parties to confront the unilateral and authoritarian approach of the head of the executive authority, which brought together in his hands all powers, whether legislative, executive or judicial, in order to overcome the stifling economic crisis that has cast a shadow over the social conditions of Tunisians.

After this announcement, comrade Anis Kaâbi, Secretary-General of the Tunisian Motorway Association, was thrown into prison on charges of harming the company's interests after a two-day strike on 30 and 31 January 2023. He remained in prison for 14 months, which is the maximum period for court suspension. Despite his temporary release, the case is still ongoing and his freedom is still threatened, as he could face a harsh prison sentence again.

Furthermore, 16 comrades from the transport sector, led by the General-Secretary of the Transport union, comrade Wajih Al-Zaidi, were brought forward on the pretext of causing chaos in front of the minister's office. Comrade Wajih was also referred to trial on charges of violating Decree No. 54, which holds accountable anyone who makes critical statements to the executive authority in the media or via the media and on social networks.

For several months, comrade Senki Assoudi, General-Secretary of the Regional Labour Union of Kasserine, has been in prison on malicious charges. He was arrested immediately after the visit of the Head of State to the institution where he works. The Head of State gave a speech in which he directly accused Senki Assoudi of charges, without any evidence.

Comrade Youssef Al-Awadni, General-Secretary of the Regional Federation in Sfax, has been subjected to security investigations and trials several times, against the backdrop of strikes, protest movements and labour disputes, and with him more than 80 trade unionists were referred to the courts because of their union activity.

This year, comrade Abdel Salam Al-Atawi, General-Secretary of the Religious Affairs Syndicate, died while he was forced to take refuge in Algeria after the abuse to which he was subjected, together with 16 union leaders from this sector. They were expelled from work, and some of them were brought to trial on malicious charges, and the case of the deceased union leader was still being followed up by the United Nations High Commissioner. These are the very examples of the violations of the Convention.

Interpretation from Chinese: Government member, China – We appreciate the introduction by the representative of the Tunisian Government. We have carefully read the Report of the Committee of Experts and have taken note of the supplementary information submitted by the Government.

The Government has been committed to fulfilling its obligations in compliance with relevant ILO Conventions, incorporating international labour standards, implementing the Convention, taking the Committee of Experts' recommendations seriously and providing timely information as required. The Tunisian Government has achieved significant progress and we appreciate the Government's proactive cooperation and actions.

The Government has revised labour legislation to protect workers' fundamental rights and provide them with decent working environments and conditions. It has maintained close communication with the ILO Secretariat, engaged in extensive collaboration with social partners and established standards for union representation. It has exchanged practices in union legislation with neighbouring countries and it values the technical support provided by the ILO. Regarding promoting social justice as a priority, the Government keeps advancing legislation and implementation of social policies protecting the rights of workers as well.

We are pleased to see that the Government has joined the Global Alliance for Social Justice. We look forward to close cooperation and active engagement of the Government in promoting social justice with relevant stakeholders. We urge the ILO Secretariat to enhance communication and exchanges with the Tunisian Government, strengthen mutual understanding and cooperation, provide necessary technical support to the Government, help the country enhance its compliance capacity, and further promote its economic and social development.

Worker member, Brazil – At the outset, I would like to offer my sincere solidarity to the workers of Tunisia. We know how the actions of a Government with authoritarian practices can be damaging to democracy and in particular the trade union movement.

In Tunisia, a campaign of intimidation and harassment has been launched against trade unions, including arrests, criminal prosecutions and administrative measures against trade unions, such as the arrest of the Secretary-General of the UGTT, Mr Anis Kaâbi, for a lawful and legal strike, the dismissal of trade union leaders and the use of the law enforcement agents to control and restrict trade union activity.

The observations and concerns raised by the Committee of Experts, in particular the arrest of comrade Anis Kaâbi, were confirmed by the Government in its report and imply serious violations of trade union rights.

The Compilation of decisions of the Committee on Freedom of Association contains various paragraphs on this subject, of which we highlight 76, 124 and 127.

It should be underscored that prosecution of trade union representatives does not only involve national trade union leaders but also leaders of the opposition outside the country, lawyers, judges, activists and journalists.

Social dialogue in Tunisia is virtually prohibited. Thus, in addition to not making the regulatory changes necessary for the implementation of the Convention, in line with training provided by the Government itself, the recent proposed legislative amendments were made without the participation of the social partners, and in some cases the new regulations are used to quash the right to protest. This is the case of Decree Law No. 54/2022 on combating crimes related to information and communication systems.

The arrest of the lawyers, Sonia Dahmani and Mehdi Zagrouba, at the bar school in Tunisia, for example, is an extremely serious case that we could discuss until the end of the Conference, without even exhausting all the violations committed. I will therefore focus on the aspect we consider to be the cruellest of the Government's practices, the detentions and arrests.

The act of taking away the freedom of human beings by imprisoning them for their trade union convictions and political practices is an act of the most severe reprobation and is certainly one of the most perverse forms of prosecution. Removing an individual from living with others in society, from being close to family and friends because of political differences, violates all the international human rights treaties.

In short, given the degree of reprobation and the related practices, here in this meeting, we urge that a high-level mission be recommended for Tunisia to create an environment conducive to social dialogue and to examine the discrepancies between the national legislation and compliance with international labour standards.

Government member, Indonesia – The Government of Indonesia respectfully urges the ILO to recognize and commend Tunisia’s substantial progress in implementing the Convention. Tunisia has demonstrated a steadfast commitment to international labour standards through comprehensive legislative reforms and strong cooperation with ILO supervisory bodies. Tunisia’s efforts to align national laws with international standards, coupled with active engagement of social partners, underscore its proactive approach to labour rights advocacy.

By prioritizing social justice initiatives, Tunisia sets a commendable example for other nations. Furthermore, Tunisia’s regulation of trade union pluralism and constitutional guarantee of the right to strike highlight its dedication to an inclusive and equitable labour environment. These measures reflect Tunisia’s profound commitment to safeguarding fundamental labour rights and ensuring that workers’ voices are respected within the legal framework.

The Government of Indonesia believes Tunisia’s efforts deserve positive acknowledgment and continued support from the ILO. Tunisia’s progress in enhancing labour standards and fostering a fair labour environment aligns with the core values and mission of the ILO.

Tunisia’s proactive measures and dedication to improving labour conditions serve as a valuable example for other Member States, demonstrating the benefits of aligning national legislation with international labour standards and fostering collaborative relationships with social partners.

In conclusion, the Government of Indonesia reiterates its strong support for Tunisia’s efforts in implementing the Convention and encourages the ILO to recognize these significant strides, providing continued assistance and recognition to Tunisia in its journey toward promoting and protecting labour rights.

Worker member, Norway – I am speaking on behalf of trade unions in the Nordic countries and Solidarnosc in Poland. We were all proud when the Tunisian National Dialogue Quartet, consisting of workers’ and employers’ organizations, alongside the Lawyers and the Human Rights League, was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 2015 for its decisive contribution to building a pluralistic democracy in Tunisia following the Jasmine Revolution of 2011. We hoped for a democracy that respected human and labour rights, utilizing social dialogue to create a new and better society.

In February 2023, the Norwegian Confederation of Trade Unions and the Norwegian Employers’ organization hosted a tripartite delegation from Tunisia, including two ministers, to exchange experiences on tripartite structures and social dialogue. However, instead of continuing the constructive work and dialogue to overcome common challenges in Tunisia and build on the trust established in Oslo, the situation has unfortunately deteriorated.

We are extremely disappointed to find that developments have gone in the wrong direction. Recently, there have been arrests, accusations, criminal prosecutions and administrative measures taken against trade unionists. Social dialogue is no longer taking place, and the labour organization, the UGTT, and the Employers’ organization, the Tunisian Confederation of Industry, Trade and Handicrafts (UTICA), are excluded from the process of amending national laws. Sadly, Tunisia’s current Government has also decided to impose restrictions on the free operations of trade unions, including the right to assembly and industrial actions.

The right to organize, bargain collectively and conduct their own activities without government interference are key elements of the ILO's mandate, essential for advancing social justice and shared prosperity. Moreover, a well-functioning social dialogue benefits the economy and the country by involving employers and trade unions in regulating employment relations, promoting industrial harmony, productivity and stability.

We urge the Tunisian Government to take the necessary measures to comply with the Convention, ensuring that laws and practices align with the Convention. It is imperative that labour unions can fully exercise their rights to organize, bargain collectively and operate freely without government interference.

Finally, we call on the Government to review the social dialogue in Tunisia.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Libya – We support the reforms undertaken by Tunisia in implementing its obligations under ILO Conventions that Tunisia has ratified, namely Convention No. 87 on freedom of association and Convention No. 98 on collective bargaining. The State of Libya commends the measures taken by the Tunisian Government in gradually amending its labour legislation in order to afford workers their fundamental rights and to provide decent work conditions in both the private and public sectors, as well as eradicating all forms of precarious work and setting up a committee that is in charge of preparing a draft law in order to eliminate outsourcing and to adopt legal mechanisms that would further eradicate all forms of precarious work. All these amendments are in line with more freedoms and with the rights and principles enshrined in the Constitution of Tunisia and ILO standards.

We also commend Tunisia for making use of comparative experiences and studies of neighbouring countries. We welcome Tunisia's further reforms and its full cooperation with the ILO supervisory bodies by providing answers and clarifications and taking into account the observations of the Committee of Experts. We request the withdrawal of the case of Tunisia from the list of individual cases, taking into account the progress made by Tunisia in guaranteeing labour standards.

Government member, Türkiye – Türkiye welcomes the redefinition of the concept of essential services in Tunisian Labour Code, through social dialogue and consensus. It is an important development that this approach, adopted by social partners, resulted in the signing of agreements between employers and workers on the provision of minimum service in essential services.

We see the work initiated by the Tunisian Ministry of Social Affairs and the establishment of two committees in the execution of this work, to eliminate precarious jobs for workers in the public and private sectors, within decent working conditions, as an important step. Türkiye commends the effort of the Government to gradually change labour legislation, in order to improve the fundamental rights of workers and provide decent working conditions.

We appreciate the fact that the Government is working with the ILO, in cooperation with the social partners, to regulate trade union pluralism by defining criteria for trade union representation.

We agree with Tunisia's views that the right to strike is not clearly included in the Convention. We recognize the importance of safeguarding the right to strike as an integral element of labour rights and principles in constitution and relevant laws.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Algeria – We have listened carefully to the speech by the Tunisian Government on the implementation of the Convention. The Government has clearly indicated its determination to apply the provisions of the Convention and to work closely with the ILO, in particular to define the criteria for trade union representativeness, and its obligations. We welcome this cooperation with the supervisory bodies through the provision of information, particularly that based on the Committee of Experts' recommendations.

We are pleased with the Government's efforts to comply with ILO standards to strengthen fundamental labour rights and ensure decent working conditions in the public and private sectors, together with all its attempts to eradicate precarious work as a means of achieving greater social justice.

The Government has also established a committee to prepare a draft revision of the Labour Code to effectively end all forms of outsourcing. We welcome this cooperation with the ILO and the dialogue with the social partners to determine criteria for trade union pluralism, with the involvement of certain occupational associations, particularly the most representative, and we believe that this broad dialogue which will be initiated by the Government will allow us to achieve the desired result.

Tunisia is a pioneer with regard to the right to strike and establishes a number of guarantees in the 2022 Constitution, which safeguards this right and its full enjoyment. It has adopted the necessary legislation. Greater dialogue is needed with the Government to further strengthen the results achieved so far regarding social justice in Tunisia.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Lebanon – Lebanon welcomes the intervention by the brotherly State of Tunisia and we would like to thank Tunisia for the report it provided regarding the implementation of the Convention. We would like to commend the efforts deployed by Tunisia and its commitment to ILO standards and to aligning its national legislation with ILO Conventions and their provisions, and with the recommendations of various ILO committees, namely this Committee and the Committee of Experts. We also welcome Tunisia's efforts towards improving its working environment and providing justice to all social partners. This is part and parcel of Tunisia's constructive dialogue and cooperation with the ILO in terms of determining the legal and administrative measures required to improve fundamental rights and principles at work in the public and private sectors, and guaranteeing the right to strike and freedom of association in a healthy working environment in accordance with Tunisia's 2022 Constitution. In conclusion we welcome the progress made so far by Tunisia in establishing decent working environments and we wish it every success in its endeavours.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Syrian Arab Republic – The delegation of the Syrian Arab Republic welcomes the information provided by the delegation of Tunisia. We commend Tunisia's fulfilment of its obligations under ILO Conventions and the full implementation of the provisions of these Conventions in aligning its national legislation with ILO standards.

We also welcome Tunisia's full cooperation with the supervisory bodies of this house by providing answers and clarifications requested, and taking into account the observations of the committees, namely the Committee of Experts. Tunisia's gradual amendment of its labour legislation in order to guarantee the fundamental rights of workers to provide decent working environments in both the public and private sector and to eliminate all forms of precarious work should be commended and appreciated by all. In addition to that, Tunisia is deploying considerable efforts in order to achieve social justice, and this is clearly apparent by Tunisia's early joining of the Global Coalition on Social Justice which was launched by the ILO last June. The delegation of the Syrian Arab Republic supports the stance of the Tunisian Government that is based on a spirit of consensus, cooperation and dialogue in order to reach the desired conclusion. This will reflect positively on all constituents. It will protect Tunisian national interests in line with its sovereignty, legislation and laws and would guarantee the application of ILO Conventions in line with Tunisian national legislation and in cooperation with the ILO.

Government member, Philippines – To date, Tunisia remains steadfast in its commitment to uphold its obligations towards the ILO. We take note of Tunisia's diligent implementation of international labour Conventions, harmonization of national legislation with international labour standards, and full cooperation with the ILO supervisory bodies, evidenced through active engagement with the Committee of Experts.

We take note of the efforts being made by Tunisia in gradually amending its labour legislation to enhance workers' fundamental rights, ensure decent working conditions, and eliminate precarious employment. It is notable that a dedicated committee is revising the Labour Code to address subcontracting and develop legal frameworks for better working conditions.

In response to observations from the Committee of Experts, Tunisia is collaborating with the ILO and social partners to regulate trade union pluralism. We take note that Tunisia consulted occupational organizations on criteria for union representation, inviting the most representative to a working session. We encourage the Government to continue the dialogue with all stakeholders with the support of the ILO.

We also take note of the efforts of Tunisia in leveraging comparative experiences by exchanging studies with neighbouring countries regarding union representation legislation. It is notable that ensuring this issue remains a priority in cooperation with the ILO, and Tunisia has requested and will benefit from technical support in this field.

Regarding the right to strike, although the Convention does not explicitly provide for this right, and its interpretation is pending before the International Court of Justice, Tunisia has been a pioneer in guaranteeing and organizing this right. The Constitution of 25 July 2022 enshrines the freedom of association and the right to strike. The Government refrains from enacting restrictive general legislation, allowing parties to exercise the right to strike freely.

Government member, Gabon – Gabon thanks Tunisia for the information it has provided to the Committee on the application of the Convention.

My country welcomes the Tunisian Government's commitment to respecting its ILO obligations, as reflected, for example, in its full cooperation with the ILO supervisory bodies. In this regard, we appreciate the work carried out with the ILO, in consultation with the social partners, to follow up on the observations of the Committee of Experts on the matter of trade union representativeness.

We encourage the Government to renew dialogue with the social partners to resolve this matter, starting by establishing criteria for representativeness. My country requests the Office to provide the necessary technical assistance for this purpose.

We are also pleased to note that the right to strike is enshrined in article 41 of the Tunisian Constitution of 25 July 2022, which is a major achievement and demonstrates the country's commitment to promoting fundamental labour principles and rights.

Finally, my delegation calls on the Government to continue its efforts to realize social justice, in consultation with the social partners and for the well-being of all Tunisians.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Egypt – The delegation of Egypt welcomes the statement by the Government of Tunisia on the implementation of the Convention. We commend Tunisia's renewed commitment to its international obligations and its commitment to the implementation of ILO Conventions, as well as its close cooperation with the ILO supervisory bodies.

Tunisia has gone a long way in terms of its reforms of its legislation. Tunisia is working on gradually amending its labour legislation in order to strengthen the fundamental rights of workers in both the private and public sector, as well as eliminating precarious work and employment. In this regard, Tunisia has set up a committee to revise its labour code to put an end to outsourcing. We commend Tunisia's cooperation with the ILO in consultation with the social partners to strengthen freedom of association. We note that Tunisia has consulted occupational associations and has called for the most representative associations to take part in this dialogue that will take place soon in Tunisia.

Tunisia has made use of comparative studies and experiences of neighbouring countries when it comes to legislation on union representativeness. Tunisia has made sure that union representativeness is part and parcel of its fields of cooperation with the ILO and has priority. Tunisia has been a pioneer in terms of guaranteeing the right to strike. It has enshrined the right to strike and freedom of association in its 2022 Constitution. The Government has made sure it did not interfere in or restrict the right to strike. In conclusion, we welcome the efforts made by the State of Tunisia and we value its attempts to be in compliance with ILO standards. We hope that the Committee will take into consideration all these efforts made in Tunisia when it comes to its conclusions.

Government member, Nigeria – Nigeria wishes to lend a strong voice in support of the efforts Tunisia is making towards the implementation of the Convention and by responding to the observations of the Committee of Experts. The ILO is invited to recall that Member States give effect to ratified Conventions based on national peculiarities and development plans, which Tunisia is committed to achieving. The ILO is therefore requested to acknowledge the progress made by Tunisia and its commitment to review its laws and legislation with a view to promoting fundamental principles and rights at work, decent work for its workers, as well as upholding the tenets of social justice.

Tunisia, in this regard, may wish to request for technical assistance from the ILO, to enable it to achieve its aspirations to the effective implementation of this Convention. We enjoin Tunisia to remain committed to upholding best practice in its labour administration system, by partnering with its social partners accordingly.

Government member, Cameroon – The Tunisian Government has ratified Convention No. 87, and Conventions Nos 98 and 135. The ratification of these fundamental Conventions generally indicates a State's commitment to ensuring respect for the basic fundamental human right of freedom in the world of work.

Given that liberty is an inalienable human right, the Government, through the Tunisian Court of Appeal, decided to release Mr Anis Kaâbi, Secretary-General of the Tunisian Motorway Association, and on 5 March 2024 the Court of Cassation overturned the decision of the indictments chamber to refer his case to the criminal chamber.

The review of a labour code requires a substantial amount of time. Indeed, in addition to consulting with all actors in the world of work, it is important to bear in mind influencing factors and developments in the modern world. Tunisia has begun the process with the aim of making progressive changes to labour law, strengthening working conditions and workers' basic rights and eradicating all forms of precarious work by making all these rights national priorities. These efforts have resulted in the establishment of two commissions within the Cabinet and the Ministry of Social Affairs charged with drafting a Bill to amend the Labour Code to put an end to all forms of precarious work.

Convention No. 138 sets the minimum age for admission to employment at 16 years, and article 242 of the Tunisian Labour Code provides that a minor over 16 years may join a trade union unless his or her father or guardian objects. It should be noted that the legal age of majority has been standardized in Tunisian legislation at 18 years.

It is important to continue social dialogue to ensure access for foreign nationals to trade union office. We therefore urge the ILO to continue to provide close support, and we invite the Tunisian Government to increase the number of platforms for the necessary social dialogue and the relevant consultations, in order to support all stakeholders in the world of work and uphold social justice.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Sudan – The Government of Sudan wishes to echo the statement here by the representative of Tunisia in reaffirming that Tunisia does indeed honour its commitments under Conventions that it has ratified, including the Convention being discussed. Convention No. 87 governs freedom of association and protection of the right to organize, and is a Convention that Tunisia honours and respects. Sudan commends Tunisia's cooperation with the ILO supervisory mechanisms. Tunisia submits reports and information requested, and also cooperates with the Committee of Experts. We applaud the steps taken by the Government of Tunisia in modifying the Labour Code in order to enhance the fundamental rights of workers and guarantee their right to decent work. All of these measures taken together strengthen freedoms and respect for law, and they are fully in line with international labour standards. Tunisia has done more than that, it has learned from the experience of other countries. It has pooled data information with them and shared experience with them. The right to strike is at present being considered by the International Court of Justice. We would, therefore, encourage and indeed urge the ILO not to intervene in this matter but to continue to provide technical assistance to Tunisia for the handling of individual cases.

Observer, IndustriALL Global Union (IndustriALL) – I am speaking on behalf of IndustriALL, the International Transport Workers' Federation (ITF), and the Building and Wood Workers' International (BWI).

We are closely following developments in Tunisia and the UGTT's struggle for genuine social dialogue and respect for freedom of association. The Government of Tunisia has been indirectly suspending the work of the National Council of Social Dialogue since 2021 by failing to appoint its own representatives to the Council.

The Government issued Circular No. 20 in 2021 which resulted in serious restrictions to the exercise of collective bargaining in the sectors, as well as the non-implementation of the agreements between the sectorial unions and the respective ministries. These restrictive measures are affecting about 40 sectorial unions. In addition, the Government has failed to implement the agreements of February 2021 and September 2022. Further, the Government started unilaterally amending the labour laws and excluded the UGTT from the discussions.

On freedom of association and on limiting trade union work, the Government has cancelled the concessions, as enshrined in the national and international agreements and Conventions on allowing workers holding a trade union position to work full time for the UGTT (full time unionists). In addition, the Government has requested the unionists to pay huge financial compensation. This is apparent in the case of Tahar Berberi, Bassam Ben Treka, and Mohamed Bedera. Tahar Berberi, who was the Vice-President of IndustriALL and is currently the Assistant General-Secretary of the UGTT for the private sector, is facing a trial and he is also banned from travelling abroad because of his union work.

In Tunisia, union leaders face dismissals and transfers from jobs because of their union work. Union leaders are subject to fabricated court cases because of their union activities, and some have been jailed. The case of brother Anis Kaâbi from the transport sector, who spent 14 months in prison, is a blatant example of such violations.

Let us also not forget the restrictions and attacks on union solidarity actions. Last year, sister Esther Lynch, the General-Secretary of ETUC was ordered by the Government to leave the country after taking part in a protest against the crackdown on trade unions and workers' rights. Esther Lynch had travelled to Tunisia as part of a delegation of international union leaders to show solidarity with the UGTT, whose members are being subjected to a campaign of harassment by the country's Government.

We call on the Government to implement all the signed agreements between the Government and the UGTT and social partners, end all forms of harassment of trade union leaders, respect the national and international agreements and well-established national practices on union representation.

Therefore, it is imperative for the ILO to take urgent high-level action in the country and to meet with the social partners to ensure that the rights to freedom of association and collective bargaining are respected.

Chairperson – I have the honour to give the floor to the Government representative of Tunisia, for her concluding remarks.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government representative – I would like to thank all the speakers and I note with satisfaction that most of the contributions commended the efforts made by Tunisia to develop legislation on labour and freedom of association, and to enshrine these principles in law and in practice. This reflects an interest in following Tunisia's steady advancements towards the creation of a trade union climate that encourages dialogue.

In this respect, I wish to clarify Tunisia's firm position on treating all persons equally and respecting judicial independence. We are all liable to judicial oversight, whether we are trade unionists or not. Being a trade unionist does not exempt a person from judicial oversight for committing acts not related to their trade union activities. The examination of these cases therefore is based on the act and not the identity of the person. These procedures are in place in all areas, including for trade union organizations. A trade unionist can be prosecuted for violating trade union rules. Can we interpret this procedure as harassing and targeting trade unionists? No, because the trade union organization is governed by laws and rules and is entitled to set up a safeguarding mechanism against any persons who cannot respect the rules. This is why the Tunisian Government guarantees the right to strike and to work on an equal footing. Judicial prosecution of persons who commit offences, such as prohibiting the freedom to work, is unrelated to violations of freedom of association but is related rather to personal freedom to work. This is why any actions taken are done so in order to prosecute acts that are prohibited under criminal law. It is necessary to clarify the difference between two situations. On the one hand, the right to organize and the right to strike, and on the other, violation of regulations and public order and the undermining of freedom to work. With regard to social dialogue, as usual, the Government held discussions with the UGTT on wage increases in 2021, 2022, 2023 and 2024 for public and private sector workers. This demonstrates the existence of social dialogue. In the same vein, we have designed 42 measures as part of a framework agreement between the Government and the trade unions. We have also reviewed various other agreements and have started negotiations on those, such as those for the textile industry and other sectors. To illustrate the existence of social dialogue in the country, I wish to present some relevant figures. In 2023, we registered 380 notifications of strikes, 215 of which were withdrawn following dialogue with the social partners through negotiation. This proves that there is social dialogue in Tunisia.

With regard to the implementation of Decree No. 21, this relates only to public institutions. This has never undermined collective bargaining in public institutions and has never imposed restrictions on trade union work. In 2023, we received 152 notifications of strikes from the UGTT in the public sector concerning Decree No. 21. We were able to withdraw 65 per cent of these notifications, which proves that this Decree has not affected bargaining and social dialogue. This Decree aims rather to guarantee the implementation of the agreements signed between the administration and the unions.

To conclude, it is worth recalling that most of the speakers at this Conference in all the committees have agreed on the changes facing the world at different levels, particularly in the world of work with the emergence of new forms of work and the impact of this on labour relations; not forgetting the impact of demographic change, migration and climate change, which will have repercussions on all societies, all workers and all institutions. These challenges require that labour legislation be observed, that decent and sustainable work, and fundamental rights and principles at work be enshrined, that precarious work models be addressed, and that social protection for all workers be ensured, in line with international labour standards. This underscores the urgent need to formulate a new social contract, particularly in the light of the significant transformations that many countries in our region are undergoing. And Tunisia, like other countries, is affected by all these transformations. Tunisia has, for example, undergone profound social and political transformations which have led to this current period of rebuilding. We are developing a vision for the State's role and design in social prosperity. This vision includes efforts to meet people's economic, social, health and cultural needs. In addition, it is important to mention the difficulty of the current situation and the Government's willingness to ensure adequate social protection for vulnerable groups. This requires giving priority to social questions over others. This work involves targeting the most vulnerable groups, tackling unemployment, improving living conditions by giving citizens the resources necessary to live with dignity, thereby ensuring a human-centred and sustainable approach. We are aware of the stakes. This is why, despite the difficult situation, we were among the first to join the Global Coalition for Social Justice. This reflects our willingness to move forward to find the difficult balance between economic and social affairs in a way that serves the foundations and principles of social justice and enshrines human rights in all their dimensions. We welcome all the statements made during this meeting and the guidance that we can take into consideration in our progress towards establishing social justice. We rely heavily on the ILO's technical support in this area.

Employer members – We would like to, once again, thank the representative of the Government of Tunisia for the information, both written and oral, but also for the commitment expressed here today to avail itself of technical assistance from the ILO in order to make progress on the challenges that we have all been talking about, and that is commendable. With regard to the observations of the Committee of Experts, the Employer members would like to recommend to the Government the following: that the Government reviews the Labour Code with a view to harmonizing it with the Convention: (i) in respect of the trade union rights of workers who are minors but have reached the age admission into employment; (ii) in respect of foreign workers' ability to access leadership roles in trade unions after a reasonable period of residence in the country; and (iii) to ensure that questions about the representativeness of workers' organizations are settled through clear pre-established objective criteria.

Worker members – We thank the Government for the explanations provided to our Committee. We note the observations made by the Employers concerning the right to strike. We will simply recall that we do not share this view and we refer to our position on the subject.

We invite the Government to follow up on the various points raised, both by the Committee and during our discussion today. It is fundamental that the Government ensures a climate free from intimidation, as a condition sine qua non to achieve freedom of association. To give new momentum to social dialogue in the country, we invite it to accept a high-level mission.

In order to facilitate the organization of this mission, we invite the Government to ensure the presence on the ground of the representative workers' and employers' organizations, the ITUC and the IOE. These organizations can then assist their members in this context.

I wish to conclude by recalling that the trade union movement in Tunisia has always been part of the historical turning points of the country. Whether in the fight for independence or at other significant periods, it has always been a positive force. We invite the Government to turn to this force to build the country's prosperity.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted with deep concern the reports of arrests, accusations, criminal prosecutions and administrative measures taken against trade unionists for carrying out activities protected under the Convention.

Taking into account the discussion, the Committee urged the Government of Tunisia, in consultation with the social partners, to:

- restore an environment conducive to the enjoyment of freedom of association free from intimidations, threats and arbitrary arrests;
- ensure that workers' and employers' organizations are able to organize their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes in full freedom, in accordance with the Convention;
- ensure that representatives of independent international workers' and employers' organizations are allowed to support their affiliates in accordance with Articles 5 and 6 of the Convention;
- ensure that the Labour Code is brought in conformity with the Convention;
- ensure that the determination of representative organizations at sectoral and enterprise level is based on clear, pre-established and objective criteria.

The Committee invited the Government to seek ILO technical assistance, if necessary, in the implementation of the above-mentioned recommendations.

The Committee requested the Government to report to the Committee of Experts on all measures taken and progress achieved in order to implement the Committee's recommendations and on all outstanding information requested by the Committee of Experts before 1 September 2024.

Government representative – At the outset, I wish to thank the members of the Committee for their professionalism and neutrality in the examination of the various cases that have been presented and submitted during this session.

We welcome the recommendations adopted on the application of freedom of association and the right to organize. We will follow the recommendations in cooperation with the social partners. While our views may differ, we all share the same sense of national commitment; and we want to build a bridge of consensus using a dialogue of consensus that will respect the diversity of our respective roles.

In Tunisia, we all consider that dialogue should be a choice. We must act on this option, we must choose it in a renewed commitment. It must not be imposed by force. We are committed to dialogue and we consider the ILO our historical partner. It is a partner with which we have shared many concerns and many hopes, particularly that of building a better and more prosperous world of work, where human rights are widely respected based on the concept of the world of work and shared responsibilities. Hence why we wish to welcome all offers of technical assistance by this Organization, which has always stepped up whenever we needed it.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98)

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the Government representative of Türkiye, Adviser to the Minister of Labour and Social Security, to take the floor.

Government representative – Before I begin my remarks, I would like to congratulate you and your Vice-Chairpersons on your election to this Committee. I wish you every success in your endeavours to make this Committee's work more fruitful, objective and meaningful, in a spirit of constructive dialogue.

First of all, I would like to bring to the attention of the Committee that Türkiye is the second country after Finland to ratify Convention No. 98, among Member States party to all fundamental ILO Conventions. This highlights our commitment to international labour standards. Türkiye actively integrates these standards into national legislation through tripartite dialogue, reflecting its dedication to democracy, the rule of law, and universal legal norms. As a founding member of the Council of Europe, G20 and OECD and the 19th largest economy in the world, Türkiye is a significant donor of Official Development Assistance as well.

We regret its inclusion in the final list of individual cases for Convention No. 98 with a double footnote, emphasizing our long-standing partnership with the ILO. Despite geopolitical hardship, along with challenges including a coup attempt, earthquakes and the coronavirus (COVID-19) pandemic, Türkiye urges the Committee to recognize our considerable progress, emphasizing the importance of maintaining the credibility of the supervisory mechanisms.

Since the last discussion in 2013, significant advancements have been made in Türkiye's labour legislation: the revised articles on determination of the branch of activity; protection of shop stewards; scope and level of the collective labour agreement and benefiting from collective labour agreements; regulating competence; settlement of collective labour disputes; regulating prohibition and postponement of strikes and lockouts; e-membership services for trade union memberships in a few countries worldwide; and initiation of the mediation procedures, encompassing regulations concerning the branch of activity and the extent of collective bargaining agreements. At the same time, there is coverage of the entitlements derived from such agreements, objections regarding competence determinations, competence itself, and prohibitions on strikes and lockouts.

These matters are undeniably significant in the realm of labour, both domestically and internationally, and are addressed with clear favour towards employees. Türkiye's labour laws and legislation give prominence to the protection of employees, recognizing their position as the weaker party in the employment relationship.

Let me start with the Committee's concerns on the personal scope of the Convention, particularly regarding prison staff. Collective agreements provide benefits to all public servants, including prison staff, who are ineligible to join unions under article 15, and retired public servants.

A 2023 Constitutional Court decision permits heads of departments, faculty deans, institute and college directors and their deputies to establish and join trade unions, suggesting that their roles in public power do not automatically disqualify them from trade union membership. The justification of this decision may serve as stimulating jurisprudence for narrowing the category of public servants who cannot become members of the trade union.

Regarding locum workers and certain public servants working without a written contract, like teachers, nurses and midwives, their employment relationship is governed by status employment laws, not contracts. Therefore, their exclusion from trade unions aligns with legal stipulations, as outlined in the Public Servants Law.

Correspondingly, the Tripartite Consultation Board, chaired by the Minister of Labour and Social Security Mr Vedat İşikhan, was convened on 20 October 2023, with the agenda entitled "Social Dialogue in the Turkish Century." Representatives from the Ministry, affiliated institutions, workers and employer confederations attended the meeting to discuss challenges facing the country in this area. Subsequently, it was decided to establish sub-working committees and commence immediate collaboration with confederations, trade unions, lawyers, lecturers and relevant public officials.

The sub-working committee convened its first meeting on 23 May 2024, focusing on challenges within the current Trade Unions Law, particularly concerning the determination of authorization and freedom of association. It has begun to discuss possible amendments to the Law in this regard. It agreed to hold a second meeting on 26 June 2024.

Regarding the allegations of massive dismissals in the public sector, following the 2016 coup attempt, public servants, including some trade union representatives, were dismissed from their positions based on their alleged ties to terrorist organizations. The Inquiry Commission on State of Emergency Actions, operational from 2017 to 2023, aimed to assess and address such dismissals.

Over the past five years, significant judicial efforts have been dedicated to addressing the issues outlined by the Committee.

Accordingly, it is crucial to note that the President of the Republic introduced a judicial reform strategy in May 2019. As part of this strategy, the Eighth Judicial Package, published in March 2024, expanded the mandates and authorities of the Human Rights Compensation Commission, established in 2013, to further shorten litigation processes.

The Compensation Commission is mandated to examine applications related to delayed proceedings within one month from the date of investigation, trial or final decision. It also assesses individual applications at the Constitutional Court within three months and applications made to the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) within three months of the Constitutional Court's decision of rejection or, as of 10 October 2023, from the notification of the decision of inadmissibility.

As regards allegations of insufficient protection against anti-union dismissals and discrimination in both private and public sectors, out of nearly 1.5 million decisions by the Chief Public Prosecutor's Office, only 791 were related to impeding trade union rights, with 357 deemed unnecessary for prosecution. This suggests a fair and equitable judicial process.

Special laws governing decisions by Chief Public Prosecutors' Offices show that only 1,465 out of over 433,000 files fall under the Meetings and Demonstrations Law, with non-prosecution decisions rendered for 877 files.

The last National Employment Strategy workshops, led by the Ministry of Labour and Social Security in 2024, aimed to prevent workplace discrimination and promote civil liberties through collaboration with the social partners. The Human Rights and Equality Institution of Türkiye (TİHEK) will conduct meetings, research studies, workshops and training programmes in the coming years to further these goals.

Collective bargaining bonuses are paid directly to trade union members to ensure unity, simplicity and practicality. Payments are deducted from employees' salaries and deposited into the trade union's account as membership dues.

Regarding the observations of the Health Services Union (SAHİM-SEN) on collective bargaining bonuses, the Constitutional Court decision in 2024 nullified the 2 per cent threshold provision. After this cancellation, all public servants who are trade union members began receiving collective bargaining support. I believe all these statistical data and legal developments reflect a positive trend toward the improvement and development of trade union rights in Türkiye.

Collective labour agreements can be established at various levels, including workplaces, companies, multi-employer groups and through framework arrangements. This system has evolved within Türkiye's robust industrial relations framework over time.

In order to further advance collective bargaining and trade union rights in our country, the Tripartite Consultation Board focuses on strategies to enhance union organization in Türkiye. It anticipated changes in trade union thresholds and challenges faced in determining collective bargaining authorization processes. At the end of the meeting of the Tripartite Consultation Board, two sub-working committees, including social partners, were established to revise the Labour Law and the current Trade Unions Law. The Labour Law sub-working committee started meetings in January 2024 and held three subsequent meetings. The current Trade Unions Law sub-working committee held its first meeting in May 2024, with participation from social partners.

On the other side, regarding the scope of the law on collective bargaining rights of public servants, the Public Personnel Advisory Board convened in November 2023, chaired by the Minister, to enhance social dialogue in the public sector and address challenges faced by public servants, including the expansion of the scope of dialogue and the election mechanism for the Chairman and members of the Public Servants' Arbitration Board.

At the end of the meeting of the Public Personnel Advisory Board, it was decided to establish sub-working committees to discuss these issues, especially the review of the legislation. The sub-working committees not only addressed the Public Servants Law reviews, but also the development of the framework of financial and social rights, such as reimbursement and food allowance for public officials, as discussed.

Last but not least, the Thirteenth Labour Assembly, which could not convene after its last meeting in 2019 due to the pandemic and the devastating earthquakes, convened in Ankara in April 2024, with the presence of Minister Mr Vedat Işıkhan, Ms Beate Andrees, Assistant Director-General and Regional Director for Europe and Central Asia, Mr Youcef Ghellab, Head of the ILO Social Dialogue Unit, and the team from the ILO Office for Türkiye. The ILO Director-General, Mr Gilbert F. Houngbo, addressed the assembly via video message, congratulating all Türkiye's parties for their commitment to social dialogue and their contributions to decent work and social justice.

The Assembly, on the theme of "The Labour Life in the Turkish Century: The Future of Labour, Unionization and Employment," was actively attended by experts, academicians, government officials, workers' and employers' organizations, public servants' unions, and chambers. Discussions with a broad participation of more than 1,000 participants focused on advancing unionization, collective bargaining procedures, expediting judicial processes related to labour rights, and ensuring the effective continuation of social dialogue.

During the Assembly, representatives of the social parties discussed issues within the scope of the current Trade Unions Law such as trade union thresholds, collective bargaining authority determination processes, reinstatement and court proceedings based on the objection of the employer, and strike postponement decisions. Article 15 of the Public Servants Law sets out that public employees cannot become members of trade unions, the scope of collective agreements in the public sector, locum workers and the structure of the High Arbitration Board.

Following this Assembly meeting, a declaration will be published after it is finalized by the Scientific Board, which carries out academic studies in the fields of labour legislation and industrial relations. This declaration will accelerate the work of two sub-committees with the participation of the relevant social partners to carry out the review and rearrangement of the legislation on the issues discussed in the Labour Assembly, taking into account the opinions and evaluations of the Committee of Experts.

We are committed to providing the Committee with regular updates on developments in this regard, ensuring transparency and accountability in our progress towards enhancing labour rights and social dialogue.

The momentum gained through three large and seven sub-working committee meetings in the last seven months will bring about significant progress, especially relating to legislative changes, issues highlighted by the social partners regarding the Labour Law, article 15 of the Public Servants Law and articles 25, 34 and 41 of the current Trade Unions Law.

We have initiated work on reviewing and revising the aforementioned issues in the sub-working committees through active collaboration with our social partners and we are confident that the Government will finalize this work, together with the social partners.

Worker members – Our Committee is examining the application of Convention No. 98 by the Government of Türkiye. This case has already appeared 11 times before our Committee and was double-footnoted by the Committee of Experts, pointing out the seriousness of the violations of trade union rights occurring in the country.

Since 2016, the Government of Türkiye has been relentlessly pursuing an anti-union agenda, using state of emergency laws to justify the massive dismissal and demotion of thousands of civil servants. Since then, many trade union members have sought redress through an Inquiry Commission on State of Emergency Actions in charge of examining appeals.

The Committee of Experts noted that this Inquiry Commission considered only whether a link, even tangential, could be established between the dismissed civil servants and terrorist groups, as determined by the National Security Council. Applicants had no possibility to be informed of, let alone challenge, the information gathered against them. As stated by the Government, the purpose of the dismissals was to “terminate the existence of terrorist organizations within the public institutions” and the Inquiry Commission focused solely on determining whether the dismissals were justified in view of this purpose. This Inquiry Commission rendered more than 127,000 decisions, only 14 per cent of which led to an acceptance decision.

No specific information was submitted by the Government as to the appeals submitted by dismissed trade union members and officers. We note with deep concern that 4 confederations, 19 federations and 19 trade unions were shut down after the courts found that they were affiliated with terrorist organizations. We also note with concern that according to the Confederation of Public Employees’ Trade Unions (KESK), a total of 4,267 of their members were arbitrarily dismissed from all public sectors under the emergency laws.

We deplore the failure of the Government to put in place an independent, effective and fair process to review the appeals of public servants against their anti-union dismissals. We note that the Inquiry Commission concluded its five-year mandate. Now, workers have to go through a lengthy process before the courts for the review of their cases. We urge the Government to establish an independent, expeditious and in-depth process for investigation and remedy of cases brought against anti-union dismissals in the framework of the emergency laws.

Furthermore, we note with concern that despite the expiration of the state of emergency, governors and ministries continue to use exceptional legal provisions to dismiss public servants.

A second long-standing issue is the total lack of protection of workers against anti-union discrimination in the private and public sectors. As pointed out by the Committee of Experts, Law No. 6356, the Law on Trade Unions and Collective Labour Agreements, which specifically regulates anti-union dismissals in the private sector, merely provides that in case of “termination of contract of employment for reasons of trade union activities”, “union compensation” shall be ordered, while reinstatements can legally be refused by the employers. There are no administrative or penal sanctions applicable in case of anti-union dismissal. Similarly, in the public sector, there are no legal provisions sanctioning those responsible for anti-union discrimination or awarding compensation to victims.

This lack of effective protection and dissuasive sanctions in the legislation created a permissive environment for employers to engage in systematic union busting. Over the years, trade unions in the country have denounced countless examples of targeted dismissals of trade unionists and workers attempting to form or join a trade union.

These are issues that have been raised by the ILO supervisory bodies for years. However, so far, their recommendations have remained unheeded. Our Committee in 2013 requested the Government to establish a system for collecting data on anti-union discrimination in both private and public sectors. Eleven years later, the Government can show no progress in this regard.

This overall anti-union climate has harmful consequences on the ability of workers to collectively bargain, which are further compounded by a restrictive legal framework. The Committee of Experts has made numerous comments on the need to review Law No. 6356, which imposes stringent conditions on collective bargaining in the private sector.

Firstly, the threshold for becoming a collective bargaining agent at the enterprise level is exceptionally high: the union should represent at least 1 per cent of the workers engaged in a given branch of activities and more than 50 per cent of workers employed in the workplace and 40 per cent of workers of the enterprise to engage in collective bargaining.

These requirements have a direct impact on trade unions' capacity to represent and defend their members in collective bargaining. According to 2023 data provided by the Government, close to three quarters of the unions in the country would not qualify to become a bargaining agent due to the application of the 1 per cent sectoral threshold. These rules create considerable obstacles to collective bargaining in the country, especially for minority unions, as there are no legal provisions regarding their rights to collective bargaining. As a result, according to data from ILOSTAT, only 7.4 per cent of employees in Türkiye were covered by a collective agreement in 2019.

In addition, Turkish trade unions attempting to challenge the recognition of a trade union as an exclusive bargaining agent face a protracted judicial process which can take up to six or seven years. Meanwhile, the bargaining process remains on hold and workers are deprived of the coverage of collective agreements.

Secondly, Law No. 6356 does not allow cross-sector regional and national bargaining, thus unduly restricting the autonomy of the social partners to decide on the levels of collective bargaining.

In the public sector, collective bargaining is also restricted in its scope, which is limited to "social and financial rights", excluding any other aspects of the professional life of public workers. In addition, representation of trade unions in collective bargaining processes in the public sector are limited to an observation role. Majority unions, while allowed to participate in the Public Servants' Union delegation, cannot make proposals for collective agreements, in particular where their demands are qualified as general or relate to more than one service branch.

The Government has also persistently ignored the Committee of Experts' call to review the composition of the Public Employee Arbitration Boards. Currently, 7 out of 11 of its members are nominated by the President of the Republic, leaving some doubt as to its independence and impartiality.

Finally, we note with concern the persistent inaction of the Government to allow prison staff and locum workers, as well as public servants without a written contract, to exercise their rights to organize and collectively bargain.

In view of the heavy legal restrictions that apply to the rights to organize and to collectively bargain and in this persistent anti-union climate, workers and trade unions in Türkiye are effectively prevented from defending their rights and interests. We call on the Government to urgently take measures, in consultation with the social partners, to lift all the legal barriers to the full enjoyment of the rights guaranteed by the Convention and to take meaningful and effective action to address anti-union discrimination both in the private and public sectors.

Employer members – Convention No. 98 is one of the ten fundamental ILO Conventions. Türkiye acceded to the ILO in 1932 and has ratified 59 Conventions, including the 10 fundamental Conventions. Turkey ratified Convention No. 98 in 1952. This is the 12th time that the Committee has examined the application in law and in practice of this Convention by Türkiye. Specifically, the Committee of Experts has already made some 30 observations since 1989 concerning protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and the right to bargain collectively.

Following the attempted coup d'état on 15 July 2016, the state of emergency required that certain exceptional measures be taken to guarantee national security. This state of emergency ended on 18 July 2018. Very recently, with the support of the ILO, tripartite social dialogue was strengthened within the tripartite Labour Assembly, which met in April 2024, in which a high-level ILO official participated. In addition, an important ILO project financed by the European Union was launched with the participation of the Turkish social partners, which will cover freedom of association and the right to bargain collectively as pillars of fundamental rights.

In its previous observations, the Committee of Experts requested the Government to take the necessary measures, based on Articles 1, 2, 3, 4 and 6 of the Convention, to effectively prohibit and punish acts of anti-union discrimination, follow an effective and impartial procedure where such acts occur, and ensure that collective bargaining is further promoted by the authorities.

In its reply to our interventions last year, the Government specified the following information:

- persons employed in strategically important organizations, such as prison staff and those involving positions of police and intelligence forces on behalf of the State, cannot join or form a trade union. These limitations are mainly due to the importance of ensuring, impartially, the provision of essential public services by these public servants. However, these workers are covered by collective agreements concluded for the public sector. The Government states that certain locum workers are also not legally entitled to join or form a union and nor are they covered by the collective agreements;
- the Government maintains that, between 22 December 2017 and 22 January 2023, all complaints against massive dismissal in the public sector for so-called anti-union reasons were the subject of an impartial procedure before the Inquiry Commission. The Commission issued a total of 127,292 decisions (17,960 of which were decisions to accept the complaint). The persons concerned could subsequently seek judicial review;
- the Government states that the national legislation is in line with the ILO Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), which Turkey ratified in 1994. Under Turkish law, a worker dismissed for trade union reasons has the right to take legal action for reinstatement and, if the court decides that the dismissal was based on union-related or anti-union grounds, it also sets the amount of compensation to be paid if the employee is not reinstated. Preventing the exercise of trade union rights, however, is a criminal offence carrying criminal penalties. Furthermore, it is very difficult to develop a methodology for collecting data on anti-union dismissals. A report established in 2018 with the ILO and a tripartite workshop organized at the time did not lead to a solution;
- according to the Government, the legal concept of a group-level collective agreement already allows the social partners in the private sector to conclude collective agreements at branch level. However, the Government provides no clarification for the conclusion of inter-sectoral collective agreements;

- the double threshold for recognition as a representative trade union in the private sector was validated by the Constitutional Court. In addition, the rate of union membership in the private sector was 10.6 per cent in the first statistics in January 2015 published after the threshold was lowered to 1 per cent. The rate of union membership has continued to increase since then, reaching 74.5 per cent in the public sector and 14.8 per cent in the private sector. These figures show a positive trend in the country;
- regarding the Arbitration Council for public servants, the Government specifies that these lawyers are not attached to the executive branch and that the independence of the judiciary is guaranteed.

The Employer members reaffirm the vital importance that all ILO Member States observe Convention No. 98 as a fundamental Convention. The right to organize and to bargain collectively, for both employers and workers, is an essential condition for guaranteeing the application of all ILO standards. We insist that national law and practice ensure this fundamental right. Anti-union acts must therefore be punished fairly and effectively. Governments must actively promote the social partners' right to bargain collectively.

The Employer members would like to make the following remarks in this regard: we consider that the current legislation, which provides for a 1 per cent threshold in the sector for trade unions to be able to engage in collective bargaining, is compatible with Article 4. This determines the best way to achieve the objective of collective bargaining. Article 4 leaves room for governments to settle this question. Through Law No. 6356, the reduction of the legal threshold from 3 to 1 per cent of the workers in a given branch of activity has had a positive impact on the collective bargaining mechanism. The social partners reached prior consensus on reducing this threshold, as they were concerned that if the threshold was simply removed it would result in ill-intentioned practices and a return to chaotically organized industrial relations. Given that there are 228 trade unions in Türkiye, the Employer members consider it legitimate to set objective thresholds above which a trade union may be authorized to conclude collective agreements. Currently, 60 out of 228 unions would meet these criteria. The Employer members indicate that if an employers' organization or a freely established trade union refuses to respect the conditions of representativeness or does not respect the rules of social dialogue, they should instead be considered mere pressure groups. Recognition of their role as social partners implies strict criteria relating to representativeness, democratic functioning and a responsible attitude to the negotiation of balanced social agreements, which is the opposite of the role played by non-governmental organizations. Only the social partners can request the intervention of the ILO when their rights are threatened or violated.

The Employer members highlight the importance of the national tripartite discussions which were held last April within the Labour Assembly. A joint declaration will shortly be issued as a result of that meeting, containing commitments by all parties to strengthen social democracy. In accordance with the decisions of the Labour Assembly, sub-commissions have been set up to examine the legislation on trade unions and the law on collective bargaining in the public service. These sub-commissions have already started their work.

I close my intervention with two important points. First, it is vital that the legislation on collective bargaining in the public sector applies to all public service workers, in accordance with Convention No. 98, even if certain exceptions in the public sector may be justified. Second, the level of collective bargaining in the private sector must be freely chosen and set by the social partners themselves rather than by law. We hope that the social partners will discuss, in particular, the inter-sectoral level in the extended session of the Labour Assembly that began in April.

Worker member, Türkiye – We have been discussing Türkiye at this Committee with regard to Conventions Nos 87 and 98 for years. We are pleased to note that there have been improvements, such as the introduction of the e-State system instead of the notary system for trade union affiliation and resignation procedures.

Despite these efforts, problems regarding legislation and implementation in Türkiye continue. Anti-union dismissals are still a significant problem in Türkiye. The legal framework regulating the protection of employment is not adequate. Reinstatement of workers in case of injustice and anti-union termination of the labour contract is very limited in practice. Further to court rulings, employers generally prefer to pay severance and notice rather than opting for reinstatement. In the case of unilateral termination of the employment contract, the employer notifies the authorities not to pay compensation. If workers claim that this practice constitutes unfair dismissal, they must go to court, which is an expensive and lengthy process for the plaintiff. Moreover, while half of the workers who resign in Türkiye seem to do so of their own free will, they in fact were made to sign the resignation document in advance. It is an employer strategy for providing legal grounds not to pay compensation. In addition, workers cannot claim unemployment benefits because they resigned apparently voluntarily.

The prolonged judicial processes focusing on competency to conclude collective agreements is another important issue in Türkiye, and is one of the common and major causes of de-unionization. Another aspect of this issue is the competency objections, which pave the way for an unclear judicial process, also causing resignations from unions. At the sectoral level, this threshold was as high as 10 per cent in the past. It decreased to 1 per cent in 2015, as a result of the consensus among the social partners. A technical mission from the ILO also visited Türkiye and took part in the dialogue process.

Under article 41(1) of Law No. 6356, the threshold at the sectoral level has a regulatory role enabling the participation of the most representative and strongest trade unions.

It must be clearly stated that a union organization environment at the workplace level where the employers and political parties can intervene is not a preferable system for the collective benefit of workers in Türkiye. The absence of a sectoral threshold can cause the proliferation of atomized unions. In addition to this risk, micro-level organizations can be guided by the employers in order to disrupt the strength of the organized labour movement. Furthermore, there can only be one authorized union in any one workplace to conclude the collective agreement, according to the existing legislation. These arrangements were made in dialogue with the social partners, taking into account past experiences. All in all, the right to organize should be interpreted more broadly by the legislative authority to ensure that all persons in the labour market can enjoy the right to organize. I do not want to take the time of my colleague who will speak on the right to organize and collective bargaining of civil servants, which is referred to extensively by the Committee of Experts in its report.

Another Worker member, Türkiye – On behalf of the Turkish Confederation of Public Workers Associations (Kamu-Sen), one of the representative confederations of public employees in Türkiye, I would like to add some information related to public workers' problems.

The report of the Committee of Experts states that the prohibition against membership under article 15 of the Public Workers Trade Union (PWTU) Law (No. 4688) includes not only prison staff, locum workers and public servants working without a written contract, but also provides for a broader prohibition which covers approximately 20 per cent of the public employees. Many public employees, except police, military workers and public servants engaged in the administration of the State, are still deprived of their rights to organize and collective bargaining with the current prohibited regulation expressed in the mentioned article of the law.

Another issue included in the Committee of Experts' report concerns public officials dismissed within the scope of the state of emergency. The implementation of the state of emergency was a result of the extraordinary circumstances that occurred after a military coup attempt supported by the FETÖ terrorist organization in 2016. All legal forces, non-governmental organizations and almost all of our people took a position against the FETÖ by closing roads and public areas, and protesting. We managed to get rid of them in six hours. As a result of this coup attempt, our country lost 252 people and our economy was destroyed through the loss of billions of dollars. After the coup attempt was suppressed, a state of emergency was immediately declared, and a large investigation was initiated by the State institutions and organizations to detect all activities of the FETÖ and other terrorist organizations, as well as their connections with public employees. As a result of the evaluations, public employees who were determined to have connections with the FETÖ and other terrorist groups, for judicial reunions, should be removed from their civil servant duties, with due protection during judicial investigations, within the framework of public workers' law and the provisions of the Turkish Penal Code. However, considering some internal and external judicial decisions and the decisions of the Commission of Inquiry mentioned in the report, it was understood that some dismissals were made without sufficient administrative and judicial review and research. The Turkish authorities stated, at the end of the process, that refunds and compensation for economic and moral losses had been taken into account. But the process is still continuing, and the problem is going on. It is important for the Government to establish a new regulation as soon as possible to clarify the process regarding public officials who are in this situation. Union discrimination in the public sector has been continued for many years, as the Committee of Experts has duly noted. Despite hundreds of complaints made against them, none of the public administrators who were involved in discrimination in public employee unionism were punished.

On the other hand, the issue of the 2 per cent threshold for union membership included in the Committee of Experts' report and introduced for public employee unionism is aimed at paving the way for positive unionism. Similar thresholds are still in place in the context of labour unionism, aimed at encouraging more powerful representative unions, that is positive unionism. The threshold implemented in our country creates strong representative trade unions by the number of members, instead of distributing the power among many small and marginal unions, which are weak in that regard. So, we support the application of this threshold to create more powerful and authorized trade unions.

Taking account of the collective bargaining process, its duration, scope, authorization of representatives, signature competence, mismatch regulations of the branch and general collective bargaining systems, public workers' trade union law has many troubles.

So as a result, I would like to propose to the Government and all our trade unions to come together under the leadership of the Government, and to reorganize and implement the public workers' Trade Unions Law again on the basis of the Convention

Employer member, Türkiye – The Committee of Experts' observations on Türkiye, under Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention, are mainly based on massive dismissals in the public sector under the state of emergency decrees.

After the attempted coup of 15 July 2016, an Inquiry Commission was established further to applications against decisions concerning the dissolution of trade unions during the state of emergency, which may be appealed before the administrative courts of Ankara. The grounds for the dissolution of trade unions and the dismissal of trade unionists can be examined by the administrative courts when applications are made, which is a due and effective recourse by law.

The Committee of Experts' also made observations on Article 1 of the Convention regarding adequate protection against anti-union dismissals. The provisions of the Labour Act No. 4857 on unjustified dismissals are designed along the lines of the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), which similarly does not require that reinstatement be mandatory.

According to article 25 of Law No. 6356, a worker whose employment contract is terminated for a union-related reason shall have the right to file a lawsuit relating to reinstatement into a job. If, during a lawsuit for reinstatement into a job, it is determined that the employment contract was terminated for a union-related reason, union-related compensation shall be ordered, the amount of which should not be less than one year's wages of the worker. Such an amount must be identified as a dissuasive measure for the protection of the worker against anti-union dismissal.

On the other hand, the penal sanction for anti-union dismissal is regulated in article 118 of the Penal Code. According to article 118, the use of force to block the exercise of union rights is a crime, requiring imprisonment of the perpetrator. The section provides that whoever uses force or threat against a person to force them to join or not to join a union, to participate in the activities of the union, or to leave their position in the union or union management, will be sentenced to imprisonment from six months to two years. Contrary to the observations of the Committee of Experts, this provision does in fact concern anti-union dismissals.

Moreover, according to article 78, paragraph 1 of Law No. 6356, an individual who enrolls members in a union by way of force or pressure in breach of union freedom or who forces a worker to maintain or quit his or her membership shall be charged with an administrative fine for each membership.

As Turkish employers, therefore, we are considering that all these provisions contain an adequate legal protection against anti-union dismissals both in private and public sectors.

Another point regarding the Committee of Experts' observations about Article 2 of the Convention refers to article 15 of the Civil Servants' Unions Act. It takes into consideration the complaints filed by different workers' organizations about the scope of Article 2 of Convention No. 98. In respect of the complaints, the Committee of Experts' observations focus on rendering article 15 of the Civil Servants' Unions Act compatible with the Convention.

According to a sentence added to the fifth paragraph of article 90 of the Constitution of the Republic of Türkiye in 2004, "in case of discrepancies arising from the fact that international agreements on fundamental rights and freedoms, duly put into effect, and laws contain different provisions on the same subject, the provisions of international agreements shall prevail".

In this context, the decision of the Constitutional Court on whether civil servants working in the Presidency National Palace Directorate can be deprived of the right to unionize has been pending. Upon the appeal of the decision regarding such disputes, the Ninth Civil Chamber of the Court of Cassation, disregarding the prohibition in the legislation, considered the ILO Conventions in relation to article 90(5) of the Constitution and concluded that the mentioned public officials have the right to unionize. Thus, despite the prohibition provision in article 15 of Law No. 4688, the ILO Conventions to which Türkiye is a party were taken as the basis.

These decisions demonstrate the progress made by the Turkish judicial organs towards recognizing the union rights of public officials in Türkiye. As Turkish employers, we believe that all employees, except for a few exceptions, working in the public sector should enjoy the right to organize.

Another issue regarding the Committee of Experts' observations about Article 4 of the Convention is the promotion of collective bargaining with a view to amending article 34 of Law No. 6356 to ensure that it does not restrict the possibility of the parties in the private sector to engage in cross-sector regional or national agreements should they so desire.

Another point regarding the Committee of Experts' observations about Article 4 of the Convention is the determination of the most representative union and rights of minority unions. The existing system is a product of a long and well-established industrial relations system in Türkiye. The lowering in 2015 of the branch representation thresholds for becoming a bargaining agent at the workplace from 3 to 1 per cent has had a positive impact on the unionization rate.

However, the Turkish employers do not consider that the removal of the branch threshold would have a similarly positive impact on the rate of unionization or on the capacity of unions, especially independent unions who are not affiliated to large confederations, to use the collective bargaining machinery.

Finally, I want to emphasize that Turkish employers give the utmost priority to the ILO's supervisory system. In our view, the credibility and transparency of the Committee must be respected with a view to enabling a high level of compliance with the international labour standards.

Government member, Belgium – I have the honour to speak on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States. The candidate countries Montenegro and North Macedonia, and the European Free Trade Association countries Iceland and Norway, members of the European Economic Area, align themselves with this statement.

The EU and its Member States are committed to the promotion, protection, respect and fulfilment of human rights, including labour rights.

We actively promote the universal ratification and implementation of fundamental international labour standards. We support the ILO in its indispensable role to develop, promote and supervise the application of international labour standards and of fundamental Conventions in particular.

The EU and its Member States have a strategic interest in the development of a cooperative and mutually beneficial relationship with Türkiye, a candidate country and a key partner of the EU. This relationship is long-standing, with an Association Agreement concluded in 1963, and a Customs Union agreed in 1995.

We note with deep concern the Committee of Experts' observations that, following the massive dismissals after the 2016 coup attempt, public officials alleging that their dismissals under the state of emergency laws were motivated by anti-union reasons did not have access to an effective, rapid and fair procedure that would protect them against anti-union dismissals. Given the end of the mandate of the Commission of Inquiry on the State of Emergency Measures, we encourage the Government of Türkiye to put in place appropriate measures that will ensure independent, expeditious and in-depth investigations of these allegations through effective and rapid procedures with the necessary guarantees of due process and to report on measures taken. In the context of the absence of an effective and rapid remedy system against state of emergency dismissals, we echo the concern of the Committee of Experts regarding the lack of information on the perpetuation of state of emergency powers. We encourage the Government to comply with the Committee of Experts' request to provide its observations to the ILO on this matter.

Anti-union dismissals remain a concerning issue in the private sector as well. We note the absence of minimum compensation and of administrative or penal sanctions for anti-union dismissal, and that a reinstatement judicial order can be refused by the employer, opting for financial compensation. We join the call of the Committee of Experts on the Government to adopt effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against anti-union dismissal in the private sector and to provide information on the judicial practice in the determination of compensation awarded to dismissed workers.

In line with the Committee of Experts, we call on the Government to ensure adequate protection against anti-union discrimination in the public sector. We echo the Committee's call to take legislative measures ensuring full compensation of the prejudice suffered in both occupational and financial terms and to put in place effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions.

Measures taken by the Government to protect public order should not deprive workers' organizations of their right to hold peaceful demonstrations and public meetings to defend their interests. In this regard, we reiterate the Committee of Experts' call on the Government to refrain from arresting, detaining and prosecuting workers and trade unionists for participation in peaceful public meetings.

We regret the Government's observation that significant difficulties persist in the collection and recording of data on anti-union discrimination in the public and private sectors. We recall that the Conference Committee extended this request to the Government in 2013 and encourage the Government to improve data collection systems and institutional databases.

We encourage the Government of Türkiye to address the concerns of the Committee of Experts to ensure that more, including minority, workers' organizations can engage in collective bargaining and to report to the ILO on this matter.

We echo the call of the Committee of Experts and encourage Türkiye to bring its national legislation in line with the requirements of the fundamental Convention No.98 to ensure that senior public employees, magistrates, prison staff, locum workers, public servants working without a contract of employment and retirees can enjoy and exercise their right to establish and join organizations.

We regret the information provided by the Committee of Experts that existing legal provisions do not make it possible to negotiate collective agreements at all levels and encourage the Government to follow up on the recommendations of the Committee of experts to ensure that parties in the private sector wishing to engage in cross-sector regional or national agreements can do so.

We encourage the Government to ensure the full application of the Convention in full consultation with the social partners.

The EU and its Member States remain committed to a joint constructive engagement with Türkiye and welcome the recent engagement of the Government with the ILO. We encourage further exchanges between the Government and the ILO with a view to implementing the recommendations of the Committee of Experts.

Government member, Kazakhstan – My delegation thanks the Government representative of Türkiye for the report. We note the commitment on the part of the Government of Türkiye to observe the ILO Conventions and welcome the progress made by the Government in responding to the recommendations of the Committee of experts.

In the past years the Government of Türkiye has demonstrated efforts to strengthen and adapt its current legislative framework to bring it into line with ILO standards and in particular, through amending trade union laws and improving working conditions. Recent amendments concerning the settlement of collective labour disputes regulating competent mediation procedures, expanding the powers of the Human Rights Compensation Commission and aligning trade union rights with ILO standards should be acknowledged.

We welcome the willingness of the Government to enter into an open discussion on how to further improve the situation with trade unions. We encourage the Government to continue these efforts. We believe that Türkiye, which fulfils its obligations in the submission of reports related to the ratified ILO Conventions, will continue to work closely with the ILO and social partners.

Worker member, Netherlands – This intervention is also on behalf of the Korean, Nordic and Belgian Workers. Convention No. 98 is about the right to organize and collective bargaining. The first Article states that “Workers shall enjoy adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in respect of their employment.”

Although the Turkish Constitution and the Trade Unions Law provide that every worker has a right to choose his or her trade union, the reality is different. The exercise of freedom of association is related to the Government’s approach to this right, which in practice means there is anti-union discrimination.

The Government has policies and practices, for instance, the Anti-Terrorism Law and the Penal Code, as a tool to silence trade unions when, for instance, KESK carries out its usual trade union activities distributing trade union materials, organizing actions, which are not in line with government policies.

The Committee of Experts has noted the observations of KESK, which state that, in total, 4,267 KESK members were dismissed from all public sectors under the state of emergency decree laws. According to KESK, the dismissals were arbitrary and non-transparent, and no effective remedy was provided. Public employees were unable to see the accusations and defend themselves. KESK alleges that the Commission of Inquiry did not provide an effective remedy against anti-union dismissals and was instead used to punish trade unionists with no due process and proper court decision.

As KESK testified before the Commission of Inquiry, there was no transparent mechanism allowing the public officers to challenge any of the evidence against them. KESK finally states that, now that the work of the Commission of Inquiry is completed, the dismissed KESK members and executives must apply to administrative courts, a process that may take up to ten years to come to a conclusion. In practice, Article 1 of the Convention is violated in many ways. The Government and public institution managers facilitate some confederations while they put extra pressure on the members and leaders of independent and democratic unions. This is why they face forced relocations. The public authorities act in quite an arbitrary way and independent unions face discrimination. There are no dissuasive sanctions when public managers violate their rights.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Tunisia – My delegation welcomes the delegation of the Government of Türkiye and expresses its thanks for the information provided on the country's efforts to implement the provisions of the Convention.

We welcome the administrative measures taken by the Government to comply with international standards through the revision of its Labour Code and to respect the right to organize, in order to ensure the effectiveness of social dialogue and collective bargaining procedures. My delegation welcomes the efforts made to strengthen consultation mechanisms. Decisions have been adopted to improve workers' and employers' rights. These measures demonstrate the country's commitment to defending international standards. In view of the commitments made, my delegation congratulates the Turkish Government for the results achieved and encourages it to continue its efforts to ensure that its legislation is aligned with international standards, while taking into account the comments of the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts.

Interpretation from German: Worker member, Germany – It is with great concern that we have learned that many colleagues are still being held in Turkish prisons following their activities on 1 May 2024 and we urge the Government to release these and other prisoners.

The report of the Committee of Experts refers to a protection gap in Turkish law. If an employer dismisses a worker because of trade union activity, the worker can take legal action against this, but the legal consequence is not reinstatement, only the payment of compensation. The amount of compensation is not specified by law and, in practice, we have seen that these compensation payments are far too low to serve as any kind of a deterrent. In addition, the legal proceedings take far too long for the affected workers – up to four years.

The fact that colleagues in Türkiye are not adequately protected against dismissal due to their trade union activities was already established by the ECHR in 2017 in the Tek Gıda İş Sendikası case, but we still find ourselves in the same legal situation now. Resorting to dismissal to prevent unionization is the most widespread form of union busting.

Effective protection against dismissal is of the utmost importance, especially in the initial phase of trade union organizing in a company. Otherwise it is too easy for employers to dismiss union members in return for just small payments.

This is also impressively demonstrated by a study by the Turkish Metalworkers' Union. In a period of one and a half years, 875 of its members were dismissed in the first phase of organizing.

The protection against unlawful dismissal on the grounds of trade union organization laid down in Article 1 of the Convention is an essential basis for exercising the right to organize. If this is lacking, the right to collective bargaining cannot be exercised. Employers can simply buy their way out cheaply. The minimum requirement for such protection is a right to reinstatement, as is stated in the report of the Committee of Experts and as is common practice in Germany.

Against this background, we call on the Government to standardize a statutory right to continued employment in the event of dismissal due to trade union activity.

Government member, Pakistan – We recognize and note the ongoing engagement by the Republic of Türkiye with the ILO supervisory system. We reiterate that dialogue and engagement remain the best vehicles to address any concerns and promote labour rights and standards. Pakistan acknowledges the positive steps taken by the Republic of Türkiye towards the implementation of the Convention within the ILO's tripartite framework. We welcome

Türkiye's ongoing efforts in labour law and judicial reforms, social dialogue and international cooperation. These initiatives reflect a strong commitment to enhancing workers' rights and aligning them with ILO standards. Pakistan commends Türkiye's efforts and strongly encourages the ILO to take Türkiye's achievements and the challenges it faced into due consideration.

Worker member, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland – I speak on behalf of the workers of the United Kingdom, and the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO) of the United States associates itself with these remarks.

Many of the workers of Türkiye, suffering the after-effects of dismissal during the state of emergency, are years later trapped in an interminable cycle of delayed justice. Those workers, dismissed without any court case, are only able to return to their working lives with the assistance of a slow-moving, under-resourced series of court interventions.

In one example, the Government started this process with an act of gross and arbitrary unfairness, retrospectively applying the provisions of a state of emergency to the issuing of a joint statement – the peaceful exercise of freedom of expression – at a time before the emergency took place, arresting a seemingly random subsection of those involved in making the statement, and then letting an under-resourced legal system slowly crush their hopes of restitution. Seventeen per cent of those persons were eventually cleared but, of those, almost half then lost an appeal launched by the Government, and again lost their jobs, meaning only 10 per cent of those originally unfairly arrested and, essentially blacklisted, regained any kind of normal life.

Victims of the mass dismissals must first apply to the administrative courts – there are 100,000 such victims still awaiting justice. There are, however, no more than ten administrative courts. Unions in Türkiye have estimated that, without additional resources, it will take these courts ten years to clear the backlog, ten years in which these workers cannot exercise their skills and experience in their chosen field, often forced into low-paid jobs. And, at the end of that long wait, should the administrative court clear them, they need to progress to the higher court, and finally the constitutional court, taking several more years. Even then, a successful win in the courts might win them the right to have their remedy implemented within two further years, something that very rarely happens far ahead of that deadline.

A public servant at the height of their career at the time of their original dismissal will retire, possibly destitute, having been unable to work at their full potential for half their working life.

As long ago as 2018, the Committee of Experts expressed its deep concern at the situation as it had developed, given the high numbers of suspensions and dismissals that still affected trade union officials and members, and hoped the courts would reinstate any trade unionists dismissed for anti-union or interference motives.

Six years later, the lives of trade unionists caught up in this snail's pace sham of justice are still waiting for remedy. The Government of Türkiye's failure to act shows a callous disregard for their lives and, frankly, for the ILO supervisory system.

The wait has been long enough. At least 60 members of trade unions have killed themselves while waiting for this process to be completed, though, in a grim twist, many of them were later cleared. The sluggishness of the Government's approach is not only ruining lives, it is costing them.

Government member, Azerbaijan – At the outset, we would like to highlight that Türkiye has a long-standing and close relationship with the ILO and was among the first countries to sign the Convention.

In the past 11 years, Türkiye has enacted significant changes in its labour legislation, particularly in trade union laws. These reforms have largely improved social dialogue, trade union rights and collective bargaining procedures, making them more accessible and efficient.

We see it as an important advancement for Türkiye to expand the duties and powers of the Human Rights Compensation Commission, which aims to expedite litigation processes with recent judiciary reforms. This might ensure quicker resolutions, especially regarding union issues, with shorter trial periods. Also, we welcome and commend that Türkiye has revitalized the tripartite consultation mechanisms.

Türkiye's ongoing efforts in labour law and judiciary reforms, social dialogue and international cooperation, demonstrates its commitment to enhancing workers' rights and aligning with ILO standards.

Worker member, Sri Lanka – First of all, I would like to note that Türkiye has a long and close relationship with the ILO and the relevant workers' and employers' organizations on the promotion of labour standards and workers' rights and is committed to strengthening these rights.

Over the past ten years, Türkiye has made significant changes, such as the determination of the branch of activity, the regulation of competence, the establishment of an e-membership service for trade union membership, and introduction of mediation procedures in its labour legislation, in consultation with social partners.

The Committee should take into account the significant efforts and advancements that the country has realized in the world of work, despite the challenging times encountered at the same time. I am very proud to be a member of the International Labour Conference with regard to the White Flag certification, which was introduced to encourage unionization and increase registered employment, and which is a very positive and significant development, and we support it.

We commend the Government for being a member of the Global Coalition for Social Justice Coordinating Group. As a worker side, we are pleased to be part of this process.

Türkiye has revitalized one of the most crucial social dialogue mechanisms, the tripartite consultation mechanism. We also believe that the sub-working committees established within the framework of tripartite consultation mechanisms will produce concrete results in the revising and reviewing of legislation in terms of working life.

We are 25 countries, 33 confederations and 30 million workers in the International Labour Conference, so on behalf of the Conference and on behalf of Sri Lanka workers, the plantation workers, I am making this statement.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Sudan – We align ourselves with the statements delivered by the Government of Türkiye. We support the amendments and reforms implemented by Türkiye to bring its legislation into conformity with international labour standards and the ratified Conventions, in particular the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Sudan considers that the Government has adopted fundamental measures and legislation that improve workers' rights, as well as other measures that enable workers to enjoy their trade union rights, in accordance with the articles of the Constitution and international labour standards, and in line with social justice, social dialogue and collective bargaining.

Sudan believes in what Türkiye has done, which is why it requests that the country be removed from the list of individual cases, due to the efforts made.

Government member, Algeria – The Algerian delegation has followed very carefully the statement delivered by the distinguished delegate of Türkiye, in which she demonstrated the Government's will and commitment to continue to collaborate with the International Labour Organization and to enhance labour standards and workers' rights. We emphasize that Türkiye was among the first countries to sign the Convention.

Algeria welcomes the positive and significant steps taken by Türkiye and its notable successes in improving working conditions, despite the challenges faced by the Government. In this regard, this delegation has taken note of the Government's efforts in changing its labour legislation, particularly in trade union laws. These reforms have largely improved social dialogue, trade union rights, and collective bargaining procedures, making them more accessible and efficient, especially for workers.

Furthermore, we note that Türkiye has demonstrated its commitment to aligning trade union rights and collective bargaining procedures with ILO standards, in consultation with social partners. This includes provisions and improvements on: determination of the branch of activity; protection of shop stewards; regulation of competence; settlement of collective labour disputes; regulation of the prohibition and postponement of strikes and lockouts; establishment of e-membership service for trade unions; and revitalization of the tripartite consultation mechanisms.

The National Employment Strategy for 2024–28 focuses on building partnerships with social organizations to combat discrimination and improve civil liberties in the workplace.

Finally, this delegation remains convinced that this mutual collaboration promotes a consolidation of current good practices to strengthen the measures already implemented by the Government of Türkiye to guarantee compliance with international labour standards.

Government member, Philippines – This representation would like to express our support for Türkiye's continuous collaboration with the ILO and its dedication to advancing labour standards and workers' rights. Türkiye's long-standing partnership with the ILO, beginning as one of the first signatories of the Convention, underscores its commitment to these fundamental principles.

Türkiye's efforts in labour law and judiciary reforms, social dialogue, and international cooperation reflect its dedication to enhancing workers' rights and aligning with ILO standards. Its efforts are evident in the key reforms in trade union law. With its current role as a Pathfinder Country in Alliance 8.7, dedicated to eliminating child labour, and its active participation in the Global Coalition for Social Justice, Türkiye showed its commitment to ensuring that social justice is upheld and advanced at both national and international levels.

These efforts to align with the ILO standards and to advance workers' rights should be encouraged and supported with continuous technical assistance from the ILO and its Member States.

Government member, Indonesia – Indonesia commends Türkiye on its long-standing and robust relationship with the ILO and its full commitment to the Convention. Türkiye's continued collaboration with the International Labour Organization underscores its dedication to enhancing labour standards and protecting workers' rights. The Committee of Experts should recognize both the significant challenges Türkiye has faced and the remarkable progress it has achieved in improving working conditions. Over the past 11 years, Türkiye has made substantial reforms in its labour legislation, particularly in its trade union laws which have significantly enhanced social dialogue, trade union rights and collective bargaining procedures. This reform is aligning with ILO standards which have been developed in close consultation with social partners, and which include improvement in the determination of activity branches, protection of shop stewards and the scope and level of collective labour agreements. Türkiye's pioneering efforts suggest that the implementation of membership services of the trade union and White Flag certification for businesses meeting ILO standards are effective approaches to fostering labour rights. As a Pathfinder Country in Alliance 8.7, Türkiye's commitment to eliminating child labour and its active participation in the Global Coalition for Social Justice further reflects its dedication to promoting social justice on a global scale. The recent reform that expands the role and powers of Human Rights Compensation Commission is noteworthy for ensuring the quick resolution of union-related issues. Additionally, Türkiye's National Employment Strategy for 2024–28, which focuses on combating workplace discrimination and improving civil liberties, adopts a forward-looking approach. The revitalization of the tripartite consultation mechanism and the productive outcome of more than ten meetings with social partners demonstrate Türkiye's commitment to social dialogue. The establishment of the subcommittee within this framework will help concretize initial legislative professional reviews. In light of this comprehensive and ongoing effort in labour law, law reform, judiciary improvement and international cooperation, Indonesia fully supports Türkiye's efforts in aligning with ILO standards. We encourage the Committee of Experts to consider Türkiye's notable successes and sustained commitment to enhancing workers' rights as a testament to its dedication to social justice and labour rights advancement.

Interpretation from Russian: Government member, Russian Federation – We are grateful to the Government of Türkiye for providing clarifications on the measures taken at the national level regarding compliance with the Convention. We note the significant progress in the social and labour sphere, which has been achieved thanks to the efforts of the Government, especially over the last 11 years, following comprehensive labour law reform in the country. This has contributed to strengthening social dialogue, enhancing union rights and improving the effectiveness of collective bargaining. Among other achievements, we would highlight the judicial reform that increased the efficiency of the Human Rights Compensation Commission, as well as the resumption of the tripartite consultation mechanisms. Overall, measures taken by the Government indicate that Türkiye has established deep, systematic work to strengthen labour standards aimed at enhancing tripartite dialogue mechanisms and ensuring workers' rights in particular.

Against this background we see no grounds for including the situation in Türkiye in this list of individual cases before the Committee, and even less reason for assigning a double-footnote status for this case. So, we count on the Committee's constructive approach to this matter.

Observer, International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) – I am speaking on behalf of the ITUC, but I am also coming from a metalworkers' union in Türkiye. That is why before starting my words, I have to say that, right now and since 1 May, around 60 workers are in prison just for joining the May Day demonstration. This example itself gives an idea of freedom of association in Türkiye currently. So, as many of you already know, collective bargaining coverage in Türkiye is quite low and this is not just a result of coincidence, there are structural problems behind it and these structural problems are quite well-defined in the Committee of Experts' report.

First, there is a national sectoral threshold. According to the Ministry of Labour's own statistics, more than 120,000 union members in 171 different unions cannot enjoy their right to organize or their right to collective bargaining because of this sectoral threshold. The Government says, in the Committee's report, that they can change this threshold, but the social partners do not agree on that. That is why they do not change it. You cannot just take away 100,000 people's rights just because some other people do not want them to use this right.

Let us say that a union is above this threshold, then that union needs 50 per cent membership in that workplace to start collective bargaining negotiations. This is one of the highest thresholds in the world, and it makes it almost impossible for many workers to enjoy their right to collective bargaining.

Also, union members can be dismissed just for joining a union, without any real protection at all. Courts cannot even order reinstatement of the dismissed union members. Contrary to what our colleague from the Employers' side just said at the start of this meeting, this is also highlighted by the ECHR, and which says in its decision that there is no real protection against anti-union dismissal in Türkiye.

Dismissals are not a problem only in the private sector, as the Committee of Experts' report underlines, since more than 100,000 public employees were dismissed by the emergency decree laws under the state of emergency. These members suffer from a lack of effective legal remedy.

The Committee's report also mentions judicial challenges by employers against unions' certificates. The Government's response says that that these court cases end in three months, including the appeal. This is factually incorrect. There has not been even one case in the entire history which ended in three months. I am not claiming the Government intentionally gave wrong information to the Committee, but probably there has been a misunderstanding. My own union has experience of court cases which lasted 7 years, on average, it is 1,100 days in our case.

So, in this regard, we think it is of the utmost importance to organize an ILO high-level mission to handle these outstanding problems in a constructive and productive manner.

Observer, Public Service International (PSI) – I am speaking also on behalf of KESK in Türkiye. The Committee of Experts' report covers the issues related to the Convention, and it is not the first time that it covers this issue. I will focus on the dismissals in the public sector in this intervention. When we look at the dismissals, we see that massive numbers of dismissals violated the right to work and had a negative impact on trade union rights in Türkiye. And the reasoning for these dismissals was not objective or justified, but quite subjective and arbitrary. The generic justification was vague and broadly applied to 4,267 KESK members who were critical of the Government, and the use of generic and vague justification is related to the Government's policies that amount to trade union discrimination. And when we look at the Inquiry Commission on State of Emergency Actions which completed its mandate, we see that the presumption of innocence was violated as well because the Inquiry Commission, as the Committee of Experts' report states, was not providing an effective remedy against anti-union dismissals, instead it was used as a tool to punish trade unionists. And in fact, "arbitrary" was the prevalent characteristic of these unjust dismissals. It is still a fact that KESK members are suffering from these dismissals even though eight years have passed since 2016, since the failed coup attempt. And the judicial process that the dismissed KESK members undertake will take several more years. There is no indication that the Government plans to accelerate this appeal process through other mechanisms. Thus, it can be inferred that there is no effective remedy for the dismissed public employees as the report states.

It also needs to be noted that the trade union members carry out their daily activities to raise awareness about this issue, but most of these daily activities are banned by the public authorities or interfered with by the security officers. The recent example is the May Day demonstrations in Istanbul. Last week, the leader of the education union was arrested just because he organized a solidarity action with some other trade unions. All these policies and practices aim to create and maintain a climate of fear, and this means that there is a need for more active monitoring from the ILO side and, in this respect, a high-level mission to Türkiye is necessary to discuss all these issues from various perspectives in the country.

Observer, IndustriALL Global Union (IndustriALL) – My organization represents 20 sectoral unions in the main export industries of Türkiye. As mentioned in the report of the Committee of Experts, there has unfortunately been no progress in Türkiye in the implementation of the Conventions Nos 87 and 98. Although article 51 of the Constitution rules that workers have the right to form unions freely, and the right to become a member of a union, in reality, this right cannot be exercised because of a series of obstacles in practice.

I want to share the ground reality with you in the manufacturing, energy and mining industries.

Article 17 of Law No. 6356 on Trade Unions and Collective Labour Agreements rules that trade union membership is acquired via the e-state system. Nevertheless, workers are forced to share their e-state passwords with employers, so their union membership is checked by employers, which is illegal. IndustriALL receives reports every single day about cases where workers join trade unions, but they are exposed to anti-union discrimination. Union members face aggressive acts of punishment and retaliation, including intimidation, threats and dismissals for joining our affiliated trade unions.

Thousands of workers are dismissed just because they use their constitutionally and internationally protected and guaranteed right to freedom of association.

Terminated workers and their unions take the cases to the judiciary system, and an overwhelming majority of the cases end in favour of workers with clear verdicts that they were terminated because of their union membership.

This demonstrates clearly that there is systemic and widespread anti-union discrimination against union members and a clear failure to provide the necessary protections to guarantee freedom of association.

Furthermore, I wish to draw your attention to the obstacles the Government mounts to prevent unions from obtaining collective bargaining certification. Even if a Turkish union manages to recruit more than 50 per cent of workers in one single workplace or 40 per cent in an enterprise with more than one workplace, both thresholds are extremely high and there is widespread misuse of the judiciary process to block collective bargaining certification.

Once the Ministry of Labour and Social Security issues an official document certifying that the union has a sufficient majority membership in a workplace to be eligible for collective bargaining negotiations, then the employer disputes the Ministry's document of competence claiming that the union concerned does not have the required majority. This is done through a simple petition without having to provide any evidence to support the claim.

As a result of these delaying tactics by employers and lack of enforcement of the labour laws, cases drag on for years, on average for three years. This is unacceptable.

Legislative rules cannot protect malicious behaviour. Labour law must have as its main goal the protection of workers. However, in this case, malicious employers are protected, and workers who exercise their fundamental rights are punished.

Seeing that the Government of Türkiye, despite the support and technical assistance provided by the ILO, has not made any progress in protecting the right of workers to collective bargaining, IndustriALL calls on the ILO to take further measures, including a high-level mission to the country, to address Türkiye's violations of the Convention.

Observer, International Transport Workers' Federation (ITF) – Adequate protections against anti-union dismissals are not only necessary to protect workers' rights and their livelihoods, but also are essential to ensure the very existence of trade unions.

Sadly, the ITF has had to come before this Committee on several occasions over the past decade to lament anti-union discrimination, including dismissals and attacks on the right to organize in several sectors of the Turkish economy, most notably in civil aviation, logistics and rail transport.

Today, we want to highlight a case of anti-union discrimination taking place right now in a port in the Bursa province of northwestern Türkiye.

On 2 March 2024, just three months ago, the Liman-İş union began organizing at the port. Eighty-five per cent of the workers at the facility decided to join the union. On 20 March, six workers were dismissed for no other reason than their union membership. After their colleagues engaged in a four-day work stoppage to protest these dismissals in the face of police intimidation, Members of Parliament intervened and mediated the dispute, following which the workers were reinstated. The company vowed to no longer block union organizing.

This is when things deteriorated. Almost immediately, the employer began to threaten workers and demand that they relinquish their union membership.

Starting on 13 May, 37 workers were placed on leave, initially with no pay. Then, on 21 May, all 37 workers were dismissed – via SMS – simply because they refused to relinquish their union membership. All 37 workers were either lead organizers or union contacts. Two weeks on, the situation persists and the ITF has coordinated global solidarity action in support of these dismissed workers.

Our discussion here in Geneva is not taking place in a vacuum. These 37 workers and their families are only a fraction of the people affected by Türkiye's long-standing failure to protect workers against anti-union dismissals in the private sector. This simply cannot continue.

Despite the right to freedom of association being protected under Türkiye's Constitution and domestic law, Türkiye has repeatedly failed to uphold its domestic and international legal obligations, including those under Convention No. 98.

Türkiye must, as a matter of urgency, adopt effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against anti-union dismissals and ensure that workers who have suffered such prejudice, including these 37 workers, are entitled to reinstatement to employment and full compensation in financial terms. These measures would bring Türkiye closer into line with the Convention.

Finally, I would like to say that, if these safeguards against anti-union dismissals are not put in place, this will lead to the actual disappearance of trade unions at the level of the undertaking and this is not something that this Committee can allow to stand.

Chairperson – I can see no more requests for the floor. So I would like to invite the representative of the Government of Türkiye to take the floor for her concluding remarks.

Government representative – We have listened attentively to the remarks of esteemed Worker and Employer representatives, as well as the distinguished representatives of Member countries. There is a mismatch between the realities of Türkiye and the content of the discussion taking place at the ILO. Türkiye is one of the countries which has been on the agenda of the Conference Committee many times for many years. An approach only concentrating on the deficiencies and not seeing any positive developments should not be the right approach to encourage compliance with international standards. I would like to bring to the attention of the Committee the following most significant developments and progress that have been made in the realm of labour life since 2013, especially within the scope of Convention No. 98, in line with the demands of the ILO in our current Trade Unions Law. Important progress in legislation has been achieved through a decision by the Constitutional Court. Rulings in 2013 and 2014 removed barriers preventing civil servants in the Ministry of National Defence and the Turkish Army Force and the General Directorate of Security from joining trade unions. This narrowed the scope of article 15 of the Public Servants' Law. The introduction of e-membership services for trade union membership and withdrawal in November 2013 of the long-standing requirement for notary requirement, simplifying the process and reducing financial burdens on both workers and their organizations. An amendment of article 50 of the current Trade Unions Law introduced a mediation procedure allowing bargaining parties to peacefully resolve disputes before resorting to strikes by selecting a mediator from the official list. In 2014, the Constitutional Court abolished the distinction between workplaces based on employee numbers. Provisional article 6 of the current Trade Unions Law was amended to provide the right to bargain collectively without meeting the branch activity threshold. In 2019, the Constitutional Court took a decision stating that banking and public transport services were not considered essential services by the ILO, leading to a further narrowing of the strike ban. The implementation of the current Trade Unions Law and significant amendments of the Public Servants Law have led to a consistent increase in trade union membership rates. Since January 2013, the rate of unionization has steadily risen from 9.2 per cent to 15.2 per cent by January 2024. This trend is also evident among public sector employees with unionization rates increasing from 47.9 per cent in 2002 to 74.5 per cent by January 2024. These statistics highlight the positive progress made in Türkiye over the years against a trend of declining unionization rates around the world. Furthermore, the White Flag certification has been launched to promote registration, employment and trade union membership in Türkiye. It involves granting the White Flag certification with the slogan "Decent work, organized workplace" to businesses that adhere to registered working conditions, occupational safety and health standards in line with ILO guidelines. I want to reiterate that, alongside the positive change, the momentum gained since last year through the participation of the social partners in a tripartite consultation mechanism will drive further new regulation and amendments.

During this process, Türkiye shifted focus from reforms to tackling internal and external challenges, notably the 15 July coup attempt, while maintaining commitment to democracy and the rule of law. Unfortunately, we must highlight that the Committee of Experts' report did not adequately consider the Government's effort in restoring democracy, upholding the rule of law, and involving social partners and safeguarding the Republic and individual rights amidst significant terrorist threats. Over five years, the Inquiry Commission processed approximately 130,000 procedures resolving nearly 127,000 decisions, including dismissals from public service and other measures based on criteria related to connection to terrorist organizations and financial support. Applicants, including detainees and convicts could apply from penitentiary institutions electronically, with decisions overseen by the National Judiciary Informatics System (UYAP) and subject to appeal in nine specialized administrative courts in Ankara. I would like to boldly emphasize that, as a legal remedy for dismissals from public service, after the Inquiry Commission on State of Emergency Actions completed its duties, relevant units were formed in the relevant ministries in order to effectively follow up and finalize the administrative case files in accordance with provisional article 5 of Law No. 7075. However, as we have reiterated many times, it would be inappropriate to treat security-related issues as if they were a part of the world of work. Moreover, we also think that the ILO should approach such issues in a manner that prevents abuse. Besides, no trade unionist is immune from prosecution for unlawful acts, within affiliations or involvement in terrorism. Following the COVID-19 pandemic, Türkiye faced two major earthquakes in February 2023, impacting 11 provinces in the southeastern region and affecting 14 million people, representing 16 per cent of the population and 9 per cent of the economy. We express here our heartfelt thanks to international organizations and Member countries, particularly the ILO, for their support during these challenging times. Over the past seven years, Türkiye has actively participated in ILO initiatives, collaborating with the Ministry of Labour and Social Security and other stakeholders on events and programmes such as the Tenth European Regional Meeting and efforts to combat child labour. Recognized as a leading example in this regard, Türkiye has earned the status of an Alliance 8.7 Pathfinder Country and serves as a Coordinating Country in the ILO Global Coalition for Social Justice, alongside Belgium and Switzerland in the region.

In the framework of this importance and trust shown to us by the ILO and our own deep history of dialogue with the social partners, the Government is willing to negotiate within the framework of the existing Trade Unions Law and the Public Servants Law, if desired by the involved parties, in particular with regard to the level of collective bargaining, trade union thresholds and the authorization process for collective bargaining agreements.

I would like to point out that the Government is prepared to consider proposed amendments to the current collective bargaining system, specifically regarding articles 34 and 41(1) of the current Trade Unions Law. These amendments would be considered, if jointly proposed by social partners and if consensus is reached.

The Government is open to considering proposed amendments jointly made by social partners regarding various paragraphs in articles 46, 47, 49, 51, 60, 61 and 63 of the current Trade Unions Law. However, it is worth noting that the implementation of these articles is collaboratively carried out by employers' and workers' organizations. The collective bargaining process regulated by these articles proceeds smoothly without hesitation.

Türkiye has recently demonstrated its commitment to making changes and regulations on these issues in cooperation with the social partners by convening the Labour Assembly, the Tripartite Consultation Board, the Public Personnel Advisory Board and their sub-working committees.

Regarding the allegations on the restriction of freedom of peaceful assembly and May Day demonstrations, in Türkiye, all forms of peaceful gatherings and demonstrations take place within secure and unrestricted areas. The principle of the rule of law is upheld and limitations are only imposed as specified by legislation. In addition, 227 actions or events were organized with the participation of nearly 245,000 people in 78 provinces across Türkiye in 2024, regarding the 1 May Labour and Solidarity Day, and legal action was initiated against 269 people who acted illegally in these actions or events.

In Istanbul, an event organized by the Confederation of Progressive Unions (DISK) and KESK was held in Saraçhane Park, one of the most important demonstration and meeting areas, with the participation of 10,000 people. This event was held peacefully without any intervention.

On the other hand, Taksim Square is not included among the areas where meetings and demonstrations can be organized due to the high density of vehicles and pedestrians, the difficulty in taking security measures and protecting personal rights and freedoms, but more importantly, because it will have irreparable consequences for ensuring the security of life and property of the public. I would like to emphasize that there is no such situation as a ban on Taksim Square only for May Day. Therefore, the allegation that there is a Government ban on May Day celebrations does not reflect the truth.

In addition, I would like to bring to your attention that, similar to our approach under Convention No. 98, we have initiated the adoption of the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930. Moreover, the ratification process for the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended, will be concluded soon.

Finally, it is our expectation that the Committee's conclusions will duly take into account my above explanations. As it is requested by the Committee of Experts, we will submit our report in 2024 with detailed information on the latest developments and with the copies of the documents requested for further examination by the Committee.

Employer members – The Employer members have taken due note of the information provided, but some information given this evening on the ECHR does not seem quite right.

One of the ILO's main missions is to promote collective bargaining throughout the world. This mission was afforded it in 1944 in the Declaration of Philadelphia, which is part of the ILO Constitution. Collective bargaining contributes to the establishment of equitable and balanced working conditions and thereby to social peace.

As indicated in the 2012 General Survey, paragraph 198, "Under the terms of the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work, 1998, collective bargaining is a fundamental right accepted by Member States from the very fact of their membership in the ILO, and which they have an obligation to respect, to promote and to realize in good faith."

Paragraph 168 sets out that "Convention No. 98 covers all workers and employers, and their respective organizations, in both the private and the public sectors, regardless of whether the service is essential. The only exceptions authorized concern the armed forces and the police, as well as public servants engaged in the administration of the State."

The excluded categories must therefore be interpreted narrowly. We consider that prison staff should not be excluded but that specific terms of collective bargaining could be set for this category, as mentioned in paragraph 213 of the General Survey.

Lastly, paragraph 200 states that "under the terms of Article 4 of the Convention, collective bargaining must be free and voluntary and respect the principle of the autonomy of the parties. However, the public authorities are under the obligation to ensure its promotion."

We consider that the social partners themselves rather than the law are best placed to decide the level at which they wish to collectively bargain and conclude collective agreements. They should therefore conclude collective agreements at intersectoral, sectoral, regional and enterprise level.

We note that there are encouraging developments for the future of Türkiye. All trade union confederations and employers' organizations have met since last April 2024 to set a new social agenda to respond to the daily challenges related to industrial relations. In addition, a significant project has been set up by ILO Türkiye with the participation of the social partners, which will cover freedom of association and the right to bargain collectively as pillars of the agenda of fundamental rights. This project will strengthen the understanding and implementation of international labour standards in Türkiye.

The Employer members encourage the governmental authorities to strengthen these consultations with the representative employers' and workers' organizations to promote collective bargaining at all levels. The promotion of collective bargaining concerns both the private and the public sector, even if certain exceptions are justifiable in the public sector based on their particular role in guaranteeing national security.

The Employer members also invite the Government to provide the ILO with all the information requested by the Committee of Experts. I conclude by highlighting that, above all, incentives should be strengthened so that social partners organize in full freedom and bargain freely and independently.

Worker members – We thank the Government of Türkiye for its remarks. We also thank all the speakers who took the floor and all the people who are still in the room.

Despite the additional information provided by the Government, our concerns regarding the many violations of the right to organize and the right to collective bargaining in the country have not been eased.

Anti-union discrimination and union busting are rampant both in the private and the public sectors. The national legal framework for the exercise of trade union rights is highly restrictive. Trade unionism is heavily impaired by excessive representativity thresholds. And we disagree with the characterization used by the Employer members to describe minority unions as “mere lobbying groups” with no rights or protections under the Convention. We firmly recall that, under Convention No. 98, the granting of exclusive rights to the most representative organization should not mean that the existence of other unions to which certain involved workers might wish to belong is prohibited. Minority organizations should be permitted to carry out their activities and at least to have the right to speak on behalf of their members and to represent them.

We are deeply concerned about the hostile stance taken by the Government against trade unions and their members since 2016, as demonstrated by the bouts of police violence occurring on May Day almost each year. On 1 May this year for example, KESK members and leaders were prevented from accessing the Taksim Square. Police forces violently broke up the demonstration, using tear gas and rubber bullets against workers and 215 workers were arrested that day.

We urge the Government to stop interfering in legitimate trade union activities and to refrain from using violence against trade union members and workers. We call on the Government to urgently take measures to lift all the legal barriers to the full enjoyment of the rights guaranteed by the Convention, including by reviewing, in full consultation with the social partners, legislative provisions regarding: the thresholds for becoming a collective bargaining agent; the rights of minority unions to collectively bargain; the restrictions of collective bargaining at all levels in the private sector; and the restrictions applying to prison staff, locum workers and public servants without a written contract.

Furthermore, we urge the Government to take meaningful and effective action to address anti-union discrimination both in the private and public sectors, including by: establishing an independent, expeditious and in-depth process for investigation and remedy of cases brought against anti-union dismissals in the public sector, in the framework of the emergency laws; but also repealing any remaining provisions which enable authorities to exercise state of emergency powers and to summarily dismiss union members; also adopting, in full consultation with the social partners, effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against anti-union dismissals, as well as effective and expeditious mechanisms accessible to workers to seek redress; and, finally, elaborating and implementing, together with the social partners and with the technical assistance of the ILO, awareness-raising campaigns and programmes to educate the police and security forces, the judiciary and the administration on trade union rights.

We also call on the Government to engage in a broader review, in consultation with the social partners and with ILO technical assistance, of judicial and non-judicial mechanisms for the effective and timely investigation and redress of cases of anti-union discrimination.

Given the seriousness and the persistence of the violations in the country, we call on the Government to accept a high-level mission.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted with concern the high number of cases of anti-union discrimination in the country and the lack of sufficiently dissuasive sanctions to combat this phenomenon in law and in practice. The Committee noted with concern the significant gaps in law and practice regarding the scope of collective bargaining.

Taking into account the discussion, the Committee called on the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to take appropriate and effective measures to:

- ensure the independent, expeditious and in-depth investigation into the alleged anti-union dismissals under the state of emergency decrees in the framework of procedures presenting all the guarantees of due process;
- adopt effective and dissuasive sanctions against anti-union discrimination, including anti-union dismissals, in both the public and private sectors, and ensure that workers who have suffered such prejudice are entitled to appropriate remedies (including reinstatement, financial compensation, etc.);
- engage in a comprehensive review of judicial and non-judicial mechanisms for the effective and timely investigation and redress of cases of anti-union discrimination;
- establish a robust system for collecting data on anti-union discrimination in both the public and private sectors;
- prevent interference in legitimate trade union activities and use of violence against trade union members and workers;
- amend section 34 of Act No. 6356 with a view to enabling parties in the private sector wishing to engage in cross-sector regional or national agreements to do so;
- ensure that minority trade unions are able to exercise their rights protected under the Convention;
- ensure that court proceedings on the legal validity of trade union majority certificates are concluded within a reasonable time;

- amend section 28 of Act No. 4688 with a view to removing restrictions on the material scope of collective bargaining in the public sector and to ensure that the parties concerned can autonomously decide the subjects for negotiation;
- amend existing legislation to ensure that prison staff, locum workers and public servants without a written contract can effectively exercise their right to organize and bargain collectively under the Convention;
- provide efficient and rapid remedies against the dismissal of trade union members based on state of emergency powers;
- review the method of appointment of members of the public employee arbitration board so as to ensure its independence and impartiality;
- elaborate and implement awareness-raising campaigns and programmes to educate the police and security forces, the judiciary and the administration on trade union rights; and
- provide any outstanding information requested by the Committee of Experts before its next session together with detailed information on the measures taken to implement these recommendations, and on the results achieved.

The Committee invited the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance to effectively implement all of the Committee's recommendations.

Government representative – First of all, I would like to state that this decision of the Committee is a regrettable one, which is against the will of our Government which has been put forward by our country and which is expected to issue concrete results in a short period of time with the efforts of the social partners. In any case, it would have been appropriate for the Committee to give us a reasonable time for the arrangements that will be realized by our Government together with the social partners. We hope that this process will have a positive outcome for the relations between the ILO and our country together with the social partners.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105)

Written information provided by the Government

The Government has provided the following written information as well as a copy of the road map for cooperation activities between the ILO and the Government of Turkmenistan for 2024–25.

During the ILO high-level mission in February 2024, the next stage of cooperation was discussed with the active participation of the social partners. During the visit, meetings were held with the following bodies of Turkmenistan: deputies of the Cabinet of Ministers, representatives of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Parliament (Mejlis), the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, the Ministry of Internal Affairs, the Ministry of Finance and Economy, the Ministry of Agriculture, the Ministry of Justice (Adalat), the Ministry of the Textile Industry, the Office of the Ombudsman, the Institute of State, Law and Democracy, the Office of the Prosecutor-General, the Ministry of Education, the State Statistics Committee, the National Trade Union Centre, the Union of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs, the main State service, Turkmenstandartlary, the State concern, Turkmenpagta, and provincial administrative bodies.

As a result of constructive cooperation, the road map for cooperation with the ILO for 2024–25 was adopted.

- (1) Priority actions will be taken to strengthen the policy framework to prevent the mobilization of child labour. As part of this measure, there are plans to enshrine in law provisions that prohibit forced or compulsory labour during the cotton harvest, that is to prepare and submit a draft presidential decree on measures for a highly organized cotton harvest, taking into account the organization of voluntary and fairly remunerated employment during the harvest.

With regard to the prevention of child labour, the list of jobs, occupations and positions with harmful or hazardous (and especially harmful or especially hazardous) working conditions in which the employment of persons under the age of 18 is prohibited, is to be revised, with the inclusion of activities relating to the cotton harvest. Provision is also to be made to ensure that children under the age of 18 are not involved in the cotton harvest, and to ensure compliance with legislation on the minimum age for employment. There are plans to develop and implement measures to raise public awareness of the prevention of mobilization and involvement of child labour, aimed at local authorities, social partners and the public. Accordingly, the development and implementation of a plan is envisaged to disseminate relevant information to stakeholders, local authorities and daikhan (farmers) associations, employers, workers and the general public on how to identify and report risks and incidents, including unacceptable practices in recruiting cotton pickers, by encouraging voluntary disclosure before and during the cotton harvest.

The road map also provides for:

- the promotion and establishment of fair and decent pay for cotton pickers by analysing the possibility of establishing (revising) the minimum wage (for picking one kilogram of cotton) for both the 2024 and 2025 cotton harvests, through research and consultations by way of social dialogue with the Government;
 - ILO technical support to Turkmenistan on accession to the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), and the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), by analysing relevant national legislation; the signing of a memorandum of understanding on organizing an analysis of the review of working conditions in Turkmenistan;
 - the development of protection protocols covering all individuals who file complaints, including measures to protect confidentiality, protect against harassment and ensure referrals to appropriate support services; the development and implementation of pilot feedback/complaint mechanisms during the 2024 harvest, and improvement of complaint mechanisms for the 2025 harvest.
- (2) As part of the improvement of the legislative framework:
 - the legislative framework with regard to forced and child labour is to be improved in accordance with the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), and the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182);
 - the ILO recommendations to review legislation and draft legislative amendments are to be implemented;

- provisions, rules and systems for decent employment and working conditions during the cotton harvest are to be improved, namely through strengthening regulations on recruitment of cotton pickers by entering into appropriate contracts with them and agricultural producers, and monitoring compliance with the minimum wage for their labour;
 - technical assistance is to be provided to support progress towards ratification of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) and the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129);
 - capacity is to be built and technical assistance provided for the ratification of the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187), and the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102).
- (3) The law enforcement framework includes the provision of technical assistance to increase victims' access to effective remedies (Ombudsman's Office, law enforcement and judicial authorities at central and regional levels) and the development of protocols and tools to support access to remedies.

The road map also envisages broader reforms, such as studying international experience to establish a recruitment system and a selection mechanism for cotton-harvesting jobs, promoting social dialogue in cotton production, and identifying possible structural reforms to increase the productivity and sustainability of cotton production, and support decent work opportunities along the entire cotton value chain.

The ILO technical mission of 14–17 May 2024, with the participation of ILO officials, contributed positively to the implementation of the priority actions of the road map for 2024–25, and was aimed at discussing the activities of the road map, including the development of Government instructions for personnel selection and working conditions during the 2024 cotton harvest, revision of the list of jobs, occupations and positions with harmful or hazardous (and especially harmful or especially hazardous) working conditions, in which the employment of persons under the age of 18 is prohibited, and mechanisms for dealing with complaints and access to effective remedies. A round table involving all stakeholders was organized during the mission. At the same time, work is under way to prepare a draft memorandum of understanding between the Government of Turkmenistan and the ILO on a survey of working conditions during the 2024 cotton harvest in Turkmenistan.

The Parliament of Turkmenistan, as represented by the deputy corps, is actively engaged in awareness-raising activities aimed, inter alia, at informing society about the prevention and prohibition of forced labour, including child labour. Trade union activities in *etrap*s [(districts)] and cities also include the organization of awareness-raising seminars involving stakeholders and civil society which target national and local tripartite stakeholders and civil society to ensure an open dialogue on challenges, frameworks and response mechanisms to address issues relating to fair employment of workers. Articles and publications have been produced on the legal regulation of labour relations in various sectors, including agriculture. The Government of Turkmenistan is currently considering accession to the 2014 Protocol to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 and, in this regard, consultations are being held with the ministries, departments and social partners concerned regarding ratification of the above Protocol. In addition, we would like to note our commitment to studying international experience in the prevention of forced labour, including child labour in all its forms. Evidence of this, in particular, is the participation in March 2024 of a delegation from Turkmenistan in a study tour to Tashkent, Uzbekistan, as part of the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) Safe Migration in Central Asia project. The delegation studied the experience of eradicating child and forced labour in the country's cotton sector. As a participant in the joint programme, the Ministry of Labour of Turkmenistan will continue to play an active part in the implementation of activities within its competence.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the Government representative of Turkmenistan, Ambassador and Permanent Representative of Turkmenistan to the United Nations Office at Geneva.

Government representative – Turkmenistan's case has been repeatedly considered by the Committee during its annual sessions on the implementation of the provisions of the Convention, during which our country accepted the recommendations made, including the invitation of the ILO high-level technical assistance mission. Since the high-level mission, we have embarked on a substantial programme of cooperation with the ILO and numerous visits have been undertaken by the ILO to Turkmenistan, including high-level missions.

The ratification by Turkmenistan of the two ILO governance Conventions in 2019 and 2021, the ILO Constitutional Amendment in 2022 and the adoption and full implementation of the road map for cooperation with the ILO for 2023 are significant results of close cooperation.

The implementation of the activities of the road map was carried out in close collaboration and cooperation with ILO staff, in particular on: reviewing the policy and administrative structure governing cotton harvesting; improving labour inspection; promoting full and freely chosen employment in the cotton sector; developing and raising awareness; and promoting social dialogue in the cotton production and processing sectors.

As part of ILO activities, a qualitative survey of hiring practices for cotton harvesting was conducted in selected regions of Turkmenistan, with visits to the cotton fields during the harvesting period to monitor working conditions. At the same time, a quantitative survey of households was conducted by the state statistic authorities to assess the trend of cotton harvesting over the last five years.

In September 2023, the Government and the ILO signed the Memorandum of Understanding concerning the observation of working conditions during the 2023 cotton harvest in Turkmenistan. In accordance with the Memorandum, a delegation of ILO specialists made phased visits to Turkmenistan in September–October 2023, consisting of seven ILO teams. During the visits, the ILO teams travelled to the regions of the country to visit cotton harvest fields, met and held interviews with cotton harvest participants, tenants, farmer associations and representatives of farms.

An ILO report was prepared based on the results of the monitoring conducted within the framework of the road map and was discussed among stakeholders in Turkmenistan in February 2024. The report describes Turkmenistan's cotton industry, results of visits to cotton fields, information on hand-picked cotton, wages and working hours at the cotton ginner, regulation of fair and voluntary recruitment of workers and their replacement during the cotton harvest, and organization of inspections of working conditions of cotton pickers.

The report also presented recommendations on continuing to improve legislation on the prevention and prohibition of forced labour, raising awareness of employers and local authorities on the prevention of the use of forced labour, including child labour, and on the mechanism for handling complaints and other recommendations. The report also made recommendations on the ratification of a number of ILO Conventions, in particular the labour inspection Conventions, the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labor Convention, 1930 and a number of occupational safety and health Conventions.

During the ILO high-level mission in February 2024, with the active participation of the social partners, the issues concerning the next stage of cooperation were discussed. During the visit, meetings were held with deputies of the Chairperson of the Cabinet of Ministers, representatives of Parliament, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Office of the Ombudsman, leading ministers and departments, as well as local authorities.

As a result of ILO recommendations and our constructive cooperation, and in consultation with the social partners, the road map for cooperation with the ILO for 2024–25 was adopted. We have shared the road map with the Committee, and you can find it on the ILO website. The main areas of the road map include priority actions to strengthen the policy framework to prevent mobilization and child labour through:

- improvement of the legislative framework on forced and child labour, in accordance with the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), Convention No. 105, the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) and the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182);
- provision of technical assistance by the ILO to support progress towards the ratification of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187), the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), and the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930;
- signing of a memorandum of understanding on the organization of an analysis of the review of working conditions in Turkmenistan and the undertaking by the ILO of an observation of the cotton harvest; and
- development and implementation of feedback/complaints mechanisms during the 2024 harvest, and improvement of complaints mechanisms for the 2025 harvest.

Enforcement includes technical assistance to improve access to effective remedies for victims, an Office of the Ombudsman, law enforcement and judiciary at the central and regional levels.

The road map also envisages broader reforms, such as learning from international experience to establish a recruitment system and job-matching mechanism for cotton harvesting, promoting social dialogue in cotton production, and identifying possible structural reforms to improve the productivity and sustainability of cotton production and to support decent work opportunities along the entire cotton value chain. It is important to note that we have already started working to implement this road map with the ILO.

In particular, the first meeting between the Office of Ombudsman, and ILO and United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) experts was held a few days ago, on 4 June, with the aim of discussing the upcoming actions on the implementation of the aforementioned road map. A day later, a meeting was held between ILO experts and representatives of the Ministers of Labour, Justice and Agriculture and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Turkmenistan. By the end of June, we are also expecting ILO experts in Ashgabat for a working visit.

In addition, recently, we also received some proposals from the ILO on concrete actions and measures within the implementation of our new road map for 2024–25, related again to the Ombudsman's Office, the awareness-raising campaign, and the observation of the cotton harvest in the current year, which were already discussed during the aforementioned meetings.

At the present time, Turkmenistan is undergoing a crucial reform of the agrarian sector of the country and further improvement of its management. By the decree of the President of Turkmenistan, the Ministry of Agriculture was reorganized early this year in February.

In order to increase crop yields, develop livestock and poultry farming, create modern facilities for the production of high-quality agricultural products, and introduce modern technologies in production, sectoral agricultural structures (concerns and associations) in specific areas, including the State concern "Turkmenpagta", were established and separated from the Ministry of Agriculture of Turkmenistan.

An important step in the context of the topic under consideration today is the decision of the Government to significantly increase the purchase price of cotton from 1.5 to 5 manats, which is linked to the cotton harvest period. Such an increase was due to the need to provide farmers with greater incentives and income, as well as to increase payment to cotton pickers for each kilogram of cotton harvested, depending on the time of harvesting this crop and its quality.

An effective contribution to the implementation of priority actions of the road map for 2024–25 was the ILO technical mission in May this year, which was aimed at implementing the activities of the above-mentioned road map, including the development of instructions of the Government on recruitment and working conditions during the 2024 cotton harvest. During the mission, a round table was organized with the participation of all stakeholders. A second round table was also organized to discuss the inclusion of cotton picking in the list of jobs, professions and positions with harmful and dangerous working conditions that are not allowed for the employment of persons under the age of 18. Work is already underway in close coordination with the ILO in follow-up to these round tables.

A meeting of the tripartite commission of social partners is currently being planned. One of the key issues on the agenda is the consideration of the action plan of the road map for 2024–25, in particular the issue of improving the list of dangerous and hazardous work through the inclusion of cotton pickers.

In addition, as part of the discussion of the action plan, the issue of improving the legal framework governing the relationship between employers and cotton pickers is being considered. At the same time, work is under way to prepare a draft memorandum of understanding between the Government and the ILO concerning the independent observation of working conditions during the 2024 cotton harvest in Turkmenistan.

The Government is currently considering the ratification of the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, and consultations are being held with the ministers, departments and social partners concerned.

At the same time, we would like to note our commitment to studying international experience in the prevention of forced labour, including child labour in all its forms. This is evidenced, in particular, by the participation in March this year of a delegation of Turkmenistan in a study tour to Tashkent, Uzbekistan, within the framework of the USAID Safe Migration in Central Asia project, during which the delegation studied Uzbekistan's experience in the abolition of forced labour, including child labour in the cotton sector of the country.

We highly value the cooperation with the ILO in achieving global fair labour goals and are committed to continuing this cooperation to address the recommendations of the supervisory bodies.

Taking into account all state target programmes, the constant work to improve Turkmenistan's legislative and institutional framework, and the results of practical activities in the area of labour, employment and social protection of the population, Turkmenistan has a high potential for the ratification, in the future, of a number of other priority ILO Conventions and the effective implementation of their standards.

In conclusion, I would like to express confidence that Turkmenistan will continue to pay special attention to the problems of social and economic justice, ensuring fundamental human rights and freedoms.

Employer members – We have noted with interest the information shared by the Government. We wish to encourage Turkmenistan to continue its efforts to better investigate and remediate the issues regarding forced labour in cotton harvesting that have led Turkmenistan's compliance with the Convention to become a regular subject here in the Committee. Turkmenistan ratified the Convention in 1997. ILO Convention No. 105 is a fundamental Convention that calls for the abolition of forced labour. This case was discussed in the Conference Committee in 2016, 2021, 2023, and again now in 2024. There were observations issued by the Committee of Experts on this case in 2015, 2016, 2019, 2020, 2021, 2022, 2023, and again now in 2024.

To be clear, the Employer members wish to stress their deep commitment towards the eradication of forced labour. We stand united in our belief that there should be no place for forced labour in our world of work, especially forced labour that is mandated or facilitated by a sovereign State. We further stand ready in our commitment to exercise any authority we may have as a social partner to assist in the eradication of forced labour, whether in Turkmenistan or anywhere else in our world.

Context, as always, is critical, and here it is significant to note that Turkmenistan's economy is largely state-driven, with its private sector remaining relatively small and closely regulated by the State. We also take note that Turkmenistan is – depending on the source that is consulted – the 13th or 14th largest cotton producer in the world, and that Turkmenistan's cotton harvest is of material importance to its economy. Although more can be said about the political context, we wish to reiterate here that the Committee has raised serious questions about the independence of the country's trade union and employer organizations.

By way of legal context, and in addition to ratifying the Convention, we note that the Constitution of Turkmenistan (article 33), guarantees the right to freely choose a profession, occupation and place of work, as well as to healthy and safe working conditions. As the road map for cooperation activities between the ILO and the Government for 2024–25 has noted, forced or compulsory labour is prohibited under national law, which includes:

- “any practice of compelling or forcibly mobilizing persons working in enterprises, regardless of form of ownership, or any other person under or over 18 years of age to pick cotton”;
- “collection of cotton by employees of enterprises (organizations, institutions) of all forms of ownership during the working week in the working hours established by the schedule”; and
- “any practice that requires public or private sector employees or any other person to pick cotton or hire pickers or pay for replacement pickers or otherwise finance the picking of cotton.”.

The existence of regulation is quite different from the respect and enforcement of that regulation. It is, of course, a benefit to have existing regulation and, most relevant here, a country that has voluntarily ratified the Convention. There nonetheless appears to be a continued and unfortunate enforcement gap and we should all recall and continue to be mindful that the work of this esteemed Committee is to explore and seek to ensure compliance with certain voluntarily ratified Conventions, like Convention No. 105.

To that end, we note that the Committee of Experts has repeatedly identified multiple abusive practices that conflict with the Convention, in particular Article 1(b) of the Convention prohibiting forced or compulsory labour as a method of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development, with a focus on the practices within the Turkmen cotton industry.

These concerns led to ILO high-level missions, and then a road map for cooperation between the ILO and Turkmenistan that was adopted in March 2023. The 2023 road map covered the following six areas:

- (1) a review of the policy and administrative framework;
- (2) improvement of labour inspection and law enforcement;
- (3) promotion of full, productive and freely chosen employment in the cotton sector;
- (4) improvement of cotton production and harvesting;
- (5) design and implementation of awareness-raising activities; and
- (6) promotion of social dialogue in cotton production.

We appreciate any progress towards this 2023 road map, and note that the Government has indicated that: (i) an analysis has been carried out of the current legislative framework, and draft legislative acts were submitted to Parliament; (ii) meetings were held with the participation of the relevant ministries and agencies, social partners and the ILO representatives; (iii) there are ongoing efforts to produce a qualitative study of recruitment practices for the cotton harvest; (iv) a technical workshop was held during the ILO mission in July 2023 to discuss seasonal and casual employment; (v) in 2021–22, more than 200 awareness-raising meetings, workshops and round tables were held to address fair employment issues; and (vi) the Government has indicated that national employers' and workers' organizations are actively involved in implementing all the measures set out in the 2023 road map.

In addition, another ILO high-level mission, led by the ILO Regional Director for Europe and Central Asia, took place from 19 to 23 February 2024, which focused on certain discrete items, including a round table discussion with government authorities and representatives of the national employers' and workers' organizations to discuss the next phase of cooperation under a two-year road map for 2024–25, and a report to synthesize all research activities and observations from the 2023 cotton harvest. A technical ILO mission took also place on 14–16 May 2024, just several weeks ago.

The new joint two-year road map was approved by the Government just weeks ago, on 13 May 2024. This 2024–25 road map contains four main components: (i) priority actions aimed at strengthening policy framework, to be taken immediately and ahead of the 2024 cotton harvest that begins in just two months, including the preparation of a presidential decree as a first step towards legislative reform, as well as a public awareness campaign; (ii) a further improvement of legislative framework; (iii) strengthening of the enforcement of legislation and international labour standards; and (iv) other and complementary reforms and assistance, including various measures related to ILO technical assistance.

The Employer members wish to emphasize that component (iv) of the road map recognizes that the sustainable elimination of forced labour in cotton production requires the active participation and monitoring of the process by independent employers' and workers' organizations. Critically relevant here is that the Committee of Experts has raised serious legal issues regarding state control over employers' and workers' organizations in last year's observation on Turkmenistan on the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). The International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) further questioned the independence of the trade union movement in the country and the Employer members have similar concerns about the independence of employers' and business organizations in Turkmenistan. The Employer members thus wish to emphasize that freedom of association and independent employers' and workers' organizations are not only fundamental principles in themselves, but also guarantors of compliance with other ILO standards, such as Convention No. 105. We trust that a thorough mapping and assessment of the organizations representing employers and workers in Turkmenistan and a review of the legal and institutional framework for these organizations will be carried out, as foreseen in the road map and in line with any guidance provided by the ILO standards supervisory bodies.

We also note that the 2024–25 road map requires a memorandum of understanding to be signed between the Government and the ILO to better observe and report on actual working conditions.

There has been no shortage – in our view – of contemplated protocols or suggested actions to help end the use of forced labour in Turkmenistan's cotton harvest. Much ink has been spilled. It would nonetheless appear that this scourge continues to persist. It is our belief and wish that every available effort be taken to step past protocols and road maps to ensure better and more meaningful access to the facts and circumstances on the ground and, moreover, to ensure that forced labour is eradicated in Turkmenistan.

The Employer members have not and will not tolerate forced labour in contravention of the Convention, particularly forced labour that is mandated or facilitated by a sovereign State. Forced labour is an unconscionable practice that is harmful from all perspectives, even from a commercial perspective. It is starkly unethical and bad business in all senses.

Although we encourage the Government to continue engaging in cooperation with the ILO within the framework of the 2024–25 road map, we again place an emphasis on implementation and tangible results. We stand ready as Employer members to assist in any way that we can. We look forward to hearing the views of other groups on this case.

Worker members – This is the fourth time our Committee has examined the application of the Convention by the Government. This year will be the second consecutive time. In 2021, our Committee invited the Government to receive a high-level mission. This mission took place in November 2022. Contacts between the Government and the ILO led to the adoption of a road map in March 2023. A further ILO high-level mission was then held in February 2024, resulting in an updated road map, approved on 13 May 2024, by the Government.

This road map provides for activities in a number of areas that will enable progress to be made towards greater compliance with the Convention and a considerable improvement in the situation of many workers in Turkmenistan. This is a positive step forward, but we are still far from the objective of eradicating forced labour in Turkmenistan. We urge the Government to now make every effort to effectively implement this road map.

Despite all these initiatives, forced labour practices in cotton production are still present on a large scale in Turkmenistan according to reports done by independent monitors taking great risks investigating in the country. Absence of fundamental freedoms remains an obstacle to ending forced labour, and workers are still denied their fundamental rights to organize an independent trade union.

In 2022, the managers of state-owned enterprises came under greater pressure to mobilize workers for the cotton fields. In particular, tens of thousands of public sector employees, including teachers, doctors, cultural workers and civil servants, were mobilized to pick cotton to meet the targets of the State's cotton harvest plan. We understand, however, that in 2023, teachers and doctors were not involved anymore in cotton picking but thousands of other public workers were still mobilized.

Cotton pickers were forced to work in dangerous and unhealthy conditions, including temperatures ranging from -10°C in December to over 40°C in August, in direct sunlight and without sufficient quantities of drinking water. Cotton pickers were exposed to chemicals without warning and were not provided with any protective equipment or medical follow-up. They were also required to pay for their own food, water, transport and accommodation. Some were forced to use replacement pickers whom they paid out of their own pockets to avoid taking part in the cotton harvest themselves.

The UN Human Rights Committee also expressed concern in its 2023 concluding observations about the widespread use of forced labour by civil servants during the cotton harvest, under threat of sanctions such as termination of their employment contracts or loss or reduction of wages.

It also emerged that an independent ILO observation mission on the working and recruitment conditions of cotton pickers, made up of ILO staff and independent consultants, took place during the harvest in October 2023. The initial findings of this mission show direct and indirect evidence of the mobilization of civil servants in all but one of the regions visited. We regret that the full report of this observation mission is not yet available to the Committee.

It is positive to note that the cooperation of the Government with the ILO in implementing the recommendations of our Committee, enables the ILO to have a clearer view of the situation on the ground, and thus to be able to provide the most appropriate assistance to the Government. However, we can only share the Committee of Experts' deep concern about the continuing practice of forced labour in the cotton sector. We can therefore only invite the Government to redouble its efforts to pursue all the initiatives it has put in place in collaboration with the ILO.

These initiatives have clearly identified the areas in which time-bound action needs to be taken.

First of all, the political and administrative framework governing the cotton harvest needs to be re-examined. We have seen in the past that the national harvest plan and the objectives assigned to it are implemented at regional and local levels. It is therefore important that every link in this chain be involved in efforts to bring the situation into line with the Convention.

An ILO technical mission was set up in May 2024 to help the Government formulate clear instructions on recruitment and working conditions for the next cotton harvest, the revision of the list of hazardous work for children, the setting of a living wage for the cotton harvest, the establishment of complaints mechanisms, the strategy and actions for awareness-raising campaigns, and the parameters for ILO observations during the 2024 cotton harvest.

The labour inspectorate obviously has a fundamental role to play in resolving the problems encountered during the cotton harvest. The Government needs to work to improve labour inspection and enforcement. The concrete initiatives taken to prepare for the ratification of Conventions Nos 81 and 129 are to be welcomed, and we encourage the Government to continue resolutely along this path.

The promotion of productive and freely chosen employment, the development and implementation of awareness-raising activities and the promotion of social dialogue in cotton production will also be areas in which efforts will need to be made.

We note that over 200 awareness-raising meetings, workshops and round tables have been held over the 2021–22 period. Given the entrenchment of forced mobilization practices in Turkmenistan's cotton harvesting campaign, it is absolutely essential to continue and multiply these types of activities so that all strata of society are made aware of this issue.

Cotton production and harvesting conditions need to be improved to make up for the lack of decent work in many places. The next cotton harvest will be decisive in assessing the concrete progress made by the Government.

We expect the Government to make public, high-level policy statements condemning forced labour, to instruct officials at all levels not to use coercion to mobilize anyone to work. Furthermore, we expect the unimpeded operation of independent labour monitors to document and report labour conditions without fear of reprisal and ensure that their findings are integrated in the monitoring.

In addition to maintaining close collaboration with the ILO, it is important that the Government allows independent national and international social partners to participate in the process. Their participation will ensure transparency, better compliance with the Convention and close follow-up of the implementation of the road map agreed. It is only through tripartite social dialogue that lasting solutions can be found to the challenges facing Turkmenistan. It is therefore of utmost importance that Turkmenistan also guarantees an environment conducive for freedom of association in order to resolve the non-compliance with the Convention.

Government member, Belgium – I have the honour to speak on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States. The candidate countries Albania, Montenegro and North Macedonia, and the European Free Trade Association country Norway, member of the European Economic Area, align themselves with this statement.

The EU and its Member States are committed to the respect, protection and fulfilment of human rights, including labour rights. We promote the universal ratification and effective implementation of fundamental ILO Conventions and support the ILO in developing and promoting international labour standards and supervising their application.

Human rights are an essential aspect of our bilateral relations with Turkmenistan. The EU and Turkmenistan hold an annual Human Rights Dialogue, allowing for discussions on issues related to this topic.

In June 2023, the Committee deplored the persistence of widespread use of forced labour in relation to the annual state-sponsored cotton harvest and the Government's failure to make any meaningful progress on the matter since the discussions of the case in 2016 and 2021.

In this context, we welcome the recently increased cooperation between the Government and the ILO to address this long-standing concern related to the effective implementation of the Convention. We thank the Office for its active engagement in the promotion of labour rights and the abolition of forced labour in Turkmenistan and welcome that the Government has availed itself of ILO technical assistance, including several ILO missions in this regard. We call on Turkmenistan to translate this engagement into concrete progress.

We took note of the written information provided by the Government, including on the priority areas of the adopted road map for cooperation activities between the ILO and Government for 2024–25. We welcome that priority is given to the abolition and prevention of child labour and forced or compulsory labour during the cotton harvest through policy, administrative and legislative measures.

In line with the road map, we expect the Government to ensure the adequate protection of all individuals who file complaints, as well as provide appropriate support services and effective access to remedies for victims. We acknowledge the planned involvement of the Office of the Ombudsman in monitoring the situation and handling complaints related to forced labour. It is essential that the Government ensures decent employment and working conditions, including fair and decent pay for cotton pickers through social dialogue. Continued collaboration with the ILO is important in this regard, including in view of the ratification of Conventions Nos 81 and 129, fundamental occupational safety and health Conventions Nos 155 and 187, Convention No. 102, as well as the Protocol of 2014 to Convention No. 29.

We welcome the collaboration with the ILO with regard to preparing a draft memorandum of understanding on a survey of working conditions during the 2024 cotton harvest in Turkmenistan and express our strong call for the planned improvements in the legislative framework in the country to take place. We took note of the information, provided by the Government, on the engagement of the Parliament of Turkmenistan in awareness-raising activities on forced and child labour and encourage the Government to continue the activities in this regard.

While welcoming the initiatives undertaken by the Government, we note with great concern the observations by the ITUC on increased pressure on heads of state-owned enterprises to mobilize workers for cotton harvesting, including public sector employees, to meet the State's cotton harvest plan. We are also deeply concerned by the hazardous conditions under which the work is performed, the practice of imposing fees for replacement pickers and the fact that the majority of civil servants subject to forced labour are women.

We regret that the findings of the independent ILO observation mission, carried out during the harvest in October 2023, also show direct or indirect evidence of a widespread mobilization of public servants for cotton harvesting.

We reiterate the Committee of Experts' call and urge the Government to further strengthen its efforts to engage with the ILO and the social partners to fully implement the Convention in practice, thereby ensuring complete elimination of the use of compulsory labour of workers, particularly from the public sector, in cotton production. We expect the Government to continue to provide information on concrete measures taken to fully implement the road map.

The EU and its Member States welcome the Government's recent openness on the issue of eradication of forced labour in the country and its readiness to continue cooperation with the ILO. We hope it is followed by concrete progress soon. We stand ready to support Turkmenistan in meeting its obligations under the ratified Conventions and we will continue to follow closely the situation in the country.

Government member, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland – I am speaking on behalf of Australia, Canada and my own country, the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom has been engaged directly on this issue in Turkmenistan for several years.

We thank the Government for the recent information provided on its implementation of the Convention. We note that the information highlights several measures undertaken by the Government with the aim of addressing the observations of the Committee of Experts, including via the road map for cooperation activities between the ILO and the Government for 2024–25, which was adopted after the ILO high-level mission in February 2024.

We note the Government's plans to enshrine, in law, provisions that prohibit forced or compulsory labour during the cotton harvest, including the draft presidential decree. We look forward to its swift adoption.

Regarding child labour, we are encouraged that the inclusion of activities relating to the cotton harvest will be included in legislation for the prevention of child labour, and the broad public awareness campaign on the prevention of the mobilization and involvement of child labour. We hope that these initiatives will be rolled out swiftly.

We also note the developments in other areas beyond the immediate scope of the Convention, such as providing technical assistance to increase victims' access to effective remedies. Even as we note progress, we still remain deeply concerned and we strongly urge the Government to take immediate and effective action to:

- adopt its legislative proposals and roll out its awareness-raising activities expeditiously;
- continue to work constructively and collaboratively with the ILO, the UN Resident Coordinator, independent social partners and other development programmes; and
- continue to avail itself of ILO technical assistance for the Convention, the other relevant Conventions outlined in the road map, and its ratification of the 2014 Protocol to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930.

We believe that with committed action, Turkmenistan can, once and for all, eliminate forced labour, and improve recruitment and working conditions, in the cotton sector.

We sincerely hope that the Government's next report to the Committee of Experts will highlight the full implementation of the road map and further positive developments towards the elimination of forced labour in Turkmenistan.

Employer member, Argentina – The Argentine employer sector is pleased that the authorities of Turkmenistan have accepted ILO technical assistance, and have received the high-level missions in recent years, in particular the missions that took place during the harvest in October 2023 and in February 2024. However, given the results reported by these missions, we regret that we are once again at a session of the Committee in which it is not possible to demonstrate consolidated progress in the fulfilment of the obligations arising from the Convention. We therefore support the request by the Committee of Experts that the Government continue its efforts to ensure the elimination of forced labour in Turkmenistan.

In particular, we would like to highlight point 4.3 of the 2024–25 road map and underline the importance of technical assistance aimed at ensuring dialogue with representative and independent workers' and employers' organizations. Dialogue with representative employers' and workers' organizations helps to address the causes and risk factors associated with forced labour, and to effectively monitor the implementation of the policies developed.

In this regard, we are of the opinion that this case should be considered in connection with the Committee of Experts' recommendations on the application of the Convention in Turkmenistan.

We would like to emphasize that freedom of association, including the free election of workers' and employers' representatives, besides being fundamental principles, are elements that establish the necessary conditions for effective compliance with other international labour standards, including the Convention.

As noted in other sessions of this Committee, the effectiveness and sustainability of measures designed to combat forced labour are inseparable from countries' regulatory and economic environments.

We therefore trust that, in the light of this discussion, the Government will take the measures included in the 2024–25 road map and make every effort to ensure the operation of institutionalized and transparent social dialogue mechanisms, and that it will continue to avail itself of ILO technical assistance to adequately monitor, in law and in practice, the road map to eliminate forced labour in the country.

Government member, Azerbaijan – Azerbaijan expresses its gratitude for the detailed information provided on the current situation related to the implementation of the Convention. We would like to note the efforts made by the Government on the implementation of the Convention in close cooperation with the ILO. Observation missions of the ILO in 2023 and the planned mission during the cotton harvest in the current year indicate the openness and readiness of the Government to cooperate and resolve existing issues.

We welcome the successful implementation of the road map for cooperation between Turkmenistan and the ILO for 2023, as well as the development and adoption of the new road map for 2024–25 with concrete action on the implementation of the mentioned Convention, as well as the creation of a necessary legislation base.

I would like also to highlight the measures taken by the Government on maintaining dialogue with the social partners. As mentioned by the delegation, the meeting of the tripartite commission of social partners is a good example of the commitment demonstrated in the comprehensive approach of the Turkmen side.

Worker member, Netherlands – This statement is also on behalf of the German and Austrian workers and the Russian workers from the Confederation of Labour of Russia (KTR). Year after year during the cotton harvest, which takes place between August and December, the Turkmen Government forces tens of thousands of public sector workers to pick cotton or pay for replacement pickers under threat of penalty, including loss of employment, reduction of work hours or pay, and extorts money from the same workers to pay expenses related to the harvest.

In Turkmenistan, harvesting cotton using forced labour is not an anomaly, but an integral part of a command system of agricultural production that drives both rural poverty and child labour.

Forced labour of public sector employees to pick cotton was widespread and systematic in all regions that were monitored by independent researchers. Many civil servants reported mobilizations by mid-August. By December, despite temperatures below freezing, about 25 per cent of public sector employees were forced to pick cotton or pay for replacements during the week, and even more employees were sent to the fields on the weekend.

We welcome the recently signed road map for 2024–25 and the intention of the Government to work with the ILO. We consider that the road map contains important and necessary steps to be taken by the Government to abolish all forms of forced labour in the country.

However, when working on solutions, independent workers' organizations must be involved in the whole process. Unfortunately, this has not been the case so far. Therefore, we emphasize, Government representatives of Turkmenistan cannot formulate and execute plans with the ILO without involving the social partners, key constituents of the same institution.

As previous speakers, we also urge the authorities from Turkmenistan to fully cooperate with and implement recommendations from the ILO supervisory mechanisms. Under the framework of ILO technical advice, the Government should establish, monitor, and report on clear benchmarks to fulfil its obligations under all fundamental labour Conventions of the ILO.

Interpretation from Russian: Government member, Belarus – I would like to thank the Government for providing detailed information on the matter before us, and we note the commitment of the Government and workers' and employers' organizations to the principles of tripartite dialogue and the active participation of the ILO, including in the development of the road map for 2024–25. We welcome the road map's recommendations to include, in national law, provisions relating to banning forced labour, prohibiting the work of minors in hazardous enterprises and also creating a safe working environment. We welcome the Government's work to cooperate with the social partners and increase awareness relating to the unacceptability of using forced labour and child labour. We welcome the ILO's work and invite it to continue providing technical assistance, particularly in accordance with the road map for 2024–25, and also to continue to ensure further progress and to protect the rights and interests of workers.

Employer member, United States of America – The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO) was a founding member of the Cotton Campaign, a multistakeholder coalition dedicated to ending the use of forced labour in the annual cotton harvests in several Central Asian countries. As a member of this campaign, we welcomed the US Government's 2018 decision to ban the importation of products containing Turkmen cotton for the systematic use of state-sponsored forced labour. As others have noted, there has been important progress since this body discussed this case last year.

Critically, the Government no longer denies the existence of forced labour during its annual cotton harvest, as evidenced by the recently signed 2024–25 road map. But this is just the beginning of the journey toward ending the systemic use of forced labour in the cotton harvest. As this body knows all too well, the road map is only a first step and real progress depends on its effective and transparent implementation with the full participation of the social partners.

As a recent independent monitoring report shows, the Government-run forced labour system is alive and well in the Turkmenistan cotton harvest.

- Public employees were once again mobilized en masse and forced to pick cotton or pay for replacement workers,
- Children are still in the cotton fields, hired as "replacement pickers" or helping a parent meet a quota.
- Independent monitors and journalists are still persecuted and face great risk in reporting on the annual harvest.
- Workers are still denied their fundamental rights to organize an independent trade union and bargain collectively.

The action plan is an important first step, but now we need to see it implemented in an inclusive and transparent fashion. This means the ILO social partners must be fully consulted on the evaluation of compliance and understand the methodologies that form the basis of any ILO report conclusions. This is the only way to build trust that durable progress is being made and the State is tackling the root causes of this entrenched forced labour system. Only then will Turkmenistan eventually be able to produce and market cotton that is free from the taint of forced labour.

Government member, Kazakhstan – The Kazakh delegation thanks the Government representative of Turkmenistan for the report. We welcome the Government's recent engagement with the ILO. We note the commitment on the part of the Government to implement the road map for cooperation between the ILO and the Government for 2024–25, which includes concrete measures, as well as the enhancement of dialogue between the Government and the ILO. We encourage the Government to continue to pursue its efforts to ensure the complete elimination of the use of compulsory labour in cotton production.

Worker member, United Kingdom – Cotton infiltrates supply chains everywhere. We know that some cotton from Turkmenistan comes directly to the United Kingdom, but far more worrying is the vast amount that goes to Türkiye, a major supplier of finished textiles to the UK market. But the moment that this cotton becomes a Turkish-made product and is exported to our shops, its origins become harder to trace.

We know that companies have a responsibility to respect human rights in their supply chains, as set out in the United Nations Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights and – increasingly – in national and transnational legislation. Free and independent trade unions, sometimes through multi-stakeholder initiatives like the United Kingdom and Ireland's Ethical Trading Initiative, play a role in both improving the rights of workers in supply chains, and in verifying those improvements, providing a vital element of the necessary due diligence that no visiting auditor could ever supply.

The situation in Turkmenistan represents a challenge to that model, however. Cotton, produced through forced labour finds its way into the complexity of supply chains of companies that might otherwise be behaving ethically. As such, it can best be challenged and remedied at source. But unions cannot operate freely in Turkmenistan, and therefore cannot currently play a role in verifying whether that cotton, some of which will inevitably end up in UK supply chains, is free from the taint of forced labour.

It seems, on the face of it, that there has been some progress in Turkmenistan, and that it is to be welcomed. However, the face is all we are allowed to see and, until things change on the ground, we will continue to fear that reforms are piecemeal and fail to address the significant concerns stemming from previous investigations and from those independent assessments that are available from the 2023 harvest, which indicate that, although latterly, doctors and teachers were finally exempted from cotton picking, other public employees were still compelled to work on cotton farms, with no effective government intervention recorded to hold those responsible to account. Those forced to work faced the harsh, unhealthy and dangerous conditions described earlier by my fellow workers.

Ending forced labour requires a comprehensive strategy that extends far beyond merely reducing the number of individuals compelled to pick cotton. To ensure that reforms are sustainable, it is crucial to broadly enable labour rights, including to freedom of association and collective bargaining. Independent social partners can play a vital role in the development, implementation and – crucially – verification of substantial and lasting reforms aimed at eliminating state-imposed forced labour and the exploitation of farmers in the cotton sector.

Unions are ready to engage with the ILO-led road map, noting that strong accountability structures are required to help sustain progress towards agreed destinations and avoid a return to the ILO's supervisory systems in a few years' time. That engagement needs to be meaningful, involving independent unions at all stages, and ultimately making sure they can play the role they do elsewhere, and both contribute to, and verify, the progress hopefully sought by all sides.

Government member, Kyrgyzstan – The Kyrgyz delegation extends its gratitude to the Government for providing its written report. We commend Turkmenistan for its dedication to upholding the ILO Conventions and acknowledge the progress made in addressing the ILO's recommendations.

We appreciate the efforts made to support workers' rights and the national initiatives fostering social dialogue. Turkmenistan's commitment to dialogue and cooperation with the ILO is particularly noteworthy. In February of this year, the Government engaged in comprehensive discussions with the high-level ILO delegation, resulting in the adoption of the 2024–25 road map for cooperation with the ILO.

Turkmenistan is actively taking measures to prohibit forced labour and child labour, aligning its legislation with ILO Conventions on child labour prohibition, and working towards ratifying key ILO Conventions on labour inspections and social security. Additionally, Turkmenistan hosted an ILO technical mission in May, several weeks ago.

We believe in the importance of dialogue and cooperation, as emphasized in the ILO Constitution. Maintaining constructive dialogue is crucial for the benefit of workers, employers, and the economy as a whole.

In conclusion, we express our sincere gratitude to the Government for its commitment to constructive dialogue with the ILO and call for the continuation of active engagement with ILO bodies for the common good.

Worker member, France – I am speaking on behalf of French workers. Turkmenistan is the world's 14th largest cotton producer, and the use of forced labour for harvesting is organized by the public authorities. To harvest the crops, the public authorities set coercive quotas, mobilize all the human resources available and therefore call upon, under duress, state employees, civil servants, who are not at all normally employed in agriculture. There are penalties for anyone who tries to escape this system. The authorities thus create an environment conducive to abuse and corruption throughout the production chain.

Working conditions are harsh. Workers lack sufficient drinking water, and have to find their own accommodation and food. They are not provided with the appropriate protective equipment and are exposed to chemicals and fertilizers.

Workers cannot escape this forced mobilization: either they go to work in the fields, or they find and pay someone to replace them, or they pay a contribution to their line manager at their usual place of work, who will then recruit replacements and collect a tithe in the process. This system particularly affects public sector employees, and especially women, who comprise the majority of this workforce, which is paid a pittance and virtually forced to work in occupations that are not their own.

According to independent observers, while for the 2023 harvest two categories of public servants – teachers and doctors – were no longer forced to work or pay replacements, this system continued for other categories of less qualified public employees, such as care assistants, nurses, technical staff and road workers.

The Government's intention to work with the ILO, reflected in field missions and the signing of the 2024–25 road map, is an important and necessary step towards ending this practice of forced labour. However, the lack of freedom of association, the non-existence of independent trade unions and the absence of press freedom severely hamper the monitoring and application of ILO recommendations and render any progress uncertain and fragile. The intention to eradicate forced labour will only be successful if the country genuinely implements the fundamental ILO Conventions.

Government member, Switzerland – Switzerland supports the statement made by the European Union and would like to share the following points. Like the ILO, Switzerland attaches particular importance to the abolition of forced labour throughout the world. In this regard, Switzerland regrets having to discuss once again the failure to comply with Convention No. 105 – a fundamental Convention – by Turkmenistan.

The use of forced labour in cotton production through the large-scale mobilization and use of the workforce, including civil servants, still appears to be a common and widespread practice in Turkmenistan. These workers, mainly women, are threatened with penalties such as the termination of their employment contract, a reduction in salary or other penalties if they fail to comply with this obligation to work. Workers forced to pick cotton also generally work in unsafe and unhealthy conditions.

Switzerland recalls that this case has already been discussed by the Committee three times in recent years: in 2016, 2021 and 2023. These discussions all resulted in clear and repeated calls for the Government to end its systemic use of forced labour in cotton harvesting and production.

Switzerland notes and welcomes the fact that, following a number of high-level ILO technical assistance missions, a road map for cooperation between the ILO and the Government, including tangible measures to improve workers' conditions, was adopted in March 2023. However, Switzerland regrets that these measures are not systematically implemented by the Government, as certain groups of public sector workers seem to fall outside their scope.

In this regard, Switzerland urges the Government to put in place concrete and effective measures to eliminate, in law and in practice, forced labour for all workers, in accordance with the Convention.

Finally, Switzerland supports the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee of Experts urging Turkmenistan to communicate actively on the measures taken and the concrete results achieved, and to continue to use ILO technical assistance to improve recruitment and working conditions in the cotton sector.

Government member, United States – The United States thanks the Government for providing additional information to this Committee in response to the recent observations of the Committee of Experts. We welcome the approval and publication of the road map for cooperation between the ILO and the Government for 2024–25, focusing on: measures and awareness campaigns to combat forced and child labour and ensure, for workers, a minimum wage and safe and healthy working conditions; improving the legislative framework for the prevention and prohibition of forced labour; technical assistance for the Government to ratify additional ILO Conventions; technical assistance for the prosecution of those accused of depriving others of labour rights; technical assistance for the development and analysis of databases to analyse hiring practices and child and forced labour and to promote social dialogue, decent work and a just transition in the cotton sector and; the holding of periodic round tables to inform the formulation of policies to prevent mobilization and the use of child labour in cotton.

We encourage the Government to continue to actively pursue its efforts to ensure the complete elimination of the use of compulsory labour in cotton production. We welcome the Government's cooperation with the ILO to develop legislative standards that will align with the Convention while addressing forced labour in the cotton sector.

We also note that the independent workers' representatives will be essential partners for the development of new legal and policy approaches that eliminate the root causes of forced labour in the cotton sector. To that end, we urge the Government to amend provisions in the trade union law and the law on public associations that enable the Government to exact undue control over union activities including over the selection of trade union leadership. We welcome the Government's willingness to have ILO representatives observe the cotton harvest. We note with concern, however, the continued credible reports of forced labour in the sector, and policies that perpetuate the mobilization of workers for forced labour. We look forward to the Government's continued cooperation with the ILO and full implementation of the 2024–25 road map to eradicate child labour and forced labour. The United States remains committed to engaging with the Government to advance workers' rights in Turkmenistan.

Observer, International Union of the Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers' Associations (IUF) – The reports of the Cotton Campaign and Central Asia Labour Rights Monitoring Mission show that using various forms of coercion of workers to harvest cotton continues to be massive and systematic in Turkmenistan. Large groups of public sector workers, including employees of schools, preschool institutions, healthcare institutions and state enterprises are still sent to the fields.

The Government consistently denies the mass coercive nature of forced labour on the grounds that the authorities do not receive complaints. At the same time, the country has not created conditions for public control by non-governmental organizations and the media, as well as independent trade unions, which could respond to such information and, in cooperation with international organizations, carry out activities to protect workers.

In this regard, we positively assess the recently signed road map, which shows the intention of the Government to cooperate with the ILO on the eradication of forced labour. A number of measures envisaged in the document can indeed have a serious impact on the situation, if the work is done in a transparent manner and is open to consultations with the independent social partners, in particular international global unions such as ours, the IUF and the ITUC.

We call on the Government to continue meaningful cooperation with the ILO on bringing legislation and law enforcement practice into line with the provisions of the ratified Convention. This should be carried out within a broader framework which will lead the country towards effective implementation of all the ILO fundamental Conventions and, above all, the right to freedom of association.

Chairperson – We have just received a request for the floor from the Employers' delegate and the Workers' delegate from Turkmenistan. I accept this request and give the floor to the Workers' delegate from Turkmenistan.

Interpretation from Russian: Worker member, Turkmenistan – We would like to express our happiness at being able to speak at today's meeting. As has been said, the case of Turkmenistan has been discussed many times. I would like to particularly focus on how trade unions have acted during this period, what they have done, what achievements have been made, and what outcomes have been reached. As experts have noted, and other speakers have also said, the trade unions of Turkmenistan have been actively involved in the process of tripartite social dialogue. We have been actively participating in the discussions, after the signing of the road map for 2024–25. In the beginning of this year, we participated in the high-level mission, which was led by many high-level representatives of the ILO. Furthermore, the delegation of trade unionists and their leaders have had close cooperation with the Bureau for Workers' Activities (ACTRAV) throughout this process. During this period, the trade unions have been doing significant work. Our legislation is undergoing review. It will clearly define terms such as forced labour. In 2016, the new version of the Constitution included the provisions relating to the prohibition of the worst forms of child labour and the banning of forced labour. That is a major success in our country. We now have these principles enshrined in the highest legal act, the Constitution. There have been other new laws and amendments to existing laws, which now reflect the principles of the labour standards that we have been discussing. As things stand today, there is a range of legislative measures to prohibit forced child labour and legal liability for the breaking of these laws is in place. There have been positive changes over these years.

There is a clearer influence on the development of legal principles, the legal framework and occupational safety and health. Furthermore, the possibilities available to the social partners in terms of oversight are greater. The effectiveness of labour inspection is greater and involves the trade unions, which indicate public opinion serving as a feedback mechanism for the State, which enables it to correct its social policy. The trade unions regularly undertake work to assess the implementation of Convention No. 105 and other Conventions in accordance with the Labour Code.

The constitution of the trade unions has enshrined the principles of labour inspection which take place whenever there is a concern about violations of labour standards and collective agreements. The trade unions stand together alongside the social partners. We have adopted a law on a tripartite commission and, as things stand today, Turkmenistan has ratified the fundamental Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). The social dialogue between the Government, employers' representatives and workers is bearing fruit. As a part of the social partnership, there is a general agreement on tripartism at the moment, which started this year and will exist for three years. We visit the regions and carry out awareness-raising work among workers, farmers, leaseholders, local authorities, and we carry out workshops and seminars providing information on the ILO Conventions.

In May and June, our labour inspectorates carry out campaigns relating to the harvest, particularly with the participation of farmers and agricultural workers. We also carry out reviews of the effectiveness of observants of labour standards. Information sessions and workshops take place. We inform our colleagues in the regions, as well as farmers, keeping them up to date about the road map 2024–25 and its provisions, including the information about the wide range of measures which are directly linked to resolving the issues relating to the prohibition of forced labour and child labour and the implementation of the Convention.

The seminars that we carry out include the materials from international experts gathered from the active work of the last few years. We have been actively participating in all of this with the institutions of international labour.

In 2024, the ILO and the Government agreed upon and signed the road map. Within its framework, the trade unions are working on the improvement and enhancement of the labour legislation and their own regulations. We are members of the Working Group in Parliament for the development of a new Labour Code, and we very much hope that, in light of these efforts, there will be corresponding amendments to the Labour Code.

As a result of a visit of international experts in May 2024, trade unions are considering the issues relating to the measures on improving the working methods during the harvest, hiring and conclusion of contracts with harvest workers. The high-level mission has sent a positive signal as it reflects the intention of the Government to work with the ILO. This is an important step towards putting an end to the practice of forced labour and I would also like to say that, in recent years, there has been increasingly active cooperation not only with the ILO, but also with the regional trade union organizations. We have concluded an agreement with the Federation of Trade Unions of Uzbekistan. We know that Uzbekistan has also been along a difficult path, so we are looking at the experience of our neighbours and learning how we can overcome the issues that we face.

Furthermore, I would like to say that we are also working on two questions related to the review of the list of professions and the inclusion in that list of activities related to the harvest of cotton.

We would like to say that this not only constitutes a part of social partnership, but also results from the effective work with the ILO.

*Interpretation from Russian: Employer member, Turkmenistan – As already noted in the report of the Government, an agreement on cooperation between Turkmenistan and the ILO has been signed, relating to working conditions during the harvesting of cotton. The employers of our country took part in the high-level mission of the ILO, which led to the adoption of the road map for 2024–25. This all reflects the willingness of the Government and the private sector to work together in close cooperation with such an authoritative Organization as the ILO. Workers' and employers' organizations are willing to pursue this cooperation in all sectors of the economy and to ensure that the conditions for the hiring and payment of workers during the cotton harvest are fair and the inclusion of minors is restricted.

The role of the private sector in agriculture has increased and it is getting close to 90 per cent. Trade unions and employers' organizations are seeking to improve the conditions for farmers, for example by providing loans and access to equipment. We are also working on the issue of hiring minors. At the moment, we are carrying out efforts to improve the legislation on working conditions during the harvest, including relating to the conclusion of agreements between employers and cotton pickers, and wages. In this context, I think it is particularly important to note that, in February of this year, with a view to further improving farming in this sector, the President of Turkmenistan signed a decree to reorganize the Ministry of Agriculture. The reform of the Ministry will not only lend impetus to the whole reform of the agricultural sector and improve the productiveness in the country, but will also create better conditions for the participation of the entire country in the agricultural sector. The President has signed a decree relating to the increased purchase price of cotton and those measures will be put into place in 2024. It will stimulate the work of farmers and increase the attractiveness of the sector. Employers in Turkmenistan actively participated in the road map for 2024–25 and have been called upon to implement certain elements. Our organization is carrying out major work to enhance the activities of our members. We would like to express once again our dedication to acquiring international experience and to facing the issues of forced labour and child labour in this sector. In conclusion, I would like to express our confidence that we will pay particular attention to socio-economic justice issues in the future, ensuring fundamental rights and freedoms for individuals.

Chairperson – There are no more requests for the floor so I would like to invite the Government representative of Turkmenistan, to make his concluding remarks.

Government representative – On behalf of the Government delegation of Turkmenistan, let me express gratitude to the Committee for the work that has been done, as well as to the Employer members and Worker members and the delegations of the countries for their statements, proposals and recommendations. We took note of all these recommendations.

I would like to express my gratitude for the constructive approach to the dialogue and for studying the materials provided by the Turkmen side in preparation for this meeting. At the same time, I would like to call on Worker and Employer members, and individual governments to consider the materials and comments provided by the Government in a more objective and unbiased manner.

As noted in our main statement, with the active support of the ILO, Turkmenistan is working consistently on this important issue and implementing the standards of the Conventions, both at the legislative level and enforcement practice. I would like to assure you that all concerted proposals and recommendations made on this issue will be carefully studied and analysed, not only at the ministerial level, but also at the high-government level. It should be noted that the road maps for cooperation with the ILO are not just formal acts, but are procedural documents aimed at providing practical solutions for specific issues concerning labour.

With regard to improving the legislative framework, I would like to note that, in the previous road map for 2023, we had a technical discussion on the review of legislation which was implemented. The current stage – the new road map – provides directly practical steps in this direction. At the moment, the Parliament is working on the recommendations and suggestions received from the Government group, Workers and Employers to improve the regulatory framework. In terms of awareness-raising, in the run up to the cotton harvesting works this year, the Ministry of Labour, in cooperation with the Ministry of Agriculture, has started relevant work with local self-government bodies to prevent cases of forced labour.

I would like to take this opportunity to reiterate the Government's commitment to honouring its obligations under the ILO Conventions and Protocols that Turkmenistan has ratified.

Worker members – While we must acknowledge the encouraging signs in the case of Turkmenistan, we remain deeply concerned by the persistence of forced mobilization in the context of the cotton harvesting campaigns. We hope that we will soon be able to see the tangible results of all the initiatives put in place in the meantime.

We can therefore only encourage the Government to pursue its efforts to put a definitive and lasting end to the practice of forced mobilization during cotton harvesting campaigns. This will involve implementing the road map adopted following the ILO's high-level mission to the country. To this end, the Government must draw up a precise timetable of actions to be taken to achieve the definitive and lasting elimination of forced labour of public and private sector workers, as well as students, in the context of the state-organized cotton harvest.

The Government will also proactively implement the measures recommended by the ILO technical mission to improve recruitment and working conditions in the cotton sector in line with international labour standards.

We are aware that the national cotton harvesting campaign involves a system of compulsory quotas, which is at the root of many of the abuses observed. We maintain that the Government must put an end to the system of compulsory quotas, and that failure to meet quotas should not result in sanctions or threat of sanctions.

We expect the Government to make public, high-level policy statements condemning forced labour, and to instruct officials at all levels not to use coercion to mobilize anyone to work. Any person, including public figures, involved in the forced mobilization of workers for the production or harvesting of cotton should be prosecuted and appropriately punished. Victims of these forced mobilizations must also have access to effective reparation mechanisms. The Government will ensure that inspection services are strengthened, including by continuing its efforts to ratify Conventions Nos 81 and 129.

We believe it is important that the legislative reform initiatives currently under consideration should be implemented to ensure that national legislation complies with the Convention. Without pretending to give an exhaustive account of the legislation still posing problems, we can cite the State of Emergency Act, the Emergency Intervention Act, the Turkmenistan Mobilization Preparation and Implementation Act and section 19 of the Labour Code.

Finally, the Government will promote an environment conducive for freedom of association in the country, promote social dialogue in the cotton sector, strengthen its collaboration with the ILO and allow the participation of independent national and international social partners in the process to ensure that the Convention is applied in practice, including within the framework of the road map, and to document all evidence of the use of forced labour in the cotton harvest.

Furthermore, we expect the unimpeded operation of independent labour monitors to document and report labour conditions without fear of reprisal, and ensure that their findings are integrated in the monitoring.

We ask the Government to continue its collaboration with the ILO within the framework of the initiatives currently undertaken and underway, including the road map, and to communicate full reports on the implementation of these recommendations and the results arising from these initiatives to the Committee of Experts by 1 September and to continue reporting on the progress until the road map is fully implemented.

Employer members – We thank all those who spoke today, and in particular the Government for the information it shared and moreover for the commitments that it made.

In closing we would like to stress once again that the Employer members consider unacceptable any forms of forced labour and other abusive practices that amount to forced labour, notably, when they target the most vulnerable categories of society and are orchestrated by central authorities. Our position thus aligns in this regard with the Committee of Experts' report and with the workers. While we welcome efforts undertaken to address the issues that were raised by the Committee of Experts and the commitments in the 2024–25 road map, including those commitments that were made today, we also note with regret the unfortunate reports that forced labour by the State continues in the cotton harvesting sector.

The Employer members thus request the Government to:

- (1) ensure the complete elimination and use of compulsory labour;
- (2) continue engaging in cooperation with the ILO and independent social partners to ensure the full application of the Convention in practice, including within the framework of the 2024–25 road map; and

- (3) provide information on concrete measures taken in this respect, including on the activities indicated in the 2024–25 road map and to further report on tangible results from the same.

We trust that the Government will implement such recommendations in a timely manner to achieve full compliance with the Convention.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the oral and written information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

While taking due note of the Government's explanations regarding collaboration with the ILO to address the issue of forced labour in cotton harvesting, the Committee deplored the persistence of the widespread use of forced labour in relation to the annual state-sponsored cotton harvest in Turkmenistan.

Taking into account the discussion, the Committee urged the Government, in consultation and cooperation with the social partners, to take all necessary measures to:

- ensure the complete elimination of the use of compulsory labour;
- improve recruitment and working conditions in the cotton sector in line with international labour standards;
- eliminate the compulsory quota system for production and harvesting of cotton and ensure that no one is threatened with punishment for the lack of fulfilment of production quotas in line with the Convention;
- issue clear instructions on the prohibition of the use of forced labour and strengthen labour inspection and law enforcement;
- prosecute and sanction appropriately any public official who participates in the forced mobilization of workers for the cultivation or harvest of cotton;
- ensure that victims of the forced mobilization have access to effective remedies, including measures to prevent future harm;
- ensure that, in line with the Convention, the State of Emergency Act, the Emergency Response Act, the Act on preparation for and carrying out of mobilization in Turkmenistan and article 19 of the Labour Code are not used as a legal basis or pretext for forced labour; and
- promote social dialogue and continue engaging with the ILO and independent employers' and workers' organizations, to ensure the full application of the Convention in practice, including within the framework of the 2024–25 road map and to provide information on concrete measures taken and tangible results achieved in this respect, including within the framework of the 2024–25 road map.

The Committee requested the Government to provide a detailed report to the Committee of Experts on the implementation of the Committee's recommendations by 1 September 2024.

Government representative – At the outset, I would like to take this opportunity to express our gratitude to the members of the Committee, to the representatives of the Government group, Employers' and Workers' groups, various non-governmental organizations, who took part in the discussion on Turkmenistan's case.

Reaffirming our willingness to cooperate further with the social partners and the ILO to ensure the necessary conditions for the implementation of the provisions of Convention No. 105 in Turkmenistan, I would like once again to draw the Committee's attention to the fact that, over the past couple of years, the Government has done a considerable amount of work to implement the recommendations received as part of the reviews on Turkmenistan in previous years. As a result, we have been able to achieve positive developments in this area, including the launch of active dialogue with the ILO, the ILO observation mission in September–October 2023, the adoption and implementation of ILO technical assistance, as well as two road maps to progressively address existing gaps.

The 2024–25 road map on cooperation between the Government of Turkmenistan and the ILO was recently approved between the parties, which many of you have been able to get acquainted with in advance as it was made available to the Committee as a public document. The document clearly sets out a plan of action to address the issues at hand. This is a demonstration of the willingness and openness of the Government to engage at a practical level. However, to our regret, the Committee has once again failed to take into account Turkmenistan's considerable efforts. We take note of all the recommendations you have made, given that almost every one of the items presented is already in our 2024–25 road map.

Once again, I would like to draw your attention to the need to seek dialogue, whether the Government or the social partners. A position of pressure cannot be the best tool in building constructive cooperation aimed at positive results. In this regard, we sincerely hope that the established trusting and constructive relations between the Government of Turkmenistan and the ILO are maintained.

Uganda (ratification: 2003)

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138)

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – We move on to the first individual case on our agenda, which is Uganda on the application of the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138). I kindly invite the Government representative of Uganda, Deputy Permanent Representative at the Permanent Mission of Uganda in Geneva, to take the floor.

Government representative – I am delighted to introduce the delegation with me today. It includes the Permanent Secretary of the Ministry of Gender, Labour and Social Development, and the Commissioner for Labour, from the same Ministry, that is the Ministry of Gender, Labour and Social Development.

At the outset, I wish to underline that we value the work of this Committee and we note the report of the Committee of Experts.

The presence of our delegation at this session today demonstrates our continued commitment to delivering our obligations under the Convention. As a signatory to the Convention, Uganda attaches great importance to upholding the minimum age for admission to employment. We are committed to honouring our obligations and collaborating with all stakeholders, including the social partners, to eradicate child labour.

In this regard, we appreciate the support and the partnership of the ILO and all our development partners. We look forward to strengthening this partnership even further.

To demonstrate our commitment to the Convention, Uganda continues to formulate and implement comprehensive legal frameworks, policies and institutional measures.

As mentioned in our communication to the Committee of 3 June 2024, Uganda is committed to providing a detailed response to all individual cases raised in the report of the Committee of Experts. Once our internal processes are complete, the necessary responses will be provided to the Committee of Experts expeditiously.

Worker members –This is the first time that our Committee is called to examine the application of the Convention by the Government of Uganda. We note that Uganda ratified the Convention in 2003 and that the Committee of Experts has issued nine observations since 2008 showing concern at the plight of children in Uganda and the failure of the Government to remedy the situation. In its latest comment, the Committee of Experts double footnoted the case.

The Committee of Experts expressed its deep concern regarding the dramatic increase of child labour in Uganda. According to the latest National Labour Force Survey, the incidence of child labour rose from 14 per cent prior to the COVID-19 pandemic, to 22 per cent in 2020, and reached an alarming rate of 39.5 per cent, or 6.2 million children, in 2022. That is a 129 per cent increase in three years.

The survey also shows that child labour is the highest among children between the ages of 5 and 11, with 58 per cent of these children trapped in child labour. Around 1.2 million children aged between 12 and 17 years old are occupied in hazardous industries, work in hazardous conditions or perform long hours of work. Child labour is commonly found in many economic sectors, but it is highly predominant in the agricultural sector, including in the sugarcane, rice, tea, coffee, tobacco, livestock and fishing industries.

A baseline report from the Uganda Bureau of Statistics found that child labour in the two districts of Hoima and Kikuube stood at 26 per cent and that three out of ten of these children were engaged in hazardous work or worked for longer hours. The report also identified some root causes of child labour in those regions, pointing to the general lack of awareness among the communities and ignorance of the negative impact of child labour, as well as the need for children to contribute to household income and food security.

The Committee of Experts raised a second issue of concern regarding the gaps in the monitoring of child labour. More specifically, the Committee of Experts noted that, while the Government had strengthened its labour inspection services with the recruitment of 175 district labour officers and the provision of additional means of transport, it provided no information or data on the number of child labour violations identified through inspections or the number or nature of penalties applied.

We note, as did the Committee of Experts, that the Government has engaged in positive steps at the policy level to combat child labour in the country, including the establishment of the National Steering Committee on Child Labour (NSCCL) in 2021, which is tasked with advising on and monitoring issues related to child labour. We also take note of the National Action Plan on the elimination of child labour (NAP II), entering its second phase for 2024/25 which aims to create an enabling environment for the prevention, protection, rehabilitation and reduction of the risk of children removed from work being pushed or pulled back into child labour, as well as the project “CLEAR Cotton: Eliminating child labour and forced labour in the cotton, textile and garment value chains” (CLEAR) which aims to address the root causes of child labour. Finally, we take note of the positive results achieved by the ACCEL Africa project or the “Accelerating action for the elimination of child labour in supply chains in Africa” project, with specific reference to the tea and coffee sectors, and of its continuation for the period 2023–28. We note, in this regard, that both the CLEAR and the ACCEL Africa projects are implemented with the technical assistance of the Office.

While the Worker members welcome the policy commitment of the Government, we are nonetheless alarmed by the abrupt increase of child labour in the country during and following the COVID-19 pandemic. We are concerned that the impact of the measures adopted remains nominal in comparison to the overwhelming prevalence of child labour in the country, and that the positive results of the period pre-COVID-19 have been wiped out by the pandemic.

We recall the global commitments made in 2022 known as the Durban Call to Action on the Elimination of Child Labour, which stressed that “meeting target 8.7 of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development, to end child labour in all its forms by 2025, requires immediate, intensified, gender-responsive, well-coordinated, multi-sectoral, multi-stakeholder, rights-based action to scale up efforts to eliminate child labour and forced labour”. Among other commitments, the Durban Call to Action requires Member States to strengthen measures for the prevention and elimination of child labour, to end child labour in agriculture, to ensure children enjoy the right to education, and to provide universal access to social protection.

In order to make good on this commitment, we call on the Government to address the root causes of child labour, including through strong and targeted measures to raise awareness among communities on the negative impact of child labour on children’s development and future chances, and on the need to ensure that children are enrolled in and complete at least the compulsory level of education. In this regard, we note that, according to UNICEF-Uganda’s 2022 report, child poverty is on the increase in the country, with four out of every ten children in poverty. UNICEF further noted that teenage pregnancy increased, with 1,050 girls becoming pregnant daily, and with some dropping out of school, thereby increasing their vulnerability.

As did the Committee of Experts, we call on the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour. Noting with concern the dramatic increase in child labour during and after the pandemic, we urge the Government to identify and address the root causes of this increase and to take the necessary measures to address the situation, including through the adaptation and continuation of the actions plans already in place. We call on the Government to give priority to the objectives of the elimination of child labour in all its forms, in particular by ensuring that labour inspection services are adequately staffed and funded to carry out their functions of prevention, detection, investigation and punishment of cases of child labour. We urge the Government to work with its social partners in addressing these challenges.

Employer members – The present case is dealing with the application in practice of the fundamental Convention No. 138 in Uganda. Uganda ratified the Convention in 2003 and, since then, the Committee of Experts has made observations on eight occasions: 2011, 2013, 2016, 2017, 2019, 2020, 2021 and 2022. The Committee of Experts also raised direct requests 11 times over the years. This is the first time, however, that the Conference Committee is discussing the case.

We would like to thank the Government for its presence in the Conference Committee today and for its stated commitment to providing the information requested in the Committee of Experts’ observations. Of course, it is disappointing that the Government has not provided the information in a timely manner to assist in the discussion of the case.

The Committee of Experts' observations outline very serious gaps in Uganda's compliance with the Convention. First, regarding Article 1 of the Convention, on the national policy designed to ensure the effective abolition of child labour and the application of the Convention in practice, the Committee of Experts has expressed its deep concern regarding the significant number of children engaged in child labour, which has increased dramatically since 2019, before the COVID-19 pandemic.

We noted that, according to the National Household Survey of the Uganda Bureau of Statistics, child labour rates for children between the ages of 5 and 17 increased from 14 per cent prior to the pandemic to 22 per cent in 2020. Moreover, ILO reports highlight that the incidence of child labour increased to 39.5 per cent in 2022, amounting to a total of some 6.2 million children.

The highest incidence of child labour, at 58 per cent, was observed among the ages of 5 to 11. As this is a very tender age in any child's development, these numbers present a very serious concern and demand urgent and effective measures.

The lack of awareness about the negative impact of child labour is a serious factor that leads to the cultural approval of children's contributions to household incomes and food security. That alone, added to the COVID-19 pandemic restrictions on the education system, contributed to the increase of child labour in the country. However, the Employer members are of the view that the accelerated increase of child labour in the country must also be analysed in the light of other causes that have built up since the COVID-19 pandemic.

It is noted that the Government has adopted policies aimed at tackling the root causes of child labour, including in particular the review of the National Child Labour Policy to increase access to social protection, education, skills development and social services for children or households in communities affected or at risk of child labour.

Accordingly, the Employer members would like to request the Government to redouble its efforts and provide further information regarding the implementation of the NAP II. In particular, we would like to request the Government to implement measures concerning its child labour awareness and community sensitization, to intensify its efforts to facilitate access to free basic education for all children, and to provide information on the concrete measures taken in this regard, as well as on the school attendance, maintenance and dropout rates.

We would also like to highlight that the design of efficient and effective policies against child labour must take account of their interaction with the real economy, specifically with informality. The impact of informality may be observed in increased child labour, even in the context of economic recovery. Accordingly, we encourage the Government to strengthen its strategy towards formalization and to seek ILO technical assistance in this regard.

With regard to Article 9(1) regarding penalties and labour inspection, the Employer members note the Government's efforts in recruiting, training and orienting district labour officers on the elimination of child labour, including in hazardous work. However, the Government did not provide information or data on the number of child labour violations identified through inspections or the number or nature of penalties applied and assessed for child labour violations.

The Employer members echo the Committee of Experts and urge the Government to strengthen its measures to ensure that labour inspectors are adequately trained and possess the necessary resources to be able to detect cases of child labour, as well as to ensure the effective implementation of the regulations providing for penalties in cases of child labour violations.

The Employer members would like to highlight that, while substantial, prosecuting and sanctioning the adults and removing the children from child labour, are not and cannot be stand-alone solutions. These measures are unlikely to be sufficient, effective or sustainable, when not implemented in conjunction with strategic policies aimed at addressing the root causes, risk factors and socio-economic circumstances that either lead to or result in exploitation of children.

Finally, we would like to request the Government to redouble its efforts and take measures to ensure that, in practice, through investigations and robust prosecutions, the necessary and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions are imposed, and to provide information to the Office in this regard.

The Employer members would like, once again to thank the representatives of the Government for their presence and for their commitment to providing the necessary information to the Office. We reiterate, however, our request to the Government, to intensify its efforts regarding the implementation or early identification of high-risk areas and vulnerable groups, to improve the resources allocation regarding the identification of child victims, and to continue to report relevant data on the measures taken, and the results.

Finally, the Employer members note that the ILO Office is already supporting the country in its efforts to combat child labour in the ACCEL Africa project. We encourage the Government to seek further assistance from the ILO, including to increase the capacity of tripartite constituents, in order to implement effective and sustainable strategies to eradicate child labour in the country, and in particular the engagement of children in hazardous forms of work.

Worker member, Uganda – I speak on behalf of Uganda's organized labour, and we fully align with the observations of the Committee of Experts regarding the implementation of the Convention, which our country ratified in 2003.

The Committee of Experts noted with deep concern the significant increase in the incidences of child labour in Uganda, escalating from 14 per cent before the COVID-19 pandemic to an estimated 6.2 million children, or 39.5 per cent of all children in the country, as reported by the National Labour Survey in February 2023. According to the 2019–20 National Household Survey of the Uganda Bureau of Statistics, strict school closures during the pandemic accelerated this issue, increasing the child labour rates for the children aged between 5 and 17 from 14 per cent to 22 per cent, amounting to a total of 2.7 million children in 2020.

The most alarming observation is that the highest incidence of child labour is found among children aged between 5 to 11 years, who make up 58 per cent of working children. Further, 19.8 per cent of the 6.2 million children in child labour are between 12 and 17 years old, and are engaged in hazardous occupations predominantly in agriculture, involving long working hours and dangerous conditions. The Committee of Experts also observed with regret that there is no available information regarding the number of child labour violations identified by the labour inspectorate. Given these distressing statistics, the Committee of Experts considered this case to meet the criteria for examination at this Conference.

We take note of our Government's initiatives to combat child labour through the NSCCL, established in 2021, that meets quarterly to advise on and monitor issues related to child labour. Additionally, the NAP II, aligned with the National Development Plan (NDPIII), aims to create an enabling environment for the prevention, protection, rehabilitation, and reduction of the risk of children returning to work once removed.

Moreover, the ACCEL Africa project was implemented by the Government, social partners and civil society organizations from 2018 to 2023. This regional project aimed to address the root causes of child labour with the overarching goal of accelerating its elimination in Africa through targeted actions in selected supply chains.

We, as trade unions in Uganda, have integrated child labour issues into collective bargaining agreements and various union projects and plans. With funding from the ILO, we have participated in the ACCEL Africa project in Uganda.

Despite our efforts as social partners, child labour persists. We acknowledge the glaring statistics and facts on child labour in Uganda presented in the Committee of Experts' report and recognize the need for further action to address this pressing issue.

We have noted some weaknesses in our efforts to eliminate child labour and I therefore urge our Government to immediately take the following measures to combat child labour:

- Enhancing the National Steering Committee on Child Labour: The operations of the NSCCL need to be strengthened, particularly in terms of capacity and logistical support to effectively address child labour issues and improve tripartite coordination and engagement.
- Inclusive formulation of national action plans: The formulation of national action plans should be participatory to ensure that workers' issues and perspectives are well-captured. The Government should ensure the representation of workers on the expanded board of the National Planning Authority to incorporate their views effectively.
- The ratification of ILO Convention No. 102: To enhance social protection systems and services in the country, the Government should urgently ratify the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), to ensure that comprehensive social protection floors for the children are addressed and implemented. Health insurance systems for children, especially vulnerable children, should also be addressed by the Government.
- Strengthening collaboration between labour officers and unions: Labour officers at district and national levels should work closely with district workers' councillors and labour unions as provided for in the Local Government Act, particularly in monitoring, reporting and raising awareness on the dangers of child labour.
- Formulating a Child Labour Act: While the Government has put in place the National Child Labour Policy of 2006, there is a need to formulate a Child Labour Act to operationalize the policy, address the child labour issues in the country and consolidate fragmented pieces of legislation on child labour so that they comply with the Convention.
- Strengthening labour inspections: Governments must ensure that there are adequate labour inspectors that are well-resourced to undertake inspections and prosecute those who violate the law.

Let me end by saying child labour remains a critical human rights issue in Uganda, necessitating concerted efforts for its eradication. I call for support from the ILO and international development partners to assist the Government and its social partners, particularly in terms of capacity-building, awareness creation, trade union and community outreach, data analysis, and the unionization of workers in the labour unions.

As organized labour, we remain committed to working alongside the Government and other stakeholders to eliminate child labour and ensure that all children can enjoy their rights to education, health and a safe environment free from exploitation.

Employer member, Uganda – I would like to align myself with the statement made by the Employer members. The ratification of the Convention in 2003 demonstrates the Government's commitment to tackling child labour. While progress has been made, as we have already heard before, recent challenges require renewed focus. The Committee of Experts' concerns regarding the rise in child labour are of course well-founded. A staggering 6.2 million children (40 per cent aged 5–17) are involved in child labour.

Child labour definitely is a serious issue, and Ugandan employers fully support the efforts to eradicate it. We however recognize the Government and other stakeholders' efforts, particularly in light of the unique challenges that came following the COVID-19 pandemic.

In the case of Uganda, schools were closed for nearly two years, businesses were disrupted and, of course, poverty increased to a great extent, and this then resulted in the doubling of the rates of child labour in a short period. However, we commend the Government's multi-stakeholder approach, already highlighted by my Worker colleague. The NSCCL is in place, a multi-stakeholder committee. We have developed the NAP II, which we are currently implementing, taking into account challenges that have emerged especially linked to the COVID-19 pandemic, the National Employment Council has been established and, of course, the Labour Advisory Board has been reactivated as well. All this demonstrates a strong commitment towards addressing the issue that we are dealing with.

We have also seen increased budgetary allocations for both primary and secondary education, granting universal access to education for school-going children and, more recently in 2023, we saw a robust poverty reduction initiative through the Parish Development Model. All these are positive steps. We have also seen the expansion in the Presidential Skilling Initiative, with around 19 hubs spread across the country. On the part of employers, we have also seen a lot of efforts in making the registration of businesses a lot easier, and these are crucial long-term solutions.

The Ugandan employers have zero tolerance for child labour. We actively support education through direct funding in schools, but there are also a lot of social protection initiatives like in-house retirement schemes that have been created by employers. As the Federation of Uganda Employers (FUE), we have signed the Memorandum of Understanding with several companies to address the issue of child labour. We also have a running Memorandum of Understanding with our trade union counterparts on this issue.

We appreciate the support of the Office, both technical and financial, through the ACCEL Africa project, but also the project on "Capacity Strengthening of Governments to Address Child Labour and/or Forced Labour, and Violations of Acceptable Conditions of Work in Sub-Saharan Africa" (CAPSA), and we believe that we are on the right track and, of course, future results will reflect that.

We further urge the Office to maintain and enhance its support, particularly in strengthening our labour inspection mechanism and reporting, which we have already spoken about, but also the transition from the informal to the formal sector. Child labour is big but largely in the informal sector in Uganda. The Ugandan Employers are fully committed to working with all stakeholders to eliminate child labour, not just in Uganda, but also globally.

Government member, Belgium – I have the honour to speak on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States. The candidate countries Albania, Montenegro, North Macedonia, the Republic of Moldova and Ukraine, and the European Free Trade Association countries Iceland and Norway, members of the European Economic Area, align themselves with this statement.

The EU and its Member States are committed to the respect, protection and fulfilment of human rights, including labour rights. We promote the universal ratification and effective implementation of fundamental ILO Conventions, and support the ILO in developing and promoting international labour standards and supervising their application.

We will continue to stand up for the rights of every child to reach their full potential in line with the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and its Optional Protocols, as also included in the EU Strategy on the Rights of the Child. Effective implementation of the fundamental ILO Convention No.138 is crucial in this regard.

The EU and its Member States have been committed development partners of Uganda, including through the “Everything But Arms” (EBA) arrangement under the EU’s General Scheme of Preferences, granting duty-free and quota-free access to the EU market. We recall that the trade benefits granted under the EBA arrangement are subject to the condition that Uganda respects core international principles, enshrined in core UN and the ILO Conventions.

The EU and its Member States welcome the measures taken by the Government to address the challenge of child labour in the country, especially with the establishment of the NSCCL in 2021 and the adoption and implementation of the NAP II. We also take note of the ACCEL Africa project in selected supply chains to specifically address the root causes of child labour.

However, we must express our deep concern about the significant number of children engaged in child labour, including in hazardous work, and the recent dramatic increase. According to estimates, incidence of child labour was at 14 per cent prior to the pandemic and now concerns 6.2 million children, or 39.5 per cent of all children in the country. We are also deeply concerned that the highest incidence of child labour is found among those aged between 5 and 11 years old and that a significant number of children aged between 12 and 17 years old are occupied in hazardous occupations mainly in agriculture, and in hazardous working conditions and long working hours.

Given the gravity of the situation, we echo the call of the Committee of Experts on the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour by children under the minimum age for employment or work, as well as for those engaged in hazardous conditions. We would also like to highlight the need for the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure that the labour inspectorate has adequate training and resources to be able to detect cases of child labour, and that an adequate system is put in place to withdraw children from labour and place them in schools, while at the same time ensuring that support is provided to the parents to help them achieve living income.

We regret the absence of information regarding the number and nature of child labour violations and would like to ask the Government to provide reports and statistics on labour inspection, as requested by the Committee of Experts, as well as detailed information on the root causes of the increase in child labour and the measures taken to combat it, and on the policies and projects already implemented and their concrete results.

The European Union is a committed development partner of Uganda, including through the CLEAR project, implemented under the lead of the ILO, which aims to strengthen systems to prevent and eliminate child labour in the coffee value chains and to address its diverse root causes. We look forward to continuing joint efforts with the Government, the ILO, and its constituents to address the issues raised above.

Worker member, Senegal – I take the floor on behalf of the workers of west Africa on the implementation of the Convention in the Republic of Uganda. We welcome the remarkable work of the Committee of Experts on this matter. We have also noted the Government's statement on the efforts made, including the establishment of the National Steering Committee on child labour in 2021, the adoption of the NAP II and the implementation of the ACCEL Africa project.

Despite all these efforts, we note with regret and concern, as indicated in the report of the Committee of Experts, the persistence of this plague and even its worsening, according to the 2019–2020 National Household Survey of the Uganda by the Bureau of Statistics. The rate of child labour involving children between 5 and 17 years rose from 14 to 22 per cent following the COVID-19 pandemic. Further, a communication of the Bureau of Statistics published in April 2021 highlights that child labour in the two districts of Hoima and Kikuube has reached 26 per cent (74,000 children) and that three out of every ten of these children are engaged in hazardous work. Child labour results in developmental delays in the children involved and undermines the status of society.

Given the known causes and consequences of this plague imposed on children, their families and the socio-economic future of Uganda, we urge the Committee to act effectively with the Government in order that relevant, specific and urgent measures be taken to combat and progressively eliminate child labour. We also invite the Government to:

- strengthen and broaden policies on school support and attendance by making children's school enrolment compulsory in practice;
- establish a national policy for health and nutrition at school to discourage absence from school and promote school meals, thereby lightening the burden on indigenous parents;
- broaden and strengthen the Government's social protection policy by allocating family support benefits, such as the "cash transfer" programme for vulnerable households; and
- strengthen community information and awareness campaigns on the negative impact of child labour.

We hope our call will be heard. Thank you for your attention.

Government member, Switzerland – Switzerland supports the statement made by the European Union and wishes to make the following point. Switzerland expresses its deep concern regarding the increased use of child labour in Uganda in recent years. According to ILO figures, child labour rose from 14 per cent before the COVID-19 pandemic to 39.5 per cent in 2023, which represents 6.2 million children. Furthermore, the majority of these children are very young, as they are aged between 5 and 11 years. These children also often work in hazardous occupations or industries, in which the working conditions can significantly affect their physical and psychological well-being in the short, medium and long term.

In response to this exponential and worrying increase in the number of children engaged in work, Switzerland urges the Ugandan Government to take all measures necessary to prevent and identify cases of child labour, and to penalize the perpetrators.

As labour inspection is an essential means of identifying and preventing child labour, Switzerland deeply regrets the absence of data and information on the number of offences recorded by inspectors and the number of penalties imposed by the Ugandan authorities. Switzerland encourages the Government to pursue and step up its actions under the NAP II, in order to ensure that its labour inspection services have the necessary means to identify and ensure the follow-up of these cases of child labour.

As the application of the Convention by Uganda has been the subject of several observations of the Committee of Experts over the last ten years, Switzerland encourages the Government to strengthen its efforts, particularly by considering additional resources – and including possible technical assistance from the ILO – to effectively and rapidly combat child labour.

Worker member, Ghana – On behalf of the workers of Ghana, I would like to express our unwavering support to the workers of Uganda and to urge the Government to earnestly consider the recommendations of the Committee of Experts regarding non-compliance with the Convention.

For several years, the Committee of Experts has highlighted concerns regarding Uganda's adherence to the Convention, yet no significant progress has been made. This ongoing situation suggests a troubling lack of commitment on the part of the Government to prioritize and implement measures that protect children from exploitation. This neglect jeopardizes the future of Uganda's youth, exposing many to not only precarious work but also hazardous conditions, which is profoundly regrettable. As Nelson Mandela once said, "There can be no keener revelation of a society's soul than the way in which it treats its children". We therefore urge the Government to prioritize the implementation of the already ratified Convention and its associated Recommendation.

Regarding the challenges related to the minimum age for employment, Uganda can draw valuable lessons from Ghana's proactive measures to combat child labour. The Ghanaian Government, in collaboration with tripartite partners and various civil society organizations, has effectively utilized social dialogue as a critical tool to eliminate child labour. A National Steering Committee has been established, working in concert with social partners to implement strategies aimed at eradicating this scourge. This collaborative approach in Ghana serves as a model that the Ugandan Government can adopt to address child labour issues and ensure compliance with the Convention.

As Kofi Annan profoundly stated, "There is no trust more sacred than the one the world holds with children. There is no duty more important than ensuring that their rights are respected, that their welfare is protected, that their lives are free from fear and want and that they grow up in peace". It is imperative that Uganda takes decisive action to uphold these principles and protect its children from the perils of child labour.

In conclusion, I call upon the Government to work with the social partners, in particular the trade unions and employers in crafting solutions to their problem and the implementation of the recommendations of the Committee of Experts.

Worker member, Spain – One of the fundamental aspects to be highlighted in the analysis of the case of Uganda regarding the Convention is related to the complex situation arising from the coexistence, in the country's legislation, of different regulations with different minimum age limits.

For example, I can point out that the Constitution of Uganda (1995) establishes a minimum age of 16 years. The Employment Act (2006) prohibits work by children under 12 years of age and limits the work of children aged between 12 and 14 years to light work. The Children Act uses the age threshold of 18 years to define a person as an adult, as does the National Child Labour Policy. This means that 12, 14, 16 and 18 years are established as a minimum age, depending on the legislation, which demonstrates a clear lack of harmonization with regard to this fundamental aspect of the Convention in some of its Articles.

For example, Article 1 of the Convention refers to a national policy to ensure the effective abolition of child labour and to raise progressively the minimum age. However, the range of minimum ages in Ugandan legislation prevents the enforcement of a national policy in this area due to the aforementioned multiplicity of situations permitted by the regulations. Article 2 of the Convention establishes that each Member which ratifies this Convention shall specify, in a declaration appended to its ratification, a minimum age for admission to employment or work within its territory. Uganda, as a signatory to the Convention, fails to comply with this provision by establishing different minimum ages.

Article 9 of the Convention mandates the competent authority to provide all necessary measures, including the provision of appropriate penalties, to ensure the effective enforcement of the provisions of the Convention. However, the lack of Uganda's regulatory clarity on the matter hinders the work of the authorities relating to their inspection and punishment functions to combat child labour, and to effectively comply with the Convention.

For example, the Committee of Experts' observations include the matter of labour inspection, which is limited by not only the evident lack of resources and training, but also by the legislative framework itself which does not function as a tool to help inspectors.

The Government alleges that it has recently made efforts, through the implementation of projects, to strengthen the national institutional framework on child labour. However, the necessary changes to the regulatory framework in line with the Convention have not been made, and it should be pointed out that the projects carried out by the Government and highlighted in the Committee of Experts' report, are limited to only a few areas of the country, and to only some agricultural production chains such as coffee and tea, with child labour present in many other economic sectors.

The situations of child labour described reveal widespread non-compliance with the Convention, but furthermore, and this is what I wish to highlight, Uganda does not even have an adequate regulatory framework on child labour.

It is considered that the confusion created by the different regulations is one of the causes of the growing incidence and prevalence of child labour in Uganda, as stakeholders continue to ignore the correct legislation on the minimum age for work.

The data collected by the Committee of Experts in its report and that added by the worker representatives of Uganda in this Conference Committee, call for the Government to step up its efforts to comply with the Convention and put an end to child labour. However, addressing this necessary work requires a policy coherence that is currently lacking in Uganda, which makes it even more difficult to effectively apply the Convention.

Interpretation from the Arabic: Government member, Egypt – We have duly noted the measures adopted by the Government of Uganda concerning the implementation of the provisions of the Convention. The Government has adopted positive measures to prevent child labour. A national council was established in addition to the creation of another consultative body in 2021. Further, there is a national plan that aims to put an end to child labour and to tackle the supply chain through the ACCEL Africa initiative. We encourage the Government to continue this way forward, ultimately to implement all the provisions of these international labour standards, the purpose of which is to end child labour. We think that the Government is on the right path. Lastly, we welcome the Government's efforts to this end.

Government member, Mali – It is both a pleasure and a duty for my country, Mali, to support the Government's position in the case to which it is invited to respond before your august assembly. This case concerns the application of a Convention already ratified by Uganda before many other countries, which leads us to believe in the Government's good faith regarding the effective application of the Convention. I recall that Mali and Uganda both benefited from the ACCEL Africa project at the same time, which has enabled them, to date, to make some progress to combat child labour.

In conclusion, my Government fully supports Uganda and invites it to continue the way it has started, to implement not only Convention No. 138 but also other fundamental ILO Conventions on child labour.

Government member, Canada – Canada is deeply concerned by reports indicating that child labour in Uganda rose from 14 per cent before the pandemic to 39.5 per cent in 2022, including an increase in the number of children facing hazardous work and long working hours. Alarming, the highest incidence is among children between 5 and 11 years, with 58 per cent of such children involved in child labour. Likewise, we deeply regret that, despite the Government's various efforts, there is a worrying lack of data on the number of child labour violations identified during inspections, and the number and nature of measures implemented.

Canada recognizes the Government's initiatives to combat child labour, including the NAP II and the ACCEL Africa project. However, the Government must strengthen its efforts to protect and rehabilitate its children. We urge the Government to take immediate and specific measures to:

- (a) strengthen efforts aimed at eradicating labour of children under the minimum age for employment and work, and employed in hazardous work;
- (b) determine and address the root causes of child labour, particularly by improving access to education;
- (c) strengthen labour inspection by ensuring an adequate number of labour inspectors with the necessary training and resources to detect child labour, with a view to improving their capacity to impose sanctions; and
- (d) improve efforts to collect data on child labour violations and related measures.

We sincerely hope that the Government's next report to the Committee of Experts will highlight positive developments and we wish the Government much success in its next steps.

Employer member, Colombia – Firstly, I consider it important to underscore the importance and priority that we, as employers, attach to the Convention, which aims to protect children and ensure the abolition of child labour. I wish to highlight that, in order to achieve Sustainable Development Goal (SDG) target 8.7 of eliminating child labour in all its forms by 2025, we must work, through social dialogue and with the social partners, in a coordinated manner.

On this specific case, the Committee of Experts indicated, in its report, its deep concern regarding the increase in the number of children engaged in child labour and hazardous work in recent years in Uganda.

In this regard, it should be recalled that, in accordance with Article 1 of the Convention, the Government must adopt a national policy to ensure the abolition of child labour and raise progressively the minimum age for admission to employment.

We reiterate the request of the Employer spokesperson, encouraging the Government to conduct the necessary investigations in the field of labour inspection, and to apply the appropriate penalties when violations of standards on the employment of children and young persons occur, and also for the Government to strengthen its efforts, in coordination with the most representative organizations, to implement multidimensional strategies and policies to enable capacity-building to achieve the elimination of child labour.

Observer, International Union of the Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers' Associations (IUF) – I am speaking on behalf of the IUF and we indeed represent agricultural workers around the world, and I would like to draw the attention of the meeting to the fact that most of the child labour globally is found in agriculture.

The African countries are not an exception. According to the Global Conference on the Elimination of Child Labour in Durban in 2022, the focus should be on the agricultural sector and, geographically, on Africa, if we want to seriously achieve progress on the elimination of child labour. This is the area, the sector and the continent where specific measures have to be taken. This was a conclusion based on the statistics received even before the pandemic. During the pandemic, we saw a number of features which can be characterized by and applied specifically to Uganda, as one of the African countries and as one of the agricultural countries. We saw that the absence of universal social security coverage as one of the problems which undermine the ability of families to keep their children at home and send them to school. We saw the absence of the minimum wage and minimum income, the income which can guarantee families the ability not only to feed their children but also to send them to school. When this minimum income level and minimum wage is non-existent, it is a reason for and a root cause of the increasing use of child labour, especially in agriculture. The Committee of Experts highlighted, as one of the root causes, the need for children to contribute to household income and food security.

That means most of agricultural families are not able to feed themselves. They are at risk of food insecurity. Therefore, the ability to deal with this issue relies not only on the legislative measures but also on creating economic conditions for legislative measures to be implemented.

Lastly, looking at the report and hearing what was said, most child labour in Uganda is found in the sugarcane, tea, coffee, tobacco and fisheries sectors. These are all the crops which are supplied to the European Union, and they were all highly and hugely undermined during the pandemic days, leading to a huge loss of employment, because of the lack of regulations helping to equally and fairly distribute the profits which are received in these supply chains by the European companies. We call on the Government, but also the EU countries, to look at these issues and take measures in order to enable the economic conditions to implement legal action.

Observer, Building and Wood Workers' International (BWI) – The case to be discussed is under Convention No. 138, but it should also be highlighted that a lot of the observations are also in line with the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), as a majority of the children work in the most hazardous sectors of construction, mining and agriculture. As the Committee of Experts notes, there has been a recent significant increase in the incidence of child labour in Uganda from 14 per cent prior to the pandemic to a staggering 39.5 per cent of all children in the country. This is also connected to a staggering increase of child labour in the sector I represent, construction, which was reported as a consequence of the total lockdown, including the closing of schools, during the pandemic. With one of the exempted sectors being the construction sector, the result is that there was a great increase in children working in the sector despite its hazardous nature.

In response to these facts, this intervention focuses on the need to ensure the effectiveness of the efforts taken by the Government to strengthen child labour monitoring, as the report by the Committee of Experts highlights. Despite the efforts made to recruit, train, and orient district labour officers on the elimination of child labour, including in hazardous work, there is little evidence of their effect and operation. Labour inspectors have traditionally been critical players in eliminating child labour. Child labour inspection is a public function, a responsibility of the Government, and best organized as a system, within the context of a larger state system, and in line with the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81). To tackle hazardous child labour, inspectors should: give information on hazardous child labour; use their legal enforcement powers to ensure that children are withdrawn from workplaces where hazardous work is taking place, and are referred to the appropriate authorities who can then get them into school and help them obtain skills training; and ensure that the health of the children who have reached minimum legal age to work is fully protected in the workplace.

Considering this critical role of the functioning labour inspectorate and concerning the significant increase in the incidence of child labour in the country, we support the Committee of Experts' call for the Government to strengthen its measures to ensure that the labour inspectorate is adequately trained and possesses the necessary resources to be able to detect cases of child labour, as well as to ensure that the regulations providing for penalties in the case of a violation of the provisions on the employment of children and young persons are effectively implemented.

Government representative – On behalf of the Ugandan delegation, I would like to thank the social partners and Member States for the constructive engagement that we have had during this session. Once again, I would like to underscore that we value this engagement. We view this process as our collective efforts to eradicate child labour, consistent with target 8.7 of SDG 8 on decent work and economic growth.

Like any other country, Uganda has challenges but nonetheless, we are proud of the tremendous progress we continue to make in the eradication of child labour. We appreciate the recognition that has been expressed by many speakers during this session on the progress that we have made and continue to make.

As others have said this afternoon, we believe that effective implementation of the Convention goes hand in hand with a stronger partnership. A partnership that enhances and supports capacity-building, institutional strengthening and constructive stakeholder engagement. We therefore will welcome support from the ILO and other partners as we walk along this road.

Finally, I would like to reiterate Uganda's readiness to engage with the Committee and reaffirm our commitment to supporting and advancing the goals of the Convention.

Employer members – We would like to again thank the representative of the Government for the commitment to cooperate with the Committee of Experts with respect to the information requested. We would also like to thank all the speakers who took the floor to contribute to this discussion. The Employer members wish to emphasize the seriousness of addressing child labour, especially the hazardous forms of child labour. Accordingly, we recommend to the Government the following:

- to strengthen its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour by children under the minimum age for employment to work, as well as for all children engaged in hazardous work;
- to provide information on the root causes of the increase in child labour in the country, and to indicate the measures taken to address the situation according to international labour standards enforced in the country;

- to provide detailed information on the implementation of the NAP II and of the ACCEL Africa project, including on the results achieved;
- to continue to supply information on the application of the Convention in practice, particularly statistics disaggregated by age and sector of activity, on the situation of children engaged in child labour in the country; and
- to strengthen its measures to ensure that the labour inspectorate is adequately trained and has the necessary resources to detect and address child labour cases, as well as implement sufficiently dissuasive sanctions for child labour violations and to communicate statistics on violations and persecutions in this regard.

Worker members – The Worker members would like to thank the Government for its participation and its final remarks. We also thank all the speakers who took the floor.

We express once again our deep concern regarding the alarming rise of child labour in Uganda which, according to the latest data available, impacted 39.5 per cent of all children in the country. While we take note and welcome the efforts deployed by the Government to combat child labour in the country, including through several national plans and other projects in the framework of international technical assistance, we are concerned by the adverse impact of the COVID-19 pandemic which led to a dramatic surge in child labour, as a palliative to the economic difficulties met by families in Uganda.

In the post-pandemic recovery, we urge the Government to address child labour as a matter of priority and to adopt and implement targeted measures, namely:

- to identify and address the root causes of child labour, including through awareness-raising campaigns in communities to alert on the negative impact of child labour, as well as school enrolment campaigns for all school-age children;
- to take the necessary measures towards the elimination of child labour, including through the continuation of national actions plans already ongoing. These action plans should be reviewed to take into account the dramatic increase of child labour in the country since the pandemic, so as to adapt them and to develop targeted measures to address the situation;
- to take measures to ensure that labour inspection services are adequately staffed and trained and that they have sufficient funding and material resources to carry out their functions of prevention, detection, investigation and punishment of cases of child labour.

These measures should be developed and implemented by the Government in consultation with the social partners. The technical assistance provided by the Office should be reinforced, including through the review of the ongoing projects and their adaptation, where necessary, to effectively tackle all the dimensions of child labour in the country. We call on the Government to accept a technical advisory mission.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted with deep concern the recent significant increase in the incidence of child labour in the country, including children between the ages of 5 and 11 years, and noted with deep concern that a large number of children continue to be involved in hazardous work.

The Committee noted the willingness of the Government to address the issue.

Taking into account the discussion, the Committee urged the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to take effective and time-bound measures to:

- intensify its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour by children under the minimum age for employment or work, as well as for all children engaged in hazardous work, in particular by: (i) implementing measures concerning child labour awareness and community sensitization; (ii) intensifying its efforts to facilitate access to free basic education for all children.
- strengthen the capacity of the labour inspectorate (i) to detect cases of child labour, by providing all the human, material, financial and technical resources and by adequately training the labour inspectorates; and (ii) to ensure that the relevant provisions on the employment of children and young persons providing for penalties are effectively implemented.
- intensify its efforts towards early identification of high-risk areas and vulnerable groups and improve resources allocation for this purpose;
- provide detailed information on: (i) the implementation of the NAP II and of the ACCEL Africa project, and the results achieved; (ii) the concrete measures taken to improve child labour awareness and community sensitization; (iii) the efforts taken to facilitate access to free basic education for all children as well as school attendance, maintenance and dropout rates; (iv) the number and nature of violations involving children detected by the labour inspectorate, in particular by communicating a copy of all recently published Annual Labour Inspection reports; (v) the measures taken to strengthen the capacity of the labour inspectorate and the results achieved; and (vi) statistics, disaggregated by age and sector of activity, on the situation of children engaged in child labour in the country.

The Committee called on the Government to continue with and to intensify the ongoing ILO technical assistance and review, where necessary, the ongoing projects to effectively implement all the above-mentioned Committee's recommendations.

The Committee requested the Government to provide a detailed report on the measures taken to implement the above-mentioned recommendations and the results achieved before the deadline of 1 September 2024.

Report of the Committee on the Application of Standards: Presentation, discussion and approval

The President

We will now turn our attention to the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards. Part One of the report is contained in Record of Proceedings No. 5A. Part Two is contained in Record of Proceedings No. 5B.

Please allow me to recall that the Officers of the Committee and its Reporter are: Mr Różycki (Poland), Chairperson; Mr Moyane (South Africa), Employer Vice-Chairperson; Mr Leemans (Belgium), Worker Vice-Chairperson; and Mr Siyoucef (Algeria), Reporter.

I now give the floor to Mr Siyoucef, so that he may present to us the Committee's report. The Officers will then take the floor.

Mr Siyoucef

Reporter of the Committee on the Application of Standards (Original French)

I am honoured to present the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards to the plenary of the 112th Session of the International Labour Conference. As a standing body of the International Labour Conference, this unique tripartite forum is authorized under article 10(1) of the Standing Orders of the Conference to consider measures taken by Member States to give effect to their obligations under Conventions that they have voluntarily ratified. It also considers matters linked to their reporting and other obligations under the ILO Constitution. The basis of this discussion is the annual report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. I am pleased to report that the Committee fulfilled its mandate and managed to conclude its programme of work. The working methods of the Committee were agreed upon during informal tripartite consultations which were held in March this year.

The report of the Committee, which is now submitted to the plenary, comprises two parts. Part One contains the General Report, which includes: a record of the general discussion and of the outcomes of the Committee's discussion of the General Survey of the Committee of Experts, entitled Labour administration in a changing world of work; cases of serious failure by Member States to respect their reporting and other standards-related obligations; a record of a special sitting concerning the application by Belarus of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), in application of the resolution adopted by the International Labour Conference in 2023; and, lastly, 24 individual cases regarding the application of ratified Conventions. Part Two of the report contains the verbatim records of the discussions held in the Committee. As in previous years, this part of the report is submitted to plenary in the form of a trilingual patchwork document. The complete report, translated into the three working languages of the Conference, will be published on the Committee's website within 30 days.

I would like to highlight some of the main points of the Committee's discussions. This year, the general discussion again focused on the fruitful dialogue between the Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee of Experts. As part of this dialogue, the two Vice-Chairpersons of the Committee on the Application of Standards participated in a special sitting with members of the Committee of Experts during the latter's annual session in December 2023. The Conference Committee noted that, in addition to this institutionalized dialogue, the Committee of Experts held an informal briefing session with Government representatives in December 2023. Moreover, this year the Conference Committee welcomed Judge Thomas-Felix, a member of the Committee of Experts, representing the Chairperson of the Committee of Experts, Judge Dixon Caton, who was unable to attend for reasons beyond her control. Judge Thomas-Felix participated as an observer and addressed the Committee during the opening and closing sittings of the general discussion. What I took away from her statement is the importance that the Committee of Experts attaches to constructive engagement and continued dialogue between the two Committees, and the will to continue to strengthen this dialogue. The Committee also had the pleasure of welcoming the Chairperson of the Committee on Freedom of Association, Professor Evans Kalula, who presented the annual report of his Committee, thereby highlighting the complementarity between the different supervisory procedures.

Our Committee welcomed the opportunity to discuss the subject of labour administration in a changing world of work, on the basis of the General Survey carried out this year by the Committee of Experts. The Committee highlighted the key role of labour administrations in facing challenges and seizing opportunities linked to changes in the world of work. It highlighted that the Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150), continues to be a relevant and flexible instrument, and reminded ILO constituents of the need to step up their efforts to ratify and implement it, with the technical assistance of the Office where necessary.

As I mentioned earlier, the Committee held a special sitting concerning the application by Belarus of Conventions Nos 87 and 98. The sitting followed up on the resolution adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 111th Session with a view to ensuring compliance with the recommendations of the Committee of Inquiry established to examine the application of these two Conventions by Belarus. Breaking with its practice of adopting conclusions by consensus, the Committee exceptionally adopted the conclusions on this case by vote. These are reflected in the Committee's report.

Lastly, the Committee adopted a list of 24 individual cases for examination. The Committee was able to consider all cases and adopt conclusions by consensus. Following the adoption of the conclusions, the governments concerned had the opportunity to express their views, which are reflected in the records contained in the Committee's report.

I would like to conclude my brief statement by thanking the Chairperson of the Committee, Mr Łukasz Różycki, a Government representative of Poland, for the competence with which he led our meetings, and the Employer Vice-Chairperson, Mr Kaizer Moyane, and Worker Vice-Chairperson, Mr Marc Leemans, for the spirit of cooperation which prevailed within the Committee. And, of course, I would also like to thank the Secretariat, led by the representative of the Secretary-General, Ms Corinne Vargha.

To conclude, I recommend that the Conference adopt the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

Mr MoyaneEmployer Vice-Chairperson of the Committee on the Application of Standards

On behalf of the Employers' group in the Committee on the Application of Standards, I would like to endorse the Committee's report and recommend its approval. Overall, the Employers are pleased that the Committee was able to successfully conclude its work at this session.

I would like to make a few remarks on the various sections of the report. First, the general discussion. In the discussion of the General Report, the Employers' group highlighted several important issues of concern that need to be addressed. We would like to reiterate our request that the needs of sustainable enterprises be systematically taken into account by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations in supervising ILO Conventions. Not only would this contribute to more balance and acceptance in the Committee of Experts' standards supervision, but it is also called for by the ILO Centenary Declaration for the Future of Work. Let me quote from the Declaration: "International labour standards also need to respond to the changing patterns of the world of work, protect workers and take into account the needs of sustainable enterprises, and be subject to authoritative and effective supervision."

Regrettably, there is a persisting view among some members of our Committee that sees enterprises as only a means to an end – in other words, a means to achieve workers' welfare and well-being. This view only serves to downplay or even undermine the value and relevance of sustainable enterprises in the world of work. It should be noted that the setting up and operation of enterprises depend on the initiative and commitment of entrepreneurs. In doing so, these entrepreneurs, while paying tax and complying with applicable rules, make use of their right to pursue their legitimate economic objectives. They are not just objects that are committed to a public purpose. Without an enabling environment, entrepreneurs will not start businesses or may close them down. They will not create or maintain decent jobs, produce goods and services or pay taxes, and thus will not provide the benefits to society that sustainable enterprises can. Therefore, when applying and supervising ratified ILO Conventions, which, by definition, serve to protect workers, the needs of sustainable enterprises should always be kept in mind and incorporated into the definition of the respective obligations. After all, this is the imperative of the ILO Centenary Declaration, and the Employers would like to see it reflected more clearly in future Committee of Experts' assessments of compliance with ratified Conventions.

Second, the Employers recall once again that the referral of the dispute on the right to strike in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), requires the ILO, including the Committee of Experts, to take a neutral position on the topic. This is necessary to protect the integrity of the advisory opinion process, which the ILO should not be seen as interfering in or anticipating the outcome thereof. For the Committee of Experts, this means that it should suspend its recommendations on the right to strike in Convention No. 87, or at least make a visible reference in its report to the fact that this matter is contentious, that this issue is currently before the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion, and that the Committee of Experts' recommendations on the right to strike require confirmation by the International Court of Justice. If the Court has not issued its advisory opinion by the next session of the Committee of Experts in November 2024, the Employers expect the Committee of Experts to address this issue in the manner described above, or in a similarly appropriate manner.

Third, the Employers would like to recall the need to make the ILO standards supervisory system more effective. This is not just a question of streamlining reporting or facilitating reporting on standards through electronic means. The objective should be to achieve better compliance on the ground, which is evidenced by a decreasing volume of comments by the Committee of Experts. I think we should all be able to agree on this objective. A first step in this regard is to help countries take a more careful and deliberate approach to ratification. The high number of comments of the Committee of Experts suggests that either ratifications are premature or made without proper pre-ratification assessments, or that outcomes of pre-ratifications are not considered. The Office should, in its promotional activities on ILO Conventions, advise constituents on how to approach ratification. Ratification should not just be considered a political statement or a declaration of intent, but rather what it actually is: a treaty under international law that is to be complied with, and that compliance needs to be properly prepared. The Employers are convinced that if ratification was addressed in a compliance-oriented manner, application of ratified Conventions would be much improved. As a result, the supervisory system would be less burdened and could focus on more serious cases. In order to have a more solid basis for devising appropriate assistance regarding ratification, we suggest that the Office undertake a study to examine the circumstances of ratifications made by Member States in recent years. The goal is simple: ensuring that once a Convention is ratified, the deriving obligations are complied with.

Regarding the discussion under the General Survey, which this year addressed the two ILO instruments on labour administration, the Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150), and the Labour Administration Recommendation, 1978 (No. 158), the Employers consider that an effective labour administration is key for protecting workers and contributing to an enabling environment for entrepreneurship and sustainable enterprises, as called for by the Centenary Declaration. Well-functioning labour administrations also ensure resilience or stability in labour markets in times of crisis, as has been demonstrated in the financial crisis of 2008 and the recent COVID-19 pandemic. The General Survey also showed that Convention No. 150 and Recommendation No. 158 are remarkably flexible instruments that are indeed universally applicable, in that they limit themselves to defining essential objectives, functions, actors and working methods of labour administrations, and they are open to different national situations, as well as to new developments and needs. The golden thread in both standards is tripartite cooperation in labour administration for the benefit of employers and workers. For these reasons, the Employers also consider that Convention No. 150 is a model instrument whose structure, content and flexibility features should be analysed and taken into account in future standard-setting. Finally, the Employers noted from the General Survey that the positive potential of labour administrations is not yet fully recognized and developed in many ILO Member States. The Employers, therefore, hope that the discussion of this General Survey will help spread good practices and, in this way, help to further labour administration.

With regard to the individual cases, I will make two comments: first, on the case of Belarus on the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). This year we had a special sitting in the context of the Conference resolution concerning measures recommended by the Governing Body under article 33 of the ILO Constitution regarding Belarus. The discussion unfortunately showed that the Belarusian Government is not in the least willing to cooperate with the ILO to work towards compliance with its obligations under Conventions Nos 87 and 98. The Employers consider the Belarusian Government's call for a vote on the Committee's conclusions, and the Government's subsequent declaration that it will not accept the CAS conclusions despite the adoption by a large majority, as an unprecedented affront to the Committee and to the ILO's standards supervisory system as a whole.

The second case on which I will comment is Nicaragua, also on Convention No. 87. This case concerns very serious allegations against the Government for dissolution and confiscation of the assets of the Higher Council for Private Enterprise (COSEP) and its 18 member associations, as well as persecution, intimidation, repression and arbitrary detention of COSEP leaders. We urge the Government to immediately restore the legal status of the dissolved organizations and to fully and unconditionally recognize the right of independent employers' and workers' organizations to organize their activities without any interference that would restrict this right. We also expect the Government to strengthen effective social dialogue at the national level, with a presence of the ILO, in order to rebuild trust with the social partners. The Employers would have liked to see this case mentioned in the special paragraph of the General Report. Unfortunately, this did not receive the support of the Workers' group, and so the Employers are asking themselves, if this case, which can hardly be surpassed in terms of urgency and severity, cannot be mentioned in a special paragraph, what other case could?

With regard to conclusions on individual cases, let me emphasize that we have once again tried to formulate short, clear and balanced conclusions that address the problems and possible solutions in a fair and equitable manner. This year, however, we had to realize that the time available was often insufficient, as we had a total of 25 cases to discuss this year, including the first article 33 discussion on Belarus. We strongly suggest limiting the total number of cases to 24 again next year. The conclusions should accurately reflect the discussion that occurred in the Committee. This is important to ensure the credibility and transparency of the ILO standards supervisory system.

With regard to follow-up to the Committee's conclusions, and the final point on the report itself, I would like to reiterate the importance of systematically involving the Bureau for Employers' Activities (ACT/EMP) and the Bureau for Workers' Activities (ACTRAV) in the follow-up to conclusions, in order to make sure that independent and representative workers' and employers' organizations in their respective countries can help find ways of complying with the Conventions that adequately take account of their needs.

In conclusion, although there exists a margin for improvement, the Employers are overall satisfied with the operation of the Committee's session this year. Consensus was reached where possible, and disagreements were reflected where necessary. In our opening remarks to the Committee, we identified room for further improvements on balance, transparency, relevance, effectiveness and tripartite governance of the Committee, and we made some concrete and constructive proposals. We invite all Committee members and the Office to consider them with an open and constructive spirit.

I would not be doing justice to my report if I did not mention and give special thanks to the way our Chairperson, Mr Różycki, helped us to navigate the sometimes very difficult discussions, in a very fair and parliamentary manner, which allowed us to reach the conclusions that we did. A big thanks to him. Allow me also to extend a word of thanks to the Employers' group, specifically Paul Noll, Annick Hellebuyck, Fernando Yllanes Martínez, Jackie Van Der Meulen, Guido Ricci Muadi, Michael Congiu, Laura Giménez, Paul Mackay, Miriam Pinto Lomeña, Juliana Manrique Sierra, Tala Khoury and Pablo Carrasco Quintana, for their support and assistance in preparing and presenting the Employer perspective on the individual cases and the General Survey. I would also like to thank my friend, and a very good opponent at that, Marc Leemans, the Worker Vice-Chairperson, and his team, and all the Government representatives who actively participated in the work of the Committee to enrich the discussions as well, and allow us to reach constructive and productive conclusions. Lastly, I would like to express particular gratitude for the absolutely invaluable support of Rita Yip, Altea Rossi and Emilie Villet from the International Organisation of Employers, and Christian Hess and María Ángeles Palmí Reig from ACT/EMP. Without these people's support, I really would not have been able to deliver my part on these conclusions.

Mr Leemans

Worker Vice-Chairperson of the Committee on the Application of Standards
(Original French)

As the Reporter has highlighted, our Committee was able to conclude its work successfully and our discussions were characterized, as they are every year, by very lively debates.

We have had the opportunity to discuss the role of and interactions between the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Committee on the Application of Standards. The Workers' group reiterated its commitment to respect for the experts' independence and impartiality. We will continue to reject attempts made to issue injunctions to the experts and to call into question their working methods in an unjustified way. The Employers' group reaffirmed its position concerning the right to strike and was disappointed that the experts continued to issue observations on this matter while there are proceedings before the International Court of Justice. Our group also reminded everyone of its position on the subject. Further, it stressed that the ongoing proceedings should not have any impact on the work of the supervisory bodies. For several years, the Committee on the Application of Standards has had a modus operandi that allows it to do its work. The ongoing proceedings were decided upon by the Governing Body after concluding that all social dialogue routes had been exhausted in this matter.

In another respect, the Employers' group seems to believe that the Committee of Experts should integrate the needs of enterprises into its supervisory work. This is a rather absurd request. Contrary to what is commonly claimed, the ILO Centenary Declaration for the Future of Work (2019) (Centenary Declaration) does not provide any basis for this request. The Centenary Declaration does call for standards to reflect the needs of sustainable enterprises, but it is in no way directed at the supervisory bodies. Similarly, the time when these considerations should be taken into account is at the stage when standards are adopted and not when supervising their application. The Centenary Declaration should be read in full. It insists on the importance of a supervisory system that is authoritative. We may thus ask: what would remain of the authority of a supervisory system that would seek to reflect the wishes and desires of one of its groups of constituents?

I would also raise the point that, despite its merits, the Centenary Declaration must be read in conformity with the Organization's mandate. Whether one likes it or not, this mandate is based on respect for workers' rights and the improvement of their living conditions. We sometimes hear it said that, in order for there to be workers' rights, there must first be enterprises to create jobs. Those who say this seem to overlook the reason why this Organization was created. Economic forces did not need the ILO or the existence of social legislation in order to develop. It was in reaction to the exploitation produced by these economic forces that social legislation came into being. With its body of standards, the ILO is the guarantor of this legislation at the international level. These standards are there to impose limits on the logic of profit and to rein in economic forces.

Further, it is generally accepted that economic activity is not sustainable if it does not respect workers' rights. This discussion that we have had on the role of sustainable enterprises has not been limited to our Committee. It is a debate that has been held elsewhere too within this Organization, and this is why it is high time to make a clarification on this matter.

The ILO's standards do not recognize rights of enterprises. They do recognize employers' rights, such as freedom of association, but not rights of enterprises. Within the Organization, the interlocutors of workers are employers and not representatives of the business world. This distinction is crucial in order to prevent misunderstandings. Employer is a social role that is exercised within the framework of professional relations with workers and their representatives, and these relations are engaged in with a view to negotiating working conditions that improve workers' lives. To come to the ILO to plead that it take into account the needs of enterprises on the same level as workers' rights is to come to the wrong forum.

Our Committee had the opportunity to examine and reach conclusions on 24 individual cases on our list. The case of Belarus, which was further discussed at a special sitting, gave rise to clear and specific conclusions. We lament the fact that our Committee required a vote in order to adopt them. This voting procedure is not in line with the methods of work and practices of our Committee. Some speakers justly pointed out that this did not serve as a precedent, but was an aberrant example. Consensual conclusions adopted by our Committee prompted contrasting reactions on the part of the Governments concerned. We welcome the constructive attitude of the Governments of Australia, Spain, Guinea, Gambia and Colombia.

Others, however, had a negative attitude. We deplore the statements made by the Governments of Cambodia, the Philippines and Nicaragua following the adoption of the conclusions. The conclusions adopted by our Committee are not sanctions. They are an integral part of the tools of social dialogue that are available to this Organization. We call upon the Governments to see these tools as an opportunity to improve their level of compliance with the obligations they have undertaken. Our Committee has also adopted conclusions concerning the General Survey. The General Survey had as its theme labour administration, which represents a crucial means of leverage for attaining social objectives and promoting decent work.

I have referred to the debates and differences we have had within our Committee. However, our capacity to overcome these obstacles to reach consensus is a testimony to the sense of responsibility felt throughout our Committee. The Employers' group insists on the importance of a convergence of views between our Committee and the Committee of Experts in order to improve the effectiveness of the supervisory system. However, there is another type of convergence that is even more important. That is the one that should exist between the Employers' group and the Workers' group. That is the relationship that will allow us to overcome the numerous challenges that threaten the world of work. We need to stop scrutinizing our differences to look instead in the same direction and seek consensus around common interests. Thank you for your attention and I would very much like to thank all those who took part in our Committee's debate.

Mr Różycki

Chairperson of the Committee on the Application of Standards

I am very honoured to take the floor this afternoon in my capacity of Chairperson of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 112th Session of the International Labour Conference, as we approve our Committee's report. The Committee on the Application of Standards is one of the key committees of the International Labour Conference and, together with the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, is at the heart of the supervisory system for which the ILO is known. It is therefore a great honour and privilege for me personally, and for my country Poland, to represent the Government group and to be given the responsibility for chairing the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards this year.

I hope the Committee members will allow me the indulgence of repeating myself, but I find it very important to stress, once again, that the International Labour Organization and its supervisory system have special meaning for my country. Democratic changes in Poland would not have been possible without ILO assistance, which, effectively implemented over the course of many years, has borne fruit. It was the rise of Solidarity, or Solidarność in Polish, in the 1980s, the first independent self-governing trade union in the Eastern Bloc, established in line with the ILO Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), that truly highlighted the significance of this assistance. The story of an electrician named Lech Wałęsa scaling the walls of the shipyard at Gdańsk 44 years ago still resonates almost half a century later. The imposition of martial law in Poland a few years later, followed by the suppression of all trade unions by the Government, resulted in the ILO establishing a Commission of Inquiry to monitor the situation in my country. Based on the Commission's conclusions, the ILO and numerous countries and organizations urged Poland to fulfil its obligation under ILO Convention No. 87 and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). The Polish Government subsequently recognized Solidarność and finally granted it legal status. According to Lech Wałęsa, leader of Solidarność and later President of Poland, the Commission of Inquiry created by the ILO after the imposition of martial law made significant contributions to changes which brought democracy to Poland. From there, the road first opened in 1980 ultimately led to the transition to democracy, European Union membership, the 20th anniversary of which we celebrate this year, and Poland's new role in the international arena. The example of Poland illustrates that the International Labour Organization and its well-functioning and authoritative supervisory system continue to play a crucial role in ensuring the implementation of, and compliance with, international labour standards. Chairing the Committee on the Application of Standards, after all these key historic moments that are so important for my country, and seeing how the architecture of this Organization, this tripartite system and these international labour standards remain relevant, if not essential, given the very serious nature of the challenges we all face, was a special moment for me.

During this session, the Committee discussed matters that were particularly topical, including the question of labour administration, which is the subject of the General Survey. As for the examination of individual cases, the discussions were able to proceed as scheduled, and all the cases on the list were examined within the time available.

As we are all aware, the unique tripartite structure of the ILO was founded on social dialogue. Therefore, I regret that despite the well-established practice of the Committee on the Application of Standards of taking decisions by consensus, as well as protracted attempts by the Committee's Vice-Chairpersons and myself to seek convergence or flexibility, not all the conclusions could be adopted by consensus. Notwithstanding, I welcome the fact that this year the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards are action-oriented, ambitious and achievable. Again, the discussion was rich and passionate. We heard different and even opposing views, but these were always expressed with respect for the views of others, in parliamentary language and in a way that reflected a firm commitment to standards and the supervisory system.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank all the delegates for their commitment and for the constructive spirit in which they participated in the work of the Committee. The success of our work was illustrated by the fact that the two rooms allocated for it were very often full. All of this is testimony to the interest generated by the discussion of the Committee and, more generally, highlights the relevance and importance of the supervisory system.

To conclude, and to echo those who have spoken before me, if I had to use just a few words to summarize the work of our Committee, they would emphasize the important role of the Committee in promoting social justice as the foundation of the global recovery to ensure that the future is human-centred, as advocated by the ILO Director-General. Let us not forget that the issues discussed by the Committee on the Application of Standards are and will remain central in the lives of Workers and Employers promoting decent work and social justice for all.

There are numerous people who have helped me reach this point who I would like to thank. I would like to start with the Government group. Poland is a member of the Eastern European group, the European Union and the group of industrialized market economy countries. I would like to thank those groups for placing their trust in me and for all their support. I would like to express my sincere appreciation in particular to the Employer Vice-Chairperson, Mr Kaizer Moyane, and the Worker Vice-Chairperson, Mr Marc Leemans, for their cooperation, professionalism and constructive understanding. I would like to thank the respective spokespersons for both sides, for the Workers and the Employers, for their contributions to the work of the Committee. I would also like to thank the Reporter, Mr Abdelkrim Siyoucef from the Government of Algeria for his efficient work and for his accurate account of the work of our Committee.

Finally, I wish to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the Office for its commitment, professionalism and high quality guidance throughout the sittings of our Committee. In particular, I would like to express my sincere and very special gratitude to the representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference, Ms Corinne Vargha, for her immense support and guidance throughout these two weeks and well before the beginning of the work of the Committee. Thank you for your expertise, which enabled this Committee to play its pivotal role within the ILO's constitutional framework. I would also like to thank all members of the Secretariat for their cordiality, dedication, professionalism and support. Their efforts to deliver high quality work for the International Labour Organization are commendable. Filled with a deep sense of pride and accomplishment for what we have achieved, I recommend that you approve the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

The President

I now declare open the discussion of the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

Ms Mbouzie Ahanda Épouse Abah

Government (Cameroon), speaking on behalf of the Africa group
(Original French)

We would like to begin by thanking the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations for the quality of the documents that served as a working basis for our debates.

Our thanks also go to the Officers of the Committee, particularly to the Chairperson, Łukasz Różycki, for the quality of the leadership that typified the conduct of our work. We further thank the International Labour Office for the professionalism shown in the organization and management of the work, and finally the interpreters, without whom we would not have been able to communicate.

The Africa group also thanks the Employers' group, the Workers' group and all the Governments that participated in the work of the Committee for the solidarity expressed, the mutual understanding shown despite differences in interpretation and the mutual respect which made it possible to reach the conclusions that are being submitted to the Conference for adoption. These conclusions will guide the work of the ILO and its tripartite constituents in respect of the application of standards.

The Africa group reaffirms the importance of international labour standards, which constitute the fundamental legal basis for social justice at a time when the world is seeing growing inequalities and when workers are the victims of climatic, environmental, demographic and other changes. In assessing the application of Conventions, it should be remembered that, although these are binding legal instruments, the integrated policies and strategies arising from the reports should take into consideration the social, political and economic realities of each region of the world and of each country.

In our region, there continue to be numerous challenges related to the effective application of Conventions and the deployment of efficient labour administration in a changing world of work. Several countries are making efforts and are cited for their good practices. However, many of us still need technical assistance from the International Labour Office to manage the integration of standards into the legal corpus of each country and to consolidate a structured, relevant and sustainable social dialogue.

In conclusion, the Africa group supports the approval of the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

Ms Lizin

Government (Belgium), speaking on behalf of the European Union and its Member States

I have the honour to speak on behalf of the European Union and its Member States. North Macedonia, Montenegro, Ukraine, the Republic of Moldova, Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Georgia, Iceland and Norway align themselves with this statement.

I would like to start by warmly thanking the Chairperson of the Committee on the Application of Standards for his efficient leadership of the discussions and his very good time management. We also extend our warm thanks to the Vice-Chairpersons and the Reporter for their constructive spirit, contributions and efficiency, and to the Office for its dedicated support and guidance.

We welcome the discussions and the constituents' positive approach to and engagement in the work of the Committee. However, we very much regret that not all decisions could be adopted by consensus this year, thus going against the long-established practice of the Committee. Nevertheless, we are pleased to have reached concrete conclusions, which will provide guidance on the way forward to effectively implement international labour standards in law and practice. We strongly believe in the fundamental importance of international labour standards, their ratification, and the effective, independent and authoritative supervision of their implementation. We share the view that human rights, including international labour standards, are fundamental to relations between people and nations.

The Committee on the Application of Standards is a crucial pillar of the ILO's supervisory system and embodies the core values of the ILO, based on social dialogue and tripartism. It enables all constituents to discuss the implementation of ILO Conventions in a constructive, respectful and tripartite manner. We highly appreciate the analysis and expertise of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, which provides a solid basis for the work of the Conference Committee. We value and put our trust in the guidance provided by the Committee of Experts, which helps to implement international labour standards. We recall our strong commitment to the independence, objectivity and impartiality of the Committee of Experts. We are very pleased that the Committee of Experts continues to deepen its cooperation with the United Nations human rights treaty bodies in order to enhance the effective fulfilment of human rights, including labour rights.

Realizing labour rights as human rights is one of the priorities of the Global Coalition for Social Justice, an initiative strongly supported by the European Union and its Member States. Through the EU Action Plan on Human Rights and Democracy, we put increased emphasis on human rights, including labour rights. We attach great value to the General Survey of the Committee of Experts. It helps us to analyse difficulties in the application of standards and identify means to overcome them. Labour administration and inspection systems have faced great challenges during recent economic crises and COVID-19, and we welcome this year's timely General Survey on the matter, and its recommendations for improvement.

We welcome the fact that the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards are more action-oriented. They provide guidance to the constituents and foster the commitment of the ILO Member States. We encourage Member States to comply with the conclusions to the greatest extent possible and, where appropriate, with the support of ILO technical assistance, which may also entail missions.

We will continue to fully support and reinforce the ILO's supervisory system. We remain convinced that it is one of the most extensive and valuable elements of the multilateral, rules-based order. We are looking forward to constructive engagement with the Office and the tripartite constituents in the follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee.

Ms Varfalameyeva
Worker (Belarus)
(Original Russian)

I represent 4 million workers in Belarus. I have been working for more than 20 years and collaborating with the ILO over this time. Over the course of the past two weeks at the Conference, we have heard lofty words about the need for solidarity between all countries in order to ensure social justice for workers across the world. However, when it comes to the Republic of Belarus, the International Labour Organization continues to promote extremely unfair restrictive measures, which are directed against effective employment, decent income and the social protection of workers in our country.

The workers of Belarus, whom I represent, do not agree with the decision adopted on Belarus. We are indignant that the issue of Belarus continues to be considered in an extremely prejudiced and biased manner. The real evidence of the effective work of trade unions in Belarus is simply ignored. Equality between all Members of the Organization, pluralism of views, democracy and openness are the fundamental rules that govern the ILO and they must not be violated by anyone.

Appeals to international organizations working in health, child protection, and industrial and nuclear security to limit their collaboration with our country, as set out in the resolution, are also designed to reduce the level of socio-economic development in the country and to reduce the protection afforded to its people. As a specific example of this: in our country today, precisely because of these sanctions and restrictions, a number of Western manufacturers are refusing to supply Belarus with medicines that are necessary to treat and alleviate the suffering of children with serious genetic diseases, and supplies of medical equipment are being disrupted. Belarus is dealing with this challenge but I would like to ask all the instigators of sanctions: how are you in a position to say anything about human rights? Who gave you the right to deprive people of vitally important assistance?

We call upon the ILO to refrain from this utterly unproductive and unfair approach towards our country and to return to the fundamental principles that govern the work of this Organization.

The President

We shall now proceed with the approval of the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

If there are no objections, may I take it that the Conference approves the report, as contained in Records of Proceedings Nos 5A and 5B?

(The report is approved.)

I would like to congratulate the Officers and members of the Committee and the Secretariat on the work accomplished this year. My warmest thanks to them all. Good job. Let me emphasize that the work of the Committee on the Application of Standards is one of the cornerstones of the ILO.

(The Conference continues its work in plenary.)

International Labour Conference – 112th Session, 2024

Date: 13 June 2024

Outcome of the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards

Resolution and proposed Conclusions submitted to the Conference for adoption

This report contains the text of the resolution and proposed Conclusions submitted by the Standards-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards for adoption by the Conference.

The report of the Committee on its proceedings, as approved by the Officers of the Committee on behalf of the Committee, will be published on the Conference website in Record No. 6B after the closure of the session. Committee members will have the possibility to submit corrections to their own statements appearing in the report until 12 July 2024.

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled “Biological hazards in the working environment”

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having adopted the report of the Committee appointed to consider the fourth item on the agenda,

Having in particular approved as conclusions, with a view to the consultation of the tripartite constituents, proposals for a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation concerning biological hazards in the working environment,

Decides that an item entitled “Biological hazards in the working environment” shall be included in the agenda of its next session for a second discussion with a view to the adoption of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation, Decides that any part of the proposed conclusions that has not been agreed upon or considered at the current session will be bracketed and will be included in the draft instruments that will be submitted to the Conference for its consideration at the 113th Session (2025).

Proposed Conclusions

A. Form of the instruments

1. The International Labour Conference should adopt standards concerning biological hazards in the working environment.
2. These standards should take the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.

B. Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention

Preamble

3. The Preamble of the Convention should provide the following:
 - (a) recalling the solemn constitutional obligation of the International Labour Organization to further among the nations of the world programmes which will achieve adequate protection for the life and health of workers in all occupations,
 - (b) recalling the inclusion of a safe and healthy working environment in the ILO's framework of fundamental principles and rights at work by the International Labour Conference in June 2022,
 - [(c) considering the objective to provide a comprehensive legal framework for the respect, promotion and realization of the right to a safe and healthy working environment concerning biological hazards, including provisions for preparedness and response arrangements for the effective management of emergencies related to biological hazards in the working environment, taking new and emerging hazards and risks into account,

- (d) stressing the importance of promoting international policy coherence and cooperation in the prevention of communicable and non-communicable diseases caused by biological hazards in the working environment,
- (e) recognizing the relevance of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187), considered as fundamental Conventions within the meaning of the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work (1998), as amended in 2022, and the relevance of the Protocol of 2002 to Convention No. 155 and the Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161),
- (f) noting the need to revise the Anthrax Prevention Recommendation, 1919 (No. 3), and to close the gap in coverage of international labour standards concerning other biological hazards in the working environment,
- (g) noting that the proposed instruments constitute the first international instruments addressing biological hazards in the working environment at the global level,
- (h) stressing the need to promote effective management of occupational safety and health regarding biological hazards in the working environment through collaborative means and measures by relevant actors, including public health and occupational safety and health authorities and employers' and workers' organizations, in their respective areas of responsibility.]

Definition and scope

4. For the purposes of the Convention, the term "biological hazards" refers to any microorganisms, cells or cell cultures, including those which have been genetically modified, which can cause harm to human health, such as bacteria, viruses, parasites, fungi, prions, DNA and RNA materials, and any other microorganisms and their associated allergens and toxins.
5. Biological hazards in the working environment include exposure inter alia to organic materials of plant, animal or human origin, bodily fluids and biological vectors or transmitters of disease.
6. Harm to human health caused by biological hazards in the working environment includes communicable and non-communicable diseases and injuries.
7. The Convention should apply to all workers in all branches of economic activity.
8. A Member ratifying the Convention may, after consultation with the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, and on the basis of an assessment of the biological hazards involved and of the preventive and protective measures to be applied, exclude from its application, in part or in whole, particular branches of economic activity or limited categories of workers in respect of which its application would raise special problems of a substantial nature on condition that a safe and healthy working environment is maintained. It should also make special provisions to protect confidential information whose disclosure to a competitor would be liable to cause harm to an employer's business so long as the safety and health of workers are not compromised thereby.
9. Each Member which avails itself of the possibility afforded in the preceding point should list, in its first report on the application of the Convention under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, the particular branches of economic activity or categories of workers thus excluded, giving the reasons for such exclusion and describing any measures taken to provide adequate protection to excluded workers, and indicate in subsequent reports any progress towards wider application. Members should make every effort to end exclusions at the earliest opportunity.

National policy

- 10. Each Member should, consistent with national law and practice and in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers, integrate the protection against biological hazards in the working environment into its national policy on occupational safety and health, based on an evaluation of risk that takes into account the characteristics and degree of concern of hazards, which would be periodically reviewed.
- 11. National policies on biological hazards should take account of:
 - (a) other relevant policies, including on public health and the environment, where these policies are consistent with, complement or improve occupational safety and health provisions;
 - (b) the best available information concerning the management of occupational safety and health regarding biological hazards in the working environment or promote new research where available information is insufficient;
 - (c) the need to develop arrangements for the effective management of biological hazards in the working environment, including new or emerging biological hazards, considering the need to develop preparedness and response measures to deal with accidents and emergencies related to biological hazards in the working environment, as well as workers' physical and mental health and general well-being;
 - (d) the need to consider the impact of climate and environmental risks on occupational safety and health in the working environment and take adequate action to prevent or remedy identified risks;
 - (e) relevant provisions of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187), and, as appropriate, other relevant international labour standards.
- 12. With a view to obtaining the best available information, the competent authorities should, in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers, make arrangements, as appropriate, and in accordance with national law and practice, for exchanging information and coordinating action with relevant national authorities, including public health and occupational safety and health authorities, and scientific institutions, as well as relevant international organizations.
- 13. Recognizing that many biological hazards create cross-border risks, Members should encourage both national and multinational employers to provide adequate occupational health and safety conditions and contribute to a preventive occupational health culture to eliminate or minimize these risks.

Preventive and protective measures

14. The competent authorities should, in accordance with national law and practice and in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers, develop national guidelines for preventive and protective, or as appropriate precautionary, measures for the management of biological hazards in the working environment, based on the results of an evaluation of risks. These guidelines should include preparedness and response measures to deal with accidents and emergencies related to biological hazards in the working environment, and should take into account new and emerging hazards and risks, and promote continuous improvement of the level of protection of workers exposed to biological hazards in the working environment.
15. The competent authorities should provide timely information, and support to employers, workers and their representatives concerning preventive and protective measures for the management of biological hazards in the working environment, based on the results of an evaluation of risks, in an accessible form and understandable language, and which should be periodically reviewed, and updated as necessary and keep abreast of scientific and technical knowledge.
16. Each Member should, in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers, develop, make public and regularly review national guidance and preventive and protective measures for:
 - (a) sectors and occupations where workers are at a high risk of recognized harm due to exposure to biological hazards;
 - (b) workers who may require special protection, taking into account the need to ensure that such measures should not result in discrimination or contribute to occupational segregation.

Occupational health and occupational health services

17. In taking preventive and protective measures regarding biological hazards in the working environment, in accordance with national law and practice, each Member should seek to:
 - (a) progressively extend occupational health services to all workers in all branches of economic activity, in particular to workers and occupations at a higher risk of exposure and workers with certain conditions who may require special protection;
 - (b) facilitate the coordination and efficient use of national health and labour infrastructure, expertise and resources for the provision of occupational health services to workers in relation to biological hazards in the working environment.

Data collection, recording and notification of occupational diseases and occupational accidents

18. The competent authorities should, having regard to national conditions and practice and in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers, establish, implement and regularly review procedures for:
 - (a) the reporting, recording, notification and investigation of occupational diseases, occupational accidents and, as appropriate, dangerous occurrences, caused by exposure to biological hazards in the working environment;

- (b) the production and publication of annual statistics, disaggregated by sex, on occupational diseases, occupational accidents and, as appropriate, dangerous occurrences, caused by exposure to biological hazards in the working environment;
 - (c) the holding of inquiries for cases of serious occupational diseases, occupational accidents or any other injuries to health caused by exposure to biological hazards in the working environment;
 - (d) the annual publication of information on measures taken under the national occupational safety and health policy, which address exposure to biological hazards in the working environment;
 - (e) the determination of the appropriate duration for maintaining records on occupational diseases caused by exposure to biological hazards in the working environment, taking into account the latency periods of such diseases.
- 19. The competent authorities should, in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers, and in accordance with national law and practice, relevant international standards and scientific developments:
- (a) periodically review the national lists of occupational diseases for the purposes of prevention, recording, notification and, if applicable, compensation;
 - (b) update these lists, as may be necessary, to include any disease where a direct link between the exposure to biological hazards in the working environment and the disease is established scientifically, or determined by methods appropriate to national conditions and practice.

Employment injury benefits

- 20. Each Member should ensure that any disease, injury or incapacity due to occupational exposure to biological hazards in the working environment should give rise to an entitlement to employment injury benefits or compensation, in accordance with national law and practice.

Enforcement of laws and regulations

- 21. Each Member should ensure the enforcement of national laws and regulations concerning biological hazards in the working environment through an adequate and appropriate system of inspection and, where applicable, other mechanisms for ensuring compliance, including preventive and supportive measures, with allocation of adequate resources and the support needed for these functions.
- 22. The competent authorities should ensure that:
- (a) labour inspectors with duties related to biological hazards and risks in the working environment and, as appropriate, other officials are trained on biological hazards in the working environment;
 - (b) labour inspectors with duties related to biological hazards and risks in the working environment, in assessing compliance with national laws and regulations concerning biological hazards in the working environment, promote a systematic approach to occupational safety and health.

23. Each Member should apply, in accordance with national law and practice, adequate penalties for violations of national laws and regulations concerning biological hazards in the working environment.

Duties and responsibilities of employers

24. Employers should ensure that, so far as is reasonably practicable, the working environments under their control are without risk to safety and health due to exposure to biological hazards by taking the appropriate and necessary preventive and protective measures.
25. Preventive and protective measures should be optimized based on risk assessment that includes the characteristics and degree of concern of the biological hazard.
26. Employers' duties and responsibilities with respect to biological hazards in the working environment should include adopting preventive and protective measures, as a result of an adequate risk assessment, ensuring, as appropriate, a gender-responsive perspective that is consistent with national law and applicable collective agreements, and in particular:
- (a) establishing, in consultation with workers and their representatives, adequate and appropriate systems to conduct, review and, where necessary, update assessments of the risks to the safety and health of workers arising from biological hazards, taking due account of workers who may require special protection;
 - (b) taking all reasonable and practicable measures to eliminate, or when not possible, control and minimize the risks due to biological hazards in the working environment, taking due account of the hierarchy of controls;
 - (c) providing, maintaining and replacing, as necessary, at no cost to the workers, adequate personal protective equipment according to the hierarchy of controls together with training for its use;
 - (d) conducting regular surveillance of the working environment and providing, in accordance with national law and practice, and on the basis of a risk assessment, health surveillance of workers that is adequate and appropriate to the occupational risks of the undertaking;
 - (e) supervising work processes and regularly reviewing the effectiveness of preventive and control measures, including the availability of appropriate personal protective equipment;
 - (f) providing information, instruction and training on biological hazards in the working environment and applicable preventive and protective measures to managers, supervisors and workers, as well as to workers' representatives, at suitable and regular intervals, on paid work time and, where possible, during usual working hours;
 - (g) ensuring that all workers are suitably informed, in an accessible form and understandable language, of the risks due to exposure to biological hazards and of the applicable preventive and protective measures before they start any tasks involving such risks, when there are changes in working methods, materials or the risk assessment based on new information and, as necessary, at regular intervals thereafter;

- (h) ensuring that precautionary measures are taken where sufficient information is not available to adequately assess risks;
 - (i) investigating occupational diseases, occupational accidents and, as appropriate, dangerous occurrences in order to identify causes and take the necessary measures to prevent recurrence of similar events, in cooperation with occupational safety and health committees or workers' representatives.
- 27. Whenever two or more employers engage in activities simultaneously at one workplace, they should collaborate on how to ensure workers' safety and health related to biological hazards in the working environment, without prejudice to the responsibility of each employer for its workers.
- 28. Employers should establish preparedness and response measures, according to the size and nature of their activities, to deal with accidents, incidents and emergencies, related to biological hazards in the working environment, taking into account outbreaks of communicable diseases. These measures should be consistent with the guidance provided by the competent authorities.

Rights and duties of workers and their representatives

- 29. Workers and their representatives should have rights with respect to biological hazards in the working environment that include:
- (a) receiving information and training on biological hazards and risks in the working environment and on appropriate preventive and protective measures and their application;
 - (b) being consulted on the identification of hazards and risk assessments conducted by the employer or the competent authority;
 - (c) being consulted on preventive and protective measures to protect themselves and other workers and being involved in their implementation;
 - (d) enquiring into and being consulted by the employer on relevant aspects related to exposure to biological hazards in the working environment;
 - (e) participating in investigations of occupational diseases, occupational accidents and, as appropriate, dangerous occurrences and being consulted about the conclusions of these investigations;
 - (f) receiving reports on health surveillance and medical examinations, subject to confidentiality rules for personal and medical data;
 - (g) appealing to the competent authorities if they consider that the measures adopted and the means used are not sufficiently effective to ensure adequate protection;
 - (h) in accordance with national laws, being transferred to alternative work, under the advice of the occupational health services, when continued employment in a particular job is contraindicated for health reasons, provided that such work is available and that they have the qualifications or can be trained for such work;
 - (i) receiving medical treatment and rehabilitation, in accordance with national law and practice, in the event of an illness, disease or injury caused or exacerbated by exposure to biological hazards;

- (j) being protected against any discrimination on account of contracting or transmitting a disease caused by exposure to biological hazards.
- 30. Workers should have duties with respect to biological hazards in the working environment that include:
 - (a) complying, in accordance with the instructions received, and the training and means provided by their employers, with prescribed occupational safety and health measures on the prevention of and protection from biological hazards to themselves and others, including through the proper handling and use of adequate personal protective equipment, facilities and other equipment made available to them for this purpose;
 - (b) reporting promptly to their immediate supervisor any working conditions which they believe could present a biological hazard or risk for their safety or health or for the safety or health of others;
 - (c) cooperating with the employer and other workers to adequately identify and implement occupational safety and health measures addressing biological hazards.
- 31. With respect to biological hazards in the working environment workers should:
 - (a) have the right to remove themselves from a work situation without undue consequences, where they have reasonable justification to believe that there is an imminent and serious danger to their life or health and should inform their immediate supervisor of the imminent and serious situation without delay;
 - (b) report forthwith to their immediate supervisor any situation which they have reasonable justification to believe presents an imminent and serious danger to their life or health;
 - (c) not be required by their employer to return to a work situation where there is continuing imminent and serious danger to life or health until the employer has taken remedial action.

Methods of application

- 32. Each Member should give effect to the provisions of the Convention in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers, through laws and regulations as well as through collective agreements or any other measures consistent with national conditions and practice.

[C. Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation]

Preamble

- 33. The Recommendation should include a preamble indicating that the provisions of the Recommendation should be considered in conjunction with and supplement those of the Convention.

Preventive and protective measures

- 34. The preparedness and response arrangements to be established under the Convention for the effective management of emergencies related to biological hazards in the working environment should include:

- (a) the preparation or updating of regulations for the management of such emergencies;
 - (b) the establishment of early warning systems;
 - (c) the establishment of measures to be taken in the working environment in the event of outbreaks, epidemics or pandemics;
 - (d) the establishment of mechanisms of coordination and information with public health authorities;
 - (e) national and international collaboration on research;
 - (f) provision for appropriate emergency human resources;
 - (g) the effective operation of healthcare facilities and essential services;
 - (h) material preparedness;
 - (i) collaboration between relevant public health, water and waste, occupational health and veterinary health authorities, and other partners;
 - (j) rapid public health response systems and real-time communication of expert advice to prepare for and manage outbreaks;
 - (k) training of occupational health service providers on potential biological hazards, supported by clinical or laboratory-based surveillance.
- 35. The sectors and occupations where workers are at a higher risk of exposure to biological hazards and for which specific preventive and protective measures should be developed under the Convention should include:
- (a) the healthcare sector;
 - (b) agricultural work, including in the animal, vegetable and grain sectors;
 - (c) the waste sector;
 - (d) cleaning and maintenance work;
 - (e) humanitarian work;
 - (f) laboratory work.
- 36. The categories of workers with certain conditions that may require special protection should include:
- (a) pregnant and breastfeeding women;
 - (b) young workers;
 - (c) older workers;
 - (d) workers with disabilities;
 - (e) workers medically predisposed to infections or allergies, including immunocompromised workers;
 - (f) workers in need of protection due to their social situation and multiple disadvantages.
- 37. When developing measures and guidance for the management of occupational safety and health regarding biological hazards in the working environment, Members should take due account of relevant internationally agreed technical and practical guidance developed by the International Labour Organization and other competent organizations and promote a management systems approach to occupational safety and health, such as the approach set out in the Guidelines on occupational safety and health management systems (ILO-OSH 2001).

Recording of occupational diseases

- 38. In determining the appropriate duration for maintaining records on occupational diseases as required by the Convention, Members should, in accordance with national law and practice, take account of the latency periods of occupational diseases.

Employment injury benefits

- 39. In applying the provisions of the Convention concerning employment injury benefits, Members should take due account of the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121), the Employment Injury Benefits Recommendation, 1964 (No. 121), and the List of Occupational Diseases Recommendation, 2002 (No. 194).

Enforcement of laws and regulations

- 40. The system of inspection provided for in the Convention should be guided by the provisions of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), without prejudice to the obligations thereunder of Members which have ratified these instruments.
- 41. In assessing compliance with national laws and regulations concerning biological hazards in the working environment, labour inspectors should promote a management systems approach to occupational safety and health.

Duties and responsibilities of employers

- 42. In taking the preventive and protective measures that are their responsibility pursuant to the Convention, employers should take due account of relevant instruments, codes and guidelines, including the Occupational Safety and Health Recommendation, 1981 (No. 164), the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Recommendation, 2006 (No. 197), the Guidelines on occupational safety and health management systems (ILO-OSH 2001), the Technical guidelines on biological hazards in the working environment and other relevant subsequent guidance adopted by the International Labour Organization.
- 43. In applying the hierarchy of controls referred to in the Convention, employers should take into account the Technical guidelines on biological hazards in the working environment and other relevant subsequent guidance adopted by the International Labour Organization.
- 44. The Recommendation supersedes the Anthrax Prevention Recommendation, 1919 (No. 3).]

[Points to be inserted in Part C]

- XX. Each Member should take measures, in accordance with national law and practice, with a view to ensuring that those who design, manufacture, import, provide or transfer biological substances to which workers could be exposed in the course of their work:

- (a) satisfy themselves that, so far as is reasonably practicable, such substances do not entail dangers for the safety and health of those using them correctly;
 - (b) make available information concerning the correct use and dangerous properties of such substances, including in the form of safety and health data sheets if such are available, as well as instructions on how known hazards are to be avoided;
 - (c) undertake studies and research or otherwise keep abreast of the scientific and technical knowledge necessary to comply with clauses (a) and (b);
 - (d) take due account of the United Nations Recommendations on the Transport of Dangerous Goods and the Basel Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes and Their Disposal.
- XX. These preparedness and response arrangements should include:
- (a) the preparation or updating of workplace policies and guidelines on the management of emergencies related to biological hazards, taking into account possible public health impacts;
 - (b) the provision of appropriate and adequate preventive measures, in accordance with national law and practice and on the basis of a risk assessment, which could include immunization, chemoprophylaxis and testing to all workers free of charge and on a voluntary basis.
- XX. [...] endeavour to provide access to income protection during periods of isolation or quarantine;
- XX. [...] endeavour to provide, as appropriate, protection from dismissal if, while complying with monitoring, travel restrictions, quarantine or isolation orders, or for related preventive or curative treatments, they have to be absent from work.

Introduction

1. At its first sitting the Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairperson: Mr Luis Claudino de Oliveira (Government member, Portugal)

Vice-Chairpersons: Ms Isabel Maya Rubio (Employer member, Spain)
Mr James Ritchie (Worker member, New Zealand)

2. At its seventh sitting the Committee appointed Ms P. Nghidengwa (Government member, Namibia) as reporter and the members of the Drafting Committee ¹ as follows:

Government members: Mr M. Costela (Chile)
Mr J. De Saint-Jores (France)
Ms S. Soleimani, (Islamic Republic of Iran)

Employer members: Ms V. Bognar and Mr F. Moraes (United States of America)
Mr R. Marinkovic (International Organisation of Employers, Adviser)

Worker members: Ms R. Ajam (South Africa)
Ms A. Landry (Canada)
Mr A. Salsamendi (Uruguay)

3. The Committee held 24 sittings.
4. The Chairperson stated that the Committee was meeting at a decisive moment as the world of work confronted profound transitions linked to digitalization, technological innovation, globalization and demographic change. One of the critical challenges was protecting workers from biological hazards in the workplace. In 1919, the ILO Constitution established the principle that workers must be protected from sickness, disease and injury arising from their employment, and that principle remained central to the ILO's mandate in the current context. This had been reaffirmed by the decision of the International Labour Conference, at its 110th Session (2022), to elevate the right to a safe and healthy working environment to the status of a fundamental principle and right at work. Much work nonetheless remained to be done; indeed, the COVID-19 pandemic had highlighted the urgent need for robust measures to safeguard workers' health and safety in the face of biological hazards. The work of the Committee was therefore of utmost importance and represented a heavy responsibility on its members.
5. The representative of the Secretary-General noted that the ILO had adopted more than 40 international labour standards on occupational safety and health but that, with the exception of the Anthrax Prevention Recommendation, 1919 (No. 3), none of those addressed biological hazards. A regulatory gap with respect to other biological hazards had been identified by the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group (SRM TWG) in 2017. To address that gap, the ILO Governing Body had confirmed, at its 343rd Session (November 2021), the need for a new instrument or instruments that covered all biological hazards at work. In June 2022, a tripartite meeting of experts had developed technical guidelines on biological hazards in the working environment, which had been adopted by the Governing Body at its 346th Session (October–November 2022). The Governing Body had decided, at its 341st Session (March 2021), to place on the agenda of the 112th and 113th Sessions of the International Labour Conference, in 2024 and 2025, a standard-setting item on biological hazards under a double discussion procedure.

6. In advance of the first discussion, the Office had prepared two reports that were before the Committee. Report IV(1), entitled Biological hazards in the working environment, summarized the law and practice across ILO Member States. It contained a questionnaire to which the governments of all Member States had been invited to reply, in consultation with representative organizations of employers and workers. The questionnaire had received an encouraging number of responses – from 87 governments, 50 employers' organizations and 94 workers' organizations. Based on an analysis of those replies, the Office had prepared Report IV(2), entitled Protection against biological hazards in the working environment, which contained proposed Conclusions for discussion by the Committee. Those Conclusions were built upon recognition of the need for a comprehensive normative framework encompassing all biological hazards that might affect the safety and health of workers, going well beyond the catastrophic context of pandemics to address the risks faced by workers as part of their normal working lives.
7. The deputy representative of the Secretary-General presented a brief overview of the preparatory work leading up to the Committee, the proposed Conclusions and the next steps that should be taken once the Committee would have completed its work. The proposed Conclusions contained 44 points organized in three parts: A. on the form of the instrument, B. on proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention, and C. on proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation.

Opening statements

8. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that while all ILO standard-setting discussions were important in advancing decent work, this discussion was particularly important, relevant and timely for two reasons. First, in 2022, the right to a safe and healthy working environment had been declared to be a fundamental principle and right at work, which meant that all Member States were obliged to uphold and protect the right as it applied to all workers. Second, the world was emerging from the COVID-19 pandemic that had been caused by a novel coronavirus. Millions of workers had been exposed to that biological hazard, and many had died unnecessarily.
9. He stressed that if the ILO were to provide authority in upholding rights and expanding decent work in a critical area of OSH, these discussions had to lead to the highest of global standards, namely a Convention on biological hazards. To fail to agree on a Convention and guiding Recommendation over the next two Conferences is to fail to meet one of the greatest challenges in the world of work of our time and to fail the constituents of the ILO. A Convention will be an important tool in making workplaces safer so we must not be comfortable with a lesser goal. Let me remind you that we have the Constitutional mandate of this House, the solemn obligation towards workers' safety and health. This was clear to our predecessors and this obligation was renewed with the updated Declaration on Fundamental Principle and Rights at Work, which now includes OSH. A normative gap had been identified and the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), and Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187) are not specialized enough to ensure protection in the working environment in the face of the increased risk posed by biological hazards.

10. The recent pandemic had demonstrated that all workers might be exposed to a biological hazard at some time during their working lives. It was therefore critical that all the world's workers be covered by the Convention and Recommendation which would emerge from these discussions. The scope of a new standard on biological hazards had to be comprehensive and include all related infectious and non-infectious diseases, poisonings, cancers and injuries and other harms related to the physical properties of biological agents and substances. Explosions, asphyxiations and other physical risks related to the presence of biological hazards in the environment and other conditions arising out of exposures such as cardiovascular and psychosocial conditions should also be within the scope of the new standards. Finally, the new standards should be 'future proofed' to ensure that novel, emerging or evolving biological hazards would be within their scope. The rise of antimicrobial resistant infections and the emergence of new diseases demonstrate the need for vigilance, effective surveillance and a preventive, precautionary approach to risks.
11. The increasing impact of the climate crisis should also be considered in the discussion. Rising temperatures and climate events such as floods, impacted on the numbers and spread of vectors, like mosquitos.
12. Workers and their representatives had a responsibility to cooperate in OSH policy, practices and procedures but the primary responsibility rested with employers to ensure a safe and healthy working environment. Workers had rights to a safe and healthy workplace including the right to information, training, representation and the additional rights bestowed on worker representatives. Workers also had a right to refuse dangerous work without penalty. The standard setting process needed to explicitly recognize these rights. The interconnection between OSH and other fundamental rights was extremely important to recognize. The ILO Social Dialogue Report 2022 showed that 70 per cent of all collective bargaining agreements contained specific clauses on OSH, which provided empirical evidence that when freedom of association and collective bargaining rights were granted, workers and employers prioritized the protection of OSH.
13. The standard-setting discussion should be cognizant of the different impact of exposure to biological hazards on women and men. It did not only pertain to pregnant and breastfeeding women but also to differences in immune responses, the role of women as the primary caregiver in a patriarchal world, and the need for gender sensitive personal protective equipment (PPE). The impact of biological hazards on vulnerable workers including those in informal and precarious employment and migrant workers, including undocumented workers, should also be considered.
14. In closing, he noted that provision for emergency preparedness and response should be an integral part of any new standard, and that should be done with the participation of workers' organizations at all levels. Finally, the text of any new standard should address income protection, rehabilitation and compensation that might result from workplace closures, suspensions, and furloughs due to exposure to biological hazards.
15. The Employer Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the COVID-19 pandemic had highlighted the global health consequences of uncontrolled biological hazards, as well as its impact on the economic and social situation in countries. The pandemic had also reinforced the importance for governments to fulfil their public health responsibility to manage and mitigate global health crises, and the critical role that social partners should play when developing and implementing mitigation measures impacting the world of work.

16. She stressed the importance of considering in a balanced way the roles and perspectives of the three constituents (governments, employers and workers), when developing any new instrument on biological hazards, and of being sensitive to the viewpoints of both developed and developing countries, small and large companies, and all workers.
17. In 2022, the ILO had adopted Technical guidelines on biological hazards in the working environment, which provided exhaustive and detailed advice to governments, employers, and workers on prevention and control measures related to exposure to biological hazards. For the first time a meeting of experts preceding the examination of an item on the agenda of the Conference had adopted an outcome document aimed at providing guidance to constituents in the area concerned. Those guidelines would therefore provide a useful reference point for the discussions and the Employers' group would take them into account when submitting its amendments. The outcome of the Committee, and particularly the nature of the instruments to be adopted, would be different from the guidelines. The Committee would need to identify the general principles on which the guidelines are based and carefully consider the implications of the language used. It would be important to refrain from repeating or entering into unnecessarily details, knowing that the technical guidelines would complement the instruments to be adopted.
18. The Employers' group had several key concerns with the proposed Conclusions. First, the proposed instrument needed to provide a balanced approach between the protection of workers and the enhancement of the economy. It was therefore important to ensure that the instrument would be flexible and adaptable to the context of each country. Conventions could be effective instruments only if they met certain criteria that encourage and attract wide ratification. The text proposed by the Office was too detailed and entailed the implementation of a number of non-fundamental OSH standards and would dissuade many countries from ratifying it: ILO standards should state the principles and the objectives in a clear manner, leaving the details of implementation to be defined by each country according to its own legal traditions and approaches. The Employers' group was convinced that a standalone Recommendation aligned with the principles of the two fundamental OSH Conventions would provide the appropriate flexibility needed for effective implementation by Member States. The instrument should be specific to biological hazards, building on well-established OSH principles. It should not repeat unnecessarily, nor extend or change the content of other OSH instruments but be consistent with them. Furthermore, the Committee should refrain from extending the scope of application, by going further than the Technical guidelines.
19. Second, the origin of the biological hazard present in the working environment was of paramount importance when it comes to establishing the strategies, policies, and specific measures to be adopted. It was important to distinguish between exposure to a biological agent caused by an outbreak, epidemic or pandemic and work-related exposure to a biological agent due to the nature of the work. In respect of the first, public health authorities and provisions were the ones leading the way in the prevention and protection of workers' health while preserving the countries' capacity to produce and keep their economy stable. In respect of the second, occupational safety and health (OSH) provisions were the ones prevailing although it may be necessary to specify or adapt the existing framework provisions to biological risks.

20. Third, it was important that the text of any new standard was clear and easy to understand by workers, employers, civil servants, labour inspectors, experts, and anyone implementing its provisions.
21. Fourth, and finally, provisions were of little value if they did not clearly establish responsibilities, duties, and rights, and if they were too prescriptive and inflexible. When determining rights and obligations, a proper balance needed to be struck between clarity and level of detail. All those elements must remain at the level of principles and fit within the framework established by the more general Conventions, such as Convention No. 155.
22. The Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group,² noted the timeliness of the discussion, following the recent COVID-19 pandemic, which had exposed deficits in dealing with emergencies and with communicable biological hazards. In Africa, there were gaps in policy frameworks, inadequate national systems, low preparedness, and limited technical capacity to deal with biological hazards in the workplace. Biological hazards typically resulted in occupational diseases, which were often undiagnosed, misdiagnosed, unreported and mistreated. While most countries in the African region had robust reporting and compensation frameworks for occupational accidents, this was not the case in respect of occupational diseases, including those resulting from biological hazards.
23. The development of a holistic framework on biological hazards would improve the working environment and protect workers. The proposed ILO instruments on biological hazards needed to be aligned with similar standards and policies developed by national public health authorities and international organizations like the World Health Organization (WHO). In Africa, workers in the informal economy were particularly vulnerable to the risks posed by biological hazards. Their needs had to be considered in the development of the new standards. Attention should also be paid to high-risk worker populations, including women of reproductive age, youth and workers with disabilities.
24. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran, speaking on behalf of the Asia and Pacific group (ASPAG), pointed out that the region faced unique challenges in addressing biological hazards in diverse working environments. Considering the region's vast geographical expanse, varied economic development levels, and distinct cultural contexts, a comprehensive and tailored approach was crucial to ensure effective protection against biological hazards for all workers. Specific attention needed to be given to workers in the informal economy; to capacity building and awareness raising; to regional cooperation and knowledge sharing; to the recognition of cultural and linguistic diversity in the development of guidance and educational materials; to addressing climate change and environmental factors; to ensuring inclusivity and non-discrimination; to promoting public-private partnerships; and to emphasizing sustainable and resilient workplace practices. This could include promotion of the adoption of sustainable and resilient workplace practices that incorporated principles of prevention, risk mitigation, and emergency preparedness.
25. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States, said that North Macedonia, Montenegro, Serbia, Albania, Republic of Moldova, Bosnia and Herzegovina and Norway aligned themselves with the statement. She noted that a new convention, supplemented by a Recommendation, would be a clear added value and provide a comprehensive and forward-looking framework for respecting, promoting and

26. Biological hazards in the workplace were not just a threat to workers' health, but also had significant economic implications. These hazards disrupted businesses and, on a larger scale, impacted the economies of countries. Governments, in collaboration with social partners, could play a crucial role to mitigate these hazards. The COVID-19 pandemic illustrated how crucial OSH was for protecting workers' health, for the functioning of society, and for the continuity of critical economic and social activities. This underlined the importance of supporting and guiding employers to implement preventive and protective measures. This could lead to a healthier workforce, and result in economic benefits.
27. The Government member of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the Cooperation Council for the Arab States of the Gulf (GCC) countries, noted the importance of developing an international labour standard to address all technical aspects of biohazards. It was important for such a standard to take the form of a Recommendation since it needed to be applicable to different contexts. All aspects of work, especially unexpected emergencies such as the COVID-19 pandemic, should be included in the Recommendation. The definition of biological hazards should include a direct link between the hazards, the work environment, and the place of work. The Recommendation should cover all agents and vectors and include mechanisms to address biological hazards, especially in the informal economy or precarious work.
28. The Government member of Cuba noted the need for interaction between the workplace and the community to address the threat of biological hazards. In addition, there was a need for coordinated approaches between authorities responsible for labour, health, and environmental topics. Cuba was taking steps to ensure that all workers could enjoy safety and health protection at work, including through prevention and training of workers and employers. In reference to the proposed Conclusions and in particular point 15 of the text prepared by the Office, she asked for clarification on the obligations that could arise after the adoption of an instrument, in particular reporting obligations under article 22 of the ILO Constitution.
29. The Government member of Switzerland noted that her country had always favoured an integrated standard-setting approach on OSH that would allow the Office to cluster instruments and work more effectively. The Office had no remit for public health protection. It was essential to bolster the existing role of the fundamental Conventions. Switzerland would prefer a Recommendation over a Convention. There were currently 17 Conventions and 8 Protocols addressing safety and health at work, but none of them had achieved a ratification rate of more than 45 per cent, with 11 instruments that had a ratification rate of less than 25 per cent. A specific Recommendation on protection against biological hazards alongside the existing Conventions would promote an integrated approach.
30. The Government member of Norway noted that Norwegian authorities saw the need for better regulation, especially after the COVID-19 pandemic. The text proposed by the Office was in line with Norwegian working environment regulations. Doctors had to report all illnesses that they assumed were due to a patient's working situation, but this system was prone to under-reporting. Norway was currently focusing on education and reporting routines to improve reporting outcomes. Due to the experience of the COVID-19 pandemic, collaboration between public health authorities and occupational health authorities had improved, especially regarding infection control in working life and the population more broadly. The work on a Convention and Recommendation would provide additional impetus for this work.

31. The Government member of Denmark said that her Government supported the statement of the EU and its Member States. She spoke on behalf of the youth population in Denmark. During the COVID-19 pandemic, young people had been at the forefront of jobs that had a high exposure to the virus. Their safety had to be guaranteed through laws, regulations, and workplace culture, in which education and mutual learning played an important role. Employers had to provide access to proper and up-to-date equipment and comply with national laws. Governments had to ensure the availability of safety equipment and education. No one, whether young or not, should fear going to work because of potential exposure to hazardous biological agents.
32. The Government member of Japan noted the need to close the gap in international labour standards to ensure that it covered biological hazards. He emphasized four points. First, it was important to coordinate with other agencies, especially the WHO and the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations. Second, consistency with Conventions Nos 155 and 187 was crucial, and it was therefore important to examine whether it was appropriate to establish a new, additional Convention focused on biological hazards. Third, some Members already had national legal frameworks to protect workers' occupational safety and health on a broad range of issues. It was neither efficient nor realistic to ask them to create new legal frameworks focusing only on biological hazards. Fourth, not all Members faced the same magnitude of risks and damage from all biological hazards included in the wide-ranging definition proposed by the Office. Individual biological hazards should therefore be prioritized.
33. The Government member of the United States of America highlighted the need to strengthen the protection against existing and emerging biological hazards. COVID-19 was just one of many emergencies related to biological hazards that had affected workplaces in recent years, including SARS, H1N1 influenza, Ebola virus disease, and Zika virus disease, among others. The United States placed the highest priority on maintaining and improving strong international labour standards, including the development of new standards upon identification of normative gaps, as in the case of biological hazards. He reaffirmed the support of his government for the recognition of a safe and healthy working environment as a fundamental principle and right at work. The standard on biological hazards would complement existing ILO OSH standards. The United States supported and actively participated in the WHO's efforts to negotiate a pandemic accord. ILO standards on biological hazards would complement a pandemic accord and include a world of work focus. ILO standards were unique because they were negotiated in a tripartite manner. Through the full participation of employers and workers in the process, it was possible to develop biological hazards standards well-tailored to workplaces.
34. The Government member of Canada noted that any new standard should be clear, relevant, inclusive, forward-looking, and implementable by governments. It should also be consistent with other ILO OSH standards and the ILO's fundamental principles and rights at work. Both preventive and protective measures based on a management system approach would be the most effective way to counter and control workplace risks. Workers and employers should jointly play a role in identifying workplace risks and finding the best solutions to prevent and address them.
35. The Government member of Australia expressed his government's commitment to the development of new international labour standards for the protection against biological hazards in the working environment. His government supported the Office's proposal that the new instrument take the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. A new international standard would strengthen existing OSH frameworks and support the United Nations Sustainable Development Goal 8. Australia had a comprehensive workplace health and safety framework that covered all hazards, including biological hazards. However, while it was recognized that national law and practices differed between Member States, it would be important to ensure that the new standards provided a robust framework for preventative and protective measures against biological hazards in the workplace.

36. The Government member of Honduras emphasized the importance of regulatory frameworks, protocols and mechanisms to address biohazards in an increasingly interconnected and dynamic world. The lessons from the COVID-19 pandemic should be extended to other fields of economic activity, allowing coverage for all workers, closing regulatory gaps, and articulating efforts among all actors in society through policies and strategies that promote prevention, protection, and mitigation. Honduras had established a regulatory framework that addressed occupational risks broadly, and involved workers' and employers' organizations and competent authorities that combined the functions of regulation, promotion, and surveillance of OSH regulations. That legislation recognized biological risks and provided parameters of coverage for infectious and parasitic diseases, toxic and physical agents, with compensation based on the degree of impact. It also established prescriptions and guidelines for employers and workers. The adoption of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation should provide Member States with a framework that included prescriptive elements while allowing flexibility for ratification and adaptation in national contexts.
37. The Government member of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland noted that the United Kingdom was in a pre-election period, which meant that she was unable to adopt a position on the form that the proposed instrument should take. However, her government was committed to contributing to the creation of a new standard that would promote international policy coherence, workers' health worldwide, and contribute to containing the spread of infection exposure to biological hazards at work. She requested the Office to clarify which sectors, occupations, and categories of workers referred to in points 35 and 36 of the proposed text. She emphasized the importance of national OSH regulation, which included general and specific duties for employers to ensure health and safety in the workplace, including protection from the risks of exposure to biological hazards.
38. The Government member of Türkiye noted that the COVID-19 pandemic had revealed the legal gaps at the national and international level regarding biological hazards at work. The adoption of an instrument would contribute to better estimation and prevention against biological hazards. Türkiye's Regulation on Prevention of Exposure Risks to the Biological Factors set minimum requirements for the health and safety of workers exposed to biological agents at work. He recognized the need for a similar instrument at the international level. Türkiye would support a Recommendation that provided sufficient flexibility for practical implementation, while promoting Conventions Nos 155 and 187.
39. The Government member of the Democratic Republic of the Congo noted that his government has promoted safe and healthy workplaces through its national legislation and that biological hazards were fully considered in Congolese legislation. While national legislation provided both employers and workers with the most effective guidance on national policies on employment and professional training, the labour code, and list of occupational diseases, his government supported the adoption of international standards on biological hazards in the workplace in the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.
40. The Government member of Islamic Republic of Iran welcomed the development of a new international standard to address biological hazards in the working environment. A strong and comprehensive instrument was crucial to protect the workforce considering Iran's large agricultural, healthcare, and informal economy sectors and the numerous small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) that faced high risks from biological agents. It would be important for the standard to include special measures tailored to the informal economy and mechanisms to ensure adequate pensions to disabled, suspended, or unemployed workers resulting from exposure to occupational hazards. Specific guidance on approaches to manage antimicrobial resistance risks and on emergency preparedness plans at different levels should be considered. The Islamic Republic of Iran was ready to collaborate with all stakeholders to create a robust international instrument that addresses biological hazards in the workplace.

41. The Government member of Indonesia indicated that his government fully supported the ILO's efforts to address issues related to biological hazards in the workplace. Indonesia had adopted its own measures to address the spread of biological hazards, including COVID-19, and stood ready to collaborate with the ILO and other Member States to share knowledge, experience, and best practices related to biological hazards.
42. The Government member of Senegal noted that his country had ratified Conventions Nos 155 and 187, as well as Convention No. 161, which provides for the establishment of occupational health services. In addition, it had also adopted numerous laws and policies to protect the safety and health of workers, including the development of a second National Occupational Safety and Health Programme 2023–2027. Senegal therefore supported the adoption of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.
43. The representative of Women in Informal Employment – Globalizing and Organizing (WIEGO) noted that WIEGO represents millions of workers in informal employment. Waste pickers and other workers in informal employment across many different occupations faced serious risks from biological hazards daily, threatening their health, the health of their families, and their livelihoods. They worked largely without personal protective equipment, faced inadequate access to occupational health and other medical services, lacked broader social protection, and were largely excluded from OSH regulations, laws and policies. There was an obligation for both employers and governments to create working conditions in which those workers could be protected from biological hazards. She called on the ILO to develop a Convention and Recommendation that were inclusive and sensitive to the working lives of the global majority, particularly women and gender minorities, upheld the right for all workers to basic health services, and promoted full participation of workers in informal employment in social dialogue.
44. The representative of the International Commission of Occupational Health (ICOH) noted that ICOH data indicated that each year, biological risks caused 550,000 deaths and related disabilities at work. Those hazards created a massive social and economic burden of some US$548 billion annually. ICOH strongly supported ILO efforts to reduce the burden of biological hazards in the working environment through the adoption of a new international standard.
45. The representative of StreetNet International noted that his international alliance of street and market workers represented over 700,000 informal workers. Street and market vendors worked in precarious conditions subjected to biological hazards daily and were in extreme vulnerable positions. Women represented 70 per cent of informal street and market vendors and that the gender dimension of exposure to biological hazards should not be overlooked. He called for inclusive social dialogue that would include informal street and market workers and supported the adoption of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation that explicitly laid out the responsibilities of state authorities towards self-employed workers in public spaces.
46. The representative of the Institution for Occupational Safety and Health (IOSH) noted that biological hazards affected workers across all sectors and that pregnant women, migrant workers, elderly workers, and people with pre-existing or chronic diseases were particularly vulnerable to specific types of biological hazards. Global knowledge on the impact of biological hazards remained incomplete due to poor healthcare and prevention, lack of trained epidemiologists and lack of trained occupational health professionals, as well as ineffective disease reporting and surveillance. She welcomed public policy efforts to protect workers against biological hazards through mitigation, prevention and control strategies based on robust evidence on the impact of hazardous agents on occupations and industries. The ILO's Technical guidelines on biological hazards in the working environment was an important blueprint for education and biological risk awareness, and offered improved prevention, preparedness, response planning, and increased resilience against biological risk factors. She noted that legal compliance related to biological hazards had not been prioritized in the international OSH policy agenda, and she welcomed the prospect of a new ILO standard on the topic. IOSH was particularly concerned by work-related diseases linked to biological agents affected by climate change and increases in cancers associated with exposure to biological hazards at work. Effective surveillance and a preventative precautionary approach to risks should be supported with advice from occupational safety and health professionals especially for emerging and developing economies that needed to build sufficient competences.

47. The representative from Public Services International (PSI) noted that PSI represented 30 million public service workers in 154 countries. Public service workers were the backbone of societies and risked their lives to ensure that communities could function safely in the face of biological hazards. The recognition of the universal right of all workers to a safe and healthy working environment called for robust comprehensive measures to ensure that no worker was left unprotected. Policies and regulations should not discriminate and should be extended to all workers irrespective of their sector and status. She supported the development of a Convention coupled with a Recommendation that included a clear framework for safeguarding workers against biological hazards, encompassing mandatory safety protocols, access to necessary protective equipment, regular training and support systems the mental and physical health of workers. It was fundamental that trade union rights were protected and upheld to ensure the effective implementation of the Convention.
48. The Employer Vice-Chairperson confirmed the importance of the topic and the need to protect workers, but noted that a few of her group's concerns had also been expressed by governments, such as the binding nature of the instrument, the repetition or duplication of content from existing ILO OSH instruments, and the need for clarity especially with regard to the responsibilities of each actor in the application of the instrument. Also, there should be a clear understanding of the interface between public health and OSH to develop a proper framework to address hazards originating from the workplace versus public health concerns.
49. The Worker Vice-Chairperson highlighted that the fundamental rights outlined in Conventions Nos 155 and 187 did not represent a constraint, but rather a baseline that could be enhanced to protect workers from biological hazards. There was an overlap between population-wide pandemics and work-related biological hazards, and clarification was needed with regard to the WHO's responsibility for public health, and the ILO's for labour and OSH issues. It was critical to ensure that workers were protected, but that risks arising from and impacting the workplace were also addressed through a preventative approach built around respect for workers' rights and cooperation between all social partners at every level, from policy to workplace practice.

Discussion of the amendments to the proposed Conclusions³

A. Form of the instruments

A.6 and A.28

- 50. An amendment proposed by the Government members of Japan, Switzerland and Türkiye (A.6) was withdrawn and an amendment proposed by the Employers' group (A.28) was not adopted as a consequence of the decision reached by the Committee on point 2.
- 51. Point 1 was adopted.

- 52. The Committee had before it two amendments proposing to modify the text to read: "This standard should take the form of a Recommendation". One was submitted by the Employers' group and one by the Government members of Japan, Switzerland and Türkiye.
- 53. The Employer Vice-Chairperson explained that her group would prefer the instrument to take the form of a Recommendation to provide greater flexibility and the possibility to adapt to different national contexts. She also underlined that the proposed instruments did not provide legal certainty in the definitions and scope of application, as most national laws had a more limited approach. Coupled with the inclusion of clauses that repeated the content of other ILO OSH instruments, that would constitute a ratification barrier for many governments, taking into account the low ratification rate of other OSH Conventions.
- 54. The Government member of Switzerland, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Japan and Türkiye, explained that they also had a preference for the instrument to be a Recommendation which would accompany the current fundamental OSH standards, rather than duplicate provisions of existing standards.
- 55. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendments and recalled that the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group had found a regulatory, gap concerning biological hazards. Filling this gap would require binding regulations in the international arena. Moreover, an instrument taking the form of a Convention could mirror a hazard-specific approach as was the case for the Chemicals Convention, 1990 (No. 170). The COVID-19 pandemic had highlighted the need for a binding instrument as there was no directly applicable normative ILO reference for biological hazards, and the fundamental OSH Conventions had not provided constituents with appropriate guidance at that time. Given the high annual mortality of workers due to biological hazards and the risk of a future pandemic, a normative instrument was needed to protect all workers.
- 56. The Government member of Türkiye underlined the overall low ratification rate of existing OSH instruments and the risk of repeating that with a new Convention on biological hazards.

³ The proposed Conclusions are included in pages 99–107 of ILC.112/Report IV\(2\). All amendments by point can be found on the Committee's web page.

57. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, did not support the amendments, noting that it would be important to adopt a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation due to the necessity of having a specific instrument dealing with biological hazards, especially in the devastating aftermath of COVID-19. An instrument could protect the health of workers and support business continuity, regardless of whether it was ratified or not.
58. The Government member of Japan was also in favour of having an instrument in the form of a Recommendation, as he shared the concerns concerning the possible low ratification rate.
59. The Government member of Chile did not support the amendments, as he was in favour of an instrument in the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation, noting that the low ratification rate of other OSH Conventions did not predict that it would be the case for a new Convention.
60. The Government member of Colombia expressed support for Chile's position and emphasized the importance of having a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. The Government members of Brazil, Honduras, Kenya, Zimbabwe, Senegal, Namibia, Zambia, South Africa, Australia and Norway also preferred that the instrument take the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.
61. The Government member of Qatar called for the adoption of a Recommendation, given the technical and precise nature of the proposed text. The Government members of Morocco and Indonesia also supported an instrument in the form of a Recommendation.
62. The Government member of the United States supported a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation, noting that it was impossible to predict ratification rates. As OSH standards had gained more attention, the hope was that a new Convention on biological hazards could bring attention to that serious issue.
63. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed that a legislative gap on biological hazards existed, but that did not mean that a Convention was needed. In recent standard-setting activities, such as for apprenticeships, where a normative gap had also been identified, a Recommendation had been sufficient. Regarding Convention No. 170, replicating the process and content from chemicals to biologicals would not necessarily be useful. The COVID-19 pandemic had been a public health issue and it was important to differentiate between public health and OSH hazards. Conventions were only binding when they were ratified, and that the greatest protection would be provided by adopting an instrument in the appropriate form.
64. In response, the Worker Vice-Chairperson clarified that he had not suggested copying the content of Convention No. 170, but having a similar approach in adopting a Convention on specific hazards. Conventions did not need to be ratified to influence national legislation; they created an international standard. Recommendations, on the other hand, did not fill a normative gap but merely provided guidance.
65. The Government member of Japan said that if a Convention was discussed it should be based on consensus to increase its potential of being implemented by many countries.
66. The Employer Vice-Chairperson emphasized the need for a consensus-based approach. Noting the lack of consensus on the type of instrument, she proposed to discuss the content and postpone the decision on the form of the instrument. The Government members of Switzerland and Mali, agreed with the proposal.
67. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that there was a majority of governments in favour of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation and that the discussion had allowed constituents to better understand concerns. He did not agree to postpone the decision on the nature of the instrument as the language would be different depending on whether the text was for a Convention or a Recommendation.

68. The Government member of the United States agreed that a majority of governments preferred the Office text and expressed concern about not being able to reach an agreement. He proposed to commit to reach a consensus on the nature of the instruments.
69. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, agreed with the Government member of the United States on the importance of taking a consensual decision on the form of the instrument. Since a Convention would create obligations for Member States, the decision should be made before discussing the text in order to ensure that the language would be adapted to the type of instrument.
70. The Government members of Brazil, Norway, Chile and the Islamic Republic of Iran supported the point made by the Government member of Belgium.
71. The Government member of Japan remarked that the objective should be to reach a consensus and not have a vote resulting in a majority versus a minority. In that spirit, he withdrew the amendment (A.7) submitted with the Government members of Switzerland and Türkiye.
72. When resuming the discussion at the next sitting, the Employer Vice-Chairperson said that her group would not withdraw its amendment because they believed that a Convention would be overly prescriptive and its application could be problematic in practice, particularly taking into account that most employers concerned were small and medium-sized enterprises. A Convention had to be ratifiable in order for it to be a useful and beneficial instrument. Nonetheless, her group wished to seek a consensus-based solution on this point.
73. The Chairperson asked if there were any objections to deciding that the amendment was not adopted.
74. The Government member of the Philippines proposed to hold a vote to take the decision, but the motion was not seconded.
75. The Employer Vice-Chairperson reiterated that her group had thought that consensus could be reached on that important issue and her group would not call for a vote as not all avenues of dialogue had been exhausted.
76. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, recognizing that the majority of Committee members did not support the amendment, indicated that his group supported the Chairperson's proposal to announce that the Committee did not adopt the amendment.
77. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of other group of Latin American and Caribbean countries (GRULAC), and Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, also supported deciding that the amendment was not adopted.
78. The amendment was not adopted.
79. Point 2 was adopted without amendment.

B. Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention

A.30

80. An amendment proposed by the Employers' group fell as a consequence of the decision reached by the Committee on point 2.

81. The title of Part B was adopted without amendment.

Preamble

Point 3, introductory sentence

A.31

82. An amendment proposed by the Employers' group fell as a consequence of the decision reached by the Committee on point 2.
83. The introductory sentence of point 3 was adopted without amendment.

New clause before point 3(a)

A.20

84. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert, before point 3(a), a new clause reading "Recalling the constitutional solemn obligation of the International Labour Organization to further among the nations of the world programmes which will achieve adequate protection for the life and health of workers in all occupations". He explained that the wording was drawn from Article III(g) of the Declaration of Philadelphia (1944) and also related to the status of a safe and healthy working environment as a fundamental principle and right at work.
85. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment as it was not specifically related to the issue of biological hazards.
86. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, the Philippines and Indonesia supported the amendment.
87. The amendment was adopted and the new clause before (a) was adopted.

Point 3(a)

88. Clause (a) of point 3 was adopted.

Point 3(b)

A.8

89. The Government member of Switzerland, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Japan and Türkiye, introduced an amendment to delete the word "comprehensive" before "legal framework". Challenges and responses regarding biological hazards differed greatly between countries and a "comprehensive" legal framework would consequently be too broad in scope.
90. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
91. The Government member of the Philippines did not support the amendment as he considered that a focus solely on a legal framework would be too limiting.
92. The amendment was adopted.

93. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete the words “for the respect, promotion and realization of the right to a safe and healthy working environment” after “legal framework”. That modification should be considered in conjunction with other amendments proposed by her group. A distinction needed to be drawn between biological hazards that arose from the workplace activity and those that arose from the external environment. Furthermore, the reference to the right to a safe and healthy working environment was not fully consistent with the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work (1998), as amended in 2022 (1998 Declaration) and clause (a) already referred to it, so there was no need to repeat it in clause (b).
94. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. The purpose of the Preamble was to provide the context for the substantive content of the instrument that would follow, and it was therefore important to recall the 1998 Declaration.
95. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Philippines and South Africa did not support the amendment.
96. In response to a request from the Employer Vice-Chairperson for an explanation of the origin of the language in the Office text, a member of the Secretariat read out paragraph 2 of the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work.
97. The amendment was withdrawn.

98. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, noting the importance of distinguishing between exposures that arose from work activities and those from public health emergencies, introduced an amendment to replace “including provisions for preparedness and response arrangements for the effective management of emergencies related to biological hazards in” with “arising from work activities, as well as those causing public health emergencies affecting”.
99. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment, specifically the deletion of preparedness arrangements which were critical for protecting workers from biological hazards. He noted that “arising from” was not sufficient as biological hazards that originated from outside of the workplace could also affect the working environment.
100. The Government member of the United States did not support the insertion of “arising from work activities as well as those causing public health emergencies” in clause (b). It narrowed the scope since some biological hazards did not arise from work activities and did not necessarily become public health emergencies, but nonetheless arose from the working environment.
101. The Employer Vice-Chairperson specified that the proposal was not to completely eliminate the text “including provisions for preparedness and response arrangements for the effective management of emergencies related to biological hazards in” from the conclusions, but to move it to point 3 as proposed in another amendment submitted by her group (A.35). The proposal was to insert a new clause after clause (b) that read as follows: “recognizing the need for public authorities to develop provisions for preparedness and response arrangements for the effective management of public health emergencies related to biological hazards affecting the working environment, taking new and emerging hazards and risks into account,”.

- 102. The Worker Vice-Chairperson questioned whether it was appropriate to include the clause in the Preamble and suggested that it might be better suited in the part dealing with duties and responsibilities of social partners.

- 103. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to delete “including provisions for preparedness and response arrangements for the effective management of emergencies related to biological hazards in the working environment” and insert, at the end of the clause, “as well as the need to develop arrangements to deal with accidents, incidents and emergencies related to biological hazards in the working environment”. The aim was to emphasize the importance of the “working environment,” as pandemics or epidemics, despite being public health issues, could become emergencies in the working environment.
- 104. The Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed support for the amendment with the exception to retain measures on preparedness and response, and proposed to subamend the text to read: “(b) considering the objective to provide a legal framework for the respect, promotion and realization of the right to a safe and healthy working environment concerning biological hazards, including provisions for preparedness and response arrangements, taking into account new and emerging hazards and risks, as well as the need to develop arrangements to deal with accidents, incidents and emergencies related to biological hazards in the working environment”. This combined the need for preparedness while addressing the concerns raised by the EU and its Member States.
- 105. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that her group could support the amendment if the amendment they had submitted could also be accepted. She proposed a subamendment to add the words “arising from work activities” before “taking into account new and emerging hazards and risks”.
- 106. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment and noted that biological hazards did not only arise from work activities, citing the example of a pandemic.
- 107. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government members of Bangladesh and Brazil did not support the subamendment.
- 108. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stated the need to draw a distinction between biological hazards that arose from within the workplace and hazards that originated outside of work-related activities. It was important to differentiate between those two separate situations and the responsibilities that differed accordingly. If hazards arose from within the workplace, OSH measures would apply. However, for a hazard originating outside the workplace, public health measures should be applied. Enterprises should not be expected to control events such as pandemics.
- 109. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that employers had responsibilities for biological hazards present at the workplace, even if they did not arise from work activities, notably to minimize hazards in the workplace and to protect workers from exposure to such hazards.
- 110. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, did not support the subamendment and proposed another subamendment to add the words “as well as the need to develop preparedness arrangements to deal with accidents, incidents and emergencies related to biological hazards in the working environment” at the end of the sentence. She highlighted the need for preparedness arrangements to mitigate new and emerging biological hazards, both those inside and outside of the working environment.

- 111. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the new subamendment.
- 112. The Government member of Algeria noted some confusion regarding the responsibilities of employers and public health authorities and asked the Office to propose text that clarified the distinction.
- 113. The Government member of Switzerland, seconded by the Government members of Japan and Türkiye, proposed a new subamendment to replace the words “arising from the workplace” with “when the risk in the workplace is higher than in the general population” after “working environment concerning biological hazards”, acknowledging the important differences in risk between the general population and the working population.
- 114. The Employer Vice-Chairperson reiterated that her group could accept the amendment if there was a clear legal framework setting out responsibilities as noted by the Government member of Algeria. She proposed adding the words “and/or arising from work activities” instead of “when the risk is higher.”
- 115. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed to delete the words “in the working environment and/or arising from work activities” as well as the words “in the working environment” at the end of the point.
- 116. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed with the proposal of the EU Member States under condition that the words “in the working environment and/or arising from work activities” be reintroduced as part of a new point after the Point 12 of the proposed text.
- 117. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, proposed to retain the original text since the proposed amendments distorted its meaning.
- 118. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported GRULAC’s proposal and agreed to consider the proposal by the Employers’ group to insert the words “in the working environment and/or arising from work activities” in a new proposed point after Point 12.
- 119. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed with GRULAC’s proposal and to propose the insertion of a new point after point 12 that recognized the need for public authorities to develop provisions for preparedness and response arrangements for the effective management of public health emergencies related to biological hazards.
- 120. As the Committee did not have time to resume the discussion of point 3(b), all related amendments and subamendments fell and the original text was retained in the final Conclusions as point 3(c) in italics and brackets. Similarly, as the Committee could not consider clauses (c) to (g) of the proposed Conclusions submitted to the Conference, they were included in the final Conclusions as originally drafted in italics and brackets.⁴

Title of section 1

- 121. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew two amendments (A.40 and A.49) and the title of section 1 – Definition and scope – was adopted.

Point 4

- 122. An amendment submitted by the Employers’ group (A.41) fell as a consequence of the decision reached by the Committee on point 2.

⁴ See para. 1124 below for an explanation concerning the parts of the text that were not examined by the Committee.

123. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add “hazards posed by biological agent, which are” before the words “any microorganisms”. The text addressed biological hazards but when referring to microorganisms, cells and the like, it was technically more accurate to refer to biological agents.
124. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that the Convention should apply to the full spectrum of biological hazards, not just biological agents. He suggested that the words “the hazards associated with biological substances and agents and includes but is not limited to” be added to the text after “refers to”. The reference to “substances and agents” came from Articles 5 and 16 of Convention No. 155, which represented the official ILO definition of biological hazards. Examples of substances that were not necessarily biological agents included tobacco plants that caused green tobacco sickness, stinging nettles and poison ivy, cotton causing cotton workers’ lung, flour dust and other plant dust that caused respiratory illnesses, aggravated asthma, and resulted in dermatitis. In addition, the ILO’s list of occupational diseases included diseases caused by both biological agents and biological substances. He requested advice from the Office on whether an attack by a wild or a domestic animal would be covered by a definition of biological agents that referred to “substances and agents”. For example, agricultural workers and construction workers were often exposed to snake bites.
125. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that Article 12 of Convention No. 155 referred to biological agents but not to biological substances. It was therefore appropriate to refer to biological agents, which was the term commonly used in occupational safety and health. Biological agents did not include any type of harm caused by living agents but referred to harm caused by an infection, a toxic effect or an allergic effect. The Employers’ group could not accept an overly broad definition of biological hazards and preferred the text that referred to biological hazards caused by biological agents.
126. The Government member of the Democratic Republic of the Congo agreed with the Employer Vice-Chairperson that the definition of biological hazards should be limited to diseases caused directly by microorganisms and by the vectors of diseases in the working environment, such as diseases transmitted directly from animals to humans. This would exclude snake bites.
127. A representative of the Secretariat explained that when preparing the text, the Office had retained the broad definition of biological hazards based on the Technical guidelines on biological hazards in the working environment adopted by the Governing Body in November 2022 following the meeting of experts, and taking into account replies to the questionnaire. The aim was to afford the broadest and most comprehensive protection possible to workers against biological hazards. The proposed definition was therefore broader than that commonly found in the legislation of some countries. It encompassed a wide range of potential risks associated with exposure to biological hazards in the working environment and was not limited to the risks caused by biological agents. The Office text aimed for a more inclusive approach, covering all biological hazards and associated risks, but the definition did not cover attacks by wild animals, but only the impact of animals as vectors of disease, such as mosquitos.
128. The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that Articles 5 and 16 of Convention No. 155 referred to both biological substances and agents.
129. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, expressed support for the amendments introduced by both the Employers’ group and the Workers’ group but suggested to subamend the text proposed by the Workers’ group so that the beginning of point 4 would read: “For the purposes of this Convention, the term biological hazards refers to hazards associated with biological substances and agents, included but not limited to...”.

130. The Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, did not support the subamendment proposed by GRULAC, and noted that her group favoured the Office text, which was broad and inclusive.
131. The Government member of China did not support the subamendment and noted that the definition of “biological hazards” was too broad and would hinder implementation at national level. The definition should be aligned with the guidelines contained in Conventions Nos 155 and 187.
132. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Switzerland and Kenya supported the subamendment because it made the definition more precise and therefore easier to implement.
133. The Employer Vice-Chairperson reiterated that her group did not support the subamendment because it made the definition of biological hazards too broad and open-ended. It also included a reference to biological substances, which her group opposed. However, her group could accept the text if it was consistent with Convention No. 155.
134. The Government member of Bangladesh did not support the subamendment because it resulted in an overly broad definition of biological hazards. He proposed a further subamendment that was not seconded and therefore fell.
135. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States did not support the subamendment, and noted that the definition should be broad and exclude reference to biological agents.
136. The Government member of Japan did not support the subamendment and agreed with the Government members of China and Bangladesh that the definition was too broad and without clear boundaries. It was important to ensure that definitions in Conventions were specific and clear.
137. The subamendment and the amendment were withdrawn.

138. The Committee considered together four amendments to point 4 proposed by the EU Member States.
139. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, explained that their proposed amendments intended to draw a distinction between the biological agents that could cause harm and how people were exposed to those hazards. The latter issue would be dealt with under point 5 (A.71 and A.72). A risk assessment was called for to understand workers’ exposure to hazards in various ways, such as by working with animals or humans, being in contact with bodily fluids or with biological vectors or transmitters.
140. The Government member of Switzerland said that two issues were under consideration: an umbrella definition of biological hazards and a list of examples of such hazards. She suggested to discuss the list first, which would help to clarify the umbrella definition.
141. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported the four amendments.

- 142. The Worker Vice-Chairperson indicated his preference to retain the original text in points 4 and 5, which came from the ILO's Technical guidelines on biological hazards in the working environment. The Government member of Brazil also did not support the amendments.
- 143. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, indicated support for the original text and preference for examining each amendment individually.
- 144. The Employer Vice-Chairperson indicated that if the amendments by the EU Member States were adopted her group would withdraw its amendments to point 4 and consider supporting other amendments such as the one proposed by the Government member of Japan (A.70).
- 145. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, indicated that they could accept the new formulation of point 4 and so did the Employer Vice-Chairperson.

A.71 and A.72

- 146. The Committee had before it two amendments proposed by the EU Member States to modify the text of point 5 to read: "Biological hazards and risks in the working environment include exposure inter alia to organic materials of plant, animal or human origin, bodily fluids and biological vectors or transmitters of disease."
- 147. The Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed with the insertion of "exposure inter alia to organic materials of plant, animal or human origin, bodily fluids and" (A.72), but not with inserting the words "and risks" (A.71), and so did the Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government member of Brazil.
- 148. The Government member of Switzerland said that adding "exposure inter alia to organic materials of plant, animal or human origin, bodily fluids and" would not make sense if adding "and risks" was not retained.
- 149. The Worker Vice-Chairperson explained that the interpretation of "risks" would need to be addressed in the Drafting Committee, particularly since the term appeared throughout the document. He was supported by the Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, as well as by the Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran, who added that risks were the result of existing hazards and were defined by likelihood and severity, thus they should not be referred to in this context.
- 150. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, suggested to consider the amendments to points 4 and 5 together. The Government member of Chile considered that most members of the Committee seemed to be in favour of that.
- 151. The Government member of Japan did not agree and the Employer Vice-Chairperson asked to look at each amendment to point 4 individually. On point 5, her group supported the insertion of "and risks".
- 152. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, agreed to address each amendment under point 4 individually and indicated that he would support adopting both amendments to point 5.
- 153. The Government member of Brazil did not support inserting "and risks" due to the absence of a definition of "risk" in the Conclusions, which could generate issues of legal interpretation.

- 154. The Government member of Honduras supported the insertion of those words, as the definition of “risks” was sufficiently broad to be incorporated into national legislation.
- 155. The Government member of the United States noted that, while there was an important debate on the inclusion of “risks” to be conducted, that was not the priority. There seemed to be consensus on the four amendments proposed by the EU Members States for point 4, and on amendment 72 for point 5. Agreeing with the Worker Vice-Chairperson, he suggested to use the text of point 4 as so amended as a basis to go through the other amendments proposed on point 4, as well as to adopt point 5 with the addition of “exposure inter alia to organic materials of plant, animal or human origin, bodily fluids and”. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, reiterated that the discussion was on a package of amendments.
- 156. The Chairperson asked for confirmation on consensus for adopting those amendments to points 4 and 5 and then proceeding with the consideration of other amendments individually.
- 157. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Switzerland, Zimbabwe on behalf of the Africa group and Chile on behalf of GRULAC confirmed that there was consensus.
- 158. The Employer Vice-Chairperson replied that her group supported adopting the amendments to point 4 as subamended, but would prefer to continue discussing point 5 to better frame the definition.
- 159. Amendments A.60, A.61, A.62 and A.63 were adopted, with the following text for point 4:
- For the purpose of the Convention the term “biological hazards” refers to any microorganisms, cells or cell cultures, including those which have been genetically modified, which can cause harm to human health, such as bacteria, viruses, parasites, fungi, prions, DNA and RNA materials, and any other microorganisms and their associated allergens.
- 160. Amendment A.72 was adopted, with the following text for point 5:
- Biological hazards in the working environment include exposure inter alia to organic materials of plant, animal or human origin, bodily fluids and biological vectors or transmitters of disease.
- 161. Two amendments (A.14 and A.45) fell.
- 162. The Employer Vice-Chairperson repeated that while they supported the adoption of amendments to point 4, they did not support A.72 as they considered that the language could be further improved from a technical point of view. When resuming the discussion on amendment A.71 at a later sitting, she proposed a subamendment to insert “associated with biological hazards” after “risks”.
- 163. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, did not support the amendment or the subamendment.
- 164. The subamendment was not adopted and the amendment was withdrawn. Another amendment (A.23) was withdrawn.

Consideration of other amendments to point 4

- 165. An amendment (A.18) was withdrawn.

A.19

- 166. The Government member of the United States, seconded by the Government member of the United Kingdom, introduced an amendment to delete “which can cause harm to human health” after “which have been genetically modified” and before “such as bacteria,” and to add “in the working environment that are causing or are likely to cause a significant risk of material harm to human health” at the end of the sentence. He subamended the proposed new text to read: “in the working environment that, based on a risk assessment, are causing or are likely to cause material harm to human health.” The subamendment introduced a practical element which would allow workplaces to classify and control hazards based on their risk level.

- 167. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Worker Vice-Chairperson, and the Government members of Cuba, Zimbabwe, and Chile speaking on behalf of GRULAC, did not support the amendment or the subamendment.
- 168. The Government member of Japan supported the amendments as subamended, noting that it would be important to determine risk levels for different types of biological hazards in the workplace.
- 169. The subamendment and the amendment were withdrawn.
- 170. Three amendments (A.43, A.44 and A.56) were withdrawn.

A.65

- 171. The Government member of Switzerland, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Japan and Türkiye, introduced an amendment to replace “microorganisms, cells, or other organic materials” with “cellular or non-cellular biological substances”, and to insert “cell cultures” before “bodily fluids,” to be consistent with the WHO Laboratory Biosafety Manual.
- 172. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Worker Vice-Chairperson, and the Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the African group, did not agree with the proposed amendment.
- 173. This amendment was withdrawn.

A.66

- 174. The Government member of Switzerland, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Japan and Türkiye, introduced an amendment to delete “including those which have been genetically modified,”, to be consistent with the WHO Laboratory Biosafety Manual. He proposed a subamendment to replace “including those which have been” with “either naturally occurring or” and keep “genetically modified,”.
- 175. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Employer Vice-Chairperson, and the Government members of Ghana and Zimbabwe did not support the amendment or the subamendment.
- 176. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran supported the amendments as subamended as it corresponded to the WHO Laboratory Biosafety Manual.
- 177. The amendment was withdrawn.
- 178. Two other amendments (A.67 and A.68) were withdrawn.

A.69

- 179. The Government member of Switzerland, speaking on also on behalf of Japan and Türkiye, proposed an amendment to delete “and their associated allergens and toxins” at the end of the text, noting that the mechanism of action was more similar to chemical substances than to biological ones.

- 180. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support this amendment, citing the ILO Chemicals Convention, 1990 (No. 170), which explicitly excluded organisms, indicating a gap in coverage.
- 181. The Government member of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries; the Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC; the Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group; and the Government member of Brazil also did not support the amendment.
- 182. The amendment was withdrawn.

- 183. The Government member of Japan, speaking also on behalf of Switzerland and Türkiye, introduced an amendment to add at the end of the point: "Given the wide range of the definition, approach to each hazard should be optimized based on risk assessment by each Member that includes the characteristics and degree of concern of the biological hazards." He explained that the addition of that text would be important to compensate for the withdrawal of another amendment (A.19) that had sought to take into account the issue of risk assessment.
- 184. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that the amendment did not affect the agreement that had been reached on the rest of the text of point 4 and therefore it should be discussed.
- 185. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment, noting that point 4 related only to the definition and the approach for risk assessment could be dealt with in other parts of the Convention. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government member of South Africa, also did not support the amendment.
- 186. The Government member of the United States supported the amendment, noting that the concept of harm and probability should be included in the definition. Seconded by the Government member of Japan, he proposed a subamendment to put the text in a new point to differentiate the concept of risk assessment from the definition.
- 187. The Government members of the Dominican Republic, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Switzerland and Türkiye supported the proposal to put the text of the amendment in a new point.
- 188. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed to park the discussion of the proposed new point, noting that while the issue of risk assessment was significant, it would be more appropriate to discuss it in the section on risk management. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the proposal to discuss the possible new point when considering another section.
- 189. The Government member of the United States noted the broad support for the inclusion of a new point and agreed to park the discussion in the hope that consensus would be reached when resuming the consideration of the text.
- 190. The Government member of Japan aligned with the statement of the Government member of the United States and pointed out that there were several sections of the Convention concerning governments' responsibilities where it could be relevant to consider adding the concept of risk assessment.
- 191. The Committee agreed to resume at a later sitting the discussion of a possible new point with the following text:

Given the wide range of the definition, approach to each hazard should be optimized based on risk assessment by each Member that includes the characteristics and degree of concern of the biological substance.

192. Point 4 was adopted, as amended.

Consideration of other amendments to point 5

193. Two amendments (A. 45 and A.14) fell.

A.71

- 194. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to insert “and risks” after “Biological hazards”.
- 195. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment and proposed a subamendment to add “associated with biological hazards” after “risks”.
- 196. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, did not support the amendment or the subamendment.
- 197. The subamendment was not adopted and the amendment was withdrawn. Another amendment (A.23) was withdrawn.
- 198. Point 5 was adopted as amended.

Point 6

A.17

- 199. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to insert “can” after “environment” and delete “communicable and non-communicable”. The intention was to clarify that harm to human health was not limited to injuries and diseases and the instrument would cover other adverse health effects that did not constitute a disease or an injury. The reference to “communicable and non-communicable” diseases pertained more to pandemics than to the workplace. She proposed a subamendment to include “other adverse health effects” after the “diseases” to make it clear that the harm to human health was not limited to injuries and diseases.
- 200. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 201. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, proposed a subamendment to replace the word “can” with “among others”.
- 202. The Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed in principle, but suggested to use the words “not limited to” instead of “among others” in order to make sure that the text include implicitly “other adverse health effect” as was proposed in one of his group’s amendments (A. 24).
- 203. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that her group could not support the addition of the words “can”, “among others” or “not limited to” since that made the text too broad and open-ended and language in Conventions needed to be precise.
- 204. The Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, did not support the proposed subamendments because the word “includes” already made it clear that the list was not exhaustive.

- 205. The Government member of China did not support the inclusion of “can” and suggested considering the insertion of “mostly” before “includes”. That would make it clear that the harm to human health caused by biological agents was not limited to diseases and injuries.
- 206. The Government member of the United States supported the inclusion of the words “not limited to”.
- 207. When resuming the discussion at a later sitting, the Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries and the United Kingdom expressed their preference for the original text and the amendment was withdrawn.

- 208. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert “other adverse health effects” between “diseases” and “and injuries”. He introduced a subamendment to delete “communicable and non-communicable” before “diseases” to make the text clear and comprehensive.
- 209. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment because it went beyond definitions contained in national legislation within the EU Member States and other regions.
- 210. In response to a request from the Government member of Japan to clarify the meaning of “adverse health effects”, the Worker Vice-Chairperson explained that adverse health effects included chronic conditions that might not appear immediately, but as a consequence of the cumulative effect of a biological hazard, such as asthma, hepatitis or various forms of cancer. Those were serious conditions that did not manifest themselves as injuries or diseases when initially assessed.
- 211. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported the amendment as subamended.
- 212. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran requested the Secretariat to clarify why the term “communicable and non-communicable diseases” had been included in the text.
- 213. A representative of the Secretariat clarified that the reference to “communicable and non-communicable diseases” had been included in the questionnaire that had sent out by the Office as part of the first report prepared for the standard-setting discussion. He read the definition of “health” from Article 3(e) of Convention No. 155, in case it could be of assistance for the debate: “[T]he term health, in relation to work, indicates not merely the absence of disease or infirmity; it also includes the physical and mental elements affecting health which are directly related to safety and hygiene at work.”
- 214. The Employer Vice Chairperson proposed a subamendment to keep “communicable and non-communicable before “diseases” and to replace “other adverse health effects” with “and other directly caused adverse health effects”.
- 215. The Government member of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, supported the subamendment proposed by the Employers’ group.
- 216. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Zambia did not support it.

- 217. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Japan said that “communicable and non-communicable” should be deleted. The Government member of Japan asked for clarifications on the rationale of only focusing on directly caused adverse effects.
- 218. The Employer Vice-Chairperson explained that “directly caused adverse health effects” had to be understood as those caused directly by biological agents, as opposed to other situations not caused by biological agents.
- 219. When resuming the discussion at a later sitting, the Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that his group could agree to revert to the original text and asked the Office to take the discussion into account when preparing the report for the second discussion.
- 220. The amendment was withdrawn.

- 221. The Government member of Switzerland, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Japan and Türkiye, introduced an amendment to replace “communicable and non-communicable diseases and injuries” with the “the potential to cause infection, allergy, toxicity or otherwise create a hazard to humans.” The definition of harm to human health should be based on whether the exposure to a biological hazard had the potential to cause an infection and not on whether it was capable of causing a disease. That distinction was important as there were diseases that never manifested themselves after exposure and infection occurred at work.
- 222. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment but introduced a subamendment to add “caused by exposure to biological hazards” at the end.
- 223. The Worker Vice-Chairperson indicated that his group could not support the amendment or the subamendment as the scope of the proposed text was narrower than that proposed in its amendment to insert “other adverse health effects”.
- 224. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, did not support the amendment. It was not appropriate to include a reference to the potential to suffer harm in the text. Harm should only include injuries, diseases and other adverse health effects that resulted from contact with microorganisms or hazards. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, also did not support the amendment. Deleting the reference to “communicable and non/communicable” diseases would mean that not all types of diseases would be covered.
- 225. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced another subamendment to delete “the potential to cause” to enable the text to cover all the possible situations that could arise and the most common forms of harm.
- 226. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Brazil and Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, did not support the amendment or the subamendments.
- 227. The subamendments were not adopted and the amendment was withdrawn.

- 228. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete “and injuries”, since that was a broad term, and it was preferable to refer only to diseases.

- 229. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Zimbabwe speaking on behalf of the Africa group and Saudi Arabia speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, did not support the amendment. The Government member of Kenya also did not support the amendment, indicating that injuries could be at the cellular level.
- 230. The Government member of Japan said that the word “injuries” might be interpreted too broadly, including the case of an agricultural worker getting bitten by a snake, and preferred more limited wording.
- 231. The Employer Vice-Chairperson explained that the term “injuries” was not sufficiently specific and therefore proposed a subamendment to add “related to exposure to a biological hazard” after “and injuries”.
- 232. A representative of the Secretariat clarified that the ILO code of practice on recording and notification of occupational accidents and diseases, 1996, defined occupational injury as death, any personal injury or disease resulting from an occupational accident. Examples included a medical professional contracting HIV from an open needle or an agricultural worker contracting tetanus from a contaminated cutting device.
- 233. The Government member of Japan commented that the examples provided by the Secretariat were covered under the term diseases, therefore the mention of injuries was redundant.
- 234. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that based on the explanation by the Office it was clear that an injury was related to an accident. If you cut yourself with a knife, that was an injury. If the result was tetanus, that was a biological hazard. She added that the subamendment accounted for both by mentioning injuries caused by a biological agent.
- 235. The Government member of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, supported the subamendment.
- 236. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that a farm worker trying to get an animal into a closed space and getting injured by the animal, or a hotel worker exposed to hotel bugs that caused injuries but not diseases would be examples of biological hazards. He did not support the subamendment because there was a need for a comprehensive definition.
- 237. The Government members of the United States, Ghana, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States did not support the subamendment.
- 238. The subamendment and the amendment were withdrawn.

- 239. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert “, allergies and toxic effects” after “and non-communicable diseases”. That would maintain consistency with the definition, which mentioned allergens and toxic effects. She also suggested a subamendment to keep “and injuries”, consistent with the discussion on the previous amendment (A.46).
- 240. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Ghana, Cote d’Ivoire and Morocco did not support the subamendment or the amendment.
- 241. The subamendment and the amendment were withdrawn and point 6 was adopted with no amendment.

New point after point 6

- 242. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to insert a new point as follows: “Biological hazards may arise from work-related activities or from the spread of biological agents due to an outbreak, epidemic or pandemic situation.” to make a distinction between the two different sources of biological hazards.
- 243. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that the amendment should be discussed only after all amendments to point 6 would have been considered. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, agreed.
- 244. The Government member of Chile did not support the amendment.
- 245. When resuming the discussion at a later sitting, the amendment was withdrawn.

Point 7

- 246. An amendment (A.50) fell as a consequence of the decision reached by the Committee on point 2.

A.51

- 247. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to add the word “the” before “workers in all branches,” and insert the word “covered” after “economic activity,” in order to align with the language of Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of Convention No. 155.
- 248. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment because it could potentially exclude many workers from the right to a safe and healthy working environment.
- 249. The Government members of Zimbabwe, Chile, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Australia and Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, did not support the amendment.
- 250. The amendment was withdrawn.

- 251. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to insert “regardless of their employment status,” after “apply to all workers”, citing the importance of extending protection to all workers including those in the informal economy.
- 252. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment, noting that it was inconsistent with Article 3(b) of Convention No. 155, which specified that “workers” covered all employed persons. Self-employed workers had different mechanisms in place at national level to access safety and health protection.
- 253. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, did not support the amendment.
- 254. The amendment was withdrawn.

- 255. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to insert “sectors and” before “branches of economic activity,” to ensure that the instruments would apply to workers in the public sector.
- 256. A representative of the Secretariat confirmed that the term “branches of economic activity” defined in Article 3(a) of Convention No. 155 specified that workers in the public service were covered.
- 257. The amendment was withdrawn.

A.52

- 258. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to add “when exposure to biological hazards occurs,” at the end of the sentence, noting the importance of precision regarding when the Convention should apply.
- 259. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment.
- 260. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudia Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, the United States and Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, did not support the amendment.
- 261. The amendment was withdrawn.

- 262. The Government member of Brazil introduced an amendment to add at the end of the point the words “as a standard and minimum level of protection.” He explained that some branches of economic activity might require standards that went beyond the minimum standards specified in the Convention, and that possibility needed to be made explicit.
- 263. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment.
- 264. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 265. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, agreed with the reasoning given by the Government member of Brazil which was reflected in European legislation. She proposed a subamendment to replace the text to be added by “and lays down particular minimum provisions in this area”.
- 266. The Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, did not support the amendment or the subamendment, as it was clear that both Conventions and national legislation established minimum standards.
- 267. In response to a request for clarification by the Worker Vice-Chairperson, a member of the Secretariat cited article 19(8) of the ILO Constitution which stated that ILO Conventions or Recommendations did not affect any (national) law, award, custom or agreement which ensured more favourable conditions to the workers concerned. Nothing therefore prevented a sovereign State from adopting in its legislation higher standards than those provided in an ILO instrument.
- 268. The subamendment and the amendment were withdrawn.

- 269. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add at the end of the point the words “and provide a legal framework for the respect, promotion and realization of the right to a safe and healthy working environment in respect of biological hazards”. Those words were especially important to the Workers’ group.
- 270. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment as that phrase had already been included in the Preamble and did not need to be repeated. She preferred the Office text which was aligned with Convention No. 155.
- 271. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States and the United Kingdom, did not support the amendment.
- 272. When resuming the discussion at a later sitting, the amendment was withdrawn and point 7 was adopted without amendment.

- 273. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete point 8 of the proposed Conclusions in its entirety to avoid any possible exclusion of workers from the protection. As a fundamental principle and right at work, the right to a safe and healthy working environment was applicable to all workers without exception, just as the other four fundamental principles and rights at work. He questioned the basis upon which certain groups of workers could legitimately be excluded from that right.
- 274. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. Point 8 was based on Convention No. 155, which did not intend to limit workers’ right to safety and health but rather allowed a necessary degree of adaptability for certain sectors under specified conditions. Moreover, noting the number of conditions to be met for a reason to be considered as valid, the provision would in no way allow governments to decide on any unjustified exclusion.
- 275. The Government member of Brazil supported the amendment.
- 276. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, understood the workers’ point of view but also recognized the difficulties that employers and governments might encounter when seeking to provide full protection to every worker in every sector. Point 8 stipulated specific conditions for exclusions, namely prior consultation with employers’ and workers’ organizations, an assessment of the biological hazards involved and the application of preventive and protective measures. In addition, point 9 required Member States to inform the Office about the measures they had taken. In the spirit of the ILO and the fundamental principles and rights at work, Member States were obliged to make efforts to apply the provisions of the fundamental Conventions to the maximum extent possible. For those reasons, the EU and its Member States did not support the amendment.
- 277. In response to a request from the Government member of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, a representative of the Secretariat explained that similar provisions regarding exclusions existed in other OSH instruments, such as Convention No. 155 (Article 1) and the Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162) (Article 1). Member States which had ratified the Convention and applied the flexibility clause were bound to report to the Office on the measures they had taken to extend protection to all sectors and workers. He also read out an explanation by the Office of the Legal Adviser of the terms “special” and “substantial”, with respect to the phrase in point 8: “its application would raise special problems of a substantial nature”. The ordinary meaning of the term “special” would exclude problems that were too general or non-specific in nature while the term “substantial” seemed to indicate that the problems had to be of significant importance.

- 278. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that it would not be acceptable, in any circumstances for tripartite consultations to lead to the denial of a worker’s fundamental right to a safe and healthy working environment.
- 279. The Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, did not support the amendment. Point 8 provided necessary flexibility and was in line with many countries’ national legislation. In the absence of that provision, Member States would have great difficulty in ratifying and applying the Convention.
- 280. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, mentioned the European Union’s “Framework Directive” on OSH, which allowed for exclusions for the police and the armed forces.⁵ Her group supported retaining the original text. She emphasized the critical importance of better data collection on biological hazards at the workplace to enable evidence-based decision making regarding preventive measures.
- 281. The Government members of Türkiye, Switzerland and Japan did not support the amendment.
- 282. The Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed concern that so-called temporary exclusions often became permanent, and that very little action had been taken with respect to reporting. Entire categories of workers, such as agricultural workers and migrant workers, who were most at risk with regard to OSH hazards, had often been excluded because the authorities had found it expedient to do so. He argued that full protection for such groups would bring significant public health benefits. The Government member of Brazil supported that view.
- 283. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, understood the Worker Vice-Chairperson’s position and said that there was absolutely no justification for migrant workers to receive less protection than nationals doing the same work and agricultural workers equally required full protection.
- 284. The Employer Vice-Chairperson appreciated the issues that had been raised by the Government members of the Committee. The flexibility allowed by Convention No. 155 was necessary in certain specific and difficult situations which required tailored OSH measures. The pandemic was a notable example of why such clauses were needed. It was not a question of denial of workers’ rights, but of practical implementation.
- 285. In response to the question raised by the Worker Vice-Chairperson as to whether tripartite consultation could remove fundamental rights of workers, the Legal Adviser explained that the question raised two issues. The first was whether there were certain limits that needed to be respected in the negotiations within a technical committee, and the second whether the exemption clause in point 8 of the Office text was legally acceptable or not.
- 286. Regarding the first issue, it was clear that the Committee was mandated to develop draft standards. It therefore enjoyed significant discretion within the limits established by the ILO Constitution and by the Governing Body decision that placed the issue on the agenda. For example, the Committee was mandated to address biological hazards and could not decide to broaden the scope to include other hazards. The Committee could also not propose a draft Convention that would directly contravene any of the fundamental principles enshrined in the Constitution, including in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

287. Regarding the second issue, it was important to consider the distinction between a fundamental principle and a technical standard. The Committee was tasked with developing technical standards pertaining to a fundamental principle, which was a legal framework that was meant to be reflective of and adaptable to national circumstances, priorities and needs for the realization of the fundamental principle and right to a safe and healthy working environment. In doing so, the Committee could find it useful to propose progressive or staged implementation, standards grouped in separate parts, qualified requirements, different levels of protection, or differentiated standards for different groups of workers or economic sectors.
288. Those legal techniques were commonly referred to as flexibility clauses that offer the space or time some countries might need before full implementation of the entire set of standards of a ratified Convention. Flexibility clauses had a clear constitutional basis in article 19(3) of the ILO Constitution and in Section V of the Declaration of Philadelphia that stated that the manner of the application of the principles must be determined with due regard to the stage of social and economic development reached by each people. What was common among all the legal techniques was their provisional or exceptional nature. They were neither meant to deny the protective coverage of any Convention to entire groups definitively nor meant to escape the oversight and control of the ILO supervisory bodies. Standards aspiring to universal acceptance needed to be firm in principle, but flexible in implementation, as was noted during the adoption of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended (MLC, 2006).
289. The proposed text in point 8 was identical to clauses included in various other ILO instruments, including the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994 (No. 175), Night Work Convention, 1990 (No. 171), Maternity Protection Convention, 2000 (No. 183), Safety and Health in Agriculture Convention, 2001 (No. 184), and Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81). The same clause also appeared in Article 1 of Convention No. 155, which was one of the fundamental Conventions. That clause had given rise to extensive debate in the past, for instance, during the drafting of the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994 (No. 175). On that occasion the clause had finally been accepted on the understanding that exclusions could only be made when the problems of application were so serious that no alternative solutions could be found to meet the requirements of the Convention.
290. The Office had provided two informal opinions in 2005 and in 2021 on what was meant by the terms “special” and “substantial”. The ordinary meaning of “special” would exclude problems that are of a too general and unspecific nature, while “substantial” indicated that the problems had to be significant.
291. In conclusion, there was no legal impediment to negotiating a flexibility clause, customizing its scope and content to the nature of the instrument being drafted, on condition that that such a clause should remain in line with standard features and safeguards that had been consistently applied in all past standard setting exercises, namely that the clause was devised as a temporary measure; called for cautious and restrictive use in exceptional circumstances only; had been the subject of prior consultations with the employers’ and workers’ organizations concerned; and remained subject to the oversight and control of the supervisory organs.
292. When resuming the discussion at a later sitting, the Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed, as a subamendment, instead of deleting the entire point, to add “on condition that a safe and healthy working environment is maintained” after “substantial nature”. The language proposed was from the Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (No. 167), and in line with other OSH Conventions, where exclusions were defined. That would allow to maintain the flexibility for governments while ensuring consistency with other standards.

- 293. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, expressed their preference for the original text.
- 294. The Government members of the United Kingdom, China, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Canada and Australia supported the subamendment.
- 295. In response to a question from the Government member of Switzerland about whether the obligation to respect the fundamental Conventions was based on the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights, as amended in 2022, a representative of the Secretariat explained that flexibility clauses varied between Conventions. For example, in Convention No. 155, provisions were quite general while Convention No. 167 stated that exclusions should be made only on condition that a safe and healthy environment would be maintained for workers. It was for the Committee to decide on the most appropriate formulation in each context.
- 296. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that if the proposed subamendment was not adopted, the instrument would be the only OSH Convention that did not provide for the fundamental right. As a baseline, the Employer Vice-Chairperson reiterated that the original text was already in line with Convention No. 155, which was a fundamental Convention, and that any exclusion would be applied only after an assessment and taking into account a safe and healthy environment for workers. However, her group could be flexible.
- 297. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Japan indicated flexibility.
- 298. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 299. An amendment (A.54) fell as a consequence of the decision reached by the Committee on point 2 and another amendment was withdrawn (A.5).

- 300. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add a new sentence at the end of the point as follows: “It should also make special provisions to protect confidential information whose disclosure to a competitor would be liable to cause harm to an employer’s business so long as the safety and health of workers are not compromised thereby.” She explained that, in the context of application of the exclusions clause, businesses might have to provide confidential information which could be commercially damaging should it be disclosed. The proposed wording was taken from Article 1(2)(b) of Convention No. 170.
- 301. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment because, in that context, the whistleblower protection should be taken into account. If there was an outbreak of salmonella in a food processing factory, for example, it was possible that the employer would not want that made public so as not to harm the business. But if one or more workers thought that there was a danger to public health, authorities would need to be notified.
- 302. The Employer Vice-Chairperson explained that her group did not refuse to disclose information, but that companies might have processes, software, substances or other elements that were essential for their competitiveness.

303. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Bangladesh and Canada expressed their flexibility to support the amendment.

304. The amendment was adopted and point 8 was adopted as amended to read:

A Member ratifying the Convention may, after consultation with the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, and on the basis of an assessment of the biological hazards involved and of the preventive and protective measures to be applied, exclude from its application, in part or in whole, particular branches of economic activity or limited categories of workers in respect of which its application would raise special problems of a substantial nature on condition that a safe and healthy working environment is maintained. It should also make special provisions to protect confidential information whose disclosure to a competitor would be liable to cause harm to an employer's business so long as the safety and health of workers are not compromised thereby.

305. An amendment (A.55) was withdrawn as a consequence of the decision reached by the Committee on point 2.

A.27

306. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed to subamend an amendment so that instead of deleting point 9, the following new sentence would be added at the end of the point: "Members shall make every effort to end exclusions at the earliest opportunity." The purpose was to underscore that exclusions should be intended to be a temporary measure.

307. The Employer Vice-Chairperson preferred the original text which was drawn from a procedural Article of Convention No.155.

308. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Australia, Canada, China and the United Kingdom supported the subamendment.

309. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that her group could join the consensus and the amendment was adopted as subamended.

310. Point 9 was adopted as amended.

Title of section 2

311. The title of section 2 – National policy – was adopted.

Point 10

312. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace the word "should" by "shall". The same amendment had been proposed at other points in the text. He requested an explanation from the Secretariat of the difference between the two tenses.

313. The deputy representative of the Secretary-General explained that the use of "should" was standard practice in proposed Conclusions that were discussed at a first Conference standard-setting discussion. "Shall" would be used in the proposed text of a Convention to be included in the report that the Office would submit to ILO constituents for comment in advance of the second Conference discussion in 2025.

- 314. In light of the explanation, the amendment was withdrawn, along with other amendments by the Workers' group on the same issue.

- 315. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace the words "consistent with national law and practice" by "as part of the broader national occupational safety and health policy". The existing language was too flexible and implied that the provisions of the Convention might be undermined by national legislation, which was not the intention of any ILO Convention.
- 316. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment which was incompatible with Convention No. 155. Countries required the flexibility to apply their own laws and practice while respecting the spirit of Convention No. 155.
- 317. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, did not support the amendment. Each country needed flexibility to address workers' protection in the right manner and at the right level. Nonetheless, a policy on biological hazards should be a part of a national OSH policy. With that aim in mind, the EU Member States had submitted an amendment (A.100) for consideration by the Committee.
- 318. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, agreed with the statement by the Government member of Belgium and did not support the amendment.
- 319. The Government member of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, supported the amendment as a national OSH policy should also cover biological hazards.
- 320. The amendment was withdrawn.

A.100

- 321. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to replace "formulate, implement and periodically review a coherent and comprehensive national policy on" with "integrate the protection against" before "biological hazards" and add at the end of the point "into their national policy on occupational safety and health". She explained that in the European Union, there was a framework that allowed Member States to develop their own OSH national policies. The aim of the amendment was to facilitate the integration of biological hazards within OSH national policies rather than into a separate national policy, which would avoid duplication and reduce the administrative burden on EU Member States.
- 322. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 323. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to add "and formulate, implement and periodically review" before "their national policy on occupational safety and health".
- 324. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the amendment as subamended.
- 325. The Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported the amendment but not the subamendment proposed by the Workers' group and suggested instead to add "which would be periodically reviewed" at the end of the point.
- 326. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the EU and its Member States supported the subamendment by the Africa group.

327. The Government member of the United States supported the subamendment by the Africa group and, seconded by the Government member of Australia, proposed to add “that are causing or are likely to cause a consequential risk of non-negligible harm to human health” after “working environment”. The policies that Member States would be developing should not target all biological agents but focus on biological hazards in the working environment that were likely to cause harm to human health. The inclusion of “risk” was necessary because of the broad and open-ended definition of biological hazards that had been adopted by the Committee.
328. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Saudi Arabia speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and of Japan, supported the new subamendment proposed by the Government member of the United States. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that the point addressed real harm to human health, therefore the inclusion of the word “consequential” would be very helpful.
329. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, did not support the subamendment. The use of the word “risk” was problematic because in Spanish, the word “hazard” referred to both “risk” and “danger”. It was also a problem the way the word was used in the point. His group therefore suggested deleting the word, noting that its removal would not change the meaning of the text and facilitate the support from Spanish-speaking countries. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
330. The Government member of the United States acknowledged the concerns that had been raised by GRULAC but noted that a decision on the use of the term “risk” would have to be made because it would be introduced again during the discussion of other parts of the text. He reiterated the importance of retaining that word which addressed transmissibility of the biological agent, and asked members to propose an alternative term that would be acceptable in Spanish.
331. The Government member of Australia stressed that many countries, including Australia, had a risk-based system in place and that the inclusion of the concept of “risk” was therefore particularly important.
332. A representative of the Secretariat explained that the concepts of “risks” and “hazards” had distinct meanings and had been defined in the ILO Guidelines on Occupational Safety and Health Management Systems (ILO-OSH 2001). “Hazard” meant the inherent potential to cause injury or damage to people’s health, while the term “risk” entailed a combination of the likelihood of an occurrence of a hazardous event and the severity of injury or damage caused by this event.⁶
333. The Government member of Brazil noted that if governments were meant to only integrate risks of biological hazard that were causing or likely to cause a consequential or non-negligible harm into national policies, some biological hazards would be excluded from the scope of national policies. Seconded by the EU Member States, he proposed to insert “especially those” after the word “environment”.
334. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed to replace words “risks of” with “probability of”.
335. The Government member of the United States supported the subamendment introduced by the EU Member States but could not accept the proposal by Brazil to insert “especially those” because that would place an obligation on national governments to develop a national policy on all biological agents, which would be too broad and burdensome. For the same reasons, the Government member of Japan also did not support the subamendment introduced by Brazil.

- 336. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran pointed out that “risk” did not mean the same as “probability”. Risk included both probability and severity.
- 337. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that the word “risk” meant the probability of a substance, agent, or something else to cause harm. “Probability” was therefore an appropriate substitute for “risk”.
- 338. The Government member of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela said that the words “risk” and “probability” were synonymous. Hazards need to be addressed where there was a high probability or high risk.
- 339. The Government members of China and of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, proposed to revert to the original text.
- 340. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and of Türkiye supported the suggestion by the EU and its Member States.
- 341. The Government member of the United States expressed willingness to use the term “probability” as an alternative to “risk” and noted that the text as subamended seemed to have broad support.
- 342. The Government members of the United Kingdom and Canada and the Employer Vice-Chairperson reiterated support for the text as subamended.
- 343. The Government member of South Africa suggested that the words “that are causing or are likely to cause a consequential risk of non-negligible harm to human health” proposed by the United States be moved to point 13 instead and added after “management of biological hazards in the working environment”.
- 344. The Government member of the United States agreed that it would be appropriate to include the reference to “risk” in point 13, but that it was equally important to address the concepts of risks and harm in point 10, which dealt with national policies and the preventive and protective measures that were appropriately targeted at hazards that had the risk of causing non-negligible harm.
- 345. The Government member of Japan said that moving the words “that are causing or are likely to cause a consequential risk of non-negligible harm to human health” to point 13 was inappropriate because that point addressed preventive and protective measures taken by competent authorities only and excluded the roles and of employers’ and workers’ organizations.
- 346. The Government member of the United States agreed to remove the word “consequential”. Seconded by the Government member of Australia, he proposed to insert “based on a risk assessment,” before “are causing or are likely to cause,” and to delete “risk/probability of,” to be consistent with existing ILO standards and technical guidelines.
- 347. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Worker Vice-Chairperson, and the Government members of Saudia Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, the United Kingdom and Indonesia supported the text as subamended.

- 348. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, noted that her group could accept the subamendment if the same phrase would also be added to clause (b) of point 11, given its relevance for national policy. The Government member of Brazil supported the proposal.
- 349. The Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, proposed to delete “non-negligible harm,” after “likely to cause”, as it was subjective terminology. The Government member of Japan did not support the proposal, noting that “non-negligible” was the correct terminology.
- 350. When resuming the discussion at a later sitting, the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, acknowledging the need of certain Member States for flexibility in the way they should address biological hazards in national policy, proposed a subamendment to replace the text after “and workers” by: “integrate the protection against biological hazards in the working environment into their national policy on occupational safety and health, that takes into account the characteristics and degree of concern of those hazards, which would be periodically reviewed.”
- 351. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of the United States, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Japan supported the subamendment.
- 352. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported most of the proposed text except for “degree of concern”, as that expression was subjective and potentially inaccurate. The Government member of the United States said that the words “degree of concern” captured the notion of risk.
- 353. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a to delete “those” before “hazards” and to insert “based on a risk assessment” after “and health”. The Government member of the United States, seconded by the Government member of Belgium, proposed to use language that had been agreed in other parts of the text: “based on an evaluation of risk” instead.
- 354. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, indicated her flexibility but with a reservation that governments did not conduct risk assessments when they were preparing laws. The Government member of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela did not agree as national policies were prepared in many different ways and were not only based on an evaluation of risks.
- 355. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

- 356. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete “and comprehensive” before “national policy” to be consistent with Convention No. 155.
- 357. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Japan supported the amendment.
- 358. The amendment was adopted.

A.76

- 359. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add “where governments, employers and workers actively participate through a system of defined rights, shared responsibilities and duties, as well as through social dialogue and cooperation” after “working environment”, to be consistent with Convention No.187. Under that Convention, it was clear that national policy should develop a culture of prevention, in which the rights, duties and responsibilities of all parties were clearly established.

- 360. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment, noting that the language was not clear and not in line with Convention No. 155.
- 361. The Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC and China did not support the amendment.
- 362. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed to delete “shared” before “responsibilities and duties” in an attempt to reach consensus.
- 363. The subamendment did not find support and was withdrawn as was the amendment.

A.150

- 364. The Government member of Switzerland, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Japan and Türkiye, introduced an amendment to delete “and comprehensive” before “national policy,” to be in line with Convention No.155. She also proposed to replace “a policy” by “policies,” noting that multiple policies would be necessary.
- 365. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Worker Vice-Chairperson, and the Government members of Australia and Brazil supported the amendment.
- 366. The amendment was adopted and point 10 was adopted as amended to read:

Each Member should, consistent with national law and practice and in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers, integrate the protection against biological hazards in the working environment into its national policy on occupational safety and health, based on an evaluation of risk that takes into account the characteristics and degree of concern of hazards, which would be periodically reviewed.

- 367. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete the introductory sentence that was accompanied by five other amendments (A.78, A.79, A.80, A.81 and A.82) to delete the clauses of the point. She explained that the Convention should be a general text while the detailed guidance should be included in the Recommendation. Existing OSH instruments, such as Conventions Nos 155 and 161 and Recommendations Nos 164 and 197, already covered national OSH policies and there was no need to duplicate those provisions in the Convention under discussion. Repeating those clauses would in fact constitute a ratification barrier, noting the low ratification rate of some of those instruments, and would elevate the provisions of existing Recommendations into binding commitments.
- 368. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment as governments, employers and workers would look to the Convention for authoritative guidance regarding their policies on managing biological hazards.
- 369. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group and Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC did not support the amendment.

- 370. All the amendments to delete point 11 and its clauses (A.78, A.79, A.80, A.81 and A.82) were withdrawn.

- 371. The Government member of Switzerland, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Japan and Türkiye, introduced an amendment to replace “policy” by “policies” as multiple policies would be needed given the many different types of biological hazard.
- 372. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Saudi Arabia speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and Australia supported the amendment which was in line with previously agreed text.
- 373. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, having listened to the points of view of the Government members, also supported the amendment.
- 374. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, initially did not support the amendment. There should not be a variety of policies aimed at the workplace and the purpose of ILO Conventions was to regulate the rights and duties of employers and workers. However, having listened to the other speakers, she could accept the amendment.
- 375. The amendment was adopted.

- 376. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to insert “integrated in the national policy on occupational safety and health” after the word “hazards”. That would be in line with the amendment submitted to point 10.
- 377. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment, believing the suggestion was logical and would lead to greater administrative efficiency. The Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and of Algeria also supported the amendment.
- 378. In response to requests for clarification from the Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Brazil concerning the relationship between the amendments to points 10 and 11, the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Members States, explained that under point 10, each Member should integrate workers’ protection against biological hazards into the national OSH policy. As a result, in point 11, the national policies on biological hazards would already be integrated within the OSH policy. The intention of their amendments to points 10 and 11 was to convey that measures relating to the protection from biological hazards in the working environment, integrated in the national OSH policy, should take into account other relevant policies, including on public health and the environment. If their amendment (A.100) to point 10 was adopted, the text would read: “Each member should, consistent with national law and practice and in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers, integrate the protection against biological hazards in the working environment into their national policy of occupational safety and health.” The amendments to point 11 and its clauses would make their text consistent with that of point 10.
- 379. The Government member of the United Kingdom asked what the implications would be in the instance that a national policy on biological hazards had not been integrated into the national OSH policy.

- 380. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, responded that the national policy on biological hazards referred to by the Convention should address only issues of relevance to the working environment, while other policies would address other aspects of biological hazards, for example public health and the environment. Those issues were beyond the competence of ministries of labour and other workplace actors, but the different policies needed to be implemented in a coordinated way if results were to be achieved. The proposed amendment (A.102) to clause (a) of point 11 addressed that issue.
- 381. The Government member of Japan was unclear about the meaning of the word “integrated” and noted that the qualifier “as appropriate” that had been used elsewhere did not appear in the amendment.
- 382. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed to insert “which are” between “biological hazards” and “integrated”.
- 383. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment as it would exclude national policies on biological hazards that were not integrated in the national OSH policy. He proposed to use the expression “which are to be integrated” instead.
- 384. The Government member of the United States agreed that ministries of labour did not control all policies related to biological hazards. She therefore proposed to insert “in the workplace” after “biological hazards”.
- 385. The amendment was withdrawn, and another amendment (A.115) was withdrawn.
- 386. The introductory sentence of point 11 was adopted as amended.

- 387. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to replace “be integrated into existing national occupational safety and health policies, as appropriate, and be consistent with and complement other” with “take into account other”. This was in line with their proposal to include the concept of integration with OSH policies in point 10.
- 388. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, the United Kingdom, Indonesia, Singapore and China supported the amendment.
- 389. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, preferred the original text.
- 390. The amendment was adopted.

A.116

- 391. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add “where these policies are consistent with, complement or improve occupational safety and health provisions” at the end of clause (a). His group wanted to avoid that other, non-OSH related policies could be taken into consideration unless they complemented or improved OSH provisions.
- 392. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC and the Islamic Republic of Iran did not support the amendment.

- 393. When resuming the discussion at a later sitting, the Worker Vice-Chairperson explained that there had been inconsistencies between public health and OSH policies during the COVID-19 pandemic. In the working environment, OSH policies should take precedence as public health policies did not always provide the most appropriate solutions. The boundaries between the two policy areas had to be respected in a manner which led to the best possible outcomes.
- 394. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed with the term “consistent with” but proposed a subamendment to delete “complement or improve”. In the face of pandemics and other complex situations, public health authorities needed flexibility to respond in the most appropriate way.
- 395. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the amendment which allowed adequate flexibility but not the subamendment. A lack of coordination between the public health and OSH authorities during a public health crisis would jeopardize both the security and health of workers and the business continuity of employers. Speaking in her national capacity, she mentioned the experience of Belgium during the COVID-19 pandemic, where issuance of appropriate OSH guidance had enabled businesses to continue to operate and keep their workforce employed.
- 396. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the United Kingdom supported the amendment but not the subamendment. The Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, was flexible and the Government member of Singapore supported the subamendment.
- 397. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the objective of the subamendment had been to facilitate the work of governments in complex situations, such as pandemics, where it would not be realistic to expect the whole population to be fully protected. Nonetheless, the subamendment was withdrawn.
- 398. The amendment was adopted and clause (a) of point 11 was adopted as amended.

Point 11(b), introductory sentence

A.152

- 399. The Government member of Switzerland, speaking also on behalf of Japan and Türkiye, introduced an amendment to replace “take account of” with “consider”. The reason was that some elements introduced in the point did not depend entirely on governments.
- 400. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Saudi Arabia supported the amendment.
- 401. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment.
- 402. The amendment was withdrawn.
- 403. The introductory sentence of clause (b) in point 11 was adopted without amendment.

Point 11(b)(i)A.117

- 404. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add “or undertake or commission new research where available information is insufficient,” after the word “health”. He explained that health and safety-related information on biological hazards in the work environment was often insufficient and it was necessary to commission new research when required.
- 405. The Government member of the United Kingdom supported the amendment as it highlighted the importance of evidence-based decision-making. The Government member of Indonesia also supported the amendment.
- 406. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the United States, Switzerland, Türkiye and the Islamic Republic of Iran did not support the amendment.
- 407. When resuming the discussion at a later sitting, the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed a subamendment to replace “undertake or commission” with “promote” because the latter was less prescriptive.
- 408. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, supported the subamendment.
- 409. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that the language used in the amendment was consistent with Article 12(c) of Convention No. 155, but in the interest of reaching consensus, he supported the subamendment.
- 410. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

A.118

- 411. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add “including a needs assessment with a clear gender perspective” at the end of point 11(b)(i) because several OSH practices and policies were mainly focused on males, while protective equipment needed to be gender sensitive and different immune responses also had to be considered.
- 412. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed to replace “a needs assessment with a clear gender perspective” with “a gender-responsive needs assessment”.
- 413. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment and the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Canada, South Africa, Namibia, the United Kingdom, Australia, the United States and Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the amendment as subamended.
- 414. The Government member of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries did not support the subamendment or the amendment because it did not take into account all national contexts. The proposed texts were opposed the historical and religious customs in his country. The Government members of Egypt, Algeria, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of Africa group, and Türkiye also did not support the subamendment or the amendment.
- 415. The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that Employment and Decent Work for Peace and Resilience Recommendation, 2017 (No. 205), referred to the need to adopt a gender perspective to needs assessments and it would be remiss of the Committee not to include this perspective in the Convention.

- 416. The Government member of Saudi Arabia introduced a subamendment to replace “gender” with “sex”. The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the most recent standard adopted by the ILO – the Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190) – contained numerous references to “gender”. Therefore it was the appropriate term to use rather than “sex”. The Government member of Saudi Arabia withdrew the subamendment and expressed support for the original text. He wanted to put on record that the GCC countries did not support the inclusion of “gender-responsive” in the text.
- 417. When resuming the discussion at a later sitting, the Government member of Zimbabwe noted that there was significant disagreement on the use of the term “gender-responsive”.
- 418. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran did not support the amendment. She said that if “gender” were included, it would also be important to refer to other disadvantaged groups such as the persons with disabilities, older persons and migrant workers. She asked to put on record that, should the text include “gender-responsive”, her government would disassociate itself from that part of the Convention.
- 419. The Government member of the United States acknowledged the differences in opinion in the room but pointed out that historically, medical research had been conducted on men and not on women. Biological hazards affected men and women differently, and it was therefore important to ensure that women were included in medical research. The Government member of Canada shared the same views.
- 420. The Employer Vice-Chairperson indicated flexibility on the amendment.
- 421. As the words “gender-responsive” could not remain bracketed in the final proposed Conclusions,⁷ they were removed and subclause (i) of point 11(b) was adopted as amended.

New subclause after (i) in point 11(b)

A.119

- 422. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add a new subclause reading “all health impacts, including complications of biological hazard related harms and sequelae, including psychosocial disorders, and infection related cancers and heart conditions”. Health impacts were not always immediately apparent due to the cumulative exposure to biological hazards such as in the case of heart diseases and different forms of cancer.
- 423. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. She noted that Conventions Nos 155 and 187 dealt exhaustively with the content of national policies. There was no need to develop policies that went beyond the scope of those two Conventions.
- 424. The Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of Africa group, did not support the amendment. What was proposed could be covered by the definition of biological hazards.
- 425. The Government member of the United States, seconded by the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced a subamendment for the text to read “biological hazards that the Member has determined based on results of a risk assessment are likely to cause or are causing non-negligible harm to human health”. He noted that the text proposed had received broad support from the Committee during the discussion on point 10.

- 426. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment because it removed any reference to “psychosocial disorders”, which was one of the most serious effects of exposure to biological hazards.
- 427. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of the United Kingdom supported the subamendment.
- 428. The Government member of Chile and the Government member of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, did not support the subamendment.
- 429. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that the subamendment came at the expense of the amendment proposed by the Workers’ group, which was unacceptable.
- 430. The subamendment was withdrawn.
- 431. When resuming the discussion at a later sitting, the Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Saudi Arabia, Japan and the United States still did not support the amendment, while the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, noted that her group was flexible.
- 432. The amendment was not adopted.

Point 11(b)(ii)

- 433. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to replace “preparedness and response arrangements for the effective management of emergencies related to biological hazards in the working environment, including new or emerging biological hazards and risks” with “measures, taking into account new and emerging hazards and risks as well as measures to deal with accidents, incidents and emergencies related to biological hazards in the working environment”. There was a need for preparedness outside the context of pandemics, and it was therefore important to develop measures to address new and emerging biological hazards as well as accidents, incidents and emergencies related to biological hazards. That would align the text with EU legislation.
- 434. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported most of the text proposed in the amendment except for the deletion of “preparedness and response arrangements”. He proposed a subamendment to retain those words and add “and taking into account workers’ physical and mental health and general well-being” at the end of the clause.
- 435. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment.
- 436. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, did not support the addition proposed by the Workers’ group at the end of the clause and proposed to move the reference to “preparedness and response” to after “that take into account the need to develop” and to delete the reference to “risks”, since numerous Committee members had expressed concern with its use.
- 437. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment but reserved the right to reintroduce the words “and taking into account workers’ physical and mental health and general well-being” when introducing a subsequent amendment (A.170).

- 438. The Government members of the United Kingdom, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported the text as subamended by the EU Member States.
- 439. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced a subamendment to delete the word “incidents” since it was already covered under the terms “accidents and emergencies”.
- 440. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, and the Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
- 441. The amendment was adopted as subamended and another amendment (A.169) fell.

A.170

- 442. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add “taking into account workers’ physical and mental health and general well-being”.
- 443. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment because it broadened the scope by going beyond what was included in the fundamental Conventions. Noting that the concept of “general well-being” was not defined in any ILO instruments, she proposed a subamendment to delete “physical and mental”.
- 444. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment because the wording that he had proposed was in line with Article 3(e) of Convention No. 155, which read: “the term health, in relation to work, indicates not merely the absence of disease or infirmity: it also includes the physical and mental elements affecting health which are directly related to safety and hygiene at work”. While the Committee could expand on the scope of fundamental Conventions, it could not agree on anything less than stipulated in the fundamental Conventions.
- 445. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the United States and Tunisia supported the amendment and not the subamendment. The Government member of Tunisia explained that several chronic diseases, like tuberculosis, had physical and mental consequences and the amendment was also consistent with language from the WHO.
- 446. The Employer Vice-Chairperson pointed out that Convention No. 155 included “physical and mental elements” but not “mental health” or “well-being”. The meaning of workers’ health as covered by that Convention could not be expanded, because the Committee had not yet gone through what damages and harms biological hazards could cause.
- 447. The Government member of Switzerland, seconded by the Government members of Türkiye and the United Kingdom, proposed to delete “well-being”.
- 448. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed to use the wording in Convention No. 155 – “taking into account workers’ health including physical and mental elements”. The Government member of Türkiye supported the subamendment.
- 449. The Worker Vice Chairperson did not support the two subamendments and read the ILO definition of “workplace well-being”: “all aspects of working life, from the quality and safety of the physical environment, to how workers feel about their work, their working environment, the climate at work and work organization”. He pointed out that there was broad support for his group’s amendment and it should be adopted.

- 450. In response to the request by the Chairperson to clarify the procedure to be followed in a first standard-setting discussion, the Legal Adviser explained that in the first year, the aim was to adopt a set of conclusions, which were not yet put in the form of a draft instrument. According to the Conference rules of procedure, there would be opportunities for constituents to provide further inputs for the preparation by the Office of the draft instruments to be considered during the second Conference discussion. During the first discussion, non-essential language and syntax matters could be left to the Conference Drafting Committee and the focus should be on expressing what the priorities were, what was missing or what was not well reflected in the proposed Conclusions. Concerning the procedure for considering amendments, the Committee was advised, as a matter of general principle, not to move to the following amendment before having reached a decision on the one under examination. Parking certain issues in the interest of promoting tripartite negotiations and not disrupting the progress of the Committee's deliberations was a well-recognized method. In contrast, bracketing amendments and subamendments as soon as a strong objection was expressed to their adoption under the understanding that the Committee would resume their discussion after the entire text had been examined, had not been used before and was unlikely to ensure the efficient and timely completion of the Committee's task. Finally, with regard to decision-making, the Standing Orders provided that the Committee should make every effort to take its decisions by consensus – meaning the absence of any objection presented by a member as an impediment to the adoption of the decision in question – but also clearly provided that in the absence of consensus, decisions should be taken through a vote.
- 451. In response to a question by the Government member of Japan, the Legal Adviser explained that, as per past practice, any text of the proposed Conclusions not agreed upon or considered at the first discussion, this is to say any text that was neither rejected nor adopted due to lack of time or lack of consensus, would be included within square brackets and reproduced in the draft instruments to be submitted for the second Conference discussion.
- 452. The Employer Vice-Chairperson asked for informal consultations among members to formulate language that would be acceptable to all.
- 453. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the United States and Australia asked to conduct a vote if the Employers' group could not join the consensus.
- 454. Following an indicative show of hands, which showed that most members of the Committee supported the amendment, the Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew the subamendment. While her group was not in agreement with the proposed text, it did not place an objection to block consensus.
- 455. The amendment was adopted.
- 456. Subclause (ii) of point 11(b) was adopted as amended to read:
- the need to develop arrangements for the effective management of biological hazards in the working environment, including new or emerging biological hazards, considering the need to develop preparedness and response measures to deal with accidents and emergencies related to biological hazards in the working environment, as well as workers' physical and mental health and general well-being;

New subclauses after (ii) in point 11(b)A.121

- 457. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add a new subclause that read: “the need in the case of emergencies that lead to furloughs or permanent or temporary job loss, to stabilize livelihoods and income through immediate social protection and employment measures;”. That was necessary to ensure the protection of workers and their family members through social security which would reduce the risk of workers carrying infection into the workplace, as well as ensure business continuity. It was both an OSH and a public health measure.
- 458. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, and the Government members of Brazil and Chile did not support the amendment.
- 459. The amendment was withdrawn and the proposed new subclause was not adopted.

A.122

- 460. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add a new subclause that read: “the need to take account of the impact of climate and environmental risks on occupational safety and health and take adequate action to prevent or remedy identified risks;”. He noted the crisis the world was facing due to climate change and the increased risks of biological hazards linked to it and associated environmental change. He cited the resolution concerning environment, development, employment and the role of the ILO adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 77th Session (1990).
- 461. The Government member of the United States supported the amendment.
- 462. The Government member of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, proposed a subamendment to add, after “occupational safety and health”, the words “in the workplace” to make the text more specific.
- 463. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the amendment as subamended.
- 464. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed to replace “in the workplace” by “in the working environment” to ensure consistency of language with the rest of the text.
- 465. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Australia and the Islamic Republic of Iran, supported the text as subamended. The Government member of Australia added that, by including this subclause, the ILO would clearly demonstrate its leadership in addressing the impact of climate change and environmental risks that affected workers across all countries and sectors.
- 466. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 467. A new subclause after subclause (ii) in point 11(b) was adopted.

Point 11(b)(iii)

- 468. Subclause (iii) of point 11(b) was adopted and point 11 was adopted as amended.

New subclause after (iii) in point 11(b)

- 469. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert a new subclause that read: “the need to respect, promote and realize the other fundamental principles and rights at work, namely freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining, the elimination of all forms of forced or compulsory labour, the effective abolition of child labour and the elimination of discrimination in respect of employment and occupation, as well as promote decent work.” He said those principles were at the core of the ILO and needed to be spelled out, as evidence showed that when those rights were respected, occupational safety and health improved.
- 470. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, while agreeing with the spirit of the suggestion, did not support the amendment as he did not believe the text belonged in the operative part of the instrument. The Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the United States did not support the amendment.
- 471. The Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed that the text would be better placed in the Preamble. The amendment was withdrawn and the new subclause was not adopted.

A.83

- 472. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert “evidence-based” before “available information”. Information had to be based on data drawn from the real world. It was common practice in the analysis of risks to look for scientific studies, for example in the case of chemical hazards, and the same evidence-based approach would be needed for biological hazards.
- 473. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to change the placement of “evidence-based” by inserting, after “available information,” the phrase “including evidence-based data taking into account the precautionary principle,”.
- 474. The subamendment and then the amendment were withdrawn.

- 475. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert “relevant to public health” after the word “information”, to specify the type of information needed for developing and implementing national policies.
- 476. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment, which he considered to be unnecessary and confusing, since the information should be relevant also to occupational safety and health. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Islamic Republic of Iran did not support the amendment.
- 477. The amendment was withdrawn.

- 478. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add “respecting workers’ rights to access their personal medical data and the need to ensure the confidentiality of these data,” after “information,”. The confidentiality of workers’ personal medical data and their access to such data were important issues. Such provisions on data confidentiality and access were standard in privacy legislation around the world.
- 479. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to add “as well as business data confidentiality” after “of these data”.
- 480. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Islamic Republic of Iran and Switzerland did not support the subamendment or the amendment. They pointed out that issues of data confidentiality were covered in point 29(f).
- 481. The subamendment and the amendment were withdrawn.
- 482. Another amendment (A.124) was withdrawn.

- 483. The Government member of Switzerland, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Japan and Türkiye, introduced an amendment to insert “as appropriate, and in accordance with their national laws and practices,” after “organizations of employers and workers”. National laws and practices varied between countries and the amendment would allow flexibility to Member States.
- 484. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and China supported the amendment.
- 485. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to delete “as appropriate” to avoid the possible implication that consultation with employers’ and workers’ organizations be considered as optional.
- 486. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and Switzerland supported the subamendment.
- 487. The Government member of the United States did not support the subamendment as the resulting text could still be misleading. She suggested instead to move the amendment to either the beginning or the end of the point.
- 488. The Government member of Switzerland, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Japan and Türkiye, clarified that the addition of “as appropriate” was not intended to imply that consultations with the social partners were optional. To avoid that misinterpretation, it could be useful to insert the new phrase after the word “should”.
- 489. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed that the Drafting Committee refine the text by moving the proposed addition after “make arrangements”. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, agreed.
- 490. The subamendments by the Workers’ group and the Government member of the United States were not adopted and the amendment was adopted as subamended by the EU Member States.

- 491. The Government member of the United States, seconded by the Government member of Australia, introduced an amendment to add “other” in front of “relevant national authorities” and to delete “and occupational safety and health” before authorities, because OSH authorities should be coordinating.
- 492. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment and so did the Government member of Zimbabwe, on behalf of the Africa group.
- 493. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran agreed with deleting “other” but did not support the second part of the amendment.
- 494. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, preferred the original text.
- 495. Having heard the government members, the Employer Vice-Chairperson, also preferred retaining the original text.
- 496. The amendment was withdrawn.
- 497. Point 12 was adopted as amended.

New point after point 12

- 498. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add after point 12 a new point to read: “Recognizing many biological hazards create cross-border risks, Members should ensure both national and multinational employers provide adequate occupational health and safety standards and contribute to a preventive occupational health culture to eliminate or minimize these risks.” Paragraph 43 of the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, as amended in 2022 (MNE Declaration) included a cross-border clause establishing obligations of human rights due diligence for multinational employers.
- 499. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. Although the concept of cross-border hazards was relevant, this was not the right place to address it, because the Convention would have to be implemented by each ratifying Member State. Moreover, the amendment was not related to the topic at hand but to broader policy discussions out of the scope of the Committee.
- 500. The Government members of Cuba, Indonesia and Algeria supported the amendment. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran also supported it but asked that the new point be added under the sections dealing with protective and preventive measures.
- 501. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the United States, Canada, Switzerland, Türkiye, China, Singapore and Australia did not support the amendment, mostly because there was no extra-territorial jurisdiction enabling the smooth implementation of cross-border application and there were several categories of multinational enterprises.
- 502. The Government member of Japan asked for clarifications on the meaning of the amendment which could be read in two ways. Governments might be forced both to guarantee that their companies adhered to OSH regulations elsewhere and to ensure that foreign multinational companies operating in their territories complied with national OSH regulations.

- 503. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, did not support the amendment for the same reasons mentioned by the Government member of Japan. She proposed to move the concept to the Recommendation.
- 504. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced a subamendment to replace “ensure” with “promote that”.
- 505. The Government members of Cuba and Honduras supported the amendment as subamended.
- 506. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Canada, the United States, Indonesia, Singapore, Jamaica and Türkiye supported the amendment as subamended, with a preference to move the text to the Recommendation.
- 507. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not agree with including the concept in the Convention. She proposed to replace “both national and multinational employers” with “employers provide”. If the point were to be retained, she indicated that at the very least, it should be placed in the Recommendation.
- 508. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, Cuba, Canada, the Dominican Republic and Honduras did not support the subamendment proposed by the Employers’ group because it changed the meaning of the point.
- 509. The Employer Vice-Chairperson indicated that no company could apply a standard that was not applied by the country in which it operated and insisted on deleting “both national and multinational employers” to clarify that the responsibility to apply the standards stood with each country.
- 510. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support that additional subamendment, explaining that his group’s proposal was consistent with the ILO strategy on decent work and supply chains. No jurisdiction in the world was opposed to adequate OSH standards and a preventive health culture.
- 511. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Australia, Cuba, Honduras, Singapore and the United Kingdom did not support the further subamendment.
- 512. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that for her group the text presented many problems, especially since the Convention would be ratified at the national level. Noting that the Committee expressed a clear preference for placing the text in the Recommendation, she indicated that her group had major difficulties with it but requested that the text be placed in the Recommendation.
- 513. The Chairperson indicated that the discussion on where to place the point could take place during the second discussion in 2025.
- 514. In response to the request by the Government member of Japan to clarify the scope of the second discussion, the representative of the Secretary-General stated that everything that had been discussed in the first year could also be discussed the second year.
- 515. The amendment was adopted as subamended and the new point was adopted to be included in the proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation.

Title of section 3

- 516. The title of section 3 – Preventive and protective measures – was adopted.

Point 13

- 517. An amendment (A.127) was withdrawn.

A.154

- 518. The Government member of Switzerland, also speaking on behalf of the Government members of Japan and Türkiye, introduced an amendment to insert “in accordance with national law and practice and” before “in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers”, to give Member States flexibility in taking measures that would reflect national laws and practices.
- 519. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment, as it was not appropriate to refer to national law and practice in that context.
- 520. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Indonesia, Algeria and Singapore, United States and Japan supported the amendment.
- 521. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment in the interest reaching consensus.
- 522. The amendment was adopted.

A.164

- 523. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert “laws or regulations and” after the word “develop”. When standards were adopted, that was an encouragement for Member States to develop laws and regulations.
- 524. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that the point was meant to address guidelines, not rules and regulations and that her group did not support the amendment.
- 525. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and Singapore did not support the amendment.
- 526. The amendment was withdrawn.

- 527. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete the words “, or as appropriate, precautionary”. Precautionary measures were a concept taken from environmental and public health policies, which had no equivalent in OSH. It could be interpreted in a very restrictive way, thus creating legal uncertainty for employers and governments alike.
- 528. The Worker Vice-Chairperson explained that the original text did not mention that there should be national guidelines for precautionary measures. Citing an example of conjunctivitis in dairy farm workers during a time when the avian flu was detected in cattle in the United States, it had been necessary to apply the precautionary principle to ensure that everything was being done to reduce the risk of exposure to biological hazards.
- 529. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the United States and China did not support the amendment.

- 530. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced a subamendment to add “or as appropriate” after “risk-based”, to clarify that the measure was not to be applied in a broad sense.
- 531. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the United States, Singapore and the Islamic Republic of Iran did not support the subamendment.
- 532. The subamendment and the amendment were withdrawn.

- 533. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add “risks posed by” after “for the management of,” to ensure coherence with accepted terminology.
- 534. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, did not support the amendment, noting difficulties in interpretation of the terminology. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed that the issue be dealt with by the Drafting Committee.
- 535. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Islamic Republic of Iran supported the amendment also noting the need for the language to be considered by the Drafting Committee.
- 536. The Government member of the United States, seconded by the Government member of Australia, proposed a subamendment to insert “based on the results of risk assessment,” after “measures for the management” to improve coherence.
- 537. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Canada, Türkiye, the United Kingdom, Switzerland, Japan, and Singapore supported the amendment as subamended.
- 538. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Islamic Republic of Iran and China did not support the subamendment.
- 539. The Government member of the United States proposed to replace “of risk assessment” by “an evaluation of risk” to clarify the phrase.
- 540. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, indicated that she was flexible on the amendment as subamended.
- 541. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, explained there was a need for precautionary measures even when the risk could not be evaluated.
- 542. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the further subamendment.
- 543. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

- 544. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete “including preparedness and response arrangements for the effective management of emergencies related to biological hazards in the working environment,” noting the need to differentiate between measures that addressed biological hazards in the workplace and those related to global crises such as pandemics.

- 545. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment given the importance of preparedness and response arrangements.
- 546. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed to modify the text to read: “including preparedness and response measures to respond to accidents and emergencies related to biological hazards in the working environment and,” before “taking into account”, to be coherent with language used in other sections of the text.
- 547. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment and proposed to add “including public health emergencies” after “accidents and emergencies.”
- 548. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, supported the text as subamended but not the subamendment proposed by the Employers’ group.
- 549. The subamendment was withdrawn and the amendment was adopted as subamended.

A.165

- 550. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace “or” by “and” before “emerging hazards” and to add, at the end of the point: “, and ensuring continuous improvement of the level of protection of workers exposed to biological hazards in the working environment”, in line with Convention No. 187.
- 551. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment.
- 552. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, supported the amendment.
- 553. The Government member of the United States proposed a subamendment to replace the word “ensuring” by “promoting”. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
- 554. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 555. An amendment (A.104) was withdrawn and point 13 was adopted as amended.

- 556. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert a new point that read: “Developing national guidelines for preparedness and response arrangements for the effective management of public health emergencies related to biological hazards in the working environment should be the responsibility of public health authorities.” She highlighted the important role of public health authorities in responding to emergencies such as pandemics.
- 557. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. The OSH authorities, rather than public health authorities, had the necessary expertise for work-related response measures such as personal protective equipment and implementation of the hierarchy of controls.

- 558. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, aligned with the Workers' group's position. In her national capacity, she added that in Belgium, preparedness rules were established by OSH, not public health, authorities. The Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, did not support the amendment.
- 559. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the amendment.
- 560. The representative of the Secretary-General clarified the meaning of the term competent authority/authorities, based on the Manual for drafting ILO instruments (ILO, 2006). Those expressions, which were used in many international instruments, should as far as possible be left undefined, given that the intention was to allow Member States to determine which of their authorities was "competent" for the purposes of implementation and compliance.
- 561. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to delete "related to biological hazards in the working environment", and to replace "public health authorities" by "competent authorities" at the end of the point.
- 562. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the United States, Japan and Singapore did not support the subamendment.
- 563. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said his group could be flexible, but joined the consensus for not supporting the subamendment or the amendment.
- 564. The subamendment and the amendment were withdrawn.
- 565. Another amendment (A.89) was withdrawn.

A.129

- 566. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert "timely" before "information", and to add at the end of the point ", and which shall be periodically reviewed and updated as necessary and keep abreast of scientific and technical knowledge". For information to be useful, it needed to be made available quickly and to be regularly updated. The proposed language was in line with Convention No. 155.
- 567. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, and the Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the amendment.
- 568. The amendment was adopted.

A.90

- 569. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert "risks posed by" before "biological hazards" to be in line with previously agreed terminology.
- 570. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 571. The Government member of the United States introduced a subamendment to replace "risks posed by" with "based on the results of an evaluation of risks" to ensure consistency in the text.

572. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

573. Point 14 was adopted as amended.

574. An amendment (A.130) was withdrawn.

A.105, A.106, A.107 and A.108

575. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced amendments to move the entire point with all its clauses to the Recommendation.

576. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Singapore supported the amendments, noting that the text should be discussed, when considering the part of the Conclusions concerning the possible Recommendation.

577. A representative of the Secretariat explained that the language was based on Article 12 of Convention No. 155. However, clause (d) of point 15 referred to the United Nations Recommendations on the Transport of Dangerous Goods and the Basel Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes and their Disposal, which was not the case in Convention No. 155.

578. The amendments were adopted and point 15 was moved to Part C of the proposed Conclusions.

Point 16, introductory sentence

579. An amendment (A.135) was withdrawn.

A.136

580. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert, after “develop”, “and regularly review and make public”. That would emphasize the importance of regularly reviewing the national guidance and preventive and protective measures, and of making that information public. It was in line with Convention No. 155.

581. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Australia noted their flexibility while preferring the Office text.

582. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, China and the Islamic Republic of Iran supported the amendment.

583. The amendment was adopted and the introductory sentence of point 16 was adopted as amended.

New clause before point 16(a)

584. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add “all sectors and occupations and set a social dialogue rapid response mechanism based on the precautionary approach;”. It was not possible to anticipate what jobs or sectors would present a high risk and the clause highlighted the need to adopt a precautionary approach.

- 585. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the proposed amendment was not in line with the mandate of the Committee which was on biological hazards and not on social dialogue, and therefore it should not be discussed.
- 586. The Government member of the United States appreciated the value of precautionary measures but did not understand what was meant by a social dialogue rapid response mechanism. He did not support the amendment.
- 587. The Worker Vice-Chairperson explained that, in the event of the emergence of a biological hazard which had the potential for a very serious impact, the tripartite constituents had to adopt an approach that went beyond “normal” social dialogue. He proposed a subamendment to replace “the” by “a” before “precautionary approach”.
- 588. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Islamic Republic of Iran did not support the amendment.
- 589. The Worker Vice-Chairperson insisted on the importance of including reference to social dialogue in all ILO instruments but withdrew the amendment.

A.138 and A.146

- 590. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert, after “where workers are”, the words “known to be”.
- 591. The Employer Vice-Chairperson pointed out that there were three similar amendments to clause (a). She did not support the Workers’ group’s amendment but did support the proposed amendment by the Government of the United States (A.146).
- 592. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the amendment of the Workers’ group.
- 593. The Government member of the United States, seconded by the Government member of the United Kingdom, introduced an amendment (A.146) to replace “higher” by “significant” before “risk” and to insert “material harm due to” before “exposure”. She proposed replacing “significant” by “high” and “material” by “recognized”.
- 594. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment as subamended.
- 595. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed a further subamendment to replace “high” by “higher”. Workers in certain sectors and occupations faced a higher risk of exposure to biological hazards than in others, such as hospital workers compared to administrative workers. Using the term “high risk” still implied the need for a comparison with “low risk” so did not solve the problem.
- 596. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of the United States, Panama and the Islamic Republic of Iran did not support the further subamendment. They noted that the European Agency for Safety and Health at Work used the term “high risk” and that could be measured through risk assessment scales established according to a universal standard adapted to national contexts whereas “higher” could not.
- 597. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, withdrew the subamendment.

- 598. The amendment proposed by the Government member of the United States (A.146) was adopted as subamended and the amendment from the Workers' group (A.138) was withdrawn.
- 599. Another amendment (A.94) was withdrawn and clause (a) of point 16 was adopted as amended.

Point 16(b)

A.139

- 600. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete "with certain conditions". Those words were superfluous and limiting in terms of the groups of workers who might require special protection.
- 601. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. Workers with certain health conditions needed different and special protection, based on risk analysis, as they were at higher risk of harm from exposure to biological hazards than other workers.
- 602. The Government member of the United States stated her flexibility but preferred the language in the amendment than the original text. In the United States, special protections were not based on a predetermined list of health conditions but rather by the individual circumstances of the worker, citing the example of a person with a beard requiring special PPE.
- 603. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Australia and the United Kingdom supported the amendment.
- 604. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the phrase "workers who may require special protection" was very general and that the reasons why particular workers required special protection would need further clarification.
- 605. The amendment was adopted and, as a consequence, another amendment (A.95) fell.

A.110

- 606. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to add, at the end of the clause the following text:
 - These categories of workers should include:
 - (i) pregnant and breastfeeding workers;
 - (ii) young workers;
 - (iii) workers medically predisposed to infections or allergies, including immunocompromised workers."
- 607. She believed that it was important to list in the text of the Convention those three categories of workers who were especially vulnerable, while others could be listed in the Recommendation.
- 608. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. Member States should take the decision regarding which groups of workers required special protection based on a risk assessment, and the Convention should not predetermine this. The list included in point 36 of the proposed Conclusions should be discussed at the appropriate time.

609. The amendment was withdrawn and clause (b) of point 16 was adopted as amended.

Two new clauses after point 16(b)

610. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert a new clause that read: “ensuring access to income protection during periods of isolation or quarantine.”, noting the importance of providing income protection as both a good OSH and public health measure. That was in line with the joint WHO and ILO publication Occupational safety and health in public health emergencies: A manual for protecting health workers and responders (2018).
611. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the amendment was beyond the mandate of the Committee as it concerned social protection and not biological hazards. There were many other reasons, beyond biological hazards, why workers could not work and as such, that point would belong in a different ILO instrument.
612. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran agreed with the Workers’ group’s proposal but believed it should be dealt with under point 17.
613. The Government member of the United States did not support the amendment. She agreed that providing income protection was, in general, good public policy but said that governments could not commit to it forever and in all situations. It had significant resource implications and governments needed to prioritize. The type of support would vary depending on national circumstances.
614. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, did not support the amendment.
615. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to replace “ensuring” by “endeavour to provide” before “access”.
616. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the text as subamended and proposed to move the new clause to the Recommendation. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Japan, the United States, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the United Kingdom, Canada and Australia supported inserting the text in the part concerning the possible Recommendation.
617. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not agree with the Employer Vice-Chairperson that discussion of social protection issues was outside the mandate of the Committee. Strong precedents existed, for example the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121), and the List of Occupational Diseases Recommendation, 2002 (No. 194). The Government member of Australia also disagreed with the views of the Employers’ group that the text did not address an OSH matter and was not within the mandate of the Committee. Isolation or quarantine for workers were often a direct consequence of exposure to biological hazards. If workers knew that they had income protection, it would encourage them to report potential exposure and adhere to the isolation or quarantine protocol, which were crucial to containing outbreaks and protect the workforce.
618. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced a subamendment to add “as well as sustainability of enterprises” after “quarantine”.

- 619. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment because that part of the text dealt specifically with the protection of workers and including a reference to business continuity would therefore be out of scope.
- 620. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the United Kingdom, Canada, the United States and the Islamic Republic of Iran did not support the subamendment.
- 621. The representative of the Secretary General explained that it was within the remit of the Committee to decide what to include in the text based on the mandate provided by the Governing Body to develop new standards on biological hazards to fill a gap in the ILO's normative framework. The report submitted to the Conference noted that the modalities for coverage of employment injury schemes were normally regulated separately from OSH laws and that the availability of such schemes varied globally. The COVID-19 pandemic had demonstrated that it was critically important to have employment injury schemes in place to support workers and prevent the spread of the virus. Nothing would prevent the Committee from including income protection of workers in the context of biological hazards. Several ILO OSH standards included references to social security, such as Article 4(3)(g) of Convention No. 187, Article 21 of the Safety and Health in Agriculture Convention, 2001 (No. 184), Article 11(3) of the Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention, 1977 (No. 148), and Article 12 of the Guarding of Machinery Convention, 1963 (No. 119).
- 622. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew the subamendment and agreed to adopt the text to be inserted in the Recommendation but wanted to place on record that her group remained of the view that the issue of income protection fell outside of the scope of the Committee's mandate, as it was not related to biological hazards.
- 623. The amendment was adopted as subamended and the new clause would be inserted in Part C of the proposed Conclusions.

- 624. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert a new clause that read "ensuring protection from dismissal if, while complying with monitoring, travel restrictions, quarantine or isolation orders, or for related preventive or curative treatments, they have to be absent from work."
- 625. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that her group could not support the proposed text because it was not related to biological hazards per se and therefore outside the scope of the Committee's mandate.
- 626. The Government member of Algeria supported the amendment. The amendment fell within the normative scope of the Committee as it was related to the world of work. The examples referred to in the amendment were all examples of force majeure, and workers impacted needed to be protected against dismissal.
- 627. The Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, did not support the amendment and said that workers' rights were sufficiently covered in the section entitled "Rights and duties of workers and their representatives".
- 628. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States supported the new clause and proposed its insertion in the Recommendation. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of the Islamic Republic of Iran; Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and of China supported that proposal.

- 629. The Government member of Namibia supported the position of the Africa group and proposed inserting the text in clause (j) of point 29.
- 630. The Government member of the United States noted that while the amendment fell within the mandate of the Committee, her government could not support the insertion of the proposed text because it had an “employment at will” system, which allowed workers to be dismissed for any reason or no reason at all.
- 631. In an effort to address those concerns, the Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to replace “ensuring” with “endeavouring to provide”. The Government member of the United States said that she could support that subamendment and, seconded by the Government member of Australia, proposed to add “in accordance with national law and practice” after “endeavour to provide”. The Worker Vice-Chairperson suggested using the words “as appropriate” instead of “in accordance with national law and practice”.
- 632. The Employer Vice-Chairperson expressed a preference for the proposal put forward by the Government member of the United States but could also support the subamendment by the Workers’ group. Her group could also agree to inserting the new clause in the Recommendation, although it did not believe that dismissal protection fell within the remit of the Committee and continued to have reservations about allowing discussion on the topic. She stressed that her group remained of the view that the issue of dismissal fell outside of the scope of the Committee’s mandate as it is part of national labour legislation.
- 633. The amendment was adopted as subamended and the new clause would be inserted in Part C of the proposed Conclusions.
- 634. The Legal Adviser, in response to queries concerning the receivability of certain amendments in light of the Committee’s mandate, in particular whether the Committee had the right to consider amendments related to income protection or protection from dismissal, noted that there was no rule stating what could or could not be discussed by a Committee. Any amendment that was submitted in due form and within the time limits was receivable and, if properly seconded, could be introduced for discussion. Whether income protection or protection from dismissal fell outside the scope of biological hazards could be a reason to oppose the amendments concerned, but could not and did not forfeit the Committee’s right to duly examine those amendments. The Office had already provided examples of OSH instruments containing elements that touched upon social security matters. However, even if no other OSH instrument happened to address social security-related issues, from a legal perspective, nothing would prevent the Committee from debating such proposals.

Title of section 4 and point 17

A.97, A.96, A.98 and A.99

- 635. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced four amendments proposing to delete the entire section. She noted that the language was already included in Convention No. 161 and Recommendation No. 171 and was not relevant in the instruments under discussion. Retaining the language on occupational health services in the Convention would make it difficult for Member States who had not ratified Convention No. 161 to ratify it. Only 36 Member States had ratified Convention No. 161.
- 636. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendments. The section was important in the proposed Convention and fell within its scope.

- 637. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, did not support the amendments.
- 638. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, noted that when confronted with biological hazards in the working environment, it was key to monitor the health of workers. Health surveillance was an important issue addressed by the instrument under discussion. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed that it was important to monitor the health of workers. However, in order to make it easier for Member States to ratify the Convention, employers considered that it was better not to include a text already covered in another instrument with a low level of ratification. If the section was not deleted, it could be moved to the Recommendation.
- 639. The amendments were withdrawn and the title of section 4 – Occupational health and occupational health services – was adopted.

Point 17, introductory sentence

A.162

- 640. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert “in line with the requirements of ILO Convention No. 161,” after “working environment”.
- 641. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment and said that her group preferred an amendment (A.111) proposed by the EU Member States.
- 642. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, did not support the amendment. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, the United States, and China did not support the amendment and aligned themselves with the views expressed by the Employers’ group.
- 643. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced a subamendment to insert “in accordance with national law and practice” after “Convention No. 161,”. The Employer Vice-Chairperson could support the subamendment, but not the amendment.
- 644. The subamendment and the amendment were withdrawn.

- 645. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to insert “in accordance with national law and practice” after “working environment” to ensure consistency with other points adopted and facilitate the adaptability of the Convention.
- 646. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Employer Vice-Chairperson, and the Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran supported the amendment.
- 647. The amendment was adopted.
- 648. Two amendments (A.160 and A.163) were withdrawn and the introductory sentence of point 17 was adopted as amended.

Point 17(a)

- 649. Two amendments (A.161 and A.172) were withdrawn.

A.171

- 650. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert “suitably resourced and sufficiently skilled” after “progressively extend”. To be effective, it was necessary for occupational health services to be adequately resourced and skilled.
- 651. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the United States did not support the amendment.
- 652. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment and expressed a preference for the Office text to ensure consistency with the text in Convention No. 161.
- 653. The amendment was withdrawn.

A.147

- 654. The Government member of the United States, seconded by the Government member of the United Kingdom, introduced an amendment for the clause to read “progressively extend occupational health services to workers and occupations at a significant risk of material impairment of health due to biological hazards”. He proposed a subamendment to replace “significant” with “high” to align with previously adopted text and to introduce the element of risk (see A.146).
- 655. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment as subamended.
- 656. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, did not support the subamendment or the amendment. Input from occupational health services was required when workers were exposed to biological hazards irrespective of the intensity of the risk.
- 657. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Australia, and China, did not support the subamendment or the amendment.
- 658. The subamendment and the amendment were withdrawn.

- 659. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to add “with the aim of providing occupational health services to all workers, including through primary care” at the end of the clause.
- 660. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment because the meaning of “primary care” could result in confusion among Member States.
- 661. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Saudi Arabia, Tunisia and the Islamic Republic of Iran preferred the Office text.
- 662. The Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, said that the integration of occupational health services within primary healthcare was particularly important in low resource areas, and that the text should be included in the Recommendation to ensure that all workers were covered by occupational health services. The Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed and said that it was essential that primary healthcare was available to all workers, including those in the informal economy. Delivering occupational health services through primary care was an important way to progressively extend occupational health services to all workers.

- 663. In response to the request by the Government member of China to provide examples of primary care, the Worker Vice-Chairperson explained that primary care included general practitioners and nurses who have been trained in occupational health services and could provide health services to communities who have been exposed to biological hazards in the workplace.
- 664. The amendment was withdrawn and clause (a) of point 17 was adopted without amendment.

- 665. An amendment (A.149) was withdrawn.

A.112

- 666. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed an amendment to add “as appropriate” after “facilitate”.
- 667. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment but asked the Office to clarify the meaning of “labour infrastructure”.
- 668. A representative of the Secretariat clarified that the term “labour infrastructure” should be understood as any services or institutions under the system of labour administration with a responsibility for OSH at the workplace, in the sense of national OSH system under Article 1(c) of Convention No. 187.
- 669. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment.
- 670. The amendment was withdrawn and clause (b) of point 17 was adopted without amendment.

Title of section 5

- 671. The title of section 5 – Data collection, recording and notification of occupational diseases and accidents - was adopted.

A.216, A.215, A.213, A.214 and A.212

- 672. The Government member of Switzerland, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Japan and Türkiye, introduced five amendments to delete the entire point 18 because the content was already covered in Article 11, clauses (c), (d) and (e) of Convention No. 155.
- 673. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendments.
- 674. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, China, and the Islamic Republic of Iran did not support the amendments. They stressed the importance of reliable data collection to provide governments with good insight into the risks present at the workplace that in turn could inform appropriate policies on biological hazards.
- 675. The amendments were withdrawn.

Point 18, introductory sentence

A.197

- 676. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to move the introductory sentence to before point 38, and to modify the text to read:

The competent authorities should, by methods appropriate to national conditions and practice, and by stages as necessary having regard to national conditions and practice and in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers, establish, implement and periodically review procedures on data collection, recording and notification of occupational diseases and accidents, and, if applicable, compensation.

- 677. While the Protocol of 2002 to the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981, had been ratified only by 19 countries, the language of the Protocol informed the text under discussion. To ensure as much flexibility as possible, it was preferable to move the text to before point 38, which dealt with the matter of recording of occupational diseases.
- 678. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the United States did not support the amendment. They did not support moving the introductory sentence to the Recommendation because data collection in the context of biological hazards was of the utmost importance and needed to be included in the Convention.
- 679. The amendment was withdrawn and the introductory sentence of point 18 was adopted without amendment.
- 680. The amendments submitted by the Employers' group to delete all clauses of point 18 (A.198, A.199, A.200 and A.201) were withdrawn in consistency with the previous decision.

Point 18(a)

- 681. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to ensure that the language used was consistent with Article 3 of the Protocol of 2002 to Convention No. 155. The text would read:
- (a) the reporting, recording, notification and investigation of occupational accidents, occupational diseases and, as appropriate, dangerous occurrences, commuting accidents and suspected cases of occupational diseases related to biological hazards in the working environment;
- 682. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the inclusion of commuting accidents and suspected cases of occupational diseases because they were not covered by Convention No.155.
- 683. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Australia preferred the original text.
- 684. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced a subamendment to delete "commuting accidents and" but insisted on the importance of retaining a reference to "suspected cases of occupational diseases related to biological hazards in the working environment".

- 685. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the subamendment, but the Employer Vice-Chairperson pointed out that it would be challenging to document “suspected cases of occupational disease” and that her group preferred the original text.
- 686. The subamendment and the amendment were withdrawn.

- 687. The Government member of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela introduced an amendment to replace after the word “dangerous”, “occurrences” with “incidents”, which was more aligned with common OSH terminology.
- 688. The Employer Vice-Chairperson expressed a preference for the Office text, because the term used in the Protocol was “dangerous occurrences”, but noted that her group could support the amendment should it enjoy majority support.
- 689. The Government member of the United States supported the amendment.
- 690. The amendment was adopted and clause (a) of point 18 was adopted as amended.

Point 18(b)

A.196

- 691. The Government Member of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, seconded by the Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, proposed an amendment to replace “occurrences” with “incidents” to ensure the use of appropriate terminology, citing the Protocol of 2002 to Convention No. 155.
- 692. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed to refer the matter to the Drafting Committee.
- 693. A representative of the Secretariat explained that the definition of “dangerous occurrence” was in the Protocol of 2002 to Convention No. 155 and that the definition for “incident” was provided by the ILO Guidelines on occupational safety and health management systems: ILO-OSH 2001. He noted the lack of definition for “dangerous incidents,” and confirmed it could be deferred to the Drafting Committee. He further noted that “dangerous occurrences” was not always translated into French and Spanish with the same words in different ILO instruments.
- 694. The Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed to defer the matter to the Drafting Committee and stated that the word “injuries” was cited several times in the Protocol to Convention No.155.
- 695. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Singapore, noted their preference to be consistent with the language used in the Protocol.
- 696. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Japan did not have a preference.
- 697. The amendment was withdrawn.

A.217

- 698. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert “disaggregated by gender,” after “annual statistics,” noting that it was useful to understand the differences in the impact on both women and men, and to be in line with the ILO resolution concerning the promotion of gender equality, pay equity and maternity protection (2004).

- 699. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that her group preferred to listen to the opinions of the Governments first and recalled that the text went further than that of Convention No. 155.
- 700. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, the United Kingdom, Canada and the United States supported the amendment. The Government member of the United States made an appeal for flexibility and understanding, highlighting that data by default was collected on men. As biological hazards could have serious impacts on women, data should be disaggregated to be able to protect half of the population from harm.
- 701. The Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Egypt, the Islamic Republic of Iran, and Algeria did not support the amendment.
- 702. The Government member of Zimbabwe, on behalf of the Africa group, proposed a subamendment to replace “gender” by “sex,” to help reach consensus. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Government member of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Türkiye, and the Islamic Republic of Iran supported the subamendment.
- 703. The Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed disappointment about moving away from the accepted language of “gender,” but accepted the subamendment.
- 704. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

A.218

- 705. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to insert “any other injuries or adverse health effects,” and to replace “caused by” with “related to,” not to constrain the effects of exposure to biological hazards.
- 706. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment, noting that the existing text was sufficiently clear.
- 707. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Islamic Republic of Iran supported the amendment.
- 708. The Government member of Japan, seconded by the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed a subamendment to insert “as appropriate” before “any other injuries or adverse health effects.”
- 709. The Government member of the United States supported the subamendment and, seconded by the Government member of Japan, proposed replacing “and” with “or”.
- 710. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the text as subamended.
- 711. The Employer Vice-Chairperson could accept the text as subamended but preferred retaining “caused by” than inserting “related to”.
- 712. The Government member of Singapore did not support the subamendments or the amendment.
- 713. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of the Islamic Republic of Iran, and Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, supported the subamendment of the Employers’ group.
- 714. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Singapore, Türkiye, and China did not support the amendment as subamended and preferred retaining the original text.

- 715. In response to a question by the Worker Vice-Chairperson about the appropriateness of using the expression “any other injuries”, a representative of the Secretariat explained that Convention No.155 and its Protocol referred to statistics on “occupational accidents, occupational diseases and as appropriate, dangerous occurrences”.
- 716. The subamendments and the amendment were withdrawn and clause (b) of point 18 was adopted as amended.

Point 18(c)

- 717. An amendment (A.184) was withdrawn and clause (c) of point 18 was adopted.

Point 18(d)

- 718. An amendment (A.174) was withdrawn.

A.176

- 719. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States proposed an amendment to delete “annual” and insert “in accordance with the frequency defined in that policy,” after “working environment” to ensure coherence with national legislation.
- 720. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that her group was flexible.
- 721. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Singapore, the United States, the Philippines and China supported the amendment.
- 722. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment, noting that the frequency could not be less than annually, citing the fundamental Convention No. 155 and its Protocol.
- 723. The amendment was withdrawn and clause (d) of point 18 was adopted without amendment.

New clause after point 18(d)

- 724. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to insert a new clause that read:
 - the determination of the appropriate duration for maintaining records on occupational diseases as required by the Convention, taking into account the latency periods of occupational diseases.
- 725. It was important to keep records on occupational diseases for an appropriate duration, as the latency period for some diseases could span several years.
- 726. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, noted their flexibility.
- 727. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, and the Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the United States, Singapore, the United Kingdom, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Australia and China supported the amendment.
- 728. The amendment was adopted and a new clause after clause (d) of point 18 was adopted.

New point after point 18

729. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to insert a new point that read:

In determining the appropriate duration for maintaining records on occupational diseases as required by the new Convention, Members should, in accordance with national law and practice, take account of chronic work-related conditions and the latency periods of occupational diseases.

730. As the proposed text was similar to the one in the amendment that had been adopted to insert a new clause at the end of point 18, he proposed to withdraw the amendment submitted by his group and subamend the text of the new clause to replace “conditions” with “diseases”. That would ensure consistency and provide coverage for chronic work-related diseases that lead to disability at an advanced age and continued to worsen even after exposure.

731. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment, noting that it was redundant, and highlighted that procedurally it was not correct to subamend a new clause that had already been adopted.

732. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the subamendment.

733. The amendment was withdrawn and point 18 was adopted as amended.

A.202, A.203 and A.204

734. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced three amendments to delete the introductory sentence and clauses (a) and (b). The Employers’ group wanted a flexible and simple Convention that did not duplicate provisions from existing instruments. Recommendation No. 194 included the content of the point and it did not need to be repeated.

735. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudia Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and Australia did not support the amendment.

736. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, also did not support the amendment, as covering all aspects – from prevention to compensation for injuries and diseases related to biological hazards – in a single instrument was essential.

737. The Government member of the United States did not support the amendment as it was incompatible with “open systems”, such as in the United States, where no list existed, and any disease could be considered as occupational if it could be linked to the work environment.

738. The Employer Vice-Chairperson pointed out that including the provision in the Convention rather than the Recommendation would make it harder to ratify and hence would reduce, rather than increase, workers’ protection. Nonetheless, she withdrew the amendments.

Point 19, introductory sentence

- 739. The Government member of the United States, seconded by the Government member of the United Kingdom, introduced an amendment to insert "If applicable," at the beginning of the sentence and ", as appropriate," after "standards". She recognized that many countries had a list of occupational diseases, but others did not. Therefore, it was important to modify the language as suggested to accommodate different national systems.
- 740. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and Saudia Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, did not support the amendment.
- 741. The Employer Vice-Chairperson indicated her flexibility.
- 742. Noting the lack of support in the room, the Government member of the United States, seconded by the Government member of the United Kingdom, proposed a subamendment to delete "if applicable". However, the inclusion of "as appropriate" was necessary as it referred to compliance with relevant international standards, and not all countries had ratified those standards. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, did not support the subamendment.
- 743. A representative of the Secretariat explained that "relevant international standards" referred to Convention No. 121 and Recommendations Nos 121 and 194 and clarified that the term "as appropriate" would give Member States flexibility regarding the relevant standards which they considered as a reference.
- 744. The subamendment and the amendment were withdrawn.

- 745. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to insert ", in accordance with national law and practice," after "authorities". It was important for the EU that the systems for compensation of occupational diseases be determined at national level.
- 746. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries and Singapore supported the amendment.
- 747. The amendment was adopted.
- 748. An amendment (A.211) was withdrawn and the introductory sentence of point 19 was adopted.

Point 19(a)

- 749. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add "noting the ILO's List of Occupational Diseases Recommendation, 2002 (No. 194) and Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121)" at the end of the clause.

- 750. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that reference to those instruments would be more appropriate in point 39 of the Recommendation since they provided guidance. In fact, the text prepared by the Office included those references in point 39.
- 751. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and Singapore did not support the amendment.
- 752. The amendment was withdrawn and clause (a) of point 19 was adopted without amendment.

Point 19(b)

- 753. Clause (b) of point 19 was adopted and point 19 was adopted.

Title of section 6 and point 20

- 754. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced amendments to delete the title of section 6 and point 20, which she believed should be part of the Recommendation. There was a specific Convention (No. 121) related to benefits in the event of occupational accidents and diseases and approaches varied between countries. The provision would therefore not be appropriate in a Convention concerning biological hazards in the working environment.
- 755. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Singapore and the United States did not support the amendments.
- 756. The amendments were withdrawn and the title of section 6 – Employment injury benefits – was adopted.

A.210

- 757. The Government member of Switzerland, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Japan and Türkiye, introduced an amendment to reposition “, in accordance with national law and practice,” from the end of the point to the beginning, after “should”, and to insert “a confirmed” before “occupational exposure”. He explained that the causal link between exposure to a biological hazard and the health impact on a worker was often very difficult to prove. The intention was to clarify the meaning and make application of the Convention more feasible, including with respect to administrative decisions taken by health insurance companies.
- 758. The Employer Vice-Chairperson indicated her group’s flexibility and the Government member of the United States supported the amendment.
- 759. The Worker Vice-Chairperson preferred the Office text but was flexible, and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, did not support the amendment.
- 760. The amendment was withdrawn.

- 761. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace “or” by “and/or” as some countries’ social security systems did not include both employment injury benefits and compensation.
- 762. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Indonesia preferred the original text, and the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, was flexible.
- 763. In response to the request by the Employer Vice-Chairperson to clarify the meaning of the terms “benefits” and “compensation” in ILO instruments, a representative of the Secretariat explained that the term “benefits” was used in relation to social security systems while “compensation” normally referred to payments made by employers in the absence of a social security scheme.
- 764. The amendment was withdrawn.

- 765. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add at the end of the point: “noting that entitlement should apply to all workers, regardless of their employment relationship and workers in the informal economy”. The wording was taken from the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204), and the aim was to guarantee the protection of the many millions of informal workers and those in other employment arrangements around the world who were excluded. That entitlement would be the responsibility of Governments.
- 766. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the Committee had already decided not to refer to workers in the informal economy, whose needs were beyond the scope of a standard on biological hazards and should be addressed by other ILO instruments. Her group did not support the amendment.
- 767. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Indonesia and Singapore did not support the amendment.
- 768. The amendment was not adopted and point 20 was adopted without amendment.

New point after point 20

- 769. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add a new point with the following text and suggested that it could be included in the Recommendation after point 41:

Members, taking into account national circumstances, should promote OSH strategies that aim at zero work-related deaths and the prevention of work-related injuries and illnesses, including those related to biological hazards, as well as access to relevant social security benefits, ensuring protection for all workers.
- 770. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, noted that the proposed text should preferably be included in the Preamble but was flexible.
- 771. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported inserting the new point in the Recommendation.

- 772. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not agree with the content of the amendment as it was already covered under point 12, national policies. In consequence, her group did not support the amendment. Moreover, the contents of the text was also already included in the sections “Preventive measures” (first part of the text) and in point 20 (second part of the text).
- 773. The amendment was adopted, and the new point would be inserted in Part C of the proposed Conclusions.

Title of section 7

- 774. The title of section 7 – Enforcement of laws and regulations – was adopted.

- 775. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert “including prevention and supportive measures” after “ensuring compliance”. The dual role of the labour inspection system was set out in Article 3 of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), namely, to secure the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work, and to supply technical information and advice to employers and workers concerning the most effective means of complying with the legal provisions.
- 776. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Canada, China and Indonesia supported the amendment.
- 777. The amendment was adopted.

- 778. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert “with allocation of the adequate resources and the support needed for these functions” after “ensuring compliance”.
- 779. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Indonesia supported the amendment.
- 780. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and the United States did not support the amendment because the issue was covered by the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81).
- 781. The Government member of the United States requested clarification from the Secretariat on whether other ILO Conventions referred to the allocation of “adequate resources”. She expressed her government’s strong objection to the amendment. Requiring the allocation of adequate resources in a Convention was unprecedented.
- 782. A representative of the Secretariat explained that there were several provisions in Convention No. 81 that referred to the allocation of resources, although none used the term “adequate”. For example, Article 10 stated that the number of labour inspectors should be “sufficient”, while Article 11 referred to “suitably equipped offices”. Article 5 of Convention No. 184 provided that Member States should ensure “an adequate and appropriate system of inspection” for agricultural workplaces and that the system be provided with “adequate means”.

- 783. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that in Article 10 of Convention No. 81 the reference to a “sufficient” number of labour inspectors had the same intention as “adequate resources”. The amendment did not call for a certain amount of funding, but it was important that Member States ratifying the Convention commit to allocating adequate resources to support the labour inspection system.
- 784. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, expressed flexibility about the amendment.
- 785. The Government member of the United States proposed a subamendment to insert “with allocation of the adequate resources and the support needed for these functions” before “where applicable, other mechanisms for ensuring compliance including prevention...”. She noted that while it was reasonable to expect Member States to allocate adequate resources to labour inspection, the same could not be said for the allocation of resources for prevention and supportive measures.
- 786. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, did not support the subamendment.
- 787. The Government member of the United States recognized that her subamendment did not garner support from the Committee and reiterated that she could not support the amendment.
- 788. The amendment was adopted and point 21 was adopted as amended.

A.179

- 789. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, noted that the proposed text for point 22 could be interpreted as stating that all labour inspectors should undergo training on biological hazards in the workplace. Therefore, she introduced an amendment to divide the point into an introductory sentence with two clauses as follows:

The competent authorities should ensure that:

 - (a) labour inspectors with duties related to biological hazards and risks in the working environment and, as appropriate, other officials are trained on biological hazards in the working environment;
 - (b) labour inspectors, in assessing compliance with national laws and regulations concerning biological hazards in the working environment, promote a systematic approach to occupational safety and health.
- 790. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. The text would require further modifications to ensure that such a provision could be implemented by governments. In addition, the content of clause (b) was already addressed in point 41 and should be discussed when that point would be considered.
- 791. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the United States supported the amendment.

- 792. The Government member of Japan introduced a subamendment to insert “with duties related to biological hazards and risks in the working environment” in clause (b) after “labour inspectors”.
- 793. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment because many countries did not have labour inspectors specialized in biological hazards. She proposed replacing in clause (a) “are trained” with “acquire the necessary competencies” to broaden the scope, and deleting “systematic approach” in clause (b), because it could be interpreted as requiring a management system approach to OSH, which did not fall under the functions of the labour inspectorate. Article 3(1) of Convention No. 81 listed the functions of labour inspection and requiring a “systematic approach” went beyond what was required by that Convention.
- 794. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the United States and Japan did not support the subamendment introduced by the Employers’ group. The Government member of Belgium said that an effective labour inspection system required a systematic approach.
- 795. The Government member of United States noted that labour inspectors needed to promote a systemic approach to OSH to perform their advisory duties regarding biological hazards effectively.
- 796. In response to a request from the Employer Vice-Chairperson to clarify the meaning of the term “systematic approach”, a representative of the Secretariat explained that the term could be applied to the approach that employers adopt to the management of OSH, or to the integrated and comprehensive approach of labour inspectorates towards their duties, which involved looking into all possible causes of harm. “Systematic approach” was not the language used in ILO standards.
- 797. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that her group was not prepared to withdraw its subamendment.
- 798. The amendment was adopted as subamended by the Government member of Japan.
- 799. Two amendments (A.207 and A.209) were withdrawn and point 22 was adopted as amended.

- 800. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment proposing the deletion of point 23 because its content was already covered in other Conventions and addressed in national legislation. The issue of sanctions or penalties was linked to general enforcement and not specifically to biological hazards.
- 801. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of the United States, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, did not support the amendment.
- 802. The amendment was not adopted.

A.180

- 803. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed an amendment to insert “in accordance with national law and practice” after “apply”. She noted that the issue of penalties fell under the competence of national authorities, which meant that the imposition of such penalties should align with national law and practice.

- 804. The Worker Vice-Chairperson preferred the original text, but indicated that his group was flexible on the amendment.
- 805. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Switzerland, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Indonesia, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the amendment.
- 806. The amendment was adopted.
- 807. An amendment (A.193) was withdrawn and Point 23 was adopted as amended.

New point after point 23

- 808. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add a new point to read:

Recognizing many biological hazards create cross-border risks, Members shall ensure effective remedy for workers, from national or multinational employers, which may include apologies, restitution, rehabilitation, financial or non-financial compensation and punitive sanctions (whether criminal or administrative, such as fines), as well as the prevention of harm through, for example, injunctions or guarantees of non-repetition.
- 809. Biological hazards created cross-border risks, which required the need for effective remedy for workers from both national and multinational employers. He subamended the proposed text to replace “ensure” with “promote”. The language was taken from the MNE Declaration and from the UN Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights. He proposed to insert the text in the Recommendation.
- 810. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. Her group strongly objected to including text from an explanatory note to the UN Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights, which was not a legally binding document and not linked to biological hazards.
- 811. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and Türkiye, did not support the amendment as subamended.
- 812. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that it was important that national and multinational employers remedied human rights violations, and that his group would not withdraw the amendment.
- 813. The amendment was not adopted.

Title of section 8

- 814. The title of section 8 – Duties and responsibilities of employers – was adopted.

Point 24

815. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to ensure that the relevant levels of control would be appropriately mentioned. She subamended the proposed text by introducing the corrections indicated in bold:

Employers should ensure that biological hazards in the working environment are eliminated or replaced, or where this is not technically practicable having regard to the activity, biological hazards ~~at least the risks are reduced~~ to a level as low as necessary to adequately protect the health and safety of workers ~~minimum as far as is reasonably practicable by taking the appropriate and necessary preventive and protective measures.~~

816. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment because employers could only be responsible for biological hazards arising from industrial activities; they could not be made responsible for pandemics. Employers preferred the original text, which was in accordance with Convention No. 155.
817. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment as subamended because all actors had an obligation to reduce biological hazards to a level that would adequately protect the health and safety of workers.
818. The Government member of Zambia proposed to replace the word “replaced” with “substituted” and the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported that proposal, since it reflected the hierarchy of controls.
819. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government member of Japan did not support the amendment and subamendment because it was not possible to substitute a hazard, but only the agents causing such hazard or the exposure to them. The issue was therefore related to the risk. The Government member of Zimbabwe also did not support the amendment and subamendment.
820. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed to delete the word “substituted” that had been inserted by the Workers’ group and to replace “hazards” with “risks” before “are reduced to a level”. The Government member of the United States, seconded by the Government member of Australia, suggested instead to insert “risks due to” before “biological hazards”, to improve consistency.
821. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the proposal by the United States and stated that her group could accept the amendment if the words “so far as is reasonably practicable” and “under their control” from the original text were kept.
822. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendments by the Employers’ group and suggested deleting “due to” after “risks”, to reflect the hierarchy of controls.
823. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and Canada did not support the text as subamended as it had become too complex and suggested going back to the original text.
824. The Employer Vice-Chairperson expressed flexibility for returning to the Office text or adopting the subamendments. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and the United States supported the subamendments.

- 825. The subamendments and the amendment were withdrawn.

- 826. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace “working environments” by “workplaces”, to be more accurate.
- 827. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. The original text was clear, and the term “working environment” was used throughout the Conclusions and was consistent with Convention No. 155.
- 828. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, did not support the amendment for consistency reasons.
- 829. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that the term “workplace” was used in Convention No. 155.
- 830. The amendment was withdrawn, and another amendment (A.221) was withdrawn.

- 831. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert “arising from work activities”, after “biological hazards”, because preventive and protective measures applicable to risks arising from work activities were different from those arising from external events, as had been the case during the COVID-19 pandemic. The fundamental Conventions, including Convention No.155, did not cover pandemics.
- 832. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and the United States did not support the amendment.
- 833. The amendment was withdrawn.

- 834. The Government member of Japan, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Switzerland and Türkiye, introduced an amendment to add “or when not, take all reasonable and practicable measures to control and minimize the risk” at the end of the point to address cases when it was not reasonably practicable to take measures. The wording was borrowed from point 25(b) and was kept as simple as possible.
- 835. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. The hierarchy of control would be addressed later in the text.
- 836. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, also supported the amendment and suggested replacing “when not” with “when this is not possible”.
- 837. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and the Islamic Republic of Iran did not support the amendment and the subamendment.
- 838. The subamendment and the amendment were withdrawn and point 24 was adopted without amendment.

New point after point 24

- 839. The Government member of Japan, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Switzerland and Türkiye, introduced an amendment to insert a new point and subamended it for the text to read:

Given the wide range of the definition, approach to each hazard should be optimized based on risk assessment ~~by each Member~~ that includes the characteristics and degree of concern of the biological substance.

- 840. They proposed that the same text be inserted also after point 10.
- 841. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment and the Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and the United States supported the amendment. The Government member of the United States also agreed with including the same text after point 10.
- 842. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment.
- 843. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, suggested replacing “Given the wide range of the definition, approach to each hazard” with “Preventive and protective measures” and deleting “risk assessment by each Member that includes”.
- 844. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the further subamendment as it changed the meaning of the original proposal by no longer recognizing the overly broad nature of the definition. Regardless of this amendment, she also highlighted that similar language should be included under point 4 on the definition of biological hazard.
- 845. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of the United States supported the subamendment.
- 846. The amendment was adopted as subamended and the new point was adopted.

Point 25, introductory sentence

A.246

- 847. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to move the text to insert it before point 42, under the Recommendation, because it would be difficult to ratify a Convention that included too many details. The amendment also proposed inserting “arising from work activities” after “working environment”.
- 848. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment as the point should remain in the text of the Convention.
- 849. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, did not support the amendment, explaining that employers had specific duties and responsibilities with regard to biological hazards.
- 850. The Employer Vice-Chairperson clarified that the intention was not to indicate that employers did not have duties and responsibilities. Article 16 of Convention No. 155 established clear responsibilities for employers.

- 851. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and Australia did not support the amendment.
- 852. The amendment was not adopted. The Employer Vice-Chairperson requested to put on record her group's position. In consistency with that decision, she withdrew the proposal to move all the clauses of point 25 to before point 42 from other amendments (A.247, A.248, A.249, A.250, A.252, A.254, A.255, A.256 and A.258).

- 853. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete “and applicable collective agreements” because the Convention should only refer to national standards established by Member States.
- 854. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, China and the United States did not support amendment.
- 855. The amendment was withdrawn.

A.236

- 856. The Government member of Switzerland, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Japan, and Türkiye, introduced an amendment to make the provision more specific by inserting “in line with Articles 16(3), 17 and 21 of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155) and” after “protective measures”.
- 857. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 858. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Saudi Arabia did not support the amendment as it was not appropriate to mention a fundamental Convention only partially.
- 859. The amendment was withdrawn.

A.273

- 860. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to insert “as a result an adequate risk assessment” before “in particular:”
- 861. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and Australia supported the amendment.
- 862. The Employer Vice-Chairperson indicated that her group was flexible.
- 863. The amendment was adopted.

A.222

- 864. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert “ensuring gender-sensitive perspective” before “, in particular”. There were around 16 ILO instruments where the term “gender” was used and measures should differentiate between men and women as consequences could be different.

- 865. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that her group could not support the amendment because that was not the appropriate place to include it.
- 866. The Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Türkiye and Algeria did not support the amendment because the addition was not appropriate.
- 867. The Government members of the United States and Canada supported the amendment as it was important to account of different requirements for women and men.
- 868. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced a subamendment to replace “gender sensitive perspective” with “gender responsive perspective”.
- 869. The Government member of Chile supported the amendment as subamended, but suggested inserting the new text after the word “measures”.
- 870. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of the United Kingdom and Australia supported the subamendments.
- 871. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, preferred the original text.
- 872. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendments as they changed the original meaning and employers would not be able to implement such measures. She suggested to add “as appropriate” before the “gender responsive perspective”.
- 873. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the further subamendment and so did the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, and Türkiye.
- 874. The Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Algeria and of the Islamic Republic of Iran indicated that they recognized the need to differentiate between men and women but had reservations on the term “gender”. The word “sex” could be used instead.
- 875. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, stated that the term gender was used elsewhere, and it would be appropriate to keep consistency. The Government members of China, the United Kingdom, the United States and Australia agreed that “gender responsive” was the term accepted by the Organization.
- 876. The amendment was adopted as subamended and the introductory sentence of point 25 was adopted as amended.

Point 25(a)

- 877. Two amendments (A.223 and A.253) fell as related language had already been included in point 16(a).

A.249

- 878. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete “in consultation with workers and their representatives,” after “establishing” to improve the quality of the text and to avoid repetition.
- 879. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment, noting that it was not in line with established language of the ILO. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Canada did not support the amendment.

- 880. The amendment was not adopted.

A.250

- 881. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to delete “taking due account of sectors and occupations at a higher risk of exposure and workers with certain conditions who may require special protection”, noting that: (a) it was a redundancy to say that an employer in a sector had to take account of the sector; and (b) there was a need to simplify the text to promote implementation.
- 882. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment and proposed a subamendment to, instead of deleting the phrase, replacing it with “taking due account of workers who may require special protection.”
- 883. The Employer Vice-Chairperson accepted the proposal, but suggested inserting “with certain conditions,” before “who may require special protection.”
- 884. The Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported the amendment as subamended.
- 885. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the United States supported the subamendment proposed by the Workers’ group, but not the further subamendment of the Employers’ group.
- 886. The further subamendment was withdrawn and the amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 887. Clause (a) of point 25 was adopted as amended.

Point 25(b)

- 888. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to insert “including risks while commuting and in sanitary installations, canteens and accommodation provided by the employer,” before “taking due account,” to be in line with Convention No.161.
- 889. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, and the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Indonesia, and Singapore did not support the amendment.
- 890. The amendment was not adopted.
- 891. An amendment (A.251) was withdrawn and clause (b) of point 25 was adopted without amendment.

Point 25(c)

- 892. An amendment (A.237) was withdrawn.

- 893. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace “where risks due to biological hazards cannot be controlled through other measures” with “according to the hierarchy of controls” to simplify the text.
- 894. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, noted their flexibility. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, supported the amendment.
- 895. The amendment was adopted.

- 896. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to insert “and clothing that takes account of the characteristics of the wearer and ensures a good fit,” and to insert “and provide training in its use” to reflect Convention No.155 regarding gender-specific differences for personal protective equipment (PPE). The Government member of Switzerland supported the amendment.
- 897. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the first insertion regarding clothing but supported the second insertion regarding training. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Singapore aligned themselves with the Employers’ group.
- 898. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed to move “according to the hierarchy of controls” after “adequate personal protective equipment” to ensure accuracy. The text would read:
 - (c) providing, maintaining and replacing, as necessary, at no cost to the workers, adequate personal protective equipment according to the hierarchy of controls, and provide training in its use.
- 899. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed to insert “as appropriate” after “hierarchy of controls.” The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, did not support the further subamendment.
- 900. The further subamendment was withdrawn and the amendment was adopted as subamended. Clause (c) of point 25 was adopted as amended.

- 901. An amendment (A.254) was withdrawn.

- 902. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed an amendment to replace “workers’ health” with “in accordance with national law and practice, and on the basis of a risk assessment, provide health surveillance of workers”. She emphasized that regular surveillance should be done in accordance with national law and practice and on the basis of risk assessments.
- 903. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Employer Vice-Chairperson, and the Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Indonesia, Singapore and India supported the amendment.

904. The amendment was adopted and clause (d) of point 25 was adopted as amended.

- 905. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete “including the availability of appropriate personal protective equipment” after “control measures” to simplify the text.
- 906. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, did not support the amendment, noting that it mixed two different concepts – checking and supervising – and was not appropriate in that context. The Government member of China aligned herself with the Government member of Chile.
- 907. The Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported the amendment.
- 908. The amendment was withdrawn and clause (e) of point 25 was adopted without amendment.

Point 25(f)

A.226

- 909. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to delete “safety and health” before “representatives,” to include different types of workers’ representatives.
- 910. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and Indonesia supported the amendment.
- 911. The Government member of Japan noted that if “safety and health” was deleted, the information, instruction and training referred to at the beginning of the sentence might be misunderstood to have to be provided to all workers’ representatives.
- 912. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to insert “at company level” after “representatives” to make the text more specific. The Government member of the United States stated that it could be more appropriate to use the term “in the undertaking”, which was used in Convention No. 155, and the Employer Vice-Chairperson subamended her proposal accordingly. The Government member of Algeria said that it would be more accurate to use the expression “the employing organization”.
- 913. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, the Islamic Republic of Iran, India and Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, did not support the subamendment. The Government member of Belgium pointed out that in another section the expression “workers and their representatives” had been used and that in Convention No.170 the term was “workers’ representatives”.
- 914. All the subamendments were withdrawn and the amendment was adopted.
- 915. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted her group’s disagreement and highlighted that the point should refer only to workers in the undertaking, not to workers who were not employees of the undertaking.

- 916. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to replace “as well as to workers’ safety and health representatives, at suitable and regular intervals, on paid work time” with “as needed,” to simplify the text and provide flexibility to cover a variety of contexts.
- 917. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment, noting the importance of remaining specific on how and when training could take place, in line with Convention No. 155. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, the United States and India also did not support the amendment.
- 918. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to revert to the original text and delete “on paid work time,”. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the United States did not support the subamendment.
- 919. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed add “according to national laws and regulations,” after “on paid work time”. The Government member of Canada did not support the subamendment and highlighted that the introductory sentence of point 25 already included “according to national law”.
- 920. The subamendment and the amendment were withdrawn and clause (f) of point 25 was adopted as amended.

Point 25(g)

A.257

- 921. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to move the text to insert it before point 42, noting that clause (g) was excessively detailed and repetitive.
- 922. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, and the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Islamic Republic of Iran did not support the amendment.
- 923. The amendment was withdrawn.

- 924. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to insert “in a form which is accessible and language that they easily understand,” to ensure that workers would be able to access available information appropriately.
- 925. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran, seconded by the Workers’ group, proposed to substitute “in a form which is accessible and language that they easily understand” by “in an accessible form and understandable language”, which was the wording that had been agreed upon in another section.
- 926. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, and the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and Indonesia supported the subamendment.
- 927. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

A.238

- 928. The Government member of Japan, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Switzerland and Türkiye, proposed an amendment to replace “new risks appear” with “changes to the risk assessment based on new information” to make the text more objective.
- 929. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed to insert “relevant” before “changes.”
- 930. The Government member of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, supported the amendment and the subamendment.
- 931. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and India supported the amendment but not the subamendment.
- 932. The subamendment was withdrawn and the amendment was adopted.
- 933. Clause (g) of point 25 was adopted as amended.

New clause after point 25(g)

A.227

- 934. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert a new clause that read “ensuring that where sufficient information is not available to adequately assess risks, a precautionary approach is taken;”. It was important to adequately assess risks and a precautionary approach should be adopted in the absence of sufficient information, to protect workers against unknown hazards.
- 935. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment because the proposed text was too broad, uncertain and open-ended. It was the responsibility of national authorities to implement precautionary measures, not of companies.
- 936. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Australia, Canada, China and the Islamic Republic of Iran supported the amendment.
- 937. The Government members of Indonesia and Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, said they were flexible.
- 938. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to add “as appropriate” after “adequately assess risks” and replace “approach is” with “measures are”.
- 939. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment.
- 940. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the subamendment. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran supported the subamendment except for the addition of “as appropriate”. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed to delete the words “as appropriate”.
- 941. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the subamendment.
- 942. The amendment was adopted as subamended and the new clause after (g) in point 25 was adopted as amended.

Point 25(h)A.258

- 943. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace “in cooperation with occupational safety and health committees or workers’ representatives, in order to identify all causes and take the necessary measures to prevent recurrence of similar events” with “according to data collection, recording, and notification of occupational diseases and accidents in applicable national laws and regulations.” Investigating accidents and dangerous occurrences was inherently linked to standard-setting approaches and required data collection and accurate recording of accidents to inform prevention efforts.
- 944. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment because it linked investigations to data collection, recording, and notification of occupational diseases and accidents and removed the social dialogue component.
- 945. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Singapore did not support the amendment. It was important to acknowledge in the text the role of OSH committees and workers’ representatives in assisting employers in identifying the causes of occupational diseases and accidents.
- 946. The Employer Vice-Chairperson highlighted the importance of acknowledging that the investigation of occupational diseases and accidents was conducted in accordance with each country’s national laws and regulations and explained that the intention was not to eliminate or negate cooperation with OSH committees, but to focus on the obligations of employers, which was the subject of point 25. The rights and duties of workers and their representatives would be addressed in point 29.
- 947. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, the United States and Canada did not support the amendment.
- 948. In response to a request from the Employer Vice-Chairperson, a representative of the Secretariat noted that Article 19 of Convention No. 155 referred to the cooperation between employers and workers and their representatives on various OSH-related matters. Article 20 of the Convention confirmed that cooperation between management and workers and their representatives were an essential element of OSH measures taken at the level of the undertaking.
- 949. The amendment was withdrawn.

- 950. The Government member of Japan, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Türkiye and Switzerland, introduced an amendment to replace “in order to identify all causes and take the necessary measures” with “to identify causes as far as is reasonably practicable in order to take the necessary corrective measures and”. It was unrealistic to expect an investigation of all causes of occupational diseases and accidents and important to take corrective measures to contain immediate hazards such as toxic leaks.
- 951. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Saudi Arabia and Singapore supported the amendment.
- 952. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Members States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, did not support the amendment because the term “corrective” was too limiting and excluded other measures that employers needed to take to prevent the recurrence of diseases or accidents.

- 953. The Government member of Switzerland, as one of the proponents of the amendment, introduced a subamendment to insert “and preventive” after “corrective” and the Government member of Japan suggested also adding “take necessary measures” before “to identify causes”. The subamendments did not find support and were not adopted.
- 954. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to only delete “all” before “causes” from the original text.
- 955. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Japan and Singapore supported the subamendment by the Workers’ group.
- 956. The amendment was adopted as subamended and clause (h) of point 25 was adopted as amended.

New point before point 26

A.229

- 957. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert a new point that read:

All employers, including multinational enterprises, should demonstrate supply chain responsibility through due diligence, ensuring adherence to ILO fundamental principles and rights at work, including occupational safety and health, throughout their operations.
- 958. It was important that employers, including multinational enterprises, performed due diligence along their supply chain and operations. That obligation was recognized in the MNE Declaration and increasingly included in trade and investment agreements.
- 959. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Singapore did not support the amendment. They noted that other similar amendments had not found support in the Committee.
- 960. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said the amendment was political and not related to biological hazards and its adoption could jeopardize the support of her group for the Convention.
- 961. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that that the amendment was not political in nature but related to human rights, which included the right to a safe and healthy working environment. He nevertheless acknowledged the lack of support in the room and the amendment was withdrawn.

- 962. Three amendments (A.230, A.240 and A.262) were withdrawn.

- 963. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete point 26 because its content was already included in Convention No.155 and was also not specific to biological hazards. However, her group would be flexible if there was no support.
- 964. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Singapore and Canada did not support the amendment.
- 965. The amendment was withdrawn and point 26 was adopted without amendment.

New title before point 27

- 966. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert before point 27 a new title that read: "Emergency preparedness in case of outbreaks, epidemics and pandemics in the workplace". She highlighted the need to differentiate between risks in the workplace arising from work activities and situations of outbreaks, epidemics and pandemics that affect workplaces, but also other places such as schools, in the sense that not only workers are affected.
- 967. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment, noting that the instrument should cover much more than just outbreaks, epidemics and pandemics, and should also include all working environments, including schools and hospitals.
- 968. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, did not support the amendment, explaining that emergency situations could originate from accidents and incidents in the workplace itself, and the text should not be limited only to epidemics and pandemics.
- 969. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Islamic Republic of Iran also did not support the amendment.
- 970. The amendment was withdrawn.

A.271

- 971. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed an amendment to replace the entire text after "Employers should" with "establish measures to deal with accidents, incidents and emergencies, related to biological hazards in the working environment, taking into account outbreaks of communicable diseases. These measures should comply with the guidance provided by competent authorities or be more comprehensive." It was important for employers to establish measures for communicable disease outbreaks, and to have an opportunity to go beyond minimum standards set by competent authorities.
- 972. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to insert "preparedness and response" after "establish" to ensure coherence in the text.
- 973. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment but did not support the subamendment. She proposed to replace "comply" with "be consistent," and to delete "or be more comprehensive.” The reasons are to avoid confusion and provide legal certainty to employers by adopting a text that is clear.

- 974. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, supported the amendment as subamended by the Employers’ group.
- 975. The subamendment proposed by the Workers’ group was withdrawn and the amendment was adopted as subamended.

- 976. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to insert “according to the location, size, and nature of its activities,” after “response arrangements,” stressing that the measures which were put in place should reflect the needs and range of different situations of the undertaking.
- 977. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to delete “location” noting that it was not always relevant for preparedness and response measures.
- 978. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the amendment as subamended.
- 979. The amendment was adopted.
- 980. Two amendments (A.231 and A.241) were withdrawn and point 27 was adopted as amended.

A.268, A.269 and A.270

- 981. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced three amendments to delete point 28 with its two clauses from the Convention and to insert it into the Recommendation, in order to provide more flexibility.
- 982. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Qatar speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, and China supported the amendments.
- 983. The amendments were adopted and the text of point 28 was moved to Part C of the proposed Conclusions.

Title of section 9

- 984. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete “and duties” after “Rights” noting that Convention No. 155 did not explicitly use the term duties. He highlighted that workers have rights, and specifically, the responsibility to cooperate in applying OSH measures, rather than duties.
- 985. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment, noting that workers represent active stakeholders, and rights and duties form the basis of fundamental rights on OSH. She noted that Convention No. 155 clearly outlined legal obligations for workers and employers. She also cited Conventions Nos 187, 174 and 170, and Recommendation No. 197, which referred to duties of workers.

- 986. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Islamic Republic of Iran also did not support the amendment.
- 987. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced a subamendment to replace “and duties” with “and responsibilities,” reiterating that Convention No.155 did not refer to duties but to the responsibility to cooperate.
- 988. The Government member of the United States supported the subamendment, noting the lack of enforceable duties of workers regarding OSH measures in his national legislation.
- 989. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and Canada did not support the subamendment.
- 990. The subamendment and the amendment were withdrawn and the title of section 9 – Rights and duties of workers and their representatives – was adopted.

Point 29, introductory sentence

A.297

- 991. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert “, in line with national laws and practices” after “representatives” and to replace “include:” with “cover information, training, consultation and participation.” at the end of the sentence. She explained that different types of rights were applied to workers or their representatives according to national regulations.
- 992. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment since workers’ rights were not subject to national laws and regulations but were universal.
- 993. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, did not support the amendment and introduced a subamendment to start the sentence with “In accordance with national laws and practices” instead of inserting “in line with national laws and practices”, and to delete the addition proposed by the Employers’ group at the end of the sentence. She stated that workers’ rights concerning biological hazards in the working environment were universally recognized and did not depend on specific national laws and practices.
- 994. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment by the EU Member States and proposed to insert “/or” after “workers and”.
- 995. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stressed that workers’ rights concerning biological hazards in the working environment were not only those covered by the fundamental OSH Conventions but also by the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).
- 996. The Government members of Chile speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Oman speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Australia, the United Kingdom and Indonesia preferred the original text.
- 997. The subamendment was withdrawn and the amendment was not adopted.
- 998. An amendment (A.282) was withdrawn and the introductory sentence of point 29 was adopted without amendment.

Point 29(a)

- 999. Two amendments (A.289 and A.298) were withdrawn and clause (a) of point 29 was adopted.

Point 29(b)A.299

- 1000. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew the proposal to move the text of clauses (b), (e), (g), (h), (j) and (k) to after point 41 from six amendments (A.299, A.302, A.304, A.305, A.308 and A.309), as well as the amendments to delete clauses (c), (d) and (f) (A.300, A.301 and A.303). She introduced an amendment to replace “the identification of hazards and” with “the process for”.
- 1001. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the United Kingdom, Canada and the Islamic Republic of Iran did not support the amendment. They preferred the original text because workers needed to be involved in the identification of hazards, which was the starting point for the risk assessment.
- 1002. The Government member of Indonesia supported the amendment.
- 1003. The Employer Vice-Chairperson clarified that being consulted on identifying risks was not the same as being involved and asked the Secretariat to clarify the legal implications.
- 1004. A representative of the Secretariat explained that Article 19(d) and (e) of Convention No. 155 enabled workers and their representatives to be consulted by the employer on all aspects of OSH related to their work, including risk assessments. That process had to be carried out in the framework of national legislation.
- 1005. The amendment was not adopted and clause (b) of point 29 was adopted without amendment.

Point 29(c)

- 1006. Clause (c) of point 29 was adopted.

Point 29(d)

- 1007. An amendment (A.290) was withdrawn.

A.275 and A.283

- 1008. The Committee had before it two amendments proposing to replace “all” with “relevant”, since consultation on all aspects was not possible. One was submitted by the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, and the other by the Government member of Japan, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Switzerland and Türkiye.
- 1009. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendments because it was not clear who would decide what was relevant.
- 1010. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Indonesia and the Islamic Republic of Iran supported the amendments.
- 1011. The amendments were adopted and clause (d) of point 29 was adopted as amended.

Point 29(e)A.302

- 1012. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace “participating in” with “being informed of the results of”.
- 1013. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Australia, the United Kingdom and the Islamic Republic of Iran did not support the amendment. The reasons were that workers needed to be involved in investigations, as well as in their results.
- 1014. The amendment was withdrawn.

- 1015. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to replace “participating in” with “collaborating to” and to add “and being consulted about conclusions of these investigations” at the end. That would align the text with that used in other Conventions and better convey the relevance of collaboration as a right and duty of workers.
- 1016. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced a subamendment to replace “collaborating” with “cooperating”, which was the word used in Convention No. 155, and to replace “consulted” with “informed”.
- 1017. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that there was an established precedence for consultations between employers and workers representatives for investigations of occupational diseases, accidents, and dangerous occurrences. The conclusions of such consultations would lead to discussions about the measures to be put in place to prevent the recurrence of such diseases and accidents.
- 1018. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment but did not support the subamendment.
- 1019. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Canada and the United States indicated a preference for keeping “participating in” from the original text, but agreed with the second part of the proposed amendment.
- 1020. The Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the proposal to keep the “participating in”.
- 1021. The Government member of Indonesia expressed reservations with the word “participating in” and supported the second part of the amendment.
- 1022. In response to the request from the Employer Vice-Chairperson to clarify the meaning of the terms “consultation”, “participation” and “cooperation” and how they should be used, a representative of the Secretariat read paragraph 3.12.2 of the Guidelines on occupational safety and health management systems: ILO-OSH 2001: “Such investigations should be carried out by competent persons, with the appropriate participation of workers and their representatives.”

- 1023. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that the amendment was in line with the European Framework, which explicitly stated that the “employers shall consult with workers and other representatives and allow them to take part in discussions on all questions relating to safety and health at work”.
- 1024. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that the word consultation had a legal significance and entailed a particular process and thus was not appropriate. She also stated that adopting that language would create problems in Member States. Finally, she expressed her group’s preference for the original text.
- 1025. The subamendment proposed by the Employers’ group was not adopted and the amendment was adopted as subamended by the Africa group.

- 1026. The Government member of Japan, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Switzerland and Türkiye, introduced an amendment to move “as appropriate” to the end of the sentence to provide more flexibility, since investigations could not be conducted on all occupational diseases, accidents and dangerous occurrences.
- 1027. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran supported the amendment.
- 1028. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, expressed a preference for the original text.
- 1029. The Government member of Japan said that if the reason for the preference for the original text by certain members was not that they denied the need for flexibility but rather that such flexibility could be read from the original text and it was therefore unnecessary to change the original text, he could withdraw his proposal while recording the interpretation. There were no comments to reject his interpretation of the reason for the preference for the original text. The amendment was withdrawn and clause (e) of point 29 was adopted as amended.

- 1030. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to replace “receiving reports” with “if requested receiving relevant information” and to replace “subject to confidentiality rules for personal and medical data” with “in an anonymous and aggregated way”. When health surveillance information and medical data had to be provided, it was important to inform workers and their representatives about that and to anonymize data to protect privacy.
- 1031. The Employer Vice-Chairperson expressed flexibility to support the amendment only if it was limited to providing information on the general health situation in the undertaking, not the information that a worker received about their bill of health and medical examinations.
- 1032. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced a subamendment to delete “if requested”.
- 1033. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, the United States and China preferred the original text.
- 1034. The amendment was withdrawn and clause (f) of point 29 adopted without amendment.

Point 29(g)

- 1035. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert “and informing the employer” after “appealing to the competent authorities”, as workers should inform their employer about insufficient measures before appealing to the competent authorities.
- 1036. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. In most cases, workers would inform their employers first. Nevertheless, in line with whistleblower protection measures, workers should be able to appeal to the competent authorities without risking their employment.
- 1037. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Australia and Indonesia, supported the original text.
- 1038. The amendment was withdrawn and clause (g) of point 29 was adopted without amendment.

Point 29(h)

- 1039. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to move clause (h) to point 31. The clause was important, but to be consistent with other rights and duties of workers, namely, the fact that they had to call their supervisor in case of a biological hazard in the working environment and that they had the right to remove themselves from such a work situation, the text would be better placed in point 31.
- 1040. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 1041. The amendment was adopted and clause (h) of point 29 of the proposed Conclusions was moved to point 31.

Point 29(i)

A.306

- 1042. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete the clause because systems worked differently across countries and the point was more related to employment benefits, compensation systems and social security.
- 1043. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment, noting that a similar text was reflected in Recommendation No.171.
- 1044. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, did not support the amendment. It was standard practice that when occupational physicians advised that a worker could not continue working for health-related reasons, particularly following exposure to biological hazards, they be given the possibility to take up another job within the company.
- 1045. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, also did not support the amendment.
- 1046. The amendment was withdrawn.

- 1047. The Government member of the United States, seconded by the Government member of Switzerland, introduced an amendment to insert “in accordance with national law” at the beginning of the clause, because it was not always feasible to transfer workers to another job.
- 1048. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the United Kingdom, the Islamic Republic of Iran and Singapore supported the amendment.
- 1049. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment.
- 1050. The amendment was adopted and clause (i) of point 29 was adopted as amended.

Point 29(j)

A.308

- 1051. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete “an illness” and “or exacerbate”. She considered that “illness” and “disease” were synonyms and inclusion of “exacerbate” could lead to confusion.
- 1052. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. “Illness” referred to conditions not covered by the term “disease”, such as respiratory illnesses.
- 1053. The Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported the deletion of “an illness”, but not of “or exacerbate”, but indicated flexibility.
- 1054. The Government members of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Canada and Indonesia preferred the original text.
- 1055. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the difference between illness and disease was not very clear, and the word “disease” had been used throughout the text.
- 1056. The amendment was not adopted.
- 1057. Another amendment (A.307) was withdrawn and clause (j) of point 29 was adopted without amendment.

New clause after point 29(j)

A.291

- 1058. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert a new clause that would be very relevant for ensuring business continuity in case of a pandemic. The text read:

when quarantined or required to self-isolate, receive normal compensation and benefits and be protected from dismissal, as far as practicable;
- 1059. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, did not support the amendment as the Committee had already agreed to address the issue of pandemics in the Recommendation.
- 1060. The amendment was withdrawn.

Point 29(k)

A.309

- 1061. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert “in the working environment” after “any discrimination”. An employer could only protect a worker within the working environment, not outside it.
- 1062. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Canada did not support the amendment as it was already covered in the introductory sentence of point 29.
- 1063. The amendment was withdrawn.

A.292

- 1064. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add “and stigmatization” after “discrimination”. Stigmatization had been a very serious issue in the early stages of the spread of HIV and AIDS. The language was taken from the HIV and AIDS Recommendation, 2010 (No. 200).
- 1065. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed to add “in accordance with national laws” after “stigmatization”.
- 1066. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the amendment but not the subamendment.
- 1067. The subamendment and the amendment were withdrawn and clause (k) of point 29 was adopted without amendment.
- 1068. Point 29 was adopted as amended.

Point 30, introductory sentence

A.293

- 1069. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace the text by the following, which was in line with Article 19 of Convention No. 155: “When employers have made necessary arrangements, workers and their representatives should:”.
- 1070. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment as workers had obligations in the same way that employers and governments did. The issue had already been discussed in amendment A.288.
- 1071. The Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, did not support the amendment.
- 1072. In response to a request for clarification by the Worker Vice-Chairperson, a representative of the Secretariat said that OSH standards included a variety of references to arrangements. Article 19(f) Convention No. 155 referred to the arrangements by which workers should report any hazardous situation they encountered in the workplace. Other OSH Conventions, such as the Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (No. 167), the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176), and the Safety and Health in Agriculture Convention, 2001 (No. 184), referred to workers’ duty to comply with prescribed safety and health measures. Those provisions normally comprised two associated elements, namely the duty of workers to comply with OSH regulations and the duty of employers to provide information and training to workers in that respect.

1073. The Worker Vice-Chairperson insisted that, if the wording of the introductory sentence was any less comprehensive than that contained in the fundamental Convention No.155, he could not withdraw the amendment.

1074. The amendment was not adopted.

1075. The Government member of the United States, seconded by the Workers' group, introduced an amendment to replace "should" with "may, where permitted by national laws,". The intention was to allow the necessary flexibility for those Member States in which workers had no legal obligations with respect to OSH.

1076. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, China and Indonesia did not support the amendment.

1077. The amendment was withdrawn.

1078. Another amendment (A.310) was withdrawn and the introductory sentence to point 30 was adopted without amendment.

New clause before point 30(a)

1079. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment (A.320), which would no longer make sense because his group's amendment to the introductory sentence had not been adopted. The Workers' group stressed that the reason for submitting those amendments was because they believed that the original text undermined the protection provided by fundamental OSH Conventions. He asked the Office to take those views into account when preparing the report to be submitted to the second Conference discussion in 2025.

1080. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew from three amendments (A.311, A.312 and A.314) the proposal to move the three clauses of point 30 to after point 41 of the proposed Conclusions. She also withdrew the proposal to insert a new introductory sentence before clause (a).

1081. She introduced an amendment to delete ", in accordance with the instructions received, and the training and means provided by their employers," because it was too detailed and unnecessary.

1082. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment because it removed the need for training, which was required by the fundamental Conventions. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Australia, Indonesia and Saudi Arabia did not support the amendment.

1083. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed that workers should be trained and explained that the intention of the amendment was not to remove that right. However, her group could agree to keeping the original text and the amendment was withdrawn.

- 1084. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add “adequate” before “personal protective equipment”.
- 1085. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment and noted that it was implied that personal protective equipment should be adequate.
- 1086. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Canada, the Islamic Republic of Iran and the United Kingdom supported the amendment.
- 1087. The amendment was adopted.
- 1088. Clause (a) of point 30 was adopted as amended.

Point 30(b)

A.312

- 1089. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace “promptly” with “forthwith” and to add, after clause (b), a new clause that read “reporting any incident, accident, or injury to health, which arises in the course of or in connection with work;”. The wording was taken from Recommendation No. 164 and was in the interest of workers.
- 1090. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the United States and Indonesia did not support the amendment.
- 1091. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the amendment.
- 1092. The amendment was not adopted.

A.295

- 1093. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete “or safety and health representative” as workers should report concerns directly to their immediate supervisor.
- 1094. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 1095. The amendment was adopted and clause (b) of point 30 was adopted as amended.

Point 30(c)

A.314

- 1096. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete “, following an occupational safety and health management systems approach” because not all companies had OSH management systems.
- 1097. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. One of the reasons that occupational injuries, occupational diseases and other adverse health effects occurred was because employers did not have OSH management systems.
- 1098. The Government member of the United States supported the amendment. Many SMEs in the United States did not follow the OSH management systems approach. The Government members of Singapore, Indonesia, the Islamic Republic of Iran and China also supported the amendment.

- 1099. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, suggested that the issue of OSH management systems should be revisited during the second Conference discussion in 2025.
- 1100. The amendment was adopted and, as consequence another amendment (A.296) fell.
- 1101. Clause (c) of point 30 was adopted as amended and point 30 was adopted as amended.

New point before point 31

- 1102. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed to insert a new point that read:

The workers' representatives should respect the obligations of secrecy with regard to the information which, in the legitimate and objective interest of the undertaking or the workplace, has been communicated to them as being of a confidential nature.
- 1103. It was important to safeguard businesses and prevent disclosure of confidential information that could harm a company's competitiveness in the market.
- 1104. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment because the proposed text would need to be subamended to include protection for whistleblowers and that would require extensive discussions.
- 1105. The Government member of the United States did not support the amendment and noted that confidentiality was primarily a matter of contract law in the United States. It was the responsibility of employers to reach agreements with their workers on handling confidential information. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, did not support the amendment and agreed with the views expressed by the Workers' group and the Government member of the United States.
- 1106. The Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Oman and Singapore did not support this amendment.
- 1107. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that her group would resubmit the amendment during the second Conference discussion in 2025 and requested the Office to take into account when preparing the report for that discussion, how a clause dealing with confidential information could be implemented. The Worker Vice-Chairperson added that the report prepared by the Office should also consider the protection of whistleblowers.
- 1108. The amendment was not adopted.

A.287

- 1109. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to replace all the text after "Workers should" with "with respect to biological hazards in the working environment", and add the following three clauses:
 - (a) report forthwith to their immediate supervisor any situation which they have reasonable justification to believe presents an imminent and serious danger to their life or health;

- (b) not be required by their employer to return to a work situation where there is continuing imminent and serious danger to life or health until the employer has taken remedial action;
- (c) have the right to remove themselves from a work situation without undue consequences, where there they have reasonable justification to believe that there is an imminent and serious danger to their life or health, and also inform their immediate supervisor of the situation without delay.

1110. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed the following subamendments:

- in clause (b): replace “continuing” with “demonstrated” and insert “, if necessary” after “remedial action”;
- in clause (c): delete “to believe” and “situation” and replace “and also inform their immediate supervisor of the situation without delay” with “due to biological hazards in the working environment, and also shall inform their immediate supervisor of the imminent and serious danger without delay”.

1111. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed reordering the clauses as follows: (c), (a) and (b).

1112. The Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported the amendment as subamended by the Workers’ group and proposed to introduce the text of point 29(h) as a new clause (d).

1113. The Government member of Switzerland, seconded by the Government member of Japan, did not support the subamendments and proposed to insert in the introductory sentence “in accordance with national law and practice” after “with respect to biological hazards in the working environment”.

1114. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, did not support the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Switzerland because workers had the right to remove themselves from imminent and serious danger to their life or health due to exposure to biological hazards irrespective of national law and practice. In response to the proposal made by the Africa group, she said that the content of point 29(h) had been integrated into her group’s amendment.

1115. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment introduced by the Government member of Switzerland or the subamendment introduced by the Africa group. He supported the text as subamended by the Employers’ group.

1116. The subamendments proposed by the Government members of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Switzerland were withdrawn.

1117. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced a further subamendment to delete “if necessary”, which was proposed in the subamendment by the Employers’ group.

1118. The Government member of Canada introduced a further subamendment to delete “due to biological hazards in the working environment” from the proposed clause (a), since those words were included in the introductory sentence.

1119. The Government member of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the amendment as subamended by the Workers’ group, the EU and its Members States and Canada.

1120. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed deleting “demonstrated” in clause (c).

- 1121. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the text as subamended and expressed a preference for the original text.
- 1122. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government members of Chile, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Japan, the United Kingdom and Australia supported the amendment as subamended.
- 1123. The amendment was adopted as subamended and point 31 was adopted as amended.

Title of section 10 and point 32

- 1124. The title of section 10 – Methods of application – and point 32 were adopted.

Adoption of the proposed Conclusions and the draft resolution

- 1125. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that in the proposed Conclusions, the points that had not been considered due to lack of time had been put in italic font and placed within brackets. With the adoption of the proposed Conclusions, all the amendments to the bracketed text would fall and would have to be resubmitted at the next session, if their proponents so wished. Similarly, the amendment proposing to insert in point 11(b)(i) the term “gender-responsive”, which the Committee had put in brackets pending further discussion would also fall and it was therefore no longer reflected in the text. The points that the Committee had decided to move from the Convention to the Recommendation had been included at the end of the text. All bracketed text would be reproduced in the proposed instruments.
- 1126. The Committee adopted the proposed Conclusions as amended and reviewed by the Drafting Committee.
- 1127. The Committee adopted a draft resolution to place on the agenda of the next session of the Conference an item entitled “Biological hazards in the working environment” for a second discussion with a view to the adoption of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.⁸

Closing statements

- 1128. In their closing statements, Committee members expressed their gratitude to the Chairperson for his excellent leadership throughout the discussions. They acknowledged that those discussions had not always been easy, especially during the first week, but recognized that the spirit of tripartism and compromise had prevailed and led to a successful conclusion of the important work of the Committee.
- 1129. They also thanked the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons for their commitment and willingness to engage in constructive dialogue, and the Government regional spokespersons and other government members. The work by the Drafting Committee, at very inhospitable hours, was applauded. Speakers thanked members of the Secretariat for their excellent support and guidance and, especially, the interpreters.
- 1130. The Employer Vice-Chairperson underlined the importance of the Committee’s work to address the management of biological hazards, which would make a difference to workers and employers worldwide. She shared some reflections from the Employers’ group. The overarching aim of the Employers' group had been to work towards a result that could be ratified and implemented at national level by the highest possible number of Member States. However, employers remain concerned by the level of detail in the proposed Conclusions, as well as the degree of overlap with other OSH instruments, some of them with a low degree of ratification. The definitions could prove problematic in practice and there is ambiguity in them. That added to the confusion with respect to OSH and public health roles and responsibilities; employers advocated for a clear distinction between situations produced by factors external to the employer's activity, like pandemics and situations arising from the employer's activities. The reason is that responsibilities and actions to be taken are completely different. While very important discussions had taken place, political debates should be avoided when the item to discuss was a technical one, like biological hazards. Procedures needed to be clear and based on consensus; consensus is the foundation stone of the ILO and must be preserved. Regarding the future, she requested that consultations be held with the groups to strengthen the draft texts before the second discussion.

- 1131. The Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed the commitment of his group to extending protection to all workers who encountered biological hazards in the working environment, the risks of which were increasing as evidenced by the COVID-19 pandemic, the emergence of antimicrobial resistant pathogens and climate change, among other worrying trends. As part of the framework of fundamental principles and rights at work, the OSH Conventions Nos 155 and 187 could not be undermined by the biological hazards instrument. Protection was especially urgent for workers in the informal economy and other vulnerable groups, as well as equally for women and men. The work of the Committee had provided a good basis to achieve the goal of adoption of a strong Convention and Recommendation in 2025.
- 1132. The Government member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, expressed her satisfaction with the decision to adopt proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. Protecting workers' right to a safe and healthy working environment in sectors including healthcare, agriculture and transport would in turn support business productivity. The new standards would cover the gaps in Member States' legislation, systems and programmes in the workplace and would complement other OSH instruments such as Convention No. 170. She highlighted several issues that deserved particular attention in preparation for the second discussion, including the need for a risk-based approach, integration of occupational health services into primary healthcare, clearly defined duties, responsibilities and rights for all, and special provisions regarding vulnerable workers including those in the informal economy.
- 1133. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, noted that North Macedonia, Montenegro, Albania, Ukraine, Bosnia and Herzegovina and Norway aligned themselves with her statement. Despite the challenging discussions, the constructive spirit of consensus had ultimately allowed the Committee to conclude its work. The proposed Conclusions represented a crucial step towards providing a legal framework to protect all workers from biological hazards in the working environment that extended beyond outbreaks and pandemics, and agreement had been reached on its most important elements. She looked forward to finalizing that important work in 2025.
- 1134. The Government member of Switzerland highlighted the importance of developing solutions through consensus. She expressed concern over the broad definition of biological hazards that might hinder the ratification and effective implementation of the new Convention and Recommendation.

- 1135. The Government member of the United Kingdom noted that, despite sometimes challenging discussions, the tripartite spirit had demonstrated what was possible through collaboration. The work of the Committee had provided a valuable opportunity to create international policy coherence, promote workers' health worldwide and help contain the spread of infection through biological hazards.
- 1136. The Government member of the United States said that the Committee had successfully navigated its way through a challenging discussion, demonstrating what could be achieved through democratic decision and tripartite social dialogue to successfully respond to the most challenging issues in the world of work, including biological hazards in the working environment. He looked forward to continuing the work in the same spirit.
- 1137. The Government member of Cuba also noted how tripartite negotiations and social dialogue had allowed the Committee to deal with significant challenges and differences. Protecting the safety and health of workers in the work environment was a priority for his government. The new instruments on biological hazards would benefit public health, the global economy and the well-being of all workers.
- 1138. The Government member of Indonesia noted the spirit of mutual respect by all parties which had been crucial for reaching the outcome. While the Government of Indonesia supported most of the text of the Conclusions, it was concerned about the use of the term "gender-responsive".
- 1139. The Government member of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC countries, noted the importance of unifying efforts to protect workers against biological hazards in the working environment. He pledged his group's full commitment to continuing the work.
- 1140. The representative of the Secretary-General summarized the work accomplished by the Committee. Based on its outcomes, the Office would continue its work with a view to completing the standard-setting process in June 2025.
- 1141. The Chairperson thanked the Committee for the trust it had placed in him. He thanked the two Vice-Chairpersons and all the Committee members for their hard work and dedication, and the Secretariat for its support both in the meeting room and behind the scenes. He expressed his firm conviction that the outcome of the rich deliberations would shape important instruments that would contribute to the realization of the fundamental principle and right to a safe and healthy working environment around the world.

Outcome of the work of the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards: Presentation and discussion

The President

This morning we shall turn our attention to the outcome of the work of the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards, namely the Committee's proposed resolution and Conclusions. These texts, which are being presented to the plenary for adoption, can be found in Record of Proceedings No. 6A. The report on the Committee's proceedings is contained in Record of Proceedings No. 6B. Needless to say, we look forward to listening to the Committee's presentation.

It is my pleasure to welcome the Officers of the Committee and its Reporter, namely: Mr Claudino de Oliveira (Portugal), Chairperson; Ms Maya Rubio (Spain), Employer Vice-Chairperson; Mr Ritchie (New Zealand), Worker Vice-Chairperson; and Ms Nghidengwa (Namibia), Reporter.

I will first give the floor to Ms Nghidengwa (Reporter), so that she may give us a summary of the Committee's work. The Officers of the Committee will then take the floor.

Ms Nghidengwa

Reporter of the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards

It is an honour for me to report to the Conference on the work and outcome of the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards.

Our mandate from this esteemed Conference was to hold a first discussion on protection against biological hazards with a view to establishing a new international labour standard or standards. I am happy to report that the Committee has managed to review a significant part of the proposed Conclusions presented in Report ILC.112/IV(2), which the Office compiled from the responses of 87 governments, 50 employers' organizations and 94 workers' organizations to the questionnaire shared with Member States in December 2022. The questionnaire was included in the initial report to the Conference, Report ILC.112/IV(1).

I am proud to report that the Committee has reached an agreement that the International Labour Conference should adopt standards concerning biological hazards in the working environment and that these standards should take the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. I must say that such an agreement was not an easy achievement, but rather the result of lengthy, and sometimes heated, debates. The Committee was successful in achieving consensus on a set of Conclusions with a view to a Convention. It has achieved this remarkable result through tripartite negotiation and compromise, following intensive and constructive deliberations in 24 sittings over 10 days.

The proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention include a Preamble which recalls the inclusion of a safe and healthy working environment in the ILO's framework of fundamental principles and rights at work by the International Labour Conference in June 2022. The proposed Conclusions define the term "biological hazards" for the purposes of the new instruments, and the scope of the Convention. The Conclusions also state that each Member should, consistent with national law and practice and in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers, integrate the protection against biological hazards in the working environment into its national policy on occupational safety and health, which would be periodically reviewed.

The tripartite constituents have also agreed on a set of preventive and protective measures required for the management of biological hazards in the working environment, defining the role of the competent authorities in regulating and providing guidance on these specific hazards, and requested the progressive extension of occupational health services to all workers in all branches of economic activity. The Conclusions also include provisions on data collection, recording and notification of occupational diseases and occupational accidents, and on enforcement of laws and regulations. The collection and analysis of data pertaining to biological hazards provide for informed responses, effective planning and the successful prevention of accidents and injuries to health in the working environment. Finally, the proposed Conclusions have also defined the duties and responsibilities of employers and the rights and duties of workers and their representatives.

Due to the technical nature and the complexity of the issues involved and the diversity of approaches in different countries and regions, as well as the fact that this was the first time the Conference had been called on to address biological hazards in the working environment, the Committee did not have adequate time, within the sittings allocated, to finish its review of the Conclusions proposed by the Office, including the proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation. The Committee requests the Office to propose, on the basis of the amendments submitted and the discussion of the Committee at this session, a revised text with a view to a Recommendation for the second discussion at the 113th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Before closing, I wish to acknowledge the contribution of all participants in the Committee. The Government members, the Employer members and the Worker members discussed in a spirit of openness and mutual respect throughout the entire process. Despite initial challenges with divergent perspectives, the Committee was able to refocus on the substantive issues. The commitment of the tripartite members of the Committee to overcoming differences in opinion and positions by making compromises led to a consensus that aligns with the ILO's mission to promote safety and health at work. The Chairperson, Mr Claudino de Oliveira, Government member of Portugal, and the two Vice-Chairpersons, Ms Maya Rubio for the Employers and Mr Ritchie for the Workers, ably navigated these complex discussions and found solutions which ensured the success of our Committee's ambitious task. We thank Mr Claudino de Oliveira for his wisdom and patience in seeking consensus, which facilitated tripartite collaboration in achieving substantial outcomes. We are also thankful to our two Vice-Chairpersons, whose mastery of tripartite negotiation and the decision-making process was instrumental in getting the job done. Furthermore, we would like to express our gratitude to all members of the Secretariat for their invaluable support, under the able leadership of Ms Seppo, representative of the Secretary-General. These colleagues worked tirelessly, day and night, both on and behind the scenes. Their excellent work has ensured the successful conduct of our business.

Ms Maya Rubio

Employer Vice-Chairperson of the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards (Original Spanish)

In this process, the concept of safety and health as a new fundamental principle and right at work has provided us with context and clear limits. The Employers' group took part in the debate in full awareness of its relevance and potential, with a view in particular to addressing the important issue of biological hazards in the working environment.

Governments, Workers and Employers met with the aim of working constructively towards the common goal of addressing biological hazards in the working environment. This is a very important issue for all of us, given that our work may have real and concrete impacts in the workplaces of the world. Preventing, managing and controlling the hazards related to biological agents is essential, both for employers and for workers.

It was and continues to be our shared responsibility to consider, in a balanced and coherent way, the perspectives of the three constituent groups and to consult all those who may be affected, both in developed countries and developing countries, in both small and large companies, and also workers, whatever their place of work. The instruments that we have developed this year, and will be working on next year, have to be able to provide a practical approach balanced between worker protection and the sustainability of companies, as well as a coherent risk-based approach that guarantees adequate protection and minimizes labour market disruptions. For that reason, it is important that they have the necessary flexibility to be adapted to the situation in each country.

The Employers have been clear about their goal of achieving an outcome that can be implemented in national legislation and in practice for the largest possible number of Member States. In their current form, the conclusions are not sufficiently practical to guarantee robust and generalized ratification. At present, the conclusions repeat what has been set out in other instruments and introduce excessively complicated elements, thereby creating uncertainty with regard to the application of other standards. We are concerned that the conclusions are based on too many instruments on the subject of workplace health and safety that have not been ratified sufficiently and lack flexibility, rather than relying on the weight and authority of the two fundamental Conventions on workplace health and safety.

Regarding scope of application and definitions, which are critical parameters on which to focus efforts and provide a solid basis for action, these are, in our respectful opinion, problematic. The definition of biological hazards presents significant practical problems when considered in the context of operational provisions. This creates ambiguity and legal uncertainty in terms of what will be required of employers in relation to the workplace and we have heard from many Governments that they share similar concerns with respect to their own obligations. This ambiguity is exacerbated by the blurring of the dividing line between responsibilities for public health matters and responsibilities for safety and health at work. The Employers argue for a clear distinction between, on the one hand, situations where exposure to a biological hazard has its origin directly in the workplace and, on the other hand, situations linked to external factors, such as pandemics, which evidently affect workplaces. The conclusions do not reflect this, but rather confuse those two types of situation. We need to establish a clear distinction, because the responsibilities and measures needed to protect the safety and health of workers differ between the two cases.

However, we do believe that the spirit of consensus and the expertise of all those involved in the search for compromise has broken through just in time to reach significant conclusions through the tripartite negotiations. We have seen the progress that has been achieved through our discussions and we have emerged from them with more experience and more appreciation for different perspectives, and this is reflected in the draft text, laying the foundations for next year and offering opportunities for success.

Having made these remarks, we will come back to this discussion next year with the best intentions and ready to devote all the necessary effort to achieving a good outcome. We would ask the Office to continue to consult the groups before the second discussion and we are confident that, at the Committee next year, we will be able to develop applicable instruments that the Employers can promote and support. To that end, we anticipate significant improvements to the text in order to achieve greater practicality, clarity and coherence with other instruments. We have a year ahead of us in which to address the main concerns of the constituents. In the chamber of social dialogue, we must adhere to the collective objective of achieving an instrument that is practical and ratifiable.

I would add that it has been an honour for me to take part in the work of the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards and to act as Vice-Chairperson for the Employers. Allow me to conclude by thanking all those present and all those who participated in the discussion.

Mr Ritchie

Worker Vice-Chairperson of the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards

The Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards has reached its Conclusions, with proposals for a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation concerning biological hazards in the working environment, with a view to consulting the tripartite constituents and finalizing these standards at the next session of the International Labour Conference, in 2025.

The Workers' group is pleased with the progress made at this session of the Conference and wishes to thank the Employers' and Government groups for their diligent and constructive work in reaching our Conclusions. Our discussions were expertly guided by the Chairperson of the Committee, Mr Claudino de Oliveira, from the Government of Portugal. We also wish to thank Ms Maya Rubio, the Employer Vice-Chairperson. The Office gave invaluable support, led by Ms Seppo.

The Workers' group came to these discussions committed and determined to do everything possible to extend protections to all workers who encounter biological hazards within the working environment. We did this in the knowledge that, since 2022, occupational safety and health (OSH) has been included in the fundamental principles and rights at work, as mandated by the tripartite constituents of this house. Along with freedom of association and the right to organize and engage in collective bargaining, the right to be free from discrimination, and the prohibition on forced labour and child labour, OSH is now included in the United Nations (UN) human rights framework. The right to a safe workplace will be greatly enhanced by the adoption of a Convention and guiding Recommendation on biological hazards in 2025 and, so far, we have a clear and unambiguous text for a proposed Convention.

Given the pandemic experience of the last few years, together with the growing incidence of antimicrobial-resistant pathogens and the increased risk of exposure to biological hazards arising from the climate crisis and loss of biodiversity, there is no other legitimate option within the UN framework for the promotion of rights, peace and sustainability than to make every effort to enhance protection against biological hazards in the working environment.

The Workers' group, as one of the tripartite constituents of this house, advocates for all workers, including workers in the informal economy and other vulnerable workers, including migrant workers. In addressing the risks posed by biological hazards, it is important that all constituents recognize the reality of national and global economies, which have significantly reduced employment security, increased inequalities and consigned millions of workers and their families to insecure and inadequate incomes, which are insufficient to realize the rights to food, education, health and housing. We are in danger of being mere spectators, as the insatiable demands of capitalism intensify this crisis with every passing day. This house and its tripartite constituents have an obligation to uphold its standards, including the fundamental principles and rights at work, and to ensure that these standards are accessible to all workers.

There is, of course, a public health and OSH imperative to reaching agreement on definitions and scope, which must be inclusive. Just as access to vaccines is a universal requirement to ensure global protection from infectious diseases, universal access to a safe working environment is a prerequisite to containing the spread of disease and to preventing unnecessary suffering and death. Cooperation between public health agencies and OSH agencies is a prerequisite to protecting our communities from exposure to biological hazards.

Public health policy and OSH policy must be complementary, but we endanger lives, increase suffering and disrupt business continuity if we believe that public health policy and action are enough to contain biological hazards in the working environment. By using the “hierarchy of hazard control” approach, workers and employers can remove, minimize and control biological hazards, which in turn enhances the effectiveness of public health and builds safer communities. It is important to be clear about this as we advance our discussions next year.

The effective management of biological hazards in the working environment, including new or emerging hazards, necessitates the development of preparedness and response plans and, where necessary, precautionary measures to deal with accidents and emergencies, as well as the need to take into account workers’ physical, mental and general well-being. We are pleased that the Committee has agreed to include these important mechanisms in the draft text of the Convention. Looking forward to next year, we must also agree on the language that will be used to ensure that both women and men have equal protection in line with their different needs and vulnerabilities. We have a good basis from this year’s discussions to meet our common goal, and we will devote our best efforts to achieving a strong Convention and Recommendation at the 2025 session of the Conference.

I want to thank everybody involved in the Committee, the Chairperson, the Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Workers’ group secretariat and the Bureau for Workers’ Activities (ACTRAV) for their brilliant support, and the Drafting Committee in particular for going beyond the call of duty by working diligently at such an inhospitable hour. Most of all, I want to thank the Workers’ group members as a whole for their wise and considered contributions to our input, their patience, good humour and commitment. They come with a mandate from the workers they represent, and to those workers I say, you have great leaders committed to your well-being and safety.

Mr Claudino de Oliveira

Chairperson of the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards

I have the honour, in my capacity as the Chairperson of the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards, to present to you some observations on the proceedings and the outcome of the Committee’s work.

Allow me to start by informing the Conference that we agreed that international instruments on biological hazards in the working environment are required, and that these instruments should take the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.

May I recall that this Committee met as the result of a decision of the ILO Governing Body at its 341st Session (March 2021) to place on the agenda of the 112th and 113th Sessions of the International Labour Conference an item related to occupational safety and health protection against biological hazards. This decision is a follow-up to the assessment of the ILO’s normative framework on occupational safety and health conducted in 2017 by the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group. It recommended that a regulatory gap related to these occupational hazards be addressed so as to complement and supersede one of the first ILO instruments, the Anthrax Prevention Recommendation (No. 3), which was adopted in 1919.

Since then, as we know, more than 40 international labour standards on occupational safety and health have been adopted by this house. But other than very limited references to some preventive measures in some standards, the ILO has never discussed biological hazards on their own for standard-setting purposes. This is also the first standard-setting process dedicated to safety and health after the historic decision of the Conference in June 2022 to include a safe and healthy working environment in the ILO's framework of fundamental principles and rights at work, designating the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187), as fundamental Conventions.

We have before us a unique opportunity. The protection of workers against sickness, disease and injury arising out of employment is a constitutional objective of the ILO. While the Organization's response to challenges related to occupational safety and health has changed over time, the adoption of OSH-related instruments is the gold standard for ensuring that the management of occupational hazards, both at the national and workplace levels, takes into account emerging and re-emerging risks. Climate change, for example, is exacerbating many workers' exposure to biological hazards, namely due to an increased risk of vector-borne diseases in workers through the effects of changing weather patterns on vector population sizes, survival rates, and reproduction. COVID-19 and epidemics that have severely affected workplaces in many regions in recent decades have also reminded us of the dire consequences of a lack of sound and resilient occupational safety and health systems when facing biological hazards.

If adopted next year, as currently proposed by the Conclusions approved by the Committee, the ILO will add to its normative framework specific references to biological hazards in the working environment. If so confirmed, they will be the first international instruments addressing these particular occupational hazards.

To guide its work, the Committee had before it two informative pre-Conference reports, which were the result of extensive research and consultations both within the Office and with constituents. Report ILC.112/IV(1) (the "white report") compiled information on national law and practice addressing biological hazards in a work context. The information collected enabled the Office to draft a questionnaire, which was sent to all Member States in order to obtain their views on the need for an instrument or instruments, and on the content. The complexity of the issues at stake started to emerge at this point, as the Office twice needed to postpone the deadline for replies to the questionnaire, which resulted in a more comprehensive view of ILO Members' perspectives. The Office received 87 replies from governments, 50 from employers' organizations, and 94 from workers' organizations. Based on the information received from Members, a second report was drafted (Report ILC.112/IV(2)), which contained a set of proposed Conclusions, including 32 points with a view to a Convention and 12 with a view to a Recommendation.

During our deliberations, we were cognizant that agreeing on the key principles and elements would be challenging, given the complexity of the subject matter being addressed, diverging points of view from tripartite constituents, and the quite different approach by national jurisdictions. Questions relating to the definition of biological hazards, the scope of the instruments, and the form and content of national policies represented a significant part of the discussions.

The Committee was nevertheless able to build consensus and reach joint decisions on critical questions that will allow the process to move forward. Among these, the Committee agreed that international instruments on biological hazards in the working environment are required, and that these should be in the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. The Committee also agreed on the definition of biological hazards for the effects of the proposed standards. It is proposed that the standards would apply to all branches of economic activity and all workers, while providing for some flexibility for Member States, in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, to make temporary exclusions based on certain premises.

Elements of the national policy on biological hazards in the working environment were agreed on, including the need for coherence with broader national occupational safety and health policies, taking into account the best available information and promoting coordination between relevant national authorities. The Committee also agreed on preventive and protective measures to be adopted, including the development of national guidance, inter alia, for preparedness and response measures to deal with accidents and emergencies, taking into account new and emerging risks. The Committee also reached consensus on points related to occupational data collection, recording and notification of occupational diseases and accidents, duties and responsibilities of employers, and rights and duties of workers and their representatives. Other agreed points referred to employment protection measures and enforcement of laws and regulations.

Looking back and taking into account the range of issues raised during the work of the Committee and the different points of view offered, I am very pleased to inform you that the Committee was able to deliver on its mandate to a great extent. It is to be noted that time did not allow us to discuss the proposed points with a view to a Recommendation, but I believe that the Office now has the elements that will allow the process to move forward.

We were entrusted with a complex task – to start the discussion on the regulation of biological hazards in the working environment in order to address a normative gap in the ILO. I believe that, given the intricacy of the endeavour, the Committee has made a major breakthrough, upon which constituents will build in 2025. This was made possible by Committee members working towards consensus and demonstrating flexibility in accepting each other's views around all issues.

In this respect, I would like to extend my sincerest appreciation to all delegates representing governments, employers and workers, as they all brought constructive proposals and views. I must confess that I did not expect the negotiations to be so complex, but I am also delighted to report to you that consensus was the rule for decision-making in the Committee, valuing the importance of tripartism.

I would like to thank the Vice-Chairpersons – Ms Maya Rubio for the Employers' group and Mr Ritchie for the Workers' group – for their passion, professionalism and commitment. I would also like to thank the Government members for their useful contributions and full engagement throughout. My thanks also go to the Office – the representative of the Secretary-General, Ms Seppo, the deputy representative, Ms Paquete-Perdigao, the senior advisers, Mr Pintado Nunes and Mr Santos O'Connor, and the team of experts – for the excellent preparation of this standard-setting discussion, the comprehensive background reports, which provided an excellent basis for discussion, and their competent support during the deliberations. Last but not least, I thank the coordinators – Ms Wong-Ramesar, Ms Pinoargote and Ms Ramirez Abarca – and all members of the Committee Secretariat, who provided continuous, smooth and efficient support throughout, and who worked long hours to support the Committee in producing its outcome. Please also allow me a word of thanks for the colleagues of the Portuguese delegation, who were always there for me.

The work of our Committee has ended for this session, but the work is not finished here. As a next step, the Office will prepare a new report containing a draft text of the instruments and a commentary, and will circulate it for Members' comments. This consultation will form the basis for the final report, which will facilitate the work of the Standard-Setting Committee at the 113th Session of the International Labour Conference next year. It has been my privilege to serve as Chairperson of this Committee.

The President

The discussion on the outcome of the work of the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards is now open.

Ms Ponnet

Government (Belgium), speaking on behalf of the European Union and its Member States

I have the honour to speak on behalf of the European Union and its Member States. North Macedonia, Montenegro, Albania, Ukraine, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Norway align themselves with this statement.

We want to express our warm thanks to Mr Claudino de Oliveira, the Chairperson of the Committee, for leading the discussions successfully, despite the fact that our discussions were sometimes difficult. We also thank the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons and our colleagues in the Government group for the fruitful contributions, which allowed us to gain a common understanding of this crucial matter.

The Conclusions we are adopting today are an important step towards improving the ILO's body of standards and protecting workers from biological hazards in the working environment, as well as to promoting and realizing the fundamental right to a safe and healthy working environment. They are a crucial step towards achieving the first international instrument on this key matter, and will provide a framework with the objective of protecting all workers in regard to biological hazards in the working environment, which goes beyond protection in the event of outbreaks and pandemics.

The Conclusions provide the basis for a new Convention and give guidance on what should be included in the accompanying Recommendation. We welcome the fact that we could agree on the most important elements, including the form of the instruments and the definition of biological hazards in the working environment. We are looking forward to finalizing this important work next year and to working towards a new Convention, supplemented by a Recommendation, on biological hazards in the working environment.

We would like to convey our great gratitude to the Secretariat for its support and guidance, and to all the interpreters for their excellent job in facilitating our work – even though it was sometimes difficult for them because we were talking a little too fast. We also thank the members of the Drafting Committee for reviewing the language of the instrument at late hours. Our thanks also go to the whole staff who supported the work of the Committee and of this session of the Conference. Lastly, I thank all the people who were working behind the scenes to make it possible for the Committee to produce its Conclusions.

Mr Mc ClashieMinister of Labour (Trinidad and Tobago)

The first standard-setting discussion on the issue of biological hazards has been an engaging and timely one, especially on the heels of COVID-19. Over the past two weeks, the Committee held in-depth discussions on the issue of biological hazards, the importance of ensuring protection from threats that may arise from such hazards in the working environment, and the possible mitigations to ensure protection to life and limb.

Let me take this opportunity to highlight at the national level the commitment of Trinidad and Tobago to ensuring protection against biological hazards. Our country, through its Occupational Safety and Health Authority, has a steadfast commitment to ensuring safe and healthy work environments. Established under the Occupational Safety and Health Act, this advisory body encourages compliance with the OSH Act in the workplace, develops codes of practice, and engages in research activities that will continue to promote a safe and healthy environment. Currently, work is under way to amend this legislation to ensure a robust national framework to promote workplace safety and health. This should positively impact my country's ability to comply with the new instrument.

We look forward to continued tripartite discussions on this matter next year, and to this body adopting a new instrument on biological hazards.

In closing, I want to commend the ILO on the work undertaken in addressing this critical issue and its continued support to countries such as Trinidad and Tobago.

Ms AjamWorker (South Africa)

Thank you to the Secretary-General, all the Officers of the Conference, all the staff across the divide who have a role in making this Conference a success, all delegates, and particularly the members of the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards. On behalf of the Workers' group, I wish to highlight some of the issues that have been characterized in the Committee.

We are pleased with the Conclusions and the outcomes. They are incredibly important for all workers of the world, recognizing the rights of both male and female workers, but especially vulnerable workers from Africa. This approach sets the tone, demonstrates goodwill and provides assurance that no one is left behind. The extension of protection to all workers insofar as biological hazards are concerned is absolutely remarkable, taking due cognizance of the exacerbation of biological hazards due to climate change. Climate change poses significant risks to workers in Africa and the global village, particularly the increased exposure to biological hazards. These risks are especially concerning for informal, outdoor and frontline workers. We therefore remain deeply committed to mitigating all risks posed by climate change and the increased exposure to biological hazards in ensuring sustainable and resilient workplaces in the face of these global challenges.

For this reason, clear inspiration has been drawn from the spirit and progress of the negotiations that have officially culminated in a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. While we are flexible with the Conclusions, it is our hope that the strength and concretized outcome of an even more solidified text in 2025 will guarantee inclusivity and the extension of protection against biological hazards for all citizens of the world.

Mr MoraesEmployer (United States of America)

On behalf of the United States Council for International Business, the Employers' delegation, I would like to thank Isabel, Pierre, Robert, Matthias and Laura from the International Organisation of Employers, and the Bureau for Employers' Activities (ACT/EMP) for guiding us in the last couple of weeks. Also, I want to thank my fellow members of the Employers' group for the valuable contributions during our group meetings. Thanks to the Chairperson, Mr Claudino de Oliveira, the Governments' representatives and to the Workers' group for the fruitful discussions and negotiations that, although many times challenging, are necessary to ensure that decisions made in this house are made by consensus. Last but not least, I would like to thank my fellow brave colleagues from the Drafting Committee for the hours we spent in the last few days to make this document easier to be understood and aligned in English, French and Spanish.

The spirit of constructive work, focusing on achieving consensus, was present during the entire session. However, there are important and concerning topics to be considered for next year, especially related to the definitions and scope section, as well as the distinction between public health and occupational health and safety.

In conclusion, speaking for myself now, I would like to say that, as a physician specialized in occupational medicine and infectious disease, I am leaving here with a positive feeling that the document produced at this session of the Conference will set the stage for a productive discussion next year, focusing on the development of a standard that will be able to be ratified and implemented. This will contribute to strengthening health and safety in the workplace, which is one of the elements of the mission of the ILO, the only tripartite UN agency.

Ms LandryWorker (Canada)*(Original French)

I wanted to share with you the importance of the work being done in this house on the Convention on biological hazards in the working environment, a subject that may sometimes seem arduous and daunting, but which is essential to ensuring the recognized fundamental right to a safe and healthy working environment for all workers, regardless of their place of employment, occupation or gender. Having a safe and healthy job, free of biological hazards, also means having the right to return from work in good health, in a way that promotes our personal development and the development of our families and our communities.

Over the past two weeks, I have witnessed how difficult it is to achieve a genuine and flexible tripartite dialogue to move the discussions forward. I would like to invite all those who will sit on the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards next year to come with an openness to dialogue in order to advance the work we must finish, which will certainly again require long hours of work as we have seen over the past two weeks, but which I hope will do credit to the millions of workers who are exposed to biological hazards that jeopardize their health and safety every day. Because improving their conditions and thereby respecting their fundamental right to a safe and healthy working environment is why we are here.

The Convention on biological hazards will be even more crucial as workplaces face additional challenges in the wake of climate change. In Canada, global warming is already exposing workers to zoonotic diseases that were unknown to us just two decades ago, and this is only the beginning.

In conclusion, I would like to thank my colleagues from the Workers' delegation, and underscore the extraordinary work of the Worker Vice-Chairperson, Mr Ritchie, and group Secretariat members, Mr O'Neill and Ms Llanos, who brought us together so well around the common goal of obtaining a Convention and Recommendation on biological hazards in the working environment. We look forward to continuing the discussion next year.

Mr Chester
Employer (South Africa)

I speak as a technical expert on behalf of Business Unity South Africa (BUSA).

Our task, as a Committee, was to produce a document focusing on fundamental principles relating to biological hazards, whether from operational or incidental sources – for example, tuberculosis, malaria, influenzas, SARS-CoV-2 and whichever the next one is around the corner. The task was huge, and the detail was complex. The passion of the tripartite groups – Government, Workers' and Employers' – was highly evident and set a dynamic tone for our negotiations.

We all know that changing mindsets can be challenging, and our discussions have been testament to this. While we found common ground in many areas, consensus on some fundamentals, including the definition of "biological hazards", proved elusive. Further to this, the placement and understanding of definitions and concepts within the instruments sparked considerable debate. Terms such as "risk", "risk assessment", "risk-based approach", "reasonably practicable" and, of course, "biological hazard" were discussed repeatedly, which underscored their importance in the instruments. We devoted substantial time to broad debates, perhaps at the expense of technical detail, even though existing Conventions like the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), provide ample coverage.

Despite these lengthy, and sometimes frustrating, discussions, we reached consensus on many key issues. We now have a document that is significantly improved from the base text. I eagerly anticipate our continued engagement to strive towards a Convention that is widely understood, appreciated and, above all, ratified. Improper oversight in these areas would have disastrous consequences for governments, workers and employers.

In closing, I would like to thank BUSA for my invite – I am honoured – and extend my deepest appreciation for the Biological Hazards Committee Chairperson, Mr Claudino de Oliveira, the coordinators, governments and especially my South African Government representative, Bulelwa, and the Africa group representatives, Betty and Benjamin. They were an example of social dialogue. I also extend my gratitude to the Vice-Chairpersons, Mr Ritchie and, of course, my own group's Vice-Chairperson, Ms Maya Rubio, whose courage under fire was truly commendable. They, and particularly Pierre on our side, provided a calming presence amidst the storm. And I thank, of course, the Drafting Committee and interpreters. I also want to acknowledge the Secretariat and representatives of the International Organisation of Employers for their deep understanding of the Conventions and working methods, and the entire Employers' group team for their passion, knowledge, temperament and wisdom. I do look forward to collaborating with you all again.

Mr Zuccotti

Worker (Argentina)

Just two years ago, a fifth fundamental right was added, guaranteeing a safe and healthy working environment for all workers. This decision made it possible to take a more comprehensive look at all the fundamental rights and, since then, it has been a matter of fulfilling a duty of care to people, which also includes the environment in which they work. Recent history has shown us that biological hazards are never far away and that, if we do not address them, the consequences can be devastating and unpredictable. We cannot ensure that there will be no new pandemics, but we must ensure that we do everything possible to achieve the fullest level of prevention so as to protect workers around the world from being exposed.

The Conclusions before the plenary will give rise to the first standard that will make operational various aspects of the fundamental Conventions on occupational safety and health. This Convention and the Recommendation will be the first international labour standards to address the important issue of the protection of all workers from biological hazards. As constituents, we should do all we can to reach agreements in this house of social dialogue that will result in an up-to-date text that covers all productive activities that are subject to these risks.

I assure you that this will lead to a better working environment and offers real potential for saving lives: the ultimate objective when it comes to decent work. The Workers' group can be counted on for its effort, commitment and, fundamentally, its good faith in continuing to build a world with more social justice for all. Lastly, my thanks go to the remarkable Workers' group for the opportunity to participate in this discussion.

Resolution and ConclusionsProposed Conclusions: Adoption*The President

There being no further speakers, we shall now proceed with the adoption of the proposed Conclusions of the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards, as set out in Record of Proceedings No. 6A.

If there are no objections, may I take it that the Conference adopts the proposed Conclusions?

(The Conclusions are adopted.)

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Biological hazards in the working environment": AdoptionThe President

Let us now move to the adoption of the resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Biological hazards in the working environment".

If there are no objections, may I take it that the Conference adopts this resolution?

(The resolution is adopted.)

I would like to extend my warmest thanks and congratulations to the members and Officers of the Committee for their work. I would also like to thank the Secretariat for its support. We already look forward to the outcomes of this double discussion standard-setting procedure.

(The Conference continues its work in plenary.)

International Labour Conference – 112th Session, Geneva, 2024

Date: 13 June 2024

Outcome of the Recurrent Discussion Committee on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work

Proposed resolution and conclusions submitted to the Conference for adoption

This Record of Proceedings contains the text of the proposed resolution and conclusions submitted by the Committee to the Conference for adoption.

The Report of the Committee on its proceedings will be published in Record of Proceedings No. 7B after the closure of the session.

► Resolution concerning the third recurrent discussion on fundamental principles and rights at work

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization, meeting at its 112th Session, 2024,

Having undertaken a third recurrent discussion on fundamental principles and rights at work, in accordance with the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work (1998), as amended in 2022, and the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization (2008), and duly taking into account the ILO Declaration of Philadelphia (1944) and the ILO Centenary Declaration for the Future of Work (2019), to consider how the Organization should respond to the realities and needs of its Members,

1. Adopts the following conclusions which contain priorities for ILO action for the effective and universal respect, promotion and realization of fundamental principles and rights at work;
2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to give due consideration to the conclusions and to guide the International Labour Office in giving effect to them; and
3. Requests the Director-General to:
 - (a) prepare a plan of action giving effect to the conclusions for consideration by the Governing Body at its 352nd Session in November 2024;
 - (b) communicate the conclusions to relevant international and regional organizations for their attention, including in the context of the Second World Summit for Social Development;
 - (c) take into account the conclusions when allocating resources within the existing programme and budget, preparing future programme and budget proposals, and mobilizing extrabudgetary resources; and
 - (d) keep the Governing Body informed of their implementation.

► Conclusions concerning the third recurrent discussion on fundamental principles and rights at work

I. Fundamental principles and rights at work are more needed and relevant than ever

1. Fundamental principles and rights at work (FPRW) are universal human rights and immutable in nature. They are inseparable, interrelated and mutually reinforcing. They are key to human dignity and well-being and to the foundation of inclusive and just societies. They are important for ensuring that economic and social progress advance together in the pursuit of social justice. FPRW are rights and enabling conditions that are necessary for the full realization of the strategic objectives of the International Labour Organization (ILO).
2. In line with the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work (1998), as amended in 2022 (the 1998 Declaration), all Members, even if they have not ratified the fundamental Conventions, have an obligation, arising from the very fact of membership in the Organization, to respect, to promote and to realize, in good faith and in accordance with the Constitution, the principles concerning the fundamental rights that are the subject of these Conventions.
3. There has been some progress and new developments since 2017:
 - (a) At the national level, Member States have undertaken multiple legal reforms, policies and programmes to guarantee and protect freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining, to combat child labour and forced labour, address discrimination in respect of employment and occupation, and implement occupational safety and health measures and systems. In addition, the number of ratifications of fundamental Conventions and the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) and their incorporation into national legal and policy frameworks has increased;
 - (b) At the international level, the right to a safe and healthy working environment was elevated in 2022 to a fifth category of FPRW, widening and strengthening international commitment to respect, promote and realize all FPRW, and the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155) and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187) were considered as fundamental Conventions within the meaning of the 1998 Declaration. In 2020, the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) became the first ILO instrument to reach universal ratification. FPRW have been reflected in a number of new international labour standards, such as the Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190). References to FPRW in legal and policy frameworks have increased, including in trade and investment agreements, safeguard policies of international financial institutions, international and national framework agreements and due diligence legislation and initiatives;
 - (c) Employers' and workers' organizations, together with their members, have also taken important steps to advance FPRW.
4. At the same time, challenges remain.
5. We are far from achieving the universal ratification of fundamental Conventions and significant implementation gaps remain. According to ILO global estimates, child labour has increased in absolute terms to 160 million children, with 79 million in hazardous work; forced labour has grown to 27.6 million; and annually, 3 million workers die related to occupational accidents or diseases. Gender labour force participation and pay gaps remain stuck at 25 percentage points and 19 per cent, respectively.

6. While statistics for the period 2000–2019 suggest an overall improvement in workplace safety, workers across the world continue to be exposed to unsafe and unhealthy working environments and certain risks have intensified, including heat stress and psychosocial risks.
7. Freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining are severely threatened around the world. Certain categories of workers are excluded from the scope of labour policy, labour legislation and labour dispute resolution institutions.
8. Various emerging forms of work can offer both opportunities and risks. When providing decent work, they can be an avenue for workers and their families to escape poverty and enter the formal economy. When they do not provide decent work, or workers are misclassified, they can be insecure and pose challenges to the realization of FPRW.
9. Threats to and impairment of freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining are exacerbating risks of child labour, forced labour, discrimination and hazardous working conditions.
10. Persistent informality continues to represent a major barrier to FPRW advancement, sustainable development and decent work.
11. Failures to protect and respect FPRW continue to be observed within supply chains. Disruptions of supply chains during recent crises have adversely affected the full realization of FPRW in some countries.
12. Inequalities and poverty are persistent challenges contributing to the failure to respect and realize FPRW. They were exacerbated by the COVID-19 pandemic, social and economic crises, conflicts and geopolitical instability, natural disasters and climate change.
13. Weak governance, erosion of the rule of law and civil liberties, restrictions on freedom of association and on the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining, inadequate enabling environments for sustainable enterprises, inadequate regulation, under-resourced and ineffective labour administrations and inspectorates, and other relevant labour authorities, and ineffective labour migration governance, among other causes, have impeded progress to respect, promote and realize FPRW.
14. Demographic, environmental and digital transitions, including the rise of artificial intelligence and related technologies, are transforming the world of work, reinforcing the urgency of promoting the FPRW to address challenges and seize opportunities.
15. These complex developments create risks for, require renewed emphasis on, and reaffirm the importance of FPRW. FPRW provide a framework to navigate complex and turbulent times to prevent and manage future crises, especially crises in the world of work. This requires stronger policy and action for their respect, promotion and realization.

II. Strengthening action for the effective respect, promotion and realization of fundamental principles and rights at work

16. The respect for human rights, the rule of law, and democratic and fundamental freedoms are prerequisites for the full realization of FPRW. Responding to emerging challenges and realizing FPRW require political will, effective labour market governance and social dialogue. To strengthen action for the effective respect, promotion and realization of FPRW, including in pursuit of the Sustainable Development Goals, governments, in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, and taking account of national circumstances, should:

- (a) engage in tripartite social dialogue and take action to consolidate the progress made, stop reversals and address regulatory and implementation gaps;
- (b) seize the momentum generated by the recognition of a safe and healthy working environment as a fundamental principle and right at work to strengthen national laws and practices to accelerate progress to respect, promote and realize this principle and right;
- (c) give particular attention to freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining, noting their particular importance to enable the attainment of the four strategic objectives, while ensuring balanced attention to all five categories;
- (d) take necessary steps to reduce informality in line with the ILO Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204);
- (e) effectively incorporate FPRW into a just transition and into a human-centred approach when dealing with technological and demographic shifts, inter alia, that are transforming the world of work;
- (f) adopt policies to promote sustained, inclusive and sustainable economic growth, full and productive employment and decent work for all and create an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises, noting that business activity, investment and innovation are major drivers of productivity, inclusive growth and job creation;
- (g) continue efforts to advance the interrelated and mutually reinforcing nature of FPRW.

17. Areas of focus should include:

Strengthening governance

- (a) ratify and effectively implement all fundamental Conventions, including the Protocol of 2014 to Convention No. 29;
- (b) expand the coverage of labour laws, establish enabling regulatory frameworks, ensure effective enforcement and strengthen relevant institutions to uphold the rule of law, good governance, and protection and promotion of human rights;
- (c) build and strengthen the capacity of labour administration, labour dispute resolution and labour inspection systems, and provide appropriate human, technological and financial resources, to effectively implement, monitor and enforce national labour legislation and policies, with specific attention to working conditions and protection of workers;
- (d) ensure effective, independent, impartial and accessible judicial and non-judicial labour dispute prevention and resolution mechanisms for all, including grievance mechanisms;
- (e) enhance coherence between national public policies, including migration, employment, labour and social protection policies;
- (f) ensure an evidence-based approach to decision-making and monitor progress by building effective and transparent information systems, including databases and statistical systems;

Freedom of association and social dialogue, including collective bargaining

- (g) protect and promote respect of the right of freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining in light of their particular importance to enable the attainment of the four strategic objectives, notably social dialogue and tripartism;

- (h) strengthen the capacity of mechanisms and institutions for social dialogue to formulate policies to promote, respect and realize FPRW and their interconnectedness with ILO strategic objectives; and promote and engage in meaningful social dialogue in all its forms and at all levels to guide implementation, assess progress, and respond and adapt to complex and multiple challenges;

Formalization and sustainable enterprises

- (i) accelerate progress on the transition from the informal to the formal economy, based on the guidance provided in Recommendation No. 204 and on tripartism and social dialogue, to address some of the root causes of decent work deficits and advance an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises;
- (j) create an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises, including micro, small and medium-sized enterprises, which is conducive to realizing FPRW;
- (k) raise awareness of the central role of FPRW in productivity improvement, inclusive growth and job creation;
- (l) support the social and solidarity economy to prosper, innovate and create decent work;

Equality and inclusion

- (m) continue strengthening legal and policy frameworks to eliminate discrimination in employment and occupation for all workers and on all grounds protected by international labour and human rights standards, and ensure that their application is effective, regularly monitored and evaluated;
- (n) promote gender equality in pay and labour market participation, including through the implementation of equal pay for men and women for equal work or work of equal value, pay transparency measures, maternity protection, parental leave and measures to prevent and protect against gender-based violence and harassment;
- (o) adopt targeted measures for groups more at risk of serious deficits regarding FPRW, including persons belonging to one or more vulnerable groups or groups in situations of vulnerability facing exclusion and discrimination, often on multiple and intersecting grounds;
- (p) adapt national laws and policies to ensure adequate protection for all workers, in line with the ILO Centenary Declaration on the Future of Work (2019), ensuring respect for their fundamental rights;
- (q) meaningfully tackle poverty, insecurity and inequalities, as major drivers of FPRW deficits, including through adequate wages set through collective bargaining and adequate minimum wages, whether statutory or negotiated, and income support through social protection.

18. Governments should reaffirm their commitment to the respect, promotion and realization of FPRW. This would entail coherence among legal frameworks, policies, strategies and programmes, and the development of synergies aimed at realizing the FPRW and those aimed at implementing all strategic objectives of the ILO through which the Decent Work Agenda is expressed, namely employment, social protection, social dialogue and tripartism, and FPRW.

III. Priorities for ILO action

Thematic priorities

19. The ILO should focus on the following agreed priorities to promote FPRW, which now include a safe and healthy working environment, in support of its tripartite constituents based on national circumstances and needs:
- (a) informal economies with due attention to rural areas;
 - (b) enterprises and supply chains;
 - (c) situations of crisis and fragility;
 - (d) just transition towards environmentally sustainable economies and societies for all;
 - (e) the digital economy.

Means of action

20. The Office should update its integrated strategy on FPRW to balance its action across the five FPRW categories and address gaps in implementation, while being responsive to the needs of constituents and focusing its work on the following areas:

Standards-related action

- (a) intensify efforts to promote the universal ratification of the ten fundamental Conventions and the Protocol of 2014 to the Convention No. 29, in particular those that are least ratified, including by pursuing specific campaigns and providing technical advisory services to countries interested in ratification;
- (b) continue to provide technical advisory services, including gap analyses and trainings, to ILO constituents on the effective implementation of the above-mentioned instruments, guided by the ILO supervisory bodies and the annual follow-up to the 1998 Declaration;
- (c) enhance the potential of the annual follow-up to the 1998 Declaration, including through an improved use of the information gathered therein;
- (d) increase synergies among the ILO supervisory bodies, development cooperation, technical assistance and research, including by enhancing efforts to mainstream understanding of the functioning and outputs of the ILO supervisory mechanisms across the Organization, both in the field and in headquarters;

Enhanced research and capacity

- (e) continue to promote and conduct research, and develop tools, guidelines, statistical measurement methodologies, and associated training resources, for qualitative and quantitative data collection, including disaggregated data on discrimination and other under-addressed FPRW categories, and research on FPRW;
- (f) support national institutions to collect and analyse data on the status of FPRW and the characteristics of the populations affected to support evidence-based policy-making;
- (g) produce, in collaboration with Member States, global estimates on child labour and forced labour, and other FPRW issues as data permit, and based on international statistical standards and measurement practices;
- (h) increase the visibility and accessibility of ILO's data and research, including through global platforms such as the Forced Labour Observatory;

- (i) continue to undertake research and analysis on the intersection of FPRW and trade and investment;
- (j) continue to undertake research and data collection on workplace-related injuries, accidents, diseases and fatalities, and on emerging occupational health and safety risks, including psychosocial risks;
- (k) in the context of the ILO Social Dialogue Flagship Report, undertake research and collect good practices on the role of effective social dialogue in addressing challenges related to FPRW in support of the five thematic priorities;
- (l) examine the nature, causes and consequences of FPRW deficits and build the body of policy-based evidence on the role of the ILO decent work strategic objectives on the realization of FPRW and the social and economic impacts of FPRW at the country and global levels;
- (m) undertake research on the economic and social impact of informality, and in particular its impact on the realization of FPRW;
- (n) undertake action-oriented research on best practices to integrate respect for FPRW into the business of MSMEs and newly formalized enterprises, including through greater synergies between the work on FPRW and the SCORE programme;
- (o) undertake research and impact assessments on the challenges and opportunities of digitalization, including artificial intelligence in relation to FPRW, in line with the resolution and conclusions concerning the second recurrent discussion on labour protection (2023);

Strengthening capacity and knowledge-sharing

- (p) build the capacity of constituents, and other relevant national authorities, to develop and implement policies and programmes that support the realization of FPRW and to integrate these rights in policies related to the ILO's strategic objectives, including in collaboration with the International Training Centre in Turin;
- (q) conduct targeted capacity-building for employers' and workers' organizations with regard to all five FPRW, with a focus on retaining and expanding membership, providing services and engaging in effective social dialogue;
- (r) strengthen the ILO Helpdesk for Business on International Labour Standards, which is an important vehicle for assisting enterprises and tripartite constituents in their efforts to respect the principles of international labour standards, including FPRW, and promote the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, as amended in 2022, and the United Nations Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights;
- (s) strengthen the ILO Global Business Network on Forced Labour, the ILO Global Business and Disability Network and the Child Labour Platform, and seek ways to ensure their sustainability;
- (t) encourage peer learning, information-sharing, cooperation and policy coherence within, and among, Member States, at the regional and international levels, including through the next Global Conference on the Elimination of Child Labour;
- (u) document and share good and innovative practices on FPRW;

Policy coherence and partnerships

- (v) promote policy coherence on FPRW:
 - (i) within the UN system and with multilateral organizations, development banks and international financial institutions;
 - (ii) in trade and investment policies and agreements, including through strengthened engagement with the World Trade Organization;
 - (iii) in decent work country programmes and UN sustainable development cooperation frameworks;
- (w) accelerate progress on FPRW through the Global Coalition for Social Justice, and leverage advocacy and cooperation through partnerships, such as:
 - (i) Alliance 8.7;
 - (ii) the Equal Pay International Coalition;
 - (iii) the relevant business initiatives such as the Child Labour Platform, the Global Business Network on Forced Labour and the Global Business and Disability Network;
 - (iv) the Global Accelerator on Jobs and Social Protection for Just Transitions;

Planning, mobilization and allocation of resources and development cooperation

- (x) ensure that technical assistance and development cooperation reflect the mutually reinforcing nature of FPRW and their interconnectedness with all ILO strategic objectives;
- (y) enhance support to governments to develop and implement domestic resource mobilization strategies;
- (z) mobilize resources for development cooperation at the country, regional and global levels, including by engaging with UN Resident Coordinator's Offices;
- (aa) explore innovative ways to more efficiently deliver technical assistance and development cooperation, including South-South and Triangular Cooperation, taking into consideration the diversity of circumstances of individual Member States;
- (ab) monitor and evaluate the impact of the support provided by the ILO to its constituents, with a view to improving the design and implementation of future activities;
- (ac) follow through on the direction of the resolution and conclusions concerning the second recurrent discussion on fundamental principles and rights at work (2017) to develop a plan of action for resource mobilization to support projects around target 8.8 of the Sustainable Development Goals to protect labour rights with a focus on freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right of collective bargaining.

Introduction

1. The Committee for Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work, established by the International Labour Conference at its first sitting on 3 June 2024, was originally composed of 193 members (109 Government members, 8 Employer members and 76 Worker members). To achieve equality of strength, each Government member entitled to vote was allotted 152 votes, each Employer member 2071 Votes and each Worker member 218 votes. The composition of the Committee was modified four times during the session and the number of votes attributed to each member adjusted accordingly.
2. The Committee had before it Report V: Fundamental principles and rights at work at a critical crossroads (ILC.112/Report V(Rev.)), prepared by the International Labour Office (hereinafter the Office report) for consideration under the fifth item on the agenda of the 112th Session of the International Labour Conference: “A recurrent discussion on the strategic objective of fundamental principles and rights at work, under the follow-up to the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization, 2008, as amended in 2022” (Social Justice Declaration).

The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairperson: Ms Claudia Fuentes Julio (Government member, Chile) at its first sitting

Vice-Chairpersons: Mr Tom Mackall (Employer member, United States of America) and Mr Magnus Norddahl (Worker member, Iceland) at its first sitting

3. The Committee appointed a drafting group to prepare and submit a set of draft conclusions for its consideration. The drafting group was composed as follows:

Government members: Mr A. Fall (Senegal), Mr C. F. Kamara (Sierra Leone), Mr S. Gao (China), Mr N. Komada (Japan), Ms S. Morgan (United States), Ms C. H. Greenidge (Barbados), Mr I. Liberatore (France), Mr T. Bevers (Belgium)

Employer members: Mr T. Mackall (United States), Mr G. Ricci (Guatemala), Mr A-S Oyerinde (Nigeria), Mr D. Opio (Uganda), Ms E. Nagasawa (Japan), Ms J. Tinsley (Australia), Ms A. Vauchez (France), Ms C. Barsan (Germany)

Worker members: Mr M. Zante (Burkina Faso), Mr A. Amoussou (Benin), Mr J. Vogt (United States), Mr J. E. Onate (Mexico), Mr C. Roberts (Canada), Ms S Amponah (United Kingdom), Mr M. Norddahl (Iceland), Mr P. Dimitrov (Bulgaria)

4. The Chairperson noted that the Committee was taking place at an opportune moment. Changes and challenges, highlighted in the Office report prepared for the Committee, were affecting progress on the fundamental principles and rights at work (FPRW). The Committee should ensure that the International Labour Organization (ILO) and its members were equipped to address the challenges and make use of the opportunities that arose.
5. The Representative of the Secretary-General (Ms Manuela Tomei, Assistant Director-General) said that fundamental principles and rights at work (FPRW) were essential to people’s well-being and dignity and to fostering sustainable economic growth and social progress. The ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work, as amended in 2022 (1998 Declaration) underscored the obligation to uphold freedom of association and collective bargaining, the abolition of forced labour and all forms of discrimination, the elimination of child labour, and the right to a safe and healthy working environment. As such, it represented a cornerstone of social justice. In the past seven years, since the last recurrent discussion, unprecedented challenges, linked to crisis, geopolitical tensions and climate change had arisen. This directly led to a slow down, stagnation, if not reversal, in respect of FPRW, including freedom of association and collective bargaining, which remained under threat in many regions. More than 27.6 million people were trapped in forced labour, child labour had increased since 2017, discrimination continued to undermine opportunities for people, and in 2019 almost 3 million people died from occupational accidents and diseases while 395 million workers sustained a non-fatal work injury. At the same time, new opportunities were arising. Major transformations spurred by technological progress and climate change were opening up unprecedented opportunities for innovation, productivity and economic growth. There was a need to promote FPRW with renewed vigour, promoting integrated and holistic approaches, balancing attention across the five FPRW, strengthening national legislation and enforcement, reinforcing social dialogue, improving evidence-based actions and impact measurement, building partnerships for promotion of FPRW in tandem with the other strategic objectives of decent work and mainstreaming FPRW in responses to emerging challenges on digitalization of work, climate change and shifting economic dynamics. The Committee's guidance would be crucial leading up to the 2025 Second World Summit for Social Development.

General discussion

Opening statements and discussion point 1

Since the last recurrent discussion in 2017, what have been the most important developments and how have these impacted the respect, promotion and realization of fundamental principles and rights at work?

6. The Employer Vice-Chairperson recalled that the mandate of the discussion was to understand the realities on the ground and assess the results achieved and inform future action. The Committee should not engage in policy discussions. However, the 1998 Declaration remained an important framework, strongly supported by the Employers' group and, as universal human rights that were inseparable, interrelated, indivisible and mutually reinforcing, applicable to both workers and employers. FPRW were on an equal footing with each other, with no hierarchy. The Office report emphasized that since the 1998 Declaration considerable progress had been achieved but that there were significant implementation gaps. Further progress required political will, effective labour market governance and inclusive social dialogue.
7. The Employers' group considered that the Office report disproportionately focused on negative aspects and did not properly account for positive action taken, such as the universal ratification of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182). However, statistics showed an overall increase in child labour, demonstrating that ratification alone was insufficient to the realization of FPRW. Another positive development was in improvements in workplace safety. There had been a 10 per cent decrease in work-related mortality from 2000 to 2019. Since 2017, national action plans on child labour and forced labour had been adopted, as well as reforms to discriminatory legal provisions barring women from specific occupations and types of work. In 2022, a safe and healthy working environment had been included in the ILO's framework of fundamental principles and rights at work.

8. Despite progress, challenges linked to root causes persisted and impeded realization of FPRW. Such challenges included failure to implement Conventions, whether ratified or not, the breadth of informality, lack of good governance and rule of law, the need to mitigate corruption, inadequate capacity-building and awareness-raising of the social partners. They also included a lack of education and training, specifically within small and medium-sized enterprises and, finally, a lack of evidence-based data and reporting. High levels of informality impeded formal markets: diligent efforts were required to promote formalization. Weak governance and corruption also undermined progress. Quality data were key to inform effective decision-making.
9. The Committee's conclusions must be practical, based on learning from failures and successes; they must uphold Member States' primary obligation to respect human rights; they must acknowledge the importance of root causes and promote good governance, the rule of law and social protection; they must address informality and incorporate the role of sustainable enterprises; they must be faithful to the 1998 Declaration in promoting an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises, affirming the practical reality that economic development through sustainable enterprises advanced FPRW and decent work. Strong building blocks from the employers' standpoint were therefore effective good governance, formalization and strong social dialogue. Continued efforts in that direction were needed from the Office and the constituents.
10. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stressed that the current discussion came at a critical point, as FPRW, and human rights more generally, were coming under attack worldwide. He stated that the world was further away than ever from delivering the agreed objectives to attain sustainable development, including Sustainable Development Goal 8. Deregulations, employment insecurity and precarious, non-standard forms of employment were on the rise. Independent, self-employed workers, workers on variable working hours contracts, on temporary contracts or in multiparty employment relationships continued to be deprived of fundamental labour rights and basic labour protection. Independent workers encountered barriers to trade union representation and were unable to negotiate working conditions. The use of artificial intelligence (AI) was an alienating influence and contributed to employment insecurity. Global supply chains contributed to social dumping, with low wages and low labour costs, while labour had never been, and never would be, a commodity. Governments were failing to regulate in favour of worker rights. There were over 2 billion workers employed in the informal economy, working outside the rule of law. Demographic ageing and pressures on public budgets made it difficult to protect FPRW.
11. Multiple crises, including armed conflict and climate change, darkened the picture further. Climate change was already impacting seriously on workers, notably through heat stress. Technological changes required just transition measures. Trade union rights were under attack across the world, especially freedom of association and collective bargaining rights. According to the International Trade Union Confederation Global Rights Index, 87 per cent of countries were violating the right to strike, while other countries were violating civil liberties and collective bargaining. Moreover, forced labour and child labour were on the rise, along with discrimination in employment. Occupational safety and health were major issues globally, with 3 million workers dying each year and a 5 per cent increase in the mortality rate since 2015. Such trends did not reflect natural phenomena: inadequate regulation, austerity and incentives for hiring workers on precarious contracts were all measures promoted by international financial institutions.
12. Political will, labour market governance and social dialogue were critical to solutions. Universal ratification and implementation of FPRW should be promoted. Following the inclusion of a safe and healthy working environment as a fifth category of FPRW, a strategy should be set out to promote the ILO Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155) and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187). There was an urgent need to boost multilateral coherence, including ILO engagement with the World Trade Organization (WTO) and with international financial institutions. The Office should ensure that FPRW were integrated into its technical support to the constituents and Member States, with emphasis on freedom of association and non-discrimination. Progress had been made in that connection, but more efforts were needed, given that FPRW were instrumental in promoting international labour standards in general and achieving the constitutional objectives of the ILO. FPRW were immutable, enabling rights for the achievement of the ILO strategic objectives. The ILO should build on the commitments of the ILO Centenary Declaration for the Future of Work, 2019 (ILO Centenary Declaration), with all workers guaranteed enjoyment of FPRW, including limits on working time and protection of health and safety. The mutually reinforcing nature of FPRW called for an integrated approach for their realization. There was a need for space to reflect on how the ILO could do that better and to promote a higher level of commitment in the future.

13. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the European Union (EU) ¹ and its Member States, said that North Macedonia, Montenegro, Serbia, Albania, Ukraine, Georgia, Iceland and Norway aligned themselves with the statement. He expressed regret that a revised version of the Office report, specifically of its paragraph 96, had been uploaded without transparent communication to the constituents. While there was regression in advancing FPRW since 2017, there was current momentum to advance the rights. The inclusion of a safe and healthy working environment among FPRW in 2022 was welcome. Multiple crises, including COVID-19 and the geopolitical disruption caused by armed conflicts, deterioration in the rule of law and climate change, all hampered realization of FPRW. Digitalization and the development of artificial intelligence introduced possibilities for improved productivity and working conditions, but they also brought threats to privacy and to transparency of working conditions. Informality was a challenge for a large section of the labour force. Labour markets could not keep up with the number of entrants, resulting in increased precarity. There was pressure on working conditions and an increased risk of forced labour. FPRW should be fully applied in global supply chains. Enforcement had been a key challenge, and a horizontal approach was needed. Sustainability and just transition needed to be addressed through policy coherence and respect for rights at all levels. Freedom of association and collective bargaining were a gateway for all FPRW rights. The Committee's conclusions should be action-oriented, in order to assist the ILO and the constituents to fully and urgently implement all FPRW and guarantee their effectiveness.
14. The Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, noted that important progress had been made since the adoption of the 2017 framework for action. However, COVID-19, armed conflict and poverty all had an impact on realization of FPRW. In respect of the rural economy, the Office report highlighted different challenges to the recognition of FPRW and a slowing down in progress towards universal ratification of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), with notable gaps observed for agricultural and domestic workers who were still without freedom of association or collective bargaining rights. Some informal workers became victims of forced labour through lack of access to credit and a lack of awareness of their rights, due to insufficiently trained public institutions.

15. Child labour impacted everyone on the African continent. There was an alarming increase in child labour resulting from lax protections for farm workers. The ILO should examine root causes, including poverty, lack of social protection and informality. Discrimination inhibited decent work and social justice. Persons with disabilities were often victims of discrimination, with inadequate social protection, unable to enjoy their FPRW. The inclusion of a safe and healthy working environment among FPRW was an important step. The group invited other countries to ratify Convention No. 187 and to implement policies that addressed the gaps. The group welcomed the greater attention being paid to mental health at work. In the promotion of FPRW and their effective implementation, it was important to avoid controversial terms, which could result in their disrespect. The ILO should respect general terminology for communities facing discrimination.
16. The Government member of Qatar, speaking on behalf of the countries of the Cooperation Council for the Arab States of the Gulf (GCC), noted the different factors that had hindered implementation of FPRW since 2017, stemming from many years of crisis. Those problems highlighted in the Office report all impacted labour and decent work, with the COVID-19 pandemic as a key factor in undermining resilience. The result was backsliding from progress previously made, including in respect of child labour. For the GCC, lessons must be learned from those events, in order to mitigate or avoid vulnerabilities in future health crises. It was important to protect all people from all kinds of dangers. The inclusion of a safe and healthy working environment among FPRW was welcome, adding an important dimension to the rights. GCC countries had taken initiatives to strengthen policy coherence through national strategic plans, including in relation to forced labour and migration, with labour inspection systems put into place to ensure proper working hours. GCC countries benefited from experience-sharing on policy formulation and implementation. Those advances allowed GCC states to create a propitious environment for women's employment, with zero tolerance for sexual harassment. Initiatives had also been taken to improve social protection for migrant workers and to make sure they benefited from social insurance and had access to their rights.
17. The Government member of Switzerland, agreeing with the comment made by the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, regretted not having received a corrigendum, and wished that in future the Office would communicate all changes made to the report. Switzerland recognized the role of FPRW in ensuring sustainable economies and stressed the need to take all FPRW together on an equal basis. Important progress had been made in Switzerland with the ratification of the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, and in developing the National Action Plan to Combat Human Trafficking 2023–2027, including implementation mechanisms at federal and cantonal levels and efforts to strengthen labour inspection and identify victims.
18. The Government member of Australia noted the importance of combating all grounds of discrimination. Since 2017, the Office and the constituents had taken important steps towards realization of the 1998 Declaration. Australia welcomed ratifications and improved implementation efforts but noted that renewed focus was required. Australia had ratified nine of the ten fundamental Conventions, as well as the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930. The country had taken steps to promote health and safety, to improve the collective bargaining framework and protections against sexual harassment. Australia had introduced new protections for workplace delegates and established a new clear pathway for casual employees to convert to permanent work. It had established the first federal Anti-Slavery Commissioner and was working with partners in the Asia Pacific region on the Better Work programme to promote labour standards. The ILO should promote and achieve universal ratification of FPRW.

19. The Government member of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland welcomed the inclusion of occupational safety and health among FPRW. The Government was disappointed that references to the Office's work to address discrimination of LGBT+ workers had been removed from the Office report. The United Kingdom was committed to tackling gender equality and in March 2023 had held its first strategic summit on the employment of women and girls. It was important to promote capacity-building to improve social conditions in global supply chains. She noted that capacity-building for those participating and investing in supply chains was key to effecting lasting change. The United Kingdom's Partnership Against Child Exploitation (PACE) programme was an example of a tool to help enterprises and investors to identify and understand child labour risks in specific supply chains. Since the last discussion, AI technologies had brought improvements, but the deployment of this technology needed to respect human rights. A global response was needed, as a recent United Kingdom AI safety summit had highlighted, when discussing options for internationally coordinated action.
20. The Government member of Saudi Arabia said that his Government wished to share its vision for 2023 and its commitment to sustainable development. That vision required continued social dialogue with the tripartite constituents. The Government rejected all types of discrimination and had taken steps to enrich its national protection framework. Women's empowerment had increased from 19 per cent in 2014 to 34 per cent in 2023. Many more people with disabilities were employed in the country and there were important initiatives to combat child labour. Saudi Arabia was interested in advancing the right to maternity leave and committed to the provision of proper health services. The Government had put in place national programmes on occupational safety and health and had taken steps to combat forced labour.
21. The Government member of Japan stressed his Government's commitment to decent work. In order to address root causes, the ILO should embrace a "One ILO" approach. More holistic and coordination action was needed. Japan had recently joined the Global Coalition for Social Justice and had held the presidency of the Group of Seven (G7) in 2023. The G7 countries remained committed to supporting decent work and Japan had encouraged other countries to join the Alliance 8.7 in fighting child labour. In relation to human rights violations in global supply chains, Japan had intensified its efforts in providing technical assistance on occupational safety and health issues in global supply chains, with a focus on the Asia Pacific region.
22. The Government member of Honduras welcomed the discussion as vitally important to ensure recognition of FPRW. Since the last meeting, humanity had seen many events affecting decent work, including COVID-19, digitalization and the climate crisis. Efforts should be made to combat such crises, to address forced labour and child labour, and to eliminate all sources of discrimination in work. Honduras had ratified all the fundamental Conventions and was committed to decent work. Representation at international forums was important in allowing nations to advance collectively. Honduras was proud to be a member of the Global Coalition for Social Justice and was actively seeking to realize social justice for all.
23. The Government member of Türkiye noted the destructive effects of the various crises and armed conflicts, and their costs in terms of the economic and social fabric, including the loss of millions of jobs. Climate change had brought adverse risks but including occupational safety and health as part of FPRW was an historic achievement. Informality threatened efforts to realize decent work, while technological progress could increase informal work models. Technological transformation had resulted in higher levels of precariousness. The increased use of AI could lead to the loss of millions of jobs. Artificial intelligence could also increase worker surveillance, degrading job quality further. Freedom of association and collective bargaining were indispensable to attaining decent work, but the lack of protection against anti-union discrimination continued to be an important obstacle to progress.

24. The Government member of Canada noted that, since 2017, governments, workers and employers had faced challenges, including COVID-19 and growing international conflicts. Unionization had declined and fewer workplaces were covered by collective bargaining agreements. Economies had undergone structural challenges that presented both opportunities and challenges for FPRW, including the transition towards an environmentally sustainable economy, the digital transformation of the world of work, and an increasing number of workers in non-standard forms of employment, including in the platform economy, which posed challenges for workers and could complicate the provision of labour and social protection in law and collective agreements. Workers in vulnerable situations should be protected through a sound occupational safety and health system. The ILO had a proactive leadership role in eliminating discrimination in the world of work for all groups and on all grounds, including on sexual orientation and gender identity. It was noted with regret that the Office report removed references to the tools related to LGBTIQ+ persons.
25. The Government member of China noted the importance of FPRW in view of its large population of workers. This was emphasized through its labour laws and regulations enacted since 2017 for the protection of workers' rights. The focus was on four key areas, firstly the promotion of collective bargaining, which included undertaking tripartite coordination of labour relations at all levels and collaboration with the ILO office in Beijing to gather collective bargaining cases to develop training and manuals for the promotion of collective bargaining. Second, she underlined China's consistent opposition to forced labour and noted China's 2022 ratification of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), which had demonstrated commitment to workers' protection, to opposition to forced labour and to participation in international labour governance. Third, she highlighted China's vigorous actions to eliminate discrimination in employment, and in particular gender-based discrimination in the recruitment practices of employers. Measures had also been taken on labour inspection and labour market discrimination, particularly for women. The number of women in new forms of labour had risen due to flexible working arrangements. Fourth, actions had been taken to strengthen the protection of the rights and interests of workers in new forms of employment. China had seen a rapid increase in the number of workers relying on internet platforms for work and had issued guidance defining labour protection responsibilities for enterprises in accordance with labour and civil relations. Through administrative guidance on the use of labour, strengthening supervision and inspection, and other means, China had guided and urged enterprises to use labour in accordance with the law, and to effectively safeguard the rights and interests of workers in new forms of employment.
26. The Government member of the United States of America emphasized the significant ongoing and new challenges facing FPRW since 2017, including restrictions on civic space, breakdowns in the rule of law, growth in the informal economy, green and digital transitions (including the rapid increase in development and use of AI), and a pandemic. Trade union density rates had continued to decline globally, and vulnerable groups of workers were not fully represented. Workers had faced violence and threats, including intimidation, blacklisting, and gender-based violence and harassment. New forms of work had presented new opportunities, but also challenges to workers' effective representation and collective voice. Forced labour and child labour had increased globally despite the universal ratification of Convention No. 182 in 2020.

27. More needed to be done to address discrimination and the promotion of inclusive labour markets for all workers, in particular to address the unique needs of women, persons with disabilities, migrant workers, LGBTQI+ persons, and other members of underserved communities. The inclusion of a safe and healthy working environment was welcomed as a FPRW, and the United States was open to discussing how occupational safety and health could be included in the integrated strategy on fundamental principles and rights at work.
28. Governments, multilateral organizations, the business community and civil society were increasingly recognizing the importance of integrating the worker's voice into supply chain risk assessments, and in approaches to remedy. The Global Coalition for Social Justice would provide an important opportunity to promote multilateral coherence and to highlight the importance of FPRW to achieving social justice and inclusive economic growth.
29. The Government member of Argentina also noted the global challenges since 2017, and in particular COVID-19, which had resulted in a loss of jobs and livelihoods that had reversed achievements made. Although these economic repercussions had reduced, armed conflicts resulting in upheavals in supply chains remained. In addition, the deterioration of the rule of law, erosion of civil and human rights, and the shrinkage of the democratic space had undermined FPRW. A long-term view must be taken to see the effects of climate change and the impact on structural formations of how workers organized. Further political, legal and instructional efforts should be made to close the gaps in implementation of the 1998 Declaration. FPRW must be guaranteed to uphold other labour rights, and to bring about inclusive, sustainable and lasting development. A renewed, coherent commitment to promote FPRW must be made.
30. The Government member of Barbados underscored Barbados' critical development in the expansion of the legal frameworks for the protection of workers' rights, through the extension of current laws and the development of new laws. These were a result of in-depth consultations among stakeholders and included a law on safety and health at work. Barbados had ratified the Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190), and had passed laws on safeguards against sexual harassment and discrimination and the prevention of discrimination. Through a minimum wage order of 2021, minimum wages had been set at a national level, with specific hourly rates for certain sectors. However, poverty crises and debt, cost-of-living and climate crises had had implications on the progress towards Sustainable Development Goal 8. In particular, the 2022 Bridgetown Initiative for the Reform of the Global Financial Architecture had brought sharply into focus the need to ensure livelihoods were climate resilient and supported a just transition in employment.
31. The Government member of Côte d'Ivoire outlined its achievements in promoting FPRW, noting that the right to collective bargaining had been enshrined in the Ivorian Constitution and the Labour Code. Forced labour had been prohibited by the Labour Code and the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, had been ratified. An early warning system of child labour had been established as an essential component of the national action plan to combat child trafficking and exploitation. Discrimination in employment had also been prohibited by the Labour Code, which outlined equal pay for work of equal value, regardless of gender. Côte d'Ivoire had ratified Convention No. 155 and had produced a national occupational safety and health policy and programme for the country. In addition, a global strategy for labour inspectorates had been planned to address related issues in the coming years, but further action would be required in that respect.

32. The Government member of Senegal concurred with the challenges in realizing FPRW in several countries, including Senegal, particularly due to obstacles to exercising civil liberties and human rights, informality, political instability and the decreasing democratic space, particularly in enterprises. Senegal had analysed its system of social dialogue and, as a result, had implemented a national action plan to strengthen social dialogue to enhance collective bargaining by providing capacity-building for stakeholders on freedom of association, the right to organize and collective bargaining, and negotiation techniques. Child labour had been aggravated by the loss of family income due to the economic crises caused by the pandemic. Senegal had adopted a national framework plan on the elimination of child labour, which aimed to eliminate the worst forms of child labour by 2030. Senegal had drafted a national occupational health and safety policy to address health and safety at work. The country had also ratified Convention No. 187. In addition, the labour and social security inspectorates had increased inspection activities to ensure compliance with regulations.
33. A representative of the Institution of Occupational Safety and Health said that the Office report showed that policy and regulatory gaps, as well as limited institutional capacity, had been persistent barriers to realizing occupational safety and health at a national level. The extension of legal occupational safety and health protection to unprotected workers had remained unaddressed and underdiscussed. While some initial progress had been made, the institution had often been unable to reach more vulnerable and marginalized workers in informal economies due to resourcing constraints. With the ILO and other partners, the institution had supported workers in the agriculture, fisheries and garment industries in remote rural locations to better understand their working conditions and the compounding risk factors and harms faced. Further partners would be welcome to join in that work.
34. A representative of the International Young Christian Workers pointed to the shortage of decent work opportunities that had forced many young workers to accept poor-quality, lowly paid jobs, without access to social protection. The contractualization, informalization, flexibilization and digitalization of work had denied the basic rights of workers on freedom of association, having a decent salary and access to social protection. Those problems had never been addressed by the authorities concerned, while young workers maintained the right to just work and a dignified life, which could not be achieved if they were continually exploited.
35. The Employer Vice-Chairperson highlighted the numerous points of convergence during the discussion, and the clear and widespread commitment to FPRW. There were structural barriers, widely mentioned by speakers, in particular the prevalence of informality and the adverse consequences of persistent informality, and the importance of addressing those and other root causes impeding implementation of FPRW. All FPRW must be addressed in an integrated manner, and they were universally applicable to all. The Employers welcomed the strong recognition of the value and importance of occupational safety and health as a FPRW and hoped that those areas of alignment would provide a solid foundation for a constructive and balanced outcome.
36. Precarious work did exist in the informal economy, however use of the terms such as “precarious”, “insecure” and “non-standard forms of work” should be avoided, in favour of the agreed language of “diverse forms of work.” The associated language had been linked to the platform economy, and care should be taken not to pre-judge prior to the forthcoming standard-setting discussion on the platform economy in 2025. Regarding global supply chains, the real challenges lay with the small and medium-sized enterprises that were purely domestic in nature. Moreover, businesses that remained in the informal economy fell outside of the programmatic efforts of governments.

37. The Worker Vice-Chairperson reaffirmed the validity of the 1998 Declaration and reiterated that FPRW remained universal, inalienable and enabling rights, and applicable to all workers regardless of the sector, type of work or type of contract. The Committee's conclusions should underscore that point. Governments had made efforts to promote FPRW, including the work on strengthening the minimum wage. As stated by the Government member of Gabon, child labour trends were worrying, and there was a need for effective implementation. The Government member of Qatar had raised an important point, when outlining his Government's efforts on initiatives and cooperation on labour migration and labour inspection, regarding the vital nature of learning from each other. The Workers' group welcomed the news from Saudi Arabia regarding the increase in participation of women in the labour market, and from China on the promotion of collective bargaining, increasing the number of workers who were covered by collective agreements, and the access to employment protection for those in non-standard forms of work. Argentina had made a valid point regarding the importance of FPRW in times of crisis and the need to be able to have inclusive and sustainable development.
38. The overall regression in FPRW since the last recurrent discussion was deeply worrying. New problems included the challenges of digitalization, the rise of AI, the rise of the platform economy, growing numbers of armed conflicts and disasters, situations of fragility, climate change, the rise of global supply chains, and the rise in precarious forms of work. The ILO's priorities and future actions, including the new integrated strategy on FPRW, should specifically seek to address those conditions.
39. As previous speakers had noted, the breadth of informality was impeding FPRW. Formalization efforts had to be a part of any strategy for the promotion of workers' rights. The ILO Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204) provided an important framework for action. The Workers' group supported all action to strengthen labour inspectorates, a point made by several governments. Greater multilateral coherence to promote FPRW was a necessity. The Worker's group echoed the request for the Global Coalition of Social Justice to serve as a vehicle for the promotion of labour rights internationally.

Which policies, initiatives and practices at national and global levels have contributed to the respect, promotion and realization of fundamental principles and rights at work and, taking stock of the Integrated Strategy on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work 2017–2023, which challenges and lessons learned should be drawn by ILO Member States and the Office in view of advancing social justice?

40. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that there were worrying deficits in policies and practices needed to support the realization of FPRW. The situation was compounded by the lack of ratification by Member States of core labour standards and, even where there was ratification, systematic violations occurred. Deregulation, the weakening of employment protection and collective bargaining had in many countries been adopted as part of a strategy for job creation, often promoted by international organizations. That approach was erroneous. Countries should take measures to promote formalization, in line with Recommendation No. 204. Member States' enforcement capacity must be strengthened to identify rights and sanction non-compliant employers. More action should be taken to protect domestic workers, platform workers, self-employed workers and to address the gender pay gap and labour migration issues. Regulation should extend throughout the entire length of global supply chains, in particular regarding respect and promotion of freedom of association and collective bargaining. The group welcomed efforts made by some countries and regional organizations to extend protections to workers in non-standard forms of employment. It was important to highlight the continued relevance of the employment relationship as a primary gateway for ensuring labour rights. Employment misclassification would be combated by introducing a legal presumption of an employment relationship. Robust anti-discrimination legislation and effective enforcement should be introduced to counter multiple and intersecting forms of discrimination. The gender pay gap could be addressed through the introduction of transparency measures, as well as work-life measures. Migrant policies were undermining workers' rights in some countries and should be addressed through an examination of the intersection between migration and social and labour policies. The group reaffirmed its desire for strengthened international level frameworks to support decent work in supply chains, currently under ongoing discussion at the ILO. Responsible business conduct in supply chains could not be guaranteed without respect by multinational enterprises for freedom of association and collective bargaining. Better conditions should be put in place for transnational union organizing. With respect to climate change, the group recognized that an increasing number of countries were putting in place plans to safeguard workers who might be affected, but in very few cases, through collective bargaining on just transition. Finally, greater coherence between the lending conditions imposed by international financial institutions and fundamental labour standards was required.

41. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that important policies, programmes and practices had contributed to the advancement of FPRW, including occupational safety and health policies, and reforms to discriminatory practices for women. The social partners had contributed to progress in recruitment and had provided support to micro, small and medium-sized enterprises (MSMEs) and self-employment. They had engaged with informal enterprises to support their formalization and had undertaken capacity-building on FPRW to support their members and in social dialogue to foster joint action. ILO technical assistance at the national level had been key for the constituents, such as in Uzbekistan and Qatar. The conclusions must acknowledge the importance of ILO initiatives to advance FPRW, including the ILO Helpdesk for Business on International Labour Standards of the Tripartite declaration of principles concerning multinational enterprises and social policy (MNE Declaration), and the ILO Global Business Network on Forced Labour, a powerful tool for sharing best practice on FPRW. Funding should be streamlined to allocate further resources to the network. The Better Work programme and Alliance 8.7 both helped promote FPRW and had an impact at local and global levels. The Office report could have capitalized better on those positive aspects, and should have assessed follow-up to the 2017 resolution concerning the second recurrent discussion on fundamental principles and rights at work (2017 resolution), which informed the following points that should be included in the conclusions: firstly, the need to recognize that resources were limited. The focus must be on agreed thematic areas, rather than on creating new areas. The 2017 resolution called for an integrated strategy for FPRW, involving balanced support for all FPRW, and ensuring coherence with other ILO strategic objectives. The conclusions should reaffirm the need for demand-driven focusing of efforts responding to the constituents' needs and fostering synergies between the ILO's four strategic objectives. Conversely, the Employers did not support the Office's description of a new "integrated approach", which would most likely diffuse, rather than sharpen, the focus on targeted interventions. Integrated strategies should address the root causes of the decent work deficit at the national level. The conclusions should highlight the positive relationship between sustainable enterprises, productivity growth and the promotion of and respect for FPRW. The Annual Review under the follow-up to the 1998 Declaration provided an opportunity to develop and drive good practice, and that should also be reflected in the conclusions.

42. The Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, said that Member States in Africa continued to promote respect for and implementation of FPRW. Action taken to promote freedom of association and collective bargaining included the repeal of legislation prohibiting union membership for reasons of age or nationality. Member States had taken steps to strengthen the labour inspectorates, for example in the fishing sector. The group had also taken measures to align the school-leaving age with the minimum age of employment, as a means of combating child labour. Integrated action had been engaged regarding child labour, in conformity with the Durban Call to Action on the Elimination of Child Labour. Africa lacked specialists and doctors in occupational safety and health, and work was required to strengthen the capacities of government officials and labour inspectors. The countries also needed a tool to evaluate existing policies and programmes.
43. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that North Macedonia, Montenegro, Serbia, Albania, Ukraine, Georgia, Iceland and Norway aligned themselves with the statement. She enumerated recent initiatives adopted by the EU on minimum wages and pay transparency, social dialogue and health and safety legislation, and trade policies. The EU had a zero-tolerance policy regarding child labour, and had adopted legislation on corporate sustainability due diligence, forced labour, corporate sustainability reporting and on platform work. The EU recalled that freedom of association and collective bargaining were enabling rights that underpinned the realization of FPRW. Protection from all grounds of discrimination should be promoted, paying due attention to multiple and intersecting forms of discrimination – the ILO could step up its action in that connection. Following the inclusion of the right to a safe and healthy working environment as a fifth category, it should be integrated into a holistic strategy to advance the mutually reinforcing nature of FPRW. The EU counted on the Global Coalition for Social Justice to enhance policy coherence leading up to the 2025 Second World Summit for Social Development.
44. The Government member of Qatar, speaking on behalf of the GCC, noted the consensus in the Committee on commitments and progress made, but also noted comments concerning insufficient attention paid to the root causes of FPRW deficits, and systematic problems related to implementation. Lack of human and financial resources should be addressed through specific methodologies, efficient governance and sustainable reform.
45. The Government member of the United Kingdom listed some of the latest initiatives taken in the United Kingdom, including legislation related to Convention No. 190 and the United Kingdom's LGBT rights programme focused on eliminating violence, discrimination and stigma. Gender participation and pay gaps remained a challenge at the domestic level and specific measures had been adopted accordingly. Since 2017, the United Kingdom had concluded 17 trade agreements that referenced FPRW, and research had recently been undertaken on levers to reduce business and human rights abuse in supply chains – an initiative in which the ILO could play a role.
46. The Government member of Canada stressed that FPRW contributed to achieving social, economic and development objectives, with freedom of association and collective bargaining as enabling rights. Canada, at the federal level, had recently taken action to prohibit the use of replacement workers during a strike or lockout, while the Government had enacted legislation to address forced labour in the context of supply chains, banning the importation of goods produced using forced labour, as well as legislation at the provincial level to protect young workers, for example from hazardous forms of work. Regarding discrimination, Canada had introduced two new designated groups in the Employment Equity Act: Black people and 2SLGBTQI+ people. Work on reducing the pay gap was also going ahead.

47. The Government member of the United States highlighted the Presidential Memorandum on Advancing Worker Empowerment, Rights and High Labor Standards Globally, signed in November 2023, which included action to protect and promote respect of FPRW. In 2021, a task force on worker organizing and empowerment had been established, together with the Forced Labor Enforcement Task Force, while in 2022, the Interagency Task Force to Combat Child Labor Exploitation had been created. The Government advocated a whole-of-government approach to promoting FPRW, emphasizing the enabling rights of freedom of association and collective bargaining. Research had shown that the prevalence of child labour was lessened where adult workers enjoyed those rights.
48. The Government member of Honduras referred to the recent tripartite meeting held in the country, with ILO support, to define its Decent Work Country Programme for 2024–27. Honduras had reopened tripartite social dialogue, in order to prevent collective labour conflicts and anti-union violence. The Government was in the process of ratifying Conventions Nos 155 and 187, as well as Convention No. 190. Regarding the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), a labour inspectorate protocol to identify and sanction discrimination at work was under development. International cooperation and multilateralism were critical to guaranteeing sustainable and inclusive social protection.
49. The Government member of Mexico outlined the 2019 reforms introduced by the Government to restructure the labour system to allow trade unions to undertake their work freely and democratically. Over 30,500 collective labour agreements had since been concluded, benefiting more than 5 million workers. Gender equality in union representation was promoted. The labour reform included provisions for employers and workers to implement measures against discrimination and harassment in the workplace and further provisions to combat trafficking in persons and child labour. The Government had engaged the process of ratifying Convention No. 187.
50. The Government member of Colombia indicated that the Government was taking steps to guarantee access to social protection for workers in precarious or informal employment. Digitalization and the use of AI required special attention with regard to safeguarding FPRW, by ensuring human participation both at the design stage and in system supervision. Colombia was working to identify risks arising from remote work and in designing appropriate inspection, surveillance and control strategies for such work. Freedom of association and collective bargaining must be inclusive, with strengthened trade unions. It must cover formal employment, but also rural and emerging employment.
51. The Government member of Türkiye said that FPRW were guaranteed under the Constitution in her country. The social partners engaged in social dialogue to address issues arising from the world of work, such as in setting minimum wages. The Government had implemented plans and programmes to prevent industrial accidents and occupational diseases, and those were effectively monitored. Türkiye prioritized the prevention of child labour and promoted the access of women, persons with disabilities and young persons to the labour market, through specific incentives and financial mechanisms.
52. The Government member of Brazil noted worldwide challenges to the effective application of FPRW. Social dialogue was essential to addressing those issues. In Brazil, tripartite councils, and tripartite and interministerial working groups, had been reactivated and were deliberating on platform work and the implementation of the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151). The Employ More Women Act of 2023 had introduced the concept of gender equality in parenthood, making it possible for women and men to share parental leave. Further action had been taken to ensure equal pay for men and women under the Equal Pay Act.

53. The Government member of Mozambique said that the Government had ratified Conventions Nos 155 and 187 in 2024 and was in the process of ratifying Convention No. 190. Also in 2024, legislation had extended maternity leave from two to three months and had introduced paternity leave and remote work. Efforts were under way to improve the protection of agricultural workers and to extend social security to self-employed workers.
54. The Government member of India said that India was making strides towards fulfilling its Sustainable Development Goal targets. International labour standards were key to advancing principles of governance in the world of work and to mitigating the effects of economic and social crises. Social dialogue was a core pillar of decent work and provided a linkage between international labour standards and the country's legal framework. India's labour regulatory system was informed by international labour standards, with four individual codes, respectively on wages; social security; industrial relations; and occupational safety, health and working conditions. Social security cover had been extended to informal sector workers, migrant workers, and gig economy and platform workers. Discriminatory legislation had been amended to allow women to take up work previously prohibited to them. Action had been taken to install a minimum wage in the formal and informal sectors, and to prevent gender discrimination in matters related to wages and recruitment. The informal sector occupied a significant portion of employment and economic activity, and the Government had taken a number of initiatives to improve the skills and lifelong learning of informal workers. The Government had also instigated a range of in-kind social protection measures. India's latest Decent Work Country Programme was focused on promotion of FPRW.
55. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that, while efforts made by governments to promote various aspects of FPRW were commendable, major challenges persisted. The role of social dialogue and collective bargaining as enabling rights made it all the more important to protect those rights and remove barriers to union organizing. The group agreed with its Employer counterparts on the importance of social dialogue to support FPRW, although the Employer Vice-Chairperson had not included freedom of association and collective bargaining to that end. The inclusion of a safe and healthy working environment among FPRW was encouraging countries to examine the ratification of the Occupational Safety and Health (Dock Work) Convention, 1979 (No. 152), and Convention No. 187. Universal ratification and implementation of those instruments was essential. The group upheld their view, contrary to the Employer Vice-Chairperson's statement of his group's view, that an integrated approach to implementation of FPRW was essential.
56. The Employer Vice-Chairperson highlighted the points of convergence his group had observed during the discussion, noting the success stories that had been evoked by the Africa group, India and the Government member of Belgium on behalf of the EU and its Member States. However, matters had been raised that could not be endorsed by the Employers' group, such as the mischaracterization of work as "precarious, insecure or non-standard". In the ILO Centenary Declaration, the term "diverse forms of work" was used. Such forms of work should not only be considered in negative terms. They could also create opportunities in the formal economy. Precarity was an informal economy issue. Criticism had been levelled at global supply chains, however the ILO focused on all supply chains, whether global or not. While the group did not maintain that supply chains were free of problems, the Office report also highlighted their importance in advancing FPRW. Moreover, there was an ILO supply chain strategy that spanned the period up to 2027, which was not to be negotiated in the current discussion. Mandatory human rights due diligence, under agreed ILO policy, was promoted under the voluntary framework of the United Nations (UN) Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights. Some countries had asserted that freedom of association and collective bargaining were enabling rights for the other FPRW. That was a variation of the language used in the 2008 Social Justice Declaration, which referred to FPRW as “both rights and enabling conditions”. The group agreed with the importance of freedom of association and collective bargaining, but the root causes of FPRW deficits were not due to the absence of those rights. In Latin America, a reduction in child labour had resulted from policies including aligning the minimum school leaving age with the minimum age of employment. Access to social protection and wage policies could also help. Promoting sustainable enterprises and an enabling environment would help address informality and establish social protection floors. The group supported an integrated strategy, indeed it considered it critical to making progress. However, an integrated approach, where one FPRW could not be addressed without addressing all the others, would simply complicate and impede progress.

In pursuing social justice, how can the Organization scale up its action to support Member States, including through an integrated strategy, and which additional efforts are needed to further respect, promote and realize fundamental principles and rights at work? What priorities should be identified within the areas of partnerships, international policy coherence, institutional capacity-building, research, development cooperation, Decent Work Country Programmes and standards-related action? What actions should the Office and Member States take to achieve the universal ratification and effective implementation of the ten fundamental Conventions and the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930?

57. The Employer Vice-Chairperson recalled the gaps in implementation of FPRW at the national level, the need to address the root causes of those gaps, and the need for inclusive economic growth to foster sustainable enterprises. In order to achieve this, Member States must: eliminate implementation gaps; promote formalization in line with Recommendation No. 204; promote sustainable and inclusive economic growth; create an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises as a major driver of productivity and job creation; innovate to support MSMEs and newly formed enterprises; establish means to monitor and adapt policies and practices; and harness the potential of technology and digitalization.
58. The Employers’ group supported the following ILO actions on internal coherence: continuing to develop and pursue an integrated strategy on FPRW providing balanced support to all FPRW, integrating efforts on occupational safety and health; strengthening existing tools and instruments (in particular better resourcing for the ILO Helpdesk for Business on International Labour Standards, the ILO Global Business Network on Forced Labour, and the Child Labour Platform); and continuing to focus on the three thematic areas articulated in 2017 by strengthening the synergies between all ILO actions. ILO action should target root causes, the capacity of labour inspectorates, promoting sustainable enterprises, including building on synergies between the Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work Branch and the Sustaining Competitive and Responsible Enterprises (SCORE) programme. More should be done to increase the visibility of the ILO as a central, widely accessible repository for reliable FPRW data.
59. The Employers’ group wished the Office to undertake: peer-reviewed and scientifically rigorous research on the economic and social impact of informality on the realization of FPRW; evidence-based research and collection of data leveraging technology and digitalization to tackle the root causes of FPRW deficits; and action-oriented research on best practices on integrating FPRW into MSMEs and newly formalized enterprises. Greater priority must be given to effective implementation of FPRW at the national level. To that end, a restructuring of the Annual Review questionnaire and the development of a user-friendly survey instrument to facilitate follow-up actions and support from the ILO were proposed.

60. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stressed the importance of the Office continuing to promote universal ratification and effective implementation of ILO core instruments, with a special focus on freedom of association and collective bargaining. The ILO should better promote ratification of core labour standards in Decent Work Country Programmes and technical assistance efforts and better respond to and ensure the allocation of resources for technical assistance requests made under the Annual Reviews.
61. Regarding standards, the Office should specifically promote Conventions Nos 87, 98, 155 and 187. The Office should improve linkages between the 1998 Declaration and the ILO supervisory system outcomes and the ILO integrated strategy on FPRW. Violations and deficits noted by the ILO supervisory system should result in immediate responses at the national level and should affect development cooperation, Decent Work Country Programmes and technical assistance.
62. The Office should continue an integrated approach to FPRW and to focus on the five thematic areas of: informality; conflict and crisis situations; digital platform work and other emerging forms of work; supply chains; and climate change action and just transition. There should be a balance in attention and resources across all five FPRWs, with freedom of association, collective bargaining, gender equality, non-discrimination and inclusion kept as cross-cutting priorities in the integrated strategy. The ILO should build the capacity of workers' organizations to promote the realization of rights at work for all workers, with a focus on the most vulnerable.
63. The Workers' group requested more regular data collection and research on: (i) forced labour and updates on the Forced Labour Observatory; (ii) transnational social dialogue; (iii) public procurement; (iv) the impact of non-standard forms of work and new technologies on FPRW; (v) FPRW in the context of a just transition towards a zero-carbon economy; (vi) human rights due diligence laws and their implementation in line with international labour standards; and (vii) trade and labour provisions in trade agreements on FPRW, as well as on import bans on goods made using forced labour. The recent decision for the Office to publish its Social Dialogue Flagship Report regularly was welcome. It was stressed that the ILO must actively engage in ongoing discussions for international business and human rights, especially with regard to a binding UN business and human rights treaty.
64. To build partnerships for supporting FPRW, the ILO should further engage with the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and multilateral development banks, as well as with the WTO. The ILO must advocate for high-level political commitment to FPRW, including universal ratification of ILO labour standards, and within the UN system. FPRW must be a core part of the Global Coalition for Social Justice and the forthcoming Second World Summit for Social Development.
65. The Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, stated that the ILO must examine the root causes of barriers to implementation of international labour standards in many contexts, including Africa. That would require implementation of the integrated strategy, taking account of the social and cultural context. The ILO should also increase support for ratification of other fundamental ILO Conventions and increase monitoring and follow-up of activities, policies and plans on respecting FPRW at work. The Africa group welcomed the ILO's commitment to strengthening the capacity of governments in the area of labour inspections and institutions to solve labour disputes. The Organization should ensure that national strategies related to FPRW at work were adequately resourced to allow an appropriate response to needs.

66. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that the ILO's priorities and future actions must match the challenges of transition and crises, and recalled the relevance of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. The ILO should continue analysing the impact of climate change on FPRW and associated climate adaptation and mitigation measures. A follow-up to the integrated strategy covering all five FPRWs, in line with the "One ILO" approach, would be appreciated. The Office should continue providing technical assistance, taking into account the interdependence and mutually reinforcing nature of FPRW. A holistic and integrated approach to the respect, realization and promotion of FPRW was required. There should be better interplay between the findings of ILO supervisory bodies and the technical assistance provided.
67. The ILO should further explore how the decline of collective bargaining and trade union density could be addressed, including the gaps in representation for most vulnerable workers. Continued attention should be paid to strengthening the capacity of the social partners, and to cooperation with civil society, including in the context of the Global Coalition for Social Justice. Further research was required into barriers to the full realization of FPRW and into good policy practices. The ILO should continue its work on data collection and analysis as a basis for evidence-based policymaking and should make efforts to reinforce Member States' data capacities as well. It should maintain its advocacy in the multilateral system on mainstreaming FPRW across all policy fields, including within the United Nations, with international financial institutions and regional economic organizations.
68. The Government member of Switzerland indicated the Government's wish to see greater coherence in internal and external ILO policies. The "One ILO" approach should be applied in a coherent fashion throughout all ILO offices. The Organization should collaborate with partners, including international financial institutions, at an international level on economic development cooperation. The Better Work programme and the interdepartmental approach in Ethiopia were examples that should be expanded more broadly in the ILO and among the constituents.
69. The Government member of the United Kingdom suggested an iterative process of continual improvement to be developed through constituent knowledge-sharing and Office operationalization through technical assistance and decent work country programmes. The ILO supervisory system could also play a key part in diffusing knowledge within the Organization of developments and trends to support equal focus on ratifying and implementing FPRW. The United Kingdom's locally led approach to international development could be an example approach to respond to the different needs of Member States. New capacity-building levers could include business investors who had an influence on combating human trafficking and forced labour in supply chains.
70. The Government member of Mexico provided examples of the ILO initiatives to combat child labour in Latin America and the Caribbean, and highlighted its partnerships, including as a Pathfinder Country of Alliance 8.7 and as Co-chair, with Qatar, of the Fair Recruitment Initiative. Those types of exchanges of experience, capacity-building, and cooperation could help boost respect for, and implementation of, FPRW.
71. The Government member of China recommended the strengthening of policy coordination and cooperation, as well as the enhancement of development cooperation for developing countries. More discussions should be held to explore Member States' diversity in terms of culture, history and legal systems. The supervisory system should ensure that its comments on implementation efforts were up to date, fact based and took consideration of diversity. Platform workers must be protected, as flexible and new forms of employment had been important channels for Chinese workers to increase income, while at the same time posing challenges in the protection of workers' rights. The Office should conduct research on: (i) employers' responsibilities and the employment relationship; (ii) extending social security coverage; and (iii) the impact of and responses to digital technological advancement and AI on labour rights and lifelong learning.

72. The Government member of the United States emphasized that FPRW were mutually reinforcing and should be implemented in a balanced manner. That had not yet been achieved through the current strategy. Reports had outlined that less focus had been given to freedom of association than to forced labour and child labour, which were increasing in global estimates. The Government strongly supported according higher visibility and work density to less frequently covered FPRW categories, in particular freedom of association and collective bargaining, and announced in November 2023 in this regard a new project of up to US$40 million to support countries and research activities on freedom of association and collective bargaining. Additional attention was also needed to promote gender equality, non-discrimination and inclusion. The Office should, for example, develop country-based qualitative and quantitative research on the labour market situation of women, persons with disabilities, people living with HIV, indigenous and tribal peoples and other population groups affected by discrimination and exclusion, including on the grounds of race, sexual orientation and gender identity. ILO development cooperation and the ILO supervisory machinery should develop synergies. Given the lack of information on "One ILO" initiatives undertaken from 2017 to 2023, further details in that regard would be welcome.
73. The Government member of Canada echoed the recommendations for the Office to streamline its operations through increased internal coordination, and to maximize the use of resources when addressing the uneven distribution of funding between FPRW. Regarding discrimination, the ILO had a key role in assisting the constituents to better understand barriers and gaps by providing disaggregated data on discrimination and the intersectionalities of discrimination. Particular focus should be placed on the inclusion of mental health considerations when integrating safe and healthy work environments. Regarding technical assistance, priority should be given to the integration of FPRW into the UN Sustainable Development Cooperation Framework and ILO Decent Work Country Programmes, complemented by building the capacity of employers' and workers' organizations for meaningful social dialogue. The ILO supervisory system could take on an important role in identifying targeted interventions. The Government strongly encouraged initiatives such as the Equal Pay International Coalition (EPIC) for equal pay for work of equal value. The ILO should provide ongoing advice on FPRW in the context of increasing due diligence legislation, responsible business conduct in supply chains, and labour provisions in trade agreements.
74. The Government member of Barbados recommended action to leverage the regional similarities in the design of context-specific programmes to promote FPRW and to facilitate knowledge-sharing among members in real time. Priorities for action included the modernization of labour legislation, which should be informed by related gap analyses. This was of particular importance to small island developing States, where the effects of the climate crisis were clear. It was also vital that resources were directed to capacity-building in labour inspection, which was essential to promoting FPRW. The ILO must continue to form and strengthen relationships within the UN system and international financial institutions to promote FPRW. The ILO must intensify advocacy to ensure that FPRW were included in international treaties for trade and financing. The Global Coalition for Social Justice could provide a common backdrop for the development of coherent policies at the international level. Promotion of FPRW must include the actors in the social and solidarity economy.

75. The Government member of Türkiye reflected positively on the ILO's assistance in Türkiye and noted a desire to see an expansion of these activities in the region. The ILO should limit itself to universally accepted terminology, in order to respect Member States' diversity of culture and legal systems. There was a need to strengthen support for women in the labour market, to continue the eradication of child labour and forced labour, and to offer training for non-employment educational training.
76. The Government member of Egypt outlined several legislative efforts, projects and programmes the Government had undertaken in support of FPRW, including freedom of association and collective bargaining. Measures had been taken that aimed at achieving gender equality, empowering women economically, enabling them to reconcile family duties with work requirements, and eliminating all forms of discrimination. The Egyptian delegation, while supporting much of the content of the Office report, rejected in substance paragraphs 41 and 96 as they introduced new categories that did not align with international human rights law and did not enjoy the consensus of all ILO constituents.
77. The Government member of Indonesia noted the importance of the protection of a safe and healthy working environment, which was reflected in Indonesian national legislation. The aftermath of COVID-19 effects had been ongoing, including hiring and labour issues, layoffs and furloughs. In addition, digitalization had fundamentally transformed the economy, diversifying and expanding job opportunities, resulting in the growth of MSMEs. Working conditions were regulated not only through national legislation but also through collective agreements between enterprises and trade unions.
78. The Government member of Algeria highlighted the efforts made by Algeria to strengthen the social security system, employ new talent from universities, extend social security for vulnerable groups, and increase maternity leave. The labour law had been revised to provide greater opportunities for workers to establish unions and to facilitate union registration and provide for "entrepreneurship leave" whereby workers could return to their former employment should a venture fail. The Government was taking steps to boost entrepreneurship through the establishment of micro enterprises and start-ups. Algeria aimed to strengthen its continental role in social security by becoming a central depository for social security knowledge for the continent.
79. The Government member of Peru said that coherence between national and international policies was needed to ensure that there were no conflicts between economic and labour rights objectives. Ratification of the core Conventions should be pushed forward, together with efforts to ensure their implementation. The Government reaffirmed its commitment to working with the international community by exchanging good practices, strengthening capacities and promoting technical cooperation.
80. The Government member of Chile invited the Office to support the exchange of practices within regions, and through Alliance 8.7 and related coalitions. It was important to maintain and integrate the gender perspective within normative instruments in a holistic approach. Chile also attached great importance to occupational safety and health within FPRW. Partnerships were key to increasing respect for and implementing FPRW: governments, the social partners and the Office could not work alone.
81. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stressed that the outcome of the Committee's work should be balanced and based on consensus. There were many points of convergence among participants. Some speakers had called for the need to evaluate impact in order to assess good practices. Technical assistance should be demand driven and responsive to Member States' and constituents' needs. Thus, there was a need for high-quality data to allow informed decisions to be taken. The focus should be on capitalizing on ILO initiatives that worked well, which could be duplicated elsewhere. The Employers acknowledged the relationship between FPRW and the four pillars of the ILO strategic objectives, in line with the 2008 Social Justice Declaration. The group wished to be clear that the 2008 Declaration stated that FPRW were "rights and enabling conditions" for the pillars, rather than "enabling rights". The Employers also urged the Committee not to ignore the fact that digitalization could create opportunities for economic development and growth. The following priorities should inform the conclusions of the Committee: decisive action to eliminate the implementation gap, moving beyond ratification; strong political will and commitment to addressing root causes; the imperative of building constituents' core capabilities appropriate to national circumstances; creating an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises; and transitioning from informality to formality. ILO actions must support these imperatives, while being anchored in evidence-based research. These actions should be taken without losing sight of resource limitations and should be prioritized to ensure the greatest impact.

82. The Worker Vice-Chairperson referred to the Employer group's rejection of the terms "non-standard forms of work", made on the grounds that the term was not agreed ILO terminology, and that the term "diverse forms of work" should be used. There had in fact been no agreed terminology, and the language proposed by the Employers obscured the fact that certain forms of work came with less security and lower rights and protections for workers. The Workers also disagreed with the Employers' words "moving beyond ratification of core ILO instruments". Ratification was needed to ensure that national legislation was in line with international standards and to engage the ILO supervisory machinery. Many governments had stressed the importance of ratifying standards. The group had, however, heard constructive proposals, including calls for further technical support for labour inspection, calls to reinforce development cooperation and to integrate FPRW into decent work country programmes. The group was in favour of strengthened cooperation with international financial institutions to improve policy coherence at the international level and promote FPRW in international trade. The Global Coalition for Social Justice could serve as a crucial forum for promoting FPRW at the international level. The Africa group had highlighted that it was not only workers that profited from the fundamental Conventions, but also employers. The Workers held that governments also profited from those instruments. The group wholeheartedly concurred with the view that social dialogue was of critical importance and recalled that collective bargaining was a central element of social dialogue.

Discussion of the draft conclusions

83. The Chairperson introduced the draft conclusions prepared by the drafting group, noting that 160 amendments had been submitted for consideration. Amendments addressing points of the draft conclusions that remained in brackets would be dealt with in the same manner as non-bracketed text.

Draft conclusions concerning the third recurrent discussion on fundamental principles and rights at work

Title

84. The title “Draft conclusions concerning the third recurrent discussion on fundamental principles and rights at work” was adopted.

Subtitle

I. Fundamental principles and rights at work are more needed and relevant than ever

85. The subtitle of part I “I. Fundamental principles and rights at work are more needed and relevant than ever” was adopted without amendment.

Points 1 to 4

86. Points 1 to 4 were adopted.

Point 5

87. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment (A.96) to replace the words “per cent” with “percentage points”.
88. The Worker and Employer Vice-Chairpersons and Government members supported the amendment.
89. The amendment was adopted.
90. Point 5 was adopted as amended.

New point to be inserted after point 5

91. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.167) to insert a new point after point 5, to read “Workers in all sectors and across the world continue to be exposed to unsafe and unhealthy working environments and new risks have emerged, including heat stress and psychosocial risks”. It would highlight the continued challenges of ensuring the right to a healthy and safe working environment and emerging occupational safety and health risks, as raised in paragraphs 17, 49 and 52 of the Office report.
92. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed a subamendment to replace “new risks have emerged” with “risks have intensified”, given that they were not new risks.
93. The Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported the amendment by the Workers’ group, as subamended by the EU Member States.
94. The Government member of China made a reservation to the wording “Workers in all sectors” in the new point proposed by the Workers’ group, considering the situation to have been exaggerated, particularly in his country.
95. The Government member of Norway, also speaking on behalf of the Government of Iceland, supported the Workers’ amendment as subamended by the Government member of Belgium.
96. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to insert the word “certain” before “risks have intensified”. He proposed a further subamendment to replace “Workers” with “While workers” at the start of the sentence, to replace the full stop after “psychosocial risks” with a comma, and to then insert the wording “statistics for the period from 2000 to 2019 suggest an overall improvement in workplace safety, marked by a 10 per cent decrease in the work-related mortality rate”. He proposed another subamendment to insert a second sentence, to read “This calls for the promotion, respect and realization of a safe and healthy work environment to protect workers, enhance work performance and productivity, improve staff retention, and minimize tension and conflict”.

97. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of the group of Latin American and Caribbean countries (GRULAC), supported the amendment proposed as subamended.
98. The Government member of China, expressing appreciation for the efforts to reach consensus, proposed a subamendment to replace “all sectors” with “certain sectors”, and supported the other language proposed.
99. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, pointing out that point 4 noted that challenges remained, and that the subsequent points discussed the challenges while the previous points had discussed progress and positive developments, expressed a reservation about the location of the proposed new point as worded. He proposed a subamendment, to read “While statistics for the period from 2000 to 2019 suggest an overall improvement in workplace safety, including a 10 per cent decrease in the work-related mortality rate, workers in all sectors across the world continue to be exposed to unsafe and unhealthy working environments and certain risks have intensified, including heat stress and psychosocial risks”. The Office report addressed all sectors, not certain sectors, and there were certain risks that applied to all sectors.
100. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that, in the interests of moving forward, the Employers would agree to inserting their proposed second sentence elsewhere, provided that the sentence was framed as it stood. The Employers supported the subamendment proposed by China for “certain sectors” to replace “all sectors”.
101. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, emphasizing that paragraph 49 of the Office report referred to “all sectors”, said that his group preferred to retain the term.
102. The Government member of the United States appreciated the reference to “heat stress” and “psychosocial risks”, which were of particular importance to her Government. She proposed a subamendment to delete “including a 10 per cent decrease in the work-related mortality rate,” from the additional sentence proposed in the Employers’ subamendments as, although that percentage was noted in the Office report, the latter also subsequently noted that the challenge had not diminished in absolute terms, and that as the global labour force had increased over the period, 0.33 million more work-related mortalities had been seen. She was therefore concerned that the context would not be clear in the draft conclusion. She supported the wording “all sectors”.
103. The Government member of Canada seconded the subamendment.
104. The Government member of China said that, while “all sectors” was indeed in the Office report, the latter was just the basis for discussion; the conclusions should accurately reflect the different realities of Member States.
105. The Government member of Canada proposed a further subamendment to delete “in all sectors”.
106. Several Governments seconded the subamendment proposed by Canada, including Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC.

107. The Government member of Algeria proposed a subamendment to replace “Workers in all sectors” with “Workers in sectors and regions around the world”.
108. The Government member of Tunisia seconded the subamendment proposed by Algeria.
109. The Government member of Türkiye supported the subamendment proposed by Canada but did not support the subamendment proposed by Algeria.
110. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment proposed by Algeria but supported the subamendment proposed by Canada.
111. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that he would not block the consensus to either of the proposed formulations.
112. The Government member of Ghana proposed a subamendment to the subamendment proposed by Canada to insert a comma after “safety” and to replace “and” before “certain risks” with “with” and to replace “have” with “being”. The sentence would therefore read “While statistics for the period 2000 to 2019 suggest an overall improvement in workplace safety, workers across the world continue to be exposed to unsafe and unhealthy working environments with certain risks being intensified, including heat stress and psychosocial risks.”
113. The Government member of Cameroon seconded the subamendment proposed by Ghana.
114. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the subamendment proposed by Canada and expressed flexibility on the subamendments proposed by Ghana.
115. The Government member of Sierra Leone supported the subamendment proposed by Canada but did not support the subamendment proposed by Ghana.
116. The Government member of the United Kingdom supported the subamendment proposed by Canada and expressed flexibility on the subamendment proposed by Ghana.
117. The Government member of Algeria supported the subamendment proposed by Ghana.
118. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the subamendment proposed by Canada but preferred to retain the word “and” rather than “with”, which had been proposed by Ghana, as “unsafe and unhealthy working environments” and “certain risks have intensified” were separate concepts.
119. The Government member of the United States supported the first part of the subamendment proposed by Ghana to insert a comma after “safety” but preferred to retain “and certain risks being intensified”.
120. The subamendment proposed by Algeria fell.
121. The amendment was adopted as subamended by Canada and Ghana.
122. The new point to be placed after point 5 was adopted as amended.

Point 6

123. Point 6 was adopted.

Point 7

124. The Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, introduced an amendment (A.169) to replace the draft as follows: “the prevalence and nature of certain forms of work pose special challenges for protecting and promoting these workers’ fundamental rights.” His group was proposing that wording in the interests of conciseness and precision, highlighting the specific elements of the prevalence and nature of forms of work and the special challenges they posed for the protection of FPRW.

125. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to delete “certain forms of work” and to replace it with “insecure forms of work and misclassification of workers”. It was important to add the reference to insecure forms of work and misclassification of workers because it was an issue debated extensively, including in relation to platform workers. Moreover, the language “certain forms of work” obscured the fact that certain forms of work came with less security and lower rights and protection for workers. The last two recurrent discussions of the Conference, on employment policy and labour protection, had not shied away from the need to address insecure forms of work.
126. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to insert before “At the same time,” the wording “Diverse, new and emerging forms of work create both opportunities and risks. They can be an avenue for workers and their families to escape poverty and enter the formal economy”. The remainder of point 7 would continue as per the Africa group’s proposed amendment (A.169).
127. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the Employers’ proposed subamendment, as it watered down the exact point that the Workers sought to make: the fact that there were more workers in insecure forms of work and misclassified and therefore excluded from labour legislation, labour rights protection and FPRW.
128. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the subamendment; it was important to mention diverse, new and emerging forms of work. It was also important to note that there were risks and opportunities but that there was a need for a better understanding of them.
129. The Government member of China supported the subamendment.
130. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed a subamendment to replace “certain forms of work can pose certain challenges for protecting and promoting FPRW” with “insecure forms of work and misclassifying workers can exacerbate challenges and decent work deficits and pose challenges to the realization of FPRW”.
131. The Government member of Algeria sought clarification on the rationale for replacing “misclassification” with “misclassifying” workers.
132. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, explained that “misclassification” implied the absence of legislation, whereas “misclassifying” referred to the lack of enforcement and application of existing legislation.
133. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the use of terms such as “insecure” and “precarious” would stigmatize a particular sector or contractual arrangement and impound a certain subjectivity, bias and ideology, which the Employers’ group could not support. He proposed a subamendment to replace “the prevalence and nature of insecure forms of work and misclassifying workers can exacerbate challenges and decent work deficits and pose challenges to the realization of FPRW” with “the prevalence and nature of certain forms of work can exacerbate challenges and decent work deficits and pose challenges to the realization of FPRW”.
134. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to replace the wording of point 7 with “Various emerging forms of work can offer both opportunities and risks. When adequately regulated to provide decent work, they can be an avenue for workers and their families to escape poverty and enter the formal economy. At the same time, insecure forms of work and misclassifying workers can exacerbate decent work deficits and pose challenges to the realization of FPRW”.

135. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment, as the text retained the inappropriate mention of “insecure forms of work”. In addition, decent work did not require adequate regulation and the Employers could therefore not agree to “when adequately regulated to provide decent work”. Furthermore, it was not just various emerging forms of work that could provide those opportunities; some so-called “emerging” forms of work had been around for a long time.
136. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, underlined the importance of addressing the issue of worker classification, as it related to certainty of the employment relationship and the ability of workers to better defend their working conditions.
137. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that his group could agree to the deletion of the word “emerging”, to ensure the wording was more inclusive. He noted that there were many workers in insecure forms of work who were sometimes misclassified, and that forms of work needed to be more accurately regulated in order for workers to obtain their rights. Adequate regulation would be required for decent work.
138. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to delete “when adequately regulated to provide decent work”, “insecure” and “and misclassifying workers”. He remained open to discussing “misclassification” but, in lieu of misclassification, “failure to determine correct status to avoid employment relationship” could be accepted as more precise and factual. His proposed subamended text would therefore read “Various forms of work can offer both opportunities and risks. They can be an avenue for workers and their families to escape poverty and enter the formal economy. At the same time, certain forms of work and failing to establish the correct status of workers in order to avoid an employment relationship can exacerbate and pose challenges”.
139. The Worker Vice-Chairperson preferred to maintain “when adequately regulated”, as regulation was needed to ensure the clarity of worker status. He proposed a subamendment, to read “Various forms of work can offer both opportunities and risks. When providing decent work there can be an avenue for workers and their families to escape poverty and enter the formal economy. At the same time, insecure forms of work and misclassifying workers can exacerbate decent work deficits and pose challenges to the realization of FPRW”.
140. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the subamendment proposed by the Workers’ group.
141. The Government member of China preferred the language “new and emerging forms of work” but could support “various forms of work.” If the term “regulated” were not to be used, he would suggest instead “when appropriately regulated in accordance with the national context” after “providing decent work”, so as to ensure taking account of the diverse economic situations of different Member States. In most developing countries, job creation came before decent work; it would be difficult for all jobs created to be decent. In the interests of reaching consensus, he could be flexible on “insecure forms of work” and “misclassification of workers or “misclassifying workers”.
142. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, said that his group would prefer to keep “emerging” but supported the subamendment proposed by the Workers’ group.

143. The Government member of the United States appreciated the mention of addressing the priority area of misclassification of workers, as her Government had focused on that area recently. She also preferred to keep “new” or “emerging” forms of work but could be flexible.
144. The Government member of Canada said that she would like to see some reflection of emerging forms of work, but could be flexible, and supported retaining “When providing decent work”. The term “insecure forms of work” had been agreed in previous Conference discussions, and misclassification of workers remained a significant challenge for the platform and gig economy. She supported the text as subamended by the Workers’ group.
145. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, as a basis for moving forward, proposed a subamendment so that the point would read “Various emerging forms of work can offer both opportunities and risks. When providing decent work, they can be an avenue for workers and their families to escape poverty and enter the formal economy. When they do not provide decent work, or are misclassified, they can be insecure and pose challenges to the realization of FPRW”.
146. The Worker Vice-Chairperson requested a clarification on whether misclassification referred to the form of work or to the worker. It would be clearer to address the misclassification of workers than of work. The notion of insecurity was missing in the text, and he proposed a subamendment to replace “or are misclassified” with “or are insecure and are misclassified”.
147. The Employer Vice-Chairperson could not agree to including the reference to insecurity and deferred to the Office on how to deal with misclassification.
148. The Representative of the Secretary-General said that, in the ILO, misclassification was in relation to workers, not to work or a form of work.
149. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed to propose a subamendment, which read “Various emerging forms of work can offer both opportunities and risks. When providing decent work, they can be an avenue for workers and their families to escape poverty and enter the formal economy. When they do not provide decent work, or workers are misclassified, they can be insecure and pose challenges to the realization of FPRW”.
150. The Government member of China proposed a subamendment to delete “to escape poverty”, as decent work was not the only way to escape poverty, seconded by the Government members of Algeria and Sierra Leone.
151. The Government member of Gabon, on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government member of South Africa, supported the subamended text proposed by the Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson, as subamended by the Government member of China.
152. The Government member of Belgium, on behalf of the EU and its Member States, wished to retain “to escape poverty”.
153. The Government member of Sierra Leone proposed a subamendment to replace “escape poverty” with “reduce poverty”, seconded by the Government members of Cameroon, Ghana and Morocco.
154. The Government member of Mexico, speaking in his national capacity, proposed a subamendment to replace “escape poverty” with “end poverty”, as it was the agreed language of the UN 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development, seconded by the Government member of Brazil.

- 155. The Government member of China said that the issue was with decent work appearing as a precondition to escaping poverty, which was not the case in China. As a compromise, he could agree to “When creating jobs and providing decent work, they can be an avenue for workers and their families to escape poverty and enter the formal economy”. It should not be expected that emerging forms of work would be decent work in the first instance. In practice, new opportunities of work or informal forms of work could also help to lift workers out of poverty.
- 156. The Government member of the United Kingdom did not support the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Mexico, as ending poverty applied to national contexts rather than individual workers or their families. She preferred retaining “escape poverty”.
- 157. The Government member of Mexico withdrew his Government’s subamendment.
- 158. The Worker Vice-Chairperson also wished to retain the notion of escaping poverty. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that decent work could indeed be an avenue to escaping poverty, but that there were other pathways as well. They both reiterated their support for their agreed subamendment.
- 159. The Government member of China said that he could accept the language, on the understanding that it was not exclusive and that there were other avenues to escape poverty.
- 160. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 161. Point 7 was adopted as amended.
- 162. Amendments A.98, A.166, A.165, A.196, A.18, A.170, A.19, A.15 and A.197 fell as a consequence.

Point 8

- 163. The Government member of Sierra Leone, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, proposed an amendment (A.168), that would read “Lack of freedom of association, protection of the right to organize and collective bargaining increase vulnerability, especially for non-unionized workers and; those who are at risk of child labour, forced labour, discrimination and hazardous working conditions”. It highlighted the risks to non-unionized workers because only unionized workers, with an opportunity to exercise the enabling right to freely associate and bargain as a group, were able to improve their working lives and the lives of their families.
- 164. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to delete “non-unionized workers and”.
- 165. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to the text so that it would read “Those who are most at risk of child labour, forced labour, discrimination and hazardous working conditions may also lack voice and representation, which increases their vulnerability”.
- 166. The Government member of the United States welcomed that the amendment proposed by the Africa group supported the idea that a lack of freedom of association could create additional risks for workers. She proposed a subamendment to the text so that it would read “Lack of freedom of association and the protection of the right to organize and bargain collectively increases vulnerability, including the risk of child labour, forced labour, discrimination or hazardous working conditions”, seconded by the Government members of Canada and Türkiye.
- 167. The Government member of Algeria supported the Africa group’s amendment.
- 168. The Government member of Ghana proposed a subamendment to delete “child labour” from the subamendment proposed by the Government member of the United States. Child labour in Ghana was linked to poverty, a lack of legal framework and poor law enforcement, not necessarily to a lack of collective bargaining and freedom of association.

169. The Government member of China seconded the subamendment.
170. The Government member of the United States said that a lack of freedom of association and collective bargaining often impacted parents' ability to obtain well-paid jobs, which could put children at risk of child labour.
171. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the proposed text was a very different statement from the original text and was no longer appropriately placed; it should be placed elsewhere in the draft conclusions. The original text prepared by the Office was a fair statement of a challenge faced by all but had morphed into a statement of ideology and universality that was not supported by solid evidence.
172. The Worker Vice-Chairperson disagreed; the text was well placed in the section on challenges to be addressed in the document. He supported the subamendment proposed by the Government member of the United States to retain the reference to child labour.
173. The Employer Vice-Chairperson reiterated that the Employers' group was comfortable with the original Office text, as reference to action was necessary to address the issues and the proposed text should therefore be moved to the section on actions.
174. The Government members of Mexico; Türkiye; Norway, also speaking on behalf of Iceland; Belgium speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States; the United Republic of Tanzania; and Gabon supported the text as subamended by the Government member of the United States.
175. The Government member of Sierra Leone proposed a subamendment to insert "of workers" after "increases vulnerability", seconded by the Government members of Canada, Cameroon, Morocco and Ghana.
176. The Government member of Sierra Leone underlined that it was clear in the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), and the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that children should not work and should be in school or engaged in light work. He supported the proposal of the Government member of Ghana to delete "child labour".
177. The Government member of Ghana reiterated that children should not be at the workplace nor imbued with right to freedom of association and collective bargaining. Furthermore, not all workers were parents, and the term "vulnerability of workers" should be sufficient.
178. The Government member of the United Kingdom agreed with the inclusion of the risk of child labour but considered that the wording implied that children were also workers. She proposed a subamendment to replace "including" with "and", to avoid confusion.
179. The Government members of Canada; Ghana; Belgium, on behalf of the EU and its Member States; Sierra Leone; Mexico; Norway, also speaking on behalf of Iceland; and Chile seconded the subamendment.
180. Point 8 as amended (A.168) by the Africa group and subamended was as follows "Lack of freedom of association and the protection of the right to organize and bargain collectively increases vulnerability of workers, and the risk of child labour, forced labour, discrimination or hazardous working conditions;".
181. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a further subamendment to the amendment to replace the first words "Lack of" with "Threats to and impairment of"; replace the phrase "the protection of the right to collective bargaining" with "effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining”; to delete the phrases “increases vulnerability of workers,” and “and the risk”; and instead insert “are exacerbating risks”; and to replace the word “or” with “and”.

- 182. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment as subamended.
- 183. The Government members of Canada; Belgium on behalf of the EU and its member States; Barbados; Gabon; and the United States supported the amendment.
- 184. The amendment (A.168) was adopted as subamended.
- 185. Point 8 was adopted as amended.
- 186. Amendments A.191, A.20, A.164, A.163, A.21, A.192, A.193 and A.175 fell as a consequence.

Point 9

- 187. Point 9 was adopted.

New point after point 9

- 188. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.162) to insert a new point after point 9, to read “Major violations of FPRW continue to be observed within global supply chains due to an attenuated chain of responsibility. Disruptions of supply chains during recent crises, including the COVID-19 pandemic, have further challenged the enjoyment of FPRW in some countries”. Issues of violations of FPRW in supply chains were inadequately addressed in the draft conclusions, while it was clear that working conditions in supply chains had been affected.
- 189. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment because it was singling out global supply chains, with no basis for doing so. Any statement of risk should be respectful of the ILO strategy on decent work in supply chains and there should not be a reopening of difficult discussions that had taken place in recent years, including in the general discussion of the 2016 session of the Conference on decent work in global supply chains. He suggested that the amendment be rejected.
- 190. The Government member of Gabon requested a clarification of the term “attenuated chain of responsibility”.
- 191. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that it meant a “decreased chain of responsibility”. He would agree if the Employers’ group would like to delete “global” before “supply chains”.
- 192. The Government member of Belgium on behalf of the EU Member States, supported the spirit of the new point and proposed a subamendment to delete “major,” replace “attenuated” with “weakened” and delete “the enjoyment of”.
- 193. The Government member of Mexico asked for examples of how the disruption in global supply chains had created an obstacle to the enjoyment of FPRW.
- 194. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that it was discussed in paragraphs 5 and 22 of the Office report.
- 195. The Government member of Norway, also speaking on behalf of Iceland, supported the subamendment proposed by the Government of Belgium, on behalf the EU Member States.
- 196. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that nowhere in the Office report was the issue of supply chains and attenuated responsibilities in supply chains identified. The issue of COVID-19 and disruption in supply chains was mentioned. Moreover, there was nothing in ILO documents that had been agreed upon regarding attenuated or weakened responsibility in supply chains. He stressed that it was not the Committee’s purpose to discuss the issue; rather, it was to take stock of the last seven years and to make recommendations on the way forward. That should be done within the context of authoritative documents, including the resolution concerning decent work in global supply chains (2016) and the ILO strategy on decent work in supply chains that addressed FPRW. The Employers' group was willing to find a statement that could address supply chains but not global supply chains.

197. The Government member of China did not support including global supply chains in the conclusions, as there was already a clear global supply chain track being followed by the Office. He emphasized that if the focus was on how COVID-19 and other challenging situations had impacted FPRW, he could propose specific language, but could not support the Workers' proposed amendment.
198. The Government member of Türkiye said that, although he supported the purpose of the new point proposed by the Workers' group, he could not support it as currently worded. He noted that paragraph 5 of the Office report not only underlined the negative impact of COVID-19, but also geopolitical tensions and several major armed conflicts.
199. The Government member of Canada echoed the concerns of the Employers' group and proposed a subamendment to the Workers' amendment, to insert "including" before "due to" and after "global supply chains". She also proposed a subamendment to the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, to replace "the enjoyment of FPRW" with "the realization of FPRW", to align the language. She supported the Workers' proposed amendment as subamended by the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, as there were gaps in the realization of FPRW in supply chains.
200. The Government members of Japan, the United States, and Mexico seconded the subamendments.
201. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that there were a number of issues with the proposed language. The most fundamental issue was the attribution of violations of FPRW within supply chains to the chain of responsibility. The topic had already been discussed in depth in 2016, with the focus on the implementation gaps and failures in host countries to enforce their laws. Therefore, there was no reason to single out global supply chains, and the Committee was not the place for a policy discussion on the matter. He proposed a subamendment to delete the first sentence and to replace "further challenged" in the second sentence with "adversely affected" to acknowledge that disruption in supply chains during recent crises had adversely affected the full realization of FPRW in some countries.
202. The Worker Vice-Chairperson could not accept the deletion of the first part of the first sentence, only deletion of the second part; he proposed a subamendment to the first sentence, to read "Violations of FPRW continue to be observed within global supply chains". He could accept "adversely affected" in the second sentence.
203. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment, as violations occurred in supply chains but not more so than outside supply chains, and likely more in the informal economy and in small and medium-sized enterprises where there were probably larger sources of risk. The issue should focus on the disruption and the broader impact beyond FPRW.
204. The Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed to delete the word "global" from "global supply chains".
205. The Government member of Canada recalled that the 2022 Recurrent Discussion on Employment, where specific language referring to violations of labour rights in global supply chains was used. Based on the agreed language and ongoing discussions beyond the ILO in other international organizations, it was important that the Committee included that language, especially given the focus on FPRW.

- 206. The Government member of China supported the subamendment to the second sentence of the point but did not support the subamendment to the first sentence, even if the word “global” was removed. As the Government member of Canada had noted, this was discussed in other forums, but it was an ILO topic, and the Committee was not the appropriate place to re-open the discussion on supply chains.
- 207. The Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported the subamendment to remove “global” from “global supply chains”.
- 208. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that, although his group did not see the need to include the language proposed by the Workers in the first sentence, it recognized the United Nations Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights, under which governments had a duty to protect workers, while employers had a duty to respect the principles. Accordingly, the group proposed a subamendment, to read “Failures to protect and respect fundamental principles and rights at work continue to be observed in supply chains. Disruptions of supply chains during recent crises have adversely affected the full realization of FPRW in some countries”.
- 209. The Governments of Japan, Mexico on behalf of GRULAC, and the United Kingdom, supported the subamendment proposed by the Employers.
- 210. The Government member of China accepted the subamendment, at the same time maintaining its position that the issue of supply chains should not be addressed.
- 211. The Government member of Sierra Leone questioned the word “failure”, asking to whom that word applied.
- 212. The Employer Vice-Chairperson clarified that under the United Nations Guiding Principles, failure to protect applied to the State, while failure to respect applied to enterprise.
- 213. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government member of the United States supported the subamendment.
- 214. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 215. The new point to be included after point 9 was adopted as amended.

Point 10

- 216. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, introduced an amendment (A.176) that aimed at increasing the precision of point 10, to read “Failure to realize FPRW accentuates inequalities and poverty. This has been exacerbated by the COVID-19 pandemic, social and economic crises, conflicts and geopolitical instability, natural disasters and the adverse effects of climate change”.
- 217. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government members of Ghana and the United Republic of Tanzania did not support the amendment.
- 218. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that they could accept either version.
- 219. The Representative of the Secretary-General indicated that the issues of concern to GRULAC were covered under another point in the draft conclusions.

220. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, withdrew the proposed amendment, although was keen to keep the reference to the adverse effects of climate change.

221. Point 10 was adopted.

Point 11

222. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, proposed an amendment (A.177) to replace point 11 to read “Weak governance, erosion of the rule of law and civil liberties, restrictions on freedom of association and effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining, inadequate regulation, under-resourced labour administrations and inspectorates, and other relevant labour authorities, and ineffective migration governance, among other causes, have impeded progress”.

223. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that his group could accept the inclusion of “freedom of association and effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining”, with the insertion of the words, following a comma placed after “collective bargaining,” “inadequate enabling environment for sustainable enterprise”.

224. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that his group had supported deletion of the bracketed phrase concerning an enabling environment.

225. The Government member of Ghana proposed replacing the words “effective recognition” with the words “ineffective recognition”, and replacing the term “under-resourced” with “ineffective”.

226. The Government member of Japan seconded the proposal by the Government member of Ghana, and supported the proposal put forward by the Employers’ group.

227. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that his group was flexible, but preferred “lack of an enabling environment”, wished to pluralize “environments”, and favoured “under-resourced labour administrations”.

228. The Government member of Sierra Leone, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, wished to maintain “under-resourced”. He queried what was meant by “other relevant authorities”.

229. The Government member of China supported “inadequate enabling environment” but was flexible.

230. The Government member of Canada said that in earlier texts, including the 2017 resolution, the issue of sustainable enterprises was addressed in a standalone paragraph. The point as it stood listed various elements required to ensure an enabling environment. She requested clarification from the Office regarding other elements to ensure an enabling environment that were not covered by the present text.

231. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that the issue of an enabling environment was very widely recognized in ILO texts, including in the 2017 resolution. It was also evoked in the ILO Centenary Declaration. Economic prosperity and a robust job market could not be taken for granted. Access to decent work was contingent on work being available. The ILO Centenary Declaration recognized the role of sustainable enterprises as generators of employment and promoters of innovation and decent work. By definition, sustainable enterprises operated with respect for FPRW.

232. The Representative of the Secretary-General said that other elements of an enabling environment for enterprise included physical infrastructure, information and communication technology, services and macroeconomic policies.

- 233. The Government member of Türkiye proposed a subamendment to replace “ineffective recognition” by “effective recognition”, seconded by the Government member of the United Kingdom.
- 234. The Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania supported the term “inadequate enabling environment”. He asked for clarification of the term “other labour authorities”.
- 235. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that “other labour authorities” could apply to different concepts in different countries, depending on how the labour administrations were structured. He stated that the issue under discussion was that of FPRW, on which the Committee should concentrate. He proposed that the wording regarding labour authorities could read “under-resourced and/or ineffective”, since under-resourced labour inspectorates could be effective through great dedication, while others might still not work effectively despite adequate resourcing.
- 236. The Employer Vice-Chairperson was unable to agree with his Worker counterpart, whose argument was fundamentally flawed. Moreover, it was redundant, since sustainable enterprises by definition respected the FPRW. However, he agreed that the text should focus on FPRW but the Employers’ group held that the enabling business environment was a fundamental issue that required special mention and action from the ILO. The failure to provide such an environment was a root cause of lack of realization of FPRW.
- 237. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that the mention in point 2(b) of the 2017 resolution mentioned adopting policies to enable sustainable growth, but the context of the present discussion was different. The issue concerned sustainable enterprises as a vehicle for the promotion of FPRW. He proposed a further subamendment to add the words “to respect the FPRW” after “inadequate enabling environments for sustainable enterprises”.
- 238. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the language undermined the sense of the 2017 resolution and diminished the importance of sustainable enterprises as being engines of full employment, decent work and a robust economy, which evidence showed as being effective in the reduction of poverty, in combating informality and in advancing FPRW. His group could accept the insertion, in line with the 1998 Declaration, after “have impeded progress,” of the words “to respect, promote and realize FPRW”.
- 239. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the Employer Vice-Chairperson’s latter subamendment.
- 240. The Government member of Sierra Leone supported “inadequate enabling environments”. He reiterated his question, echoed by the Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania, regarding the meaning of “other relevant labour authorities”. He stressed the importance of the term “under-resourced”. In practice, labour administrations were ineffective because they lacked personnel, vehicles, equipment, office space, and so forth. With reference to the Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150), he proposed a subamendment to delete the term “and other relevant authorities”.
- 241. The Representative of the Secretary-General explained that under Article 1(b) of Convention No. 150, the term “system of labour administration covers all public administration bodies responsible for and/or engaged in labour administration – whether they are ministerial departments or public agencies, including parastatal and regional or local agencies or any other form of decentralised administration – and any institutional framework for the co-ordination of the activities of such bodies and for consultation with and participation by employers and workers and their organisations”.

- 242. The Government member of Sierra Leone withdrew his subamendment to delete the term: “other relevant authorities”.
- 243. The Government member of the United States proposed subamending the term “ineffective” to “effective” for the phrase to read “restrictions on freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining”.
- 244. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, seconded that subamendment. She suggested deletion of the words “and/or ineffective” after “under-resourced”, as they were not needed. She supported the inclusion of “to respect, promote and realize FPRW” at the end of the paragraph as subamended according to the proposal made by the Employers and agreed by the Workers. She also proposed a subamendment to insert “labour” before “migration governance”.
- 245. The Government member of Ghana supported keeping the term “and ineffective” after “under-resourced”. Labour administrations could be well-resourced, but abuse of those resources would make the administrations ineffective.
- 246. The Government member of Morocco seconded the proposal.
- 247. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 248. Amendments A.150, A.23, A.102, A.25 and A.104 fell as a consequence.
- 249. Point 11 was adopted as amended.

Point 12

- 250. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment (A.27) to delete the bracketed phrase “including the rise of artificial intelligence and algorithmic management”. While “algorithmic management” was currently a hot topic, there was no agreed definition of the term, and the subject would be covered in the discussion on the item on decent work in the platform economy to be held at the 113th Session (2025) of the International Labour Conference. The singling out of two concepts, of which one was subordinate to the other, in a document that would be guiding ILO action for the next seven years did not seem appropriate. It should be left to the general discussion to provide a definition of the two terms.
- 251. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the proposed deletion. The terms “artificial intelligence” and “algorithmic management” had been subject to extensive discussion during the opening sittings of the Committee. Paragraph 21 of the Office report read “AI has the capacity to transform jobs by automating tasks, which could lead to either job displacement or a transformation of job roles... The integration of AI into the workplace could profoundly influence working conditions, autonomy, the pace and intensity of work, skill utilization and workers’ interactions with management and peers”. The inclusion of that one sentence did not pre-empt the 2025 Conference discussion. Platform work was only part of the group’s concern.
- 252. The Employer Vice-Chairperson observed that paragraph 21 of the Office report made no reference to FPRW violations, neither did it provide a definition of algorithmic management. The discussion constituted policy dialogue and was not appropriate to the discussion on FPRW. The Committee should concentrate on identifying opportunities to promote FPRW.
- 253. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that the two elements in question were new developments that had, and would have, significant impact on the world of work. They should remain in the conclusions.

254. The Government member of Brazil supported the statement made by the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States.
255. The Government member of Mexico, speaking in his national capacity and also on behalf of Chile, wished to maintain the reference to artificial intelligence, but not to “algorithmic management” since it had not been clearly defined. He proposed amending the reference to read “including the rise of artificial intelligence”.
256. The Government member of Japan said that the Government could support both proposals but did not wish to pre-empt the 2025 discussion.
257. The Government member of China supported mention of artificial intelligence, but not that of algorithmic management, the meaning of which was not clear.
258. The Government member of the United Kingdom wished to maintain reference to both terms.
259. The Government member of Cameroon agreed with the Employer Vice-Chairperson’s proposal to delete. The term “digital transition” already included artificial intelligence and algorithmic management.
260. The Government member of the United States said that the focus should be on analysing artificial intelligence and algorithmic bias in the world of work. The United States had previously issued a joint statement with Spain on those issues, highlighting their impact on discrimination, workers’ well-being and FPRW. The Government supported the original text.
261. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that it was important to address algorithmic management and proposed bracketing the text for later discussion. Under no circumstances could his group accept the “adaptation” of the FPRW, which were enshrined in the 1998 Declaration and could not be altered. The term algorithmic management had already been used by the ILO in high-level discussions that had underscored the need for human control in management practices.
262. The Employer Vice-Chairperson underlined the importance of retaining or strengthening the phrase “seize new opportunities”. He cited an example, from an ILO study published in March 2024, where artificial intelligence had been used to assist the labour inspectorate detect undeclared labour in Albania. His group supported the “need for” option presented above and was flexible with regard to “and adapting”, although FPRW were referred to elsewhere in the document as “immutable”. The “adapting” certainly meant “adapting the use of FPRW”, not altering them in any way.
263. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, agreed with the Workers’ group that the FPRW should not be adapted in any way. He supported the phrase “seize new opportunities”, as such opportunities would certainly be presented by artificial intelligence. He preferred the variant “urgency of” to “need for”.
264. The Government member of Türkiye was against including “and adapting” and favoured the words “urgency of” as against “need for”. He tabled a subamendment to the first five words of point 12, to read: “Demographic and environmental changes, and digital transitions, ...” to clearly separate the various elements of meaning, seconded by the Government member of Canada.
265. The Government member of Japan supported retaining the phrase “seize new opportunities”.
266. The Government member of China also supported “seize new opportunities” as well as the subamended first phrase tabled by the Government member of Türkiye. His Government could accept either variant, “urgency of” or “need for”. He agreed with the deletion of “and adapting”.

- 267. The Government member of Canada, while noting the potential improvements that artificial intelligence could bring, also pointed to research showing that it could reinforce gender, race and class biases. With reference to the resolution concerning the second recurrent discussion on labour protection (111th Session of the International Labour Conference, 2023), and the High-level section of the 350th Session (March 2024) of the Governing Body of the ILO, she supported inclusion of the phrase “and algorithmic management” in point 12. Likewise, she supported “seize new opportunities” and deletion of “and adapting”.
- 268. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, withdrew the group’s amendment “and adapting”, seeing it lacked support. Speaking in his national capacity and on behalf of Mexico, Chile and Peru, he expressed a preference for “the need for” over the “urgency of” option. The digital divide made it hard for some countries to respond urgently to rapid technological change.
- 269. The Employer Vice-Chairperson recognized the substantial support for the notion of seizing new opportunities. His group retained its preference for the “need for” option. Algorithmic management was simply one aspect and an inherent part of artificial intelligence. The reference should refer to artificial intelligence only.
- 270. The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed to the earlier mention of the resolution concerning the second recurrent discussion on labour protection, 2023, where artificial intelligence and algorithmic management had been included in the same sentence. The phrase “and algorithmic management” should be included in point 12. He reiterated his group’s preference for the “urgency of” text option.
- 271. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stressed the need not to pre-empt the discussion to be held at the 113th Session (2025) of the International Labour Conference on the platform economy. He repeated that algorithmic management was an inherent part of artificial intelligence.
- 272. The Worker Vice-Chairperson reiterated that the two phenomena had been discussed during the negotiation for the resolution concerning the second recurrent discussion on labour protection. He proposed removing the strike through from the words “including the rise of artificial intelligence and algorithmic management” and from the words “seize new opportunities” but maintaining their brackets for further discussion later.
- 273. The Government member of the United States suggested a re-phrasing to read: “artificial intelligence and the use of algorithms”.
- 274. The Employer Vice-Chairperson subamended the amendment (A.27) to replace the phrase “the use of algorithms” with “related technologies” and to replace the phrase “seize new opportunities and address challenges” with “address challenges and seize opportunities”. The text had been discussed at length with the social partners, in the full understanding that the point would only be appropriate if it had full tripartite support. His group was trying to present a way forward.
- 275. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment as subamended, which presented a balanced approach. His group preferred the “urgency of” option, rather than “need for”.
- 276. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the amendment as subamended and preferred the “urgency of” option. He queried the meaning of “related technologies”.
- 277. The Employer Vice-Chairperson explained that “related technologies” referred to all the technologies for which artificial intelligence acted as an “umbrella term”: machine learning, algorithmic management and others. All presented both challenges and opportunities.

- 278. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the language.
- 279. The Government members of Barbados, Türkiye and the United States, supported the amendment as subamended and preferred the “urgency of” option.
- 280. The Government member of Sierra Leone supported the text, but questioned why it should not read “seize opportunities to address challenges”.
- 281. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the draft aimed at acknowledging that both challenges and opportunities would arise from new technologies and sought to keep the two separate.
- 282. The amendment (A.27) was adopted as subamended, including the “urgency of” option.
- 283. Point 12 was adopted as amended.
- 284. Amendments A.28, A.149, A.105, A.178 and A.148 fell as a consequence.

Point 13

- 285. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment (A.106), which proposed adding the words “policy and” between the words “stronger” and “action”.
- 286. The Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons supported the amendment.
- 287. The amendment was adopted.
- 288. Point 13 was adopted as amended.

Subtitle

II. Strengthening action for the effective respect, promotion and realization of fundamental principles and rights at work

- 289. The subtitle of part II “II. Strengthening action for the effective respect, promotion and realization of fundamental principles and rights at work” was adopted.

Chapeau to point 14

- 290. Four amendments to the first line of the chapeau to point 14 submitted similar proposals for insertion between the terms “FPRW” and “be advanced”. Two amendments (A.194) (GRULAC) and (A.147) (Worker members) both proposed the insertion of “can only” between those terms. One amendment (A.1) (China) proposed the insertion of the word “will” between the two terms. Another amendment (A.93) (Canada, the EU Member States, Switzerland, Türkiye, the United Kingdom and the United States) proposed the insertion of the words “will only” between the two terms.
- 291. The Government member of China said that his amendment (A.1), seconded by Cameroon, was because the language should align with that of the 2017 resolution, which used the word “will”.
- 292. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group’s amendment (A.147) in favour of “will only” (A.93).

- 293. The Government member of Ghana proposed a subamendment to insert “can” between “FPRW” and “be advanced”, arguing that the use of the term “can only” suggested that the realization of FPRW could only be advanced where the elements included in the paragraph (an environment of respect for human rights, the rule of law and democratic freedoms) were present. Many other factors had an impact on the advancement of FPRW. The paragraph should not be restrictive.
- 294. The Government member of China seconded the subamendment.
- 295. The Government member of the United States stated that the aspects listed were necessary conditions for “full realization”, but their inclusion in the text did not mean they alone were sufficient.
- 296. The Employer Vice-Chairperson maintained a position of flexibility.
- 297. The Worker Vice-Chairperson reiterated his group’s support for “will only”.
- 298. The Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania agreed that inclusion of the word “only” unnecessarily limited the scope of the text.
- 299. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, said that it was fundamental to retain “can only”. If there were not an environment conducive to human rights, FPRW could not be realized. The group could consider the “will only” option, but its preferred position was “can only”.
- 300. The Government member of China said that his Government could accept the word “only” because a majority of participants had agreed to that language. However, it diverged from the language of the 2017 resolution. In making the concession, he noted that his Government had already shown considerable flexibility, and hoped that others would do likewise in the coming discussions. He requested that his statement be clearly recorded in the record of proceedings.
- 301. The Government member of Ghana stated that the three conditions listed in point 14 were not enough to achieve full realization of FPRW. Climate change and high levels of youth unemployment might negatively impact the realization of FPRW. His Government could not support inclusion of the word “only”. He requested that the record of proceedings should clearly show his point of view.
- 302. The Government member of Sierra Leone said that the use of the word “only” was confusing, since it limited conditions for the realization of FPRW to those listed in point 14: an environment of respect for human rights, the rule of law and democratic freedoms.
- 303. The Employer Vice-Chairperson was ready to accept either “can only” or “will only” in the sense that it was a necessary but not sufficient set of conditions.
- 304. The Worker Vice-Chairperson indicated his group’s willingness to join the consensus.
- 305. The Government member of Sierra Leone said that his Government’s position was for either “can” or “will”, but he would agree to keeping the word “only”, provided his position was clearly recorded in the record of proceedings.
- 306. The Government member of Ghana proposed a subamendment to delete the words from “The full realization” to “advanced by”, to insert the word “An” before “environment”, and to insert the phrase “is necessary for the realization of FPRW” after the word “freedom”. The full sentence would read “An environment of respect for human rights, the rule of law and democratic freedoms is necessary for the realization of FPRW”. The Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, seconded the subamendment.

307. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment, as point 14 was concerned specifically with the “full” realization of FPRW, and that could not occur in an environment lacking the elements listed.
308. The Government member of the United Kingdom and the Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported “will only”.
309. The Government member of the United States, observing that there had been broad consensus for “will only”, said that the word “only” was not synonymous with “solely” and did not exclude other necessary conditions. It simply meant that the conditions listed in point 14 were essential to the “full” realization of FPRW.
310. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, in the interests of breaking the impasse over the term “will only”, proposed a subamendment to replace the first sentence of the chapeau to point 14, to read “The respect for human rights, the rule of law and democratic freedoms are prerequisites for the full realization of FPRW”.
311. The Government member of Ghana, the Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
312. The Government member of China said that he could accept the proposal on the understanding that the prerequisites listed did not preclude other elements.
313. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, could agree to the subamendment with an additional subamendment to replace “democratic” freedoms with “fundamental” freedoms to align with the wording of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.
314. The Government members of China, Switzerland and Gabon, in its national capacity, supported the subamendment.
315. The Worker Vice-Chairperson sought clarification from the Office on why “democratic” and not “fundamental” had been used in the initial draft text.
316. The Representative of the Secretary-General clarified that “democratic” had been used in the 2017 resolution. The term “democratic freedoms” referred to the environment that could enable FPRW, whereas “fundamental freedoms” referred to freedoms embedded in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Both types of freedoms were relevant, therefore the word choice should be selected based on the context.
317. The Worker Vice-Chairperson preferred to keep the term “democratic” to be consistent with what had been agreed in the previous recurrent discussion on FPRW.
318. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported being consistent and aligning with prior approved texts to ensure no misunderstanding; however, he was willing to support the prevailing view among the governments.
319. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, noted that the two concepts of freedom were different but both relevant in the context and proposed a subamendment to include “fundamental” and “democratic” freedoms in the text.
320. The Government member of Switzerland supported the subamendment.
321. The Government member of the United States would prefer a focus on democratic freedoms but could be flexible with keeping both terms in the interests of consensus.

- 322. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, proposed a subamendment to switch the order of the terms “fundamental” and “democratic”, to read “The respect for human rights, the rule of law, democratic and fundamental freedoms are prerequisites for the full realization of FPRW”.
- 323. The Government member of China said that “fundamental freedoms” was more appropriate in the context, but for the sake of consensus he could accept “democratic and fundamental”.
- 324. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
- 325. The chapeau to Point 14 was adopted as subamended by the Government member of Belgium.
- 326. Amendments A.194, A.1, and A.93 all fell as a consequence.

Point 14(a)

- 327. Point 14(a) was adopted.

Point 14(b)

- 328. Point 14(b) was adopted.

Point 14(c)

- 329. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment (A.29) to delete point 14(c), expressing concern about the placement of the text in the draft conclusions. By definition freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining were of equal importance to the other categories of FPRW. It had been agreed that FPRW were equal, interrelated and mutually reinforcing without hierarchy or causation. He called on the Committee not to adopt a text that would change the notion of FPRW as being equally important rights.
- 330. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that the placement of the paragraph was correct in part II on strengthening action on FPRW and would not agree to its deletion. Particular attention to freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining was needed as compared to the other FPRW, given the persistent deficits in many countries and their underpromotion. Since the last discussion, there had been threats to trade union rights and civil liberties, a lack of protection against anti-union discrimination, and the violation of collective bargaining rights, with interference being the most frequent issue. As per the Office report, more focus on freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining was needed.
- 331. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that the Office report identified similar deficits with other FPRW. As the five categories of FPRW were of equal importance, there should be no hierarchy and having a balance was of critical importance.
- 332. The Government member of the United States strongly agreed with the Workers’ group on the placement. She underscored that the text was seeking to highlight gaps, not only in the Office engagement, but also within the actions taken by governments. Freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining were also enablers and key rights for social dialogue. In order to be effective, social dialogue required strong social partners, and it was useful to note the importance of freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining for social dialogue. Moreover, in the ILO Declaration concerning the aims and purposes of the International Labour Organization (Declaration of Philadelphia) one of the key aspects highlighted was the right to freedom of expression and association to achieve sustained progress.

333. The Government member of China said that the text should convey a clear and coherent message to the international community that the five categories of FPRW should be treated equally. He strongly supported the wording “ensuring balanced attention to all categories”. He could be flexible regarding the Employers’ group’s proposed deletion of the paragraph, provided a clear message was conveyed to the governments, as they were responsible for ensuring the realization of all five categories of FPRW.
334. The Government members of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Members States, Norway, Türkiye and Iceland supported keeping point 14(c).
335. The Government member of Japan agreed that FPRW should be treated equally and was concerned that the first sentence excluded other FPRW. He supported the wording of China’s proposed amendment (A.2).
336. The Government member of Canada did not support the removal of the point. She recalled the decline in the unionization rate, which could have broader implications for civic life, political participation and social welfare in the respective countries. Freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining were at the core of FPRW.
337. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that his group was not of the view that there was a hierarchy between the different categories of FPRW. He recalled the binding decisions recognizing freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining as an enabling right in the ILO Centenary Declaration and Social Justice Declaration, which were adopted by the International Labour Conference. Likewise, in the high-level evaluation of the ILO’s strategies and actions to promote fundamental principles and rights at work 2018–23 (high-level evaluation) and the Office report, one of the key lessons learned was that the Office had neglected to prioritize freedom of association and collective bargaining as a critical enabling right and that the ILO should expedite its ongoing efforts to strengthen its strategy and action in those areas. The text should align and reflect what had previously been agreed.
338. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, while acknowledging the desire to maintain a reference to freedom of association and collective bargaining in part II, reiterated that the text might be more appropriate elsewhere. He withdrew his amendment.
339. The Government member of China introduced an amendment (A.2), so that the point would read “Ensure balanced attention to all five categories”. Retaining the last part of the sentence would convey the message to the international community that all five categories of rights should be treated equally.
340. The Employer Vice-Chairperson seconded the amendment. He proposed a subamendment to insert after “categories” “of fundamental principles and rights at work to enable the attainment of the four strategic objectives”.
341. The Worker Vice-Chairperson emphasized that his group wished to retain the wording of the first part of the original text but was open to discussing the amendment proposed by the Government member of China and the subamendment thereto proposed by the Employers’ group.
342. The representative of the Government of Norway supported the Workers’ group in retaining the first part of the paragraph. She proposed a subamendment to insert “of the Decent Work Agenda” after “the four strategic objectives”.

- 343. The representative of the Government of Türkiye also supported retaining the first part of the paragraph and seconded the subamendment proposed by Norway.
- 344. The Government member of Mexico, speaking in his national capacity and also on behalf of Brazil and Chile, proposed a subamendment to delete the words “particular” in both instances in the text, as it would make the text less prescriptive and more neutral.
- 345. The Government members of the United States and Argentina did not support the subamendment.
- 346. The Government member of Ghana agreed with the Worker Vice-Chairperson, as freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining were key vehicles for ensuring safety and health in the workplace, for providing a platform to engage the social partners, and to ensure that if there were any infractions or issues at the workplace there was an opportunity for dialogue. To ensure that the interests of workers, employers and governments were all catered for, he proposed a subamendment, so that the paragraph would read “While recognizing the importance of all the five categories of FPRW, there is a need to ensure particular attention to freedom of association and effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining, noting their particular importance to enabling the attainment of the four strategic objectives of the Decent Work Agenda”.
- 347. The subamendment was seconded by the Government member of Gabon.
- 348. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed reverting to the original text of point 14(c) of the draft conclusions.
- 349. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the United States, Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Indonesia, Japan and China supported the suggestion of the Employer Vice-Chairperson.
- 350. The subamendment was withdrawn.
- 351. Amendments A.29 and A.2 were withdrawn.
- 352. Point 14(c) was adopted.

Point 14(d)

- 353. Point 14 (d) was adopted.

Point 14(e)

- 354. Point 14(e) was adopted.

Point 14(f)

- 355. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.146) to delete the point.
- 356. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment, as it was a critically important part of any programme to realize FPRW.
- 357. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment (A.107) to retain the original paragraph but to end it after “sustainable enterprises”, as the rest of the sentence was a statement of fact that did not directly relate to FPRW.

- 358. The Government member of China did not support either amendment and preferred to retain the whole paragraph.
- 359. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group's amendment (A.146) to delete the point and agreed to the original text of point 14(f) of the draft conclusions.
- 360. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed.
- 361. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, also agreed to the original text and withdrew their amendment (A.107).
- 362. The Government members of Switzerland, China, the United Kingdom, Indonesia, Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Barbados, and Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported the original text.
- 363. Point 14(f) was adopted.

Point 14(g)

- 364. Point 14 (g) was adopted.
- 365. Point 14 was adopted in its entirety as amended.

Point 15

- 366. The Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf the Africa group, introduced an amendment (A.172) to delete "policy" and "and fostering synergies", as synergy would normally apply to actions taken by institutions and not to legal frameworks, while coherence would be better applied to legal frameworks.
- 367. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not have any material objection to the language proposed.
- 368. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment.
- 369. The Government member of Ghana and the Government member of Barbados supported the amendment.
- 370. The Government member of Algeria supported the amendment but a small adjustment to the text might be needed with regard to coherence, as it was public policy that set the general framework, which was then be implemented by the legal framework.
- 371. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted a preference for the original text but would not object to the amendment should there be majority support for it.
- 372. The Worker Vice-Chairperson concurred with the Employer Vice-Chairperson and would go with the majority.
- 373. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, preferred the original text but would not stand in the way of consensus.
- 374. The Government member of the United States proposed a subamendment to the second sentence of point 15, so that it would read "This would entail coherence between legal frameworks, policies, strategies and programmes, and to develop synergies aimed at realizing FPRW", which was seconded by the Government member of Gabon.
- 375. The Government members of Japan, Argentina and Switzerland supported the proposal from the United States.

- 376. The Government member of the United Kingdom supported the amendment but proposed a further subamendment to replace “to develop” with “development of”, which was seconded by several Government members.
- 377. The Government member of Ghana proposed an additional subamendment to replace “between” with “among”, to be grammatically correct, which was seconded by the Government member of Barbados.
- 378. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, as well as the Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
- 379. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 380. Point 15 was adopted as amended.

Point 16

Heading

- 381. The heading “Areas of focus” before point 16 was adopted.

Chapeau to point 16

- 382. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.145) to delete “, with consideration to national circumstances”, which was identical to an amendment (A.89) tabled by the Governments of Canada, Switzerland, Türkiye, the United Kingdom, the United States and the EU Member States. Reference to the consideration of national circumstances was redundant, as point 14 referred to taking account of national circumstances.
- 383. The Employer Vice-Chairperson preferred the original text of the draft conclusions and did not agree to the amendment.
- 384. The Government member of China did not support the amendment, as the wording of point 14 did not cover what was being discussed in point 16. For the whole section to be workable for every government, to some extent the national circumstances or context should be taken into consideration, otherwise it would be difficult to implement the list of actions.
- 385. The Government members of Malaysia, Indonesia, Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the GCC, supported China’s position.
- 386. The Government member of Canada agreed with the importance of considering national circumstances. That being said, it was by virtue of ILO membership that all had to commit to respecting, promoting and realizing FPRW. For that reason, she supported the amendment.
- 387. The Government member of the United Kingdom supported the amendment for the reasons set out by the Government member of Canada.
- 388. The Government member of China emphasized the importance of including the phrase to ensure that the actions listed were put into practice. He agreed with Canada that governments had to respect, promote and realize FPRW; however, the issue was how to put that into action. It was of crucial importance to respect the diversity of ILO membership in order to realize FPRW.
- 389. The Worker Vice-Chairperson reiterated that point 14 included taking into account national circumstances as a frame to the whole section. If it was also mentioned in point 16, it would narrow the scope and exclude consultation and dialogue.

- 390. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that it would be necessary for certain governments to buy into the actions and that the inclusion of the language would be harmless.
- 391. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, pointed to the fact that implementing the actions would involve many actors, not just national governments, and it was self-evident that none would act without taking into account their own national contexts or circumstances. The additional text was not needed.
- 392. The Government member of Canada submitted an amendment (A.89), which was identical to an amendment submitted by the worker members (A.145), to the chapeau of point 16, deleting the wording: "Action should be taken in the following areas" and replacing it with the wording "Areas of focus should include". She also subamended the amendment to propose moving the entire point 16 up the numerical order to place it under point 14(g), thus exchanging places with point 15.
- 393. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson fully supported the amendment as subamended.
- 394. The Government members of Indonesia and the United Republic of Tanzania supported the amendment as subamended.
- 395. The amendments (A.89 and A.145) were adopted as subamended.
- 396. The chapeau to point 16 was adopted as amended.

Point 16, first subheading

- 397. The first subheading "Strengthening governance" was adopted.

Point 16(a)

- 398. Point 16(a) was adopted.

Point 16(b)

- 399. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, submitted an amendment (A.180) which replaced the words "of and respect for civil liberties" with "and promotion of human rights", to give broader meaning to the point and to connect with the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights.
- 400. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment, since human rights included civil liberties.
- 401. The Government members of Barbados, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the amendment.
- 402. The amendment was adopted.
- 403. Point 16(b) was adopted as amended.

Point 16(c)

- 404. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, presented an amendment (A.181) to insert the words "and strengthen" between the words "build" and "the capacity" at the beginning of point 16(c).
- 405. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.

- 406. The Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania put forward a subamendment to insert the words “and the institutions dealing with dispute resolution systems” after the words “labour inspection systems”.
- 407. The Government member of China seconded the amendment.
- 408. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment reformulating that insertion to read “build and strengthen the capacity of labour administration, labour dispute and labour inspection systems, and provide [...]”
- 409. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
- 410. The Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government members of Japan and the United Republic of Tanzania supported the amendment as subamended.
- 411. The amendment (A.181) was adopted as subamended.
- 412. Point 16(c) was adopted as amended.

Point 16(d)

- 413. Point 16(d) was adopted.

New subheading after point 16(d)

- 414. The Worker Vice-Chairperson tabled an amendment (A.159) to introduce a new subheading after point 16(d). However, his group wished to subamend its amendment by adding the words “and social dialogue” after “freedom of association”, deleting “promoting” and adding “including” before “collective bargaining”. The proposed subheading would therefore read “Freedom of association and social dialogue, including collective bargaining”.
- 415. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment as subamended.
- 416. The Government members of Norway, Türkiye, Switzerland and Canada supported the amendment as subamended.
- 417. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 418. The new subheading after point 16(d) was adopted as amended.

Point 16(e)

- 419. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group’s amendments (A.32 and A.33) to point 16(e).
- 420. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group’s amendment (A.144) to point 16(e) and wished to return to the original text.
- 421. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and of China, withdrew their amendments to point 16(e) (A.108 and A.3, respectively).
- 422. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group’s remaining amendments (A.143 and A.142) to point 16(e).
- 423. Point 16(e) was adopted.

Point 16(f)

- 424. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, presented an amendment (A.109) to insert the words “employers’ and workers’ organizations and of” between the words “capacity of” and “mechanisms and” in the first line of draft point 16(f). It was important to strengthen the capacity of employers’ and workers’ organizations.
- 425. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the original draft text.
- 426. The Government member of Türkiye supported the original draft text.
- 427. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, withdrew the amendment (A.109).
- 428. The Government member of China submitted an amendment (A.4) to point 16(f) to delete the words “in all its forms and at all levels”. He argued that “social dialogue” was already a broad enough concept, and that the phrase he proposed to delete was redundant.
- 429. The amendment was seconded by the Government member of Cameroon.
- 430. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that they preferred the original draft text.
- 431. The Government member of China withdrew his amendment (A.4).
- 432. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group’s amendment (A.141) to point 16(f).
- 433. Point 16(f) was adopted.

Point 16(g)

- 434. The Worker Vice-Chairperson presented an amendment (A.161) to move point 16(g) up the list under point 16(d).
- 435. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 436. The Government members of Switzerland, the United Kingdom, Canada and Türkiye endorsed the amendment.
- 437. The amendment (A.161) was adopted.
- 438. Point 16(g) was adopted as amended.

Point 16(h)

- 439. The Government member of the United Kingdom submitted an amendment (A.90), seconded by the Governments of Canada, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States, to insert the words “and risk” between the words “evidence” and “based approach. The aim was to ensure that existing resources were better focused.
- 440. The Worker Vice-Chairperson recalled that the Drafting Group had discussed this issue at length, and his group preferred the original text.
- 441. The Government member of the United Kingdom withdrew the amendment (A.90).
- 442. The Worker Vice-Chairperson presented his group’s amendment (A.160) to move point 16(h) higher up the list to come after point 16(d).
- 443. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.

444. The Government members of Türkiye, Mexico and Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the amendment.

445. The amendment (A.160) was adopted.

446. Point 16(h) was adopted as amended.

Subheading after point 16(h)

447. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group's amendment (A.158) to the subheading under point 16(h).

448. The subheading under 16(h): "Formalization and sustainable enterprises", was adopted.

Point 16(i)

449. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group's amendment (A.157) to point 16(i).

450. Point 16(i) was adopted.

Point 16(j)

451. The Worker Vice-Chairperson presented his group's amendment (A.156) to point 16(j). The group wished to subamend the amendment, which had been to delete the entire point, by reverting to the original text, but to replace the words "essential for" with "conducive to".

452. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the proposed subamendment.

453. There was broad support for the subamendment from the government benches.

454. The amendment (A.156) was adopted as subamended.

455. Point 16(j) was adopted as amended.

456. Amendments A.151, A.155, A.154, A.38, A.153, A.39, and A.152 all fell as a consequence.

Point 16(k)

457. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group's amendment (A.140) to delete point 16(k).

458. The Government member of China tabled an amendment (A.5) to delete point 16(k) due to doubts as to whether FPRW really played a central role in productivity improvement, inclusive growth and job creation.

459. The Government member of Indonesia seconded the amendment.

460. The Employer Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment and wished to revert to the original text.

461. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the original text.

462. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Türkiye and the United States opposed the amendment and supported the original text.

463. The Government member of China withdrew his amendment (A.5).

464. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group's amendments (A.41, A.42 and A.43).

465. Point 16(k) was adopted.

New point after 16(k)

- 466. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group's amendment (A.44) to insert a new point after point 16(k).
- 467. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group's amendment (A.139) to insert a new point after 16(k).

Point 16(l)

- 468. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group's amendment (A.45) to delete paragraph 16(l).
- 469. The amendment submitted by the Government member of Argentina to delete paragraph 16(l) was not seconded and fell.
- 470. Point 16(l) was adopted.

Subheading after point 16(l)

- 471. The subheading under 16(l): "Equality and inclusion", was adopted.

Point 16(m)

- 472. The Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, submitted an amendment (A.171) to delete the words "and on all grounds," from point 16(m). His group wished the conclusions to remain within the context of the FPRW. The fundamental text in this case was the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). The words "and on all grounds" did not feature in that instrument. As a result, the phrase did not add value to point 16(m).
- 473. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson said that they would align with the majority.
- 474. The Government member of China supported the amendment.
- 475. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Canada, Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Norway, also speaking on behalf of Iceland, the United Kingdom, and the United States supported the original wording.
- 476. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson, noting an apparent majority in favour of the original wording, said that their groups supported that wording.
- 477. The Government member of Sierra Leone said that this issue should be governed specifically by Article 1 of Convention No. 111. The current wording was vague.
- 478. The Government member of Indonesia supported the deletion of the phrase "and on all grounds".
- 479. The Government member of Cameroon said that inclusion of the words "and on all grounds" might be used by persons engaging in terrorist or political activity seeking impunity through invoking the protection accorded to workers. It was therefore preferable from the perspective of the protection of the State to delete the phrase.
- 480. The Government member of Senegal said that the Committee should bolster the legal framework of protection of workers from discrimination. Point 16(m) referred to eliminating "discrimination in employment and occupation for all workers". The phrase "and on all grounds” was superfluous. The Africa group sought support on this issue, which was important to the group. The group unanimously supported deletion.

481. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that it did not seem possible that frameworks to protect workers from discrimination in employment and occupation would ever lead to terrorism.
482. The Government member of the United States noted that the wording had been included in the tentative conclusions prepared by the Office. The United States found the phrase useful. She requested further explanation of the wording from the Secretariat.
483. The Representative of the Secretary-General said that under Convention No. 111, the term “discrimination” referred to differential treatment, consisting of a given preference, exclusion or different treatment of someone, relative to someone else. To restrict the point to eliminating discrimination in employment and occupation for all workers was not sufficient because discrimination occurred due to various unlawful distinctions. Article 1 of Convention No. 111 listed seven grounds of discrimination. However, grounds for discrimination evolved over time. Behaviour considered acceptable in the past might not be considered so in the present. New causes of discrimination might arise. Thus, Article 1(b) of Convention No. 111 allowed Member States, after consulting with employers’ and workers’ organizations, to determine additional grounds of discrimination, if they so decided. The ILO had responded to this, issuing Recommendations for example on disability, HIV/AIDS, health status and age. International humanitarian law likewise took account of the shifting nature of discrimination.
484. The Government member of Sierra Leone, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, proposed a subamendment to the group’s amendment, to replace the phrase “and on all grounds” with “in accordance with ILO Convention No. 111, based on national circumstances”.
485. The Government members of Cameroon, Gabon, Ghana and Indonesia supported the subamendment.
486. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, rejected the subamendment, stating that it did not cover the meaning of “and on all grounds”, as the Secretariat had explained it.
487. The Employer Vice-Chairperson recognized the importance accorded by various governments to the issues under consideration, and the genuine concern felt by parties. His group had therefore looked for guidance where the issues had been discussed in a tripartite setting. The resolution concerning inequalities and the world of work, adopted by the 109th Session (December 2021) of the International Labour Conference contained a possible solution. He proposed a subamendment to point 16(m), to read “Continue strengthening legal and policy frameworks to eliminate discrimination in employment and occupation for all workers and on all grounds protected by international law and human rights standards, and ensure that their application is effective, regularly monitored and evaluated;”.
488. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the proposed subamendment.
489. The Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported the subamended text.
490. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and of Norway said that they could join the consensus.
491. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, said that his group could join the consensus.

- 492. The Government member of Canada asked for clarification as to whether the proposed formulation would include interpretations by the Committee of Experts and by UN treaty bodies.
- 493. The Representative of the Secretary-General said that in the ILO the term “standards” referred to the Organization’s Conventions, Protocols and Recommendations. In the United Nations, the term was used to refer to the standards laid down in the UN human rights treaties and the work of the treaty bodies often helped to clarify them. Human rights standards are also contained in non-binding instruments such as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and may take the form of customary international law or general principles of law.
- 494. The Government member of Canada said that her Government could join the consensus.
- 495. The amendment (A.171) proposed by the Africa group was adopted as subamended.
- 496. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group’s amendment (A.48) to point 16(m).
- 497. Point 16(m) was adopted as amended.

Point 16(n)

- 498. The Government member of Japan presented an amendment (A.97) submitted jointly with the Government member of Türkiye to insert the word “equal” between the words “women for” and “work”, and “or work” before the words “of equal value”, to read “for equal work or work of equal value”. That wording was in line with agreed wording in labour ministerial meetings such as the Group of 20 (G20) Labour and Employment Ministers’ Meeting Declaration of 2020.
- 499. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson said that their groups supported the original language but would join the consensus.
- 500. The Government members of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the United States joined the consensus.
- 501. The amendment (A.97) was adopted.
- 502. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group’s amendment (A.50) to point 16(n).
- 503. Point 16(n) was adopted as amended.

Point 16(o)

- 504. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States and Türkiye, submitted an amendment (A.110) to delete the words “domestic workers, workers in the rural and informal economy, and migrant workers, as well as other groups” and replace them with the phrase “persons belonging to one or more vulnerable groups or groups in situations of vulnerability”, language that was in line with the resolution concerning a just transition towards environmentally sustainable economies and societies for all, adopted by the 111th Session (June 2023) of the International Labour Conference and which took account of the variety of vulnerable groups as well as national contexts.
- 505. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that the Worker group preferred the original language.
- 506. The Government members of Canada, China, Indonesia, the United Kingdom and the United States supported the amendment, which used agreed language and reflected an inclusive approach.
- 507. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, stressed the importance for the governments of his group of adopting a progressive approach to this issue. The fact was that the three groups historically at risk of exclusion and discrimination were so on grounds of race, gender, or ethnicity. With that statement reflected in the record of proceedings, GRULAC could support the amendment proposed by the EU Member States.

- 508. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson said that their groups would join the consensus around the amendment.
- 509. The amendment (A.110) was adopted.
- 510. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, and Türkiye tabled an amendment (A.111) to replace the term “compounding” with “intersecting”.
- 511. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 512. The Government members of Canada, Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, the United Kingdom, and the United States, supported the amendment.
- 513. The Government member of Indonesia said he would prefer the original text but could join the consensus. He requested that his preference be reflected in the record of proceedings.
- 514. The amendment (A.111) was adopted. Amendments A.52 and A.6 fell as a consequence.
- 515. Point 16(o) was adopted as amended.

New point after point 16(o)

- 516. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.138). His group wished to make a subamendment to that text, by placing a full stop after the words “fundamental rights”, and deleting the remaining phrases.
- 517. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment as subamended.
- 518. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Switzerland and Türkiye supported the amendment as subamended.
- 519. The amendment (A.138) was adopted as subamended.
- 520. The new point to be placed after point 16(o) was adopted as amended.

Point 16(p)

- 521. The Worker Vice-Chairperson presented an amendment (A.137) to insert the words “and inequalities”, delete the following word “a”, and pluralize the word “driver” to “drivers”.
- 522. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 523. There was broad support from the government benches for the amendment.
- 524. The amendment (A.137) was adopted.
- 525. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group’s two remaining amendments (A.54 and A.55) to point 16(p).
- 526. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group’s two remaining amendments (A.135 and A.136) to point 16(p).
- 527. Point 16(p) was adopted as amended.

New point after point 16(p)

- 528. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group's amendment (A.134) to insert a new point after point 16(p).
- 529. Point 16 was adopted in its entirety. The Committee noted that point 16 would be moved to become point 15.

SubtitleIII. Priorities for ILO action

- 530. The subtitle of part III "III. Priorities for ILO Action" was adopted.

Heading

- 531. The heading before point 17 "Thematic priorities" was adopted.

Point 17Chapeau to point 17

- 532. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.56) to delete "promote FPRW as a stand-alone objective as well as" which was discussed together with two other identical amendments (A.112 and A.7) submitted by the EU Member States and China, respectively, and two amendments (A.133 and A.113) to delete "continue to" submitted by the Workers and the EU Member States, respectively. The Employer Vice-Chairperson argued that promotion of FPRW as a stand-alone objective did not add to the substance of the sentence and almost inferred a siloed approach and strategy that was not consistent with the Office's integrated strategy on FPRW.
- 533. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the Employers' amendment, referring to the Office report, which highlighted the need to promote FPRW as a stand-alone objective.
- 534. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the deletion of both phrases, as the EU Member States were in favour of adding two additional priorities to the list of thematic priorities.
- 535. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Government members of the United States, Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and Türkiye said that they could be flexible and could go with the consensus.
- 536. The Employer Vice-Chairperson clarified that there were two distinct amendments and that the "continue to" amendment depended on the outcome of the discussion on the thematic priorities; in other words, "continue to" would apply if the same three priorities were retained but should be removed if there were more than three priorities agreed or if there was a change in the designation of the priorities. Thus, the only issue at the current juncture before the Committee was whether to include "promote FPRW as a stand-alone objective as well as".
- 537. The amendments (A.56, A.112 and A.7, A.133 and A.113) were adopted.
- 538. The chapeau to point 17 was adopted as amended.

Point 17(a)

- 539. Point 17(a) was adopted.

Point 17(b)

- 540. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment (A.114) to delete the word “sustainable” before “supply chains”, noting that it was important for all enterprises to be sustainable.
- 541. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not object to the amendment.
- 542. The Government member of Argentina and the Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 543. The amendment was adopted.
- 544. Point 17(b) was adopted as amended.

Point 17(c)

- 545. Point 17(c) was adopted.

Points 17(d) and 17(e)

- 546. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.59) to delete point 17(d), arguing that, even though the first three priorities had been in place for three years, they still required much work; it was thus inappropriate to add to the thematic priorities, which would use up limited ILO budget resources.
- 547. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support deleting the point, noting that just transition linked to FPRW had been mentioned in paragraph 129 of the Office report in terms of endangering jobs and livelihoods across the world, and in Part II(A) of the ILO Centenary Declaration, which stated that “In discharging its constitutional mandate, [...] the ILO must direct its efforts to: ensuring a just transition to a future of work that contributes to sustainable development [...]”. It was an urgent issue being addressed worldwide and must be included.
- 548. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the topic had been discussed at the International Labour Conference in 2023 and that the conclusions had not requested the Office to create a nexus between just transition and FPRW, rather the resolution had simply asked the Office to strengthen the capacity of the constituents.
- 549. The Government member of China supported the Employers’ position.
- 550. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Canada, Türkiye, Switzerland, the United States, and Mexico, speaking in his national capacity and on behalf of Brazil and Argentina, supported retaining point 17(d).
- 551. The Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, said that he could be flexible on the amendment.
- 552. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the Employers recognized that there was a majority of support for maintaining the text, but insisted the same principle could not apply to the subsequent thematic priorities on the list, so it was difficult to reach a decision on the two amendments in isolation.
- 553. The Worker Vice-Chairperson disagreed, noting that it was important to address both issues, and the Committee had not yet heard the governments’ views on digitalization and the platform economy. As the overwhelming majority supported keeping the addition on just transition, it would not be prudent to discuss it on basis of programme and budget, which was a separate topic.

- 554. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group's amendment (A.59).
- 555. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced amendment (A.60) to delete point 17(e), arguing that unlike just transition, the subject of the digital economy was a topic in a state of flux, with emerging work arrangements due to be discussed in the standard-setting discussion on decent work in the platform economy in the International Labour Conference in 2025. The Employers opposed the addition of both themes to the list of thematic priorities.
- 556. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support deleting point 17(e), considering that the work on the first three thematic priorities would never be completed and emerging trends relevant to FPRW needed to be addressed. Paragraph 129 of the Office report referred to digital platforms, which were providing work for workers but with critical challenges to addressing their rights. The Office must be equipped with the requisite competencies to advise Member States on the issues in question.
- 557. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, agreed that it was important not to pre-empt the normative work of the Office. On behalf of the EU Member States, he proposed a subamendment to delete the reference to emerging work arrangements, while maintaining the reference to the digital economy.
- 558. The Government member of the United Kingdom noted that both a just transition and the digital economy were key changes affecting the world of work.
- 559. The Government member of Türkiye supported maintaining both point 17(d) on a just transition and point 17(e) on emerging work arrangements in its future work but could be flexible concerning the subamendment proposed by the EU Member States.
- 560. The Government member of Indonesia supported retaining point 17(d) on a just transition and expressed flexibility on point 17(e), suggesting it was inclined to support the subamendment proposed by Belgium, to remove the reference to emerging work arrangements.
- 561. The Government member of the United States said that she could be flexible regarding the digital economy.
- 562. The Government member of Mexico, speaking in his national capacity and on behalf Brazil, supported both concepts in point 17(e) and did not support the subamendment proposed by the EU Member States.
- 563. The Government member of Canada saw the need to keep both phrases under point 17(e) but indicated she would be open to accepting the subamendment proposed by the EU Member States if it helped reach consensus.
- 564. The Government member of Barbados expressed flexibility in accepting the subamendment proposed by the EU Member States but noted that, if consensus could not be achieved, it would be important to include a statement indicating the importance of looking at emerging work arrangements as part of the process of examining FPRW.
- 565. The Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, said that if the ILO supported a just transition and the digital economy it would benefit African countries; it therefore supported the subamendment proposed by the EU Member States.
- 566. The Employer Vice-Chairperson appreciated the constructive discussion, but reiterated his group's concerns, noting that taking stock and making recommendations required practical advice and sufficient resources at a time of zero budget growth in the ILO. With great reluctance, he indicated that the Employers would not block consensus and would accept the subamendment proposed by the EU Member States. He withdrew his group's amendment (A.60).

- 567. The Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed to the subamendment proposed by the EU Member States.
- 568. The subamendments proposed to point 17(e) by the Government member of Belgium, on behalf of the EU Member States, were adopted.
- 569. Point 17(d) was adopted.
- 570. Point 17(e) was adopted as amended.
- 571. The Government member of Kiribati introduced an amendment (A.187) to add a new clause, to read "labour mobility to enhance and promote fair and inclusive employment opportunities for all".
- 572. The amendment was not seconded and therefore fell.
- 573. Point 17 was adopted in its entirety as amended.

Point 18

- 574. Amendments (A.182, A.115 and A.61) to delete point 18 had been submitted by GRULAC, the EU Member States and the Employers, respectively. An amendment (A.188) to replace the text of point 18 with "Just transition towards environmentally sustainable economies and societies for all, with special consideration for small island developing States, least-developed countries and migrant workers" had been proposed by Kiribati.
- 575. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that, given the discussion that had just taken place, the language was superfluous and point 18 should be deleted.
- 576. Amendments A.182, A.115 and A.61 were adopted.
- 577. Amendment A.188 fell as a consequence.
- 578. Point 18 was deleted.

Heading

- 579. The heading before point 19 "Means of action" was adopted.

Point 19

Chapeau to point 19

- 580. The Government member of the United States introduced an amendment (A.99) tabled by the Government members of Canada, Switzerland and the United States, arguing that since the current strategy on integrating FPRW ended in 2023, it was important to ask the Office to develop and implement a new strategy on FPRW.
- 581. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that his group's amendment (A.132) was similar and indicated that the Workers would consider withdrawing their amendment in favour of A.99 if it facilitated consensus.
- 582. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the Employers preferred the original chapeau text, but they could propose subamendments if there was support for the amendment.

- 583. The Government members of Norway, speaking also on behalf of Iceland, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the United Kingdom supported the amendment.
- 584. The Government member of China said it was important to take into account the national context of Member States, and proposed a subamendment to insert “, taking into account the national contexts of Member States,” at the end of the amendment.
- 585. The Chairperson noted that China had submitted an amendment (A.8) to the same effect but agreed to accept their amendment as a subamendment to facilitate the discussion.
- 586. The Government members of Japan, Indonesia and Senegal seconded China’s subamendment.
- 587. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed subamendments to delete the reference to the high-level evaluation, as it was neither a tripartite document, nor adopted by the Governing Body; to replace “develop and implement a new integrated strategy on FPRW” with “include in its integrated strategy on FPRW”; to delete “, paying”; and to insert “, while remaining responsive to needs of constituents”, after “categories”. The subamended text would read “The Office should include in its integrated strategy on FPRW particular attention to promoting a balance in Office action across the five FPRW categories, while remaining responsive to needs of constituents, and focus its work on the following areas:”.
- 588. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendments proposed by the Employers, as it was important to emphasize “develop and implement”, given that the document was intended to guide the Office. It would also be difficult for the Office to take into account FPRW across the Office while taking into account national circumstances. The Workers agreed to delete the reference to the high-level evaluation, but not the other subamendments, given that the imbalances in FPRW were referenced in the Office report.
- 589. The Employer Vice-Chairperson further explained the rationale behind each proposed subamendment, noting that any strategy was adapted towards the perspective of the future, so it was appropriate to allow for flexibility, whether developing a new strategy or adjusting an existing one. Addressing imbalances seemed not to be a strategy statement but a remedial statement. The Employers’ intention was to be positive in the approach, while recognizing that technical assistance was often driven by the demand perceived from the constituents.
- 590. The Worker Vice-Chairperson recalled that the main purpose of the recurrent discussion was to take stock of the past and address what could be done better. Citing paragraph 124 of the Office report, where it was indicated that, with some exceptions, the Office had pursued more singular focus efforts and not an integrated approach, he emphasized the need to say what needed to be done better.
- 591. The Government member of China agreed to the Employers’ subamendment to delete mention of the high-level evaluation, but insisted on the importance of maintaining the reference to the national context of Member States.
- 592. The Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported the subamendments proposed by the Employers and the Government member of China.
- 593. The Government member of Türkiye supported the text as subamended by the Employers and expressed flexibility on the subamendment proposed by the Government member of China.
- 594. The Government member of Ghana supported the subamendment proposed by the Government member of China.

- 595. The Government member of the United States proposed a subamendment to provide new wording, to read “The Office should update its integrated strategy on FPRW, including addressing the imbalances in Office action across the five FPRW categories, and focus its work on the following areas, while remaining responsive to the needs of constituents:”.
- 596. The Government members of Japan, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, the United Kingdom and Norway seconded the subamendment.
- 597. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed to the subamendment but made a further subamendment to replace “addressing the imbalances” with “promoting balance”, given that the language was more constructive.
- 598. The Government member of Cameroon supported the subamendment but proposed an additional subamendment to insert “taking into account the national context of Member States”.
- 599. The Government members of Ghana and Senegal seconded the subamendment.
- 600. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that a reference to national circumstances was included under point 17 and it was therefore unnecessary to repeat it. His group supported the subamended text proposed by the Government member of the United States, as subamended by Employers, but did not support the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Cameroon. He proposed a subamendment to replace “addressing the imbalances in Office action” with “ensuring balance in Office action”.
- 601. The Government member of Mexico, speaking in his national capacity, proposed a subamendment to insert “taking into account the context of constituents”.
- 602. The Government member of Indonesia supported the subamendment.
- 603. The Government member of China said that “ensuring balance” was too strong a term. She proposed a subamendment to place greater emphasis on the phrase “taking into account the national context” by moving it before the reference to “the five categories of FPRW”.
- 604. The Government member of Cameroon seconded the subamendment proposed by the Government member of China.
- 605. The Government member of Türkiye supported the text as subamended by the Workers’ group.
- 606. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, sharing the Government member of China’s view that the word “ensuring” was too strong and prescriptive, proposed a subamended text, to read “The Office should update its integrated strategy on FPRW to balance Office action across five FPRW categories, address gaps in implementation, and respond effectively to the needs of constituents, while taking into account the national contexts of Member States and focusing its work on the following areas:”.
- 607. The Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed a concern regarding the role of the Office, which did not get involved in national-level support unless requested, and proposed a subamendment to maintain “while being responsive to the needs of constituents” but delete “taking into account the national contexts of Member States”.
- 608. The Government member of Ghana did not support the Workers’ subamendment and proposed a subamendment to replace “balance Office action” with “balance its action”.
- 609. The Governments of Cameroon, Indonesia, Malaysia and the United Republic of Tanzania seconded the subamendment.

- 610. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the phrase “taking into account their national contexts” implied that the national context of tripartite constituents was considered, but proposed a subamendment to replace the comma after “categories” with “and”. It would then be a strong sentence that would address all interests.
- 611. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment, providing it was the majority view.
- 612. The Government member of the United States agreed that the Office needed to respond to national needs but given the global-level nature of some of the actions, she sought advice from the Office as to whether the Employers’ proposal would address the context of global and national level actions.
- 613. The Representative of the Secretary-General confirmed that the ILO did indeed support activities and actions of constituents at different levels, such as support to the International Organization of Employers at the global level or the capacity-building needs of workers’ organizations at regional, intra-regional and local levels. Actions appearing under the chapeau of point 19 included references to national institutions, where support was provided only upon request and support would necessarily be tailored. But the draft means of action also included global-level activities such as producing global estimates on child labour or forced labour, encouraging peer learning and information-sharing across regions and within regions. Thus, a combination of different activities was foreseen, some of which would need to be conducted at the national level.
- 614. The Government member of Canada agreed that the needs of constituents would encompass the national context, as well as intra-regional and global activities. Canada proposed a subamendment to delete “taking into account their national contexts”, which was seconded by the Government member of the United States.
- 615. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Japan and Iceland, also speaking on behalf of Norway, as well as the Worker and Employer Vice-Chairpersons, supported the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Canada.
- 616. The amendment (A.99) was adopted as subamended.
- 617. Amendments A.132 and A.8 fell as a consequence.
- 618. The chapeau to point 19 was adopted as amended.

Subheading

- 619. The subheading “Standards-related action” before point 19(a) was adopted.

Point 19(a)

- 620. The Government member of Canada introduced an amendment (A.91), submitted by the Governments of Canada, the EU Member States, Switzerland, the United Kingdom, and the United States. The amendment deleted “, including the Protocol of 2014 to Convention No. 29”, and inserted, following “the ten fundamental Conventions”, “and the Protocol of 2014 to the Convention No. 29”. It was a technical amendment and aimed at acknowledging the fact that the Protocol constituted the eleventh fundamental Convention.
- 621. The Government member of the United Kingdom said that the amendment made it clearer that the Protocol was indeed one of the fundamental Conventions.

622. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment but sought the guidance of the Office regarding the status of the Protocol.
623. The Representative of the Secretary-General said that the Protocol of 2014 could only be ratified by Member States that had already ratified the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), after which it became part and parcel of Convention No. 29.
624. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, while habitually against singling out individual instruments, supported the amendment, given that the Protocol of 2014 had a separate ratification process before becoming part of Convention No. 29.
625. The Government members of Argentina, Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, Iceland, Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and Norway supported the amendment.
626. The amendment was adopted.
627. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.130) which inserted, between “specific campaigns” and “and providing technical advisory services”, the phrase “to promote the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155) and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187)”. The intention was to highlight that a safe and healthy working environment had become a new FPRW, and therefore to advocate for specific campaigns to promote the Conventions, building on the momentum.
628. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the intention was already covered by the wording encouraging ratification campaigns “in particular for those [Conventions] that are least ratified”. The Conclusions had a seven-year time span to cover. Over that period, priorities might change, and overly specific guidance could become obsolete.
629. The Government member of Ghana did not support singling out individual Conventions.
630. The Government member of the United Kingdom, noting that the Workers had tabled a further amendment (A.131) to point 19(a), singling out another two fundamental Conventions, queried whether a list of Conventions was in the making.
631. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, said that the first part of the point covered all ten fundamental Conventions.
632. The Government member of Türkiye said that the proposed amendment limited the scope of the point.
633. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew amendment A.130 and introduced his group’s other amendment (A.131), which inserted the words “to promote the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No.87) and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98)” between “specific campaigns” and “and providing technical advisory services”. Those two instruments were acknowledged in many ILO texts as being the most important of the fundamental Conventions. They were critical enabling rights. The independent high-level evaluation of the ILO’s strategies and actions to promote fundamental principles and rights at work, 2018–23 had underlined that freedom of association and collective bargaining were inadequately addressed.
634. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. The high-level evaluation report was not a document that had tripartite consensus. Each of the FPRW was an enabling condition, supporting the strategic objectives of the ILO. Individual areas should not be highlighted.
635. The Government member of Argentina supported the proposed amendment.

- 636. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, acknowledged the importance of Conventions Nos 87 and 98, but could not support an amendment that singled them out.
- 637. The Government members of China, Türkiye and the United Kingdom aligned themselves with the statement made by the Government member of Belgium on behalf of the EU and its Member States.
- 638. The Government member of Ghana pointed out that amendment A.91 had been adopted, already highlighting the Protocol of 2014. Which fundamental Convention was more important than another could depend on the situation in individual countries – one fundamental Convention might be more important to one country than another.
- 639. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that the language of the amendment was based on agreed language from the Social Justice Declaration, which spoke of “respecting, promoting and realizing the fundamental principles and rights at work, which are of particular significance, as both rights and enabling conditions that are necessary for the full realization of all of the strategic objectives [...] freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining are particularly important to enable the attainment of the four strategic objectives”. The ILO Centenary Declaration placed “a focus on freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining as enabling rights”. The proposed amendment was required in order to set guidelines for future work and address existing shortcomings.
- 640. The Employer Vice-Chairperson disagreed that Conventions Nos 87 and 98 should be elevated above the other fundamental Conventions, such as the instruments on child labour and forced labour.
- 641. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that the purpose of the ILO at its establishment in 1919 had been to attain social peace. That could only be secured through freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining. Certainly, combating child labour was crucial, but one of the most effective ways to address it was through promotion of freedom of association and collective bargaining.
- 642. The Government member of Cuba, speaking also for Mexico and Brazil, supported the statement made on behalf of the EU and its Member States and the Employer group’s position. In his national capacity, he believed that it was important to retain a balance, and not highlight individual instruments.
- 643. The Government member of Canada agreed with the statement made by the Government member of Belgium on behalf of the EU and its Member States, observing that Conventions Nos 87 and 98 already figured among the least ratified Conventions. However, it was true that the two fundamental Conventions were the foundation of social dialogue, and as such the cornerstone of democracy in the workplace. The Government of Canada was therefore open to the inclusion of those Conventions but would not block consensus.
- 644. The Government member of Ghana agreed with the importance of Conventions Nos 87 and 98 but thought it important to take heed of the needs of all constituents, which might vary by country and region. The text already called for intensified efforts to increase ratification of the two instruments, as they were included in the category of “least ratified Conventions”.
- 645. The Representative of the Secretary-General, at the request of the Worker Vice-Chairperson, informed the Committee that the Governing Body of the ILO had recently adopted two strategies on collective bargaining and occupational safety and health, respectively; the latter strategy following the elevation of occupational safety and health as an FPRW. Both strategies included ratification campaigns for the fundamental Conventions concerned, and both were funded under the Programme and Budget for 2024–25.

646. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, in light of the information concerning ongoing ILO action to promote the least ratified fundamental Conventions, withdrew his group's amendment (A.131).

647. Point 19(a) was adopted as amended.

Point 19(b)

648. Point 19(b) was adopted.

Point 19(c)

649. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, introduced an amendment (A.183) to delete point 19(c). The implications of the point were unclear and might place too great a burden on Member States. He asked for clarification of the phrase "to enhance the potential of the annual follow-up to the 1998 Declaration".

650. The Representative of the Secretary-General explained that the annual follow-up included the preparation of reports containing information from all Member States on ratification of the fundamental Conventions, identifying obstacles to such ratification. The Employers' group had suggested that the questionnaires sent to Member States for that purpose might be improved and consequently allow the Office to offer better services, more closely targeted countries' needs, where requested to do so by Member States. The aim would be to tighten the link between the Office and Member States. Better information from Member States would enable the Office to align its actions more closely to needs, creating a virtuous circle.

651. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment.

652. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, withdrew the amendment.

653. The Worker Vice-Chairperson tabled another amendment (A.129) to point 19(c), which proposed deleting the first three words: "Explore avenues to".

654. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Ghana supported the amendment.

655. The amendment was adopted.

656. The Chairperson asked the Committee to turn its attention to a further amendment (A.9), submitted by China.

657. The Government member of China withdrew the amendment.

658. The Government member of the United States introduced an amendment (A.101), tabled by the Governments of Canada, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States, to insert "to better inform technical assistance in response to requests" between "use of the information" and "gathered therein". The purpose was to make clearer the use of the additional information gathered.

659. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that his group preferred the original language, which allowed the information to be used in any number of ways. The wording made the text restrictive.

660. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that his group supported the amendment but would join a contrary consensus if necessary.
661. The Government member of Ghana did not support the amendment, which limited the scope of point 19(c).
662. The Government member of Argentina and the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the amendment.
663. The Government member of Senegal proposed a subamendment to insert “specifically” after “information”, to read “through an improved use of information specifically to better inform technical assistance in response to requests gathered therein”, which was seconded by the Government Members of Cameroon and Morocco.
664. The Employer Vice-Chairperson found the text even more restrictive in that it directed use of the information specifically to technical assistance, stifling the full potential of gathering information in that way.
665. The Government member of the United States agreed that the follow-up to the 1998 Declaration was a useful source of information. The amendment was aimed specifically at the question “what are your technical assistance needs?” She asked for clarification regarding the Office’s views on an “improved use of information”.
666. The Representative of the Secretary-General said that currently the Office made the information gathered available through the baseline reports. The Office made other use of the information, but not exclusively for technical assistance. The follow-up to the 1998 Declaration was potentially a rich mine of information for the ILO, useful for multiple purposes. She suggested wording to read “including through an improved use of the information gathered therein to, among other purposes, better inform technical assistance in response to requests” to be considered by the Committee.
667. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to place a full stop after “technical assistance” and delete the remaining four words.
668. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
669. The Government member of China did not support the proposed wording, as “among other purposes” could be ambiguous.
670. The Government member of Ghana proposed reverting to the original text, which avoided placing the accent on informing technical assistance.
671. The Government member of the United States withdrew the amendment.
672. Point 19(c) was adopted as amended.

Point 19(d)

673. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.128), the purpose of which was to allow the supervisory bodies to better guide development cooperation, technical assistance and research. The amendment replaced the first three words of the draft text “Ensure synergies between” by “Ensure that the outcomes of”, and inserted “guide” between “supervisory bodies” and “development cooperation”. However, the group withdrew the amendment in favour of an amendment (A.103) submitted by the Governments of Canada, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States.

- 674. The Government member of the United States introduced an amendment (A.103), which inserted “, including by enhancing efforts to mainstream understanding of the functioning and outputs of the ILO supervisory mechanisms across the Organization, both in the field and in headquarters” after “technical assistance and research”. The aim was to connect the work of the supervisory bodies with technical cooperation and research.
- 675. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the amendment.
- 676. The Government member of the United States explained that her Government, and the other governments tabling the amendment, believed there was room to build bridges between development cooperation and technical assistance and the supervisory mechanisms.
- 677. The Government member of Ghana proposed a subamendment to replace “between” with “among”, which was seconded by the Government members of Cameroon and Morocco.
- 678. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Senegal supported the subamendment but requested clarification of the meaning of “in the field”.
- 679. The Representative of the Secretary-General explained that the text should say “Office” rather than “Organization”. The meaning was to ensure that all ILO employees, in field offices, but also those not attached to field offices and at headquarters, should be fully conversant with the functioning of the supervisory machinery.
- 680. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 681. Point 19(d) was adopted as amended.

Subheading

- 682. The subheading before point 19(d) “Enhance research and capacity” was adopted.

Point 19(e)

- 683. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.65) to insert before “develop” the words “continue to”, and to insert after “develop” the words “for all constituents”. It was a technical rather than a substantive amendment.
- 684. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that it was self-evident that the ILO worked for all constituents and therefore the phrase was redundant. He proposed a subamendment to delete the words.
- 685. The Government member of Türkiye supported the amendment as subamended.
- 686. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, responding to a request for clarification from the Government member of Canada on the rationale behind the deletion of “for all constituents”, said that the phrase could create an obligation for the Office to respond to requests from one group of constituents for tools specific to their group. By definition the ILO promoted and conducted activities for all constituents.
- 687. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew the phrase “for all constituents” from his group’s amendment.
- 688. The Government member of Ghana agreed with the withdrawal. He proposed a subamendment to insert the words “promote and conduct” before “research”, given that research was conducted, rather than developed, so that it would read “promote and conduct research, develop tools, guidelines, statistical measurement methodologies, and associated training resources, for qualitative and quantitative data collection and research on FPRW". The Government members of Sierra Leone and Senegal seconded the subamendment.

- 689. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
- 690. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment and proposed a further subamendment to insert the word "and" before "develop tools".
- 691. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 692. The Government of Canada introduced an amendment (A.92), tabled by the Governments of Canada, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States, to insert "; including disaggregated data on discrimination and other under-addressed FPRW categories," after "data collection". The high-level evaluation had highlighted the uneven distribution of development cooperation funding for freedom of association and collective bargaining and for discrimination, while the Office report referred to the lack of disaggregated data to assess progress and gaps in the area of discrimination.
- 693. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC and in his national capacity, supported the amendment.
- 694. The Government member of Gabon questioned why discrimination was being highlighted in the amendment.
- 695. The Government member of Canada explained that non-discrimination at work was one of the FPRW where disaggregated data was lacking. Without data, it was not possible to identify gaps, and thus the Office could not assess progress made. The high-level evaluation noted that freedom of association and collective bargaining and discrimination were allocated the smallest share of development cooperation funding.
- 696. The Government member of Sierra Leone said that the basic definition of research involved systematic collection and analysis, including disaggregation. If the data was not analysed, it was not complete. Therefore, the phrase "including disaggregated data" was redundant. He did not support the amendment.
- 697. The Government member of China submitted a subamendment to delete the words "and other under-addressed FPRW categories", which was seconded by the Government member of Cameroon.
- 698. The Government member of the United Kingdom, the Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Gabon supported the original amendment as submitted.
- 699. The Government member of China withdrew her subamendment.
- 700. The Government member of Ghana preferred the original text from the Drafting Group. Research should focus on all FPRW categories, and not be concentrated in one area.
- 701. The Government member of the United States saw value in specifically pointing to the need for more disaggregated data, a shortcoming nonetheless highlighted in paragraph 108 of the Office report.
- 702. The Government of Gabon expressed support for amendment A.92.
- 703. The amendment was adopted.

704. Point 19(e) was adopted as amended.

Point 19(f)

- 705. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced his group's amendment (A.67), which was technical and aimed at improving clarity. It replaced the word "institutions" with "capacities".
- 706. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that his group could be flexible regarding the amendment, although the word "institutions" was more precise.
- 707. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that when talking of research bodies, the term "institutions" was more common.
- 708. The Government member of Mexico, speaking in his national capacity, proposed subamending to "institutional capacities". The subamendment was seconded by the Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania.
- 709. The Government member of Norway supported the statement made by the Government member of Belgium on behalf of the EU and its Member States.
- 710. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment.
- 711. The Government member of Mexico, speaking in his national capacity, withdrew his subamendment.
- 712. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced a second amendment (A.68) to point 19(f) to replace the words "prevalence of deficits" with the less negative term "status".
- 713. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 714. The Government members of Argentina; Belgium, on behalf of the EU and its Member States; Cameroon, also speaking for Morocco; Canada; Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group; Ghana; Mexico; Norway; and the United States supported the amendment.
- 715. The amendment was adopted.
- 716. Point 19(f) was adopted as amended.

Point 19(g)

- 717. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment (A.116) to delete the words "if data permit".
- 718. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 719. The Employer Vice-Chairperson explained that if the amendment was adopted, then a subsequent amendment (A.70) affecting the deleted words and tabled by the Employers, would necessarily fall. He therefore proposed submitting amendment A.70 as a subamendment to amendment A.116, with the wording to read ", as data permit". It recognized that perfect data often did not exist, but there was a threshold of data which, while not perfect, might allow valid work to go ahead.
- 720. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
- 721. The Government member of Mexico, speaking in his national capacity, preferred the amendment without the subamendment.
- 722. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed a subamendment to remove the comma between "issues" and "as data permit".

- 723. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
- 724. The Government member of the United States proposed a subamendment to insert the word “on” between “and” and “other”, to read “and on other FPRW issues”, which was seconded by the Government members of Canada and the United Kingdom.
- 725. The Employer Vice-Chairperson submitted a further subamendment to allow the phrase “as data permit” to qualify each of the areas of research listed, so that the text would read “continue to produce, in collaboration with Member States, global estimates on child labour, forced labour and on other FPRW issues, as data permit;”.
- 726. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania agreed with the text as subamended.
- 727. The Government member of the United States said that, given the consensus on the matter, she could be flexible. It would be important to ensure that what was being conveyed to the Office was clear. It was anticipated that the Office would continue to collect data and produce global estimates on child labour and forced labour, and the question around other FPRW issues had been well discussed.
- 728. The Representative of the Secretary-General clarified that the Office currently produced global estimates on child labour and forced labour, where the minimum data necessary existed. However, in other areas of the FPRW, where data collection was difficult, that was not the case. There were, for example, challenges to forming estimates on data on disability-based discrimination. On the other hand, data on gender inequalities and participation were available, albeit unevenly. It might therefore be preferable to revert to the previous formulation.
- 729. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group’s subamendment.
- 730. The Government member of Ghana proposed a subamendment to delete the second “on”, between “and” and “other”, which was seconded by the Government member of Senegal.
- 731. The Government member of the United States said that she found the word “on” useful but could withdraw her subamendment if necessary.
- 732. The Government member of China asked whether the Office had already produced global estimates for other FPRWs and, if not, why the phrase “continue to produce” might be thought appropriate.
- 733. The Representative of the Secretary-General said that the Office produced global estimates for forced labour and child labour on a regular basis. In collaboration with the World Health Organization (WHO), it also produced global estimates on some aspects of occupational safety and health. Regarding migrant workers vis-à-vis their treatment compared to nationals, the ILO produced global estimates on migrant workers, although not on a regular basis. In the past, the ILO had run a survey on indigenous peoples’ labour market participation as compared to non-indigenous populations’ labour market participation. There were, moreover, several FPRW for which estimates had never been produced.
- 734. The Government member of China said that, in light of the response, the phrase “continue to produce” was questionable, given that the Office was not producing certain global FPRW estimates.
- 735. The Representative of the Secretary-General also clarified that surveys were produced with Gallup on violence and harassment. Possibly the text should be amended to distinguish between the different types of data produced.

- 736. The Government member of China presented an amendment (A.190), to insert the words “based on reliable evidence, facts and data” between the terms “FPRW issues” and “[if data permit];”. She explained that the amendment sought to express an understanding that, while data was imperfect, it should nevertheless reflect reality. The Government member of Senegal seconded the amendment.
- 737. On request, the Secretariat provided an alternative formulation to the amendment (A.116) submitted by the Government members of the EU to point 19(g), to read: “Produce, in collaboration with Member States, global estimates on child labour and forced labour, and other FPRW issues as data permit, and based on international statistical standards and measurement practices;”
- 738. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the alternative formulation.
- 739. The Government member of China supported the alternative formulation but requested clarification regarding international statistical standards and measurement practices.
- 740. The Deputy Representative of the Secretary-General said that the ILO had been producing global estimates for over 20 years. The estimates were an approximation in terms of numbers and were not intended to provide a basis for policy guidance at the national level. The Global estimates on child labour and forced labour had been more and more robust based on an increased number of national statistical data. On the other hand, the statistical definition of child labour had evolved over the years and had been adopted by the International Conference of Labour Statisticians (ICLS). The methodology used for the publication of global estimates on child labour and forced labour was transparent and was annexed to the respective reports issued.
- 741. The Government member of China said that his Government was actively involved in the ICLS and proposed to subamend point 19(g) by adding, after the words “international statistical standards”, the words “adopted by the ICLS”.
- 742. The Deputy Representative of the Secretary-General said that the phrase was redundant to the extent that international statistical standards were necessarily adopted by the ICLS, just as international labour standards were necessarily adopted by the International Labour Conference.
- 743. The Government members of China and Gabon, on behalf of the Africa group, supported the draft text provided by the Secretariat.
- 744. The alternative formulation was adopted.
- 745. The Government member of China withdrew his amendment (A.190) to point 19(g).
- 746. Point 19(g) was adopted as amended.

Point 19(h)

- 747. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group’s amendment (A.126), in preference for the original text submitted by the Drafting Group.
- 748. The Government member of China introduced an amendment (A.11), explaining that the wording was similar to the previous one his Government had proposed.
- 749. The amendment was not seconded and therefore fell.
- 750. Point 19(h) was adopted.

New point after point 19(h)

- 751. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.123) to insert a new clause after point 19(h), to read “continue to undertake research and analysis on the intersection of FPRW and trade and investment, including in relation to labour rights clauses in trade and investment agreements, the use of forced labour import bans, and the use of public procurement to support FPRW;”. The 2023 recurrent discussion on labour protection had identified a need for further knowledge development on capacity-building around labour provisions in trade and investment agreements, including in public procurement, and that the ILO should undertake research into public procurement to foster adherence to labour rights. The Workers were proposing that such research should give a central place to FPRW and were incorporating a new element of forced labour import bans, given that many countries had introduced, or were discussing introducing, import bans on goods produced with forced labour. Hence more research was warranted, as the consequences were serious.
- 752. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that there was agreement elsewhere in the draft conclusions on priority research topics but, for the sake of consensus, proposed a subamendment to delete “, the use of forced labour import bans, and the use of procurement to support FPRW” so that the work of the Office would not be limited.
- 753. The Government member of Canada supported the Workers’ amendment, but not the Employers’ subamendment, noting that it was important to uphold FPRW benefits to all constituents.
- 754. The Government member of China supported the Employers’ subamendment, expressing strong concern about the language “labour rights clauses in trade and investment agreements, the use of forced labour import bans, and the use of public procurement to support FPRW”. It was up to the negotiating parties to decide on the scope of trade and investment agreements and for governments to decide on their procurement policies. Some countries were using forced labour import bans as a way to introduce protectionist policies, which had severe consequences for the countries subjected to unfair, unilateral sanctions.
- 755. The Government member of Malaysia aligned with China and supported the Employers’ subamendment.
- 756. The Government members of Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States supported the Workers’ amendment.
- 757. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, preferred to retain the Workers’ original amendment, but proposed a subamendment to replace the two instances in the text of the word “use” with “impact”, noting that it was important for the ILO and its constituents to learn about the impact of such measures, not to promote their use. As for the comment about using protectionist policies, the Social Justice Declaration explicitly stated that labour standards should not be used for protectionist trade purposes; thus, the risk should be non-existent.
- 758. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that there was nothing in the language of the clause before “, including” that would prevent the Office from engaging specifically in those areas of research.
- 759. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that his group would go with the consensus.
- 760. The Government member of Canada supported the subamendment proposed by the EU Member States.

- 761. The Government member of Türkiye supported the subamendment but proposed a further subamendment to reference child labour bans, in addition to forced labour bans.
- 762. The subamendment from Türkiye fell, as it was not seconded.
- 763. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed further subamendments to replace “including in relation to” with “including the impact of”, to delete the two instances of “the impact”, and to insert after FPRW the wording “which are matters of disagreement among Member States”, so that the point would read “continue to undertake research and analysis on the intersection of FPRW and trade and investment, including the impact of labour rights clauses in trade and investment agreements, of forced labour import bans, and of public procurement to support FPRW, which are matters of disagreement among Member States;”.
- 764. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that, while he agreed to the Employers’ subamendments, with the exception of the wording at the end “which are matters of disagreement among Member States”, what was being suggested was already included in the text. He proposed a subamendment to end the point after “investment”, so that it would read “continue to undertake research and analysis on the intersection of FPRW and trade and investment;”.
- 765. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed and withdrew those subamendments.
- 766. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, agreed and withdrew their subamendment.
- 767. Amendment A.123 was adopted as subamended.
- 768. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced another amendment (A.125) to insert a new clause after point 19(h), to read “continue to undertake research and data collection on workplace-related injuries, accidents, illnesses and deaths, and undertake research on new occupational health and safety risks, including psychosocial risks;”. In light of the recent recognition of occupational safety and health as one of the FPRW, it was important to reflect it as an additional action point under the research agenda. The Office report referred to a lack of reliable data in relation to national recording and notification systems on workplace-related injuries, accidents, illnesses and deaths in many countries, and the 2023 recurrent discussion on labour protection had also called for more data on emerging occupational safety and health risks linked to digitalization. Moreover, there were new exacerbated risks due to climate, heat stress and mental health at work.
- 769. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed with the concept but questioned the need to include “continue to undertake” on research that was already being carried out. Moreover, he did not see the value in calling out psychosocial risks and proposed a subamendment to delete “including psychosocial risks”.
- 770. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed a subamendment to replace “illnesses” with “diseases”, as it was the more usual wording, and to delete the word “new” before “occupational health and safety”, as many risks had been around for a long time, including psychosocial risks. He echoed the Employers’ question over the need to call out “psychosocial risks”.
- 771. The Employer Vice-Chairperson sought the Office’s clarification as to whether research was already under way on occupational safety and health risks and, if so, he proposed a subamendment to delete the second “undertake research”, so that the text would read “continue to undertake research and data collection on workplace-related injuries, accidents, diseases and deaths, and on occupational health and safety risks”.

- 772. The Representative of the Secretary-General said that research on occupational safety and health risks was under way, including in cooperation with the WHO. There were significant changes in the way work was organized, including use of new technology, which created new occupational hazards and risks; it was a constant process of learning and adjustment. Using a qualifier such as “emerging” or similar could be useful to refer to the fact that there were new risks or risks that were acquiring growing visibility in light of constant adjustments occurring in the organization of production and the implications for the organization of work arising from the increased use of technology, heat stress and climate change.
- 773. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that he was flexible on including a qualifier for occupational safety and health risks, if there was support to do so, and suggested “evolving”, for example. He proposed a further subamendment to replace “deaths” with “fatalities”.
- 774. The Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed to the subamendment proposed by the EU Member States to replace “illnesses” with “diseases” and to the subamendment proposed by the Employers to replace “deaths” with “fatalities”. He also agreed to delete the second “undertake research”, given that the research was already under way. He wished to retain “new” and “including psychosocial risks” because the issue should be specifically addressed in the context of FPRW.
- 775. The Government member of Sierra Leone supported the subamendments to replace “illnesses” with “diseases” and “deaths” with “fatalities”, and to delete the second “undertake research”, as well as to delete “including” before “psychosocial risks”. He agreed with the Workers that it was important to reference newly emerging workplace risks but proposed a subamendment to replace “new” with “emerging” and to replace “risks” with “hazards and their associated risks”. The Government member of Senegal seconded the subamendment.
- 776. The Representative of the Secretary-General suggested that it was better not to replace “risks” with “hazards and risks”, as hazards were not emerging; rather, were defined within four categories (biological, economic, physical and chemical).
- 777. The Government member of Sierra Leone agreed to remove from his subamendment the replacement of “risks” with “hazards and their associated risks”.
- 778. The Government member of Mexico, speaking in his national capacity and also on behalf of Brazil, supported the subamendment to replace “illnesses” with “diseases” but did not support the subamendment to replace “deaths” with “fatalities”, arguing that the term fatality was associated only with accidents. He also preferred to retain the reference to psychosocial risks, as the COVID-19 pandemic had generated an increase in those risks.
- 779. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that the Workers were flexible on the terms “deaths” or “fatalities” but wished to retain “including psychosocial risks”, given that work-related diseases were increasing and psychosocial risks played a significant role in that trend.
- 780. The Employer Vice-Chairperson reiterated that the Employers preferred “fatalities” to “deaths”, as it was the term normally used in the context of occupational safety and health risks, and that there was no added value in including psychosocial risks. However, in the interests of reaching consensus, the Employers could agree to the language.
- 781. The Government member of Sierra Leone agreed with the Employers that “fatalities” was the most appropriate term in the context of occupational safety and health.
- 782. The Government member of Mexico, speaking in his national capacity and also on behalf of Brazil, said that, for the sake of consensus, they could accept “fatalities”.
- 783. Amendment A.125 was adopted as subamended.

- 784. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an additional amendment (A.124) to insert a new clause after point 19(h), to read “in the context of the ILO Social Dialogue Flagship Report, undertake research and collect good practices on the role of social dialogue, including collective bargaining, and on addressing challenges related to the enjoyment of FPRW, including on just transition and transnational social dialogue;”. Given the value added of the ILO’s Social Dialogue Flagship Report series, coupled with the importance of social dialogue, and especially of collective bargaining, highlighted in the 2023 resolution concerning a just transition towards environmentally sustainable economies and societies for all, the proposed new point would be helpful in identifying how the social partners could address new and emerging phenomena in the world of work related to the enjoyment of FRPW.
- 785. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that, in his view, the point was a superfluous call for research. As a compromise, he proposed a subamendment to delete the last clause of the sentence “, including on just transition and transnational social dialogue”, especially given the divergent established viewpoints between the social partners on transnational social dialogue.
- 786. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government member of the United States supported the amendment proposed by the Workers and were flexible regarding the Employers’ subamendment.
- 787. The Government member of the United States supported the ILO Social Dialogue Flagship Report and appreciated the additional focus on collective bargaining. Her Government could be flexible on the wording.
- 788. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that some of the issues related to a just transition were transnational, not just national. Moreover, he cited the 2018 conclusions concerning the second recurrent discussion on social dialogue and tripartism, in which Members had been called on “to provide an enabling environment for and promote, where appropriate, cross-border social dialogue to foster decent work, including for vulnerable groups of workers in global supply chains”, and to “play a stronger role in an international context, in particular through cross-border social dialogue based on knowledge and research provided by the ILO”. Thus, there had been a direct request for research to be provided by the ILO.
- 789. The Employer Vice-Chairperson insisted that the Employers would not support the language on transnational social dialogue in the text.
- 790. The Worker Vice-Chairperson tabled a subamendment to his group’s amendment (A.124) for a new point following point 19(h), to insert the word “effective” before “social dialogue” and to replace the phrase “including collective bargaining, and on addressing challenges related to the enjoyment of FPRW, including on just transition and transnational social dialogue” with “in addressing challenges related to FPRW in support to the five thematic priorities.” Social dialogue had many aspects, of which only one was collective bargaining.
- 791. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to replace “support to” with “support of”.
- 792. The Chairperson noted the broad support of the government benches for the amendment as subamended.
- 793. The amendment (A.124) was adopted as subamended.
- 794. The new point to be inserted after point 19(h) was adopted.

Point 19(i)

- 795. Point 19(i) was adopted.

First new point after point 19(i)

- 796. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.72) to insert a new clause after point 19(i), to read “undertake peer-reviewed and scientifically rigorous research on the economic and social impact of informality, and in particular its impact on the realization of fundamental principles and rights at work;”. Informality played a significant role in impeding progress on realization of FPRW, thus the Employers’ proposal was for the ILO to undertake peer-reviewed research on the role of informality and link it to FPRW.
- 797. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the Employers’ amendment but proposed a subamendment to replace “fundamental principles and rights at work” with the acronym “FPRW”.
- 798. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, supported the amendment as subamended by the Workers, and proposed a further subamendment to remove “peer-reviewed and scientifically rigorous research”; it was recognized that the Office undertook quality research and the phrase was not used in the other parts of the research agenda, thus it was not needed.
- 799. The Government members of the United States and Gabon supported the subamendment.
- 800. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed to the subamendments proposed by the Workers and the EU Member States.
- 801. Amendment A.72 was adopted as subamended.
- 802. The first new point after point 19(i) was adopted.

Second new point after point 19(i)

- 803. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.74) to insert a new point after point 19(i), to read “action-oriented research on best practices to integrate respect for FPRW into the business of MSMEs and newly formalized enterprises, including through greater synergies between the work on FPRW and the SCORE programme;”. Noting the extent of the FPRW implementation gap, particularly with enterprises, including MSMEs, transitioning to the formal economy, he highlighted the need to identify good practices, in addition to academic research, with a focus on how to integrate respect for FPRW, including through greater synergies between the ILO SCORE Programme and the Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work Branch.
- 804. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 805. The Government member of the United Kingdom supported the amendment but proposed a subamendment to insert the word “undertake” before “action-oriented research”, which was seconded by the Government member of Canada.
- 806. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Sierra Leone and Mexico supported the amendment as subamended by the United Kingdom.
- 807. Amendment A.74 was adopted as subamended.
- 808. The second new point after point 19(i) was adopted.

Third new point after point 19(i)

- 809. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.122) to insert a new point after point 19(i), to read “undertake research and impact assessments on the challenges and opportunities of digitalization, including artificial intelligence and algorithmic management, in relation to FPRW, in line with the 2023 Conclusions on labour protection;”. Referring to paragraph 21 of the Office report on digitalization of work and its impact on FPRW, he argued that it would be appropriate to request the Office to carry out specific research into the challenges and opportunities posed by digitalization in order to inform constituent choices. Algorithmic management had been included as it was related the new FPRW on occupational safety and health.

- 810. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed that digitalization and the digital economy would be a new priority and was clearly linked to FPRW but proposed a subamendment to delete “including artificial intelligence and algorithmic management” and “, in line with the 2023 Conclusions on labour protection”, as they were superfluous. Research was already under way in that area. Moreover, there was no reference to “algorithmic management” in the Office report and the Worker Vice-Chairperson had not explained what it meant; it was likely to be a term more appropriate for the standard-setting discussion in 2025.
- 811. The Worker Vice-Chairperson clarified that “algorithmic management” was the strategic tracking, evaluating and managing of workers through algorithms. It was not something the Workers could accept without having more research and knowledge; humans must always be in control of human resources and management.
- 812. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that his Worker counterpart had confirmed the Employers’ point that before using such terms there was a need to defer to the work to be undertaken in the standard-setting discussion in 2025.
- 813. The Government member of the United States supported the Workers’ amendment but did not support the Employers’ subamendment. It would be helpful to specify the particular research, but not limit it to that, and to highlight those two areas as being of specific interest. The research would be useful in the field of labour protection, and it would be helpful in the broader context of FPRW to make the cross-linkages between the two recurrent discussions.
- 814. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and China supported the amendment and expressed flexibility on the wording.
- 815. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, stressed the importance of retaining the reference to artificial intelligence, given the rapid technological changes worldwide, but could be flexible on the wording of the rest of the sentence.
- 816. The Government member of the United Kingdom supported the amendment, as subamended by the Employers, but could be flexible on the final wording.
- 817. The Government member of Canada preferred the original text of the Workers’ amendment, as her Government deemed algorithmic management to be a key element of labour protection.
- 818. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the Employers could support language referencing artificial intelligence in relation to FPRW.
- 819. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that the Workers could agree to deleting the reference to algorithmic management but would like to maintain “, in line with the 2023 Conclusions on labour protection”.
- 820. The Employer Vice-Chairperson sought clarification on the value added of including the reference.

- 821. The Worker Vice-Chairperson cited paragraph 24(g) of the 2023 Conclusions on labour protection, in which the Organization was called on to “intensify knowledge development and capacity-building activities, particularly in relation to an impact assessment and awareness on the challenges and opportunities of digitalization, including artificial intelligence and algorithmic management”. Thus, it was a document already agreed on, in which artificial intelligence and algorithmic management were specifically addressed.
- 822. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that, in view of the clarification, he would not object to the reference to the 2023 Conclusions on labour protection.
- 823. Amendment A.122 was adopted as subamended.
- 824. The third new point to be inserted after point 19(i) was adopted.

Point 19(j)

- 825. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to his group’s amendment (A.121) to replace the text, to read “conduct targeted capacity-building for workers’ and employers’ organizations with regard to all five FPRW, with a focus on retaining and expanding membership, providing services and engaging in effective social dialogue”.
- 826. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Türkiye supported the amendment as subamended.
- 827. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, also supported the Workers’ amendment as subamended and withdrew their amendment (A.117), on the understanding that “expanding membership” included specific attention to vulnerable workers.
- 828. The Worker Vice-Chairperson confirmed that expansion of membership particularly aimed at covering vulnerable workers.
- 829. The Government member of Cuba also supported the amendment as subamended. He sought clarification from the Office as to whether the language of the original amendment was more neutral, and that the amendment could be interpreted as an interference; he therefore sought clarification from the Office.
- 830. The Representative of the Secretary-General explained that the point was partly linked to the regular Office activities to ensure the promotion and respect of fundamental rights. In the point in question, it referred to the training activities provided by the Office aimed at ensuring the promotion and respect of FPRW for workers’ and employers’ organizations and could not be construed as government or State interference. The International Training Centre of the ILO (ITC-ILO) organized the training activities, including capacity-building for trade union organizations and other programmes for employers’ organizations.
- 831. The Government member of the United States, noting that the Office could play an important role in strengthening the capacity of independent employers’ and workers’ organizations, deferred to the Workers and Employers the decision on the best wording.
- 832. The Government member of Sierra Leone said that workers and employers had a right to join, or not join, unions, which had an obligation to serve their memberships. Growth in membership would depend on the quality and effectiveness of the services provided. It therefore might be better for a focus on service provision and engaging in effective dialogue, rather than on retaining and expanding membership.

- 833. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that quality services and social dialogue, and the overall demonstration of effectiveness and capacity were the best way to attract and retain membership but, with an increase in membership and the associated systemic and organizational challenges, Office support for capacity-building was needed to help member organizations to adapt to changes in membership.
- 834. The Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported the amendment as subamended.
- 835. Amendment A.121 was adopted as subamended.
- 836. Amendments A.87, A.184, A.117 and A.76 fell as a consequence.
- 837. Point 19(j) was adopted as amended.

Subheading

- 838. The subheading “Strengthening capacity and knowledge-sharing” before point 19(k) was adopted.

Point 19(k)

- 839. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, proposed an amendment (A.185) to delete “and all other national authorities” and to insert “tripartite” before “constituents”, to reflect the structure of the Organization. Since all constituents were tripartite, there was no need to mention specifically “all other national authorities”.
- 840. The Worker Vice-Chairperson requested clarification from the Office on whether national authorities were considered part of Member States.
- 841. The Representative of the Secretary-General clarified that the reference to “all other national authorities” was to reflect that it was not only labour administrations that could deal with issues, such as some of the structural causes, impeding the realization of FPRW but that there was a need for other entities and a whole-of-government approach. The term “constituents” covered the tripartite constituents of governments and employers’ and workers’ organizations, and national authorities (namely the governments) were part of the constituents.
- 842. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, in light of the clarification, proposed a subamendment to replace “constituents, and all other national authorities,” with “the tripartite constituents and relevant national authorities”.
- 843. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that any relevant national authority would be within a tripartite constituent as part of the government. He questioned how authorities that were not part of the government, and thus not part of the constituents, would fall within the ILO's purview.
- 844. The Representative of the Secretary-General said that, for the ILO to deal with the structural issues and to ensure policy coherence and that the different streams of work converged and did not neutralize each other, it must deal with the whole range of ministries and national authorities that belonged to the various powers covering different areas, such as industrial policies, technological development, economic matters and planning, and whose action had a major bearing on the respect and realization of FPRW.
- 845. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to delete the word “other” because employers’ and workers’ organizations were not national authorities.

- 846. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, withdrew their amendment (A.185) in light of the discussion.
- 847. The Government member of Switzerland proposed an amendment (A.88) tabled by Canada and Switzerland to insert the word “relevant” before “national authorities”, as the original phrase “all other national authorities” was too broad. He proposed a further subamendment to delete the word “other”.
- 848. The Worker Vice-Chairperson seconded the subamendment to delete “other” and supported the amendment as subamended.
- 849. The Employer Vice-Chairperson indicated his flexibility with regard to the language used.
- 850. The Government member of the United States preferred the word “other” to be included, otherwise it would imply that labour administrations were not relevant national authorities. She proposed a subamendment to read “and other relevant national authorities”, which was seconded by the Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group and several other governments.
- 851. Amendment A.88 was adopted as subamended.
- 852. Point 19(k) was adopted as amended.

Move point 19(j) after point 19(k)

- 853. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment (A.73) to move point 19(j) after point 19(k) to bring the text regarding strengthening the capacity of organizations under the subheading “Strengthening capacity and knowledge-sharing” rather than under “Enhanced research and capacity”.
- 854. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the governments agreed.
- 855. The amendment was adopted.

Insert a new point after point 19(k)

- 856. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, in view of the agreements reached on the capacity-building clauses, withdrew an amendment (A.77) to insert a new point after point 19(k), to read “conduct capacity-building to support policy, legal and institutional frameworks to address root causes of FPRW deficits at the country level, with due attention to measures to tackle informality and build the capacity of labour inspectorates for that purpose;”.

Point 19(l)

- 857. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment (A.79) to include “and constituents” between the words “enterprises” and “in their efforts”. Workers’ organizations were the second largest users of the ILO Helpdesk for Business on International Labour Standards and it was too limiting to say that it was “an important vehicle for assisting enterprises”.
- 858. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the United States and numerous other government members supported the amendment.
- 859. The Government member of Gabon, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, proposed a subamendment to insert “tripartite” before “constituents”.
- 860. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed to the subamendment.

- 861. Amendment A.79 was adopted as subamended.
- 862. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment (A.80) to include “principles of the” before “ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy and the United Nations Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights” to reflect that it was the principles being promoted through the work of the Helpdesk for Business.
- 863. The Worker Vice-Chairperson preferred to retain the original wording of the Office text because the MNE Declaration was much broader in scope than some of the principles.
- 864. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the United States preferred the original text, without the amendment in question.
- 865. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew amendment A.80.
- 866. Point 19(I) was adopted as amended.

Insert a new point after point 19(I)

- 867. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment (A.81) to insert a new point after point 19(I), to read “strengthen the ILO Global Business Network on Forced Labour, the ILO Global Business and Disability Network and the Child Labour Platform and seek new ways to streamline funding channels;”. They were ongoing initiatives under the Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work Branch that had experienced bureaucratic challenges to enable funding from outside sources to support their work.
- 868. The Worker Vice-Chairperson considered the amendment to be redundant, as the activities had already been addressed under the subheading “Policy coherence and partnerships”.
- 869. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the paragraph actually dealt with synergies and interactions between the entities within the Organization, referring to the benefits to strengthening them by streamlining their funding to make them more effective. There could be benefits to seeking to strengthen the networks and platform and in particular through streamlining funding to make the initiatives more effective, which came primarily under extrabudgetary funding.
- 870. The Worker Vice-Chairperson could not support the amendment as there were many other business initiatives for which the Workers would like to streamline funding.
- 871. The Employer Vice-Chairperson clarified that the Child Labour Platform was not a business initiative and involved workers and employers; it had experienced the same funding challenges as the other networks.
- 872. The Government member of the United States requested clarification on the meaning of “streamline funding channels”.
- 873. The Deputy Representative of the Secretary-General said that the Child Labour Platform and the ILO Global Business Network on Forced Labour had a different type of governance mechanism but the same type of funding mechanism, created to provide a platform for the exchange of experiences between businesses. One challenge was the increasing number of requests from enterprises and multinationals and the need to ensure the sustainability of the services provided by both platforms, given their funding based on annual membership fees. Another issue was the way the funding needed to be managed by the Office.
- 874. The Employer Vice-Chairperson added that there were often significant steps to complete that could take several months or more to allow an interested party seeking to fund activities to be able to do so. There were also challenges with some government funding mechanisms that applied to those initiatives. The amendment sought to address procedural barriers to enabling the networks to be funded robustly.

- 875. The Worker Vice-Chairperson disagreed on calling out specific issues of funding; they should be taken up in the programme and budget.
- 876. The Employer Vice-Chairperson had not expected resistance to proposing minor steps to make existing initiatives more sustainable and effective. The three initiatives in question were encountering particular funding issues but had the potential to have impact with very little effort. He proposed a subamendment to his group's amendment (A.81), to read "Strengthen the ILO Global Business Network on Forced Labour, the ILO Global Business and Disability Network and the Child Labour Platform and seek ways to ensure their sustainability;".
- 877. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment as subamended.
- 878. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, as well as the Government members of Cuba, Mexico and the United States supported the amendment as subamended.
- 879. Amendment A.81 was adopted as subamended.
- 880. The new point to be inserted after point 19(l) was adopted.

Point 19(m)

- 881. Point 19(m) was adopted.

Point 19(n)

- 882. Point 19(n) was adopted.

Subheading

- 883. The subheading before point 19(o) "Policy coherence and partnerships" was adopted.

Point 19(o)

Chapeau to point 19(o)

- 884. The chapeau of point 19(o) was adopted.

Point 19(o)(i)

- 885. Point 19 (o)(i) was adopted.

Point 19(o)(ii)

- 886. The Government member of China submitted an amendment (A.12) to delete point 19(o)(ii). While he could accept the Office undertaking research on the intersection between trade and FPRW, the proposal had serious implications. He noted that there were divergent views within the Committee regarding linkages between FPRW and trade and investment policy agreements.
- 887. The amendment was seconded by the Government member of Cuba.
- 888. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that the impact of trade on FPRW had been highlighted during the discussion. There was a need to create safeguards to prevent such practices as social dumping. Increasing numbers of trade agreements included labour clauses. Further engagement by the Office to bring FPRW into trade agreements would be useful.

- 889. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that his group was aligned with the Workers' group on this issue.
- 890. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States supported the position taken by the Workers and Employers.
- 891. The Government member of China withdrew amendment A.12.
- 892. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.120) to add the words ", including through strengthened engagement with the World Trade Organization and other relevant institutions;" after the words "policies and agreements". Labour rights were already integrated into the work of the WTO, in that the 1998 Declaration applied to ILO Member States that were members of the WTO. The Workers' group felt that the ILO should reinforce its relationship with the WTO in order to promote FPRW. The two organizations should work together to ensure countries abided by their obligations under ILO standards.
- 893. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the text as subamended by the Workers.
- 894. The Government member of China considered the wording "and other relevant institutions" to be ambiguous and put forward a subamendment to delete it.
- 895. The subamendment was seconded by Cameroon.
- 896. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed to that deletion.
- 897. The Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania supported the text as subamended.
- 898. The amendment (A.120) was adopted as subamended.
- 899. Point 19(o)(ii) was adopted as amended.

Point 19(o)(iii)

- 900. Point 19(o)(iii) was adopted.

New point to be inserted after point 19(o)(iii)

- 901. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group's amendment (A.119) to insert a new point after point 19(o)(iii).

Point 19(p)

Chapeau to point 19(p)

- 902. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, tabled an amendment (A.118) to add a comma between the words "Social Justice" and "and leverage". Without that comma, the clause centred the proposed action solely on the work carried out through the Global Coalition for Social Justice, and not through other possible channels.
- 903. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 904. Amendment A.118 was adopted.
- 905. Point 19(p) was adopted as amended.

Point 19(p)(i)

906. Point 19(p)(i) was adopted.

Point 19(p)(ii)

907. Point 19(p)(ii) was adopted.

Point 19(p)(iii)

908. Point 19(p)(iii) was adopted.

Point 19(p)(iv)

909. Point 19(p)(iv) was adopted.

Subheading

910. The subheading "Planning, mobilization and allocation of resources and development cooperation" before point 19(q) was adopted.

Point 19(q)

911. Point 19(q) was adopted.

Point 19(r)

912. The Government member of China tabled an amendment (A.13) to remove the words "and guidance" from point 19(r). He did not feel that the ILO could provide guidance to Member States in relation to mobilizing domestic resources.

913. The Government member of Cameroon seconded the amendment.

914. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that there had been extensive discussion in the Drafting Group on this point. His group wished to maintain the original wording.

915. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that "guidance" was not synonymous with "direction". He proposed a subamendment to replace "capacity and guidance" with "support".

916. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that there could be instances where guidance was needed and requested by Member States. It would therefore be prudent to retain the original wording. However, he understood that "support" could encompass both guidance and support.

917. The Government member of China asked the Secretariat to clarify what guidance from the Office might entail.

918. The Representative of the Secretary-General said that the Office could provide comprehensive guidance, information on how other countries had implemented domestic resource mobilization strategies, support in developing such strategies, comparative analysis, and identification of the most effective strategies to assist governments. It did not imply imposition.

919. The Government member of China agreed with the Employers' subamendment.

920. The amendment (A.13) was adopted as subamended.

921. Point 19(r) was adopted as amended.

Point 19(s)

922. Point 19(s) was adopted.

Point 19(t)

923. Point 19(t) was adopted.

Point 19(u)

924. Point 19(u) was adopted.

New point to be inserted after point 19(u)

925. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group's amendments (A.86 and A.85) to insert a new point after point 19(u).

Point 19(v)

926. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced his group's amendment (A.84) to point 19(v). While the original amendment had been to delete point 19(v), the group wished to table a subamendment to replace the original text, to read "Follow through on the 2017 direction to develop a plan of action for resource mobilization to support projects around target 8.8 of the Sustainable Development Goals to protect labour rights with a focus on freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right of collective bargaining".

927. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment replacing the word "direction" with "FPRW conclusions".

928. The Employer Vice-Chairperson suggested that a more correct wording would be "follow through on the 2017 FPRW resolution's direction to [...]".

929. The Government members of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, China, the United Kingdom and the United States supported the subamendment.

930. The amendment (A.84) was adopted as subamended.

931. The Government members of China and Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, withdrew their identical amendments (A.14 and A.186 respectively) to point 19(v), as they supported the wording provided by the previous amendment to that point.

932. Point 19(v) was adopted as amended.

933. Point 19 in its entirety was adopted as amended.

Adoption of the Committee's draft conclusions

934. The draft conclusions of the Committee on the third recurrent discussion on fundamental principles and rights at work were adopted in their entirety.

Consideration of the draft resolution

935. The Committee considered the text of the draft resolution that would operationalize its conclusions.

936. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to the draft resolution to insert a comma after the words "for their attention" in point 3(b), followed by the words "including in the context of the Second World Summit for Social Development;".

- 937. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported that amendment, which replaced missing wording that had been in a previous draft.
- 938. There was broad support for the amendment from the government benches.
- 939. The draft resolution concerning the third recurrent discussion on fundamental principles and rights at work was adopted as amended.

President: Mr Buzu

Outcome of the work of the Recurrent Discussion Committee on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work: Presentation and discussion

The President

We will now proceed with the presentation and discussion of the outcomes of the work of the Recurrent Discussion Committee on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work. The text of the proposed resolution, which contains the Committee's conclusions, can be found in Record of Proceedings No. 7A. The report on the Committee's proceedings is contained in Record of Proceedings No. 7B.

I am pleased to welcome the Officers of the Committee and its Reporter, namely: Ms Fuentes Julio (Chile), Chairperson; Mr Mackall (United States of America), Employer Vice-Chairperson; and Mr Norddahl (Iceland), Worker Vice-Chairperson; as well as Ms Angonemane Mvondo (Cameroon), Reporter.

I now give the floor to Ms Angonemane Mvondo, so that she may present to us the outcome of the Committee's work. The Officers of the Committee will then take the floor.

Ms Angonemane Mvondo

Reporter of the Recurrent Discussion Committee on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work
(Original French)

It is an honour for me to take the floor today to present to this august assembly the outcome of the work of the Recurrent Discussion Committee on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work. Please allow me at the outset to thank the Africa group and, above all, its coordinator, for having chosen my country, Cameroon, and myself for this role. May I express Cameroon's deep gratitude to them.

I would also like to thank Ms Fuentes Julio for the remarkable way in which she steered the work of the Committee. Thanks to her human qualities, particularly her sense of humour, she made sure that nobody in the Committee felt excluded from its work. Her passion to achieve results enabled us to achieve conclusions which we can all support.

I would also like to applaud the contribution of the two Vice-Chairpersons, Mr Mackall, Employer member from the United States of America, and Mr Norddahl, Worker member from Iceland. Their wisdom, experience and skills, and the efforts made by both them and their teams to find common ground, made it possible to resolve situations that seemed to be leading to an impasse and played a key role in the successful completion of our Committee's work. I would also like to thank all the members of the Government group. They demonstrated impressive teamwork and commitment.

I cannot conclude my words of thanks without expressing the Committee's gratitude to the members of the Secretariat of the International Labour Organization. A tremendous team, in particular the précis-writers, editors, translators and interpreters, who I thank for their important work and who have helped us in the difficult task of summarizing the discussions of the Committee and faithfully reporting on the proceedings, facilitating many important exchanges that took place within our Committee.

The Committee held 12 sittings, during which, from Monday to Wednesday, working until late at night, it considered more than 160 amendments. While the tentative plan of work only allowed for very few extensions beyond 9.30 p.m., the plenary sittings and the drafting group meetings finished before 10 p.m. only once, on Tuesday, 4 June. Despite these demanding working hours, the members of the Committee never tired in their work. Quite the contrary. They stayed at their posts, showing great diligence, following the work of the Committee and making individual contributions to the work of their group.

Our discussions were sometimes technical, long and complex, and sometimes sensitive, in view of the different perspectives held. Fortunately, the spirit of dialogue, respect and consensus shown by each delegate prevailed at every stage of our work and this was clearly driven by a shared sense of the importance of our task, namely that of promoting the fundamental principles and rights at work, both for each of us individually and for our societies as a whole.

My intention this morning is not to present a detailed report on the work of the Committee. That is the purpose of the report. I will therefore limit myself to emphasizing the profound spirit of collaboration, sacrifice and above all respect and mutual understanding that inspired all our deliberations, both on points of detail and on sensitive issues.

The message of hope coming from our conclusions is not something that occurred by chance. It reflects the capability of the tripartite spirit to achieve something remarkable, as well as the importance that the tripartite constituents give to respect for the fundamental principles and for human rights at work.

Our conclusions thus mark both a break from and a sense of continuity with preceding recurrent discussions, in view of the challenges we now face. A break, because the conclusions are focused on identifying underlying causes and have produced guidelines for the tripartite constituents. A sense of continuity, because the conclusions build a bridge between two world summits: the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen in 1995, and the other, which is to be held next year. The set of conclusions we have developed thus provide a solid basis for the activities to promote the fundamental principles and rights at work that will be undertaken by the tripartite constituents over the coming years with the support provided to them by the Office.

We have all been enriched by this experience. We will leave with a clearer vision of the path ahead. I sincerely hope that you will return home inspired by our work and that we will all be able to work together in the future in order to move forward on the path we have just charted for ourselves.

Lastly, I would like to thank the Committee for giving me the opportunity to speak on its behalf and I invite the Conference to adopt the outcome of its work.

Mr Mackall

Employer Vice-Chairperson of the Recurrent Discussion Committee on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work

The Employers' group is pleased to present the proposed resolution and conclusions for adoption. We must first share, however, our gratitude to the Chairperson, Ms Fuentes Julio, for her inclusive and effective leadership and her continuing and timely sense of humour amidst the work; to my Worker counterpart, Mr Norddahl, my friend Magnus, for advocating strongly, but respectfully and constructively; to our Government colleagues, whose commitments were clear and who worked tirelessly to help resolve differences through consensus; and to the Office, the Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work Branch, the technical team, and the interpreters, who ensured a smooth operation with little noise, which enabled us to focus on the work at hand. Finally, I would like to thank my Employer colleagues, whose work, commitment and support, even into the wee hours of the morning, provided the energy to see the discussions through to a successful close.

From the very opening of this session of the International Labour Conference, all parties acknowledged the importance of the outcome of this discussion. Presumably, the next recurrent discussion will not occur for another seven years. More critically, fundamental principles and rights at work (FPRW) are at the heart of the values and work of this house, and governments, employers and workers alike see them as enabling the conditions necessary for the full realization of the ILO's strategic objectives. In short, this outcome does matter. These principles are universally recognized human rights that are inseparable, indivisible, interrelated and mutually reinforcing. Applicable to workers and employers alike, they all stand on an equal footing, not in a hierarchy of value or causation.

Coming into the discussion, we all appeared to agree that, despite ongoing commitments to FPRW, tremendous work at the ILO and at the national level, and very significant progress since the last recurrent discussion in 2017, significant implementation gaps remained. Ratifying Conventions and pledging commitments to respect, promote and realize FPRW is one thing; implementing those commitments is something else. In our discussions, most constituents shared the view that paying greater attention to the root causes of implementation failures is crucial. There was broad recognition of the critical importance of developing the capacities of governments and social partners, of strengthening governance, of addressing the persistence of informality, and of supporting social dialogue. The Employers' group also argued that creating an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises is essential for ensuring inclusive growth and economic development, providing people with avenues into the formal economy and out of poverty, and promoting the full realization of FPRW. Finally, there was agreement that the ILO's actions should be focused on supporting constituents, especially governments.

We would like to draw particular attention to the call to address informality. Informality remains one of the major obstacles to progress in the respect, promotion and realization of FPRW. Informality impedes both workers and employers from fully benefiting from FPRW. Informal enterprises, particularly micro, small and medium-sized enterprises (MSMEs), are faced with low productivity and a lack of access to finance. Governments are directly affected by informality, as it translates into lower economic growth and development and is a critical barrier to a sustainable social protection system. The outcome document calls on States to "take necessary steps to reduce informality in line with the ILO Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204)".

We welcome the reaffirmation of the key role of sustainable enterprises. The conclusions fully align with the ILO Centenary Declaration for the Future of Work, which recognized sustainable enterprises as key generators of employment and promoters of innovation and decent work. An adequate enabling environment for sustainable enterprises encourages productivity growth, decent work and the promotion and respect of FPRW. This is especially true for MSMEs, which are the backbone of our economies. The conclusions strongly reaffirm the essential, mutually reinforcing link between sustainable enterprises and FPRW, and call for due attention and support to be given to MSMEs.

We also welcome the fact that the ILO's priority actions include enhancing the potential of the annual follow-up to the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work (1998), as amended in 2022; examining the nature, causes and consequences, and the social and economic impacts of FPRW deficits at the country and global levels; and undertaking research into the economic and social impacts of informality on the realization of FPRW. Moreover, we support the undertaking of research on best practices for the integration of FPRW into the business of MSMEs and newly formalized enterprises, including through greater synergies between the work on FPRW and the Sustaining Competitive and Responsible Enterprises (SCORE) programme.

As our Reporter said, I do not wish to go through the terms of the document in greater detail. I hope that you will all read it and take to heart and recognize how it has embraced the viewpoints expressed so forcefully by the constituents in the room. We are pleased to have reached an agreement that will guide the Office's work for the coming years. The conclusions specifically state that the Office should update its integrated strategy on FPRW to balance action across all five FPRW categories and address gaps in implementation, while ensuring that the ILO continues to be responsive to the needs of constituents.

Mr Norddahl

Worker Vice-Chairperson of the Recurrent Discussion Committee on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work

The recurrent discussion is an important one, where we address both our success and what we could have done better, whether as the ILO, as Governments or as social partners. This year we dedicated this Committee to the discussion of fundamental principles and rights at work. I will not deny that it has been a week of very intense and spirited debates, and frankly sometimes quite difficult ones. But at the end of the day, there was a collective will to reach consensus on the conclusions.

From the perspective of the Workers' group, we believe that the final conclusions are balanced. They set out a clear path for the work that we, as constituents, as well as the Office, need to do in order to realize fully the fundamental principles and rights at work for all workers of the world, irrespective of their employment relationship. The debates that we had acknowledge that the world is currently undergoing a number of transformations that are affecting the capacity of workers to build and to enjoy fully their fundamental rights: their rights against forced labour, child labour and discrimination, as well as their rights to freedom of association, collective bargaining and a safe and healthy working environment.

Allow me to recall a number of developments and challenges that grounded our discussions. First, the pervasiveness of the informal economy is posing a major challenge to the enjoyment of fundamental principles and rights at work. Around 60 per cent of the global workforce continues to make a living through informal work. These workers are often excluded from labour laws and associated protections and rights. Technological changes and the rise of the digital economy, and accompanying developments such as the rise of digital platforms and employment misclassification, are contributing to workers' insecurity and are threatening the enjoyment of workers' fundamental rights. These include the right to organize and to join a trade union, as well as the right to negotiate improvements to working conditions in collective agreements.

The prevalence of global supply chains is continuing to facilitate social dumping, as companies and countries compete on the basis of low wages, a lack of protection and low labour costs, with business accountability compromised through an attenuated chain of responsibility. The global trading system is further putting downward pressure on labour standards and is constraining the policy space of governments to regulate sufficiently in favour of the adequate protection of labour rights. The world at work is, at the same time, affected by multiple crises, including armed conflict and disasters, as well as climate change. These trends are creating new and emerging risks, including in relation to occupational safety and health, such as heat stress.

Within our discussion, the constituents reaffirmed their commitment to protect, respect and realize the fundamental principles and rights at work. These principles and rights at work are the heart of all of our work. It was agreed that governments will engage in tripartite social dialogue and take action to consolidate the progress made, stop reversals and address regulatory and implementation gaps. They will also seize the momentum generated by the recognition of a safe and healthy working environment as a fundamental principle and right at work to strengthen national laws and practices on occupational safety and health. They will also take the necessary steps to reduce informality in line with the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204), and they will effectively incorporate the fundamental principles into a just transition.

We moreover reached an agreement that the ILO's work in the coming years in relation to the principles will pay due attention to the ongoing challenges. This work will be focused on five thematic areas: informal economies; enterprises and supply chains; crisis and fragility; and the two new ones, just transition and the digital economy. The relevance of the ten fundamental Conventions, as well as of the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, was reaffirmed. That being said, major ratification gaps remain; major violations of fundamental rights have been observed around the world; and the work of the Office must seek to address these gaps. We are pleased that, as a result of our discussions, the Office will intensify efforts for universal ratification of the core Conventions and a specific campaign will focus on those least ratified Conventions.

In this respect, I would like to emphasize that, given the recent recognition of occupational safety and health as a fundamental right, now is the time to seize the moment to advance ratification of the related Conventions.

We also look forward to the Office's promotion of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), which still have major ratification gaps compared to most other core Conventions. Major violations of these two Conventions have been observed, including this week by the Committee on the Application of Standards, and those violations call for effective responses from all countries. Freedom of association and collective bargaining are not only fundamental rights; they are also enabling rights, as has been confirmed time and time again. They allow for the enjoyment of all four other fundamental principles and rights at work, as well as the five strategic objectives of the ILO's Decent Work Agenda. The enabling character of these rights was well reflected in the discussion and in the conclusions, and the Governments agreed to pay particular attention to the enjoyment of these rights going forward.

Within our discussion, it was also evident that we need greater policy coherence, both at the national level and internationally, to enable the true enjoyment of the fundamental rights. We reached an agreement that the Office will make better use of the information gathered in the annual follow-up to the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work (1998), as amended in 2022, and will increase synergies among the ILO supervisory bodies, development cooperation, technical assistance and research, including by enhancing efforts to mainstream understanding of the functioning and outputs of the ILO supervisory mechanisms across the Organization.

We also reached an agreement to promote policy coherence, both internally within the ILO and internationally. Going forward, the Office will engage with a number of relevant initiatives and institutions internationally, including the World Trade Organization, to better promote adherence to the fundamental principles and rights at work.

I wish to conclude by emphasizing that realizing the fundamental principles and rights at work is a prerequisite for achieving social justice. Each of us, Governments, Employers, Workers and the Office, have important but different roles and responsibilities in this regard. These conclusions provide an important framework for defining the way forward for the constituents and for the ILO itself and, if implemented, will make a real difference to the lives of workers all around the world.

These conclusions would not have been reached without my dedicated team from the International Trade Union Confederation and the Bureau for Workers' Activities (ACTRAV), and definitely not without my Employer counterpart, Mr Mackall, a wordsmith and a pathfinder of solutions. Neither would they have been reached without our distinguished, elegant and resourceful Chairperson, Ms Fuentes Julio. Under her leadership, and with all the distinguished representatives of Governments representing all regions of the world, in its complexity and with its diverse cultures, we have shown that social dialogue works if we are dedicated enough to listen, to understand, to communicate with respect and to be true to those who have chosen us to protect and promote their interests on our path towards social justice and a peaceful world.

Ms Fuentes Julio

Chairperson of the Recurrent Discussion Committee on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work (Original Spanish)

I would like, once again, to thank all those who granted me the great honour of chairing the work of the Recurrent Discussion Committee on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work, a privilege that was even greater since I could count on the valuable support of the two Vice-Chairpersons, Mr Mackall and Mr Norddahl.

Mr Mackall impressed me with his great eloquence and elegant language, his great knowledge and his ability to find the right words to sum up accurately and concisely the ideas that were brought up during the discussions, as well as his skill in building bridges and bringing the different positions of the members together.

Mr Norddahl also impressed me, particularly with his passion for the defence of workers' rights, his great knowledge and his capability in defending the interests of his group, while not forgetting about other collective and shared interests. I would like to thank both of them and acknowledge their great skill as negotiators.

Over the last two weeks, I would have to say that the interaction between them steadily improved, and by the end I would even go so far as to say that they developed a kind of symbiosis in their work. The result is that they managed to bring together the positions that separated their respective groups and also build bridges towards the positions of the Governments. The Governments, I am proud to say, did not restrict themselves just to being the third group, but also displayed a lot of knowledge, capacity for compromise and skill in formulating and conceiving proposals. The Government group made essential contributions to the work of the drafting group and during the discussion of amendments.

I would therefore like, once again, to thank all of the groups. It was truly a great pleasure to chair the discussions and contribute to the achievement of a satisfactory outcome. I would also like to thank the members of the Secretariat who displayed excellent attitude, professionalism and determination in their work and always provided support when needed. Lastly, I would like to thank the Reporter for her efforts to ensure that the work done in our Committee has been accurately reflected. Ms Angonemane Mvondo was present not only at all of our sittings, but also at the drafting group meetings, which has meant that she has a complete overview of all our work and the progress we have made.

Allow me now to say a few words about the outcome of our Committee's work. I believe that we have achieved more than we initially expected. The conclusions stress that the fundamental principles and rights at work are more necessary and relevant than ever. They are key to human dignity, to the foundation of more just societies and to ensuring that economic and social progress advance together. They are also key to building more peaceful societies. This is vital at a time when international peace is so elusive. The conclusions reaffirm the enabling nature of the fundamental principles and rights at work in creating the conditions that are necessary for the realization of the ILO's strategic objectives.

In a context in which demographic, environmental and digital transitions, and the rise of artificial intelligence and related technologies, are transforming the world of work and creating new challenges and opportunities, it is clear that we need to pay renewed attention to the fundamental principles and rights at work and also to more robust policies and measures.

The conclusions emphasize that respect for the rule of law and democratic freedoms are prerequisites for the full realization of the fundamental principles and rights at work and that persistent inequalities, poverty and informality continue to be significant obstacles to the advancement of these principles and rights, as well as to the advancement of sustainable development and decent work.

Our Committee identified four areas on which governments should focus their attention as a priority, in consultation with representative organizations of employers and workers.

The first area of focus is strengthened governance in the labour market, since the adoption of laws on respect for fundamental principles and rights at work is essential, but not sufficient to make them a reality. Effective institutions and measures are also required to ensure compliance.

The second area is full respect for and promotion of freedom of association, trade union rights and social dialogue, including collective bargaining, in order to identify suitable, legitimate and lasting solutions to address the challenges and opportunities that may arise in a world of work that is experiencing profound transformation.

The third concerns the acceleration of measures that will facilitate transition from informality to formality and the creation of an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises, which are defined as those that respect the fundamental principles and rights at work.

The last area of focus is the promotion of equality of treatment and opportunities in employment and occupation, without any kind of discrimination and with full inclusion both in economic and social terms, and in terms of the rights of the most vulnerable groups.

Part III of the conclusions sets out a road map for the ILO, and the Office in particular, for supporting the constituents of the Organization in the adoption of suitable measures to make this vision a reality.

I would like to point out, in particular, that the Office is called on to update its integrated strategy on the fundamental principles and rights at work, using the momentum generated by the recognition of a safe and healthy work environment as the fifth fundamental principle and right at work. This update should ensure a balance between actions related to the five categories of fundamental principles and rights at work, while recognizing at the same time the particular significance of freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining to achieving the four strategic objectives.

In this respect, the Office is called on to intensify efforts to promote the universal ratification of the fundamental Conventions and the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930; to strengthen synergies among the ILO supervisory bodies, development cooperation, technical assistance and research; to continue to promote and carry out studies and develop statistical measurement tools and methodologies in order to collect qualitative and quantitative data, with an emphasis on those categories of fundamental principles and rights at work that have not received sufficient attention up till now; and to promote policy coherence in relation to the fundamental principles and rights at work at national level, as well as within the United Nations system and with multilateral organizations, development banks and international financial institutions.

I am very pleased that the Committee has established a link between its work and the preparations for the upcoming Second World Summit for Social Development. I believe that the principles of social justice, social dialogue and tripartism should be key pillars of the Summit.

In reading the Committee's outcome document, it occurs to me that our work over the past two weeks bears a close similarity with an experience that some of you may perhaps have had, in particular if you have had the opportunity to visit the Swiss Alps or the majestic Andes. Just like when you go hiking, in a Committee like ours, it is important to take things step by step but, at the same time, to keep up a steady rhythm and demonstrate perseverance. Even though the walker might not see the summit they are aiming to reach until it is only a few metres ahead of them, they keep going without losing focus until finally they get to the top and then they can look around at the impressive panorama of the landscape.

When we started looking at the amendments this week, I imagine that many of us felt something similar and at times the path was very difficult, but I think that all of us then felt the sense of happiness that overcomes you when you reach that summit, look back and realize the importance of our achievement.

In conclusion, I would once again like to thank all the members of the Committee and reiterate that it was a pride and a pleasure for me to take this journey with them.

The President

I now declare open the discussion on the outcome of the work of the Committee.

Mr Tomita

Government (Japan), speaking on behalf of the Asia and Pacific group

Japan is honoured to speak on behalf of the Asia and Pacific group (ASPAG). I wish to thank Ms Fuentes Julio for her leadership of the Committee. Despite the Committee having to address a range of broad, complex and challenging issues, an agreement was reached thanks to the tremendous constructive efforts of the tripartite constituents of this Committee, who worked tirelessly. I would like to express my gratitude to all those involved in the discussions. However, we have to draw attention to the fact that some meetings lasted until midnight due to so many unexpected breaks. We believe there is much room for improvement. We request the Office to make more efforts to develop efficient working methods and provide stronger support to the Chairperson, so that we can try all the means available to make full use of time. We have to avoid late sittings.

Asia and the Pacific is home to roughly 60 per cent of the world's population. It includes both advanced economies and those with significant development challenges. Despite this diversity, we are united by our shared aspirations for the fundamental principles and rights at work (FPRW). Last week, on the sidelines of the Conference, ASPAG held our ministerial meeting. We acknowledge that promoting social justice is necessary at this time of immense social and environmental challenges. We strive to ensure decent working conditions, advance social justice and achieve the Sustainable Development Goals.

ASPAG recognizes that FPRW are crucial to achieving decent work. These principles and rights are inseparable, interconnected and mutually reinforcing. Therefore, all five categories of FPRW should be treated equally. To pay due attention to environmental change and keep up with the fast-changing pace of the world of work, it is vital that technical assistance is provided in line with national circumstances, taking into consideration the different economic development status and unique vulnerability of small island developing States and the least developed countries. Areas of particular importance include the impact of climate change, natural disasters and constraints on economic diversification. With these considerations in mind, we will continue to contribute to respecting, promoting and realizing FPRW.

Since the discussion on FPRW in 2017, our region has seen significant progress and many developments. We have witnessed many governments making efforts to ratify the Conventions, especially those regarding a safe and healthy working environment, which was elevated to a fifth category of FPRW in 2022. We welcome that change, especially because workers continue to be exposed to unsafe and unhealthy working environments and because new risks like heat stress and psychological risk have emerged. Also, we have conducted legal reforms and established policies and programmes to respect FPRW, in collaboration with international organizations and groups. For example, regarding child labour, the Office report Fundamental principles and rights at work at a critical crossroads pointed to progress in the Asia and the Pacific, showing a steady decline in child labour since 2008.

On the other hand, there are some challenges: informal employment often falls outside the scope of labour regulations, leaving millions of workers inadequately protected. We highlight the need to respond to developments and trends in the world of work, such as demographic shifts, digital transitions and climate change, in order to continue addressing issues related to FPRW. We would also point out that diverse and emerging forms of work create both opportunities and risks and can pose special challenges for fully realizing FPRW. Furthermore, we express concern about the lack of freedom of association and collective bargaining, which increases the vulnerability of those workers who are often most at risk of child labour, forced labour, discrimination and hazardous working conditions.

We welcome the great efforts of all tripartite constituents to adopt these conclusions at this Conference session. We also welcome the ILO's prioritization of five thematic priorities in relation to FPRW. We endorse the ILO's future actions to promote FPRW and are eager to see how the ILO will enhance its support for its Members to ensure social justice and decent work for everyone. With this statement, we support the Committee's resolution and conclusions.

Mr Mangongo

Government (Gabon), speaking on behalf of the Africa group
(Original French)

The Africa group would like to thank the Officers of the Committee for the work that has been achieved and the interpreters who have facilitated our discussions. The group also thanks the Employers' group, the Workers' group and all the Governments that participated in the work of the Committee for the efforts they made and which have led to the conclusions that are before the Conference for adoption. These conclusions will guide the actions of the ILO and the tripartite constituents for the years ahead.

The Africa group reaffirms the importance of the fundamental principles and rights at work (FPRW) in a world where inequalities are widening owing to a number of factors, such as poverty, informality, social and economic crises, conflict and geopolitical instability. We believe that by addressing these factors, which are obstacles to the application of FPRW, and by continuing to promote these fundamental principles and rights, we will be able to achieve greater social justice through the achievement of decent work.

Further, despite the inseparable, interrelated and mutually reinforcing nature of FPRW, the integrated policies and strategies to be applied at the regional and national levels should take into account the context and needs expressed by the tripartite constituents.

Our region is determined to consolidate FPRW at the continental level, including by eliminating gaps in respect of the five categories of FPRW. We would like to emphasize that, as regards discrimination in employment and occupation, the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), defines the grounds for discrimination and emphasizes the importance of the national context for addressing this issue.

Accordingly, the Africa group recalls the need for the Office to take into account the specificities of each regional and national context, and the needs authentically expressed by the tripartite constituents in their different contexts when developing and implementing the next action plan, which it will submit to the Governing Body in November 2024.

In closing, the Africa group supports the adoption of the resolution before us.

Ms Renard

Government, Belgium (EU and its Member States)

I have the honour to speak on behalf of the European Union and its Member States. North Macedonia, Montenegro, Albania, Ukraine, Georgia, Iceland and Norway align themselves with this statement.

First and foremost, we warmly thank the Chairperson, Ms Fuentes Julio, for her able chairing and steering of the discussions. We are equally grateful to the Vice-Chairpersons, Mr Norddahl and Mr Mackall, for their passionate engagement in this Committee, as well as to our fellow Government representatives for their meticulous approach. We would like to thank the Secretariat for its tireless work over the last two weeks, as well as all ILO staff, and especially our interpreters and translators, for their excellent efforts in facilitating our work.

Since the last recurrent discussion on fundamental principles and rights at work in 2017, they have been threatened by unprecedented challenges, such as public health, economic and political crises. This accelerated the process of adding the fifth fundamental right, the right to a safe and healthy working environment, in 2022. The current context places fundamental principles and rights at work at heightened risk, and at the same time reaffirms their importance. They have to guide us through the demographic, digital and environmental transitions that lie ahead and that are rapidly changing the world of work.

At the outset of these discussions, we stated our ambition for conclusions that would look beyond the walls of this house, and that would be a reference point, not only for tripartite constituents, but also for international and multistakeholder action, feeding into the momentum created by the launch of the Global Coalition for Social Justice, and contributing to the preparations of the upcoming Second World Summit for Social Development. It was therefore also our hope that there would be convergence on strong, future-oriented and inclusive language on non-discrimination. In the Committee's journey to consensus, we regret that these considerations were sometimes secondary, yet we welcome the emphasis placed on balance, clarity and improvement based on constructive tripartite dialogue. In particular, we welcome that this house has agreed to add just transitions and the digital economy as two new priority areas, in addition to the informal economy, situations of fragility and enterprises in supply chains. We believe that this will enable the Office to take up meaningful work for a better tomorrow. We are also happy that the conclusions give due attention to increasing the synergies between the ILO supervisory bodies and ILO assistance to its constituents, as well as to policy coherence at all levels, and that they highlight the ILO's role in the multilateral system.

The EU and its Member States look forward to further collaboration with the ILO on informed policies based on its excellent research and expertise. We would like to ask the Office, and subsequently all constituents, to reflect on the working methods of Recurrent Discussion Committees. We trust that there are ways to work more efficiently, while fully respecting everyone's role and input. We bring many people together here for two full weeks and should make the most of their time and experience.

Finally, all of us in this room, as ILO constituents, are accountable for making fundamental principles and rights at work a reality for all. We hope that the adoption of these conclusions in the plenary serves to underscore the crucial importance of promoting, respecting and realizing fundamental principles and rights at work, now, more than ever, and consequently enhance progress under the Sustainable Development Goals. We look forward to continuing our joint work in following up on the conclusions.

We have concluded a recurrent discussion full of many challenges and difficulties. Many hours of work have allowed us to reach conclusions that will enable us to continue building a future of respect for and protection of the rights of all workers around the world.

For the Latin American region, talking about fundamental principles and rights is a very significant matter, with the region being one full of challenges and opportunities, where we see progress in some countries, but threats and exclusions in others. Therefore, the role that governments play in committing to the respect, promotion and achievement of fundamental principles and rights is vital.

The cornerstone of, or, as we would say in the aviation industry, the engines that move the aeroplane of, fundamental principles and rights are freedom of association and collective bargaining. These rights make it possible to guarantee that workers have representation that allows them to defend and fully realize their rights, along with social justice and the promotion of social dialogue.

Promoting gender equality in terms of remuneration and participation in the labour market, respect for and defence of people who belong to one or more vulnerable groups and effectively addressing issues of poverty, insecurity and inequalities are some of the points that were focused on and are ones that we must continue to pay attention to in order to respect all these fundamental rights. With the inclusion of occupational safety and health, there are new opportunities for all workers to have a safe and healthy working environment.

Challenges are arising in the world of work, including artificial intelligence and digitalization. Therefore, it is important for us to have all the elements that will make it possible to understand and face the coming challenges, while always, always, keeping human beings in the forefront and, thereby, guaranteeing respect for their rights. There are still many tasks to be done, which is why it is important to have the support of all those who participate in the world of work: the ILO, Governments, Employers and, of course, us Workers. If we understand that fundamental principles and rights are and will always be the vehicle, we will be on the right track to build a new social contract in favour of everyone around the world.

Ms Jantjies
Employer (South Africa)

One of the most pervasive challenges to economic development and the advancement of fundamental principles and rights at work (FPRW) is the persistence of the informal economy. While informality worldwide is estimated at 60 per cent of the workforce, in the region where I am from nearly 83 per cent work in the informal economy, according to ILO statistics.

Not only does informality affect the workforce, but it also affects the productivity of businesses and impacts society as a whole. Hence, to advance FPRW, we need to promote the transition to the formal economy, following the recommendations found in the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204), and we call on all governments to ensure an enabling environment to promote it. Nevertheless, FPRW cannot be advanced around the world without addressing the common economic root causes, especially through practical, demand-driven policy solutions.

Therefore, we call on all Member States to ensure the implementation of effective policies and reforms to promote the transition to a formal economy, which is a win-win for all constituents. As an essential actor in this process, with a distinct role as the legitimate representative of the business community, we have a clear commitment to improving economies and work around the world, for which we call on the ILO to support all its constituents in transitioning towards formalization as a precondition to upholding FPRW in line with the ILO. The transition from the informal economy to the formal economy is paramount to this discussion, and we are quite pleased that the conclusions reinforce the need to give continuous attention to informality in order to advance the realization of FPRW.

It was particularly important for us that the Committee should reach conclusions, given the serious nature of the findings set out in the report Fundamental principles and rights at work at a critical crossroads, including the increase in child labour and the fact that the rights to collective bargaining and freedom of association are being called into question in many countries. It was therefore important to recall some of the gains made by the ILO, which must be maintained in order to guarantee and uphold social justice. The conclusions reached by the Committee reiterate the particular importance of freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining in achieving the ILO's strategic objectives.

It was also essential that the conclusions should guide the actions of the ILO, to ensure that the Organization remains relevant for all workers, and especially young people. The ILO must address new challenges which, if not duly taken into account, will affect the labour rights of new generations. This is why it was so important to set the two new thematic priorities of just transition and the digital economy.

Respect for the fundamental principles and rights at work is key to ensuring that the exacerbation of climate change, the development of platform work and the growing use of artificial intelligence and algorithmic management do not lead to forms of work that are not decent. It was also important to reiterate that combating all forms of discrimination remains a priority for the ILO. Lastly, I believe that it is particularly important to ensure that the plan of action to be prepared by the Director-General to give effect to the conclusions does not overlook supply chains. It will be essential to develop and support legislation on due diligence, and to rethink globalization so that it is, at last, fair to workers.

The fundamental principles and rights at work include the means to obtaining progress and the ends we all wish to achieve. We have shown that symmetry in social dialogue is essential for reinforcing the link between the fundamental principles and rights at work, the pillars of decent work and the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. In achieving our objectives, a discourse of acceptance implies that we have gathered around the negotiating table and demonstrated the strength of the relationship that we have. Today, we have managed to reach an agreement because of our common ground, despite our differences. After two weeks, I think I can safely say that guaranteeing the means and achieving the ends of the fundamental principles and rights at work would not be possible if we were not all fully participating. As Employers, I think it is right to acknowledge our social partners in achieving this excellent outcome. To find a viable solution to our problems, we must work together. Finally, in order to accomplish our goals, we must also focus on the resources needed to achieve them. Establishing an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises is vital for all our efforts, because we will never get to where we want to go or where we have to be without the means to get there. To achieve this, you can rely on our support.

Mr Dimitrov

Worker (Bulgaria)

I will briefly address two issues that we have included in our conclusions in this Committee: one is supply chains, including global supply chains, and the second one is inequalities, or tackling inequalities. As stated in point 11 of the conclusions, failures to protect and respect the fundamental principles and rights at work (FPRW) continue to be observed within supply chains. In point 19(b), we reaffirm that enterprises and supply chains are among the five thematic priorities on which the Office should focus in updating its integrated strategy on FPRW, while taking into account and building on the ILO strategy on decent work in supply chains (2023–27), adopted by our Governing Body.

Governments, in consultation with the social partners, should ensure the compliance of business practices with FPRW within global supply chains, including mandatory due diligence legislation, in line with the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, as amended in 2022. We also call on the ILO to promote policy coherence on FPRW in ongoing international efforts to regulate, in international human rights law, the activities of multinational enterprises and other businesses.

Also, to ensure that governments will meaningfully tackle poverty, insecurity and inequalities, which are major drivers of FPRW deficits, as stated in point 17(q), we need to ensure the effective recognition of collective bargaining and require living wages to be set through such bargaining, taking into account the needs of workers and their families, and calculated for the work performed during normal hours of work, excluding overtime, in accordance with the ILO's principles on estimating living wages, as agreed by the Governing Body on a tripartite basis at its 350th Session.

Ms Nagasawa Employer (Japan)

Employers fully support the fundamental principles and rights at work (FPRW) as universal human rights which apply to workers and employers alike. The ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work (1998), as amended in 2022, and the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization (2008), as amended in 2022 (Social Justice Declaration), constitute the international framework to promote, respect and realize FPRW. They are as relevant and as important as ever.

During the discussions, we agreed that substantial progress has been made, but significant gaps in the implementation of FPRW still remain. Sustainable enterprises that create decent jobs play a key role in tackling these gaps and challenges. In particular, micro, small and medium-sized enterprises need support to understand and integrate respect for FPRW into their businesses. They are the backbone of any economy by creating decent jobs and enabling productive and freely chosen employment. They are essential for the realization of FPRW. This reflects the clear interdependency between sustainable enterprises, economic and social development and the advancement of FPRW.

As you recall, many ministers from different regions who spoke at the inaugural forum of the Global Coalition for Social Justice emphasized the importance of an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises to achieving social justice for all. Therefore, an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises to promote decent work is a precondition to implement FPRW and to achieve concrete and effective outcomes on the ground, noting that business activity, investment and innovation are major drivers of productivity, inclusive growth and job creation. The Social Justice Declaration and the resolution concerning the second recurrent discussion on fundamental principles and rights at work (2017) both acknowledged the indispensable role of sustainable enterprises, and the Employers are very pleased to have achieved the reinforcement of this key role in the conclusions of this third recurrent discussion.

Resolution and conclusions concerning the third recurrent discussion on fundamental principles and rights at work

The President

There being no further speakers, we will now proceed with the adoption of the proposed resolution concerning the third recurrent discussion on fundamental principles and rights at work, which contains the Committee's conclusions, the text of which can be found in Record of Proceedings No. 7A.

If there are no objections, may I take it that the Conference adopts, as a whole, the proposed resolution and the conclusions contained therein?

(The resolution and conclusions are adopted.)

I would like to extend my warmest thanks and congratulations to the members and Officers of the Committee for their tireless work. I would also like to thank the Secretariat for its support. Good job, and congratulations to them all.

(The Conference adjourned at 12.30 p.m.)

Date: 13 June 2024

Outcome of the General Discussion Committee on Decent Work and the care economy

Proposed resolution and conclusions submitted to the Conference for adoption

This Record of Proceedings contains the text of the proposed resolution and conclusions submitted by the Committee to the Conference for adoption.

The Report of the Committee on its proceedings will be published in Record of Proceedings No. 8B after the closure of the session.

► Resolution concerning decent work and the care economy

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization, meeting in Geneva at its 112th Session, 2024,

Having undertaken a general discussion on decent work and the care economy, and duly taking into account the ILO Declaration of Philadelphia (1944) and the ILO Centenary Declaration for the Future of Work (2019), to pursue decent work in the care economy,

1. Adopts the following conclusions;
2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to give due consideration to the conclusions and to guide the International Labour Office in giving effect to them;
3. Requests the Director-General to:
 - (a) prepare a plan of action on decent work and the care economy to give effect to the conclusions, for consideration of the Governing Body at its 352nd Session (October-November 2024);
 - (b) communicate the conclusions to relevant international and regional organizations;
 - (c) take into account the conclusions when preparing future programme and budget proposals and mobilizing extra-budgetary resources;
 - (d) keep the Governing Body informed of their implementation.

► Conclusions concerning decent work and the care economy

I. Context - decent work and the care economy: an urgent need for action

1. Care is central to human, social, economic and environmental well-being, and sustainable development. Care work, paid and unpaid, is essential to all other work. A well-functioning and robust care economy contributes to a healthier present and future workforce, creates jobs, supports businesses and enhances productivity. Transformative change in the world of work, driven by technological innovations, demographic shifts and environmental and climate change, affect the demand for and supply of, as well as access to, care.
2. A well-functioning and robust care economy is critical for building resilience to crises, including pandemics, and brain drain, and for achieving gender equality and inclusion, and addressing other inequalities, promoting economic and social development, a human-centred approach to the future of work, just transition and social justice. The care economy is fast-growing and creates and enables employment opportunities.
3. Women make up the majority of paid and unpaid care work throughout the world.
4. The COVID-19 pandemic emphasized the importance of the care economy and shed light on gaps in public policies. The pandemic exacerbated the disproportionate share of unpaid care work provided by women and girls, and the pre-existing decent work deficits of care workers, including long working hours and occupational health and safety risks – such as exposure to violence and harassment, including gender-based violence and harassment – and severe staff and skill shortages.

5. The care workforce is heterogeneous. While care work is highly demanding and often requires high levels of skills and specialized knowledge, skills are not always fully recognized and valued accordingly. While some care workers are highly skilled and well-paid, many, including migrant and domestic workers, remain in the informal economy, low-paid and excluded, by law or in practice, from protections, including social and labour protection. Community health and care workers, often not recognized as workers, are also without such protection. Migrant workers, many of whom are women, often are not able to exercise fully the same rights as other workers. Further challenges to decent work and the care economy include strong ethnic, racial and gender-based occupational segregation, and undervaluation of care work. Women, especially those in vulnerable situations, provide an unequal share of unpaid care, which creates structural barriers to their participation, retention and progression in the labour force.
6. The fast pace of society ageing in some parts of the world brings more care burden, which intensifies the gaps in the demand for, supply of and access to care, and at the same time high quality services are more needed than ever before.
7. The International Labour Organization (ILO) plays a leadership role in promoting decent work in the care economy, based on a life-course approach to care, embracing the 5R Framework for Decent Care Work (recognition, reduction and redistribution of unpaid care and reward and representation of care workers). Some governments have made progress on the ratification of care-related and other relevant international labour conventions and have implemented integrated approaches to care policies. Employers and workers, through social dialogue, as well as employer-led initiatives, have led to the introduction of some family-friendly workplace policies and working arrangements to help improve the work-life balance of individuals while balancing care responsibilities. Care workers are increasingly organized. These efforts represent progress towards transforming the unequal division of care work between men and women into a more equal organization of care, promoting social co-responsibility among the State, the private sector, families, the social and solidarity economy (SSE) and the community.
8. However, significant gaps remain in public awareness, legislation, policies, funding and implementation. Urgent action is needed to ensure decent work in the care economy and promote decent work by ensuring access to care for all.

II. A common understanding of the care economy

9. The care economy comprises care work, both paid and unpaid, and direct and indirect care, its provision within and outside the household, as well as the people who provide and receive care and the employers and institutions that offer care. Care work consists of, among others, activities and relations that pursue sustainability and quality of life; nurture human capabilities; foster agency, autonomy and dignity; develop the opportunities and resilience of those who provide and receive care; address the diverse needs of individuals across different life stages; and meet the physical, psychological, cognitive, mental health and developmental needs for care and support of people including children, adolescents, youth, adults, older persons, persons with disabilities and all caregivers.
10. Care work is provided through the public sector and the private sector, including Micro, Small and Medium Enterprises (MSMEs). It is also provided by the non-profit sector, the SSE and households. Paid care work spans diverse occupations and sectors. The care economy, spanning formality and informality, includes, but may not be limited to, the activities of workers in education, early childhood care and education, and the health and social sectors, of domestic workers and of individuals who perform unpaid care work. There is currently no internationally agreed statistical definition of care work and such a definition should be developed to promote harmonization and consistency of data on care, including in all applicable sub-sectors.

11. Direct care work refers to personal care activities that are relational, while indirect care work comprises activities that enable well-being in the absence of direct personal contact, such as cleaning and cooking.
12. Unpaid care work, often provided by the family and social network of care recipients, is of great value for care recipients, care providers and society. This care, which should be more equally shared between men and women, complements and supplements, but cannot replace paid care work.
13. The current social organization of care, that is who provides care and who accesses care, places a disproportionate share of unpaid care work on women, which hinders women's economic inclusion and effective labour market participation, widening gender gaps in the world of work, and leaves many without adequate access to social protection. The burden of paid and unpaid care work on women can be largely dependent on race, ethnicity, socio-economic conditions and place of origin.
14. The care economy comprises policies and regulatory frameworks, services, infrastructure, institutions, financing mechanisms, and social norms that influence and govern the provision and receipt of care and support throughout the life-course.

III. Guiding principles

15. In pursuing integrated, comprehensive and holistic policies and approaches for decent work and the care economy, Members should take into account the following principles.
16. Just as labour is not a commodity, labour in the care economy is not a commodity. All people should be able to provide and receive care, including self-care.
17. All care workers should enjoy decent work. Decent work for care workers contributes to quality care, recruitment and retention of workers, and promotion of gender equality, counteracts the shortage of workers and builds resilient societies and economies.
18. All Members have an obligation to respect, promote and realize the fundamental principles and rights at work in respect of care workers, namely: freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining; the elimination of all forms of forced or compulsory labour; the effective abolition of child labour; the elimination of discrimination in respect of employment and occupation; and a safe and healthy working environment.
19. Ratification and implementation of the international labour standards relevant to the care economy are central to a rights-based approach to care.
20. Provision of, access to and receipt of care should be based on the principles of non-discrimination, solidarity, sustainability, equity, universality, and social co-responsibility.
21. Investing in the care economy promotes quality care and decent job creation, and can lead to enhanced human capabilities, productivity growth, quality education, improved health and well-being and gender equality, as well as decent work and stronger female participation in the labour market, and enables the transition to the formal economy.
22. The 5R Framework for Decent Care Work guides integrated and coherent strategies to achieve decent work in the care economy. Unpaid care work should be recognized, reduced and redistributed. Paid care work should be rewarded through adequate remuneration including in accordance with the principle of equal pay for work of equal value, and effective labour and social protection.

23. Achieving decent work includes the adoption and effective implementation of well-designed care leave policies and services. This enables:
 - (a) workers with family responsibilities to enter, remain in and progress in the labour force, without discrimination;
 - (b) better work-life balance, and a more equal sharing of care responsibilities between men and women;
 - (c) productivity growth through maintaining the health and well-being of the workforce;
 - (d) addressing disadvantages faced by people with high care or support needs, as well as those faced by people providing unpaid care or support;
 - (e) addressing inequitable access to care and support services, including for workers in the informal economy.
24. The State has a primary responsibility for care provision, funding, regulation and ensuring high standards of quality, safety and health for care workers and care recipients. This includes the allocation of the necessary resources and the adoption and maintenance of a robust policy and regulatory framework.
25. Public-private partnerships that leverage the strengths of both public and private sectors can help scale quality care services without overburdening either side, fostering a more sustainable care ecosystem.
26. Public and private enterprises, cooperatives and other SSE entities, play a role in the provision of quality care, investment in sustainable and modern care infrastructure, and provision of training and employment opportunities.
27. Community-based care provision, including through partnership with indigenous and tribal peoples where applicable, can assist in meeting local needs.
28. Collecting data disaggregated by all forms of care work and measuring the scope and value of unpaid care are critical to understanding the care economy and informing policy design. These data should be disaggregated by income, sex, age, race, ethnic origin, migration status, disability, geographical location and other relevant characteristics, in line with national context.
29. Coordination across levels and sectors of government, taking a whole-of-government approach, fosters coherent, effective and integrated approaches to care.

IV. Advancing decent work in the care economy

30. Taking into account the above principles, governments, employers' and workers' Organizations, as appropriate to their spheres of responsibility, with support from the ILO, should:
 - (a) design and implement integrated and coherent care policies and systems for decent work and gender equality. These policies should contribute to a rights-based approach for care and be grounded in international labour standards and social dialogue. The 5R Framework for Decent Care Work provides valuable guidance in this regard;

- (b) mainstream care into relevant public policies, including employment, skills, macroeconomic, social and labour protection, migration and environmental policies, while ensuring adequate public financing and coordination taking into account national circumstances;
- (c) promote employment and macroeconomic policies that create decent jobs in the care economy, including through the formalization of informal care jobs and enterprises, and the prevention of informalization of formal ones, and ensure sufficient fiscal space;
- (d) promote active labour market policies, education and training, upskilling and re-skilling, skills recognition and skills certification within and, where appropriate, across national borders, openness to learning and access to lifelong learning opportunities, in line with technological developments, to promote career development and attract and retain a skilled care workforce;
- (e) address the undervaluation of care work, including by raising public awareness about the social and economic value of care work;
- (f) address the unequal gender distribution of paid and unpaid work, and promote women's economic inclusion and autonomy beyond caregiving, including by changing social norms and gender stereotypes around caregiving roles;
- (g) ensure appropriate responses to the needs of all workers with care responsibilities by ensuring comprehensive maternity protection and care leave and protection policies, including paternity, parental leave and long-term care leave;
- (h) strengthen policies and measures facilitating work-life balance, paid work and care responsibilities. This includes measures related to the organization, time and location of work, and other terms and conditions of employment;
- (i) build and maintain universal social protection systems that provide adequate protection to care workers in all types of employment and recognize unpaid care work, including through care credits in social insurance;
- (j) create an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises and develop a conducive environment for SSE entities, including gender-responsive policies that promote productivity, investment in education and skills development, and enhanced access to business opportunities, formalization and finance;
- (k) invest in and make available high-quality, affordable, adequate and accessible care services, including childcare, health care and long-term care for all workers, including for workers in the informal economy, enabling their transition to the formal economy;
- (l) ensure measures consider culturally appropriate services and workforce considerations for indigenous and tribal peoples, including the development of community-based approaches;
- (m) enhance the availability of assistance and support services for persons with disabilities to promote individual autonomy and independence, including by taking a disability-inclusive approach to increase access to employment opportunities;
- (n) prevent and address all forms of discrimination against care workers, with particular attention to women, migrant workers, racialized groups and persons in situations of vulnerability;
- (o) ensure effective access to labour protection and social security, including through labour inspection, for all care workers, in all types of employment, especially to those most at risk of insufficient or inadequate protection such as domestic workers, migrant workers or community health and care workers;

- (p) design and implement policies and strategies to achieve: maximum limits on working time, occupational safety and health, including preventing and addressing violence and harassment, including gender-based violence and harassment, and adequate minimum wages whether statutory or negotiated. Public sector care providers should lead by example in this regard;
- (q) monitor the impacts of climate change and technological change on care, including unpaid care work, and consider care issues in relation to emerging labour market governance issues and climate change adaptation and mitigation policies and actions;
- (r) support MSMEs and SSE entities, including cooperatives and other community-led initiatives, that deliver quality care services, including through capacity-building, skills development and access to finance;
- (s) collect and disseminate data on unpaid and paid care work, in line with existing international statistical standards and with international statistical standards that will be developed to provide an evidence base for policy-making;
- (t) promote the voice and representation of, and consult with, care worker organizations, including those of domestic workers, community health and care workers, and migrant workers, organizations of employers of care workers and unpaid family carers, where these exist;
- (u) Support multilateral initiatives such as the Equal Pay International Coalition (EPIC).

V. The Role of the International Labour Organization

- 31. In line with the principles and priorities set out in these conclusions, the Organization, in consultation with constituents should further develop its comprehensive work on the care economy across its strategic objectives and direct its efforts to:
- (a) promote the ratification and implementation of international labour standards relevant to the care economy, including all fundamental Conventions;
 - (b) prepare research to be discussed by a tripartite meeting, to be determined by the Governing Body at the earliest date possible, so as to enable the Organization to assess whether there are gaps in the ILO's body of international labour standards related to paternity and parental protection, and other care leave (for sick or critically-ill family members, older persons or persons with disabilities) and, if so, what normative and/or non-normative actions could be appropriate;
 - (c) support the development of internationally-agreed statistical standards as the basis for the collection of detailed, comparable and harmonized data on the care economy, taking into account all relevant unpaid and paid care work, for discussion at the 22nd International Conference of Labour Statisticians in 2028;
 - (d) provide technical support and policy guidance, including through Decent Work Country Programmes, for the development of national care policies and systems that ensure universal access to care, promote professionalization and formalization of care jobs, and the highest attainable standards of quality, safety and health for care workers and care recipients, guided by the 5R Framework for Decent Care Work;

- (e) provide technical assistance to promote the effective protection of migrant care workers; domestic workers; community health and care workers; workers in cooperatives and other SSE entities; care workers in the informal economy; and workers with family responsibilities;
- (f) promote policies and legislation for care and support services for those with physical and mental illnesses, persons living with HIV and persons with disabilities, with the participation of persons from the groups concerned;
- (g) enhance further its expertise on the care economy through strengthened research and improved dissemination and communication on decent work and the care economy in economies at different levels of development, including by providing regular trends and analyses, coverage gaps and public investments in care and their impacts on gender equality, employment, pay, working conditions and social protection of care workers, including migrant workers, and the quality of care service provision;
- (h) research and publish information on challenges and opportunities in the introduction and use of technology in the care economy, including digital technologies and artificial intelligence, and its impact on working conditions;
- (i) provide ongoing support to countries for the measurement of both paid and unpaid care work, applying the latest international statistical standards and good measurement practices;
- (j) collect and share best practices, and conduct research on skills development that promotes career development and attracts and retains a skilled care workforce;
- (k) support constituents in ensuring sustainable and adequate financing for care, including through conducting socio-economic feasibility and costing studies, measuring financing gaps and exploring options to expand fiscal space, as well as the development of adequate pro-employment macroeconomic policies, both fiscal and monetary, in line with ILO instruments on employment policy and social protection;
- (l) provide, with the International Training Centre of the ILO in Turin, and in collaboration with other relevant training centres, as appropriate, technical capacity-building for the design, adequate financing, implementation and monitoring of inclusive policies for the care economy, including mainstreaming care into all other relevant policies;
- (m) reinforce the capacities of tripartite constituents to engage in the formulation, implementation and monitoring of national care policies, and strengthen all forms of social dialogue, including collective bargaining and tripartite cooperation. Encourage effective workplace cooperation as a tool to help ensure safe and productive workplaces, in such a way that it respects collective bargaining and its outcomes and does not undermine the role of trade unions;
- (n) reinforce its global leadership role in advancing the care agenda at the global, regional and national levels by promoting, supporting and setting legal and statistical standards, ensuring policy coherence and inter-institutional cooperation on decent work and the care economy in the multilateral system;
- (o) continue to promote the Guidelines for a just transition towards environmentally sustainable economies and societies for all (2015), including in relation to the care economy;
- (p) leverage the Global Coalition for Social Justice and the UN Global Accelerator on Jobs and Social Protection for Just Transitions to strengthen partnerships with UN entities, international financial institutions, international networks and research centres, and to create a South-South platform to promote decent care work;

- (q) ensure adequate resources towards its work on the care economy and integrate decent work and gender equality in the care economy into all relevant ILO development cooperation projects and activities to harness fully the care economy's potential to contribute to the Decent Work Agenda, the achievement of the Sustainable Development Goals and a just transition;
- (r) provide support to, particularly, small island developing States and least developed countries, in mitigating the risk of brain drain.

Introduction

1. The General Discussion Committee on Decent Work and the Care Economy was set up by the International Labour Conference at its first sitting on 3 June 2024 to deal with the sixth item on the agenda of its 112th Session.
2. The Committee elected its Officers and reporter as follows:

Chairperson: Mr Carlos Sorreta (Government member, Philippines) at its first sitting

Mr Colin Jordan (Government member, Barbados) at its seventh sitting, in replacement of Mr Sorreta

Vice-Chairpersons: Ms Sonya Janahi (Employer member, Bahrain) and Ms Lily Chang (Worker member, Canada) at its first sitting

Reporter: Mr Alfredo Novales (Government member, Spain), at its third sitting

3. At its third sitting, the Committee appointed a drafting group composed of the following members to prepare and submit a set of draft conclusions for consideration by the Committee:

Government members: Ms N. Gasman Zylberman (Mexico), Mr J. Dale (United States of America), Mr A. M. Amar (Senegal), Mr S. Muperi (Zimbabwe), Ms L. Rankin (Australia), Mr M. Sarinanto (Indonesia), Mr N. Dumas (France), Ms L. Verschingel (Belgium)

Employer members: Ms S. Janahi (Bahrain), Ms L. Sephomolo (Lesotho), Ms N. Chenard (Congo-Brazzaville), Ms S. Mayers-Granville (Barbados), Mr J. R. Moya (Philippines), Ms L. Høj Larsen (Denmark), Mr D. Naumann (Germany), Mr D. Hamel (Canada)

Worker members: Ms L. Chang (Canada), Mr D. Moore (United States), Ms J. d. C. Britez (Argentina), Mr L. Vanderlinden (Belgium), Mr D. Joyce (Ireland), Ms C. Gonzalez (Australia), Ms J. B. Coronacion (Philippines), Ms B. Modise (South Africa)

4. The Committee held 12 sittings.
5. The Committee had before it Report VI, entitled Decent work and the care economy, and three points for discussion prepared by the International Labour Office.
6. The representative of the Secretary-General (Ms Celeste Drake, Deputy Director-General), presenting the Office report, said that the discussion on decent work and the care economy was critical, in light of the significant demographic, technological and environmental transitions taking place. The report highlighted the ongoing impacts of the COVID-19 pandemic and underscored the centrality of care work to societies and economies, while revealing weaknesses in working conditions and staffing in the care sector. The pandemic had particularly highlighted the substantial amount of unpaid care work done by women, which impacted their labour market participation. The report presented statistics, highlighting that care jobs constituted 11.5 per cent of total global employment and that women accounted for two thirds of the care workforce. It also noted the increasing demand for care, with 2.3 billion people projected to need care by 2030.

7. The transformative potential of the care economy in achieving gender equality was emphasized in the ILO Centenary Declaration for the Future of Work (2019) (hereafter Centenary Declaration). The Declaration promoted equal opportunities, participation and treatment for women and men, advocating for better work-life balance and investment in the care sector. Investment in care was beneficial not only for enhancing care infrastructure and service resilience to shocks, such as pandemics, but also for improving the skills of care workers, creating decent jobs and addressing the unfair distribution of unpaid care work. Workers with family responsibilities could be supported to participate fully in the labour market, thus boosting productivity and promoting human rights and well-being for caregivers and care recipients alike.
8. The general discussion was intended to further elevate the care economy on global, regional and national policy agendas, contributing to the achievement of the United Nations Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs), particularly those related to poverty, health, gender equality, decent work and reduced inequalities. The three points for discussion, which would guide the Committee's deliberations, focused on forming a common understanding of the care economy, examining effective measures by constituents to promote decent work and gender equality in the care economy, and identifying gaps. The discussion would provide guidance on priorities for ILO, emphasizing the importance of social dialogue, multilateral coordination and partnerships to foster a resilient and well-functioning care economy.

General discussion

Opening statements and point for discussion 1

Given the diverse social, economic, and political contexts in which paid and unpaid care is provided and the highly heterogeneous nature of the care workforce, what are the critical aspects and components that constitute the care economy?

9. The Chairperson emphasized the urgency of addressing decent work challenges in the care economy, especially those highlighted by the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic, on unpaid and paid care work. The pandemic exposed severe issues, such as poor working conditions and gender inequalities in the care sector, while also highlighting the critical role of care work for the well-being of society and the economy. The Committee was invited to examine decent work and the care economy and propose conclusions to be adopted at the Conference's plenary session.
10. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the outcome of the Committee's work would be crucial to promote a robust and sustainable care economy, as a vital component of the global economy, which required the support of the private sector. A well-supported care economy was essential for a healthier, more productive and agile workforce, which would bolster enterprise competitiveness and innovation, resulting in more jobs and greater economic opportunities for businesses, thus enabling more individuals to remain productive in the workforce.
11. To deliver an outcome to the benefit of workers, employers and governments alike, the Committee's conclusions should focus on three pillars. First, the Committee should address the global challenge of attracting and retaining skilled workers in the care sector to redress current labour shortages and skills mismatches. Policy measures to that end should include developing skills anticipation tools, promoting active labour market policies promoting public and private employment services, embedding innovation and digital transformation for service efficiencies, promoting all forms of social dialogue, including workplace cooperation, aligning the technical and vocational education and training systems with industry needs to bridge the skills gap and enhance care quality, and promoting pathways and opportunities for workers to move into more productive and sustainable sectors through cross-sectoral pathways.

12. Second, the Committee should emphasize the need to frame care as a societal issue rather than solely as a women's issue. Owing to its multifaceted nature, investing in the care economy required a whole-of-government approach; coordinated action would ensure coherent care policies. Women's economic inclusion should be promoted beyond caregiving; societal norms around caregiving roles must be changed to ensure a diverse workforce, inclusive of men, and recognize the contribution of the care economy to economic development. Those in the care economy should see it as a viable career with opportunities for growth. Trends of women in higher-paid and higher skilled care occupations should be documented globally and analysed for insights.
13. Third, the Committee should recognize the role of private care enterprises, services and agencies in complementing public services, reducing pressures on healthcare systems and driving innovation and quality improvements. The private sector contributed to job creation, income generation, enhanced entrepreneurship and providing diverse care options, which enhanced the overall effectiveness and responsiveness of the care economy. The private sector also invests in care infrastructure, ensuring sustainability, and quickly adapts to changing demographics and care needs. Additionally, they provide training and employment opportunities, addressing skill shortages in the care sector. Overall, private care services enhance the care economy's effectiveness, diversity, and responsiveness, promoting economic growth and innovation.
14. Turning to point for discussion 1, on critical aspects and components of the care economy, she underscored that a well-functioning, resilient and sustainable care economy, required recognition both of care workers and their employers. The private sector played an undeniable role in care provision and management, often in cooperation with governments. Public-private partnerships would heighten service efficiency and sustainability, and thus improve the quality of care for recipients and decent work for care workers.
15. The gender gap in the care economy must be redressed by increasing women's participation in the labour market and facilitating women's economic inclusion. Empowering women and supporting their transition from unpaid care work to entrepreneurship and formal employment are needed. An enabling environment for private care institutions was needed, including policies that promoted investment in education and skills development, enhanced access to business opportunities and finance, harnessed a flexible business environment, enhanced access to finance and venture capital, increased access to markets, fostered productivity and entrepreneurial activities, and support for social protection systems. Such an environment would facilitate the formalization of care work and support workforce participation for those with caregiving responsibilities.
16. Upskilling and reskilling in the care sector were crucial to bridge workforce gaps and improve service delivery. The Committee's conclusions should include specific measures to promote skills development, lifelong learning, and the certification of care workers, to ensure a diversified skill set that blended technical competencies with core work skills.

17. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that the care economy was crucial for advancing decent work, gender equality, social justice, and sustainable development, and as such was a key priority for the Workers' group, which commended regional and international efforts to promote care as a human right, encompassing the rights to receive care, provide care and exercise self-care. The Global Day of Action for Care initiated by trade unions was now recognized by the United Nations international day. The human right to care should be universally recognized. Social dialogue, freedom of association, and collective bargaining were vital for securing decent work for care workers and expanding labour protections and paid leave entitlements.
18. Global gender and economic inequalities were rooted in injustice, including care systems that relied heavily on unpaid labour, predominantly undertaken by women. Despite women entering the paid workforce in great numbers over the recent decades, progress towards transforming care organization and meeting care needs had been slow. The lack of a common understanding of the care economy led to fragmented national policy responses, which in turn resulted in considerable gaps and challenges in the sector. Decades of austerity, underinvestment and privatization had resulted in hundreds of millions of working people lacking access to quality public care services and gender-responsive social protection, and not benefiting from care leave policies. Marginalized communities were disproportionately affected.
19. Care work was central to the health, welfare and well-being of societies, and to the sustainability of economies. No other work was possible without it. Care workers, despite being briefly championed during the pandemic, had not seen any improvements in their pay or working conditions. Increasing care needs, driven by demographic change, climate change and escalating conflicts, which were culminating in a global care crisis, required care to be recognized as a public good. Comprehensive public care systems, care leave policies, increased public financing, decent job creation, universal access to care services, and gender-responsive social protection would all be crucial to tackling that crisis. Decent job creation in care, including the formalization of informal care jobs, was a key demand of the workers' call for a New Social Contract. The provision and receipt of care should be based on solidarity, equity and universality, with States playing a leadership role in direct care provision, funding, regulation of care providers, and ensuring high standards of quality, safety, and health for care workers and care recipients.
20. Women shouldered a disproportionate burden of unpaid care work, with two thirds of such work globally performed by women, a situation which had barely improved over the past two decades. That imbalance in social organization had hindered women's opportunities in paid work, education and training, and had confined many to part-time, insecure or informal jobs, impacting their earnings and income security, and increasing their risk of poverty. The gendered division of labour shaped the organization, value and quality of care, which remained highly feminized: women accounted for over 70 per cent of the global care workforce. Paid care work was characterized by low pay, poor working conditions, lack of access to social protection and limited bargaining power. Persistent discriminatory social norms and stereotypes reinforced the notion that care work was inherently women's work and less valuable than other work, thus perpetuating occupational segregation and gender inequalities.
21. Addressing the interdependence of paid and unpaid care work and labour force participation required ensuring decent work and reinforcing international labour standards, including the fundamental principles and rights at work. The true social and economic value of care work must be recognized, shifting the perception of care work from a private responsibility to a collective social responsibility, and recognizing care as a public good. Public investments in care should be viewed not simply as a cost, but as an investment in well-functioning societies and economies and in the future world of work. A rights-based approach to the care economy was crucial; the rights of care workers and care recipients were deeply intertwined. The 5R Framework for Decent Care Work (hereafter 5R Framework) (recognize, reduce, redistribute, reward and represent) should transform the way paid and unpaid care work were viewed and valued.

22. A common understanding of care work was needed. The role of social and solidarity economy entities in providing care in underserved communities must be recognized. When care needs were met by robust care systems, and those who provided care had access to decent work, everyone would benefit. With a vast number of unpaid carers excluded from the labour force due to care responsibilities, unpaid care accounting for around 9 per cent of global GDP, and a global care workforce of over 380 million, the time had come to reach a common tripartite understanding of the care economy and agree on a new way forward.
23. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States,¹ said that North Macedonia, Montenegro, Serbia, Albania, Ukraine, the Republic of Moldova, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Georgia and Norway aligned themselves with her statement. She underscored the critical role of the care economy in ensuring decent work, gender equality, and social justice. She commended the comprehensive Office report, which placed the care economy within the context of global megatrends such as demographic shifts, climate change, and technological developments. Access to high-quality, affordable care services, adequate training, skills development, lifelong learning, better working conditions, social protection, fair leave entitlements, and work-life balance for care workers were crucial for ensuring decent work in the care economy. Advancing gender equality and the equal sharing of care responsibilities were key to increasing women's participation in the labour market. The ILO had a unique normative role in promoting decent work in the care economy, and the EU and its Member States were ready to contribute to action-oriented conclusions to build resilient care systems.
24. Both paid and unpaid care work were crucial for human, social, and economic development. The value of care was key; access to affordable, good quality care services with equal sharing of unpaid care work between men and women, and improved working conditions in the care economy were particularly important. Gender-based segregation and challenging work conditions, inadequate remuneration, workplace violence and harassment, poor working conditions, undeclared work and lack of access to social protection were commonplace and complex problems in the care economy, which disproportionately affected women and migrant workers. Investing in decent work in the care economy would yield significant returns in human capital, productivity, well-being, gender equality, and formal labour market participation. Policies must be designed equitably, and must take account of all aspects of care workers' well-being; decent work and training opportunities were key to attracting and retaining workers, and creating conditions to uphold the rights of care workers and care recipients alike. Social dialogue, freedom of association and collective bargaining would be key.

¹ Unless otherwise specified, all statements made by Government members on behalf of regional groups or intergovernmental organizations are reported as having been made on behalf of all Governments, members of the group or organization in question, who are members of the ILO and are attending the Conference.

25. The Government member of Barbados highlighted serious challenges within his country's care economy resulting from demographic shifts. An ageing population was placing significant strain on the social security system. Demand for care was driven by the increasing number of older people, higher female workforce participation, and a growing awareness of the needs of persons with disabilities. The supply of care services had been influenced by the creation of paid opportunities, improved training, and a reduction in stigma associated with care work. Broadening the scope of care work in Barbados had, however, given rise to challenges, including inadequate remuneration, high levels of work stress, and the need for better working conditions, social security and collective bargaining. The care economy had a crucial impact on the quality of life, economic productivity and well-being of current and future generations. It was integral to the nation's social and economic fabric.
26. The Government member of Japan said that care services encompassed a variety of recipients, including children, persons with disabilities and older persons. Japan's ageing population was impacting demand for care, particularly long-term care services, which had implications both for older and younger people, as a lack of care for the older population would result in younger persons needing to leave the labour market to care for their older family members. With the working-age population declining, more care workers were needed. The Government of Japan was taking measures in that regard, including raising caregivers' wages, reducing working hours, improving working conditions, and using technology where possible to replace some caregiving duties, improve productivity and reduce workload. The use of technology could thus improve the work environment and increase satisfaction at work.
27. The Government member of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland emphasized the importance of transitioning towards sustainable economies. A resilient response framework was crucial to respond to challenges, as highlighted by the COVID-19 pandemic. The ILO's proposal to integrate care economy issues, beyond gender-specific issues, into its development cooperation projects, was welcome. Gender equality in the care economy must be improved, and the right to quality services promoted. An understanding of the care economy should include childcare, and various forms of paid and unpaid care, including for older persons and persons with disabilities. Relationships between unpaid and paid care work, gender equality and decent work must be strengthened. A transformative and disability-inclusive approach should be taken.
28. The Government member of Australia highlighted her Government's recent focus on care for older persons, disability support, veterans' care and early childhood education and care, areas which had been comparatively undervalued, having traditionally been provided by women as unpaid work. In Australia, paid care work was also predominantly done by women, including migrant workers. Care took place in diverse social contexts. In Aboriginal and Torres Straits languages there was no word for "disability"; impairment or illness was perceived as part of an individual's role or responsibility. As a result, First Nations people did not always perceive themselves as "carers". While care and support work, paid and unpaid, were the backbone of Australian society, workers in the care economy were experiencing low pay, insecure work, burnout, harassment and unsafe working conditions. Gender stereotypes contributed to an imbalance in care responsibilities in families which should be redressed. The Australian Government prioritized policies that supported families, and policy settings that did not entrench inequality.
29. The Government member of Norway stated that women's financial independence was fundamental for achieving gender equality and economic growth, and that the care economy played a vital role enabling women to work. Accessible childcare was essential for women's economic participation. Advances in Norway were the result of decades of progressive gender equality policies, tripartite dialogue and leadership by the women's movement. Elements, such as affordable kindergartens, increased parental leave and paid breastfeeding breaks had resulted in a more equitable division of unpaid care work, as well as support for women's careers. Challenges persisted, however, such as women more being more likely to work part-time than men, which contributed to gender-based differences in pay, working conditions and career development. The care economy could be strengthened by recognizing, reducing, and redistributing unpaid care work through financial investment in care systems and infrastructure, countering gender-stereotypical educational and occupational choices, achieving a better gender balance in female-dominated sectors, and ensuring decent work for care workers. Freedom of association, social dialogue, and collective bargaining for care workers would be key to achieving that goal.

30. The Government member of Switzerland stated that the current shortage of health workers was a global problem, which had been exacerbated by the COVID-19 pandemic and had underscored the critical importance of nurses. More than 85 per cent of Switzerland's nurses were women. Many were leaving the profession, citing difficulties in balancing home and work life due to work schedules, such as night shifts, short-term deployment and last-minute changes in programming. The understanding of the care economy should encompass both paid and unpaid sectors, including domestic work, which, in Switzerland was often done by migrant women on temporary work and residence permits. A common definition of the care economy, covering all forms of care, was needed.
31. The Government member of Türkiye noted that care work affected everyone, either as recipients or providers. As care was the fastest-growing area of work globally, weaknesses in the care economy must be addressed. Entrenched gender roles and stereotypes meant that women had more responsibility for unpaid care work than men and were less likely to be engaged in paid employment. Those who were active in the labour market were often limited to part-time or informal employment. Thus, gender inequalities in unpaid care exacerbated gender pay gaps. Additionally, engagement in unpaid care activities that hindered women's advancement in the paid labour force significantly impacted their overall well-being. The COVID-19 pandemic had highlighted the significance of care work and exacerbated the burden of care for women. The burden and responsibilities of care work must therefore be redistributed. Migrant workers played a significant role in caring for older persons in many countries and should be taken into account when developing policies for the care economy. Investing in the care economy could enhance incomes, increase productivity, lead to more equitable economic recovery and growth and create decent jobs. A comprehensive and holistic approach was needed, engaging tripartite partners, representatives of carers and care recipients.
32. The Government member of Denmark, said that by investing in skills and professional development for care workers, high-quality care could be provided, better job opportunities created, and inclusive economic growth fostered. Decent work conditions, fair wages, and robust social protections must be ensured. Improved investment in care infrastructure and services was also needed, and young women should not be limited to caregiving responsibilities in their families. Rather, they should be given opportunities to advance their careers. The gender-segregated labour market must be addressed; segregation led to unequal opportunities. Policies were therefore needed to ensure equality, uphold equal pay, support parental leave for both parents, and promote family-friendly workplaces. The creation of inclusive workplaces that celebrated diversity was vital. Lastly, access to education and developmental opportunities would enable workers to succeed in an evolving world.

33. The Government member of Argentina said that in hearings before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights on the content of the right to care and its relation to other rights, his Government had stated the importance of care work, in particular for social and economic development and well-being. Social dialogue and collective bargaining played a key role in the defence of fundamental rights and had facilitated improvements in working conditions in Argentina, including: the extension of maternity and paternity leave periods; the creation of new leaves of absence for caregiving; the establishment of monetary compensation mechanisms for childcare expenses, and the provision of infrastructure for caregiving. The Government was also developing professional training and qualification systems that would improve both the quality of care services and workers' wages. Due to the cross-cutting and interdisciplinary nature of the care economy, the Committee should consider it in a coordinated and comprehensive manner in order to develop a common concept, analyse measures adopted for the proper functioning of the care economy, and identify priority actions for policy development to ensure that all people had access to quality care, and that care was provided with full respect for the rights of caregivers, of people to be cared for, and of those who wished to exercise self-care.
34. The Government member of Brazil said that care was a universal need and an essential activity for societies' and economies' well-being. Decent work in the care economy was crucial for achieving equal opportunities and equal pay for women and men in the world of work. Care was both a right and a public good, since it produced social and economic value that went beyond individual benefits. The current distribution and social organization of care was unfair, unequal, and unsustainable, with responsibility falling predominantly on (often disadvantaged) families and women. Lack of social co-responsibility and gender co-responsibility for care work overburdened women and compromised the enjoyment of their rights, contributing to the perpetuation of poverty and social inequality. Lack of legislative policies constituted structural discrimination, which prevented women, in particular women from minority groups, from participating in the labour market. Valuing care work (including domestic work), by tackling informality and creating public and legislative policies to correct highly feminized and racialized responsibility for care work, was essential for achieving egalitarian societies.
35. The Government member of the United States of America noted that care work was critical for the global economy, enabling full labour market participation by reassuring workers that the needs of their families and dependents were being met. Care work, particularly unpaid care work, was often undervalued, was a burden largely carried by women and girls. Care work often involved low wages, difficult working conditions difficult and exposure to violence and harassment. Flexible skills recognition and qualification frameworks could facilitate entry into care work, including for migrant workers. Informality was a challenge, especially for domestic workers, as it increased occupational safety and health risks, and left many without access to the basic labour and social protection. Freedom of association and collective bargaining could address current deficits in decent care work. Increased investment in the care economy could improve access to high-quality, affordable care, as well as enhancing care workers' skills, improving working conditions, increasing recruitment of men into the care workforce, addressing the unequal distribution of unpaid care work, and promoting work-life balance. Additional investment could also help reduce the inequalities associated with care work by improving societal perception of care work and care workers.
36. The Government member of Canada highlighted that addressing unpaid care work would contribute to achieving gender equality, economic growth and the SDGs, and was a priority for her Government. Most paid and unpaid care work in Canada was done by women, many of whom were migrants and racialized. Despite the importance of their work, those care workers often remained invisible, underpaid and undervalued. The care economy's contribution to the economy and to society must be recognized, along with the challenges faced by care workers in accessing labour and social protection. A common, internationally agreed understanding of the care economy was needed. Canada's international assistance policy took a feminist approach to redressing the disproportionate care work done by women and girls around the world.

37. The Government member of China highlighted the fundamental importance of care work, stressing that the demand for care work correlated with the number of pre-school-aged children and older people in the population. As people lived longer, the number of older persons with disabilities was growing, and the demand for care was increasing. In the context of smaller families, family care capabilities have been reduced and demand had shifted to social care. That growth in demand for care was driving the development of the care economy. From the supply side, the care economy required the care service system to provide infrastructure, including childcare and long-term care. Decent work in the care service system would not only address the care needs of infants, young children, and older persons with care needs, but could also increase employment of women. Public investment in childcare services, and the use of social policies to ensure care of persons with disabilities and older persons should be increased. Efforts to strengthen the care economy could include policies on training of care providers, social security, and employment protection (such as maternity).
38. The Government member of Honduras noted that, with regard to the care economy, the Honduran social, economic and political context was similar to the overall context in Latin America. Care work was undervalued, unfair and unpaid, and, in some cases, discriminatory and without social protection. Challenges included a lack of statistics in the care economy. Steps were being taken to ratify the ILO Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189).
39. The Government member of Philippines said that care workers from the Philippines provided care all over the world. The Committee must clearly define the scope of care work, establish which aspects of care work were paid and which were unpaid, and encourage the creation of policy spaces among Members for the ethical recruitment of migrant care workers, to be sustainably co-managed by care-provider and care-receiver countries. His Government had ratified ILO Convention No. 189 and incorporated it into national law in an effort to improve protection for workers engaged in domestic work by ensuring that, when locally hired, they were provided with protection at the place of employment and opportunities for decent and productive work.
40. The Government member of Namibia said that, in Namibia, care work was not necessarily considered to be work, but rather a family responsibility. The tendency to rely on women for childcare and eldercare meant that women struggled to access or advance in the labour market. The gender dimension of care was not acknowledged by policymakers, owing to a lack of data. While issues of childcare and specialized eldercare were not considered to be societal issues, demographic change meant that extended family "safety nets" for care were shrinking. Older people were often required to care for their grandchildren. Funding care services and ensuring that care work was decent work were crucial, especially since those who most needed care were those who could least afford it. A comprehensive understanding of the multifaceted nature of the care economy was essential, with consideration of issues related to how care was provided by families, employment, provision of social protection, and funding. The care economy crossed sectors, policy frameworks and budgets, with only some aspects of care work covered by collective bargaining.

41. The Government member of Côte d'Ivoire, affirming his Government's commitment to social justice, said that various initiatives had been undertaken to incorporate Côte d'Ivoire's commitments under international law, in particular on the right to work for persons with disabilities and on the provision of social protection for the most vulnerable, into domestic legislation. Steps had been taken in that regard to put decent work at the forefront of its development strategy, as a key aspect of guaranteeing the security, health and well-being of all.
42. The United Nations Special Rapporteur on Extreme Poverty and Human Rights commended the ILO for its report on decent work in the care economy. Unemployment and underemployment levels remained high, yet official figures did not account for those who left employment owing to circumstances beyond their control, including lack of childcare. Some 470 million people would be seeking jobs in developing countries by 2035. Yet there would not be a shortage of jobs. Meeting the care needs of the global population would require an additional 170 million jobs. The care economy must provide decent jobs. The COVID-19 pandemic had highlighted not only that care work was vital but also that it was often significantly underpaid.
43. The representative of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights said that the COVID-19 pandemic had underscored the essential role of care and support systems. Care and support systems must be redesigned from a human rights perspective, to advance the rights of workers, whether paid or unpaid, and the recipients of care and support. Access to decent work and social protection for care workers should be guaranteed. Transformation must not, however, lead to increased institutionalized care. It must promote family unity, create residency pathways, address discrimination and strengthen protections for migrant workers. Care and support systems must be gender-responsive, disability-inclusive and age-sensitive. The value of care and support must be recognized, and unpaid care must be reduced and redistributed. Investment in care and support promoted a human rights economy that would enhance social well-being, equality and inclusion.
44. The representative of UN Women said that the time had come to recalibrate the approach to sustainable development to connect care work, gender equality, economic prosperity and social well-being. There were over 14 times as many working-age women as men outside the labour market, owing to unpaid care responsibilities. Care was central to the UN Women vision for social and economic transformation and its mandate of advancing the full realization of women's rights and opportunities. Care needs must be addressed through a life-course approach, from childhood to old age. The value of unpaid care work must be acknowledged, public investment in essential services and social protection must be enhanced, pay and working conditions for paid care work must be improved and the rights and contributions of caregivers and care recipients must be recognized. The partnership between UN Women and the ILO had been instrumental in bringing gender equality, the care economy and decent work to the forefront of the global agenda. Decent work for all women and a thriving care economy must not be mere aspirations.
45. The representative of the Economic Council for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC) said that care was essential throughout the life course as a means of guaranteeing quality of life for all. Governments in the Latin American and Caribbean region had recognized care as essential work, and as a key sector for revitalizing economies, through the Buenos Aires Commitment, adopted in 2022. Population ageing, epidemics and climate change were likely to vastly increase the demand for care work. A care crisis must be averted by building a future in which care burdens were shared equitably, and time and resources were redistributed for a paradigm shift to a new, more egalitarian type of development and society. To do so, care objectives must be incorporated into all public policies, including on employment, labour, health, social protection, the environment, and macroeconomic and fiscal policies.

46. The representative of the World Health Organization (WHO) said that the global care workforce had been exposed to decades of chronic underinvestment, which had hindered global progress towards gender equality. Evidence had shown that addressing such underinvestment could simultaneously strengthen health systems and women's economic empowerment, provided the care work was decent work. Governments could use the WHO Global Health and Care Worker Compact to inform policies and legislation to protect and support health and care workers. Partnerships should be built across sectors to facilitate dialogue, evidence and information sharing, and policy changes, all of which would enhance the value, recognition and impact of the care economy.
47. The representative of the International Cooperative Alliance said that community-based cooperatives were a unique and innovative model for the provision of care, which was rapidly increasing in popularity. They were resilient care providers, ensuring affordable, uninterrupted care services, with good quality working conditions for caregivers. Multistakeholder governance allowed cooperatives to take account of the interests of various parties and to raise finances from multiple sources. ILO constituents were invited to promote cooperative provision of care as a community-based solution to address care gaps.
48. The representative of UNI Global Union said that all care work must be decent work. Too often, home and community care workers were in the informal economy without access to social protection. Many did not receive adequate training and in many countries care workers were overworked owing to staff shortages. Lack of access to decent work hampered quality of care. To ensure decent work for all care workers, governments and employers must formalize all care work, provide comprehensive training and professional development activities, ensure safe staffing numbers and guarantee all care workers the right to join unions and engage in collective bargaining.
49. The representative of the International Domestic Workers' Federation said that decent work conditions were not being realized for domestic workers, the majority of whom were women; domestic work remained invisible to governments, employers and society as a whole, yet domestic workers accounted for 25 per cent of the global workforce. Domestic work, in all its forms, should be recognized, and effective public policies should be put in place to promote decent work, gender equality and sustainable development.
50. The representative of Public Services International said that as a childcare worker, she had endured long working hours, physically difficult work and low pay, as a migrant woman with no access to paid medical leave or holiday, no formal training and a constantly changing job description. Despite the increasing global demand for care, care workers' working conditions had not improved. A radical new approach to care was needed, which not only valued and supported the workforce but also delivered better quality of care for all, underpinned by gender equality. The public nature of care must be reclaimed, with the State being primarily responsible for good quality care services.
51. The representative of Make Mothers Matter said that women who were mothers suffered discrimination in accessing and advancing in the labour market. While the gender pay gap was largely due to motherhood, data in that regard was lacking. A statistical framework was therefore needed to measure, monitor and address the motherhood penalty. The links between unpaid and paid care work should be recognized, and a holistic approach should be taken to decent work. The time had come for a paradigm shift to a world of work that should adapt to workers with care responsibilities.

52. The representative of the Intercontinental Network for the Promotion of Social and Solidarity Economy said that the care economy must be advanced in a human rights framework, both for users and providers of care services. The social and solidarity economy provided good quality, affordable care that respected the rights of care workers, including in the transition from the informal to the formal economy. The Committee's conclusions should support the social and solidarity economy as a contributor to the care economy as a global public good.
53. The representative of the Institution of Occupational Safety and Health said that while care work, paid and unpaid, represented humanity and sustained communities and societies, care workers were commonly undervalued and overlooked. Many domestic and informal care workers did not have decent work and were excluded from social protection. Workers in care-related jobs were among the most vulnerable in society, with migrant and ethnic minority women disproportionately affected. Care work must be transformed, through sustainable investment in human capital and decent work in the care economy.
54. The Representative of StreetNet International, speaking also on behalf of HomeNet International, said that street-based and home-based workers around the world suffered from lack of access to care services. They must be recognized as workers and participants in social dialogue, allowed access to affordable childcare and eldercare facilities and given full maternity benefits. Social and solidarity economy and cooperatives for childcare and eldercare services should be recognized. All workers should have access to care, and should enjoy the rights to decent work and dignity.
55. The representative of International Young Christian Workers, also speaking on behalf of International Coordination of Young Christian Workers, said that care workers often faced poor working conditions, low wages and lack of recognition. Decent work was crucial for a thriving care economy. Fair compensation, safe working conditions and social protection should be afforded to all care givers. Greater public investment in care was required, along with its recognition as a public good.
56. The representative of Social and Solidarity Economy International Forum welcomed the fact that the Office report mentioned cooperatives among the community groups providing care. Social and solidarity economy enterprises and organizations had a key role to play in bridging gaps and contributing to a more resilient and better functioning care economy. When considering policies on and investment in the care economy, ILO constituents should take account of the role of the social and solidarity economy and cooperatives in care provision.
57. The representative of the International Catholic Migration Commission said that care was work and work was care. Care was a way of being, doing and existing that implied dignity, generosity, freedom and responsibility, inspired by concern for unity. In the world of work, caring should pay particular attention to migrants and refugees. The ILO 5R Framework was particularly welcome in that regard. Work that did not care and did not respect the dignity of workers could not be considered decent. Work that cared for and contributed to the restoration of human dignity would contribute to a sustainable future.
58. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said it was clear that there was common recognition that a well-functioning care economy would be to the benefit of all. The care economy required a holistic policy approach, which went beyond normative measures and spanned economic, social and fiscal policies. Decent work in the care economy did not only require a human rights-based approach; it required a principles-based approach, involving considerations for institutions and their roles, economic incentives and development. Care as a human right would require a universally agreed definition of care. The Employers' group would prefer not to enter into a discussion on that topic, since it would require an in-depth mapping of the care economy as a whole, which was complex and cross-sectoral. Care as a human right should therefore not be addressed in the Committee's conclusions. Collective bargaining was not necessarily the best tool to address bottlenecks or gaps in the labour market. Collective bargaining required a formal employment relationship, which was not in place for many care workers. Collective bargaining was part of social dialogue, and when referred to in the Committee's conclusions, the language used should be in line with that of the Centenary Declaration. The conclusions should be pragmatic and progressive and focus on the care economy, which is distinct from the social and solidarity economy. It must not overlook the role of micro, small and medium-sized enterprises (MSMEs) in care provision. Care was not only a public good; private care providers had better resources and incentives to innovate and could provide more effective treatment and personalized care than public care settings. Competition drove continuous service improvement. The impact of increased regulation, such as paid leave entitlements, on MSMEs with limited capacities must be taken into account, and consultations with employers would be essential to assess its potential costs. Governments were responsible for building care infrastructure and expanding social protection. The Employers' group strongly discouraged the use of language regarding the social contract. The social contract would be the subject of discussion at the forthcoming World Social Summit, the work of which must not be pre-empted.

59. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that, in the midst of a care crisis, the Committee's discussion was timely. A clear agenda must be set for the future. She noted that several points of alignment had arisen throughout the discussion. The ILO and its constituents must work together to transform the realities of the millions of people struggling to balance work and caring responsibilities. Care should be reinforced as essential to the pursuit of the Centenary Declaration. Public investment in comprehensive care systems was essential. The Committee's conclusions should constitute a clear road map for the ILO and its constituents, grounded in a common tripartite understanding of the care economy, embracing the 5R Framework and understanding care as a human right and a public good. The conclusions must recognize the interdependence of decent work for all care workers and the quality of care services, and should acknowledge the crucial role of social dialogue, freedom of association and collective bargaining in building a resilient and well-functioning care economy.

Point for discussion 2

What are the gaps, and what effective measures have ILO constituents taken towards a resilient and well-functioning care economy that promotes decent work, gender equality, quality and accessible care services, and inclusive and sustainable economic and social development?

60. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that cuts in public funding and chronic underinvestment had contributed to fragmentation and significant gaps in national care systems, which had been exposed and exacerbated by the COVID-19 pandemic. Millions of people worldwide were either not receiving the care and support they needed or were receiving suboptimal care at high costs. The most vulnerable, marginalized and disadvantaged were impacted disproportionately. Care was marked by widespread decent work deficits; millions of care workers provided essential care services in dire working conditions, risking their health for little or inadequate pay. They faced discrimination, violence and harassment, work-related hazards, excessive working hours, heavy workloads and poor work-life balance. Those who tended to face multiple and intersecting forms of discrimination, including racialized and migrant workers, tended to be over-represented in low-paid and low status jobs.

61. Care work was physically and emotionally demanding, yet the skills required were not always recognized or valued, and workers often lacked access to training, lifelong learning and promotion opportunities. Care workers often faced obstacles to joining trade unions and bargaining collectively, which left them particularly vulnerable and exposed them to exploitation and abuse. The numerous challenges faced by care workers, coupled with inadequate public funding, had resulted in an increase in insecure, precarious and informal work, labour shortages and understaffing. Many care workers were leaving their profession, which contributed to staff shortages and declining quality of care. Migrant workers were increasingly filling those workforce gaps, and by doing so exacerbated brain drain in their home countries. The care gaps they left behind would inevitably be filled by unpaid carers, most of whom would be women. Migrant care workers' visas were often tied to a particular employer, and live-in domestic workers in particular encountered exploitation and abuse throughout the migration cycle. Domestic work and community health work remained largely invisible, and as a result, workers were excluded from social protection and decent wages.
62. Care leave policies and family-friendly policies, such as flexible working arrangements, could help reduce the amount of unpaid care work done predominantly by women, and facilitate better work-life balance. Paid paternity leave and parental leave entitlements would support men's involvement in childcare, breaking down gender stereotypes and redistributing the care burden. Gaps in legislation and investment for care leave, however, together with a lack of access to care services, had a disproportionate impact on women's effective labour force participation and thus contributed to the gender pay gap and gender pension gap.
63. For the care economy to be resilient and function well, care must be recognized as a global public good, which would ensure comprehensive care systems, universal access to care, and gender-responsive social protection. States must take the lead and increase the public funding needed to generate decent jobs, putting in place comprehensive policy and regulatory frameworks for national care systems grounded in international labour standards and social dialogue, and guided by the 5R Framework. Such policy frameworks should cover all care workers, including those in the informal economy and should ensure that all workers with family or caring responsibilities were covered by paid care leave entitlements. Fundamental principles and rights at work should be respected for all care workers, irrespective of their employment or migration status. Freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining were enabling rights. Targeted measures should be taken to address discrimination and redress the undervaluation of paid care work. Wage policies and wage-setting mechanisms were needed to promote gender equality, equity and non-discrimination. Migrant care workers' labour and social protection rights must be upheld, including through bilateral agreements between countries of origin and destination and rights-based migration pathways. International standards on the fair and ethical recruitment of migrant workers must be respected. Destination countries must reduce over-reliance on migrant care workers, while countries of origin must boost efforts to retain the care workforce. Increased public investment in care would require revenue generation and broad fiscal space; external debt burdens prevented States from investing in care and must be addressed.
64. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that, on the supply side, workforce shortages in the care economy affected various sectors: global shortages of 4.5 million nurses and 10 million health workers were expected by 2030. To meet the challenges posed by those shortages, the private sector would complement and boost public sector care and care provided by families. The professional development of care workers was essential for creating career pathways and opportunities for advancement to make care jobs more attractive. Comprehensive vocational training and certification, and the mutual recognition of skills could elevate the quality of care and improve workers' job satisfaction and retention, while also improving the quality of care services provided.

65. Over-reliance on unpaid work, done primarily by women, impacted women's participation in the labour market. Women's economic inclusion was crucial, yet a lack of affordable, accessible and good quality care services prevented many women from seeking paid employment. Care systems must be transformed through infrastructure expansion and technological innovation, and an attitudinal change was needed to recognize the economic value of care. Despite the crucial role of care in economies and societies, the global care economy remained under-funded. Quality care services required public investment in facilities and social protection systems, including care credits in social insurance, childcare subsidies and unemployment and disability benefits. Such public investment should not place undue burdens on companies.
66. MSMEs and entrepreneurs were vital to the care economy, providing essential services and employment opportunities while fostering community engagement and innovation. They offered accessible solutions tailored to local needs and generated employment opportunities. However, they often lacked the resources, technical support and information and networking opportunities needed to improve their services and expand their operations. Government support should therefore be provided in the form of capacity-building, entrepreneurial skills development, targeted microfinance and venture capital for start-ups, among others. Such measures were particularly important for women, for whom entrepreneurship could be a means to achieve flexibility, control and balance in managing care responsibilities. The informal nature of the care economy must be addressed by incentivizing the formalization of micro and small enterprises.
67. Family-friendly employment policies and flexible working arrangements could help reconcile work with care responsibilities, ensuring that companies' and workers' needs were met. Such arrangements could help increase women's labour participation rates. Major leave entitlements could be a significant burden for MSMEs; extended leave entitlements, such as parental leave, were more feasible for large employers. Private employment services should be supported since they played a key role in matching care workers with suitable employers. Collaboration between private employment services and public employment programmes could broaden job opportunities in the care economy. Policies to expand the care services provided by the private sector were essential, including financial incentives, such as tax breaks, for companies investing in care services. Public-private partnerships could be effective for leveraging private sector resources, such as for the construction or renovation of healthcare facilities. Partnerships with technology companies could be used to enhance telemedicine, electronic health records and data analytics, all of which could contribute significantly to meeting the growing demand for care services.
68. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that North Macedonia, Montenegro, Serbia, Albania, Ukraine, the Republic of Moldova, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Georgia and Norway aligned themselves with her statement. The majority of both paid and unpaid care work was done by women, often with inadequate remuneration, leading to a gender employment gap and a gender pay gap. Policies and measures must be developed to address the value of care work, promote the transition to formality, ensure decent work and equal pay for work of equal value, and eliminate violence and harassment in the care economy. Unpaid care work inhibited women's participation in the labour market and lowered their economic self-sufficiency. Equal sharing of care between women and men and the provision of high-quality affordable care services were therefore key to women's economic empowerment.

69. Active labour market policies were needed to help all those who had withdrawn from the labour force due to care responsibilities. Such policies could include employment opportunities, training, upskilling and reskilling, and employment services for jobseekers. Effective and robust social dialogue in the care economy were crucial, as were broader labour policies for the improvement of work–life balance, family leave and family-friendly working time arrangements. Access to high-quality affordable childcare and long-term care services, including through the social and solidarity economy, would improve possibilities for combining work and care responsibilities throughout the life course.
70. The Government member of Barbados said that deficiencies had been identified in the care economy in Barbados, including gaps in labour and social protection, lack of a policy and legislation on sexual harassment and discrimination, the absence of a national minimum wage, lack of occupational safety and health in domestic contexts, insufficient training and lack of accessible early childhood education. Steps had been taken to bridge those gaps, including the ratification of the ILO Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190), and ILO Convention No.189, and the provision of training in early childhood education and eldercare, measures to grant paternity leave to fathers, as well as the development of national policies on ageing and on improving the lives of persons with disabilities. The national protocol on migrant labour was being revised. Despite those efforts, much remained to be done, in particular to ensure that occupational safety and health standards were upheld in domestic workplaces.
71. The Government member of Cuba said it had adopted a new Family Code, which contained provisions on co-responsibility and which cemented the key role of the State in putting in place programmes and policies for persons in need of care. The Code included provisions on respect for dignity and autonomy and set out the rights and responsibilities of care givers and care recipients. It prohibited violence and balanced care responsibilities with personal, professional and family aspirations, while also recognizing the importance of support networks for carers. Along with other legislative revisions in Cuba over recent years, the adoption of the new Code had been central to establishing Cuba’s national system of care as an integral part of life. Data and evidence were essential to inform public policies on the care workforce. One of the most significant challenges was to overcome the tendency to allocate roles on the basis of gender stereotypes. Education would be crucial in that regard.
72. The Government member of the United Kingdom said that in the United Kingdom, social protection for care workers was established in law; legislation had been enacted concerning matters such as carer’s leave, flexible working arrangements and equal pay. A national living wage had been instituted and a carer’s allowance provided for financial support for full-time carers. Inclusive initiatives were in place to support women and persons with disabilities in the world of work. A campaign for women’s economic empowerment was driving economic, policy and care sector reform to reward and redistribute care work, while a disability inclusion and rights strategy was being implemented to improve access to care services for persons with disabilities. Social protection and gender equality, which were key to achieving economic and social development, depended on the availability of inclusive, good quality and accessible care services.
73. The Government member of Australia said that expert panels had been established on pay equity and on the care and community sector in Australia’s national workplace relations tribunal, to review care workers’ wages. Fee-free vocational education was provided for certain care work qualifications. Respectful workplaces were promoted, and employers had a positive duty to eliminate harassment. Community-led and culturally sensitive services were being piloted in First Nations communities, targeted to local needs. Legislative amendments had been made to guarantee migrant workers equal workplace rights to others. Carers of older persons and persons with disabilities had access to flexible income support and working arrangements. Flexible work arrangements were also in place for parents of young children. A childcare subsidy would help parents, women in particular, to engage in paid work. Men were being encouraged to take paternity leave. Parental leave payments would soon include superannuation, which would reduce the gender gap in retirement contributions. Cross-sector coordination was important.

74. The Government member of Switzerland said that Switzerland was party to ILO Convention No. 189, and as such was committed to the protection of the rights of domestic workers. An increasing demand for care services in private homes was resulting in more migrant workers coming to Switzerland for temporary work. A specific contract for domestic workers had thus been introduced, to guarantee them equal labour rights. Regarding paid care work, an initiative to bolster nursing care was being undertaken, under which nursing training was being promoted and access to good quality nursing care was guaranteed. New legislation was being prepared to improve working conditions for nurses, with a view to encouraging retention and preventing staffing shortages. Those measures were helping to redress gender imbalances in the healthcare sector. A national survey of care workers was due to take place, to assess the impacts of the initiatives undertaken.
75. The Government member of Türkiye said that increasing the interest of the international community in the care economy was crucial for bridging gaps in decent work. Leveraging new technologies would be key to enhancing efficiency, reducing costs and improving the quality of care services. The ILO should provide guidance on well-functioning care economy models, including a compendium of best practices from its Member States.
76. The Government member of Mexico said that her Government was creating a new national care system, which set out care modalities for children, persons with disabilities and older persons, based on the principles of universality, progress and sustainability. The system would: ensure that care needs were met by good quality and accessible services; relieve the care burden on women, allowing them to join the labour market; and boost employment and economic growth. Equitable distribution of care would also benefit peace, security and environmental sustainability. The new care system would have gender equality at its heart. Key measures to promote decent work and gender equality in the care economy included: paid care leave, including maternity and paternity leave; preschool and early childhood education and eldercare services; care cooperatives; professional training schemes; and policies for equal treatment of migrant care workers.
77. The Government member of Brazil said that the gender and racial division of care work was rooted in discrimination and determined how jobs were valued. Her Government was trying to overcome the challenges of that reality by developing a comprehensive national care policy and plan to guarantee all people the right to care. The plan sought to ensure access to quality care, promote decent work for care workers, implement measures to balance work and care responsibilities and promote co-responsibility for care between the State, private companies and communities. Care was not a commodity. It was a human right and a public good. Unpaid care work should be redistributed, and decent jobs must be guaranteed. The Government of Brazil had set up a coordination office to promote equal opportunities at work, with a focus on tackling gender-based and racial discrimination and eliminating informality in paid domestic work. A specialized labour inspectorate had been established to enforce the rights of domestic workers. The elimination of domestic slave labour was a priority.

78. The Government member of Canada said that decent work deficits and labour shortages negatively affected the quality of care services and could increase the burden on unpaid caregivers. Her Government was working with provincial, territorial and indigenous partners to give all families in Canada access to high-quality, affordable, flexible and inclusive early learning and childcare. An early learning and childcare workforce strategy was being developed, based on recruitment, retention and recognition. Steps were being taken to address decent work deficits and labour shortages in long-term and home care, and to develop a specific indigenous long-term and continuing care framework, to ensure culturally safe long-term and continuing care programming and services in or near indigenous communities. Maternity and parental leave and childcare benefits were provided to support working women during pregnancy and motherhood. The Government had recently announced the development of a national caregiving strategy, as well as a new programme for migrant workers to grant home care workers permanent residence on arrival in Canada. At the international level, the Government was contributing financial assistance for gender transformative unpaid and paid care work programming in low- and middle-income countries.
79. The Government member of China said that her Government was taking measures to promote decent work and the care economy, including pilot programmes for the provision of long-term care and a long-term care insurance scheme, which covered 49 municipalities across 27 provinces. A cross-sectoral approach was being taken. Social security contributions needed to be at 70 per cent for individuals to benefit from the long-term care provisions. Long-term care workers were being trained and the number of care staff in the areas covered by the pilot programmes had reached 300,000. The programme had bolstered the perception of care work and attracted more people to the care workforce. In some provinces, measures were in place to retain women in the labour market, including maternity insurance, which ensured paid maternity leave, as well as flexible working hours and breastfeeding policies.
80. The Government member of the United States said that an Executive Order had been passed in the United States to boost the supply of childcare and long-term care and to support family caregivers, in line with which measures were being taken to: increase compensation and benefits for childcare workers, early childhood educators and long-term care professions; expand learning opportunities to improve job quality and attract new entrants to the care workforce; improve jobs for domestic workers; and improve the quality of data on the care workforce. Employment agreements for domestic workers and their employers had been published in seven languages. Legislation had been enacted to protect workers from wage theft and prohibit violations of leave protection entitlements for family caregivers. A comprehensive approach was being taken to prevent gender-based violence and harassment. The 5R Framework had been incorporated into the national strategy for women's economic security, which aimed for women and girls to meaningfully and equally contribute to and benefit from economic growth and global prosperity.
81. The Government member of Namibia said that legacies of Namibia's apartheid system included low wages and poor working conditions for domestic workers, who constituted around 11 per cent of the national workforce. Although legislative measures had been taken to regulate domestic work, the minimum wage for domestic workers had stagnated. A new national minimum wage had recently been set, however, which would effectively double the minimum wage for domestic workers, constituting a first step towards eliminating income inequality and gender pay gaps. Given the prevalence of informality, application of the new minimum wage was likely to be challenging initially, although compliance was expected to increase progressively in tandem with real economic growth. Amendments to the Labour Act, currently before Parliament, would include automatic cost of living increases in statutory minimum wages, and provisions on maternity protection and the right to breastfeeding, family leave for fathers, occupational safety and health, and the prohibition of violence and harassment in the workplace.

82. The Government member of Zimbabwe said that the care economy was characterized by serious decent work deficits and deprivation of workers' labour rights. Care and domestic workers were exposed to high levels of harassment and violence at work. Unpaid work constituted a significant share of care work; in many parts of Africa, community healthcare work was considered voluntary. Most care workers in Zimbabwe were employed informally and therefore lacked access to sick leave or care leave, occupational safety and health and social protection. Care workers were left vulnerable to exploitation, and the lack of decent work weakened the quality of care provided. Progressive measures were, however, being taken to bridge decent work gaps and formalize the care economy, and to enable care workers to join trade unions and bargain collectively. Training for social workers had been successful and national guidelines on labour migration were being developed in response to the increasing demand for Zimbabwean social workers abroad.
83. The Government member of the Philippines said that laws and practices had been put in place for the protection of healthcare workers, caregivers, teachers and domestic workers in the Philippines. Gaps in protection persisted owing to: broad informality, which hampered access to labour and social protection; and gender inequality, which resulted in exclusions and discrimination. Her Government had taken measures to address those challenges by providing universal social protection and universal health coverage, conducting reviews of labour legislation, strengthening labour inspection and actively engaging with workers' and employer's groups. Meanwhile, the global care economy relied largely on migrant care workers, many of whom were from the Philippines. Those workers faced challenges in access to decent employment, owing to the non-recognition of their qualifications. Given the disproportionate prevalence of women in the care workforce, gender perspectives must be integrated into policymaking and the unequal distribution of unpaid care work must be addressed. Her Government was collaborating bilaterally with other governments to promote sustainable and ethical recruitment and rights-based labour migration, promote the use of standard employment contracts, provide upskilling opportunities, and promote decent work for Filipino migrant workers through a whole-of-society and whole-of-government approach.
84. The Government member of the Democratic Republic of the Congo said that internationally recognized statistical standards for care work were lacking. The conceptual framework and indicators applicable to care work, due to be considered by the 22nd International Conference of Labour Statisticians, would encourage consistency and comparability of data at the international level. The burden of unpaid care work was disproportionately shouldered by women and hampered their access to employment in managerial and decision-making roles, and thus to higher salaries. Unpaid care work was often provided by family members and was thus not legally recognized as work. Legislative and institutional mechanisms relevant to decent work and the care economy were in place, but the war in the east of the country posed serious challenges to their implementation, causing mass displacement and lack of access to healthcare. Despite those challenges, measures such as free maternity care, free basic education and universal health coverage had been successful.
85. The Government member of Senegal said that the care economy was growing fast and had become a means of generating employment and tackling gender inequality. It remained, however, associated with various negative aspects, including: lack of social protection for workers, inadequate remuneration, exposure to physical and psychological violence, and in some cases, sexual abuse. The care economy had a key role in the functioning of households and communities. An agenda had thus been set for long-term economic and social reform. Legislative reform was under way, policies had been put in place for the provision of social protection and basic infrastructure to redistribute care responsibilities between women and men, and a new framework for a social and solidarity economy had been put in place. A national policy for early childhood provided for pre-school care, thereby enabling mothers to work. An increase in healthcare facilities had enhanced training and professional integration for healthcare workers. An action plan for decent work and equal opportunities in the care economy provided for a balanced sharing of family responsibilities between women and men. Affordable social protection, adapted to the needs of women, provided legal and financial support and reduced the financial burden of child rearing. A UN Women project for the redistribution of unpaid work between women and men had been under way since 2021 to find solutions for the unpaid care needs of rural women.

86. The Government member of Egypt said that several measures had been taken in Egypt to promote gender equality and women's economic empowerment, including the establishment of a special unit in the Ministry of Labour, responsible for eliminating all forms of discrimination. A national plan for gender equality had been adopted and the capacities of labour inspectors had been strengthened with a focus on issues such as gender equality, the application of international labour standards and the rights of domestic workers. The ILO had provided guidance in the preparation of a manual for labour inspectors on gender equality and a just transition and on training women for work in high-level professions and entrepreneurship. Legislation on domestic workers was under preparation. A national campaign had been launched to accelerate societal change to eliminate gender inequality, and public-private dialogue was being encouraged to increase private sector investment in childcare facilities.
87. The Government member of Sri Lanka said that labour law was being reformed in Sri Lanka, which would improve the terms and conditions of employment and would benefit the care economy. A national policy and action plan on migration had been launched to improve labour migration governance, secure migrant workers' rights and promote opportunities for employment. In collaboration with the ILO and the International Organization for Migration (IOM) the Sri Lankan Government had: produced an evidence-based report on the care economy and decent work in Sri Lanka; developed demand-driven skills training to promote paid care work; and developed a labour migration strategy for caregiving and hospitality sectors to increase the employability of Sri Lankan labour migrants, in particular women, in countries of destination. Further technical collaboration with the ILO and IOM was planned, to develop an integrated approach to tackle the challenges faced by care workers in Sri Lanka, including through gender-responsive care policies, a new maternity insurance scheme, a digital application for registering domestic workers and including them in social protection coverage, and measures to strengthen skills development.
88. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that care must be recognized as a public good, requiring comprehensive public care systems and adequate public financing. Well-funded care policies and regulatory frameworks should be developed in a coherent, integrated and complementary manner. They must be grounded in international labour standards and social dialogue, and based on the recognition, reduction and redistribution of unpaid care work and the 5R Framework. Workers voices must be included in the design, implementation and monitoring of care systems. Increased public investments in care, through progressive taxation and broadening fiscal space, would ensure universal access to quality care services throughout the life course, including for the most marginalized and disadvantaged communities. Public investments were needed to improve wages and ensure equal pay for work of equal value and decent working conditions, by, among others: supporting formalization of care work, recognizing and enhancing workers' skills, addressing labour shortages, redressing unequal distribution of unpaid care work and improving work-life balance for families with care responsibilities. Care, just like labour, was not a commodity; it was a right. If profit was the sole motive for care, it came at the expense of decent work for care workers and quality of care for recipients, and access to care for those who could not afford high user fees. Public-private partnerships had proven costly for governments in the long term. Social dialogue and collective bargaining had been key drivers of advancements in the care economy. The rights to freedom of association and collective bargaining must therefore be guaranteed for all care workers.

89. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the terms "precarious" and "insecure" forms of work were not agreed definitions in the ILO context but were based on subjective interpretations. Their use in the current context ran the risk of stigmatizing workers in the care economy. Work could be done in diverse forms and under various arrangements, which allowed for greater opportunities to enter the labour market and escape poverty. Mental health diagnoses were complex and influenced by multiple factors and were therefore difficult to link directly to working conditions. While mental health was an important issue, it could not be addressed through regulation. Rather, employers should be supported in implementing good practices to assess and manage psychosocial risks and encouraging a culture of dialogue and pragmatic action in the workplace.
90. The rights to freedom of association and collective bargaining should not be referred to as "enabling rights", since that language was not aligned with the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization (2008), as amended in 2022. Furthermore, collective bargaining is considered a form of social dialogue, which includes other forms such as tripartite cooperation, bipartite cooperation and workplace cooperation. More than 80 per cent of the formal economy did not use collective bargaining agreements as a tool of social dialogue; it was more important to build a culture of trust among social partners.
91. The concept of the "living" wage should be operationalized in line with ILO principles on wage setting. To achieve a "living" wage, the involvement of the State would be crucial, and the root causes of low pay, informality, low productivity, and weak institutions and compliance systems must be addressed. On equal pay for work of equal value, the pay gap was caused by a multiplicity of factors and could only be addressed through social dialogue, in consultation with employers, to re-evaluate care work, according to diverse national contexts and situations faced by care workers. Lastly, while migrant workers in the care economy must be protected, the legal pathways to bring skilled workers into the care economy must be up to date. Smooth processes must be in place to make work permits available for foreign workers to be able to contribute to filling skills gaps.

Point for discussion 3

In light of the ILO's mandate, transformations in the world of work, and developments in the care economy, what priority actions should the ILO's constituents and the International Labour Office take to promote, advance, and support coherent and integrated policies and investments in the care economy, including through social dialogue, multilateral coordination and partnerships?

92. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that, in the context of transformations in the world of work, the ILO and its constituents should prioritize coherent, integrated policies and public investments in the care economy. The care economy contributed significantly to a healthier workforce, which could increase productivity, give businesses and economies a competitive advantage and enhance overall business performance. The business case for a well-functioning care economy should be reflected in the policy recommendations proposed by the Office in the 5R Framework. The Framework, however, lacked market incentives and flexibility that drove innovation, efficiency and scale. Employers needed public policies that provided such incentives for businesses to innovate and improve care delivery. Moreover, the Framework should emphasize that continuous professional development and training for care workers were essential to deliver high-quality care. Policies should support investment in vocational training, apprenticeships, skills recognition and lifelong learning opportunities. Initiatives to boost career progression and professional recognition should make care work an attractive career option. The ILO should support its constituents in ensuring that their policies covered the full spectrum of care workers, from high-skilled to low-skilled.

93. She cautioned that directly attributing increased care demands to climate change was an oversimplification, and that integrating climate change considerations into the care economy could divert attention from care needs. The ILO would do better to support its constituents in improving care services, training care workers and enhancing infrastructure. More research was needed on the potential benefits of public-private partnerships. ILO research on attraction and retention strategies for care workers could also be helpful. The ILO should focus on its mandate, rather than broader issues such as progressive taxes or mental health, concentrating on local realities and constituents' needs at the national level.
94. Employers needed policies that would help manage costs, while improving care quality. The 5R Framework should encourage the use of cost-effective solutions and technology that enhanced efficiency. It should include provisions for financial support mechanisms, such as subsidies or low-interest loans, for care providers to help manage the initial costs of implementing improved care standards. Governments could provide tax breaks for investment in care infrastructure and workforce development, subsidies for technology adoption, or grants for research and development in care services. Risk-sharing between the public and private sectors could help mitigate the financial burden on businesses. Without adequate resources, other components of the 5R Framework could not be fully realized. The rights-based approach should be complemented with economic, operational, and practical considerations, and a comprehensive approach would ensure that care systems were not only equitable but also effective and sustainable. A sixth "R": "resources", should be added to the 5R Framework, to represent the financial support mechanisms and continuous investment needed for workforce development.
95. Central to ILO constituents tailoring the 6R Framework is a strong focus on social dialogue. Effective social dialogue was crucial to create policies that balanced the needs of care enterprises with those of the workforce, and that developed strategies for businesses to thrive while supporting decent work. The Office should continue carrying out research and building constituents' technical capacities in labour migration, social protection, gender equality, sustainable enterprises, tackling informality, public-private partnerships, employment and macroeconomic policies. Further attention should be paid to talent mobility, including policies that facilitated work permits and recognized the skills and qualifications of migrant care workers.
96. The Office should support ILO constituents in adopting a balanced mix of normative and non-normative actions as recommended by the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group. Technical support and guidance on maternity protection was needed, moving from employers' liability to social security schemes for financing maternity benefits. That shift should be supported by comprehensive childcare infrastructure and incentives for mothers to return to work. Measures to promote decent work in the care economy should support public and private care providers alike. Arguments against privatization often overlooked its benefits; privatization introduced competition, which drove innovation, which in turn improved care quality. Privatized care did not prioritize profit over patient care. Many private institutions reinvested profits into services. They underwent rigorous oversight and invested in the workforce, which resulted in better patient outcomes and organizational success.

97. Lastly, non-normative actions were required to address gaps in paternity and parental protection; promoting healthier families and balanced gender roles would sustain societal change. Stringent leave policies could, however, discourage companies from hiring young parents and could place a burden on small and medium-sized enterprises.
98. The Worker Vice-Chairperson called for the ILO to further develop its comprehensive work on the care economy across its strategic objectives. It should increase work to monitor public investment trends in care, pay and working conditions of care workers, quality of care service provision and employment. The decision to launch an international statistical standard-setting process on care work was welcome. The process should consider all forms of unpaid and paid care work, including work performed by domestic workers, community health workers and community care workers.
99. Member States should enhance their efforts to build national integrated care systems. To that end, ILO could convene a tripartite meeting of experts to examine how to address gaps in the care economy, including through normative or non-normative action, to recognize care as a public good and provide practical guidance to ILO constituents on how to design, implement, and monitor national integrated care systems, in line with the 5R Framework.
100. The ILO should provide technical support and policy guidance to countries, including through the Decent Work Country Programmes and the United Nations Global Accelerator on Jobs and Social Protection for Just Transitions, for the development of national care policy and regulatory frameworks to ensure universal access to care, and promote the professionalization and formalization of care jobs. Such policy and regulatory frameworks would also ensure the highest attainable standards of quality, safety and health for care workers and care recipients, and would be guided by the 5R Framework and based on social dialogue. Technical support should include guidance on how to recognize and value unpaid and paid care work in employment policy frameworks and social protection systems, including through the use of care credits. Such support and guidance should focus on ensuring sustainable and adequate financing for care, including by conducting a variety of feasibility, costing and financial studies, in line with ILO instruments on employment policy.
101. The ILO should examine ways to address gaps in the effective implementation of existing international labour standards and provide technical support and guidance to Member States on guaranteeing protection to all care workers, including persons in precarious and informal work. Such guidance should take into account transformations in the world of work, including migration, the introduction of new technologies, and the impact of climate change.
102. A new international labour standard on paternity and parental protection was needed to address normative gaps, building on the conclusions issued in 2023 by the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group. The process of preparing such a standard could also include consideration of other care-related leave entitlements, such as leave to care for older persons, persons with disabilities or family members who were critically ill. The ILO should scale up campaigns and technical assistance to ensure ratification and implementation of ILO instruments relevant to the care economy, standards related to social security, instruments related to working time and wage-setting, and the ten fundamental Conventions.

103. Technical support and guidance should also cover actions to remove barriers that prevented migrant care workers from fully accessing and exercising their labour and social protection rights. Labour inspectorates must be strengthened, and freedom of association and the right to bargain collectively at all levels should be effectively guaranteed for all care workers. The ILO should conduct research into the key obstacles and challenges to care workers' effective exercise of the right to freedom of association and collective bargaining.
104. The ILO should enhance the capacities of its tripartite constituents to formulate, implement and monitor national care policies and strengthen social dialogue, including collective bargaining. Working conditions and working arrangements of community health and care workers, should be examined, and guidance provided on their formal recognition as care workers.
105. ILO leadership was needed to strengthen inter-institutional cooperation and promote alignment between multilateral institutions on the need to promote ILO standards and the Decent Work Agenda. The ILO should further strengthen its leadership role, including through its the Global Coalition for Social Justice and the World Social Summit in 2025, and should convene a high-level event on the role of the care economy in the context of the Global Coalition for Social Justice.
106. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, said that when considering decent work in the care economy, attention should be given to the unique challenges and context of the African continent. In pursuing a more just and equitable society, the empowerment of women and girls, who bore a disproportionate burden of unpaid care work in Africa, should be a priority. Measures in that regard would include promoting education and economic opportunities, and challenging traditional gender norms that perpetuated unequal caregiving responsibilities. The power of community-based care systems, which had long been central to African societies, must be leveraged by investing in community-based health workers, traditional healers and other informal caregivers. Access to care services should be improved, particularly in rural and underserved areas. Capacity-building for care workers should also be a priority, in particular through training and skills development.
107. Social dialogue should be encouraged to negotiate collective bargaining agreements and set standards to improve working conditions and social protection for care workers. Investment in care infrastructure was crucial, in particular in childcare facilities and eldercare services, which would create employment opportunities and alleviate the burden of unpaid care work, while also promoting gender equality in the labour market. The intersectionality between care work and marginalization should be addressed in policymaking, to ensure that the needs and rights of all care workers, particularly those from marginalized communities, were fully recognized and supported. She called on the ILO to assist constituents in data collection and research to inform policies to strengthen the care economy in Africa. Cross-border collaboration and sharing of experiences could be leveraged to build a more inclusive and sustainable care economy for all.
108. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that North Macedonia, Montenegro, Serbia, Albania, Ukraine, the Republic of Moldova, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Georgia and Norway aligned themselves with her statement. A global, human rights-based approach to the care economy was needed. A universally agreed understanding of the concept of the care economy would ensure recognition of its value for social and economic development, well-being and social justice. The rights and needs of givers and receivers of care and support, particularly those in situations of vulnerability, should be guaranteed to tackle inequalities. Internationally established statistical standards would help fill data gaps. Evidence-based policies should be rooted in relevant, high-quality data on paid and unpaid care work, disaggregated by sex, age and disability.

- 109. Investment in the care economy had positive impacts, including productivity growth, improved well-being, formalization and professionalization of care workers, better working conditions, enhanced skills and higher rates of participation of women in the labour market. Promoting the 5R Framework would contribute to sustainable development, alleviating poverty and realizing social and economic rights for caregivers. While the relational nature of care work meant that digital technologies were unlikely to replace human labour, their potential to facilitate and complement service delivery should be harnessed. Despite numerous international labour standards on various aspects of equality and women's rights, women continued to face unequal opportunities compared to men, including in respect of labour market participation and pay. Equal sharing of responsibilities, both in the workplace and in caregiving, was essential to achieving gender equality.
- 110. The full realization of fundamental principles and rights at work in the care sector was essential to ensure decent work. The ILO should promote gender equality through a transformative agenda to redistribute care work. Social dialogue, freedom of association and collective bargaining were the cornerstones of decent work in the care economy. Engagement between social partners and care economy entities was needed to facilitate the transition from the informal to the formal economy and ensure adequate social protection coverage for care workers. Lastly, knowledge sharing and strategic partnerships should be fostered between the ILO and other United Nations entities, including through the Global Coalition for Social Justice.
- 111. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of the group of Latin American and Caribbean Countries (GRULAC), noted the important progress that the region had made on reaching a common understanding on care and its importance for sustainable living and for the development of society and the economy. The recently approved Buenos Aires Commitment recognized the human right to care, be cared for and exercise self-care, based on the principles of equality, universality and co-responsibility. Care work, both paid and unpaid, was recognized as fundamental, and as having the potential to revive economies.
- 112. Progress had also been made in the region in measuring care and unpaid work, and in adopting methodologies that served as regional standards. By filling gaps in statistics and boosting the visibility of figures on care, awareness would be raised of both the contribution of care work to the economy, and its impact on inequality. Those statistics could be used as the basis for evidence-informed public policies that contributed to equality and social justice.
- 113. Despite the progress made, challenges persisted, such as discrimination in the social organization of care, the burden of which was carried disproportionately by women. Structural change, beginning with cultural change and education, would be needed to eliminate discrimination from the care economy. Care was not a commodity; it was a right and a public good, with social and economic value, which benefited the whole of society. New ways of creating quality jobs in the care economy, including new forms of employment such as teleworking, should be explored. Ways to improve social security coverage, expand labour rights and address inequalities in the provision of care could also be explored, which would contribute to the economic inclusion of women and the advancement of more egalitarian societies. Decent work in the care economy should be strengthened, so that it was no longer precarious, feminized or racialized. Occupational safety and health measures should be strengthened for paid and unpaid care workers alike.

- 114. The Government member of Barbados said that the ILO Global Coalition for Social Justice was essential to achieve decent work in the care economy. Organizations that impacted the development of the care economy must remain cognizant of the particular context and vulnerabilities of small island developing States. Policy coherence was crucial. Given the key role of migration in the care economy, governments and regional groups should develop migration protocols and policies that took account of the particularities of workers who migrated for the purpose of participating in the care economy. Training and development opportunities should be provided for workers in the care economy, especially those in informal work arrangements, and efforts should be made to raise public awareness of the value of care work. Investment in care infrastructure should not be the responsibility of governments alone; businesses and civil society organizations could also contribute. Informal care workers must be included in social security schemes since social protection was a key pillar of decent work.
- 115. The Government member of India said that to meet India's 2030 national health and education policy targets, an additional 22.74 million workers would be needed. The care economy had a crucial role in India's economic development and gender equality efforts. Investment in paid and unpaid care would be essential to meet increasing demand. Measures were needed to address the challenge of unpaid care work faced disproportionately by women and enhance women's workforce participation. In India, legislation had been enacted to increase the duration of paid maternity leave and provide childcare facilities in certain categories of workplace, and dedicated healthcare facilities were being established for older persons. An ageing population meant increasing demand for care, which, unlike other services, was likely to remain labour-intensive. Skills development initiatives were therefore under way to align the skills of India's care workers with international standards. The Government was engaging with other States bilaterally to facilitate the movement of skilled care workers and ensure decent working conditions for migrant workers.
- 116. The Government member of the United Kingdom said that the ILO should integrate Member States' best practices for improving quality of and access to care into its work on universal social protection. Data gaps must be bridged; gathering data from individual households was essential to understand the intergenerational nature of unpaid care and domestic work. A gender equity and disability-inclusive focus in social protection policies and programmes would reduce discriminatory barriers to coverage. Regarding access to quality jobs, gender inequalities must be reduced using a transformative approach, particularly through the provision of additional care support. Policies that rewarded paid care work by fostering decent job creation and guaranteeing equal pay for work of equal value should be promoted to redistribute unpaid care in line with the ILO 5R Framework. Care and support systems must acknowledge the needs and rights of all who required and all who provided care and support; many people were both users and providers of those systems.
- 117. The Government member of Australia welcomed the ILO gap analysis on paternity and parental protection, which was crucial to ensure adequate support for all parents, regardless of gender. Her Government supported the 5R Framework's objectives and policy recommendations, but suggested referring to "human rights-based care and support systems" rather than a "right to universal access to care", in line with the language used by other United Nations forums. Governments played a critical role in creating a sustainable, equitable care system that ensured decent work. Investment was required in workforce development to recruit, retain and upskill care workers. Policies must promote gender equality, address the gender pay gap and fairly distribute unpaid care work. Decent work must extend to workers in vulnerable situations, such as First Nations people and migrants, and climate change impacts on the care economy must be given due consideration. Social partners must ensure that care workers' voices were heard, advocating for fair wages and working conditions. Beyond tripartite structures, individuals, families, the media and education institutions should also be involved in efforts to foster positive change.

- 118. The Government member of Switzerland stated that investment in improving the working conditions of care workers was crucial; social dialogue was a key tool for negotiating such improvements. The ILO played a vital role in promoting consistency between policies on employment, social protection, worker protection and the environment, to support the care economy. International cooperation was crucial for sharing best practices in that regard. The ILO also played a role in managing the complex dynamics between migration and the care economy. Migrant workers must enjoy the same protections and opportunities as local workers. Measures must therefore be taken to tackle exploitation, human trafficking and discrimination, while promoting the social and professional integration of migrants in the care economy. Policy monitoring and evaluation were crucial. In Switzerland, the results of a national survey on the care workforce were due to be published, providing an up-to-date view of the situation.
- 119. The Government member of Türkiye emphasized that care was vital for economic growth, social justice and individual well-being. Measures must be taken to address forced labour, child labour and discrimination, which were prevalent in the care economy, with women disproportionately affected. Access to care services and care leave policies would help workers balance family responsibilities and improve labour market attachment. The ILO should continue leading initiatives on the care economy, in particular the development of international statistical standards to guide data collection and bridging data gaps for evidence-based policymaking. The 5R Framework would provide a foundation for progressive care policies. The Office should also provide tailored policy advice, support implementation and build strong partnerships. Gaps in international labour standards on paternity and parental protection should be bridged, and social dialogue in the care economy should be promoted to ensure that care workers' voices were heard. Focus should be placed on improving employment conditions, developing skills and accreditation programmes, and transitioning to formal, professional care work.
- 120. The Government member of Mexico said that the human right to care had three dimensions: the right to provide care, to be cared for and to exercise self-care. The enjoyment of that right required ensuring decent work, reconciling professional and personal life, and promoting social dialogue and the right to collective bargaining. Local and national care systems should be universal, sustainable and progressive. Multicultural and multisectoral approaches would ensure inclusivity. Budgetary allocations, with a gender perspective, should be increased to enhance the sustainability of the care economy. The care economy should be financed by a combination of State funding, private investment and international development cooperation. Cooperative care provision, led by women, should be promoted, fostering a social and solidarity economy. Agreements should be concluded between migrant sending and receiving countries to protect the rights of temporary migrant workers. Ratification of the ILO's ten fundamental Conventions was also imperative. Lastly, the ILO should develop a new international standard on paid and unpaid care work that recognized care as a job, as a public good and as a human right.
- 121. The Government member of Brazil said that care, while currently highly feminized, should be the responsibility of society as a whole. This common responsibility must be fully understood if women workers were to be valued. In that regard, measures should be taken to ensure equal pay for work of equal value and effective rights for women care workers. To uphold those rights, it was necessary to tackle informality, especially for domestic workers. The social organization of care work should be redressed through the adoption of public policies that guaranteed social and gender co-responsibility, making men equally responsible for care. To that end, the ILO should set international standards for paternity and parental leave. It should also encourage the professionalization and training of women care workers. To achieve decent work in the care economy, the work of women, especially those in situations of vulnerability, must be valued.

122. The Government member of the United States said that the ILO should continue developing a statistical definition of care work and a collective understanding of the care economy. The collection and compilation of harmonized data was crucial for evidence-based policymaking and peer learning. The ILO should enhance its research on employment trends and decent work in the care economy, including workers' unionization and collective bargaining. It should also assist its constituents in estimating care needs and gaps, reviewing innovative financing mechanisms, and conducting policy impact analyses. Strong national and global partnerships were essential for advancing care policy packages aligned with the 5R Framework on decent care work. The ILO's Global Coalition for Social Justice could serve as a platform for further strengthening partnerships with other multinational stakeholders. The ILO should also address gaps in international labour standards related to paternity and parental protection and promote social dialogue in the care economy through Decent Work Country Programmes.
123. The Government member of Canada emphasized the importance of prioritizing a gender transformative approach to the care economy, in line with the Centenary Declaration. Inclusive care economy measures should take account of the particular needs of vulnerable groups, including migrant workers. A statistical standard to identify care economy jobs could support analysis of paid care working conditions. The ILO's leadership in promoting integrated policy approaches, based on the 5R Framework, positioned it to guide and build capacity for its constituents, advancing gender equality and non-discrimination. Recognizing the high rates of violence and harassment faced by care workers, Member States should ratify and implement ILO Convention No. 190 on violence and harassment. Efforts to promote gender equality through multilateral initiatives, such as the Global Alliance for Care and the Equal Pay International Coalition, were welcome. The ILO should integrate efforts to transform the care economy throughout all its work, and ensure coordination with other international organizations.
124. The Government member of China stated that many women reduced their working hours or left jobs altogether after childbirth, impacting their income and career prospects. Studies had shown that the "motherhood penalty" had increased over time. Maternity leave, while protecting careers, could also exacerbate employment discrimination. The ILO should encourage men to share childcare responsibilities, fulfil their roles as fathers and reduce workplace gender discrimination linked to motherhood. Reliance on women's unpaid care work would thus decrease, thereby promoting gender equality, and enhancing women's well-being.
125. The Government member of Namibia said that, from the perspective of a developing country with limited fiscal capacity, her Government urged the ILO to deepen its research on care gaps, decent work deficits and gender inequality in developing nations, with a view to strengthening capacities to meet the needs of the poor and underserved. The ILO should assist Member States in conducting situational analyses to identify care needs and develop strategies for expanding care and promoting decent work. The Office could help by sharing the experiences and best practices of Member States in mainstreaming decent care work strategies across policies in various sectors. The Office could also provide information on the creation of cooperatives to support the care economy, and on ensuring decent work in that context. A South-South platform should be established to promote care expansion and decent work among developing countries.

- 126. The Government member of Indonesia affirmed his Government's commitment to promoting decent work and a resilient care economy, in line with the Centenary Declaration and the ILO Global Call to Action for a human-centred recovery from the COVID-19 crisis that is inclusive, sustainable and resilient, 2021 (hereafter Global Call to Action). Indonesia's national development plan focused on social transformation to enhance workforce participation of women, persons with disabilities, and vulnerable groups; economic transformation to increase female labour participation to 70 per cent by 2045; and socio-cultural resilience to protect the rights of children, women, youth, persons with disabilities, and older persons. Companies were encouraged to provide childcare, lactation rooms, healthcare and family planning services. Indonesia's Care Economy Investment Roadmap included accessible childcare, eldercare, inclusive care for vulnerable groups, improved maternity care and new laws to improve the welfare of working women and children. The Indonesian Government ensured robust support for care workers, providing decent work conditions, fair wages, social security, manageable workloads, occupational safety and union rights.
- 127. The Government member of the Philippines highlighted his Government's efforts to support care workers through effective social dialogue and collaboration with social partners. Policies and actions were being implemented to ensure decent work for care workers, including universal social protection, health and welfare, and protection of rights with a gender-inclusive approach to promote empowerment and work-life balance. The rights of care workers to organize and bargain collectively had been strengthened. Measures were being taken to mitigate the effects and costs of climate change-induced migration and provide care for migrants and their families. Regional frameworks and bilateral agreements on ethical recruitment were being implemented. New areas for bilateral cooperation had been identified, including: digitalizing ethical recruitment processes; encouraging employers to provide financial support to migrant healthcare workers who were awaiting credentials in countries of destination; and offering grants for further learning for care workers. Sector-specific reintegration programmes for migrant care workers were being developed. The ILO should: provide technical assistance; promote the development of national care economy strategies; ensure policy coherence across ministries; facilitate multilateral coordination; and advocate for increased investment to improve care economy infrastructures and working conditions.
- 128. The Employer Vice-Chairperson cautioned that there were diverging interpretations of the 5R Framework, and underscored the need for an additional "R" for resources. Canada had substituted "reward" with "respond", and others used alternative terms such as "reclaim" and "remunerate". Consensus on the Framework's key components was essential. Care should not be considered as a public good, but rather as a service provided by both public and private sectors, as well as families. Holding technical meetings on the care economy would not be an optimal use of the ILO's limited resources, which would be better spent on research into skills attraction and retention strategies for care workers, with a view to addressing employment issues and skills shortages.
- 129. Freedom of association should be voluntary and free from undue pressure or interference by authorities of Member States; collective bargaining should not be mandatory. The Employers' group was against developing new standards on parental or paternity leave and advocated instead for a more flexible approach, focusing on practical implementation and technical assistance.

- 130. The effectiveness of some existing instruments in bringing about progress was questionable. The low level of ratification of the ILO Maternity Protection Convention (No. 183) and Recommendation (No. 191), 2000, was evidence of their limited impact. The concept of intersectionality was complex and often associated with progressive political ideologies. The Committee's conclusions should take a simpler approach, promoting "gender equality and diversity", in line with terminology commonly used in the United Nations context.
- 131. The Worker Vice-Chairperson emphasized the essential role of ILO leadership and its tripartite constituents in advancing a comprehensive care agenda, which advanced the human rights of care workers and those dependent on care, and ensured resilient, gender-responsive, integrated care systems. The ILO should convene a tripartite meeting of experts to examine how to address care economy gaps, including through recognition of care as a public good, and to provide practical information for constituents on how to design and monitor national integrated care systems according to the 5R Framework.
- 132. The ILO should scale up promotional campaigns and technical assistance for the ratification and implementation of relevant ILO instruments. A new international labour standard was required on paternity and parental protection, which should also take account of leave entitlements for caring for elderly, disabled or critically ill family members. The ILO should conduct research into the obstacles to freedom of association and collective bargaining for all care workers.
- 133. Enhanced technical guidance was needed to recognize and value unpaid and paid care work, ensure sustainable public financing, guarantee access to labour and social protection for all care workers, recognize community health workers as workers, and strengthen labour inspectorates. Enforcing ILO leadership would ensure policy coherence on the care economy, thereby promoting decent work, gender equality, social justice and sustainable development.

Discussion of the draft conclusions

- 134. The Chairperson introduced the draft conclusions prepared by the drafting group and informed the Committee that 228 amendments had been received. Some aspects of the text of the draft conclusions had not been agreed upon by the group, and thus had been placed in square brackets. He proposed that, once all amendments had been discussed, the Committee would consider the text of the draft conclusions accepted, and would agree to delete any text that remained in square brackets, after which the conclusions would be submitted to the Plenary session of the Conference on Friday, 14 June.
- 135. It was so agreed.
- 136. The Worker Vice-Chairperson welcomed the work done by the drafting group and looked forward to a fruitful discussion.
- 137. The Employer Vice-Chairperson thanked the Office for its work on the initial text of the draft conclusions and commended the efforts of the drafting group. Given the complexity and breadth of the care economy, the Committee would be calling on the Office for guidance during the forthcoming discussions, in particular on matters related to tripartite agreed terminology.

Title "Draft conclusions concerning decent work and the care economy"

- 138. The title was adopted.

Part I. Context – decent work and the care economy: an urgent need for action

139. The title was adopted.

Point 1

[A.140 and A.30]

140. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States and on behalf of the Governments of Australia and New Zealand, introduced identical amendments to delete the words “social reproduction” from the first sentence. The term was confusing, was likely to be misinterpreted, and was not common United Nations parlance.
141. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendments. Social reproduction referred to the concept of ensuring future generations of workers to contribute to healthy and productive societies and economies. The concept was particularly important in ageing societies with insufficient young working people to meet the increasing needs for care and support.
142. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, concurred. Care work, whether paid or unpaid, was essential for the functioning of societies and economies. Social reproduction referred to education, training and development throughout the life course and was essential to the reproduction of a healthy and productive workforce.
143. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States and the Governments of Australia and New Zealand, said that while she understood and agreed with the concepts explained by the Workers’ group and GRULAC, the use of the term “social reproduction” remained problematic and could be misconstrued as the perpetuation of social status between generations.
144. The Government member of Mexico proposed a subamendment to replace “social reproduction” with by “reproduction of life”. The Government member of Chile seconded the proposal.
145. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment as proposed by Mexico and proposed a further subamendment to add the words “and labour workforce” after “reproduction of life”.
146. The Government members of Brazil, Colombia and Chile and the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the two subamendments.
147. The Government member of Türkiye requested clarification of the meaning of “labour workforce”, as proposed by the Workers’ group; standard wording would be either “labour force” or “workforce”.
148. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, following a discussion on a proposed subamendment to replace “reproduction of life and labour workforce” by the words “societal functioning”, which had not received sufficient support, proposed replacing “labour” by “future”. The amendment, as subamended, would thus read, “reproduction of life and future workforce”.
149. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported that subamendment.
150. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, could not support the subamendment. The concept of social reproduction encompassed the whole of the life course, not just workers, and “future workforce” was therefore not an appropriate replacement.

- 151. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Members States, said that the lack of consensus pointed in favour of the original amendment, to simply delete the words “social reproduction”.
- 152. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed.
- 153. The Government members of Türkiye and Switzerland and the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, expressed support for the amendments introduced by the Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Government member of Belgium on behalf of the EU Member States.
- 154. The amendments were adopted.

- 155. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment, in the final sentence of point 1, to replace “demand and supply of” with “demand for and access to”. The concept of “access” rather than “supply” would better reflect the reality that care services were not items to be exchanged. Care was a matter of human relationships, human rights and people’s ability to live a healthy, fulfilling and dignified life. The sentence related to circumstances that could exacerbate the need for or reliance on care, or which could create staffing shortages. Care was not a commodity. Reference to “supply” and “demand” of care was therefore not appropriate.
- 156. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that if all parties were to be involved in creating an ecosystem that supported the care economy, there must be supply to meet demand. The role of employers in providing opportunities for training and development and equipping workers with the skills they needed should not be ignored. The Employers’ group therefore wished to propose a subamendment, after “demand”, to replace “for” by “and supply” and to replace “and” by “as well as” before “access to”.
- 157. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment or the marketization of the care economy. The Government member of Colombia agreed.
- 158. The Government member of Barbados pointed out that supply and demand were fundamental concepts of any economic discussion, including discussion of the care economy.
- 159. The Government member of Türkiye felt that the word “supply” was at odds with a human-centred concept of care. He suggested a further subamendment to replace the word “supply” by “provision”. The proposed subamendment was seconded by the Government member of Barbados.
- 160. The Worker Vice-Chairperson suggested a further subamendment for the purposes of clarification, to read “the demand for, provision of, as well as access to”.
- 161. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that supply and demand was a universally understood economic principle, not a marketing tool. “Demand and provision” was not universally understood. The concept of supply and demand was critical for several reasons: growing demand for care services driven by demographic changes, changing family structures and increasing care needs necessitated a robust supply of care providers; workforce availability and quality of care related to the supply of care workers; and accessibility and affordability of care were linked to supply, as were innovation and efficiency. Supply was thus a crucial concept, which must remain in the text.
- 162. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that, in the absence of consensus, her group could agree to a compromise, reading “demand for, supply of, and access to care”.

- 163. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed.
- 164. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, could also agree.
- 165. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 166. Point 1 was adopted as amended.

Point 2

[A. 111]

- 167. The Government member of Kiribati, speaking also on behalf of the Government of Samoa, introduced a proposed amendment to add the words “brain drain”, after the word “pandemics” in the first sentence. Brain drain was a central theme in the care economy, posing a threat for small island developing States and rural community contexts with relatively small and fragile healthcare systems and households.
- 168. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 169. Following a discussion on the alignment between the three language versions, the Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed to the proposed amendment.
- 170. The amendment was adopted.

[A.137]

- 171. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace “addressing gender and other inequalities” with “achieving gender equality and inclusion”, to strengthen the language and make it more inclusive.
- 172. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. A well-functioning care economy would help to address gender inequalities as well as other inequalities, including income inequalities or inequalities affecting migrant or racialized care workers, who were often over-represented in low-status and low-paid care jobs.
- 173. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, did not support the amendment. Many inequalities persisted in access to care and in the conditions of the provision of care work. There was significant inequality in the disproportionate number of indigenous women, women of African descent, migrant women, rural women and women from low-income households in unpaid care work and in the most precarious forms of informal work.
- 174. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed a subamendment to add “and addressing other inequalities” after “and inclusion”.
- 175. The Government members of Canada, Switzerland and Mexico supported the subamendment.
- 176. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson also supported the subamendment.
- 177. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

[A.31 and A.41]

- 178. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment (A.31) to delete the words “employment, particularly for youth and women” and add, after “creates”, “and enables employment opportunities”. Employment opportunities should be created for all, in an effort to move away from the current gender-based segregation in care.

- 179. The Government member of Switzerland said that her Government, together with the Government of the United States, had submitted a similar proposed amendment (A.41), to replace “creates employment, particularly for youth and women” with “enables employment opportunities”, also in the spirit of promoting employment in the care economy for all.
- 180. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment proposed by the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States.
- 181. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, also supported the amendment proposed by the Government member of Belgium on behalf of the EU Member States.
- 182. The Government member of Mexico could support the addition of “and enables employment opportunities”, as proposed by the EU Member States, but did not support the deletion of “particularly for youth and women”. A disproportionate number of women were in unpaid care work; creating employment opportunities for them was particularly important. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, agreed.
- 183. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson did not wish to reinstate the words “particularly for youth and women”.
- 184. The Government member of Türkiye supported the amendment proposed by the Governments of Switzerland and the United States. Employment creation was implicit in the words “enables employment”.
- 185. The Government member of the United States, speaking also on behalf of the Government of Switzerland, could support the amendment proposed by the EU Member States. It therefore withdrew its proposed amendment.
- 186. The amendment submitted by the EU Member States was adopted.
- 187. Three amendments (A.136 and A.135 and A.157) fell.

[A.114]

- 188. In the light of the deletion of the words “particularly for youth and women”, the Government member of Kiribati, speaking also on behalf of the Government of Samoa, withdrew a proposed amendment to add “and men” to the end of the second sentence.
- 189. Point 2 was adopted as amended.

New point after point 2

[A.26]

- 190. The Government member of Switzerland, speaking also on behalf of the Government of the United States, proposed the introduction of a new point, after point 2, to read: “Women make up the majority of paid and unpaid care work throughout the world, particularly mothers”. It was important to reflect the fact that women did the overwhelming majority of work in the care economy.

- 191. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the addition of the new point but questioned the specific reference to mothers, which might not be factually accurate. She therefore proposed deleting the words “particularly mothers”.
- 192. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed.
- 193. The Government member of Switzerland agreed to the subamendment.
- 194. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 195. The new point after point 2 was adopted, as amended.

Point 3

[A.133]

- 196. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace “, including in public policy” by “; it shed light on gaps in public policies”.
- 197. The Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed with the sentiment of the proposal but suggested, for the sake of clarity, replacing “; it” by “and”, and ending the sentence after “public policies”. The words “The pandemic” should then be added before “exacerbated” to start the second sentence.
- 198. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government member of Mexico supported the subamendment.
- 199. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

- 200. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced a proposed amendment to replace the word “poor” with the word “challenging” when referring to the working conditions of care workers. Qualifying working conditions as “poor” was subjective and not in line with ILO terminology.
- 201. The Worker Vice-Chairperson strongly opposed the amendment. The COVID-19 pandemic had shed light on the poor working conditions faced by many care workers worldwide. Those workers had been at increased risk of contracting the virus, as a result of which thousands had died. During the pandemic, care workers had faced increased violence, harassment and mental distress. Thousands had since left their jobs. The word “challenging” was therefore wholly inadequate. Working conditions had been poor.
- 202. The Government member of Türkiye did not support the amendment.
- 203. The Government member of Mexico agreed with the Workers’ group that the conditions of work during the pandemic had been particularly difficult. She proposed replacing the word “poor” by “precarious”.
- 204. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government member of Colombia supported that subamendment.
- 205. The Government member of the United Arab Emirates, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the Cooperation Council for the Arab States of the Gulf (GCC) supported the amendment as originally proposed by the Employers’ group.
- 206. The Employer Vice Chairperson proposed a further subamendment to use “difficult” instead of “challenging”.

- 207. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government member of China supported the subamendment proposed by the Employers' group.
- 208. The Worker Vice-Chairperson insisted that the word "poor" should be maintained.
- 209. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that during the pandemic everything had been challenging and difficult. The reference to "poor working conditions" was too generic and therefore not acceptable; the challenges of the pandemic had been specific and unprecedented. Similarly, the word "precarious" was not appropriate. The words "challenging" or "difficult", however, would be acceptable.
- 210. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that "poor working conditions" was commonly used language in various documents adopted at the international level, especially when describing conditions of work during the pandemic. Replacing "poor" by "difficult" or "challenging" would minimize the experiences of workers during the pandemic. She recalled the long hours worked, including by those who had worked around the clock because there had been no one to relieve them, shortages of personal protective equipment, workers having been unable to return home after shifts for fear of transmitting the virus to their families, and the tens of thousands of deaths of people working in care. The words "poor working conditions" were therefore an accurate description of the dire situation at the time.
- 211. The Government members of Switzerland, Kiribati, the Philippines, and the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa Group, did not support the proposed amendment; the original wording, "poor working conditions" was commonly understood language. The Government members of the United States and the United Kingdom agreed, while noting that poor working conditions during the pandemic had not necessarily been the fault of employers.
- 212. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, said that while the English "poor working conditions" was acceptable, a literal Spanish translation would be meaningless, and it would therefore be difficult to align the different language versions of the text.
- 213. The Government members of India and Zambia and the Government member of the United Arab Emirates, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, supported the proposed amendment, since the term "poor" seemed to imply that no efforts for improvement had been made, whereas "challenging" was a clear indication that the circumstances had been the reason for the difficulties, not a lack of will.
- 214. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, in the absence of a consensus, said that her group could accept "poor working conditions", provided that the words "care workers" could be replaced by "some care workers at the time,".
- 215. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that the word "some" was wholly inadequate to describe the situation in which tens, if not hundreds, of thousands of people had died. Her group categorically could not accept the subamendment.
- 216. The Government members of Australia and Canada concurred. The Government member of Canada requested clarification from the Office on the definition of "poor working conditions".
- 217. The deputy representative of the Secretary-General stated that the Office included the term "poor working conditions" as it was used by several Office documents in relation to COVID-19, including the ILO Monitor on COVID-19 and the world of work, and the recently published flagship report, World Employment and Social Outlook: Trends 2024.

- 218. Following further discussion and in the absence of consensus, the deputy representative of the Secretary-General recalled the wording of the ILO Global Call to Action, which referred to “pre-existing decent work deficits”.
- 219. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that her group could accept that language.
- 220. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, withdrawing her group’s subamendment, proposed a further subamendment to replace “the poor working conditions” by “pre-existing decent work deficits”, in line with the Global Call to Action.
- 221. It was so agreed.
- 222. The amendment, as subamended in line with the Global Call to Action, was adopted.

[A.204]

- 223. The Government member of the United Kingdom, also speaking on behalf of Government of the United States, introduced an amendment to insert “, including gender-based violence and harassment” after “such as exposure to violence and harassment”. Gender-based violence and harassment were a particular issue of concern in the care sector.
- 224. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 225. The Government member of Mexico introduced a subamendment to add a reference to ILO Convention No. 190, to read “as defined in ILO Convention No. 190”, immediately after the proposed language “, including gender-based violence and harassment”. The Government member of Philippines seconded the subamendment.
- 226. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment; it would be preferable not to quote instruments in the conclusions.
- 227. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, while understanding the objective of the proposed subamendment, cautioned that many Member States had not yet ratified the Convention.
- 228. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government member of Kiribati, did not support the subamendment.
- 229. The Government member of the United Kingdom appreciated the intention behind the proposed subamendment and pointed out that other proposed amendments had been submitted that referred to issues related to Convention No.190. The matter might therefore be revisited later in the Committee’s deliberations.
- 230. The subamendment was rejected.
- 231. The amendment was adopted.

[A.222]

- 232. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced a proposal to amend the end of the point by starting a new sentence after “harassment”, to read “The pandemic increased the demand for care, heightening the severe staff and skill shortages”. The amendment was intended to ensure a balanced and comprehensive point, which took account not only of policy areas, decent work deficits and staff and skills shortages exposed by the pandemic, but also of the increase in demand for care caused by the pandemic.
- 233. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not accept the amendment, which suggested that staff shortages had only begun as a result of increased demand for care during the pandemic. Staff shortages in eldercare, for example, had predated the pandemic.

234. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government members of Türkiye, Switzerland and Australia did not support the amendment.

235. The amendment was withdrawn.

[A.223]

236. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add “faced by public organizations and businesses, specifically MSMEs” after the word “shortages” at the end of the point.

237. The Worker Vice-Chairperson acknowledged that organizations providing care services had faced skills and staff shortages during the pandemic. Point 3 of the draft conclusions was, however, intended to highlight the poor working conditions faced by care workers. The Workers’ group did not support the amendment.

238. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported by the Government members of Australia and the United Kingdom, while acknowledging that skills and staff shortages were broad issues, would prefer not to include a list, which would be unnecessarily limiting. The Government member of Kiribati also opposed the amendment.

239. The amendment was withdrawn.

240. Point 3 was adopted as amended.

Point 4

[A.213]

241. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, proposed an amendment to divide point 4 into three points, for the sake of clarity.

242. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. The point dealt with one theme and should remain as a single point.

243. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment.

244. The amendment was withdrawn.

[A.27]

245. The Government member of Switzerland, speaking also on behalf of the Governments of New Zealand and the United Kingdom, proposed an amendment to insert “often” before “requires”, and replace “a high level of skill” by “high levels of skills”.

246. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.

247. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment; all care work required skills and to suggest otherwise would be to continue to undervalue care work.

248. The Government members of Türkiye and Kiribati and the Government of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the amendment.

249. The Government member of Switzerland clarified that the insertion of “often” did not exclude any level of skill.

250. The Worker Vice-Chairperson underscored that all care work was important and required various skills. There should be no distinction between high- or low-level skills. Provided due note was taken of that clarification, the Workers' group could accept the amendment.

251. The amendment was adopted.

[A.224]

252. The Government member of Türkiye introduced an amendment to replace the word "expert" by "specialized" before "knowledge", to refer to more in-depth, detailed knowledge.

253. The Employer Vice-Chairperson seconded the amendment.

254. The Worker Vice-Chairperson considered the amendment unnecessary but could accept it in a spirit of consensus, provided there was broad support for it among the rest of the Committee.

255. The Government member of Switzerland supported the amendment.

256. The amendment was adopted.

[A.227]

257. The Government member of Türkiye introduced a proposed amendment to insert the word "fully" before "recognized", to read, "skills are not always fully recognized".

258. The Employer Vice-Chairperson seconded the amendment.

259. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.

260. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government members of the Philippines, Switzerland, Mexico and Kiribati also supported the amendment.

261. The amendment was adopted.

[A.225]

262. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, introduced an amendment to recast the fourth sentence from, "Migrant workers, many of whom are women, often are not able to exercise fully the same rights as other workers", to "Migrant workers, especially women, face additional obstacles to the enjoyment of the same rights as other workers".

263. The Worker Vice Chairperson did not support the amendment; the original language was stronger. The Employer Vice Chairperson concurred.

264. The amendment was withdrawn.

[A.22]

265. The Government member of Kiribati, speaking also on behalf of the Government of Samoa, introduced an amendment to delete the words "many of whom are women" after "migrant workers", since there were many male care providers.

266. The Worker Vice Chairperson did not support the amendment. The ILO had produced extensive reports acknowledging the overwhelmingly disproportionate number of female migrant care workers and migrant domestic workers.

267. The Employer Vice Chairperson did not support the amendment.

268. The amendment was withdrawn.

[A.128]

- 269. The Employer Vice Chairperson introduced an amendment to remove the word “strong” before “ethnic, racial and gender-based occupational segregation”. The text was already comprehensive.
- 270. The Worker Vice Chairperson did not support the amendment; in the nursing sector, for example, women faced strong segregation.
- 271. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government member of Canada also preferred to maintain the word “strong”, as it was factually accurate.
- 272. The amendment was withdrawn.

[A.228, A.127 and A.126]

- 273. The Government member of Türkiye proposed an amendment to delete the words “ethnic, racial and” before “gender-based occupational segregation” and to delete the words “especially the racialized and poor” after “Women,”. The proposal was intended to simplify and clarify the point and maintain the focus on gender-related challenges.
- 274. The Employer Vice Chairperson seconded the amendment.
- 275. The Worker Vice Chairperson did not support the amendment. Care workers were often subject to intersectional discrimination based on more than one ground, with race and socio-economic background being predominant factors. In the context of the International Decade on People of African Descent, it would be opportune to reflect on the historical realities underpinning current inequalities. Indigenous workers and workers of African descent were disproportionately represented in care provision and most likely to be engaged in low-wage care work. They often faced racism, racial violence and abuse while working. Segregation in unpaid care was also significant. References to ethnic and racial segregation, and to racialized and poor women should therefore remain in the text.
- 276. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that while many groups faced specific difficulties, she would prefer not to create a list of grounds for discrimination. With that in mind, the EU and its Member States had also submitted a proposed amendment (A.32), which would be discussed subsequently, to replace the words “racialized and poor” with “those in vulnerable positions”.
- 277. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, said that GRULAC comprised 33 countries in Latin America, with a total of approximately 134 million people of African descent. One in four people living in Latin America was either of African descent or indigenous. Many were migrant workers, were mobile within and outside the region, and experienced strong gender-based segregation. There was a disproportionate number of women, including women of African descent, in the Latin American care sector. Domestic workers in particular experienced severe deficits in decent work. Women of African descent, migrants, indigenous people and people living in poverty experienced multiple and exacerbated forms of discrimination. Those inequalities must be clearly referenced in the text of the conclusions.
- 278. The Government member of Türkiye withdrew the proposed amendment in favour of the amendment due to be proposed by the EU Member States.
- 279. In the light of the foregoing and given a distinct lack of support, the Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew two amendments: the first, to delete “ethnic, racial and” before “gender-based occupational segregation”; and the second, to delete “especially the racialized and the poor” after “Women”. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC similarly withdrew an amendment (A.226) to delete the words “especially the racialized and poor” after “Women”, in favour of the subsequent amendment proposed by the EU Member States.

[A.32]

- 280. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on the behalf of the EU Member States, proposed an amendment (A.32) to replace “the racialized and poor” with “those in vulnerable situations”.
- 281. Both the Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 282. The amendment was adopted.
- 283. Point 4 was adopted as amended.

New point after point 4

[A.149]

- 284. The Government member of China introduced a proposal, seconded by the Government of Brazil, to introduce a new point, after point 4, to read, “The fast pace of society ageing brings more care burden, which intensified the conflict between the care services supply and demand, and at the same time high quality services are more needed than ever before.”. An ageing population was increasing the demand for eldercare worldwide, heightening the need for good quality paid care services and increasing the burden of unpaid care. Efforts to meet the increased demand both for formal and informal care must be strengthened. The conclusions should place greater emphasis on the pressure that an ageing population put on the qualitative and quantitative demand for care services.
- 285. The Government member of Japan supported the proposal.
- 286. The Government member of Brazil, supported by the Government members of Mexico and Chile, proposed a subamendment to replace the word “conflict” by “gap”.
- 287. The Government member of Tunisia, supported by the Government member of Türkiye and the Government member of the United Arab Emirates, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, proposed a further subamendment to replace “conflict” by “imbalance”.
- 288. The Government member of Türkiye proposed a subamendment to delete the word “before” from the end of the point. The Government member of the United Arab Emirates, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, supported that proposal.
- 289. The Government member of Zimbabwe said that Africa did not have an ageing population but in fact had a youth dividend; the words “in some parts of the world” should therefore be inserted after “ageing”, since the phenomenon was not global. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government member of Kiribati supported that subamendment.
- 290. The Government member of Mexico opposed the subamendment proposed by the Government of Zimbabwe.
- 291. The Government member of Indonesia pointed out that while the fast pace of society ageing brought challenges, it also afforded opportunities. He therefore proposed replacing the words “burden” by “challenges and opportunities”. The Government member of Kiribati seconded that proposal.

292. The Employer Vice-Chairperson could agree to the proposal by China as subamended by Indonesia, Zimbabwe, Tunisia and Türkiye.
293. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the addition of the new point. Reference to the demographic shift had been agreed in point 1; the addition of a point on population ageing constituted unnecessary repetition. The Workers’ group remained uncomfortable with references to “supply and demand” in relation to care work.
294. The Government member of China recalled the importance of recognizing the impact of the global ageing of the population and increasing life expectancy, which were in turn increasing the number of people needing care. Ageing was an important factor in the care economy.
295. The Government member of Mexico proposed deleting the words “which intensifies the conflict between the care services supply and demand,”.
296. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that if there was support for the inclusion of a new paragraph on the ageing population, her group would propose the following: “The pace of population ageing intensifies the need for and access to care, and at the same time demonstrates that high-quality care services are more needed than ever before.”.
297. The Government member of Switzerland supported that proposal.
298. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the proposal by the Workers’ group.
299. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States could support the Workers’ proposal but wished to subamend it, for the purposes of clarity, by adding “fast” before “pace”, replacing “intensifies” by “impacts”, and deleting “before”.
300. The Government members of Tunisia and Mexico did not support the Workers’ proposal, preferring the wording of the original amendment proposed by the Government of China.
301. The Government member of China proposed a compromise, which had been prepared in conjunction with the Governments of Brazil and Japan, to read, “The fast pace of population ageing, in some parts of the world, increases the burden of unpaid and paid care work and intensifies the gap between demand for and provision of care. This demonstrates that high-quality care services are more needed than ever before.”.
302. The Government member of Mexico, and the Government member of Belgium speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, welcomed the efforts to seek consensus and supported the proposed new point, as revised by the Governments of China, Brazil and Japan.
303. The Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed appreciation for the effort to reach a compromise. The Workers’ group could support the revised point.
304. The Government member of Switzerland cautioned that the word “services” implied something that would be provided by qualified professionals and would be paid for. The term “services” therefore seemed incompatible with “paid and unpaid”.
305. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed that the proposal was contradictory. Paid work should not be referred to as a “burden”. The spirit of the new point as originally proposed by the Government of China, which had focused on ensuring a balance between supply and demand for care work, had been lost. Her group could only support the original proposal by the Government of China, as subamended by Indonesia, Tunisia, Türkiye and Zimbabwe.

- 306. The Government member of Mexico, supported by the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, said that high-quality services were required to ease the burden of unpaid care work currently shouldered by women.
- 307. The Government member of the United Kingdom proposed a subamendment as follows: “The growth of population ageing in some parts of the world can increase the care burden and highlight the need for high-quality, age-sensitive care systems.”. The Government member of Australia seconded that subamendment.
- 308. The Government members of Japan, Switzerland and the United States, and the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported that proposal.
- 309. The Employer Vice-Chairperson asked how “age-sensitive care systems” could be defined.
- 310. The Government member of Switzerland said that “age-sensitive” could be defined as responding effectively to age-specific needs at all stages of the life course. It did not imply exclusively eldercare.
- 311. The Government member of China, while welcoming the efforts to reach a consensus, could not support the proposal by the Government of the United Kingdom.
- 312. Following informal consultations, the Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed reverting to the original amendment as proposed by the Government of China.
- 313. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment as proposed by the Government of China and proposed subamendments to introduce, after the word “ageing” the words “in some parts of the world”, and to replace “conflict between the care services supply and demand” with “gaps in care services”.
- 314. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that her group could accept the subamendments as presented by the Worker Vice-Chairperson, except the deletion of “supply and demand”.
- 315. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government members of Colombia, Australia and the United Kingdom supported the subamendments as proposed by the Workers’ group.
- 316. The Government member of New Zealand also supported the subamendments as proposed by the Workers’ group and pointed out that reference to supply and demand related to demographic shifts was included in point 1 of the draft conclusions.
- 317. The Government member of Brazil echoed the comments made by the Employer Vice-Chairperson: she could accept the subamendments proposed by the Workers’ group except the deletion of “supply and demand”. She proposed a further subamendment to replace “conflict” by “gaps in” and reinstate “supply and demand” after “care services”.
- 318. The Employer Vice-Chairperson seconded that subamendment.
- 319. The Government members of China, India, Japan and Mexico also supported the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Brazil.
- 320. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a further subamendment, “gaps in the demand for, supply of and access to care”.
- 321. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed to that proposal.

- 322. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Members States, the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government members of Australia, Brazil, Chile, China, Colombia, New Zealand, Mexico, and the United States supported the subamendment by the Workers' group.
- 323. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 324. The new point after point 4 was adopted as amended.

Point 5

[A.125]

- 325. In the absence of support from the Workers' and Government groups, the Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew a proposed amendment to replace "leadership" by "leading".

[A.124]

- 326. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced amendment to add, after the first sentence, a new sentence to read "Adequate resources are critical to advance the 5R Framework for Decent Care Work." The amendment was intended to reflect the crucial nature of resources, without placing the burden entirely on the public sector.
- 327. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment; while her group agreed that resources were needed for a robust and well-functioning care economy, they were not required for the 5R Framework, which pertained to public policy. Reference to resources would be more appropriately placed in part IV – the operational part – of the draft conclusions.
- 328. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the amendment.
- 329. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that her group would prefer to move the reference to point 19, under part III, Guiding principles, to link the resources to the 5R Framework for Decent Care Work. On the understanding that the words "Financial resources and incentives to invest in the care infrastructure and workforce are essential" could be added to point 19, then the proposed amendment to point 5 could be withdrawn.
- 330. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to add the words "Adequate resources are critical" in point 19.
- 331. The Employer Vice-Chairperson accepted that subamendment.
- 332. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government members of Australia, Canada, Mexico and New Zealand agreed to the proposed way forward.
- 333. The amendment was withdrawn, on the understanding that the agreed wording would be included in point 19.

[A.158]

- 334. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace "Employers have increasingly" by "Social dialogue, including collective bargaining, has led to the introduction of". The amendment was intended to highlight the crucial role of the social partners in achieving the better working conditions necessary for States to uphold their obligations under international labour standards. The introduction of family-friendly workplace policies should not be attributed exclusively to employers. All stakeholders had contributed to the progress made.

- 335. The Employer Vice-Chairperson objected to the removal of reference to the efforts made by employers with respect to building skills and creating jobs. Those efforts were crucial to creating a proper ecosystem for the care economy. Employers could not be excluded from the equation of the care economy. Social dialogue was at the heart of the work of the ILO, not collective bargaining.
- 336. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that social dialogue, by definition, included the employers. Similarly, collective bargaining could not be done by workers alone. The amendment had been proposed in a spirit of inclusivity.
- 337. The Government member of Cameroon, supported by the Government member of Switzerland, agreed that the concept of social dialogue by its very nature included three parties: the government, employers and workers. His Government supported the amendment.
- 338. The Government member of the United States proposed a subamendment, recognizing the efforts of employers and the results of social dialogue, to read, “Employers and social dialogue, including collective bargaining, have led to the introduction of”.
- 339. The Government members of Mexico and Chile supported the subamendment proposed by the Government of the United States.
- 340. The Government member of Zimbabwe said that “and” should be replaced by “as well as” before “social dialogue” for grammatical accuracy.
- 341. The Government member of Belgium speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, also supported the proposal by the Government of the United States and suggested replacing “Employers and” by “Employers, through”.
- 342. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed the insertion of “and workplace cooperation” after “collective bargaining”.
- 343. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not accept the insertion of “and workplace cooperation”. She suggested a further subamendment, to read, “Employers and workers, through social dialogue, as well as employer-led initiatives, have led to the introduction of”.
- 344. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed to that proposal.
- 345. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

[A.123]

- 346. In the absence of support from the Workers’ and Government groups, the Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew a proposed amendment to insert the word “flexible” before “working arrangements”.

[A.205]

- 347. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, introduced a proposed amendment to add, at the end of point 5, a new sentence to read, “These efforts represent progress towards transforming the unequal distribution of work between men and women into a fair organization of care, which promotes co-responsibility between governments, the private sector, families and the community.”

- 348. The Employer Vice-Chairperson could support the amendment with two subamendments: the first, to delete the word “fair” before “organization” and the second, to replace “co-responsibility” by “cooperation”. Co-responsibility was not a term used commonly in ILO documents, and cooperation between tripartite constituents was a well-recognized concept.
- 349. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment; while the content might be acceptable, its inclusion in point 5 would be misplaced.
- 350. The Government member of the United States agreed with the Workers’ group that the sentence would be better placed elsewhere in the conclusions.
- 351. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, agreed that the proposal would be better placed elsewhere. She proposed adding a reference to the social and solidarity economy at the end of the sentence.
- 352. The Government member of Mexico supported that proposal.
- 353. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, with a view to allaying the concerns of the Employers’ group, suggested replacing “fair” by “more equal”. She could not accept the replacement of “co-responsibility” by “cooperation” but instead suggested “shared responsibility”.
- 354. The Employer Vice-Chairperson could not accept “shared responsibility”. The private sector complemented the State and cooperated with it, but did not share responsibility equally. The word “partnership” might be amenable to all parties.
- 355. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, introduced a subamendment to revise the proposed new sentence at the end of point 5 to read, “These efforts represent progress towards transforming the unequal distribution of work between men and women into a fair organization of care promoting social co-responsibility between the State, the private sector, families, the social and solidarity economy and the community.”
- 356. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment or the amendment. Part I of the draft conclusions referred to the context and realities of the current care economy and to the 5R Framework for Decent Care Work. The statement proposed by GRULAC would be better placed elsewhere in the conclusions.
- 357. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment and proposed a further subamendment to replace “fair” with “more equal”. The concept of fairness was subjective.
- 358. The Government member of Kiribati agreed with the Workers’ group and felt that the proposal from GRULAC would be better placed in the part of the conclusions on transformation.
- 359. The Government member of the United Arab Emirates, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, suggested a further subamendment to insert “care” before “work”, to read “unequal distribution of care work between men and women”.
- 360. The Employer Vice-Chairperson seconded the subamendment, which was also supported by the Government members of New Zealand and the United States.
- 361. The Government member of Brazil supported the subamendments proposed. She proposed a further subamendment to the English language version, to replace “distribution” by “division”.
- 362. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that despite considering that the sentence would be better placed elsewhere in the draft conclusions, her group would not stand in the way of consensus. It could agree to the amendment, as subamended.
- 363. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment, as subamended.

- 364. The Government members of the United Kingdom, Australia, the United States, Canada, New Zealand and Colombia supported the amendment as subamended.
- 365. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 366. Point 5 was adopted as amended.

Point 6

[A.1]

- 367. The Government member of Türkiye introduced an amendment to insert the words “public awareness” before “, legislation” to underscore the importance of an informed public and of fostering societal support for legislative and policy changes.
- 368. The Employer Vice-Chairperson seconded the proposed amendment. The involvement of the public sector was particularly important; it was a key player in the care economy.
- 369. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that her group would not object to the amendment, although she questioned the need for the reference to public awareness, which was already mentioned in point 26(e) of the draft conclusions.
- 370. The Government member of Belgium speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Government member of South Africa speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Government member of the United Arab Emirates speaking on behalf of the member States of the Gulf Cooperation Council, and the Government member of Kiribati supported the amendment.
- 371. The Government member of Kiribati pointed out that public awareness raising would incur costs. She hoped that the ILO would consider that in its support to Member States.
- 372. The amendment was adopted.

[A.23]

- 373. The Government member of Kiribati, speaking also on behalf of the Government of Samoa, proposed an amendment to replace “to care” by “for all” at the end of the paragraph.
- 374. The Worker Vice-Chairperson cautioned that the amendment would alter the focus of the point to access to decent work, rather than access to care.
- 375. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that while her group could accept the addition of “for all” it wished to retain the reference to care. She therefore proposed a subamendment, to read “access to care for all”.
- 376. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government members of Malaysia, Australia and Dominican Republic supported the amendment as subamended.
- 377. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 378. Point 6 was adopted as amended.
- 379. Part I, as a whole, was adopted as amended.

Part II. A common understanding of the care economy

- 380. The title was adopted.

Point 7

[A.12]

- 381. The Government member of Türkiye introduced a proposed amendment to delete the words “the household” in its first instance, to avoid unnecessary repetition.
- 382. The Employer Vice-Chairperson seconded the proposed amendment.
- 383. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 384. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government member of the United States, supported the amendment.
- 385. The amendment was adopted.

[A.165]

- 386. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, proposed an amendment to insert the words “and emotional effort” after “relations” in the second sentence of point 7. The amendment was proposed with the intention of acknowledging the mental and emotional burden on care providers.
- 387. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 388. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. The term “emotional effort” was too broad and detracted from the focus of point 7.
- 389. In the absence of any further expressions of support, the amendment was withdrawn.

[A.168]

- 390. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, introduced a proposed amendment to insert the words “mental health” between “cognitive,” and “and developmental”. Mental health needs were different to psychological and cognitive needs. Mental health needs had become particularly prominent during and since the COVID-19 pandemic. Mental health issues had a significant impact on people the world over and merited mention in the conclusions.
- 391. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 392. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment; mental health was covered broadly by “psychological” and “cognitive” needs. The addition of a specific reference to mental health risked narrowing the understanding of those terms. The list in point 7 was already comprehensive.
- 393. The Government members of the United States and the United Kingdom also felt that mental health was already covered by “psychological” needs.
- 394. The Government members of the Dominican Republic, Chile and Benin supported the proposed amendment. The inclusion of a specific reference to mental health needs was important. The Government member of Chile added that the mental health needs of those who provided care or worked in emotionally stressful jobs, such as frontline emergency services, should also not be forgotten.

- 395. The Government member of Brazil speaking on behalf of GRULAC underscored the importance of referring specifically to mental health. “Psychological needs” and “cognitive needs”, while related to mental health, were not broad enough terms to encompass all aspects of mental health. The scope of mental health encompassed care provision for prevention, clinical treatment and day-to-day care, but also reflected emotional support needs. Those aspects were not covered by “psychological” or “cognitive” needs. The WHO estimated that 12 billion days of productive work were lost per year owing to mental health issues, in particular depression and anxiety.
- 396. The Government member of the United States thanked the Government member of Brazil for the explanation, in light of which his Government would support the amendment.
- 397. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, also supported the amendment.
- 398. The Employer Vice-Chairperson asked the Office to clarify whether any ILO instruments relating to occupational safety and health included reference to “mental health”.
- 399. The Government member of Kiribati said that the term “mental health” was commonly used in ILO documents. She supported the amendment.
- 400. The deputy representative of the Secretary-General said that the ILO recognized both the concepts of “mental health” and “psychological needs” and used both terms.
- 401. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government members of Canada, Kiribati and the United States reiterated their support for the amendment.
- 402. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed to the amendment.
- 403. The amendment was adopted.

- 404. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced a proposed amendment to delete “/and” before “support” in the last sentence, to read, “care or support”, and to delete the words “care, and when necessary, support” in square brackets. The ILO Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156), referred to “care or support”. Moreover, in placing the item on the agenda of the 112th Session of the International Labour Conference, the Governing Body of the ILO had mandated a discussion to review “developments concerning care work, across the ILO’s strategic objectives, as a critical area for advancing the transformative agenda for gender equality and promoting an ecosystem of care for all” (GB.343/INS/2(Rev.1). Moreover, care “and” support was restrictive, as it implied that both must be provided at all times, whereas “or” gave the flexibility of choice.
- 405. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. Her group had submitted an amendment (A.159) proposing the counterargument that care “or” support was restrictive, as it implied that a choice needed to be made. The words “care and support” reflected the broad range of jobs that could be required at all levels of care across the life course. That language was reflected in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, resolutions of the United Nations Human Rights Council and a recently adopted resolution of the General Assembly of the United Nations establishing the International Day of Care and Support.

- 406. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, said that their groups had both submitted identical amendments (A.171 and A.29) to that submitted by the Workers' group, in favour of the wording "care and support". They could not support the Employers' amendment.
- 407. The Government members of Austria, Canada, Chile and the United States, and the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, also expressed a preference for "care and support" and thus did not support the Employers' amendment.
- 408. In the light of guidance provided by the Office on recent developments in common ILO language usage, and following informal consultations, the Employer Vice-Chairperson, in the spirit of compromise, agreed to withdraw her group's amendment and accept "care and support".
- 409. The amendment was withdrawn.

[A.159, A.171 and A.29]

- 410. In the light of the foregoing, the Chairperson said he took it that the Committee wished to adopt the amendment submitted by the Workers' group as well as two identical amendments submitted by the Government members of the EU Member States and the Government members of GRULAC, to refer to "care and support".
- 411. It was so agreed.
- 412. The amendments were adopted.

[A.170]

- 413. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, presented a proposed amendment to add the word "adolescents" to the list of life-course categories, since adolescents had distinct care needs from children.
- 414. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that "youth", already in the list, was a comprehensive term that encompassed "adolescents" but that her group could agree to the amendment.
- 415. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, having received confirmation requested from the Office on the recognition of the category "adolescents" in the work of the International Conference of Labour Statisticians, said that her group could support the amendment.
- 416. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Government member of South Africa speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government members of Zimbabwe, the United States and Türkiye supported the amendment.
- 417. The amendment was adopted.

[A.167]

- 418. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, proposed an amendment to add the words "and all caregivers" at the end of the final sentence, to be inclusive of all those who provided care, whether paid or unpaid, as professional care workers or providing care on an unpaid basis in their families or communities.

- 419. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the amendment was unnecessary, given that the whole paragraph referred to “care work, both paid and unpaid”, as stipulated in the first sentence. Including caregivers in the list of life-course categories seemed incongruous.
- 420. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that her group could support the amendment.
- 421. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government members of Vanuatu and Kiribati supported the amendment.
- 422. The amendment was adopted.
- 423. Point 7 was adopted as amended.

Point 8

[A.216]

- 424. As it was not seconded, an amendment submitted by the Government of Türkiye, fell.

[A.2]

- 425. The Government member of Mali proposed an amendment that affected the French version only.
- 426. The proposal was seconded by the Government member of Senegal.
- 427. The amendment to the French version was adopted.

[A.33]

- 428. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to remove the term “work” after “social” in the fourth sentence of point 8. Reference to the broader concept of “health and social sectors” would be preferable to “health and social work sectors”.
- 429. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 430. The Worker Vice-Chairperson requested guidance from the Office, since the term “social work sectors” was used in the Office report, including in a quote from the European Agency for Safety and Health at Work.
- 431. The deputy representative of the Secretary-General clarified that the Office had used the term “social work” in the context of statistics, in line with the United Nations International Standard Industrial Classification of all Economic Activities, which referred to “social work sectors”.
- 432. The Government member of Brazil said that in Brazil, “social work” was a crucial aspect of social policy, encompassing non-contributory social protection. She did not support the amendment. In the Latin American context, social work included care services, such as childcare, long-term care, and care for persons with disabilities.
- 433. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, cautioned that some categories of care workers, such as long-term care providers and nursing assistants, might not be covered by the term “social work”, which, when defined in the European context, referred to a specific profession in the social sector. The broader social sector should be referenced in point 8; a reference to “social work” would limit the scope.
- 434. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that, similarly, in her country, social work was a specific profession. She could therefore support the amendment.

435. The amendment was adopted.

[A.132]

436. The Government member of the United Kingdom, speaking also on behalf of the Governments of Australia, Canada and the United States, introduced an amendment to insert the word “internationally” before “agreed statistical definition of care work”.

437. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson both supported the amendment.

438. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of Africa group, and the Government member of Türkiye supported the amendment.

439. The amendment was adopted.

[A.219]

440. In the absence of a second, an amendment proposed by the Government of Türkiye fell.

441. Point 8 was adopted as amended.

Point 9

442. Point 9 was adopted.

New point after point 9

[A.35]

443. The Government member of Netherlands, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced a proposed amendment to insert a new point after point 9 to read “Unpaid care work, often provided by the family and social network of care recipients, was of great value for care recipients, care providers and society. Care providers from within the recipient’s social network know the recipients well and are often in the best position to understand their needs. This care, which should be more equally shared between men and women, complements and supplements, but cannot replace paid care work”. In the light of informal consultations, however, he wished to propose a subamendment to delete the second sentence of the new point, which had proven problematic for some parties.

444. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that, while the Employers’ group had preferred the original amendment, it could support the proposal as subamended.

445. The Worker Vice-Chairperson welcomed the proposal to subamend; the second sentence had been a cause of concern for her group. She wished to hear the views of the governments before stating a position on the proposal.

446. The Government member of Kiribati expressed disappointment that States, such as Kiribati, which relied heavily on unpaid care work had not been approached for their input. In the Pacific Island States, unpaid care work was a highly valued aspect of national priorities and cultural norms. His Government was particularly opposed to last sentence of the proposed new point, which was not in line with the policies and practices of small island developing States, or indigenous or remote communities, which relied on unpaid care work.

447. The Government members of Mexico, the United Kingdom, Brazil and New Zealand supported the amendment, as subamended.

448. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, in a spirit of consensus, accepted the amendment, as subamended.

449. The new point after point 9 was adopted as amended.

Point 10

[A.7]

450. As it was not seconded, an amendment proposed by the Government of Türkiye fell.

[A.120 and A.162]

451. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced a proposed amendment to replace the word “many” by “some” before the word “countries” in the second sentence, to avoid generalization.

452. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. The word “many”, reflected more accurately the disproportionate amount of care work done by women, who were often further marginalized by their race, ethnicity and migration status.

453. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, said that it would be preferable not to make a quantitative judgement as it was unclear how “many” and “some”, were defined; different countries included different ethnic and social variables in their data collection. In Latin America and the Caribbean, one in four people were of African or indigenous descent. If required to choose between “some” and “many” countries, “many” would be preferable.

454. The Government member of Mexico concurred. She did not support the amendment.

455. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, stated that the burden of paid and unpaid female care work could depend on many factors. She wished to know whether the Office had data on the matter.

456. The deputy representative of the Secretary-General stated that the ILO had microdata from 119 countries disaggregated by sex, education, country of birth and citizenship but not by race or ethnicity.

457. The Government member of the United States proposed a subamendment to delete the words “In [some/many] countries,” from the beginning of the sentence, to begin, “The burden of paid and unpaid care work”.

458. The Employer Vice-Chairperson seconded the subamendment.

459. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.

460. The Government member of South Africa speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government member of Mexico supported the subamendment.

461. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

462. A subsequent amendment (A.162) fell.

463. Point 10 was adopted as amended.

Point 11

[A.163]

464. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to insert, after “financing mechanisms”, the words “policy and regulatory frameworks underpinning care systems”. A reference to regulation should be made in the definition of the care economy in point 11, and would be in line with point 26(a), which referred to integrated and coherent care policies and systems.
465. The Government members of Mexico, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, the United States, Canada and the Philippines, and the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the amendment.
466. The Government member of Zimbabwe supported the amendment in principle but, since “policies” were already included as the first item on the list of aspects comprising the care economy, there was no need to include it a second time.
467. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed that it would be preferable to avoid the repetitive use of the word “policy” and therefore proposed a subamendment to insert the words “regulatory frameworks,” after “policies,”. The words “underpinning care systems” were redundant and should not be added.
468. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment. It was not sufficient to only mention regulatory frameworks. Comprehensive policy frameworks ensured that care was mainstreamed in all relevant policy areas and included all care workers, including those in the informal economy, ensuring policy coordination and coherence among all relevant ministries and public authorities and taking account of the demographic, socio-economic and environmental aspects that were increasing the demand for care. They also ensured comprehensive coverage and access to protections and paid care leave entitlements for all workers with family or caring responsibilities, regardless of employment status. Regulatory frameworks provided clear career pathways, training, skills development and lifelong opportunities accessible to all care workers, including migrant workers, promoting the professionalization and formalization of care work, and ensuring decent work.
469. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that an enabling environment was also important for businesses, particularly MSMEs. While her group could agree to linking “policies and regulatory frameworks”, it could not accept the addition of “underpinning care systems”.
470. The Worker Vice-Chairperson could not agree to the deletion of the reference to care systems.
471. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, shared the concern of the Workers’ group and did not support the subamendment.
472. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that the words “The care economy comprises” at the beginning of the point covered the concept of care systems. It was therefore not necessary to mention care systems a second time. She supported the subamendment.
473. The Government members of the United Kingdom, China and the United States supported the subamendment.
474. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that, in a spirit of compromise, her group would accept the subamendment.
475. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

[A.119]

- 476. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment to delete the words “and support” after “receipt of care”.
- 477. Point 11 was adopted as amended.
- 478. Part II as a whole, as amended, was adopted.

Part III. Guiding principles

- 479. The title was adopted.

Point 12

- 480. Point 12 was adopted.

Point 13

[A.118]

- 481. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment, which she wished to subamend, to replace “Care work is not a commodity” by “Labour in the care economy is not a commodity”, in line with the language used in the ILO Declaration of Philadelphia, 1944.
- 482. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment. Labour was not a commodity in any sector. She proposed a further subamendment, to read, “Just as labour is not a commodity, labour in the care economy is not a commodity.”
- 483. The deputy representative of the Secretary-General stated that the proposed subamendment by the Workers’ group would strengthen the alignment with the language of the ILO Declaration of Philadelphia, 1944.
- 484. The Government members of the United States, Australia and the United Kingdom, the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the subamendment proposed by the Workers’ group.
- 485. The Government member of China preferred the subamendment presented by the Employers’ group.
- 486. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that given the broad support from the governments, her group could accept the subamendment proposed by the Workers’ group.
- 487. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

[A.6]

- 488. The Government member of Australia, speaking also on behalf of the Governments of Canada, New Zealand and Switzerland, introduced a proposed amendment to replace “It is a right of all people to provide and receive care, including self-care” by “The care and support system must be firmly grounded on a human rights-based approach that unequivocally upholds and protects the human rights of both caregivers and recipients”. There was no internationally recognized right to care. The amendment was intended to acknowledge the importance of human rights, rather than stating that care was a right per se. A subsequent amendment due to be proposed by the EU Member States, which sought to revise the second sentence of point

13 to read, “All people should be able to provide and receive care, including self-care”, was welcome and should be included, before the new sentence.

489. The Employer Vice-Chairperson considered that a focus on human rights should mention a principles-based approach. Her group could therefore not support the proposed new sentence contained in the amendment submitted by the Government of Australia. It could, however, support the amendment proposed by the EU Member States for the revision of the second sentence. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that the amendment, as proposed by the Government of Australia, reflected the worker group’s views.
490. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the amendment proposed by the Government of Australia, and welcomed the suggestion to also include the wording, due to be proposed through a subsequent amendment (A.37) submitted by the EU Member States, to read, “All people should be able to provide and receive care, including self-care”. She said she could also accept the Employers’ group suggestion to include reference to a principles-based approach.
491. The Government member of Brazil, speaking also on behalf of ten States from Latin America, supported the revision of the second sentence as per the amendment submitted by the EU Member States, to read “All people should be able to provide and receive care, including self-care.”.
492. In light of the broad support for the revision of the second sentence as proposed by the EU Member States, the Chairperson said he took it that the Committee wished to approve the amendment of that sentence.
493. It was so agreed.
494. Turning to the proposed amendment introduced by the Government member of Australia, the Government member of the United Kingdom expressed support but wished to propose a subamendment to delete “human” before “rights-based approach”. The subamendment was seconded by Government member of South Africa and supported by the Government members of the United States and Mali.
495. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment presented by the Government of the United Kingdom and proposed a further subamendment to read “rights- and principle-based approach”. The only international human rights instrument that explicitly covered the provision of care, under very specific circumstances, was the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities. Comprehensive care was not recognized as a human right. A rights-based approach would relate to normative action and legally binding instruments, whereas a principle-based approach would relate to promoting values and principles, sharing best practices, peer learning, developing a sense of community, promoting respect, building cooperation and partnerships and applying soft law. Redressing the disproportionate volume of unpaid care work done by women would require changes in mindset and behaviour, which would require an adaptable and flexible approach aligned with the local context. A principle-based approach was therefore as important as a rights-based approach.
496. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that her group would prefer to keep the words “human rights-based approach”. Adding reference to a principles-based approach would weaken the text; voluntary principles were not equivalent to rights. A human rights-based approach would be rooted in the application of international human rights standards, including international labour standards. The addition of reference to a principle-based approach would be incongruous with the subsequent wording, “unequivocally upholds and protects the human rights of both caregivers and recipients.”. She recalled the opening remarks of the representative of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, who had highlighted that care and support systems must be redesigned from a human-rights perspective to advance the rights of all care workers and all recipients of care and support.

497. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, expressed strong support for the inclusion of the words “human rights-based”. She could also accept the addition of “principle-based”.
498. The Government members of Canada and Kiribati, and the Government member of Brazil, speaking also on behalf of ten States from Latin America, did not support the subamendment proposed by the Government of the United Kingdom.
499. In light of the foregoing and having received further clarification from the Government member of Australia that the “human rights-based approach” referred to the application of existing international human rights instruments, the Government member of the United Kingdom withdrew the subamendment to delete the word “human”.
500. Following informal consultations, the Government member of Australia proposed a subamendment, by which references to the contested “human rights-based” and “principles-based” approaches would be deleted. The sentence would thus read, “The care and support system must unequivocally uphold and protect the human rights of both caregivers and recipients”.
501. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
502. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a further subamendment to delete the word “unequivocally” and to replace “care and support system” by “State”, in line with the United Nations Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights, which referred to “States’ existing obligations to respect, protect and fulfil human rights”.
503. The Worker Vice-Chairperson wished to replace “The State” by “Members”. States were not solely responsible for upholding human rights: trade unions and employers were also required to uphold human rights.
504. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the subamendment proposed by the Workers’ group.
505. The Government member of Kiribati pointed out that in certain circumstances, workers found themselves outside States’ jurisdiction and relied wholly on trade unions to uphold their rights. Such had been the case for many seafarers abandoned at sea during the COVID-19 pandemic. He therefore supported the subamendment proposed by the Workers’ group.
506. The Government member of Cameroon proposed a subamendment to replace “human” before rights by “labour”. The subamendment was seconded by the Government member of China.
507. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment proposed by the Government of Cameroon, which complemented the Workers’ group proposal to begin the sentence with the word “Members”.
508. The Worker Vice-Chairperson could not agree to the removal of the reference to human rights. The recipients of care could be infants. Referring to labour rights in that context would not be appropriate.
509. A representative of the Secretariat said that it was clear that all work done by organizations of the United Nations Development System, including the ILO, must be grounded in human rights. While that did not mandate the ILO to work on all human rights, the Organization had a mandate to work on labour rights, which were human rights. As the first organization to become a specialized agency of the United Nations in 1946, it was entirely appropriate for conclusions adopted in the context of the ILO to refer to human rights.

510. In the absence of any consensus on the amendment and at the conclusion of the Committee's work, the Chairperson said he took it that the Committee agreed that the amendment and three subsequent amendments to point 13, which had not been introduced, would fall. The agreed text of point 13 would thus read, "Just as labour is not a commodity, labour in the care economy is not a commodity. All people should be able to provide and receive care, including self-care."

511. It was so agreed.

512. Point 13 was adopted as amended.

Point 14

[A.9]

513. As it was not seconded, an amendment proposed by the Government of Türkiye fell.

514. Point 14 was adopted.

Points 15 and 16

515. Points 15 and 16 were adopted.

Point 17

[A.172]

516. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, introduced an amendment to insert the word "intersectionality" after "equity" to reflect the risks faced by certain groups of being discriminated against on multiple intersecting grounds.

517. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.

518. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the inclusion of "intersectionality".

519. The Government member of Zimbabwe requested further clarification of the term "intersectionality".

520. The Government member of Brazil drew attention to the ILO Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), a fundamental Convention, which listed seven grounds of discrimination that could intersect, and ILO Convention No. 190, which referred to "multiple and intersecting forms of discrimination" in its Preamble. Intersecting discrimination had a significant impact on the lives of vulnerable groups.

521. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, considered that intersectionality was not a principle to which to aspire, and therefore was not in line with the other items listed in point 17. The list already included "non-discrimination", which included discrimination on any or multiple grounds of discrimination operating simultaneously, such as in the case of intersectional discrimination. However, they thought that non-discrimination covered intersectionality, as intersectionality was a characteristic of discrimination, and they also thought it would be unwise to add intersectionality to the list of elements that society hoped for or was based on. They did not support the amendment.

522. The Employer Vice-Chairperson concurred.

- 523. The Government members of Mali and Saudi Arabia, and the Government member of Qatar, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, did not support the amendment.
- 524. The Government member of the United States, while agreeing that a reference to intersectionality might be appropriate elsewhere in the conclusions, did not support the amendment.
- 525. Given the broad lack of support for the proposal, the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, withdrew the amendment.

[A.115]

- 526. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment, which she wished to subamend to delete the words “and gender” before “co-responsibility” from the end of the point. Employers, workers and governments shared responsibility for providing good care for all. The addition of a reference to “social co-responsibility” would reflect that.
- 527. The Worker Vice-Chairperson wished to defer to the Government group before pronouncing an opinion on the amendment.
- 528. The Government member of Kiribati emphasized the importance of the social responsibility of the private sector.
- 529. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government member of Mexico supported the amendment.
- 530. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that her group could support the amendment.
- 531. The amendment was adopted.
- 532. Point 17 was adopted as amended.

Point 18

[A.174]

- 533. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, introduced an amendment to insert the words “from a gender and rights perspective”, after “Investing in the care economy”. Gender and rights must be taken into account as a prerequisite for promoting quality care, decent work, health and well-being.
- 534. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 535. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment.
- 536. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that while the EU supported the spirit of the amendment, it did not support the proposed location of the new wording, which risked limiting the scope of the paragraph. The EU Member States had submitted an amendment on the same point (A.38), which included gender equality in the list of aspects enhanced by investment in the care economy.
- 537. The Government member of Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, did not support the amendment.
- 538. The Government member of Mexico stressed that investing in the economy without a gender perspective could have negative consequences for women. By including a gender perspective in investment, the impacts of pre-existing gender inequality would be taken into consideration.

The ILO had published research showing that omitting the gender perspective from the investment phase could lead to increased inequality.

- 539. The Government member of Brazil added that the amendment proposed by the EU Member States listed gender equality as a result of investment, whereas the amendment proposed by GRULAC emphasized the need for a gender perspective in the overall approach to investment in the care economy; those two aspects were in fact complementary.
- 540. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, did not support the amendment.
- 541. The Government member of Kiribati supported the amendment.
- 542. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed a subamendment to the text, to replace “from” by “with” before “a gender perspective”.
- 543. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
- 544. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment; the matter had already been addressed and covered in point 15 and there was no need to repeat it.
- 545. The Government members of the United States and the United Kingdom, and the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the subamendment.
- 546. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that her group would not support the amendment as it would prefer to amend the point in line with the subsequent amendment due to be presented by the EU Member States, which included aspects on gender equality, improved well-being and productivity growth.
- 547. The Government member of Qatar, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, agreed with the Employers’ group.
- 548. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, said that despite the Employers’ lack of support, there appeared to be a majority in favour of the amendment. Mainstreaming the gender perspective into investment in the care economy affected all aspects of investment not only investment by private institutions.
- 549. Following informal consultations, the Government members of Kiribati and the United States and the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, expressed support for the amendment. The Employer Vice-Chairperson reiterated that her group could not support the amendment. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that her group did not have strong feelings and would be willing to support the majority.
- 550. In the absence of consensus, the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, withdrew the amendment.

[A.38]

- 551. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed an amendment (A.38) to insert “job creation and can lead to human capital increases, productivity growth, improved well-being and gender equality, as well as decent work and stronger female participation in the labour market” after “decent”. The Office report, Decent work and the care economy (ILC.112/Report VI) had underscored the significant return on investment in the care economy, not only with regard to the workforce and economy, but also for society in general. She suggested including a reference to gender equality, as per the previous amendment discussed (A.174), and also including the word “education”, as per the subsequent amendment, due to be presented by the Government members of GRULAC (A.175).

552. The Employer Vice-Chairperson expressed her group's full support for the proposed amendment.
553. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced a subamendment, to replace the words "human capital increases" with "enhanced human capabilities", in line with the terminology used in the ILO's report World Employment and Social Outlook. The Workers' group could also support the inclusion of the word "education" in the list of aspects improved by investment in the care economy.
554. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
555. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the subamendment proposed by the Workers' group and suggested that education might be considered to be included in "enhanced human capabilities".
556. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the amendment as subamended by the Workers' group. An explicit reference to education would be preferable.
557. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed a subamendment to insert the word "education" after "productivity growth".
558. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a further subamendment to add "quality" before "education".
559. The Government member of Mexico asked why the word "health", which had been in the original Office text, had been deleted in the amendment proposed by the EU Member States.
560. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, explained the rationale that health was included in the term "well-being". The EU would not, however, object to the addition of an explicit reference to health.
561. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendments to insert "quality education" after "productivity growth".
562. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to insert "health and" before "well-being". She proposed a further subamendment to delete the word "decent" before "job creation", as decent work had already been mentioned, and the terminology "decent job creation" was questionable.
563. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the proposal to delete "decent"; the ultimate aim was to ensure that all work, including new jobs, was decent.
564. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, underscored the importance of explicitly referring to decent job creation: the creation of new decent jobs was a separate issue to ensuring that existing work was decent.
565. The Employer Vice-Chairperson drew attention to the Centenary Declaration, which referred to "job creation" rather than "decent job creation". The word "decent" should be deleted.
566. The Worker Vice-Chairperson referred to point 14 of the draft conclusions, which underscored the importance of decent work for all care workers. All new jobs created in care work should be decent.
567. The Government members of Australia, the United States, the United Kingdom, the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, did not support the proposal to delete “decent” before “job creation”.

- 568. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew the subamendment to delete the word “decent”.
- 569. The Chairperson said he took it that the Committee wished to accept the remaining subamendments, to replace “human capital increases” with “enhanced human capabilities”, to insert “quality education” before “productivity growth”, and to insert “health and” before “well-being”.
- 570. It was so agreed.
- 571. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 572. A related amendment (A.175) fell.
- 573. Point 18 was adopted as amended.

Point 19

[A.113]

- 574. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to replace “rewarded with fair and adequate wages” with “adequately remunerated”.
- 575. The Worker Vice-Chairperson fully supported the ILO 5R Framework for Decent Care Work, as presented in proposed point 19, as a guide to integrated and coherent strategies to achieve decent work in the care economy. The wording used in the 5R Framework should not be changed. The Workers’ group therefore could not accept the proposed amendment.
- 576. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to read, “should be rewarded through adequate remuneration”.
- 577. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment.
- 578. The Employer Vice-Chairperson pointed out that agreement had not been reached on the 5R Framework. Replacing “fair and adequate wages” by “remuneration” was more appropriate in the context of being “rewarded”.
- 579. The Worker Vice-Chairperson requested guidance from the Office.
- 580. The deputy representative of the Secretary-General explained that the 5R Framework was to recognize, reduce and redistribute unpaid care work, and to reward and represent paid care workers. The term “rewarded with fair and adequate wages” was often used; however, “rewarded through adequate remuneration” could be accepted. The word “remuneration” was defined in the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), as “the ordinary, basic or minimum wage or salary and any additional emoluments whatsoever payable directly or indirectly”.
- 581. In the light of that explanation, the Worker Vice-Chairperson said that she could accept the subamendment.
- 582. The Government members of Mexico, South Africa, the United States, Canada, and the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the subamendment.
- 583. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

[A.4]

- 584. The Government member of Japan, speaking also on behalf of the Government of Türkiye, introduced a proposed amendment to replace “including” by “in accordance with the principle of” before “equal pay for work of equal value”, in line with the wording of Convention No. 100.
- 585. The Worker Vice-Chairperson requested guidance from the Office.
- 586. The representative of the Secretary-General confirmed that the wording of the amendment was consistent with Article 2(1) of Convention No.100.
- 587. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 588. The Government members of New Zealand and Mexico also supported the amendment.
- 589. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed a subamendment, to insert the word “including” before “in accordance with”, as there were multiple principles to be taken into account.
- 590. The Government members of the United States and Australia supported the amendment, as subamended.
- 591. The Government member of Japan also supported the subamendment.
- 592. The Worker Vice-Chairperson welcomed the confirmation provided by the representative of the Secretary-General. Her group could accept the amendment but did not agree to the subamendment to insert “including” before “in accordance with”.
- 593. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that her group could be flexible and accept either the amendment or the amendment as subamended.
- 594. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, reiterated that the subamendment was intended to ensure that all relevant principles were included.
- 595. The Government members of Mexico and the United Kingdom supported the subamendment.
- 596. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that in a spirit of compromise, her group would accept the proposed subamendment.
- 597. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

[A.112]

- 598. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to insert “of care employers and workers” after “Representation” in the penultimate sentence, to include all parties in the principle of representation.
- 599. The Worker Vice-Chairperson could not accept the amendment. The 5R Framework referred specifically to the representation of care workers.
- 600. The Employer Vice-Chairperson asked the Office to clarify whether the 5R Framework referred exclusively to workers and did not include employers.
- 601. The deputy representative of the Secretary-General stated that the 5R Framework, in its aspect on representation, referred primarily to representation of care workers. However, given that it included social dialogue and collective bargaining, employers were not excluded.
- 602. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted the importance of including all constituents in the discussion on the 5R Framework. Care employers, as well as workers, should be included in the aspect on representation, thereby specifying the constituents involved in social dialogue.

- 603. The Government member of Brazil supported the amendment by the Employers' group. Social dialogue including collective bargaining should include organized workers and employers. Both sides should be represented.
- 604. The Government member of Mexico supported the amendment and the intervention made by the Government member of Brazil.
- 605. The Government member of Chile said that her Government supported the amendment. She cautioned, however, that the subsequent amendment, also due to be introduced by the Employers' group, sought to delete the reference to collective bargaining.
- 606. The Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed that employers needed to be represented but underscored that the 5R Framework referred to the need to rectify the fact that many care workers were not represented. She therefore proposed a subamendment to delete "of care employers and workers" after "Representation", and instead insert "with workers' and employers' organizations," after "social dialogue".
- 607. The Government member of New Zealand pointed out that collective bargaining usually took place between workers' representatives and employers, rather than employers' organizations.
- 608. The Government members of Mexico, Brazil, Canada and Zimbabwe supported the text as subamended.
- 609. The Government member of Canada added that the 5R Framework was embedded in Canada's international assistance policy.
- 610. In the absence of any consensus on the amendment and at the conclusion of the Committee's work, the Chairperson said he took it that the Committee agreed that the amendment and three subsequent amendments to point 19, which had not been introduced, would fall. The remaining text in square brackets (the last two sentences of the point) would therefore be deleted. The text of point 19 would thus read, "The 5R Framework for Decent Care Work guides integrated and coherent strategies to achieve decent work in the care economy. Unpaid care work should be recognized, reduced and redistributed. Paid care work should be rewarded through adequate remuneration, including in accordance with the principle of equal pay for work of equal value, and effective labour and social protection."
- 611. It was so agreed.
- 612. Point 19 was adopted as amended.

Point 20

Chapeau

[A.108]

- 613. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.108) to delete "and funded" after "well designed". Care leave policies were a matter of national legislation; some were unpaid. Calling for the funding of all care leave policies would place undue burden on the public sector.
- 614. The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that in point 17 of the draft conclusions, the Committee had agreed to the universality of access to and provision of care, which would require well-funded care leave policies and services. She could therefore not support the amendment.
- 615. The Government members of New Zealand and China supported the amendment.

- 616. The Government member of the United States, supported by the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government member of Canada, requested clarification of the rationale behind the proposed deletion of “funding”, which seemed inconsistent with the Employers’ group’s emphasis on the need for adequate resources in previous parts of the discussion.
- 617. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that not all of the items enumerated in the clauses following the chapeau of point 20 required funding. If an employee needed to take emergency leave for personal care-related reasons, there were options for unpaid leave, which was not funded by the Government. Some countries did not have options for paid care leave.
- 618. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government members of Canada, the United States, Mexico and the United Kingdom did not support the amendment.
- 619. At the initiative of the Government member of the United Kingdom, the Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to retain “and funded”, and add “,where appropriate” after “services”.
- 620. The Worker Vice-Chairperson could not support either the subamendment or the amendment.
- 621. The Government member of China supported the subamendment since care leave policies varied according to national contexts.
- 622. The Government members of Argentina, New Zealand, Mali, Saudi Arabia and Mexico, and the Government member of Qatar, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, supported the subamendment.
- 623. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, reiterated her lack of support for the subamendment; unpaid care leave did not foster gender equality. To the extent possible, care leave should be funded.
- 624. The Worker Vice-Chairperson concurred. The point, which was included in the guiding principles of the conclusions, aimed to enumerate the effects of well-designed and well-funded care leave policies.
- 625. The Committee did not have time to reach a consensus on the amendment at its last sitting. The following text was considered for adoption: “Achieving decent work includes the adoption and effective implementation of well-designed care leave policies and services. This enables:”.
- 626. It was so agreed.
- 627. The chapeau was adopted, as amended.

Point 20(a)

- 628. Point 20, clause (a) was adopted.

Point 20(b)

[A.176]

- 629. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, introduced an amendment to insert the words “between men and women and between the government, the private sector, the community and families” after “care responsibilities”, for the purposes of clarification.

- 630. The Worker Vice-Chairperson considered that the proposed wording might be inappropriate, given that “equal sharing of care responsibilities” referred to care responsibilities at the household level.
- 631. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that since social co-responsibility was addressed in point 17, her group did not support the amendment.
- 632. The Government member of the United Kingdom agreed that such wording could be better placed elsewhere.
- 633. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed a subamendment to only retain “between men and women” in the amended language, deleting “and between the government, the private sector, the community and families”.
- 634. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government members of the United Kingdom and Switzerland supported the subamendment.
- 635. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
- 636. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment, to insert a comma after “better work–life balance”.
- 637. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
- 638. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, also supported the subamendment.
- 639. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 640. Point 20, clause (b) was adopted as amended.

Point 20(c) and (d)

- 641. Point 20, clauses (c) and (d) were adopted.

New clause after point 20(d)

[A.164]

- 642. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert a new clause after point 20 (d), to read “addressing inequitable access to care and support services, including for workers in the informal economy” to draw attention to the reality that workers in the informal economy were often excluded by law or by practice from social protection. Low wages and other structural inequalities, prevented them from accessing the same kind of care and support that they provided, thereby denying them access to decent work and putting them and their families at risk.
- 643. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to replace “inequitable access to care and support” by “the gap in supply and demand of”.
- 644. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment; the proposal referred to ensuring access, not filling gaps.
- 645. The Government members of Mexico, Brazil, the United States and Canada, and the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported the amendment as proposed by the workers. They did not support the subamendment.

- 646. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that in the spirit of compromise, she wished to withdraw the subamendment.
- 647. The Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed her group's gratitude for that flexibility.
- 648. The amendment was adopted.
- 649. The new clause after point 20, clause (d) was adopted.

New point after point 20

[A.10]

- 650. As it was not seconded, an amendment (A.10) submitted by the Government of Türkiye to add a new point after point 20, fell.

Point 21

[A.28]

- 651. As it was not seconded, an amendment to delete point 21, proposed by the Government of Argentina, fell.

[A.39]

- 652. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, presented a proposed amendment to delete the words "Care has characteristics of a public good, which implies that" and to replace "primary" by "specific" before "responsibility".
- 653. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the deletion of the opening of the point, but did not agree with replacing "primary" by "specific". She proposed a subamendment to reinstate "primary".
- 654. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment as subamended by the Workers' group.
- 655. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said she could accept the subamendment.
- 656. The Government member of Brazil, also speaking on behalf of ten other States from Latin America, explained that care was considered a public good in Latin America. She did not support the amendment.
- 657. The Government members of New Zealand, Argentina and Bangladesh supported the amendment as originally presented by the Government member of Belgium on behalf of the EU Member States.
- 658. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government members of Canada, the United Kingdom, the United States and the Syrian Arab Republic supported the amendment as subamended.
- 659. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 660. Three amendments (A.107, A.188 and A.169) subsequently fell.

[A.106, A.105 and A.104]

- 661. In the light of the adoption of the previous amendment, the Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew three further amendments.

[A.45]

- 662. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, presented a proposed amendment to replace “requires” by “includes” before “the allocation of the necessary resources”.
- 663. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said her group could accept the amendment.
- 664. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 665. The Government member of Argentina presented a subamendment to insert after “includes”, the words “, in line with national circumstances”.
- 666. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic seconded the subamendment.
- 667. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government member of Cuba supported the subamendment.
- 668. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment.
- 669. The Government member of Canada sought clarification regarding whether the alignment with national circumstances was implicit in “the allocation of the necessary resources”.
- 670. The deputy representative of the Secretary-General said that as part of the guiding principles of the care economy, the allocation of resources in line with national circumstances would go without saying.
- 671. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that the word “necessary” before “resources” implicitly accounted for national circumstances.
- 672. The Government members of Australia, the United States, Mexico and Canada supported the amendment as originally presented. They did not support the subamendment.
- 673. The amendment was adopted.

[A.42]

- 674. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to add, at the end of the point, “and the adoption and maintenance of a robust policy and regulatory framework.”.
- 675. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 676. The Government members of Bangladesh, the United States, Mexico, the Syrian Arab Republic and Brazil also supported the amendment.
- 677. The amendment was adopted.
- 678. One subsequent amendment (A.166) fell.
- 679. Point 21 was adopted as amended.

New point after point 21

[A.102]

- 680. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.102) to insert a new point after point 21, which read: “Public-private partnerships that leverage the strengths of both public and private sectors can help scale quality care services without overburdening either side, fostering a more sustainable care ecosystem.” Public-private partnerships played a significant role in the creation of infrastructure and services, boosting innovation and competition, which could improve job creation, employment prospects, and upskilling and reskilling for care workers.
- 681. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that her group would not accept any reference to public-private partnerships in the guiding principles. There was currently no agreed tripartite ILO language referring to public-private partnerships at the national level. The role of the private sector was addressed in point 8 of the draft conclusions. Public-private partnerships did not necessarily deliver quality, efficiency or value for public money. Private finance could lead to public debt.
- 682. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Government member Saudi Arabia, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, and the Government member of Zimbabwe supported the amendment.
- 683. The Government members of Mexico, Canada and Brazil acknowledged the importance of public-private partnerships but suggested that the reference would be better placed in part IV of the conclusions, on advancing decent work in the care economy, rather than in part III on guiding principles.
- 684. The Government member of New Zealand said that the role of public and private enterprises was addressed in point 22 and the new point was therefore not necessary.
- 685. Following informal consultations, the Employer Vice-Chairperson reiterated the importance of referring to public-private partnerships and acknowledging their role in fostering a sustainable care economy as a framework for cooperation between the public and private sectors through public and private investment and the public regulatory framework.
- 686. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that, on the understanding that the regulatory framework referred to in point 21 would apply, her group could support the amendment.
- 687. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Government member of Qatar, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government members of the United States, Bangladesh and Mexico supported the amendment.
- 688. The Government member of Bangladesh pointed out that in the context of public-private partnerships, public and private resources should be shared.
- 689. The amendment was adopted.
- 690. The new point after point 21 was adopted.

Point 22

- 691. Following informal consultations, the Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew two amendments submitted by her group in relation to point 22.

692. Point 22 was adopted.

Point 23

693. Point 23 was adopted.

Point 24

[A.98]

- 694. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced a proposed amendment to replace “forms” by “types”; many types of work could not be classed as “forms” of work.
- 695. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. The reference to “all forms of care work” was intended to reflect the forms of care work identified and agreed in point 8 of the draft conclusions.
- 696. The Government member of Mali could not support the amendment; the International Conference of Labour Statisticians referred to “forms” of work.
- 697. A representative of the Secretariat said that in statistical standards, forms of work had a clear definition, whereas types of work did not. The point called for disaggregated data. Data could only be collected and disaggregated by categories with clear definitions. Without clear definitions, disaggregation would be difficult.
- 698. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to insert “on care work and” after “Collecting data” and to delete the words “all types of care work and by”.
- 699. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that her group could not support the subamendment or the amendment.
- 700. In the light of the comments from the Office, the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, did not support the amendment.
- 701. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government members of Mexico, Canada and Zimbabwe did not support the amendment.
- 702. Following informal consultations, the Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment.

[A.142]

- 703. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, introduced a proposed amendment to add a new sentence to the end of point 24, to read, “These data should be disaggregated by income, sex, age, race, ethnic origin, migration status, disability, geographical location and other relevant characteristics, in line with national context.”. The list comprised key components for describing the care economy and care work.
- 704. Both the Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 705. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, expressed support for the amendment.
- 706. The amendment was adopted.

[A.51]

- 707. In the light of the adoption of that amendment, the Government member of Belgium, on behalf of the EU Member States, withdrew a subsequent amendment.

[A.97]

- 708. The Employer Vice-Chairperson also withdrew a subsequent amendment to point 24.
- 709. Point 24 was adopted as amended.

Point 25

[A.179]

- 710. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, introduced an amendment to insert “government, social and private” before “levels” and to replace “taking a whole-of-government approach” by “taking an approach involving all entities”.
- 711. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment; the intention of the point was for the State to coordinate across various ministries and State bodies to mainstream care across public policies and ensure coherence.
- 712. The Employer Vice-Chairperson concurred. Her group did not support the amendment.
- 713. The Government member of Australia did not support the amendment; it was particularly important to take a whole-of-government approach to the care economy. A lack of cross-sector coordination could lead to policy gaps and mismatches. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, also could not support the amendment.
- 714. The amendment was withdrawn.
- 715. Point 25 was adopted.
- 716. Part III as a whole, as amended, was adopted.

Part IV. Advancing decent work in the care economy

- 717. The title was adopted.

Point 26

Chapeau

- 718. The chapeau was adopted.

Point 26(a)

[A.177]

- 719. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment to insert a reference to a regulatory framework, since the importance of regulatory frameworks had already been sufficiently reflected in the draft conclusions.

[A.96]

- 720. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace “agenda” by “and principles-based approach”. She wished, however, to subamend it, removing the words “and principles-based” to simply replace the word “agenda” by “approach”.
- 721. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment and thanked the Employers’ group for its flexibility.
- 722. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government members of the United Kingdom and New Zealand supported the amendment.
- 723. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

[A.94 and A.93]

- 724. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew two subsequent amendments.
- 725. Point 26, clause (a) was adopted as amended.

Point 26(b)

[A.180]

- 726. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, withdrew an amendment to replace “depending on the country’s level of development;” by “taking account of national circumstances;”.

[A.178 and A.92]

- 727. The Workers’ and Employers’ groups had submitted identical amendments to delete the words “depending on the country’s level of development”.
- 728. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, said that the African continent faced unique challenges related to care services, demographics and economic conditions. Tailoring policies to national circumstances would ensure effective solutions to those challenges. Public financing must be aligned with countries’ budgetary capacity and priorities. Understanding national nuances would allow targeted investment, efficient coordination and sustainable care systems. She therefore proposed a subamendment to add “taking into account national circumstances” at the end of the clause.
- 729. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson both supported the subamendment.
- 730. The Government member of Argentina also supported the subamendment.
- 731. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.
- 732. One subsequent amendment (A.92) fell.
- 733. Point 26, clause (b) was adopted as amended.

Point 26(c)

[A.183]

- 734. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment to include the words “gender responsive”, since the need for gender-responsive policies had been addressed elsewhere in the draft conclusions.

[A.90]

- 735. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment to add a reference to public–private partnerships, since those had already been sufficiently referenced in the draft conclusions.

[A.62]

- 736. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to replace “the expansion of the” by “ensure sufficient” before “fiscal space”. If there was already sufficient fiscal space for adequate investment in the care economy, expansion would not be necessary.
- 737. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson said they would defer to the government majority on the matter.
- 738. The Government member of Argentina did not support the amendment.
- 739. The Government members of the Syrian Arab Republic, Mexico, New Zealand, Australia, Kiribati, Bangladesh and the United States supported the amendment.
- 740. The amendment was adopted.
- 741. A subsequent amendment (A.220) fell.

[A.221]

- 742. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment to delete the words “invest in the care economy” from the end of the clause.
- 743. Point 26, clause (c) was adopted as amended.

Point 26(d)

[A.82]

- 744. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced a proposed amendment to replace “skilling” by “upskilling”.
- 745. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that her group could accept the amendment.
- 746. The Employer Vice-Chairperson concurred.
- 747. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported the amendment.
- 748. The amendment was adopted.

[A.150]

- 749. The Government member of the United Kingdom, speaking also on behalf of the Governments of Australia, Canada and the United States, introduced a proposed amendment to add “where appropriate” before “across national borders”, to incorporate a degree of flexibility to take account of national systems and bilateral agreements.

750. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.

751. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said her group could accept the amendment.

752. The Government members of New Zealand and Mexico and the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the amendment.

753. The amendment was adopted.

754. Point 26, clause (d) was adopted as amended.

Point 26(e)

755. Point 26, clause (e) was adopted.

Point 26(f)

[A.70]

756. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment, for the purposes of clarity, to insert the word “gender” between “unequal” and “distribution”, and to delete the words “between women and men” after “unpaid work”.

757. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.

758. The Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government members of the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and the United States supported the amendment.

759. The amendment was adopted.

[A.17]

760. As it was not seconded, an amendment proposed by the Government of Türkiye fell.

[A.88]

761. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced a proposed amendment to delete the words “within the context of national values” from the end of the clause.

762. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.

763. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Government member of Mexico, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government member of the United States supported the amendment.

764. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, said that with regard to the reference to “by changing norms and gender stereotypes”, Africa had rich and diverse cultures, traditions and practices. Those cultural nuances must be taken into account. By incorporating national cultural values, interventions would be more inclusive and attractive to local communities. She therefore proposed a subamendment replace “within the context of national values” by “taking into account cultural values”, which would contribute to sustainable shifts in caregiving norms in Africa.

- 765. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
- 766. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment. The language of the clause was already sufficiently flexible and did not impose any specific measures to be taken.
- 767. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that the clause was intended to promote gender equality and women's economic inclusion. While there might be circumstances that determined the pace at which some countries moved forward in that regard, adding a reference to cultural values would detract from the focus of the clause.
- 768. The Government members of Australia, Argentina, Canada, Brazil the United Kingdom and the United States did not accept the subamendment.
- 769. In view of the broad lack of support, the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, withdrew the proposed subamendment but underscored the importance of giving due consideration to countries' differing cultural values.
- 770. The amendment was adopted.
- 771. Two subsequent amendments fell.
- 772. Point 26, clause (f) was adopted as amended.

Point 26(g)

[A.86 and A.85]

- 773. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew amendments to replace "ensure" by "through social dialogue, provide" and to delete the word "all" before "workers".

[A.151]

- 774. The Government member of the United Kingdom introduced a proposed amendment to replace the word "strengthening" by "ensuring comprehensive" before "maternity protection".
- 775. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 776. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, also supported the amendment.
- 777. The amendment was adopted.

[A.186]

- 778. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment to add "and other types of care leave" at the end of the clause.
- 779. Point 26, clause (g) was adopted.

Point 26(h)

[A.84]

- 780. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew a proposed amendment to replace the clause by "provide scope for achieving better work-life balance by enabling workers and employers to agree on solutions, including on working time, that consider their respective needs and benefits;”.

[A.152]

- 781. The Government member of the United Kingdom, speaking also on behalf of the Governments of Australia and the United States, withdrew a proposed amendment to insert the words “flexible working” after “facilitating”.

[A.187]

- 782. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew a proposed amendment to add the words “, including for workers in the informal economy” at the end of the first sentence.
- 783. Point 26, clause (h) was adopted.

Point 26(i)

[A.217 and 218]

- 784. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew two proposed amendments, to replace “build and maintain universal” by “achieve universal access to comprehensive, adequate and sustainable” and to delete “adequate” before “protection”.

[A.189]

- 785. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew a proposed amendment to insert “all” before “workers”.
- 786. Point 26, clause (i) was adopted.

Point 26(j)

[A.192]

- 787. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed adding “and SSE entities” after “sustainable enterprises”.
- 788. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment; sustainable enterprises included entities of the social and solidarity economy. The amendment was therefore not necessary.
- 789. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government members of Australia, Canada, Brazil and Mexico supported the amendment.
- 790. The Employer Vice-Chairperson wished to propose a subamendment, based on the Conclusions concerning decent work and the social and solidarity economy adopted at the 110th Session of the International Labour Conference, to replace “and SSE entities” by “and develop a conducive environment for SSE entities”.
- 791. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
- 792. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government members of New Zealand, Australia and Canada also supported the subamendment.
- 793. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

[A.81]

- 794. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced a proposed amendment to insert “productivity and” before “investment”. Productivity was not linked to profit-making but rather to career development and opportunities for workers.
- 795. The Worker Vice-Chairperson cautioned against linking productivity and investment. She proposed a subamendment to replace “and” by a comma.
- 796. The Employer Vice-Chairperson accepted the subamendment.
- 797. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government members of New Zealand, Argentina, Brazil and Canada supported the subamendment.
- 798. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

[A.87]

- 799. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced a proposed amendment to insert “gender equal” before “business opportunities”, since women entrepreneurs faced greater obstacles to business opportunities than their male.
- 800. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 801. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. The meaning of “enhanced access to gender equal business opportunities” was unclear. Business opportunities should be accessed on merit, not on the basis of gender. There were many programmes in place to support women entrepreneurs. The insertion of “gender equal” in clause (j) seemed incongruous.
- 802. The Government members of the United States and the United Kingdom, and the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the amendment.
- 803. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, said that, unfortunately, women entrepreneurs were often discriminated against on grounds of gender, and were afforded fewer opportunities. She proposed a subamendment to insert “gender-responsive” before “policies”, rather than “gender equal” before “business opportunities”.
- 804. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed to the subamendment.
- 805. The Worker Vice-Chairperson also agreed to the subamendment.
- 806. The Government members of Canada and the United Kingdom supported the subamendment.
- 807. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

[A.91]

- 808. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to delete the words “, including in the care economy” from the end of the clause, which it considered redundant, given that the conclusions as a whole were explicitly related to the care economy.
- 809. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 810. The Government members of Zimbabwe, and the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, also supported the amendment.
- 811. The amendment was adopted.

812. Point 26, clause (j) was adopted as amended.

Point 26(k)

[A.80 and A.79]

813. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew two amendments, to insert “short-term” before “and long-term” and to delete “all” before “workers”.

[A.95]

814. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, withdrew a proposed amendment to replace the word “workers” by “people”.

815. Point 26, clause (k) was adopted.

New clause after point 26(k)

[A.3]

816. The Government member of Australia, speaking also on behalf of the Governments of Canada, Japan, New Zealand and the United States, introduced a proposed amendment to add a new clause, after (k), to read, “ensure measures consider culturally appropriate services and workforce considerations for indigenous and tribal peoples, including the development of community-based approaches;”. Gaps in the availability of community-based, culturally appropriate care services supporting indigenous people could lead to indigenous people seeking services outside their communities or not accessing services at all. Both outcomes had negative impacts for indigenous people and distorted data on demand for care services. Approaches to filling carer roles that were not grounded in community knowledge or cultural safety could contribute to a care workforce that was not recognized, remunerated or supported professionally to deliver appropriate services. Owing to differences in interpretation of care and workforce challenges, aspects of care in indigenous communities could require different considerations and approaches to the care economy.

817. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.

818. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government members of Mexico, the Syrian Arab Republic, Kiribati and New Zealand supported the amendment.

819. The amendment was adopted.

820. The new clause after point 26 (k) was adopted.

Point 26(l)

[A.153]

821. The Government member of the United Kingdom, speaking also on behalf of the Governments of Australia, Canada and the United States, introduced an amendment to insert “by taking a disability-inclusive approach to increase” before “access to employment opportunities” to integrate a more explicit measure for fostering inclusive employment opportunities.

822. The Worker Vice Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.

- 823. The Government member of Mexico, the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the amendment.
- 824. The amendment was adopted.
- 825. Point 26, clause (l) was adopted as amended.

Point 26(m)

[A.181]

- 826. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, introduced a proposed amendment to insert “all forms of” before “discrimination”.
- 827. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 828. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government members of Canada and the United States supported the amendment.
- 829. The amendment was adopted.

[A.182]

- 830. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, proposed an amendment to delete “based on any prohibited ground”, which was redundant and should therefore be removed.
- 831. The Worker Vice-Chairperson requested confirmation from the Office that the language was redundant.
- 832. The deputy representative of the Secretary-General said that, in the light of the adoption of the previous amendment by which “all forms of” had been inserted before “discrimination”, the words “based on any prohibited ground” could indeed be considered redundant.
- 833. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson accepted the amendment.
- 834. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government members of the United Kingdom, Guinea and the United States supported the amendment.
- 835. The amendment was adopted.

[A.77]

- 836. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment to delete “, with particular attention to women, migrant workers and racialized groups,”, in favour of the subsequent amendment submitted by the Member States of the European Union.

[A.99]

- 837. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced a proposed amendment to replace “migrant workers and racialized groups” by “and persons in vulnerable situations”.
- 838. The Government member of the United Kingdom expressed support for the amendment.
- 839. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.

- 840. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. Her group preferred the original text as prepared by the Office, referring specifically to “women, migrant workers and racialized groups”.
- 841. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, concurred with the Workers’ group.
- 842. The Government member of Zimbabwe requested clarification of the definition of the term “persons in vulnerable situations”.
- 843. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, said that the wording “persons in vulnerable situations” was proposed, in line with language used in the resolution concerning decent work and the social and solidarity economy (ILC.110/Resolution II) and the resolution concerning the second recurrent discussion on labour protection (ILC.111/Resolution IV), to draw attention to people in vulnerable situations in an inclusive manner. Migrant workers and racialized groups would be covered by “vulnerable situations”, along with all other examples of vulnerability, without exception.
- 844. In the light of that explanation, the Government members of Zimbabwe and Australia supported the amendment.
- 845. The Government member of Mexico did not support the amendment; certain groups of individuals required particular support and should be named specifically. Generalizing the wording was not advisable.
- 846. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to add, after “women”, “, migrant workers, racialized groups and other persons in situations of vulnerability”.
- 847. The representative of the Secretary-General cautioned against referring to women as “people in situations of vulnerability”.
- 848. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a further subamendment to delete the word “other”.
- 849. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, supported the subamendment.
- 850. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said her group could accept the subamendment.
- 851. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government members of the United States, Bangladesh and Mexico supported the subamendment.
- 852. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 853. Point 26, clause (m) was adopted as amended.

Point 26(n)

[A.78 and A.76]

- 854. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew two amendments, the first to add at the beginning of the clause “improve legal pathways for skills mobility to fill skills shortages in the care economy and”, and the second to replace the word “ensure” by “enable” before “the protection of migrant care workers”.

[A.193]

- 855. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert “all” before “migrant care workers”. The large number of amendments submitted to clause (n) were testament to the importance of the subject of migrant workers. Migrant workers deserved protection as much as any other worker. Migrant care workers left families behind to look after children and sick and older persons in other countries. They left their own loved ones behind to be cared for by others, usually women and girls. The pandemic had not only demonstrated the important contribution of migrant care workers to societies and economies but also the enormous challenges they faced. Undocumented migrant workers comprised a significant part of the care workforce. They were often rendered vulnerable to exploitation and other labour rights violations, as unscrupulous employers used their irregular status to intimidate and silence them. Fundamental labour rights must be for all workers, regardless of their employment or migration status. In many countries, migrant workers, both regular and irregular, were denied the right to freedom of association, to join or form a union, and to bargain collectively. While ILO instruments, standards and decisions enshrine the principle that all ILO core labour standards were fundamental for all workers, regardless of their immigration status, non-binding instruments, such as the Global Compact for Migration, had systematically tried to limit freedom of association and collective bargaining rights for migrant workers, taking migrant care workers out of the protections of labour law and viewing them only in the context of migration management.
- 856. The Employer Vice-Chairperson accepted the amendment.
- 857. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government members of the Syrian Arab Republic and Bangladesh supported the amendment.
- 858. The Government member of the United Kingdom could not support the amendment and suggested that the clause required more comprehensive discussion and consultation.
- 859. The Government member of Türkiye concurred. Ensuring the protection of all migrant workers was unrealistic. The portability of social protection rights was also exceptionally challenging, as different countries had different legal frameworks. Offering protection to all migrant workers could be in conflict with national laws and international agreements. The strong connections between migrant workers and the informal economy rendered the situation particularly complex.
- 860. The Government member of Kiribati agreed that the matter was sensitive and complex and required further comprehensive discussion.
- 861. Owing to a lack of consensus at the conclusion of the Committee’s work, the amendment and 11 subsequent amendments (A.103, A.211, A.212, A.194, A.117, A.75, A.73, A.195, A.122, A.72 and A.16) were not adopted.
- 862. Owing to lack of consensus at the conclusion of the Committee’s work, point 26, clause (n) fell.

Point 26(o)

[A.71]

- 863. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment to replace the word “ensure” by “promote” at the beginning of the clause.

[A.196]

- 864. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment to add, after “ensure” the words, “the effective exercise of the right to freedom of association and collective bargaining and the”.

[A.69]

- 865. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment to delete the words “including through labour inspection”.

[A.129]

- 866. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed an amendment to insert the words, “and other relevant authorities where applicable” after the words “labour inspection”.
- 867. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. The reference to labour inspection was sufficient.
- 868. The Employer Vice-Chairperson also did not support the amendment.
- 869. The amendment was withdrawn.

[A.68, A.67 and A.66]

- 870. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew three amendments to delete “all” before “care workers”, to replace “all” by “different” before “types of employment”, and to delete the words “such as domestic workers, migrant workers or community health and care workers”.

[A.134]

- 871. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed an amendment to delete the words “such as domestic workers, migrant workers or community health and care workers”.
- 872. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment.
- 873. The Government members of the United States, Mexico, Brazil and Kiribati did not support the amendment; it was important to refer specifically to the needs of domestic workers.
- 874. The amendment was withdrawn.
- 875. Point 26, clause (o) was adopted.

Point 26(p)

[A.64]

- 876. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduce an amendment, which she immediately subamended, to replace “appropriate limits to working hours and overtime, prevent and address violence and harassment and progressively ensure living wages and fair remuneration, including through collective bargaining” by “maximum limits on working time, occupational safety and health, including preventing and addressing violence and harassment, and adequate minimum wages, whether statutory or negotiated.”
- 877. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said her group could accept the amendment, as subamended.

- 878. The Government member of Qatar, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, and the Government members of the Syrian Arab Republic and Bangladesh, supported the amendment as subamended.
- 879. The Government member of the United States, supported by the Government member of Zimbabwe, said that, as drafted, there appeared to be maximum limits on occupational safety and health. He suggested a reordering of the sentence for the purposes of clarity.
- 880. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the drafting had been closely aligned with the text of the Centenary Declaration.
- 881. The Worker Vice-Chairperson suggested inserting a colon after “achieve”.
- 882. It was so agreed.
- 883. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.
- 884. A subsequent amendment (A.202) fell.
- 885. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that the issues addressed in the clause were particularly important to the Workers’ group. The decent work deficits in the care economy were profound. The Workers’ group had hoped that agreement would be reached on more specific language relating to working time, rest periods, compensation for overtime, regular and predictable working hours and occupational safety and health, to move beyond the Centenary Declaration. However, in a spirit of compromise, the Workers’ group had agreed to the text as approved, in order to maintain a reference to working conditions in the Committee’s conclusions.

- 886. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, withdrew an amendment to replace “address” by “combat” and to insert “in the world of work” after “harassment”.

[A.206]

- 887. The Government member of the United States proposed an amendment to add the words “, including gender-based violence and harassment,” after “harassment”, to ensure that the gender imbalance in the care economy was adequately referenced.
- 888. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 889. The Government members of Zimbabwe, Kiribati, Switzerland, Australia, Canada and Bangladesh, the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, supported the amendment.
- 890. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed to the amendment.
- 891. The amendment was adopted.

[A.203, A.207, A.208, A.199 and A.209]

- 892. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew five amendments: to insert “, establish minimum safe staffing levels,” after “overtime”, as the clause already referred to occupational safety and health; to replace “to achieve appropriate: by “that provide for rest periods,”; to replace “to achieve appropriate limits to working hours” by “that provide for maximum limits on working time”; to insert” promote regular and predictable working hours and schedules” before “prevent and address”, and to insert “guarantee compensation for overtime” after “harassment”.

[A.65 and A.63]

893. The Employers withdrew two amendments, to delete “hours and over” between “working” and “time” and to replace “progressively ensure living wages and fair remuneration, including through collective bargaining” by “ensure an adequate minimum wage, whether statutory or negotiated”.

894. Point 26, clause (p) was adopted as amended.

Point 26(q)

[A.61]

895. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete from “including unpaid care work” to the end of the clause.

896. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment.

897. Following informal consultations, the Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment.

898. Point 26, clause (q) was adopted.

Point 26(r)

[A.60]

899. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace “and” by “as well as” and to delete the word “including” before “cooperatives”.

900. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment.

901. Following informal consultations, the Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment.

902. Point 26, clause (r) was adopted.

Point 26(s)

[A.59]

903. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment to insert the word “analyse” after “collect,”.

[A.141]

904. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced a proposed amendment, which she wished to subamend, to insert the word “existing” before “international” and to insert “and international statistical standards that will be developed” after “statistical standards”.

905. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment as subamended.

906. The Government members of the United Kingdom, the United States, Zimbabwe, Mali and Kiribati, and the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, supported the amendment as subamended.

907. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

908. Point 26, clause (s) was adopted as amended.

Point 26(t)

[A.58]

909. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment to replace “promote the voice and representation of, and consult with” by “in consultation with national employers’ and workers’ organizations, support”.

[A.143]

910. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, presented an amendment to insert “family care workers,” before “domestic workers”.

911. The Worker Vice-Chairperson asked how “family care workers” would be defined.

912. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States said that “family care workers” referred to people who cared for their family members or friends, perhaps going to live with them to provide temporary care. The term “caregiving relatives” might also be used. Such carers were unpaid.

913. The Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed concern that the clause referred to paid work, and the reference to family care workers was therefore not appropriate in that context.

914. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment.

915. The Government member of Brazil, supported by the Government member of Mexico, supported the proposed amendment. Unpaid carers who provided care to relatives and friends at home were an important aspect of the care economy. Those carers were often women. The voice and representation of such carers was important. They should therefore be included in the clause, and the fact that they were not paid should be specified.

916. The Government member of Canada and the Government member of the United States agreed that unpaid caregivers should be included, but suggested that they be added towards the end of the list, after “organizations of employers of care workers”.

917. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said her group was not opposed to the inclusion of unpaid family carers in the list but agreed with the Government member of Canada that the reference would be better placed later in the clause.

918. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed a subamendment to remove “family care workers” and insert the words “and unpaid family carers” before “where these exist”.

919. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.

920. The Government member of Bangladesh felt that the reference to “unpaid family carers” was not well placed in the clause, which was on the subject of organizations. He therefore did not support the subamendment.

921. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government member of Kiribati supported the subamendment. The Government member of Kiribati particularly appreciated the inclusive use of language being applied.

922. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

[A.144]

- 923. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced a further amendment to insert the words “and groups that represent people needing care” before “where these exist”.
- 924. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that her group could accept the amendment.
- 925. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that the words “where these exist” should not apply to “unpaid family carers and groups that represent people needing care”. They should therefore be inserted before “unpaid family carers”.
- 926. The Government member of Switzerland said that organizations of unpaid family carers existed in Switzerland. The words “where these exist” should therefore be inserted after “unpaid family carers”.
- 927. In the absence of consensus, at the end of the Committee’s work the amendment was not adopted.
- 928. Point 26, clause (t) was adopted as amended.

New clause after point 26(t)[A.201]

- 929. The Government member of Canada, speaking also on behalf of the Government of the United States, introduced a proposed amendment to add a new clause after (t), to read “support multilateral initiatives such as the Equal Pay International Coalition (EPIC).”. EPIC was a multistakeholder initiative of the ILO, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and UN Women, which supported governments in taking specific measures to achieve SDG target 8.5 on equal pay for work of equal value by 2030. The Coalition shared knowledge, awareness and lessons learned. It was a tripartite arrangement, which paid particular attention to the health and the care sector. Leveraging the efforts of such initiatives could contribute to ensuring decent work for care workers.
- 930. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 931. The Government members of Mexico, Brazil, the United Kingdom and Switzerland, and the Government member of South Africa, on behalf of the Africa group, supported the amendment.
- 932. The amendment was adopted.
- 933. The new clause after point 26(t) was adopted.

New clause after point 26(t)[A.145]

- 934. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, withdrew an amendment to add a further new clause after (t) to read, “leverage multilateral networks such as the Global Alliance for Care.”.
- 935. Point 26, as a whole, as amended, was adopted.
- 936. Part IV, as a whole, as amended, was adopted.

Part V. The role of the International Labour Organization

937. The title was adopted.

Point 27

Chapeau

[A.57]

- 938. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add “in consultation with national employers’, workers’ organizations, and governments”, to make explicit reference to the need to ensure dialogue between all constituents.
- 939. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that her group could accept the amendment.
- 940. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, agreed with the spirit of the amendment but felt that the term “national” could be limiting. She therefore proposed a subamendment to replace “national employers’, workers’ organizations, and governments” by “constituents”.
- 941. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed to the subamendment.
- 942. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, the Government member of the United Arab Emirates, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, and the Government members of Saudi Arabia, Chile, the United States and India supported the subamendment.
- 943. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 944. The chapeau was adopted as amended.

Point 27(a)

[A.154]

- 945. The Government member of the United Kingdom, speaking also on behalf of the Governments of Australia, Canada and the United States, introduced an amendment to add “and the ILO Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190)” at the end of the clause. The Convention was particularly relevant in the context of protecting women and girls and those who were vulnerable in the care workforce.
- 946. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, while acknowledging that the Convention was indeed important and relevant to the care economy, cautioned against listing international labour standards in the conclusions.
- 947. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed that it was not necessary to list instruments and did not support the amendment.
- 948. The Government member for South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Government member of the United Arab Emirates, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, similarly did not support the amendment.
- 949. The Government member of the United Kingdom withdrew the amendment.
- 950. Point 27, clause (a) was adopted.

Point 27(b)

[A.56]

- 951. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment to revise the clause, in favour of the two subsequent amendments due to be presented (A.190 and A.191).

[A.190]

- 952. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to replace “assess gaps in” by “conduct an assessment of”. The objective should be to conduct a broad assessment of all provisions in the ILO’s body of care-related international labour standards.
- 953. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. The word “gaps” was in line with the wording used in the report of the eighth meeting of the ILO Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group.
- 954. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced a subamendment to align the wording fully with the report of the Tripartite Working Group by replacing “Conduct an assessment of” by “Assess whether there are gaps”, and to delete the words “leave and” after “parental”.
- 955. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that while it was clear that there were gaps, the outcome of the assessment should not be pre-empted. The original amendment was intended to stipulate that an assessment should be conducted. The EU and its Member States could, however, accept the subamendment as proposed by the Employers’ group.
- 956. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment as presented by the Employers’ group.
- 957. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government member of Mexico also supported the subamendment.
- 958. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

[A.191]

- 959. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, submitted an amendment to add the words, “and report back to the Governing Body” at the end of the clause.
- 960. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to replace “report back to the Governing Body” with “to be discussed through a tripartite committee”, in line with the wording of the report of the eighth meeting of the ILO Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group (GB.349/LILS/1).
- 961. The Worker Vice-Chairperson asked the Office to clarify whether the addition of that language was necessary.
- 962. A representative of the Secretariat said that the proposed subamendment reflected the decision taken by the Tripartite Working Group of the Standard Review Mechanism, which had requested that the Office prepare research to be discussed by a tripartite meeting. The Governing Body should decide on the form such a tripartite meeting should take.
- 963. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that she did not support the amendment.

- 964. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said, with regard to the possibility of aligning the wording with that of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group report, that the report only referred to research into gaps in parental protection, not the other items listed in the clause. If the scope of that research could not be extended to cover all aspects of the clause, the amendment should remain as originally proposed.
- 965. At the request of the Employer Vice-Chairperson, a representative of the Secretariat explained that the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group had conducted a review of the Maternity Protection Convention, 1919 (No. 3), Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952 (No. 103), the Maternity Protection Recommendation, 1952 (No. 95), the Maternity Protection Convention, 2000 (No. 183) and the Maternity Protection Recommendation, 2000 (No. 191). In the context of that review, questions had been raised regarding potential gaps in international labour standards in respect of paternity and parental protection. The Tripartite Working Group had recommended that research be conducted in that regard. In its subsequent decision concerning the report of the eighth meeting of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group, the Governing Body had requested the Office to “prepare research to be discussed by a tripartite meeting, to be determined by the Governing Body at the earliest date possible, so as to enable the Organization to assess whether there are gaps in respect of paternity and parental protection and, if so, what normative and/or non-normative actions could be appropriate”. The Committee could thus consider whether to keep the present clause in line with the recommendation of the Tripartite Working Group, thereby restricting it to paternity and parental protection, or to extend the scope of the clause to other care responsibilities. The Committee could invite the Governing Body to either broaden the scope of the tripartite meeting already foreseen, or to convene a separate tripartite meeting.
- 966. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed a subamendment, in light of the guidance provided by the Office, and in line with wording used in the resolution concerning a just transition towards environmentally sustainable economies and societies for all, to read “and consider convening a tripartite meeting, the format of which is to be decided by the Governing Body”. Such an approach would reflect the language of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group, while also allowing for a broader list of care leave policies, and would allow the Governing Body to decide whether to broaden the scope of the planned tripartite meeting to cover those aspects of care leave, or to convene a separate one.
- 967. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment and would prefer to see the same language as used by the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group, in line with which the clause would read, “assess whether there are gaps in the ILO’s body of international labour standards in respect of paternity and parental protection, and if so, what normative and non-normative actions could be appropriate to be discussed through a tripartite committee;”.
- 968. The Government member of Brazil supported the subamendment proposed by the EU Member States.
- 969. The Government member of Australia noted the importance of inviting the Governing Body to expand the scope of the tripartite meeting beyond parental protection to cover other care leave policies, if possible.
- 970. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed a subamendment, to replace the clause by: “prepare research to be discussed by a tripartite meeting, to be determined by the Governing Body at the earliest date possible, so as to assess whether there are gaps in the ILO's body of care-related international labour standards, paternity and parental protection, and other care leave (for sick or critically-ill family members, older persons or persons with disabilities) and, if so, what normative and/or non-normative action could be appropriate".

- 971. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment and proposed a further subamendment, to remove "care-related" before "international labour standards". The research should relate to all international labour standards.
- 972. It was so agreed.
- 973. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a further subamendment to add "related to" before "paternity" for grammatical reasons.
- 974. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
- 975. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 976. Point 27, clause (b) was adopted as amended.

Point 27(c)

[A.55]

- 977. The Employer Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment to delete clause (c). The conclusions should remain in line with the recommendations of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group. Clause (b), as adopted, reflected those recommendations. Clause (c) did not. It should therefore be deleted.
- 978. The Worker Vice-Chairperson could not support the amendment. Clause (b) related to normative gaps in parental protection, whereas clause (c) requested an assessment of normative and non-normative gaps on decent work and the care economy. The Committee, in its conclusions, had noted the existence of gaps in public awareness, legislation, policies, funding and implementation. An assessment of such gaps was required, and should be conducted by a tripartite group.
- 979. The Government member of the United Arab Emirates, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, supported the amendment.
- 980. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, did not support the amendment.
- 981. In the absence of consensus at the conclusion of the Committee's work, the amendment was not adopted.
- 982. Having not been agreed by the Committee, clause (c) was not adopted.

Point 27(d)

- 983. Point 27, clause (d) was adopted.

Point 27(e)

[A.54]

- 984. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert "including" before "through Decent Work Country Programmes", since there were many countries that did not have Decent Work Country Programmes.

- 985. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 986. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government members of Bangladesh, the United States, Mexico, Brazil, Chile and the Syrian Arab Republic supported the amendment.
- 987. The amendment was adopted.

[A.53]

- 988. Following informal consultations, the Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment to include “; adequate resources are critical to advance the 5R Framework” before “for Decent Care Work”.
- 989. Point 27, clause (e) was adopted as amended.

Point 27(f)

[A.215]

- 990. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment (A.215) to replace the text, “migrant care workers; domestic workers; community health and care workers; workers in cooperatives and other SSE entities; care workers in the informal economy; workers with family responsibilities” with “care workers”. The intention was to avoid an exclusive list. Care workers in general must be protected.
- 991. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. Given the Committee’s long discussions on the vulnerabilities and challenges faced by particular groups of workers in the care economy, those specific groups must be identified explicitly.
- 992. The Government member of Mexico agreed with the Workers’ group and could not support the amendment. The list was important and should be retained.
- 993. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic supported the amendment, with a view to ensuring that all workers were included.
- 994. The Government member of Brazil introduced a subamendment to insert “all care workers including” before the list, thereby making specific categories of care workers explicitly visible, while ensuring that no care workers were excluded.
- 995. The Government member of Mexico seconded the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Brazil.
- 996. The Government members of Zimbabwe and China supported the subamendment.
- 997. The Government member of the United Arab Emirates, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, supported the original amendment.
- 998. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced a further subamendment to replace the list with “all care workers, and workers with family responsibilities”, since workers with family responsibilities were not covered by “all care workers”.
- 999. The Government members of the United Kingdom and the United States supported that subamendment.
- 1000. The Employer Vice-Chairperson also supported the subamendment, as proposed by the Government member of Belgium on behalf of the EU Member States.

- 1001. The Government member of Bangladesh said that he could support either the proposal to maintain the entire list or the proposal to replace the list by “care workers”. He could not, however, support the removal from the list of some categories of workers.
- 1002. In the absence of any consensus and following informal consultations, the Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment and a subsequent amendment (A.214) to insert the words “to address the root causes of exclusion from labour protection and” before “to promote”.
- 1003. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, withdrew an amendment (A.147) to insert the word “care” before “workers in cooperatives”.
- 1004. Point 27, clause (f) was adopted.

Point 27(g)

- 1005. Point 27, clause (g) was adopted.

Point 27(h)

[A.34]

- 1006. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to remove “including migrant workers” after “social protection of care workers”, since issues relating to migration had been mentioned several times in the conclusions.
- 1007. The Worker Vice-Chairperson strongly opposed the amendment. Migrant workers played a crucial role in the care economy and faced enormous challenges. More expertise and research were needed the impacts of the aspects mentioned in clause (h) on migrant care workers.
- 1008. The Employer Vice-Chairperson explained that the proposed deletion of “including migrant workers,” was not intended to exclude migrant workers. The aspects included in the clause related to all care workers, including migrant workers.
- 1009. The Government members of Mexico, Bangladesh, Canada, Brazil, the Plurinational State of Bolivia, Australia, Philippines, Chile, the United States and Mali did not support the amendment.
- 1010. The Government member of the United Arab Emirates, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, and the Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic supported the amendment.
- 1011. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, said that she could support the amendment, in the spirit of compromise.
- 1012. In view of the lack of consensus, the Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment.
- 1013. Point 27, clause (h) was adopted.

New clause after point 27(h)

[A.5]

- 1014. The Government member of Japan introduced an amendment, which was seconded by the Government member of Belgium on behalf of the EU Member States, to add a new clause after point 27(h) to read, “research and publish information on examples of the use of technology in care workplaces that can enable a better working environment;”. In the context of shifting demographics, technology could perform some duties for care workers, such as record keeping, which would improve productivity and reduce workload. Consideration must be given to which aspects of care could be supported or replaced by technology, to best contribute to a sustainable care economy.

- 1015. The Worker Vice-Chairperson welcomed the amendment and agreed that the use of technology was an important issue. She proposed a subamendment to revise the new clause to read: “research and publish information on challenges and opportunities of the introduction and use of technology in the care economy, including digital technologies and artificial intelligence”.
- 1016. The Employer Vice-Chairperson welcomed the amendment and supported the subamendment. However, she wished to propose a further subamendment to add the words “in workplaces that can enable a better working environment” at the end of the clause.
- 1017. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that the reference to the challenges of the introduction of technology earlier in the clause meant that “can enable a better working environment” was no longer coherent within the clause. She would be open to reconsidering the wording.
- 1018. The Government member of the United States proposed a subamendment to replace “in workplaces that can enable a better working environment” by “and its impact on working conditions”.
- 1019. The member of Australia seconded the proposed subamendment.
- 1020. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government members of Japan, Canada, Argentina and Brazil supported the subamendment.
- 1021. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic also supported the subamendment and underscored the importance of access to digital technology and artificial intelligence, which for some countries, such as his, was restricted by geopolitical situations, thereby hampering economic development.
- 1022. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
- 1023. The amendment (A.5) was adopted as subamended.
- 1024. The new clause after point 27(h) was adopted as amended.

Point 27(i)

- 1025. Point 27, clause (i) was adopted.

Point 27(j)

[A.50]

- 1026. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace “the effective exercise of the right to freedom of association and collective bargaining by all care workers, including those most at risk of exploitation and abuse” with “respecting, promoting and realizing the fundamental principles and rights at work”. Fundamental principles and rights at work were broader in scope but still included the right to freedom of association and collective bargaining.

- 1027. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment, which changed the objective of the clause to examine specific obstacles to specific rights. The rights to freedom of association and collective bargaining for care workers who were most at risk of exploitation and abuse were particularly important, enabling rights.
- 1028. The Government member Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Government members of the United States, Canada, Chile, Mexico, Brazil and the Syrian Arab Republic did not support the amendment.
- 1029. The Government member of the United Arab Emirates, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, supported the amendment.
- 1030. In the absence of a consensus, at the conclusion of the Committee's work, the amendment was not adopted.
- 1031. Having not been agreed by the committee, clause (j) was not adopted.

New clause after point 27(j)

- 1032. The Employer Vice Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert a new clause after point 27(j), to read, "collect and share best practices, and conduct research on skills attraction, retention strategies of care workers and the benefits of harnessing technology in advancing decent work in the care economy;"
- 1033. The Worker Vice Chairperson supported the request for research to help attract and retain care workers, but did support the reference to "skills attraction". Workers were not skills; workers had skills and qualifications. She therefore proposed a subamendment, to revise the new clause to read, "collect and share best practices, and conduct research on skills development that promotes career development and attracts and retains a skilled care workforce".
- 1034. The Employer Vice Chairperson supported the subamendment.
- 1035. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government members of the United States, Bangladesh, Japan, Brazil Chile and Mexico supported the subamendment.
- 1036. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic supported the original amendment but did not support the subamendment.
- 1037. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 1038. The new clause after point 27 (j) was adopted.

Point 27(k)

- 1039. Point 27, clause (k) was adopted.

Point 27(l)

[A.148]

- 1040. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, introduced an amendment to include "and WHO Academy in Lyon", to complement the expertise of the International Training Centre of the ILO (ITCILO) in Turin with respect to capacity-building for the care economy.

- 1041. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. It was the prerogative of ITCILO Turin to decide with which partners to collaborate.
- 1042. The Government members of Mexico Chile and Senegal supported the amendment.
- 1043. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic supported the amendment and suggested a subamendment to add “and other specialized centres” after “Lyon”, to ensure wider collaboration.
- 1044. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, seconded the subamendment, which was also supported by the Government member of France.
- 1045. The Employer Vice Chairperson requested clarification from the Office regarding whether the ILO had any control or capacity in relation to other centres not under its jurisdiction, bearing in mind that the clause referred to technical capacity-building for “adequate financing”.
- 1046. The representative of the Secretary-General responded that the ILO had no influence over the WHO Academy in Lyon, which would open at the end of 2024 offering online courses. However, the ITCILO cooperated with relevant United Nations agencies at many levels, and could select appropriate partners to work with on appropriate topics.
- 1047. The Government member of the United States, supported by the Government member of the United Kingdom, supported the amendment as subamended; there were important benefits to the ILO working with other international bodies.
- 1048. The Government members of Mali and Guinea also supported the amendment as subamended.
- 1049. The Government member of the United Arab Emirates, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, and the Government members of Cameroon and Zimbabwe, supported the reference to other specialized centres but did not support the inclusion of a reference to the WHO Academy.
- 1050. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to replace the amendment by “and collaboration with other relevant training centres”, to open the scope for other organizations to be included.
- 1051. The Government members of Mexico and Chile did not support the subamendment. Specific reference should be made to the WHO Academy.
- 1052. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, and the Government members of China, Kiribati and Bangladesh supported the subamendment as proposed by the Employers’ group.
- 1053. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to include “, as appropriate” after “relevant training centres.”
- 1054. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported that subamendment.
- 1055. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government members of Chile, Bangladesh Argentina, Mali, Cameroon, Kiribati, New Zealand, the Syrian Arab Republic and Zimbabwe supported the subamendment.
- 1056. The amendment was adopted as subamended.
- 1057. Point 27, clause (l) was adopted as amended.

Point 27(m)

[A.48]

- 1058. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete “mechanisms” after “collective bargaining.”
- 1059. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that “collective bargaining” and “workplace cooperation” should not be placed as equally weighted aspects of a list. Workplace cooperation was a tool, whereas collective bargaining was a fundamental right. As such, she did not support the removal of “mechanisms”.
- 1060. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the fundamental principles and rights at work were the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining, but that collective bargaining was not, in itself, a right.
- 1061. The Government member of New Zealand, noting the concern of the Workers’ group, proposed a subamendment, to read “collective bargaining, as well as workplace cooperation”.
- 1062. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU Member States, proposed a subamendment to end the clause after the words “social dialogue”, thereby deleting the references to collective bargaining and to workplace cooperation.
- 1063. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment proposed by the EU Member States.
- 1064. The Worker Vice-Chairperson suggested aligning the wording with the Centenary Declaration, to read, “including collective bargaining mechanisms and encourage, where appropriate, effective workplace cooperation;”.
- 1065. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the subamendment.
- 1066. The Government member of Qatar, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the GCC, and the Government members of Türkiye, Switzerland and Bangladesh did not support the subamendment.
- 1067. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, and the Government members of Brazil, the United States and Canada supported the subamendment.
- 1068. Following informal consultations, the Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a further subamendment to revise the clause to read, “reinforce the capacities of tripartite constituents to engage in the formulation, implementation and monitoring of national care policies and strengthen all forms of social dialogue including collective bargaining and tripartite cooperation. Encourage effective workplace cooperation as a tool to help ensure safe and productive workplaces, in such a way as it respects collective bargaining and its outcomes, and does not undermine the role of trade unions;”.
- 1069. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment.
- 1070. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, also supported the subamendment.
- 1071. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.
- 1072. One subsequent amendment (A.210) fell.
- 1073. Point 27, clause (m) was adopted as amended.

Point 27(n)

[A.47 and A.40]

- 1074. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew two proposed amendments to replace “leadership” by “leading” before “role” and to replace “ensuring” by “enhancing” before “policy coherence”.
- 1075. Point 27, clause (n) was adopted.

New clause after point 27(n)

[A.155]

- 1076. The Government member of the United Kingdom, speaking also on behalf of the Government of Canada, introduced a proposed amendment to insert a new clause after (n), to read, “continue to promote the Guidelines for a just transition towards environmentally sustainable economies and societies for all (2015), including in relation to the care economy;”.
- 1077. The Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson both said that their groups could accept the amendment, provided it was also supported by the majority of governments.
- 1078. The Government member of South Africa, speaking on behalf of the Africa group, the Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government member of Kiribati supported the amendment.
- 1079. The amendment was adopted.
- 1080. The new clause after point 27 (n) was adopted.

Point 27(o)

- 1081. Point 27, clause (o) was adopted.

Point 27(p)

[A.46]

- 1082. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment to delete clause (p).
- 1083. Point 27, clause (p) was adopted.

New clause after point 27(p)

[A.20]

- 1084. The Government member of Kiribati, speaking also on behalf of the Government of Samoa introduced a proposed amendment to add a new clause after (p) to read, “strengthen social dialogue, cooperation and coordination for long-term sustainability of economies and societies for all.”.
- 1085. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, supported by the Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment, since sufficient reference had been made to strengthening social dialogue in point 27(m).
- 1086. The amendment was not adopted.

New clause after 27(p)

- 1087. The Government member of Kiribati, speaking also on behalf of the Government of Samoa introduced a proposed amendment to add a new clause after (p) to read, “bring about transformational changes to address care employment challenges both in labour sending countries and in labour receiving countries, including strengthening regulatory institutions, social monitoring and audits, legal protections, occupational safety and health, equal access to ensure decent work in the care economy and promote decent work for all care workers.”. Care had a very different context in small island Pacific States than in the rest of the world, and was considered a privilege and part of daily life, intrinsically linked to island community culture. There was no formal provision of childcare, palliative care or eldercare homes. Care for all vulnerable members of society was provided by the community and the provision of care was considered a great mark of honour. The cultural devotion to care had been supported and perpetuated by migrant workers and the remittances they sent back to their home communities. Without specific provisions for migrant workers from small island developing States, the Committee’s conclusions would not be universally applicable.
- 1088. The Government member of Australia thanked the Governments of Kiribati and Samoa. Circumstances in small island developing States were distinct from elsewhere in the world. Her Government could support the amendment.
- 1089. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government member of China supported the amendment.
- 1090. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment. It contained several aspects that were already covered by other provisions of the conclusions, and other aspects that were not clearly defined.
- 1091. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment.
- 1092. The amendment was rejected.

New clause after point 27(p)

[A.19]

- 1093. The Government member of Kiribati, speaking also on behalf of the Government of Samoa introduced a proposed amendment to add a new clause after (p) to read, “provide support to, particularly, small island developing States and least developed countries, in mitigating the risk of brain drain”.
- 1094. Responding to a request for clarification from the Employers’ group regarding how the ILO could provide the support requested, the representative of the Secretary-General said that support could be provided including through programmes to help establish care systems and develop skills.
- 1095. In light of that explanation, the Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 1096. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment.
- 1097. The Government member of Australia thanked the Governments of Kiribati and Samoa and expressed strong support for the proposal, which would make a significant difference in the Pacific region.

- 1098. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, the Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, and the Government members of the United States, Canada and China supported the amendment.
- 1099. The amendment was adopted.
- 1100. The new clause after 27(p) was adopted.
- 1101. Point 27, as a whole, as amended, was adopted.
- 1102. Part V, as a whole, was adopted as amended.
- 1103. The conclusions concerning Decent Work and the Care Economy, as a whole, as amended, were adopted.

Approval of the draft resolution concerning decent work and the care economy

- 1104. The Chairperson introduced the draft resolution, which had been circulated among the Committee members. The resolution was a technical element to give effect to the conclusions adopted by the Committee.
- 1105. The resolution was adopted.

Closing remarks

- 1106. The Employer Vice-Chairperson thanked the Chairperson for his impartiality, professionalism and focus in steering the Committee in its challenging work. She expressed appreciation to the Worker Vice-Chairperson and to all government members, as well as to the Office for its support.
- 1107. The Worker Vice-Chairperson echoed the words of thanks to the Chairperson, who had done well to guide the discussions on a complex subject. She thanked all those who had provided support to the Workers' group and expressed her appreciation to the Employer Vice-Chairperson and to the government members, who had contributed to the work of the drafting group and of the Committee.
- 1108. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the EU and its Member States, thanked the Chairperson for having taken over the reins of the Committee in unprecedented circumstances and expressed appreciation to the social partners and all government members who had been active in seeking solutions together, in a spirit of compromise. The support of the Office had been invaluable.
- 1109. The Government member of Brazil, speaking on behalf of GRULAC, thanked all those who had participated in the work of the Committee for their efforts, and drew attention to the world's migrant and domestic workers, whose voices the governments of her region represented.
- 1110. The representative of the Secretary-General thanked the Chairperson and all constituents for their hard work and dedication throughout the Committee's work, which, although difficult, had been infused with a spirit of goodwill from the outset.
- 1111. The Chairperson commended the spirit of cooperation that had prevailed throughout the Committee's work, even during difficult moments. The subject of the care economy meant a great deal to the social partners. He thanked the governments for their pragmatism. The results of the Committee's work were testament to the goodwill that had prevailed.

- 1112. The Chairperson declared the Committee on the general discussion on decent work in the care economy closed.

Outcome of the work of the General Discussion Committee on Decent Work and the Care Economy: Presentation and discussion

The President

I am pleased to declare open this 17th and last plenary sitting of the 112th Session of the International Labour Conference.

We resume our proceedings by turning our attention to the work of the General Discussion Committee on Decent Work and the Care Economy and its proposed resolution, which contains the Committee's conclusions, the text of which can be found in Record of Proceedings No. 8A. The report on the Committee's proceedings is contained in Record of Proceedings No. 8B.

It is my pleasure to welcome the Officers of the Committee, namely: Mr Jordan (Barbados), Chairperson, who replaced Mr Sorreta (Philippines); Ms Janahi (Bahrain), Employer Vice-Chairperson; and Ms Chang (Canada), Worker Vice-Chairperson. The Reporter is Mr Novales Bilbao (Spain).

I will first give the floor to Mr Novales Bilbao, so that he may present to us the outcome of the Committee's work. The Officers of the Committee will then take the floor.

Mr Novales Bilbao

Reporter of the General Discussion Committee on Decent Work and the Care Economy (Original Spanish)

It is an honour for me to present for adoption the proposed resolution and conclusions of the General Discussion Committee on Decent Work and the Care Economy. First of all, allow me to thank the Committee for the trust it showed in appointing me as Reporter.

The subject of this discussion is very significant for my country, Spain, which over recent years has made important progress in the pioneering use of innovative approaches in health and social care and family support, which has made it possible to improve outcomes in the fields of health and longevity and has improved citizens' quality of life, including work-life balance for both women and men.

The Committee believes that our deliberations have been extremely timely and that taking action in favour of decent work and the care economy is urgent. The debates affirmed the centrality of care work to our societies and economies, highlighted the persistent effects of the COVID-19 pandemic and shed light on the huge amount of unpaid care work that is done by women, which impacts their participation in the labour market. They also recognized the shortcomings in working conditions and staffing in the care sector and that sector's importance in a period of demographic, technological and environmental changes.

Over the past two weeks, the Committee's delegates have focused their discussions on three points.

Firstly, the essential aspects and components that make up the care economy, taking into account the diversity of social, economic and political contexts in which care, paid or unpaid, is provided, as well as the great heterogeneity of the care workforce.

Secondly, the gaps that remain, as well as the effective measures that the constituents have taken to foster resilience and the good functioning of a care economy that promotes decent work, gender equality, accessible and quality care services, and inclusive and sustainable economic and social development.

Thirdly, the priority actions that the ILO constituents and the Office should take to promote, advance and support coherent and integrated policies and investments in the sphere of the care economy, including through social dialogue, multilateral coordination and partnerships.

In total, 12 plenary sittings were held, with two extended sittings. In addition, the drafting group held 6 sittings with one extended sitting. The number of sittings and the discussion of the more than 228 amendments received are a testament to our collective effort that has led to these detailed conclusions.

We have had fruitful, frank and direct discussions that were always characterized by a true spirit of social dialogue. The Committee has managed to accomplish its work and reach a consensus thanks to the tireless work of the Chairperson, Mr Sorreta from the Government of the Philippines, who actively guided discussions during the first week. Unfortunately, owing to unexpected health issues, Mr Sorreta was unable to continue working with the Committee. Mr Jordan, Minister of Labour, Social Security and Third Sector of Barbados, was appointed to lead the Committee during the second week. I would take this opportunity to thank him most sincerely for his skilful guidance, insightful contributions and unwavering commitment to ensuring that our dialogue was productive and effective.

The outcome has also been the fruit of the work of the two Vice-Chairpersons, Ms Janahi, representing the Employers' group, and Ms Chang, representing the Workers' group, as well as the Government members. I wish to thank all the Committee's members for their commitment and constructive contributions, which often resulted in them working late into the night. I would also like to express appreciation for the dedication of the members of the drafting group, who proposed to the Committee a set of draft conclusions for discussion.

Allow me also to acknowledge the great efforts made by the Office in preparing and presenting an exhaustive report with a vision of the future. In particular, I wish to thank the representative of the Secretary-General, Ms Drake, the deputy representative of the Secretary-General, Ms Dasgupta, the Coordinator of the Committee, Ms Licata, the senior expert, Ms King, and all the technical and coordination staff of the Secretariat, including experts, translators, interpreters, editors, report writers, technicians and administrative staff, for their invaluable contribution and support.

The proposed conclusions are structured in five parts. Part I is entitled "Context – decent work and the care economy, an urgent need for action" and acknowledges that a well-functioning and robust care economy is critical in order to improve resilience against crises and achieve gender equality and inclusion, while addressing other inequalities. However, significant gaps remain and urgent action is needed to ensure decent work in the care economy.

Part II, entitled "A common understanding of the care economy", clarifies what elements make up the care economy and who its main actors are. Our Committee's conclusions highlight the heterogeneous nature of the care economy and the organization of care, both within and outside the household, which relies to a great extent on work done by women, particularly in the social sector, in health and education and by domestic workers, community health and care workers, and workers in the social and solidarity economy.

In Part III, entitled “Guiding Principles”, on the 80th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia our tripartite Committee members were unanimous in reaffirming that “as labour is not a commodity, labour in the care economy is not a commodity”. All care workers should enjoy decent work. Investing in the care economy and promotion of the protection of all care workers, including migrant workers, can lead to social and economic development. The ILO’s 5R Framework for Decent Care Work provides a framework for developing integrated and coherent strategies to achieve decent work in the care economy through recognition, reduction and redistribution of unpaid care work, as well as reward and representation of care workers. Our conclusions also recognize the primary role played by the State in care provision, along with the private sector, the social and solidarity economy, and households.

Part IV, entitled “Advancing decent work in the care economy”, contains a range of recommendations to guide the policy action of governments, employers’ organizations and workers’ organizations, with the support of the ILO, to achieve a resilient, productive and inclusive care economy, especially in the context of the technological, demographic and environmental changes that the world of work is experiencing.

Finally, Part V, entitled “The Role of the International Labour Organization”, covers the leadership role of the ILO in promoting the care agenda on a global scale through its research reports, international statistical standards, and its technical support and policy guidance. Mobilizing partnerships, including in the context of the Global Coalition for Social Justice, will be decisive to harnessing the potential of the care economy to contribute to the Decent Work Agenda, the achievement of the Sustainable Development Goals and a just transition.

To conclude, I sincerely believe that the conclusions drawn from our discussion will greatly guide and enhance our collective efforts to promote decent work and social justice in the care economy. On one final note, looking beyond these conclusions, during the discussion there were ideas that perhaps have not yet found their moment, such as that care should be considered a public good and, therefore, is the responsibility of governments, like health, education and so forth, or that access to care could be recognized as a human right. Personal testimonies were heard and the inclusion of emotions as an essential component of care was advocated.

We also considered the mental health perspective that was ultimately incorporated into the conclusions, as it often involves caring for the elderly, children or people with disabilities, which requires special skills, and we also discussed social reproduction, a concept not yet fully defined that can be understood as factors of inequality inherited between generations that will have to be accounted for better in the future. There were intense moments that allowed us to appreciate the profound human element of this broad sector of activity. These discussions introduced what we might call a more real element to the debate and the message is that societies must continue to progress so that social justice becomes a reality in the care economy.

And with that I have the honour and privilege of presenting to the International Labour Conference the proposed resolution and the conclusions related to the general discussion on decent work and the care economy, with a view to their adoption.

Ms Janahi

Employer Vice-Chairperson of the General Discussion Committee on Decent Work and the Care Economy

Today I stand before the Conference for good reason, not to close off a session of the Conference so that we can each get back to our daily work, but because we each played our part, and that is the very purpose of the ILO: advancing social justice and decent work throughout the world through tripartite dialogue and action. Today, I stand here on behalf of the Employers, to proudly share the collective vision of the tripartite constituents, reached through robust dialogue on the care economy and care workers.

The COVID-19 pandemic put our care economy to the ultimate test: could it expand and specialize, so as to mitigate the number of people turning into patients or – even worse – fatalities? Since the pandemic, we have been seeing staggering statistics on the care economy. The demand for care is increasing at pace. The demand for paid care services is projected to rise from 8.7 per cent of global gross domestic product to 14.9 per cent in 2030. The United States of America voiced its wish to boost the supply of long-term care and caregivers. Japan mentioned in our Committee that it will need 2.53 million caregivers by 2025; that, for the record, is next year. This makes sense. Humans are living longer and healthier lives, and demographics reveal large cohorts of ageing populations in certain countries. This is why the supply of care is fundamental. Without a supply of quality care, we simply cannot create jobs, promote career development and achieve decent work. There is already a projected skills shortage of 10 million health and care workers by 2030, and today we already require an additional 3 million health and care workers to keep our care system running. In short, we are here at the ILO today to advance decent work in the care economy for good reason.

During our discussions in the Committee, we found common ground on many topics. Most workers in the care economy, both paid and unpaid, are women. As such, our Committee took a position on promoting gender equality and social co-responsibility and on supporting the provision of formalized care work. Our Committee agreed that the provision of quality care requires upskilling and reskilling, ultimately enabling jobseekers and workers to work as caregivers, nurses, doctors and supervisors. Strengthening the role of the care economy has a positive multiplier effect, as healthier people, enterprises and societies boost productivity across countries and regions. The opposite also holds true. Not investing in the care economy denies a lifeline to other sectors and puts economic and social health and growth on the line, as witnessed during the COVID-19 pandemic.

Skills recognition and skills certification are needed to facilitate swift and effective labour market transitions to the care economy. Advancing decent work in the care economy necessitates the creation of an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises, and these enterprises, including micro, small and medium-sized enterprises, need support to ensure the much-needed supply of care. Importantly, we recognize the added value of the private sector in promoting decent work in the care economy. The private sector complements public services and the care economy creates jobs and sustainable careers, reduces health and care costs and drives innovation in the industry. Therefore, public-private partnerships have leveraged the strengths of both the public and the private sectors and can help scale quality care services without overburdening either side, fostering a more sustainable care ecosystem.

This may not come as a surprise, but we also disagreed on some issues. We took some time to discuss whether care can really be considered as an absolute human right, the notion of linking a rights-based approach with a principles-based approach, and the importance of collaborative efforts between employers and workers on effective workplace cooperation.

We would like to strengthen and enrich the 5R Framework for Decent Care Work, as we missed the “how” in this concept. In other words, how will the 5R Framework be implemented? Our proposal was to include another “R”: resources. Although this is not an official sixth “R”, we firmly believe that adequate resources are critical to advancing the 5R Framework. We also stressed the need for representation to refer to the representation of employers as well as of workers. Employers in the care economy may also require representational strength and association if they are to effectively contribute to promoting decent work in the care economy. While we were unable to mutually agree on the scope of representation, we believe that there is significant value in care employers and service providers being represented, if appropriate, so that their collective voice can be heard in negotiations and decision-making processes.

These are just some examples of our different views, which demonstrate the diversity and breadth of the care economy, the need for enhanced mutual understanding between different stakeholders, and the need for more dialogue. And we are here at the ILO for these reasons. Through social dialogue, the Employers and Workers narrowed their differences in the evening of the Committee's last sitting. I sincerely thank Ms Chang and her team for the intense negotiation, which led us to many agreements and enabled us to reach consensus.

The outcome of today is that we did as much as possible to get to a set of conclusions. Some points require additional discussions, and we will take these forward in our capitals. It makes sense that we sometimes disagree, because we each have our own backgrounds, experience and roles to play. And, even more importantly, we work towards a common objective to reach an agreement. This is key, because having common objectives enables us to share a common interest.

On a more personal note, I would also like to share some observations after my first time as an Employer spokesperson for a Committee discussion. After these intense two weeks, I cannot stress enough how fundamental it is for everyone to stay curious. No representative takes the floor or submits an amendment for the sake of amending. No; every proposal consists of an idea, and ideas shape discussions, and discussions shape the world of work that we live in. Throughout these two weeks, I experienced from our Chairperson, the ILO experts, our Government representatives, and the Workers, a natural curiosity. This curiosity, in terms of willingness and ability to participate, even with respect to concepts that not everybody could grasp, such as social reproduction, is not only conducive to moving the discussion forward, but it also moved me. The eagerness of the representatives to understand, encourage and influence one another speaks volumes about why we are here today, and I thank them for that.

I would like to thank the Chairperson for stepping in and accepting the unexpected, involuntary, formidable task. His patience, humour and enduring personality carried us through, and we were not always an easy class to manage. I also thank the ILO experts. Without them, we would be left sifting through facts and figures and not engaging in a content-driven discussion as we did. Thanks also to the coordinator, operators, note-takers and interpreters for their hard work. Without them, we would not understand one another enough to have made a tripartite agreement possible. Thanks to the Government representatives. They represented their countries well and we were honoured to work with them. Thanks also to the Workers, and especially the Worker Vice-Chairperson, my friend. She truly is a great counterpart, and I am sincere when I say that I hope we will have another opportunity to work with each other again in the near future. It was a pleasure to meet and work with her. Lastly, thanks to my fellow Employer representatives, and the teams from the International Organisation of Employers and the Bureau for Employers' Activities. They are now my "care family". I cannot thank them enough for their unwavering support. I wish them safe travels and will miss them all until we meet again. Lastly, I would like to thank everyone in this room for their curiosity in this discussion, and the ILO, for we could not work without it.

Ms ChangWorker Vice-Chairperson of the General Discussion Committee on Decent Work and the Care Economy

On behalf of the Workers' group, I am pleased to speak to you today about the conclusions of the General Discussion Committee on Decent Work and the Care Economy. Workers came to this Conference with very high expectations. Inspired by the ILO's groundbreaking 2018 report Care Work and Care Jobs for the Future of Decent Work and the 5R Framework for Decent Care Work, workers and their trade unions across the globe have been organizing, advocating and campaigning to draw attention to the importance of decent work in care, the centrality of care for achieving gender equality, and the need to future-proof our economies by investing in quality care services for the people who depend on care. We have also stepped up our efforts, claiming care as a public good and as a universal human right, which includes a right to provide care, to receive care and to exercise self-care.

The COVID-19 pandemic uncovered the ways in which care is fundamental to human, social, economic and environmental well-being, as well as to sustainable development. It exposed and exacerbated the vulnerabilities and inequalities within our care systems. It brought into stark relief the severe labour shortages, low pay and poor working conditions of care workers and the challenges experienced by workers with care responsibilities, in particular women who are juggling paid work and unpaid care work.

It is within the backdrop of the pandemic and its devastating impacts that our Committee was tasked with crafting a road map for the ILO and its constituents to advance decent work in the care economy. We would not be here today if it were not for the care workers, informal and formal, the domestic workers, the community health and care workers, the migrant care workers, and all the other millions of care workers who have been tireless in their advocacy. They have really pushed to keep this high on the agenda of the global trade union movement.

We wanted to see workers' voices, their stories and their lived experiences reflected in the discussion. We indeed agreed in the Committee that we need to pay particular attention to workers with care responsibilities – in particular women, and racialized and ethnic minority workers who assume a disproportionate share of unpaid care work – and to care workers who are most at risk of insufficient or inadequate protection, including due to obstacles to accessing and exercising their rights to freedom of association and collective bargaining. Like the informal economy workers who lack adequate access to social protection and care services. Like the many healthcare workers who often have to work excessive hours without any rest breaks and who, during the pandemic, continued to care for us while risking their own health and unable to see and care for their own families. Like the domestic workers who are often denied an employment contract and a living wage. Like the elderly care, home care and disability support workers who are often trapped in precarious and insecure work. Like the community, health and care workers who are not even considered as workers and have no access to opportunities for training and skills development. Like the migrant care workers who often fall victim to predatory recruitment agencies, and many others who continue providing care for our loved ones in the most difficult circumstances.

We agreed that urgent action is needed if we are to reverse the global care crisis and build resilience in the face of ongoing transformations in the world of work, demographic shifts, climate change and technological change. We emerged with a clear, common understanding of the care economy and a set of guiding principles and actions for the development of national care policies and systems. The conclusions that we have in front of us recognize the primary responsibility of the State to provide care, fund, regulate and ensure high standards of quality, safety and health for care workers, and ensure and recognize the need to allocate the necessary resources, as well as ensure that national care systems are underpinned by robust policy and regulatory frameworks.

Above all, care work is fundamentally a human activity. The labour involved is multifaceted, physical, mental and emotional, and requires a high level of skill. For too many care workers, these skills are not always recognized. Our conclusions underscore the importance of skills recognition and the need to recognize, reduce and redistribute unpaid care work and to reward care work, including through equal pay for work of equal value, and to guarantee representation of care workers through social dialogue and collective bargaining, as guided by the 5R Framework for Decent Care Work and grounded by international labour standards.

Decent work builds resilient economies and societies, whether it is caring for children, the elderly, the sick or the disabled. All care workers should enjoy decent work. Our conclusions recall the Declaration of Philadelphia of 1944 in stating that, just as labour is not a commodity, labour in the care economy is not a commodity. This was an important statement to make, especially in the context of migration and care work and the global care chain. In today's world, care labour is too often treated like a commodity. We speak of skills shortages and mobility as if care workers were assets to be traded, gained or lost, rather than human beings who, like anyone, deserve decent jobs that will help them live healthy and fulfilling lives, support their families and feel like part of the community.

While the text of the conclusions includes good language on migrant care workers, we had hoped to deliver more for these workers who are among the most marginalized and vulnerable, despite their vital contribution to economies, communities and families. It was also important for our conclusions to acknowledge the impact of care worker migration on origin countries, particularly small island developing States and other countries that are experiencing what was referred to in our discussion as "brain drain". It is important that our future work on care keeps in mind the realities of countries of both origin and destination.

We also emerged with a tripartite commitment to build on the strong foundation of the ILO's work in promoting decent work in the care economy, and we agreed that, by reinforcing the ILO's leadership role within the multilateral system, we can help ensure the centrality of decent work in advancing the care agenda at the global, regional and national levels. I truly believe that what you have here before you today are conclusions that can help transform the lives of millions of people worldwide who provide and receive care. While governments and employers' and workers' organizations all have a role to play, this change must be informed and led by workers' organizations and workers themselves. This change must also incorporate strategies to address the social norms and gender stereotypes that continue to place a disproportionate share of unpaid and paid care work on women and others affected by multiple and intersecting discrimination, contributing to ethnic, racial and gender-based occupational segregation and the undervaluation of care work.

To this end, the ILO's technical support on strengthening social dialogue, including collective bargaining, will be a key driver for achieving decent work for all care workers, in particular the most exposed to exploitation and abuse, and expanding access to paid leave entitlements and services for workers with care responsibilities. The ILO's technical support to the constituents for the development of national care policies and systems, as well as support on ensuring sustainable and adequate financing for care, would promote quality care, decent job creation, gender equality, professionalization and formalization of care jobs and help ensure universal access to care. The convening of a tripartite meeting of experts would be a crucial first step in assessing gaps in the ILO's body of international labour standards in relation to paternity, parental protection and other types of care leave entitlements. We are looking forward to the action plan that the Office will develop to present to the Governing Body. Let us all work together to make it a reality.

Mr Jordan

Chairperson of the General Discussion Committee on Decent Work and the Care Economy

My colleagues have already presented very ably the work done by the Committee. I will draw your attention to a few points that I consider to be important.

Care work, both paid and unpaid, is essential to all other work. The Committee's discussion on the care economy and the world of work was a historic first. Never before have the tripartite constituents formally and comprehensively discussed the care economy and the world of work at the highest institutional level of the Organization. Accelerating global transformations – including the impacts of the climate crisis and rapid advances in technology – have made this discussion extremely timely. Urgent action is needed to ensure decent work in the care economy and to promote decent work by ensuring access to care for all.

Understanding and putting in perspective the social and economic complexities of the care economy has been challenging. The two Vice-Chairpersons spoke about some of these challenges. But the Committee nonetheless succeeded in arriving at important common understandings. Listening and sharing experiences have been the drivers for a successful outcome.

The care economy, decent work and gender equality are intimately linked. Women carry out a disproportionate share of unpaid care work. This is a structural barrier for substantive gender equality, including in respect of women's equal participation in the labour market. Women are also the greater part of the care workforce, with strong occupational segregation by gender, race or ethnicity persisting. It is clear from our discussion that a well-functioning and robust care economy is critical for achieving gender equality and inclusion, and addressing other inequalities.

Based on the discussion and its outcomes, it is evident that building a well-functioning and robust care economy is a shared policy objective of countries across all regions, irrespective of their level of development or their size. This is also illustrated by the active participation of ILO Members from large countries, advanced and developing countries, and small island developing States. While the nature and scale of the challenge may differ, according to national contexts, countries all around the globe face the challenge of building comprehensive and strong care systems that are resilient to crises, in order to advance on the path of inclusive and equitable sustainable development.

Sharing our respective challenges and experiences has helped the Committee to build a forward-looking common agenda. The conclusions chart an important tripartite road map. They articulate principles to guide the process of designing and implementing integrated and holistic approaches and policies for decent work and the care economy, and they identify actions that governments and the social partners, as appropriate to their spheres of responsibility, should take. Importantly, the State has a primary responsibility for care provision, funding, regulation and ensuring high standards of quality, safety and health for all workers and all recipients of care.

The conclusions highlight the importance of the fundamental principles and rights at work, and of labour and social protection for care workers, particularly for groups of workers who may be excluded from such protection, such as migrant workers, domestic workers, and community health and community care workers. They also highlight the decent job creation potential offered by the care economy and the important role of skills development. Critically, the Committee stressed the need for well-designed care leave policies and services as a lever for gender equality, for supporting workers with family responsibilities and for achieving work–life balance.

Solutions and support will have to be tailored to diverse needs and contexts. In this regard, the conclusions call on the ILO to leverage the Global Coalition for Social Justice and the United Nations Global Accelerator on Jobs and Social Protection for Just Transitions, and propose the creation of a South–South platform to promote decent care work.

Bringing together governments, workers and employers, key actors in the care economy, the ILO plays a leadership role in promoting decent work in and through the care economy. The conclusions place a responsibility on the Organization to strengthen and expand its work further in this area, including through collaboration and partnerships with other players and providing technical support and policy advice to the constituents. The 5R Framework for Decent Care Work, as developed by the Office, was acknowledged as offering useful guidance in this regard.

It has been a great honour for me to step in to chair this Committee after Mr Sorreta of the Philippines was prevented from completing his tenure owing to health reasons. I give very special thanks to the two Vice-Chairpersons and to the Reporter for their patience, for their support, for their advice – sometimes guidance – and the spirit of genuine cooperation throughout our discussions.

Last, but certainly not least, I cannot but express on behalf of the Committee our sincere gratitude to the entire ILO team for their professionalism, their high quality technical knowledge and their tireless efforts, without which we would not have been able to succeed. I must offer my own specific gratitude to Ms Drake, and to Ms Dasgupta, who were to my right, both of them, and to Ms Licata, who was to my left, who I leaned to and on quite frequently and who was an excellent team member for me.

A strong and functioning care economy is key for sustainable prosperity, gender equality and social justice for all. This is an important part of our pursuit of a human-centred approach to the future of work. We have a historic opportunity and a responsibility to move this agenda forward jointly with our partners. Let us grasp that opportunity.

The President

I thank the Reporter and the Officers of the Committee for their statements. I now open the floor for the discussion of the outcome of the Committee's work.

Ms Abramo

Government (Brazil), speaking on behalf of the group of Latin American and Caribbean countries
(Original Spanish)

It is an honour to speak again on behalf of the group of Latin American and Caribbean countries (GRULAC) at this session of the Conference. Once again, the importance and power of this unique forum for tripartite dialogue on the core issues of the world of work are evident. I would like to begin by thanking all the members of the Committee, who have worked tirelessly over the past few days. I would like to thank the Chairperson of the Committee, Mr Jordan, for conducting the work in an impeccable manner, which was key to our success. I would like to thank the Employers' and Workers' representatives for their commitment, collaboration and constructive spirit and the Governments for their invaluable cooperation. I would also like to convey our sincere thanks to the Office for its continued support.

Over the past few days, we have taken a huge step towards societies that place care, people's well-being and decent work at their core. As we have already stated, our region has reached important agreements that prioritize the care agenda. In various regional forums, we have reached a common understanding of the importance of care for equality, social justice and the sustainable development of our societies and economies. In these agreements, we affirm that care is a form of work, a necessity for all people and a right: to care, to be cared for and to exercise self-care. In addition, nine countries in the region have argued before the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights of the Organization of American States that care is a human right. These views have been expressed in the discussions that have taken place over the last few days, and we very much welcome their outcomes.

The conclusions of the discussion state, in accordance with the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia, that care work is not a commodity. They also state that the current social organization of care is unjust and that it is necessary to make progress towards a better division of care work, whether paid or unpaid, between men and women, and to promote social co-responsibility for the provision of care among the State, which has primary responsibility for it, the private sector, families, the community and the social and solidarity economy.

The care economy is characterized by multiple and intersecting forms of inequality that, in our region, are structural and persistent. Making these inequalities visible and recognizing them is the first step towards confronting them. Recognizing them means, inter alia, naming and measuring them. Statistical and cognitive invisibility is a severe form of discrimination. This is why, during the discussions, we reiterated the importance of explicitly mentioning these inequalities and generating statistical evidence in order to develop better informed and more efficient public policies. We are referring to the poorest women, indigenous women, women of African descent and all other racialized women, domestic workers, migrant women, women in the informal sector, young women whose education and work is put on hold because of their family care responsibilities, women living in rural areas, women with disabilities, women living in the most precarious urban areas and community caregivers.

We are sure that the conclusions of the Committee will be crucial for reinforcing the work undertaken by the ILO's tripartite constituents to promote decent work and the care economy. This will undoubtedly be strengthened by the action plan that the Office will have to present to the Governing Body at its next session. We hope that the next steps will be towards an instrument that is able to address the current gaps in the ILO's body of standards on key issues such as paternity and parental protection and long-term leave.

Ms Coenen

Government (Belgium), speaking on behalf of the European Union and its Member States

I am honoured to speak on behalf of the European Union and its Member States. North Macedonia, Montenegro, Albania, Ukraine, the Republic of Moldova, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Georgia, Iceland and Norway align themselves with this statement. We sincerely thank both of the Chairpersons we had during this session of the International Labour Conference, Mr Sorreta and Mr Jordan. On Tuesday morning, Mr Jordan took up the mantle at very short notice and ably guided us through the rest of the discussions to these conclusions. We also express our appreciation for all the work that Mr Sorreta had carried out prior to that, and we wish him good health.

Ongoing megatrends in the global world of work, including demographic shifts, climate change, technological developments and, more recently, growing labour shortages and the repercussions of the COVID-19 pandemic, have accentuated the need to put the topic of decent work and the care economy on the agenda. At a time when the topic of care has moved up on the agenda, the General Discussion Committee on Decent Work and the Care Economy has sought to tackle issues such as the unfair distribution of unpaid care work, gender equality, investment in care, access to quality care services, decent working conditions, labour shortages and skills mismatches. The Committee, under the agile leadership of Mr Sorreta and Mr Jordan, now presents a set of conclusions that will guide constituents and the ILO in their work, not only to ensure decent work for care workers, but also to foster the benefits that investing in care brings to society and humanity as a whole.

As you all know, the unique tripartite structure of the ILO, founded on social dialogue, gives an equal voice to workers, employers and governments. This practice does not make it easy, but we were once again able to agree to a broad set of conclusions in our Committee. We warmly thank the social partners, in particular the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons, and of course, all our colleagues in the Government group for their engagement and valuable contributions. We also express our warmest gratitude to the Office for its support and guidance. The European Union and its Member States acknowledge the strength of the ILO, with its unique tripartite composition and its expertise deeply rooted in the world of work. This expertise should be used to point us in the right direction to build robust and resilient care systems, improve decent work prospects and eliminate gender inequality.

Everyone in the Committee, including a large team of technical, security and logistical staff behind the scenes, has worked very long hours, and our Committee may even hold the record for the longest sitting. This did lead some of us to start reflecting on the discrepancy between the kind of working conditions that we are striving for worldwide and the ones we have experienced ourselves over the last few days. I will leave this up to the consideration of everyone here, but the most important message that I want to give you is that we are very grateful for what we were able to achieve. We look forward to continuing our joint work in following up on these conclusions.

Ms Mayers-Granville Employer (Barbados)

I have two words: intense and rewarding. The discussions, the insights and the conclusions we reached will have a lasting impact on the future of work in the care economy. We considered: the demand for care being impacted by ageing populations; the supply of care, noting the global skill shortages and contextual issues of family and community carers; and access to care and the need for adequate resourcing. While time prevented consensus on a few areas, what was overwhelmingly obvious to all three groups of constituents was that the care economy is critical. We acknowledged the vital role that women play and called for a re-evaluation of gender norms towards better balance.

I would like to express my heartfelt gratitude to all members of the Committee. Their contributions were invaluable. The advocacy of Ms Chang, the Worker Vice-Chairperson, on behalf of migrant and domestic care workers and persons facing vulnerabilities, was particularly admirable. The contributions made by various Governments added significant context to our discussions. And special thanks to Mr Sorreta of the Philippines, for his chairmanship, despite having to step down due to illness. Mr Jordan of Barbados, at short notice, expertly continued to chair the Committee, ultimately leading to the conclusions.

I must also express my thanks to Ms Janahi, our dedicated Employer Vice-Chairperson, for effectively conveying the Employers' positions. She was ably supported by the International Organisation of Employers and officers from the Bureau for Employers' Activities and guided by Employer representatives.

As the long nights wore on, the coffee from the vending machine became crucial for sustenance. By 2 a.m. on Thursday, fatigue was setting in, but our determination and perseverance were commendable as we worked tirelessly to ensure that as many areas as possible were included in the final outcome document. I am proud of the work done and the impact that we will have on the care economy.

Ms Coronacion Worker (Philippines)

Thank you for this opportunity to once again address the International Labour Conference and thank you to the Committee for the extraordinary effort that went into drafting and crafting this document. We have achieved successes, particularly in asserting that labour in the care economy is not a commodity and that the State carries the primary responsibility for care provision, funding and regulation. However, I must register the Philippine Workers' delegation's vehement objection to the insertion of a reference to public-private partnerships in the outcome document's guiding principles. It is difficult for me to understand why the Employers and most Governments could not accept such straightforward language as "care work is the right of all people". Perhaps admitting this would make it impossible for them to justify their main agenda. I refer to paragraph 25, which states, "[p]ublic-private partnerships that leverage the strengths of both public and private sectors can help scale quality care services without overburdening either side, fostering a more sustainable care ecosystem". Including this in the guiding principles contradicts our assertion that decent work in the care economy is the primary responsibility of States. It can and will worsen the experiences of many care workers around the world, including the migrants and domestic workers we represent.

The historical and practical record is clear. Public-private partnerships have consistently fallen short of delivering on their promises of improving care services without overburdening either sector. From a human rights perspective, the commodification of care through public-private partnerships often leads to the prioritization of profit over people, undermining the quality and accessibility of essential services. Paragraph 25 undermines all of the strong and positive provisions that we have agreed upon in this text. We remain adamant that we cannot accept any language on public-private partnerships, as this institutionalizes further privatization in the care economy. We emphasize that this represents a disservice, especially to our migrant workers, who stand to suffer from further abuse and rights violations. As such, we do not treat this matter as settled. Workers and unions will continue to push back against all efforts to commodify care work and undermine the rigid protections that we have fought hard to enshrine.

Mr Babu Government (Bangladesh)

Allow me to express my heartfelt thanks and deep appreciation to my outstanding colleagues from all three benches, who have been actively engaged in discussing and negotiating the outcome document on the care economy. I would also like to thank the Chairperson of the Committee, Mr Jordan of Barbados, the Deputy Director-General, Ms Drake, and other colleagues of the Office.

As we see the present, and project the future of the world of work, we come across the predominance of care workforces and the increasing demand for care work. Workers with a wide range of expertise and experience are contributing to health and community-held social sectors and domestic care work. Hence, the ILO, with its values grounded in the Declaration of Philadelphia and the ILO Centenary Declaration for the Future of Work, has responded in the form of the outcome that has been presented to the Conference for adoption today.

Bangladesh considers that care workers in all sectors equally deserve a decent working environment, social protection, fair wages, and the right to organize and bargain collectively. However, the protection of migrant care workers requires our special attention, as they are often engaged in highly informal care work and face cultural, legal and many other obstacles in realizing their rights as workers and as human beings. The outcome document mandates the Office to promote international labour standards, provide technical support and policy guidance, provide technical assistance to protect migrant care workers, support the constituents in exploring fiscal space, and so on. At the same time, the tripartite constituents have also been urged to design and implement integrated and coherent care policies and systems, promote policies to create decent jobs in the care economy and strengthen policies to tackle inequalities, discrimination, violence and harassment. We strongly believe that governments, especially from the developing world, will need more technical assistance and financing, as well as effective social dialogue, to achieve the goals we agree on here today. We are optimistic that the spirit of cooperation shown in drafting the document will continue, for the purposes of effective implementation.

Mr Naumann
Employer (Germany)

We appreciate the outcome of the discussions of the General Discussion Committee on Decent Work and the Care Economy and the fruitful tripartite negotiations which took place. I want to sincerely thank the Chairperson and the Vice-Chairpersons of the Committee, especially Ms Janahi, and the International Organisation of Employers for their outstanding contributions throughout. Members of the Employers' group will be able to carry back many important impressions and experiences.

The spirit of the tripartite discussions and the tripartite character of the ILO encourage all stakeholders to take other perspectives into account, and this is exactly the way we need to handle the major challenges we face in our societies. For example, in Germany, the demographic shift and its consequences are one of the most debated issues. We feel the demographic consequences on the ground. Social security systems are under financial pressure and even the best ideas and biggest budgets cannot succeed if we do not have the workforce to do the job. Therefore, a well-balanced approach is needed. The importance of skills and labour shortages cannot be underestimated. We should also put emphasis on the value of private care enterprises, services and agencies for good quality care. In conclusion, all of society benefits from a well-advanced care system, and social dialogue and the social partners have to play a major role in it.

Ms Britez
Worker (Argentina)
(Original Spanish)

On behalf of the Workers, we would like to reaffirm everything that our spokesperson in the General Discussion Committee on Decent Work and the Care Economy has said, and express our support for the statement made by our colleague from the Philippines. We are delighted to be here to present the conclusions reached by the Committee.

These two weeks were intense and emotional. We highlighted the importance of care as a crucial driver in our lives. Care is not a commodity and, here at the ILO, we know what that means. We paid tribute to carers and I would like to give special thanks to all those who have devoted their lives to caring for others.

The discussions enabled us to identify the enormous challenges faced in care sectors, and in particular those faced by domestic workers. In this respect, I would like to note that I represent the International Domestic Workers Federation, which serves as the voice of more than 75 million domestic workers. We also identified the challenges faced by migrant workers who, as our colleagues have pointed out, continue to suffer violations of their rights, and by care workers in the health sector, community care workers, care workers employed in the informal economy, home care workers and all those who carry out this type of activity.

We gave thought to the importance of receiving high-quality care and to the central role of governments in developing public policies that support care systems. The conclusions presented here contain a framework of principles that will guide the work of the ILO and of us all, whether Workers, Employers or Governments. Emphasizing the importance of guaranteeing decent working conditions for care workers and quality services for those who receive care, we also developed guidance for ILO action. We are very proud of this work and of course fully support its implementation.

I would like to thank all the members of the Committee, in particular the members of the drafting group, our spokesperson, Ms Chang, her advisory team and all the colleagues from the Bureau for Workers' Activities, who provided the Committee with their constant support. The Workers will continue to strive for a world that is more equitable and that provides opportunities, and for a care economy that is more visible and based on decent work.

Mr Nirmal
Government (India)

I wish to begin by thanking all the Committee members and ILO experts for the intense and productive discussion on this important subject of global significance. As the global population ages, the demand for care services is set to rise, creating numerous job opportunities.

India recognizes the importance of the care economy for job creation and boosting female labour force participation. India is undertaking various skilling, upskilling and reskilling initiatives to align care workers' skills with international standards. India is also engaging with various countries to facilitate demand-driven supply of skilled care workers from these countries, ensuring decent working conditions for the migrant workers. Global skills mapping in the field of the care economy is the need of the hour to provide equitable, sustainable and inclusive access to decent standards of living for all.

The Committee's conclusions underscore the essential role that care work plays in achieving the Sustainable Development Goals with the active participation of all stakeholders. The care burden on women hinders gender equality and limits women's participation in the labour force. The conclusions will not only help in improving female labour force participation and economic activities, they will also foster equality and quality skilled and affordable care services that can enhance human capital development, which is vital for global economic growth. The way forward requires a concerted effort and policymaking at the national, regional and global levels to recognize the demand for the care economy, thereby promoting gender equality and fostering a robust and resilient labour market.

Ms Chenard

Employer (Congo)
(Original French)

It is a great honour for me to participate in my very first session of the International Labour Conference within the General Discussion Committee on Decent Work and the Care Economy. First of all, I would like to congratulate the ILO for its excellent organization and the work accomplished. I also applaud the professionalism and leadership of our Chairpersons, including Mr Jordan, and our Vice-Chairpersons, including Ms Janahi, as well as the dedication of the teams, in particular the International Organisation of Employers and the Bureau for Employers' Activities, and the delegates who worked tirelessly, even beyond 3 a.m. when necessary.

After long and sometimes intense discussions, we succeeded in producing a balanced text that takes into account the concerns of all constituents. A key point highlighted was the importance of public-private partnerships in promoting the care economy. Public-private partnerships are essential to the development of the care economy sector. These partnerships can play a crucial role in improving health services and, more generally, in ensuring sustainable economic growth.

I look forward to exploring this subject further in future discussions, particularly those on the informal economy, which, according to the reports we have from the United Nations Development Programme and the ILO, creates 80 per cent of jobs in Africa, 68 per cent in Asia and the Pacific and 53 per cent in Latin America. The situation of workers in regions that represent 80 per cent of the global population cannot be improved without addressing the problem of the informal economy.

I will conclude by saying that participating in this session of the Conference has allowed me to come to understand the importance and profound impact of the work accomplished here. The instruments prepared here have the potential to improve the lives of so many people. However, this will be the case only if they are actually implemented at the local level. I therefore ask and implore Governments that have ratified instruments to ensure their monitoring and effective application at the national level.

Ms Gandiwa Magaya

Worker (Zimbabwe)

The care economy is composed of both paid and unpaid workers. Among them are marginalized and vulnerable groups, such as domestic workers, community healthcare workers, migrant care workers, and informal economy care workers, the majority of whom are women who have already been socially, economically and culturally disadvantaged. Most care workers suffer discrimination for reasons of gender, disability, race, social status, ethnicity or economic status, to name but a few. It is therefore a milestone achievement that we are gathered here to celebrate strong conclusions that include the need to promote: gender equality and equity in the care economy; equal access to skills development, business opportunities and social protection for care workers; the protection of migrant care workers in situations of vulnerability; gender-responsive policies in the care economy; and our roles as tripartite partners.

The incorporation of the 5R Framework for Decent Care Work will enable us to monitor progress in ensuring that decent work in the care economy is achieved in an equitable manner. This was a journey that was painful but worth taking, as today we adopt conclusions that will see a more gender-equal, human-rights-based and inclusive care economy with decent work. There can never be social justice without gender equality in any part of the world. On behalf of the care workers of the world, allow me to conclude by saying, “Nothing for us, without us”.

Resolution and conclusions concerning decent work and the care economy

The President

We will now proceed with the adoption of the proposed resolution concerning decent work and the care economy, which contains the Committee’s conclusions, the text of which has been published in Record of Proceedings No. 8A.

If there are no objections, may I take it that the Conference adopts, as a whole, the proposed resolution and the conclusions contained therein?

(The resolution and conclusions are adopted.)

I would like to thank all the members of the Committee, and the members of the Secretariat working behind the scenes, for their commitment and dedication. Good job, and congratulations to them all for these excellent results. I take note of the comments made with regard to the working conditions in the Committee. We will see how we can improve them next year.

(The Conference continues its work in plenary.)

Proposed abrogation of four international labour Conventions	3
Appendix Final proposals concerning the abrogation of four international labour Conventions	5

Introduction

1. At its opening sitting, on 3 June 2024, the International Labour Conference established the General Affairs Committee. In accordance with article 7(2) of the Standing Orders, the Conference referred to the General Affairs Committee the proposed abrogation of four international labour Conventions for its consideration (item VII on the agenda of the Conference).
2. The Committee had before it the questionnaire and report prepared by the Office in relation to the item (ILC/112/VII(2)).
3. In accordance with article 7(1) of the Standing Orders, the Committee was composed of 56 members (28 members nominated by the Government group, 14 members nominated by the Employers' group and 14 members nominated by the Workers' group).
4. The Committee held one sitting.

Election of the Officers of the Committee and a Reporter

5. In accordance with article 37(2) of the Standing Orders, the Committee elected its Officers, and a Reporter, as follows:

Chairperson: Mr Mehdi Aliabadi (Government member, Islamic Republic of Iran)

Employer Vice-Chairperson: Ms Jacqueline Mugo (Employer member, Kenya)

Worker Vice-Chairperson: Ms Catelene Passchier (Worker member, the Netherlands)

Reporter: Ms Hana Elgallal (Government member, Libya)

6. In accordance with article 37(6) of the Standing Orders, the Officers approved the report of the Committee submitted to them by the Reporter.

Proposed abrogation of four international labour Conventions

7. The Committee examined proposals for the abrogation of four international labour Conventions, namely the Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45), Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937 (No. 62), Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63) and Labour Inspectorates (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 85). The proposals were placed on the agenda of the Conference by the Governing Body upon the recommendation of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group (SRM TWG).
8. The Legal Adviser indicated that since the publication of the report, two Member States, Jamaica and Oman, had expressed support for the proposed abrogation.
9. The Worker Vice-Chairperson recalled the role of the SRM TWG and emphasized the need to ensure that the body of international labour standards continued to protect workers. In 2018 when the SRM TWG reviewed the four Conventions in question and recommended their abrogation, the Workers expressed their reluctance to abrogate instruments which, although outdated, were ratified by an important number of Member States and offered a level of protection to workers, such as Conventions Nos 62 and 85. She regretted the inadequate response of governments to the calls made for the ratification of the corresponding up-to-date

Conventions. Once outdated Conventions were abrogated, there was no protection left for workers in the absence of ratification of more modern ILO standards. It was striking that 68 countries were still bound by Convention No. 45 but only one Member State had ratified the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176), since the Governing Body had decided to recommend the abrogation of Convention No. 45. Similarly, 19 Members were still bound by Convention No. 62 but only two had ratified the up-to-date Home Work Convention, 1996 (No. 177). As for Convention No. 63, 14 Members were still parties to it while no new ratifications had been registered for the Repatriation of Seafarers Convention (Revised), 1987 (No. 166). She noted the concerns expressed by two national trade unions with respect to the abrogation of Conventions Nos 45 and 62, as reflected in the Office's report.

10. While not challenging the decision to abrogate the four Conventions, the Worker Vice-Chairperson wished to put on record the very serious concerns of her group that the work of the SRM TWG had become a mere standards abrogation exercise since it did not involve the effective promotion of the ratification of relevant up-to-date Conventions and that the development of new standards following recommendations of the SRM TWG was too slow. With respect to women's work in mining, she stated that while it was true that the prohibition of women's underground work to provide them with protection against the specific hazards of work in mining was contrary to the principle of equality, there was still need for protection of women, and indeed of all workers, men and women, when working in mines, which was exactly what the more modern instrument Convention No. 176 provided for.
11. The Employer Vice-Chairperson reiterated the disagreement of her group with the Workers' position that the abrogation or withdrawal of an instrument necessarily led to a gap in coverage unless States parties ratified a more up-to-date Convention. Whether there was a gap or not could only be decided on a case-by-case basis and not in a mechanical manner. A case in point was Convention No. 45 which banned the work of women and constituted discrimination in violation of a fundamental principle and right at work. The Employers were of the view that the abrogation of outdated instruments was to be achieved as soon as possible in keeping with the mandate of the SRM TWG to ensure that the ILO had a clear, up-to-date and robust body of standards.
12. The Chairperson recalled that the overall objective of the SRM TWG was to ensure that the ILO had an up-to-date body of standards and acknowledged that the abrogation of outdated Conventions should go hand in hand with, or even be conditioned upon, the promotion and formal ratification of more modern and relevant Conventions. At the same time, he noted that this was the fifth time that the Conference was called upon to engage in the abrogation of obsolete instruments and that the applicable procedure had been implemented diligently and successfully so far. This procedure guaranteed thorough preparation by the Office and ample consultations with the tripartite constituents. The procedure was reinforced with the establishment of the SRM TWG that further ensured careful reflection before the abrogation or withdrawal of any obsolete standard was recommended to the Conference.
13. The General Affairs Committee decided to recommend to the Conference that it take the decision, pursuant to article 52(2) of the Standing Orders, to submit the final proposals for the abrogation of four international labour Conventions to a final record vote to be held on 6 June 2024.

Appendix

Final proposals concerning the abrogation of four international labour Conventions

1. The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having been convened in Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met at its 112th Session on 3 June 2024, and

Following consideration of the proposal for the abrogation of four international labour Conventions, decides this 6 June 2024 to abrogate the Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45).

The Director-General of the International Labour Office shall notify all Members of the International Labour Organization, as well as the Secretary-General of the United Nations, of this decision to abrogate the instrument.

The English, French and Spanish versions of the text of this decision are equally authoritative.

2. The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having been convened in Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met at its 112th Session on 3 June 2024, and

Following consideration of the proposal for the abrogation of four international labour Conventions, decides this 6 June 2024 to abrogate the Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937 (No. 62).

The Director-General of the International Labour Office shall notify all Members of the International Labour Organization, as well as the Secretary-General of the United Nations, of this decision to abrogate the instrument.

The English, French and Spanish versions of the text of this decision are equally authoritative.

3. The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having been convened in Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met at its 112th Session on 3 June 2024, and

Following consideration of the proposal for the abrogation of four international labour Conventions, decides this 6 June 2024 to abrogate the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63).

The Director-General of the International Labour Office shall notify all Members of the International Labour Organization, as well as the Secretary-General of the United Nations, of this decision to abrogate the instrument.

The English, French and Spanish versions of the text of this decision are equally authoritative.

4. The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having been convened in Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met at its 112th Session on 3 June 2024, and

Following consideration of the proposal for the abrogation of four international labour Conventions, decides this 6 June 2024 to abrogate the Labour Inspectorates (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 85).

The Director-General of the International Labour Office shall notify all Members of the International Labour Organization, as well as the Secretary-General of the United Nations, of this decision to abrogate the instrument.

The English, French and Spanish versions of the text of this decision are equally authoritative.

President: Mr Buzu

Report of the General Affairs Committee: Presentation and noting of the report and adoption of the Committee's recommendation

The President

Without further ado, we shall begin with the presentation of the report of the General Affairs Committee. This report has been published on the Conference website, in Record of Proceedings No. 2A.

It is my pleasure to recall the names of the Officers and of the Reporter of the Committee, all of whom are with us in the room here today. They are: Mr Ali Abadi (Islamic Republic of Iran), Chairperson; Ms Mugo (Kenya), Employer Vice-Chairperson; Ms Passchier (Netherlands), Worker Vice-Chairperson; and Ms Elgallal (Libya), Reporter.

I will begin by giving the floor to Ms Elgallal, so that she may present to us the Committee's report. The Officers will then take the floor.

Ms Elgallal

Reporter of the General Affairs Committee

I have the honour to present to the Conference the outcome of the deliberations of the General Affairs Committee. The report of the Committee has been published in Record of Proceedings No. 2A. It presents a summary of the proceedings and the outcome of the discussions on the only matter that the Conference referred to the Committee this year, that is, the proposed abrogation of four international labour Conventions. Two of these Conventions, namely the Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45), and the Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937 (No. 62), concern occupational safety and health; the third, the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63), deals with statistics; and the fourth, the Labour Inspectorates (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 85), refers to labour inspection in non-metropolitan territories. They have in common the fact that they were all examined by the Governing Body's Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group in 2018, which determined that they are no longer relevant and that they no longer make a useful contribution to the attainment of the objectives of the Organization.

The discussion in the General Affairs Committee was expeditious and consensual. The Committee decided to recommend to the Conference that it submit the proposals for the abrogation of the four Conventions to a final record vote, to be held later today. The proposals are set out in the appendix to the report.

This is the fifth time that the Conference will be called upon to decide on the abrogation of obsolete international labour Conventions. If the four Conventions are abrogated, the Conference will have removed from the body of standards a total of 23 Conventions since 2017. As in previous exercises, the focus of the reflection by the constituents has been the need to find a careful balance, on the one hand, striking out outdated standards in the interest of preserving the relevance of the ILO system of norms and, on the other, avoiding the creation of gaps in coverage or protection. It somehow involves looking back, and burning away what is no longer relevant, but also looking ahead, and making sure that modern approaches and solutions are accepted. It is all about associating progress not only with the denunciation of old instruments, but also with the ratification and application of modern ones.

With these words, I have the honour to submit the report of the General Affairs Committee to the 112th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Ms Mugo

Employer Vice-Chairperson of the General Affairs Committee

It is our pleasure to take part in the presentation of the report of this General Affairs Committee. We examined the instruments that were proposed for abrogation and we are in agreement. We believe, as Employers, that this is a decision of key relevance, and it comes at the end of a very long process. The work done by the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group played a key role in advising and informing the decision of the Governing Body on the way forward towards securing the continued relevance and up-to-date nature of the framework of standards that we have in this house.

The Employers' group believes that we, as a body, need to continue to make efforts to make a contribution towards having legal certainty in the instruments that guide our work and to keep them current for the world of work that we have today. With these brief remarks, the Employers confirm that we support the Committee's report.

Ms Passchier

Worker Vice-Chairperson of the General Affairs Committee

We have before us the report of the General Affairs Committee, focusing especially on the abrogation of four Conventions. The process was initiated on the recommendation of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group, with the approval of the Governing Body, and included steps by the Office to consult national governments and constituents. The Workers' group has supported the decisions made throughout this process. In the General Affairs Committee, however, I raised the concerns of my group regarding the situation, namely that we are currently abrogating four Conventions, of which some still have a very high ratification rate, while the more modern instruments have not been ratified. A case in point is Convention No. 45, on the protection of women in mining, where 68 ratifications are still valid; only one of the 68 countries has in the meantime ratified the more modern instrument, which is the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176), regarding the protection of men and women workers in mines. Although the approach of Convention No. 45 certainly is outdated – and we agreed with that – its abrogation, without having any further newer instruments applicable, leaves women in mines without any protection. While we do not question the current proposals for abrogation and can support the report of the General Affairs Committee, we want to come back to this worrying situation in the future.

Mr Ali Abadi

Chairperson of the General Affairs Committee

I have the honour to stand before you as the Chairperson of the General Affairs Committee. I was privileged to have been elected to this position. The General Affairs Committee is one of the standing committees of the Conference. It exemplifies the critical coordination and synergy between the Conference and the Governing Body.

The Conference has submitted to the Committee one item this year, which was the consideration of the proposed abrogation of four international labour Conventions, on the basis of the questionnaire and report prepared by the Office, contained in document ILC.112/VII(2)(Rev.1).

In addition to what you have just heard from the Reporter of the Committee, I wish to recall that, due to the institutional significance of the act of removing Conventions in force from the body of standards, a meticulous and multistep process has been devised and must be carried out before the Conference can take a record vote with a qualified majority on the matter. This process is aimed at ensuring that the obsolescence of the instruments concerned is generally recognized and that the broader implications for the coherence of the ILO's normative system have been thoroughly considered. This process is deliberately lengthy and includes an initial examination by the dedicated Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group, a debate on that Group's recommendations by the Governing Body, consultations with the tripartite constituents at the national level, further discussion by the General Affairs Committee of the Conference and a formal decision by the Conference in plenary on whether to put the proposed abrogation to a record vote, which is precisely the purpose of the sitting this morning.

The Conference is the supreme deliberative body of the ILO and has the power to adopt and remove standards from the so-called "international labour code". It does so with vision and pragmatism. It is for the Member States, of course, to translate this vision into reality, not only by distancing themselves from the outdated standards, but also, and perhaps more importantly, by promptly embracing and effectively implementing the new standards that this Conference diligently crafts.

To conclude, I wish to thank the members of the Committee, and of course Ms Jacqueline Mugo, the Employer Vice-Chairperson, and Ms Catelene Passchier, the Worker Vice-Chairperson, for their engagement and expertise.

The President

I thank the Reporter and the Officers of the Committee for their statements. As there are no requests for the floor or objections, may I take it that the Conference agrees to take note of the report of the General Affairs Committee?

(The Conference takes note of the report.)

Abrogation of four international labour Conventions

The President

The General Affairs Committee has recommended to the Conference that it take the decision, pursuant to article 52(2) of the Standing Orders of the Conference, to submit the formal proposals for the abrogation of four international labour Conventions, namely the Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45), the Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937 (No. 62), the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63), and the Labour Inspectorates (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 85), as set out in the appendix to the report of the General Affairs Committee, to a final record vote. The vote will be held by electronic means later today. You are strongly encouraged to exercise your right to vote on these issues of institutional importance.

If there is no objection, may I take it that this decision is adopted by the Conference?

(It is so decided.)

Closing of the sitting

The President

That brings us to the end of our proceedings related to the work of the General Affairs Committee. I now declare closed this plenary sitting of the 112th Session of the International Labour Conference.

(The Conference adjourned at 10.25 a.m.)

(The Conference continues its work in plenary.)

Friday, 7 June 2024, 10.05 a.m.

President: Mr Dubey

Employer Vice-President of the Conference

Abrogation of four international labour Conventions: Announcement of the results of the record vote

The President

It is my honour to declare open the eighth plenary sitting of the 112th Session of the International Labour Conference.

This morning we shall begin by announcing the results of the final record vote on the proposed abrogation of four international labour Conventions, which was held electronically yesterday afternoon. The quorum was set at 286 votes.

I am pleased to announce that, as a result of the final record vote, all four instruments have been abrogated, the quorum and the required two-thirds majority having been reached. These instruments are:

Abrogated Conventions

- Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45)
- Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937 (No. 62)
- Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63)
- Labour Inspectorates (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 85).

(The detailed results of all the votes are available on the Conference website.)

(The Conference continues its work in plenary.)

1. The Credentials Committee of the 112th Session of the International Labour Conference is composed as follows:

Chairperson:	Mr Aniefiok Etim Essah (Government delegate, Nigeria)
Employer Vice-Chairperson:	Mr Fernando Yllanes Martínez (Employers' substitute delegate, Mexico)
Worker Vice-Chairperson:	Ms Zingiswa Losi (Workers' delegate, South Africa)
Substitute:	Ms Amanda Brown (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland)

Composition of the Conference

Status of accreditation of Member States

2. As at 5 June 2024 at 6 p.m., 173 of the 187 Member States of the International Labour Organization (ILO) have accredited a delegation, of which 131 deposited their credentials within the time limit set for their submission, 14 May 2024. The following 13 Member States ¹ (14 in 2023) have not accredited a delegation:

Antigua and Barbuda	Saint Lucia
Comoros	Saint Vincent and the Grenadines
Dominica	Solomon Islands
Ecuador	Tajikistan
Marshall Islands	Tonga
Palau	Tuvalu
Saint Kitts and Nevis

3. The following four Member States have accredited incomplete delegations:
 - El Salvador (no Employers' delegate)
 - Rwanda (no Employers' delegate)
 - Haiti (exclusively governmental)
 - Yemen (exclusively governmental)
4. The Committee recalls that the Governing Body decided ² that the present session of the Conference would be conducted in person, with the added option for passive remote attendance (the Plenary sittings via live stream on the Conference website and the public sittings of Committees via links provided by committee coordinators upon request). In accordance with article 3(1) of the ILO Constitution, Member States were expected to send complete tripartite delegations to Geneva, with a minimum composition of two Government delegates, one Employers' delegate and one Workers' delegate.

¹ Not counting Myanmar (see paragraphs 16-24 concerning the representation of Myanmar).

5. The Committee notes with regret the number of Member States that have not accredited a delegation, or only an incomplete one. In this regard, it notes with concern that incomplete delegations remain a recurrent reality (see Appendix I) and, in particular, that one Member State, Yemen, has since 2015 only accredited incomplete, in most cases exclusively governmental, delegations. It wishes to stress again that, by not appointing a delegation, or by failing to accredit a fully tripartite delegation, the Government deprives the employers or workers of the country, as the case may be, of their right to be represented in person in the highest policymaking body of the ILO and to participate actively in its work. The appointment of a full tripartite delegation is also essential in view of article 4(2) of the ILO Constitution, which provides that if a Member State fails to nominate one of the non-Government delegates, the other non-Government delegate who has been accredited loses the right to vote. The Committee can only emphasize again that, without the participation of Governments, Employers' and Workers' representatives, the Conference cannot function properly or attain its objectives.

Delegates and advisers

► Accredited delegates, substitute delegates and advisers

	Governments		Employers		Workers		Total
	Accredited	Registered	Accredited	Registered	Accredited	Registered	Accredited	Registered

Total	1 696	1 252	767	481	1 002	732	3 465	2 465

* Advisers who are permanently appointed as substitute delegates in the credentials.

6. Of the accredited 678 delegates, 537 have registered.
7. Detailed information by Member State is provided in Appendices II and III. Information on the composition of the Conference is also available at Delegations to the 2024 International Labour Conference, which is regularly updated.

Proportion of women accredited in delegations

8. The overall proportion of women delegates and advisers that have been accredited to this session of the Conference is 37.8 per cent (36.6 per cent in 2023). There are 44.1 per cent of women in Government delegations (42.8 per cent in 2023), 33.4 per cent of women in the Employers' delegations (32.6 per cent in 2023) and 30.4 per cent of women in the Workers' delegations (29.5 per cent in 2023).

► Proportion of women by function and group

9. While those overall figures represent a continued improvement and the minimum target of 30 per cent of women's participation has been reached in all three groups, the Committee notes that, as shown in the above table, titular delegates from across the Government, Employers' and Workers' groups are still predominantly men, a situation that does not live up to the Committee's expectations.
10. Moreover, the Committee observes that, as shown in Appendix IV to this Report, six delegations to the present session of the Conference, Fiji, Haiti, Jordan, Liberia, Rwanda and Yemen, are exclusively composed of men, while noting that some of the delegations concerned are of a small size. The Committee calls upon the governments, employers' organizations and workers' organizations concerned to take appropriate steps with a view to redressing the situation.

Quorum

11. The following 13 Member States accredited to the Conference are in arrears in their financial contributions to the Organization under the terms of article 13(4) of the ILO Constitution and therefore may not, at present, participate in the voting of the Conference, including in its committees:

Afghanistan

Sao Tome and Principe

Chad

Sudan

Congo

Suriname

Equatorial Guinea

Uganda

Gambia

Venezuela (Bolivarian Republic of)

Guinea-Bissau

Yemen

Lebanon

12. Therefore, 32 delegates from among these Member States who have registered a delegation are not taken into account in calculating the quorum.
13. In conformity with article 17(3) of the ILO Constitution and article 22 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, as at 5 June 2024 at 6 p.m. the necessary quorum to give a vote validity is 284. Regularly updated information regarding the composition of the Conference and the quorum for votes is available on the Conference website.

Other participants

14. A total of 171 Ministers or Vice-Ministers have been accredited.
15. The Conference is also being attended by the following observers: one non-Member State (Holy See), one liberation movement (Palestine), representatives of the United Nations and some of its bodies, as well as representatives from specialized agencies and other official international organizations, non-governmental international organizations with consultative status, and representatives of other non-governmental international organizations.

Representation of Myanmar

16. The Committee had before it two communications containing credentials for two tripartite delegations of Myanmar designated respectively by the military authorities and the "National Unity Government" (NUG). The first communication was received on 10 May 2024 from the Permanent Mission of Myanmar in Geneva and included employers' representatives from the Union of Myanmar Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry (UMFCCI) and workers' representatives from the Myanmar Seafarers Federation. The second communication was received on 14 May 2024 from the Ministry of Labour of the NUG and the Permanent Mission of Myanmar in New York and included employers' representatives from the Myanmar Nway Oo Employers Federation (MNEF) and workers' representatives from the Confederation of Trade Unions of Myanmar (CTUM). In a further communication dated 28 May 2024, the NUG Ministry of Labour made certain changes to its credentials and explained the reasons for its choice of an employers' delegation from MNEF and a workers' delegation from CTUM, which is part of the Myanmar Labour Alliance (MLA), those being the only organizations that truly represent, respectively, the employers and workers of the country.
17. The Committee also had before it a communication dated 20 May 2024 addressed to it by CTUM. The purpose of the letter was to present the credentials of the "Workers Delegation of Myanmar to the 112th Session of the International Labour Conference". Referring to paragraph 29 of the first report of the Credentials Committee of the 111th Session (2023) of the Conference, the CTUM considered that there was no legal obstacle for the Conference to accredit both employers' and workers' delegates of Myanmar given that the position taken by the United Nations General Assembly concerned only Government delegates.
18. The Committee recalls that at the three previous sessions of the Conference, competing credentials had been received on behalf of the same two entities. Taking into account the United Nations General Assembly resolution 396(V) of 14 December 1950 and the position adopted by the General Assembly and by other UN system organizations on this matter, the Committee decided that no delegates for Myanmar would be accredited (ILC.109/Records Nos 3B and 3E, ILC.110/Record No. 2A, ILC.111/Record No. 2A(Rev.1)).
19. The Committee takes note of the developments that have taken place in the ILO concerning Myanmar since the closure of the last session of the Conference in June 2023, in particular, the Governing Body discussions at its 349th (October–November 2023) and 350th Sessions (March 2024) on the follow-up to the report of the Commission of Inquiry established in accordance with article 26 of the ILO Constitution concerning the non-observance by Myanmar of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29).

20. The Committee recalls once again that, according to United Nations General Assembly resolution 396(V) of 14 December 1950, whenever more than one authority claims to be the government entitled to represent a State, the attitude adopted by the General Assembly concerning any such question should be taken into account in other organs of the United Nations and in the specialized agencies. Consequently, a consistent line of precedents has it (see Dominican Republic (1965), Cambodia (1998), Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (2011), Myanmar (2021–2023) that the question of recognition of governments and their representation in the ILO is considered a political matter in relation to which the Organization should be guided by any position adopted by the United Nations General Assembly.
21. The Committee notes that on 6 December 2023, the Credentials Committee of the United Nations General Assembly decided to postpone its consideration on the credentials of Myanmar. Its report was approved on 18 December 2023 by the General Assembly, which has not re-examined the question since then. It is further noted that other organizations have similarly deferred consideration of the credentials of Myanmar and kept its seat vacant pending further guidance from the United Nations General Assembly, most recently, at the 77th Session of the World Health Assembly of the World Health Organization on 29 May 2024.
22. Noting that the situation has not evolved in the United Nations General Assembly and taking into account the United Nations General Assembly resolution 396(V) of 14 December 1950, the Committee decides that no delegates for Myanmar will be accredited at the 112th Session of the Conference.
23. The Committee nonetheless reiterates its regret in relation to the continued ambiguity on the question of representation of Myanmar and notes that in the absence of guidance from the United Nations General Assembly, it may need to make its own determination in due course so as to enable the tripartite constituents of Myanmar to resume active participation in the work of the annual Conference. In the meantime, the Committee wishes to invite the Governing Body, through the Conference, to urgently consider possible options that could allow employers' and workers' representatives from Myanmar to contribute to the work of future sessions of the Conference.
24. As regards the communication from the CTUM, the Committee recalls that credentials are the instrument used by a State to designate persons entitled to represent it and act on its behalf at an international conference. Accordingly, the credentials of the tripartite delegations of Members to the International Labour Conference must be signed by, or on behalf of, an authority with the power to bind the State, such as the Head of State, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, or the Minister responsible for labour questions. No valid credentials can be deposited by any other entity, such as a workers' organization, be it only for a partial delegation. Other entities can accredit participants to represent them at the Conference, such as international non-governmental organizations invited by the Governing Body, but the Committee notes that the CTUM does not qualify as such an organization.

Monitoring cases, objections and communications

25. In addition to the four cases of monitoring (concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegations of Djibouti, Mauritania, and the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, and the Employers' delegation of Nicaragua), of which the Committee is seized in accordance with article 34 of the Standing Orders following decisions taken at the last session of the Conference, the Committee has before it several objections and communications. It has forthwith commenced their examination. The Committee believes that its work is facilitated when credentials reach the International Labour Office within the time limit set for their submission.

26. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference so that it may take note of its content.

Geneva, 7 June 2024

Appendices

I. List of accredited delegates and advisers	34
II. List of registered delegates and advisers	35
III. Proportion of women accredited in Conference delegations	36

Composition of the Conference

1. Since 7 June 2024, when the Credentials Committee adopted its first report (ILC.112/Record No. 3A), one more Member State (Ecuador) has accredited a delegation, bringing the total number of accredited Member States to 174. In addition, two Member States (Suriname and Uganda) have regained the right to vote.
2. There are altogether 6,246 persons accredited to the Conference (as compared to 6,095 in 2023) of whom 4,987 have registered. Among the persons accredited, there are 169 ministers and vice-ministers.
3. The overall proportion of women delegates and advisers remains at 37.8 per cent. The appendix contains more details on the proportion of women accredited in delegations.

Monitoring

4. The Committee was seized of four monitoring cases, pursuant to article 34 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference, by virtue of a decision of the Conference taken at its 111th Session (2023).

Djibouti

5. At its 111th Session (2023), the International Labour Conference decided, by virtue of articles 32(7) and 34 of the Conference Standing Orders, and upon the unanimous recommendation of the Credentials Committee, to renew the monitoring of the situation raised in an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation (ILC.111/Record No. 2B(Rev.), paragraph 12). Consequently, it requested the Government to submit for the next session of the Conference, at the same time that it submitted its credentials for its delegation, a detailed report, substantiated with relevant documentation:
 - (a) concerning the concrete measures undertaken with respect to the establishment of criteria for the independent representation of workers in the country, in conformity with freedom of association principles; and
 - (b) on the procedure followed for the nomination of the Workers' delegate and advisers, in consultation with representative workers' organizations, specifying the organizations consulted and according to which criteria, their numerical importance, the date and place of these consultations, the names of the individuals nominated by the organizations during these consultations and the positions they hold within those organizations. Where more than one organization claims the same name, the report should also specify which organization was consulted and for which reasons.
6. The credentials of Djibouti for the current session of the Conference were submitted through the online accreditation system on 12 May 2024. The Government submitted on 26 May 2024 a brief report to the secretariat of the Committee.
7. In the report, the Government reiterated information provided previously regarding the establishment of criteria for the independent representation of workers in the country. The Government recalled that it had received, following its request for technical assistance, technical comments from the ILO concerning a draft decree on this topic. The Government reiterated that it would keep the Office informed in the near future on developments concerning this draft text. Pending the establishment of criteria, a system of rotation has been implemented since 2017 to nominate the representatives of the workers' organizations to the different functions in the delegation.

8. With respect to the nomination of Workers' delegates and advisers at the present session of the Conference, the Government reiterated the information provided previously regarding the existence of three main representative organizations: the Union Djiboutienne du Travail (UDT), the Union Générale des Travailleurs Djiboutiens (UGTD) and the Confédération Nationale des Employeurs de Djibouti (CNED). The Government stated that the two Workers' organizations – the UDT and the UGTD – as well as the Employers' organization had been invited to designate their representatives within the delegation by letters dated 6 May 2024. In separate communications dated 7 May 2024, the UGTD designated its Secretary-General, Mr Said Yonis Waberi as titular delegate and the Secretary-General of the Syndicat de travailleurs de Djibouti Télécom, Mr Abdo Bileh Guelleh, as advisor, while the UDT designated its President, Mr Mohammed Youssouf Mohamed to participate in the delegation and Mr Ali Mohammed Kamil as substitute delegate.
9. The Committee notes that the Government's report is largely similar to the report submitted in the previous years and that, yet again, it does not provide satisfactory replies to the questions raised by the Conference. In particular, since 2014 the Government has referred to a draft decree in relation to the establishment of criteria for the independent representation of workers in the country and repeatedly promised to keep the Office informed. In particular, the Government had stated last year that the draft decree would be submitted to tripartite consultation in September 2023, while no update was given this year.
10. In addition, the Committee must express once again its concern regarding some contradictory information provided in the report. As last year, the Government has accredited as the Workers' titular delegate the Secretary-General of UGTD, and as an adviser the President of the UDT, whereas, in their nomination letters, the two organizations seemed to expect the opposite. In particular, the Committee notes with perplexity the continued reference by the Government to a rotation system which had been put in place since 2017, while the representative of the UGTD has been continuously designated by the Government as workers' titular delegate since the 108th Session of the Conference.
11. The Committee notes, in addition, that the situation having given rise to the monitoring is also the subject of review by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations in relation to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards Convention, 1976 (No. 144), but that the Government has not submitted its reports or responded to comments submitted by workers' organizations (ILC.112/III(A)).
12. The Committee regrets that since the last session of the Conference, no steps have been taken to address the long-standing matters pending before the Committee and that, in general, there is a lack of cooperation from the government in relation to the examination, under established procedures of the Organization, of the question of the establishment of objective criteria for the representativeness of workers' organizations and the free choice of their representatives at the Conference.
13. The Committee is concerned by the stalemate reached by the situation. It deeply regrets that the Government has in essence ignored the Committee's report noted by the Conference at its 111th Session. Noting also that the Government has not fulfilled its obligations in relation to the submission of reports and information on the application of ratified Conventions, the Committee is concerned that it is not in a position to take an informed view on the pending matters by reason of the lack of any meaningful information from the Government.

14. The Committee strongly urges the Government to implement without delay the measures that it has called for, in order to put an end to a situation that started in 1997, thus lasting more than half of the duration of Djibouti's membership to the Organization.
15. Therefore, notwithstanding the fact that the Committee received no objection this year concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Djibouti, the Committee considers that the situation justifies the renewal of its monitoring under terms similar to those decided by the Conference at its last session. Consequently, by virtue of articles 32(7) and 34 of the Conference Standing Orders, the Committee unanimously proposes that the Conference request the Government of Djibouti to submit for the next session of the Conference, at the same time that it submits its credentials for the delegation of Djibouti, a detailed report, substantiated with relevant information:
 - (a) concerning the concrete measures undertaken with respect to the establishment of criteria for the independent representation of workers in the country, in conformity with freedom of association principles; and
 - (b) on the procedure followed for the nomination of the Workers' delegate and advisers, in consultation with representative workers' organizations, specifying the organizations consulted and according to which criteria, their numerical importance, the date and place of these consultations, the names of the individuals nominated by the organizations during these consultations and the positions they hold within those organizations. Where more than one organization claim the same name, the report should also specify which organization was consulted and for which reasons.

Mauritania

16. At its 111th Session (2023), the International Labour Conference decided, by virtue of articles 32(7) and 34 of the Conference Standing Orders and upon the unanimous recommendation of the Credentials Committee, to renew the monitoring of the situation raised in an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation (ILC.111/Record No. 2B\(Rev.\), paragraph 19), and consequently, it requested the Government to submit for the next session of the Conference, at the same time that it submitted its credentials for its delegation, a detailed report, substantiated with relevant information:
 - (a) the progress made in relation to the organization of elections with a view to determine the representativeness of the workers' organizations;
 - (b) the trade union situation in the country, including the name(s) of the representative workers' organizations, their coverage, their numerical membership, and other objective and verifiable criteria; and
 - (c) the procedure utilized to nominate the Workers' delegation, specifically, the organizations that have been consulted on the matter and according to which criteria; the date of the consultations, and the names and titles of the representatives consulted; information as to the measures taken by the Government to facilitate an agreement among the representative workers' organizations; and the names of the individuals nominated by the organizations during these consultations.
17. According to the credentials deposited through the online accreditation system on 15 May 2024, the Workers' delegate for this year's Conference was the Secretary-General of the Union des Travailleurs de Mauritanie, accompanied by one substitute delegate (the Secretary-General of the Confédération mauritanienne des Travailleurs) and four advisers (the Secretaries-General of the Confédération générale des Travailleurs de Mauritanie, of the Union générale du Travail et de la Santé en Mauritanie, of the Union de la Génération nouvelle des Travailleurs de Mauritanie and a member of the Executive Board of the Union nationale des Travailleurs sociaux).

18. In its report submitted on 27 May 2024 in response to the decision taken by the Conference at its last session, the Government recalled that it had already started the process for the determination of the representativeness of trade unions. In particular, a commission had been established within the Ministry of Public Service and Labour on 10 October 2023, whose role would be to supervise this process. Pending the completion of this process, the Ministry of Public Service and Labour had put in place a list of criteria to evaluate the representativeness of trade unions, such as the age of the organization, number of shop stewards, territorial coverage, number of affiliated unions, number of collective or individual labour disputes supported by the organization, which permitted the Ministry to designate workers' representatives in international forums and in certain public institutions.
19. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government. It once again deeply regrets that the process to determine the representativeness of the workers' organizations has still not been completed. It notes in this regard that the Government committed already more than ten years ago to organizing trade union elections (ILC.101/Record No. 4C, paragraph 69) and had provided to the Committee a detailed road map for the holding of elections by the end of 2022, approved at the ministerial level (ILC.110/Record No. 2B, paragraph 15). Under decree 156-2014 of 2014, trade union elections became a necessary requirement for trade unions to be able to claim representativeness, yet none were organized.
20. The Committee deeply regrets that the report submitted by the Government does not provide information as to whether consultations have taken place prior to the designation of the delegation to the Conference, while it had previously attempted such consultations. Furthermore, the Committee deeply regrets that only cursory information was provided by the Government with regard to the criteria applied for the purpose of the nomination of the Workers' delegation, a question on which the Committee had commented in previous years (ILC.110/Record No. 2B, paragraph 17; ILC.111/Record No. 2B(Rev.), paragraph 18), and that no information was provided on its concrete application to the nominations for this session.
21. The Committee welcomes the information provided by the Office according to which the Minister of Public Service and Labour, in a visit to Geneva in March 2024, had met with the Office to discuss the Government's road map to trade union elections to be held during the second half of 2024 and to request technical assistance from the Office. The Committee urges the Government to fully avail itself of any technical assistance that the Office may be able to provide in response to this request, so that the Government can follow through its commitment to organize elections as soon as possible with a view to determining the representativeness of trade unions. The Committee expects that this process will be completed in time to benefit the nomination of the Workers' delegation to the next session of the Conference.
22. Considering, on the one hand, the serious doubts that remain, as in previous years, as to the nominations made for this session of the Conference and, on the other hand, the commitments made by the Government, the Committee considers that the situation justifies the renewal of the monitoring under analogous terms to those decided by the Conference at its last three sessions. Consequently, by virtue of articles 32(7) and 34 of the Conference Standing Orders, the Committee unanimously proposes that the Conference request the Government of Mauritania to submit for the next session of the Conference, at the same time that it submits its credentials for its delegation, a detailed report, substantiated with relevant information:
 - (a) the progress made in relation to the organization of elections with a view to determine the representativeness of the workers' organizations;

- (b) the trade union situation in the country, including the name(s) of the representative workers' organizations, their coverage, their numerical membership, and other objective and verifiable criteria; and
- (c) the procedure utilized to nominate the Workers' delegation, specifically, the organizations that have been consulted on the matter and according to which criteria; the date of the consultations, and the names and titles of the representatives consulted; information as to the measures taken by the Government to facilitate an agreement among the representative workers' organizations; and the names of the individuals nominated by the organizations during these consultations.

Nicaragua

23. At its 111th Session (2023), the International Labour Conference decided, by virtue of article 32 (7) of the Conference Standing Orders, and upon the unanimous recommendation of the Credentials Committee, to monitor the nomination of the Employers' delegation of Nicaragua (ILC.111/Record No. 2B(Rev.), paragraph 103). Consequently, it requested the Government to submit for the next session of the Conference, at the same time that it submits the credentials for the delegation of Nicaragua, a detailed report substantiated with relevant documentation on:
 - (a) the representative employers' organizations operating in Nicaragua, specifying their membership and comparative importance, including with respect to any de facto organizations, and
 - (b) the procedure followed for the nomination of the Employers' delegate and advisers, in consultation with representative employers' organizations, specifying the organizations consulted and according to which criteria.
24. The credentials of Nicaragua for the current session of the Conference were submitted through the online accreditation system on 14 May 2024. Following two reminders from the Office, the Government submitted a brief report to the secretariat of the Committee on 4 June 2024. In its report, the Government stated that the country's delegation to the present session of the Conference was nominated on 26 April 2024, in a tripartite manner by a unanimous decision of the representatives from workers' and employers' organizations, and the Government. In response to the Committee's request for documentation on the representativeness of employers' organizations, the Government stated that the delegation sufficiently represented the country's employers and provided documents to support its claims, including the records of the 26 April 2024 meeting, an invitation letter to that meeting addressed to the Asociación de Promoción al Desarrollo y Sostenibilidad de Nicaragua (APRODESNI), as well as documents attesting to the juridical personality of the Cámara Nacional de la Pequeña Industria (CONAPI) and APRODESNI.
25. The Committee regrets that the report requested by the Conference was submitted only after two reminders from the Office and 21 days after the Government had submitted its credentials. It further regrets that the Government's report does not satisfactorily address several questions raised by the Conference. While the Government has provided information concerning the organization of a meeting for the nomination of the country's delegation to the Conference, it has entirely failed to indicate the criteria of representativeness on the basis of which the participating organizations were invited. Furthermore, the Government has not provided the information requested by the Committee on the representative employers' organizations operating in Nicaragua, including their membership figures and comparative importance, including with respect to any de facto organizations. The Committee observes with serious concern that, despite its conclusions on objections lodged at previous sessions of the Conference, an objection has once again been lodged against the Government of Nicaragua concerning the nomination of the Employers' delegation. Taking into account its conclusions on the examination of that objection (see paragraphs 88 to 92 below), the Committee considers that the situation justifies the renewal of the monitoring of the situation under terms similar to those decided by the Conference at its last session. Consequently, by virtue of article 32(7) of the Conference Standing Orders, the Committee unanimously proposes that the Conference request the Government of Nicaragua to submit for the next session of the Conference, at same time as it submits the credentials for the delegation of Nicaragua, a detailed report substantiated with relevant documentation on:

- (a) the representative employers' organizations operating in Nicaragua, specifying their membership and comparative importance, including with respect to any de facto organizations, and*
- (b) the procedure followed for the nomination of the Employers' delegate and advisers, in consultation with representative employers' organizations, specifying the organizations consulted and according to which criteria.*

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

- 26. At its 111th Session (2023), the International Labour Conference decided, by virtue of articles 32(7) and 34 of the Conference Standing Orders and upon the unanimous recommendation of the Credentials Committee, to renew the monitoring of the situation raised in an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation (ILC.111/Record No. 2B(Rev.), paragraph 29), and consequently, it requested the Government to submit for the next session of the Conference, at the same time that it submitted its credentials for its delegation, a detailed report, substantiated with relevant information on:
 - (a) steps taken by the Government to obtain objective evidence regarding the representativeness of all workers' organizations in the country; and
 - (b) the procedure followed to attempt to reach an agreement among the most representative workers' organizations and, if such an agreement was not reached, the objective and verifiable criteria established for the nomination of the Workers' delegation.
- 27. In its report, which was submitted on 14 May 2024, the Government indicated that, based on the affiliation data available from the National Trade Union Registry (NTUR), the Central Bolivariana Socialista de Trabajadores y Trabajadoras de la Ciudad, el Campo y la Pesca (CBST-CCP) remained the most representative organization in terms of the number of affiliate organizations and workers, according to the figures updated by the organization in April 2024. This year again, the Government had urged the trade union organizations to register and update their data in NTUR within the first three months of the year, as required by article 388 of the Organic Labour Law, and had granted an additional period of 60 days for doing so. As regards the determination of representativeness, the Government had also considered the fact that the CBST-CCP had engaged most frequently in collective bargaining and signed the largest number of collective agreements.
- 28. The Government detailed the actions it had taken for the purposes of designating the Workers' delegation to the present session of the Conference, which had included a written call for all workers' organizations (ASI, CBST-CCP, CGT, CODESA, CTV and UNETE) to come up with a proposal and a dedicated meeting where the organizations participating in the Social Dialogue Forum (ASI, CBST-CCP, CGT and CTV) were invited with a view to reaching consensus on the composition of the delegation. However, subsequently, separate proposals were received from ASI, CBST-CCP and CGT. The Government accredited the Workers' delegation based on the proposal received from the CBST-CCP, considering that it included the largest number of representatives of the different trade union organizations.

29. The Government further recalled that it had continuously and repeatedly requested the Office's technical assistance with the determination of representativeness of employers' and workers' organizations.
30. The Committee notes that, this year again, the Government accredited the Workers' delegation to the present session of the Conference on the basis of a proposal received from the CBST-CCP. While in addition to the Workers' delegate, substitute delegate and advisers from the CBST-CCP, the Workers' delegation also includes representatives from the three other workers' organizations participating in the Social Dialogue Forum (ASI, CGT and CTV), their inclusion does not appear to result from an agreement amongst the organizations concerned. The Committee also notes that two workers' organizations that did not subscribe to the terms of the Plan of Action adopted by the Social Dialogue Forum (CODESA and UNETE) and have been excluded from the subsequent meetings of the Forum, have again, this year, filed an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, calling into question the independence of the CBST-CCP (see paragraphs 112 to 116 below).
31. The Committee recalls, once again, that where several representative organizations exist, Governments must take them all into consideration when proceeding to the nomination of a delegation and, ideally, obtain the agreement of all the most representative among them. However, while both the Government and the organizations concerned should strive to achieve such an agreement, and while a plurality of organizations may better represent the views of employers and workers in a country, such a plurality cannot be unilaterally imposed by the Government. Failing an agreement amongst most representative organizations, the Government must assess, based on objective and verifiable criteria, which organization is the most representative.
32. As regards the determination of representativeness on the basis of registration data available in the NTUR, the Committee recalls that the Commission of Inquiry appointed under article 26 of the ILO Constitution to examine the observance by the Government of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela of the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26), the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), recommended, in consultation with the representative organizations, "the adoption of the necessary measures to ensure in law and practice that registration is a mere administrative formality and that in no event can it imply previous authorization" as well as "in general, the elimination in law and practice of any provisions or institutions that are incompatible with freedom of association, including the requirement to provide detailed information on members, taking into account the conclusions of the Commission and the comments of the ILO supervisory bodies" (see Report of the Commission of Inquiry, paragraph 497(2)(i) and (v)). In this respect, the Committee notes that during the fourth session of the Social Dialogue Forum held in Caracas from 1 to 2 February 2024, the participating workers' organizations indicated that there were still "serious problems with the functioning of the National Register of Trade Union Organizations" (GB.350/INS/12\(Rev.1\), paragraph 6(c)). The Committee further notes that the "Follow-up to and updating of the plan of action resulting from the Social Dialogue Forum in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela" adopted by the participants in the fourth session of the Forum contains a commitment to "identify, by means of regular meetings, institutional formulas or processes to strengthen the functioning of the National Register of Trade Union Organizations and continue to address particular cases submitted by workers' organizations" (GB.350/INS/12\(Rev.1\)). Concerning the Government's request for the ILO's technical assistance with the determination of representativeness, the Committee recalls the relevant recommendation made by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations in its report submitted to the last session of the Conference according to which “ILO technical assistance should be defined on a tripartite basis in the context of institutionalized dialogue” (ILC.111/Report III (Part A), p. 328).

- 33. In light of the foregoing, the Committee considers that it is necessary to renew the monitoring measures. Consequently, it unanimously recommends to the Conference that it request the Government of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, by virtue of articles 32(7) and 34 of the Conference Standing Orders, to submit for the next session of the Conference, at the same time that it submits its credentials for its delegation, a detailed report substantiated with relevant documentation on:
- (a) steps taken by the Government to obtain objective evidence regarding the representativeness of all workers’ organizations in the country; and*
 - (b) the procedure followed to attempt to reach an agreement among the most representative workers’ organizations and, if such an agreement was not reached, the objective and verifiable criteria established for the nomination of the Workers’ delegation.*

Objections

- 34. The Committee has received and dealt with 17 objections. These relate both to the credentials of delegates and their advisers who were accredited to the Conference, as reflected in the provisional list of delegations published on 3 June 2024 and in the revised provisional list of delegations of 7 June 2024, as well as to incomplete delegations. The Committee has completed the examination of all objections, which are listed below.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers’ delegation of Belarus

- 35. The Committee had before it an objection challenging the credentials of the Workers’ delegation of Belarus submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), alleging that the Government had not nominated the Workers’ delegation in conformity with article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution. The objecting organization submitted that both the Workers’ delegate and the substitute delegate, as well as two out of the nine Workers’ advisers, were from the Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus (FPB), an organization that did not genuinely represent the workers of Belarus as it was neither independent nor democratic. It considered that the FPB had been captured by the Presidential administration, as appeared from the fact that a number of its successive leaders had had a government career. The lack of independence of the FPB from the Government had been raised by the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Belarus during the High-level roundtable to discuss freedom of association in Belarus held in the ILO on 28 May 2024. The Director-General’s report on the latest development regarding the situation of freedom of association in Belarus submitted to the Committee on the Application of Standards at the current session of the Conference specifically quoted the observations made during the High-level roundtable by the Special Rapporteur regarding the severe workers’ rights violations in the country since August 2020 and the liquidation of independent trade unions, namely the Belarusian Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (BKDP) and the persecution of its leaders, since 2022 (CAN/D/Special sitting Belarus-C.87-C.98, p. 4).
- 36. The ITUC recalled that, until April 2022, the state tripartite structure involved the BKDP, the only independent trade union confederation in the country, with 10,000 members in four affiliated unions. However, since the recent onslaught by the Government to destroy the independent trade unions, BKDP was no longer part of the national tripartite bodies set up following recommendations made by the 2004 Commission of Inquiry. In 2022, the Supreme Court had issued rulings to discontinue the activities of the BKDP and four other major trade unions, and several BKDP leaders and activists had been detained and sentenced to prison.

37. The ITUC recalled the resolution adopted by the Conference at its 111th Session, concerning the measures recommended by the Governing Body under article 33 of the ILO Constitution on the subject of Belarus (ILC.111/Resolution I) and the Committee's conclusions on the objection filed by the ITUC concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Belarus at the last session of the Conference (ILC.111/Record No. 2B\(Rev.\)). The Committee had not recommended the invalidation of the credentials of the Worker's delegation, in the hope that the Government would promptly and in good faith comply with the requests and recommendations of the ILO's supervisory bodies and would thereby ensure the nomination of the Workers' delegation to the current session of the Conference in agreement with the most representative, genuine and independent workers' organizations. According to the ITUC, the Government had thus far ignored these calls, leading the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations (CEACR) in its report submitted to this session of the Conference to consider that "the failure of the Government to acknowledge, address and redress very serious allegations of violation of civil liberties or to act on the repeated specific requests of the ILO supervisory bodies, including those made by [the CEACR], reinforces the reality of wilful Government non-compliance with its obligations stemming from its membership in the Organization" (ILC.112/Report III \(Part A\), p. 142).
38. The objecting organization further recalled that the CEACR and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (CAN) had repeatedly denounced the express support and display of favouritism shown by the State authorities, and in particular the President, towards the FPB. It also noted that, in her latest report, the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Belarus, acknowledging the lack of independence of the FPB, had recommended suspending its participation in the International Labour Conference (A/HRC/56/65, paragraph 131). The ITUC requested the Committee to reject the credentials of Workers' delegation of Belarus for its lack of representativeness and genuineness.
39. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government indicated that the objection was completely unfounded and based on unconfirmed and unsubstantiated claims which in no way reflected the actual situation. It indicated that the FPB was the only association of trade unions operating in the whole territory of the country, with a membership of around four million people from 15 national sectoral trade unions. It indicated that, in addition to the FPB, several other trade unions were registered in the country. However, the FPB was the only most representative workers' organization within the meaning of article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution. Consequently, the Government requested the FPB to designate its representatives to the Workers' delegation to the present session of the Conference, which it did, independently and freely, without any Government interference. The Government nominated the Workers' delegation based on the information received from the FPB.
40. As regards the question of the representative nature of the FPB, the Government explained that, in accordance with the Law on Trade Unions, the FPB carried out its activities independently, in accordance with its Charter. Its current President was elected at the Ninth Extraordinary FPB Congress on 5 April 2024. The FPB's activities, which included active participation in social dialogue, collective bargaining processes and the protection of workers' rights, are not financed or controlled by the Government. The Government emphasized the role of the FPB and its member organizations' in achieving a high number of collective agreements providing additional social and labour guarantees for workers with respect to the legislation. As a Co-Chairperson of the National Council on Labour and Social Issues (NCLSI), the Chairman of the FPB indeed signed the General Agreement on behalf of the workers. In view of the above, the Government insisted that there were no grounds to cast doubt on the representative nature of the FPB. The Government considered that the objection was unfounded and politically motivated and proposed that it be set aside.

41. The Committee deeply regrets that the Government merely reiterates the information provided in response to the objection presented to the Committee last year, affirming the representativeness of the FPB, without addressing the allegations concerning the destruction of independent trade unions, and namely the BKDP. In this regard, the Committee notes that the CEACR, in its report to this session of the Conference, noted “with deep concern the absence of any measures taken to review the situation of the dissolved trade unions so as to ensure that they may again function and fully participate in national tripartite bodies” and deplored “the total lack of progress in implementing the recommendations of the 2004 Commission of Inquiry and in addressing the outstanding recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies, as well as the continuing deterioration of freedom of association in the country” (ILC.112/Report III (Part A), pp. 143–144).
42. The Committee observes that the issues raised by the objection relate to extremely serious violations of the principles of freedom of association whose examination fall outside of its mandate. However, as it found last year (ILC.111/Record No. 2B(Rev.), paragraph 46), there is nothing to impede the Committee from taking into account findings of competent ILO supervisory bodies on questions of freedom of association in examining allegations of non-respect of article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution. In this regard, the Committee wishes to reaffirm its conviction that the requirement of consultation and agreement with the most representative workers’ organizations under article 3(5) of the Constitution can only be satisfied if the organizations consulted were genuine organizations of workers, free and independent from the Government.
43. While the FPB undoubtedly has the largest membership, the Committee remains of the view that the FPB has not shown that it is a genuine organization of workers, free and independent from the Government. As the CEACR noted in its most recent report to the Conference, the FPB “enjoyed the publicly expressed support from State authorities at the highest level” and its “independence from the authorities was questionable” (ILC.112/Report III (Part A), p. 143). The Committee further notes the statement by the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Belarus regarding the lack of independence of the FPB.
44. These considerations, combined with the deplorable absence of any measures taken by the Government to review the situation of the dissolved trade unions, reinforce the Committee’s serious doubts that the nomination of the Workers’ delegation to the Conference has been made in accordance with article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution. Noting the long-standing conclusions of the ILO’s supervisory bodies, and in particular, the measures under article 33 of the ILO Constitution adopted at the last session of the Conference, the Committee urges the Government to cooperate with the ILO and its supervisory bodies in securing compliance with the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry of 2004, and thereby ensure that the Workers’ delegation to the next session of the Conference is nominated in agreement with the most representative, genuine and independent workers’ organizations. In the absence of progress, the Committee will consider proposing the invalidation of the credentials of the Workers’ delegation to the Conference.
45. Considering the grave allegations repeated in this year’s objection concerning the nomination of the Workers’ delegation of Belarus, the Committee considers that the nomination of the Workers’ delegation of Belarus should be monitored. By virtue of article 32(7) of the Conference Standing Orders, the Committee unanimously proposes that the Conference request that the Government of Belarus submit for the next session of the Conference, at the same time that it submits the credentials for the delegation of Belarus, a detailed report substantiated with relevant documentation:

- (a) on the procedure followed for the nomination of the Workers' delegate and advisers, in consultation with most representative workers' organizations, specifying the organizations consulted and according to which criteria; and*
- (b) on the concrete measures undertaken, in line with the recommendations of ILO supervisory bodies, to ensure that organizations consulted on the nomination of the Workers' delegate and advisers are genuine organizations of workers, free and independent from the Government.*

Late objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Cabo Verde

- 46. The Committee received an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Cabo Verde presented by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on behalf of União Nacional dos Trabalhadores de Cabo Verde – Central Sindical (UNTC-CS).
- 47. The objection, dated 17 May 2024, was received by the Credentials Committee on 10 June 2024, at 8.39 a.m., well after the expiry of the time limit established by article 32, paragraph 1(a) of the Standing Orders of the Conference (i.e., Wednesday, 5 June, at 10 a.m. for this session of the Conference). The Committee considers that the objection is time-barred and thus not receivable.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Colombia

- 48. The Credentials Committee received an objection presented by Ms Miryam Luz Triana Alvis, President of the Confederación General del Trabajo (CGT), concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate. The author of the objection alleged that the Ministry of Labour had unduly interfered in internal matters of the CGT, including by nominating Mr Percy Oyola Palomá as Workers' delegate for a second consecutive year. Following the removal of Mr Oyola Palomá as CGT President on 15 April 2023, the Ministry of Labour delayed issuing Ms Triana Alvis her certificate of legal representation and, once registered, overrode it through the subsequent issuance of one in favour of Mr Oyola Palomá, as CGT President. In July 2023, the CGT's highest organ (Congreso Confederado) met and reaffirmed Ms Triana Alvis' position as President, which was nevertheless not recognized by the Ministry. Her exclusion from the Workers' delegation amounted to bias, violating the right to union representation pursuant to the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135) and article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution, and she requested that the Committee take action.
- 49. On 4 June 2024, the Committee received an unsolicited communication signed by the Central Unitaria de Trabajadores (CUT), Confederación de Trabajadores de Colombia (CTC) and Mr Oyola Palomá for the CGT, as well as the Confederación de Pensionados de Colombia (CPC) and the Confederación Democrática de Pensionados de Colombia (CDP). The CUT, CTC and the CGT submitted that they were the most representative workers' organizations in the country and combined with the CPC and the CDP formed the Comando Nacional Unitario, representing the most important trade and social union movement. They expressed their surprise regarding Ms Triana Alvis' pretensions to be accredited as the Workers' delegate, explaining that the representation of the Colombian workers to the Conference was an annual joint decision made by the trade union confederations before the tripartite subcommittee on international relations. This year the mandate fell on the CGT in the person of its President, Mr Oyola Palomá. They requested that the Committee not respond positively to the claim.
- 50. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government submitted detailed information on the method and mechanism for determining the most representative organizations, which were the CUT, CGT and CTC. Regarding consultations, it limited itself to receiving the names transmitted by the most representative workers organizations that were communicated to it during a meeting held on 7 May 2024, for the purpose of designating the members of the delegation to this year's Conference. The Government was informed by the CUT that the Workers' delegate would be Mr Oyola Palomá, who was recognized as the CGT's legitimate representative by the Comando Nacional Unitario. The Government acknowledged having received two communications from the CGT but decided in favour of Mr Oyola Palomá, based on his registration status and his recognition as legitimate representative by the Comando Nacional Unitario. It stressed that it did not interfere with any decision made by the workers.

51. The Committee notes that the representativeness of the CGT is not called into question, but rather the individuals representing it. It notes that the Government designated the Workers' delegate, Mr Oyola Palomá, on the basis of the nomination received from the CUT, CTC and others who form the Comando Nacional Unitario. Insofar as the objection before it arises from a conflict within the CGT, the Committee recalls its consistent line of jurisprudence that where a matter centres on an internal conflict within an organization, it lacks jurisdiction to examine the dispute. In these circumstances, the Committee is unable to reach further conclusions on the matter. It expresses its hope that the parties will endeavour to resolve their differences before the next session of the Conference.

Objection concerning the failure to deposit credentials of an Employers' delegate by the Government of El Salvador

52. The Credentials Committee received an objection presented by the Employers' Group concerning the failure to deposit credentials of an Employers' delegate by the Government of El Salvador. The Employers' Group submitted that the Government had failed to fulfil its constitutional obligations by excluding the country's legitimate employers' representatives from the Conference. This exclusion took place in a country where non-compliance with ILO Conventions Nos 87 and 144 was ongoing and, in this regard, it referred to a 10 November 2022 communication from the International Organization of Employers (IOE) to the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. It stressed that article 3 (5) of the ILO Constitution required that employer and worker delegates be appointed "in agreement with the most representative professional organizations of employers or workers." The Committee was requested to take all necessary measures, so that future delegations to the Conference were fully tripartite and nominated in consultation with the legitimate and most representative employers' organization in the country, namely the Asociación Nacional de la Empresa Privada (ANEP).
53. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government referred to consultations held in relation to the 111th (2023) Session of the Conference and explained that insofar as designations for employers' and workers' representatives were solicited, only the workers had responded last year. In the absence of a reply, the Government proceeded to nominate employers who had participated in previous consultations. However, it had been accused of interference. For the present session of the Conference, to avoid similar accusations, the Government limited itself to requesting nominations from the employers' and workers' organizations. While it had received designations for the workers' representatives, it had not received one for the employers' representatives. Instead, the IOE had written the ILO Director-General bypassing the appropriate governmental authorities responsible for the accreditation. The Government added that it had been engaged with the ILO through the supervisory mechanisms in the past year, but as relayed in its reports, politicization was ongoing in the unprecedented electoral situation, including by the ANEP. This, along with other reasons, had not permitted it to embark on consultations this year for the purposes of nominating delegates to the Conference, although it remained receptive to expressions of interest from the sectors. The Government regretted the situation and reiterated its commitment to respond to the situation that gave rise to the objection, including through social dialogue. It requested cooperation from the interested parties and that it not be bypassed in the future.

54. The Committee recalls the obligation that all governments have, under article 3(1) and (5) of the ILO Constitution, to nominate a fully tripartite delegation and to ensure that non-governmental delegates and advisers are chosen in agreement with the most representative employers' or workers' organizations, as the case may be, in their respective countries. The Committee notes that, according to the Employers' group, ANEP is the most representative Employers' organization of El Salvador and that this is not questioned by the Government. The Committee further notes that the Government this year did not undertake consultations, but rather simply solicited designations from both the employers and workers. However, the Committee observes that the Government did not submit any documents to support that these designations were in fact solicited nor to whom they were directed.
55. Taken together with the Government's acknowledgment that it did not undertake consultations this year with respect to designating the Employers' delegation to the Conference and that this was already the subject of an objection last year that centred on the failure of effective consultations (ILC.111/Record No. 2B (Rev.)), the Committee expresses its deep concern that the Government appears to ignore its obligations under article 3(1) and (5) of the ILO Constitution to nominate a fully tripartite delegation and to ensure that non-governmental delegates and advisers are chosen in agreement with the most representative employers' or workers' organizations. Moreover, this year, the Committee notes that in sending a delegation that is not fully tripartite, the Government deprives not only the employers of the country of their right of being represented in the highest policymaking body of the ILO and to participate in its work, but also the workers of the right to vote, by virtue of article 4(2) of the ILO Constitution. Without the participation of Government, Employers' and Workers' representatives, the Conference cannot function properly or attain its objectives.
56. Taking into account the Government's commitment to respond to the situation that gave rise to the objection, including through social dialogue, the Committee urges the Government to accredit a fully tripartite delegation to the Conference next year in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations of the country.

Objections concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Guinea-Bissau

57. The Committee received an objection from the União Nacional dos Trabalhadores da Guiné-Central Sindical (UNTG-CS), signed by Mr Júlio António Mendonça, Secretary-General, supported by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), regarding the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Guinea-Bissau. According to the UNTG-CS, which claims to be Guinea-Bissau's largest workers' organization, the persons appointed by the Government as workers' representatives for the 112th Session of the Conference did not belong to the UNTG-CS and were nominated without the organization's knowledge, which violated the principles of freedom of association. It requested that these individuals be not accredited. The ITUC added that the nominated representatives did not meet the criteria of genuineness and representativeness, as they were not freely chosen by workers and were not independent from the Government. The ITUC recalled that the currently nominated representatives forcibly occupied the UNTG-CS offices despite a court order validating the legitimate leaders' election. Therefore, the ITUC requested that the Committee reject the credentials of the Workers' delegation.

58. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government rejected the allegations as a misrepresentation of the union situation in the country. It noted the existence of two large workers' organizations, Confederação Geral dos Sindicatos Independentes da Guiné-Bissau (CGSI-GB) and UNTG-CS, and challenged the claim that UNTG-CS was the most representative in the absence of any reliable documentation in this regard. The Government indicated that the current Secretary-General of CGSI-GB was nominated for the Workers' delegation following an invitation by the Government, and that the representative of UNTG-CS, Mr Laureano Pereira had been invited as a consequence of the UNTG-CS congress that had been held in accordance with legal procedures. The Government questioned the legitimacy of Mr Mendonça as Secretary-General of the UNTG-CS as he had never presented himself to the Government as a representative of the workers. In fact, as an independent professional, he was more an employer than a representative of workers. Noting that both unions frequently participated in tripartite social dialogue and regretting the inaccurate information provided by the objecting organizations, the Government requested ILO support for a survey on union representation and organization with a view to resolving the issue concerning UNTG-CS. It affirmed that all accredited representatives were genuine workers and reiterated its commitment to ILO principles and to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).
59. The Committee observes that this is the third consecutive time it has before it an objection concerning the Workers' delegation of Guinea-Bissau. The Committee takes note of the Government's response but is concerned about the incomplete nature of the information provided. It notes, in particular, that the Government did not address the repeated grave allegation that the UNTG-CS offices were forcibly taken over by the persons accredited at this session as Workers' substitute delegate and adviser, with the help of the Government and despite a court order validating the election of the leadership under Mr Mendonça.
60. The Committee reiterates that while it lacks jurisdiction to examine the dispute concerning the UNTG-CS leadership, it can and must consider the allegations of Government interference in the affairs of that organization to the extent that they may have had a bearing on the nomination of the Workers' delegation to the Conference. For there can be no valid designation of delegates and advisers under article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution that is the result of Government interference. In view of the allegations contained in the objection and the Government's insufficient response to them, the Committee has serious doubts as to whether the nomination of the Workers' delegation was made in full independence from the Government.
61. With regard to the allegations of violations of freedom of association that go beyond the question concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation to the Conference, the Committee reiterates that it has no jurisdiction to investigate such allegations for which only the Committee on Freedom of Association is competent. In this regard, the Committee observed in previous years that the objecting organizations could submit a complaint to that Committee. It notes that the UNTG-CS has now done so (Case No. 3448). In view of this development, the Committee will refrain from recommending further action to the Conference on the objection this year.
62. The Committee notes that the Government requests ILO technical assistance on questions relating to the operation and representativeness of workers' organizations. It transmits this request to the Office trusting that it will give it due consideration as circumstances permit, while reiterating that Government interference cannot result in valid designation of delegates.

Late objections concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of India

63. The Committee received two objections concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of India. The first objection was presented by Hind Mazdoor Sabha and the second by the Joint Forum of the Ten Central Trade Unions in India (AICCTU, AITUC, AIUTUC, CITU, HMS, LPF, SEWA, TUCC, UTUC and INTUC).
64. The objections were received by the Credentials Committee on 6 June 2024 and 8 June 2024, respectively. They were received well after the expiry of the time limit established by article 32, paragraph 1(a) of the Standing Orders of the Conference (i.e., Wednesday, 5 June, at 10 a.m. for this session of the Conference). The Committee considers that the objections are time-barred and thus not receivable.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Employers' delegate of Kyrgyzstan

65. The Credentials Committee received an objection presented by the Employers' Group of the Conference concerning the nomination of the Employers' delegate of Kyrgyzstan. It stated that the Government had appointed the Employers' delegate without consulting or agreeing with the country's most representative employers' organization, thereby violating article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution. It considered that the Chamber of Commerce and Industry, to which the Employers' delegate belonged, could not be considered an independent and most representative employers' organization. The author of the objection regretted that the most representative employers' organization had been denied the right to nominate representatives to the Conference.
66. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government explained that there existed four most representative employers' organizations in the country, and detailed their membership as follows: the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of the Kyrgyz Republic (1,648 member enterprises), the Business Association JIA (more than 1,400 representatives of small, medium and large businesses, including outside the country), the Association of International Road Carriers of the Kyrgyz Republic (more than 1,200 business entities) and the International Business Council (120 member enterprises), the first three of these organizations being party to a tripartite national agreement. The Government further explained that the Chamber of Commerce and Industry was, according to the law establishing it, a non-governmental organization that represented the interests of entrepreneurs and businesses in the country.
67. As to the designation process of the Employers' delegation, the Government indicated that consultations had taken place, due to lack of time, by telephone with the Chamber of Commerce and Industry and with the Business Association JIA. The Government, justifying the designation of an Employers' delegate from the Chamber of Commerce and Industry, referred to limited available funding and to its wish to grant the opportunity for this entity to be represented at the Conference, in order to ultimately raise its status as a social partner on equal footing with other employers' associations.
68. The Committee notes that according to the information provided by the Government, there are at least three most representative employers' organizations in the country. The Employers' delegate derives from one of them, the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of the Kyrgyz Republic, a non-governmental organization, which according to the membership figures provided has the highest number of member enterprises. In the absence of concrete information from the objecting group, the Committee is not in a position to question the independence or the representativeness of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

69. Regarding the process of designation of the Employers' delegate, the Committee regrets that, while the Government explained having undertaken some form of consultation by telephone with the two most numerous organizations, no information is provided as to the outcome of the consultations, in particular if agreement was reached with both of them. Doubts arise in this regard in view of the reason given by the Government for appointing the delegate from the Chamber of Commerce and Industry. The Government's desire to give an organization international exposure through participation in the Conference cannot replace the agreement with the most representative employers' organizations required under article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution. In this regard, the Committee recalls that the aim of consultations, that must take place with all the most representative organizations of the country, is to effect an agreement between them which, in the circumstances, may be regarded as the best for the purpose of ensuring the representation of the employers of the country.
70. The Committee regrets that the Government did not undertake meaningful and timely consultations for the purpose of nominating the Employers' delegation as required under article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution. The Committee therefore has serious doubts whether the Employers' delegate of Kyrgyzstan to this session of the Conference has genuinely been nominated in agreement with the most representative organizations, and thus in full compliance with article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution. It hopes that at future sessions the delegate will be designated as a result of adequate consultations with the most representative employers' organizations of the country and in agreement with them. The Committee will therefore, with this expectation, refrain from recommending further action on the objection this year.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Liberia

71. The Committee received an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate presented by Mr John Nyemah Natt, acting Secretary-General of the Liberia Labour Congress (LLC). The author of the objection submitted that there was an ongoing leadership crisis within the LLC due to the former Government's interference, who refused freedom of association and right to collective bargaining to civil servants. While the new Minister of Labour had asked his Deputy Minister to facilitate discussion between the LLC faction leaders, he subsequently ignored the Deputy Minister's proposal to accredit both leaders to the present session of the Conference in the hope of bringing appeasement. The Minister accredited the leadership headed by Mr Marcus Blamah as the Workers' delegate, which the objection called "anti-union" leadership. The author of the objection requested the Committee to reject the credentials of the Workers' delegate because of his lack of legitimate representativeness of the workers of Liberia.
72. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government indicated that there was a dispute amongst the leadership of the LLC. As a result of a Supreme Court ruling, the parties were ordered to conduct new elections under the supervision of the Ministry of Labour. Nineteen of the existing 26 workers' organizations in the country participated in the elections, which were held on 26 October 2022, while seven declined to participate. The Government provided the list of the elected officers of the LLC, including the Workers' delegate to this session of the Conference. The Government indicated that the LLC had nominated Mr Blamah, the Secretary-General of the LLC, as the Workers' delegate. The Government stressed that it was bound by the judicial orders of the Supreme Court of Liberia. It requested the Committee to dismiss the objection. The Government provided a copy of the Civil Court ruling dated 27 March 2020 invalidating the LLC elections because of the participation of the Civil Servant Union, which the Court considered ineligible under the 2015 Decent Work act to participate in the elections. It also provided a copy of the Civil Court's final ruling dated 12 October 2023, confirming the dismissal of the application of the umbrella association of civil servants to become a member of the LLC, a matter that had previously been heard by the Supreme Court of Liberia.

73. In an oral statement delivered to the Committee at his own request, the Minister of Labour reiterated the information provided in the written communication, asking the Committee to recognize Mr Blamah as the democratically elected leader of the LLC. He added that the Government had engaged in mediation efforts between parties to the LLC leadership dispute and was hoping to make some progress in this regard. The Minister also referred to his address to the Conference plenary, indicating that the Government was seeking the ILO's technical assistance in undertaking the alignment of the Civil Service Standing Orders and the 2015 Decent Work Act.
74. The Committee notes that, for the third consecutive year, it has been seized of an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate. While the representativeness of the LLC itself is not called into question, the legitimacy of the Workers' delegate as its leader is. The Committee notes that the pending leadership dispute within the LLC originated in the invalidation of the LLC election results on the ground that the Civil Servants Association (CSAL) was not a labour union or trade union within the meaning of the Decent Work Act of 2015, and could therefore not join the LLC nor participate in its elections. Therefore, the objection is linked to a wider question of freedom association in the country, especially as regards the rights of civil servants.
75. In this regard, the Committee refers to the conclusions concerning the application by Liberia of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) of the Committee on the Application of Standards of the 111th Session of the Conference and of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations in its report to this year's Conference concerning the need for the Government to take measures to ensure that all workers are covered by the Convention (see ILC.111/Record No. 4B, p. 349 and ILC.112/Report III(A), p. 295).
76. Insofar as the Committee has no jurisdiction to examine questions of freedom of association that go beyond the question concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation to the Conference, it is unable to reach a conclusion on the objection. However, this year again, it strongly urges the Government to comply with the requests and recommendations of the ILO's supervisory bodies in this regard, as the respect for freedom of association is essential to determining representativeness which lies at the heart of article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Madagascar

77. The Committee received an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Madagascar presented by the Secretary-General of the trade union SVS/ Randrana Sendikaly Mpiaro Ny Zon'ny Mpiasa. The author of the objection claimed that the nomination of the Workers' delegate violated domestic norms, since the latter did not belong to one of the four most representative national workers' organizations – namely the trade unions FISEMARE, SEKRIMA, FISEMA and SVS, as recognized for the period 2022–24 in Governmental decree No. 1680/2024 of 18 March 2024 – but rather to the Conférence des Travailleurs de Madagascar (CTM), a trade union platform. Furthermore, the nomination had been made without consulting these four most representative workers' organizations.
78. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government explained that CTM was the officially recognized platform formally representing workers in the country. Accordingly, it had been consulted by the Government for the designation of the Workers' delegation to the Conference, and its nominations had been included in the credentials submitted on 12 May 2024. Turning to the decree No. 1680/2024, its application had been provisionally suspended by the Conseil d'État on 22 April 2024.

79. The Government further explained having received, on 16 May 2024, an objection by FISEMARE concerning the composition of the Workers' delegation and the process followed at the CTM, with respect to which the Government had sought explanations from the CTM. In its reply, the CTM clarified that a rotation system had been agreed according to which representation at the Conference would rotate between the three most representative trade unions, namely FISEMARE, SEKRIMA and FISEMA. SEKRIMA, whose turn it was to be represented at the Conference, had been suspended by the CTM. Accordingly, the CTM had nominated the workers' representation, by a decision supported by six out of the ten trade unions members of the CTM, including FISEMA. The CTM recalled the suspension of the decree concerning the representativeness and deplored that one of its members had filed a complaint with the Government, rather than seeking an internal solution. Finally, the Government explained having sought a meeting with the CTM and the objecting organizations in order to find a solution concerning the Workers' delegation at this session of the Conference, but that this meeting had not been accepted prior to the Conference.
80. The Committee notes that, due to ongoing judicial proceedings, the situation regarding the representativeness of trade unions in the country is not settled. Nevertheless, the Committee considers that, from the information provided, the objecting organization has a reasonable claim at being one of the four most representative workers' organizations in the country, a claim that the Government has not contested.
81. The Committee recalls that, as stated in Advisory Opinion No. 1 of 1922 of the Permanent Court of International Justice and subsequent case law of the Committee, several most representative organizations may exist in one country and that, in such cases, the Government must, pursuant to the terms of article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution, aim to effect an agreement amongst them.
82. The Committee notes with concern that, on the one hand, the Government has officially recognized the CTM as the only platform formally representing workers in the country and that, on the other hand, not all most representative trade unions appear to be affiliated to the CTM. By consulting solely the CTM – even if it collectively represents a majority of workers in the country – on the nomination of the Workers' delegation, the Government may be at risk of falling short of article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution.
83. The Committee notes that the nomination of the Workers' delegation was the subject of another complaint filed with the Government after the submission of the country's credentials, and that the Government has taken steps to address this complaint. The Committee notes with concern, from the facts presented by the CTM to the Government, that the nomination does not appear to have received substantial support within the CTM.
84. Due to the uncertainty concerning the representativeness of trade unions, the Committee does not at present have sufficient information to enable it to arrive at a decision. The Committee trusts that the Government will ensure that the nomination of the Workers' delegation to future sessions of the Conference will be in full compliance with article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Malaysia

85. The Credentials Committee received an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Malaysia, submitted by the Secretary-General, the Vice-President, and the Deputy Secretary-General of the Malaysian Trades Union Congress (MTUC). The authors of the objection submitted that, despite the reminders and clarifications provided, the Government failed to comply with the usual administrative procedures with a view to obtaining nominations from the MTUC to the Workers' delegation. As a result, the Government failed to accredit Mr Kamarul Baharin bin Mansor, the Secretary-General of the MTUC, to the current session of the Conference. The authors of the objection urged the Committee to refuse to admit any Workers' delegate or adviser representing the MTUC who had not been officially nominated by the MTUC, for the sake of the integrity of the Workers' delegation and tripartism.

86. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government indicated that, through an official email dated 7 May 2024, it requested the Presidents of the Malaysian Employers Federation (MEF) and the MTUC, respectively the most representative employers' and workers' organizations in the country, to provide it with nomination proposals for the non-governmental delegates to the current session of the Conference. The name of Mr Kamarul Baharin bin Mansor was not on the list of nominations received from the MTUC. The Government indicated that on 9 May 2024, it was informed by the Department of Trades Union Affairs that the registration of Mr Kamarul Baharin bin Mansor as the Secretary of the Union of Workers in Maintenance and Waste Management Services of Peninsular Malaysia for the 2023–26 term could not be completed due to non-compliance with Section 26 (1A) of the Trade Unions Act of 1959, insofar as he was not an employee and therefore could not be a union member and hold a position within the trade union. This view was based on an investigation conducted by the Social Security Organization (SOCSO), where it was found that Mr Kamarul Baharin bin Mansor, having resigned from his company, did not qualify as an employee according to the provisions of section 2(5) of the Employees' Social Security Act of 1969. The Government explained that the MTUC membership, according to its constitution, is composed of unions and not individual members. If an individual is not eligible within their union, they cannot be a representative of the union and therefore are not qualified to hold any position in the MTUC, including as a member of the General Council of the MTUC.
87. The Committee notes that, like the authors of the objection, the Workers' delegate and four of the ten Workers' advisers come from the MTUC. They are the MTUC President and four Vice-Presidents. The Committee therefore notes that the objection does not call into question the representativeness of the MTUC but rather the persons representing it. The Committee also notes the detailed explanations provided by the Government regarding the accreditation process of the Workers' delegation on the basis of the list provided by the MTUC and the absence of any valid mandate within the MTUC of Mr Kamarul Baharin bin Mansor for lacking the status of an employee. In the absence of any specific information provided by the authors of the objection regarding the substance of their allegations, the Committee decides not to uphold the objection.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Employers' delegation of Nicaragua

88. The Credentials Committee received an objection presented by the Employers' Group of the Conference concerning the nomination of the Employers' delegation of Nicaragua. The objection stated that the Government appointed the Employers' delegation without consulting or agreeing with the country's most representative employers' organization, the Consejo Superior de la Empresa Privada (COSEP), thereby violating article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution. It emphasized the COSEP's traditional role in designating delegates for past ILC sessions and expressed deep concern over the Government's systemic persecution, including the arbitrary detention and forced exile of the COSEP leaders. It was also recalled that the Government had invalidated the juridical personality of 19 employers' organizations, including the COSEP, citing alleged non-compliance with applicable laws based on legal arguments that the Employers' Group considered unfounded. The Government had also supported the creation of an employers' organization under its control which now heads the Employers' delegation to the Conference. The Employers' Group considered that these actions constituted a systematic violation of the ILO Constitution, tripartism and freedom of association principles. They called for the Committee to address these serious violations, emphasizing the need to uphold the ILO Constitution and ensure genuine and independent representation of Nicaraguan employers at the Conference, free from persecution and respectful of freedom of association.

89. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government called the objection unfounded and lacking in truthful arguments. It contended that a meeting attended by the country's most representative workers' and employers' organizations had been held on 26 April 2024, under the auspices of the Government. It affirmed that the delegation representing Nicaragua at the Conference was sufficiently representative of the majority of employers in the country and provided in support of its allegations the records of the mentioned meeting as well as documents indicating the numerical membership of the Cámara Nacional de la Pequeña Industria (CONAPI), as well as the juridical personality of the CONAPI and the Asociación de Promoción al Desarrollo y Sostenibilidad de Nicaragua (APRODESNI).
90. The Committee remains deeply concerned about the grave allegations of persecution, intimidation and repression of employers' organizations in Nicaragua. These concerns confirm and add to those it already expressed at the 108th (2019), 110th (2022), and 111th (2023) Sessions of the Conference. The Committee notes that the above-mentioned grave allegations are being examined by competent ILO supervisory bodies. Specifically, it recalls that a complaint under article 26 of the ILO Constitution alleging non-observance by Nicaragua of Conventions Nos 87, 98, 111 and 144, that was submitted by Employers' delegates to the 111th Session of the Conference (2023), has been the subject of a first discussion at the Governing Body in March 2024 (GB.350/INS/15(Rev.1)). It also takes note of the 2023 conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards that highlight "persistent climate of intimidation and harassment of independent workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee noted with deep concern the allegations of the arrest and detention of employer leaders and the further deterioration of the situation" (CAN/PV.CCL 14.06.23).
91. The Committee recalls that article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution requires consultation by the Government of the most representative employers' organizations. It notes that the Government has never explicitly denied that the COSEP is one of the most representative employer organizations in the country. However, the information made available to the Committee shows that the COSEP and other organizations have been deprived of their legal existence. In this regard, the Committee recalls that, according to its case-law, the sole fact that an organization may have no legal recognition does not exempt the Government from consulting it, as article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution refers simply to the existence of – not to the legal existence of – employers' and workers' organization (ILC.97/ Record 4C, paragraph 53). If the COSEP still had a de facto existence, it should have been consulted by the Government.
92. The Committee considers that, given the reiterated and serious nature of the allegations against it, the Government had a heightened duty to provide sufficient and clear evidence to ensure that the Employers' delegation was nominated in accordance with the ILO Constitution. Despite the submission of certain documents, the Government has failed to provide verifiable information regarding the representativeness of the organizations concerned, including the COSEP, and, therefore, has not demonstrated that the nomination of the Employers' delegation was done in full compliance with article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Pakistan

93. The Credentials Committee received an objection presented by Mr Chaudhary Muhammed Yaseen, General Secretary of the Pakistan Workers Federation (PWF), concerning the nomination of two members of the Workers' delegation of Pakistan. The author of the objection alleged that the nominations of Mr Mohammad Zahoor Awan, as Workers' delegate, and of the two Workers' advisers had been made without his consent as General Secretary of the PWF. Their designation as Workers' representatives was dubious since they had no organizational capacity or mandate to represent Pakistani workers on behalf of the PWF. The author of the objection furnished a document from the National Industrial Relations Commission (NIRC) showing that he had been elected as General Secretary of the PWF (Case Order No. 13(67)/2023 of 5 April 2023). He added that the PWF was the most representative workers' organization and, as submitted to last year's Credentials Committee, requested the Committee this year to withdraw the accreditations of the Workers' delegate and advisers.
94. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government submitted that the NIRC's 2019 figures for the PWF placed its membership at 510,280; Muthahida Labour Federation's at 44,537; and National Labour Federation's at 42,210. However, in 2023, the NIRC's updated figures for the National Labour Federation placed its membership at 434,936; PWF's at 215,318; and the Pakistan Central Mines Federation's at 191,743. Although those figures were awaiting validation by the NIRC and were questioned by the International Trade Union Confederation Asia-Pacific (ITUC-AP), the Government submitted that the change in membership levels demonstrated that there was a changing trend regarding the representative nature of the PWF. If the NIRC figures were to be relied upon, neither of the purported PWF leaders came from the current most representative workers' organization, i.e., the National Labour Federation.
95. On the nomination of the Workers' delegate, the Government was aware that the intra-federation dispute continued between two PWF factions. However, it had received a designation on 29 March 2024 from Mr Awan. It continued to rely on information that identified him as the PWF's President on the NIRC website. Also, Mr Yaseen's credentials as an office-bearer of the PWF were pending adjudication by the NIRC. The Government submitted letters indicating that the ILO Country Office, the regional (ITUC-AP) and international (ITUC) workers' organizations, to which PWF is affiliated, had acknowledged the election of Mr Awan. His inclusion in the delegation by the Government was also due to his perceived suitability, extensive experience, on the recommendation of the President of the PWF. Since 2012, he had attended sessions of the International Labour Conference and was a sitting Worker deputy member (2021 to 2024) of the ILO Governing Body.
96. The Government did not invite Mr Yaseen to consultations in view of the PWF's President's designation. It acknowledged receiving a communication on 27 May 2024 from Mr Yaseen which arrived too late for consideration as the approval process for Pakistan's delegation to the Conference was nearly complete. For the next session of the Conference, the Government would seek to ensure that the situation regarding the most representative workers' organization and PWF's legal office bearers would be well-settled. It conceded that, in view of the ongoing litigation between the different factions of the PWF and the National Labour Federation's less than responsive attitude towards the NIRC and the Government, the Workers' delegation's nomination to this year's Conference might not be the most suitable to represent the workforce of the country.
97. The Committee notes that for a second consecutive year, an objection has been filed regarding the designations of the Workers' delegation of Pakistan led by Mr Awan as delegate

(ILC.111/Record No. 2B(Rev.), paragraph 106). As last year, the objection challenges the individuals representing the PWF and does not call into question the representativeness of the PWF. However, the Committee notes with concern the Government's statement casting doubts as to the representativeness of the Workers' delegation it has designated to this session of the Conference. Insofar as it implies that the PWF may no longer be the most representative workers' organization, the Committee recalls that it is the Government's obligation to assess the representativeness of workers' organizations based on objective and verifiable criteria and to consult with all the most representative organizations with a view to reach an agreement with them on the composition of the Workers' delegation.

98. As regards the doubts raised concerning the legitimate leadership of the PWF, the Committee notes that the Government has accepted the nomination of Mr Awan as the Workers' delegate received from the person indicated as PWF President on the NIRC's website, although the same website shows Mr Yaseen as General Secretary of the PWF. In this regard, the Committee recalls its consistent line of jurisprudence that where a matter centres on an internal conflict within an organization it lacks jurisdiction to examine the dispute. Insofar as the Government justified Mr Awan's designation with his long-standing experience, his frequent nomination as Workers' delegate at previous sessions of the Conference as well as his mandate as Worker deputy member of the ILO Governing Body, the Committee considers that those facts do not in themselves establish his representativeness as the Workers' delegate at this session of the Conference.
99. Noting the Government's commitment to settle the issues regarding the most representative workers' organization and the PWF's leadership before the next session of the Conference, the Committee trusts that the Government will designate the Workers' delegation to that session in full conformity with article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Qatar

100. The Credentials Committee had before it an objection challenging the credentials of the Workers' delegation of Qatar submitted by FairSquare Projects, a non-profit research and advocacy organization based in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, alleging that the Government had not designated the Workers' delegation in conformity with article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution. It submitted that the Workers' delegation of Qatar to the Conference was composed of employees of state-owned companies, who had not been freely chosen by workers and were not representative of Qatar's workforce.
101. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government indicated that the Workers' delegation was selected by the workers' committees of two enterprises, which encompassed a significant portion of workers who engaged with various sectors, without any interference from the Government or company management. The Government had limited itself to receiving the names and submitting them to the ILO.
102. With respect to the receivability of the objection, in particular whether it could be validly submitted by the objecting organization, the Committee notes that the Standing Orders do not specify any conditions as to the organizations or individuals that can lodge objections before the Committee. While objections can therefore emanate from a wide variety of juridical or physical persons, the Committee has in the past considered that they must be objections within the spirit of the Standing Orders – which come from members of delegations, from governments or from national or international employers' or workers' organizations (see ILC.50/Record of proceedings, p. 489). The characteristic of such individuals or organizations is that they have a specific interest in the composition of a given delegation at a given session of the Conference. The Committee notes that such specific interest is lacking in the case of the objecting organization in this case. It therefore finds that the objection is not receivable.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Senegal

- 103. The Credentials Committee received an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Senegal presented by Mr Mballo Dia Thiam, Secretary-General of the Fédération Générale des Travailleurs du Sénégal (FGTS/B). The author of the objection stated that his organization had not been consulted regarding the designation of the Workers' delegation, despite being one of the most representative workers' organizations in the country. This was documented by the result of the trade union elections held in December 2023, in which the FGTS/B had received 10 per cent of the votes. The FGTS/B should therefore be allowed to nominate representatives to the Conference, and the lack of consultations by the Government constituted interference with the internal affairs of the trade union.
- 104. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government explained that the FGTS/B was the fifth most representative workers' organization in the country. However, since the death of the Secretary-General of the FGTS/B in June 2023, two persons have been claiming to be representing this trade union. The first was Mr Moussa Cissokho Gueye, who controlled the funds and offices of the trade union and had provided to the Government a resolution designating him as acting Secretary-General adopted by the secretaries-general of 15 trade unions pursuant to the internal regulations of the FGTS/B. The second was the author of the objection, who had not provided any supporting documents to the Government. Faced with this situation, the Government had recommended to the two sides to resolve their dispute amicably or, failing this, to have recourse to judicial proceedings. In the absence of a legal resolution to the dispute, the Government had decided not to give credence to either claim. For this reason, the Government had consulted only the four most representative workers' organizations, excluding the two persons claiming to represent the FGTS/B.
- 105. The Committee notes that the representativeness of the FGTS/B is not called into question, but rather that of the individuals representing it. It also notes that the objection before it arises from a conflict within the FGTS/B, certain aspects of which may be referred to national courts. The Committee recalls its consistent line of jurisprudence that where a matter centres on an internal conflict within an organization, it lacks jurisdiction to examine the dispute.
- 106. In these circumstances, the Committee is unable to reach any conclusion on the matter. It expresses its hope that the internal dispute will be resolved before the next session of the Conference.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Sri Lanka

- 107. The Credentials Committee received an objection presented by the Free Trade Zones and General Services Employees' Union, Ceylon Mercantile Industrial and General Workers' Union, Ceylon Federation of Trade Unions, United Plantation Workers' Union, Ceylon Federation of Labour, National Union of Seafarers Sri Lanka, Ceylon Estate Staff Union, and United Federation of Labour concerning the Workers' delegation of Sri Lanka. The eight objecting organizations submitted that although they were members of the National Labour Advisory Council (NLAC), a tripartite consultative forum headed by the Minister of Labour, the Government designated the Workers' delegation to the present session of the Conference unilaterally and without tripartite consultations with them. They further submitted that they were being systematically ignored, since they had filed a representation pursuant to article 24 of the ILO Constitution. They submitted past communications from the Government demonstrating that they had been consulted until this year, when the Government met with preferred workers' organizations instead of them. They added that the individuals nominated to the Workers' delegation had political affiliations and some held posts in the Government. They did not object to the individuals, but rather the flawed process.

108. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government explained that it had convened six of the seven most representative workers' organizations for the purposes of designating the Workers' delegation to the Conference. It had not invited the NLAC due to ongoing internal legal challenges. Also, the Workers' delegation to this year's Conference was smaller as compared to prior years, due to financial hardships the country had been suffering since 2021. It provided the membership figures for those entities with more than 6,000 members, including the Ceylon Workers Congress with 102,558 members; Nidahas Sewaka Sangamaya with 76,554 members; Lanka Jathika Estate Workers Union with 58,095 members; Inter Company Employees' Union with 40,814 members; Ceylon Bank Employee's Union with 25,680; Ceylon Federation of Labour with 25,552 members; and Ceylon Federation of Trade Unions with 22,602 members – the latter two members of the NLAC. Membership figures for another four of the eight objecting organizations were also provided, these were: United Plantation Workers' Union with 20,481 members; National Union of Seafarers Sri Lanka with 11,528; Ceylon Estate Staff Union with 9,902; and Ceylon Mercantile Industrial and General Workers' Union with 6,762. The Government added that the selected workers' organizations represented a wide range of sectors, including plantation (consisting primarily of female workers), hospitality, transport, manufacturing, banking, EPZs and aviation.
109. On the matter of consultations, these took place on 26 April 2024 and were attended by four of the six invited workers' organizations. The Government recalled that no delegation was sent in 2023 and it explained to attendees that it would nominate only two workers' representatives to this year's Conference due to the ongoing economic crisis and limited budget. It stated that its own participation would be limited to three Government officials. One of the objecting organizations, Ceylon Federation of Labour, had been invited but did not attend this meeting. This was documented by the invites and minutes of the meeting provided by the Government to the Committee. The Government acknowledged that on prior occasions it had consulted a larger group, including members of the NLAC (except for the United Federation Plantation Worker's Union that only joined in 2023). This year the NLAC's exclusion was due in part to a pending internal legal challenge (Court of Appeals, CA 321/2023) launched by the Free Trade Zones and General Service Employees Union, regarding selection criteria and non-inclusion by the NLAC. The Government added that the NLAC's term had expired in December of 2023. The Government submitted that it had done its best to ensure that the most representative and relevant unions were selected within the limited time frame and without limiting the number of trade unions consulted. Subject to the resolution of the NLAC's legal situation, it considered that it could be consulted in the future as had occurred in the past.
110. The Committee notes that the tripartite delegation of Sri Lanka to this year's session of the Conference is comprised of eight Government members (including three from the Permanent Mission in Geneva), two employers' members and four workers' members. The Workers' delegate derived from the Ceylon Workers Congress; two advisers, respectively, from Inter Company Employees Union and Lanka Jathiak Estate Union; and one accredited person not appearing on the list from Sri Lanka Nidahas Sewaka Sagamaya. The Committee also takes note that the eight organizations submitting the objection included Free Trade Zones and General Service Employees Union, even though it had purportedly filed a legal challenge.
111. Taking into account that the objecting organizations together represent approximately 96,827 members, not including two whose figures have not been submitted by the Government, the Committee notes that the Government has not explained why it did not consult the objecting organizations, regardless of the situation that the NLAC may currently be facing. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Workers' delegations to the three preceding Conferences included at least one of the eight objecting organizations (Ceylon Mercantile, Industrial and General Workers Union in 2019; Free Trade Zones and General Services Employees Union, Ceylon Federation of Trade Unions and Inter Company Employees Union in 2021; and, Ceylon Federation of Trade Unions, Free Trade Zones and General Services Employees Union, and National Union of Seafarers Sri Lanka in 2022). The Committee further notes that it also remains unclear why the Government considered that the announced limitation of the number of worker nominations to only two justified limiting the organizations to be consulted to six. According to Advisory Opinion No. 1 of the Permanent Court of International Justice, the only object of the intervention of industrial organisations, in connection with the selection of delegates and technical advisers, is to ensure, as far as possible, that the Governments nominate persons whose opinions are in harmony with the opinions of employers and workers of the country respectively. Taking into account the above considerations, the Committee trusts that the Government will in future nominate the Workers' delegation in full compliance with article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

- 112. The Credentials Committee received an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, submitted by the leaders of the Unión Nacional de Trabajadores de Venezuela (UNETE) and the Confederación de Sindicatos Autónomos (CODESA). The authors of the objection submitted that, following the Government's call upon all workers' confederations to agree on the nomination of the Workers' delegation, the CODESA submitted its proposal on 20 May to the Deputy Minister for Labour Rights and Industrial Relations of the Ministry of the People's Power for the Social Process of Labour. The CODESA was not contacted by other trade union confederations concerned, in particular the Central Bolivariana Socialista de Trabajadores y Trabajadoras de la Ciudad, el Campo y la Pesca (CBST-CCP), nor was there any interest on the part of the Government to nominate a delegation with equal participation of all the trade union confederations. Unlike in previous years, the UNETE did not submit any proposal, considering that it was eventually the Government who appointed the Workers' delegation through its trade union apparatus. The UNETE and the CODESA were excluded from the Workers' delegation to the present session of the Conference, without any formal invitation to a prior meeting. The Government had not taken measures to promote an agreement between the workers' confederations on the nomination of the Workers' delegation, which once again was done unilaterally by the Government through CBST-CCP. As regards CBST-CCP, the authors of the objection recalled the findings of the Commission of Inquiry which in its Report had pointed to the close relations of collaboration and involvement between the CBST-CCP, the Government and its political party and to the lack of true separation between them (see Report of the Commission of Inquiry, paragraph 471). They also recalled that several objections and complaints had been presented to the Committee in past years regarding the designation of delegates and advisers from the CBST-CCP, justifying the renewal of monitoring measures.
- 113. The authors of the objection further recalled that, because of their lack of support to the Plan of Action of the Social Dialogue Forum adopted on 28 April 2022, the UNETE and the CODESA had been excluded from all subsequent meetings of the Social Dialogue Forum. The two organizations had specifically denounced before the ILO the condition set by the Government for their inclusion in the so-called "social dialogue" which required them to recognize that the Government has made progress in ensuring compliance with the relevant ILO Conventions, whereas the situation of workers in the country remained very serious and the violation of their rights continued. They objected to the nomination of the Worker's delegation given that the criteria for representativeness had not been established in the framework of the round table on Convention No. 87 and that no agreement had been reached on the nomination of the Workers' delegation amongst the Workers' confederations.

114. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government reiterated the information provided in its monitoring report. It indicated that, based on the data available in the National Trade Union Registry (NTUR), the CBST-CCP remained the most representative organization in terms of the number of affiliate organizations and workers, and in terms of its engagement in collective bargaining and the number of collective agreements signed. Labour legislation provided for mechanisms to define representativeness in case of disputes in this regard. The Government recalled its continuous and repeated requests for the Office's technical assistance concerning the determination of representativeness of employers' and workers' organizations and regretted that it had not yet received that assistance. It further recalled that it had issued a written call for all workers' organizations (ASI, CBST-CCP, CGT, CODESA, CTV and UNETE) to make a proposal for the nomination of the Workers' delegation to this session of the Conference, and that it had organized a dedicated meeting where the organizations participating in the Social Dialogue Forum (ASI, CBST-CCP, CGT and CTV) had been invited with a view to reaching consensus on the composition of the delegation. While it had subsequently received separate proposals from ASI, CBST-CCP and CGT, it accredited the Workers' delegation based on the proposal received from the CBST-CCP, considering that it included the largest number of representatives of the different trade union organizations. As regards CODESA's proposal for the nomination of the Workers' delegation, the Government considered that it had been submitted late, as it reached the email address of the Directorate of International Relations and Liaison with the ILO of the Ministry of Labour only on 3 June 2024. Concerning the UNETE's allegation that the Government should have accredited representatives of all workers' organizations, regardless of whether they had submitted a proposal for the nomination of the delegation or not, the Government submitted that no government that upholds democratic principles could incorporate individuals into delegations without their consent.
115. The Committee notes that, once again, the Government has accredited the Workers' delegation based on a proposal received from CBST-CCP which does not appear to result from an agreement amongst the most representative workers' organizations. The Committee recalls that, where several representative organizations exist, Governments must take them all into consideration when proceeding to the nomination of a delegation and, ideally, obtain the agreement of all of them. However, while both the Government and the organizations concerned should strive to achieve such an agreement, where this is not possible, the Government must assess, based on objective and verifiable criteria, which organization or organizations are the most representative ones and obtain agreement with those. As regards the establishment and application of such criteria by this Government, the Committee refers to its conclusions on the monitoring of the situation of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela (paragraphs 30 to 33 above).
116. The Committee hopes that the Government will be able to establish, with the technical assistance of the ILO, objective and verifiable criteria enabling it to assess the representativeness of workers organizations and, eventually, to nominate the Workers' delegates to the Conference in agreement with the most representative of them, in full conformity with the requirements of article 3(5) of the ILO Constitution. As recommended by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations in its report submitted to the last session of the Conference, ILO technical assistance in this regard “should be defined on a tripartite basis in the context of institutionalized dialogue” (ILC.111/Report III (Part A), p. 328).

Complaints

117. The Committee also received and dealt with three complaints, which are listed below.

Complaint regarding the non-payment of travel and subsistence expenses of the Workers’ delegation of Colombia

- 118. The Credentials Committee received a complaint dated 5 June 2024 presented by the Confederación de Trabajadores de Colombia (CTC) concerning the non-payment of travel and subsistence expenses of the Workers’ delegation. According to the complainant, the Government had not paid the travel expenses for the CTC representatives and had not responded to requests for these payments.
- 119. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government stated that it had covered the travel and subsistence expenses for certain delegates. It explained that payments were made according to historical commitments and current budget constraints, covering expenses for the main delegates and for advisers from the most representative workers’ and employers’ organizations, as determined by Colombian law and established procedures. It provided documentation indicating that payments had been processed on 8 June 2024 and listing the members of the delegation for which expenses were paid, as well as the amounts.
- 120. The Committee notes the explanation and documentation provided by the Government attesting to the payment of the travel and subsistence expenses of the Workers’ delegation. Nonetheless, in view of the fact that the payments were processed only on 8 June 2024, the Committee recalls that the obligation under article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the ILO Constitution requires governments not only to bear the expenses necessary for a Member State’s tripartite delegation to attend the Conference but to make sure that the necessary financial means are made available to the participants concerned sufficiently in advance, so that the participation of delegates who cannot afford to advance expenses is not jeopardized. The Committee accordingly hopes that the Government will take necessary steps to ensure that in the future payments of travel and subsistence expenses of the Employers and Workers’ delegation occur in advance of the travel, so as to permit participation by the members of those delegations from the beginning and for the full duration of the Conference for the full duration of the Conference.

Complaint concerning the non-payment of travel and subsistence expenses of the Employers’ delegation of Congo

- 121. The Committee received a complaint filed by the Employers’ Group of the Conference alleging that the Government of Congo had not paid the travel and subsistence expenses of some of the members of the Employers’ delegation to the Conference.
- 122. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government recognized that there had been some delay in providing the members of its delegation with the funds needed to cover their travel and subsistence expenses. By email received on Saturday 8 June 2024, the Employers’ Group notified the Committee that, having received assurance from the Government that mission expenses had been reimbursed by bank transfer, it accepted to withdraw its complaint.
- 123. The Committee takes note of the withdrawal of the complaint.

Complaint concerning the non-payment of travel and subsistence expenses of the Workers' delegation by the Government of Uganda

- 124. The Committee received a complaint filed by the Secretary-General of the National Organization of Trade Unions (NOTU), the Workers' delegate of Uganda, alleging that, over the past three years, the Government had not paid the travel and subsistence expenses of the Workers' delegation to the Conference. The complaint was supported by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The author of the complaint provided copy of a letter of 22 March 2024 from the Permanent Secretary of the Ministry of Gender, Labour and Social Development, requesting the NOTU to nominate a delegation to this session of the Conference while informing it that the Ministry had no budget provision to pay for the travel and subsistence expenses of employers' and workers' delegations.
- 125. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government indicated that, on 7 June 2024, it engaged in productive dialogue in respect of the complaint with a delegation from NOTU. As a result, an amicable solution was reached, consisting in addressing the matter internally. The Government requested the Committee to consider the matter closed. In an unsolicited written communication received by the Committee on 12 June 2024, the NOTU confirmed that the complaint was addressed internally and that an amicable resolution was reached with the Government. In its written response to the Committee's request for details regarding the outcome of the amicable settlement, the Government merely reiterated that it held fruitful discussions with NOTU and reached an amicable position.
- 126. The Committee notes that the complaint alleges that the Government has failed to pay the travel and subsistence expenses of the Workers' delegation to the Conference for the last three years. While the Committee is competent to deal with this situation only with respect to the current session of the Conference, it notes that this is a very serious allegation. At the same time, the Committee notes that it has not received corresponding complaints in recent years.
- 127. As regards the non-payment of the expenses of the Workers delegation at this session, the Committee recalls the Government's obligation, under article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the ILO Constitution, to cover at least the expenses of the titular delegates of the employers and workers. The Committee acknowledges the difficult financial situation that Member States may be facing and understands the financial burden that the participation of a full tripartite delegation to the Conference implies. However, as the Committee has often stated, most governments can rely on the support of their respective Permanent Missions in Geneva to ensure participation of a governmental delegation, whereas the social partners cannot rely on such a system. Financial constraints have not only had an impact on governments, but an even greater impact on the social partners and their ability to cover their own expenses. The Committee notes that the Government reached an amicable resolution with the NOTU with respect to the complaint. In the absence of information regarding the terms of the amicable settlement, the Committee trusts that the Government will, as a minimum, meet its constitutional duty to cover the travel and subsistence expenses of the Workers' delegate relating to their participation from the beginning and for the full duration of the present session of the Conference as well as for future sessions.

Communications

- 128. The Committee also received the following communications.

Communication concerning the Workers' delegation of Afghanistan

- 129. The Committee had before it a communication received from an individual purporting to be the president of the All Afghanistan Federation of Trade Unions (AAFTU), who was the Workers' delegate of Afghanistan at the 95th Session (2006) of the Conference. He requested the Committee to facilitate his participation at this session of the Conference and alleged that his travel and subsistence expenses incurred in 2006 had still not been reimbursed by the Government.
- 130. The Committee considers that the communication calls for no action on its part.

Communication concerning the delegation of Ecuador

- 131. The Credentials Committee received a communication from the Frente Unitario de Trabajadores (FUT) and the Confederación Ecuatoriana de Organizaciones Sindicales Libres (CEOSL) submitting that the Government failed to convene the National Council of Labour and Wages in time to nominate the Workers' delegation for the Conference. The Minister of Labour, citing ILO arrears, announced that she would not attend and delegated to the Vice Minister, who resigned before formalizing his accreditation. The authors of the communication claimed that the failure to accredit a delegation to this session of the Conference violated article 3 of the ILO Constitution. It urged the Committee to remind the Government of its obligations and take measures to prevent repetition of this situation in the future.
- 132. In a written communication to the Committee furnished on 12 June in response to its request for information by 6 June, the Government indicated that due to austerity measures and the current internal conflict requiring the Government's priority attention to preserve peace and security in the country, the Government decided not to participate in this session of the Conference. It reiterated its commitment to working for the interests and rights of workers, in accordance with the current circumstances that demand priority attention to the country's stability and development.
- 133. The Committee regrets that the Government had not responded sooner to the communication inviting it to provide its observations. The Committee notes that, after receipt of the communication, on 7 June 2024, the Government accredited a delegation consisting exclusively of Government delegates from the Permanent Mission in Geneva. The Committee observes that while it has no specific mandate to examine communications regarding the failure of a Government to accredit a delegation, it is competent to examine objections relating to the failure to deposit credentials of an Employers' or Workers' delegate. It notes, however, that the Government of Ecuador deposited its credentials not only long after the time limit provided for in article 31(1) of the Conference Standing Orders but also after the publication of the Revised list of delegations, thus making the lodging of any objection impossible and preventing the Committee from exercising its mandate. While noting the reasons expressed by the Government in its communication, the Committee urges the Government to make serious efforts and to ensure that a fully tripartite delegation is accredited to future sessions of the Conference.

Communications concerning the Workers' delegation of Nepal

- 134. The Credentials Committee received three communications concerning the Workers' delegation of Nepal from the Joint Trade Union Coordination Centre (JTUCC), the General Federation of Nepalese Trade Unions (GEFONT), and the National Democratic Confederation of Nepalese Trade Union (NDFONT). The JTUCC submitted that the Government had failed to appoint advisers to accompany the Workers' delegate to this year's Conference unlike in prior years and without any consultation. The GEFONT and NDFONT added that, since the JTUCC's establishment, it had always been agreed to include advisers from their respective organizations in the delegation. The GEFONT highlighted that article 3(2) of the ILO Constitution permitted delegates to be accompanied by two advisers per item placed on the agenda by the ILO Governing Body. The NDFONT added that there had been no request made to the Government for payment of travel and subsistence expenses for the purposes of attending the Conference, although this was foreseen by article 13(2)(a) of the ILO Constitution. It considered that this demonstrated anti-union discrimination by the Government and requested the Committee to refer the matter to the Committee on Freedom of Association, as well as to examine the imbalance between the number of Workers' advisers (none) to the Government's advisers (10).

- 135. The Committee notes that the Government did not reply to the Committee's invitation to comment on the substance of the communication.
- 136. The Committee recalls that article 3(2) of the ILO Constitution does not require governments to nominate advisers. It also recalls that article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the ILO Constitution imposes on Member States an obligation to pay the travel and subsistence expenses of the delegates and their advisers once nominated. However, the competence conferred on the Committee to examine complaints on the non-observance of that provision, in accordance with article 33, paragraph 1(b), of the Conference Standing Orders, is limited, with respect to advisers, to cases of serious and manifest imbalance as between the number of Employer or Worker advisers whose expenses have been covered in the delegation and the number of advisers appointed for the Government delegates. This requires, in accordance with paragraph 3(b) of the same article, that there is at least one adviser for whom the payment of travel and subsistence expenses could be claimed, which is not the case here as no Workers' advisers have been nominated. Notwithstanding, the Committee considers that the Government should have consulted the objecting organizations in this regard taking into account that the Workers' advisers were usually appointed in the past and that, as the Committee has often stated, the ability for the social partners to actively participate in the work of the Conference depends to a large extent on the number of advisers that accompany their delegate to the Conference. The Committee hopes that the Government will do so for future sessions of the Conference.

Communications concerning the Employers' and Workers' delegations of Peru

- 137. The Credentials Committee received two communications respectively from the Employers' Group of the Conference and the Workers' delegate regarding the late payment of travel and subsistence expenses of the Employers' and Workers' delegation by the Government of Peru. The authors of the communication recalled that, the tripartite delegation attending the Conference each year included four employers' representatives and four workers' representatives, which implied the timely payment of their travel and subsistence expenses by the Government. This year, despite having received the list of non-governmental delegates in good time, with a request for travel to be arranged with arrival in Geneva on 1 June 2024, the Government informed the delegates concerned on 29 May 2024 that it could only facilitate travel with departure on 2 June. However, because of flight cancellations due to a technical failure at the airport of Lima, the delegates arrived in Geneva on 4 June. Furthermore, on 31 May 2024, the Government indicated that the payment of travel expenses would be available only on 4 June 2024, requiring delegates to advance payments for meals, transfers and accommodation. The authors of the communications stated that it was particularly important for them to participate in their respective group meetings on 2 June as Peru was included in the long list of cases likely to be examined by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and that the Government was fully aware of this. The authors of the communications requested the Committee to urge the Government to include in its institutional budget the cost corresponding to the participation of the non-governmental delegations in the Conference, and to process their travel and subsistence expenses with sufficient anticipation, respecting the travel dates indicated by the delegates.

- 138. In a written communication addressed to the Committee at its request, the Government explained that, for 2024, the executive branch established extraordinary economic and financial measures to moderate public spending and reduce the fiscal deficit. As a result, the budget for international travel of the Ministry of Labour and Employment Promotion (MTPE) was reduced. As of 9 May 2024, the MTPE sought to obtain from the Ministry of Economy and Finance an increase of the spending limit for international travel, in order to cover the travel expenses of the entire tripartite national delegation to this session of the Conference. The non-governmental delegates were kept fully informed of the steps taken. The Government emphasized that the situation did not only affect the Employers' and Workers' delegates, but also the governmental delegation. The Government confirmed that it covered the travel and subsistence expenses of four members of the Employers' delegation and four members of the Workers' delegation. It purchased their air tickets on 31 May and deposited their subsistence expenses on 3 June 2024. The Government acknowledged that, because of the technical failure at the airport of Lima on 2 June, two of the accredited Employers' advisers could not travel to Geneva at all.
- 139. The Committee notes the Government's explanations regarding current budgetary constraints, and that it eventually purchased the air tickets of the eight members of the non-governmental delegations on 29 May and deposited their subsistence expenses on 3 June 2024.
- 140. The Committee recalls that the timely payment of travel and subsistence expenses of the full tripartite delegation plays an important role in ensuring its actual participation in the Conference, and hopes that the Government will take the necessary steps in the future to ensure that payments of travel and subsistence expenses of the delegation occur as early as possible, so as to permit participation by those nominated to serve as delegates and advisers from the beginning and for the full duration of the Conference.

- 141. The Credentials Committee adopts this report unanimously. It submits it to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it and adopt the proposals contained in paragraphs 15, 22, 25, 33 and 45.

First report of the Credentials Committee: Presentation and noting

The President

It is my honour to declare open the 12th plenary sitting of the 112th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I invite you all to turn your attention to the first report of the Credentials Committee, which is contained in Record of Proceedings No. 3A.

Please allow me quickly to recall that the members of the Credentials Committee are as follows: Mr Essah (Nigeria), Chairperson; Mr Yllanes Martínez (Mexico), Employer Vice-Chairperson; and Ms Losi (South Africa), Worker Vice-Chairperson, who was temporarily replaced by Ms Brown (United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland).

I will now give the floor to Mr Essah, who will present to us the Committee's first report.

Mr Essah

Chairperson of the Credentials Committee

I am honoured and pleased to present to the plenary of the 112th Session of the International Labour Conference the first report of the Credentials Committee. This report – which is published as Record of Proceedings No. 3A – includes information on the composition of the Conference, as well as the Committee's conclusions on the question of the representation of Myanmar at this session of the Conference.

In connection with its mandate to examine the credentials of delegations to the Conference, the Credentials Committee traditionally comments on the overall composition of the Conference. In this regard, I would like to mention two points.

First, with 174 Member States having accredited a delegation, the participation level in the Conference remains high. With respect to the 13 Member States that are not represented at this session of the Conference, the Committee reiterated its concern that, by not appointing a delegation, or by failing to accredit a fully tripartite delegation, the government deprives the employers or workers of the country, as the case may be, of their right to be represented in the highest policymaking body of the ILO and to participate actively in the work.

Second, the participation of women in the Conference has continued its steady but slow increase. This year, it reached 37.8 per cent. The Committee noted that it is the first time that the minimum target of 30 per cent of women's participation has been reached in all three groups. Apart from the fact that this target – which was set in 1990 and should have been reached within the five following years – looks rather unambitious today, women continue to be unevenly distributed by function and by group. Let us hope that the upward trend will continue and will accelerate.

Let me now turn to the question of the representation of Myanmar. Like the last three years, the Committee was faced with two sets of competing credentials: one set submitted by the military authorities that seized power in February 2021, and another from the so-called National Unity Government. As you are aware, the Credential Committee's decision not to recognize either authority as the legitimate government, taken in line with the position of the United Nations (UN) General Assembly, has had the effect that no invitations have been extended to Myanmar to attend sessions of the Conference or Governing Body or other ILO meetings. The Committee noted that, in December 2023, the UN General Assembly decided again to defer a decision on the credentials of Myanmar. It also noted that several other entities have also deferred consideration of the question, including the Credentials Committee of the recent 77th World Health Assembly. In the light of these considerations, the Committee decided that no delegates from Myanmar would be accredited at the 112th Session of the Conference.

However, like last year, the Committee considered that, at the ILO, the situation could not be considered satisfactory, as the continued ambiguity on the question of the representation of Myanmar affects not only the representation of the Government of Myanmar in the ILO, but also precludes the participation of the employers and workers of Myanmar in the Conference and at other tripartite meetings. Last year, the Committee had suggested, in the continued absence of guidance from the UN General Assembly, that it could, in due course, consider making its own determination to enable the tripartite constituents of Myanmar to resume active participation in the work of the Organization. This year, it considered that, in the meantime, there might be other options to allow employers' and workers' representatives from Myanmar to contribute to the work of the Conference at future sessions. As it considered that the examination of such options was not within its mandate, it decided to invite the Governing Body, through the Conference, to urgently consider such options.

With this, I invite you to take note of the first report of the Credentials Committee, which is contained in Record of Proceedings No. 3A and is available on the website of the Conference.

The President

The Credentials Committee has unanimously adopted its first report, and the Conference is requested to take note of its content without discussion, in accordance with article 31(3) of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

If there is no objection, may I take it that the Conference takes note of the first report of the Credentials Committee?

(The Conference takes note of the first report of the Credentials Committee.)

I would like to take this opportunity to thank the Officers of the Committee for their excellent work. I have been told that the atmosphere in the Committee was very positive and that the work was carried out in a spirit of fruitful collaboration.

(The Conference continues its work in plenary.)

Second report of the Credentials Committee: Presentation, noting and approval of the Committee's proposals

The President

I am honoured to declare open this morning's 16th plenary sitting, on the last day of this 112th Session of the International Labour Conference. We shall begin with the second report of the Credentials Committee, which is contained in Record of Proceedings No. 3B.

I now give the floor to Mr Essah, the Chairperson of the Credentials Committee, who will present to us the Committee's second report.

Mr Essah

Chairperson of the Credentials Committee

I am honoured and pleased to present to the plenary of the 112th Session of the International Labour Conference the second report of the Credentials Committee. This report, published as Record of Proceedings No. 3B, contains the conclusions on the cases lodged with the Committee. We received 17 objections, 1 of which was considered serious enough to warrant monitoring; 3 complaints; and 6 communications. In addition, the Committee examined four monitoring cases that were referred to it by the Conference at its last session.

The Committee held seven sittings and worked in an informal and cordial manner. This is all the more important as we are a small Committee of just three members: one Government representative, one Employer's representative and one Worker's representative.

This is the first time that I have served as Chairperson of the Credentials Committee, and the experience has given me great insight into the important role that the Committee plays in ensuring the genuine tripartite composition of the Conference. This is something that I value, as a true believer in tripartism.

A credentials committee is a routine feature of the plenary assemblies of international organizations and international conferences. Most of them only examine the formal validity of the credentials submitted by Member States. Occasionally, they are faced with cases in which the legitimacy of a government is questioned or where competing credentials are received from more than one entity claiming to represent a Member State. As I reported to you on Monday, our Credentials Committee has been dealing with such a situation in the case of Myanmar, for the fourth consecutive year.

What makes the Credentials Committee of the International Labour Conference unique are other aspects of its mandate. The Committee is tasked with examining objections to credentials in two different situations. The first is where it is alleged that the delegate or adviser is not nominated in agreement with the most representative organizations of employers or workers. The second is where a government fails to nominate an Employers' or Workers' delegate, resulting in an incomplete delegation.

The first type of objection is the core mandate of the Credentials Committee, which it has exercised since 1919. The need for it is clear: to make sure that the Employers' and Workers' delegates of Member States truly represent the workers and the employers of their country. This is why governments must appoint them in agreement with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations in the country. But what happens when they do not? The Committee must then examine objections. It requests the government concerned for its comments. On the basis of the information at its disposal, it reaches its conclusions. As mentioned before, our Committee examined 17 such objections, 3 of which concerned Employers' delegates and 14 of which concerned Workers' delegates.

I would like to highlight just two cases: Belarus and Nicaragua.

In the case of Belarus, the question that was before the Committee for a second consecutive year was whether the Workers' delegates and advisers from the Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus can be considered genuine workers' representatives. The information before the Committee did not show that the Federation was a genuine workers' organization, free and independent from the Government, and reinforced the Committee's serious doubts as to the compliance of the nomination with the relevant constitutional provisions. On this basis, the Committee decided to propose to the Conference that this case be monitored by the Committee next year.

In the case of Nicaragua, the Committee remains deeply concerned about the grave allegations of persecution, intimidation and repression of employers' organizations that are being examined by competent ILO supervisory bodies. These concerns have been expressed at three of the four previous sessions of the Conference. For the nomination of the Employers' delegates and advisers to the Conference, it is particularly relevant that the Government appears to have deprived representative employers' organizations of their legal existence. In this case, the Committee proposes to renew the monitoring.

In the case of Belarus, the number of monitoring cases has now risen to five, along with four renewals. When such a proposal is adopted by the Conference, the Government must provide a report to the Credentials Committee when it submits credentials the following year. The report is then assessed by the Credentials Committee.

A subject that has permeated our discussions on several cases is the link between the proper designation of Employers' and Workers' delegates, and the respect for freedom of association in the country concerned. It has always been evident that there is a strong link between the two. Nevertheless, the Committee generally refrains from adopting conclusions on questions concerning freedom of association, because such questions lie within the mandate of the Committee on Freedom of Association. This is why, for example, in the case of Liberia, it made only a cross reference to the freedom of association question underlying the leadership dispute within the Liberia Labour Congress. However, it clarified last year, in the case of Belarus, that while the Conference does not have a mandate to examine alleged violations of freedom of association, it may take the findings of the competent ILO supervisory bodies into account in its own conclusions on the question of whether an employers' or workers' organization is genuine and representative. It has reconfirmed this approach this year.

As stated again in the case of Guinea-Bissau, there can be no valid designation of delegates and advisers that is the result or the product of government interference.

In addition to objections, the Committee also examines complaints. These are cases where it is alleged that a government has not paid the travel and subsistence expenses of a delegate or adviser. Governments are reminded that they are obliged to cover these expenses under article 13(2)(a) of the ILO Constitution. Under the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Credentials Committee can only consider complaints if the Member has not paid the expenses of a titular delegate, or if there is a serious and manifest imbalance between the advisers paid for in the three parts of the delegation. While the Committee's mandate is limited, it finds itself with complaints where a Member State has not paid in a timely manner, or has not paid in full. The Committee calls on all Members to make adequate arrangements sufficiently in advance so as to permit essential partners to participate for the full duration of the session of the Conference.

In addition, the Committee had the opportunity to examine an unusual objection lodged by a non-profit research and advocacy organization. This case led to an in-depth examination of the historical records of the ILO. The Committee recalled an earlier statement, according to which objections within the spirit of the Standing Orders must come from members of delegations, from governments, or from national or international employers' or workers' organizations. Therefore, even though objections may be lodged by a wide variety of organizations or individuals, those must still have a specific interest in the composition of the given delegation at the given session of the Conference. The case before the Committee did not meet this threshold and the objection was not found receivable.

This concludes the cases that I wish to bring to your particular attention this morning. It remains for me to thank my fellow members and the Vice-Chairpersons of the Committee; Mr Yllanes Martínez, from Mexico, for the Employers; Ms Losi from South Africa, for the Workers; and Ms Brown from the United Kingdom, who temporarily replaced Ms Losi. We truly worked very well as a tripartite team on this task, and this report reflects our unanimous views. I would also like to thank the Office, the translators and the interpreters for their efforts. They permitted the Committee to work in a seamless manner.

With this, I now invite the Conference to take note of the second report of the Credentials Committee, which is contained in Record of Proceedings No. 3B, and is available on the website of the Conference, and to approve the Committee's proposals as set out in paragraphs 15, 22, 25 and 33, in relation to the four existing monitoring cases, and in paragraph 45, in relation to the new monitoring case.

The President

The Credentials Committee has unanimously adopted its report and requests the Conference to take note of its content and to approve the proposals contained in paragraphs 15, 22, 25, 33 and 45 of Record of Proceedings No. 3B, relating to Djibouti, Mauritania, Nicaragua, the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela and Belarus.

In accordance with article 31(3) of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the proposals shall be approved without discussion.

If there is no objection, may I take it that the Conference takes note of the second report of the Credentials Committee and approves the five proposals?

(The Conference takes note of the second report of the Credentials Committee and approves the five proposals.)

I would like to take this opportunity to thank the Officers of the Committee once again for their excellent work and dedication. The work of this Committee is fundamental to ensure tripartite representation at the Conference.

(The Conference continues its work in plenary.)

Strategic dialogue with the co-facilitators of the intergovernmental preparatory process of the Second World Summit for Social Development: Summary

The President warmly welcomed all participants and said that the Conference was honoured by the presence of Mr Hilale, Permanent Representative of Morocco to the United Nations in New York, and Mr Kridelka, Permanent Representative of Belgium to the United Nations in New York, in their capacity as co-facilitators of the intergovernmental preparatory process of the Second World Summit for Social Development, following their nomination for that role by the President of the United Nations (UN) General Assembly.

Mr Hougbo (Director-General of the International Labour Office and Secretary-General of the Conference) extended a warm welcome to the co-facilitators. He said that the Second World Summit for Social Development was of paramount importance for the ILO and offered an unprecedented opportunity to address the pressing challenges of the time, in particular the three core themes of social development, namely: poverty eradication; full and productive employment and decent work for all; and social inclusion. The Summit should serve as a global platform to reaffirm the commitments that had been made to social justice, and its outcomes would have far-reaching implications. The ILO's unique tripartite structure was a strength within the UN family. A working party of the Governing Body was in the process of developing a tripartite input to the Summit, with a first statement to be adopted on 15 June. The co-facilitators brought a wealth of experience and insight from their work in New York, offering a perspective that was both complementary to and distinct from the dynamics in Geneva. He urged all participants to engage actively and constructively in that crucial intergovernmental preparatory process.

Mr Hilale (Permanent Representative of Morocco to the United Nations in New York and co-facilitator of the intergovernmental preparatory process of the Second World Summit for Social Development) congratulated the President and the Vice-Presidents of the Conference on their election and thanked the Director-General of the ILO for his invitation. He said that the co-facilitators were firmly committed to undertaking the intergovernmental process in an inclusive, transparent, ambitious and pragmatic manner. They would make every effort to create and enable a constructive, inclusive and positive environment for the preparations for the Second World Summit for Social Development.

In his report entitled "Our Common Agenda", the UN Secretary-General had made a proposal to convene a world social summit in 2025, to be discussed and agreed upon by Member States. At the Sustainable Development Goals Summit in 2023, Member States had emphasized that the possible summit outcome should have a social development approach and give momentum towards the implementation of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. In resolution 78/261, adopted on 26 February 2024, the UN General Assembly had decided to convene the "World Social Summit" in 2025, under the title "Second World Summit for Social Development". That enabling resolution stressed that the Summit should address the gaps and recommit to the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development and Programme of Action and its implementation and give momentum towards the implementation of the 2030 Agenda. The Summit would therefore be a crucial opportunity to scale up efforts to deliver on the three pillars of social development, namely poverty eradication; full and productive employment and decent work for all; and social inclusion. It would also be an opportunity to reinforce respect for all human rights and promote gender equality.

The 2030 Agenda, which was strongly influenced by the Copenhagen outcome, set out a commitment by Member States to work towards sustainable development in its three dimensions – social, environmental and economic – in an integrated manner. Thus, the international community had moved the policy discussion from social development to the social dimension of sustainable development. Social development had become integral to the development process, rather than being relegated to a separate track, where it was often subordinated to economic priorities. Yet, too many communities were being left behind. According to the UN Secretary-General's most recent report on progress in implementing the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs), only 15 per cent of the SDG targets were on track to be achieved, 49 per cent showed minimal or moderate progress, and 36 per cent of the targets showed signs of stagnation or regression. It was imperative to invest in the productive potential of people, build trust, reinforce social dialogue, create decent work and narrow inequalities. Full and productive employment and decent work were the link between social justice and the economic and environmental components of sustainability. The ILO's expertise in advancing social justice and promoting decent work was indispensable to address the core themes of social development.

The process leading to the Second World Summit for Social Development was taking place as preparations for the Summit of the Future and the fourth International Conference on Financing for Development were progressing. The mobilization of resources and solidarity were expected to be at the heart of the deliberations of the Second World Summit for Social Development. The Summit had the potential to cement the political will required to foster investments in human capabilities, social protection and decent work, build resilience to safeguard progress and deliver on the commitment to leave no one behind.

The co-facilitators were keen to listen to the ILO's expectations for the Summit and the perspectives of the ILO's tripartite constituents on the preparatory process and its outcome. They relied on the ILO's constituents to ensure harmony in the views and positions taken in Geneva and in New York.

Mr Kridelka (Permanent Representative of Belgium to the United Nations in New York and co-facilitator of the intergovernmental preparatory process of the Second World Summit for Social Development) congratulated the President of the Conference on his election and thanked him for the invitation to participate. He said that he and Mr Hilale had been appointed by the President of the UN General Assembly on 4 March 2024 as co-facilitators for both the modalities and the outcome of the Summit, in accordance with resolution 78/261. The aim was first to produce a modality resolution and then a concise political declaration to be adopted by consensus. The political declaration should have a social development approach and give momentum towards the implementation of the 2030 Agenda. It was their firm intent to finalize the modality resolution in June. The negotiations on the political declaration should start, as was usual in such a process, during the next session of the General Assembly, after the High-level Week in September 2024.

A first consultation of the Member States in New York on 28 March had highlighted that the Summit offered an opportunity to strengthen and refocus efforts and commitments in respect of the social dimension of sustainable development, building on the 2030 Agenda and on the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development and Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development of 1995, while taking into account the preparations for the Summit of the Future, the Global Digital Compact and the discussion on financing for development.

The co-facilitators were firmly committed to facilitating the discussions among Member States in an open, inclusive and transparent manner that considered the views and priorities of all stakeholders. The Summit should be a message of hope and commitment to deliver on people's dreams towards a more prosperous and more just world.

Following the consultation in March, extensive consultations with a broad spectrum of stakeholders, including many UN agencies in Geneva, including the ILO, had taken place. He thanked the Director-General of the ILO for the extensive briefing the ILO had organized on 22 April.

The first reading of a zero draft modality resolution had taken place on 7 May. It was followed by two further readings, which had led to a revised version of the text, which had been discussed on 3 June. Seven out of the ten proposed preambular paragraphs had been closed, as had one of the 14 proposed operative paragraphs. Referring to the status of the negotiations, he drew attention to three important points. First, negotiations were still ongoing regarding the explicit reference to specific institutions – including the ILO – and their role. The question of the role and participation of civil society and the social partners was also still under discussion. Second, new elements had been introduced to the discussion on the possible themes of the high-level round tables, including the new social contract. And third, regarding the location of the Summit, there were currently two options, namely Qatar and New York, during the High-level Week. Member States had been invited to provide written comments in that regard and the next steps would be announced soon. Once agreed on, the text of the modality resolution would be submitted to the General Assembly for approval, following which the preparation of the Summit's outcome would start through an extensive consultation process.

The Summit was very important and it would be taking place against the backdrop of a difficult context, calling for a spirit of partnership that put the needs, rights and aspirations of people at the centre of decisions. The co-facilitators were fully aware of the difficulty of the tasks ahead, and they hoped and believed that it would be possible, collectively, to live up to the commitment to progress that had been made at the 1995 Summit, 30 years earlier.

Ms Hornung-Draus (Chairperson of the Employers' group) thanked the ambassadors for their presence and for having visited the Employers' group that morning. She said that the ILO had an instrumental role to play in achieving the goals of the Summit through its tripartite structure, anchoring economic and social policy in the real economy, and through its human-centred approach. Five key elements should be reflected in the outcome document of the Summit.

The first element was the recognition that the private sector, and in particular micro, small and medium-sized enterprises of the real economy, as the main employment provider, contributed to sustainable development. Enterprises were the backbone of any economy, driving investments, innovation and growth. Without sustainable enterprises, there were no jobs. It was essential to create a conducive environment for sustainable enterprises in order for micro, small and medium-sized enterprises to thrive. The conditions behind such a conducive environment included political and macroeconomic stability, agile labour markets and effective and sustainable social protection that stimulated both jobs and growth.

The second element was a reference to effective labour market governance. Trust in public institutions was key. The Employers called for the outcome to promote effective governance to fight corruption and to ensure equitable and sustainable labour markets. That required effective, flexible and modern national regulations with robust labour market institutions. Investment in labour market data collection and research to inform evidence-based policymaking was a precondition for achieving that goal.

The third element was the recognition of the central role of employers' and workers' organizations as social partners committed to the well-being and economic prosperity of entire societies beyond their own interests. The social partners were anchored in the real economy, and they should be recognized in the outcome document as key actors and also, most importantly, as actors in the implementation of the outcome, as they provided first-hand expertise on the realities of work.

The fourth element was the importance of investing in skills and development. Education was the backdrop of any thriving society. From early childhood to adulthood, investing in quality education that was accessible to all and in continuous skills development was essential. Investing in adaptable training programmes that met the demands of modern economies, particularly in the digital and green sectors, laid a strong foundation for lifelong learning and employability.

The fifth element that should be reflected in the outcome was the recognition that productivity growth was a driver for social justice. The ILO Centenary Declaration for the Future of Work (2019) recognized that enhancing productivity created employment opportunities and improved living standards. A robust productivity agenda was essential. It included reskilling, improving regulations, reducing informality and strengthening institutions to create high quality jobs and elevate living standards for all.

Ms Passchier (Chairperson of the Workers' group) thanked the co-facilitators for their presence. She said that there were four priorities that the Workers' group would like to see reflected in the process and outcome of the Summit.

First, the Summit would take place in a context in which geopolitical polarization was undermining multilateralism. However, global challenges – including achieving peace, tackling climate change and combating inequalities – required global solutions. The ILO was uniquely placed to support a more inclusive multilateralism, founded on its mandate of setting international labour standards and on its tripartite structure. The ILO's expertise and its tripartite structure were key to the promotion of social justice and to the advancement of sustainable development. The first demand was therefore to support the leading role of the ILO in shaping the 2025 Second World Summit for Social Development, based on its mandate and constituent members.

Second, the Summit outcome should reflect the call of the Workers' group for a renewed social contract, with Goal 8 of the 2030 Agenda at its core, to advance social development. The new social contract should emphasize the creation of decent and climate-friendly jobs, the extension of labour protection to all workers, the establishment of living wages, universal social protection and the promotion of equality and inclusion with a special emphasis on gender equality. That demand aligned with the calls made by the UN Secretary-General in his report "Our Common Agenda" for universal social protection, decent work for all and universal labour protection floors for just transitions.

Third, the role of social dialogue and tripartism in the preparations for the Summit and in the implementation of its outcomes must be recognized. Social dialogue was a fundamental pillar of the ILO's Decent Work Agenda and an essential governance tool for social development and for achieving the SDGs. The pivotal role of social dialogue for social justice was recognized in the work of the UN Commission for Social Development. It must be absolutely clear that, in that context, the enabling fundamental rights of freedom of association and collective bargaining would have to be addressed explicitly. The social partners must be included in the Summit and the key role of social dialogue in social development must be recognized in the Summit outcome.

The fourth priority was to ensure that the Summit enhanced the nexus between social justice, peace and democracy. Trust in democracy and its institutions was at an all-time low, as working people did not feel that their voices were being heard or that they were getting a fair share of the wealth that they helped to create. The Summit must be used to prioritize the rebuilding of democratic institutions to ensure human dignity and peaceful and inclusive societies.

She thanked the co-facilitators for meeting her group, which stood ready to engage on a renewed social contract that included robust financial mechanisms and social dialogue as a driving force for change.

Ms Makonda-Ridley (Government Malawi, speaking on behalf of the Africa group) said that, in preparing for the Summit, the multilateral community must undergo a paradigm shift in respect of how it dealt with social justice and social development in order to focus on the most excluded, in particular in the least developed countries. Tackling exclusion of all forms started with education and skills building. The shortest route to dealing with exclusion was to look again at how to support education in those countries where populations were growing fast – which included most African countries – and where budgets for education were lacking. A paradigm shift was needed to ensure that agencies across the multilateral system could work on issues that delivered on social justice and social development. Education was one of those issues, and it must be at the heart of the Summit.

Mr Pecsteen de Buytswerve (Government, Belgium, speaking on behalf of the European Union and its Member States) said that North Macedonia, Montenegro, Serbia, Albania, Ukraine, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Georgia, Norway and Armenia aligned themselves with his statement. He thanked the co-facilitators and expressed the commitment of his group to strengthen the social dimension of sustainable development. The Summit offered an opportunity to rebuild the social contract on the basis of human rights, social cohesion, solidarity and decent work. The renewed social contract should be anchored in the ILO's fundamental principles and rights at work and should address inequalities and transformative challenges. His group expected the Summit to address the new challenges that had emerged since the 1995 Summit and to give momentum towards implementation of the 2030 Agenda. The Global Coalition for Social Justice and the Global Accelerator on Jobs and Social Protection for Just Transitions should play a crucial role in contributing to the objectives of and follow-up to the Summit. The Summit preparations needed to be closely coordinated with the ILO and its tripartite structure. He asked the co-facilitators to share their assessment of how the negotiations were developing regarding the ILO's role, decent work and the renewed social contract. He also asked them to share their views on the steps that the ILO had defined for its contribution to the Summit.

Mr Muñoz Castro (Government, Colombia) said that economic development must create jobs and working conditions that respected the freedom, safety and dignity of workers. Colombia insisted on the need for greater support and depth in order to guarantee adequate conditions for workers in rural areas and those who belonged to indigenous communities. Their access to freedom of association, safety, social protection, professional and vocational training, and technologies should be guaranteed. Strategies for decent work must be implemented, which required the commitment of all partners. Workers in the informal economy should enjoy their rights. The goal should be generations of people working in formal work without precarious conditions. The Summit should focus on the effective protection of women, the LGBT+ community, rural workers, ethnic and cultural diversity, and the creation of spaces for tripartism.

Mr Ghariani (Employer, Tunisia) said that employers in Tunisia supported the underlying principles of the Summit and encouraged the Members of the United Nations to address the Summit in a constructive and positive manner, recognizing the important social and economic progress that had been achieved since the World Summit for Social Development in 1995. A realistic approach to poverty eradication was recommended. Innovation, globalization and trade had led to progress, such as increased life expectancy, improved social protection, poverty reduction and the progression of the middle class. However, the global economic community was still facing enormous challenges, including persistent unemployment, particularly among young people, and weak or uncertain growth.

Ms Sequeira Mata (Worker, Costa Rica) said that it was fundamental for the Summit to recognize social dialogue based on respect for freedom of association, collective bargaining and the right to strike as key mechanisms to drive social development and justice, both nationally and internationally. That should be recognized in the outcome of the Summit. In terms of process, employers' and workers' representatives should fully participate alongside governments in the preparation process, the deliberations, and the follow-up to the Summit. She asked how the full participation of the social partners in the Summit could be ensured and how the role of tripartism and social dialogue would be reflected in the Summit.

Mr Jordan (Government, Barbados) said that Barbados encouraged colleagues to review the outcome documents of the recent Global Supply Chain Forum (in partnership with the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the Global Conference on the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States (SIDS) while preparing for the Summit. SIDS needed a global partnership which recognized that developed nations had a responsibility to invest in building their resilience. The vulnerability of SIDS must be properly assessed, as gross domestic product per capita alone was not a sufficient indicator. The Global Coalition for Social Justice was essential for advancing policy coherence and a human-centred approach. The climate crisis remained an existential threat to humanity as a whole and urgent action was needed to mitigate its negative effects. The impact of rapid advances in technological development must be recognized and guidelines put in place to ensure that the vulnerable in our societies did not become collateral damage. The need for a just technological transition was as imperative as the need for a just energy transition.

Mr Nur (Worker, Somalia) said that, as global migration continued to rise, there was a need for a rights-based approach to labour migration that took into account sustainable development, just transition and equality, as well as the needs of migrant workers and their families, in a holistic and coherent manner. The Summit must ensure that migration pathways were not only regular, safe and orderly, but also rights-based and gender-sensitive. The Summit was also an opportunity to break the silos between migration and labour, employment, education policies and governance structures. Social dialogue and international labour standards must guide labour migration governance. Workers must enjoy full freedom of association and the right to bargain collectively. He asked how international labour standards and social dialogue for migrant workers could be promoted during the Summit negotiations.

Mr Dragún (Employer, Argentina) said that enterprises were the key drivers for decent work, especially for work formalization. Getting out of informality required close consultation with employers as they played an important role. Social dialogue must take place. The transition towards the formal economy should occur within regulatory frameworks and should offer incentives to move away from informality. Guaranteeing employability and increasing productivity should be the main aims in order to combat the main causes of informality.

Mr Lee (Government, United States of America) said that the United States regarded the Summit as an opportunity to refocus the world's attention on equity, inclusion, social justice and non-discrimination. The potential of the Summit must be realized in order to address serious gaps in the implementation of the Copenhagen Declaration, including by advancing decent work and protecting workers' fundamental rights. The world was also facing newer challenges that must be addressed promptly with a focus on social justice. The Summit should unite the international community behind a climate transition that delivered justice for workers and harnessed the full potential of the digital transition to improve workers' lives. The Summit should also be used to strengthen labour protections and overcome inequalities. He asked how the ILO and its constituents could best shape the Summit and its outcome, and what the appropriate framework was to maximize the impact of an ILO tripartite input in the Summit.

Ms Mayers-Granville (Employer, Barbados) said that social development envisioned through the SDGs could not be achieved without including businesses. The private sector included local enterprises, multinational corporations and micro, small and medium-sized enterprises, which all drove inclusive growth and provided sustainable employment opportunities. Creating decent jobs required conducive domestic and international conditions for businesses.

Ms Zimna (Worker, Maldives) said that the Summit was a historic opportunity to call firmly for the universality of human rights, women's rights and labour rights, and to invest in gender equality as one of the most effective means to further social development and social justice. Three elements were pivotal: enhancing the care economy, recognizing equal pay for work of equal value and eradicating gender-based violence. The Summit should recognize care as a public good and call for universal ratification of the Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190). She asked how those issues and policy coherence could be promoted at the global level.

Mr Oeschger (Government, Switzerland) said that Switzerland believed that the goal of the Summit should be to assess progress, identify current challenges and renew commitment to the principles of the Copenhagen Declaration, while giving new impetus to the implementation of the 2030 Agenda. Switzerland called upon all Member States of the United Nations to support the inclusive integration of all partners, in particular the social partners, in preparation for and during the Summit. Switzerland wished to draw attention to the important role that the Global Coalition for Social Justice should play in providing consistency between the various goals of the Copenhagen Declaration.

Ms Whittier (Government, Trinidad and Tobago) highlighting the specific vulnerabilities of SIDS, said that it would be important to ensure that the Summit placed a special focus on those countries. SIDS recognized the importance of developing productive populations through policies to promote employment and reduce unemployment through avenues such as skill development, productivity enhancement and knowledge transfer. It would be important to ensure that those elements featured in the discussions at the Summit.

Ms Sephomolo (Employer, Lesotho) said that an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises included the promotion of entrepreneurship, the reduction of the costs of doing business and the unlocking of investment opportunities. Businesses in the least developed countries often operated in difficult environments. She asked that employers be included in UN processes at both national and global levels and that their voice be brought to the Summit in a meaningful way.

Mr Annisette (Worker, Trinidad and Tobago) said that social justice, human dignity and equity must become a tangible reality. The global labour movement had always been at the forefront of the fight for social justice, advocating for the rights of workers, fair wages, safe working conditions, and the right to organize and bargain collectively. New economic policies were needed. The labour movement was also a central player in the transition to a green economy, advocating for policies that created sustainable jobs and protected the planet for the future. Workers' rights should be universally respected. The principles of solidarity, justice and equity should guide preparations for the Summit.

Ms Reyes Parra (Government, Peru) said that the preparations for the Summit constituted a fundamental and urgent opportunity to join collective efforts towards the consolidation of a more just world. Significant progress had been made in terms of social development, but considerable work remained to be done. She said that everyone must unite to overcome challenges and must show compassion and act in solidarity.

Mr Gallego García (Worker, Spain) said that the Summit needed to drive real progress in terms of social justice and come up with ambitious commitments, not only in terms of social development but also in terms of funding. The Summit should include commitments for increased official development aid and reserve at least 7 per cent of it for social protection. Other issues to be addressed included building a multilateral debt architecture for middle-income countries, a fiscal reform based on participative and democratic governance, and the reform of the Bretton Woods decisions to respond to the needs of developing countries. A key question would be the articulation between the Summit's outcome and the discussion on finance for development, including the Fourth International Conference on Financing for Development taking place in Madrid in 2025.

Ms Corrods (Government, Jamaica) said that the Summit must secure outcomes that responded to the growing need to redefine how labour was engaged, in particular young people. In crafting those solutions, an inclusive and people-centred approach must be considered. The conversation around the future of work, social development and social justice must incorporate youth engagement, focusing on the thematic areas of transitional unemployment support, greater social protection for workers in the platform economy, informality, and non-standard work engagements. Another issue of interest would be how labour authorities could respond to a changing world of work.

Ms Fuentes Furuya (Representative, Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR)) said that the OHCHR supported the integration of human rights, labour rights, gender equality and social protection and hoped to see human rights put at the centre of the Summit. Human rights could help address the root causes of social, economic and environmental challenges. The OHCHR promoted a human rights' economy and encouraged the Summit to address care and support systems as a key lever to sustainable development. For the transformation of the care and support economy and systems, it would be crucial to apply a full range of relevant international labour and human rights standards addressing the human rights of women, persons with disabilities, children, young people, older persons and migrant workers, both as caregivers and receivers of care and support.

Mr Kridelka (Permanent Representative of Belgium to the United Nations in New York and co-facilitator of the intergovernmental preparatory process of the Second World Summit for Social Development) said that the exchange had been very useful and that all the points had been well noted. The questions regarding the ILO's involvement in the preparation of the Summit called for a coherent approach between Geneva and New York to ensure that Member States spoke with one voice. Likewise, the answer to the question regarding the involvement of social partners in the Summit lay with the individual governments that instructed their missions in New York. Coherence was also important regarding human rights, which was a holistic concept giving equal importance to all human rights, including economic, social, civic, cultural and political rights. The ILO was mentioned as one of the key agencies in the modality resolution for the World Summit for Social Development held in Copenhagen. He expressed the hope that the same language would be kept for the modalities of the Second World Summit for Social Development.

Regarding the thematic priorities, good note had been taken of the five priorities of the Employers and the four priorities of the Workers. The specific situation of the least developed countries and SIDS was also a priority in New York. Migration, formalization, gender equality, the fight against all discrimination, rural workers, support for entrepreneurship and the focus on young people were all very important issues.

To conclude, he said that it was important that individual governments listened to the priorities of the social partners and transmitted them to the delegations in New York as the outcome document would be agreed through a process led by Member States.

Mr Hilale (Permanent Representative of Morocco to the United Nations in New York and co-facilitator of the intergovernmental preparatory process of the Second World Summit for Social Development) said that due note had been taken of the interventions, which would be shared in New York. The co-facilitators attached great importance to the contribution of the ILO. Specific concerns would be best addressed if raised in New York by individual countries. Labour ministers needed to raise awareness among their governments so that their concerns could be integrated into the outcome document of the Summit.

The expressions of interest and the focus that had been placed on social dialogue, social justice and gender equality had already been heard in New York, and he expressed the hope that they would be reflected in the Summit's final declaration. Those issues, together with the creation of decent work, were key components of the society they were dreaming of for the future and which it was their responsibility to leave for the generations to come. He also expressed the hope that financing for development would find its place in the Summit. Renewed commitment was needed for the financing of policies that created decent jobs.

Regarding artificial intelligence, it was necessary to ask the right questions. Beyond the positive forecasts, to what degree could countries integrate a social dimension? How could the wealth generated by artificial intelligence improve working conditions, help to invest in a healthy environment and strengthen the rights of workers? Participants' contributions on those issues were key. Finally, he expressed the hope that human rights would take a rightful and noble place in the vision for the future at the Second World Summit for Social Development. The universality of all human rights must be recognized. There could be no prosperity, nor economic and social development, without upholding human rights.

The President thanked the co-facilitators and the delegates for their participation.

(The Conference adjourned at 6 p.m.)

Opening of the inaugural Forum

- Address by Mr Gilbert F. Hounbo, ILO Director-General and Co-Chair of the Coordinating Group
- Address by Mr Luiz Marinho, Minister of Labour and Employment of Brazil, representing the Government of Brazil as Co-Chair of the Coordinating Group
- Address by Mr Ramchandra Paudel, President of Nepal

The President of the Conference welcomed participants to the inaugural Forum of the Global Coalition for Social Justice. The Forum consisted of three thematic dialogues, each with a Partners' Conversation and a Partners' Spotlight led by two renowned moderators. Keynote speeches would be given by President Ramchandra Paudel of Nepal and President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva of Brazil. With over 1,200 participants, the Forum would hold its conversations between two alternating meeting rooms, with participants in the secondary room following the proceedings on screens. He emphasized the importance of the programme for partners to share their perspectives, experiences and priorities to align with the Coalition's objectives.

Mr Hounbo warmly welcomed all participants. The inaugural Forum marked a significant milestone following the establishment of the Global Coalition for Social Justice by the ILO Governing Body. He expressed deep appreciation for the commitment shown by nearly 300 partners representing governments, employers' and workers' organizations, United Nations (UN) agencies, regional bodies, non-governmental organizations, businesses and academics. The Coalition was a space for dialogue, action and advocacy, with a key role in advancing social justice worldwide.

Since the Coalition's inception, partners had participated actively in thematic discussions aimed at translating debates into actionable initiatives. At the Forum, partners were poised to showcase their commitments to building resilient societies, enhancing coherence between economic and social policies, and fostering social dialogue for shared prosperity. He expressed hope that those commitments would inspire collaborative actions to realize the Coalition's goals. Looking forward, he stressed the need to elevate social justice on national, regional and global agendas, affirming the Forum's role in guiding the Coalition's trajectory towards meaningful impact. He concluded by calling for collective efforts in dialogue, collaboration and action to transform the world for the better.

Mr Marinho underscored Brazil's steadfast commitment to social justice and the promotion of decent work for all, a commitment reaffirmed and strengthened in 2024 through targeted actions. The country demonstrated unwavering support for the fundamental principles and rights at work advocated by the ILO, and President Lula's personal presence at the Forum was a symbol of Brazil's deep-rooted dedication. Brazil took a proactive stance in driving forward the Coalition's agenda, which focused on human-centred approaches and inclusive development.

Global challenges included the profound impacts of the COVID-19 pandemic, the rapid evolution of the digital economy, and the urgent environmental crises, including the catastrophic floods in Brazil's Rio Grande do Sul region. Brazil was undertaking extensive efforts, under President Lula's leadership, to mitigate those challenges, including substantial financial investments to aid affected communities and support businesses in the region. In the context of Brazil's current presidency of the G20, it was advocating for fair and inclusive economic policies, particularly focusing on the regulation of the digital economy, equitable distribution of the benefits of technology, and environmental sustainability. Brazil's agenda within the G20 aligned closely with its commitments to the Global Coalition for Social Justice, aiming to advance the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs).

Looking ahead, he expressed optimism about the potential of the Global Coalition for Social Justice to advance the Decent Work Agenda and accelerate progress towards the SDGs. Brazil was committed to eliminating child labour and forced labour, promoting gender equality, and fostering fair and inclusive economies. It also took an active role in advocating for reform of international governance and regional balance within the ILO and other international bodies. In addition to Brazil's contributions through South-South and Triangular Cooperation with the ILO, social dialogue played a critical role in achieving comprehensive social justice and promoting decent work globally.

He concluded by reaffirming Brazil's openness to dialogue and collaboration with all stakeholders, underscoring the importance of collective action in prioritizing decent work and human well-being on a global scale.

Mr Hounghbo warmly welcomed the President of Nepal, noting that throughout his long political career, the President had always been a strong and an ardent advocate of social justice, fairness and democratic participation. His unwavering commitment to democracy and social values had meant that he had even been sentenced by an authoritarian regime to many long years of imprisonment. Thanks to the people's movement, to which President Paudel belonged, Nepal was now a federal democratic republic. The Constitution of Nepal expressed a strong determination to creating a balanced society on the basis of the principle of social justice.

He commended the country's efforts in ensuring safe labour migration through bilateral agreements in cooperation with the ILO. Furthermore, Nepal had become a pathfinder country of the Global Accelerator on Jobs and Social Protection for Just Transitions, as well as a member of the Global Coalition for Social Justice, which demonstrated the country's dedication to promoting social justice in Nepal and beyond.

Mr Paudel congratulated the ILO on the inauguration of the Global Coalition for Social Justice and expressed his gratitude for having been invited as a keynote speaker. A century ago, the ILO had been created based on the premise that universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice. The ILO still stood firmly on the foundation of social dialogue and tripartite cooperation. The rapidly changing labour market demanded new skills, technologies, and creative ways of working across various sectors, including industrial production, service sectors, IT-based banking services, and artificial intelligence. There was therefore a need for adaptability and innovative work styles to accommodate those changes and implement the Decent Work Agenda.

Nepal's constitution embraced provisions on social justice, such as equal rights, opportunities and treatment, which aligned with the core values of the ILO. He expressed Nepal's dedication to social justice by participating in the Global Coalition for Social Justice and reaffirming faith in multilateralism. He stressed the importance of climate justice, noting the severe impacts of climate change on Nepal, despite its negligible contribution to carbon emissions. The retreat of glaciers in the Himalayas had had adverse effects on drinking water, agriculture, biodiversity and public health, pushing many into marginal poverty and exacerbating inequality. He subsequently called for adequate funding, compensation and the necessary technology to be provided to countries affected by climate change, emphasizing the responsibility of major emitters. He also highlighted the misallocation of resources towards weapons instead of development, and urged the international community to focus on shared prosperity and global brotherhood for sustainable peace.

In Nepal's transition to a federal democratic republic, labour rights, the right to employment, the right to form trade unions, and the right to participate in collective bargaining had been enshrined in the constitution. Legal and institutional arrangements, such as the Labour Act, the Trade Union Act, the Employment Rights Act, the Contribution-Based Social Security Act, and the National Employment Policy, had been established to implement those provisions. Recently, the Government had announced the "Shramadan" plan to create employment within Nepal. He appealed to all countries to treat migrant workers with respect and adhere to the principle of decent work, and affirmed Nepal's active engagement in the Alliance 8.7 against child labour, forced labour and modern slavery, and its role as a pathfinder country for the Global Accelerator on Jobs and Social Protection for Just Transitions. He highlighted the implementation of the Decent Work Country Programme 2023–2027 in Nepal, whose three pillars were employment, rights and social dialogue.

In conclusion, he expressed his belief that the Global Coalition for Social Justice would continuously inspire collective efforts through social dialogue to achieve social harmony, tolerance, economic development and prosperity. He reiterated the importance of ensuring that a fair share of the fruits of labour reached the hands of workers, which was the essence of social justice.

Thematic Dialogue: Building the resilience of societies

- Mr Syed Hussain Syed Husman, President, Malaysian Employers' Federation (MEF)
- Ms Zingiswa Losi, President, Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU)
- Mr José Manuel Salazar-Xirinachs, Executive Secretary, United Nations Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC)
- Mr Adama Mariko, Secretary-General, Finance in Common

The moderator introduced the first Thematic Dialogue, entitled "Building the resilience of societies", noting that the Global Coalition for Social Justice, although only seven months old, held significant potential for addressing social justice deficits, implementing the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development, and ensuring decent work for all.

Ms Calderone, as a representative of the country holding the G7 presidency, emphasized the responsibility they had to promote concrete, innovative and sustainable initiatives to address global challenges. It was important to understand their role, particularly in ensuring protection during real emergencies, such as addressing inequalities, protection gaps, and the exploitation of labour, including child labour, and of supporting the Global Coalition for Social Justice on those themes. At their meeting in Cagliari in September 2024, G7 labour ministers would emphasize their support for the Coalition and adopt a declaration. Social dialogue was a key element of the Coalition, which supported transition processes in advanced, emerging and developing economies to ensure decent working conditions, improve lifelong learning and promote occupational safety and health. The Italian Government encouraged all countries to ratify ILO Conventions and support the capacity and representativeness of employers' and workers' organizations. There was a need to protect workers during technological, ecological and demographic transitions, which would significantly change societies and create new opportunities and risks. She concluded by stressing the importance of creating comprehensive guarantees and extending collaborative work on the implementation of the Global Coalition for Social Justice.

Mr Syed Husman stated that Malaysia was an economically sound country. The current Government's main emphasis, as highlighted by the Prime Minister, was on integrity, trust and care for its citizens, ensuring no one was left behind. Malaysia had implemented many social policies to benefit its citizens. One significant success was the introduction of the Social Security Organization, initially covering the formal sector. Recognizing the growing informal economy, plans had been implemented to include it in the social security scheme. The scheme required employers to pay 1.75 per cent of the basic salary while employees paid only 0.25 per cent. It provided 24-hour coverage for any accidents or injuries requiring hospitalization and medical care. The Government had also agreed to cover the substantial foreign labour workforce. To address the lack of coverage for housewives and househusbands, the Government had introduced a scheme to provide them with coverage, recognizing their contributions to the economy. The inclusive national policy ensured that every working person in the country was covered by insurance, reflecting true social justice. Those actions had significantly benefited the economy, as a stable family environment led to better performance in organizations.

Ms Losi, speaking on behalf of workers, emphasized the importance of practical measures to ensure adequate participation of workers across all sectors when championing a just and inclusive transition. No transition could succeed without workers and trade unions, and sector-wide opportunities for upskilling and reskilling were needed to prevent anyone from being left behind. Intentional efforts must address unemployment and underemployment through targeted opportunities. Localization should be an entry point for economic growth, including investments in emerging sectors, local manufacturing, and job creation in construction sectors. Communities and workers were equally affected by a just transition, and there must be sufficient investment in social ownership, social protection, and ensuring households were not disadvantaged. Social compacts and partnerships between government, workers and employers were important to ensure a just transition across all sectors, especially in energy, manufacturing, agriculture and related sectors. Workers whose jobs were directly and indirectly affected by transitions, including those in value chains and host communities, must be taken into account to prevent negative economic impacts such as ghost towns. Particular attention must be paid to women, youth, persons with disabilities and rural residents in discussions and actions related to a just transition and social justice.

Ms Calderone emphasized the importance of managing transitions to avoid worsening inequality and further weakening vulnerable workers. All countries faced the challenge of ensuring that progress was coupled with guarantees and protections, especially concerning people's rights.

Mr Salazar-Xirinachs noted that ECLAC had recently joined the Global Coalition and underscored the Coalition's crucial significance. Latin America and the Caribbean faced a number of economic challenges, including alarmingly low average economic growth of 0.8 per cent over the past decade, contrasted with much higher growth rates in previous decades. There was an urgent need for productive transformation policies to stimulate growth and create jobs. Low economic growth impeded efforts to reduce poverty, informality and inequality, and to finance social policies for social justice. He stressed the importance of inclusive and sustainable economic growth, which was achievable through policies fostering governance, social dialogue and collaboration across sectors. Successful approaches included cluster initiatives bringing together the private sector, public institutions and academia to enhance productivity and job creation. In addition to low economic growth, two further traps in the region were inequality and weak governance. Addressing those challenges collectively could catalyse transformative growth and social justice.

Mr Mariko expressed his excitement about the formation of the Global Coalition, which had potential as a powerful instrument for promoting social justice. Development banks should support its work in the long term. There were approximately 530 public development banks worldwide, but only 10 per cent had an international mandate as international financial institutions. The remaining 90 per cent operated nationally, serving as intermediaries between government fiscal policies and economic investments. Collectively, those banks managed assets totalling US$23 trillion and invested $US2.5 trillion annually across various economies. The banks could play a significant role in supporting social transitions and promoting social justice, particularly through financing the SDGs and integrating social perspectives into national climate strategies. Examples were countries such as South Africa and others involved in the Finance in Common coalition, where banks were actively engaged in policy dialogues and funding social protection and disaster risk reduction programmes. It was important for public development banks to share knowledge and best practices to strengthen social protection programmes and reduce social inequalities. They had an important role in investing in infrastructure and utilities while considering social impacts and addressing inequalities. He advocated for continued investment in social safety nets, particularly during economic shocks such as the COVID-19 crisis, and noted the counter-cyclical role that public development banks played in reducing inequalities and societal fractures.

Mr Salazar-Xirinachs acknowledged the critical role of finance within the Coalition. An important conversation was taking place within the UN about the inadequacies of the financial system in meeting the SDGs and addressing climate issues. There was a significant gap in financial support despite the importance of social dialogue and well-designed public policies. Without robust financial resources, even the best-laid plans might falter.

The moderator asked panellists to conclude with one word or sentence on how they envisioned collaboration within the Coalition.

Mr Mariko expressed the usefulness of creating awareness through the Coalition ecosystem.

Mr Salazar-Xirinachs acknowledged that the Coalition was still young and needed to establish effective working methods and operational procedures to ensure transformative impact.

Ms Losi stressed the critical role of social dialogue, transparency and worker inclusion in economic growth and development.

Mr Syed Husman highlighted the commitment of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) to social justice through dialogue, collaboration and learning from both strengths and weaknesses.

Ms Calderone emphasized the importance of human capital and skills development according to a rationale of social dialogue, which also created the ground for protection for everyone, starting with the promotion of quality collective bargaining.

The moderator concluded by thanking for their significant contributions to the inaugural Forum of the Global Coalition for Social Justice.

- Mr Adama Kamara, Minister of Employment and Social Protection, Côte d'Ivoire
- Mr Pasi Hellman, Undersecretary of State, Development Policy, Finland
- Mr Michal Mlynár, UN Assistant Secretary-General and Acting Executive Director, United Nations Human Settlements Programme (UN-Habitat)
- Mr Joel Hernández García, Undersecretary for Multilateral Affairs and Human Rights, Mexico
- Mr Jung Sik Lee, Minister of Employment and Labour, Republic of Korea

The moderator introduced the Partners' Spotlight of the Thematic Dialogue on "Building the resilience of societies", which gave partners of the Global Coalition a platform to showcase their contributions to social justice.

Mr Kamara expressed his delight at participating in the event dedicated to promoting social justice and resilience in societies, which was aligned with the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. President Ouattara of Côte d'Ivoire was committed to those goals, and the country played an active role within the Global Coalition for Social Justice. Recent achievements contributing to social justice included the implementation of various government policies aimed at creating sustainable and protective employment opportunities, and significant steps to enhance working conditions and increase incomes, including the establishment of social safety nets benefiting over 200,000 disadvantaged households. Over 13 million people were registered for universal health coverage and the aim was to increase the figure to 20 million by the end of 2024. From 2022 to 2024, focused efforts had targeted poverty and precarity, particularly in the northern border regions, alongside initiatives to empower jobseekers with necessary skills. In addition, the Government had established robust support systems, including unemployment benefits, housing assistance and retirement provisions, ensuring comprehensive support throughout citizens' lives. He called upon all stakeholders to unite their efforts in building a resilient and sustainable future for all generations to come.

Mr Hellman thanked Mr Hounbo for his leadership in prioritizing social justice globally. Finland was committed to contributing actively to the preparations for the World Social Summit in 2025 and recognized the significant potential of the Global Coalition on Social Justice to contribute to it. Finland supported the Coalition's objectives and efforts. There was a critical need for resilience in societies facing increasing global turbulence. Progress on the SDGs had been insufficient and uneven, hence bold action was urgently needed to enhance the well-being of populations, particularly women, girls, young people and vulnerable groups. Finland advocated for decent work, inclusive labour markets, universal access to health and social services, and social protection as essential strategies to combat poverty and discrimination. The country was committed to sustainable development through a comprehensive approach involving the entire government and society. The “economy of well-being” approach integrated economic, social and ecological dimensions into all political decision-making processes, both domestically and in foreign and development policies. Finland supported the ILO’s Trade for Decent Work Programme in Africa. The country focused on fostering innovation, including technological and social innovations. Policy coherence within the UN and the multilateral system was crucial to promote social justice and decent work effectively, which required cross-governmental strategies. It was time to adapt the social contract to current realities and build resilient economies that fostered inclusive and sustainable well-being within planetary boundaries.

Mr Mlynár commended the ILO for the important initiative. UN-Habitat was collaborating with the ILO on crucial social justice policies, particularly within urban areas, where over 50 per cent of the population and 70 per cent of economic activity resided. Cities thus had a pivotal role in shaping social justice. UN-Habitat’s mission was to ensure universal access to adequate living standards, including housing and basic services, in resilient human settlements conducive to safe, healthy and prosperous lives. The long-standing partnership between UN-Habitat and the ILO focused on enhancing housing and public services in urban settings. He expressed eagerness to renew and strengthen that partnership in pursuit of social justice and a sustainable future. Urban housing and social conditions were pressing priorities for labour movements, and protection of rights was imperative for marginalized groups, such as those in extreme poverty, homelessness or displacement, women, young people and those experiencing discrimination. Three key initiatives highlighted UN-Habitat’s commitment to fostering societal resilience, where collaboration from partners would be welcomed: firstly, the establishment of an intergovernmental expert working group on adequate housing for all under the UN-Habitat Assembly aimed at monitoring efforts and promoting strategies globally; secondly, the Sustainable Urban Resilience for the Next Generation (SURGe) initiative, which integrated climate action across urban sectors like buildings, energy, waste, mobility and water; and thirdly, the Local2030 Coalition, a network supporting SDG implementation at the local level, where local and regional governments were essential partners in advancing social justice. Concluding, he urged participation in empowering local governments with tools, knowledge and networks to effectively serve communities in achieving societal goals.

Mr Hernández García, speaking on behalf of Mexico, Indonesia, the Republic of Korea, Türkiye and Australia (the MIKTA countries), noted that as a result of Indonesia’s recent decision to join the Global Coalition for Social Justice, all five MIKTA countries had become partners. They supported the initiative aimed at intensifying collective efforts to urgently close social justice gaps and accelerate the implementation of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development, including the SDGs and the Decent Work Agenda. All five countries were aligned with the Coalition’s goal to foster cooperation and partnerships to address critical issues, and were committed to developing their activities over time to better serve the cause of social justice. The five countries supported the efforts of the Forum to enhance societal resilience, promote coherence between economic and social policies, and foster social dialogue for shared prosperity. The MIKTA countries welcomed the Forum as a unique opportunity to advance the core objectives of the Global Coalition for Social Justice and invited other countries to join them in the endeavour.

Mr Lee expressed his delight at being part of the inaugural Forum of the Global Coalition. In today’s world, there was increasing complexity and uncertainty due to biological hazards such as COVID-19, climate change, new forms of employment and digitalization. Regrettably, vulnerable groups, especially in low-income countries, were experiencing growing inequalities due to the disproportionate impacts of those challenges. The Global Coalition aiming to minimize inequalities and achieve social justice was a timely initiative to navigate the global challenges. Less than a year from its launch, the Coalition had garnered 284 partners, including 71 governments. The Korean Government had supported the Global Accelerator, a key pillar of the Coalition, even before formally joining. Since 2004, the Republic of Korea had engaged in partnership programmes with the ILO to enhance employment and labour systems in developing countries and strengthen their capacity to implement international labour standards. The Korean Government's commitment to the Global Accelerator included the recent signing of an agreement on 11 June extending the partnership with the ILO for three years and committing an additional US$1.35 million. The Republic of Korea had transitioned from a recipient to a donor country, and international support had been crucial for the country's development after the Korean War. He affirmed the country's commitment to sharing its experiences of economic growth and democratization and providing continued financial support to global initiatives. Looking ahead, the Government of the Republic of Korea would maintain close solidarity and cooperation with the international community, including the ILO through the Global Coalition, to promote fair growth and expand social justice worldwide.

Thematic Dialogue: Improving the coherence between economic and social policies

- Mr Colin E. Jordan, Minister of Labour, Social Security and Third Sector, Barbados
- Mr Boris Zürcher, Secretary of State, State Secretariat for Economic Affairs, Switzerland
- Ms Jacqueline Mugo, Executive Director, Federation of Kenya Employers (FKE)
- Mr Gerardo A. Martínez, General Secretary, Union of Construction Workers of the Republic of Argentina (UOCRA)
- Ms Ngozi Okonjo-Iweala, Director-General, World Trade Organization (WTO)

The moderator opened the Thematic Dialogue on “Improving coherence between economic and social policies for social justice”. The Partners’ Conversation aimed to unpack the complexities of economic policies, identify overlaps with social policies, and explore strategies for inclusive and sustainable economic growth.

Mr Jordan expressed gratitude for the opportunity to discuss the crucial need for coherence between social and economic policies. Governments must focus on improving standards of living and human well-being through integrated policies. Social dialogue among workers, employers, governments and civil society was crucial in understanding the needs of human beings and achieving policy coherence. The instruments developed through such dialogue at the ILO could be used as guiding principles for coherence between social and economic policy. Small island developing States like Barbados needed access to financing. Reform in international financial institutions was needed to better accommodate their needs and perspectives, alongside reform in governance structures to ensure the meaningful participation and recognition of those States’ unique challenges and aspirations. The ILO needed to leverage the Global Coalition for Social Justice and other forums to enhance the visibility and impact of countries pursuing policy coherence and social justice globally.

Mr Zürcher affirmed Switzerland’s strong support for social justice and the Global Coalition, emphasizing the critical role of integrating social justice objectives across the multilateral system. Micro, small and medium-sized enterprises (MSMEs) were economic pillars of many countries and needed an enabling environment to foster sustainable enterprises and create decent jobs. Switzerland, alongside Norway and Italy, proudly backed the ILO’s Productivity Ecosystems for Decent Work approach, which addressed productivity constraints and promoted a fair distribution of gains. He urged more partners to join the initiative, which was supported by a Strategic Advisory Committee comprising the ILO, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD), the World Bank, UN Trade and Development, the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the IOE. Financial institutions played an important role in facilitating the formalization of informal businesses, and policies that enabled access to finance were required. In terms of trade, Switzerland advocated for inclusive policies that benefited all, founded on open and rules-based international trade, including adherence to WTO frameworks and international labour standards. In conclusion, he called on the Global Coalition to enhance understanding of how MSMEs benefited from inclusive trade, and to allow them to increase their market opportunities while also building decent jobs and ensuring that no one is left behind.

Ms Mugo, speaking on behalf of employers, expressed strong support for the Coalition, emphasizing the crucial role of advocacy, policy coherence and knowledge generation through cooperation in addressing issues such as informality, business environment enhancement, and tackling poverty, child labour and youth unemployment. Actionable steps that could be taken to enhance partnerships and cooperation on social and economic policy coherence under the umbrella of the Global Coalition included robust partnerships and resource mobilization to achieve the Coalition's goals; diverse stakeholders could contribute financially. Capacity-building among Coalition partners was important to enhance their effectiveness in driving change on the ground. Additionally, there was a need to foster social dialogue through stakeholder engagement to ensure genuine collaboration on social and economic policy coherence. Information sharing, knowledge exchange and replication of best practices across countries were important to scale up initiatives and promote social justice globally. Lastly, a policy coherence observatory should be established to monitor and evaluate the social and economic impacts of the Coalition's work, aiming to learn from both successes and failures for informed decision-making in the future.

Mr Martínez stressed the importance of innovative approaches to tackle the challenges ahead. The Coalition led by the ILO and tripartite partners was crucial in addressing global inequalities exacerbated by past economic crises such as the 2008 financial downturn and the recent pandemic. He emphasized the need to integrate social justice principles into policy frameworks, not only as governmental or employer demands but also as fundamental values that addressed the concerns of workers globally. Practical mechanisms were needed to align economic goals with social justice imperatives through multilateral cooperation and institutionalized tripartite dialogues. A universal social protection floor should be discussed as a priority by the Global Coalition. Predictability and reliability were important in addressing global inequalities. He reiterated the international union movement's long-standing call for democracy and social justice, and highlighted the role of institutionalized tripartite dialogue in shaping policies to promote inclusive development and reduce wealth disparities globally, especially in regions with significant poverty and inequality.

Ms Okonjo-Iweala emphasized the WTO's commitment to ensuring that trade and investment delivered greater social benefits and reduced inequalities, especially in low-income countries. Highlighting the role of stronger partnerships, including at the multilateral level, she made six points. First, she strongly believed that economic policy should serve social policy and social justice. If economic policy did not serve people, it needed adjustment. Second, there was an often-fraught relationship between trade and labour. Labour saw trade as a threat to jobs and wages, while the trade community viewed labour standards as potential protectionism. That suspicion must be overcome by demonstrating that trade and labour could support each other. Third, the WTO's founding document, the Marrakesh Agreement, aimed to enhance labour standards, create jobs and support sustainable development. That knowledge could change the attitude towards trade of many in the labour community. Fourth, the WTO was determined to link with the labour community, listen to it and explain the WTO's role. That was why the Organization had joined the Coalition for Social Justice. Fifth, trade had lifted 1.5 billion people out of poverty, including hundreds of millions outside China. Trade had been an instrument for inclusion and economic development but had also left some people behind. There was a need to correct that by rethinking trade and complementing trade policies with direct supply-side interventions. Lastly, current challenges in trade included protectionism and geopolitical tensions, but there were also opportunities for “re-globalization” – decentralizing supply chains to include developing countries. That would create jobs and promote social justice. Examples included decentralizing vaccine and semiconductor production to benefit developing countries. Partnerships were crucial, and the WTO was working with various organizations to support small and medium-sized enterprises, bridge the digital divide and transform industries in developing countries. The future of trade was green and digital, but it must also be socially inclusive and serve people.

The moderator asked panellists to share a concrete initiative or action they were prioritizing to strengthen policy coherence and social justice, and how they envisioned collaborating with other Coalition partners.

Mr Jordan highlighted the Bridgetown Initiative, proposed by the Prime Minister of Barbados, which advocated for reform of the international financial system to ensure access to necessary resources for public services. The initiative aimed to ensure sustainable coherence between social and economic development, benefiting the people of small island developing States with limited resources. Scarcity of funding should not force countries to choose between servicing high debt and providing essential services such as healthcare and education.

Mr Zürcher stated that Switzerland viewed the Coalition as both an incubator and accelerator for social justice initiatives and partnerships. Better coherence between trade and social policy was vital; Switzerland and other partners incorporated social sustainability provisions in free trade agreements. There was great potential for multilateral collaboration, particularly between the ILO and the WTO, which currently lacked a formal cooperation framework. He expressed hope that the Coalition would play a significant role in accelerating those efforts.

Ms Mugo stated that a key role of an employers’ organization was to influence the business environment through advocacy and engagement with the government and social partners. That aimed to create a conducive environment for keeping people in jobs, growing the economy and strengthening enterprises. There was a strong correlation between social aspects and the economy, and it was important to support enterprises through regulations, policies and laws. Kenya and other developing economies, had a large informal economy and enterprises needed help to scale up. She also advocated for recognizing and rewarding employers and businesses that promote best practices, emphasizing the creation of decent jobs to improve livelihoods and lift people socially.

Mr Martínez emphasized the importance of the debate, noting that the current tripartite dialogue focused on employment. Employers and workers had stressed that the financial system must create decent work and generate jobs to improve living conditions worldwide. Global development cooperation should involve various countries to generate social justice through socio-economic policies to bridge existing inequalities. Trade unions were a crucial part of that debate, being the voice of demand and understanding the best tools to resolve current global dilemmas. There was a need to institutionalize tripartite dialogue at the global, regional and national levels to guarantee sustainability and create a hopeful reality.

Ms Okonjo-Iweala stated that the WTO was prioritizing helping poorer cotton-growing countries in West Africa to improve living standards and create jobs by developing the cotton value chain locally. The Cotton Partnership initiative involved partnerships with international organizations such as the ILO, the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO), the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), the private sector, civil society and governments to establish manufacturing facilities and invest in the region. Success in that partnership could be replicated elsewhere. Progress in collaboration with the ILO included a memorandum of understanding and ongoing efforts, including its joining the social justice platform.

The moderator thanked the panellists for their valuable insights on social dialogue, collaboration in trade, and financial investment to improve coherence in economic and social policies for social justice.

(b) Partners' Spotlight

Moderator

- Ms Yvonne Ndege

Speakers

- Ms Karien Van Gennip, Deputy Prime Minister, Minister of Social Affairs and Employment, Netherlands
- Mr Kamel Maddouri, Minister of Social Affairs, Tunisia
- Ms Florence Bore, Minister of Labour and Social Protection, Kenya
- Mr Alok Chandra, Senior Labour and Employment Adviser, Ministry of Labour and Employment, India
- Ms Anousheh Karvar, Delegate of the French Government to the ILO, France
- Mr Oliver Röpke, President, European Economic and Social Committee (EESC)
- Mr Pradeep Wagle, Chief, Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR)

The moderator welcomed everyone to the Partners' Spotlight on improving coherence between economic and social policies for social justice, which aimed to provide partners with an opportunity to showcase concrete initiatives for advancing social justice through collaborative efforts.

Ms Van Gennip expressed gratitude for the Forum and for the establishment of the Global Coalition for Social Justice. Societal inequalities had increased, therefore cohesive societies were needed to address challenges such as climate change, migration, artificial intelligence, ageing populations and geopolitical factors. Prioritizing social justice and decent work was essential for equitable growth. The Forum was an opportunity to expand cooperation and seek collective solutions. She highlighted three key considerations. Firstly, policies should be people-centric, providing equal opportunities and fair chances for decent work. That approach ensured that everyone had a fair chance at making a living through decent work. Secondly, integrating the social agenda with economic and financial agendas was crucial for achieving inclusive economies and labour markets, and just transitions. Examples included lifelong learning, investing in skills for digital and green transitions, and ensuring fair wages. A tripartite agreement within the ILO on the concept of living wages would benefit workers directly and also provide security and purchasing power, thereby supporting broader economic development. Thirdly, it was essential to have broader cooperation by transcending existing coalitions and partnerships to achieve the SDGs. International cooperation and partnerships were vital; working in silos was not an option. The interconnectedness of the SDGs required close collaboration at all levels and for every individual. The Netherlands was a proud supporter of the Global Coalition for Social Justice and applauded cooperation between the ILO and international financial institutions such as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. It was crucial to connect the social, trade and economic dimensions of development. Countries could only prosper if all citizens were doing well. There was now a collective responsibility for partners to deliver on their promise.

Mr Maddouri expressed his delight at participating in the inaugural Forum. Integrating and ensuring cohesion among social, political and economic policies was crucial to meet individuals' needs. There was a need to review globalization and return to the foundational principles of the WTO, to guarantee decent work and living standards. International and regional collaboration was crucial for paving the way towards good socio-economic policies. Inequalities and social exclusion were major challenges, therefore social policy must be cross-cutting and fundamental to economic policies to achieve economic justice and a just transition for all societal groups. In Tunisia, the concept of social justice was integrated into the Constitution, reflecting the Government's commitment to aligning social, economic and political policies towards decent work and fundamental rights. Social policies were at the heart of economic policies and were human-centred, with a focus on extending social coverage, ensuring a just transition and promoting job market access for all. Tunisia had implemented the Social Protection Floors Recommendation, 2012 (No. 202), to guarantee a minimum income, pensions and benefits for various societal groups. The Government had also focused efforts on formalization, improving occupational safety and health, and enhancing social security through capacity-building programmes. Tunisia aimed to be a social State based on decent work, social security and the fight against inequalities, to guarantee the well-being of all members of society. The country intended to focus on true cohesion of the various social, economic and other policies, striving to achieve the SDGs.

Ms Bore provided an overview of Kenya's efforts in addressing social justice deficits and accelerating the implementation of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development and the Decent Work Agenda, as a partner of the Global Coalition for Social Justice. Kenya had formulated various policies and legislation to create an enabling environment for businesses, enhance labour protection and job creation, and empower the community. It had developed a wages and remuneration policy aimed at achieving macroeconomic stability, equity, productivity, enterprise competitiveness, and sustainable employment creation and retention. The country had also re-engineered its social dialogue institutions, including the National Labour Board and sectoral councils for wages, skills development and social protection. It had put in place the National Labour Migration Policy, which promoted inclusive, sustainable development through safe, orderly and productive labour migration, maximizing the participation of Kenyan migrant workers in economic development. A policy on recognition of prior learning aimed to mitigate challenges faced by disadvantaged individuals lacking certification, providing formal education opportunities and contributing to socio-economic transformation. Further key Government actions included revising labour laws to align with the national Constitution, integrating robust labour market information systems, implementing a green economy strategy to combat climate change, establishing National Guidelines for Sector Skills Committees to enhance labour market relevance, and promoting the National Skills Development Policy aimed at fostering a skilled workforce capable of sustainable socio-economic development. Additionally, efforts to reform Kenya's justice system included educating judges on international labour standards to ensure fairness and equitable access to justice. Lastly, initiatives were ongoing to review and develop social protection policies, including the National Policy on Family Promotion and Protection, the National Policy on the Elimination of Child Labour, the Policy on Persons with Disabilities, and the Older Persons Bill. Those initiatives were designed to enhance quality of life, boost productivity and foster economic progress. In order to realize social justice for all, it was important to involve everyone from the initial stages of policy development to implementation, supported by monitoring and evaluation mechanisms, and adopting a bottom-up approach as articulated in Kenya's national policy framework, the Bottom-Up Economic Transformation Agenda 2022–2027. She suggested that partners could adopt a similar approach to move forward in the quest for social justice.

Mr Chadra commended the ILO Director-General for his initiative promoting decent work and social justice. India viewed economic prosperity and social well-being as intrinsically interconnected, and essential for achieving sustainable development and justice globally. While economic and social policies were often seen as separate, India believed them to be interdependent. Economic growth, vital for prosperity, must be inclusive and equitable to benefit all segments of society. Conversely, social policies addressing inequality and human development required a robust economic foundation for sustainability. Despite those synergies, achieving coherence between economic and social policies remained challenging. India's development paradigm centred on inclusive growth and equity, linking economic progress with social inclusion. Initiatives such as financial inclusion, infrastructure development and targeted investments aimed to create an enabling environment for inclusive growth. Welfare programmes, including the Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Programme, provided employment and support for vulnerable populations, improving human development alongside economic growth. Moreover, India had implemented specific measures such as extending maternity benefits to 26 weeks for employed women. Education and skills development were pivotal in bridging economic and social gaps, empowering individuals to engage productively in the economy. India also prioritized sustainable development through initiatives such as the National Clean Air Programme and the International Solar Alliance, balancing economic growth with environmental stewardship and social equity. He urged members of the Global Coalition for Social Justice to reaffirm their commitment to collaborative efforts, breaking down silos and integrating economic and social initiatives into a cohesive framework for development.

Ms Karvar underscored France's steadfast support for the Global Coalition for Social Justice since its inception. Social justice was central to France's approach, which included equitable resource redistribution and universal access to essential services such as education, healthcare and social protection as key priorities. France actively participated in global initiatives promoting jobs and social protection, including a project in Senegal aimed at developing a universal social protection system. Social protection was a fundamental human right and addressed multiple determinants of decent work and health, including poverty and education, while enhancing societal resilience during crises and reducing income disparities. Gender equality was a critical focus, and France had undertaken efforts through feminist diplomacy and ratification of ILO Conventions to combat discrimination. The country advocated for policies integrating gender perspectives to reduce inequalities in health, education and justice, particularly for vulnerable groups. Furthermore, it emphasized respect for fundamental rights in business practices globally in its national laws, the European Union (EU) Corporate Sustainability Due Diligence Directive and commitments to eliminate child labour, forced labour and modern slavery through alliances such as Alliance 8.7. Coherence among economic, social and environmental policies was vital for a sustainable and equitable future, and all international actors must take concerted action to achieve that goal. France had secured commitments at the G7 summit and forged initiatives such as the Paris Pact for People and the Planet to foster global cooperation. The Global Coalition for Social Justice provided an opportunity to lay the groundwork for a more inclusive and prosperous world, contingent upon strong political will, close collaboration with social partners, and unwavering dedication to the principles of justice and equity.

Mr Röpke praised Mr Hounbo's initiative, of which the EESC had been an early supporter, as a commitment to promoting social justice globally. The EESC focused on quality work as central to social justice, addressing challenges posed by digitalization and platform work, such as inadequate social protection and health risks. The EESC stood ready to support the ILO in developing guidelines for those evolving work environments. Investment in occupational safety and health was crucial for workers' well-being and sustainable social security systems. The EESC would gladly share its expertise on occupational safety and health legislation in the context of the Conference discussion on biological hazards. Eliminating violence against women was imperative for coherence between economic and social policy, hence the ILO Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190), and the recent EU Directive on combating violence against women and domestic violence must be implemented without delay. The EESC had pledged to promote global social standards through domestic advisory groups and enhance cooperation with the ILO on monitoring standards in EU trade agreements. Ensuring sustainability in global supply chains and realizing labour rights as human rights were essential, which required measures such as mandatory due diligence and international treaties. He reaffirmed the Coalition's potential for cross-border collaboration to advance social justice globally.

Mr Wagle highlighted the partnership of the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights with the Coalition. The Human Rights Economy concept launched by his Office aimed at addressing structural injustice, promoting human rights and fostering a more equitable and sustainable future. The world had experienced the adverse effects of economic and social policies that had neglected universally shared values and human rights principles, exacerbating poverty and income inequalities globally. Economic growth alone could not mitigate inequality, hence economic policies must be anchored in human rights to ensure equality and non-discrimination. His Office believed that prioritizing human rights in economic policies could significantly contribute to positive outcomes. Many States were undertaking efforts to integrate human rights into policy frameworks, and there was a need for conscious design and assessment of policies from a human rights perspective. He invited participants to collaborate to build a human rights economy to orient policies towards universal norms grounded in human rights principles. He expressed hope that the Coalition would serve as a platform to align economic and social policies with international human rights, labour rights and social justice frameworks.

The moderator thanked the speakers for their significant contributions to the Partners' Spotlight, and closed the Thematic Dialogue on "Improving coherence between economic and social policies for social justice".

Thematic Dialogue: Fostering social dialogue for shared prosperity

- Mr Pablo Zenteno, Director, National Labour Directorate, Chile
- Mr Utoni Nujoma, Minister of Labour, Industrial Relations and Employment Creation, Namibia
- Mr Daniel Funes de Rioja, President, Industrial Organization of Argentina
- Ms Elly Rosita Silaban, President of the National Executive Board of the Confederation of Indonesian Trade Unions
- Mr Apostolos Xyrafis, Secretary General, International Association of Economic and Social Councils and Similar Institutions
- Mr Nicolas Schmit, Commissioner for Jobs and Social Rights, European Commission

The moderator welcomed the audience to the third Thematic Dialogue of the day, entitled "Fostering social dialogue for shared prosperity". She underscored the importance of social dialogue in shaping labour and economic policies and empowering workers and businesses.

Mr Zenteno, speaking on behalf of the Minister of Labour and Social Security of Chile, emphasized the country's strong commitment to the Global Coalition for Social Justice. He expressed gratitude to the Director-General for prioritizing social justice and aligning it with the SDGs. Chile was highly committed to creating decent work, tripartism and social dialogue, and was implementing reforms to ensure that social justice was a cornerstone of its legislative agenda. Through social dialogue, Chile had reduced the working week to 40 hours and had ratified Convention No. 190, which had been integrated into national law. It had also just ratified the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176). The Government had focused on regional public policies driven by social dialogue. Emphasizing the effectiveness of social justice as a tool for progress, he reaffirmed Chile's commitment to advancing initiatives aligned with the SDGs and its support for the Global Coalition for Social Justice.

Mr Nujoma began by highlighting Namibia's efforts since its independence in 1990 to dismantle discriminatory practices inherited from the apartheid era. The country was committed to advancing the economic and social status of its predominantly black population, including marginalized groups such as women, persons with disabilities, youth and ethnic minorities. In Namibia, social dialogue, rooted in freedom of association and collective bargaining rights, played a critical role in fostering robust labour relations and promoting collaboration among stakeholders. The country's Constitution contained provisions for independent trade unions safeguarding workers' rights. Namibia had ratified key ILO Conventions, including the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). The Government and social partners actively engaged in social dialogue through tripartite bodies such as the Labour Advisory Council, the Employment Equity Commission and the Employment Services Board, aiming to build consensus on labour laws, policies and regulations. Addressing inequality and promoting inclusivity in the labour market were central to Namibia's agenda, focusing on eliminating barriers to employment and enhancing labour market efficiency. Despite challenges such as a union density of only 20.6 per cent, the Government's efforts to foster collaborative agreements between trade unions, employers and sectors had resulted in sectoral collective agreements governing employment conditions and wages. He concluded by affirming Namibia's commitment to collaborative efforts with employers and trade unions, ensuring that constitutional guarantees of workers' basic rights were upheld. That task was not easy but was crucial to addressing high inequalities and bridging the great divide between people that had been inherited from colonialism.

Mr Funes de Rioja expressed strong support for the Coalition, which was needed to harmonize economic and social policies. In Argentina, dialogue and consensus-building were indispensable in addressing economic challenges. In his extensive experience with the ILO and representing employers internationally, the focus had shifted towards integrating real economy stakeholders into policy decisions affecting production and labour globally. The real economy was often an informal economy, particularly in developing countries but also among G20 nations. Employers had an important role in contributing to vital debates on labour market improvements and productivity enhancements, crucial for societal progress. It was critical to have substantive action beyond rhetoric, and tripartism and social dialogue were essential mechanisms to foster effective policymaking and translate ideals into tangible outcomes on the ground. In Argentina, collaborative efforts with trade unions had averted mass lay-offs, illustrating the efficacy of crisis management through inclusive dialogue. Global economic crises had profound impacts on real economies and production, and governments had a responsibility to foster conditions conducive to social dialogue. The Coalition's role was to facilitate meaningful exchanges and foster goodwill among stakeholders.

Ms Silaban underscored the critical importance of robust social dialogue among employers' and workers' organizations, governments and civil society to effectively address societal challenges. In 1919, the founders of the ILO had recognized the pivotal roles of governments, employers and trade unions in shaping social and economic development grounded in social justice principles. Social dialogue was a cornerstone for improving working and living conditions. Key issues vital to workers' welfare included job quality, social protection, workplace safety, living wages and decent working hours, as referenced in the 2019 report of the Global Commission on the Future of Work. Countries where social dialogue thrived and collective bargaining agreements were respected tended to enjoy broader societal support and sustainable economic development. Conversely, restrictions on trade union voices could exacerbate tensions and social conflicts. Amid multiple global crises, fostering strong social dialogue at all levels was crucial not only for economic prosperity but also for maintaining peace. Solidarity and equitable redistribution were outcomes of effective dialogue. Indonesia had been developing a comprehensive social protection system, and the trade union movement played an ongoing role in ensuring its inclusivity and effectiveness. All stakeholders in the Global Coalition for Social Justice must uphold the fundamental rights of freedom of association and collective bargaining enshrined in ILO Conventions Nos 87 and 98 as essential components of democratic practice and equitable governance.

Mr Xyrafis expressed gratitude for the opportunity to advocate for the "difficult sport" of social dialogue. He had been involved since 1996 in shaping Greece's economic and social culture. In 1999, the International Association of Economic and Social Councils and Similar Institutions was founded, which had grown to 70 members globally. The Association had shown resilience in fostering collaboration among its diverse members despite challenges to multilateralism. National social dialogue bodies contributed to shaping and monitoring countries' plans to achieve the Goals of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. Such bodies played a key role in influencing policy priorities and enhancing the effectiveness of policy implementation through consultation and advisory functions. There was a diversity of social dialogue models worldwide, but the most effective model was one tailored to each country's specific needs and context. While social dialogue institutions typically served as consultative bodies offering advice and reports to executive and legislative bodies, the potential for successful policy outcomes was increased when their recommendations were taken into account. In conclusion, he advocated for the integral role of social dialogue in advancing global agendas such as the SDGs, and its potential to enhance policy coherence and societal progress through inclusive governance practices.

Mr Schmit expressed gratitude to the ILO for launching the Global Coalition for Social Justice, underscoring that the historic Declaration of Philadelphia indicated that there could be no peace without social justice. Social dialogue had been a fundamental component within the EU since the days of its predecessor, the European Coal and Steel Community. With 27 diverse EU Member States, social dialogue had since evolved. Former European Commission President Jacques Delors had played a pivotal role in revitalizing social dialogue within the EU, stressing its dual importance in achieving a strong economy and a fair social environment. A recent Council Recommendation aimed to reinvigorate social dialogue at multiple levels to address contemporary challenges such as technological shifts and climate policies. The EU had more than 40 sectoral social dialogues, where stakeholders discussed sector-specific issues and proposed solutions. The EU's framework allowed social partners to propose solutions adopted by Member States, which was a collaborative approach to improving social and economic conditions. Furthermore, an EU Directive on adequate minimum wages emphasized the role of collective bargaining in ensuring fair wages and strengthening social dialogue across governance levels. Lastly, the EU was committed to advancing social justice through dynamic and inclusive social dialogue practices.

The moderator invited the panellists to share their thoughts and key takeaways on the Forum in a brief statement.

Mr Funes de Rioja emphasized the importance of social dialogue as an instrument for advancing beyond mere discussion to concrete agendas, proposals and agreements. At the G20 summit in Japan, he had learned of the concept of "Society 5.0", which underscored the need to prepare societies for technological and societal changes, particularly those impacting youth employment. His organization had drafted a white paper outlining proposals for enhancing production, productivity and competitiveness. Reforms were needed to modernize outdated legislation and enhance employability, which required collaborative efforts between government, employers and workers to meet the demands of a transformed economy. Believing in and practising robust social dialogue were essential for driving meaningful societal transformations and preparing future business leaders and workers for emerging challenges and opportunities.

Mr Xyrafis highlighted that social dialogue could take various forms, including bipartite, tripartite, or tripartite plus civil society. Social dialogue addressed not only labour or industrial relations but also broader societal issues. Drawing from John Rawls' concept of achieving social justice, he advocated for incremental steps and finding common ground among diverse stakeholders to foster a just society.

The moderator asked panellists to indicate concrete actions or the priority for the Coalition.

Mr Nujoma, recalling Mr Schmit's reference to the acknowledgement in the Declaration of Philadelphia that social justice was essential for peace, asked fellow panellists how social justice could be accelerated to address global challenges such as violent conflicts, high informality and youth unemployment, which were especially prevalent in Africa.

Mr Zenteno noted that social dialogue was crucial for finding solutions collectively to the global challenges posed by technological change, wars, climate issues and new social divisions. In Chile, specific challenges meant that reform of the pension system reform and collective bargaining was necessary, for which social dialogue could come up with proposals. It was important to demonstrate the effectiveness of those mechanisms to citizens to maintain credibility and legitimacy. He underscored the importance of committing to the original mandate of the ILO as advocated by the Director-General.

Ms Silaban emphasized the importance of ensuring that global agreements extended beyond meetings to include follow-up and implementation. The Coalition was a new entity needing continuous adjustment, adaptation and serious engagement from all involved. There was a need for justice at the national level, and all stakeholders had a role to play in finding solutions collectively for the benefit of humanity. True justice started with effective implementation in each country.

Mr Schmit expressed optimism and high expectations for the Global Coalition for Social Justice in the face of global challenges such as climate change, conflicts, technological advancements and societal inequalities. International collaboration, rather than conflict, was needed to address them. The upcoming World Social Summit in 2025 was a crucial opportunity to initiate significant global change, aiming to unite societies from the North and South in combating inequalities. He expressed confidence in the Coalition's ability to achieve those goals with the collective efforts of its members.

Mr Xyrafis noted that the essence of action was raising awareness and building trust among stakeholders to tackle global challenges, particularly focusing on combating inequalities as a pathway to achieving social justice. Practical actions rather than mere words were needed, as progress had been slow in addressing those issues globally. His Association had held a meeting in Athens with 40 delegations from economic, social and civil institutions worldwide, leading to a joint declaration. Furthermore, a recent visit to Abidjan had monitored implementation and gathered new ideas from the African continent. He committed to continuing such efforts to raise awareness and foster collaboration on those critical issues.

Mr Funes de Rioja emphasized the Coalition's role in promoting and stimulating action to create an environment conducive to fostering social dialogue among stakeholders. Varied approaches were needed rather than a uniform solution. It was important to set examples that resonated with people.

The moderator thanked the panel for their insights in the Partners' Conversation on fostering social dialogue for shared prosperity.

(b) Partners' SpotlightModerator

- Ms Femi Oke

Speakers

- Mr Yiannis Panayiotou, Minister of Labour and Social Insurance, Cyprus
- Mr Daniel Ysaú Maurate Romero, Minister of Labour and Employment Promotion, Peru
- Mr Alexander Astorga Monge, Deputy Minister of Labour and Social Security, Costa Rica
- Ms Thea Lee, Deputy Undersecretary for International Labor Affairs, Department of Labor, United States of America
- Mr Arshad Mahmood, Federal Secretary, Ministry of Overseas Pakistanis and Human Resource Development, Pakistan
- Ms Kareen Jabre, Director, Division of Programmes, Inter-Parliamentary Union (IPU)

The moderator opened the Partners' Spotlight on fostering social dialogue for shared prosperity.

Mr Panayiotou underscored the enduring commitment of the Government of Cyprus to social justice as a foundational element for universal and lasting peace, a principle upheld steadfastly for more than a century. Achieving peace within and between nations, alongside the progress and prosperity of humanity, necessitated a fair distribution of the benefits of peace through equitable employment, working conditions and wages. Central to his Government's vision was the role of evidence-based social dialogue and results-oriented policymaking. Those practices were essential for social partners and political leaders to collaboratively develop and implement policies that upheld social justice in the evolving labour market landscape. While political commitment through rhetoric was crucial, it must be complemented by concrete actions and outcomes. As a proud member of the Global Coalition for Social Justice, the Government of Cyprus affirmed its dedication to advancing fair wages, robust pensions and adequate income support for its citizens actively engaged in the labour market. He expressed confidence in the Coalition's ability to succeed, highlighting the imperative of raising awareness among high-level policymakers and equipping them with effective tools for socially just policymaking. His Government took a proactive stance in collaborating closely with the ILO and other Coalition members. He expressed optimism that the country's initiatives, developed in partnership with the ILO, would contribute positively to the Coalition's ambitious objectives moving forward.

Mr Maurate Romero expressed appreciation for the opportunity for the Government of Peru to participate in the Global Coalition for Social Justice and highlighted the pressing issues of poverty, unemployment and inadequate work conditions as critical facets of social injustice. In 2015, the UN General Assembly had adopted the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development, with ambitious aims for social, environmental and economic advancement among Member States. For a well-defined pathway from current challenges to future goals, specific, actionable initiatives were needed within the Coalition. Achieving measurable outcomes was essential to gauge progress effectively. Ongoing social dialogue among workers, employers and governments played a pivotal role, which required adaptive strategies that could yield concrete results in addressing societal challenges. The success of the Global Coalition for Social Justice hinged on its ability to identify and implement effective pathways towards eradicating poverty, unemployment, informality, forced labour and child labour. Measurable results and adaptive social dialogue were essential in steering the Coalition towards tangible and sustainable impacts on a global scale.

Mr Astorga Monge enthusiastically welcomed the Global Coalition for Social Justice as a critical forum to address global challenges affecting partner countries. Global solutions were needed for issues such as artificial intelligence, evolving labour practices and climate change, and tripartite social dialogue and joint efforts were essential tools. Costa Rica's efforts within the Coalition focused on institutionalizing tripartite social dialogue forums and strengthening public labour policies. Recent initiatives by the Higher Council for Labour had prioritized decent work, including freedom of association, collective bargaining and occupational safety and health. Costa Rica was committed to combating labour-related health issues and managing labour migration flows while upholding human rights. Important measures included formalizing work, enhancing social security in new labour environments and eliminating child labour to promote safe and decent working conditions. Costa Rica attributed its robust policies for social justice to effective tripartite social dialogue. The Government was confident in the ability of the Coalition to advance initiatives through collaborative efforts to address global challenges and capitalize on emerging opportunities. Costa Rica was committed to sharing its experience within the Global Coalition for Social Justice, where tripartite social dialogue would be key to fostering inclusive policies and sustainable development aligned with SDGs.

Ms Lee enthusiastically welcomed the participation of the Government of the United States in the inaugural Forum of the Global Coalition for Social Justice, emphasizing the significance of social dialogue as the cornerstone for inclusive policymaking. All available tools and resources should be leveraged to improve conditions for working people and their families worldwide. Freedom of association and collective bargaining had a fundamental role not only for economic growth but also for upholding human rights, strengthening democratic institutions and ensuring fair competition. The Coalition's focus on social dialogue was pivotal to achieving its objectives effectively. The United States had introduced the Research, Innovation and Strategic Engagement (RISE) project, a collaborative effort with the ILO aimed at advancing freedom of association and collective bargaining globally, which sought to bolster policy frameworks, enhance organizational capacities and introduce innovative strategies at the global, national and sectoral levels. She expressed optimism that RISE would foster collaboration and spark new partnerships worldwide to advance those critical rights. She concluded by congratulating the ILO and its Director-General on the successful launch of the Coalition.

Mr Mahmood highlighted the Government of Pakistan's robust efforts to advance social dialogue and welfare policies aimed at improving the lives of workers, including policy, legal, financial and institutional interventions. Key initiatives included the imminent introduction of a national immigration and welfare policy focused on the welfare of immigrant and domestic workers and enhanced social safety nets. The Government was also committed to improving workplace safety standards, particularly in high-risk sectors such as mines and healthcare, drawing from lessons learned in Decent Work Country Programmes. Recent fiscal measures, such as a significant increase in the minimum wage and allocations to social safety nets, had been announced to bolster worker protections and economic stability. The Government had pledged to ratify international labour Conventions and enhance the National Industrial Relations Commission to resolve pending labour union issues swiftly. Plans were under way to expand health and crop insurance, facilitate credit for potential immigrants, and collaborate with the ILO's International Training Centre to boost workforce efficiency. The Government had expressed unwavering commitment to the Global Coalition for Social Justice, and remained dedicated to tackling poverty, inequality and injustice through “tripartite plus” social dialogue.

Ms Jabre expressed gratitude for the launch of the Coalition for Social Justice, emphasizing the long-standing cooperation between the ILO and the IPU, which brought together 180 national assemblies globally, in advocating for social justice through legislative and oversight functions. Social justice was intrinsic to the work of parliaments, underpinning their engagement within the Global Coalition. The IPU’s efforts spanned global, regional and national levels, focusing on issues such as inequality, discrimination, and workers’ rights as human rights. The IPU facilitated dialogue among policymakers, developed parliamentary strategies and supported concrete actions at national levels to advance social justice. Inclusive decision-making was crucial, hence parliaments had a responsibility to engage citizens and ensure that their voices, especially those of women, youth, minorities and vulnerable groups, were heard. The IPU’s initiatives aimed to foster democratic participation and contribute to social dialogue and justice through political will and inclusive frameworks. She reiterated the IPU’s commitment to contributing to the efforts of the Global Coalition and looked forward to pursuing initiatives to raise awareness and engage policymakers to use their powers to make a difference.

The moderator asked the panellists to describe in a nutshell their mood at the very first Forum of the Global Coalition for Social Justice.

Mr Panayiotou felt very optimistic because, after a long period during which social justice had not been a part of the public debate, there was currently a move back to basics.

Ms Jabre said that she was really looking forward to embarking on the new initiative.

Mr Mahmood pointed to the importance of respect for difference of opinion and merit-based decision-making.

Ms Lee felt a sense of unity.

Mr Astorga Monge felt hopeful that partners would achieve great things with the Coalition.

Mr Maurate Romero stressed that social dialogue must include those who did not yet have a voice.

The moderator inquired whether partners already had examples of working together, bilaterally or multilaterally, since the start of the Coalition in November 2023.

Ms Lee commented that the United States Government was proud to have joined the Coalition with both employers’ and workers’ organizations. She looked forward to learning from them and hoped to live up to their social dialogue commitment.

Mr Mahmood explained that Pakistan had reinvigorated tripartite committees at the federal and provincial levels, which had had extensive sessions listening to the counterpoint of views and building a consensus, aiming to translate into efficiency and standard operating procedures.

Ms Jabre noted that the IPU was part of the Global Alliance to End Statelessness. It was important to acknowledge the added value of each Coalition partner, to identify the opportunities and to work together in good faith and based on trust.

The moderator thanked the partners for sharing their thoughts and their efforts to encourage others to join the Global Coalition for Social Justice.

Official closing

- Address by Mr Navid Hanif, Assistant Secretary-General for Economic Development, United Nations Department of Economic and Social Affairs
- Address by Mr Roberto Suárez Santos, Secretary-General, International Organisation of Employers (IOE)
- Address by Mr Luc Triangle, General Secretary, International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC)
- Address by Mr Tedros Adhanom Ghebreyesus, Director-General, World Health Organization (WHO)
- Address by Mr Gilbert F. Hounbo, ILO Director-General, Co-Chair of the Coordinating Group
- Address by Mr Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, President of Brazil, representing the Government of Brazil as Co-Chair of the Coordinating Group

The President of the Conference thanked the moderators, panellists and spotlighted partners for their enriching discussions, and welcomed President Lula of Brazil, representing the Government of Brazil as Co-Chair of the Coordinating Group of the Global Coalition. He then invited the distinguished guests to make their concluding addresses.

Mr Hanif said that it was an honour to deliver closing remarks and represent the UN Secretary-General at the inaugural Forum of the Global Coalition for Social Justice. He recalled Nelson Mandela's speech at the International Labour Conference 34 years previously, in which he had emphasized cooperation, peace, friendship and social progress.

The Forum reflected a renewed system aiming to leave no one behind, reinforcing the concept that social justice is essential for peaceful, prosperous and inclusive societies. He congratulated the ILO Director-General for leading the initiative, which highlighted the connection between peace and justice.

The ILO had been built on the premise of social justice, and the Declaration of Philadelphia stated that poverty anywhere constituted a danger to prosperity everywhere. There was a critical need to address contemporary challenges such as inequality, discrimination, exclusion, climate change, technological disruptions and the absence of peace through social justice. The collective resolve to turn dialogue into tangible progress was heartening and would accelerate the implementation of the SDGs.

Social justice was necessary to correct the course of sustainable development, foster global stability and prosperity, and uphold human rights. That called for a renewed social contract based on trust, justice, inclusion and human rights. The Coalition had great potential to address the needs of unemployed youth and persons with disabilities globally, and of those excluded due to their race, origin or religion, or because they were poor.

He urged partners to continue to cooperate, undertake collective actions, forge partnerships and hold each other accountable at the outcome of the Forum, and invited them to participate in the upcoming World Summit for Social Development and the Summit of the Future, aiming to place social development at the heart of all policies. The UN stood ready to support the Coalition in every possible way, providing a platform for collaboration, a voice for advocacy and a framework for accountability.

He concluded by invoking President Mandela's vision urging the dismantling of all forms of apartheid through promoting values based on social justice, where every individual, regardless of their background or circumstances, could lead a life of dignity, equality and opportunity.

Mr Suárez Santos explained why employers actively engaged in the Global Coalition for Social Justice. Representing over 50 million companies worldwide, the IOE vocally supported social justice, but recognized that not all business and political actors were as vocal. Employers supported the values of the ILO at the origins of the Organization and in the Declaration of Philadelphia, firmly believing that labour is not a commodity. In 1998, they had made a further commitment to social justice in the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work (1998), as amended in 2022, which had been followed by the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization (2008), as amended in 2022, and the ILO Declaration for the Future of Work in 2019.

Employers could not be neutral on issues such as decent jobs, education, skills, health, diversity and social protection. Despite significant progress, over 60 per cent of the global workforce remained in the informal economy, with weak institutions and corruption, with badly framed regulations, and without decent work opportunities. The lack of access to primary education for 72 million children and the nearly 800 million adults who were illiterate were unacceptable. Digital tools were important for education and training, but a third of humanity remained unconnected. Gender inequality and lack of opportunities for women were not acceptable either. Access to health was critical, as seen during the pandemic, yet half the global population lacked essential health services.

Employers viewed sustainable social protection schemes as investments, not costs. The risks of inadequate social protection had been witnessed during the pandemic. It was unsustainable and risky for businesses, locally and globally, that half of the population still did not benefit from social protection incomes. Freedom of association was also crucial, and employers opposed any backlash against the rights to associate and to freedom of expression.

There was a need for multilateralism, engaging with the UN and other global discussions, and building efficient partnerships based on common objectives and trust. Employers' engagement went beyond financial contributions, to bring expertise, knowledge and innovation. An environment that supported business growth and development was key, but was lacking in many countries due to inadequate regulations, excessive barriers, a lack of incentives and ideological prejudice, which particularly affected small and medium-sized enterprises.

The profound transformations in global growth, business and new technologies, including artificial intelligence, required a new mindset, which was also essential for partnerships. He expressed his expectation that the Coalition would foster powerful partnerships to address job disruption and the opportunities arising from digital and climate change policies. He strongly supported the Coalition's role in enhancing advocacy, promoting policy coherence and generating knowledge through cooperation, as it was essential for society and beneficial for business and employers. In concluding, he thanked the ILO for its instrumental role in creating a strong foundation to effect real change, which could count on the strong commitment of employers.

Mr Triangle, speaking on behalf of the ITUC representing over 200 million workers worldwide, noted the distinguished speakers' strong support for the Global Coalition for Social Justice. Their contributions had highlighted the Coalition's crucial role in tackling global challenges such as political instability, escalating conflicts, rising inequality, climate disasters and pandemics.

The ITUC and workers globally strongly supported the Coalition, whose objective was social justice, a core mandate of the ILO. Social justice should guide all international, economic and financial policies. The world needed a new social contract aimed at rebuilding trust in governments, creating decent and climate-friendly jobs with just transitions, ensuring rights for all workers, providing living wages, and offering universal social protection, equality and inclusion.

The UN Secretary-General had undertaken initiatives that aligned with those goals, particularly the Global Accelerator on Jobs and Social Protection for Just Transitions, which placed the social contract at their core. There was a need to build on those initiatives to achieve a new social contract leading to social justice.

Commitments were needed at both the national and international levels to finance social policies. Such financing was not a cost, but an investment with high returns. Social justice could not be achieved without a transparent and multilateral debt relief architecture, improved global governance on taxation, reform of international financial institutions, and increased ambition for reallocating special drawing rights to support an SDG-led recovery and resilience in developing countries. All investments must be aligned with the objectives of social justice, the SDGs and the Decent Work Agenda.

Social dialogue played a pivotal role in achieving social justice and sustainable development. Multilateralism was at stake, amid deep distrust towards global institutions and strong divisions within the international community. The ITUC remained committed to multilateralism and supported the UN as the peak multilateral body. A truly inclusive multilateral system where social partners were involved through real social dialogue would pave the way to social justice and sustainable development. The Second World Social Summit on Social Development represented a key opportunity to advance the pillars of a new social contract and achieve social justice. The role of social dialogue and tripartism must be recognized in the Summit's outcomes as essential governance tools for social development and achieving the SDGs.

A rights-based development model and a truly inclusive multilateral system were needed to address the current imbalance of power and wealth, using social dialogue as a key means of achieving social justice. Workers were delighted to join forces within the Global Coalition with those ready to contribute to delivering social justice for more people. He acknowledged the governments and other parties that had already joined the initiative and urged many more to join as a priority. He concluded by emphasizing the importance of collective action in delivering social justice, as workers, societies and the world needed it.

Mr Tedros expressed his gratitude to President Lula for his unwavering commitment to social justice, and his dedication to equality and solidarity, including combating hunger and poverty. He expressed his appreciation for the President having prioritized health and hosted the WHO Investment Round during Brazil's G20 presidency.

He noted that social justice served as a moral compass, ensuring that all individuals, regardless of their background or circumstances, had access to basic human rights, opportunities and necessary resources. Equity was central to social justice, requiring fairness in the distribution of wealth, power and privileges. That principle mandated stakeholders to confront systemic injustices, challenge discrimination and dismantle barriers that prevented individuals from realizing their full potential. He envisioned a world where everyone could achieve their full potential. Diversity and inclusion were key to creating a society where all felt valued and respected.

He welcomed the Global Coalition for Social Justice, which aligned with the WHO's mission in relation to health. The Constitution of the WHO, adopted in 1948, affirmed health as a fundamental human right for all. Despite that, around the world, 4.5 billion people lacked essential health services, and 2 billion faced financial hardship due to health spending. The WHO's goal was to close those gaps by advancing universal health coverage so that all people had access to essential health services without facing financial hardship.

There was, however, a global shortage of 10 million health and care workers, with the poorest nations having as little as one tenth the health workers of the richest ones. Many health workers faced violence, discrimination and unsafe working conditions, and had low pay and few rights. Together with the ILO and the OECD, the WHO's Working for Health programme supported countries in mobilizing cross-sectoral policies, actions and investments to increase the education, employment, protection and retention of health workers. Additionally, in partnership with the ILO, the WHO was developing a global strategy to enhance workplace health and well-being.

He reiterated his gratitude to President Lula and Director-General Hounbou for the opportunity to participate, and looked forward to continued partnership in advancing social justice and human rights, including the right to health. He concluded by emphasizing the essential role of social justice in achieving equitable and inclusive societies, underlining the importance of collaborative efforts to create a world where everyone could thrive and succeed.

Mr Hounbou extended his thanks to all distinguished speakers for their participation in the event. The day's discussions had emphasized the critical role of social justice in fostering productive and peaceful societies and economies and restoring trust in multilateralism. The launch of the Coalition coincided with the 80th Anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, which set out the right of all human beings "to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity".

The Coalition's mission was to turn those principles into practical outcomes for all. Its work had only just begun and the fruitful dialogue must be translated to concrete action. He called for sustained collective efforts to effect meaningful change, especially in confronting global challenges such as climate change, which was disrupting livelihoods worldwide. Expressing solidarity with the victims of environmental disasters, he underscored the urgent need for a just transition to sustainable economies through support for sustainable businesses and the development of green skills.

Social justice served as the linchpin connecting economic, environmental and social agendas, essential for achieving the SDGs. In the months ahead, common priorities and a comprehensive work plan would be finalized, buoyed by the shared commitment demonstrated by leaders such as President Lula and Mr Tedros. He called for ambitious actions at the national and international levels to reaffirm the collective resolve to transform social justice from an aspiration to a tangible reality globally. In conclusion, he expressed gratitude to all participants for their dedication and urged continued efforts to advance social justice worldwide, emphasizing the responsibility to create a world characterized by fairness and equity for all.

Mr Lula da Silva expressed great joy in returning to the International Labour Conference, which represented the relationship between labour and management. The Conference had great historical significance and the ILO's tripartite structure continued to play a crucial role in the current complex global context. Societies were still recovering from the effects of the COVID-19 pandemic at uneven paces, with new political tensions and ongoing conflicts exacerbating existing issues. In addition, digital and energy transitions were impacting on workers worldwide and quality of life was deteriorating due to climate change, with 2.4 billion workers directly affected through heat stress.

Social justice was more relevant than ever. It was necessary to revive the spirit of the Declaration of Philadelphia, which asserted that labour is not a commodity and should be treated as a source of dignity. Pope Francis had recognized the interconnectedness of welfare and justice, stating "There is no democracy with hunger, no development with poverty, and much less justice in inequality".

The Government of Brazil had therefore accepted the invitation from the Director-General to co-chair the Global Coalition for Social Justice, which would be instrumental in implementing the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. Goal 8, on decent work for all, was not progressing at the necessary pace and scale, despite a modest fall in projected global unemployment rates. Issues such as informality, precarity and poverty were persistent; indeed, the number of people with informal jobs had increased from 1.7 billion in 2005 to 2 billion in 2023. Additionally, work income was declining for the less educated and the new generations faced challenges in entering the labour market. Extreme poverty was affecting 215 million people worldwide, many of whom were in work, and inequalities on the basis of race, gender, sexual orientation and geographic origin were aggravating factors. Women were in a particularly vulnerable position in the labour force, and the principle of equal pay for work of equal value remained a distant goal. Over half a billion women of working age were excluded from the labour force due to unequal family and care responsibilities. Furthermore, 80 per cent of the world's 280 million migrants lived in the global South. Their remittances often surpassed foreign direct investments in their countries of origin, but were insufficient. A dysfunctional financial architecture was exacerbating inequalities, as development banks invested very little.

The motto on the cornerstone of the original ILO premises, "If you want peace, cultivate justice", remained just as relevant, with war being waged in Ukraine and Gaza, among many others. Workers who should have been dedicating themselves to their own lives and their families were being sent to battlefronts, as had been the case in the First and Second World Wars, with devastating impacts. Significant civilian casualties had ensued and, in Gaza, record numbers of deaths of humanitarian workers. He also condemned the increase in global military spending. The irrationality of a conflict in Europe had reignited fears of nuclear catastrophe. Hence there was a need to reaffirm that the world needed peace and prosperity, not war.

In 2024, nearly half of the world's population would be going to the polls. Democracy and social participation were crucial for achieving workers' rights. Historically, attacks on democracy had been accompanied by a loss of rights, as in his own country's experience. Political extremism attacked and silenced minorities and neglected the most vulnerable. A progressive, democratic approach was crucial to challenge the current order. Furthermore, the role of the State in planning development and addressing inequalities exacerbated by the market's "invisible hand" needed urgently to be restored. Productivity growth had not resulted in wage increases, leading to dissatisfaction and polarization. Therefore, a new form of globalization that prioritized human welfare and social fairness was called for.

Those concepts aligned with Brazil's priorities during its presidency of the G20. Discussions were ongoing on how to promote a just transition and use emerging technologies to improve the labour market. The flagship initiative, the Global Alliance against Hunger and Poverty, aimed to accelerate efforts to eliminate hunger and poverty. Additionally, Brazil was spearheading a proposal on taxing the super-rich, highlighting the stark concentration of wealth among a small number of billionaires, some of whom even had their own space programmes.

There was, however, an urgent need to address issues here on Earth, particularly the environmental crises affecting various regions, including his own country. The climate crisis would be the priority of the 30th Conference of the Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (COP30), which would be hosted by Brazil in the Amazon city of Belém. It was also vital to consider the livelihoods of indigenous peoples and workers such as fishers, miners and rubber-tappers in conservation efforts. Thus, rich countries should bear the costs to support the survival and well-being of people living in the Amazon region. The Government of Brazil had committed to achieving zero deforestation in the Amazon region by 2030 and urged other countries to follow suit.

The sociobioeconomy, green industrialization and renewable energy sources represented great opportunities to enhance collective welfare and promote a just transition. Policies and action on development of digital skills and sustainable practices would be crucial in a decarbonized, technology-intensive global economy. In previous industrial revolutions, the world had seen how technological innovations could improve humanity's horizons, but it was the workers' struggles that had democratized their use. Artificial intelligence would radically transform our way of life, and action was needed to ensure that it benefited everyone. Internet access and digital resources were still unevenly distributed, and linguistic diversity was not yet adequately represented in the digital world.

Consequently, he called for global cooperation to address those challenges. Brazil had drawn inspiration from the Spanish Government's efforts to regulate work for transportation apps and to promote collective bargaining. It had also joined the United States in a Partnership for Workers' Rights, which had been launched at the headquarters of the United Nations in 2023. The Government of Brazil was committed to improving labour conditions, with policies including increasing the minimum wage, eliminating child labour and combating modern slavery. Furthermore, a bill on equal pay for men and women had been passed, and Brazil had joined the Equal Pay International Coalition. A national care plan addressing various social inequalities was also in preparation. Furthermore, the Government was investing in reindustrialization and job creation.

The Global Coalition would be an essential tool to build a just transition with decent work and poverty eradication. However, it was essential for developing countries, which were being called on to contribute to resolving the current global crises, to be adequately represented on global governance bodies, based on the premise of "one country, one vote". Brazil was therefore advocating for the ratification of the 1986 Amendment to the ILO Constitution to abolish the permanent seats on the Governing Body.

In conclusion, he emphasized the ILO's significant role in building a fairer, more humane world. He stressed the increased responsibility of ILO participants in the twenty-first century, given the unpredictable impacts of digitalization on labour. A collaborative approach to artificial intelligence development was called for, particularly so that the global South could remain competitive. He highlighted the importance of the ILO's credibility and work in promoting global fairness and solidarity. He concluded by calling for peace in Ukraine and Gaza, and for justice to achieve global stability and prosperity.

The President of the Conference thanked President Lula for his concluding address and for his global leadership. He expressed his appreciation to the distinguished delegates for their participation and contributions, and declared the inaugural Forum of the Global Coalition for Social Justice closed.

President: Mr Buzu

Signing of authentic texts on the abrogation of four Conventions

Mr Bormioli

The Clerk of the Conference

As you will remember, the Conference decided last week, by record vote, to abrogate under article 19 of the ILO Constitution four international labour Conventions, namely the Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45), the Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937 (No. 62), the Convention concerning Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938 (No. 63), and the Labour Inspectorates (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 85).

These decisions by the Conference are reflected in formal documents that need to be authenticated by the President of the Conference and the Director-General before they are deposited with the United Nations for registration and sent to the ILO archives for safekeeping.

Therefore, I would now like to invite the President, together with the Director-General of the ILO and Secretary-General of the Conference, Mr HOUNGBO, to proceed with the signature of the authentic texts on the abrogation of the four Conventions.

(The President and the Director-General of the ILO sign the texts on the abrogation of the four Conventions.)

Closing statements

The President

The Conference has now concluded its business and has achieved its goals. The time has come for our closing ceremony.

I will call on each of my fellow Officers to make their concluding remarks to this assembly. I will begin by inviting the Employer Vice-President of the Conference, Mr DUBÉY, to take the floor.

Mr Dubey

Employer Vice-President of the Conference

It has been an honour to serve as the Employer Vice-President of this 112th Session of the International Labour Conference. Over the past two weeks, we have engaged in meaningful dialogue, shared perspectives and collaborated to shape outcomes and provide guidance on important and pressing issues in the world of work. I am grateful to have this moment to reflect on our shared achievements.

This Conference has once again shown the power of social dialogue to find mutually owned, tripartite responses to both challenges and opportunities, and the Employers' group is very happy with the outcomes. Let me share our assessment.

First, I would like to talk about the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards. In the context of occupational safety and health becoming a new fundamental principle and right at work, the Employers' group sees this first discussion on the subject as a unique opportunity to craft a new instrument. It is our shared responsibility to consider, in a balanced and practical way, the perspectives of all constituents and to address all possible stakeholders in both developing and developed countries, and in both small and large companies, as well as all workers, whatever the nature of the workplace. The instrument needs to strike a balance between protecting workers and maintaining enterprise sustainability, and it must take a coherent, risk-based approach that can ensure adequate protection while minimizing labour market disruptions and allowing for adaptation to individual country situations. A Convention as detailed as the one being proposed may dissuade States from ratifying, especially those that could benefit the most from a new instrument. The Employers call for a clear distinction to be drawn between situations that are external in nature, like the pandemic, and situations where there is work-related exposure due to the nature of the work. We also support a clear and practical Convention based on principles rather than on too many technical details. We look forward to further consultations leading up to the second discussion and hope that, next time, the Committee will be able to deliver instruments that the Employers can promote and endorse for effective implementation.

Second, the Committee on the Application of Standards successfully completed its discussions on the General Report, the General Survey, the cases of serious failure to report and the tripartite examination of 24 individual cases. It also held a special sitting on Belarus, which provided the Committee with an opportunity to examine the long-standing case concerning the Government's non-compliance with the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), which has been dealt with by various ILO supervisory bodies. The Committee adopted conclusions that we hope will encourage the Government to make progress in the implementation of the recommendations issued by the Commission of Inquiry, some 20 years ago.

Furthermore, the Committee adopted the outcome of the discussion on the 2024 General Survey, Labour Administration in a Changing World of Work, which reflects the consensus that effective labour administration systems are vital for the good governance of labour matters, as well as for economic and social progress. They can make decent work a reality in the workplace by enforcing labour standards and can contribute to economic growth by increasing competitiveness and productivity.

Third, the General Discussion Committee on Decent Work and the Care Economy addressed our collective responsibility to promote a robust and sustainable care economy as a vital component of the overall economy. This requires the support of businesses and the private sector. We emphasized that a well-supported care economy can lead to a healthier, more productive and agile workforce, as well as to enterprise competitiveness and innovation, and to more jobs and economic opportunities. Three pillars guided the position of the Employers.

The first pillar is skills. Employers worldwide struggle to attract and retain skilled care workers. This global challenge requires our immediate attention. Labour and skills shortages and mismatches affect both the public and the private care sectors, especially for modern care jobs that involve new technologies and advanced care techniques. The second pillar is gender equality. Care is often framed as a women's issue rather than a societal issue, implying that it is solely for women to solve or gender equality departments or organizations to address. While it is certainly linked to gender equality, investment in the care economy necessitates a whole-of-government approach owing to its interconnected and multi-faceted nature and the fact that it spans sectors such as healthcare, education, social services and employment. It also necessitates broad economic, social and fiscal policies. The third pillar is the role of private care enterprises, which complement public services, reduce administrative and financial pressures on existing healthcare systems, drive innovation, and promote quality improvements. Private-sector involvement creates jobs, generates income and boosts entrepreneurship, especially for women, while offering diverse care options to suit different needs. It also leads to investments in care infrastructure, ensuring sustainability and quick adaptation to changing demographics and care needs. In addition, private-sector involvement provides training and employment opportunities and relieves skills shortages in the care sector. We are pleased that these three points are well reflected in the conclusions.

Fourth, the recurrent discussion on the strategic objective of the fundamental principles and rights at work (FPRW) covered a topic that is at the very core of the ILO. The Employers are pleased with the outcome document, which provides a solid framework to guide the actions of the constituents and of the ILO going forward, reinforcing the obligation of Member States to promote, respect and realize FPRW in line with the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work (1998), as amended in 2022.

The discussions and conclusions include four central elements that the Employers fully support. First, the acknowledgement of the significant progress made since the previous recurrent discussion in 2017, with a view to taking stock and replicating best practices going forward. Proper acknowledgement of lessons learned and successes achieved is essential for meaningful progress. Key advances, such as the universal ratification of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), or the elevation of occupational safety and health as the fifth FPRW, are inspiring examples. Second, despite the progress made, challenges linked to implementation gaps and root causes continue to be major impediments to the full realization of FPRW. The outcome document clearly calls on Member States, with the support of the ILO, to take decisive action to tackle root causes and promote formalization and good governance, and to adopt policies to promote sustained, inclusive and sustainable economic growth. This requires, to quote the outcome document, “political will, effective labour market governance and social dialogue”. Third, the conclusions rightly reaffirm the key role played by sustainable enterprises in advancing FPRW, and call for due attention to be paid and support provided to micro, small and medium-sized enterprises. Lastly, the conclusions stress the inseparable, interrelated and mutually reinforcing nature of the five fundamental principles and rights at work, and the importance of social dialogue as a key gateway to addressing challenges and seizing opportunities in the world of work.

Before I conclude, a few remarks on the launch of the Global Coalition for Social Justice are in order. The Employers welcome and strongly support this Global Coalition and we reaffirm our total and strong commitment to this movement. We are grateful for the ILO’s instrumental role in shaping this collaboration. Its efforts have laid a strong foundation for this well-designed and powerful Global Coalition which, under ILO leadership and with the participation of other United Nations organizations, trade unions, non-governmental organizations and stakeholders, has the potential to create real and profound change.

In closing, the Employers would like to express our gratitude to the President of the Conference for his leadership, to my fellow Vice-Presidents of the Conference, and to the Chairpersons of the different committees for their balanced, calm, and steady management. We would also like to thank the Chairpersons and Vice-Chairpersons of the Government, Employers’ and Workers’ groups, and of course all participants in the deliberations – Workers, Employers and Governments. Credit for the success of this Conference also goes, in no small measure, to the outstanding and hard-working management and staff of the ILO, the Conference support staff, the interpreters and all others involved in the preparation and the smooth running of this intense, two-week session. And finally, the real success of this Conference will now lie in the collective dedication of all participants and of the ILO, to carry forward the torch lit here and build a future that is characterized by social justice and decent work for all.

Ms Lestic

Worker Vice-President of the Conference (Original French)

I was privileged to have been elected Vice-President of this Conference and am grateful for this. Indeed, I have had the honour of serving as Vice-President of an exceptional session of the Conference which, despite heightened tension and instability throughout the world, took place in a constructive and dynamic climate.

The ILO's tripartite social partnership has once again demonstrated its ability to transcend sometimes contradictory thinking and find negotiated solutions and recommendations to face emerging challenges in the world of work.

First and foremost, the Conference has reaffirmed its commitment to multilateralism in providing responses to the most serious crises. For example, the special sitting on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories was necessary to discuss how we can help Palestinian workers in this critical situation. We cannot settle for words alone. We must act first and foremost to save and protect Palestinian lives, but also, within the ILO's mandate, to guarantee respect for the rights of Palestinian workers. We urge all governments to contribute generously, in solidarity with the Palestinian people, to the ILO's emergency response plan. Furthermore, we must implement without further delay, as the ILO, the United Nations General Assembly resolution granting Palestine rights similar to those of a Member State. It is time for Palestine to be considered a fully-fledged country within our Organization. This recognition is part of a political solution, which is the only guarantee of lasting peace. The demand for lasting peace in the world cannot be achieved without social justice, and this is what we wanted to reaffirm here through the discussion on a new social contract.

Once again, we welcome the stimulating Report of the Director-General on this topic, which enables the ILO, together with the Global Coalition for Social Justice, to mobilize in preparation for the upcoming United Nations World Summit for Social Development to take place in 2025. A renewed social contract is in fact necessary to better achieve social justice in the coming decades and to respond to people's aspirations by creating decent and climate-friendly jobs as part of a just transition. We must shape industrial transformation to achieve carbon neutrality and promote investment in economic and strategic sectors, such as the green economy and sustainable infrastructure, the care economy and the formalization of informal work. Our renewed social contract must deliver on the promise contained in the ILO Centenary Declaration for the Future of Work (2019), with its labour protection floor, which includes rights such as maximum working hours, as well as decent wages and occupational health and safety for all workers, irrespective of their status.

We must step up our efforts to achieve universal social protection, in particular by creating a social protection fund for the most disadvantaged countries. Our new social contract must guarantee equal pay for work of equal value and put an end to all forms of discrimination, particularly gender-based discrimination, the systemic nature of which can no longer continue. This social contract must create a rights-based development model which corrects the imbalances in power and wealth through full respect for freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining, tripartism and social dialogue as essential means for the implementation of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development.

The Declaration of Philadelphia, the 80th anniversary of which we are celebrating this year, reminds us with ever greater urgency that work is not a commodity, that freedom of expression and association is crucial for sustained progress, and that poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere. With the Global Coalition for Social Justice, under the leadership of President Lula da Silva of Brazil and the Director-General of the ILO, we have a collective responsibility to bring about a real change in the way in which the global economy and policy are thought of and organized. The Workers will contribute actively to this initiative.

I would now like to refer to the various decisions that we have taken. First of all, the Workers would like to comment on the abrogation of Conventions. We did not block the decision, but we would draw the Conference's attention to the fact that the ratification of more modern Conventions and new standards is lagging compared to the abrogation recommendations of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group. This is not in line with the mandate of the mechanism as agreed, and we wish to make this clear. Our group will not continue to support an exclusively deregulatory exercise. This goes against the ILO's mandate, and it is important that the ILO maintain and reaffirm its original standard-setting function.

I would also like to congratulate the colleagues involved in the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards, which finalized the initial negotiations on a global binding standard to protect workers against biological hazards. In particular, we welcome the broadened definition and scope which cover infectious diseases such as COVID-19, but also other diseases caused by exposure to biological agents, hazards and substances, as well as accidents and injuries, and references to precautionary measures and the inclusion of new and emerging hazards.

The general discussion on decent work and the care economy is a timely response to the demographic and epidemiological challenges that we are facing, and I would like to highlight here the importance in this discussion of equality. Care economy jobs are quite precarious, and it is mainly women who carry out such work. These jobs demonstrate the professional inequalities between men and women: low wages, poorly recognized professional skills, poor working conditions and arduous work. And the situation has further deteriorated as a result of the pandemic. It is thus crucial that these jobs be valued because care contributes to well-being and is a vital element to ensuring the sustainability of societies. Now we have a shared tripartite vision for the care economy which recognizes the primary responsibility of the State in care, which demands an integrated regulatory and political framework. This shared vision calls for an increase in public investment to guarantee decent work for workers in the sector. This is a major contribution to our vision of just transitions.

Furthermore, we commend the conclusions of the Recurrent Discussion Committee on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work. We welcome the fact that the ILO is now concentrating on promoting and protecting the fundamental principles and rights at work in two new crucial areas for the future of decent work. In fact, we must guarantee that the jobs created thanks to our transition towards an environmentally sustainable and digital economy benefit from the protection guaranteed by fundamental rights, and we look forward to seeing the ILO concentrate on the fundamental principles and rights across its work, including by structurally taking into account the recommendations of the supervisory system for all forms of work carried out by the Office in Member States.

At the beginning of this session of the Conference, the Committee on the Application and Standards held its first special sitting on Belarus, and we sincerely hope that this will open up possibilities for engagement with the Government of Belarus. Similarly, we encourage all governments to fully commit to the implementation of the recommendations of this Committee. Once again, poverty and the unbridled exploitation of labour, wherever it exists, constitute a danger to prosperity and social justice everywhere, which is what we are trying to defend here.

Lastly, I would like to warmly thank the ILO teams for their organization and support throughout this session of the Conference, and I would like to thank the interpreters as well for enabling us to understand one another. Delegates, we are all an important national component of the ILO. But at the end of the session, our work is not finished. With renewed commitment and energy, we must now return to our respective countries and take on our own responsibilities to promote social justice wherever we can.

Mr Moyo

Government Vice-President of the Conference

Allow me to begin my remarks by offering our deepest condolences to the Government and the people of Malawi on the untimely and tragic passing of the Right Honourable Vice-President, Dr Saulos Klaus Chilima, and nine others who perished in a plane crash this past Monday when we started our deliberations. May their souls rest in eternal peace.

I would like to thank the President, Mr Buzu, most sincerely for his leadership and the excellent manner in which he has presided over this 112th Session of the International Labour Conference. I also want to thank and acknowledge the cooperation and dedication of my fellow Vice-Presidents, Mr Dubey and Ms Lestic, which made the work of our Conference much easier. In the same vein, special thanks go to the chairpersons of all the committees of the Conference. We had an opportunity to observe the arduous and painstaking work that was conducted. I must say that, in the short period I was in these committees, I witnessed in an excellent manner, the workings of tripartism. I wish to pay tribute to all the delegates for their commitment and dedication. Some worked very late hours in order to come up with the resolutions that were adopted by this Conference.

The 112th Session of the International Labour Conference marked the birth of the first standard-setting discussion on protection against biological hazards. We appreciate the outcomes, which will pave the way for the second discussion by the Conference next year. In the meantime, it is expected that the outcomes of the discussions will encourage Member States, even at this time, to come up with strategies to reduce accidents and injuries at places of work as we seek to create safe and healthy spaces for all workers.

The General Discussion Committee on Decent Work and the Care Economy focused on the recognition of work by paid and unpaid care workers. The Committee acknowledged the contribution of domestic workers, informal economy workers, persons with disabilities, women and youth in stimulating economic growth and job creation. The Committee also discussed the rural economy and its workers. For us in Africa, this is the major challenge that we face this century, and it might go on if we do not take remedial action in the next century. Going forward, it is important for the ILO to continue conversations on this important area, being mindful of the differences in national and regional contexts.

The work of the Recurrent Discussion Committee on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work also brought to the fore the importance of human rights in the workplace and how they are inseparable, interrelated and mutually reinforcing. Although challenges in their implementation remain, our focus should be on the thematic priorities of paying due regard to informal economies, rural areas and situations of crisis and fragility.

With respect to the work of the Committee on the Application of Standards, we appreciate the discussions on how Member States can improve the application of fundamental Conventions and how to meet reporting obligations to the supervisory bodies. For this, the Committee examined country cases, and it is our hope and expectation that it will, in the future, also discuss cases of good progress in order to share best practices so that countries can improve and not only focus on the challenges being faced by Member States.

I wish to applaud the work undertaken in preparation of the inaugural session of the Global Coalition for Social Justice. In particular, I wish to salute the Director-General, not only for the initiative, but also for the manner in which it was organized. The Global Coalition has indeed gained momentum since its launch at the 111th Session of the Conference. The panellists and moderators of all sessions have provided us with insights on how we can work together towards the attainment of social justice, and it is with renewed vigour that we will return home after the electrifying, inspiring and passionate speeches of the President of Nepal, His Excellency Ramchandra Paudel, and the President of Brazil, His Excellency Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva. In particular, we take note of their calls to: address inequalities and promote social justice; eradicate poverty by redoubling our efforts towards the attainment of the Sustainable Development Goals; address the causes of climate crisis and its mitigation through climate financing, especially by those in the Global North; and restructure the international financial architecture and the democratization of the United Nations systems of governance, including that of the ILO. We think that this will demonstrate that countries, such as those in Africa, can also participate in regular sittings in the governing councils. Furthermore, we welcome Brazil's commitment to ratifying the 1986 Instrument of Amendment to the ILO Constitution. We also take note of the call to narrow the gap that exists between and within countries, as we strive towards leaving no one, no country and no social group behind.

The discussions we have had in plenary and in the committees have been fruitful. As a result of excellent preparation and presentation by the Director-General and his staff and the Chairperson and Officers of the Governing Body, the Report of the Director-General to this session of the Conference, which focused on renewing the social contract, informed all the discussions we had and has reinvigorated our desire to make meaningful and sustained social dialogue, upon which basis we develop our economies and our societies. An overwhelming majority of speakers from the Government, Employers' and Workers' groups deplored the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. For anyone with a good heart and sense of humanity, it is clear that the war must stop, and the occupation should come to an end.

As I conclude my remarks, I wish to pay special thanks to the Secretariat for its dedication and guidance as we chaired all these sessions as Officers of this Conference. Mr Bormioli and his team were punctual, and they led us, informed us and guided us, and the success that might come to us is their success.

Finally, I wish to express my profound gratitude to the Africa group, the Government group and the Employers' and Workers' groups for having endorsed my nomination and for granting me the opportunity to serve as the Government Vice-Chairperson of the 112th Session of the International Labour Conference. It has been an enlightening and humbling experience for me personally, and an honour for the tripartite Zimbabwean delegation to serve you.

Mr Hounghbo

Director-General of the International Labour Office and Secretary-General of the Conference
(Original French)

We are now – some may say “finally” – reaching the end of this session of the Conference. It has been intense, productive, and rich in debates. I do hope that you will all return home with the feeling of satisfaction that results from a job well done. In terms of statistics, 37.8 per cent of our delegates this year were women, which is somewhat less than what we were aiming for, but a little more than the 36.5 per cent we had last year.

We have had the opportunity to celebrate the 80th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, whose principles are just as important today as they were in 1944 and after the war.

The discussion in the special plenary sitting on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, particularly in Palestine, was a solemn occasion. As a specialized agency, the ILO must consider the follow-up to the resolution adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on 10 May this year. During the special sitting, there was an urgent call for collective action to alleviate the suffering of the Palestinians, and a reaffirmation of the strong role that the ILO is duty-bound to play. We are fully aware that the task facing the ILO in Palestine is immense and that we need to plan for a rapid, job-rich recovery based on human rights and workers’ rights, even as humanitarian action is still ongoing. We of course remain firmly committed to collaborating with all colleagues throughout the United Nations system, including by providing technical support in the context of the humanitarian-development-peace nexus, with a view to achieving lasting peace.

Please allow me to convey my sincere thanks to the donor countries that have begun to pledge funds for our three-phase project that was presented on Monday. As of yesterday, we had already received US$10 million in pledges – half of the $20 million that we are seeking. I would also like to take this opportunity to call upon all those who have not yet done so – I know that you have all been very busy with the Conference – to think about the difference that the ILO can make to the Palestinians, whether in Gaza or the West Bank.

In the face of insecurity and inequality as well as persistent informality, the discussion of my report, Towards a renewed social contract, has confirmed one key message: inaction is simply not an option. You have responded to my call to renew the social contract and to discuss it in depth in order make progress in social justice as the basis for lasting peace, shared prosperity, equal opportunities and a just transition.

Throughout our discussion, concerns were raised about a loss of trust in our governance systems, both national and multilateral. We must re-establish trust in our institutions and protect the independence of workers’ and employers’ organizations. In all countries and globally we have a duty to reinvigorate social dialogue and strengthen our standard-setting mandate, which I believe remains the backbone and the raison d’être of this Organization. As confirmed in our discussion with the co-facilitators of the World Summit for Social Development, the ILO has a crucial role to play in making multilateralism inclusive, particularly at the second World Summit.

Turning now to the work of the committees, I will be brief, as the Vice-Presidents have already commented on it. On behalf of the Secretariat, I want to take this opportunity to thank all those who have worked in the committees, starting with the Chairpersons and Vice-Chairpersons, to achieve successful outcomes, with less stress than last year. I am grateful for the rich discussions you have held, which bode well for successful discussions next year, both for the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards and others on the agenda, such as the discussion on the platform economy. As we know, that will be an important discussion, and the stakeholders and the Office are already hard at work preparing for it.

Also on the subject of the committees, the Office laments the fact that, for the first time ever, a vote was conducted in the Committee on the Application of Standards. That is highly regrettable, but we must continue working together in order to promote the values that our institution embodies on a daily basis for the improvement of the living and working conditions of all workers worldwide.

As to standards, over the past two weeks, we have received nearly 20 new ratifications, including five of fundamental Conventions, five ratifications of the Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190), and four ratifications of Conventions on occupational safety and health, as well as some other Conventions. A total of nearly 20 ratifications were registered in the last two weeks and I wish to express my gratitude.

The inaugural Forum of the Global Coalition for Social Justice yesterday was clearly a success but, for us, this work is just beginning. We need to finalize the set-up of Sana De Courcelles' and Laura Thompson's team, the thematic areas and plan of action, not only for the ILO, but also for all the members or partners of the Coalition so that in 2025 we can begin truly to make a difference. As I said yesterday, action must be focused on making a real difference on the ground.

I would like to extend my thanks to the authorities of Nepal and Brazil, as we were honoured at our special day yesterday with the presence of two Heads of State. President Paudel of Nepal reminded us that there cannot be social justice without climate justice, and that lasting peace can only be achieved if there is shared prosperity. We also welcomed President Lula da Silva of Brazil, who strongly advocated for peace and encouraged us to sow the seeds of justice to cultivate peace across the globe. He recalled that attacks against democracy have always violated the law, human rights and labour rights, and underscored the need for a renewed social contract, which must place human beings at the heart of its policies.

To conclude – and I do know we are all tired, so I will be brief – I would like to thank the President and Vice-Presidents for the leadership they have demonstrated over the past two weeks. The success of these sittings and this Conference is also down to them. I thank them for their patience, especially in terms of time management and setting the atmosphere, which was not always easy, and also for allowing us to finish at a reasonable hour after these two weeks. I would also like to thank all of my colleagues from the Secretariat. I will not mention any individual names because it really is the work of a team. Nevertheless, I would like to mention in particular the interpreters, the security guards, the technicians and all those involved with the logistics, without whom we could not have achieved these outcomes.

Mr Buzu President of the 112th Session of the Conference

Let me start by thanking you for entrusting me with this high position. I am honoured, my team is honoured and I think my country is honoured as well. I hope that I have lived up to your high expectations. I also want to thank the Officers of this Conference, my “partners in crime”. The fantastic team of the ILO in the Secretariat. The Director-General should be proud of the team and also of the ILO team in my country, the Republic of Moldova.

We hold this Conference in challenging times for everyone represented in this room, workers, employers and governments alike. Despite advances in recent years, gender inequality and discrimination hinder the participation of women in the job market. There is no slowing down the epidemic of work-related accidents, stealing the lives of over 3 million workers every year. New hazards challenge the world of work. Millions face insecurity and loss of livelihoods due to war and conflict. Employers, too, are grappling with the disruption of supply chains and shifting market demand, while governments continue to be under pressure to balance economic recovery with addressing social inequalities.

Speaking of the ideal of social justice in such complicated times may seem ambitious and even unattainable. Yet the ILO has demonstrated over time that it is precisely during difficult times that its role has been most instrumental. We talked about the Declaration of Philadelphia during this session of the Conference. Like me, I am sure that many of you were moved by the humanistic principles enshrined in the Declaration: the principle that labour is not a commodity, that freedom of expression and association are essential, and that poverty anywhere is a danger to prosperity everywhere. The Declaration is even more revolutionary considering that it was written at one of the darkest hours for humanitarianism. Its signature marked a turning point for the ILO and for the Member States, giving a clarity of direction and guiding a process for dynamic development in the aftermath of the Second World War.

Challenging times expose our vulnerabilities, but also present opportunities to address them. This is why the Director-General's new initiative, the Global Coalition for Social Justice, could not have come at a better time. It is heartening that over 280 actors and stakeholders across the board have recognized the need for change and have joined forces to advance a more equitable future for workers around the world.

I was with the ILO's internal historian, on the floor of the ILO building where you have the portraits of all the ILO Directors-General, and the historian was presenting them to me and saying that this Director-General promoted the Declaration of Philadelphia, this Director-General advanced the concept of decent work, and so on. Then I thought of the present Director-General, and it occurred to me that, in the future, his portrait will be there. Then the internal ILO historian will tell a fellow visitor or minister that this Director-General promoted social justice. Nothing would make me prouder than to help him to achieve this legacy of his. And I hope I speak on behalf of all the people present in this auditorium.

The Conference also addressed two critical issues for the world of work. The first is the care economy. As we know, women continue to shoulder a disproportionate share of unpaid care work, significantly impacting their participation in the labour market. Gender stereotypes in many regions reinforce the expectation that women should prioritize caregiving over paid employment. Gaps in access to social protection programmes are especially pronounced for women in rural, marginalized and crisis-affected areas, where displacement and loss of livelihoods further exacerbate vulnerabilities. The new ILO report on the care economy will provide helpful guidance for governments in addressing this key issue.

Another critical aspect is the threat of biological hazards. The world has witnessed first-hand the devastating impacts of the COVID-19 pandemic, along with other epidemics like Ebola. These hazards pose a significant risk to workers' health and safety, leading to severe disruptions in the workplace and the broader economy. I want to thank the Standard-Setting Committee on Biological Hazards for its important discussions on the upcoming new standard ensuring that workers are better safeguarded against these threats.

Allow me to thank all the committees for their tireless work and dedication. They truly did a good job and should be proud of the work they put in here.

In my other life, I am the Minister of Labour and Social Protection of the Republic of Moldova. Over the past two years, like never before, my country has mastered the art of turning adversity into purpose and mission, and self-concern into solidarity and friendship. After two challenging years, holding the presidency of the International Labour Conference holds a deep significance. It confirms that we belong on the global stage and that we can have a say. It motivated us to exceed the expectations we set ourselves, strengthening compliance with ILO standards, implementing and enforcing the hierarchy and pressing forward for decent work for all as we move towards our goal of European Union integration by 2030. I am grateful to the Director-General for having found the time to visit my country and for providing valuable support and guidance.

I am sure that, like myself, you feel a strong sense of pride in being here today, representing your countries and brainstorming in the international arena on what needs to be done in order to achieve more results for our citizens. Let us remember this empowered feeling. Let us never forget it. As leaders in our field, it is crucial to be aware that the power we hold is not merely symbolic. It gives us a real opportunity to create change. So let us use this opportunity.

Geneva is not Las Vegas: what happens in Geneva should not stay in Geneva. We should go back to our homes and countries and spread what we have achieved all over the world. In the pursuit of a better world of work, there is no need to hold back.

Mr Hounqbo

Director-General of the International Labour Office and Secretary-General of the Conference

I am sure that all delegates will agree with me that we cannot let the President leave without thanking him for his great leadership over the last two weeks. Therefore, I would like, on behalf of everyone here, to present him with this engraved gavel by which to remember us and as a token of our appreciation.

I would also like to take this opportunity to express my appreciation to the members of the delegation of the Republic of Moldova for having hosted me during my recent visits to the country and to reiterate my support to them. I would like to thank them again for a really rich discussion and for their work with the ILO teams from Budapest and Geneva.

Also, before closing, I would like to pay tribute to Georges Politakis, the Legal Adviser of the ILO. He will be retiring at the end of August, so this session of the Conference will be his last. He has worked with so many of us over the years. I wish him well and would like to invite all those present to give him a round of applause.

(Applause.)

The President

This session of the Conference will leave an important mark in the life of our Organization, as it will affect the lives of millions of people around the world for the better. Let us make sure of that.

This year again, we found a way to overcome differences in our views and to reach consensus through dialogue and compromise. We adopted conclusions with a view to developing standards concerning biological hazards in the working environment, to promoting policies to enhance the care economy and to reaffirming our commitment to the respect of fundamental rights at work.

The Conference and the 300 partners of the Global Coalition for Social Justice expressed their strong commitment to promote social justice through strengthened cooperation for concrete action. We can congratulate ourselves for these achievements.

I now declare the 112th Session of the International Labour Conference closed.

(The 112th Session of the Conference adjourned sine die at 6 p.m.)

International Labour Conference – 112th Session, Geneva, 2024

Resolution concerning the third recurrent discussion on fundamental principles and rights at work

(14 June 2024)

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization, meeting at its 112th Session, 2024,

Having undertaken a third recurrent discussion on fundamental principles and rights at work, in accordance with the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work (1998), as amended in 2022, and the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization (2008), and duly taking into account the ILO Declaration of Philadelphia (1944) and the ILO Centenary Declaration for the Future of Work (2019), to consider how the Organization should respond to the realities and needs of its Members,

Adopts the following conclusions which contain priorities for ILO action for the effective and universal respect, promotion and realization of fundamental principles and rights at work;

Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to give due consideration to the conclusions and to guide the International Labour Office in giving effect to them; and

Requests the Director-General to:

- (a) prepare a plan of action giving effect to the conclusions for consideration by the Governing Body at its 352nd Session in November 2024;
- (b) communicate the conclusions to relevant international and regional organizations for their attention, including in the context of the Second World Summit for Social Development;
- (c) take into account the conclusions when allocating resources within the existing programme and budget, preparing future programme and budget proposals, and mobilizing extrabudgetary resources; and
- (d) keep the Governing Body informed of their implementation.

Conclusions concerning the third recurrent discussion on fundamental principles and rights at work

I. Fundamental principles and rights at work are more needed and relevant than ever

1. Fundamental principles and rights at work (FPRW) are universal human rights and immutable in nature. They are inseparable, interrelated and mutually reinforcing. They are key to human dignity and well-being and to the foundation of inclusive and just societies. They are important for ensuring that economic and social progress advance together in the pursuit of social justice. FPRW are rights and enabling conditions that are necessary for the full realization of the strategic objectives of the International Labour Organization (ILO).
2. In line with the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work (1998), as amended in 2022 (the 1998 Declaration), all Members, even if they have not ratified the fundamental Conventions, have an obligation, arising from the very fact of membership in the Organization, to respect, to promote and to realize, in good faith and in accordance with the Constitution, the principles concerning the fundamental rights that are the subject of these Conventions.
3. There has been some progress and new developments since 2017:
 - (a) At the national level, Member States have undertaken multiple legal reforms, policies and programmes to guarantee and protect freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining, to combat child labour and forced labour, address discrimination in respect of employment and occupation, and implement occupational safety and health measures and systems. In addition, the number of ratifications of fundamental Conventions and the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) and their incorporation into national legal and policy frameworks has increased;
 - (b) At the international level, the right to a safe and healthy working environment was elevated in 2022 to a fifth category of FPRW, widening and strengthening international commitment to respect, promote and realize all FPRW, and the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155) and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187) were considered as fundamental Conventions within the meaning of the 1998 Declaration. In 2020, the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) became the first ILO instrument to reach universal ratification. FPRW have been reflected in a number of new international labour standards, such as the Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190). References to FPRW in legal and policy frameworks have increased, including in trade and investment agreements, safeguard policies of international financial institutions, international and national framework agreements and due diligence legislation and initiatives;
 - (c) Employers' and workers' organizations, together with their members, have also taken important steps to advance FPRW.
4. At the same time, challenges remain.
5. We are far from achieving the universal ratification of fundamental Conventions and significant implementation gaps remain. According to ILO global estimates, child labour has increased in absolute terms to 160 million children, with 79 million in hazardous work; forced labour has grown to 27.6 million; and annually, 3 million workers die related to occupational accidents or diseases. Gender labour force participation and pay gaps remain stuck at 25 percentage points and 19 per cent, respectively.

6. While statistics for the period 2000–2019 suggest an overall improvement in workplace safety, workers across the world continue to be exposed to unsafe and unhealthy working environments and certain risks have intensified, including heat stress and psychosocial risks.
7. Freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining are severely threatened around the world. Certain categories of workers are excluded from the scope of labour policy, labour legislation and labour dispute resolution institutions.
8. Various emerging forms of work can offer both opportunities and risks. When providing decent work, they can be an avenue for workers and their families to escape poverty and enter the formal economy. When they do not provide decent work, or workers are misclassified, they can be insecure and pose challenges to the realization of FPRW.
9. Threats to and impairment of freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining are exacerbating risks of child labour, forced labour, discrimination and hazardous working conditions.
10. Persistent informality continues to represent a major barrier to FPRW advancement, sustainable development and decent work.
11. Failures to protect and respect FPRW continue to be observed within supply chains. Disruptions of supply chains during recent crises have adversely affected the full realization of FPRW in some countries.
12. Inequalities and poverty are persistent challenges contributing to the failure to respect and realize FPRW. They were exacerbated by the COVID-19 pandemic, social and economic crises, conflicts and geopolitical instability, natural disasters and climate change.
13. Weak governance, erosion of the rule of law and civil liberties, restrictions on freedom of association and on the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining, inadequate enabling environments for sustainable enterprises, inadequate regulation, under-resourced and ineffective labour administrations and inspectorates, and other relevant labour authorities, and ineffective labour migration governance, among other causes, have impeded progress to respect, promote and realize FPRW.
14. Demographic, environmental and digital transitions, including the rise of artificial intelligence and related technologies, are transforming the world of work, reinforcing the urgency of promoting the FPRW to address challenges and seize opportunities.
15. These complex developments create risks for, require renewed emphasis on, and reaffirm the importance of FPRW. FPRW provide a framework to navigate complex and turbulent times to prevent and manage future crises, especially crises in the world of work. This requires stronger policy and action for their respect, promotion and realization.

II. Strengthening action for the effective respect, promotion and realization of fundamental principles and rights at work

16. The respect for human rights, the rule of law, and democratic and fundamental freedoms are prerequisites for the full realization of FPRW. Responding to emerging challenges and realizing FPRW require political will, effective labour market governance and social dialogue. To strengthen action for the effective respect, promotion and realization of FPRW, including in pursuit of the Sustainable Development Goals, governments, in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, and taking account of national circumstances, should:

- (a) engage in tripartite social dialogue and take action to consolidate the progress made, stop reversals and address regulatory and implementation gaps;
- (b) seize the momentum generated by the recognition of a safe and healthy working environment as a fundamental principle and right at work to strengthen national laws and practices to accelerate progress to respect, promote and realize this principle and right;
- (c) give particular attention to freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining, noting their particular importance to enable the attainment of the four strategic objectives, while ensuring balanced attention to all five categories;
- (d) take necessary steps to reduce informality in line with the ILO Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204);
- (e) effectively incorporate FPRW into a just transition and into a human-centred approach when dealing with technological and demographic shifts, inter alia, that are transforming the world of work;
- (f) adopt policies to promote sustained, inclusive and sustainable economic growth, full and productive employment and decent work for all and create an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises, noting that business activity, investment and innovation are major drivers of productivity, inclusive growth and job creation;
- (g) continue efforts to advance the interrelated and mutually reinforcing nature of FPRW.

17. Areas of focus should include:

Strengthening governance

- (a) ratify and effectively implement all fundamental Conventions, including the Protocol of 2014 to Convention No. 29;
- (b) expand the coverage of labour laws, establish enabling regulatory frameworks, ensure effective enforcement and strengthen relevant institutions to uphold the rule of law, good governance, and protection and promotion of human rights;
- (c) build and strengthen the capacity of labour administration, labour dispute resolution and labour inspection systems, and provide appropriate human, technological and financial resources, to effectively implement, monitor and enforce national labour legislation and policies, with specific attention to working conditions and protection of workers;
- (d) ensure effective, independent, impartial and accessible judicial and non-judicial labour dispute prevention and resolution mechanisms for all, including grievance mechanisms;
- (e) enhance coherence between national public policies, including migration, employment, labour and social protection policies;
- (f) ensure an evidence-based approach to decision-making and monitor progress by building effective and transparent information systems, including databases and statistical systems;

Freedom of association and social dialogue, including collective bargaining

- (g) protect and promote respect of the right of freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining in light of their particular importance to enable the attainment of the four strategic objectives, notably social dialogue and tripartism;

- (h) strengthen the capacity of mechanisms and institutions for social dialogue to formulate policies to promote, respect and realize FPRW and their interconnectedness with ILO strategic objectives; and promote and engage in meaningful social dialogue in all its forms and at all levels to guide implementation, assess progress, and respond and adapt to complex and multiple challenges;

Formalization and sustainable enterprises

- (i) accelerate progress on the transition from the informal to the formal economy, based on the guidance provided in Recommendation No. 204 and on tripartism and social dialogue, to address some of the root causes of decent work deficits and advance an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises;
- (j) create an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises, including micro, small and medium-sized enterprises, which is conducive to realizing FPRW;
- (k) raise awareness of the central role of FPRW in productivity improvement, inclusive growth and job creation;
- (l) support the social and solidarity economy to prosper, innovate and create decent work;

Equality and inclusion

- (m) continue strengthening legal and policy frameworks to eliminate discrimination in employment and occupation for all workers and on all grounds protected by international labour and human rights standards, and ensure that their application is effective, regularly monitored and evaluated;
- (n) promote gender equality in pay and labour market participation, including through the implementation of equal pay for men and women for equal work or work of equal value, pay transparency measures, maternity protection, parental leave and measures to prevent and protect against gender-based violence and harassment;
- (o) adopt targeted measures for groups more at risk of serious deficits regarding FPRW, including persons belonging to one or more vulnerable groups or groups in situations of vulnerability facing exclusion and discrimination, often on multiple and intersecting grounds;
- (p) adapt national laws and policies to ensure adequate protection for all workers, in line with the ILO Centenary Declaration on the Future of Work (2019), ensuring respect for their fundamental rights;
- (q) meaningfully tackle poverty, insecurity and inequalities, as major drivers of FPRW deficits, including through adequate wages set through collective bargaining and adequate minimum wages, whether statutory or negotiated, and income support through social protection.

18. Governments should reaffirm their commitment to the respect, promotion and realization of FPRW. This would entail coherence among legal frameworks, policies, strategies and programmes, and the development of synergies aimed at realizing the FPRW and those aimed at implementing all strategic objectives of the ILO through which the Decent Work Agenda is expressed, namely employment, social protection, social dialogue and tripartism, and FPRW.

III. Priorities for ILO action

Thematic priorities

- 19. The ILO should focus on the following agreed priorities to promote FPRW, which now include a safe and healthy working environment, in support of its tripartite constituents based on national circumstances and needs:
- (a) informal economies with due attention to rural areas;
 - (b) enterprises and supply chains;
 - (c) situations of crisis and fragility;
 - (d) just transition towards environmentally sustainable economies and societies for all;
 - (e) the digital economy.

Means of action

- 20. The Office should update its integrated strategy on FPRW to balance its action across the five FPRW categories and address gaps in implementation, while being responsive to the needs of constituents and focusing its work on the following areas:

Standards-related action

- (a) intensify efforts to promote the universal ratification of the ten fundamental Conventions and the Protocol of 2014 to Convention No. 29, in particular those that are least ratified, including by pursuing specific campaigns and providing technical advisory services to countries interested in ratification;
- (b) continue to provide technical advisory services, including gap analyses and trainings, to ILO constituents on the effective implementation of the above-mentioned instruments, guided by the ILO supervisory bodies and the annual follow-up to the 1998 Declaration;
- (c) enhance the potential of the annual follow-up to the 1998 Declaration, including through an improved use of the information gathered therein;
- (d) increase synergies among the ILO supervisory bodies, development cooperation, technical assistance and research, including by enhancing efforts to mainstream understanding of the functioning and outputs of the ILO supervisory mechanisms across the Organization, both in the field and in headquarters;

Enhanced research and capacity

- (e) continue to promote and conduct research, and develop tools, guidelines, statistical measurement methodologies, and associated training resources, for qualitative and quantitative data collection, including disaggregated data on discrimination and other under-addressed FPRW categories, and research on FPRW;
- (f) support national institutions to collect and analyse data on the status of FPRW and the characteristics of the populations affected to support evidence-based policymaking;
- (g) produce, in collaboration with Member States, global estimates on child labour and forced labour, and other FPRW issues as data permit, and based on international statistical standards and measurement practices;
- (h) increase the visibility and accessibility of the ILO's data and research, including through global platforms such as the Forced Labour Observatory;

- (i) continue to undertake research and analysis on the intersection of FPRW and trade and investment;
- (j) continue to undertake research and data collection on workplace-related injuries, accidents, diseases and fatalities, and on emerging occupational health and safety risks, including psychosocial risks;
- (k) in the context of the ILO Social Dialogue Flagship Report, undertake research and collect good practices on the role of effective social dialogue in addressing challenges related to FPRW in support of the five thematic priorities;
- (l) examine the nature, causes and consequences of FPRW deficits and build the body of policy-based evidence on the role of the ILO decent work strategic objectives on the realization of FPRW and the social and economic impacts of FPRW at the country and global levels;
- (m) undertake research on the economic and social impact of informality, and in particular its impact on the realization of FPRW;
- (n) undertake action-oriented research on best practices to integrate respect for FPRW into the business of micro, small and medium-sized enterprises and newly formalized enterprises, including through greater synergies between the work on FPRW and the SCORE programme;
- (o) undertake research and impact assessments on the challenges and opportunities of digitalization, including artificial intelligence in relation to FPRW, in line with the resolution and conclusions concerning the second recurrent discussion on labour protection (2023);

Strengthening capacity and knowledge-sharing

- (p) build the capacity of constituents, and other relevant national authorities, to develop and implement policies and programmes that support the realization of FPRW and to integrate these rights in policies related to the ILO's strategic objectives, including in collaboration with the International Training Centre in Turin;
- (q) conduct targeted capacity-building for employers' and workers' organizations with regard to all five FPRW, with a focus on retaining and expanding membership, providing services and engaging in effective social dialogue;
- (r) strengthen the ILO Helpdesk for Business on International Labour Standards, which is an important vehicle for assisting enterprises and tripartite constituents in their efforts to respect the principles of international labour standards, including FPRW, and promote the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, as amended in 2022, and the United Nations Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights;
- (s) strengthen the ILO Global Business Network on Forced Labour, the ILO Global Business and Disability Network and the Child Labour Platform, and seek ways to ensure their sustainability;
- (t) encourage peer learning, information-sharing, cooperation and policy coherence within, and among, Member States, at the regional and international levels, including through the next Global Conference on the Elimination of Child Labour;
- (u) document and share good and innovative practices on FPRW;

Policy coherence and partnerships

- (v) promote policy coherence on FPRW:
 - (i) within the UN system and with multilateral organizations, development banks and international financial institutions;
 - (ii) in trade and investment policies and agreements, including through strengthened engagement with the World Trade Organization;
 - (iii) in Decent Work Country Programmes and UN sustainable development cooperation frameworks;
- (w) accelerate progress on FPRW through the Global Coalition for Social Justice, and leverage advocacy and cooperation through partnerships, such as:
 - (i) Alliance 8.7;
 - (ii) the Equal Pay International Coalition;
 - (iii) the relevant business initiatives such as the Child Labour Platform, the Global Business Network on Forced Labour and the Global Business and Disability Network;
 - (iv) the Global Accelerator on Jobs and Social Protection for Just Transitions;

Planning, mobilization and allocation of resources and development cooperation

- (x) ensure that technical assistance and development cooperation reflect the mutually reinforcing nature of FPRW and their interconnectedness with all ILO strategic objectives;
- (y) enhance support to governments to develop and implement domestic resource mobilization strategies;
- (z) mobilize resources for development cooperation at the country, regional and global levels, including by engaging with UN Resident Coordinator's Offices;
- (aa) explore innovative ways to more efficiently deliver technical assistance and development cooperation, including South-South and Triangular Cooperation, taking into consideration the diversity of circumstances of individual Member States;
- (ab) monitor and evaluate the impact of the support provided by the ILO to its constituents, with a view to improving the design and implementation of future activities;
- (ac) follow through on the direction of the resolution and conclusions concerning the second recurrent discussion on fundamental principles and rights at work (2017) to develop a plan of action for resource mobilization to support projects around target 8.8 of the Sustainable Development Goals to protect labour rights with a focus on freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right of collective bargaining.

International Labour Conference – 112th Session, Geneva, 2024

Resolution concerning decent work and the care economy

(14 June 2024)

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization, meeting in Geneva at its 112th Session, 2024,

Having undertaken a general discussion on decent work and the care economy, and duly taking into account the ILO Declaration of Philadelphia (1944) and the ILO Centenary Declaration for the Future of Work (2019), to pursue decent work in the care economy,

Adopts the following conclusions;

Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to give due consideration to the conclusions and to guide the International Labour Office in giving effect to them;

Requests the Director-General to:

- (a) prepare a plan of action on decent work and the care economy to give effect to the conclusions, for consideration of the Governing Body at its 352nd Session (October–November 2024);
- (b) communicate the conclusions to relevant international and regional organizations;
- (c) take into account the conclusions when preparing future programme and budget proposals and mobilizing extrabudgetary resources;
- (d) keep the Governing Body informed of their implementation.

Conclusions concerning decent work and the care economy

I. Context – decent work and the care economy: An urgent need for action

1. Care is central to human, social, economic and environmental well-being, and sustainable development. Care work, paid and unpaid, is essential to all other work. A well-functioning and robust care economy contributes to a healthier present and future workforce, creates jobs, supports businesses and enhances productivity. Transformative change in the world of work, driven by technological innovations, demographic shifts and environmental and climate change, affect the demand for and supply of, as well as access to, care.

2. A well-functioning and robust care economy is critical for building resilience to crises, including pandemics, and brain drain, and for achieving gender equality and inclusion, and addressing other inequalities, promoting economic and social development, a human-centred approach to the future of work, just transition and social justice. The care economy is fast-growing and creates and enables employment opportunities.
3. Women make up the majority of paid and unpaid care work throughout the world.
4. The COVID-19 pandemic emphasized the importance of the care economy and shed light on gaps in public policies. The pandemic exacerbated the disproportionate share of unpaid care work provided by women and girls, and the pre-existing decent work deficits of care workers, including long working hours and occupational health and safety risks – such as exposure to violence and harassment, including gender-based violence and harassment – and severe staff and skill shortages.
5. The care workforce is heterogeneous. While care work is highly demanding and often requires high levels of skills and specialized knowledge, skills are not always fully recognized and valued accordingly. While some care workers are highly skilled and well-paid, many, including migrant and domestic workers, remain in the informal economy, low-paid and excluded, by law or in practice, from protections, including social and labour protection. Community health and care workers, often not recognized as workers, are also without such protection. Migrant workers, many of whom are women, often are not able to exercise fully the same rights as other workers. Further challenges to decent work and the care economy include strong ethnic, racial and gender-based occupational segregation, and undervaluation of care work. Women, especially those in vulnerable situations, provide an unequal share of unpaid care, which creates structural barriers to their participation, retention and progression in the labour force.
6. The fast pace of society ageing in some parts of the world brings more care burden, which intensifies the gaps in the demand for, supply of and access to care, and at the same time high-quality services are more needed than ever before.
7. The International Labour Organization (ILO) plays a leadership role in promoting decent work in the care economy, based on a life-course approach to care, embracing the 5R Framework for Decent Care Work (recognition, reduction and redistribution of unpaid care and reward and representation of care workers). Some governments have made progress on the ratification of care-related and other relevant international labour Conventions and have implemented integrated approaches to care policies. Employers and workers, through social dialogue, as well as employer-led initiatives, have led to the introduction of some family-friendly workplace policies and working arrangements to help improve the work-life balance of individuals while balancing care responsibilities. Care workers are increasingly organized. These efforts represent progress towards transforming the unequal division of care work between men and women into a more equal organization of care, promoting social co-responsibility among the State, the private sector, families, the social and solidarity economy (SSE) and the community.
8. However, significant gaps remain in public awareness, legislation, policies, funding and implementation. Urgent action is needed to ensure decent work in the care economy and promote decent work by ensuring access to care for all.

II. A common understanding of the care economy

9. The care economy comprises care work, both paid and unpaid, and direct and indirect care, its provision within and outside the household, as well as the people who provide and receive care and the employers and institutions that offer care. Care work consists of, among others, activities and relations that pursue sustainability and quality of life; nurture human capabilities; foster agency, autonomy and dignity; develop the opportunities and resilience of those who provide and receive care; address the diverse needs of individuals across different life stages; and meet the physical, psychological, cognitive, mental health and developmental needs for care and support of people including children, adolescents, youth, adults, older persons, persons with disabilities and all caregivers.

10. Care work is provided through the public sector and the private sector, including micro, small and medium-sized enterprises. It is also provided by the non-profit sector, the SSE and households. Paid care work spans diverse occupations and sectors. The care economy, spanning formality and informality, includes, but may not be limited to, the activities of workers in education, early childhood care and education, and the health and social sectors, of domestic workers and of individuals who perform unpaid care work. There is currently no internationally agreed statistical definition of care work and such a definition should be developed to promote harmonization and consistency of data on care, including in all applicable sub-sectors.
11. Direct care work refers to personal care activities that are relational, while indirect care work comprises activities that enable well-being in the absence of direct personal contact, such as cleaning and cooking.
12. Unpaid care work, often provided by the family and social network of care recipients, is of great value for care recipients, care providers and society. This care, which should be more equally shared between men and women, complements and supplements, but cannot replace paid care work.
13. The current social organization of care, that is who provides care and who accesses care, places a disproportionate share of unpaid care work on women, which hinders women's economic inclusion and effective labour market participation, widening gender gaps in the world of work, and leaves many without adequate access to social protection. The burden of paid and unpaid care work on women can be largely dependent on race, ethnicity, socio-economic conditions and place of origin.
14. The care economy comprises policies and regulatory frameworks, services, infrastructure, institutions, financing mechanisms, and social norms that influence and govern the provision and receipt of care and support throughout the life-course.

III. Guiding principles

15. In pursuing integrated, comprehensive and holistic policies and approaches for decent work and the care economy, Members should take into account the following principles.
16. Just as labour is not a commodity, labour in the care economy is not a commodity. All people should be able to provide and receive care, including self-care.
17. All care workers should enjoy decent work. Decent work for care workers contributes to quality care, recruitment and retention of workers, and promotion of gender equality, counteracts the shortage of workers and builds resilient societies and economies.
18. All Members have an obligation to respect, promote and realize the fundamental principles and rights at work in respect of care workers, namely: freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining; the elimination of all forms of forced or compulsory labour; the effective abolition of child labour; the elimination of discrimination in respect of employment and occupation; and a safe and healthy working environment.

19. Ratification and implementation of the international labour standards relevant to the care economy are central to a rights-based approach to care.
20. Provision of, access to and receipt of care should be based on the principles of non-discrimination, solidarity, sustainability, equity, universality, and social co-responsibility.
21. Investing in the care economy promotes quality care and decent job creation, and can lead to enhanced human capabilities, productivity growth, quality education, improved health and well-being and gender equality, as well as decent work and stronger female participation in the labour market, and enables the transition to the formal economy.
22. The 5R Framework for Decent Care Work guides integrated and coherent strategies to achieve decent work in the care economy. Unpaid care work should be recognized, reduced and redistributed. Paid care work should be rewarded through adequate remuneration including in accordance with the principle of equal pay for work of equal value, and effective labour and social protection.
23. Achieving decent work includes the adoption and effective implementation of well-designed care leave policies and services. This enables:
 - (a) workers with family responsibilities to enter, remain in and progress in the labour force, without discrimination;
 - (b) better work–life balance, and a more equal sharing of care responsibilities between men and women;
 - (c) productivity growth through maintaining the health and well-being of the workforce;
 - (d) addressing disadvantages faced by people with high care or support needs, as well as those faced by people providing unpaid care or support;
 - (e) addressing inequitable access to care and support services, including for workers in the informal economy.
24. The State has a primary responsibility for care provision, funding, regulation and ensuring high standards of quality, safety and health for care workers and care recipients. This includes the allocation of the necessary resources and the adoption and maintenance of a robust policy and regulatory framework.
25. Public–private partnerships that leverage the strengths of both public and private sectors can help scale quality care services without overburdening either side, fostering a more sustainable care ecosystem.
26. Public and private enterprises, cooperatives and other SSE entities, play a role in the provision of quality care, investment in sustainable and modern care infrastructure, and provision of training and employment opportunities.
27. Community-based care provision, including through partnership with indigenous and tribal peoples where applicable, can assist in meeting local needs.
28. Collecting data disaggregated by all forms of care work and measuring the scope and value of unpaid care are critical to understanding the care economy and informing policy design. These data should be disaggregated by income, sex, age, race, ethnic origin, migration status, disability, geographical location and other relevant characteristics, in line with national context.
29. Coordination across levels and sectors of government, taking a whole-of-government approach, fosters coherent, effective and integrated approaches to care.

IV. Advancing decent work in the care economy

- 30. Taking into account the above principles, governments, employers' and workers' organizations, as appropriate to their spheres of responsibility, with support from the ILO, should:
- (a) design and implement integrated and coherent care policies and systems for decent work and gender equality. These policies should contribute to a rights-based approach for care and be grounded in international labour standards and social dialogue. The 5R Framework for Decent Care Work provides valuable guidance in this regard;
 - (b) mainstream care into relevant public policies, including employment, skills, macroeconomic, social and labour protection, migration and environmental policies, while ensuring adequate public financing and coordination taking into account national circumstances;
 - (c) promote employment and macroeconomic policies that create decent jobs in the care economy, including through the formalization of informal care jobs and enterprises, and the prevention of informalization of formal ones, and ensure sufficient fiscal space;
 - (d) promote active labour market policies, education and training, upskilling and re-skilling, skills recognition and skills certification within and, where appropriate, across national borders, openness to learning and access to lifelong learning opportunities, in line with technological developments, to promote career development and attract and retain a skilled care workforce;
 - (e) address the undervaluation of care work, including by raising public awareness about the social and economic value of care work;
 - (f) address the unequal gender distribution of paid and unpaid work, and promote women's economic inclusion and autonomy beyond caregiving, including by changing social norms and gender stereotypes around caregiving roles;
 - (g) ensure appropriate responses to the needs of all workers with care responsibilities by ensuring comprehensive maternity protection and care leave and protection policies, including paternity, parental leave and long-term care leave;
 - (h) strengthen policies and measures facilitating work-life balance, paid work and care responsibilities. This includes measures related to the organization, time and location of work, and other terms and conditions of employment;
 - (i) build and maintain universal social protection systems that provide adequate protection to care workers in all types of employment and recognize unpaid care work, including through care credits in social insurance;
 - (j) create an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises and develop a conducive environment for SSE entities, including gender-responsive policies that promote productivity, investment in education and skills development, and enhanced access to business opportunities, formalization and finance;
 - (k) invest in and make available high-quality, affordable, adequate and accessible care services, including childcare, health care and long-term care for all workers, including for workers in the informal economy, enabling their transition to the formal economy;
 - (l) ensure measures consider culturally appropriate services and workforce considerations for indigenous and tribal peoples, including the development of community-based approaches;

- (m) enhance the availability of assistance and support services for persons with disabilities to promote individual autonomy and independence, including by taking a disability-inclusive approach to increase access to employment opportunities;
- (n) prevent and address all forms of discrimination against care workers, with particular attention to women, migrant workers, racialized groups and persons in situations of vulnerability;
- (o) ensure effective access to labour protection and social security, including through labour inspection, for all care workers, in all types of employment, especially to those most at risk of insufficient or inadequate protection such as domestic workers, migrant workers or community health and care workers;
- (p) design and implement policies and strategies to achieve: maximum limits on working time, occupational safety and health, including preventing and addressing violence and harassment, including gender-based violence and harassment, and adequate minimum wages whether statutory or negotiated. Public sector care providers should lead by example in this regard;
- (q) monitor the impacts of climate change and technological change on care, including unpaid care work, and consider care issues in relation to emerging labour market governance issues and climate change adaptation and mitigation policies and actions;
- (r) support micro, small and medium-sized enterprises and SSE entities, including cooperatives and other community-led initiatives, that deliver quality care services, including through capacity-building, skills development and access to finance;
- (s) collect and disseminate data on unpaid and paid care work, in line with existing international statistical standards and with international statistical standards that will be developed to provide an evidence base for policymaking;
- (t) promote the voice and representation of, and consult with, care worker organizations, including those of domestic workers, community health and care workers, and migrant workers, organizations of employers of care workers and unpaid family carers, where these exist;
- (u) Support multilateral initiatives such as the Equal Pay International Coalition (EPIC).

V. The role of the International Labour Organization

- 31. In line with the principles and priorities set out in these conclusions, the Organization, in consultation with constituents should further develop its comprehensive work on the care economy across its strategic objectives and direct its efforts to:
- (a) promote the ratification and implementation of international labour standards relevant to the care economy, including all fundamental Conventions;
 - (b) prepare research to be discussed by a tripartite meeting, to be determined by the Governing Body at the earliest date possible, so as to enable the Organization to assess whether there are gaps in the ILO's body of international labour standards related to paternity and parental protection, and other care leave (for sick or critically-ill family members, older persons or persons with disabilities) and, if so, what normative and/or non-normative actions could be appropriate;
 - (c) support the development of internationally-agreed statistical standards as the basis for the collection of detailed, comparable and harmonized data on the care economy, taking into account all relevant unpaid and paid care work, for discussion at the 22nd International Conference of Labour Statisticians in 2028;

- (d) provide technical support and policy guidance, including through Decent Work Country Programmes, for the development of national care policies and systems that ensure universal access to care, promote professionalization and formalization of care jobs, and the highest attainable standards of quality, safety and health for care workers and care recipients, guided by the 5R Framework for Decent Care Work;
- (e) provide technical assistance to promote the effective protection of migrant care workers; domestic workers; community health and care workers; workers in cooperatives and other SSE entities; care workers in the informal economy; and workers with family responsibilities;
- (f) promote policies and legislation for care and support services for those with physical and mental illnesses, persons living with HIV and persons with disabilities, with the participation of persons from the groups concerned;
- (g) enhance further its expertise on the care economy through strengthened research and improved dissemination and communication on decent work and the care economy in economies at different levels of development, including by providing regular trends and analyses, coverage gaps and public investments in care and their impacts on gender equality, employment, pay, working conditions and social protection of care workers, including migrant workers, and the quality of care service provision;
- (h) research and publish information on challenges and opportunities in the introduction and use of technology in the care economy, including digital technologies and artificial intelligence, and its impact on working conditions;
- (i) provide ongoing support to countries for the measurement of both paid and unpaid care work, applying the latest international statistical standards and good measurement practices;
- (j) collect and share best practices, and conduct research on skills development that promotes career development and attracts and retains a skilled care workforce;
- (k) support constituents in ensuring sustainable and adequate financing for care, including through conducting socio-economic feasibility and costing studies, measuring financing gaps and exploring options to expand fiscal space, as well as the development of adequate pro-employment macroeconomic policies, both fiscal and monetary, in line with ILO instruments on employment policy and social protection;
- (l) provide, with the International Training Centre of the ILO in Turin, and in collaboration with other relevant training centres, as appropriate, technical capacity-building for the design, adequate financing, implementation and monitoring of inclusive policies for the care economy, including mainstreaming care into all other relevant policies;
- (m) reinforce the capacities of tripartite constituents to engage in the formulation, implementation and monitoring of national care policies, and strengthen all forms of social dialogue, including collective bargaining and tripartite cooperation. Encourage effective workplace cooperation as a tool to help ensure safe and productive workplaces, in such a way that it respects collective bargaining and its outcomes and does not undermine the role of trade unions;
- (n) reinforce its global leadership role in advancing the care agenda at the global, regional and national levels by promoting, supporting and setting legal and statistical standards, ensuring policy coherence and inter-institutional cooperation on decent work and the care economy in the multilateral system;

- (o) continue to promote the Guidelines for a just transition towards environmentally sustainable economies and societies for all (2015), including in relation to the care economy;
- (p) leverage the Global Coalition for Social Justice and the UN Global Accelerator on Jobs and Social Protection for Just Transitions to strengthen partnerships with UN entities, international financial institutions, international networks and research centres, and to create a South-South platform to promote decent care work;
- (q) ensure adequate resources towards its work on the care economy and integrate decent work and gender equality in the care economy into all relevant ILO development cooperation projects and activities to harness fully the care economy's potential to contribute to the Decent Work Agenda, the achievement of the Sustainable Development Goals and a just transition;
- (r) provide support to, particularly, small island developing States and least developed countries, in mitigating the risk of brain drain.
