Interpretation from Portuguese: Observer, International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) – Dear fellow trade union leaders, I would like to thank you for giving me this great opportunity to underscore some of the important aspects that compromise a labour administration that is intended to be efficient and effective, in line with the guidance set out in Convention No. 150 on the labour administration system and its decisive role in creating objective conditions to promote and improve standards of living of workers and their families. In Guinea-Bissau, after the first administrative reforms had been undertaken in an open and multiparty fashion, important measures were adopted, which, had they been applied by successive governments, would mean that we would not be calling for the implementation of the ILO Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26), which has not been updated since 1988. Decree No. 12-A/94 of 28 February 1994 issuing the public administration staff regulations states that staff will be hired through public competition, with a periodic assessment of staff performance as well as career progression. Unfortunately, successive governments in Guinea-Bissau have not respected these legal requirements, which has led to stagnation of the career of civil servants. Despite the revision of the staff regulations through Decree-Laws Nos 4, 5, 8 and 11 of 19 October 2012, no progress has been made and these provisions have been forgotten. If there were performance appraisals and career progression for workers, wages would not be so low in relation to the cost of living. That is why we need to also ensure that Convention No. 26 is implemented. It was ratified by Guinea-Bissau in 1977 and it was in 1988, through Decree No. 17/88 of 4 April 1988, that the last definition of the minimum wage in the country was made.

The lack of a definition of a national minimum wage has serious consequences for the lives of workers, employers and the State itself because workers, for example, cannot meet the expenses they need for a period of two weeks. There is also no incentive for productivity.

The State and the employers pretend to pay, the workers pretend to work. In addition, without assessment of performance and career progression for workers and officials, we cannot ensure greater productivity. Faced with this fragile situation of disregard for administrative rules, the State was led to failure. If there had been the respect of the ILO Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), by the State of Guinea-Bissau, we would not be seeing the people and workers in general suffering and living in poverty. In 2001 the Government of Guinea-Bissau created a tripartite body called the Standing Council for Social Cooperation. If this body had functioned properly, with a serious and responsible social dialogue, we would have had solutions that could have minimized the suffering of workers in Guinea-Bissau. The question of a national minimum wage is fundamental for Guinea-Bissau given that sections 153 and 154 of the new Labour Code of 18 July 2022 provide that the executive must define a national minimum wage with social partners. That is why it is vital that social dialogue be promoted so that we can respect the principle of freedom of association as well as other fundamental rights which are established in Act No. 8/91 of 3 October 1991 and Act No. 3/92 of 6 April 1992.

The State also has the obligation to honour the commitment assumed with the ratification of Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which was ratified in June 2023.

Observer, International Transport Workers' Federation (ITF) – My intervention will focus on the challenges and opportunities for labour administrations in the context of global supply chains and labour administration activities relating to non-standard forms of employment.

As highlighted in paragraphs 185–188 of the General Survey, labour inspectors have a direct and essential role in protecting the rights of workers in global supply chains. As a representative of transport and logistics workers – a heavily subcontracted workforce found in almost every product supply chain – we know too well the essential role of labour inspection in upholding the rights of these key workers. However, as noted in the excellent ILO Labour Inspection Technical Note on strategic compliance planning for decent work in global supply chains, a major challenge faced by labour inspectorates is their inability to hold multinational enterprises accountable for labour law violations in the lower tiers of their supply chains due to jurisdictional limitations. This is due to the fact that enforcement powers of labour inspectorates cover only workplaces which are located in their country and are under national labour laws. Indeed, inspectorate mandates may also be limited in Special Economic Zones.

Another major challenge faced by labour inspectorates in some countries is the weakness of national regulations concerning non-standard forms of employment, such as permissible disguised employment through labour-only contracting, or informal work arrangements, which could be linked to global supply chains.

These limitations on a labour inspectorate's mandate within global supply chains can lead to adverse outcomes for workers, especially where private compliance initiatives seek to fill this regulatory gap. Of course, these initiatives themselves have significant limitations, not least the fact that they may have vested interests due to their funding arrangements.

For these reasons, we fully endorse the Committee of Experts' conclusion that labour administrations need to promote effective governance of global supply chains based on the primary role of the State to ensure enforcement. Indeed, we would call on States to recognize the cross-border nature of global supply chains and facilitate mutual assistance in monitoring, inspections, investigations and enforcement actions, where appropriate. The ILO can also promote cooperation, assistance and capacity-building between competent authorities in this regard.

Turning now to Chapter 1.8.4 of the General Survey, we agree with the Committee of Experts that non-standard employment features prominently in the digital economy and that one of the main questions that labour administrations face, while dealing with digital platform work is the classification of the employment relationship. Indeed, as the Committee of Experts concludes in paragraph 167, it is imperative that inspectorates are adequately resourced to tackle, among other things, the expansion of non-standard forms of employment with a high incidence of non-compliance with labour legislation.

Here, we would note the significant role played by labour inspectorates in several countries.

In 2021, the Italian labour inspectorate collaborated with the public prosecutor in a major investigation into platform work. The Milan prosecutor then ordered four food delivery companies to officially hire more than 60,000 misclassified workers and to pay a total of €733 million in fines.

In Spain, the labour inspectorate has issued several fines against food delivery platform companies over unlawful misclassification – both before and after the adoption of the country's Rider Law, most recently in January this year.

In 2021, the Brazilian labour inspectorate issued a 219-page report on the employment practices of a large food delivery platform and concluded that the company's riders were in a "subordinate job where the platform was in total control over their tasks".

And finally in 2023, the Dutch labour inspectorate concluded an investigation into food delivery platforms that found instances of child labour, low pay and occupational safety and health violations.

These examples demonstrate the key role labour inspectorates play in a segment of the economy where workers do not have adequate recourse to labour justice. But labour inspectors in this space work in the dark as they do not have access to a platform's algorithmic black box. Automated monitoring and decision-making systems powered by algorithms are replacing functions that human managers usually perform, including allocating tasks, pricing assignments, determining work schedules, giving instructions and imposing sanctions. Therefore, it is essential that digital labour platforms are required to provide information on algorithmic management practices to labour inspectorates so that they can perform their duties properly.

Observer, Confederation of University Workers in the Americas (CONTUA) – Firstly, on behalf of the public workers of the labour ministries in our region, we would like to bring to this forum's attention the serious shortcomings in employment stability guarantees and respect for the continuity of public officials' posts, including the right to collective bargaining, and the almost non-existence of policies for further training for labour administration staff. This situation, when combined with low wages and poor working conditions, contradicts the image that many States attempt to project before the ILO.

We can state without a doubt that, except in very few cases, States have weakened their labour administration structures. This owes in large part to a reduction in the quantity and quality of their human resources and a lack of investment in technology. Without effective compliance with the guarantee of decent working conditions for public workers in labour ministries which we have agreed upon at the ILO, it will be impossible to meet the objectives that we set with the adoption of Convention No. 150 and Recommendation No. 158.

In short, the very persons tasked with ensuring fair working conditions are themselves victims of unfair working conditions.

The second point that we would like to make relates to the political capture of State structures, including labour administrations, to interfere in the internal affairs of trade unions. Regrettably, in many cases, indeed the majority, we see how the governments of Latin America use their labour ministries' monitoring powers to interfere in trade union elections, arbitrarily delay legal recognition and damage trade union organizations.

Thirdly, we would like to focus on social dialogue and tripartism. The labour ministries and their most senior officials repeat here, at the ILO, the mantra of social dialogue, tripartism and "labour is not a commodity". However, a rare phenomenon of as yet unknown origin seems to occur over the Atlantic Ocean, or, more precisely, during the journey from Geneva to Latin America, because when those officials set foot on land, they forget their speeches, adopt a blinkered unilateral approach and dispense with the social dialogue that 12 hours previously they were trumpeting in Europe.

As defined by my mentor and colleague Gerardo Martínez, institutionalized social dialogue is no more and no less than real dialogue, the result of consensus based on the acknowledgement of diversity, in which decisions and risks are shared, that endures over time and is consolidated as state policy.

Until very recently we as Argentinians were proud of the tripartism of the National Council on Employment, Productivity and the Adjustable Minimum Wage. However, beyond what has been shared here, what we have seen at the last two meetings of the Council has broken from the historical approach of consensus, rendering us unable to reach agreement and therefore setting us clearly on the road to regression and non-compliance with the agreements reached in this house.

At the risk of featuring in the statement that the Chairperson suggested that the Government of Argentina was going to make, I cannot fail to mention the hierarchical breakdown seen in the area of labour under the current Government, the dismantling of the former Ministry of Labour and the arbitrary dismissal of thousands of public officials, many of them in the area of labour administration, in steps that clearly contradict the objectives upheld by those of us who believe in the foundations of this Organization.

Employer members – The Employers' group would like to thank the Governments and all speakers that have contributed to this debate. Considering all contributions and remarks, the Employers wish to address the following points.

- First, effective labour administration systems are vital for good governance of labour matters as well as for economic and social progress. On the one hand, labour administration systems, along with public employment services and labour inspection, can make decent work a reality in the workplace by enforcing labour standards. On the other hand, labour administration systems can contribute to economic growth by increasing competitiveness and productivity, ensuring a predictable environment for business, as well as developing and implementing policies and producing higher employment rates and social cohesion. Labour administration plays a key role in ensuring decent work by stimulating economic growth by levelling the playing field, promoting business predictability, sustainable enterprises and inclusive economies. Therefore a well-organized labour administration that takes equal account of the needs of workers and employers is the be-all and end-all of good labour market governance and thus the key to achieving decent work, sustainable companies and economic stability.
- Second, crises can provide an opportunity to strengthen or reform labour administration and modernize labour policies so that they are better prepared to anticipate and respond effectively to future events. Today, labour administration systems operate in a rapidly changing economic, social and technological environment. The world of work is experiencing profound changes, as has been recently the case as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic. Further significant transformations are to be expected, with the spread of artificial intelligence applications in the workplace. It is therefore essential that labour administrations are constantly modernized and adapted to be able to cope with such transformations. Modernization of labour administration may require exploring new methods of governance and management, including adopting new policies, services and enforcing mechanisms but also building effective public and private partnerships. Any modernization effort, however, must respect values such as the rule of law, tripartism, social dialogue, public interest, good governance and transparency. The Employers consider, that in a post-pandemic world, modernizing and strengthening the capacity of labour administration is essential not only to address crises but also to ensure more resilient, sustainable and inclusive economies for the future. In this sense, we welcome this examination of the two ILO instruments in the General Survey as a timely opportunity to take a fresh look at the important role of labour administration systems, to see how they can best meet future challenges and needs.

- Third, as foreseen in Convention No. 150 and Recommendation No. 158, labour administrations need to engage independently with representative employers' and workers' organizations and closely in their activities through consultation, cooperation and negotiation. Employers' and workers' organizations have comprehensive and in-depth knowledge and experience in labour matters, and can, and should, assist labour administrations in providing relevant and balanced responses to the transformative changes in the world of work.
- Finally, labour administrations should pay due attention to the importance of the role of sustainable enterprises, as generators of employment and promoters of innovation and decent work, as recognized in the ILO Centenary Declaration.

In conclusion, having reviewed the General Survey, the Employers consider that the positive potential of labour administrations, as reflected in Convention No. 150 and Recommendation No. 158, is not yet fully recognized and developed in all ILO Member States. The Employers trust that this discussion of the General Survey can and will contribute to further progress in this regard.

Worker members – Given the key role of labour administration in achieving all the objectives pursued by the ILO, in our opinion, this Convention should be the subject of a campaign aimed at promoting its ratification.

In addition to the up-to-date nature of Convention No. 150 and Recommendation No. 158, the two instruments have a high level of flexibility which enables Member States to adapt national labour policy to the rapid developments in the world of work. This flexibility also allows for labour administration to be designed in accordance with the specific needs of each Member State.

It is essential for the labour administration system implemented to meet the requirements established by the Convention. The General Survey has shown that very modern solutions can be found for the implementation of an effective labour administration.

It would be useful for Member States to re-examine the possibility of ratifying Convention No. 150 in the light of this new General Survey.

In this regard, it is important for the ILO to maintain and strengthen the technical assistance provided to governments and social partners to ensure economic and social progress in an inclusive, sustainable and resilient context. And this will be achieved, in particular, by strengthening the mechanisms allowing for the consultation and participation of the social partners regarding the drafting of national policies on work and employment, and the coordinated and coherent implementation and the revision of these policies.

The vital role of labour inspectorates cannot be forgotten and must be reinforced by building their capacity.

Developing countries are particularly in need of technical assistance for the acquisition of computerized labour market information systems. It is important not only for these countries, but also for others, to have up-to-date national statistics on employment and employment trends in order to identify gaps in worker protection. These tools will provide them with the capacity to adjust, develop and implement coherent, comprehensive and effective national policies on employment and work to close gaps and evaluate the results.

As we are discussing the evaluation of employment policies and strategies, we consider that it is important to recall that, since the role of labour administration is to create decent and stable jobs, improve living standards, and promote social progress and social justice, the methods used in the private sector are inadequate for the evaluation of such objectives.

It is also in the light of this fundamental role that the notion of sustainable enterprises mentioned several times in the General Survey must be addressed. A sustainable enterprise is an enterprise that allows for the creation of decent and stable jobs, the improvement of living standards, and the promotion of social progress and social justice. It is only by keeping in mind these objectives that labour administration will be able to address this notion.

The scope of labour administration is already very wide, but it must continue to expand as the world of work evolves. The General Survey indicates the need to adapt labour administration mechanisms to these new developments in order for all workers to benefit from the policies and services implemented through labour administration.

Workers still insufficiently covered include those in the informal economy, in precarious forms of employment, such as temporary contracts, part-time work, on-call contracts, temporary agency work or working from home, not to mention workers on digital platforms and the self-employed.

Labour administration activities should cover these workers in order to increase the reliability, importance and credibility of labour administration. Labour administration can thus contribute to overcoming deficiencies in decent work in these forms of employment by adapting regulations and policies.

However, major legislative and policy gaps persist, leaving these workers without adequate protection. These gaps need to be closed.

Labour administration plays a vital role in ensuring compliance with labour standards. By implementing measures to increase the scope of and compliance with labour standards, labour administration contributes to the establishment of decent working conditions and a level playing field for all economic actors.

These measures include the compulsory extension of collective labour agreements, whereby instruments negotiated freely and voluntarily between workers' and employers' representatives can be applied to all enterprises. The Committee of Experts also recalls that the promotion of collective bargaining and the conclusion of collective labour agreements must not have the effect of lowering the level of protection provided by labour regulations.

The General Survey indicates that labour ministries rarely draw up documents comprehensively defining a national labour policy. Such a document is nevertheless essential, particularly given the need to ensure coordination and coherence, at every level, of all initiatives from all the actors involved in implementing labour and employment policy. The General Survey indicates that Member States may usefully avail themselves of ILO technical assistance in carrying out this exercise.

The promotion of ratification to which I referred at the beginning of my speech is fully in step with Member States' other commitments within the ILO, in particular those contained in the Conference resolution of 2011, the Centenary Declaration and the Global Call to Action of 2021. Developing an effective labour administration system is a key factor in achieving the objectives set out in these instruments and, more broadly, in achieving the Sustainable Development Goals.

The ILO's assistance will be essential in this regard. The ILO could develop an action plan and tools to help governments pinpoint opportunities for improving labour administration at national level. This will also require Member States to be convinced of the need to invest in their labour administration, whether in terms of financial and human resources, training of labour administration officials or legislative reforms, in order to be fully equipped to promote decent work and social justice. This General Survey makes a strong case for such investment.

Chairperson – Earlier in this sitting the Government of Argentina requested the right to reply in respect to the intervention by the Workers' delegate of Argentina. I now give the floor to the Government of Argentina to exercise the right to reply. The reply must be no longer than two minutes and must be in parliamentary language. No "right to reply" to the reply will be granted.

Government member, Argentina – Earlier, we heard a complete catalogue of inaccuracies relating to the Government of Argentina voiced by the distinguished representative of education workers. Among other matters, it was indicated that 60 per cent of workers are informal and criticisms were raised of economic parameters. I would say that the distinguished representative of education workers is right. The economy that was inherited implied that my country was on a rocky road and on the point of falling off a precipice. I will add some other indicative data.

On 10 December last year, when the new Government took office, Argentina offered a pathetic picture: 50 per cent poverty, 10 per cent destitution and an inflation rate that, for wholesale prices, was 54 per cent a month at the end of the year. But what was worse was that the children, the most precious asset in Argentina, were subjected to absolute poverty and, even worse, immersed in a sad educational poverty.

I will give you some data: in some of the provinces in the south of Argentina, primary school classes were held on 80 days, when it should have been 190 days.

What this Government is trying to do is to overcome social deficits, without collapsing into national bankruptcy. The most precious is the national education system. Do you know why? Because it is the most democratic of all, because it is free and compulsory. Is it democratic that those who have the purchasing power to be able to attend a private school should have greater opportunities on the labour market? That is not democratic, nor is it just. Education should be an essential service.

Following this legacy, what the Government of Argentina is doing, based on humility with firmness, sensitivity with audacity, prudence with courage, is to implement a therapeutic strategy to overcome the pain with justice, and the frustration with great trust in millions of Argentinians, who last October, through their ballots, expressed the hope of a better future.

B. Written information received from Governments concerned by serious failure

Plurinational State of Bolivia

The Plurinational State of Bolivia has been building a process of social and economic transformation, the achievements of which are recognized at regional and international level. Despite the interruption of democracy in 2020, the transformation process has succeeded in taking root once again and making its first significant achievements, such as the low rates of inflation and unemployment which have been recorded over the recent period, under the leadership of the Government of President Luis Arce Catacora. Among the deep-rooted social transformations in the country, emphasis should be placed on the protection of the rights of men and women workers, in accordance and compliance with the fundamental rights recognized by the ILO.

The Political Constitution of the State, promulgated in 2009, in article 46, recognizes the right to decent work, with industrial safety, occupational safety and health, without discrimination and with just, equitable and satisfactory remuneration and pay, which ensures workers and their families a decent existence. Article 48 establishes the premise that social and labour provisions are compulsory, and that labour standards shall be interpreted and applied in accordance with the principles of the protection of women and men workers, as the principal productive force of society; the primacy of the labour relationship; labour continuity and stability; non-discrimination and the reversal of the burden of proof in favour of women and men workers, with the added principle that the recognized rights and benefits of workers cannot be renounced, and that any agreement that is contrary to this principle or is likely to undermine its application shall be null and void.

Article 49(II) provides that the law shall regulate labour relations in respect of contracts and collective agreements; general and sectoral minimum wages and wage increases; reinstatement; paid leave and public holidays; the calculation of seniority, hours of work, overtime, night and Sunday rates; Christmas and other bonuses, premiums and other systems of sharing in enterprise assets, compensation and redundancy payments; work-related maternity rights; vocational capacity-building and training; and other labour rights.

Constitutional case law, and particularly Plurinational Constitutional Ruling No. 1202/2012 of 6 September 2012 “[o]n the right to work ...”, found that:

The Right to work and work-related rights constitute a nucleus, not only of socio-economic rights, but also of fundamental human rights. A central denominator of work-related rights, in terms of their purpose and content, appears to be ‘labour’ (work). In its traditional narrow meaning, work has been seen as a means of earning a living or, in other words, only a means of economic survival. At the beginning of the XXth century, another more important and global perspective began to be discussed: the interdependence between labour conditions, social justice and universal peace. Moreover, modern perceptions have positively intensified the concept of labour as a human value, a social necessity and a means of self-realization and individual development.

In relation to labour rights, the national law set out in the Political Constitution of the State, the General Labour Act, the Regulatory Decree issued under the General Labour Act, as well as texts at the same or lower levels, have recognized rights and guarantees for women and men workers that merit being protected and guaranteed by the State, such as the right to a stable source of work, to receive remuneration or wages, the guarantee of employment stability for pregnant women and parents with children, persons with disabilities, mothers and fathers, spouses, guardians of persons with disabilities under 18 years of age, or with serious disabilities, persons suffering from cancer, HIV or serious illnesses, women subjected to violence; and the protection of trade union rights.

It is also important to indicate that, article 49(III), the Political Constitution of the State prohibits unjustified dismissal and any form of harassment at work, and is in accordance with article 8(II) of the Constitution, which provides that dignity is one of the underlying values of the State, and it is therefore one of its essential purposes and functions to guarantee the well-being, development, safety and protection, and equality of dignity of persons, nations, peoples and communities, and to promote mutual respect and intracultural, intercultural and plurilingual dialogue.

This whole social and legislative structure, which is being developed and modernized, under the strictest observance of labour rights and the applicable provisions, in itself implies the compliance of the State with international labour standards, as outlined above.

In relation to the examination of the 31 standards to the legislative authorities, on which the Committee of Experts is requesting information, they may be divided into:

- four Conventions: the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006); the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187); the Work in Fishing Convention, 2007 (No. 188); the Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190);
- 23 Recommendation; and

- four Protocols.

Ratification of Conventions

The Conventions adopted by the ILO make up an international legal framework concerning all aspects of labour relations, conditions of work, social security and the protection of specific categories of workers. These Conventions are directly applicable by States that have ratified them.

Despite the provisions of article 19, paragraphs 1, 3 and 5, of the ILO Constitution, the ratification of ILO Conventions is not compulsory and, in accordance with paragraph 5(b), they have to be brought before the authority or authorities regarded as competent. Nevertheless, it is also necessary to take into consideration the specific circumstances of the situation in each country, which have prevented the Plurinational State of Bolivia from complying with this obligation, as indicated below:

- The MLC, 2006, and Convention No 188 both refer to working conditions with special characteristics, in respect of which the Plurinational State of Bolivia is not fully in control as, since 1879, Bolivia has been the victim of unjust maritime enclosure, as is globally recognized. As a consequence, it is not a priority as there is a lack of specific conditions to be regulated in accordance with these Conventions.
- With reference to Convention No. 187, Bolivia is fully engaged in the process of the modernization of labour inspection, with a view to protecting the performance of work in all its forms and regulating the minimum conditions covering the labour relationship in relation to the health of the worker. In light of these considerations and in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, Ministerial Decision No. 1444/23 was issued on 26 September 2023 approving the Labour Inspection General Regulations, which provide for the adoption of prevention measures respecting labour relations and conditions.
- With reference to Convention No. 190, in relation to its scope of application, it provides that:
 - Article 2(1). This Convention protects workers and other persons in the world of work, including employees as defined by national law and practice, as well as persons working irrespective of their contractual status, persons in training, including interns and apprentices, workers whose employment has been terminated, volunteers, jobseekers and job applicants, and individuals exercising the authority, duties or responsibilities of an employer.
 - (2). This Convention applies to all sectors, whether private or public, both in the formal and informal economy, and whether in urban or rural areas.

As a matter of principle, the ratification of Conventions cannot be made subject to reservations. There is a conceptual impediment built into the Convention in relation to ascendant harassment at work, where the victim occupies a hierarchically higher position in relation to the supposed harasser, which is in contradiction with the logic of the Plurinational State of Bolivia with regard to the possibility for a person in a position of greater authority being able to apply the disciplinary measures which may be pertinent and established by law in relation to persons at a lower level of authority, for conduct which when carried out or when it occurs may be considered “ascendant” harassment at work. This is a situation that cannot be accepted when it is used to undermine the rights of workers and leads to their unjustified dismissal. The inadmissibility of reservations, which was broadly explained in the Memorandum submitted by the ILO to the International Court of Justice in the Genocide Case in 1951, is based on the premise that “the rights which the treaties have conferred on non-governmental interests in regard to the adoption of international labour Conventions would be overruled if the consent of governments alone should suffice to modify the substance and detract from the effect of the Conventions” (paragraph 20).

Situation with regard to ILO Recommendations

The doctrine has it that the Recommendations adopted by the International Labour Conference constitute guidance for the action of governments in specific fields and are communicated to Member States for their consideration with a view to effect being given to them by national legislation. Unlike the Conventions adopted by the Conference, Recommendations do not require ratification by Member States, although their application would require their application through the provisions of the national legislation. (See the text of article 19(6) of the ILO Constitution.)

In the list of 31 standards in relation to which the Committee of Experts is seeking information on their submission to the competent authorities, 23 are Recommendations, in respect of which the Plurinational State of Bolivia has issued legal provisions regulating their application in the national territory, including:

- The Part-Time Work Recommendation, 1994 (No. 182), in relation to which the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Welfare has submitted, during the current year of 2024, a draft Presidential Decree regulating so-called atypical working hours, with a view to safeguarding the labour rights of workers engaged under this type of contract, the text of which is currently under examination in accordance with the respective legislative procedure.
- The Safety and Health in Mines Recommendation, 1995 (No. 183): in the context of the recent implementation of the Labour Inspection General Regulations, adopted by Ministerial Decision No. 1444/23, of 26 September 2023, a preliminary stage of prevention has been implemented for the protection of the conditions of labour relationships, particularly in the mining and cooperative mining sectors, which is being implemented in coordination with the cooperative sector, under which the administrative authority can recommend the adoption of protection measures to members and, where appropriate, to workers. This prevention action is currently being implemented in a satisfactory manner in the provinces of the Yungas in the Department of La Paz and its implementation is planned in the Departments of Potosí and Oruro.
- The Home Work Recommendation, 1996 (No. 184): this Recommendation has been taken into consideration in the national legislation, and particularly in Act No. 2450, of 9 April 2003, the Act regulating waged domestic work, and in Presidential Decree No. 4589, of 28 September 2021, issued during the current term of the Government of President Luis Arce Catacora, which recognizes the right to protection of women and men domestic employees through short-term social security coverage by providing for their affiliation with the National Health Fund.
- The Labour Inspection (Seafarers) Recommendation, 1996 (No. 185), the Recruitment and Placement of Seafarers Recommendation, 1996 (No. 186), the Seafarers’ Wages, Hours of Work and the Manning of Ships Recommendation, 1996 (No. 187), and the Work in Fishing Recommendation, 2007 (No. 199), which relate in particular to the conditions of persons engaged in labour relations subject to special conditions, such as “seafarers”. It should be recalled that Bolivia, on the occasion of the War of the Pacific (1879–84), during which it faced Chile, was deprived of the whole of the territory on the coast of the Pacific Ocean, thereby being condemned to being unjustly landlocked in a situation that has persisted up to the present. As a result of this imposed geographical enclosure, the labour relations of seafarers are not an important consideration among all the sources of labour in the country. As a consequence, nor is their regulation a priority requiring immediate attention, nor does this imply any renunciation by the Plurinational State of Bolivia from recuperating its maritime status, as explicitly recognized in articles 267 and 268 of the Constitution:

Article 267. I. The Bolivian State declares its non-renounceable and imprescriptible right to the territory that gives it access to the Pacific Ocean and its maritime area. II. The effective resolution of the maritime dispute through peaceful measures and the full exercise of its sovereignty over that territory shall be permanent and non-renounceable objectives of the Bolivian State.

Article 268. The development of maritime, river and lake-based interests, and those of the merchant navy, shall be a priority for the State, and their administration and protection shall be carried out by the Bolivian Navy, in accordance with the law.

- The Private Employment Agencies Recommendation, 1997 (No. 188): although this instrument dates back to 1997, its content has been taken into consideration in the national legislation, for example in Act No. 163, of 31 July 2012, the Framework Act against the Smuggling and Trafficking of Persons, which provides that the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Welfare shall issue specific regulations to determine the requirements for their functioning, rights, duties, inspection, prohibitions and penalties with a view to preventing the smuggling and trafficking of persons. This is in accordance with section 18 of Presidential Decree No. 1486, of 6 February 2013, which provides that the operation of private employment agencies shall be authorized by the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Welfare. For that purpose, Ministerial Decisions No. 1321/18, of 4 December 2018, and No. 108/19, of 1 February 2019, have been issued to approve the Regulations on the registration and operation of private employment agencies.
- The Maternity Protection Recommendation, 2000 (No. 191), which has been taken into consideration in the national legislation, which currently includes Act No. 1516, of 10 July 2023, the Act to amend section 31 of Legislative Decree No. 13214, of 24 December 1975, which was transformed into Act No. 006, of 1 May 2010, which allows the partial deferral of the maternity allowance and its addition to the 45 days following childbirth.

As can be seen, the Plurinational State of Bolivia, and particularly the executive authorities, have been engaged in the constant analysis of the international instruments adopted by the ILO, and particularly the Recommendations, with a view to their incorporation into the provisions of the national legislation, either through Presidential Decrees or Ministerial Decisions, while always strictly observing the progressivity and protection of the rights of women and men workers.

Measures taken in relation to the Protocols adopted by the ILO

Although information has been requested on four Protocols (the Protocol of 1995 to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947; the Protocol of 1996 to the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976; the Protocol of 2002 to the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981; and the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930), certain specific considerations need to be taken into account in that regard.

As explained above, in light of the geographical situation of the Plurinational State of Bolivia, it does not have a merchant navy that is sufficiently well developed, as a result of which it is not a priority to issue regulations governing this specific sector of workers.

Without prejudice to the above, it is important to indicate that the administration of President Luis Arce Catacora has overseen the adoption of Act No. 1436, of 22 June 2022, which in its sole section provides:

- I. In accordance with Article 158(I)(14) of the Political Constitution of the State, section 33(f)(b) and section 37 of Act No. 401, of 18 September 2013, respecting the conclusion of treaties, the “Protocol to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930”, adopted during the 103rd Session of the International Labour Conference in Geneva, Switzerland, on 11 June 2014, shall be ratified, and its text forms part of the present Act.
- II. The executive authorities shall be responsible for formally depositing the Instrument of Ratification of the “Protocol to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930.

Brunei Darussalam

The Government acknowledges the concern raised by the Committee of Experts regarding the case of serious failure to submit instruments to the competent authority. We would like to reiterate that Brunei Darussalam has actively engaged in sharing information on previously adopted Conventions with relevant government agencies for their policy consideration and potential ratification.

When an ILO instrument is adopted by the ILO Conference, it undergoes an initial review by the Labour Department and the Ministry of Home Affairs. Subsequently, the instrument is shared with the respective government ministries that hold the relevant policy portfolios. These government agencies collectively assess and determine the appropriate timeline for Brunei Darussalam to ratify the ILO instrument and implement the relevant obligations domestically. This comprehensive review process ensures that all implications are thoroughly considered and align with the national priorities and legislative framework.

As part of this process, Brunei Darussalam has reviewed and shared several recently adopted ILO instruments with relevant agencies. Notably, the Quality Apprenticeships Recommendation, 2023 (No. 208), adopted at the 111th Session of the International Labour Conference in 2023, has been circulated for policy consideration and potential implementation.

The Government is committed to enhancing this existing practice and ensuring full compliance with the submission’s obligation. We recognize the need for further consultation and exploration to identify the most appropriate mechanisms and platforms within our national context. This will ensure comprehensive fulfilment of these objectives and foster widespread understanding and participation.

Brunei Darussalam has proactively sought guidance from the ILO Regional Office to ensure timely and accurate fulfilment of its responsibilities. We will host an ILO expert mission to Brunei Darussalam in May 2024. This mission aims to clarify reporting responsibilities, work collaboratively to enhance compliance, and strengthen our commitment to the principles and goals of the ILO.

Brunei Darussalam welcomes any technical assistance or capacity-building efforts offered by the ILO to help achieve compliance with the obligations under article 19 of the ILO Constitution.

We appreciate the Committee and the ILO for highlighting these points, and we look forward to further collaboration in addressing this issue.

Chad

Act No. 7/66 of 4 March 1966, establishing the Labour and Social Insurance Code in Chad, takes account of the following Conventions:

- Workmen's Compensation (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 12);
- Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation) Convention, 1925 (No. 19)

In accordance with section 298 of the above-mentioned Act, "the purpose of social insurance is to guarantee workers and their families against risks of any kind likely to reduce or eliminate their earning capacity. It also covers family expenses".

Title IV of the same Act refers to the employment injury scheme. Therefore, although they have not yet been ratified, the above-mentioned ILO instruments are already incorporated into the Republic's legal instruments.

However, it is difficult for us to understand how a report could be produced on an instrument that has not yet been ratified. This is where the difficulty lies for those responsible for producing reports. We therefore request the support of the Committee to facilitate the drafting of reports on non-ratified instruments.

Congo

The Government, while noting this serious failure, nevertheless reaffirms its strong commitment to fulfilling all its obligations in this regard. It recalls that, several years ago, it was the subject of cases of failure concerning almost all obligations under the ILO Constitution. Continuous efforts to ensure compliance have, however, been undertaken and are ongoing.

The Government submitted reports to the International Labour Standards Department in August and September 2023, including one on the Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150), and another on the Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149). Moreover, it submitted a document in reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, a copy of which is appended. The Government considers that this document fulfils its obligation to reply to all or most of the comments made by the Committee of Experts.

The Congo has not yet, however, submitted first reports on the application of the Conventions identified in the report of the Committee of Experts: the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138); the Occupational Safety and Health (Dock Work) Convention, 1979 (No. 152); the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended (MLC, 2006); and the Work in Fishing Convention, 2007 (No. 188). It takes the opportunity to append to this submission its first report on the MLC, 2006, a result of numerous exchanges between the experts of the International Labour Standards Department and national stakeholders, particularly in 2023. It should be noted, however, that a joint workshop (merchant shipping and labour) is planned for a later date with a view to updating the report in the light of developments in the area of maritime labour; those developments will be the subject of an additional report by the Government.

On 8 March 2024, the Congo received, through the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, a reminder from the International Labour Standards Department concerning the report requested in an initial letter dated 7 July 2023. That report concerns the following Conventions and Recommendations:

- the Workmen's Compensation (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 12);
- the Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation) Convention, 1925 (No. 19);

- the Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation) Recommendation, 1925 (No. 25);
- the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102) (Part VI);
- the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121);
- the Employment Injury Benefits Recommendation, 1964 (No. 121).

The Government has made every effort to reply, with the involvement of technical departments and bodies. To that end, work to gather data from the General Directorate of Social Security and the National Social Security Fund has recently been completed; those data are being processed and will soon be consolidated in a report to be submitted to the International Labour Standards Department as early as the first half of June 2024.

Equatorial Guinea

Equatorial Guinea, an ILO Member State, in its efforts to fulfil its duty as an ILO Member, has provided its written views stating, inter alia, that the country has endured a chain of events which have delayed certain steps relating to ILO obligations.

Let us begin by highlighting the economic recession generated by the reduction in crude oil, which is our main source of revenue, which has forced the Government to amend its road map in certain sectors. We also highlight the emergence of the health crisis caused by the global coronavirus (COVID-19) pandemic, throughout which the Government turned to finding strategies to combat such a crisis. While governments were focused on combating the pandemic, the country was affected by the explosion of ammunition on 7 March 2021, which affected our work and, on top of the health crisis, meant that solutions had to be found to assist the victims of the disaster by applying policies to support victims. In this context, the Government enacted Decree No. 116/2022, calling Presidential elections in the Deputies Chamber, Senate and the municipalities, which meant that administrative management came to a halt.

The Government made progress in addressing situations related to the economic recession caused by the fall in the prices of crude oil and the global health crisis caused by the COVID-19 pandemic by setting up a support fund for small and medium-sized enterprises to compensate for the repercussions of the health crisis. The Government also continues to help victims of the disaster of 7 March 2024 by setting up accounts in commercial banks where philanthropic citizens may deposit voluntary contributions for the victims. Various non-governmental organizations, such as the Constanca Mangué Nsue Okomo Foundation, which supports all of the most vulnerable sections of society that do not have help, also added to the Government's actions of solidarity. Since 2020, preparation has begun on 12 reports, which had come to a standstill owing to the above sociopolitical events.

Regarding the failure to submit the instruments to the competent authorities, therefore, we report that the instruments that had been pending submission were already submitted to the Government on 19 August 2019, that is a total of 22 Conventions, 2 Protocols and 18 Recommendations, to continue the regulatory procedure.

With regard to the information that was not received in reply to all or most of the comments of the Committee of Experts, despite the difficulties faced by the Government, we were able to adopt measures to make improvements, such as the enactment of the General Labour Act No. 4/2021. Since 2018, the Government has been following a road map with the Community of Portuguese Language Countries (CPLP) on child labour, within the context of which the Government has recently attended the meeting of the Labour Ministers of CPLP

Member States to identify appropriate solutions aimed at eliminating child labour. In addition to establishing an action plan to combat trafficking in persons, the Government has already drawn up an update to the Act on trade unions. A new Criminal Code was also enacted and disseminated, adopted through Act No. 4/2022 of 17 August 2022, to repeal the 1963 Spanish Criminal Code which was still being applied in the country.

Another significant step is the enactment of Act No. 1/2020 of 13 July 2020, on preventing and combating corruption in Equatorial Guinea, as well as the dissemination of Decree No. 147 of 21 November 2023, adopting measures for the protection and care of minors in Equatorial Guinea, which was recently adopted.

Further actions include the study of the National Employment Policy, which will result in the updating of the current Act. Likewise, and without any interruption, the Government is continuing to subsidize the occupational training centres. We highlight some projects that are under way, such as the updating of the Act on Social Security; the establishment of a technical office for the promotion of decent work; the enactment of an Act for the prevention of occupational hazards; the 11th survey of the active population in training and employment; the organization of industrial arbitration to facilitate mediation of collective disputes; the training of enterprise committees and the holding of elections of workers' delegates in the enterprises, which will be carried out with the social partners, PATRONAL and OSGTGE; the updating of the Act on cooperatives; and the creation of an Act on occupational training.

In view of the above, the Government is committed to providing all the reports in the ordinary session of 2024. Furthermore, we requested technical assistance from the ILO in 2023 for the training of civil servants, as our geographical location does not allow us to easily find trainers in the ILO Africa offices because of language barriers, as Spanish is the main official language.

An agency for drafting reports has been set up, which, with ILO assistance, is receiving advice and guidance for the technical office responsible for drafting reports from the decent work office, and a proposal has been made for the establishment of an interinstitutional committee for drafting reports on international labour standards, which will involve various ministerial departments. We highlight that since 2023 we have been receiving ILO technical assistance through actions which are to continue through the 2024–25 biennium. Two seminars have been organized to strengthen understanding of the ILO basic principles for all the social partners and other training has been carried out for various civil servants on drafting reports. Consultation is also being considered concerning the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), which has replaced the Food and Catering (Ships' Crews) Convention, 1946 (No. 68) and the Accommodation of Crews Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 92), ratified by Equatorial Guinea and whose adoption is envisaged following publication of the consultation.

France – New Caledonia

Of all ILO Member States, France has ratified the second highest number of Conventions. While this is a source of pride, it also imposes obligations on us, particularly in the area of reporting, which, although extremely useful, is also very demanding to carry out and coordinate. The various Government departments, in particular those of the Ministry of Labour, Health and Solidarity, in cooperation with our social partners, are doing their utmost to produce timely reports that meet the requirements of the ILO instruments, including with the Non-Metropolitan Territories.

The Committee of Experts' warning regarding the "serious failure to respect reporting and other standards-related obligations" was communicated immediately to the competent authorities. Any comments that the Committee on the Application of Standards may make in this respect during the Conference will also be forwarded to the relevant authorities without delay.

Nevertheless, for the past two weeks New Caledonia has been experiencing an episode of urban rioting of rare intensity, which has disrupted the normal functioning of local authorities, in particular the Government of New Caledonia. The French State, which is responsible for public order, is deploying all its efforts to restore public peace. The obligation to report and respond to the Committee of Experts' observations cannot be dealt with in isolation from this context.

The Government thanks the Committee of Experts for this alert. It will make representations to the competent authorities in the Non-Metropolitan Territory of New Caledonia to urge them to continue, as in the past and at the earliest opportunity, to comply with their ILO standards-related obligations.

Rwanda

As part of the efforts of the Government towards ensuring full respect of its reporting obligations, the Ministry of Public Service and Labour consults extensively with all social partners in the process of adopting reports due for submission to the International Labour Office. In this regard, a meeting of the National Labour Council is scheduled for 30 May 2024 to validate the reports on both ratified and unratified Conventions and Recommendations, after which all pending reports will be submitted to the ILO, no later than June 2024.

Uganda

The Government of Uganda acknowledges its reporting obligations to the ILO and appreciates the work done by the Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee of Experts.

As part of the efforts to ensure full compliance with its reporting obligations, the Government consults extensively with numerous stakeholders, including social partners, during the process of preparing reports for submission to the ILO.

Due to the new Government's regulations concerning reporting to international bodies, additional time is required to provide the requisite responses. In this regard, the Ministry of Gender, Labour and Social Development is conducting the final stages of stakeholder consultations with a view of providing a comprehensive response to both individual cases and reports on non-ratified Conventions in accordance with article 19 of the ILO Constitution.

These reports will be submitted to the ILO by 30 September 2024.

Uganda is committed to working closely with the ILO to ensure the timely and accurate fulfilment of its responsibilities. We welcome any capacity-building support regarding our obligations, especially under article 19 of the ILO Constitution.

C. Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – Now, we move on to the discussion of cases of serious failure of Member States to respect reporting and other standards-related obligations.

Before giving the floor to the Vice-Chairpersons for their opening remarks, I would like to recall the Committee's working methods when dealing with the cases of serious failure to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations.

The Committee has established specific criteria to determine what constitutes a “serious failure” when it examines these compliances. These criteria are contained in document D.1, which is available on the Committee’s web page. The cases of serious failure have been identified in the relevant parts of the General Report of the Committee of Experts. It should be recalled that the following criteria are applied:

- none of the reports on ratified Conventions have been supplied during the past two years or more;
- first reports on ratified Conventions have not been supplied for at least two years;
- “Urgent appeals”: failure to send reports on the application of ratified Conventions for at least three years;
- none of the reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations requested under article 19, paragraphs 5, 6 and 7, of the Constitution have been supplied during the past five years;
- no indication is available on whether steps have been taken to submit the instruments adopted during the last seven sessions of the Conference to the competent authorities, in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution;
- no information has been received as regards all or most of the observations and direct requests of the Committee of Experts to which a reply was requested for the period under consideration;
- the Government has failed during the past three years to indicate the representative organizations of employers and workers to which, in accordance with article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution, copies of the report and information supplied to the Office have been communicated.

To take account of recent developments, updated information on the countries concerned was provided to our Committee in document CAN/D/SF, which was made available on Monday, 3 June 2024. This document takes into account the fact that some governments have submitted the required information or reports before the present sitting. The Document also compiles the written information received from governments with respect to these failures as indicated in Part V of document D.1.

Government representatives from the countries mentioned in this document and registered on the list of speakers will be invited to provide information and explanations to the Committee. When providing information to the Committee, governments are asked to provide information on all the cases of non-compliance in one single statement. The governments concerned may, in particular, highlight the challenges they may be facing in fulfilling their obligations and indicate the areas in which ILO assistance and technical cooperation may be desirable. Such information would enable the Committee to have a better understanding of the situation in the country and is helpful to the Office in its response to governments’ requests.

At the end of the discussion, I will give again the floor to the Vice-Chairpersons for their final remarks, following which I will present the draft conclusions for approval by the Committee, in accordance with its working methods.

I am now going to open the discussion on serious failure of Member States to respect reporting and other standards-related obligations. I would like to invite the two Vice-Chairpersons to make their introductory statements.

Employer members – The Employer members take note that the Committee of Experts have once again expressed concern in their report at the low number of government responses received by the 1 September deadline. We in the Committee collectively count on governments to comply with their reporting obligations under articles 19, 22 and 35 of the ILO Constitution in a timely manner and to prepare their reports in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations in their countries. We wish to stress that government reports containing complete and relevant information provide an important foundation upon which our supervisory work is built.

The persistently high number of the Committee of Experts' comments – there are 612 observations and 1,053 direct requests this year – is also a concern. It appears that ratification may, on occasion, be undertaken as a political statement or a declaration of intent rather than what it really is, namely the conclusion of a treaty under international law containing legal obligations, all of which are to be complied with, including the associated reporting obligations.

We would like to stress once again that in promoting ratification it is important for the Office to educate Member States of the necessity of making thorough, pre-ratification assessments and that these assessments should occur in consultations with the social partners. These pre-ratification assessments must include, not only an appraisal of the applicable country's capacity to implement the Convention envisaged for ratification, but also the country's capacity to report on implementation. Ratification should only occur when both the implementation and reporting capacities can be ensured.

We observe that there has been an increase in the number of reports received by the end of the session from 70.9 per cent out of the total number of reports requested last year to 75.3 per cent this year. We also note a decrease in the number of reports submitted after the 1 September deadline, from 59 per cent of reports last year to 54.4 per cent of reports this year. While this decrease in late reports is an improvement it is not yet satisfactory. We therefore ask all governments to make special efforts to provide their reports in a timely manner so that the supervisory bodies can perform their work efficiently and effectively.

We also note with concern that the following 14 countries have not provided the reports due with respect to ratified Conventions for the past two or more years: Afghanistan, Barbados, Comoros, Dominica, Grenada, Haiti, Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, Somalia, Syrian Arab Republic, Tonga, Tuvalu, Vanuatu and Yemen. Respectfully this is unacceptable, and we urge the governments concerned to supply all their respective outstanding reports at the earliest opportunity. If the reports cannot be submitted for reasons beyond the control of the given government, we ask that the applicable government should, at a minimum, inform the ILO of its circumstances. In such cases the applicable government may also request ILO technical assistance with the goal of addressing the problem in a sustainable manner.

With respect to the first reports on ratified Conventions, we note with concern that there are nine countries that have failed to supply these reports for two or more years, namely, Djibouti, Grenada, Iraq, Lebanon, Marshall Islands, Sudan, Tonga, Tuvalu and Vanuatu. We would like to stress that first reports are particularly important as they are meant to provide complete information about government action to implement the applicable ratified Convention. As such, first reports provide an indispensable baseline for an initial, comprehensive assessment of compliance. We therefore call on the Governments of these nine countries to submit their overdue first reports to the ILO without further delay. Here too, if necessary, the applicable governments are encouraged to request ILO technical assistance to enable them to address the problem in a sustainable manner.

We also note with concern that the number of comments – whether observations or direct requests – by the Committee of Experts to which replies have not been received from the governments remains high. Specifically, there are 35 governments that have not provided responses this year.

On a positive note, we appreciate that the governments of 11 of those 35 countries have provided information regarding their failure to reply to all or most the Committee of Experts comments, namely, Bahamas, Cambodia, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Fiji, Iceland, Islamic Republic of Iran, Madagascar, Montenegro, Romania, Rwanda and Slovenia. We welcome the provision of explanations by these governments for their respective failures, as well as the steps taken to address the situation. We trust that they will be able to meet all their reporting obligations going forward. We would also like to hear from the other governments that have yet to provide their reasons for their unresponsiveness to the Committee of Experts' comments. This high rate of unresponsiveness by governments is an indication that there may be systemic challenges or barriers to reporting. However, without further clarity from applicable governments regarding the reasons for their unresponsiveness, we are not in a position to either diagnose or recommend broader remedies for addressing these deficiencies.

We also note with regret that the following 16 countries have not provided reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations requested under article 19 of the ILO Constitution for the past five years: Barbados, Chad, Djibouti, Dominica, Equatorial Guinea, Haiti, Marshall Islands, North Macedonia, Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Singapore, Timor-Leste, Tuvalu, Uganda and Yemen. We suggest that the Office, together with the applicable governments, work towards identifying the underlying reasons for these reporting deficiencies and develop effective remedies.

We welcome the decision of the Committee of Experts to further extend the practice of “urgent appeals” for cases meeting certain criteria of serious reporting failure that require this Committee's attention. This enables the Committee to have a direct and serious dialogue on this point with the governments concerned and to remind them that the Committee of Experts will examine the substance of the matter at its next session, even in the absence of a government report. We note with appreciation that all reports that were pending for more than three years have been examined following the launch of urgent appeals and we trust that there will be the same positive results in future.

Furthermore, we appreciate that, with the assistance of the Office, the Committee of Experts and this Committee have decided to strengthen the follow-up given to cases of serious failure.

Finally, and before concluding, we wish to comment on the social partners' role and participation in the regular supervisory system. Under article 23(2) of the ILO Constitution, governments of Member States have an obligation to communicate copies of their reports to representative employers' and workers' organizations. Compliance with this obligation is essential to ensuring the proper involvement of the social partners in standards' implementation at the national level.

We observe that the social partners submitted 1,276 observations to the Committee of Experts this year, which is an increase as compared to last year at 1,156. Two hundred twenty-one of this year's observations were communicated by employers' organizations which is up from 212 last year and 1,055 were communicated by workers' organizations, again an increase from 944 last year. We welcome the overall increase in submissions, and we trust that the Office will continue to provide technical assistance, including capacity building, to social partners where needed to enable them to provide relevant comments to the Committee of Experts.

The International Organization of Employers (IOE) together with ILO ACT/EMP is supporting employers' organizations in submitting up-to-date and relevant information to the Committee of Experts in law and in practice in their respective countries. In particular, employers' organizations are critical in highlighting when governments have failed to take into account the needs and realities of sustainable enterprises when implementing ratified Conventions and routinely make suggestions on how this could be improved.

We trust that the Committee of Experts, in their assessments, will give due consideration to the comments from employers' organizations, as well as any additional comments made by employers' representatives in the discussion of the Committee.

Worker members – Reporting obligations are fundamental to the work of our Committee. Not only that, they are fundamental to the proper functioning of the ILO's standard-setting system. The first fundamental obligation to which I would like to refer is that which goes to the very essence of the ILO. This is the obligation to communicate to the respective organizations of workers and employers, copies of the reports and information communicated to the ILO. Tripartism is at the heart of the ILO, and this is reflected in particular in the need to involve the most representative workers' and employers' organizations in the dialogue that is being established with the ILO. A serious failure in this regard consists of not having indicated for three years or more the workers' and employers' organizations to which copies of the reports have been communicated. No serious breach of this obligation has been alleged against an ILO Member State for several years. If this formal obligation is universally respected, there is still a need for genuine tripartite social dialogue to be put in place in the Member States to guarantee the tripartism promoted by the ILO. We will have the opportunity to see in other discussions in this Committee that a lot of effort still needs to be made in this area.

The second fundamental obligation related to standards is the obligation under article 19 of the ILO Constitution, which requires Member States to submit a Convention adopted at a session of the Conference within one year to the competent authorities, with a view to transforming it into law or taking other measures. This obligation makes it possible to enhance the Standard-Setting Committees of the ILO and to reflect the standard-setting activity of the ILO at the national level. Any Member State which does not provide any indication that initiatives have been taken to submit the instruments adopted during the last sessions of the Conference is in a situation of serious failure to comply with this obligation. Twenty-six Member States were in this situation at the time of the publication of the Committee of Experts' report. The Democratic Republic of Congo has since provided information on this subject that allows this Member State to be removed from the list of States in serious breach of this obligation.

The third obligation is that which requires the submission of a report within the framework of the theme chosen by the Governing Body for the preparation of the General Survey by the Committee of Experts. This obligation also applies to the Member States which have not ratified the Conventions concerned. This obligation is fundamental in that it allows the ILO to identify areas of action to support and encourage the ratification of instruments by Member States. If a Member State does not provide any report expected for the carrying out of an overall Survey in the course of five consecutive years, it will be in serious breach of this obligation. Twenty-one Member States were in this situation at the time of the publication of the report of the Committee of Experts. In the meantime, five Member States have submitted a report on the subject. However, we regret that the failure to respond to this call for five consecutive years has irreparably deprived the ILO of being able to benefit from the information this Member State can provide at the appropriate time. This obviously also applies to the Member States that is still in serious breach of this obligation.

After these obligations, which are imposed independently of the ratification of instruments, there are a series of obligations that are imposed by the ratification of ILO Conventions. The first of these is the obligation to communicate to the Committee of Experts an initial report on the application in law and practice of a Convention newly ratified by the Member State concerned. The ratification of Conventions by Member States is obviously the objective that we must pursue as tripartite constituents. These ratifications make it possible to initiate an essential dialogue between the ILO and the Member States concerned to assess the implementation of international Conventions in a national context. The first reports are of crucial importance in that they are particularly detailed in order to enable the ILO to have a comprehensive view of how a Convention is implemented in the country concerned. Failure to provide a first report for at least two years thus constitutes a serious breach of this obligation. Eleven Member States were in serious breach at the time of the publication of the Committee of Experts' report. Since then, two Member States, Fiji and the Cook Islands have regularized the situation by providing their first expected reports.

Secondly, the ratification of Conventions entails the need to be able to submit regular reports on the basis of the reporting cycle defined for each country. This is also an essential process for the dialogue that must take place between the ILO and Member States. If none of these reports is provided for at least two years, it will be a serious breach on the part of the Member State concerned. Fifteen Member States were in this situation at the time of the publication of the experts' report. One Member State, Antigua and Barbuda, has since regularized the situation.

Finally, the dialogue between the ILO and Member States often leads to observations or direct requests from the bodies of the ILO's standard-setting system. The responses to these observations or requests are fundamental to continue this dialogue. Unfortunately, some Member States do not respond to these comments or requests. This is also a serious breach. At the time of the publication of the report of the Committee of Experts, 35 Member States had not responded to most, if not all, of the observations and direct requests made. Some of these Member States did submit reports but did not respond to observations or direct requests. The response to the questions raised by the bodies of the ILO standard-setting system is fundamental and testifies to the value that the ILO's constituents attach to dialogue with them. We note that between the publication of the Committee of Experts' report and the special session, eleven Member States provided information in response to the observations and direct requests of the Committee of Experts. We encourage them to continue along this path, and invite other Member States to follow up as well, if necessary by having recourse to the ILO's technical assistance. This year, the Committee of Experts issued eleven urgent appeals against Member States that had not transmitted any report for three years or more. This procedure allows the Committee of Experts to draw to the attention of the Member States concerned that an examination of the conformity of the legislation in practice will be carried out, even in the absence of a government report.

In this year's report, the Committee examined seven cases that had previously been the subject of an urgent appeal. This procedure is essential in that it ensures that the work of the ILO's standard-setting system is not paralyzed, despite the difficulties for the Member States concerned to provide the requested reports. It will be interesting to hear from the Member States concerned about the difficulties they are facing, and I hope that after the respective interventions from workers and employers that governments will use this opportunity to take the floor in this discussion. It cannot be stressed enough that Member States can have recourse to the technical assistance of the ILO to assist them in this reporting task. The difficulties encountered in this regard must never be an obstacle to ratifying an ILO Convention. If these difficulties were to lead to such consequences, it would be an important signal for the ILO to strengthen its technical assistance, and also a strong signal for the Member States concerned on the need to strengthen their systems of labour administration, as we have just heard in the General Survey discussion.

In addition, there are many tools that are available to tripartite constituents to help them participate fully in the ILO's standard-setting system. Examples include the managing international labour standards reporting website which focuses specifically on reporting obligations, and the online guide on established practices of the ILO supervisory system which, in turn, makes it possible to understand the essential role of these reporting obligations for the supervisory system. We can only invite Member States to take note of these new tools, and invite the Office and the experts to ensure the greatest possible visibility of them. In addition to these tools, the training of government officials responsible for producing the requested reports is an absolute necessity. In this regard, ILO constituents can rely on the training programmes offered by the ITC Centre in Turin which will be able to train government officials in the reporting obligations incumbent on Member States, and thus avoid having to identify shortcomings in this area.

Many Member States were able to regularize this situation between the publication of the Committee of Experts' report and the holding of this special session. In total, out of the 63 Member States concerned by one or more serious breaches, 17 of them have regularized one or more serious breaches for which they were accused. This is a very positive signal that we would like to highlight, and we encourage other Member States to request the technical assistance of the Office, which we have no doubt they will be fully prepared to provide in order to regularize their situation.

Our committee cannot afford to evade the fundamental issue of reporting obligations. The work of the ILO, and more particularly that of our Committee, is based on the reports provided by the Member States, as well as on the observations submitted by trade unions and employers' organizations. Failure to meet these obligations inevitably disrupts the proper functioning of the ILO's many areas of work, meaning the ILO is not in a position to fully assess the implementation of its standards-setting instruments in the Member States, and to provide the necessary responses. Ensuring the effective implementation of ILO instruments means ensuring respect for the dignity and rights that workers must derive from ILO instruments. Let us not lose sight of the fact that this is the purpose of these reporting obligations.

Chairperson – Thank you very much, as I can see no request for the floor, I now give back the floor to, the Worker spokesperson for her concluding remarks.

Worker members – We had really hoped that we would hear from some governments, so I am sorry to have to hear from me again, it is a shame.

The aim of this special sitting is to make us aware that these reporting obligations, beyond the formalism that they may present, are fundamental in that they stimulate dialogue between Member States and the ILO, and underpin the dynamics of tripartite social dialogue, as well as the respect and promotion of International Labour Conventions. Member States must commit themselves fully to these processes.

With this in mind, it would be advisable to actively promote the ratification of the Tripartite Consultations (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), as well as its correct application, as this can also contribute to the greater compliance with reporting obligations.

As we were able to discuss in the context of the General Survey, strengthening labour administrations can be one way of enhancing Member States' ability to meet these reporting obligations. Ratification and effective implementation of Convention No. 150 is therefore also appropriate in this context.

We have also taken note of the written information transmitted and of the difficulties encountered by certain Member States and are pleased to point out that these Member States generally call on the ILO for assistance, and that the Office systematically responds favourably and with great efficiency.

We have also taken note of the information provided by one Member State, which pointed to an ongoing crisis situation that would not enable it to resolve in the short term its serious shortcomings identified. First of all, it should be pointed out that the shortcomings identified had already occurred long before the crisis arose. Although this is a factor to be taken into account, we have already pointed out during the COVID-19 crisis that reporting obligations cannot be waived, even in times of crisis. We hope that the Member State in question will do everything in its power to resolve the shortcomings identified as soon as possible.

We regret that some Member States appear to be wilfully ignoring their reporting obligations. The approach towards these Member States should be firmer than towards the Member States with proven technical difficulties or insufficient capacity. The urgent appeal procedure is a first response, but it applies indiscriminately to Member States acting in good or bad faith.

Within the framework of activities to promote international labour standards, additional resources could still be allocated to technical assistance and support activities for Member States and social partners, to enable them to meet their standards-related obligations and to engage them actively in the ILO's tripartite dialogue.

We have taken good note of the commitments made by certain governments, and we hope that these will be followed by concrete action to ensure full compliance with their obligations.

It is essential that all these governments, and particularly those which have not provided any information to the Committee, put an end to these serious breaches and bring themselves into compliance as soon as possible.

Proactive support through the Office's technical assistance will remain essential to enable Member States to fully meet their standards-related obligations.

Employer members – We would like to conclude by reiterating that in order to be effective, the ILO's regular supervisory system depends on governments' reports that contain complete and relevant information and that are sent regularly and on time. It is also critical that the Committee of Experts takes note of the additional comments from the social partners, as they provide key context. It is only with all of these inputs that the supervisory bodies can properly assess the implementation of ILO standards. Overall, we have reason for optimism but also significant room for improvement in the fulfilment of reporting obligations this year. To that end we support all efforts aimed at enabling the supervisory system to do its work more efficiently, including the streamlining of reporting and the extension of possibilities for e-reporting. We stress however, that these efforts can only be successful if they are accompanied by the consolidation and simplification of the ILO standards themselves. Such consolidation and simplification would lead not only to better implementation of standards but also focus government reporting on the more critical issues facing the world of work. In that regard we are encouraged by the ongoing efforts of the standards review mechanism.

Conclusions of the Committee

Chairperson – As announced, now I will read out the draft conclusions on cases of serious failure to report.

The Committee takes note of the information provided in written information submitted by the Governments of Plurinational State of Bolivia, Brunei Darussalam, Chad, Congo, Equatorial Guinea, France (New Caledonia) and Rwanda.

However, the Committee regrets that the Governments of Afghanistan, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Barbados, Belize, Comoros, Djibouti, Dominica, Gabon, Gambia, Grenada, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Hungary, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Libya, Marshall Islands, Netherlands (Sint Maarten), North Macedonia, Papua New Guinea, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, San Marino, Sao Tome and Principe, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, South Sudan, Sudan, Syrian Arab Republic, Timor-Leste, Tonga, Tuvalu, Uganda, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland (British Virgin Islands), Vanuatu, Yemen and Zambia did not make statements or provide any written communication.

The Committee notes in particular the specific difficulties mentioned by some governments in complying with their constitutional obligations related to reporting and the submission of the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference to the competent national authorities. It also takes note of the promises made by some governments to comply with these obligations in the near future. The Committee recalls that the governments can avail themselves of ILO technical assistance to comply with their reporting obligations.

Concerning the failure to supply reports for the past two or more years on the application of ratified Conventions, the Committee recalls that reporting on the application of ratified Conventions is a fundamental constitutional obligation and the basis of the supervisory system. The Committee also stresses the importance of respecting the deadlines for such reporting. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Governments of Afghanistan, Barbados, Comoros, Dominica, Grenada, Haiti, Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, Somalia, Syrian Arab Republic, Tonga, Tuvalu, Vanuatu and Yemen will supply the reports due as soon as possible, and decides to note these cases in the corresponding paragraph of its General Report.

Concerning the failure to supply first reports for two or more years on the application of ratified Conventions, the Committee recalls the particular importance of this submission of the first report on the application of ratified Conventions. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Governments of Djibouti, Grenada, Iraq, Lebanon, Marshall Islands, Sudan, Tonga, Tuvalu and Vanuatu will supply the first reports due as soon as possible, and decides to note these cases in the corresponding paragraph of its General Report.

Concerning the urgent appeals, the Committee underlines the fundamental importance of sending the report and the detailed information requested in the first report on the application of ratified Conventions. The Committee stresses the importance of the information provided in the reports submitted by governments on ratified Conventions to enable the regular supervision by the Committee of Experts. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Governments of Afghanistan, Comoros, Grenada, Marshall Islands, Saint Lucia, Sudan, Syrian Arab Republic, Tuvalu and Vanuatu will send the reports due as soon as possible, and decides to note these cases in the corresponding paragraph of its General Report.

The Committee brings to the attention of these Governments that the Committee of Experts could examine in substance at its next session the application of the Conventions concerned on the basis of publicly available information, even if the Governments mentioned have not sent the reports due. The Committee reminds governments that they can request technical assistance from the Office to overcome their difficulties in this respect.

Concerning the failure to supply information in response to comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Committee underlines the fundamental importance of clear and complete information in response to the comments of the Committee of Experts in order to permit continued dialogue with the governments concerned. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Governments of Afghanistan, Antigua and Barbuda, Barbados, Comoros, Congo, Djibouti, Dominica, France (New Caledonia), Grenada, Haiti, Netherlands (Sint Maarten), Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, San Marino, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, South Sudan, Sudan, Syrian Arab Republic, Tuvalu, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland (British Virgin Islands), Vanuatu and Yemen will supply the requested information in the future, and decides to note these cases in the corresponding paragraph of its General Report.

Concerning the failure to supply reports for the past five years on unratified Conventions and Recommendations, the Committee stresses the importance it attaches to the constitutional obligation to supply reports on non-ratified Conventions and Recommendations. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Governments of Barbados, Chad, Djibouti, Dominica, Equatorial Guinea, Haiti, Marshall Islands, North Macedonia, Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Singapore, Timor-Leste, Tuvalu, Uganda and Yemen will comply with their obligation to supply reports on non-ratified Conventions and Recommendations in the future. The Committee decides to note these cases in the corresponding paragraph of its General Report.

Concerning the failure to submit instruments to the competent authorities, the Committee recalls that compliance with the obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to competent national authorities is a requirement of the highest importance to ensure the effectiveness of the Organization's standards-related activities. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Governments of Angola, Belize, Plurinational State of Bolivia, Brunei Darussalam, Dominica, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Gambia, Grenada, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Hungary, Lebanon, Liberia, Libya, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Solomon Islands, Syrian Arab Republic, Timor-Leste, Tuvalu, Vanuatu, Yemen and Zambia will comply with their obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to the competent authorities in the future. The Committee decides to note these cases in the corresponding paragraph of its General Report.

In relation to the failure to indicate during the past three years the representative organizations of employers and workers to which copies of the reports and information supplied to the Office have been communicated, the Committee stresses the importance it attaches to the constitutional obligation, under article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution, of governments to communicate copies of the reports and information supplied to the Office to employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee recalls that the contribution of employers' and workers' organizations is essential for the evaluation of the application of Conventions in national legislation and in practice for their participation in ILO supervisory mechanisms.

The Committee welcomes the fact that this year again no Member State has failed to indicate during the past three years the representative organizations of employers and workers to which copies of the reports and information supplied to the Office have been communicated. The Committee expresses the firm hope that this is a sign that genuine tripartite social dialogue has been established in all ILO Member States. The Committee decides to note this positive development and to encourage Member States to continue in that direction in the corresponding paragraph of the General Report.

III. Special sitting concerning the application by Belarus of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), in application of the resolution adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 111th Session (2023)

Written information provided by the Government

In accordance with the Constitution of the International Labour Organization (ILO), the Government of Belarus informed the Director-General of the International Labour Office of its position in relation to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry

¹ in a letter dated 1 November 2004, from the Minister of Labour and Social Protection, Ms A.P. Morova, noting that it would take steps towards their implementation, taking into account the realities of the Republic of Belarus and its sovereign interests.

In view of its stated position, the Government of Belarus has taken a number of specific, targeted steps, as a result of which at this stage a significant number of the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations have been implemented and substantial progress has been made in implementing the remainder.

The Commission recommends that the Government take all necessary steps for the immediate registration of all those primary level union organizations listed in the complaint which have still not been registered, including, if necessary, by directing enterprise managers to provide premises to those organizations. These steps should be taken regardless of the supposed obstacles to their registration caused by Decree No. 2 and its rules and regulations.

The Government of the Republic of Belarus has taken targeted measures to liberalize the trade union registration process.

In accordance with the procedure established by law for establishing a trade union and submitting to registration bodies all necessary information and documentation, the registration procedure is essentially an administrative formality.

In order to simplify and formalize the procedure for registering public associations (including trade unions), Presidential Decree of the Republic of Belarus No. 605 of 6 October 2006 abolished the National Commission for the Registration (Re-registration) of Public Associations.

All powers to register trade unions at the national level are vested in the Ministry of Justice, while powers to register territorial trade unions and trade unions established in the country's organizations and enterprises are vested in the relevant justice directorates of local executive and administrative bodies (regional executive committees and the Minsk City Executive Committee).

In accordance with the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, measures have been taken to abolish the requirement that at least 10 per cent of the total number of an organization's employees must be included in the membership in order to establish a trade union.

Thus, on 2 June 2015, Presidential Decree of the Republic of Belarus No. 4 on Amendments and Additions to the Presidential Decree of the Republic of Belarus was adopted, which amended Presidential Decree of the Republic of Belarus No. 2 of 26 January 1999 on Several Measures to Improve the Functioning of Political Parties, Trade Unions, and Other Public Associations.

With the adoption of Presidential Decree of the Republic of Belarus No. 4 of 2 June 2015, at least 10 people are required to establish a trade union at an enterprise.

To date, at the level of legislation and practice, everything necessary has been done to ensure that trade unions (their organizational structures) successfully undergo the state registration procedure.

When state bodies examine the documents submitted for state registration of trade unions and their organizational structures, and in other cases involving decisions that affect the right of citizens to form trade unions, the decisions are taken in strict accordance with legislation in force, as well as based on the principle of maximum consideration of the interests and rights of citizens and trade unions.

In order to increase the chances of obtaining a legal address, trade unions have been given the opportunity to be located not only at the employer's address, but also in any other place (non-residential premises are used for the legal address).

Practice shows that, to date, the need to confirm the existence of a legal address has not been an obstacle to the registration of trade unions.

Cases of refusal of state registration of trade unions (trade union organizational structures) are isolated in nature and are for objective reasons.

The main reasons for refusal are failure to comply with legislation concerning the procedure for establishing trade union organizations and submitting all necessary information and documentation to the registration authorities.

If the procedure for establishing a trade union organization is observed, the documents for state registration of the trade union (organizational structure of the trade union) may be resubmitted to the registration authorities after all the identified shortcomings are addressed.

In this respect, refusal to register does not amount to a ban on establishing a trade union (organizational structure thereof) and does not constitute an insurmountable obstacle to subsequent registration.

Trade unions (organizational structures thereof) successfully undergo the state registration procedure, subject to the establishment of a trade union in accordance with legislation and submission of all supporting documents to the registration authorities.

Recommendation 1 has been essentially implemented.

The Commission recommends that the Government amend the relevant provisions of Decree No. 2 and its rules and regulations so as to eliminate any further obstacles that might be caused either by the legal address requirement or by the 10 per cent minimum membership requirement at enterprise level and to ensure their transparency.

In accordance with the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry on eliminating obstacles to establishing and registering trade unions, the Government has taken measures to abolish the mandatory 10 per cent minimum trade union membership requirement for the establishment of a trade union.

On 2 June 2015, Presidential Decree of the Republic of Belarus No. 4 on Amendments and Additions to the Presidential Decree of the Republic of Belarus was adopted, which amended Presidential Decree of the Republic of Belarus No. 2 of 26 January 1999 on Several Measures to Improve the Functioning of Political Parties, Trade Unions, and Other Public Associations.

With the adoption of Presidential Decree of the Republic of Belarus No. 4 of 2 June 2015, at least 10 people are required to establish a trade union at an enterprise.

In order to increase the chances of obtaining a legal address, trade unions have been given the opportunity to be located not only at the employer's address, but also in any other place (non-residential premises are used for the legal address).

Practice shows that, to date, the need to confirm the existence of a legal address has not been an obstacle to the registration of trade unions.

Recommendation 2 has been implemented.

The Commission is of the belief that many of the difficulties posed by the application of Decree No. 2 are due to the lack of transparency in the decision-making authority represented by the National Registration Commission. Given that registration should be a routine procedure formalizing the existence of a freely formed workers' or employers' organization, the Commission recommends that the National Registration Commission should be disbanded and all registrations should be made as a matter of mere administrative formality at the corresponding local, regional or national level. If necessary, overseeing authority may be vested in the Minister of Justice.

The Government of the Republic of Belarus has taken targeted measures to liberalize the trade union registration process.

In order to simplify and formalize the procedure for registering public associations (including trade unions), Presidential Decree of the Republic of Belarus No. 605 of 6 October 2006 abolished the National Commission for the Registration (Re-registration) of Public Associations.

The Ministry of Justice is responsible for registering national-level trade unions, while the relevant justice directorates of local executive and administrative bodies (regional executive committees and Minsk City Executive Committee) are responsible for registering territorial trade unions and trade unions established in the country's organizations and enterprises.

The Ministry of Justice closely monitors the situation concerning registration of trade unions and organizational structures thereof, and issues the necessary guidance to the registration authorities to prevent violations.

As part of its outreach efforts, in December 2006 the Ministry of Justice posted on its official website a clarification on trade union membership, stating that, under the law, citizens have the right voluntarily to establish trade unions of their choice, and also to join trade unions, provided that their statutes are observed.

On 31 January 2007, the Ministry of Justice sent a letter of instruction to local authorities indicating the need for strict compliance with the law when registering trade unions.

On 28 September 2022, the Ministry of Justice sent a letter to the regional executive committees and the Minsk City Executive Committee, explaining the issues of state trade union registration and registering trade union organizational structures (in order to ensure that the registration bodies apply a uniform approach to the processing of the documents required for registration).

To date, at the level of legislation and practice, everything necessary has been done in the Republic of Belarus to ensure that trade unions (their organizational structures) successfully undergo the state registration procedure.

When state bodies examine the documents submitted for state registration of trade unions and their organizational structures, and in other cases involving decisions that affect the right of citizens to form trade unions, the decisions are taken in strict accordance with legislation in force, as well as based on the principle of maximum consideration of the interests and rights of citizens and trade unions.

Recommendation 3 has been implemented.

In order to alleviate the damage that has already been done to the independence of the trade union movement in Belarus, the Commission recommends that all its conclusions and recommendations be made public by the Government through a wide dissemination and without delay. In order to ensure the prevention of further acts of interference, the Commission recommends that the Government declare publicly that such acts are unacceptable and will be sanctioned. To this end, it highly recommends that the Presidential Administration issue instructions to the Prosecutor-General, the Minister of Justice and court administrators that any complaints of external interference made by trade unions should be thoroughly investigated. This recommendation, similar to those made on numerous occasions by the Committee on Freedom of Association, but never implemented, should be carried out without any further delay.

The Government of the Republic of Belarus has taken steps to bring the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations to the attention of the general public.

In 2005, the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations were published in the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection's journal, Occupational Safety and Social Protection (No. 4 of April 2005), and in 2006, in the newspaper, Respublika (No. 209 of 9 November), which was the country's largest print publication.

As part of the implementation of the recommendations of the direct contact mission (which visited the Republic of Belarus during January 2014), a training course on international labour standards for judges and lawyers was held in Minsk on 20–22 June 2017. This training course contributed to the implementation of Recommendations 4 and 8 of the Commission of Inquiry.

The training course was organized by the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, the International Labour Office, and the ILO International Training Centre in Turin for judges and lawyers with competence in labour law cases and issues.

The training course was attended by representatives of the Supreme Court of the Republic of Belarus, judges of courts of general jurisdiction, representatives of the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, the Ministry of Justice, the Office of the Prosecutor-General, and the prosecutor's offices of Minsk region and Minsk city.

Course participants were introduced to the ILO's activities and the system of international labour standards (in particular, those relating to freedom of association, collective bargaining, and the prohibition of forced labour), the structure and work mechanisms of the ILO supervisory bodies, the application of international law and national legislation in labour relations, relevant jurisprudence, as well as examples of the application of international law in resolving labour disputes.

In the Republic of Belarus, approaches to non-interference in trade union activities are enshrined in legislation and implemented in practice.

Thus, under article 14 of the Constitution of the Republic of Belarus, the State regulates relations between social, national and other communities on the basis of the principles of equality before the law and respect for their rights and interests.

Social and labour relations between state administrative bodies, employers' associations and trade unions are based on the principles of social partnership and interaction between the parties.

Guarantees of trade union rights are enshrined in Chapter 3 of the Trade Union Act of the Republic of Belarus.

In accordance with article 23 of this Act, employers (associations thereof), state bodies, economic entities, public associations and officials shall respect trade union rights. Such bodies and entities shall be held liable for violating trade union rights or obstructing their lawful activities in accordance with the law.

Under article 26 of the Act, trade union rights shall be protected in accordance with the law. Unlawful restriction of trade union rights and obstruction of the exercise of their powers shall not be permitted.

The principle of the rule of law applies in the Republic, and the State guarantees the rights and freedoms of citizens, as enshrined in the Constitution, the law and international obligations.

Article 60 of the Constitution of the Republic of Belarus guarantees everyone protection of her/his rights and freedoms by a competent, independent and impartial court in the manner and within the time limits established by law.

Decisions and actions (omissions) of state bodies and officials that infringe on rights and freedoms may be appealed in court.

All court cases are heard in public. Hearings in camera may only be held in cases specified by law, and in accordance with all the rules of legal procedure.

Justice shall be administered on the basis of adversarial proceedings and equality of arms.

Court rulings shall be binding on all citizens and officials.

Parties and persons participating in proceedings have the right to appeal against decisions, sentences and other court rulings.

There are no obstacles to citizens taking cases to court.

See also information on the implementation of Recommendations 7 and 8.

Recommendation 4 has been largely implemented.

All those organizations named in the conclusions as having suffered interference in their internal affairs should be guaranteed protection to carry out their activities freely. Any further complaints made by these organizations in this respect should be taken seriously and immediately investigated by an independent body having the confidence of all parties concerned.

Although the legislation of the Republic of Belarus provides for all necessary measures to protect trade union rights, including the prevention of interference in their internal affairs, Belarus has introduced an additional mechanism for the protection of trade union rights in accordance with the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations.

Thus, in 2005, the Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere, established under the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, was entrusted with the role of a tripartite independent body, enjoying the confidence of all interested parties.

This body has been empowered to consider the full range of issues arising from the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations, from examining specific situations relating to trade union registration or collective bargaining, to discussing the desirability of legislative changes.

On 21 January 2009, a national tripartite seminar was held in Minsk on the implementation of the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations on Freedom of Association and Social Partnership in the Republic of Belarus: improvement in the light of the recommendations contained in the Commission of Inquiry's report, Trade Union Rights in Belarus, organized by the International Labour Office and the Government of the Republic of Belarus to take stock of the work done and discuss further action by the parties.

Based on the conclusions and proposals drawn up during the seminar, the Government, in cooperation with International Labour Office, prepared an Action Plan to implement the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations, supported by representatives of all social partners who participated in the seminar, and approved on 20 February 2009 by the main tripartite body of the Republic of Belarus, the National Council on Labour and Social Issues (NCLSI).

The Action Plan provided for further improvement in the effectiveness of the mechanism ensuring the protection of trade union rights (Recommendations 5 and 7). The main role in this mechanism has been assigned to the tripartite Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere under the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, whose composition and functions were revised and supplemented in the light of the expansion of the range of tasks entrusted to it.

The activities of the updated tripartite Council are organized in accordance with the International Labour Office's recommendations.

In accordance with the approved Regulations of the Council, this tripartite body shall carry out consultations between representatives of the national bodies of state administration, other state agencies, and national associations of employers and trade unions on the application and improvement of the legislation of the Republic of Belarus on labour, employers' associations and trade unions, development of the social partnership and compliance with ILO Conventions ratified by the Republic of Belarus.

The Council conducts its work based on transparent and democratic principles, taking into account the interests of all parties involved in its work.

The Council strictly adheres to the approach supported by all social partners- to make decisions and conclusions on the most important issues only on the basis of the agreed position of all Council members. At the same time, all Council members and invitees are free to express their opinions at Council meetings and remain fully independent in forming their own views.

Over the years, the Council has considered a wide variety of issues on the basis of suggestions made by the parties directly relating to the implementation of the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations and the development of methods and forms of interaction between the social partners, the application and improvement of legislation, the registration of trade union organizations, the exercise of trade union rights, complaints from trade unions and workers of anti-union discrimination, cases of termination of employment contracts, the conclusion of sectoral agreements and collective contracts, the ratification of ILO Conventions and engagement with the International Labour Office in the framework of international technical cooperation.

The Council has been directly involved in resolving a number of disputes that formed the basis of trade union complaints to the ILO.

For example, based on the proposals of the Belarusian Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (BKDP), the Council's meetings considered, inter alia, issues relating to:

- dismissals of workers referred to in the 352nd report of the Committee on Freedom of Association (14 May 2009);
- registration of trade unions (registration of trade union organizational structures) and granting them a legal address (3 March 2011);
- observance of trade union rights at the Republican Unitary Enterprise, Babruysk Plant of Tractor Parts and Assemblies, and the Unitary Enterprise, P.M. Masharov Minsk Plant of Automatic Lines (3 March 2011);
- receipt of foreign gratuitous aid (3 March 2011);
- the situation with the conclusion of the collective agreement at Open Joint-Stock Company, Naftan (17 May 2012);
- the situation with the operation of trade unions at the Republican Unitary Industrial Enterprise, Granit (26 March 2013);
- draft Presidential Decree of the Republic of Belarus aimed at stimulating the employment of citizens (23 January 2015);
- Presidential Decree of the Republic of Belarus No. 5 of 15 December 2014 on Strengthening the Requirements for the Management Personnel and Employees of Organizations (23 January 2015);

- observance of trade union rights at Open Joint-Stock Company, Mazyr Oil Refinery, Republican Unitary Enterprise, Babruysk Plant of Tractor Parts and Assemblies, and Open Joint-Stock Company, Belshina (23 January 2015);
- implementation of paragraph 45 of the General Agreement between the Government of the Republic of Belarus and national associations of employers and trade unions for 2016–18, which laid down the procedure for collective bargaining and concluding collective agreements in organizations where several trade unions are represented (18 May 2016);
- the dismissal of Mr N.A. Sharakh, Deputy Chairperson of the Free Trade Union of Belarus, who worked at Open Joint-Stock Company, Polotsk-Fibreglass, on 30 April 2016, due to the expiry of his contract (18 May 2016);
- compliance by employers' associations with paragraph 45 of the General Agreement for 2016–18 (28 February 2017);
- Bill of the Republic of Belarus on Amendments and Additions to Certain Acts of the Republic of Belarus on Labour Relations (6 March 2018);
- precedents of non-compliance by employers' associations with paragraph 45 of the General Agreement for 2016–18 (6 March 2018);
- taking measures to implement Recommendation 9 of the Commission of Inquiry regarding amendments to Presidential Decree of the Republic of Belarus No. 24 (at that time, Decree No. 5 of 31 August 2015) on Use of Foreign Gratuitous Aid (6 March 2018).

Representatives of the International Labour Office have participated in the Council's work on several occasions, who, along with Belarusian associations of employers and trade unions, commended the Council's work and emphasized the importance of its role in the examination and resolution of complaints received from trade unions in accordance with the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations.

As part of the implementation of the proposals of the direct contact mission that visited the Republic of Belarus in January 2014 to monitor the situation with respect to trade union rights in the country and to assist the Government in implementing the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations, a seminar on International Experience of the Work of Tripartite Social Partnership Bodies was held in Minsk on 9–10 July 2014.

The seminar's aim was to assist the Government and the social partners in developing proposals to improve the effectiveness of the work of the tripartite Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere.

As a result of the seminar and subsequent discussions within the Council, the parties reached an agreed position on amending the Regulations on the Council to further enhance the effectiveness of its work.

The updated version of the Regulations on the Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere was approved by Order of the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection No. 48 of 8 May 2015.

In accordance with this version of the Regulations, the Council's powers have been considerably expanded.

In particular, the Council is additionally empowered to analyse existing legislation and draft regulatory and legal acts affecting social and labour relations for their compliance with ILO Conventions and Recommendations and international practice in order to ensure the application of international labour standards at the national level.

The Council is empowered to submit proposals to legislative bodies on the implementation of ILO Conventions and Recommendations in national legislation, and on amending and supplementing labour and trade union regulations in accordance with ILO Recommendations.

The Council has the right to initiate consideration by the NCLSI of proposals regarding amendments and additions to regulatory legal acts on labour and trade unions.

This version of the Regulations also provides for the possibility of more active involvement of international experts, including ILO specialists, in the consideration of issues by the Council.

In order to make the Council's deliberations more expeditious, provision has been made for the possibility of holding extraordinary meetings.

Thus, the tripartite Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere, coordinated by the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, is an effective mechanism for examining trade union communications and protecting trade union rights.

The Council's work, previously suspended due to the COVID-19 pandemic, has resumed this year.

During the Council's meeting on 26 May 2023, based on the parties' suggestions, it considered approaches to implementing the Committee on Freedom of Association's recommendation concerning the establishment of a non-judicial mechanism for settling labour disputes.

Following the discussion of this issue and considering the recommendation of the Committee on Freedom of Association that joint work with the social partners be continued to build an effective non-judicial mechanism for resolving labour disputes, it was decided to establish an expert group from among the Council's members to examine communications from trade unions (trade union associations) and employers' associations regarding the resolution of labour disputes. It was decided that when the Council receives communications from trade unions (trade union associations) and employers' associations concerning labour dispute resolution, the expert group will conduct a preliminary examination and subsequently inform the Council of its findings.

The agenda of the Council's meeting on 22 September 2023 included proposals for the work plan of the Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere and information from the International Labour Office on interpreting the provisions of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), concerning the right to strike. There was a discussion by the Council regarding the framework of the implementation of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144).

During the meeting, the parties came to the conclusion that the Council should continue to discuss the issues around collective bargaining regulation at various levels of social partnership.

A discussion was also held on regulating the right to strike in Convention No. 87. It was agreed that, if necessary, each party would independently inform the International Labour Office of its views.

Recommendation 5 has been implemented.

In order to avoid acts of interference occurring at the level of the enterprise, the Commission recommends that a clear instruction be given to all enterprise managers and directors, in cases where they are still trade union members, not to participate in the process of trade union decision-making in as much as such participation might unduly influence internal trade union affairs and, in effect, bring these organizations under management domination.

The Government continuously and systematically monitors interactions between enterprise administrations and trade unions and has made clear its view that enterprise managers should not interfere in the activities of trade union organizations.

At the Government's initiative, the issue of interaction between representatives of employers and trade unions at the level of organizations (enterprises) was considered at a meeting of the main tripartite social partnership body at the national level, the NCLSI, on 31 January 2007.

The National Council drew the attention of employers' and trade unions' representatives to the need for strict observance of the principles of social partnership enshrined in legislation and ILO Conventions ratified by the Republic of Belarus, while noting the inadmissibility of interference by employers in the internal affairs of trade unions, and also recommended that trade unions actively use social partnership mechanisms to protect their rights and those of their members.

Following a decision by the National Council, the established practice of interaction between employers' and trade unions' representatives at the level of organizations (enterprises) was discussed during the first half of 2007 at meetings of sectoral and territorial (that is, regional, town/city and district) councils on labour and social issues.

In 2015, work was carried out to implement the areas of cooperation, outlined in the proposals of the direct contact mission (which visited the Republic of Belarus in 2014), on enterprise-level collective bargaining.

Thus, the International Labour Office, together with the Government and social partners, organized a tripartite seminar, Enterprise-level collective bargaining and cooperation in the context of pluralism, which was held in Minsk on 13–14 May 2015.

The seminar was attended by members of the Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere, various representatives of employers' associations and trade unions (including heads of the Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus and the Belarusian Congress of Democratic Trade Unions), and also representatives of a number of enterprises where several trade union organizations are represented.

Following a two-day discussion, moderated by representatives of the International Labour Office, the seminar participants reached conclusions on the inclusion of representatives of all trade union organizations operating at the enterprise level in the collective bargaining commission to be established at the enterprise in question.

Based on the results of the seminar, within the framework of the meetings of the Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere, the parties developed agreed proposals on the procedure for collective bargaining and concluding collective agreements when there are several trade union organizations in an organization, which were then included in the General Agreements between the Government of the Republic of Belarus and the national associations of employers and trade unions for 2016–18, 2019–21 and 2022–24, and are being implemented in practice.

The drafting of guidelines for enterprise-level collective bargaining and their inclusion at the level of the General Agreement between the Government of the Republic of Belarus and national associations of employers and trade unions helped put into practice the principle of trade union pluralism, in line with Recommendations 6 and 12.

Recommendation 6 has been implemented.

The Commission recommends that immediate action be taken to institute independent investigations, having the confidence of all parties concerned, into outstanding complaints of anti-union discrimination, in particular as concerns bias and discriminatory use of fixed-term contracts, and that all damages suffered in this respect be redressed. Any complaints of anti-union discrimination or retaliatory acts as a consequence of cooperation with the Commission and the ILO should be given particular attention.

Taking into account the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations, the Government and social partners have taken steps to examine carefully and resolve situations involving reported cases of alleged anti-union discrimination and non-renewal of fixed-term employment agreements (contracts) with trade union members.

Thus, on the basis of the parties' proposals, issues relating to the observance of the labour rights of trade union members are examined at meetings of the tripartite Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere.

For example, at the Council meeting held on 14 May 2009, the cases of termination of labour relations with the workers listed in the report of the Committee on Freedom of Association were considered. All the workers in questions were invited to the Council meeting, and the Council reached an agreed decision in each case. As a result of the Council meeting, the dismissed workers were provided with assistance in finding employment, as well as assistance in the restoration of other rights they had lost.

At the initiative of the BKDP the Council meeting of 18 May 2016 considered the dismissal, on 30 April 2016, of Mr N.A. Sharakh, Deputy Chairperson of the Free Trade Union of Belarus, who worked at Open Joint-Stock Company, Polotsk-Fibreglass (Polotsk, Vitebsk region), due to the expiry of his contract.

Following examination of the case, the allegations of the BKDP representatives that the dismissal of Mr N.A. Sharakh was the result of anti-union discrimination were not substantiated: Mr N.A. Sharakh, at his own initiative, had written a resignation letter due to the expiry of his contract and the commencement of his retirement. In view of these circumstances, the Council considered it appropriate to discontinue consideration of the case.

The situation described above can serve as clear evidence that the complaints of the now defunct BKDP and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of alleged anti-union discrimination in the termination of contracts often lack any objective grounds and are politically motivated.

At the same time, we note that detailed information on the outcome of the examination of complaints received on alleged anti-union discrimination and non-renewal of employee contracts on the grounds of trade union membership have been submitted to the ILO monitoring bodies on several occasions as part of the periodic reports and information from the Government.

We also believe it is necessary to note that the existing legal framework in the Republic of Belarus provides adequate measures to protect citizens from acts of anti-union discrimination.

The legislation includes provisions that prohibit the use of discriminatory approaches against citizens because of their membership of trade unions (article 4 of the Trade Union Act of the Republic of Belarus, and article 14 of the Labour Code of the Republic of Belarus). The legislation also establishes special measures to protect citizens elected to trade union bodies, and trade union members.

Citizens who believe that they have been discriminated against are entitled to apply to the courts in order to protect their legitimate interests and rights. At the same time, trade unions have the right to act as legal representatives of their members in court.

The courts deal objectively and impartially with workers' claims, regardless of their participation or non-participation in trade unions.

Complaints and petitions from citizens alleging discrimination in labour relations, including discrimination on the grounds of trade union membership, are carefully examined by the courts. However, actions to address discrimination in labour relations, including on the grounds of trade union membership, are isolated in nature.

As part of the implementation of the areas of cooperation proposed by the direct contact mission (that worked in the Republic of Belarus in 2014) and supported by the social partners on the issues of labour dispute resolution and mediation, a tripartite seminar on Mechanisms of dispute resolution and mediation was held in Minsk on 25 February 2016, with the organizational assistance of the International Labour Office.

During the seminar, the participants were presented with an overview of the country's existing mechanisms of dispute resolution, and there was an active exchange of views on the situation with the examination of labour disputes under the current national system, and possible new effective mechanisms.

We also note that the Government has repeatedly informed the ILO supervisory bodies of the basis for legislative regulation of the use of contractual employment in the Republic of Belarus.

By accepting the terms of the contractual form of employment, and signing a contract as a form of fixed-term employment contract, the employee confirms her/his consent and intention to be in labour relations with the employer for the period of time stipulated in the contract as well as her/his consent and readiness to terminate the labour relations upon expiry of the contract.

As in other legal systems, in the Republic of Belarus, termination of employment at the end of a fixed-term labour contract is not considered as dismissal at the employer's initiative. In this respect, the legislation does not oblige the employer to justify her/his unwillingness to extend the employment relationship upon expiry of the contract. Expiry of the contract is in itself sufficient grounds for its termination.

Thus, if the employer has decided not to re-enter into labour relations with the employee after expiry of the contract, there is no need for additional justification on this issue.

The issue of forcing an employer to enter into a new contract with an employee cannot be resolved, including in court (except for categories of employees for whom special protective measures have been established by law).

At the same time, the legislation governing the conclusion of contracts with employees is being improved.

For example, Act of the Republic of Belarus No. 219-Z of 18 July 2019, amended the Labour Code of the Republic of Belarus (effective as of 28 January 2020) to increase the duration of concluded (extended) contracts.

In particular, article 261-3 of the Labour Code sets out the approach, according to which:

- the conclusion of a contract with an employee (except for an employee entering into her/his first contract) who does not commit any violations of production, technological, performance or labour discipline, shall be for a period of at least three years (or for a shorter period, only with the employee's consent);
- extension of the contract within its five-year period of validity with an employee who does not commit violations of production, technological, performance or labour discipline, shall be carried out for the period up to the expiry of the maximum term of the contract (or for a shorter period, only with the employee's written consent).

Recommendation 7 has been implemented.

► Recommendation 8

The Commission further recommends that the Government put into place effective procedures for protection against anti-union discrimination and other retaliatory acts. Adequate protection or even immunity against administrative detention should be guaranteed to trade union officials in the performance of their duties or when exercising their civil liberties (freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, etc.). In order to ensure that such protection is further guaranteed through an impartial and independent judiciary and justice administration, the Commission recommends that the Government implement the recommendations made by the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the independence of the judges and lawyers.

The Republic of Belarus has taken the necessary measures to ensure adequate protection of citizens against anti-union discrimination.

As noted above, in the information on the implementation of Recommendation 7, discrimination against citizens on the basis of their membership or non-membership of trade unions is prohibited by law (article 4 of the Trade Union Act of the Republic of Belarus, and article 14 of the Labour Code of the Republic of Belarus).

Citizens' membership or non-membership of trade unions shall not entail any restrictions of their employment, socio-economic, political, or personal rights and freedoms guaranteed by national legislative acts and provisions of international treaties to which the country is a party.

At the same time, guarantees of trade union rights are also enshrined in legislation (Chapter 2, Fundamental rights of trade unions, and Chapter 3, Guarantees of trade union rights, of the Trade Union Act of the Republic of Belarus), and are ensured in practice.

Employers (and associations thereof), state bodies, economic entities, public associations and officials are obliged to respect trade union rights. Such bodies and entities shall be held liable for violating trade union rights or obstructing their lawful activities in accordance with the law.

In order to carry out their statutory tasks, trade unions have the right, in accordance with the law, to organize and hold mass events, rallies, street marches, demonstrations, and also to take other collective action in order to protect their members' interests.

The procedure in force in the country for organizing and holding mass events does not contradict the principles of freedom of association and is fully consistent with the provisions of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

The legislative provisions penalizing breaches of this procedure that have serious negative consequences are aimed at preventing socially dangerous, unlawful acts that pose a genuine threat to the life and health of the public. These provisions objectively do not deter citizens and trade unions from exercising their right to freedom of lawful, peaceful assembly.

Trade unions are entitled to organize and hold strikes in accordance with the law. The procedure laid down in the law for organizing and holding strikes does not contravene international labour standards, allowing citizens fully to exercise their right to hold a lawful strike in order to resolve a collective labour dispute.

However, the prohibition of political demands during strikes is a common and justified international practice since enterprises should not be turned into objects of manipulation and used as leverage to achieve purely political goals.

Trade union rights are protected in accordance with the law. Unlawful restrictions on the rights of trade unions and obstructions to the exercise of their powers are not permitted.

At the same time, trade unions must also carry out their activities in accordance with the legislation, i.e., the Constitution of the Republic of Belarus, the Trade Union Act of the Republic of Belarus, and other regulatory legal acts. The activities of trade unions may be restricted in cases stipulated by legislative acts in the interests of national security, public order or to ensure the rights and freedoms of others.

In view of the above, the Government considers it necessary to stress once again that any allegations that trade unionists in the Republic of Belarus are persecuted for carrying out lawful trade union activities, participating in peaceful protests and lawful strikes, are unreliable and inaccurate.

Citizens residing in the Republic of Belarus freely and actively enjoy the legally guaranteed right to form trade unions. In turn, trade unions, their leaders, members and activists are free to carry out their legitimate activities aimed at upholding and protecting workers' labour and socio-economic rights and interests, improving the living standards and social security of citizens, including in the process of cooperating with the authorities within the framework of the country's existing social partnership system.

However, the competent authorities had every legal basis to bring administrative and criminal proceedings against a number of citizens whose actions were unlawful and who are currently the subject of complaints received by the International Labour Office as persons who have allegedly been the victims of anti-union discrimination.

The Government of the Republic of Belarus has repeatedly drawn attention to the fact that the mass events held in the country in 2020 with the support of external destructive forces, were not authorized by the authorities and were carried out in blatant violation of the law, were not peaceful at all, and in some places openly extremist in nature and posed a real threat to public order and the safety of citizens, and furthermore sought to destabilize the situation in the country in order to secure regime change by unconstitutional means.

Illegal attempts to disrupt the operations of individual enterprises had nothing to do with the exercise by workers of the right to hold lawful strikes in order to resolve collective labour disputes and/or satisfy economic or social demands. At the same time, individual workers engaged in absenteeism, refused to perform work stipulated by labour contracts, and took action to halt the operations of enterprises.

Thus, the citizens mentioned in the complaints of trade union structures who allegedly suffered for participating in peaceful protests and lawful strikes, have been prosecuted (on disciplinary, administrative, and in certain cases, criminal grounds) totally legitimately, for committing specific illegal acts.

In this situation, prosecuting citizens is totally unrelated to anti-union discrimination or persecution for the exercise of trade union or civil rights and freedoms and does not justify any reason to debate dropping the charges, providing any compensation and/or job reinstatement.

At the same time it should be noted that representatives of the judiciary and prosecutor's office are aware of the need to examine carefully the complaints from trade unions and trade union activists of anti-union discrimination and take decisions in full compliance with the rules and requirements of the law.

In order to raise awareness among representatives of the judicial system and prosecution service on the protection of trade union rights and compliance with the relevant international standards, and with the International Labour Office's support, a seminar on Protection of trade union rights in the activities of the courts and prosecution service of the Republic of Belarus (in the light of the implementation of the recommendations included in the ILO Commission of Inquiry's report, Trade Union Rights in Belarus) was held in Minsk on 16 January 2007. The seminar was attended by judges of the Supreme Court of the Republic of Belarus, regional (Minsk city) and district (city) courts, representatives of the Office of the Prosecutor-General of the Republic of Belarus, regional and Minsk city prosecutor's offices, the Ministry of Justice, the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, and the National Labour Arbitration.

Representatives of the judicial authorities and the Office of the Prosecutor-General of the Republic of Belarus, together with representatives of a number of ministries, as well as all trade union and employer associations, took part in a seminar on Respect for trade union rights and protection against anti-union discrimination, which was organized by the Government with the assistance of the International Labour Office, and held in Minsk on 18 June 2008.

Participants in these seminars were informed about the ILO's approach to freedom of association and also the tasks set out in the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations for the courts and the prosecution service.

As part of the implementation of the areas of cooperation recommended by the direct contact mission (2014), a training course on international labour standards for judges and lawyers was held in Minsk on 20–22 June 2017.

The training course was organized by the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, the International Labour Office, and the ILO International Training Centre in Turin for judges and lawyers with competence in labour law cases and issues.

The training course was attended by representatives of the Supreme Court of the Republic of Belarus, judges of courts of general jurisdiction, representatives of the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, the Ministry of Justice, the Office of the Prosecutor-General, and the prosecutor's offices of Minsk region and the city of Minsk.

Course participants were introduced to the ILO's activities and the system of international labour standards (in particular, those relating to freedom of association, collective bargaining, and the prohibition of forced labour), the structure and work mechanisms of the ILO supervisory bodies, the application of international law and national legislation in labour relations, relevant jurisprudence, as well as examples of the application of international law in resolving labour disputes.

With regard to recommendations on ensuring an impartial and independent judicial system and the proper administration of justice, we believe it necessary to note the following.

The Republic of Belarus is a State governed by the rule of law. The individual, her/his rights, freedoms and guarantees to exercise them are the supreme value and goal.

The principle of the rule of law applies in Belarus, and the State guarantees citizens' rights and liberties as enshrined in the Constitution and laws and as provided for by international obligations.

Everyone is equal before the law and is entitled, without any discrimination, to equal protection of her/his rights and legitimate interests.

Article 60 of the Constitution of the Republic of Belarus guarantees everyone protection of her/his rights and freedoms by a competent, independent and impartial court.

Decisions and actions (omissions) of state bodies and officials that infringe rights and freedoms may be appealed in court.

The judicial system in the Republic of Belarus is determined by law.

Judges are independent in the administration of justice, and subject only to the law. Any interference in the activities of judges in the administration of justice is impermissible and punishable by law.

The courts administer justice on the basis of the Constitution and other regulatory acts adopted in accordance with it.

If, during the examination of a specific case, the court comes to the conclusion that a regulatory act is inconsistent with the Constitution, it shall rule in accordance with the Constitution, and raise the issue of declaring the regulatory act in question unconstitutional in accordance with the established procedure.

Cases in the courts are heard collectively by a collegial body of judges, and in cases provided for by law, by a single judge.

All court cases are heard in public. Hearings in camera may only be held in cases specified by law, and in accordance with all the rules of legal procedure.

Justice shall be administered on the basis of adversarial proceedings and equality of arms.

Court rulings shall be binding on all citizens and officials.

Parties and persons participating in proceedings have the right to appeal against decisions, sentences and other court rulings.

There are no obstacles to citizens taking cases to court.

Recommendation 8 has been implemented.

The Commission recommends amendment of Decree No. 24 concerning the use of foreign gratuitous aid along the lines previously suggested by the ILO supervisory bodies, so as to ensure that workers' and employers' organizations may effectively organize their administration and activities and benefit from assistance from international organizations of workers and employers in conformity with Articles 5 and 6 of the Convention.

At present, the issues of registration, taxation and use of foreign gratuitous aid are regulated by Presidential Decree of the Republic of Belarus No. 3 of 25 May 2020 on Foreign Gratuitous Aid.

In accordance with the Decree, foreign gratuitous aid (assistance) received by legal entities of the Republic of Belarus may be used for:

- providing medical assistance, including medical and social and palliative medical care, and also for the purchase of medicines and medical devices, consumables for their maintenance, payment for medical services, health-resort treatment and recuperation for members of the public;
- providing social assistance and social services to low-income citizens, persons with disabilities, pensioners, children, families with many children, single parents, foster and adoptive families, persons with no fixed abode, as well as persons (families) in difficult life situations, including as a result of forced migration;
- preventing and responding to natural and man-made emergencies, ensuring fire, industrial, nuclear and radiation safety, and addressing the consequences of the Chernobyl disaster;
- strengthening the material and technical base of state institutions (including state bodies);
- construction, repair (reconstruction) of social facilities;
- establishing and developing libraries, and creating and maintaining library collections;
- establishing and developing museums, and curating museum collections;
- training and professional development of employees of state institutions (including state bodies);
- providing physical culture and sports organizations, educational institutions, scientific organizations, healthcare organizations engaged in physical culture and sports, sports clothing and footwear, sports equipment, kit, gear, maintenance consumables, and also prizes, medals, diplomas, flowers, souvenirs and award paraphernalia, pharmacological and restorative agents, and protein and glucose vitamin supplements;
- the preparation and participation of national teams of the Republic of Belarus in sports and reserve teams in sporting events in the territory of the Republic of Belarus and/or abroad;
- installing sewage treatment facilities, creating waste utilization facilities, waste decontamination and landfill facilities, and deploying sustainable energy sources;
- holding of international and national events (competitions, conferences, seminars and congresses) by state institutions (including state bodies);

- payment of general business expenses relating to the maintenance of the administrative apparatus of a legal entity or sole proprietor and support of their activities according to the list determined by the Office of the President of the Republic of Belarus;
- other purposes provided that the Interdepartmental Commission on Foreign Gratuitous Aid approves these uses of aid.

It is prohibited to receive and/or use aid for the following purposes (or relating to the following):

- carrying out terrorist and other extremist activities, other acts prohibited by law, as well as those causing harm to national security, state and/or public interests or threatening to cause such harm;
- financing of political parties, or unions (associations) of political parties;
- preparing or holding elections, referendums, the recall of deputies of the House of Representatives of the National Assembly of the Republic of Belarus, members of the Council of the Republic of the National Assembly of the Republic of Belarus, deputies of the local Council of Deputies, or organizing or holding meetings, rallies, street marches, demonstrations, picketing, strikes, and producing or distributing campaign materials;
- organizing events aimed at conducting political and campaigning work among the population.

Thus, Decree No. 3 does not include any provisions prohibiting the receipt and use of aid by trade unions or employers' associations.

At the same time, Decree No. 3 defines the conditions (purposes) for the use of foreign gratuitous aid and stipulates that such aid must be registered in accordance with the established procedure. However, the registration procedure is quick and easy. There have been no instances of trade unions being denied foreign gratuitous aid.

We also consider it necessary to note that the procedure established in the Republic of Belarus for receiving foreign gratuitous aid is unjustifiably linked in the ILO framework with Articles 5 and 6 of Convention No. 87.

These Articles of Convention No. 87 do not contain provisions on the right of trade unions and/or employer associations to unimpeded receipt of financial or other forms of assistance for political and campaign work among the population (organization of mass events, strikes, production and distribution of campaign materials, etc.).

The existing ban in the Republic of Belarus on receiving and using foreign gratuitous aid for purposes involving political and campaign work is dictated by national security interests and is more than justified.

It is obvious that, in the current situation, giving outside (foreign) forces the opportunity to sponsor various kinds of politically orientated events and processes in the country may be used to destabilize the socio-political and socio-economic situation in the country, which would have an extremely negative impact on society and citizens' well-being.

Therefore, Recommendation 9 does not fully meet national security interests.

The Commission further recommends amendment of the Law on Mass Events (as well as Decree No. 11 if it has not yet been repealed), as previously suggested by the ILO supervisory bodies, so as to bring it into line with the right of workers' and employers' organizations to organize their activities provided for in Article 3 of the Convention.

The Act of the Republic of Belarus No. 114-Z of 30 December 1997 on Mass Events establishes the procedure for organizing and holding meetings, rallies, street marches, demonstrations, picketing and other mass events, and is aimed at creating the conditions for the exercise of the constitutional rights and freedoms of citizens, ensuring public safety and order when these events are held in streets, squares and other public places.

The freedom of mass events that do not violate law and order and the rights of other citizens of the Republic of Belarus, are guaranteed by the State.

In accordance with the Act, mass events, as well as speeches by their participants, shall be held at a specified time and place in accordance with the purposes specified in the application.

Mass events shall be prohibited if their purpose is to promote war or extremist activities.

The organizers of a meeting, rally, street march, demonstration or picketing shall be prohibited from involving citizens in exchange for material remuneration.

During the mass event, its participants shall be obliged to observe public order and comply with all lawful requirements of the organizers of the mass event, officers of internal affairs agencies and members of the public performing public order duties.

State bodies, political parties, trade unions and other organizations, as well as citizens shall not have the right to interfere with or obstruct the holding of mass events held in compliance with the requirements of this Act and other legislative acts.

Persons who have violated the procedure for organizing and/or holding mass events established by the Act in question shall be held liable in accordance with legislative acts.

Political parties, trade unions and other organizations, whose responsible persons have failed to ensure the proper procedure for organizing and/or holding a meeting, rally, street march, demonstration or picketing, which caused extensive damage or substantial harm to the rights and legitimate interests of citizens, organizations or to state or public interests, may be dissolved in accordance with the established procedure for a single violation of the legislation on mass events.

Damage caused by the organizers of and participants in a mass event, to the State, citizens and organizations during the mass event shall be subject to compensation in the manner prescribed by law.

It should be noted that the current procedure in the Republic of Belarus for organizing and holding mass events does not conflict with the principles of freedom of association and is fully consistent with the provisions of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

Legislation providing for punishment for violating the procedure for organizing and holding a mass event, resulting in serious adverse consequences, is aimed at preventing socially dangerous, or illegal acts, that pose a real threat to the life and health of the public.

When holding mass events, trade unions are obliged to respect public order, and must not a priori permit actions which could cause the event to lose its peaceful character and cause serious harm to the public, society and the State.

The punishment provided by legislation for the organizers of a mass event for causing substantial damage, or harm to the rights and interests of citizens, organizations, and also to state or public interests, is not and objectively should not, be interpreted as a deterrent to the exercise by citizens and trade unions of the right to freedom of lawful, peaceful assembly.

Taking into account the unprecedented political and economic pressure exerted on the Republic of Belarus, we believe that diluting liability for violating the procedure for holding mass events would contribute to the creation of conditions for the strengthening of external destructive influences on the situation in the country, which would not be in the national interests of the Republic of Belarus, nor serve the purpose of ensuring the well-being of its citizens.

Thus, the Act on Mass Events does not contain provisions directly or indirectly preventing workers' and employers' organizations from exercising the right to organize their activities.

However, the requirements to dilute trade unions' liability for violating the procedure for holding mass events are not in the interests of national security.

The Commission recommends that the Government ensure that the Belarusian Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (CDTU), which already has a seat on the National Council on Labour and Social Issues (NCLSI), is allowed to participate through whichever representative it designates and also that it take steps to ensure the right of all umbrella organizations representing trade unions in Belarus to participate in the NCLSI. The CDTU's participation on the NCLSI should be ensured with immediate effect.

In order to ensure free and equal participation of all social partners in the dialogue with the Government, a representative of the Belarusian Congress of Democratic Trade Unions has been included in the composition of the main tripartite social partnership body at the national level: the NCLSI.

During the meeting of the NCLSI held on 31 January 2007, the inclusion of Mr A.I. Yarashuk, BKDP as chairperson, in this tripartite body, was approved.

During his membership of the NCLSI, BKDP chairperson Mr A.I. Yarashuk represented the interests of all affiliated organizations of the trade union organization he headed, the Belarusian Trade Union of Radio-Electronic Industry Workers (trade union REP), the Belarusian Independent Trade Union of Miners, Chemists, Oil Refiners, Power Engineers, Transport Workers, Construction and Other Workers (BNP), the Free Trade Union of Metalworkers (SPM), and the Free Trade Union of Belarus (SPB).

Recommendation 11 has been implemented.

► Recommendation 12

The Commission recommends that the Government undertake a thorough review of its industrial relations system with the aim of ensuring a clear distinction between the role of the Government and that of the social partners and of promoting clearly independent structures of workers' and employers' organizations.

Belarus ensures a clear distinction between the roles of the Government and the social partners, which is a prerequisite for the latter to carry out their lawful activities freely and independently.

The Government's activity is regulated by Act of the Republic of Belarus No. 424-Z of 23 July 2008, on the Council of Ministers of the Republic of Belarus.

The Council of Ministers of the Republic of Belarus is the Government of the Republic of Belarus and is a collegial central body of state administration of the Republic of Belarus, which, in accordance with the Constitution of the Republic of Belarus, exercises executive power in the Republic of Belarus and manages the system of subordinate national bodies of state administration and other organizations, as well as, on issues within its competence, the system of local executive and administrative authorities.

The Council of Ministers is accountable in its activities to the President of the Republic of Belarus and responsible to the National Assembly of the Republic of Belarus.

The Council of Ministers consists of the Prime Minister of the Republic of Belarus, her/his deputies, ministers, chairpersons of state committees subordinate to the Council of Ministers, and the Chief of Staff of the Council of Ministers. The Council of Ministers may include the heads of other state bodies and organizations in accordance with the decisions of the President.

The competence of the Council of Ministers is enshrined in Chapter 3 of the Act on the Council of Ministers of the Republic of Belarus.

In accordance with the general powers vested therein, the Council of Ministers:

- ensures the implementation of the Constitution, decisions of the All-Belarusian People's Assembly, laws and Presidential acts, and oversees their implementation by national state administration bodies and other organizations subordinate to it, as well as local executive and administration bodies, individuals and organizations;
- formulates the main areas of domestic and foreign policy of the Republic of Belarus and takes measures for its implementation;
- ensures the implementation of a unified economic, financial, credit and monetary policy, state policy in the field of science and innovation, culture, education, healthcare, physical culture, sport and tourism, the environment, social security and wages, the public-private partnership, prevention of and response to natural and man-made emergencies, and in the areas of investments, concessions, digital development, etc.;
- takes measures to ensure the rights and freedoms of citizens, protect the interests of the State, national security and defence capability, protect property and public order, and combat crime and corruption;

- subject to the specific features established by other legislative acts, acts on behalf of the owner in respect of property owned by the Republic of Belarus, and organizes the management of state property;
- has the right to establish, reorganize and dissolve legal entities whose property is owned by the Republic of Belarus;
- approves, in agreement with the President, the lists of state programmes, state and regional scientific and technical programmes, and also approves the list of state scientific research programmes;
- ensures the development and implementation of state programmes and approves them.

The Council of Ministers of the Republic of Belarus also exercises other powers vested therein by the Constitution, laws and Presidential acts.

Trade unions carry out their activities in accordance with the Trade Union Act of the Republic of Belarus, No. 1605-XII of 22 April 1992.

Pursuant to the Act, a trade union is a voluntary public organization of citizens of the Republic of Belarus, foreign citizens and stateless persons (hereinafter, unless specified otherwise, "citizens"), including those receiving vocational, technical, secondary specialized, higher, science-orientated education, bound by common interests in the nature of their occupation, in both industrial and non-industrial fields, for the protection and realization of labour and socio-economic rights and interests.

Citizens have the right voluntarily to establish trade unions of their choice, and also to join trade unions, provided that their statutes are observed.

Foreign citizens and stateless persons may join trade unions established and operating in the territory of the Republic of Belarus, if their charters so provide.

Trade unions may, on a voluntary basis, establish national unions (associations), and other associations (trade union associations) enjoying trade union rights, and also join them.

National associations of trade unions may, in accordance with the procedure provided for in their statutes, establish territorial (regional, town/city and district) and other organizational structures with trade union rights.

Trade unions (trade union associations) and their organizational structures are legal entities in accordance with the law and their statutes.

The principle of trade union independence is enshrined in legislation and implemented in practice.

Thus, under article 3 of the Act, trade unions carry out their activities in accordance with the Constitution, the Trade Union Act, and other legislative acts. The activities of trade unions may be restricted in cases stipulated by legislative acts in the interests of national security, public order or to ensure the rights and freedoms of others.

Trade unions independently draw up and approve their charters, determine their structure, elect their governing bodies, organize their activities, hold meetings, conferences, plenums and congresses.

Trade unions (trade union associations), their symbols, amendments and additions to their charter shall be subject to state registration in accordance with the procedure established by law.

In accordance with their statutory aims and objectives, trade unions have the right to cooperate with trade unions from other countries, and to join international and other trade union associations and organizations of their choice.

Citizens' membership or non-membership of trade unions shall not entail any restrictions of their employment, socio-economic, political, or personal rights and freedoms guaranteed by legislation.

A trade union's activity shall be terminated by decision of its members in accordance with the procedure specified by the charter of the trade union in question.

In cases where the activities of trade unions (trade union associations) contravene the Constitution and other legislative acts, or cause harm to state or public interests, they may be suspended for up to six months, or terminated with respect to national trade unions and their associations by decision of the Supreme Court on application by the Prosecutor-General, and in respect of territorial trade unions, by a court decision on application by the prosecutor of the administrative territorial unit concerned.

Article 6 of the Act establishes the procedure for interaction between state administrative bodies, monitoring (supervisory) bodies and trade unions.

Thus, improvement and development of the system of social partnership, forms and methods of interaction between trade unions (trade union associations), employers (associations thereof) and state administrative bodies are one of the top priorities of the socio-economic policy of the Republic of Belarus.

Trade unions participate in the development and implementation of the State's socio-economic policy.

Trade unions have the right to submit proposals to the state administrative bodies, in accordance with the established procedure, on the adoption, amendment or repeal of legislation on labour and socio-economic issues. Regulatory legal acts affecting the labour and socio-economic rights and interests of citizens, shall be adopted by state administrative bodies with prior notification of the relevant trade unions (trade union associations).

Trade unions, through their authorized representatives, have the right to participate in the work of the collegial bodies of ministries and other national bodies of state administration, meetings of local executive and administrative bodies, and management bodies of organizations in accordance with the procedure established by the Council of Ministers in coordination with the relevant trade unions.

National and local budgets may provide funds for the implementation of national and local programmes (educational, research, cultural, health and fitness, information, etc.) aimed at realizing the rights, freedoms and interests of citizens, as proposed by the relevant national and regional trade union associations.

In exercising public monitoring, trade unions interact with state administrative bodies, monitoring (supervisory) bodies and other organizations.

The fundamental rights of trade unions and guarantees of those rights are enshrined in Chapters 2 and 3 of the Act.

Employers (associations thereof), state bodies, economic entities, public associations and officials are obliged to respect trade union rights. Such bodies and entities shall be held liable for violating trade union rights or obstructing their lawful activities in accordance with the law.

Employers (associations thereof), state bodies, economic entities, public associations and officials have no right to prevent trade union representatives from visiting organizations in which members of these trade unions work, unless otherwise provided by legislative acts.

Trade union rights shall be protected in accordance with the law. Unlawful restriction of trade union rights and obstruction of the exercise of their powers shall not be permitted.

On 16 December 2023, Act of the Republic of Belarus No. 225-Z of 12 December 2022 on Employers' Associations, drafted at the initiative of business associations engaged in social dialogue with trade unions, came into force.

The adoption of the Act is aimed at developing the institution of employers' associations as subjects of social partnership in the country.

The Act defines the procedure for establishing employers' associations, their legal status and principles of activity, rights and obligations, and also the rights and obligations of their members.

The Act applies to employers and associations thereof operating in the Republic of Belarus.

In accordance with national legislation, employers' associations, along with state bodies and trade unions, are parties to the social partnership system.

According to the Act, an employers' association is a non-profit organization, established in the form of an organization (union), bringing together, on the basis of voluntary membership, employers and/or associations of employers for the purpose of representing and protecting their rights and legitimate interests in the field of social, labour and related economic relations, included in the register of employers' associations ("the Register").

Employers have the right, on a voluntary basis, to establish employers' associations, and are also free to join or leave such organizations under the conditions established by law and specified by the charters of these associations.

The activities of employers' associations are regulated by the legislation on employers' associations, as well as international treaties of the Republic of Belarus and other international legal acts containing obligations of the Republic of Belarus.

Employers' associations are established and act to represent and protect the rights and legitimate interests of employers and employers' associations in social, labour and related economic relations, as well as to implement the tasks assigned to them.

The main tasks of employers' associations are:

- interaction with state bodies, trade unions (their associations and organizational structures) and other representative bodies of workers authorized in accordance with legislative acts to represent their interests, in the system of social partnership;
- participation in the formulation and implementation of the State's social, labour and economic policy;
- conducting collective negotiations to conclude, amend or supplement general, tariff and local agreements, and ensuring the fulfilment of their obligations under the agreements;
- coordinating the activities of members of employers' associations to fulfil their obligations under the agreements;

- providing advisory and methodological assistance to employers and employers' associations in averting and resolving collective labour disputes.

Employers' associations:

- independently draw up their statutes, elect their governing bodies and organize their activities;
- in accordance with their statutory goals and objectives have the right to collaborate with other employers' associations, associations (unions) and public associations established in the Republic of Belarus, associations (unions) of employers from other countries, and also with international unions (organizations) of employers;
- have the right to join international unions (organizations) of employers.

Employers' associations operate on the principle of voluntary accession to, and withdrawal from, membership.

Relations between employers' associations, state bodies and trade unions are based on the principles of social partnership and cooperation between the parties.

Employers' associations may be national or territorial (regional, district, or town/city).

The most representative national employers' association, the Confederation of Employers of the Republic of Belarus, coordinates the activities of employers' associations within the framework of the social partnership system.

The Confederation of Employers is recognized as a national employers' association, which includes more than half of the national employers' associations operating in the Republic of Belarus.

Employers' associations, as subjects of social partnership, have the right to interact with state bodies and trade unions on formulating and implementing state social, labour and economic policy, and protecting the rights and legitimate interests of employers and employers' associations.

Employers' associations are entitled to submit proposals to state bodies regarding the adoption, amendment or repeal of legislative acts that affect the interests of employers and employers' associations.

Representatives of employers, taking into account their status and sectoral affiliation, are included in labour and social councils established at the industry and territory level.

Employers' associations represent the interests of their members in collective bargaining to conclude, amend or supplement agreements.

When entering into a general agreement, the employers' side is represented by the Confederation of Employers of the Republic of Belarus, and in the event of its absence, representation of the employers' side is determined by agreement between the national employers' associations.

The structure, formation procedure and powers of the management bodies of the employers' associations, and their decision-making procedure are determined by the charter of the employers' association.

Since the Act regulates the exercise of powers of employers' associations as one of the parties to the social partnership system, non-profit organizations established in the form of associations (unions) must be recognized as employers' associations through inclusion in the Register of Employers' Associations in order to acquire such powers.

The Register contains a list of employers' associations operating in the Republic of Belarus, indicating their status.

A non-profit organization is included in the Register on the basis of an application submitted to the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection.

The decision on whether to include a non-profit organization in the Register is made on the basis of an assessment of the conformity of its charter and the composition of its membership with the provisions of this Act.

The creation and maintenance of the Register, as well as organizational and methodological support for the creation and maintenance of the register, are carried out by the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection.

The rights and obligations of employers' associations are enshrined in Chapter 3 of the Act.

Employers' associations have the right to:

- carry out activities aimed at achieving its statutory aims and objectives;
- receive and disseminate freely information relevant to the activities of an employers' association, unless to do so would contravene legislative requirements;
- protect the rights and legitimate interests, and also represent their members' legitimate interests, in state bodies and other organizations, in relations with trade unions;
- initiate and conduct collective bargaining for the purpose of concluding, amending or supplementing agreements;
- obtain from the relevant state bodies and trade unions information necessary to conduct collective bargaining to conclude, amend or supplement agreements, and to monitor their implementation;
- participate in the implementation of measures to promote employment, develop vocational education and training, and draw up draft professional standards;
- exercise other rights stipulated by the Act, other legislative acts and the charter of the employers' association.

The employers' association shall:

- conduct, in accordance with the procedure established by law, collective bargaining to conclude, amend or supplement agreements;
- implement the agreements entered into, to the extent they relate to the obligations of employers' associations;
- provide its members with details on agreements concluded by the employers' association;
- provide state bodies and trade unions with the information necessary to conduct collective bargaining and relating to the competence of the employers' association;
- monitor implementation of agreements entered into by the employers' association;
- assist in its members' fulfilment of the obligations stipulated in the agreements;

- report to its members on the activities of the employers' association in accordance with the procedure provided for by the charter;
- provide its members with advisory and methodological assistance on the regulation of social, labour and related economic relations, including on the conclusion of collective contracts and agreements, and the resolution of individual and collective labour disputes;
- perform other duties stipulated by the Act, other legislative acts and the charter of the employers' association.

An employers' association shall not be liable for the obligations of its members, including their obligations under the agreements entered into by the employers' association.

Recommendation 12 has been implemented.

Thus, the information provided above confirms that the situation with the implementation by the Republic of Belarus of the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations has been steadily developing. At the same time, the ILO supervisory bodies have repeatedly noted with interest the measures taken by the Government, stating that progress has been made.

At this stage, most of the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations (except for those that are not in the interests of national security) have been implemented.

In this regard, statements that the Government of the Republic of Belarus has failed to take measures to implement most of the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations, and also regarding a complete lack of progress in their implementation, are totally unfounded and do not correspond with reality.

The Government of the Republic of Belarus is ready to cooperate with the International Labour Office on issues concerning the implementation of the ratified ILO Conventions Nos 87 and 98, provided that account is taken of present day realities and national interests, at the forefront of which are the stable socio-economic development of the Republic, the well-being and high quality of life of the Belarusian people, social harmony, the unshakeable foundations of democracy and the rule of law, and the country's independence, territorial integrity and sovereignty.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – As you know, at its 111th Session, the International Labour Conference adopted a resolution concerning the measures recommended by the ILO Governing Body under article 33 of the Constitution on the subject of Belarus and decided to hold at its future sessions a special sitting of the Committee for the purpose of discussing the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), by the Government of Belarus and the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, as long as this Member has not been shown to have fulfilled its obligations. Based on this decision, an item has been included in the Committee's agenda.

In this regard, I would like to inform all delegates that the Officers of the Committee have decided to reduce the speaking time for individual member delegates of the Committee from five to three minutes for the special sitting on Belarus. The delegates concerned have been informed accordingly by the Secretariat.

I now invite the Government representative of Belarus to take the floor.

Interpretation from Russian: Government representative (Deputy Minister of Labour and Social Protection) – Today, for the first time, the issue concerning the Republic of Belarus is being discussed within the framework of the procedure provided for by the resolution adopted under article 33 of the ILO Constitution last year at the 111th Session of the Conference. I would like to begin by clearly and unambiguously clarifying the position of the Government of Belarus on this resolution. We consider this article 33 resolution to be unfair and politically motivated. Adoption of the resolution was lobbied by countries from the Western Bloc. The authors of the resolution based it on sanctions and discriminatory measures that have no moral or legal basis. The goals being pursued by western countries are obvious to us. This is an attempt to justify the unfair and illegal economic sanctions applied to our country as a punishment for our steering an independent course. Western sanctions are aimed at harming not only business within our country but also ordinary people – depriving them of work, income, social guarantees, and ultimately creating tension in society. The resolution contains nothing about interaction and cooperation. It concerns only restrictions, exceptions and revision of relations. The measures set forth in the resolution are contrary to the ILO Constitution and the fundamental principles of its activities. The ILO principles have nothing to do with threats, pressures or sanctions. I am convinced that the existence of such an unfair resolution with reference to a full Member of the ILO causes irreparable damage to the authority of this Organization. It clearly shows the whole world that a particular group of countries has the ability to manipulate the stance of the ILO at its own discretion.

The rhetoric about the need to apply article 33 of the ILO Constitution to Belarus unfolded in the context of accusations of a supposed lack of progress in implementing the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry, and a steady worsening of the situation in the country. I have no doubt that we will hear such statements again today, but they have nothing whatsoever to do with the real state of affairs. The Government, together with the social partners, has done a great deal to upgrade national legislation, taking into account the ILO principles to develop social dialogue and tripartism in our country. To date, the majority of the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations have been implemented. I will not dwell in detail on all the measures taken by the Government in the context of implementing the recommendations. We submitted a detailed report to the Director-General, which is included in the documents for your Committee. I will only say this: in almost all areas outlined in the recommendations, specific steps were taken and significant results were achieved, such as publication of recommendations in the media, simplification of the registration procedure for trade unions, establishment of tripartite councils, and work with judges and prosecutors. In saying that, I wish to emphasize that the ILO supervisory bodies have repeatedly assessed the Government's actions in a positive way. I would especially like to note the good will shown by the Government of Belarus, its focus on interaction and cooperation with social partners and the ILO. We have tried to be as flexible and constructive as possible. At the suggestion of the ILO, we established a special negotiating platform to develop measures to implement the recommendations, a tripartite council for the improvement of legislation in the social and labour sphere, which included all interested parties. Since 2009, experts from the ILO have repeatedly participated in the meetings of that council. With their assistance, we were able to find mutually acceptable solutions to a number of issues. The results of this joint work have been reflected in legislation and the general agreement that applies in our country. Let me emphasize that our position remains unchanged. We stand ready to interact constructively and to cooperate with the ILO. We invite representatives of the ILO to participate in the work of our tripartite bodies, the National Council for Labour and Social Issues and the Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere (the aforementioned tripartite Council). At this stage, the Office has not made a positive decision on that issue, but we hope that over time everything will be resolved and cooperation will resume.

In 2019, we all celebrated the ILO Centenary. It was clear that the Government had made significant progress in implementing the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. In February 2019, a tripartite conference in Minsk with the participation of ILO representatives confirmed the high level of cooperation between our Government, the social partners and the ILO in the development of social dialogue and tripartism. However, unfortunately, everything changed in 2020. The tone of the ILO supervisory bodies' assessments of Belarus shifted radically and became much more negative. I would like to emphasize that this is not the fault of the Government of Belarus. Politics intervened in the situation. More precisely, attempts were made by western countries to illegally influence the country's political life and the choices of the Belarusian people. The West's main goal was to destabilize the situation in Belarus, to create chaos and disorder and, ultimately, a coup d'état. These attempts failed. The authorities in Belarus confirmed their ability to act. The people of Belarus overwhelmingly expressed support for the country's leadership. Of course, as in any civilized State governed by the rule of law, organizers and participants of riots were brought to justice and received the punishment they deserved. Among them were representatives of trade unions united under the roof of the Belarusian Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (BKDP). I think we will hear more about this today in the speeches made here by some speakers, and I therefore consider it necessary to clearly outline the position of my Government with reference to the BKDP. The BKDP has never represented any significant trade union force in our country. It has never had anything in common with the real trade union movement. Issues relating to labour, social dialogue and collective bargaining were not within the scope of the BKDP. Rather, under its banner, a handful of politicians united, conveniently receiving western financial funding through grants, seminars and trips abroad. This is no secret to anyone – everyone knows. For instance, the machinations of the leaders of the BKDP-affiliated Trade Union of Radio and Electronic Industry Workers, who were funded by Danish trade unions, were widely reported. Given the pseudo-trade union and highly politicized focus of the BKDP's activities, it has never been supported to any reasonable extent by workers of Belarus. It has not been a representative organization. In a country where around 4 million people are trade union members, the BKDP trade unions numbered only a few thousand altogether. As a result, the BKDP quite objectively did not have the legitimate right to participate in social dialogue with the Government. However, the ILO strongly recommended that the Government provide the BKDP with an opportunity to participate in the work of tripartite bodies at national level. Guided by the principles of good will, the Government gave the BKDP the opportunity to participate, despite the fact that this considerably complicated the process of conducting dialogue. I think that the ILO experts who participated in the meetings of the tripartite Council could see for themselves how difficult the task was to develop mutually acceptable solutions with the participation of the BKDP. The representatives at the BKDP tried to turn each meeting of the tripartite Council into a political rally. The BKDP also transferred its biased and destructive position to what we now see on the ILO platform. Every year at the meetings of this Committee, the Chairperson of the BKDP, Mr Yarashuk, made unfounded and false accusations against the Government. The year of 2020 was a turning point. The events of that year highlighted the true goals and objectives of the BKDP and the trade unions that were part of it. These pseudo-trade unions actually became a headquarters for the organization of extremist activities. Their leaders and activists grossly violated our laws, took action against the interests of our society and our State. As a result, court decisions terminated the activities of the BKDP. Its member organizations, leaders and activists within those structures were brought to account judicially.

I would like to emphasize one point. In taking measures to protect the constitutional and public order in Belarus, the Government has not committed any action that contradicts ILO Conventions. ILO Conventions do not give trade unions and their members the right to break the law. The illegal actions of the BKDP and its member trade unions were confirmed by the Supreme Court of the Republic of Belarus. In 2022, in full compliance with the law, it decided to terminate the activities of the BKDP. Today, the BKDP and its structures are not operating in Belarus and do not represent the interests of workers in our country. They are illegitimate in Belarus. Therefore, we strongly condemn any attempt to involve representatives of an illegitimate structure, the BKDP, within this dialogue on Belarus. I would like to emphasize that the inclusion of pseudo-trade unions represented by the BKDP within the judicial scope of Belarus does not and could not, in any way, affect social dialogue and tripartism in our country. All social partnership institutions are operating as usual within Belarus. On our agenda, we have the development of a new general agreement. This would be the 17th general agreement between the Government and national level associations of employers and trade unions.

Following the adoption of the resolution under article 33 of the ILO Constitution, the issue of Belarus has been discussed twice at the sessions of the Governing Body. What has emerged from those discussions? They confirmed that the resolution is being used by those who lobbied for it as a way of putting pressure on Belarus. With the help of the resolution, the ILO is being turned into a platform for implementing political orders and settling scores with unwelcome countries. This process must be stopped. The unfair resolution on the Republic of Belarus, must be repealed as it inevitably leads us to confrontation. We need to enter a new chapter and to close this chapter. We are ready to cooperate with the ILO on the principles of mutual respect and unconditional consideration of the national interests of the Republic of Belarus. I call on the Committee to take the first step in that direction and include in its conclusions a corresponding recommendation to the Governing Body.

Employer members – We have taken note of the oral and written information on this case provided by the Government of Belarus. The Employers' group stresses the importance of States' compliance with the ILO Conventions Nos 87 and 98, which are two of the ten ILO core Conventions.

Conventions Nos 87 and 98 were ratified by Belarus in 1956. The Employers' group would like to mention that this case has a long-standing history in the ILO. Since 1997, the Committee of Experts has issued many observations, and the case has been dealt with in various ILO supervisory committees. This year marks the 20th anniversary since the Commission of Inquiry issued its report and recommendations to ensure observance of Conventions Nos 87 and 98.

In the 2022 conclusions, the Committee, inter alia, urged the Government of Belarus, in consultation with the social partners, to: restore, without delay, full respect for workers' rights in respect to freedom of association; refrain from the arrest, detention, violent treatment, intimidation or harassment, including judicial harassment of trade union leaders and members conducting lawful trade union activities; investigate without delay alleged instances of intimidation or physical violence through an independent judicial inquiry, immediately release all trade union leaders and members arrested for participating in peaceful assemblies or arrested for exercising their civil liberties through their legitimate trade union activities and drop all related charges; give access as a matter of urgency to visitors, including officials of the ILO; and to ascertain the conditions of arrest and detention and the welfare of the above-mentioned persons.

The Employer members would like to recall that the Conference adopted on 12 June 2023 a resolution which called for actions under article 33 of the ILO Constitution, to secure compliance with the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry established to examine the observance by the Government of Belarus of Conventions Nos 87 and 98. It was also decided to hold a Special Sitting of the Conference Committee to discuss the application of Conventions Nos 87 and 98, as well as the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

The Committee of Experts, in 2023, gave, inter alia, the following advice on Convention No. 87. They requested that all trade union leaders and members arrested for participating in peaceful assemblies or arrested for exercising their civil liberties be immediately released and that all related charges be dropped. The Committee of Experts urged the Government to receive, without further delay, an ILO Tripartite Mission to gather information on the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and subsequent recommendations of the supervisory bodies of the ILO. The Committee of Experts expected the Government to indicate concrete steps taken to review the situation of the dissolved trade unions. It urged the Government to engage with the ILO to fully implement all outstanding recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies without further delay.

It should be noted that the Government of Belarus transmitted written information on the measures taken to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, which has been made available in full on the Conference Committee's website. On 28 May 2024, the ILO organized a "High-level roundtable on freedom of association in Belarus", which took place as part of the action plan adopted in March 2024 by the Governing Body to implement the ILO Conference resolution. Three United Nations Special Rapporteurs participated in the roundtable and reported. A video download of the meeting is available on the ILO website.

The Employer members would like to mention the recent report of the Director-General on the latest developments regarding the situation on freedom of association in Belarus and compliance with the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. The document was published on 3 June 2024 and is available on the ILO website. Furthermore, the ILO Governing Body dealt with this case several times. At the Governing Body Session in March 2024, it was requested to prepare an updated report to inform the Committee at the Conference about the latest developments. The Governing Body also, once again, urged the Government of Belarus, to receive as a matter of urgency an ILO tripartite mission with a view to gathering information on the implementation of the recommendations, including a visit to the independent trade union leaders and activists in prison or detention.

By a communication dated 17 May 2024, the BKDP provided information on the implementation by the Government of Belarus of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. According to the BKDP, it is currently impossible for trade unions and their members to carry out their activities legally. Anyone who associates with any independent trade unions and carries out trade union and human right activities is subject to criminal liability. The BKDP indicated that as of 7 May 2024 more than 50 trade unionists were under criminal prosecution, and provided a list of 39 trade unionists currently imprisoned, as well as a list of 21 trade unionists who were released but not exonerated and on whom additional restrictions were placed.

The Employer members would like to highlight that, in line with Article 2 of Convention No. 87, freedom of association compliance requires that workers and employers must be able to decide freely, without state interference, whether or not to set up their own organizations. Under Article 3 of Convention No. 87, the right to organize constitutes an important aspect of the activities of employers' and workers' organizations. According to Article 11 of Convention No. 87, states must "take all necessary and appropriate measures to ensure that workers and employers may exercise freely the right to organise".

Taking into account all the reports, the Employers' group, once again and in line with our statements in the different ILO supervisory bodies, would like to express grave concern.

After all these years, we note the Committee of Experts' comments deploring "a total lack of progress" and "the continuing deterioration of the freedom of association in the country".

We urge the Government to start engaging in a constructive dialogue with the ILO with no further delay, to improve the country's situation as regards the right of freedom of association and the right to organize. The Employer members stand ready to constructively support this process.

In conclusion, the Employer members recommend the Government to, first, receive as a matter of urgency an ILO Tripartite Mission with a view to gathering information on the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, and recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies. Second, to take steps towards the release of the detained trade unionists, who were detained because they exercised their right of freedom of association, and to provide a copy of the judicial decisions. Third, to engage with the ILO with a view to implementing the recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies without further delay. And finally, to report to the ILO on the measures taken by the Government.

Worker members – Chair, the example of Poland you presented in your opening remarks show us the crucial role of the ILO and its supervisory system in supporting and guiding Member States to fulfil and realize our foundational values of social justice, democracy and the promotion of universal peace.

This morning, our Committee is performing a special duty as instructed to us by the Conference. The measure directly aims to secure compliance by the Government of Belarus with the recommendations of the ILO Commission of Inquiry, which examined the observance by the Government of Belarus of Conventions Nos 87 and 98. The resolution calls on the Government to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and subsequent recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies and to accept an ILO tripartite mission, including a visit to imprisoned or detained trade union activists and leaders.

We note at the outset that in November 2023 and March this year, 2024, the Governing Body also discussed the situation in Belarus noting, among others, an action plan to implement the resolution. As part of it, the ILO convened a high-level roundtable to discuss freedom of association in Belarus.

The Committee on Freedom of Association has also been examining measures taken by the Government of Belarus, if any, to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

We are saddened and deeply concerned that despite the overwhelming evidence of repression against independent trade unions and their leaders, the dire and deteriorating human rights situation, the closed civic space and the strong condemnation by ILO members, the Government continues to violate its obligations under the Conventions with impunity.

The Commission of Inquiry recently examined the situation in Belarus and "... deplored the continuing deterioration of freedom of association in the country, the total lack of progress in implementing the recommendations of the 2004 Commission of Inquiry and the failure of the Government to address the outstanding recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies and the conclusions of the Governing Body".

This year, the Committee of Experts expressed in its report its "... deep concern regarding the situation of civil liberties in Belarus and the application of the Convention in law and in practice ..." and noted, "... with deep regret that in its report, the Government once again merely reiterates the information it had previously provided and considers that the Committee misunderstands and misinterprets the situation on the ground".

In the Director-General's Report on the latest developments, the Government is reported to have indicated in its communication on 9 April 2024 that it was ready to cooperate with the Office in the implementation of Conventions Nos 87 and 98, provided that account is taken of present-day realities and national interests, including stable socio-economic development and social harmony.

If only the Government would accept ILO guidance and respect its obligations under the Conventions, these objectives – including stable socio-economic development and social harmony, which already encapsulate some of the core tenets of social justice of the ILO – would be realized. But the Government continues to reject any guidance, conclusions and recommendations from the ILO and its supervisory system.

Instead, as is contained in the recent communication of the BKDP, it is dangerous to be a genuine and independent trade union, trade union activist or even member in Belarus. Independent trade unions cannot carry out their legitimate trade union activities; criminalization and imprisonment of trade unionists is the order of the day; national security is used as a pretext to ban or control trade unions.

On 4 March 2024, a new criminal case was opened against Mr Leanid Soudalenko, labour lawyer and activist of the Radio and Electronic Industry Workers Union, under section 361-4 of the Criminal Code. He was forced to flee the country.

On 5 April 2024, Ms Volha Brytsikava, leader of the Belarusian Independent Trade Union was charged with "inciting racial, national, religious or other social hatred or discord" under section 130(1) of the Criminal Code, and sentenced to three years of imprisonment after a trial behind closed doors. Additionally, a new criminal case has been opened against her under section 361(1) of the Criminal Code, which carries a maximum penalty of six years of imprisonment and a fine.

The case of Ms Palina Sharenda-Panasiuk, a trade unionist of the Radio and Electronic Workers, must be mentioned. Since January 2024, there has been no contact with her. Ms Sharenda-Panasiuk was due to be released on 21 May this year but was transferred to a detention centre and a new (third) criminal case was opened against her. She was charged for the second time under section 411(2) of the Criminal Code for offences relating to so-called "malicious disobedience to the demands of administration of the correctional institution" (previously her sentence was extended by one year under the same provision of the Code).

The Government also deploys judicial harassment and public smearing to intimidate, defame and discredit trade unions. The courts have been used to declare the BKDP and Salidarnast – its organization formed in exile in 2022 following the forced dissolution of the BKDP – as extremists and terrorists. Salidarnast is banned in Belarus. Under section 19.11 of the Code on Administrative Offences, persons who distribute, produce, store or transport materials or interact with organizations such as the BKDP or Salidarnast, including subscribing to its social networks, is punishable, by a maximum penalty of administrative arrest of up to 30 days.

According to the BKDP, as of 7 May 2024, more than 50 trade unionists were under criminal persecution and 39 trade unionists are currently imprisoned. Twenty-one trade unionists who were released still have criminal charges hanging over them with additional restrictions, including a prohibition from leaving the city or country without police permission, an obligation to report to a police station on a weekly basis and a ban against engaging in certain professional activities. Even after completion of prison sentences, restrictions of freedom continue. Those released are kept on a list for constant monitoring and official control, including of their bank accounts and work activities. Once on that list, there is no process for being removed, so the requirements are essentially permanent. And this is imposed as an administrative measure, without judicial involvement.

Also, in January 2024, Mr Aliaksandr Yeudakimchyk, leader of the Free Trade Union of Metalworkers (SPM), died after a long illness following numerous administrative arrests for his trade union activities and the negative impact they had on his health.

Detained trade union leaders report that the conditions in which they are held amount to torture. They have no access to hygiene products or a change of clothes. They are not taken for a shower or fresh air; prison cells are overcrowded; prisoners are forced to sleep on the floor, on benches and even on tables; the lights are continuously on; and there is no warm water.

We remain deeply concerned about Mr Yarashuk, Chairperson of the BKDP and an ILO Governing Body member. The health of Mr Yarashuk is a major concern for us and yet he remains subjected to a specially restricted prison regime, with little opportunity to exercise, and with only one visit and one parcel allowed per year.

In her report to the United Nations Human Rights Council, the Special Rapporteur on the human rights situation in Belarus indicates that “yellow unions” are a cog in the wheel of state control and observes that the Trade Union Federation of Belarus (FPB) is not a genuine representative of workers’ interests and not independent from the State. Workers who do not join the FPB are also penalized as collective agreements, laying down basic guarantees, apply only to members of unions close to the Government and controlled by the authorities.

At this Conference, the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) has filed a credentials objection challenging the FPB delegation, with evidence that those in the delegation, purporting to represent workers, are agents of the State and not workers or genuine and independent representative of workers. The only independent and genuine workers’ organization, the BKDP, has been dissolved and banned. The FPB must no longer be allowed to participate in ILO activities including future Conferences.

So, Chair, this is sadly the situation in Belarus regarding the implementation of its obligations under the Commission of Inquiry regarding Conventions Nos 87 and 98, as well as the subsequent recommendations of the supervisory bodies and the measures recommended by the Governing Body. Clearly, there has been no progress at all.

We strongly urge the Government to accept constructive dialogue.

Interpretation from Russian: Employer member, Belarus – I am speaking on behalf of the Confederation of Employers and Industrialists of the Republic of Belarus. Unfortunately, a year ago at the previous ILO Conference, we saw the adoption of a resolution against Belarus which led to bewilderment and confusion among the employers of our country. I think many people agree with me that any such restrictive measures affecting the rights of employers and workers will inevitably undermine businesses and business activity, as well as the development of social dialogue and partnership. They will make it difficult to implement collective bargaining agreements and to protect social rights. They might lead to a drop in wage levels and an increase in social tension. The resolution, which is supposed to promote decent work and wage levels, will actually lead to the deterioration of both.

I would like to recall that cooperation among the Republic of Belarus, its employers and the ILO has always been productive. We have cooperated with the Directors-General of the ILO, as well as Mr Kari Tapiola, who made a visit to our country. In the course of the direct contacts mission, the ILO actually made a positive assessment of the work that Belarus had done to implement the recommendations of the ILO and noted progress made. Such positive assessments have been echoed elsewhere in the ILO. However, in our very tangled and confused world, changes do take place and we now find ourselves once again discussing with you the so-called “Belarus question” in the ILO. We think this is undermining the authority of the ILO and we cannot agree that the Organization should become a tribunal for statements on issues which perhaps relate to human rights and certainly relate to politics, but do not, in any way, fall within the purview of a specialized agency of the United Nations system such as this one.

At the so-called “round-table”, held a week ago, before the official opening of the session of the Conference, we saw an attempt to prepare the ground to push this Committee to implement the so-called plan of action on the implementation of the resolution adopted last year. We have listened to the criticism. However, we would like to re-establish a positive and productive dialogue which will further the interests of our country and be based on the fundamental principles of the ILO.

We would like to continue our contacts and meetings to share the experience with the ILO and its Member States. This is the right time for that. What we need are discussions and assistance with regard to such issues such as collective bargaining relating to local level agreements, and general and tariffs agreements, negotiations of which we are to start soon for a two-year period. Any ILO support and assistance would be welcome.

We think the ILO should be in the vanguard of encouraging social and labour reforms in any country and we would be happy to accept any suggestions or recommendations made by the Organization. We understand that any barriers put in the way of business are going to undermine trade and business contacts, and they are certainly not going to help solve political issues or disagreements. The purpose of progressive business associations in Belarus is to boost business, create more jobs, improve the well-being of our workers and deal with all the other fundamental issues of the ILO. We will be happy to carry out a business and professional dialogue with the ILO committees and the Employers’ group. We think we see the situation and reflect on these issues in the same way. We urge you not to support the draft decision on Belarus because its purpose is ultimately to actually make the situation of both employers and workers in our country much worse. We want to have positive relations in our work with the ILO, positive relations between our workers and our employers, and between Belarus and the ILO.

Worker member, Belarus – I am speaking on behalf of 15 Industrial Trade Unions that together make up the FPB, which encompass almost 4 million people. They have asked me to come here today to tell you how things really stand in Belarus and to protect their good name. Today we have 4 million workers in our Federation from all sectors of our economy and that is what I represent.

As things stand today, the FPB includes 24,000 primary trade union organizations on behalf of the workers of our country, these primary-level trade unions have already concluded around 18,000 collective agreements. It is at the initiative of these trade unions that these local normative legal acts include norms that provide employees with various guarantees and bonuses over and above what is established by the Labour Code. For instance, this includes extra holidays, material payments and other benefits, guarantees for the extension of labour contracts, and special measures to support vulnerable groups, such as young persons and older persons. Employers are obliged to implement these standards; and indeed they put into practice all of the provisions of the collective agreements.

I will give you a few figures. Last year alone, at the request of the trade unions, employers redressed around 48,000 infringements of labour legislation. Also, more than 50,000 infringements of occupational health and safety standards have been redressed. At the request of workers, employers were able to pay additional benefits to workers that amounted to the equivalent of around 1 million dollars. And that is far from everything that has been achieved.

All this shows that in law and in practice in Belarus there is every opportunity available for independent and productive work to be done to defend the interest of workers. Nonetheless, we have to admit that at the 111th Session of the International Labour Conference, we know that an article 33 resolution was adopted in relation to Belarus.

It is a cause of deep regret to us that the ILO did not take into account documentary proof of the situation in our country and continues to go along with an argument that is simply seeking to harm and damage workers in Belarus. An open letter was signed by the workers of Belarus to the ILO calling for an end to pressure on the country, on both employers and workers of Belarus. More than a thousand videos have been sent where people have talked about the situation quite honestly and have given a clear picture of the situation in our country. Sadly, we have had no response to any of this from the ILO to date and we see that the ILO is continuing to listen to those who are seeking to in fact harm the people of our country, the workers, their families and children. Today, for the fourth year, we see that the ILO is dancing to the tune of those who are in fact applying unlawful sanctions against our country. And it is representatives of those countries who have dragged the ILO into this situation, where they are working against the interest of the workers of Belarus. We see how sophisticated they are in what they do. They deliberately hide information about the lack of support from many countries for what they are doing. We see the kind of efforts that are made to prevent us from speaking up on behalf of the trade unions of Belarus. They are trying to prevent us from speaking out loud and clear to defend our legitimate interest. Let us be quite honest: today we have representatives of Western countries who in essence are giving developing countries a choice. Either you agree with us or you become the next target for attacks and harassment. Those trade unions that do not agree are somehow the wrong kind of trade unions. Is that democracy? Decisions and the ILO's position on Belarus run counter to the principles that underpin the work of this Organization. Sanctions and restrictions harm all workers. They also destroy economic stability, and create unfair and unequal conditions. They infringe the rights of workers and this is being shown by the experience of many countries that have suffered from unlawful sanctions and restrictions. I call on everyone here to be fair and just, and to act in accordance with the provisions of the ILO Constitution. The ILO should protect the interests of workers from all countries. It does not have the right to act in a way that follows a political instruction of a particular group of countries. Its task is to preserve and defend labour rights, and the rights of workers. Following the adoption of the resolution on article 33 with reference to Belarus, our situation has been discussed twice at the Governing Body. That discussion raised many issues but one thing was very clear: the FTUB is ready to cooperate with the ILO based on the principles of mutual respect and due account being taken of the national interests of the Republic of Belarus. I call on the Committee to take the first step to make that a reality and to include in its conclusions a recommendation to that effect, to be put to the Governing Body. I call on everyone here to support the Republic of Belarus today.

Government member, Belgium – I have the honour of speaking on behalf of the European Union and its Member States. The candidate countries: Albania, Montenegro, North Macedonia, Ukraine and the Republic of Moldova, and the European Free Trade Association countries Iceland and Norway, members of the European Economic Area, align themselves with this statement.

The EU and its Member States are committed to the respect, protection and fulfilment of human rights, including labour rights. We promote universal ratification and effective implementation of fundamental ILO Conventions and support the ILO in developing and promoting international labour standards and supervising their application.

We deeply regret the persistent failure of the Belarusian authorities to comply with their obligations under ILO Conventions Nos 87 and 98. One year has passed since the adoption of article 33 resolution at the Conference. Yet, no initiative has been taken by the authorities to reengage in the process towards implementation of the recommendations of the 2004 Commission of Inquiry. Once again, we call on Belarus to take all the necessary measures to meet the obligations it committed itself to by becoming a member of the ILO and by voluntarily and willingly ratifying most of the ILO fundamental Conventions.

Since the 2020 presidential elections, recently followed by parliamentary and local elections, none of which were free or fair, we see a steep and continuing deterioration of the human rights situation, including grave violations of labour rights, especially of freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining. The situation has further worsened since Belarus' involvement in Russia's war of aggression against Ukraine. We strongly condemn the continuing persecution and intimidation campaigns against independent trade unionists, civil society organizations, democratic opposition forces and all other segments of Belarusian society. We remain deeply concerned by the arbitrary arrest and detention of trade union leaders and members for holding or participating in peaceful assemblies or for exercising other civil liberties pursuant to their legitimate trade union activities.

Given the gravity of the situation, the European Union has imposed seven successive rounds of sanctions since 2020, among others, to address the unprecedented level of repression, including labour rights violations.

We thank the Office for organizing the high-level roundtable to discuss freedom of association in Belarus in line with the action plan adopted by the Governing Body. This event sheds further light on the disproportionate and illegitimate use of violence, fines, detentions, arrests and the negation of fair trials for trade unionists and human rights defenders. We encourage further coordinated efforts in view of making progress in the full implementation of the Conference resolution.

We strongly urge Belarus to receive as a matter of urgency an ILO tripartite mission to gather information on the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and subsequent recommendations of ILO supervisory bodies. This mission must be enabled to visit the independent trade union leaders and activists in prison and detention. We also request Belarus to cooperate in the appointment of an ILO special representative.

The European Union deplores the dissolution of independent trade unions, undermining the legitimacy of social dialogue institutions. We repeat our call to the authorities to abandon their policy of destroying the independent trade union movement. We regret that the Supreme Court rejected the complaints filed by free trade unions in relation to their liquidation, and the lack of impartiality and independence of the judiciary system.

We deplore that political prisoners remain incarcerated in appalling conditions and express grave concern over numerous reports of deaths in detention. We urge the authorities to respect, protect and fulfil human rights, and we call for the immediate and unconditional release of all political prisoners, including trade unionists, and their effective rehabilitation. We regret that even after being released, trade unionists remain on blacklists and continue to face charges and persecution.

We are particularly concerned about the conditions of imprisonment of several political prisoners, including Mr Yarashuk, a Governing Body member, Mr Berasneu, an independent trade union leader, and a union activist, Ms Palina Sharenda-Panasiuk. We call upon the responsible Belarusian authorities to uphold humanitarian principles, provide necessary and timely medical care and refrain from any action which would further impair the situation.

We strongly support the reiterated call of the Committee of Experts to the Belarus authorities to amend a number of legal provisions that restrict or criminalize the exercise of civil and trade union rights.

We reaffirm our strong support for the application of article 33 of the ILO Constitution and will take measures in line with the Conference 2023 resolution as needed.

The European Union and its Member States are committed to working with the ILO and its constituents to secure compliance by the authorities of Belarus with the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations.

Government member, Sweden – I have the honour of speaking on behalf of Denmark, Estonia, Finland, Iceland, Latvia, Lithuania, Norway, Poland and Sweden. We align ourselves with the statement delivered on behalf of the European Union and its Member States.

Our countries reiterate our strong support to the ILO in its indispensable role to develop, promote and supervise the application of ratified international labour standards.

We deeply regret the persistent refusal of the authorities of Belarus to observe the fundamental conventions of the ILO, including Conventions Nos 87 and 98, which they voluntarily ratified.

We note with great regret that since last year's adoption of the resolution concerning the application of article 33 of the ILO Constitution, and despite repeated attempts at engagement by the ILO supervisory bodies, the situation of human rights, including labour rights, in Belarus, has continued to deteriorate.

We remain deeply concerned about more than 1,400 political prisoners still kept in custody by Belarusian authorities for participating in peaceful assemblies or for exercising their human rights. Many of them are trade union leaders and activists.

The authorities are expanding control over various types of professional groups. In the private sector they oblige company owners and directors to control their employees in terms of their loyalty to the regime. In the public sector the employees received a KGB manual on how to behave to avoid responsibility for extremism.

Our countries are also concerned by the Belarusian authorities' decision not to renew the passports of their citizens abroad, as was reported also by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). This practice is meant to force such citizens to return to Belarus and potentially face persecution, in violation of their human rights.

As recognized by the Committee of Experts, the Belarusian authorities once again merely reiterate the information they have previously provided and maintain that the Committee of Experts misunderstands and misinterprets the situation on the ground. They expect us to believe that labour rights in their country are respected, that prisoners are serving well-deserved sentences and people have full freedom of association and right to organize. They consequently refuse to receive an ILO tripartite mission, fail to provide copies of judicial decisions as requested by the Committee of Experts and continue to dissolve the independent trade union organizations.

We reaffirm our strong support for the application of article 33 of the ILO Constitution and support an effective follow-up to the 2023 Conference resolution.

We demand full transparency of law enforcement proceedings which bear the hallmarks of political cases. All trade union leaders and members arrested merely for exercising their human rights must be immediately released. We also expect Belarusian authorities to allow visits to the independent trade union leaders and activists in prison or detention.

We call on Belarus to immediately and unconditionally cease its aid to Russia's war of aggression against Ukraine, which severely impacts Ukrainian lives and livelihoods, including workers, employers and their families.

We thank the Office for its coordinated engagement with the relevant international organizations and United Nations special procedure mandate holders of the Human Rights Council, in particular for having organized the high-level roundtable to discuss the grave situation of trade union rights in Belarus. We also commend the Director-General's continued efforts to seek access to and ascertain the conditions of arrest, detention and welfare of the detained unionists.

To conclude, we extend our gratitude to the ILO constituents and international institutions for implementing measures in accordance with the 2023 Conference resolution. We also urge those who have not yet done so to take appropriate measures in line with the resolution, as requested. We continue to support the holding of a special sitting of this Committee for the purpose of discussing the application of Conventions Nos 87 and 98 by Belarus and its implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, so long as this Member has not been shown to have fulfilled its obligations.

Government member, Canada – I am speaking on behalf of the Governments of Australia, Japan, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and Canada. We thank the Committee of Experts for their most recent observations about the situation in Belarus, and note the written information provided by the authorities of Belarus to the Committee on 17 May 2024 regarding their implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. We also thank the Director-General for his report informing this Committee of the latest developments, and the Office for convening the high-level roundtable on 28 May 2024 to discuss freedom of association in Belarus with the participation of three United Nations Special Rapporteurs.

The case of Belarus has been monitored closely by the ILO for many years now, and we believe that the resolution adopted by the Conference in 2023 under article 33 of the ILO Constitution was a crucial step aimed at realizing social justice in Belarus given the long-standing disregard by the authorities of Belarus for the ILO's fundamental principles and rights at work, the ILO's Constitution and its supervisory system.

Persistent and widespread human and labour rights violations and abuses perpetuated against workers and trade unionists for exercising their fundamental rights at work are well documented and widely recognized. We remain deeply concerned at continued reports from the BKDP, United Nations Special Rapporteurs and others, of mass repression and criminal action taken against workers for exercising their fundamental labour rights, and of trade union leaders and activists being subjected to cruel, inhuman treatment in Belarusian prisons.

We are also concerned about reports of a widespread practice of forced enrolment in Government-led trade unions that are not independent.

Notwithstanding such overwhelming evidence to the contrary, the Belarusian authorities continue to systematically deny any violations of Conventions Nos 87 and 98 and maintain that the recommendations of the 2004 Commission of Inquiry have been implemented. We deplore the fact that the Belarusian authorities continue to refuse an ILO tripartite mission to observe and assess the steps taken towards the application of Conventions Nos 87 and 98, as well as to visit detained and imprisoned trade unionists to assess their health and well-being, despite repeated recommendations by the ILO supervisory bodies and requests from the Director-General. It is imperative that the authorities of Belarus cooperate fully with the ILO to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and the ILO supervisory bodies. To that end, we urge the Belarusian authorities to do the following, without any further delay.

First, release trade unionists that remain in detention for participating in peaceful assemblies or exercising their fundamental right of freedom of association, including ILO Governing Body member Mr Yarashuk, and to drop all related charges.

Second, accept as a matter of urgency an ILO tripartite mission for the purpose of independently assessing the status of implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and subsequent recommendations of ILO supervisory bodies, including a visit to the independent trade union leaders and activists in prison or detention.

Third, engage with the ILO regarding the appointment of a special representative of the Director-General to supervise all action in Belarus related to the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and ILO supervisory bodies.

Finally, we encourage all ILO constituents to continue taking all possible measures in accordance with the 2023 Conference resolution with a view to bringing Belarus into compliance with its obligations under the ILO Constitution, Convention Nos 87 and 98.

Government member, Cuba – We thank the Government of Belarus for the updated information that it has presented this morning. It is important to highlight the willingness of the Belarussian authorities to engage in respectful dialogue and cooperation with the social partners and the ILO, as stressed by the Government in a number of communications, including this morning.

The allegations of a complete lack of headway by Belarus in implementing the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and of a lack of progress are, as has been mentioned, totally unfounded and do not reflect reality. The Office itself has provided information on measures adopted by the Government of Belarus in relation to a number of recommendations and the progress made through those measures, within, of course, the framework of the country's legal system.

It is a fact for all to see that constant progress has been made in Belarus' implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, something that has also been noted by the Organization's supervisory bodies.

The Government of Belarus has demonstrated that it is willing to work with the Office on issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions, going so far as to invite ILO experts to participate in internal processes. However, political motives are continuing to have a negative impact in this respect. This very morning we have, once again, heard political allegations that have nothing to do with the world of work.

We reiterate our concern that Government replies to the ILO supervisory machinery are not afforded due analysis on an equal footing with the allegations made by the social partners. The line between trade union matters and political issues frequently seems to be irrelevant to the supervisory bodies. The approach that should be prioritized with respect to Belarus is one of cooperation and joint, mutually agreed work, rather than punishment and coercion.

We also reaffirm the vital need in all forums and settings to fully respect the sovereignty and self-determination of Member States, which is the basis for any government to be able to honour its commitments. In the analysis of any case we must all favour negotiation, respectful dialogue, assistance, the search for consensus and cooperation, rather than promoting confrontation.

To conclude, I would like to emphasize the importance of commitment to tripartite dialogue, the search for consensus and the consent of the country concerned, which are fundamental prerequisites for achieving any progress.

Worker member, China – The Chinese trade unions have noted that Belarus has achieved steady progress in relevant areas. The FPB is a legitimate organization representing 4 million workers of all sectors in the country and, as just mentioned by the delegates of the workers in Belarus, they have over 24,000 grassroot organizations and have concluded over 18,000 collective agreements, the content of which has been put in practice, which is very important.

All of those collective agreements have provided guarantees for decent wages for workers, safe working conditions and stable labour relations. Moreover, the unions of Belarus have the opportunity to participate in the development of legislation concerning workers' rights and influences the country's employment policies. We think that applying article 33 of the ILO Constitution against Belarus may have a negative impact on the country's economy and worsen the situation of the workers and their families of the country. Therefore, we need to take everything into consideration at this point. I call on the Committee to take a holistic view of the issue of Belarus.

Government member, Algeria – We have listened with great attention to the intervention of the Government of Belarus in which it stated that it has taken due account of the recommendations in the report of the Commission of Inquiry appointed under article 26 of the ILO Constitution.

Algeria welcomes the good will and constant commitment of the Government of Belarus to meet its international obligations. We also appreciate the positive, significant measures adopted by the Belarussian Government, particularly taking into account the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. We have noted the efforts made by the Government, with most of the recommendations having already been broadly implemented and progress made towards others.

Algeria is of the view that the considerations expressed by the Government are wholly praiseworthy and encourages it to pursue its efforts and work with the Office to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. We feel that the situation is positive, particularly given the efforts made to facilitate the registration of trade unions and the planned necessary steps to protect trade union rights and combat all forms of anti-union discrimination.

Government member, Azerbaijan – We took positive note of the information presented by the Government of Belarus and welcome their efforts in developing standards in the sphere of social and labour relations. We commend the willingness of the Belarusian authorities to continue constructive cooperation with the ILO. At the same time, we encourage the ILO and the Committee to avoid politicization in its work with Belarus, which could produce a dangerous precedent and a negative tendency within the Organization.

Government member, Lao People's Democratic Republic – At the outset, the Lao People's Democratic Republic takes note of the report by the General Affairs Committee and sincerely thanks Belarus for the comprehensive updates on the current ILO-related cooperation and work in Belarus.

My delegation commends Belarus for the continued efforts in fulfilling its obligations under ILO-related Conventions and mechanisms, including the implementation of the decisions and recommendations adopted during the previous Governing Body sessions and Conferences; the Government's guarantee to its citizens of the right to work, especially to the most vulnerable and marginalized groups of people; the successful conduct of meetings of the country's main tripartite social partnership bodies; and the awareness-raising campaigns on ILO work and initiatives carried out country-wide.

The Lao People's Democratic Republic reiterates that the unilateral coercive measures (UCMs) and sanctions against any ILO Member States are unproductive and not an effective way forward. We emphasize that the work of the ILO and its mechanisms should be conducted through genuine dialogues and cooperation with the consent of the host country, which can be done by providing capacity-building and technical assistance in accordance with the specific needs and priorities of the country concerned.

Worker member, Eritrea – Conventions Nos 87 and 98 are fundamental Conventions to be implemented by Member States to their fullest capacity. The case brought against the Republic of Belarus at the 111th Session of the Conference intends to outline the Belarus Government's failure to comply with implementation of these Conventions. Additionally, based on the recommendation of the ILO Governing Body, the 111th Session of the Conference passed a resolution under article 33 of the ILO Constitution concerning the Republic of Belarus and suggested the Governments, Employers and Workers reassess any relation with Belarus. The National Confederation of Eritrean Workers (NCEW) opposes this action and advocates for more dialogue to assess the supposed violation and to create a conducive environment for social dialogue, which we as workers see as an effective tool for mitigation. Furthermore, the NCEW believes that the case brought against the Republic of Belarus is politically motivated. When the case against the Republic of Belarus was raised, we initiated discussions with Belarus trade unions and gathered important information about the trade union movement in Belarus. The current labour laws in Belarus have provided a favourable environment for the FPB to expand its unionization and organizing efforts. As a result, the number of trade unions rose to 24,000 along with the recognized 18,000 collective bargaining agreements. The FPB has achieved a unionization rate of 4 million members, demonstrating the right to organize, associate and engage in collective bargaining agreements. In 2023 alone, 1,300 new unions were established. In total, about 10,000 organizations were established in 2015. Thus, the NCEW advocates for open and authentic social dialogue practice to improve the condition of workers in all aspects. The NCEW believes that the ILO standards should be used to enhance workers' conditions at bilateral and tripartite levels. The progress of the FPB over the past few years indicates a positive trend towards achieving social justice. We therefore call for an honest discussion with and support for the Republic of Belarus.

Government member, Colombia – In accordance with Advisory Opinion OC-27/21 of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, “Trade union freedom or the rights of trade union are fundamental human rights that, together with the rights to collective bargaining, to organize and to strike, constitute the foundations for the protection and promotion of the right to work in just and favorable conditions [...]”.

For years, Colombia also experienced an onslaught of violence and anti-union repression, resulting in not only the weakening of trade union organizations, but also the deaths of over 1,200 social and trade union leaders who were murdered between 2015 and 2021, facts that both trade union leaders and human rights defenders have been denouncing for years before various international bodies.

Today, Colombia has transitioned to a Government of change which respects freedom of association, and which advocates for a labour reform that allows for the harmonization of our regulations with the recommendations that the various ILO supervisory bodies have issued to Colombia for years with regard to trade union matters, collective bargaining and the right to strike.

Colombia has experienced the harshness of anti-union repression, and for this reason and because of the international solidarity that distinguishes our Government, we stand with the people of Belarus, with their workers and trade union organizations, in the situation through which they have been living during this period. We reject all acts of violence, detentions and repression that may be occurring, and support the resolution concerning the measures recommended by the Governing Body under article 33 of the ILO Constitution for this case in June 2023.

Our Government shares the deep concern expressed by the Committee of Experts regarding the list of 47 trade union leaders and activists who are currently being detained or whose freedom of movement is restricted, which was communicated by the Belarusian Congress of Democratic Trade Unions.

We respectfully call for tripartite social dialogue, respect for civil liberties, and the protection and guarantee of freedom of association to which we, the ILO constituents, have committed ourselves.

Interpretation from Chinese: Government member, China – I thank the representative of Belarus for their introduction. We have read thoroughly the detailed supplementary information submitted by the Government of Belarus. Over the years, the Government of Belarus has taken concrete measures to further simplify and optimize the trade union registration procedures and also held training programmes with ILO. It has reactivated the tripartite Committee, held a series of seminars and organized several tripartite consultations. In recent years, Belarus has witnessed the gradual reduction in unemployment and a steady increase in income levels, which merit full recognition and appreciation from the Committee. We note that the Government of Belarus has earnestly addressed and implemented most of the 12 recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. This advancement reflects its efforts and progress and its cooperation with the ILO, for which we express our appreciation.

China has a consistent position on this case with a specialized United Nations agency and the only tripartite international organization. The ILO and its secretariat are primarily tasked with serving Member States instead of sanctioning. The supervisory mechanism is of a technical nature and is intended to assist Member States in better fulfilling their obligations, rather than inflicting harm on the rights and interests of their workers and employers through sanctions.

From the ILO Constitution to the Philadelphia Declaration, and from the 1998 Declaration, 2008 Declaration to the Centenary Declaration, these documents all advocate the advancement of justice. We reiterate that invoking article 33 of the Constitution to impose sanctions on Belarus has already harmed and will continue to harm the rights and interests of workers and employers, and to seriously impact the country's economic and social development. We firmly oppose the use of such extreme measures against this Member State that is fulfilling its obligations. The mechanism must not be swayed by political influences; the politicization and instrumentalization of this mechanism would seriously damage the credibility of the ILO.

In any country ruled by law, no rights outshine those laws, transgressions of which by any individual – regardless of their status – must be met with legal consequences.

We urge the Conference Committee and ILO constituents to consider the position and information provided by the Government of Belarus, to respect its sovereignty and refrain from interfering in its internal affairs. We encourage the Office to approach this case in an objective, active and constructive manner, and to safeguard the progress and interests of the workers and employers, thereby driving its economic and social development.

Worker member, Netherlands – This intervention is also on behalf of German and Swiss workers. The Belarusian Government repeatedly declares here that there are no political prisoners in Belarus. The sentenced trade unionists are considered common criminals. But the Committee and the international community know very well that this is not true. There are at least 41 trade unionists in jail at this very moment. The prison conditions for these trade unionists as political prisoners in Belarus are extremely harsh in comparison with those of “common criminals”.

First of all, the State marks them with a yellow label sewn onto their prison uniforms.

Prison administrations artificially create conditions so they can condemn trade unionists to disciplinary sanctions for minor violations, such as an open button, a bed that is not made straight, etc. These sanctions can be of various kinds: withdrawal of parcels or visits, placement in solitary confinement, transfer to a prison regime.

I just want to explain to you what placement in solitary confinement means in Belarus. It is a tiny cell with extremely low temperatures in winter, high temperatures in summer and extremely high humidity. There are no mattresses or bedsheets, deprivation of personal belongings, no walks and no right to correspondence.

There are many types of disciplinary measures, but their aim is the same – to destroy human dignity and make the lives of our brothers and sisters in prison unbearable.

One important example. His name has already been mentioned: Mr Yarashuk – the President of the BKDP, a Vice-President of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), a member of the ILO Governing Body – was additionally persecuted by an unlawful change of prison regime from “ordinary” to “strict” and transferred to prison in November 2023. The change of prison regime is the hardest sanction.

The consequences are:

- the monthly purchase of food and basic necessities is limited to one basic unit (about €11);

- one short visit per year is allowed (of four hours in the presence of a member of the prison guards);
- one parcel or package may be received during the year;
- a one-hour walk may be taken per day.

If I had time I could give more examples of abuse of other imprisoned trade unionists, such as:

- Mr Artsiom Zharnak – Chairperson of the Free Trade Union of Metalworkers at Minsk Automotive Plant (MAZ).
- Mr Aliaksandr Mishuk – Vice-Chair of the BNP.
- Mr Aliaksandr Kapshul – a BNP labour lawyer.

Interpretation from Russian: Government member, Russian Federation – We fully share the assessment of the situation that has been provided here by the distinguished representative of the Government of Belarus vis-à-vis the special sitting. The Russian position with reference to the measures that have been taken against Belarus is well-known. This is something we have said repeatedly, and indeed we explained those views at the 111th Session of the Conference and also at many different meetings of the Governing Body. I do not have much time now so I will just highlight the key points.

If you look at the resolution that was adopted at the 111th Session, that is to say the article 33 resolution on Belarus, this is something that is very discriminatory and politicized in nature. In fact, in a short period of time we have seen that the Government of Belarus has been able to make progress and build on its long-standing cooperation, particularly by giving effect to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. The steps taken by the Government have been repeatedly commended by representatives of the ILO over the years, therefore most the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry as things stand today have already been adopted. That being so, the basis for any kind of sanctions to be adopted in accordance with article 33 simply does not exist because the Government has shown that it is willing to enter into constructive interaction with the ILO on the issues concerned.

The allegations against Belarus that it harasses trade union representatives, that it attacks freedom of association and other rights is simply based on information from the BKDP.

This is a structure that has now been terminated by a decision taken by the Supreme Court of Belarus. It is not entitled to operate in Belarus. It does not represent the workers of Belarus. Therefore, we now see that it has become a political organization that seeks in fact to operate in a way that is hostile to the interests of the State of Belarus today.

We therefore consider that what happened back in 2022 was a purely political decision and it was intended to exert pressure on the Government of Belarus as a result of political action in the country and political events there.

We are against the politicization of the work of the ILO. We are categorically against that and we are therefore against the plan of action to give effect to the recommendation adopted at the 111th Conference, that is to say, the article 33 resolution.

In particular, if we look at today's special sitting, and indeed the roundtable that took place last week, we see once again that this is simply an attempt to exert political pressure on Belarus.

We therefore categorically reject these anti-Belarus measures that have been used as a pretext for this special sitting and we call for a vote before any decision is taken on this.

Worker member, Japan – One year after the Conference adopted a resolution on Belarus, to our regret, we see no progress. Moreover, we see the continuation of repression against workers, activists and leaders of independent trade unions. For example, in August 2023, Ms Volha Brytsikava, the leader of the BNP at Naftan oil refinery, was arrested. She was sentenced to three years in prison in a closed court hearing in March 2024, and a new criminal case has been opened and she faces up to six more years in prison.

Mr Yarashuk was transferred to a cell regime, which significantly worsened his conditions and affected his health. He began to have problems with blood pressure. During this time, there were mass arrests at workplaces in Navapolatsk, Lida, Mozyr, Hrodna, Minsk and other cities in Belarus. We know of about 150 people being arrested. As a result, many of them were fined, imprisoned and dismissed without the right to find employment in another State enterprise.

Release from prison does not mean the end of persecution. Activists have to report to the police every day, to be checked and their travel and work rights are restricted, as they continue to be tainted with the stigma of being extremists. Some of them are threatened with new criminal proceedings. Any activity in the name of independent trade unions is threatened with criminal sanctions. As a result, independent trade union activities are equated with criminal activities, which shows that the right to free trade union activity is completely absent. The existing trade unions in Belarus do not meet the criteria of independence and democracy. They are part of a dictatorial system and cannot be perceived as representatives of Belarusian workers.

Despite the unwillingness of the Belarusian State to accept the constructive proposals of the International Labour Office and the Governing Body, we must continue to look for ways to fully implement the ILO resolution in order to normalize the situation in Belarus.

We reiterate our demand to send a tripartite mission to Belarus to gain access to the imprisoned trade unionists, release trade unionists from prison and bring independent trade unions back into the country.

This serious infringement of a fundamental right, freedom of association and the right to organize and collective bargaining under Conventions Nos 87 and 98, is not only the issue of Belarus or Europe, but it is also an issue for all workers throughout the world. That is why the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC-RENGO), the Japanese union, is seriously concerned at this issue.

We sincerely wish and request the Government of Belarus to change its attitude and accept our requests so that the workers of Belarus can enjoy fundamental workers' rights.

Worker member, Sweden – I am speaking on behalf of the Nordic trade unions in Sweden, Finland, Norway, Denmark and Iceland.

Once you have served your sentence you have paid your debt to society. It is a basic rule of law. But not in Belarus. And certainly not if you are a trade unionist in Belarus, unjustly condemned in the first place.

I met a fellow trade unionist from Belarus who had escaped from there. After serving a prison sentence of several years, in appallingly bad circumstances, he had thought that once free from prison he would be able to resume his old life. But no. He found himself branded an extremist, which made it impossible for him to continue in his profession. Very few other jobs were available to him. Any would-be employer risked State reprisals. He needed permission from the police to leave his home town. The police visited his home on a daily basis, and he was ordered to report in person once a week to the local police station. His bank account was monitored and ordinary bank services, such as getting a pay card or a bank loan, were not allowed. When he spoke of his ordeals to people residing outside Belarus, a new criminal case was opened against him. He managed to escape from Belarus and now lives in exile. When he left Belarus, he not only left his home and friends, but also his ageing parents, whom he will most likely never meet again. Maybe he will be able to move back home, meet his friends and resume his profession again, but only if there is change in Belarus. And we in this room have the power to be a part of that change.

Belarus is a country in want of democracy, in want of basic human rights. To be a trade unionist operating under Convention No. 87 does not make you an extremist, it makes you a responsible citizen, working to better others.

The Nordic trade unions call upon Member States to provide humanitarian assistance to trade unionists forced into exile and we urge the Government of Belarus to receive an ILO tripartite mission and to comply with Convention No. 87.

Government member, Turkmenistan – Turkmenistan welcomes the distinguished delegation of Belarus and expresses gratitude for the detailed information provided on the current situation in relation to the implementation of Conventions Nos 87 and 98, as well as the related recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. At the outset, we would like to note the efforts made by the Government of Belarus to promote full employment of the population, ensure occupational safety and security, ensure decent working conditions and a number of other fundamental norms. I would like to highlight the measures taken by the Government of Belarus to maintain dialogue with the social partners: the resumption of the work of the tripartite council for the improvement of the legislation in the social and labour sphere in 2023 is one of the examples of the commitment of the Belarusian side to its obligations. Turkmenistan would also like to draw attention to the need to seek dialogue with the Government or the social partners; a position of pressure cannot be the best way to build constructive cooperation aimed at positive results. In conclusion, Turkmenistan wishes the Government of Belarus a successful discussion.

Worker member, United Kingdom – I speak on behalf of the Workers of the United Kingdom, the United States and of France. The changing world of work is a constant challenge for unions, which must keep pace with the transformation of traditional workplaces to both defend workers' rights, but also to reach and organize those workers. Many union movements, including those of the United Kingdom, United States and France, are developing new approaches and using all available digital tools to bridge the divide between workers and workplaces to more effectively organize and represent members, perhaps an ingredient in this year's welcome rise in trade union membership in the United Kingdom.

But, if we were denied the right to use technology, it would strike at the very heart of our ability to organize and protect those members. Even worse if the workers could be prosecuted for just reading what we told them.

Such is the situation in Belarus. Like us, workers there use the available media: social media, popular and fairly secure means of communication such as Messenger, Telegram, Instagram etc. In 2020, unions quite naturally used these channels as organizing tools to communicate with workers.

Then, however, new definitions of "extremism" were introduced by the Government. Previously used to suppress religious fundamentalism and racism, these definitions abruptly morphed to encompass a vast array of independent thought and expression, including trade union ideals.

Naturally, since all the communication channels listed above often featured the sharing of articles from the banned independent media, it meant that the channels themselves were deemed carriers of extremism, and therefore those that used them as extremists.

This was used to justified, inter alia: many politically motivated arrests of labour leaders; the closure of trade unions, such as the independent Belarusian Union of Miners and Chemical Workers at Grodno Azot; and the liquidation of the Belarus Independent Trade Union (BNP) as an alleged union of extremists involved in extremist activities and the dissemination of extremist materials.

The information sources of the Belarusian exile trade unionists (Salidarnast), which are aimed at Belarusian workers, were labelled as extremist materials after the ILO Governing Body meeting in March 2024. This means that since March, workers who read these materials – and I stress just to read them, not necessarily act on them or share them with others – may be subject to administrative detention. Simply for reading. Such detention is not considered a good reason for absence from work. This leads to dismissal with the categorization of not being loyal to the State, which further complicates the search for a new job.

We know that access to the rights enshrined by the ILO depends on the ability to communicate those rights to those at work. Trade unions need to be free to explain freedom of association, collective bargaining and other rights, without fear of persecution. Otherwise, not only will trade unionists themselves suffer, but so will those workers deprived of independent information and, ultimately, their rights.

Trade union activism is not extremism.

Government member, Kazakhstan – The Kazakhstani delegation would like to thank the Government representative of Belarus for the report. We note the commitment by the Government of Belarus to observing ILO Conventions and welcome the progress made by the Government in responding to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

We welcome the pursuit of a policy to support the rights of workers, as well as the measures taken at the national level to develop social dialogue. We note the openness of the Government to address the observations of the ILO supervisory bodies and encourage the Government to continue working closely with the ILO in this regard. We believe in the importance of dialogue and cooperation, as enshrined in the ILO Constitution, and note that some of the measures proposed under article 33 with regard to reconsidering bilateral relations with Belarus might be seen as contradictory to the principle of social dialogue. Once implemented, they could have a negative impact on the well-being of the people of Belarus.

At the same time, my delegation encourages the Government of Belarus to address the concerns expressed today through constructive and mutually beneficial dialogue with all actors.

Worker member, Indonesia – According to the update submitted by the BKDP to the Director-General of the ILO, there are seven women activists and leaders of independent trade unions in Belarusian prisons, penal colonies and under house arrest. Among them are mothers of young children, union organizers, chairpersons of industrial unions at chemical plants, medics, accountants – they are called extremists by the State. We call them political prisoners. We know that trade union work is not extremism.

Our sisters have been sentenced to prison terms of between 2 and 11 years for their union work, for their views, for building networks of workers. Our solidarity and worldwide support help them and their families in this difficult time when the regime is imprisoning them and wants the world to forget them and their names – Hanna Ablab, Volha Barushka, Hanna Karneyenka, Sviatlana Sakovich, Palina Sharenda-Panasiuk, Halina Smirnova and Volha Brytsikava.

Our sister Volha Brytsikava is the Chairperson of the Belarusian Independent Trade Union of Miners and Chemical Workers at NAFTAN Oil Refinery. In 2022, Volha was arrested and imprisoned for her anti-war position. During her time in prison, she was sentenced five times to 15 days in prison each time.

After Volha was released, she continued to help her comrades. And when all independent trade unions were dissolved, she was one of the few remaining trade union leaders who did not leave the country. In August 2023, after the Conference, the regime arrested her and a few other comrades.

She is now being investigated. She faces at least six years in prison. And since then, there has not been much information about her. There have been repeated massive arrests of NAFTAN workers, and Volha's comrades have linked this to her case.

The trial against Volha Brytsikava is still ongoing. She is kept as a criminal in prison. The conditions in the remand prison are said to be the worst: overcrowded closed cells with no daylight or fresh air. A day of detention there is counted as a day and a half at sentencing.

Another sister of ours, Palina Sharenda-Panasiuk, has been sentenced to two years. She has been protesting against it, and reported that she was constantly tortured and severely punished by being placed in solitary confinement. But after two years, she was three times sentenced again and again for the violation of prison rules. Even though she has asked for a pardon, she remains in prison while we unions are campaigning for her release.

The places where female prisoners are sent to serve their sentences are penal colonies where they are made to work. Work in prison is nothing more than forced labour without health and safety regulations, without adequate pay (often less than 1 euro a month), mostly in the textile industry. In the case of female prisoners, it is an eight-hour shift in a sewing factory that makes uniforms for the military.

I call on the ILO to insist on sending a tripartite mission to Belarus to get access to trade unionists in Belarusian prisons. Release trade union leaders and activists from prison!

Government member, Switzerland – Switzerland thanks the Committee of Experts for its observations on the application of the fundamental Conventions Nos 87 and 98 by Belarus, and notes the information communicated by the Belarusian authorities on the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. We also thank the Director-General for his updated report and for having recently organized a high-level roundtable on the situation in Belarus with the participation of special rapporteurs from the Human Rights Council.

The various reports brought to our attention paint a very worrying picture of the situation in Belarus. Persistent violations of workers' rights and human rights have been credibly reported, in particular, numerous cases of the arbitrary imprisonment of workers and trade unionists who exercised their fundamental rights. Switzerland is also concerned by the reports of the forced enrolment of employees in government-led unions, which constitutes a violation of freedom of association.

Switzerland, like the Committee on Freedom of Association, deplores the complete absence of progress in the implementation of the recommendations of the 2004 Commission of Inquiry, and the fact that the Government has not taken into account the recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies and the conclusions of the Governing Body. We deeply regret that the Belarusian authorities continue to refuse the visit by an ILO tripartite mission, aimed at evaluating the measures taken by Belarus to implement its obligations under the ILO Conventions that it has ratified.

As Switzerland has already stated on several occasions, we reiterate our call to Belarus to respect its obligations as an ILO Member State by ensuring the application of and respect for fundamental principles and rights at work and the obligations arising from the ratification of the two fundamental Conventions Nos 87 and 98. To conclude, we once again call on Belarus to comply with its international obligations and, to this end, cooperate with the ILO and its bodies, and with all the other relevant international organizations.

Worker member, Brazil – Firstly, I would like to underscore the importance of the ILO supervisory system and, in particular, the work carried out by the Committee of Experts, for which I commend its Chairperson. As recalled yesterday in this plenary session, the observations of the Committee of Experts are so relevant and legitimate that they resonate in other international and national organizations.

In this regard, we must safeguard and reaffirm the mandate of the Committee of Experts in order for the Committee to continue to supervise compliance with international labour standards.

Taking this into account, with regard to the case that we are now examining, I would like to immediately reiterate the requests for information and documents made by the Committee of Experts, which are recorded in the report submitted to this Conference. The lack of response to the requests prevents a better understanding of the facts and indicates, at least, the lack of interest of the Government in demonstrating its compliance with the Conventions of this Organization. For us, responding to the requests of the Committee of Experts is an obligation of democratic States committed to the principles and purposes of the ILO.

It is also an obligation of States to ensure that freedom of association, which is a founding principle of this Organization, is guaranteed in law and in practice on a permanent basis.

I would also like to highlight the close relationship between civil and political rights, freedom of association and democracy. Contrary to the assertion by the Government, the full exercise of freedom of association presupposes that civil and political rights can also be exercised to their full extent and depth, as human rights are indivisible, interdependent and interrelated.

A State cannot be said to be democratic if it does not allow, guarantee or defend the full exercise of such rights. Democracy is based on divergence, and values differences with a view to guaranteeing fundamental rights for all. It is only in dictatorships that people are imprisoned or detained for opposing the Government in place.

We recall that the current President of my country was persecuted and detained by the civil-military dictatorship that existed between 1964 and 1985 precisely for being a trade unionist. Owing to his actions as trade union leader and opponent of the regime, his activities were considered a danger to national security, public order and democracy. Is anybody today unaware of the commitment of President Lula to democracy and the uncompromising defence of it?

Based on these considerations, we reiterate the request by the Committee of Experts for all the union leaders and unionists detained for having participated in peaceful assemblies or for having exercised their civil liberties as part of their legitimate trade union activities, to be freed immediately and for all the related charges to be dropped.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Egypt – We have taken careful note of all the written information submitted by the Government of Belarus. We have also noted the statement made here at the beginning of this sitting relating to the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. My delegation believes that it is important for all States to make efforts to give effect to ILO standards. This is important in order to achieve objectives in accordance with the role that should be played by the ILO. This is especially important when it comes to supporting national efforts to give effect to ILO standards and labour standards in general, and also to providing technical assistance to countries. All of this in recognition of the very important role played by all United Nations agencies, including the ILO, as part of the strengthening of multilateral international cooperation in this area. We therefore believe that we need to continue to pursue constructive dialogue between the Organization and the delegation of Belarus. This is important to allow us to find ways and means to put into practice labour standards, and to allow Belarus to meet its obligations in accordance with a number of Conventions, and particularly Conventions Nos 87 and 98.

Worker member, Kenya – Today is a special day. The day when we can and should protect not only our Belarusian brothers and sisters, but also the true values of the ILO. Freedom of association is a fundamental principle of the ILO's work, set out in the Declaration of Philadelphia, the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work and ILO Conventions.

The Belarusian Government has repeatedly failed to implement its international obligations with regard to the guarantee of freedom of association, and many others, for more than 20 years. Credible evidence from our Belarusian brothers and sisters, the BKDP and the international community, the ILO and other United Nations bodies demonstrate that freedom of association as such does not exist in Belarus. It has been stolen from Belarusian citizens and workers.

The Belarusian Government has dissolved all independent trade unions and appointed so-called workers' representatives under its control, the "yellow" trade unions under the leadership of the FPB. It is very convenient for the Government to say that the independent trade unionists are violating national law when they themselves pass such laws that violate international norms, including those of the ILO.

Now it is impossible to create new independent trade unions in Belarus. The slightest trade union and human rights activity is a reason to be put in prison, as extremists. Our brothers and sisters are now serving real prison terms. It is very convenient to silence independent trade unionists when you have all the means to put them in prison. It entrenches both work and wage slavery and should not be condoned.

Now it is more important than ever for us to join all our forces to get ILO resolutions implemented in practice, with consequences for those who blatantly violate them. The Belarusian case is important not only for Belarusians, but also for all of us, for the credibility of this House, the ILO.

Worker member, Mali – We have studied the comments of the Committee of Experts concerning Belarus and are closely following the consideration of this matter and the arguments of all parties. In our view, the question of Belarus is being examined in an extremely biased, non-objective manner. The facts as presented confirm clearly that there is now no genuine reason to impose special sanctions on Belarus under the ILO Constitution. Belarussian law and practice allow the country's workers to exercise their right to organize in unions. The national trade union confederation has broad, effective practices for protecting the rights of workers at all levels, while the country's effective system of regulating industrial relations through collective bargaining merits particular attention. Thanks to the social partnership established in Belarus, workers their benefit from the necessary level of labour and social safeguards. That is the real, practical aim pursued by trade unions the world over. In this situation, we feel it necessary to highlight that, while the social partners in Belarus are gearing their efforts towards economic and social development, towards ensuring employment and decent incomes for citizens, some countries are attempting to thwart that progress by introducing sanctions and other restrictions.

The ILO, unfortunately, is following the same path, contrary to the overarching principles, aims and objective of our Organization. We believe that the ILO should not encourage or impose certain restrictive measures. Unfair approaches towards Belarus must be abandoned.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Syrian Arab Republic – We note the position that has been taken here by the Government of Belarus. It has been stated that the Government of Belarus is giving effect to recommendations in accordance with the national interests of the country. We also note the information submitted by the delegation of Belarus, according to which most of the recommendations have indeed been implemented. We note what has been achieved in accordance with international standards and labour Conventions. Further, the Government has stated that it stands ready to enter into dialogue with the social partners and with the ILO. For all of these reasons, my delegation wishes to support the position taken by the Government of Belarus, based on a spirit of cooperation and dialogue between the Government, the Organization that we have here, the ILO, as well as other partners. We hope that by taking this approach we will achieve the desired outcome that is in the interests of everyone and will also respect the national interests of Belarus, its citizens and its national trade unions.

We wish to reassert the fact that we should not politicize the work of the ILO. That is something that runs counter to the goals and objectives of the Organization and its mandate. We need to respect the sovereignty of Member States and not intervene in domestic matters. That is fully in line with the principles underpinning the United Nations Charter. We should also recognize that the role of our Organization is to support and assist countries in applying ILO Conventions. Our role is not to impose measures and sanctions on any Member State, particularly not a Member State that has voluntarily joined this Organization and voluntarily ratified its Conventions.

Government member, Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela – On behalf of the Government of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, we welcome the information provided by the Government of the Republic of Belarus on the measures taken to implement the ILO Recommendations, which have been applied fully in some cases, while significant progress has been made in others.

The Government of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela reiterates that the measures imposed on the Government of the Republic of Belarus fall outside the scope of ILO Conventions Nos 87 and 98 and their application is giving rise to consequences similar to the imposition of illegal unilateral coercive measures that run counter to the Charter of the United Nations and violate human rights in that country, including labour rights.

No sovereign State or organization bearing the banners of democracy should therefore encourage, support or be indifferent to such action. In addition to undermining the very essence of freedom of association, the protection of the right to organize and collective bargaining for workers, these actions are also eroding the broad dialogue that the Government of the Republic of Belarus has maintained with various trade unions and specialized bodies to promote and protect the labour rights of Belarusian workers.

The Venezuelan Government advocates frank and direct dialogue that includes the will of the various actors in Belarusian society to foster, among other priorities, social protection for its people and the promotion of their labour rights.

Finally, the Government of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela calls on the ILO to facilitate cooperation and technical assistance with the Government of the Republic of Belarus, to continue efforts to make further progress on the recommendations and develop harmonious and lasting relations between the social partners in the country.

Government member, Nicaragua – The Government of Reconciliation and National Unity of Nicaragua rejects the manipulation of information on the application of Conventions Nos 87 and 98 in the Republic of Belarus. These false claims have been used to interfere in the internal affairs of the Republic of Belarus, to create disinformation, to increase political pressure on the legitimate Government of this sister nation and to justify unilateral Western restrictive measures against the Belarusian people.

Nicaragua recognizes the social and labour achievements of the Republic of Belarus, its efforts and action to guarantee citizens the right to work and to achieve Sustainable Development Goal 8, to promote inclusive and sustainable economic growth, full and productive employment and decent work for all.

We emphasize that over the last five years wages in the Republic of Belarus have increased by 1.7 per cent, which confirms the effectiveness of the policy pursued by the State. Persons with disabilities are constantly the focus of, and are guaranteed social support in the form of various social benefits, the provision of technical means of social rehabilitation and social services.

Regarding trade union rights, and particularly compliance with ILO Conventions Nos 87 and 98, we emphasize that the Government of Belarus has repeatedly drawn the attention of the ILO supervisory bodies to the absence of any contradiction between national law and practice and the provisions of the ILO Conventions on freedom of association.

In Belarus, the rule of law prevails and the necessary conditions are in place for the establishment and exercise of the lawful activities of trade unions and their organizational structure.

As a Member of this Organization, we reiterate that it is the duty of all nations to foster friendly relations based on respect, the principle of equality of law and the obligation imposed on us by the Charter of the United Nations not to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of States. We reject manipulation and oppose unfounded accusations against the Republic of Belarus made for political purposes and based on disinformation.

Government member, United States of America – The United States thanks the Office for the update on the situation in Belarus, including the Director-General's June 2024 report. We note the April 2024 written information from the Belarusian authorities.

One year has passed since the adoption of the resolution invoking article 33, and two decades have passed since the 2004 Commission of Inquiry. We are deeply concerned that the Belarusian authorities have failed to take meaningful action to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and of the ILO supervisory bodies to comply with Conventions Nos 87 and 98. The authorities have not cooperated with the ILO on the article 33 action plan, refusing an ILO tripartite mission to the country.

We deplore the ever-worsening repression of trade unionists and workers for exercising their fundamental labour rights, as reported by the BKDP. Trade union leaders and labour activists continue to be harassed, detained, monitored by the police, restricted in movement, and forced to flee the country.

We are extremely concerned for the well-being of the 39 Belarusian trade unionists still imprisoned under severe conditions, including forced labour and without access to or communication with their lawyers or families.

We urge the authorities in Belarus to immediately and unconditionally release trade unionists imprisoned for exercising their fundamental labour rights, including the ILO Governing Body member Mr Aliaksandr Yarashuk, who has been detained since 2022 under inhumane conditions, and Ms Palina Sharenda-Panasiuk, held incommunicado since January 2024.

We thank the Office for beginning to implement the article 33 resolution action plan by convening the High-Level roundtable on freedom of association in Belarus, which gathered United Nations Special Rapporteurs to provide in-depth perspectives on the situation and encourage further collective action in the ILO and the broader United Nations system. We encourage the Office to identify additional measures to expand and amplify such collective action.

We again urge the Belarusian authorities to fully cooperate under the article 33 resolution, particularly by: permitting an ILO tripartite mission to visit imprisoned trade unionists; cooperating on the appointment of a special representative of the Director-General to supervise all action related to implementing the Commission of Inquiry recommendations; and taking all necessary steps for prompt, effective implementation.

We also encourage all ILO Member States and social partners to continue taking all possible measures in accordance with the resolution adopted under article 33, including ceasing all relations that the Belarusian authorities can leverage against workers and freedom of association, and respecting the principle of non-refoulement for exiled Belarusian activists and trade unionists and their families.

Government member, Pakistan – We welcome the continued cooperation between the ILO and the Government of Belarus in working towards the implementation of the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations. Dialogue and engagement are essential for addressing concerns and promoting labour rights. We urge all parties to engage in constructive dialogue. The tripartite approach is essential for addressing concerns and enforcing labour rights. There is a need to explore creative solutions to overcome any remaining challenges. We commend and encourage the Government of Belarus to continue its collaboration with the ILO, emphasizing the importance of cooperation, and we hope that the measures taken will be given due consideration.

Observer, International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) – A year has gone by since the time when the Conference adopted a resolution on Belarus. This was a resolution related to the application of article 33 in relation to Belarus as a result of the infringement of the right to the freedom of association. New facts of violations have been established and they speak for themselves. However, despite the seriousness of the consequences of this evolution, the Belarusian Government is rejecting any constructive proposal that has been put forward by the Governing Body. Instead of cooperation and attempts to resolve the situation, the Belarusian Government, with the help of the FPB that it controls, is trying to convince the whole world that, as a result of the adoption of this resolution, the ILO has introduced economic sanctions against Belarus and they are describing this as political pressure on Belarus. Statements to that effect are simply an attempt to mislead everyone. Yes, sanctions have been introduced against Belarus, but in fact they were introduced for completely different reasons long before the adoption of the ILO resolution. This is an attempt to evade responsibility for the destruction of independent trade unions in Belarus and the imprisonment of dozens of trade union leaders and activists. This behaviour by the Government of Belarus can only lead to further escalation and it is absolutely not in the interests of the workers of Belarus. We hope that the Government will now take concrete steps to resolve this very serious situation. We fully abide by the proposals from the ILO and its Governing Body, including the recommendations that have been made by the Commission of Inquiry, as well as the conclusions of the Director-General. We call for the immediate exclusion of all trade unionists from the list of terrorists and extremists. We also call for urgent access to be given to medical staff to examine Mr Yarashuk, Mr Berasneu, Mr Areshka and Mr Fiadynich, whose health is at risk today. Further we call for more active use to be made of cooperation between the ILO and the United Nations. The shared utilization of special procedures, such as communications, urgent appeals, press releases, site visits by special rapporteurs or moderators from neutral countries, is a first step towards de-escalation. Further, we believe that we need to create a joint working group of the ILO and other United Nations bodies to work under the auspices of article 33 and to develop a clear mechanism for information to be provided by Member States on the measures taken with reference to resolution on Belarus, including annual reports for consideration by the Governing Body in March.

Observer, IndustriALL Global Union (IndustriALL) – It is unfortunate that the situation of human and trade union rights is continuing to deteriorate in Belarus. Just last week, at the ILO tripartite High-Level roundtable on freedom of association in Belarus, the case of Belarus was characterized as being “catastrophic” due to severe violations, as a general wave of unprecedented repression has affected the country. Unfortunately, the Belarusian Government refused to participate in that important event, thus missing the opportunity for constructive dialogue.

I want to draw your attention to the deplorable situation of trade union members and activists who are in jail. Over the last two decades, the Government of Belarus has gradually criminalized trade union work. Now, over the last four years, this level of criminalization has been escalated even further, and as a result independent trade unions, three of them are affiliates of IndustriALL, have been disbanded. Along with this, many union members and activists, including leaders of our affiliates, have been taken to prison on far-fetched and fabricated grounds.

About 40 union leaders and activists remain in jail. Their situation is very precarious. Bad health conditions, psychological pressure and various kinds of mistreatment have been reported. Independent trade union leaders and activists, recognized as political prisoners, must wear special yellow tags on their cloths as a sign to encourage abuse by prison staff.

Those who have served their terms and have been released, afterwards remain pariahs in society. They have no right to access their previous jobs.

The Belarusian Government continues to disseminate fear throughout society and is trying to retaliate against every single person allegedly involved in peaceful protests, even if they did not participate in person. Those who have tried to express their solidarity with protesters or alleviate the situation of people in jail or their families and have made financial donations for this purpose are now also subject to reprisals.

We want to remind the Committee that for years we have supported the right of our affiliates in Belarus to receive international solidarity. The ILO Commission of Inquiry made it clear as a recommendation. Not only has this right been denied, but even domestic support is also now considered a crime in Belarus.

The Belarusian authorities are now targeting those who make donations. Solidarity funds are treated as “extremist formations”. It is reported that at least 77 people are known to have been convicted for donations under article 361-2 of the Criminal Code – financing an extremist formation.

We regret to state once again that the situation in Belarus remains catastrophic. Belarus must remain under the very strict scrutiny of the ILO and other United Nations agencies unless we see clear steps by the Government.

And the very first step must be to have access to the trade union activists and leaders who are currently in jail, as well as their urgent and unconditional release with the reinstatement of all civil and political rights. We want to make sure that they are alive and healthy. We expect and demand this immediately. Our access to them must be ensured immediately.

Observer, Building and Wood Workers’ International (BWI) – In July 2022, the Supreme Court of Belarus liquidated the BKDP and its affiliates: the BNP, founded in 1991, the Radio Electronic Workers Union (REP Union), founded in 1990, the Free Trade Union of Belarus (SPB) founded in 1991 and, finally, the Free Trade Union of Metalworkers, founded in 1995. At the same time, the Government declared the BKDP and all independent unions “extremist organizations” and terminated their activities after arresting their leaders and activists.

In the period from March to August 2023, the Supreme Court of Belarus rejected three supervisory complaints filed by the Free Trade Union of Metalworkers, the Free Trade Union of Belarus and the BNP in relation to their liquidation by the Supreme Court in July 2022. In the case of the BNP, the Supreme Court considered that there was no violation of the law by the court of first instance. In the case of the Free Trade Union of Metalworkers and the Free Trade Union of Belarus, the Court considered that the representatives of both organizations lacked the authority to file a complaint because, according to national legislation, the liquidation of a legal entity terminates the power of attorney issued by that legal entity. Thus, the forced termination of the trade union’s activities excludes the possibility of the trade union representative appealing against the decision of the court.

These cases of the simultaneous liquidation of trade union organizations, when the Government declared independent trade unions as extremist organizations and thus delegitimized their activities since their foundation, and the lack of the possibility for trade unions to appeal against such liquidation, results in there being no legal mechanisms for trade unions and their members to protect their fundamental right to freedom of association.

Given the current situation in Belarus, workers are being denied their fundamental right to establish and join the union of their choice, and the absence of legal mechanisms to protect freedom of association is a pressing issue. It is therefore imperative for the ILO to act swiftly, implementing the action plan and developing further action on the resolution concerning the measures recommended by the Governing Body under article 33 of the ILO Constitution on the subject of Belarus.

Observer, International Union of Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers' Associations (IUF) – Much has been said here already about the persecution of trade union leaders and participants in trade union action in Belarus. We would like to make special mention of the situation of the relatives and families of repressed trade union members. Having lost their sources of income, many families have found themselves in a difficult financial situation. But they are forbidden from accepting humanitarian aid, even in the form of food packages.

Back in 2001, Belarus introduced an authorization procedure for receiving foreign aid. This ban on international trade union solidarity was one of the first violations of freedom of association. Today these restrictions have been strengthened. Individual recipients of humanitarian aid are prosecuted and punished with fines many times the amount of the humanitarian aid which they receive. The United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights called this practice a violation of a basic human right – the right to food. As a union of food workers, we call upon the Government to immediately lift these restrictions.

For many years Belarus has remained in the focus of ILO attention. For several years in a row, we have heard from the Government that this attention is a manifestation of disrespect to Belarus as a Member State of the ILO. We cannot agree with this. The efforts that the ILO and its Members have made to help normalize the labour rights situation in the country are probably unprecedented.

Unfortunately, over the years, the Government has refused to recognize these efforts and has consistently violated the very basic principles on which our Organization was founded. This demonstration of disrespect culminated in the arrest of a member of the ILO's Governing Body, Aliaksandr Yaroshuk.

In response to calls to release trade union leaders, we hear figures about tens of thousands of collective bargaining agreements concluded at the enterprise level. But these figures are not impressive. They simply do not matter. As long as there is at least one trade union activist under arrest in the country, everything written in these agreements will remain an empty declaration.

Therefore, once again we call on the Government of the Republic of Belarus to respond to the calls for a review of the application of article 33. To do this, it is necessary to demonstrate in practice its commitment to ILO principles. As a first, obligatory step, release the member of the ILO Governing Body, Aliaksandr Yarashuk, and other trade union activists.

Many concrete proposals have been made here, the implementation of which would allow us to speak of some progress in respecting and fulfilling fundamental workers' rights in Belarus. We do hope that the Government will take this opportunity to report on concrete steps to the ILO Committee of Experts for consideration already in its next session.

Observer, Public Services International (PSI) – I am afraid that I will also have to repeat a few things that have been said already here, but the situation demands our views. So first I want to state that I adhere to what my previous colleagues and previous speeches have said about the situation in Belarus and address the deeply troubling situation regarding the treatment of trade unionists and other activists in the country. The persecution and unjust imprisonment of trade unionists is a flagrant violation of international labour standards and human rights, and this ongoing repression calls for urgent and assisted action by the ILO and its Member States.

In 2020, our colleagues in the health sector, in various hospitals across the country, wanted to improve their working conditions for their own good and for the good of the patients, after observing the disastrous management of the pandemic by the Government of Belarus. But soon after, these individuals were targeted solely for their legitimate trade union action, facing accusations that lacked any credible basis. Now, they still remain in prison serving time in a penal quarantine or under house arrest.

The severe penalties and inhuman treatment that they are enduring reflect the broader behaviour by the Belarusian authorities to stifle any trade unionism and to suppress any form of association in the country. Such actions, as we all know, are a direct contravention of Convention No. 87.

So, I also call on this Committee to unequivocally denounce these egregious violations. We must send a clear and strong message to the Belarusian Government that the Member States and constituents of the ILO will not tolerate such blatant disregard for fundamental labour rights.

Moreover, the Belarusian Government must take concrete steps to address all the concerns raised by the ILO to ensure full compliance with these obligations under Convention No. 87. This includes ending the harassment and accusation of trade union leaders, guaranteeing their rights to freely associate and organize and enforcing an environment in which labour rights are generally respected.

In conclusion, I hope that this Committee will reaffirm our collective commitment to protecting the rights of workers and trade unions everywhere, and that we stand in solidarity with our colleagues in Belarus and will work tirelessly to ensure that justice prevails and that the principles of the ILO are upheld worldwide.

Government representative – I thank you for the opportunity to speak again to outline the position of the Government of Belarus.

First and foremost, I would like to thank the representatives of countries that have expressed support for Belarus. Your support is very important for us. We see that Belarus is not alone in defending its right to independent development. What you have said gives us the hope that, when assessing the situation in Belarus within the framework of this Committee, an objective and properly thought through approach will be taken.

On the other hand, we categorically disagree with a number of politically biased statements that have been made here by our opponents. Such statements are totally groundless. They are focused on the idea of creating some kind of information arena here, internationally, that can be used to justify the baseless and illegal sanctions that Western countries have applied to the Republic of Belarus. The ILO is just another mechanism that is being used to exert pressure on Belarus. We are fully convinced that the ILO should distance itself as much as possible from any such actions.

Today we have heard assertions that throughout the period when we have had these recommendations from the Commission of Inquiry, the situation in Belarus has only got worse in terms of compliance with ILO Conventions. But that is very far from the truth. I have already said that the supervisory bodies of the ILO have repeatedly commended what has been done by the Government of Belarus. For instance, in 2009, in conclusions adopted by this Committee, it was noted that progress had been made by the Government of Belarus in giving effect to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. The direct contacts mission, in Minsk in 2014, commended the work done by the tripartite social partnership bodies in Belarus and noted that there was trade union pluralism in the country. As a result of that, proposals were put forward to organize a whole package of measures focused on further upgrading the work of the tripartite social partnership bodies in the country, developing collective bargaining processes, as well as mechanisms for resolving trade disputes. All of these proposals were successfully put into practice by the Government of Belarus working with the ILO.

In 2015, as a result of the implementation of recommendation No. 2, we introduced changes to our legislation and we removed the requirement for at least 10 per cent of workers in an enterprise for a trade union to be created, and that is a measure that was very much commended by the Committee of Experts at the time. These positive steps resulted in a situation in which, in 2017, Belarus for the first time was not included on the short list of the Committee and consideration of the issue of application of Convention No. 87 in the country simply became part of the regular reporting regime. As a result, for four years, from 2017 to 2021, the question of compliance by Belarus with Convention No. 87 was not considered by this Committee. It is clear that such changes in the approach to the consideration by the ILO of the “Belarusian question” would not have been possible unless serious steps forward had been taken by the Government, and unless those steps had been positively commended by the supervisory bodies. All of this shows the absurdity and groundless nature of the situation that has now arisen with reference to the article 33 action against Belarus.

I would like to emphasize that the serious and systemic work that is being done by Belarus to develop social dialogue and tripartism has not been done so that we can look good in the eyes of the ILO. This is rather part of our domestic policy, it is enshrined in the Constitution of the country and in the Presidential Decree adopted on 15 July 1995, Decree No. 278 on the development of social partnership within the Republic of Belarus. We are convinced that only by working together, the State, employers and workers working together, is it possible to achieve balanced and stable socio-economic development for our country, and to develop our society. I reject all doubts and criticisms as to the legitimacy of our tripartite bodies. Such allegations are entirely baseless. We are also accused of supposedly not giving new information to the Committee, and just repeating our old arguments. But that is not the fault of the Government of Belarus. We have been compelled again and again to explain our position because it has not been appropriately taken into account.

For instance, when it comes to the Government of Belarus, again we have been accused of holding some people responsible supposedly for their trade union activities, participation in peaceful demonstrations and so on. We simply reject that. No one in Belarus is held to account in criminal terms for any lawful activity they undertake. Trade unions in our country have a lot of rights, to participate in establishing socio-economic policy, collective bargaining, and to defend the interests of workers. However, if citizens participate in illegal mass rallies or if they undertake other activities that are against the law, then they must feel the weight of the law. After all, it is one law for everyone. And it is true, that some citizens are indeed serving sentences or being punished, but that is not because of their trade union activities. It is not because of any legitimate or peaceful exercise of civil rights and freedoms. All of those who are being punished have been found criminally responsible, and information on that has been given to the ILO. Attempts by our opponents to say that what has been done is that they have been punished simply for exercising trade union rights are just not true and are just a manipulation of the facts. I have already referred to what has happened in Belarus since 2020, where we have seen the illegal interference of a number of Western countries in the internal affairs of our country. We have seen efforts to support violent demonstrations, extremist activities that threaten the good order of our country. We have seen that all of those involved have been brought to book and are indeed being appropriately punished.

We have therefore seen that people have not been held responsible for trade union activities, but that they have been held responsible for criminal activities, and that being the case, all those who break the law have to be punished. To try to say that that is not what is happening is highly irresponsible. I would emphasize that all of these cases have gone before a court. There has been evidence, there has been proof of what has happened, and indeed it could not be any different in a democratic State based on the rule of law. I have already referred to what happened in 2020 and the role of the BKDP. This Congress was involved in criminal, extremist activity. It was focused on discrediting the country, destabilizing the situation in the country and, despite that, it continued to exist, but it no longer reflects in any way the interests of the workers of our country. And yet, the bodies of the ILO seem to take account of its grievances and complaints. Sadly, on the basis of the false information provided, an argument is created that supports the stepping up of pressure on Belarus. We do not accept that. We categorically reject it. We consider that the ILO, workers and employers need to start genuine dialogue with those who, today, are genuinely upholding tripartism in Belarus. The Government of Belarus and the social partners, that is to say, the FPB and also the confederations of employers and workers, are ready to enter into constructive interaction with the ILO. By giving into the arguments put forward by the opponents of Belarus in recent years, the ILO has ended up taking biased, politicized decisions focused against the interests of Belarus and its people. But the ILO is a very special Organization. It is focused on something quite different. It is always being a champion of dialogue and cooperation. That is one of the underlying principles of this Organization, and the Government of Belarus, for its part, is interested in finding things that can bring us together and continuing an open, constructive dialogue with the ILO in the interests of our society and our State. However, in order for there to be such a dialogue, ILO bodies and its tripartite constituents have to be interested in playing fairly by the rules, recognizing what is really happening today, listening to what is being said by the Government of Belarus, and taking our national interests into account. We will not allow anyone to intervene in our domestic affairs, to undertake a policy that is focused on destabilizing our country and our development, on damaging the welfare and the well-being of our people; we will always reject that and stand up for our own independence and sovereignty. Anti-Belarus decisions by the ILO are simply getting us nowhere, and instead of this approach we need to take a new approach in which we can actually create trust and confidence working together in the interests of the development of social and labour relations in our country. We call on all the tripartite participants and supervisory bodies of the ILO to take just such an approach. We stand ready for honest and equal dialogue.

In conclusion, I would like to note one further point. You have all heard the discussion here this morning. You have all heard what has been said, and I think no one in this room thinks that, on the issue of Belarus, today, there has been any consensus. We have heard a lot of statements in support of Belarus, and of course there have been some who have spoken against us, so it is my view that that is something that has to be reflected in the minutes of this meeting. The position of Belarus has been put forward, but in fact there has been no consensus, and I would certainly call on the ILO and this Committee to refrain from policies intended to exert pressure on Belarus, but rather to seek to cooperate with us in accordance with the fundamental principles of the ILO.

Worker members – We have listened to the interventions and thank everyone for those interventions. And we draw particular attention to the grouped statements by Governments which, in themselves, already represent over 45 governmental expressions of support for the need to address the violation of workers' rights in the context of the article 33 measures adopted by the Conference last year. And let us not forget the specific individual governmental interventions which also expressed their support. Thus, a lot of governmental support was expressed.

Regrettably, what I have witnessed here today is the same unhelpful approach by the Government of Belarus already taken in previous years.

Contrary to what the Government claims, there is no plot against the Government of Belarus. The Government is the one that has eradicated independent unions in Belarus and imprisoned trade union leaders.

The Government of Belarus has repeated its comments, but they do not correspond to the reality of the lives of workers in Belarus, or indeed that of our Belarus trade union colleagues who are in exile.

It is worth noting that the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the Rights to Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and of Association recalled, during the high-level roundtable, that full enjoyment of freedom of association was essential to democracy and society as a whole. This freedom is not respected in Belarus. The Special Rapporteur also emphasized that, in view of the centrality of freedom of association, it was therefore essential that trade union activities and work was not stigmatized. Indeed, workers' rights and freedom of association are human rights. Also, at the same roundtable, the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the Independence of Judges and Lawyers was clear that the rule of law was necessary to ensure freedom of association in practice. She expressed concern at recent legislation in Belarus which tightened Government authority over the legal profession and the judiciary.

It is obvious to everyone that there has been absolutely no progress on the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and of the supervisory system. We fully endorse the ILO's action plan to implement article 33 measures with respect to Belarus.

In conclusion, we call on the Government to accept a tripartite mission to assess the situation and to meet imprisoned (and released) unionists. The Government must immediately accept an international humanitarian mission to ensure that independent doctors can visit imprisoned trade unionists, Messrs Yarashuk, Beresneu, Areshka, Fedynich, and so on, to assess their health.

Belarus must implement, in law and practice, the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and the recommendations of the supervisory bodies in that regard, as a matter of utmost urgency.

In line with the action plan, we call on the ILO Director-General to ensure that there is continuous interaction with United Nations human rights' bodies to implement jointly mechanisms of special procedures, including notes, reports, visits (for example rapporteurs or ambassadors from neutral countries to trigger de-escalation) and also to set up a working group of ILO and other United Nations institutions.

The ILO must also collect information on the measures that Member States have undertaken under the article 33 resolution.

We note that the forced exile of trade unionists for their legitimate trade union activities is a daily reality. We therefore call on ILO Member States to respect the principle of non-refoulement to ensure that trade unionists forced into exile are not returned to Belarus, where they may be subject to arbitrary arrest and torture. They should assist Belarusian citizens residing in their countries who may not have valid travel documents due to their inability to receive consular services.

We call on the ILO Director-General to appoint a special envoy to interact with governments and United Nations agencies to ensure the implementation of the article 33 resolution.

We must conclude by recalling that, according to the article 33 resolution, our Committee is to hold, at our future sessions, a special sitting on Belarus until Belarus fulfils its obligations.

We urge the Government of Belarus to engage constructively with the ILO so that at the next sitting we can see some light at the end of this very dark tunnel of the systematic violation of trade union rights in Belarus.

Employer members – The Employers' group thanks the various speakers who took the floor for their interventions and the information provided, of which we have taken full note.

We reiterate that ILO Conventions Nos 87 and 98 are fundamental Conventions which therefore require special consideration by the ILO, governments, workers and employers. The Employers wish to stress once again that we strongly condemn non-compliance with ratified ILO Conventions Nos 87 and 98.

The Employers recognize signs of the Government's willingness to cooperate with the ILO on issues concerning the implementation of ILO Conventions Nos 87 and 98. We recommend the Government of Belarus to receive as a matter of urgency an ILO tripartite mission with a view to gathering information on the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and the recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies.

We recommend the Government to engage with the ILO with a view to implementing the recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies and to report to the ILO about the measures taken.

In conclusion, we count on the cooperation of the Government of Belarus in full respect of ILO Conventions Nos 87 and 98 in law and practice. The Employers' group stands ready to constructively support this process.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee held a special sitting on the application by Belarus of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), further to the resolution adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 111th Session, concerning the measures recommended by the Governing Body under article 33 of the ILO Constitution calling on Belarus to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and the supervisory bodies.

It noted the oral and written information submitted by the Government, and the discussion which followed.

The Committee noted with deep concern the persistent disregard of the guidance, conclusions and recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, the supervisory bodies and the Governing Body by the Government of Belarus and refusal to accept and implement them.

The Committee expressed its deep concern and regret at the use of criminal sanctions against trade unionists engaged in legitimate trade union activities and the judicial harassment of trade union members, including arrests, prosecution and imprisonment. It deplored the repression against independent trade unions and the imprisonment of trade unionists and urged the Government to immediately release them, drop any charges and quash any convictions brought against them.

It recalled that this case had been discussed repeatedly in the Committee before the appointment of a Commission of Inquiry, and deeply deplored the lack of progress towards the observance of the Conventions by the Government of Belarus.

The Committee noted the action plan to implement the article 33 measures. It also noted actions taken by the ILO constituents and other international organizations in response to the ILC 2023 resolution on Belarus to review their relations with the Government of Belarus and take appropriate measures to ensure that the Government of Belarus cannot take advantage of such relations to perpetuate or extend the violations of workers' rights in respect of freedom of association and collective bargaining referred to by the Commission of Inquiry. The Committee called on ILO constituents and other international organizations to continue to do so.

Pursuant to information submitted to the Governing Body and to the Committee, the Committee deeply deplored the climate of state violence, intimidation and fear in Belarus which is not conducive to the free exercise of civil liberties, the continuing deterioration of freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining and the erosion of the rule of law exemplified by the complete lack of independence of the judiciary.

The Committee took note of the March 2024 Governing Body action plan to implement the ILC 2023 resolution and the High-Level Roundtable to discuss freedom of association in Belarus, which took place on 28 May 2024 and evidenced the persistent general climate of non-respect for basic civil liberties necessary to the exercise of freedom of association.

The Committee called on the Government to take all possible measures with the greatest urgency to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and all subsequent observations made by the supervisory bodies of the ILO regarding compliance with the Conventions.

The Committee also requested the Government with the utmost urgency to accept:

- an international humanitarian mission to ensure that independent doctors can visit all imprisoned trade unionists to assess their health and offer medical assistance, as necessary; and
- an ILO tripartite mission to assess the situation and visit trade unionists that are currently in prison or detention.

Considering the need of permanent and continuous monitoring of the situation in Belarus, the Committee expected that the ILO Director-General would appoint a special envoy in Belarus shortly and mandate her or him to interact with the Government and relevant UN agencies to ensure the full implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

In line with the Conference resolution, the Committee expected that the Director-General would engage with UN Human Rights Bodies and other relevant international bodies with a view to ensuring coordinated and joint action towards the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and the supervisory bodies and to explore the possibility of setting up a working group of the ILO and other UN institutions.

The Committee expected that the Office would continue collecting information on measures that Member States have undertaken the Conference resolution and, as requested, include such information in reports to the supervisory bodies and Governing Body of the ILO, including measures to:

- respect the principle of non-refoulement to ensure that trade unionists forced into exile in their countries are not returned to Belarus where they may be subject to persecution, arbitrary arrest and torture;
- assist Belarusian citizens residing in their countries who may not have valid travel documents due to their inability to receive consular services, and to facilitate the issuance of tourist visas to Belarusian citizens persecuted for their trade union activities and their relatives, as appropriate.

The Committee expected that the special envoy would systematically and regularly report to the Governing Body which will assess what further steps are necessary to be taken by the Government or by the ILO and its Member States. The Committee further recalled that the Government should provide a detailed report to the Committee of Experts before its next session on all measures taken to implement these recommendations in order to ensure observance of the Conventions in law and in practice.

Finally, the Committee decided to include the discussions and conclusions of the special sitting in a separate part of its report.

Chairperson – I see the delegate of Belarus. Ambassador, you have the floor.

Government representative – As far as I understand, and all members of the Committee understand also, the work of the Committee on the Application of Standards is regulated by Part 4 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference. According to article 35 of Part 4 of the Standing Orders, provisions of this part of the Standing Orders shall apply to all committees appointed by the Conference, except as otherwise provided. Article 42 of the Standing Orders in particular provides, I quote, “the Committee shall make every effort to take its decision by consensus, which is characterized by the absence of any objection presented by a member, as an impediment to the adoption of the decision in question”. The lack of consensus is as defined, is an objection by a member of the Committee. In case of objection by more than one member of the Committee, consensus could not be declared. The discussion during the CAS special sitting on Belarus, which took place on 5 June, clearly demonstrated the lack of consensus both in assessment of the policy of the Government of Belarus, as the situation in the labour and social sphere in my country, as well as the lack of consensus on the measures to be recommended by the CAS to Belarus.

About half of the statements call on the ILO and the Committee to avoid politicization in interaction with Belarus, which could then become a dangerous precedent and a negative trend within the organization. Some members of the Committee also opposed imposition of politically motivated demands to the Government of Belarus and expressed concern that such measures could have negative impact on the interests of Belarussian workers and employers.

The conclusions on Belarus submitted for adoption today, do not adequately reflect these aspects and misleads the International Labour Conference. This document, provisions of which are formulated in line with the position only of a part of the Committee, could not be presented as a consensus of all the members of the CAS.

As there is an obvious lack of consensus, my delegation asks for the rules of procedure to be strictly followed and request to put to a vote the conclusions of the CAS special sitting on Belarus. I also urge members of the CAS to vote against the non-consensual conclusion.

Chairperson – Before giving the floor to the other delegations who expressed their will to do so, I would like to refer to the ILC Standing Order, article 42 – which has been mentioned by Madam Ambassador – which states that it is my duty as President, and the Chair of this Committee, to make every effort for the Committee decision to be taken by consensus. The consensus does not mean unanimity. As indicated in the ILC Standing Orders it is characterized by the absence of any objections presented by the delegate as the impediment to the adoption of the decision and the questions.

Having said that, I wish to recall that since the Committee has been adopting conclusions on the country cases it has always – with no exception – adopted its conclusion by consensus, with divergent views systematically fully reflected in its report.

In the light of the prevailing view expressed during the Committee's discussion and also on the understanding that the Government's position will be fully reflected in the report, may I take it that the Committee is ready to adopt the conclusions displayed on the screen?

I give the floor to the distinguished Ambassador of Belarus.

Government representative – As far as I understand, the conclusion itself is not consensual because in the conclusion itself, there is no reflection of the position and the different approach of, not only my delegation, not only Government, not only workers and employers from Belarus, but of a number of delegations, a number of members of the CAS. During the consideration of the case, some delegates requested the voting on the decision.

Chairperson – Now I give the floor to the distinguished representative of the Russian Federation.

Interpretation from Russian: Government member, Russian Federation – The Russian Federation fully supports the assessment which has just been expressed by the representative of the Republic of Belarus about the conclusions of the special session. The Russian Federation does not support these conclusions, does not join a consensus on these conclusions and therefore supports the request of the Republic of Belarus that this document be submitted to a vote.

Chairperson – I give the floor to the distinguished representative of the Syrian Arab Republic.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Syrian Arab Republic – The Syrian delegation would like to welcome what Belarus has said, we commend Belarus for submitting all the information to the Committee. We support the request made by Belarus to have a vote on the conclusions.

Chairperson – I give the floor to the distinguished representative of China.

Interpretation from Chinese: Government member, China – One week ago, we attended the discussion of this Committee on the case of Belarus, and apparently after the discussion, no consensus has been reached. According to our understanding, many tripartite constituents do not agree to today's draft conclusions, and we fully support the Government representative of Belarus, and we support the motion to vote.

Chairperson – I give the floor to the distinguished representative of Nicaragua.

Government member, Nicaragua – Nicaragua aligns itself with the statement made by the distinguished delegation of Belarus and supports the request to put the conclusions to a vote. We also reiterate and urge that this case not be politicized.

Chairperson – Any other request for the floor? I give the floor to Eritrea.

Government member, Eritrea – As we have discussed on 5 June, Belarus has made a lot of effort in improving the situation by having many organized trade unions and, in the meantime, having more than 10,000 collective agreements. This positive engagement is very good as has been said. So, if that is the case then I think the CAS has to give another chance to Belarus, and if that does not work – then I think – we support the Belarusian representative to proceed with voting today.

Chairperson – I give the floor to the representative of the Plurinational State of Bolivia.

Government member, Plurinational State of Bolivia – On behalf of the Plurinational State of Bolivia, we support the motion of the representative of Belarus to put the Committee's conclusions to a vote.

Chairperson – Having heard the previous statements, I would like to take a three minute break to allow Vice-Chairpersons to consult. I kindly request and call the Vice-Chairpersons to come to the podium.

Chairperson – After the consultations with the two Vice-Chairpersons I would like to stress that the view of the distinguished Government representatives are well noted, but I wish to recall that consensus is different from unanimity and therefore the Committee should be able to proceed on the basis of a clear and strong majority.

With this explanation may I therefore take it that the Committee would be ready to adopt the conclusions on the case of Belarus?

I give the floor to the distinguished representative of the Russian Federation.

Interpretation from Russian: Government member, Russian Federation – The provisions which govern the taking of decisions in the Committee were set forth in detail by the representative of the Republic of Belarus and they make it quite clear that a voting procedure can be held if there is no consensus and that means disagreement of one State or more, and if the request for a vote is made and then supported by at least one other delegation. Chairperson, what you are suggesting, that is consensus without consensus or consensus by a majority has been tried before I think in the Governing Body. We do not think this is a procedure which should be followed here or spread in this Organization. We think we should follow the rules for the adoption of decisions in the Committee which we have always had. We do not think we should proceed in any other way, and we will take the same attitude to any attempt to take a decision anywhere in the way you have just outlined.

Chairperson – Now I give the floor to the distinguished representative of China.

Interpretation from Chinese: Government member, China – First of all, voting in this Committee is in line with the Standing Orders of the Conference. Second, it is very obvious that through the discussion and consultation last week and also today on this case, no consensus at all forms has been reached. Third, we have already read the draft conclusions and it has not shown any achievements made by the Government of Belarus. They are very biased and they have been politicized. We reiterate our support for the motion to a vote.

Chairperson – Now I give the floor to the representative of the United Kingdom.

Government member, United Kingdom – Taking into consideration the discussion and the fact that this would be the first time, as you rightly pointed out, that the Committee's conclusions will be voted on in its 100-year history, the United Kingdom agrees with the esteemed Chairperson and Vice-Chairpersons that consensus has been reached and a vote is not necessary on these conclusions.

Chairperson – I give the floor to the representative of Belarus.

Interpretation from Russian: Government representative – The discussion of whether we should vote or not vote has shown that there is no consensus on the case of Belarus. I would like to say to the United Kingdom delegation one thing, look carefully at the history of the ILO, there have been votes in this Committee before, so it is not the first time, it is not about the circumstances being unique. Votes are not prohibited here; they are covered in the Standing Orders of the ILO and of the Committee. This may be something which is unusual, but it needs to be done.

Chairperson – I give the floor to the representative of Saudi Arabia. The floor is yours.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Saudi Arabia – My delegation took note of the content of the Report of the Commission of Inquiry. We do appreciate the efforts deployed by Belarus in achieving the full implementation of the Committees' recommendation. We do also appreciate the information provided by the delegation of Belarus. We do appreciate as well, the engagement of Belarus with the ILO in sanctioning social dialogue with partners. The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia would like to reaffirm that everything that is related to improving the working conditions shall be addressed within the spirit of a constructive dialogue with all stakeholders and actors. At the end we would like to encourage Belarus to continue working on achieving the full compliance with the Conventions that it has ratified, and we ask the ILO to continue providing technical assistance to Belarus in that matter.

Chairperson – Despite protracted attempts of myself and the two Vice-Chairpersons to seek convergence or flexibility, I note with disappointment that no consensus has been reached through tripartite dialogue. Subsequently I decide, in agreement with the two Vice-Chairpersons, to proceed with a vote by show of hands. In view of the preparation of this vote, I propose a ten-minute technical break.

I give the floor to the United States.

Government member, United States – We appreciate the Chairperson's efforts to continue to seek consensus and we would just like to raise a question here to those delegates that have put forward the request for a vote. We have heard one delegate say that a voting procedure can be held but we would like to ask, should it be held? We have heard one delegate say that this needs to be done, but we would like to question whether it really needs to be done. Instead, we would respectfully ask those delegates calling for a vote to reconsider their call for a vote in favour of respect for the well-established working methods of this Committee.

Chairperson – I give the floor to Belgium.

Government member, Belgium – I speak on behalf of the European Union and its Member States. We attach great importance to the decision being taken by consensus, the long-established practice of the Committee. Therefore, we share the concern of the United Kingdom and the United States about the necessity of a vote to be called for, as only a minority of members of the Committee had called for the vote. We also appreciate all efforts made by the Chairperson and the Vice-Chairpersons in order to reach a consensus.

Chairperson – I now give the floor to the distinguished representative of Australia.

Government member, Australia – The normative and supervisory role of the ILO is at the core of its mandate. The international labour standards that we, as Member States, choose to ratify are backed by a supervisory system that is unique at the international level. The supervisory system is in the DNA of the ILO. Australia strongly encourages Belarus to accept the Committee's conclusions. To move to a vote would be a regrettable modern precedent and break with the established practice to make every effort for the Committee to make its decisions by consensus. We encourage all Member States to respect the findings of the Committee and not take any action to jeopardize its independence and critical role.

Chairperson – Are there any other delegations wishing to take the floor? I give the floor to the distinguished Ambassador of Belarus.

Interpretation from Russian: Government representative – I am grateful to you for your efforts and for the consultations which you have held in what is a very difficult situation. We have heard the appeals not to put this question to a vote but we feel that the Committee should follow the Standing Orders and the rules of procedure. The lack of a consensus on this matter is only too clear and, therefore, we would like to confirm our request, which has been backed up by several other delegations, to put this question to a vote.

Chairperson – After the break we will continue with the voting procedure. So the meeting is adjourned.

Chairperson – As I announced before the break, now we continue to proceed with the vote by show of hands.

(vote by show of hands)

Chairperson – I will announce the results of the vote on adoption of the conclusions for Belarus. The votes cast were as follows:

For: 1,272 votes

Against: 52 votes

Abstentions: 64 votes

The required quorum having been attained, the conclusions are adopted.

These results have been established after verification of the voting rights in the Workers' group.

In the light of these results the conclusions are adopted.

Chairperson – We have now completed the adoption of all the conclusions of the individual cases discussed by our Committee. I give the floor to the representative of Belarus.

Interpretation from Russian: Government representative – The decision on the conclusions has been taken. However, the conclusions reflect inaccurately and in a distorted manner the assessment and interpretation of the position of the Government. The Government and our employers and workers have several times said that we were ready to cooperate with the ILO on a non-politicized basis. Unfortunately, that has been ignored. Instead of a non-politicized dialogue, what we see is demands being made of our Government which are tantamount to political ultimatums. The Government of Belarus will not accept that. The question of the appointment by the Director-General of a Special Envoy to Belarus reflects attempts by a group of Western countries to set a precedent within the ILO of a special country procedure and to use it as another way of exerting pressure against my country. Today's conclusions are a precedent for dealing with awkward or un-submissive governments. The conclusions are also continuing the attempt to drag Member States and international organizations into a politically biased campaign of western sanctions against Belarus. The conclusions have distorted the assessment of the action of my Government and are inaccurate as to the alleged repression against trade union activity; they ask our country to change its legislation on a politicized basis. The issue of making it easier to give visas to those who have broken Belarusian law is a cynical attempt to overlook the fact that it is at the initiative of Western countries that flights from and to Belarus were grounded, making it impossible to get visas to Belarusian citizens or for western citizens to travel to Belarus. This is a cynical attempt to apply double standards. We do not support these conclusions. We believe there is politically biased manipulation of the ILO. We, therefore, urge others to reject the conclusions as well. To conclude, the Belarusian authorities and the tripartite delegation of Belarus will nevertheless be happy to cooperate with the ILO on a non-politicized basis.

Chairperson – Distinguished representative of Workers, Vice-Chairperson you have the floor.

Worker members – The Worker members deeply regret that the conclusions for this case have been adopted by a vote. This goes against the working methods and the practices followed by our Committee for several decades. This vote does not add any value.

I recall that our Committee does not have the binding means to force a government to accept the conclusions adopted. Our work is based on dialogue and persuasion. I invite all governments to respond to the conclusions of our Committee in an open and constructive spirit.

Chairperson – I give the floor to the delegation of Kazakhstan. Ambassador, you have the floor.

Government member, Kazakhstan – We regret to see that the Committee has not reached consensus and dialogue, communication and cooperation should remain the main principle of the Committee's work. The Government of Belarus has demonstrated openness to cooperate with social partners and with the ILO on the implementation of the recommendations of the Committee. However, we note that despite engagement attempts by the ILO supervisory bodies there are still outstanding issues identified by the Committee. We encourage the Government of Belarus to take the appropriate and necessary measures to ensure compliance with its obligations under the ILO Conventions and to continue to cooperate with the ILO supervisory bodies.

Chairperson – Are there any other requests to take the floor? The United States, you have the floor.

Government member, United States – I am speaking on behalf of the Governments of the United States and Canada. We deplore that a vote was called today. This vote is unprecedented. Never before in the almost one-hundred-year history of the Committee, has a vote been taken on the adoption of conclusions. This vote was unnecessary, the conclusions were proposed jointly, by the Workers' and Employers' groups, who together represent two thirds of the voting weight of this Committee. The United States and Canada hold the work on the Committee on the Application of Standards in the highest regard, as do so many of us assembled today. It is a critical element of one of the oldest and most well-respected supervisory systems in the world. It is a unique feature in the multilateral system, providing a platform for governments, workers, and employers to share perspectives and guidance on how Member States might improve their efforts to comply with their obligations under international labour Conventions they have ratified. We condemn, in the strongest terms, this disruption to the well-established working methods of this Committee, in furtherance of nothing more than an individual agenda, unrelated to enhancing implementation of international labour standards or protecting the rights of workers. We call on those Government delegates who insisted on this vote, to reconsider their careless resort to voting here and across the Organization. We implore our colleagues to respect our working methods and reconsider making use of well-established practice to make their views known for the record. We wish to emphasize that the vote today is an aberration, not a precedent and we call on all constituents of the ILO to respect the strong social dialogue that takes place in this Committee.

Chairperson – I now give the floor to the representative of the United Kingdom.

Government member, United Kingdom – The United Kingdom, like many of us in this room, is deeply dismayed that a vote has been called here today. We have discussed the situation vis-à-vis workers' rights, especially as regards Conventions Nos 87 and 98, in Belarus extensively, at several sessions of the Governing Body, at the International Labour Conference and also during the high-level round table this year. Reams of information have been provided by independent experts that has allowed us to analyse this case in great depth and in good faith. Article 33 sanctions were invoked last year, for only the second time in ILO history. Again, after a great deal of considered discussion, the esteemed Worker and Employer spokespersons have drafted these conclusions without involvement from Government. In the spirit of consensus and in respect of the ILO supervisory system and its working methods, we should have adopted these conclusions as drafted without a vote. At future sessions of the Committee, the United Kingdom strongly urges all members to adopt the conclusions, as drafted by the spokespersons, by consensus to allow the effective functioning of the ILO supervisory system which correlates directly to the fulfilment of the ILO's mandate of promoting social justice and internationally recognized human and labour rights.

Chairperson – Now I give the floor to distinguished representative of Australia. The floor is yours.

Government member, Australia – Australia deeply regrets that we were forced into a vote today in the Committee and the disruption to the well-established working methods of this Committee. Today's unfortunate action should not be seen as a precedent. As I said earlier, the normative and supervisory role of the ILO is at the core of its mandate and we encourage all Member States to respect its findings.

Chairperson – Now I give the floor to the distinguished representative of Belgium.

Government member, Belgium – I am speaking on behalf of the European Union and its 27 Member States. The Committee is a crucial pillar of the ILO supervisory system and embodies the core values of the ILO based on social dialogue and tripartism. It enables all constituents to discuss the implementation of ILO Conventions in a constructive, respectful, and tripartite manner. We very much regret that not all decisions could be adopted by consensus this year, thus going against the long-established practice of our Committee. Nevertheless, we are pleased to have reached concrete conclusions which will provide guidance on the way forward to effectively implement international labour standards in law and practice. We are looking forward to a constructive engagement with the ILO Office and the tripartite constituents in the follow-up of the conclusions of the Committee.

Annex

Director-General's report on the latest development regarding the situation of freedom of association in Belarus and compliance with the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry established to examine the observance by the Government of Belarus of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98)

Introduction

At its 350th Session (March 2024), the Governing Body took note with growing concern of the information provided in document GB.350/INS/10\(Rev.1\); urged the Government of Belarus to submit to the Director-General all information on the measures taken to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry by 15 April 2024 for transmission to the Committee on the Application of Standards; and requested the Director-General to prepare an updated report to inform the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 112th Session (2024) of the Conference of the latest developments. The Governing Body also once again urged the Government of Belarus to receive as a matter of urgency an ILO tripartite mission with a view to gather information on the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and subsequent recommendations of the supervisory bodies of the ILO, including a visit to the independent trade union leaders and activists in prison or detention. The Governing Body took note of the action plan to implement the resolution concerning the measures recommended by the Governing Body under article 33 of the ILO Constitution on the subject of Belarus. Pursuant to the action plan, the ILO was to convene a High-Level Roundtable to discuss Freedom of Association in Belarus. At the same session and after the adoption of its above-mentioned decision, the Governing Body adopted the 406th report of the Committee on Freedom of Association¹ which also examined measures taken by the Government of Belarus to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. On that occasion, the Committee deplored the continuing deterioration of freedom of association in the country, the total lack of progress in implementing the recommendations of the 2004 Commission of Inquiry and the failure of the Government to address the outstanding recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies and the conclusions of the Governing Body.

Information provided by the Government

By a communication dated 9 April 2024, the Government transmitted information on the measures taken to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry which has been made available in full on the Committee on the Application of Standards website.² The Government once again reiterated that recommendations 1–8, 11 and 12 have been implemented, while recommendations 9 and 10 do not fully meet national security interests. The Government further reiterated that it was ready to cooperate with the International Labour Office on issues concerning the implementation of Conventions Nos 87 and 98, provided that account is taken of present day realities and national interests, at the forefront of which are the stable socio-economic development of the Republic, the well-being and high quality of life of the Belarusian people, social harmony, the unshakeable foundations of democracy and the rule of law, and the country's independence, territorial integrity and sovereignty.

Information provided by the Belarusian Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (BKDP)

By a communication dated 17 May 2024, the BKDP provided information on the implementation by the Government of Belarus of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.³ According to the BKDP, it is currently impossible for independent trade unions and their members to carry out their activities legally; anyone who associates with independent trade unions and carries out trade union and human rights activities is subject to criminal liability under the following provisions of the Criminal Code: section 193-1 on "unlawful organization of the activities of a public association, religious organization or foundation or participation in their activities", punishable by a fine and/or restriction of freedom or imprisonment for up to two years; section 361-1 on "establishment of or participation in an extremist group" punishable by a fine and/or restriction of freedom or imprisonment for up to six years; and section 361-4 on "facilitating extremist activities", punishable by a fine and/or restriction of freedom or imprisonment for up to seven years.⁴

The BKDP informed of a judicial decision of 28 March 2024 by which all information materials and paraphernalia of Salidarnast (an organization founded by Belarusian trade union leaders and activists who were forced to leave the country after the liquidation and repression of democratic trade unions in 2022) were declared extremist and included in the Republican List of Extremist Materials. Salidarnast provides humanitarian, informational and legal support to trade union members and labour movement activists. The legal consequences of declaring all information materials and paraphernalia of Salidarnast as extremist is their ban in the territory of Belarus. The distribution, production, storage or transportation of these materials, as well as interaction with the organization which produces them, including subscribing to its social networks, is punishable, under section 19.11 of the Code on administrative offences, by a maximum penalty of administrative arrest of up to 30 days. The BKDP also referred to a number of administrative detentions and arrests of trade unionists.

The BKDP indicated that as of 7 May 2024, more than 50 trade unionists were under criminal persecution and provided a list of 39 trade unionists currently imprisoned, as well as a list of 21 trade unionists who were released but not exonerated and on whom additional restrictions were placed pursuant to the legislation in force (prohibition from leaving the city/country without police permission, an obligation to report to a police station on a weekly basis, ban on certain professional activities, control and surveillance of bank accounts, etc.). The BKDP also informed that in January 2024, Mr Aliaksandr Yeudakimchyk, leader of the Free Trade Union of Metalworkers (SPM), died after a long illness and alleged in this respect that persecution for carrying out trade union activities and numerous administrative arrests had an extremely negative impact on Mr Yeudakimchyk's health.

The BKDP further indicated that since its last communication the following new criminal cases were opened, and new sentences rendered. On 4 March 2024, a new criminal case was opened against Mr Leanid Soudalenko, labour lawyer and activist of the Belarusian Union of Radio and Electronic Workers (REP Union), under section 361-4 of the Criminal Code. Fearing persecution, he was forced to flee Belarus and thus cannot exercise his right to defence.

Ms Volha Brytsikava, leader of the Belarusian Independent Trade Union (BNP), charged with “inciting racial, national, religious or other social hatred or discord” under section 130(1) of the Criminal Code was sentenced to three years of imprisonment on 5 April 2024, after a trial behind closed doors. In addition, a new criminal case has been opened against her under section 361(1) of the Criminal Code entitled “calls for restrictive measures (sanctions) and other actions aimed at harming the national security of the Republic of Belarus”, which carries a maximum penalty of six years of imprisonment and a fine. The BKDP further described disciplinary sanctions and ill-treatment of several imprisoned trade union leaders by the administration of penal colonies; these included placement in isolation cell, removal of the right to receive visits, phone calls and parcels and not allowing meetings with lawyers.

The BKDP also referred to the case of Ms Palina Sharenda-Panasiuk, an activist of the Belarusian Union of Radio and Electronic Workers (REP Union).⁵ It indicated in this respect that since January 2024, there had been no contact with the activist and that during this period, a lawyer was refused access to her on three occasions. On 19 March 2024, the UN Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) requested the Government of Belarus to urgently take temporary measures to protect Ms Sharenda-Panasiuk. On 22 March 2024, State media (Belarus 1) broadcast a video featuring the activist, and in which the CEDAW request was mentioned; she did not look well and there was a yellow tag on her uniform, which identifies labour movement activists and political prisoners.

According to publicly available information after having fully served her sentence, Ms Sharenda-Panasiuk was due to be released on 21 May 2024. Instead, she was transferred to a detention centre and a new (third) criminal case was opened against her. She was charged for the second time under section 411(2) of the Criminal Code entitled “malicious disobedience to the demands of administration of the correctional institution” (previously her sentence was extended by one year under the same provision of the Code).

High-Level Roundtable

The High-level roundtable to discuss freedom of association in Belarus took place on 28 May 2024, as part of the action plan adopted in March 2024 by the Governing Body to implement the ILO Conference Resolution. By a communication dated 23 May 2024, the Government indicated that it would not participate in the event.

Three UN Special Rapporteurs participated in the roundtable – Ms Anaïs Marin, Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Belarus; Ms Gina Romero, Special Rapporteur on the Rights to Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and of Association; and Ms Margaret Satterthwaite, Special Rapporteur on independence of judges and lawyers.

Ms Marin indicated that while the situation of human rights was never satisfactory, following presidential elections in August 2020, it became catastrophic, with violations of freedom of association being a massive part of a general wave of repression. She pointed out that while peaceful demonstrations of August 2020 were accompanied by arbitrary arrests of thousands of protesters, their detention and disappearances, the crackdown on independent trade unions began two years later, in 2022, with the liquidation of the BKDP and arrests and imprisonment of its leaders and activists despite their offers for dialogue. Enterprises that did not have any unions were instructed by the Government to create them, undermining any semblance of independence. In these circumstances, the remaining organizations and trade unions, as well as any newly created ones, were under State control and lacked independence from the Government. Ms Marin also referred to the situation of those who were forced into exile and called on ILO Member States to respect the principle of non-refoulement as most would be subject to arbitrary arrest and torture if returned to Belarus. She described the conditions of detention of trade unionists, who, together with political prisoners were forced to wear yellow labels. She had collected testimony that the identification of these prisoners in this way resulted in their being harassed and intimidated, put in overcrowded cells, denied timely medical treatment, placed in isolations for long periods, denied the right to communicate with family and lawyers, and were subjected to forced labour. Some activists were pushed to ask for pardon and to beg for clemency, yet, contrary to implied promises, were not released. Being identified as political prisoners meant that these imprisoned trade unionists were not able to qualify for a pardon. Their relatives experienced threats. Ms Marin called on ILO Member States to facilitate the issuance of tourist visas to Belarusian citizens persecuted for their trade union activities and their relatives. Another issue that needed to be addressed was how Belarusians could continue to reside abroad with an expired passport following the discontinuation of consular services to renew and obtain passports.⁶ Going back to Belarus to obtain a new passport or renew an old one put them at risk of arrest.

Ms Romero recalled that full enjoyment of freedom of association was essential to democracy and the society as a whole and that it was therefore essential that trade union activities and work should not be stigmatized. In this regard, she emphasized that workers' rights and freedom of association are human rights and there was therefore a collective responsibility to ensure an end to the violation of these rights. She called on ILO Member States to provide humanitarian assistance to the persons forced into exile and their relatives.

Ms Satterthwaite recalled that independence of judges and the judiciary was at the core of the rule of law and necessary to ensure freedom of association in practice. She expressed concern about instances where lawyers were disbarred for defending human rights and trade union activists as this clearly undermined the ability of those accused to have meaningful representation in the cases brought against them. Noting recent legislation in the country which tightened government authority over the legal profession, she observed that the situation on the ground had given rise to a disturbing context of political interference with the administration of justice, the absence of an independent bar association, systemic violations of the right to a fair trial, and the use of criminal law to punish trade unionists for the exercise of basic rights and to dissolve independent trade unions.

Other participants expressed regret that the Government representatives did not participate in the event and has, so far, dismissed the pathways offered by the Governing Body. It was unfortunate that the Government politicized the issue to shirk its responsibility and claimed that the adoption of the resolution by the International Labour Conference was aimed at promoting sanctions against it. It was observed by some that no sanctions have so far been imposed pursuant to article 33 of the ILO Constitution in addition to those that were already in place prior to the adoption to the resolution.

It was observed that this event had importantly brought together several of the pieces of the international system and demonstrated the interconnectedness of their work. This should provide impetus for further reinforcement and collaboration to achieve their respective mandates. Referring to the various conclusions across the United Nations system, including the recommendations of the Universal Period Review, it was observed that there was a general international consensus that widespread violations of workers' rights occurred in Belarus. Declaring trade union activities and publications extremist, rendering any person associated with independent trade unions, including by consulting their social media accounts, a target for persecution made it impossible to exercise one's freedom of association rights. Governments had expressed interest in reflecting on how better they can coordinate their actions to give effect to the article 33 resolution.

While the trade union movement affirmed that it had never politicised this matter and rather favoured a constructive approach to get beyond this impasse, this could only occur if the Government cooperated with the ILO and took steps to ensure that trade unionists were not treated as criminals. All steps need to be taken to ensure their immediate release. Independent trade unions should be given space so that real tripartite discussions can be resumed in the country.

Communication of the BKDP

Additional Information of the Trade Union Association “Belarusian Congress of Democratic Trade Unions” (TUA BKDP) on Implementation by the Government of the Republic of Belarus the Recommendations of the ILO Commission of Inquiry

In the period from February 2024 Belarus systematically has continued to fail to take measures to address the Recommendation of the Commission of Inquiry appointed under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO and recommendation provided annually by the Committee on Freedom of Association. Violations have not only not been addressed, but have worsened with the existence of the State campaign of persecution of leaders and activists of workers’ movement following the 2020 presidential election.

Currently, it is impossible for independent trade unions and their members to carry out their activities in the Republic of Belarus legally. Anyone who associates himself or herself with independent trade unions and carries out human rights, activist and other activities for the realisation of trade unions' goals is subject to criminal liability inter alia under articles 193–1 of the Criminal Code of the Republic of Belarus (hereinafter – the CC) “Unlawful organisation of the activities of a public association, religious organisation or foundation or participation in their activities” in form of the penalty, or restriction of freedom, or imprisonment for the term up to two years; 361–1 “Establishment of or participation in an extremist group” in the form of the penalty, or restriction of freedom, or imprisonment up to six years; 361–4 “Facilitating extremist activities” in the form of the penalty, or restriction of freedom, or imprisonment up to seven years. The information about the persecution of some members and activists of independent trade unions and working movement was not intentionally included in the Information due to the unreasonable risk of increased persecution, including a threat to life and health. Therefore, there is a deliberately limited by the Government opportunity of TUA BKDP to provide information to the ILO as well as inaccuracies in the information provided.

State-run repressions against leaders and activists of workers’ movement as well as against independent trade unions have continued by the following:

1. As of 7 May 2024 more than 50 trade union and labour leaders and activists are under criminal persecution.

There are two categories of persecuted persons: who are imprisoned (in the form of imprisonment [“лишение свободы”] and restriction of freedom [“ограничение свободы”] and who are released but non-rehabilitated. The identification of the second category is due to the fact that serving a sentence does not mean the absence of restrictions on the rights of the convicted person.

The factual ground for criminal persecution (regardless of the crime charged) of workers’ organizations’ activists and leaders is their workers’ organizations’ activities and enjoyment of the freedom of association, freedom of expression, and freedom of peaceful assembly protected by the ILO Conventions and the International Bill of Rights.

The fact of the release does not negate the fact of previous illegal prosecution and violation of the above rights by the Government. Moreover, Belarusian national law provides for a system of restrictions on the rights of those who have served their sentences, which is adapted in its most severe form specifically to those crimes that the workers’ organizations’ activists and leaders are charged with. All persons released on so-called extremist or terrorist charges while serving a sentence (two years per crime for a less serious crime and five years per crime for a serious crime) are subject to additional restrictions according to Belarusian national law under “preventive observation” procedure and inclusion in extremists and terrorists lists, inter alia:

- (1) They are prohibited from leaving the country and even the city without police permission.
- (2) They are checked at their place of residence under a video recorder with their signature on the papers several times a day and even at night.
- (3) They have to appear at the police station once a week for preventive measures.
- (4) The actual ban on specific kinds of professional activities applies to them, including public service positions, educational activities, etc. (until the criminal record is expunged (on average 2–5 years after serving the sentence (depending on the crime incriminated)) or removed and for 5 years after it).
- (5) Ban on organizing mass events (until the criminal record is expunged (on average 2–5 years after serving the sentence (depending on the crime incriminated))).
- (6) Their money accounts are controlled by special services up to the freezing of accounts.

The Government in administrative order (by the decision of the Ministry of Internal Affairs of the Republic of Belarus and the State Security Committee of the Republic of Belarus (KGB)) has approved lists of extremists and terrorists that include all those released. The basis for inclusion in the extremists and terrorist lists is an enforceable sentence (to which workers’ association activists and leaders are specifically sentenced). The procedure for release from these lists has not yet been determined by the government. Therefore, the Government imposes additional penalties on all persons released in a discretionary and extrajudicial manner thereby limiting their rights in contradiction to imperative international standards.

2. Recognition of all information materials and paraphernalia of Solidarnast e.V. as extremist materials. The decision on inclusion of them into the Republican List of Extremist Materials was adopted by the court of the Central District of Minsk on 28 March 2024.

Solidarnast e.V. was founded by Belarusian trade union leaders and activists, who were forced to leave the country after the liquidation and repression of democratic trade unions in 2022. Solidarnast e.V. The organization provides humanitarian, informational and legal support to trade union members and labour movement activists.

The legal consequences of recognition of all information materials and paraphernalia of Solidarnast e.V. as extremist materials is their ban on the territory of Belarus and the basis for bringing to administrative responsibility under article 19.11 of the Code of the Republic of Belarus on administrative offences (hereinafter - the CAO) “Distribution, production, storage, transportation of information products containing calls for extremist activities or promoting such activities” all those interacting with the organization, including subscribing to its social networks and distributing materials. The possible charge is inter alia an administrative arrest up to 30 days.

3. In January 2024, Aliaksandr Yeudakimchyk (SPM leader) died after a long illness. Persecution for carrying out trade union activities and numerous administrative arrests had an extremely negative impact on Aliaksandr’s health, taking into account his age (68 years).

4. Other facts of persecution (during the reporting period or that was unknown before) in the forms of:

Initiation of new criminal cases and sentencing

4.1. Persecution of Leonid Soudalenko (REP activist, labour lawyer).

On 4 March 2024, a new criminal case under article 361-4 of the CC “Facilitating extremist activities” for his trade union activities was opened in absentia against Leonid. The possible charges are restriction of liberty [“ограничение свободы”] for a term of up to four years or imprisonment [“лишение свободы”] for a term up to six years with or without a fine.

Due to well-founded fears of persecution, he was forced to flee Belarus and, therefore, cannot exercise his right to defence in this case: familiarization with the case materials and participation in the process is impossible outside of Belarus.

4.2. Persecution of Volha Brytsikava (BNP leader and activist and former worker of OJSC “Naftan”).

On 11 March 2024, the trial of Volha began behind closed doors. She was accused under article 130(1) of the CC “Inciting racial, national, religious or other social hatred or discord”.

On 5 April 2024, Volha was sentenced to three years of imprisonment. An appeal has been filed.

Additionally, a new criminal case has been opened against Volha on the basis of article 361(1) of the CC “Calls for restrictive measures (sanctions) and other actions aimed at harming the national security of the Republic of Belarus”. The possible charges are restriction of liberty [“ограничение свободы”] for a term of up to five years or imprisonment [“лишение свободы”] for a term of up to six years with or without a fine.

4.3. Persecution of Ihar Fiodarau (workers movement activist).

Ihar was detained on 27 February 2022 and sentenced to two years of imprisonment under article 368(1) of the CC “Insulting the President of the Republic of Belarus” on 25 May 2022.

Persecution while serving a criminal sentence, expressed in torture, restriction of rights and psychological violence

4.4. Persecution of Artsiom Zharnak (chairperson of the primary SPM organisation, former worker of MAZ who was sentenced to four years of imprisonment under articles of the CC: 342(1) “Organisation and preparation of actions that grossly violate public order, or active participation in them”; 361(3) “Calls for restrictive measures (sanctions) and other actions aimed at harming the national security of the Republic of Belarus”; 361–1(1) “Establishment of an extremist formation or participation in it” on 13 October 2022).

Administration of the Penal Colony No. 1 (Navapolatsk) artificially creates situations where Artsiom is subject to disciplinary sanctions:

- Artsiom has been deprived from short visits from 29 February 2024;
- In March 2024, Artsiom was placed in a punishment cell [“ШИЗО”] for 10 days;
- From April 2024: (1) Artsiom’s monthly purchase of food by prisoners in the camp store was deprived of 6 basic ones (according to the general regime), leaving 2 basic ones; (2) Artsiom was deprived of telephone calls with relatives.

4.5. Persecution of Palina Sharenda-Panasiuk (REP activist who was sentenced to one year of imprisonment under articles of the CC: 411(2) “Malicious disobedience to the requirements of the administration of a correctional institution executing a sentence of imprisonment” on 10 September 2023 and under 364 “Violence or threat of violence against an internal affairs officer”, 369 “Insulting a representative of authority”, 368 “Insulting the President of the Republic of Belarus” on 9 June 2021).

In March 2024 it was known about ongoing persecution of Palina by the administration of the Penal colony No. 24 (Zarečča): Polina stayed in the detachment after quarantine for about

2–3 weeks. At the end of January-early February she was thrown into a punishment cell [“ШІЗО”]. She appeared in the detachment only at the very end of February, looking very pale and thin. All this time, Polina was in the punishment cell [“ШІЗО”], probably for 20 days. At the beginning of March, Polina disappeared from the detachment again, but where exactly is unknown.

Since January 2024, there has been no contact with Palina. During this period, a lawyer was not allowed to see her three times.

On 19 March 2024, the UN Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) requested Belarus to urgently take temporary measures to protect Palina.

On 22 March 2024, State media (Belarus 1) broadcasted the video with Palina after the CEDAW request (it was mentioned in the video). Polina looked bad in the video and on her uniform there was a yellow tag, which in the colony discriminately identifies labour movement activists and political prisoners.

4.6. Persecution of Siarhei Shelest (Rabochy Rukh, BNP Naftan activist who was sentenced to 14 years of imprisonment under articles or the CC: 188 “Defamation”, 356(1) “Treason against the State”, 361–1(3) “Creation of an extremist formation or participation in it” on 17 February 2023).

In January 2024, Siarhei was transferred from the Penal Colony No. 15 (Mahiliou) to the Penal Colony No. 2 (Babruysk).

Administration of the Penal Colony No. 2 (Babruysk) artificially creates situations where Siarhei is subject to disciplinary sanctions:

- At the end of February 2024, Siarhei was placed in a punishment cell [“ШІЗО”] for 45 days;
- Siarhei is deprived from visits and parcels (only food parcels are allowed);
- On 1 May 2024, Siarhei was placed in cell-type premises (“помещение камерного типа”) which implies more severe restrictions on rights than punishment cell [“ШІЗО”].

4.7. Persecution of Aliaksandr Mishuk (BNP Vice-chair, chair BNP Belaruskali who was sentenced to 2,5 years of imprisonment under article 361 of the CC “Calls for restrictive measures (sanctions) and other actions aimed at harming the national security of the Republic of Belarus” on 15 November 2022).

Administration of the Penal Colony No. 15 (Mahiliou) artificially creates situations where Aliaksandr is subject to disciplinary sanctions:

- In January 2024, Aliaksandr was placed in a punishment cell [“ШІЗО”] for ten days;
- In February 2024, Aliaksandr was placed in a punishment cell [“ШІЗО”] for ten days.

4.8. Persecution of Aliaksandr Kapshul (Rabochy Rukh, BNP Naftan activist who was sentenced to 15 years of imprisonment under articles of the CC: 295(2) “Illegal acts with regard to firearms, ammunition and explosives”, 356(1) “Treason against the State”, 361–1(3) “Creation of an extremist formation or participation in it”) and his relatives.

At the start of 2024, Aliaksandr was transferred from the Penal Colony No. 15 (Mahiliou) to the Penal Colony No. 2 (Babruysk) and then the regime for serving his sentence was tightened: he was transferred to the Prison No. 4 (Mahiliou).

Oksana Kapshul (Aliaksandr’s Kapshul former wife) was detained in January 2024 during mass detention in relation to trade unions and political activists and their relatives in Polotsk and Novopolotsk. She was sentenced on 30 January 2024 for subscription on extremist materials under article 19.11 of the CAO "Distribution, production, storage, transportation of information products containing calls for extremist activities or promoting such activities"; on 29 February 2024 – under article 25.15(2) of the CAO "Violation of legislation on foreign gratuitous aid".

Administrative detentions and arrests

4.9. Persecution of Kyril Barstok (BNP, OJSC "Naftan").

Kyril was detained at the end of March 2024 and sentenced to 25 days of administrative arrest under articles of the CAO: 19.11 "Distribution, production, storage, transportation of information products containing calls for extremist activities or promoting such activities", 24.23 "Violation of the procedure for organizing or holding mass events".

4.10. Persecution of Alena Vinakurava (BNP, OJSC "Naftan").

Alena was detained on 23 January 2024 during mass detentions in relation to trade unions and political activists and their relatives in Polotsk and Novopolotsk.

4.11. Persecution of Eugene Mikhlovsky (BNP).

On 12 December 2023, Euheni was sentenced to 15 days of administrative arrest under article 19.11 of the CAO "Distribution, production, storage, transportation of information products containing calls for extremist activities or promoting such activities".

Mass detentions of workers on the enterprises during their working days with cooperation with administration of the enterprises:

4.12. On 15 March 2024 there were detentions of workers of PUE "Rinaplastik" (Shchuchin) in relation to the distribution of extremist materials.

4.13. On 31 January 2024 there were detentions of 5 workers of OJSC "Glassworks "Neman" (Neman Glass Factory) in relation to the distribution of extremist materials.

4.14. In January 2024 there were detentions of about 10 workers of OJSC "Shchuchinagrokhimservice" in relation to the distribution of extremist materials.

4.15. In January 2024 there were detentions of as minimum of 4 workers of enterprises in Motol.

Searches at the premises of trade unions and labour activists

4.16. On 8 January 2024, a search was carried out in Novopolotsk at the place of registration of Naftan strike participant Aliaksei Malinovsky.

Sincerely, Acting Chairperson of the BKDP
Maksim Pazniakou

IV. Information and discussion on the application of ratified Conventions (individual cases)

The Committee has adopted short, clear and straightforward conclusions. Conclusions identify what is expected from governments to apply ratified Conventions in a clear and unambiguous way. Conclusions reflect concrete steps to address compliance issues. Conclusions should be read with the full minutes of the discussion of an individual case. Conclusions do not repeat elements of the discussion or reiterate government declarations which can be found in the opening and closing of the discussion set out in the Record of Proceedings. The Committee has adopted conclusions on the basis of consensus. The Committee has only reached conclusions that fall within the scope of the Convention being examined. If the Workers, Employers and/or Governments had divergent views, this has been reflected in the Committee Record of Proceedings, not in the conclusions.

Algeria (ratification: 1962)

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98)

Written information provided by the Government

The Government notes the comments of the Committee of Experts, which emphasize that Algeria regularly provides detailed information in reply to the observations made by trade unions, and in reply to the Committee's recommendations.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention

The principles of the Convention are enshrined in the Algerian Constitution of 2020 and the labour legislation, allowing trade union organizations to exercise their rights freely. The revised Constitution of 2020 reaffirms these principles, including protection against discrimination, freedom of expression, the right to organize and the right to strike.

The labour laws of 1990 set out the rights of representation, collective bargaining, workers' participation and the free exercise of the right to organize without discrimination. Moreover, Algeria has made significant progress in relation to social dialogue, collective bargaining and respect for fundamental labour rights, and it regularly complies with its reporting obligations in accordance with its international commitments.

With regard to the allegations of anti-union threats and dismissals affecting persons who claim to be affiliated to the Trade Union Confederation of Productive Workers (COSYFOP), it is important to note that this Confederation and its three affiliated organizations (the SNSTF, SNSAE and SNSCDPP) have ceased all trade union activities since 1991.

In its reports on the effect given to the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association (communication No. 224 of 14 April 2024), the Government has regularly provided information on the COSYFOP and its affiliated organizations, indicating that they have never provided the necessary information for the assessment of their trade union representativeness or the renewal of their executive bodies.

As the complainants have not provided any proof of their status as members, these allegations are without legal standing. The Government therefore calls for the closure of all the cases related to complaints by the alleged trade union leaders and delegates of the COSYFOP.

Sections 133 to 147 of Act No. 23-02

In accordance with sections 133 to 147 of Act No. 23-02, the labour inspection services received 32 complaints from trade union delegates during the course of 2023, of which 26 were in the public sector and six in the private sector.

Following the registration of these complaints, the labour inspectorate undertook 32 investigations with employers, resulting in five warnings, three compliance notices, four violation reports and two situation reports.

The action taken by labour inspectors led to the retraction of four penalties imposed by employers, including the cancellation of a dismissal. Moreover, 24 complaints were found to be without merit by the labour inspectors responsible for the investigations. Sixteen other complaints were made by trade union delegates to conciliation offices, resulting in 15 reports of the failure of conciliation, and one complaint is still being processed.

Act No. 23-02: The protection of trade union leaders during the period of the registration of the union

Act No. 23-02 contains provisions protecting trade union leaders and members against discrimination and reprisals, thereby ensuring a conducive environment for their activities from the holding of the constituent general assembly of the union. It includes enforceable measures against any hindrance to the establishment or operation of a trade union. Any person who hinders these processes is liable to a sentence of imprisonment of between three and six months and a fine of between 50,000 and 100,000 Algerian dinars (section 156).

The Government is prepared to examine complaints by trade union delegates in accordance with the legislation that is in force and to engage, where necessary, in consultations with the social partners to improve trade union representativeness and protection.

Section 8 of Act No. 23-02: Protection against interference

Act No. 23-02, in section 8, prohibits any external interference in the functioning of trade unions, except in the circumstances envisaged in the law, in order to protect their independence and autonomy. The exception provided for in section 8 is related to section 49, which provides that gifts and legacies from external sources are only acceptable with the prior agreement of the administrative authorities. The authorities verify the origin, amount and compatibility of these contributions with trade union objectives.

Sections 8 and 49 therefore guarantee that unions operate in full independence and in accordance with the law, by ensuring the legitimacy of financial contributions and maintaining the trust of the members.

Section 69 of Act No. 23-02

In response to the observations by the Committee of Experts concerning section 69 of Act No. 23-02, it should be noted that the criteria of financial transparency and political neutrality are requirements newly introduced by the Act.

In this regard, the Government wishes to specify as follows:

- The criterion of financial transparency was introduced with a view to ensuring the robust and transparent management of the financial resources of trade unions, including the contributions made by their members.

Under the terms of sections 46 to 49 of the Act, the resources of trade unions include the contributions paid by their members, income from their activities, gifts and legacies, and subsidies by the State and local communities. This income must be used solely for the objectives of the trade union and in accordance with the respective legal provisions.

Sections 50 to 52 set out the requirement for them to maintain their accounts in accordance with the commercial standards in force and to submit annually to the authorities their financial balances certified by an auditor and the report on their activities, as adopted by the General Assembly.

Accordingly, in order to meet this criterion of financial transparency, unions are required to comply with the above directives and rules, which are intended to ensure the integrity and credibility of the unions in their function of representing workers. They favour transparency of financial governance and ensure the appropriate management of trade union funds by requiring financial reports and compliance with the accounting and managerial standards in force.

Furthermore, this criterion is intended to strengthen the trust of members in their representative organizations and also contributes to the prevention of potential conflicts and disputes, which have often characterized the management of many trade unions and been brought before the competent jurisdictions.

- With reference to political neutrality, this criterion is intended to prevent any partisan political influence within trade unions, with a view to maintaining their independence and their capacity to represent in an equitable manner the interests of all their members.

This political independence of trade unions guarantees that the decisions taken really reflect the collective interests of the workers, irrespective of their political beliefs and affiliation, while at the same time respecting the political and partisan freedom of choice of each member, as set out in section 12 of Act No. 23-02, which provides that “the members of the trade union shall be free in an individual capacity to join political parties”.

Accordingly, the criterion of financial transparency and political neutrality are intended to ensure that representative trade unions use their financial resources exclusively for trade union activities in accordance with their statutes. That ensures that no financial resources are used for partisan political action.

- With reference to the voting strength in occupational elections, it should be noted that this provision responds to a claim put forward for several years by the unions active in the public service.

Section 35 of Act No. 90-14 on the procedures for the exercise of the right to organize, which has now been repealed, provided that: “Workers’ trade unions with a membership of at least 20 per cent of the total number of employees covered by the statutes of those trade unions and/or a representation of at least 20 per cent on the participation committee, where the latter exists within the employing organization concerned, shall be considered to be representative in the same employer entity.”

However, this option could only be used in public or private sector enterprises, as this body (the participation committee), composed of elected staff delegates, was not present in administrative establishments.

Accordingly, section 69 of the new Act offers an advantage to trade unions which cannot meet the criterion of the unionization rate of 25 per cent of the total number of salaried employees covered by their statutes, by enabling them to obtain the status of a representative union when they achieve the voting strength determined in the event of occupational elections in the employing organization (election of joint committees in public institutions and administrations).

The Government re-emphasizes that the draft text of Act No. 23-02 was subject to very broad consultation before being forwarded for approval.

In the first place, in 2022, a prior consultation was held with the trade unions registered at the national level, including 53 workers' organizations and 11 employers' organizations, with a view to gathering their proposals and views on the revision of the legal framework governing the exercise of trade union rights. A second consultation was then held with the most representative trade unions, which commented on the provisions of the Bill, with most of the comments being taken into account during its drafting.

The Government reiterates its commitment to inclusive and constructive social dialogue with a view to assessing the effectiveness of the measures introduced by law and improving the current legislation.

The Government takes due note of the observations made by the Committee of Experts and once again emphasizes that the draft text of Act No. 23-02 was subject to very broad consultation during all the stages of its drafting, adoption and promulgation.

That served to show that the exhaustive information requested through an electronic platform, provided exclusively by trade unions, makes it possible to achieve a better assessment, in a transparent manner, of the representativeness of a trade union.

With reference to the concerns raised, it should be noted that the information gathered is protected by law. It will in no event be shared with employers and cannot be used for the purposes of anti-trade union discrimination.

Renewal of the representativeness of trade unions

With reference to the number of reports received each year of refusal, renewal, and appeals and their outcomes, it should be noted that, as the Act is recent, and the majority of the mandates of trade unions have not expired, this information is not yet available.

Trade unions are currently engaged in the process of providing information for the assessment of their representativeness through the electronic platform, in accordance with Act No. 23-02 and Decree No. 23-359 of 17 October 2023, determining the procedures for the assessment of the representativeness of trade unions and the content of the statistical indicators of their membership.

Article 4 of the Convention: Promotion of collective bargaining

With reference to this recommendation, and in the event that the trade union does not have the information on which its representativeness is to be assessed, workers can elect their representatives directly for the purposes of collective bargaining and the settlement of collective labour disputes. Section 131 of Act No. 23-02 provides for protection against the dismissal or termination of these elected representatives.

Application of the Convention in practice

With regard to the provision of statistics on collective bargaining, the table below summarizes the evolution of the collective accords and agreements registered by the labour inspection services (2021–24).

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the Government representative of Algeria, the Director-General of Employment and Integration, to take the floor.

Government representative – I wish to affirm the Algerian delegation's full support in conducting the debates in a constructive manner, actively contributing to strengthening our Organization's supervisory body for the fair application of international labour standards.

Allow me at the outset to express my Government's surprise at seeing Algeria included in the list of individual cases when the Committee of Experts invited the Government to send its full replies in 2025. Algeria has constantly worked to strengthen workers' rights since it gained independence, by joining this Organization on 17 October 1962 and ratifying 45 international Conventions on the same date, of which eight are fundamental.

All of the Constitutions adopted by the country have enshrined the right to organize, from the provisions of the first Constitution of 1963. Articles 19 and 20 of this Constitution guarantee freedom of association, speech, public action and assembly, as well as the right to organize and the right to strike. These principles were reaffirmed in the 2020 revision of the Constitution, particularly in Articles 69 and 70, which include the principles of freedom of expression, assembly, association and the right to strike. In addition, the principles of the Convention are enshrined in the Algerian 2020 Constitution, and labour legislation allows trade union organizations to freely carry out their activities within the framework of the law.

It is thanks to these guarantees enshrined in the country's basic law and other legislation that workers exercise their rights, and have formed trade unions to defend their rights in the workplace and participate in social dialogue. Currently, the trade union landscape in Algeria comprises 166 trade union organizations, of which 100 are workers' and 66 are employers'. The rights of representation, collective bargaining, worker participation and the free exercise of the right to organize without discrimination have been enshrined in legislation since 1990.

Over the past five years, Algeria has undertaken major reforms of labour legislation and regulations to adapt to the significant changes and rapid developments in the world of work. In this context, two new Acts were enacted in 2023, both of profound importance: Act No. 23-02 on the exercise of the right to organize and Act No. 23-08 on the prevention and settlement of collective labour disputes and the exercise of the right to strike. These Acts represent a considerable change in the exercise of the right to organize and the right to strike, in line with the values and principles set forth in the country's Constitution and the international commitments arising from the Organization's Conventions ratified by our country, in particular the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and Convention No. 98.

The new Act No. 23-02 has introduced simpler and more flexible trade union registration procedures, with shortened processing times, and has enshrined the independence of these trade union organizations.

This new legislative framework dedicates a whole title to the protection of worker members of a trade union organization, protecting workers against all forms of discrimination and obstacles to the exercise of trade union rights.

Section 126 of Act No. 23-02 prohibits any decision that impedes the exercise of the right to organize, including decisions of dismissal or other disciplinary measures related to membership of a trade union organization or trade union activity.

As well as being able to freely join a trade union, this Act grants foreign workers and employers the right to hold leadership or administrative positions within the trade union organization.

The powers of the labour inspection services relating to protection of the right to organize, particularly the protection of workers and trade union representatives, have been strengthened by this Act, which also toughens criminal penalties against anyone who prevents trade union freedom.

With respect to reinforcing the mechanisms of social dialogue and collective bargaining, this Act has set out more efficient, consensual, balanced and effective mechanisms aimed at fostering a conducive climate for national economic recovery and the preservation of social peace. The new Act provides for measures that encourage the peaceful settlement of collective disputes by increasing the efficiency of conciliation, mediation and arbitration.

This new legislative framework was prepared and enhanced after consultation with some 64 trade union organizations in two stages, and drafted with the help of reputable experts and senior professionals in labour law, as well as with certain tripartite advisory institutions, such as the National Economic, Social and Environmental Council (CNESE) as a constitutional institution and the National Civil Society Observatory.

In addition, workers' and employers' organizations were also consulted during the examination of the Bills before Parliament in order to gather their views. These consultations took place in a spirit of good faith, trust and mutual respect, giving the trade unions sufficient time to express their views and discuss the texts carefully in order to improve their content.

In response to the observations and recommendations in the Committee of Experts' report, Algeria has made significant progress in the area of social dialogue, collective bargaining and respect for fundamental rights at work. It constantly fulfils its international obligations, including the submission of detailed reports by the set deadlines.

In response to allegations of threats and anti-union dismissals affecting organizations or persons reportedly affiliated to COSYFOP, it is important to note that this Confederation and its three affiliated organizations ceased all union activity in 1991. The Algerian Government regularly communicated information on COSYFOP and its affiliated organizations, pointing out that they never carried out any union activity. The organizations never provided the necessary information to assess their trade union representativeness or the renewal of their leaderships. As the complainant organizations did not provide any information proving their membership, these allegations are without any legal grounds. The Government therefore requests that all cases related to the complaints of alleged representatives or leaders of COSYFOP be shelved.

Concerning the implementation of procedures to protect employees against discrimination, the relevant statistical data of the labour inspection services show that 32 complaints were filed by union representatives in 2023. Further to the registration of these complaints, the labour inspectorate enjoys independence in conformity with Convention No. 81, ratified by Algeria, and launched 32 inquiries into employers' organizations, resulting in the issuance of five notices, three reports of refusal to cooperate, four reports of contraventions and two reports of offences. The steps taken by legally qualified labour inspectors led to the annulment of four decisions by employers to take disciplinary action, including the annulment of a decision of dismissal. Further, 24 applications were found to be without grounds and 16 further complaints were filed by trade union representatives with the conciliation offices, resulting in 15 reports of a lack of conciliation, while one complaint is still being processed.

With regard to the protection of union leaders and members during the union's registration period, the Act sets out provisions protecting them against discrimination and reprisals, thus ensuring a conducive environment for their activities as soon as the union's constituent general assembly is held. The Act includes punitive measures against anyone who impedes the establishment or functioning of a trade union organization. Any person impeding these processes is liable to imprisonment for three to six months and a fine of 50,000 to 100,000 dinars (section 156).

With regard to protection against interference, section 8 of Act No. 23-02 prohibits any external interference in the functioning of trade unions in order to protect their independence and autonomy. The exception therein refers to section 49, which stipulates that gifts and legacies from external sources are only acceptable with the prior agreement of the administrative authorities. This authority verifies that these contributions are in line with the union's objectives.

Regarding the criteria of financial transparency and political neutrality, these are requirements recently introduced by the Act being discussed, and on which the Government wishes to comment as follows: the criteria of financial transparency was introduced in order to ensure rigorous and transparent management of the financial resources of trade union organizations, and the integrity and credibility of trade unions in their representative function. These criteria aim to build members' trust in the representative organizations and help to prevent possible disputes or conflicts, which have often arisen in the management of many trade union organizations and been brought before the competent departments and jurisdictions. With regard to political neutrality, this aims to prevent any partisan political influence within trade union organizations, in order to maintain their independence and their capacity to represent the interests of all members equally. This political independence guarantees that the decisions taken by trade unions really do reflect workers' collective interests, irrespective of their political tendencies or leanings, while respecting the freedom of political and partisan choice of each member. Thus, the criteria of financial transparency and political neutrality aim to guarantee that trade unions utilize their financial resources exclusively for trade union activities in line with their statutes and ensuring that financial resources are not mobilized for activities associated with partisan politics.

With regard to voting strength in occupational elections, this measure responds to a claim put forward for several years by the trade union organizations active in the public service. Only enterprises in the economic sector could draw on this possibility, through the participative committee composed of elected staff representatives. Section 69 of the new Act therefore offers an advantage to trade unions which cannot meet the criterion of the unionization rate of 25 per cent of the total number of salaried employees covered by their statutes, by enabling them to obtain the status of a representative union when they achieve the voting strength determined in the event of occupational elections. In response to the concerns raised about the platform dedicated to representativeness, it is important to note that the information collected through this digital platform is protected by law. It will in no circumstances be shared with employers and cannot be used for anti-union purposes. The extent of the information requested through this platform, which is gathered exclusively by the trade union organizations, allows for trade union representativeness to be better and more transparently ascertained.

With regard to the renewal of the representativeness status of trade union organizations, it should be noted that, given that this Act is recent and contains transitional measures up to 2 May 2024, it has been in force for almost a month, and also that the majority of trade union section mandates have not yet come to term, this information is not yet available.

As for the promotion of collective bargaining, in cases where a trade union organization does not have the information necessary to determine its representativeness, workers may directly elect their representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining and the settlement of collective labour disputes. Section 131 of this Act provides protection against dismissal or removal of these elected representatives.

With regard to the submission of statistics on collective bargaining, the Government has regularly provided the relevant data and, on 19 May 2024, presented the latest developments in the number of agreements and collective agreements registered by the labour inspection services from 2021 to 2024.

In conclusion, the explanations and information provided in response to the comments made clearly show that since independence Algeria has worked consistently to enshrine the fundamental principles and rights at work, and will not stray from the path it is on.

Worker members – This is the first time that our Committee has been called upon to examine the application of the Convention by the Algerian Government. Nevertheless, the issue of the violation of trade union rights in Algeria is far from unknown to us and our Committee has already addressed its findings to the Algerian Government on numerous occasions in previous years, most recently in 2019.

We also recall that the Committee of Experts has for many years highlighted the shortcomings of the Algerian legislation, particularly with regard to the protection of workers against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference. In this context, the exercise of trade union freedoms by Algerian workers is effectively and durably compromised.

We take note of the adoption of Act No. 23-02 of 25 April 2023 on the exercise of right to organize. According to the Government, the Act would provide enhanced protection against acts of trade union discrimination, in particular by introducing a procedure for the worker subjected to discrimination to refer the matter to the labour inspectorate. In this context, labour inspectors have been granted enhanced prerogatives, in particular to conduct investigations and record infringements.

We also take note of the additional information sent by the Algerian Government in May 2024 that clarifies some of the new provisions of the Act. We note in particular that section 156 of the Act punishes obstruction to the formation or functioning of a trade union with a prison sentence of three to six months and a fine of 50,000 to 100,000 dinars. Nevertheless, in view of the numerous cases of anti-union discrimination regularly reported to the various ILO supervisory bodies, it is doubtful whether this provision will be applied in practice.

More generally, the legislation does not provide sufficient protection for workers. In this regard, we highlight the widespread employers' practice of dismissing the founding members of a trade union during its registration period, which in practice can take several years, without the latter benefiting from the protections afforded by the legislation against anti-union discrimination. Moreover, as highlighted by the high-level mission in 2019, certain enterprises and authorities excessively use judicial action against trade unions and their members. On the other hand, court rulings ordering the reinstatement of trade union leaders are yet to be given effect.

We recall that under Article 1 of the Convention, workers must enjoy adequate protection against all acts of anti-union discrimination in employment. Anti-union discrimination is one of the most serious violations of freedom of association since it can jeopardize the very existence of trade unions.

We urge the Government to adopt legislation, in consultation with the social partners, to strengthen the protection of workers against acts of anti-union discrimination, including during the period of registration of an established trade union. In this regard, we call on the Government to increase the penalties against employers who use anti-union strategies. We also call on the Government to improve and speed up administrative and judicial procedures to identify and remedy acts of anti-union discrimination. We further request the Government to look at ways to speed up the registration procedures of trade unions.

Finally, section 8 of Act No. 23-02, relating to protections against acts of interference, stipulates that gifts and legacies from external sources are only acceptable with the prior agreement of the administrative authorities. These authorities verify the origin, amount, and compatibility of these contributions with trade union objectives. We wish to recall that, pursuant to Article 2 of the Convention, workers' organizations must enjoy complete independence from employers in the exercise of their activities and that the public authorities must exercise extreme restraint with regard to any intervention in the internal affairs of trade unions. We urge the Government to remove this provision.

We note that the Committee of Experts expressed reservations about the conformity with the Convention of the provisions of Act No. 23-02 regulating the validation and maintenance of the status of representativeness of trade union organizations. In particular, it points out that this system could have negative effects on the development of industrial relations and collective bargaining in Algeria.

The Act defines in particular the criteria for the representativeness of a trade union organization. In addition to measuring electoral strength and the number of members, the Act stipulates that the financial transparency of accounts and political neutrality will also be taken into account. In this regard, we share the concerns of the Committee of Experts as to the impartiality and objectivity of these last two criteria.

We note the additional information sent to our Committee by the Government which provides some clarification. The criterion of financial transparency would aim to "ensure rigorous and transparent management of financial resources, including members' contributions, in order to ensure that they are used only for the objectives of the union, in accordance with the legal provisions". This vague and general wording could lead to interference by the authorities in the financial management of trade unions. As for the criterion of financial transparency, its objective and implementation remain unclear, to say the least.

We therefore echo the request of the Committee of Experts to consult the social partners on the modalities for the recognition of representativeness under Act No. 23-02, and to revise these criteria.

In addition, the Act imposes excessive conditions for the maintenance of the representative status of trade union organizations. The latter must obtain every three years a certificate issued by the administration after communication of information concerning their adhering members which, according to the Act, would make it possible to assess representativeness. This frequency seems excessive and likely to prevent the proper functioning of the trade unions.

Additionally, trade unions are legally obliged to provide the employer with information relevant to the criteria of representativeness, in particular the name and social security number of each member, the number and date of the membership card, and the contributions paid. This provision is also excessive and can lead to anti-union discrimination.

We consider that these new provisions constitute an infringement of the freedom of workers to form organizations without prior authorization, as well as undue interference in the internal affairs of workers' unions. We urge the Algerian Government to revise these provisions, in consultation with the social partners, in order to fully guarantee the rights of workers and trade unions, as protected by the Convention.

Finally, it appears that the legislation does not include provisions on the rights of minority trade unions. We reiterate the principle that where no union represents the percentage of workers required to be declared an exclusive bargaining agent, collective bargaining rights must be granted to minority unions, at least on behalf of their own members. We therefore call on the Algerian Government to adopt measures to this effect.

Employer members – The Employer members would like to thank the Government for the written and oral information shared with the Committee. Convention No. 98 is one of the ten fundamental Conventions of the ILO, which Algeria ratified in 1962. The Committee of Experts has made observations in this case six times since 1991, culminating in 2023. There was also a high-level mission that visited the country in May 2019. The Committee is examining this case for the first time.

By way of general context, we understand that Algeria is undergoing a reform process to modernize legislation on trade union status. In 2023, Algeria adopted two Acts in this regard, namely, Act No. 23-02, 25 April 2023, on the exercise of the right to organize and Act No. 23-08, 21 June 2023, on the prevention and settlement of collective labour disputes and the exercise of the right to strike.

We further note that these Acts actually came into force at the beginning of May 2024 and that the Committee of Experts raised concerns on the procedures and measures for protection against anti-union discrimination, and requested the Government to submit its comments in 2025. Notwithstanding the deadline granted to the Government to present comments on the implications of these Acts in respect of the effective recognition of the right to organize and collective bargaining, the Government was invited in advance of the indicated date by the Committee of Experts to provide us with comments on the issues at stake.

In its latest observations, the Committee of Experts requested the Government to take the necessary measures, on the basis of Articles 1, 2 and 4 of Convention No. 98, so that acts of anti-union discrimination are prohibited and effectively punished, that union representativeness is established objectively, and that collective bargaining is further promoted by the authorities.

In its response, the Government draws our attention to the following elements in particular: first, to the high-level mission which visited Algiers in May 2019 as part of the recommendations of the Committee relating to Convention No. 87, which extensively addressed the issue of anti-union dismissals. This situation is also being followed up by other ILO supervisory bodies. We further note the explanation for the impediment for COSYFOP and its affiliated trade union organizations, not being recognized as representative trade unions and as such, not being in a position to conduct collective negotiations.

Second, concerning the procedures for protection against anti-union discrimination, the Government provides explanations on the new procedure allowing a salaried worker, who considers him or herself to be the victim of an act of anti-union discrimination, to refer the matter to the labour inspectors, who now have enhanced powers to investigate and take further measures, including the referral to the competent courts if the employer refuses to comply.

Third, concerning the protection of trade union leaders and members against discrimination and reprisals during the procedure for recognition of a union, we understand that the Government is open to engaging in consultations with social partners to improve representativeness and union protection and overcome challenges exposed by the outstanding complaints of union delegates.

The Government provides explanations on the basis of the conditions of union representativeness, where political neutrality aims to prevent any political influence on union activities. It explains that this criterion must be understood in light of the historical context where Algerian unions, particularly in the 1990s, could not function independently. As for financial transparency, its aim is to ensure rigorous and transparent management of the financial resources of trade union organizations, including the contributions of their members. The accounts of unions must be certified by an independent and approved auditor, as is the case for any other organization. This obligation aims to ensure the integrity and credibility of unions in their function of representing workers.

Fourth, concerning the personal data of affiliates which must be transmitted in particular to renew the status of representative union every three years, the Government specifies that this data is encoded by the unions on a secure electronic platform and that under no circumstances can the employer access it. This platform is exclusively managed by the State, in absolute compliance with legislation on the protection of personal data. Therefore, the data cannot be a source of discriminatory decisions by the employer.

Finally, the Government provides a number of collective agreements and social agreements concluded since 2021 in sectors of activity and at company level.

The Employer members reaffirm the vital importance of the Convention for all ILO Member States, as a fundamental Convention. The right to organize and bargain collectively, for both employers and workers, is a prerequisite for ensuring the application of the ILO standards.

We insist that national laws and practices guarantee this fundamental right. Anti-union acts must therefore be punished severely and effectively by national legislation and practices. Governments must actively promote freedom of association and the right to bargain collectively by social partners.

The Employer members note that Act No. 23-02 of 25 April 2023 on the exercise of the right to organize raises some questions by the Committee of Experts where some challenges may require further action by the Government in the context of social dialogue. We observe, however, and we trust that the Government is open to engaging in consultations with the most representative organizations of employers and workers to overcome challenges where they exist.

Therefore, the Employer members call on the Government to continue on the path of social dialogue and to honour the request of the Committee of Experts to initiate consultations with the most representative social partners. We further stress the need for the Government to respect and safeguard the representativeness of employers' and workers' organizations with a view to engaging in effective social dialogue. We call on the Government to strengthen the dialogue and collaboration with the General Confederation of Algerian Employers (CGEA), the most representative organization of employers. The CGEA can provide guidance and input, and constructively engage with the Government, with a view to overcoming any challenges that the effective implementation of the Acts Nos 23-02 and 23-08 may pose, and to ensuring compliance with the principles laid down in Convention No. 98.

Worker member, Algeria – I am speaking on behalf of the General Union of Algerian Workers (UGTA), which represents over 2 million workers. At the last congress of the UGTA in July 2023, a new leadership was elected which, as soon as it was established, introduced a policy of trade union unity and of active participation in the tripartite social dialogue that is being consolidated in the country.

This commitment by the UGTA is further illustrated by its active involvement in several projects dedicated to social dialogue launched by the ILO for countries in the region. This is particularly the case for the SOLiD project to strengthen social dialogue within the Southern Mediterranean region, and the SOLIFEM project dedicated to the transition from the informal to the formal economy. Furthermore, two consultants selected by the ILO to conduct missions linked to these two projects are officials from the UGTA.

Allow me to digress for a moment to give you some information before returning to the matter under discussion today. It is interesting to note that, during the period 2022 to 2024, the Algerian Government implemented major measures in favour of employees, particularly in terms of social benefits. I will summarize them in three brief points: the wages of public officials in Algeria were increased by 47 per cent over a period of two years between 2022 and 2024; minimum retirement pensions were increased by 33 per cent, covering both allowances and minimum retirement pensions; and unemployment insurance or unemployment benefits were established in the country which cover bonuses for jobseekers and which amount to 75 per cent of the guaranteed national minimum wage. I will end here and return to the matter at hand.

In 2023, two Acts were promulgated, namely, Act No. 23-02 on the exercise of the right to organize and Act No. 23-08 on the prevention of disputes and the exercise of the right to strike. On one hand, these two Acts represent a clear step forward as they now make it possible for workers from several sectors of activity to establish trade union confederations. However, on the other hand, some provisions of these Acts allow for restrictive interpretations that may, in practice, undermine the free exercise of the right to associate and organize, the independence of trade union organizations and the right to strike.

It is for this reason that the UGTA has requested the initiation of dialogue with the Government on the revision of these provisions, in a manner that better guarantees the right to organize for workers and strengthens inclusive social dialogue that is effective at all levels. The UGTA welcomes the positive response to its request from the highest authority in the country.

As part of its unified action, the UGTA, which was approached by the Confederation of Algerian Trade Unions (CSA), a group of 13 trade unions in the process of being formed, decided, together with the CSA, to set up a task force to develop common proposals for the amendment of provisions of the two aforementioned Acts and to submit the proposals to the Government and for dialogue.

The UGTA affirms that this unified action is not intended to be limited solely to the CSA, but rather remains open to all trade union organizations in the country, on the condition that the CSA has a genuine union presence on the ground, regardless of how far it extends. This action is the result of the UGTA's deep conviction that social dialogue at the national, regional and international level is an invaluable tool for resolving the issues faced by workers and countries.

Given the above, the UGTA expects genuine and constructive support from the ILO which must, in accordance with its founding and guiding principles, encourage all processes in its Member States aimed at reaching compromises through social dialogue, in order to strengthen freedom of association, the right to organize of workers and the right to collective bargaining.

The ILO must, from our point of view, and if needed by the social partners, provide technical assistance for the conclusion of this dialogue. We urge the ILO to refrain from taking measures that would hinder this dialogue instead of promoting it. The ILO must, in this regard, give priority consideration to the trade unions that have a genuine and effective union presence on the ground.

Our request is all the more justified given that the case of Algeria under discussion today was initially scheduled for the 2025 session of the Conference. We have ample time to give social dialogue every chance to succeed and to resolve the issue through dialogue.

Interpretation from Arabic: Another Worker member, Algeria – On behalf of the National Autonomous Union of Public Administration Personnel (SNAPAP), which has been active since 1990, I would like to express its astonishment at seeing Algeria included on the list of countries established on the basis of an erroneous report containing false information, especially concerning Act No. 23-02 on the exercise of the right to organize. I would like to assure you that we are cooperating fully alongside the other trade unions.

Concerning trade union restrictions, given that we are the second trade union central organization in Algeria, we represent all sectors of work, and we wish to assure you that dialogue and consultations have been established on a permanent basis between the social partners and the Government.

The incidents mentioned in the report were recounted by persons who have nothing to do with trade unionism. They have tried, on several occasions, to seize control of our trade union, SNAPAP, and to flout fundamental laws and the internal regulations of our trade union organization. We went to court and took legal action against these persons who usurped the legitimate leadership of the trade union. Following a series of legal proceedings before the courts of first instance and the High Court, we won the case.

The same group of persons also attempted to take control of the Autonomous National Union of Electricity and Gas Workers (SNATEG) and, after the Ministry of Labour published a list of registered trade unions, the same individuals tried once again to seize control of COSYFOP. The actions of these persons have no connection with the work of trade unions. They are trying to deceive international trade unions and to mislead the delegates of this honourable and respectable Organization which is trying to ensure the exercise of the right to organize in accordance with international conventions and national legislation.

We therefore request the Committee to definitively close the discussion on Case No. 2153. This would send a positive signal to Algerian trade unionists and would show that the ILO does not tolerate fraudulent behaviour.

Employer member, Algeria – As the most representative and independent employers' organization in Algeria, we, the CGEA, note with great interest that the Government confirmed in its intervention that it has taken due note of the Committee of Experts' request to reply in 2025 to the questions raised in its report, and just examined by this Committee, and with which it aligns itself. My organization will work closely with the Government in preparing these responses in 2025, as requested by the Committee of Experts.

During his visit to Algeria and with the CGEA in September 2023, International Organisation of Employers (IOE) Secretary-General, Roberto Suarez, was received by the Minister of Labour. He emphasized the importance of further strengthening dialogue.

Recently, in April 2024, we also received a visit from the ILO Director-General, Mr Hounbo, at our Organization's headquarters in Algiers. During these exchanges between the Director-General and the President of our Confederation and my Confederation's governing board, we also talked about strengthening social dialogue with the CGEA.

The Government must also be recognized for submitting to social dialogue with the social partners the amendments to Act No. 23-02 of 25 April 2023 on freedom of association and Act No. 23-08 of 21 June on the prevention and settlement of labour disputes. This was confirmed by the employers' organization, CGEA, a member of the IOE.

It should also be noted that these new reforms, which come after 34 years, aim to strengthen the safeguards for the exercise of the right to organize in Algeria, along with other reforms initiated by the Government to modernize the economy and create decent jobs for our young people. As these are recent Acts, we will have to wait to see how they develop and are applied in practice before judging the impact of these new safeguards.

It would be fitting for the Committee to recognize this progress and encourage the Government to further strengthen dialogue with its social partners, improve the exercise of the right to organize in practice, and strengthen the independence of the social partners and the dialogue between them.

Another employer member, Algeria – I represent the Council for the Economic Recovery of Algeria (CREA), an employer organization as independent as our friends' organization, the CGEA. Beyond any technical input, we wish to align ourselves fully with the statement made by the workers' trade unions and our colleague at the CGEA and, in addition, I wish rather to show you a vision of the new Algeria because we have been speaking about events before 2019. The whole world knows that in 2019 Algeria was the scene of a great pacifist movement called the Hirak, which gave way to the introduction of a new Algeria that is being built with new reforms, new laws and, above all, with the whole population – trade unionists, authorities and others.

In the Algeria of 2024, there are two new words in the spotlight: the first is "consultation". Before 2019, there was very little consultation, or at least only among a few parties. Today, consultation has truly become a way for the Algerian State to engage with all institutions, civil society, trade unions and so forth. We were consulted widely on Act No. 23-02 (those who were consulted are resident in Algeria and, obviously, those who are not resident in Algeria cannot be consulted) and CREA made proposals concerning this Bill, some of which were accepted. I wish to add that, when, in establishing the terms and conditions for the statutes, particularly with regard to women's representation – and excuse me, but as a woman this makes my hair stand on end – a trade union labels as “interference” the application of conditions for women's representation on governing boards – while today we are all working towards gender parity – then we are in favour of State “interference” when it is necessary to ensure women's representation on trade unions' governing boards.

The second point concerns the separation of trade union and political activities. Freedom does not mean anarchy, and freedom of association does not mean trade union anarchy. We need rules, we need directives to be able to effectively carry out our activities, be they political or trade union-related, with mutual respect.

Turning to foreign funding, as employers, we consider that the strength of a trade union lies in the strength of its members and that its financial independence begins first with its members' contributions. How can we explain that a trade union, a so-called workers' union, is demanding foreign funding? Why and what for? Where are its members' contributions? What about its financial independence? Thus, Act No. 23-02 does not prohibit foreign funding. It requires that these funds be identified and earmarked, and effectively allocated for a specific trade union activity. I think all countries worldwide act in this way. We currently live in a world in total upheaval and it is important for each of us, in our own country, to check that the foreign funds received are not used for ill-intentioned purposes. Algeria is a country that is really trying to establish an approach that is more transparent financially, and I think we need to support it in this.

Furthermore, with our employer and worker colleagues we are preparing the upcoming national tripartite meeting. We will advance and make new proposals to verify that all the criteria that apply to Algerian trade unions are aligned with the criteria applicable to international trade unions. But Algeria needs time to rebuild, please, because we need it, because this country is in the thick of development, because this country has an increasingly growing population, which needs jobs, employers who create jobs and employers who create new investments. So I really think Algeria should be left to rebuild itself, and the Committee of Experts should be requested, as all my Algerian colleagues mentioned earlier, to give us the possibility to provide updated replies. That is to say that, to speak of what happened in 2019 in 2024 gives me the impression that I am a little late, or have taken the train in the opposite direction.

Government member, Cuba – We thank the delegation of Algeria for the information providing elements on the exercise of freedom of association in the country and on collective bargaining, which demonstrates the willingness of the Government to maintain communication and cooperation with the ILO supervisory bodies, and the decision to honour its commitments. We highlight the information on the updating of standards since 1990 and more recently in 2020, particularly labour legislation. These updates contribute to the alignment of national legislation with international labour standards on matters such as protection against discrimination, freedom of expression and social dialogue.

As in other cases, we appreciate that the information provided by all parties must be examined in an impartial manner. It is also important to give equal value and consideration to the replies provided by the Algerian Government, the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Committee on Freedom of Association.

We reiterate the importance of continuing to promote tripartism and respectful discussion in each country, as well as the spirit of dialogue and cooperation. We hope that the conclusions of this discussion will be objective, technical and balanced, and that the views and information provided by the Algerian authorities will be taken into account, and properly assessed and weighed.

Employer member, New Zealand – Thematically, this case is about representativeness. In this regard it is concerning to note in the Committee of Experts' report an ongoing trend concerning acts of anti-union discrimination and interference against independent unions and their leaders and the contrasting perspective from the workers from Algeria. This contrast clearly needs some resolution. We appreciate that the Committee of Experts has asked for responses on a variety of questions by next year, so my comments are made in the spirit of encouraging effective dialogue between now and then. We accordingly support the request of the Committee of Experts that the Government provide its comments without delay in this regard so that effective social dialogue may take place with the social partners.

We also want to be clear about who the social partners are. The commonly accepted definition is "the most representative organizations of workers and employers".

In this light, the Government should indicate whether consultations have taken place or are envisaged to address the question of the protection of union leaders and members during the registration period of an established union. If not, the Government should initiate consultation of the properly representative social partners on the issue.

We also echo the call of the Committee of Experts for the Government to provide timely information on the renewal of the representative status of organizations, in particular to indicate the number of certificates provided each year, refusals of renewal, appeals and their results. Making changes is hard, and often there are obstacles. However, we see a real possibility for positive outcomes in Algeria; the key is effective social dialogue. And social dialogue is most effective when it involves the voices of the widest possible sections of the economy. We therefore urge the Government to use all the representative avenues available to it in this regard.

Worker member, France – Today, it is important to recognize the voice of the Algerian trade union leaders who have been forced into exile to escape persecution by the Algerian Government. The repression does not stop at the borders of Algeria. Several independent trade union leaders were forced into exile in Europe in order to ensure their safety and that of their families.

These leaders include the President of the Algerian Union of Industries (UAI), Hamza Kherroubi, General Secretary of SNATEG, Abdelkader Kouafi, and President of COSYFOP, Raouf Mellal. They had to leave their home country, not by choice, but to escape relentless persecution.

Unfortunately, the prominent trade union leader and president of SNAPAP and the General and Autonomous Confederation of Workers in Algeria (CGATA), Mr Rachid Malaoui, was not so lucky. Also forced into exile in France, he died in December 2023 in appalling conditions. His death was followed by another ordeal in terms of the difficulties experienced with the Algerian embassy in France to repatriate his remains. Rachid Malaoui now rests in Algeria, but the obstacles encountered in his repatriation underscore the harsh reality experienced by independent trade union leaders in Algeria.

In its interim report published in February 2024 (Case No. 3434, COSYFOP), the Committee on Freedom of Association adopted a firm stance by requesting the Algerian Government to ensure that Mr Mellal, Mr Kouafi and Mr Kherroubi are able to return to their country to carry out their trade union activities in a climate free from violence, pressure and threats.

This request is essential for the survival of the autonomous trade union movement in Algeria. The right to organize and the right to collective bargaining cannot exist without a climate of trust and security. This climate requires the return of the trade union leaders forced into exile in Europe, so that they can continue to fight for the rights of workers alongside their comrades in Algeria without fearing for their lives and safety.

Lastly, the support of the Committee is crucial to guarantee the right to organize and to collective bargaining in Algeria.

Interpretation from Russian: Government member, Belarus – We are grateful to the Government of Algeria for providing detailed information on this matter. We note Algeria's commitment to active engagement with the supervisory bodies of the ILO. We welcome the work of the Government to broaden the base of the legislative framework regulating collective bargaining and the exercise of the right to strike.

We note positively the measures implemented at the national level to prevent discrimination or infringement of workers' rights, as well as the prevention of unwarranted interference in trade union activities.

The information provided by the Government, which indicates the effective operation of the labour inspectors, merits our attention as it ensures the protection of workers' rights in practice.

With regard to Act No. 23-02, providing protection from external interference, we believe that such measures protect national interests and provide a stable internal political context. Taking such measures is an inalienable right of every sovereign country. Similar regulations exist in many Western countries.

We call on the ILO supervisory bodies to assess the situation objectively and impartially, and using reliable sources of information.

The Government's concern about information being provided to ILO supervisory bodies from individuals allegedly representing trade unions that ceased their activities more than 20 years ago is of some concern.

We call on the ILO to continue providing technical assistance to Algeria with a view to further progress in the protection of workers' interests and rights.

Employer member, Germany – Convention No. 98 is one of the ten fundamental Conventions of the ILO, which was ratified by Algeria in 1962. The German employers would like to stress the importance of States' compliance with the ratified Convention.

The Convention sets out principles on the right to organize and collective bargaining, for both employers and workers. The Convention provides, in Article 2, equal protection to workers' and employers' organizations against interference into the autonomous organization and running of their internal affairs.

It should be noted that Algeria has implemented the recommendations that were formulated at the end of the high-level mission of May 2019. The Act of 25 April 2023, relating to the exercise of the right to organize was preceded by a broad consultation of the social partners.

Three rounds of social consultations with over 60 social partner organizations concerning the criteria of representativeness, union discrimination, protection against reprisals, non-interference and collective bargaining autonomy enabled an in-depth discussion.

In its latest observations, the Committee of Experts asked the Government to take the necessary measures on the basis of Articles 1, 2, and 4 of the Convention so that acts of anti-union discrimination are prohibited and union representativeness is established objectively. It should be noted that the Committee of Experts asked the Government to reply in full to the present comments in 2025.

The employers call on the Government to provide the ILO with all the information requested by the Committee of Experts and to request technical assistance from the ILO to comply with the Convention.

To conclude, we encourage the Government to promote social dialogue and to intensify its consultations with representative organizations of employers and workers, with a view to applying the fundamental principles of Convention No. 98 in law and practice.

Worker member, Spain – I am speaking on behalf of the Spanish Trade Union Confederation of Workers' Commissions. According to the Global Rights Index 2023 of the International Trade Union Confederation, in general, the region of the Middle East and North Africa continues to be the worst region in the world in terms of workers' rights. The areas of conflict in the region have witnessed the destruction of the rule of law and, therefore, neither the rights of workers nor their fundamental freedoms can be guaranteed.

In other countries, as has already been discussed in the case of Tunisia by this Committee, a new Constitution was unilaterally adopted in July 2022, without consultation of the political parties or the social partners. This is a region-wide offensive that does not affect just one country.

As a result, last year, violations of the Convention occurred, and countries such as Algeria are unfortunately no exception to this offensive.

In Algeria, independent trade unions continue to struggle to obtain registration from hostile authorities, which severely hampers their ability to function effectively. There is also the issue of "cloning" of trade unions in the country.

Amnesty International's report, The State of the World's Human Rights, published in April 2024, shows how, in general, the Algerian authorities have stepped up the reduction of space for civil society, handing down convictions against activists, trade unionists, journalists and researchers for exercising their right to freedom of expression, and have shut down websites and ordered the closure of human rights associations.

The same report also indicates that, in May, Act No. 23-02 was promulgated, which restricted the right to form trade unions, allowing the authorities to reject applications by implementing vaguely worded provisions related to "national unity" and "national values and constants", and also enabling the authorities to dissolve a trade union on various grounds such as persisting in "illegal" strike action, and to fine any trade union that joins an international, continental or regional trade union organization without informing the authorities. Furthermore, it established prison sentences of up to one year and fines for those who received foreign donations or legacies without the prior approval of the authorities.

The situation in Algeria is very serious and reflects a worrying escalation of repression in Algeria. It is essential for the Committee to demand that the Algerian Government initiate a process of open and constructive dialogue between the Government and the trade unions alleging the violation of this Convention, and to ensure respect for the fundamental freedoms of all workers in Algeria.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Sudan – The Government of Sudan aligns itself with the statement of Algeria and supports the reforms that Algeria has undertaken in implementing the obligations emanating from the ILO Conventions that it has ratified, namely Convention No. 87 as well as Convention No. 98.

Sudan values the full cooperation of the Government of Algeria with the ILO supervisory bodies by providing all the required replies and clarifications. It seeks to take into account the comments of the committees, especially the Committee of Experts.

Sudan also appreciates the measures taken by Algeria by adopting new legislation and gradually making amendments to its current labour legislation. Some amendments have already been implemented, which has contributed to enhancing the fundamental rights of workers and ensuring decent work conditions for employees and workers in the public and private sectors.

All amendments and new legislation that Algeria has adopted are in the interest of freedoms and in respect of the values and principles stipulated in the Constitution and international labour standards, especially those related to social dialogue.

Algeria has remained a pioneering country calling for non-politicization of the work of the Organization. It has benefited from its own experiences in the path of dialogue and the respect of fundamental labour rights. It has also made these experiences available to Member States in the region. Sudan appreciates Algeria's wish to also benefit from other comparative experiences and to exchange experiences with other countries in legislation related to union representation.

Sudan requests the closure of this complaint and the withdrawal of Algeria from the list of individual cases, as we believe that Algeria has played a major role in ensuring the implementation of labour rights and standards.

Employer member, Colombia -The Convention and the reiterated comments of the Committee of Experts refer to the need to implement protection measures against anti-union discrimination and interference, and the commitment to conducting effective consultations based on social dialogue, as a key tool for developing joint proposals among employers, workers and governments, in order to promote growth, peace and general well-being.

In this regard, to achieve genuine dialogue and, therefore, effective consultations, a climate of trust based on respect for employers' and workers' organizations is necessary.

We therefore call on the Government to restore the spaces for tripartite social dialogue with the social partners and to recognize the representatives of the CGEA as the most representative employers' organization.

The labour reform process that is being implemented in the country must be carried out in the framework of the re-establishment of social dialogue and through a work plan agreed on a tripartite basis which allows for progress to be made on the multiple challenges highlighted by the Committee of Experts.

Government member, Nicaragua – The Government of National Unity and Reconciliation of the Republic of Nicaragua recognizes the efforts and achievements of the People's Democratic Republic of Algeria regarding the application of the Convention, and its cooperation with the ILO supervisory bodies.

Nicaragua underscores that the political Constitution and laws of the Republic of Algeria establish a legal framework to protect the exercise of the right to organize, including protection against discrimination, freedom of expression and the right to strike.

We recognize that Algeria has made significant progress on collective bargaining and respect for fundamental labour rights, and regularly complies with its obligations to submit reports in conformity with its international commitments.

Regarding the comments by the Committee of Experts and on the implementation of the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association, we welcome the information provided by Algeria, which has reiterated that the information submitted by the complainants has no legal basis.

In this respect, Nicaragua urges this Conference to act with impartiality, in a constructive spirit, and to promote cooperation among our nations, respecting the principles of sovereign equality of States and non-interference in internal affairs.

We commend the People's Democratic Republic of Algeria on its continued commitment to labour rights, in order to ensure the stability and social and economic development of the Algerian people.

Employer member, Spain – Regarding this specific case, the Spanish employers wish to highlight the importance of social dialogue as a factor of economic progress and social cohesion. Social dialogue is a key tool for achieving consensus that builds trust and leads to the application of policies that contribute to the establishment of favourable conditions for the creation of decent jobs, inclusive economic growth and sustainable development.

We encourage the Government of Algeria to pursue the path of social dialogue with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations in the country and to initiate effective tripartite consultations. We underscore the need for the Government to respect and safeguard the representativity of employers' organizations and, specifically, that of the CGEA, with a view to achieving effective social dialogue and solid progress towards the ambitious reform plan under way in the country.

Interpretation from Chinese: Government member, China – I thank the representative of the Government of Algeria for the detailed introduction and reply. We also carefully read the report of the Committee of Experts, as well as the additional information submitted by the Government. We know that the Government of Algeria has taken into account and considered seriously the comments made by parties and submitted detailed information and replies. It respects basic rights and is making progress. The labour inspection authorities are performing their duties diligently. Labour inspections are constantly being strengthened. Standards of transparency are being formed, tripartite consultation is being carried out and laws and regulations are being implemented. We appreciate the progress. We hope the Committee will adhere to the principles of objectivity and impartiality. We should listen carefully to the statement and information provided by the Government and be impartial. We should listen to the responses of all parties and take them into account in the conclusions. And we encourage the Committee to provide further technical assistance to the Algerian Government to strengthen its ability and improve its social and economic development.

Employer member, United States of America – Initially and importantly, we wish to reiterate our belief that national law and practice should guarantee those fundamental rights that are inherent in the Convention. The contours of Convention No. 98 and also Convention No. 87 are often discussed in the context of workers' groups; there is often a good and legitimate reason for that emphasis, but we must always recall that the protections of the Convention also apply with equal force to employers and their freely chosen and representative organizations. We wish to share our concern that effective and meaningful social dialogue has not been taking place in Algeria. We wish to reaffirm the most essential importance of respect for the Convention by all ILO Member countries, as a fundamental Convention. The right to organize and bargain collectively for both employers and workers, is a prerequisite to ensuring that ILO standards are followed.

We thus call on the Algerian Government to take responsibility for fostering genuine social dialogue and follow the request of the Committee of Experts to initiate consultations with the most representative social partners. We further stress the need for the Government to respect and safeguard the representativeness of employer organizations and trade unions, which is the necessary precondition to effective social dialogue.

Government member, Türkiye – We believe that the Algerian Government's constitutional amendment in 2020, including protection against discrimination, freedom of expression, the right to organize and the right to strike, was an important step.

We also appreciate the Algerian Government's commitment to be ready to examine trade union complaints within the applicable legislation and, where necessary, to consult with the social partners to protect and promote representativeness and trade union rights.

We note the significant improvements provided by the new amendments in terms of financial transparency and political neutrality, as well as the protection of trade union leaders and members against discrimination. In particular, we believe that the financial transparency provisions will strengthen trade union members' trust in the organizations they represent, while at the same time mitigating conflicts within the many trade union organizations and reducing the number of cases brought before the courts.

We consider the political neutrality regulation to be very important in preventing political formations within trade union organizations, while at the same time preserving the independence of trade unions and their ability to fairly represent the interests of all their members.

The fact that the new Act came into force within the framework of negotiations with the social partners shows the importance given by the Government not only to its commitment to constructive social dialogue, but also to union representation within the scope of the development of the current legislative system.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Libya – The State of Libya welcomes the reforms undertaken by the Republic of Algeria in implementing the obligations emanating from the ILO Conventions that it has ratified, namely Convention No. 87 and Convention No. 98.

Libya welcomes the enactment and the adoption by the Republic of Algeria of two new Acts in 2023, the first one on 25 April 2023. It is related to the exercise of the right to organize, and the principles and rules related to freedom of association. It enhances the protection of trade unionists and union representatives by adapting the procedures for intervention by the labour inspectorate and the judicial and administrative authorities against any arbitrary decision, particularly with regard to arbitrary dismissals of workers linked to their affiliations.

Algeria also adopted the Act on the prevention and settlement of collective labour conflicts and the exercise of the right to strike on 21 June 2023. This Act establishes more flexible mechanisms for social dialogue. Social dialogue should be consensual, balanced and effective for settling collective disputes with employers according to the new Act. The Act also encourages the adoption of measures for the peaceful settlement of collective disputes by strengthening the effectiveness of reconciliation, mediation and arbitration to create a social environment based on dialogue, consultation, collective bargaining and legal procedures to respect the right to strike.

Libya welcomes the cooperation and continuous engagement of the Republic of Algeria with the ILO, the 2019 high-level mission and the Committee of Experts. We appreciate that it has submitted the required information and documents. The State of Libya calls for the Republic of Algeria to be withdrawn from the list of individual cases.

Employer member, Argentina – In this case, Algeria is being examined for non-compliance with ILO Convention No. 98. There is no doubt that this is a highly important Convention and is at the heart of this Organization.

It is essential for tripartite social dialogue to take place with employers' and workers' organizations which are independent, and which do not experience any interference by the State.

Algeria has provided information on the approval of recent standards regulating these matters. However, it is just as important for the approval, and the wording and spirit of these standards to be applied in practice. We therefore urge Algeria to maintain a mature social dialogue with the independent employers' and workers' representatives that are genuinely representative, and to ensure that there is no interference by the State, such as in the specific case of the employers' organization, the CGEA.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Egypt – We welcome the statement by Algeria concerning the application of the Convention and the efforts made by Algeria to apply the provisions of this Convention. This shows to what degree Algeria is focused on implementing international labour standards. We have taken into account the constitutional reforms undertaken by Algeria, enshrining union organizations' legitimate rights. The Constitution, which has been reviewed, also now includes a certain number of rights and principles: freedom of expression, and freedom of organization and assembly, as well as the right to strike.

We followed very closely the progress made by Algeria in the area of social dialogue, collective bargaining and the respect of fundamental rights at work. Algeria is very much focused on ensuring that it meets these standards through the provisions of the Constitution. A new Act has been adopted containing provisions protecting trade union leaders and activists, protecting them from reprisals and discrimination. A certain number of trade union members have submitted complaints. There has been consultation among social partners to guarantee representativeness and the good functioning of trade unions. The Act contains requirements of political neutrality and financial transparency. These are essential in ensuring the effective and transparent functioning of these organizations.

We support Algeria in its efforts and encourage it to continue along the path of socially inclusive, constructive dialogue and to continue to improve the legislative framework and better apply international labour standards. We welcome the reforms that Algeria has undertaken to ensure conformity with the requirements of the Convention, and we hope very much that the Committee will take into account the progress that has been made.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Tunisia – My country welcomes the positive interaction of the Algerian Government with the ILO supervisory bodies and thanks it for its renewed commitment to compliance with international labour standards.

We thank Algeria for providing information today and previously, and we also thank it for the explanations provided to the Committee of Experts. We draw your attention to the promulgation of laws in 2023 and to those concerning the exercise of the right to organize and the prevention of collective disputes. This is a positive step, which demonstrates the extent to which Algeria is keen to improve its legislative framework in order to meet its national and international legal obligations.

The path pursued by Algeria is both collegial and participatory, which has enabled it to develop and adopt these laws, to draft legislation that defines the conditions under which trade union organizations must be formed and managed, and this also applies to the criteria for membership.

We also commend Algeria on the measures taken to strengthen trust between the social partners and to encourage the peaceful settlement of collective disputes. We once again encourage Algeria to continue its reforms and its national efforts to promote the rights of workers and the improvement of the working environment taking into account national priorities and the recommendations of the Committee of Experts.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Syrian Arab Republic – The Syrian Arab Republic takes due note of the detailed information that has been provided by the Government of our brother country, Algeria, relating to the Convention.

We welcome the information which demonstrates that Algeria is applying the values and principles of this Convention, which are now enshrined in national legislation and in the Constitution, guaranteeing the exercise of union rights. A legislative reform has been undertaken to strengthen these rights and that is an excellent thing.

We note that Algeria is ready and willing to pursue a path of social dialogue together with the social partners and the support of the ILO. Algeria is responding consistently to questions from the Committee of Experts. We welcome these efforts, and we hope very much that the ILO and its committees will continue this constructive cooperation alongside the Government, factoring in the detailed information and explanations provided by the Government, bearing in mind that the Constitution and legislation do enshrine the principles of the Convention for the well-being of Algerian citizens and are very much in line with their interests.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Saudi Arabia – My country has duly taken note of the information presented by the Government and we are grateful for the explanations provided. We are pleased with the progress that has been made in Algeria when it comes to the implementation of the obligations arising from the Conventions ratified by this country. We are also delighted to see that legal reforms have been adopted in the area of labour. We take a positive view, furthermore, of the social dialogue mechanism that has been put in place, which allows the country to resolve these conflicts via conciliation, mediation and arbitration. We are pleased with the efforts that have been made by Algeria which allow trade unions to exercise their right to strike as a last resort. They must first go through mediation, reconciliation and arbitration and this is guaranteed by the new legislation. We encourage these efforts to continue.

Government member, Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela – The Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela welcomes the statement delivered by the distinguished delegation of the People's Democratic Republic of Algeria with regard to the Convention.

It should be noted that the report of the Committee of Experts urged the country to create appropriate conditions for the registration of trade unions, thereby guaranteeing freedom of association and the right of workers to organize.

In this regard, we have noted the statement by Algeria, a country in which the principles of the Convention are enshrined in the Constitution and its labour legislation of 2020, which allows for trade union organizations to freely exercise their rights. The constitutional review of 2020 reaffirms these principles, including protection against discrimination, freedom of expression, the right to organize and the right to strike.

We welcome the fact that the Government of Algeria is committed to inclusive and constructive social dialogue, aimed at evaluating the effectiveness of the measures established by law and at improving the current legislative system.

Lastly, the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela hopes that the conclusions of this Committee will be objective, balanced and impartial, in order for the Government of Algeria to continue to move forward and to strengthen its legislation so as to comply with the Convention.

Government member, Cameroon – We note the information provided by Algeria, which indicates that the Government is honouring its commitments with regard to the ILO and its social partners.

The labour Acts of 1990 enshrined the rights to representation, collective bargaining, and of worker participation, and the free exercise of the right to organize without discrimination. The revised Algerian Constitution of 2020 introduced provisions that reaffirm the principles including protection against discrimination, freedom of expression, the right to organize and the right to strike.

Respect for the rule of law is a civic duty throughout the world. The status of trade unionist or trade union leader should not exempt certain persons from this fundamental principle. Furthermore, any allegation or complaint without legal grounds should be declared unfounded. Labour inspectors perform the role of social regulators, the function of which is to either determine a party to a dispute, or to declare non-conciliation and initiate other proceedings.

Act No. 23-02 was the subject of consultation at several levels and stages before being submitted for approval, adoption and promulgation. This was a highly participatory approach which must serve as a reference as it is considered a good practice. It includes punitive measures against any impediment to the establishment or functioning of a trade union organization, and excludes any external interference in trade union activities. It should be noted that the criterion of financial transparency mentioned in the discussions is a governance procedure aimed at ensuring the rigorous and transparent management of the financial resources of trade union organizations, and ensuring the integrity and credibility of trade unions in their role of representing workers. It is also an effective mechanism to strengthen the trust of members in their representative organizations. The Act also provides that members of a trade union organization are free to join political parties individually.

Cameroon welcomes all these innovative government initiatives and invites the Office to take into account the progress achieved, and to ensure the safeguarding of tripartite dialogue in Algeria through mediation between parties. It invites the Algerian Government to pursue its commitment to inclusive and constructive social dialogue aimed at evaluating the effectiveness of the measures implemented by law, and to improve the current legal framework.

Government member, Zimbabwe – Algeria is a long-standing Member of the ILO and has, over this long history, endeavoured to comply with its obligations under ratified Conventions. Zimbabwe notes with appreciation the information provided by the Office that Algeria regularly provides detailed information in response to observations emanating from trade union organizations and ILO supervisory bodies. This is a sign of good will and an indication of a country that is working towards giving full effect to ratified Conventions.

It is important to point out that the principles of the Convention are captured in the Algerian Constitution of 2020 and the labour law. These allow trade unions to exercise their right to strike and right to organize, and offer protection against discrimination. It is also important to note that complaints have been registered, investigations have been conducted in 32 cases and action has been taken on the findings.

In the case of protection of union leaders, the Government of Algeria has submitted that there is a legal framework in place in existing Act No. 23-02 to protect union leaders. The Government of Algeria has also indicated its willingness and availability to discuss challenges faced, and if deemed necessary, to initiate a review of this Act. We therefore encourage the tripartite partners to engage on this matter with the assistance of the Office in order to address challenges that are currently being faced.

Finally, Algeria has demonstrated a willingness to comply with the provisions of the Convention, has taken steps to rectify areas of concern and is working on giving full effect to the recommendations of the Committee of Experts. We therefore support Algeria's request to be given more time to comply and we urge the ILO to continue giving the tripartite partners technical support in this area.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Lebanon – Lebanon welcomes the report that has been provided by Algeria, and we are grateful to Algeria for having set out detailed explanations that cover the efforts that have been made to align itself with international Conventions, in particular Convention No. 98 and Convention No. 87.

We wish to note Algeria's sincere efforts to put in place legislation that complies with international labour standards. In 2023, a series of new laws was passed that covers the resolution of collective conflicts, the right to strike and protection of trade union freedoms. We believe that this national legislation and policies will allow Algeria to create a climate that will lead to mutual trust and good governance for the country, which undertakes to comply with international Conventions. We see proof of this in, for example, the important adoption of a new Act that covers freedom of association and sets out a series of conditions for the establishment of trade union organizations to strengthen protection for trade union members.

Furthermore, social dialogue is essential in Algeria. Algeria continues to bolster the mediation and arbitration mechanisms, among others, that it has in place to ensure that they are effective, which will restore mutual trust among all stakeholders for peaceful solutions. In the general interest of Algeria and its social partners, we are once again delighted to see that concerted efforts have been made in a friendly atmosphere and that there is cooperation between the Government of Algeria and the ILO, in particular, the Committee of Experts and this Committee. We wish prosperity and success to Algeria.

Government member, Bangladesh – Bangladesh takes notes of the comments of the Committee of Experts which highlight that Algeria regularly provides detailed information in response to observations emanating from trade union organizations, as well as to the Committee's recommendations.

We would like to underscore that the review of the 2020 Constitution reaffirms the principles enshrined in the Convention, including protection against discrimination, freedom of expression, and the right to organize and right to strike. The 1990 social laws enshrine the rights of representation, collective bargaining, worker participation, and the free exercise of union rights without any discrimination.

Furthermore, Algeria has made significant progress in social dialogue, collective bargaining, and respect for fundamental rights at work, and it regularly fulfils its reporting obligations in accordance with the international commitments.

Bangladesh appreciates that the Government has regularly provided information on COSYFOP and its affiliated organizations, specifying that they have never provided the information necessary to assess their union representatives or the renewal of their governing boards.

The Government has submitted regular reports and supplementary reports or replies on the developments and accomplishments in the country's application of the Convention pursuant to the recommendations of the ILO.

Bangladesh believes that these actions demonstrate good faith and commitment to implement the recommendations. Bangladesh urges this august forum to recognize the commitment of the Government, and to support its action to ensure more progress and closure of the case. We would like to join voices with the request made by the Algerian Government.

Observer, Industrial Global Union (IndustriALL) – IndustriALL continues to follow with great concern the continuous criminalization of the right to organize and to perform trade union activities, including collective bargaining in Algeria. Furthermore, we are alarmed by the misapplication of the anti-terrorism laws against independent trade union leaders and members, including IndustriALL affiliates.

The backdrop of these concerns lies in the controversial labour law reforms. The new Act, which claims to enhance trade union activities and protect workers' rights, severely restricts workers' rights.

As highlighted by the report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the rights to freedom of peaceful assembly and association on her visit to the country, severe restrictions have been imposed on the population over recent years and, as a result, independent civil society has been dismantled, political pluralism has been curtailed, and human rights defenders, independent trade union members, leaders, activists and journalists have been imprisoned or forced into exile.

It is imperative that the Government of Algeria act in full accordance with the decisions and recommendations adopted by the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Committee of Experts and this Committee.

The Government must respect Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention and ensure protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference relating to independent trade unions and their leaders. There are numerous cases of harassment and dismissals of union leaders and members, as already observed in the conclusions of the high-level mission to Algiers in 2019. It is unfortunate that no remedial or fair compensatory measures have been taken to address these violations. This is reflected in the failure of the labour inspectorate to act on the cases of anti-union discrimination and dismissals.

IndustriALL also expresses serious concern about the Government's interference in the legal system, vastly delaying court decisions ordering the reinstatement of union leaders. We call on the Government to ensure the protection of independent union members and their leaders during the period in which an established trade union is applying for registration. The Government of Algeria must remove any administrative obstacles that could impinge on the development of industrial relations and collective bargaining, including the full respect of Article 4 of the Convention.

Expressing our solidarity and support for the Algerian free and democratic trade unions, we urge the Algerian Government to uphold international labour standards, respect the right to peaceful assembly and association, and ensure fair treatment of all workers, particularly for the members and leaders of the independent unions.

Observer, Public Services International (PSI) – I also speak on behalf of the International Union of Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers' Associations (IUF). The Government, in the written information submitted to this Committee and its intervention during this session, has not referred to some of the most important aspects of this case, which involve the acts of interference prohibited by the Convention. In this respect, nothing has fundamentally changed since the high-level mission in 2019.

The first refers to the legal status of the situation of independent unions, which remains precarious, to say the least. The Government has refused to register unions such as the CGATA and has arbitrarily dissolved and cloned others, like SNATEG and SNAPAP, undermining their ability to function. In this very room we have a clone of these organizations. Please allow me to call to your attention and underline again the fact that SNAPAP is an affiliate of the PSI, but we do not know the person who took the floor in a previous intervention who is registered as representing SNAPAP within the Algerian workers' delegation. I can assure you he is not a member from our affiliated organization, and we take this as a provocation, a challenge and a clear message to this Committee and the ILO that the Government has the intention to continue with these practices, regardless of its obligations with the Convention and the recommendations of the supervisory bodies, for instance the Committee on Freedom of Association Case No. 2153.

Another important aspect is the atmosphere of fear and repression that persists. Over recent years the Government has sustained its attack on independent trade unions and democratic activists. One of the most alarming characteristics of this repression is the use of the terrorism-related charges against trade unionists. Let us not forget that the Government had broadened the definition of terrorism under section 87 bis of the Criminal Code, enabling the targeting of union leaders and activists in practice. This has led to frequent arrests and prosecutions of trade unionists on illegitimate grounds, including accusations of undermining national security and unity. These charges have not only led to arrests but also severe restrictions on legal defences, with lawyers being denied access to case files and facing prosecution themselves. This effectively criminalizes freedom of association, peaceful assembly and expression, which – we must stress – has been a very successful strategy to stifle dissent and activities of independent unions in the country.

Because of this, some of our colleagues requested and obtained asylum in Europe. To grant refugee status, fact-checking bodies from different countries analysed credible evidence and found it likely that the lives of these colleagues were at risk in Algeria.

When arrests, detentions, judicial harassment, restricted civic space, lack of fundamental freedoms and interference with peaceful activities of trade unionists become commonplace, this Committee has a critical role and it must ensure that the Algerian Government is held accountable for its violations of freedom of association.

Chairperson – We do not have more requests for the floor, so I now invite the Government representative of Algeria, to take the floor for his final remarks.

Government representative – It is with great pleasure that I take the floor to thank the speakers, the governments, workers and employers, those who supported my country, those who requested clarifications and those who requested that efforts be made.

The Government takes due note of all the comments made and thanks the parties that spoke. Algerian legislation on trade union rights reflects a genuine and total commitment to protecting workers' rights and promoting fair working conditions. It conforms with international labour standards and aims to balance the interests of the employers and the workers. It is in this spirit that the two new Acts, Act No. 23-02 and Act No. 23-08, as well as the seven implementing regulations enacted in 2023 for the two Acts, do not derogate from these principles.

Regarding social dialogue, it should be noted that Algeria's experience of the practice of social dialogue is rooted in all the Constitutions it has adopted. The Government and the social partners consult each other and exchange views at bipartite and tripartite meetings that have taken place for over 30 years. The Government is committed to social dialogue and consultation, which are the main forums for addressing the country's economic and social issues. Algeria's experience of social dialogue has been shared with African countries as part of an agreement signed with the ILO aimed at promoting South-South cooperation through the implementation of a programme to share Algerian experience in social dialogue and social protection.

Algeria affords particular importance to acquiring and improving knowledge regarding trade unions and labour law. To this end, this new legislative framework entitles trade union members to leave for training purposes. I also reiterate that the Government strictly ensures the protection of trade union representatives and workers against any arbitrary decision linked to their membership or performance of trade union activity. It does this through special procedures of the labour inspectorate competent in a given territory, and through the courts competent in upholding the rights of trade union representatives, particularly reinstatement in their post after dismissal or removal from a post and the employer's refusal to reinstate them, while preserving all the rights of which they were deprived during the period of dismissal or removal.

I also wish to make a few comments on the protection of trade union representatives, leaders and members during the registration period. The new Act sets out provisions protecting these persons from discrimination or possible reprisals during the period of establishment of trade unions, and provides for punitive measures against anyone who impedes the establishment or functioning of a trade union organization. It also provides for prison sentences and fines for persons who impede the establishment of trade union organizations.

Algeria attaches great importance to human rights, in their political, economic and social dimensions, and reaffirms its commitment to the respect of these rights. To this end, all Algerians, in accordance with the Constitution, notably article 49, can freely choose their place of residence and travel within the national territory. The right to enter and leave the country is guaranteed by the Constitution. Any restriction on these rights may only be ordered by a substantiated decision of the judicial authorities. In this respect, and as recalled several times by the Algerian Government, we note that all the accusations of arbitrary repression or prevention of the trade union activities of the persons cited in the report are unfounded, as we have noted that most of those actions fall under civil law and are related to complaints filed by individuals against the accused for defamation, attacks on these persons' private lives, or for unpaid and unauthorized activities. So I think that the information already provided by the Government sheds further light to show that these accusations are unfounded.

The Algerian Government is also determined to continue its efforts to strengthen freedom of association and the effectiveness of protection mechanisms to combat anti-union discrimination and ensure the free functioning of trade union organizations strictly in line with the provisions of the relevant Conventions. To this end, with regard to the question of representativeness, it has put in place a digital, automated and secure platform, exclusively for access for trade unions and, in accordance with Act No. 18-07 on the protection of personal data; no authority or individual can manipulate, disseminate or transmit the data therein to another entity. I reassure you therefore that the data gathered from the platform is protected and cannot be shared with the employers or be used in acts of reprisal.

In addition, this new Act offers two possibilities for achieving representativeness: one through union membership and the other through the occupational elections to achieve electoral strength. This Act also guarantees that the non-representative trade union organizations continue to disseminate information and provide their views. The new Act, in addition to what has already been illustrated, aims to guarantee all the principles of the free exercise of the right to organize.

Lastly, I reaffirm the Algerian Government's commitment to constructive and inclusive social dialogue aimed at examining and improving the effectiveness of the measures established by the recent legislative system, the transitional provisions of which came to an end on 2 May 2024.

Another Government representative – I wish to draw the Committee's attention to the fact that Algeria ratified these fundamental Conventions in 1962, the year of its independence, which we wrested from the colonial power after 132 years of occupation. We are thus fully committed to human rights, to the extent that, for example, on 8 May 1945 in three regions in an authorized demonstration, 45,000 people were killed. That is to say that this historical past – this past full of sacrifices – has forged our commitment to human rights.

With regard to the free movement of persons abroad, in his lifetime, Rachid Malaoui – may he rest in peace – participated in discussion panels and television broadcasts in Algeria, and the cost of repatriating his body was borne by the Government. All the necessary procedures were respected.

Regarding persons residing abroad, there is no restriction to their free movement. They can enter and leave Algeria when they wish and how they wish. I wanted to provide the Committee with these details to show that we also respect human rights and that we are here to work for the promotion of these human rights.

Employer members – I would also like to thank the Government representatives for the information shared with us, as well as all the speakers who took the floor in this discussion. I think that simply the number of speakers who have taken the floor shows the interest that we all have in social dialogue, and the essence of the ILO.

One of the main missions of the ILO is to promote collective bargaining worldwide. This mission was set for it in 1944, in the Declaration of Philadelphia which is part of the ILO Constitution. Collective bargaining contributes to the establishment of balanced and fair working conditions and thereby contributes to social peace.

The Employer members welcome the willingness to take positive steps for the future. We take note of the continued commitment by Algeria to follow through with the conclusions and recommendations from the high-level mission of May 2019. We further encourage the Government to continue effective action in the context of social dialogue and strengthen cooperation with the most representative trade unions and employers' organizations to overcome any outstanding challenges posed by the new legislation.

In conclusion, and specifically, the Employer members encourage the Government to:

- implement procedures for protection against any form of anti-union discrimination, intensifying the role of labour inspection if necessary;
- protect union leaders and members against any reprisals during the union recognition procedure and limit the duration of this procedure;
- avoid any interference in the functioning of trade unions;
- recognize and safeguard the representativeness of employers' organizations and trade unions and guarantee the application of objective criteria for union representativeness; in particular the representativeness of the CGEA shall be respected and preserved;
- guarantee confidentiality in the processing by the public authority of personal data of affiliates.

The Employer members invite the Government to provide the ILO with all the information requested by the Committee of Experts and to request technical assistance from the ILO to comply with the Convention.

I will end by specifying that we must, above all, strengthen the incentives for the social partners to organize freely, and negotiate freely and autonomously.

Worker members – We thank the Government of Algeria for its participation, as well as the contributions it has made. We also thank all the speakers in this discussion. Several speakers have shown us a new Algeria. We would like to believe it, but it seems clear that this new Algeria looks a lot like the old one. Our group expresses its concern at the many cases of anti-union discrimination and interference regularly reported to the various ILO supervisory bodies. These violations severely and durably compromise the exercise of the right to freedom of association by Algerian workers, and hamper the proper functioning of the trade unions. In addition, the current legislative framework does not contain the necessary guarantees of protection of the right to organize and bargain collectively, as prescribed by the Convention.

We therefore urge the Government to take, without delay, the necessary measures to give full effect to the Convention, particularly to:

- adopt the legislative provisions to strengthen protection of workers against acts of anti-union discrimination, including during the period in which an established trade union is applying for registration;
- ensure that penalties against employers who use anti-union strategies are dissuasive and effectively applied;
- improve and speed up the administrative and judicial procedures to identify and remedy serious acts of anti-union discrimination;
- revise trade union registration procedures in order to shorten the processing times which can currently take years;

- repeal the provisions of section 8 of Act No. 23-02 providing that gifts and legacies from external sources are only acceptable with the prior agreement of the administrative authorities;
- revise the criteria for trade unions' representativeness for the determination of their status as exclusive bargaining agent, ensuring that these criteria are objective, preestablished and precise so as to avoid any opportunity for partiality or abuse, in case controversy should arise;
- repeal sections 73(3) and (81) of Act No. 23-02, which constitute a breach of the freedom of workers to establish trade unions without prior authorization, and undue interference in the internal affairs of trade unions;
- adopt legislative provisions guaranteeing minority trade unions the right to negotiate at least on behalf of their own members.

These measures should be taken in consultation with the social partners.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the oral and written information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

While noting the Government's ongoing process to reform the national legislation on the right to organize and collective bargaining, the Committee expressed concern about the numerous allegations of anti-union discrimination and interference. It further noted that the Committee of Experts had asked the Government to report on the implications of the new legislation in 2025.

Taking into account the discussion, the Committee requested the Government to take all necessary measures, in consultation with the social partners, to:

- strengthen cooperation with the independent social partners with a view to overcoming any outstanding challenge posed by the new legislation in order to provide the necessary guarantees for the protection of the right to organize and collective bargaining, in line with the Convention;
- adopt and effectively enforce legislation to strengthen the protection of workers against any forms of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference, including by intensifying the role of labour inspection;
- improve and speed up administrative and judicial procedures to identify and remedy acts of anti-union discrimination;
- ensure sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against anti-union discrimination;
- revise the procedures for registering trade unions in order to reduce the duration of those procedures and ensure that measures to protect union leaders and members against reprisals are effectively implemented during such procedure;
- avoid any act of interference with the functioning of workers' organizations and employers' organizations, including the General Confederation of Algerian Employers (CGEA), to preserve their full autonomy and independence;
- review the relevant sections of Act No. 23-02 with a view to ensuring the right to freely form workers' and employers' organizations to ensure that they set out precise, pre- established and objective criteria for the determination of employers' and workers' organization representativeness and that such criteria are effectively applied and ensure that employers' and workers' organizations are not prevented from receiving financial or other assistance by international workers' and employers' organizations;

- guarantee the right for minority unions to bargain at least on behalf of their own members; and
- guarantee that personal data of employers' and workers' organization members received to assess the continued representativeness of the respective organizations is kept under strict confidentiality so as to discourage any acts of anti-union discrimination.

The Committee requested the Government to provide a detailed report on the implementation of its recommendations and results achieved by 1 September 2024.

Government representative – I take this opportunity to thank all those who took part in the discussion on my country's application of the Convention: the social partners and Government representatives. My delegation takes due note of the Committee's conclusions.

This opportunity has enabled my delegation to present my country's achievements in the areas of social dialogue, collective bargaining and respect for fundamental principles and rights at work. It has led to constructive exchanges, as expressed by many of the speakers.

My delegation has openly provided all the necessary details and clarifications to the observations made in the Committee of Experts' report concerning the new legislative framework, namely the two Acts enacted recently in 2023: Act No. 23-02 on the exercise of the right to organize, and Act No. 23-08 on the prevention and settlement of collective disputes and the exercise of the right to strike.

Social dialogue, which is the cornerstone of this Organization, is guaranteed through the provisions of these two Acts. We will nevertheless closely examine the Committee's recommendations, which reflect the speakers' comments during the Committee's discussions of my country's case, in a social dialogue setting with national trade union and employer organizations and advisory bodies, as has been the tradition of my country's policy for several decades.

My delegation reiterates my country's commitment to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee of Experts and this Committee, and to continue to keep the ILO informed of the legislative developments in the exercise of trade union rights and the achievements in social dialogue with the social partners.

Lastly, Algeria will continue to fulfil its commitments to which it is bound as an ILO Member State as it is doing and has done since it won its independence 60 years ago.

Australia (ratification: 1969)

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122)

Written information provided by the Government

The Government has provided the following written information as well as copies of the Secure Jobs, Better Pay Act, 2022, the Closing Loopholes No. 2 Act 2024, and the Paid Family and Domestic Violence Leave Act, 2022.

Active policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment (Article 1)

The Government's vision for a stronger and more inclusive economy is set out in Working Future: The Australian Government's White Paper on Jobs and Opportunities, published on 25 September 2023. Informed by over 400 stakeholder submissions, the White Paper builds on the outcomes from the September 2022 Jobs and Skills Summit, which brought together unions, employers, civil society and governments to strengthen tripartism and constructive social dialogue.

The White Paper sets five ambitious objectives to achieve the Australian Government's vision:

- delivering sustained and inclusive full employment;
- promoting job security and strong, sustainable wage growth;
- reigniting productivity growth;
- filling skills needs and building our future workforce;
- overcoming barriers to employment and broadening opportunity.

Employment trends and active labour market measures

The Government has delivered significant employment and workplace relations policy reforms to address issues including insecure work, unemployment and underemployment.

Australia's employment service, Workforce Australia, commenced in July 2022. For people further from the labour market, including the long-term unemployed, Workforce Australia provides intensive case management delivered by employment service providers. Workforce Australia includes settings designed to assist the long-term unemployed, such as progress payments to incentivize providers to improve jobseekers' employability, and a bonus payment for providers when they assist a very long-term unemployed jobseeker into work.

The White Paper contains eight principles for reforming employment services so they support individuals to meet employment goals and provide pathways towards decent and secure work, including for First Nations people. Among other issues, the White Paper acknowledges the challenges faced by the long-term unemployed, including skill atrophy, loss of motivation and marginalization from the labour market.

On 14 May 2024, the Government responded to these issues in the 2024–2025 budget, announcing funding for improving employment services to better support the long-term unemployed and those with complex personal circumstances. This funding includes the Real Jobs, Real Wages initiative to support people at risk of long-term unemployment into secure work via a tapered wage subsidy over six months, and the WorkFoundations initiative to assist people with complex employment barriers to build work readiness, funding social enterprises and businesses to deliver paid employment placements with tailored, wrap-around supports.

Recent amendments to national industrial relations legislation have addressed insecure work. Under the Secure Jobs, Better Pay Act, 2022, job security was added to the objectives of the Fair Work Act, 2009, and the modern awards system, meaning Australia's workplace tribunal, the Fair Work Commission, must consider these matters when performing its functions. Fixed-term contracts, unless an exception applies, are now limited to two years (including renewals) or two consecutive contracts – whichever is shorter. This ensures employees are not kept on fixed-term contracts for roles that could be secure ongoing work.

Additionally, the Closing Loopholes No. 2 Act, 2024, introduced an interpretive principle providing that the terms “employee” and “employer” are determined by assessing the real substance, practical reality and true nature of the working relationship, in line with the ILO’s Employment Relationship Recommendation, 2006 (No. 198). This Act also legislated an objective definition of “casual employee”, so the practical reality of the employment relationship is relevant, not just the contractual description, and provided a pathway for eligible casual employees to choose to become permanent. This will particularly benefit women, who make up 53.1 per cent of casual workers.¹ Separately, the Act empowered the Fair Work Commission to set minimum standards for road transport workers and “employee like” platform economy workers, also providing these workers with a consent-based collective agreements framework and dispute resolution for unfair termination or deactivation.

Youth employment

The Government continues to support young people to gain work experience including through wage subsidies, observational work experience and volunteer work. In 2022, the Government strengthened Transition to Work – a targeted service to support disadvantaged young people at risk of an unsuccessful transition from school to work – through expanded eligibility criteria to target young people at risk, increases in the maximum time participants can receive the programme’s assistance (up from 18 to 24 months), stronger engagement mechanisms to enhance participation, and new performance frameworks for contracted providers.

Referrals to the Youth Jobs PaTH Internship programme were paused in July 2022 and the programme was abolished in September 2022, as the programme settings did not meet the Government’s expectations of fair and equitable pay for interns. The National Work Experience Programme, which had similar programme settings, was also abolished.

In the 2024–2025 budget, the Government announced the establishment of a “Commonwealth Prac Payment” to support eligible students of teaching, nursing and midwifery, and social work in higher education and vocational education and training (VET) to complete their placements. The new Payment will help ease the cost-of-living pressures experienced by many students when undertaking mandatory practicum placements as part of their degrees.

In considering future work experience policy and programmes, the Government has consulted widely with business, unions, individuals, employment services stakeholders and community organizations. The Employment Youth Advisory Group, with young people aged 16 to 25, also provides advice to the Government and shares insights on how young people are making the transition between education and work.

Women

Working for Women: A Strategy for Gender Equality, released in March 2024, outlines the Government’s vision for gender equality, with women’s economic equality and security a priority area of the Strategy. Core to driving gender equality is gender-responsive budgeting which puts consideration of issues that impact gender at the heart of policy design and budget decisions across the Government’s policies and investments.

Workplace relations reforms have centred gender equality in workplace relations systems, improving equity, safety and economic security for women. These include banning pay secrecy clauses, prohibiting sexual harassment in connection with work, and strengthening access to unpaid parental leave and flexible work, helping parents to balance work and care. The Government has also introduced new protected attributes (personal characteristics that cannot be used as a basis for discrimination) in the Fair Work Act, 2009, including breastfeeding, gender identity, subjection to family and domestic violence, and intersex status.

In 2023, the Paid Family and Domestic Violence Leave Act, 2022, came into effect providing an entitlement to ten days paid family and domestic violence leave. This entitlement is applicable to all Australian employees including casuals, recognizing that women experiencing family and domestic violence are more likely to be employed in casual and insecure work. This measure followed Australia's ratification of the ILO's Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190).

In Australia there are various mechanisms which can result in wage increases, including work value cases, equal remuneration orders and the Annual Wage Review. The Government has established new expert panels in the Fair Work Commission to hear applications for pay equity and modern award matters in the Care and Community Sector. The addition of gender equality to the minimum wages and modern awards objectives in the Fair Work Act, 2009, significantly influenced the wage rise in the 2022–2023 Annual Wage Review. Australia's aged care workers have also been awarded increases of up to 28.5 per cent through a work value case. A key determinant in awarding this increase was the historical undervaluation of care work because of gender-based assumptions.

Elsewhere, amendments to the Workplace Gender Equality Act, 2012, have enabled the Workplace Gender Equality Agency to drive transparency and action by publishing the gender pay gap of employers with 100 or more employees. This occurred for the first time in February 2024.

Indigenous peoples

The Government remains committed to realizing the Closing the Gap targets designed to reduce disparities between First Nations people and the rest of the population in fundamental areas of life.

Workforce Australia operates across all non-remote areas in Australia to support First Nations participants into work. This includes 16 providers with Indigenous Specialist Licences, special provision for training and mentoring through the Employment Fund, and immediate eligibility for wage subsidies of up to 10,000 Australian dollars.

Reforms contained in the White Paper include ensuring services are designed and delivered in a culturally responsive and inclusive way that meets First Nations communities' needs, and boosting the participation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander community controlled organizations, and community-based organizations, in the delivery of employment services.

The Government has provided funding to support the National Indigenous Employment and Training Alliance (NIETA), a group of First Nations organizations delivering employment and training services across Australia. NIETA was established to strengthen First Nations voices in employment policy, programme design and implementation, and shape further improvements to employment services and training supports to meet the needs of First Nations people. The Government continues to support NIETA as a critical stakeholder in employment service reforms across both remote and non-remote areas.

The Government has committed to replacing the Community Development Program (CDP) with real jobs, proper wages and decent conditions – developed in partnership with First Nations people. As a first step, the Government announced a commitment to implement a new Remote Jobs and Economic Development Program (RJED), to start in the second half of 2024. The RJED will support people in remote communities to move into employment by funding meaningful jobs that communities want. Eligible community organizations will be funded to create new jobs to employ local people at least at the minimum wage and conditions.

As not everyone will be ready to enter employment or may require other support services, a remote employment service will still be needed. CDP services will continue through an extension of most CDP provider agreements until 30 June 2025 while RJED is scaled up and a new remote employment service is developed.

The Indigenous Skills and Employment Program (ISEP) is a new First Nations-specific employment programme that aims to connect First Nations people to jobs, career advancement opportunities, new training and job-ready activities. ISEP projects are designed with community and key stakeholders to ensure that activities respond to the local context, leverage opportunities and deliver sustainable employment outcomes.

In addition, the Government will invest 76.2 million Australian dollars over five years in a new employment programme to improve the transition from prison to work for First Nations people, building on the Time to Work Employment Service.

Participation of the social partners in the formulation and implementation of employment policies

The Government continues to meaningfully engage with a broad range of stakeholders and social partners on employment and workplace relations issues and policies. Government, employers and unions worked together at the September 2022 Jobs and Skills Summit, leading to the Employment White Paper. The Government also consults with social partners through regular sectoral and industry forums such as the National Construction Industry Forum.

As outlined in the White Paper, the Government is committed to designing and delivering employment services through collaboration with people, community and businesses, including social partners. The Government has demonstrated its belief in working with stakeholders, including social partners, through the recent design of the new voluntary pre-employment service for parents, the policy development of the WorkFoundations initiative, and the design of the new employment programme to improve the transition for First Nations people from prison to work. It remains committed to these projects, going forward.

In March 2024, the Government announced a Ministerial Advisory Board for Jobs and Skills Australia (JSA), an expert agency that provides independent advice on current and emerging labour market and workforce needs. Consistent with the commitment that the JSA will operate as a tripartite partnership, the Ministerial Advisory Board ensures a voice for social partners to address skills, labour market and workforce development needs. Moreover, the Government has established industry-specific Jobs and Skills Councils, bringing together employers, unions and governments in a tripartite arrangement to find solutions to skills and workforce challenges.

Consultation on employment and labour policies continues at the state and territory level. For example, the South Australian Skills Commission established ten Industry Skills Councils to provide a mechanism for businesses, peak industry associations and social partners to discuss skills and workforce needs with local government.

The social partners were consulted in the preparation of this report.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the Government representative of Australia, the Assistant Secretary, Economics and International Labour, Department of Employment and Workplace Relations, to take the floor.

Government representative – Australia acknowledges the important role of the Committee of Experts and this Committee within the ILO supervisory system. Ensuring the effective application of international labour standards is critical to achieving our shared objective of sustained and inclusive economic growth, full and productive employment and decent work for all.

The Government remains committed to meeting our obligations under the Convention and to working with social partners to ensure that employment policy in Australia supports a dynamic and inclusive labour market in which people have the opportunity for secure, well-paid jobs and where workers, employers and communities can thrive and adapt.

The information presented today, and the written information submitted to the Office on 20 May 2024, responds directly to the observations made by the Committee of Experts to Australia. The Australian Government looks forward with interest to receiving the Committee's conclusions.

Since 2021, the Australian Government has implemented significant new reforms to enhance employment policy, as our nation recovers from the impacts of the COVID-19 pandemic and adjusts to structural changes in our labour market.

In September 2023, the Government released its Working Future: the Australian Government's White Paper on Jobs and Opportunities. The White Paper articulates the Government's vision for a strong and inclusive economy and serves as a road map to meeting future labour market needs in Australia.

It draws on extensive stakeholder and community consultation, including outcomes from the tripartite Jobs and Skills Summit held in 2022, and among its objectives is a focus on delivering sustained and inclusive full employment.

To achieve this, the White Paper identifies strategic priorities for employment services reform in Australia, to support people into decent and secure work, and to overcome the complex barriers to workforce participation, particularly for those who have experienced entrenched disadvantage.

Turning now to the specific matters raised by the Committee or Experts and others, we will share some key developments since the last reporting period.

The Committee sought clarification as to how various issues including unemployment, underemployment and insecure work are considered and implemented in Australia's policymaking and implementation settings.

In 2022, the new employment service – Workforce Australia – commenced. It includes a digital service to support job-ready jobseekers, and an intensive case management service for jobseekers who require more tailored support to enter the labour market. This includes mechanisms designed to assist the long-term unemployed such as progress payments to incentivize providers to improve jobseekers' employability, and a bonus payment for providers when they assist a very long-term unemployed jobseeker into work.

Enhancements to these settings were recently announced in the 2024–25 budget, reflecting further commitment and investment by the Government to creating meaningful and sustainable paid employment pathways.

The Government has also made significant amendments to our labour laws to strengthen workplace protections, job security and access to fairly paid work.

This includes the Fair Work Legislation Amendment (Closing Loopholes) Act 2023 aimed at strengthening a person's job security, pay and conditions, regardless of their employment status. Amendments relating to casual workers were enacted, introducing a fair and objective definition of casual workers in the Fair Work Act, and providing a clearer pathway for casuals to move to permanent employment should they choose to do so.

A further measure designed to address insecure work will commence on 26 August 2024, at which time the Fair Work Commission – Australia's national workplace tribunal – will be able to set minimum standards for employee-like workers and provide protection from unfair dismissal from a digital labour platform. Additionally, under the Secure Jobs, Better Pay Act 2022, the Fair Work Commission must now consider job security and secure work in its decisions.

The Committee also made observations in the context of the Convention with respect to population groups in Australia, including youth, women and indigenous Australians. Since this time, measures to enhance Australia's youth employment programmes have been introduced.

In 2022, the Government strengthened the Transition to Work service (TtW), the targeted service to support disadvantaged young people at risk of an unsuccessful transition from school to work. This included expanding the eligibility criteria for the programme to target young people with more complex barriers to education and employment, as well as increases to the maximum time participants can receive assistance through the TtW programme from 18 to 24 months. Likewise, stronger engagement mechanisms were introduced to increase participation, and changes to the performance frameworks implemented for the contracted providers.

In response to stakeholder feedback and reflecting the Government's own expectations around providing fair and equitable pay and conditions for interns, the Youth Jobs PaTH (Prepare, Trial, Hire) programme was abolished in October 2022. Increasing women's economic security has remained a national focus in Australia. Recent legislative and policy developments are aimed at ensuring women have access to safe, secure and fairly paid employment and centre gender equality in workplace relations systems. For instance, the Fair Work Act 2009 was amended to embed the principles of job security and gender equality in the Fair Work Commission's decision-making processes and ensuring they are given appropriate weight alongside other objectives, such as productivity and economic growth, throughout the workplace relations framework.

Gender equality has also been included in the minimum wages objective to ensure that equal remuneration, gender-based undervaluation, and gender pay gaps are considered in wage-related matters, including the Annual Wage Review. Other reforms include, but are not limited to, banning pay secrecy clauses, prohibiting sexual harassment in connection with work, and strengthening access to unpaid parental leave and flexible work helping parents to balance work and care.

We now turn to the Committee of Experts' comments regarding employment policies to support Australia's First Nations peoples. The Australian Government is striving to ensure that First Nations peoples have the opportunity to fully participate in employment and training and benefit from areas of economic growth and development across Australia, fostering self-determination and economic empowerment. The Government is committed to working in genuine partnership with First Nations peoples to ensure they have safe, ongoing and well-paid work with the skills needed for a sustainable future and full engagement in economic opportunities, fostering self-determination and economic empowerment. We will continue to implement the Closing the Gap priority reforms, including those that contribute to the economic empowerment of First Nations peoples in Australia. To stay on track in meeting this objective, the Government is implementing key employment reforms supporting First Nations Australians. Strengthening partnerships with First Nations peoples in policy development and the design of programmes which will enable employment and training policies to be effective in supporting the aspirations, needs and self-determination of First Nations peoples in Australia. Through Workforce Australia, employment services are delivered to First Nations participants across all non-remote areas of Australia.

First Nations consultation and collaboration is being strengthened by the National Indigenous Employment and Training Alliance (NIETA), a group of First Nations organizations delivering employment and training services across Australia. The new Indigenous Skills and Employment Program (ISEP) is a First Nations-specific employment programme that aims to connect First Nations people to jobs, career advancement opportunities, new training and job-ready activities. Projects are developed with the local community before implementing them, leveraging the strengths, interests and needs of local First Nations communities. A new Remote Jobs and Economic Development Program will be implemented later this year. Developed in partnership with First Nations peoples, this programme will support people in remote communities to move into employment by funding meaningful jobs, with proper wages and decent conditions.

Finally, we note the reflections of the Committee of Experts on the Australian Government's consultation with social partners in the development of employment policy. The Australian Government continues to meaningfully engage with a broad range of stakeholders and social partners on employment and workplace relations issues and policies. The outcomes of the 2022 Jobs and Skills Summit highlighted the value of tripartite collaboration at the national level. Regular sectoral and industry forums also enable consultation with social partners.

The recent design of the new voluntary pre-employment service for parents, the policy development of the WorkFoundations initiative, and the design of the new employment programme to improve the transition for First Nations peoples from prison to work, further illustrate our commitment to ensuring that the views of social partners are taken into account in the formulation of employment policy in Australia.

To conclude, Australia reiterates the view that we comply with our obligations under the Convention. We are confident that the combination of employment service programmes, labour laws and policies outlined today and developed in consultation with social partners and civil society, illustrate full compliance with the Articles of the Convention and its objectives. We look forward to hearing views shared during this discussion and the Committee's conclusions.

Employer members – Thank you to the Government of Australia for your oral and written information on the case which has been taken with good note. The Employer members stressed the importance of States' compliance with the Convention, a so-called governance or priority Convention. The Employer members firmly believe that compliance with the Convention is critical to ensuring meaningful opportunities for both workers and business, and also to ensuring the broader effectiveness of the ten core ILO Conventions.

Australia ratified the Convention in 1969. This is the first time that this case has been heard at the Committee but 15 observations have been issued in the case, though I am not going to spend time going through each year. In addition, 11 direct requests have also been issued on this case but again I am not going to spend time identifying each year. This case also quite critically exists within the broader context of fundamental and extensive changes to Australia's governing labour and employment legislative scheme, which the Australian Government has taken note of in its observations. It is often instructive to review the text of the applicable Convention. Here, Article 1 of the Convention states, in the relevant part, that, and I am quoting here: "each Member shall declare and pursue, as a major goal, an active policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment" and that this policy "shall aim at ensuring that – (a) there is work for all who are available for and seeking work; (b) such work is as productive as possible; (c) there is freedom of choice of employment and the fullest possible opportunity for each worker to qualify for, and to use his skills and endowments in, a job for which he is well suited".

The text and import of the Convention are fundamental to any meaningful analysis of this case. The text and import of the Convention highlight that we must assess here, first: whether and to what extent certain Australians are, or were, "available for and seeking work"?

Second, what it means to have such work be "as productive as possible," who should make that value judgement, whether so-called "non-standard" or "casual" work can legitimately be claimed to be insufficiently "unproductive" to run afoul of the Convention?

Third, whether "casual" or "non-standard work" actually reflects workers' free choice to employment in a job for which they are "well suited"?

Fourth, whether Australia has genuinely endeavoured to fulfil its obligations under the Convention, particularly as the impact of fresh and transformative laws and initiatives remain very much in flux?

These are complex and subjective questions that require and deserve a diversity of perspectives to meaningfully resolve.

Turning to the issues. The Committee of Experts has identified the following issues which I will address in turn.

First, the Australian Council of Trade Unions (ACTU) has observed that the Australian legal framework encourages the use of non-standard work arrangements. Although the ACTU also rightly acknowledges that these forms of employment can have legitimate purposes, it nonetheless avers that employers use these structures "to avoid the responsibilities associated with a permanent ongoing employment relationship" – I am quoting from the ACTU's observations.

Again, and there is more to say here, the Employer members believe that individuals' decisions to choose to be employed in so-called "casual" arrangements deserve significantly more credence. There are any number of legitimate and appropriate reasons for making these choices that do not provoke any concern under the Convention.

Moreover, we note that the Government has reported that, through its Closing Loopholes Act of 2024, it is endeavouring to interpret the terms "employee" and "employer" through the practical realities of an applicable working relationship, and to define the term “casual employee” to focus on practical realities in lieu of applicable contractual language.

Next, the ACTU claims that the Youth Jobs PaTH programme fails to provide meaningful qualifications to participants, while also excluding them from protection under the occupational health and safety (OSH) legislation.

The Committee of Experts has, in its comment, done a good job of recounting the far more complex picture relating to youth unemployment in Australia, including certain other programmes that are directed at supporting young Australians. More broadly, and I think this is critical, the problem of youth unemployment is not specific to Australia, and it remains a complex problem in many other States.

Moreover, the Government has reported to this Committee that the Youth Jobs PaTH Internship programme was abolished in September 2022 because, per the Government: the programme “did not meet the Government’s expectations around fair and equitable pay for interns”. It would also appear, from the Government’s submission and its comments today, that other youth employment programmes have been implemented after due consultation with the social partners.

Next, the ACTU has claimed that women are over-represented in insecure and low-paid jobs. We note here with interest that the Australian Government has published Working for Women: A Strategy for Gender Equality, in March 2024, which outlines certain budgetary measures designed to facilitate women’s economic equality and security, along with outlining certain relevant legislative measures and, in particular, the Paid Family and Domestic Violence Leave Act.

We further note the Government’s submission describing its new expert panels in its Fair Work Commission for pay equity and modern award matters in the care and community sector, and other efforts to better ensure gender pay equity like amendments to the Workplace Gender Equality Act that have empowered the Workplace Gender Equality Agency to publish a gender pay gap of employers with 100 or more employees.

We welcome these developments as Employer members, but we, nonetheless, request that the Government continue providing information on policy and technical measures that are aimed at increasing both the employment quality and quantity of work for women at the national level.

With respect to First Nations peoples, the ACTU has also criticized the Community Development Programmes (CDP) for providing low-quality jobs.

For its part, both today and in its written submission, the Government has indicated an intention to replace the CDP with “real jobs, proper wages and decent conditions – developed in partnership with First Nations People” and to begin a new Remote Jobs and Economic Development Program (RJED) to start later this year as well as the Indigenous Skills and Employment Program (ISEP).

The Government has also pledged to invest $76.2 million over five years to improve the transition from prison to work for First Nations peoples.

Again, we welcome these developments but the Employer members, nonetheless, request that Australia provide further detail on these issues.

Finally, the ACTU contends that the Government failed to consult it regarding employment policies. We note here, again, the Government’s substantial efforts to consult with a wide array of stakeholders, including an expert advisory panel comprised of employer, provider, and welfare group representatives. We further take note of the Government's submission that, in March 2024, it announced a Ministerial Advisory Board for Jobs and Skills Australia, which has committed to operate in a tripartite fashion.

To the extent that the Committee here, nonetheless, believes that social partners have not been sufficiently consulted, we would align with a recommendation for the Government to better ensure that this specific consultation be conducted. We look forward to hearing the views of our groups on this case.

Worker members – This is the first time we are discussing this case regarding Australia's application of the Convention. In the observations of the Committee of Experts, the Government is requested to provide information on the following:

- on employment trends and active labour market trends, the use of non-standard work arrangements with no pathways to higher-quality jobs;
- on youth employment, the exclusion of youth employment programmes from the protection of OSH legislation, the failure of the Youth Jobs PaTH programme to provide meaningful qualification to participants, and potentially displacing wage-paying jobs;
- on the employment of women, the over-representation of women in insecure, low-paid jobs and the lack of adequate paid parental leave and affordable childcare options forcing women into part-time jobs;
- on indigenous peoples, the CDP and its provision of low-quality jobs to participants who identify as indigenous. The CDP workers are not classified as workers, receive wages well below the minimum wage and are not protected under OSH protections, annual leave or sick leave;
- the failure of the Government to consult the ACTU on matters of employment policies.

We thank the Government for providing additional information after the publication of the longlist which highlights the progress that has been made to addressing the issues raised by the ACTU in 2021, in line with the Convention.

We take note that, according to the Government, it published the Australian Government's White Paper on Jobs and Opportunities, on 25 September 2023, which took into account information received from over 400 stakeholder submissions. The White Paper also builds on the outcomes from the September 2022 Jobs and Skills Summit. The Summit brought together unions, employers, civil society and governments to strengthen tripartism and constructive social dialogue.

According to the Government, the White Paper sets five ambitious objectives to achieve the Australian Government's vision:

- (1) delivering sustained and inclusive full employment;
- (2) promoting job security and strong, sustainable wage growth;
- (3) reigniting productivity growth;
- (4) filling skills needs and building our future workforce;
- (5) overcoming barriers to employment and broadening opportunity.

According to the Government they have delivered significant employment and workplace relations policy reforms to address issues including insecure work, unemployment and underemployment.

Australia's employment service, Workforce Australia, commenced in July 2022. They provide people that are further from the labour market, including the long-term unemployed, with intensive case management delivered by employment service providers.

The White Paper also contains principles for reforming employment services, so they support individuals, including First Nations peoples, to meet employment goals and provide pathways towards decent and secure work.

Regarding challenges faced by the long-term unemployed including skill atrophy, loss of motivation and marginalization from the labour market, the Government indicated that it is providing funding for improving employment services to better support the long-term unemployed and those with complex personal circumstances.

The recent amendments to the national industrial relations legislation are also aimed at addressing the challenges posed by insecure work. Under the Secure Jobs, Better Pay Act, 2022, job security was added to the objectives of the Fair Work Act, 2009 and the modern awards system, meaning Australia's workplace tribunal, the Fair Work Commission, must consider these matters when performing its functions. The Closing Loopholes No. 2 Act, 2024 is also aimed at providing necessary safeguards to deal with insecure and precarious employment. The ILO's Employment Relationship Recommendation, 2006 (No. 198), provides useful guidance in this regard.

On youth employment, according to the Government, they continue to support youth to gain work experience including through wage subsidies, observational work experience, and volunteer work. In 2022, the Government strengthened the TtW – a targeted service to support disadvantaged young people at risk of an unsuccessful transition from school to work.

Regarding the Youth Jobs PaTH Internship programme, the Government indicated that it was paused in July 2022 and that the programme was abolished in September 2022, as the programme settings did not meet the Government's expectations around fair and equitable pay for interns. The National Work Experience Programme (NWEPP), which had similar programme settings, was also abolished.

According to the Government, it has announced the establishment of a "Commonwealth Prac Payment" to support eligible teaching, nursing and midwifery, and social work students in higher education and vocational education and training (VET), complete their placements which among others will also help ease the cost-of-living pressures experienced by many students when undertaking mandatory practicum placements as part of their degrees.

On the issue raised regarding working women, the Government stated that in March this year it released a Strategy for Gender Equality, which outlines the vision for gender equality, with women's economic equality and security as a priority area of the Strategy. The Government has also introduced new protected attributes in the Fair Work Act, 2009, including breastfeeding, gender identity, subjection to family and domestic violence, and intersex status. In 2023, the Paid Family and Domestic Violence Leave Act, 2022, which provides an entitlement to ten days paid family and domestic violence leave, was created. This entitlement is applicable to all Australian employees including casual workers, recognizing that women experiencing family and domestic violence are more likely to be employed in casual and insecure work. According to the Government, the measure followed Australia's ratification of the ILO's Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190).

In Australia there are various mechanisms which can result in wage increases, including work value cases, equal remuneration orders and the Annual Wage Review. The Government has established new expert panels in the Fair Work Commission to hear applications for pay equity and modern award matters in the care and community sector. The addition of gender equality to the minimum wages and modern awards objectives in the Fair Work Act, 2009, significantly influenced the wage rise in the 2022–23 Annual Wage Review. Australia's aged care workers have also been awarded increases of up to 28.5 per cent through a work value case. A key determinant in awarding this increase was the historical undervaluation of care work because of gender-based assumptions.

There have also been amendments to the Workplace Gender Equality Act, 2012, which has enabled the Workplace Gender Equality Agency to drive transparency and action by publishing the gender pay gap of employers with 100 or more employees. This took place for the first time in February 2024.

Regarding indigenous peoples, the Government has expressed its commitment to realizing the Closing the Gap targets, designed to reduce disparities between First Nations peoples and the rest of the population in fundamental areas of life. The Government's White Paper contains measures to ensure services are designed and delivered in a culturally responsive and inclusive way that meets First Nations communities' needs and boosting the participation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander community-controlled organizations, and community-based organizations, in the delivery of employment services.

We urge the Government to, as it has indicated, replace the CDP with real jobs, proper wages and decent conditions – developed in partnership with First Nations peoples.

Finally, we note that the Government has committed to continue to meaningfully consult and ensure the participation of the social partners in the formulation and implementation of employment policies.

The Convention is aimed at stimulating economic growth and development, raising levels of living, meeting workforce requirements and overcoming unemployment and underemployment, obliging each Member State to declare and pursue, as a major goal, an active policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment.

In applying the Convention, representatives of the persons affected by the measures to be taken, and in particular representatives of employers and workers, are to be consulted concerning employment policies, with a view to taking fully into account their experience and views and securing their full cooperation in formulating and enlisting support for such policies. We appreciate that the Government is taking steps in this direction and welcome the efforts.

Employer member, Australia – It is the view of Australian employers that Australia complies with the Convention. I am surprised that Australia has been selected among the cases to be examined by the Committee of Experts, considering our view of compliance is shared by Australian workers and, of course, by the Australian Government.

A key point of difference we have with our Worker friends, however, is our view that Australia has consistently complied with the Convention. We did not share the views of the ACTU in 2021. My surprise that Australia is being examined today is not based solely on the shared view of compliance. The Committee need only look at Australia's recent employment trends and labour market measures. Unemployment in my country remains at around 4 per cent. Job vacancies remain high, almost double their pre-COVID levels, with employers struggling to find people with the right skills for unfilled positions. In trend terms, we are also seeing strong growth in full-time employment.

Employers are responding to labour and skills shortages by retaining workers where they can and offering more full-time employment to those with the right skills. While more can always be done, Australian employers appreciate measures implemented by consecutive governments to boost the workforce participation of women, young jobseekers, the long-term unemployed, those living in regional communities, those with a disability and First Nations peoples. These policies help to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, as required by Article 1 of the Convention.

I thank the Australian Government for the information it has provided to the Committee on recent actions it has taken in furtherance of the principles of the Convention. We are particularly encouraged by the establishment of Jobs and Skills Australia to provide independent advice on current, emerging, and future workforce skills and training needs. Operating as a tripartite partnership, both my organization, the Australian Chamber of Commerce and Industry (ACCI), and the ACTU hold key positions on the Jobs and Skills Australia Ministerial Advisory Board. This body is evidence that tripartism is alive and well in Australia, in compliance with Article 3 of the Convention, and is only just one such an example.

It is through such forums that we continue to push for greater support to be provided to the long-term unemployed and young jobseekers, particularly through investment in apprenticeships and other training programmes.

While we are broadly supportive of the efforts of the Government to boost workforce participation, Australian employers have significant concerns about the impact of its recent industrial relations changes. Recent changes to casual employment, to labour hire and to independent contracting make it harder for business to source the labour they need.

We urge the Government to take note of Article 1 of the Convention which refers to freedom of choice of employment and to recognize that diverse forms of work are desired by many workers for the flexibility they provide. In fact, flexibility is essential to boosting the workforce participation of many of the categories I have already listed, including women and young jobseekers in particular.

Worker member, Australia – I thank you for the opportunity to make an intervention on behalf of the ACTU. The ACTU is the sole peak trade union body in Australia, representing over 1.7 million workers. In 2021 we made a submission to the Committee of Experts highlighting our concerns that the Australian Government was not fulfilling its obligations under the Convention to pursue an active policy to promote full, productive, and freely chosen employment, including in consultation with the social partners. We raised the prevalence of insecure work, underemployment, and unemployment, and the lack of active labour market policies to address these problems, as a key reason Australia was failing to meet its obligations under the Convention.

Since we made our submission to the Committee of Experts, however, the previous coalition Government was defeated at a general election and the Australian Labour Party Albanese Government took office in May 2022. The new Government has undertaken a range of significant reforms in consultation with the social partners that have closed the loopholes that existed in Australia's industrial relations framework and in our view are in line with the Convention.

Secure jobs are critical to realizing decent work – workers need to have a secure, predictable income and hours of work in order to plan and enjoy a good quality of life and eliminate the vulnerabilities that create conditions for forced labour and the slippery slope of labour becoming a commodity – contrary to the Constitution of the ILO. The cost-of-living crisis makes addressing the rise of insecure work even more urgent – workers need reliable jobs so that they can have reliable incomes and prevent a situation of highly unequal society that threatens social cohesion and harmony.

Work has become increasingly more precarious. New forms of work have emerged where millions of workers are now engaged outside of the protections that are meant to be afforded under the Fair Work Act – Australia’s principal industrial relations law. Our laws have not kept pace with the changing nature of work, and employers were increasingly restructuring, reorganizing, or using technicalities to avoid the responsibilities of a permanent employment relationship – and shift the costs and risks onto the worker.

The most prevalent form of insecure work in Australia is what is known as “casual employment” – a worker engaged on a casual basis is supposed to be someone who works irregular or unpredictable hours and with no firm commitment of future work. They have no paid leave entitlements and limited job security, and in return, a casual employee is supposed to receive a loading – usually 25 per cent extra pay – on top of their base rate of pay, and a partial right to decline requests by their employer to work. But even with the 25 per cent loading, permanent workers still earn 11 per cent more than casuals.

More than 2.7 million workers in Australia are engaged in casual work arrangements – or a little under one in four employees. Casual work is highly concentrated in lower paid, feminized industries – for instance in care and support work. Most casual workers are women, and 40 per cent of casual workers are between the ages of 15–24.

There is nothing casual about casual work, however, as the majority of casual employees work every week and have been in their job for over one year. The continual use of casual employment, where ongoing, regular work occurs, is a major contributor to the rising lack of secure employment in Australia. The former Government introduced a loophole that enabled an employer to call any worker a casual, even if they worked ongoing, regular hours.

The current Government, however, has recently undertaken a number of reforms to address the crisis of insecure work. These changes include:

- adding “job security” as a central objective of the Fair Work Act, meaning that Australia’s workplace tribunal, the Fair Work Commission, must consider the objective of job security when performing its functions.
- restricting the use of fixed-term contracts to two years or two consecutive contracts (whichever is shorter).
- legislating a definition of “casual employee” that takes into account the reality of the employment relationship and providing a pathway for a casual worker to convert to permanency.
- ensuring that labour hire workers receive the same pay as directly employed workers on agreements doing the same work.
- enabling “employee-like” workers engaged by a digital labour platform to be covered by minimum standards and allowing workers to challenge “unfair deactivations”.

There are a number of other reforms the Government has recently undertaken that are in line with the Convention, including measures to improve women’s workforce participation, such as:

- adding “gender equality” as a central objective of the Fair Work Act;

- strengthening the right to request flexible working arrangements and giving the Fair Work Commission additional powers to arbitrate over flexible work requests – which will enable women and parents to better balance work and care and improve their workforce participation;
- addressing women's safety at work by introducing a prohibition on sexual harassment in the Fair Work Act and strengthened protections against discrimination;
- measures to close the gender pay gap, including:
 - introducing multi-employer bargaining in female-dominated industries, such as aged care and early childhood education and care;
 - pay increases for aged care workers to account for the historic undervaluation of care work;
 - introducing superannuation on paid parental leave; and
 - prohibiting pay secrecy clauses in employment contracts that hide pay discrimination against women and giving workers the right to disclose their remuneration.

The Government has also taken action to address two other key issues we raised in our comments to the Committee of Experts regarding two exploitative employment programmes:

- They have abolished the Youth Jobs PaTH Internship programme which exploited young workers and displaced wage-paying jobs.
- They have committed to replacing the exploitative CDP, which was primarily targeted at Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples in remote areas, with a programme developed in consultation with First Nations peoples.

Finally, we note the actions the Australian Government has taken in line with Article 3 of the Convention, which requires Member States to consult with employers' and workers' representatives regarding employment policies. The Government undertook an extensive consultation process with the development of its employment White Paper which outlines a comprehensive employment strategy, building on the outcomes of the Jobs and Skills Summit held in 2022 that brought together the social partners and other stakeholders to discuss employment policy. A key reform in this area is the establishment of the tripartite, statutory body Jobs and Skills Australia to provide advice on workforce skills and training needs, with a Ministerial Advisory Board with representation from the social partners. We welcome this inclusive and consultative approach by the Government of Australia in this regard.

All of these measures will strengthen protections for workers and promote job security, but the full benefit of these reforms will take time. While noting the enormous progress made under this new Government, there is still more that must be done to progress towards the goal of full, productive and freely chosen employment for all, including:

- further action to eliminate the pay gap between Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander workers and non-indigenous workers, and improve job security and employment rates for indigenous workers;
- further expanding and improving paid parental leave, and further steps to close the gender pay gap and remove barriers to women's workforce participation;
- abolishing youth wages and unpaid internships;

- increasing social security payments to ensure that jobseekers and others receiving social security are able to keep up with the rising cost of living and live in dignity.

Worker member, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland – Despite the vast geographical distance that lies between us, the world of work in the United Kingdom and Australia has many similarities. The Committee of Experts’ notes aspects of the 2021 ACTU observations that are familiar to workers in the United Kingdom: problems of insecure work, inequality, youth unemployment and the lack of meaningful consultation with social partners, are all issues my organization, the Trade Union Congress (TUC), has often raised. So, we have looked into this particular case with great interest.

We recognize the ACTU’s concerns that, in 2021, insecurity was a growing problem, leading to lower pay, underemployment and the lack of access to workers’ rights available to those with more secure employment. Insecure work affected 24 per cent of Australia’s workers. At the same time, youth unemployment was at a 30-year high, suggesting that casualization of work was having a deleterious effect on potential new workers attempting to enter the labour market. Access to the full range of rights was restricted for many women, with only 43 per cent of women in a full-time permanent job, with entitlements such as paid sick leave, which many workers in the group of industrialized market economy countries (IMEC) nations might take for granted.

Our own experience of insecure work shows that casualization – and in our context particularly zero-hours contracts, through which workers risk missing out on access to key rights and protections at work, lack income security and face lower rates of pay – often disproportionately affects women and minority groups and, especially, women from minority groups. It is therefore encouraging to see the range of initiatives brought in by the Australian Government since 2022 aimed at eradicating barriers to full-time, permanent work for women, such as the right to request flexible working hours, introducing better protections against sexual harassment and increasing pay transparency. The TUC is a strong advocate of pay transparency, including pay gap reporting not only on gender, but also race and disability, as a driver towards equitable pay.

Similar to Australia in 2021, the United Kingdom currently has a high persistent youth unemployment rate at around 15 per cent. Therefore, we will watch with interest to see if recent Australian Government policy reforms continue to drive lower rates in Australia, with rates having fallen from 13 per cent at the time of the ACTU report to under 10 per cent now. Young workers in the UK are also far more likely than other workers to be on zero-hours contracts, so Australian-style restrictions on casualization would also be of benefit at home.

As always, the presence of trade unions mitigates against inequality and exploitation, so we welcome the Australian Government’s moves to allow increased union access to unorganized workplaces and the right to represent the interests of potential members, allowing a huge increase in the number of workers who can benefit from unions’ proven track record of improving conditions.

Article 3 of the Convention states that “In the application of this Convention, representatives of the persons affected by the measures to be taken, and in particular representatives of employers and workers, shall be consulted concerning employment policies, with a view to taking fully into account their experience and views and securing their full cooperation in formulating and enlisting support for such policies.”

It is heartening, therefore, to see Australian initiatives like Jobs and Skills Australia, which are an excellent reflection of the Convention, as it does in the Government’s words take “a tripartite approach with state and territory governments, industry, employers, unions and training providers, promoting a training system that meets the needs of employees, employers and the economy”.

Structured tripartite consultative mechanisms, which can make social partnership tangible and are fully able to positively impact conditions and ensure decent work, are always to be welcomed.

We live in a crisis of insecurity on both sides of our planet, and many places besides. Without the values enshrined in the Convention, including the preamble’s objective of “just and favourable conditions of work”, the world of work may continue to fragment and deliver poor outcomes for working people. The principles of social dialogue (underpinned, of course, by the freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining), can, through structured tripartite consultation and sectoral agreement, begin the process of addressing and reversing this trend. Efforts to end gender, race and disability-based pay disparities, and to equalize rights and conditions for workers on different types of contracts, will erode inequalities. And addressing youth unemployment and insecurity through serious efforts to boost skills and create decent jobs, rather than through schemes which rely on making young people work for nothing, would be welcome in both hemispheres.

The workers of the United Kingdom will continue to watch Australia with interest, and not a little hope for the future.

Worker member, Canada – Canada’s workers welcome the Australian Government’s updated information regarding recent steps taken to promote full employment and address insecure work, youth, women’s and indigenous employment and consultation with social partners on employment policy.

The Convention requires Member States to declare and pursue an active employment policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, where each worker has the fullest possible opportunity to participate in the workforce, irrespective of sex.

Member States need to ensure that the employment policy has measures to ensure women’s workforce participation and economic equality. It is well understood that working women today, on average, earn less than men, have less job security and retire with less income. They are more likely to be doing more unpaid care and making sacrifices in their careers, to balance family and work. They are also more likely to be subject to sexual harassment, assault and violence, and treated less favourably on the basis of their gender.

We note the positive steps the Government has taken to address women’s economic inequality. In particular, I want to highlight the measures the Government has taken regarding gender-based violence and harassment in the world of work, which can be a key barrier to workforce participation. As such, governments must give consideration to measures to address gender-based violence and harassment, in order to fulfil their obligations under the Convention. We can see the interrelationship here, between Convention No. 190, which I note Australia ratified in 2023.

Measures Australia has taken, include reforms to the Sex Discrimination Act in 2022, which means that employers now must take reasonable and proportionate measures to eliminate sex discrimination, sexual harassment and sex-based harassment, hostile environments and victimization at work.

The Paid Family and Domestic Violence Leave Act came into effect in 2023, providing an entitlement to ten days paid family and domestic violence leave for all workers, and protections against discrimination and increasing protections against workplace sexual harassment and giving workers a new way to deal with sexual harassment complaints, with the Fair Work Commission.

Workers in Canada, which also ratified Convention No. 190 last year, commend these initiatives as we also celebrate similar measures hard won to improve employment policy and protections for women in the workplace, including paid domestic violence leave.

We are currently urging the Government to address gaps in the protection against third-party harassment and violence, which is an escalating issue for women and gender-diverse workers in Canada. Journalists, hotel, restaurant and retail workers, nurses and other healthcare workers, teachers, education workers, public transportation workers and many others are impacted by third-party violence at work every day.

We urge both governments to undertake robust consultation, with social partners, to identify and close gaps in existing legislation and regulation.

Worker member, Finland – I am speaking on behalf of the Nordic trade unions. In pursuit of its objectives, the ILO has advocated for, adopted, and supervised international labour standards through a tripartite process for over a century. We note the good practice examples provided by Australia of a tripartite approach and consultation with the social partners since 2022 in the formulation and implementation of employment policies.

The principle of tripartism is the founding principle of this Organization. Yet, without actual realization of genuine tripartism in both law and in practice, the word has very little meaning. The concept also must have substantial, effective, and even actionable content. Excluding workers' organizations, that is, disregarding our views and not taking the obligation of social justice into account in economic or employment policymaking, is not only contrary to this Convention. It is contrary to the values of the ILO.

As expressed under the umbrella of the ILO supervisory mechanism on various occasions, tripartite consultations should, when these are adopted, cover not only questions on labour law in the strict sense of the term, but rather encompass general matters of public policy on labour, social and economic matters.

Reflecting these principles, and the Organization's own tripartite character, the effective recognition and promotion of tripartism is evident in all of the work of the Organization, including the Conventions. Without a question, this applies to the Convention as well. By virtue of Article 3 of the Convention, Member States are required to consult representatives of employers and workers concerning employment policies.

The principle of tripartism is fundamental and it is incumbent upon the Member States to enable and effectively ensure its realization. Genuine tripartism absolutely requires consultation to exist prior to establishing relevant policies. At the present moment, one could consider that circumstances in Australia have taken a turn for the better.

We note the good practice examples provided by Australia in the information they have provided to our Committee, of a tripartite approach and consultation with the social partners since 2022 in the formulation and implementation of employment policies. For example, the dialogue on employment policy at the Jobs and Skills Summit held in September 2022, and the subsequent White Paper on Jobs and Opportunities in September 2023, set out its employment policy, which we note has objectives in line with the Convention – in particular, are delivering sustained and inclusive full employment.

We welcome the Government consulting with social partners in the formulation and implementation of employment policies and encourage other governments to follow this example of good practice.

Tripartite consultations should, in all matters where applicable, such as those required by the Convention, form a part of the elements that are required for the Government to take its decision. This is only rational. Consultations beginning after a decision has already been taken cannot usefully involve any examination of conceivable alternatives that, in their very essence, could be characterized as being of tripartite nature. Sadly though, we still have to witness such practices on the global stage today, even in certain countries, where one might presume such issues to be long eradicated.

It is only when tripartism is not simply allowed, but promoted and encouraged, that it can truly flourish and be utilized to the full extent. We welcome the inclusive and consultative approach taken by the Government of Australia in this regard. Enabling, allowing, and encouraging genuine tripartism will lead to positive outcomes.

We call on the Government to continue to meaningfully consult and ensure the participation of the social partners in the formulation and implementation of employment policies.

Government member, New Zealand – The New Zealand Government notes the important obligation contained within the Convention for each Member State to declare and pursue, as a major goal, an active policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment. New Zealand ratified this Convention in 1964. New Zealand acknowledges the Australian Government's awareness of previously raised issues relating to insecure work, underemployment, and unemployment. New Zealand supports Australia's objectives in implementing Workforce Australia in 2022, including settings to assist those further from the labour market, along with their legislative changes including to the Secure Jobs, Better Pay Act 2022 and the new Closing Loopholes Act 2024. We also note their increased funding in their 2024–25 budget for the Real Jobs, Real Wages and Work Foundations initiatives, to address these issues. Furthermore, New Zealand supports the Australian Government's intent in their strengthening and reprioritization of programmes to best address youth unemployment. We note their new Working for Women: A Strategy for Gender Equality, and range of associated workplace relations reforms to achieve women's equality and security, including their ratification of Convention No. 190. We recognize their commitment to reducing disparities between First Nations peoples and the rest of the population in fundamental areas of life, and the substantial moves they have made toward realizing this commitment. Finally, we note the range of consultation the Australian Government has undertaken with social partners in implementing employment-related initiatives. We have observed and commend Australia's positive working relationship with their employer and worker representative organizations in the ILO, in the spirit of tripartism.

Chairperson – There are no more requests for the floor, so I now invite the Government representative of Australia, to make her concluding remarks.

Government representative – The Australian Government has listened carefully to the interventions made today and welcomes the constructive comments.

I have outlined in my opening statement the range of measures that the Australian Government has already taken to address some of the matters that have been previously raised. These include in summary: reforming employment services, support to long-term unemployed people and young people, substantive reforms to the Australian workplace relation system to strengthen protections for workers and deliver secure jobs and better pay, and implementing the Closing the Gap reforms to support the economic empowerment of First Nations peoples in Australia.

I have also mentioned the 2022 Employment White Paper, which the Government identifies as a road map for ensuring that Australians are the beneficiaries of the shifts under way in the economy and in our society over the coming decades. The White Paper builds on the Jobs and Skills Summit held in 2022 which brought together worker and employer representatives, civil society and governments to address shared economic challenges. It crystalizes the ambition for a dynamic and inclusive labour market in which Australians have the opportunity for secure, well-paid jobs in a country where workers, employers and communities can thrive and adapt.

I have also provided many examples of the Government's commitment to social dialogue and tripartite engagement. Today, we are particularly pleased to hear from our tripartite social partners, the ACTU and the ACCI. Constructive collaboration with our social partners has helped to make the reforms I have outlined today better and more sustainable. Their interventions reinforce, from an Australian worker and employer perspective, first-hand experience that the Government is firmly committed to the enduring principles and objectives that underpin the Convention.

To one specific point raised by the spokesperson of the Employer members, I would like to clarify the Government's legislative reforms to the definition of "casual employment". The core definition of "casual employment" remains unchanged: the absence of a firm advanced commitment to continuing and indefinite work. What has changed is an assessment of the practical reality of the relationship, not just the contract. Some workers are stuck in casual employment, without access to leave and entitlements, despite the way their work is becoming similar to permanent employees. Therefore, if after 6 months, or 12 months for an employee of a small business, the worker does not believe they meet the definition of a casual employee, they can request to move to permanent employment if they wish. Employers can still refuse an employee conversion notification if there are fair and reasonable grounds. For example, when the conversion would require a substantial change to the organization of work.

The amendments provide choice for the 32 per cent of casual workers in Australia who have regular working arrangements, mostly in female dominated sectors, including healthcare and social assistance, accommodation and food services and retail trade. I reiterate, however, that under these arrangements, no-one will be forced to convert from casual to permanent employment.

We are hopeful that the information provided by the Government ahead of today's hearing and during our opening statement, avails the Committee of any concerns present in the 2021, article 22, reporting cycle, noting the extensive reforms and policies implemented since this time. We remain at the disposal of the Committee for any further information that may be required.

Worker members – We thank the Government and all of those who took the floor. In this era of multiple crises including global, economic and climate crises triggered in no small part by the adoption of economic policies which produce outcomes contrary to the objectives of the Convention, including widening inequalities and associated social tension, the effort by the Government of Australia to respect the Convention in law and practice is well noted.

Work has become increasingly more precarious. New forms of work have emerged where millions of workers are now engaged outside of the protection of labour law, with all the dangers and vulnerabilities that come in its wake.

In this regard, we agree with the Committee of Experts, as they stated in the 2020 General Survey on employment protection, that “the principle of substantive equality includes the requirement that, over time, or after a certain period of time, all workers have access to more permanent and stable employment relationships”.

We note that the Government has taken a number of steps to address insecure work. Also, there have been measures adopted to improve women's workforce participation. The Government is also going ahead with measures on youth employment and that of First Nations.

In line with the Convention, the Australian Government should continue to develop and implement these measures, in consultation with social partners. This is central to ensuring that there continues to be an inclusive approach to economic and employment policymaking, and to sharing the positive results together.

Employer members – The Employer members wish to thank the various speakers who took the floor, and in particular the Government of Australia, for its interventions and the information it provided. We reiterate the importance of States' compliance with the Convention, and our belief that compliance with the Convention is critical to ensuring meaningful opportunities for both workers and business, and also to ensuring the broader effectiveness of the ten core ILO Conventions.

The Employer members recommend that the Government of Australia do the three following things: (i) continue providing information on policy and technical measures aimed at increasing both the employment quality and the quantity of jobs for women at the national level; (ii) continue providing detail about the nature of its efforts to support First Nations peoples in Australia's world of work; and (iii) to the extent that the Committee nonetheless believes that social partners have not been sufficiently consulted, the Government should better ensure that this specific consultation be conducted.

We count on the Government to timely provide the requested information and to adopt the measures.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the oral and written information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

Taking the discussion into account, the Committee requested the Government, in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, to continue to develop and implement employment policies in line with the Convention, including those aimed at increasing both the quality and quantity of jobs for women.

The Committee requested the Government to submit a report, including information on its ongoing efforts to support First Nations peoples in the world of work, to the Committee of Experts in accordance with the regular reporting cycle.

Government representative – Australia would like to thank the Committee for their conclusions on our compliance under Convention No. 122. Australia acknowledges and respects the important role of the Committee of Experts and this Committee within the ILO supervisory system. Ensuring the effective application of international labour standards is critical to achieving our shared objective of decent work for all.

I hope the information presented in our verbal and written information on the significant new reforms implemented since the 2021 reporting cycle provided reassurance of Australia's commitment to, and compliance with, the Convention.

We will, of course, continue to work with social partners to follow up on the Committee's conclusions, especially as they relate to women and First Nations people.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

Written information provided by the Government

Obstacles to trade union registration

- The Law on Trade Unions (LTU) was amended in 2020 after a series of comprehensive tripartite consultative processes with trade unions and employers' associations with technical support from the ILO. Among others, the procedures for registering a trade union or employers' association were simplified under this amendment.
- Before the adoption of the LTU in 2016, we had only 3,626 professional organizations that had been registered with the Ministry. But in 2017, that means one year after the LTU was adopted, we had 4,307 professional organizations, accounting for an 18.78 per cent increase. Following the amendment of the LTU in 2020, this number increased to 5,484, accounting for a 27.33 per cent increase. As of March 2024, we have 6,317 professional organizations, accounting for a 74.21 per cent increase, compared with the number of professional organizations before 2016. The statistics speak for themselves about freedom of association in Cambodia, and the concerns of one or two trade unions that resist change is not justified.
- Once again, Cambodia would like to resubmit its strong request for technical collaboration and support from the ILO to organize training for trade union federations and confederations on the registration processes so that they can further train their members. Meanwhile, the Ministry of Labour and Vocational Training (MLVT) has implemented three working shifts from 7 a.m. to 10.30 p.m., put some officials on standby during the weekend, and created a 24/7 hotline and telegram channels for workers and employers to check with the Ministry when they have any doubts or concerns relating to labour disputes and trade union registration.

Misclassification of collective labour disputes and the Arbitration Council (AC)

- Collective labour disputes and individual disputes are very clearly defined in the Labour Law. So, their determination is not subjective.
- When there is any labour dispute, the focus should be on how to settle it peacefully and quickly in a transparent and win-win manner so that industrial peace at the enterprise level could be restored, rather than who settles it.

- The MLVT has strengthened its dispute settlement mechanism, which resulted in an increasing number of disputes being settled by the Ministry.
- Below is the statistics of labour disputes settled by the Ministry:

1 Labour Dispute Settlement
Individual Labour Disputes		2018	2019	2020	2021	2022	2023	As of April 2024
Number of cases	Case	417	571	552	695	681	818	378
Conciliated	Case	197	287	329	453	389	670	309
Non-conciliated	Case	163	254	182	182	227	120	42
Dismissed	Case	57	30	41	60	65	28	27
Collective Labour Disputes		2018	2019	2020	2021	2022	2023	As of April 2024
Number of cases	Case	163	257	247	154	225	187	82
Conciliated	Case	99	128	156	100	153	159	73
Non-conciliated	Case	61	123	86	48	68	28	8
Dismissed	Case	3	6	5	6	4	–	1
2 Arbitration Council
		2018	2019	2020	2021	2022	2023	As of April 2024
Number of cases referred to the AC	Case	53	121	66	43	53	22	5
Issued the Arbitral Award	Case	41	83	53	35	41	16	2
Settlement through agreements	Case	12	38	13	8	12	6	1

- It is imperative to emphasize that the role of the Arbitration Council (AC) is not undermined by the decline in the number of disputes referred to this quasi-judicial body. In contrast, the Labour Law was amended in 2021 to extend the jurisdiction of the AC to hear individual disputes too. It is expected that the AC will be able to take on individual disputes by the end of 2024 or early 2025. By that time, there will be no more concern about the misclassification of collective labour disputes.
- The MLVT has had several meetings with the Arbitration Council Foundation (ACF) and other stakeholders regarding the provision of a new office location, strengthening the capacity of arbitrators, and the contribution to support the operation of the institution.
- In March 2024, the MLVT had a meeting with representatives of the AC and ACF to discuss the sustainability of the AC and ACF. It was agreed that both the AC and ACF would be institutionalized as state institutions. This development was welcomed by the Royal Government.

Police violence and arrest and imprisonment of trade union leaders

- If trade union leaders suffer from any violence, they are encouraged to make complaints to the competent authorities and the MLVT. However, trade unionists are also citizens, so they shall also be responsible before the laws for their wrongdoings. In any circumstances, trade union membership cannot be construed as a shield for violating the law.

- In 2020 the Ministry, in collaboration with the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights and the Royal Police Academy of Cambodia, and with the support of the ILO, organized Training of Trainers (ToT) on the right to strike and peaceful demonstration for 120 police officers from various units of the National Police. After receiving this training, the trainers continued to train 550 police officers in their respective units. In addition, a series of drills with 161 participants were also conducted.
- The MLVT reiterates its strong request for technical assistance from the ILO to develop guidelines for police officers on how to handle strikes and peaceful demonstrations.

Persecution of union leaders for participating in peaceful strikes

- No trade union member in Cambodia has ever been arrested or persecuted for their participation in or organizing a peaceful strike. In contrast, conducting violent strikes by destroying public or private property, blocking factory gates to stop other workers from entering to work, blocking public roads, and violating health measures during the COVID-19 pandemic, is not a peaceful strike; it is a criminal offence under the criminal law because it violates the rights of others, especially the right to life. In this regard, the Convention provides no special privilege of impunity for trade unionists for such action. The legal action is consistent with the decision of the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) of the ILO, which states that “Penal sanctions should only be imposed if, in the framework of a strike, violence against persons and property or other serious violations of the ordinary criminal law are committed, and this on the basis of the laws and regulations punishing such acts”.

Progress on implementation of the direct contacts mission (DCM) 2022

- The progress on the implementation of the recommendations relating to the criminal charges against trade unionists involved in the 2014 demonstration, trade union registration, the Arbitration Council, criminalization and politicization of trade union activity, as provided in the 2022 direct contacts mission (DCM) report, are illustrated in this report.
- In respect of the recommendation on the collective bargaining agreement (CBA), the procedures for trade unions to receive the most representative status (MRS) to enable them to sign the CBA were simplified through the amendment of section 55 of the LTU. Following the amendment of this section, the number of MRS trade unions increased over time, from 525 MRS trade unions in 2019 to 624 MRS unions as of March 2024.

Murder of trade unionists

- We understand the concerns of all stakeholders on the need to conclude the ongoing investigations and to bring the perpetrators and instigators of these crimes to justice. However, we urge all stakeholders to understand that the case faces great practical challenges, especially when the victim’s family and the witnesses do not provide cooperation in the reinvestigation.
- Nevertheless, the National Commission on Reviewing the Application of the International Labour Conventions (NCRILC) ratified by Cambodia – a tripartite mechanism dedicated to resolving all concerns and requests related to the implementation of the International Labour Conventions ratified by Cambodia, including Case No. 2318 and Case No. 3424 – has recently been modified through a decision dated 2 January 2024 under the new Government. The first meeting of the NCRILC was scheduled for 28 May 2024.

Criminal charges against trade unionists in relation to incidents during January 2014 demonstration

- In relation to the violence that happened in early 2014 on Veng Sreng Road, we would like to re-emphasize that such action was not a strike but a riot.
- The charges against the six trade union leaders who were involved with that riot were dropped by the Court of Appeals. Therefore, this case has been completely closed.
- For the remaining cases, on 27 April 2022, the Cambodian Labour Confederation (CLC) sent a letter to the MLVT providing information on eight pending court cases. However, based on the report from the Ministry of Justice, none of them were related to the exercise of legitimate trade union activities.
- Since early 2024, the MLVT has had four meetings with the CLC to revisit all pending court cases and non-court cases at the request of the CLC. It was agreed that the meeting shall be conducted consecutively once a week to expedite the processes.

Rights of civil servants and domestic workers to freedom of association

- Freedom of association in Cambodia can be exercised not only through the LTU, but also the Law on Associations and Non-Governmental Organizations (LANGO). Therefore, private teachers and domestic workers can exercise their freedom of association in accordance with the LTU, while state schoolteachers are free to form associations in accordance with the LANGO. The reason for the different legal framework governing freedom of association is due to the administrative system and the separation of powers of state institutions responsible for the registration of professional organizations.

Financial audit and maintenance of registration

- Relating to this concern, we would like to clarify that section 17 of the LTU was already amended to eliminate the requirement for trade unions to submit their financial reports to the MLVT; the financial report is only for their members and donors. Trade union members or donors can request an audit of the financial report. This requirement is not exceptional because trade unions are normally required by their donors to submit an audited financial report. It also does not contradict the decision of the CFA.

Right to elect representatives freely

- Regarding the requirement to be able to read and write Khmer for foreign workers who wish to become trade union leaders, we would like to inform the Committee that the amendments to sections 20 and 21 of the LTU were the result of tripartite consultations and agreements to address trade unions' concerns. This requirement is in line with the decision of the CFA which decided that "Requiring literacy for foreign workers to become trade union leaders and individuals in charge of administration is not contrary to Convention No. 87. Inequality occurs only when regulations require at least 60 per cent of trade union members to be able to read and write before they can form a union".

Dissolution of trade unions

- Regarding trade union dissolution, unlike in other countries, the MLVT does not have the authority to dissolve a trade union.
- On the other hand, under the amendment to the LTU, local trade unions can be dissolved only when the employer's obligations to the workers have been cleared. Obviously, this amendment was made to protect the interests of workers and unions when the enterprise is closed. The unions also welcomed the amendment. Moreover, when the enterprise is closed down, there will be no more workers working in that enterprise for the trade union to represent. It is therefore impractical to maintain a trade union when the enterprise has permanently closed down.

In a nutshell, Cambodia stands firm in its commitment to foster a conducive environment where freedom of association is upheld and safeguarded. With an aspiration to promote harmonious industrial relations, quarterly meetings between all trade union federations and confederations and the MLVT have been scheduled. Two meetings have already been conducted since late 2023.

Given the progress and dedication demonstrated, Cambodia respectfully requests the Committee to consider withdrawing Cambodia's individual case on Convention No. 87 from the list of 24 individual cases.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the Government representative of Cambodia, the Secretary of State, to take the floor.

Government representative – First and foremost, I would like to extend my heartfelt congratulations to the Chairperson on his appointment. I would also like to make the following submissions to address the concerns of the Committee over the application of the Convention, as well as to provide the following updates on the progress in implementation of the recommendations of the direct contacts mission of 2022.

Regarding the long-standing Case No. 2318, the authority did the investigation and arrested the suspects immediately after the incidents happened, and all the cases had also gone through due legal proceedings.

Cambodia does not provide a place for impunity, and any attempt to promote it in Cambodia will be strongly resisted. For this reason, the Government has unreluctantly welcomed three ILO direct contacts missions – in 2008, 2017 and 2022, respectively, – to investigate Case No. 2318. During the missions, the delegates were given full support to meet with various stakeholders, including the tripartite constituents of the ILO, the victims' families and civil society organizations.

On the other hand, in response to the recommendations of the second direct contacts mission in 2017, the Government decided to establish in 2018 the National Commission on Reviewing the Application of the International Labour Conventions (NCRILC) ratified by Cambodia, which is a national tripartite mechanism replacing the Inter-Ministerial Committee for Special Investigation on Case No. 2318.

After revising the members in February 2024, the NCRILC had its meeting on 28 May 2024, last month, with the following results.

On the case of Mr Chea Vichea's murder, the National Police reaffirmed their commitment to foster cooperation with relevant stakeholders, including the victim's family, to expedite the reinvestigation and conclude the case although the reinvestigation faces a lot of challenges.

On the case of Mr Hy Vuthy, the National Police would seek support from the International Criminal Police Organization (INTERPOL) to search for the perpetrator who remains at large and bring him to justice.

For the case of Mr Ros Sovannareth, as the perpetrator Mr Thach Saveth has been convicted and is now serving his term in prison, my delegation would like to reiterate our request to the Committee to withdraw it from Case No. 2318.

Regarding the incident in early 2014, our position remains firm that that protest at the time was far beyond the strike definition of the ILO. It was actually qualified as a riot. On the other hand, as per our previous report to the Committee of Experts, the charge against six trade union leaders who were involved in the protest was dropped by the Court of Appeals. Therefore, this case has been completely closed. For other cases, the Cambodian Labour Confederation (CLC) provided information on eight pending court cases in a letter dated 27 April 2022 to the Ministry of Labour and Vocational Training (MLVT). However, after a thorough review by the Ministry of Justice, it was confirmed that none of those cases were related to the trade union activities. Nevertheless, since the beginning of 2024, the MLVT – which I myself represent – has engaged in four productive meetings with the president of the CLC to reassess all pending court and non-court cases as requested by the CLC. It was agreed that our meeting would be conducted once a week to expedite the reviewing process.

In respect of the right to strike, we would like to emphasize that the Government is committed to protecting trade unionists' rights to engage in lawful industrial action in accordance with the laws. In addition, there is a clear difference between lawful industrial action and criminal actions, and the court has sole discretion to make this judgement. Except for those who committed criminal actions, no trade unionist in Cambodia has ever been arrested or prosecuted for their legal actions. In this regard, we would like to remind the Committee that the Convention provides no special privilege of impunity to trade unionists for unlawful actions, I repeat, unlawful actions. This is confirmed by the decision of the Committee on Freedom of Association, which I would like to quote: "Penal sanctions should only be imposed if, in the framework of a strike, violence against persons and property or other serious violations of the ordinary criminal law are committed, and this, on the basis of the laws and regulations punishing such acts".

On legislative issues, my delegation would like to reiterate that several items of national legislation are in place to ensure that everyone, including public teachers, civil servants, and domestic workers, can enjoy their freedom of association. That legislation includes the Constitution, the Labour Law, the Law on Trade Unions (LTU), the Law on Common Statute of Civil Servants, the Law on Education, and the Law on Associations and Non-Governmental Organizations. Unless there is an express clause in the Convention specifying otherwise, we are not convinced that freedom of association must be exercised under one single item of legislation. We understand that law is just the means, not the goal. So, Cambodia provides a variety of means for workers, public teachers and civil servants to implement their respective freedom of association. Apparently, as of December 2023, there are 2,747 associations and 3,532 non-governmental organizations (NGOs), amounting to a total of 6,279 local associations and NGOs operating in Cambodia. Although public teachers and domestic workers cannot form trade unions under the Law on Trade Unions, they are free to form associations under other legislation. We have the Cambodian Independent Teachers' Association (CITA) as evidence.

Regarding trade union registration, following the amendment of the LTU in 2022 after a series of comprehensive tripartite consultative processes with trade unions and employers' associations under technical support from the ILO, many concerns of trade unions have been addressed, including the simplification of procedures for registering a professional organization by allowing the trade union to register at the provincial department level, vocational training, shortening the registration period from 60 to 30 days, the elimination of the requirement to submit the audited financial report, and the appropriate process of trade union dissolution. No registration application has ever been rejected if the administrative requirements are fulfilled. Our Labour Law and the LTU allow workers to form as many trade unions as they want in one enterprise. Currently, there are on average four to five trade unions in one enterprise. This is, of course, very unique.

Evidently, the number of professional organization registrations keeps increasing even after the adoption of the LTU in 2016 and its amendment in 2020. As of March 2024, we have 6,317 professional organizations, accounting for a 74.21 per cent increase compared to the number of professional organizations registered before the adoption of this Law in 2016. The sharp increase in the number of professional organizations following the adoption and amendment of the LTU is an indisputable testament that workers and employers can freely form their respective professional organizations. The registration process is not an issue. So, the concern of a couple of trade unions that resist complying with the law is not justified.

Regarding the Arbitration Council (AC), as recommended by the direct contacts mission, we would like to report to the Committee that the Government is committed to strengthening labour dispute mechanisms through making an amendment to the Labour Law in December 2021 to extend the jurisdiction of the AC to also hear individual disputes in addition to the collective labour dispute. Following this amendment, a series of tripartite consultative workshops were organized to review the existing functioning and readiness of the AC to take the individual disputes. Moreover, the Government has a strong commitment in supporting the institutionalization of the AC as a more credible, transparent, and financially sustainable judicial body for settling labour disputes in Cambodia.

On the other hand, we would like to point out that under the latest Labour Law amendment, labour inspectors will be qualified as judicial police officers to ensure the enforcement of the Labour Law, including the binding arbitral award.

While taking all concerns into serious consideration, my delegation would like to bring to your attention that what happened in the last 20 years does not reflect the contemporary situation of freedom of association in Cambodia. If we look at the past while we live in the present, it does not make sense, so please look at the present. And if we look at the present, it is proven that there has been a lot of positive progress in Cambodia, in terms of protection and promotion of the rights of trade unions. The trade union movement is quite mature now, and we have adopted the dialogue approaches in our communication. In this regard, many bipartite and tripartite mechanisms have been established. For instance, the Labour Advisory Committee, the ILO-BFC Project Advisory Committee, the National Minimum Wages Council, etc.

More importantly, in this Seventh Legislature of the National Assembly, the Government is committed to continuing and further strengthening social dialogue. For this reason, the Ministry has made provision, as a priority in our Strategic Development Plan 2024–28, to hold quarterly meetings with all federation and confederation trade unions to discuss their challenges. Meanwhile, the Prime Minister will continue to hold public meetings with workers, supervisors, and administrative managers in the garment, textiles, footwear and travel goods and bags sector – which is the most labour-intensive sector – to build a closer relationship with them so that the Government can address their needs in a timely manner. In this connection, we would like to report to the Committee that, in the Sixth Legislature of the National Assembly, our former Prime Minister had several meetings with workers, covering almost 1 million workers, and after the new Government was formed, the new Prime Minister continued this momentum, and from September 2023 to December 2023, the new Prime Minister had met with workers ten times, covering over 170,000 workers. Through those meetings, the Prime Minister has made a lot of recommendations to the Ministry to implement in order to improve the livelihood of workers, working conditions, and promote peaceful industrial relations, especially through the Government campaign entitled “One enterprise, one harmonious community”.

Moreover, to meet the demand for clarity and support regarding labour regulations, the Ministry has extended its operating hours from 7 a.m. to 10.30 p.m. on weekdays and set up standby services at the weekend and on public holidays, to continue to provide service to our workers even during the weekend and public holidays. We have also established a 24/7 hotline and dedicated telegram channels to assist workers, employers, and trade unionists with any queries, concerns or labour disputes.

To conclude, I would like to reassure the Committee that Cambodia remains committed to promoting, protecting, and adhering to all obligations stipulated in relevant instruments to which it is a party. In this regard, the collaboration and support of all relevant stakeholders, including the ILO, is indispensable.

Employer members – Thanks to the Government for those remarks which we have noted carefully. Cambodia is a country that has ratified this Convention, a fundamental Convention, in 1999. It has been discussed in this Committee eight times in the past, I will not go through the list of the years but the most recent was 2021. It has been the subject of numerous Committee of Experts’ observations, 16 of them, and the subject of three direct contacts missions, the most recent of which was in 2022.

This is a double footnoted case, designated as such by the Committee of Experts because they have concerns over and above those they would normally attribute to other cases, but sometimes it is hard to see how in fact they have made their judgement, but here the Committee of Experts noted the long-standing nature of the issues in this particular case, the lack of progress or its perceived lack of progress on a number of the issues, new allegations of serious violations and basic civil liberties essential to the exercise of freedom of association, including the arrest and detention of trade unionists and the absence of a Report from the Government for this years’ Conference.

A number of these issues are related to the right to strike, and here we remind the Employers’ disagreement with the Committee of Experts’ views concerning this Convention with regard to the right to strike and we wish to emphasize that neither the Convention nor any other ILO Convention contain rules on the right to strike and that the Government Group of the Governing Body confirmed their Position Statement in March 2015 that the scope and conditions of this right are regulated at the national level.

So turning now to some of the main issues, in relation to the murder of trade unionists, once again the Committee of Experts recalled its long-standing recommendation to complete the investigations into the murders of three trade union leaders in 2004 and 2007, and noted Government indications that investigations are underway but have been complicated by various factors, including lack of cooperation of some of those affected and witnesses. The Employer members join with the Committee of Experts in urging the Government to bring the investigations to a conclusion, that said the Employers would also point out that it is not within the mandate of this Committee to reach conclusions on civil and criminal matters unless these are clearly related to freedom of association. Thus, the investigations should also address the question of whether the deaths were directly associated with the exercise of the right to freedom of association.

As regards the incidents during the January 2014 demonstrations, the Employer members noted the information provided by the Government to the effect that the action in question was in fact a riot, the charges against six of the trade union leaders involved were dropped by the Court of Appeals, that eight further cases were not related to the exercise of legitimate trade union activities and it is since early 2024 the Government has had four meetings with the Cambodian Labour Federation to revisit all appending cases and non-court cases.

However, there is still a long way to go. The Employer members urge the Government to continue to providing information on these processes and in particular on any verdicts issued in undertaking all necessary efforts to ensure that no criminal charges or sanctions are imposed in relation to the exercise of legitimate trade union activities.

On the broader front, there is a long-standing list of complaints regarding violence, intimidation, arrest and imprisonment of trade unionists for carrying peaceful industrial action. The Employer members condemn any such measures. However, addressing them, in this Committee requires that the matters complained of are breaches of the Convention and not instead matters of civil or criminal law. In that regard we note the comments from the Government, including indicating that no trade union member in Cambodia has ever been arrested or persecuted for participation or organizing a peaceful strike and that conducting violent strikes by destroying public or private property, blocking factory gates to stop other workers from entering to work, blocking public roads, violating health measures during the COVID-19 pandemic, was in fact criminal offence under the national law. Be this at it may, the slow or no progress in investigating the situation of arrested workers makes it difficult for this Committee to reach meaningful conclusions. Therefore, we urge the Government to expedite its investigations and report back by the next session of the International Labour Conference.

On the same topic, the Committee of Experts has drawn attention to the need to ensure that the intervention of the police should be proportionate to the threat to public order; competent authorities should receive adequate instruction and training to avoid excessive force when controlling demonstrations that might undermine public order.

We note that some training has in fact taken place. According to Government information provided to this Committee in 2020, the Ministry, with the support of the ILO, organized Training of Trainers (ToT) for 120 police officers from various units of the National Police and after receiving this training, the trainers trained 550 police officers in their respective units.

While this is praiseworthy, once is not enough, ideally such training should be incorporated in the general training given to the members of the law enforcement agencies. We therefore call upon the Government to continue providing information on its efforts to ensure that members of the law enforcement agencies receive adequate and ongoing training. We also note the Government requests for technical assistance from the ILO to develop guidelines for police officers on how to handle strikes and peaceful demonstrations and trust that the ILO will respond to this request.

Turning now to legislative issues. In relation to Article 2 of the Convention, the Employer members echo the comments of the Committee of Experts and their requests that the Government takes measures, in consultation with the social partners to ensure that civil servants, including teachers, who are not covered by the Law on Trade Unions, are guaranteed their rights under the Convention. The Employer members note from the Government that public sector teachers could exercise their freedom of association through the Law on Associations and Non-Governmental Organizations (LANGO), and they request the Government to indicate if and to what extent the rights under the LANGO respond to those under the Law on Trade Unions.

In relation to domestic workers and the workers in the informal economy, the Employer members request the Government to provide detailed information on steps to promote the effective enjoyment of their rights of freedom of associations. One of the problems here seems to be that the trade union law provides for enterprise union models which does not correspond to the employment situation of domestic workers. The Employer members consider that while it is difficult for domestic workers and workers in the informal economy to organize, due to the nature of their work, the legal framework should not be an additional obstacle.

In relation to trade union registration, this Committee in 2021 called upon the Government to ensure that workers are able to register trade unions. The direct contacts mission recommended that practical hurdles to the formation and functioning should also be addressed. We note that the latest Government information suggests that there has been a very increase in the number of trade unions from 3,600 plus in 2016 to 6,300 this year, over 75 per cent increase. This seems to conflict with the Committee of Experts' views that there are difficulties in registering trade unions, such a huge increase would suggest that there are very little difficulties. So, we suggest that the Committee of Experts takes into account this information in its next examination. In the meantime, we also call upon the Government to provide further relevant information on this issue.

With respect to the requirement for leaders and other senior staff of trade unions to be able to read and write, we note from the Government that these were the result of tripartite consultations and agreements to address the trade unions' concerns. We also refer to the Committee on Freedom of Association's view that said that requiring literacy for foreign workers to become trade union leaders is not contrary to the Convention. So again, we leave it to the Committee of Experts to examine these facts and reconcile them, but for our part we would like to say that literacy requirements should not pose problems for employers' organizations in practice.

Regarding the dissolution of the representative organizations in line with Article 3, it is for workers' and employers' associations to determine the rules of such matters, these should not be regulated by law. So, we agree with the Committee of Experts' request that the Government take the necessary measures to amend section 28 of the Law on Trade Unions and also to amend section 29 so that it is up to employers and associations own laws and bylaws to determine the regulation of procedures for dissolution.

Last, in relation to the independent adjudication mechanisms, we call upon the Government to provide information relating to how it is addressing the measures requested by the direct contacts mission in 2022. We note the Government's statement just earlier that it has made a number of steps in this regard, we commend these steps and urge them to continue.

By way of conclusion, we would recall that the 2022 direct contacts mission suggested the simplification of the road map and its progress report and full consultation with the social partners and with the support of the ILO to identify priority areas for urgent action on the basis of those recommendations and therefore regular review of the adequacy of the steps taken should be conducted with all the parties involved.

These should include the measures taken to engage the social partners concerned and prioritizing areas for action with reference to all of the direct contacts mission's requests, setting our clear deliverables, responsible bodies and time frames.

Worker members – Last year we dealt with the case of Cambodia in relation to the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), while this year we are looking at Convention No. 87. The violations of Convention No. 105 noted last year are not unrelated to the lack of compliance with the Convention that we are about to discuss. When the fundamental principles of freedom of association are not respected, all the rights and freedoms of workers are under threat. The examination of this case will be the perfect illustration of this.

Last year the Committee addressed a recommendation inviting the Government to implement the recommendations made regarding the application of the Convention following a direct contacts mission in March–April 2022. This mission had been recommended by the Committee following the last examination of the application of the Convention by the Government of Cambodia in 2021. The application of this Convention in Cambodia has been examined by the Committee no less than eight times since 2007. We align ourselves with the Committee of Experts and deeply regret that the Government has not sent any report. It is clear that the persistence and seriousness of the violations of the Convention in the country is a source of deep concern for the Workers' group. The environment in Cambodia is far from allowing the exercise of civil liberties, particularly of freedom of association. An anti-union climate prevails throughout Cambodia and numerous legal and practical obstacles to the exercise of freedom of association have persisted for far too long. The most serious consequences of this toxic environment include the murders of trade unionists in the country. The report refers to the murders of trade union leaders Chea Vichea and Ros Sovannareth in 2004 and Hy Vuthy in 2007. We are bound to regret that no full and independent investigation into these events has been conducted so far. As regards the National Commission on Reviewing the Application of the International Labour Conventions, it should be noted that it meets only once a year and does not appear to have been the source of decisive progress.

Workers who engage in collective action in Cambodia are frequently exposed to violence, intimidation, arrest and detention. The report of the Committee of Experts mentions the events that occurred in 2014 following peaceful demonstrations calling for an increase in wages. The trade unionists who took part on these events were subjected to criminal prosecution, a practice which is ongoing in Cambodia. While numerous recommendations made to the Government invite it to provide information on the proceedings in progress and to make a list of the trade unionists who are the subject of such proceedings in consultation with the union concerned, the Government has not sent any information on this matter to the Committee of Experts. There are still discrepancies between the list of judicial proceedings held by the trade unions and the list held by the Ministry of labour. The Government states in its written observations that weekly meetings have been held since the start of 2024 to review all the judicial proceedings under way. It will be important that the Government sends information on this matter to the Committee of Experts for examination. The reports refers to arrests of workers that occurred in the context of a labour dispute in the Phnom Penh region following the dismissal of more than 1,300 workers, and to practices of anti-union discrimination. These facts were also referred to the Committee on Freedom of Association, which urged the Government to ensure the immediate unconditional release of the trade unionists concerned.

According to our information, in early May this year the Supreme Court of Cambodia upheld the prisons sentences handed down to these trade unionists. The recurrence of incidents with law enforcement bodies is the sign of an environment that is not conducive to the exercise of civil liberties and freedom of association. The excessive use of force makes us fear that there is a lack of training for law enforcement bodies on these matters. It seems clear to us, as recommended by the direct contacts mission, that there is a need for clear instructions to ensure that the intervention of the police in cases of collective actions is proportionate to the threat to public order and that the danger of excessive violence is avoided.

Cambodian legislation contains a number of elements which are incompatible with the Convention. The legislation on trade unions does not apply to public servants, including teachers. It is difficult to apply to domestic workers and workers in the informal economy. The enterprise union model promoted by the Law on Trade Unions imposes requirements which are difficult to meet for the workers concerned. To date, the Government has not provided any information which shows to what extent the rights enshrined in the Convention are guaranteed for public officials, domestic workers and workers in the informal economy. The written information provided by the Government merely indicates that private teachers and domestic workers may have recourse to the Law on Trade Unions while public teachers can have recourse to the Law on Associations and Non-Governmental Organizations. No details are given of the measures taken to overcome these obstacles. The issue of the trade union registration procedure continues to pose problems. Even though the number of registered unions increased between 2016 and 2024, difficulties are still apparent in the registration procedure. Maintaining registration is also subject to obligations to undertake particularly burdensome financial audits, which can constitute disproportionate obstacles to the exercise of freedom of association.

The Committee of Experts indicated in paragraph 104 of the General Survey that the requirement to be able to read and write to be eligible for trade union office is incompatible with the Convention. However, Cambodian legislation provides that foreigners must be able to read and write Khmer to become trade union officers. The Government has not provided any written information on section 326 of the Labour Law under which the Ministry of Labour and Vocational Training (Ministry of Labour) is authorized to determine arrangements for a minimum service in the absence of an agreement between the parties. Penalties for serious misconduct can also be imposed on workers. We regret the fact that it is common practice to replace workers who engage in collective actions and to issue injunctions to prevent industrial action, even where the trade unions comply with all procedures. The role of the committee responsible for managing collective disputes must be clarified so that it does not restrict the legitimate right of workers' organizations to undertake collective actions to defend the interests of their members. Section 28(2) of the Law on Trade Unions provides for the automatic dissolution of a union in the event of closure of the enterprise. Section 29 of the same law also allows any person to call for the dissolution of the trade union before the court. However, it is for the union members, under union constitutions and rules, to decide on the dissolution procedure.

As regards the functioning of the Arbitration Council, we regret the refusal of the Ministry of Labour to authorize higher-level unions to represent or support their members in collective disputes. The classification of certain disputes also poses a problem since a number of disputes which were clearly collective disputes have been classified as individual disputes and consequently could not be handled by the Arbitration Council.

Employer member, Cambodia – It is regrettable that the Committee of Experts has called Cambodia to appear this year, even though we have made significant demonstrable progress.

We observed that the report of the Committee of Experts for 2024 sets out a substantial set of requests to the Government, including some incidents reaching as far back as two decades ago. Due to time limits and other practical considerations, we are not able to address each item of the report. Rather we wish to offer our views and observations at a high level and at the same time we will focus attention on certain cases raised in the report.

The conditions of the working environment and well-being of our workers today are different from the past. Employers have collaborated with government workers and other counterparts towards ensuring decent productive and sustainable work for all women and men in Cambodia. While we understand there is much work to be done to fully achieve our common vision and goals, we take pride in the recognition of our shared efforts and progress in the improvement and strengthening of the working environment and well-being of our workers.

Allow me to highlight just a small sample of achievements over the past years. The minimum wage for workers in the garment, footwear, and textile sectors, about 90 per cent of whom are women, has increased 19 times since 1997, and the minimum wage now stands at US$204 per month. And we know that it is set annually by the negotiated tripartite process. Using the criteria as stipulated in Article 3 of the Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131), the current minimum wage in Cambodia is higher than that of some comparable countries in the region, and furthermore the actual take-home pay of workers in 2024 exceeds US$260 per month. Building the framework and expanding the coverage of national social security for the direct benefit of workers and their families including through the work injury scheme, the healthcare scheme and more recently the pension scheme, not to mention expanding social protection measures to mitigate the socio-economic impact of COVID-19 such as the wage subsidy scheme providing unemployment benefits to workers where business operation had been suspended during the pandemic. And strengthening and setting the standard for compliance with labour law and regulations as well as business and human rights principles, as recognized and reported by the ILO Better Factories Cambodia Programme.

We attribute this to employers being involved in improving knowledge and understanding of labour laws and standards, of good practice, and the improved capacity of the Ministry of Labour in introducing and enforcing labour law and regulation. We employers fully recognize the rights of trade unions to organize and represent their members. However, we remain concerned about the multiplicity of trade unions, their lack of representativeness and the fragmentation and the ongoing in-fighting among the trade unions that disrupt business operations and undermine the hard-won progress we have made in industrial relations. These problems persist in the landscape where the proliferation of trade unions marches unabated over the past years. As reported by the Ministry of Labour, the number rose over 70 per cent, to over 6,000 organizations in March this year compared to about 3,600 organizations back in 2016 when the trade union law was adopted.

We turn now to focus on some key specific issues set in the report in relation to the cases of murder of trade unionists. We share our views as follows: we condemn to the incitement of violence as well as any act of violence against any individual, including trade unionists; perpetrators of crime need to be brought to justice as warranted by Cambodia's national justice system. Regarding the case relating to the murder of Mr Chea Vichea, we recognize that the reinvestigation is very challenging for the competent authorities due to the large gap between the time the incident happened and the time the court ordered reinvestigation. Regarding the case relating to the murder of Mr Ros Sovannareth, we support the Government's request to review the matter due to the fact that the court has convicted the perpetrator and presently he has been put in prison to serve his term. We wish to draw the attention of the Committee to the fact that the cases of the killings of Mr Chea Vichea and Mr Ros Sovannareth occurred in 2004 and Mr Hy Vuthy in 2007. While these cases are serious, we ask the Committee to consider not the defining the present-day state of freedom of association and industrial relations in Cambodia on the basis of cases that happened nearly two decades ago.

In relation to the arrested union leaders and activists we know that Cambodia recognizes the right to peacefully exercise industrial action, but committing unlawful acts such as violence during protests or other illegal acts is punishable by the laws of Cambodia. We call on the Government to provide reports regularly to the Committee of Experts on the status and progress of the key issue raised in the report to allow the said Committee to have the update and to avoid misunderstandings and to promote the better appreciation by the Committee of the national realities and tangible progress achieved in Cambodia. Despite the progress, there are ongoing challenges that employers and other social partners have to continue to deal with. We believe that the social partners in Cambodia will benefit from the technical support and expertise of the ILO. We hereby request the ILO to provide and increase their provision of its technical support to employers and other social partners in Cambodia with a view to strengthening and improving the state of industrial relations and sustainability of enterprises in Cambodia. The technical support should aim to enhance knowledge and understanding of not only the rights, but also the legal obligations of the social partners relating to freedom of association, collective bargaining, and sustainability of enterprises.

Worker member, Cambodia – I am the Secretary General of the Cambodian Confederation of Trade Unions (CCTU) and I will speak on the various issues as highlighted by the Committee of Experts such as the case of murders of trade unionists, criminal charges in relation to the January 2014 demonstration against trade unionists for carrying out peaceful industrial action, the application of trade union laws for civil servants and public sector teachers, domestic workers and the informal economy, trade union registration and the ILO direct contacts mission in 2022.

As for the case of murders of trade unionists, allow me to acknowledge the commitments made by the Government of Cambodia, particularly after participating in the discussion during the meeting of the National Commission on Reviewing the Application of the International Labour Conventions (NCRILC), ratified by Cambodia on 28 May 2024. We recognize the Government's efforts and hear all the difficulties, challenges and complexities of the cases. However, we share the view with of the Committee of Experts that the investigation and conclusion of these cases are needed.

Regarding the clarification on the completion of the case against the six trade unionists in relation to the incidents in January 2014, we have learned that the Government had provided legal assistance to those unionists. We encourage that this treatment should be applied to all cases concerning unionists.

On the protection of the rights of trade unionists to engage in peaceful industrial action, as these rights are not absolute, the Government should offer clear guidance and differentiation on the lawful exercise of industrial action to prevent confusion between legitimate industrial action and criminal offences. Related authorities should possess a clear understanding of their roles concerning legitimate industrial action and criminal acts to ensure that trade unionists can engage in peaceful industrial action without fear of reprisal. While we appreciate the Government's efforts to train police officers on the right to strike and peaceful demonstration since 2020, we urge the Government to expedite the development of guidelines on handling strikes and peaceful demonstrations for police officers as well.

We also thank the Government of Cambodia for providing legal support in pending court cases involving trade unionists, although these cases did not involve the exercise of trade union rights but rather criminal acts. We therefore urge the Ministry of Labour, workers and all in training and the Ministry of Justice to persist in their collaborative efforts to offer legal assistance in any remaining trade union cases before the court. It is imperative that the Government and employers respect and protect the rights of trade unionists to engage in industrial action without facing violence, intimidation, arrest, or imprisonment. Upholding these rights is essential for promoting a fair and just labour environment that respects the dignity of all workers and serves as a cornerstone for promoting harmonious industrial relations.

We take note of the progress made by the Government on the implementation of the Law on Trade Union's (LTU). We also note the Government's clarification that civil servants and public sector teachers can also exercise their rights under different legislation, including the Law on Associations and Non-Governmental Organizations (LANGO).

We appreciate the amendments to the LTU in 2020, in which we, as part of the tripartite constituents, actively participated in the stock-taking process of inputs during tripartite consultative processes. We are looking for a more effective implementation of that law through the dissemination of workshops on trade union registration. This will help raise awareness and understanding of the registration procedures, ensuring that all parties concerned can effectively exercise their rights to freedom of association.

We acknowledge the efforts and achievements made by the Government of Cambodia on the implementation of the recommendations provided by the direct contact mission in 2022, upholding freedom of association. We also take note of the challenges which require all parties concerned to work together in addressing them.

We also commend the Government for the recent launch of the Sixth Phase of the Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) from 2024 to 2028, which is a result of continuous constructive dialogue among all stakeholders in Cambodia.

In conclusion, as we reflect on the progress and ongoing challenges relating to trade union rights in Cambodia, it is evident that dialogue is very important. The unions are committed to engaging in constructive dialogue and actions with the Government and the other social partners. We are dedicated to advancing the principles of freedom of association.

Government member, Belgium – I have the honour to speak on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States. The candidate countries Albania, Montenegro, North Macedonia, the Republic of Moldova and Ukraine, and the European Free Trade Association countries Iceland and Norway, members of the European Economic Area, align themselves with this statement.

The EU and its Member States are committed to the respect, protection and fulfilment of human rights, including labour rights. We promote the universal ratification and effective implementation of fundamental ILO Conventions and support the ILO in developing and promoting international labour standards and supervising their application.

The EU and its Member States have been committed development partners of Cambodia, including through the "Everything But Arms" (EBA) arrangement under the EU's General Scheme of Preferences, granting duty-free and quota-free access to the EU market, contributing to sustained growth and job creation in the past decades.

The trade benefits granted under the EBA arrangement are subject to the condition that Cambodia respects core international principles, enshrined in core UN and ILO Conventions. Due to serious and systematic violations of human rights, especially the right to political participation and fundamental freedoms, as of August 2020, this preferential treatment has been partially suspended.

We deeply regret that the Cambodian authorities have not provided a report this year on the application of the Convention or on the progress made in respect of the recommendations of the direct contacts mission. The written information recently submitted by the authorities only addresses a few of the key concerns, and it does not reflect the reality on the ground.

We note with deep concern the new allegations of serious violations of basic civil liberties, including violence, intimidation, arrest and imprisonment of trade unionists, and we request Cambodia to report on these issues. We urge the authorities to stop the arbitrary arrest, detention and prosecution of trade unionists and to immediately release those detained for undertaking their legitimate trade union activity.

Regular training of police forces in relation to industrial and protest action remains crucial to ensure that peaceful industrial action is not repressed and to avoid the use of excessive violence. We take note of the request of Cambodia for technical assistance from the ILO to deepen and expand such trainings. We request the authorities to report on any next steps in this regard.

We also deeply regret the lack of information on serious long-standing issues, such as the investigations into the murders of trade union leaders in 2004 and 2007. In this regard, we urge the authorities to expedite the process of investigation and bring to justice the perpetrators and instigators of these crimes.

As regards the trade unionists still facing criminal charges in relation to demonstrations in January 2014, we urge the Cambodian authorities to review the list of pending cases with the unions concerned and provide detailed information on cases of criminal prosecutions.

The persistence of legal and practical obstacles to freedom of association is also particularly regrettable. We urge the Cambodian authorities to amend the legislation, in consultation with social partners, to ensure that civil servants, including public sector teachers, domestic workers and workers in the informal economy are guaranteed their rights under the Convention. We also encourage the authorities to address rapidly the numerous obstacles to union registration.

In addition, we echo the request of the Committee of Experts to the Cambodian authorities to amend relevant sections of the Law on Trade Unions and of the Labour Law, in consultation with social partners, regarding financial audit and maintenance of registration, the right to elect representatives freely, the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities, and the dissolution of representative organizations. We reiterate the importance of holding a comprehensive tripartite dialogue on the legality of the exercise of industrial action with a view to reviewing existing regulations.

We underline the need to ensure effective and independent adjudication mechanisms, such as the Arbitration Council, as a safeguard against impunity and as a means to protect workers' rights during labour disputes.

Last but not least, we strongly encourage the Cambodian authorities to implement all the recommendations arising from the ILO's direct contacts mission of 2022 and those of the ILO supervisory bodies to stop labour rights violations and embark on a constructive path of reform. To this end, we expect the authorities to achieve progress in the development of the road map, in full consultation with the social partners and with the support of the ILO, to identify priority areas of urgent action with clear deliverables and time frames.

The EU and its Member States will remain closely informed of the situation in Cambodia.

Government member, Indonesia – I have the honour to deliver this statement on behalf of the Member States of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN). ASEAN commends Cambodia's unwavering commitment and active engagement with the ILO supervisory mechanisms, particularly in the implementation of the Convention.

We recognize and commend the significant progress Cambodia has made thus far, through comprehensive tripartite consultations, in enhancing its legal framework and ensuring the effective implementation of relevant laws and regulations, particularly the Labour Law and Law on Trade Unions. The amendment simplifies the trade union registration process and eliminates trade unions' obligation to submit a financial report to the Government. These essential strides have led to an increasing number of registered trade unions, approximately 74 per cent from 2016 to 2024. Furthermore, greater maturity among the social partners has been fostered, enabling them to conduct their activities with increasing professionalism. These achievements highlight Cambodia's robust commitment to nurturing a conducive environment for the exercise of freedom of association, reflecting harmonious industrial relations within the Kingdom.

ASEAN appreciates Cambodia's efforts in promoting the freedom of association through its mechanism for receiving complaints on labour issues from the workers and employers, through various channels such as Telegram, Facebook, the 24/7 hotline and the extended working hours of labour-related government officials until 10:30 p.m. from Monday to Sunday.

ASEAN regards Cambodia's tripartism as a good practice in enhancing industrial relations and active engagement in social dialogue. The initiative of Cambodia during May Day that its Government accepts feedbacks to discuss and tackle all labour issues, including the freedom of association and related labour rights, which we may be regarded it as a concrete mechanism to foster social dialogue and tripartite partnership. We encourage Cambodia and its social partners to continue this dialogue process for ongoing promotion of freedom of association.

ASEAN notices the progress of Cambodia in promoting the rule of law and implementing obligations under ratified ILO Conventions, including freedom of association and related labour rights since 1999. Cambodia has proven that there has been no instance where trade unionists were arrested solely for exercising their union activities, but criminal charges were handled through legal proceedings by competent authorities against individuals who committed criminal acts.

ASEAN commends Cambodia for playing a leading role in working with stakeholders in the implementation of key ILO projects including Better Factories Cambodia, the Decent Work Country Programme and Global Deal initiative.

In light of the above-mentioned progress in the application of the Convention, ASEAN calls on the ILO and all international partners to support and engage with Cambodia to further nurture an environment conducive to the exercise of freedom of association and enrich harmonious industrial relations.

Government member, Cuba – We thank the Government of Cambodia for the presentation of supplementary information, and we note that the Government expresses the will to continue moving forward on tripartite social dialogue in the country and on work with the ILO. This information and these statements show the Government's will to honour the commitments which it has assumed within this Organization.

We reiterate that the focus must be on mechanisms of cooperation and working together rather than mechanisms of coercion. In the analysis of any case, we must put the focus on negotiations, respectful dialogue, assistance and cooperation. Measures taken against the will of governments, far from promoting dialogue and cooperation, fuel confrontation. In conclusion, I reaffirm the importance of promoting tripartite dialogue and the search for consensus, both of them fundamental principles of this Organization.

Worker member, France – I am speaking on behalf of the French workers. The Australian workers also align themselves with this statement. So far, no steps have been taken to respond to the concerns of the direct contacts mission of 2022 concerning the systematic practice of the Ministry of Labour entailing the incorrect classification of collective disputes. Indeed, we observe a trend towards misclassification of labour disputes with the aim of avoiding recourse to the Arbitration Council. This practice is a source of great concern for the workers and trade unions.

If we refer to official statistics, we find that the number of collective appeals is unrealistically low. For 2023, these statistics indicate a remarkable increase in the number of individual cases channelled towards the Ministry of Labour and an 80 per cent decrease in the number of cases transferred to the Arbitration Council by comparison with the peak of 2019, and a 58 per cent decrease compared with 2022.

Since 2021, no sub-decree has been adopted to apply the extended mandate of the AC in relation to individual labour disputes, resulting in the absence of any solution to deal with the growing number of violations of freedom of association which have been wrongly classified.

It should also be emphasized that freedom of association cannot be exercised fully because of the current practice of non-reinstatement of trade unionists since the union is dissolved before it has secured its registration. Thus, while the registration of one trade union was in progress at the Ministry of Labour, the president of the union was dismissed and 15 leaders and members of the union were obliged to resign. The Ministry of Labour did not treat this matter as a case of anti-union discrimination and did not submit it to arbitration.

Access to a mechanism for the arbitration of labour disputes which is independent, effective and accessible and which enjoys the confidence of the social partners is essential for ensuring respect for the rights enshrined in the Convention and guaranteeing non-impunity.

In conclusion, I would like to recall three recommendations and concerns of the 2022 direct contacts mission:

- first, wrongful dismissals must be referred quickly to the Arbitration Council;
- second, any changes in the operation of the Arbitration Council envisaged by the Government must only take place after full, substantive consultations with all parties and actors concerned;
- third, urgent measures must be taken to recruit and train new arbitrators and the union federations and confederations must be able to represent their members without needing to obtain prior authorization from the Ministry of Labour.

We urge the Cambodian Government to implement the recommendations of the direct contacts mission as a matter of priority.

Government member, Switzerland – Switzerland supports the statement made by the European Union and wishes to make the following points. Switzerland is deeply concerned at the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation reporting a climate of repression with regard to trade unionists in Cambodia. Acts of violence and police repression, arrests and cases of arbitrary detention of trade union representatives are serious violations of the fundamental rights recognized by the Convention.

Switzerland condemns these acts and recalls that the workers must be able to fully exercise their rights to freedom of association and expression without any danger to their physical or psychological integrity. It calls on the Cambodian Government to conduct independent investigations into anti-union acts and to institute judicial proceedings against their perpetrators.

Numerous legislative, judicial and practical obstacles faced by workers are also a source of concern. These obstacles seriously restrict the full exercise of freedom of association. In this regard, the Swiss Government calls on the Cambodian Government to align its legislation to the provisions of the Convention and to ensure, in consultation with the social partners, its effective application. This is in order to ensure, in law and in practice, the effective enjoyment of freedom of association.

Switzerland also regrets the lack of information from the Cambodian Government on the application of the Convention, in particular on the measures taken in response to the recommendations of the direct contacts mission which took place in 2022. This lack of communication, combined with numerous repeated observations and direct requests from the Committee of Experts, has resulted in this case being discussed in the Committee today, for the eighth time in the last 15 years.

In view of the above, and in order to restore a climate of confidence between the Cambodian Government and the Cambodian social partners, Switzerland urges the Government of Cambodia to take all necessary steps to create an environment conducive to constructive social dialogue and to freedom of association.

Employer member, Indonesia – I am delighted to speak on behalf on the Employers' Association of Indonesia (APINDO). Freedom of association is an essential avenue for improving conditions of labour, establishing industrial peace and sustaining progress. We join Cambodia in reaffirming adherence and support for the Conventions on freedom of association and protection of the right to organize. We consider that Cambodia has set out important information and facts on the constant progress made regarding working conditions and the well-being of workers in Cambodia. We consider that Cambodia has established a strong and compelling case for its compliance with the Convention while also providing valuable contextual information and facts of the case, and underscoring the important point that analysis of the application of Conventions must be cognizant of different national realities and legal systems. As specific incidents raised in the report occurred around 20 years ago, we are sympathetic towards the challenge that Cambodia faces with regard to investigation into the cases. We commend the Government's commitment to continue providing updates to the ILO. We wish to add and highlight the value and effectiveness of the Member States' national systems to address important issues of interest. The system we have established for ourselves, including systems of social dialogue, whether formal or informal, tripartite or bipartite or context-sensitive, help to promote consensus, build better employment relationships and advance industrial peace, which ultimately benefits workers, employers and economic and social development in our countries.

Worker member, Japan – The ILO direct contacts mission in Cambodia in 2022 noted that there were still practical hurdles in trade union registration and certification for most representative status (MRS) in Cambodia, and they should be rapidly addressed. The mission also recommended ways to improve the transparency of the process and demonstrate the consistency of application.

We have heard from the Government informing this Committee of a rise in the number of registered unions and simplified registration procedure. In practice, many unions are faced with many practical hurdles. Approval is still subject to the discretionary power of the labour authorities. Thirty-three trade unions' registration applications filed since 2018 are still pending with the labour ministry for trivial mistakes made in the applications or missing documents. Among them, 20 leaders from 6 garment trade unions had been dismissed by the employer while their registrations filed in 2019 and 2020 were pending. There was no remedy by the administration with regard to their reinstatement.

In another case, the Ministry has been holding off the registration of two unions since 2019 on the grounds that one of its leaders' employment contract has been suspended - even though it is acceptable under the trade union's own statute and not prohibited under the Law on Trade Unions.

Another federation submitted for most representative status certification in two factories early this year. In the meantime, the company changed the name in the context of business registration and voided the union's application.

Workers urge the Government to register trade unions and certify MRS in a swift, fair and equitable manner, in accordance with the pointed recommendations of the ILO's direct contacts mission and the labour laws of the country.

Employer member, Philippines – I am speaking on behalf of the Employers' Confederation of the Philippines (ECOP). We consider that Cambodia has provided valuable information and facts concerning the progress on the working conditions and well-being of workers that have been achieved in the country regarding its implementation of the Convention.

We consider that Cambodia has been moving in the right direction with respect to its implementation of the Convention. It has taken measures on a continuing basis to investigate and process through judicial proceedings the listed cases of the killing of trade unionists. Despite the challenges of investigation into one of the cases that occurred almost two decades ago, Cambodia continues to press ahead with the investigation, which we view as an indication of Cambodia's commitment to discharge its duties under the Convention.

The approaches of the Government to build decent work and to adhere to its commitments on freedom of association for people in the country are notably commendable. We consider that the Government has established and has engaged actively in a great diversity of social dialogue mechanisms with trade unions, employers, and with the ILO, including ILO Better Factories Cambodia, to address the issues and challenges it is facing. We believe that the inclusive approach and the established mechanisms of social dialogue will provide valuable, numerous benefits to Cambodia as it continues to tackle the issues and challenges set out in the report.

Finally, information and understanding by the tripartite constituents are essential for effective implementation of the Convention. In this sense, we concur with the calls of the national employer of Cambodia for the ILO to increase its technical support to employers and other social partners in Cambodia in order to strengthen the state of industrial relations and sustainability of enterprises in the country.

Worker member, Switzerland – The Committee of Experts has rightly expressed its deep concerns over the arrest and prosecution of trade unionists in Cambodia.

A classic recent example is that of Mr Chan, who was arrested on 14 February 2024 at his workplace, a shoe factory, and charged with “conspiracy to commit theft” for an incident that happened a long time ago, alleged by his employer. Mr Chan was elected as president of his union at his factory one month before the arrest. First, the factory management tried to talk him out of it. After failing to dissuade him from establishing a trade union at the workplace, Mr Chan received a threat through a colleague, that if he continued his union work and did not cooperate with the management, he would end up in trouble. Mr Chan has been put under pre-trial detention for three months, until today.

At the national trade union level, Mr Morm Rithy, president of the Cambodian Tourism and Service Workers’ Federation and vice-president of the Cambodian Labour Confederation, was arrested at the trade union office on 7 May 2024 following a verdict handed down earlier on the same day by the court in his absence. He was sent to prison immediately on conviction of incitement and “discrediting a judicial decision”. He was given a sentence of 18 months’ imprisonment for airing criticisms, two years ago, questioning unfair dismissals, detention, and anti-union discrimination practices against the trade union leaders of a casino company, and openly stated in a post on his Facebook live-page that he had “lost faith in the court’s decision”. Mr Rithy’s arrest and conviction does not seem to be a coincidence given the complaint he had filed recently against the same casino group.

These are just two examples to illustrate the serious threats of intimidation and harassment faced by labour rights activists in an environment where civil liberties and judicial independence are impeded.

Furthermore, workers report cases facing threats of dismissals for merely approaching trade union organizers at their workplaces or participating freely in trade unions. Given the poverty and high indebtedness of many workers’ families in Cambodia, losing their jobs means a grave threat to their households.

We urgently call upon the Cambodian Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure that all trade unionists detained for undertaking legitimate trade union activity are immediately released, and that workers can fully exercise their rights in line with the Convention.

Government member, United States of America – The United States remains deeply concerned regarding ongoing reports of violence against trade unionists and impunity for the perpetrators, as well as arbitrary arrest, detention and conviction of trade unionists for exercising their rights to freedom of association and peaceful assembly.

We are particularly concerned by the Cambodian Supreme Court’s decision of 3 May 2024 to uphold the conviction of trade union president Chhim Sithar, convicted along with eight other members of the Labor Rights Supported Union of Khmer Employees of Nagaworld (LRSU) after engaging in a peaceful strike in 2021.

We call for Chhim Sithar’s immediate release and urge the Government to take all necessary measures to stop the arbitrary arrest, detention and prosecution of trade unionists for undertaking legitimate trade union activity.

We also urge the Government of Cambodia to take all necessary measures to address long-standing issues and fully implement the recommendations of the 2022 direct contacts mission, including:

- addressing practical hurdles to the formation, functioning and registration of trade unions, through a simple, objective and transparent process;
- revising sections 17 and 27 of the Law on Trade Unions, so that audits of financial statements and activity reports are only required in cases with serious grounds of impropriety by an organization; and
- repealing section 28(2) and ensuring that workers' or employers' organizations are only dissolved on the basis of their bylaws or by a court ruling.

We reiterate the supervisory bodies' recommendation that the Government review existing regulations and their application in practice and undertake any necessary measures to ensure that such regulations promote, respect and realize internationally recognized labour rights, including the rights to freedom of association and collective bargaining.

We emphasize the importance of the independence of adjudication mechanisms - including the important role of the Arbitration Council. And, in that regard, we note the conclusions of the direct contacts mission regarding the misclassification of disputes before the Arbitration Council preventing some complaints from being heard, such as the classification of termination of a trade union officer as an individual dispute, and the direct contacts mission's recommendation that dismissals of trade union leaders prior to or after the union's registration should be considered as a collective dispute.

We encourage the Government to work closely with the social partners to identify priority areas of urgent action based on the recommendations of the direct contacts mission and those of the ILO supervisory bodies with clear deliverables and time frames, to ensure accountability and transparency.

The United States remains committed to engaging with the Government to advance worker rights in Cambodia.

Interpretation from Chinese: Government member, China – I thank the representative of the Cambodian Government for the detailed information. We also carefully read the report of the Committee of Experts as well as the supplementary information by the Government.

Over the years, the Cambodian Government has cooperated and communicated with the ILO and its supervisory bodies, showing a positive attitude and playing a constructive role. We appreciate their efforts. We note that, with technical support from the ILO, Cambodia has amended the Law on Trade Unions after extensive consultations, simplifying the registration procedures and better protecting the interests and rights of workers. The Ministry has taken a series of measures to strengthen the dispute settlement mechanism.

No country under the rule of law allows anyone or any right to be above the law. Cambodia's Constitution explicitly guarantees civil rights, including freedom of association, and recognizes the rights of citizens to form and join trade unions. At the same time, it is stipulated that the exercise of these rights shall not violate the legitimate rights of others.

The Cambodian Government has earnestly fulfilled its obligations and ensured that its practices in all fields are in line with the provisions of the Conventions. We note that the Cambodian Government expects the ILO to continue to provide technical assistance.

The purpose of the ILO supervisory bodies is to assist its Member States in implementing their international obligations. We expect that this Committee will pay attention to the authoritative information by the Government, consider this case objectively and impartially, and reach a positive and constructive conclusion with the purpose of promoting better fulfilment of obligations.

We encourage the ILO Office to strengthen communication and exchanges with the Cambodian Government, provide more technical assistance and help them to better implement the Convention, so as to protect the interests of the workers and promote economic and social development.

Government member, Australia – The Australian Government is strongly committed to the multilateral system and the ILO as the only specialist tripartite agency of the United Nations that brings together governments, employers, and workers from across the globe.

We thank the Committee of Experts for their 2024 report. While we note with concern the allegations of non-compliance with the Convention, Australia welcomes ongoing cooperation on these issues with the Government of the Kingdom of Cambodia.

Australia works in partnership with Cambodia through our development programme to provide practical support to promote trade union and worker rights in Cambodia. For example, we support the ILO/Care International's Better Work Cambodia programme – specifically their focus on countering gender-based violence, and on factory workers through ActionAid to facilitate the decent work agenda.

Our statement at the United Nations Human Rights Council (10 October 2023) called on Cambodia to release detained human rights defenders and union leaders and drop the charges against them. During Cambodia's Fourth Cycle Universal Periodic Review on 8 May this year, we raised our concern about restrictions on civic space and on freedom of expression, association and assembly.

We continue to encourage Cambodia to ensure that laws and their implementation are consistent with international obligations, including by reviewing the Law on Associations and Non-Governmental Associations and the Law on Trade Unions.

We request the Cambodian authorities to take the necessary measures to address the concerns raised in this case and ensure that the fundamental rights of freedom of association and the right to organise are respected and implemented under the Convention's obligations.

Observer, IndustriALL Global Union (IndustriALL) - My organization represents nine sectoral unions, including textile and garment industries in Cambodia. There are still obstacles to the exercise of the right to freely join a union in the country.

The use of fixed-term contracts for anti-union purposes remains widespread and systematic. Labour law provisions on conversion of fixed-term contracts to permanent contracts or non-fixed-term contracts after two renewals within four years, under Decree 50, are not enforced. Non-renewal of fixed-term contracts remains the most convenient means to dismiss trade unionists and dismantle trade unions.

Data collected this year from 11 trade union federations in various sectors shows that at least 49 factories employing 34,000 workers failed to enforce the conversion of short-term contracts into permanent contracts. In addition, 630 elected trade union officers on fixed-term contracts were not rehired after having established a union.

Under the short-term contracts, many workers do not receive seniority bonuses or benefit from the enforcement of minimum wage regulations, and are at greater risk of discrimination, harassment and dismissal if they join a union. They also suffer pregnancy-based discrimination, denial of maternity benefits and sick leave, and they often get fired for refusing to work overtime. The widespread use of short-term practices in factories exacerbates the difficulty of union organizing.

We expect the Government of Cambodia to address the observations of the Committee of Experts concerning numerous obstacles to union registration and certification processes, and threats and harassment against trade unionists.

In the meantime, from outside of the country, there is a huge effort to support the development of economic and social progress in the country.

On a positive note, I wish to share with the committee that IndustriALL and global brands sign legally binding agreements supporting collective bargaining and improvements in wages in the textile and garment industry in Cambodia. These ground-breaking binding agreements are currently being signed by major apparel brands and IndustriALL to support collectively bargained wages for garment workers in Cambodia.

This is a major step forward, the result of a collaborative process with brands, employers and unions in Cambodia, that puts in place legally binding commitments to support national collective bargaining. Global brands have legally committed to uphold their production volume in Cambodia and have committed to ringfencing labour costs to ensure higher item prices.

Employers and trade unions have been negotiating a template agreement to address improvements in industrial relations, wages and working conditions.

We call on the Government of Cambodia to take the necessary measures to ensure the full respect of freedom of association, in line with the recommendations of the Committee of Experts.

Observer, International Union of Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers' Association (IUF) – I speak on behalf of the IUF, with affiliates in 126 countries and representing over 10 million workers, to denounce the continued imprisonment of Chhim Sithar, the president of our affiliate, the Labor Rights Supported Union (LRSU) of Khmer Employees of Nagaworld. In May 2023, a court sentenced her to two years in prison. Five others were given sentences of one and a half years, and three were given one-year suspended sentences. Her imprisonment, alongside the legal charges against other union leaders, is one of the latest in a decade-long effort to bust the union at the hotel-casino.

Her imprisonment has been denounced by nearly every committee of the ILO supervisory system. This year, the Committee of Experts, referring to this case, “urge[d] the Government to ensure that all trade unionists detained for undertaking legitimate trade union activity are immediately released.” In October 2023, the Committee on Freedom of Association also “urged the Government once again to ensure the immediate and unconditional release of Chhim Sithar and to furnish all judicial decisions in the sentencing of the LRSU leaders and members.” And just last year, the Committee of Experts “expressed deep concern at the arrest and imprisonment of trade unionists and others for exercising their civil liberties and expressing different political views from that of the Government.” Further, the UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights and several governments have called for her immediate release. Yet the Government remains unmoved.

Thus, the IUF has had no choice but to file OECD Guidelines complaints against the investment banks which have purchased bonds and stocks in the parent company of the hotel casino. And the investment banks are concerned. In the statement resulting from the mediation with a bank, the parties agreed that “workers should be able to exercise the right to freedom of association, the right to bargain collectively, and to strike, without fear of reprisals.” Furthermore, “imprisonment resulting from strike action is never acceptable.”

Trade unions, governments, investors and civil society organizations are all watching, and we are looking to Cambodia to change course and return to compliance with international standards in respect of freedom of association. The IUF urges the Government to release Chhim Sithar immediately. The Government must also ensure that the workers at the hotel-casino are able to organize and conduct their activities in full freedom without interference from the Government or retaliation from the employer. There are urgent issues at the hotel casino which the union wishes to address through the collective bargaining process, including the union’s demand that more than 1,000 unfairly terminated union members be reinstated in their jobs. Workers in Cambodia deserve to freely access their right to organize and bargain collectively. We urge the Royal Government of Cambodia to ensure that these rights are protected.

Government representative – My delegation has taken due note of the views and comments made by distinguished delegates and speakers. The constructive comments and perspectives shared at the Committee will be conveyed back to Cambodia for serious consideration, aiming to further enhance the environment for the exercise of freedom of association, although some of the comments are not agreeable to us.

My delegation would like to provide reassurance that, in honouring our obligation under the Convention, we have consistently engaged closely with our social partners to promote the exercise of freedom of association and to sustain harmonious industrial relations with technical support from the ILO. My delegation wishes to reaffirm our commitment to continuing these collaborative efforts. Regarding the legislative issues raised during the discussion, my delegation wishes to emphasize that drafting process as characterized by a series of comprehensive tripartite consultations, allowing both employers’ and workers’ representatives ample opportunity to provide their input. Their contributions were carefully considered and balanced to ensure a fair approach. We reassure you that our processes are meticulously balanced and, with regard to that, no significant issue or challenge has been reported.

From the observations and comments from some speakers, we found that they did not refer to the latest amendment to our Law on Trade Unions (LTU). The concern was related to the old version of the LTU, therefore I would like to humbly request our speakers who are concerned about the legislation related to the LTU to refer to the latest version of our amendment for reference.

To support ongoing dialogue and address any concern, we have established multiple platforms where our social partners can voice their concerns and participate in further consultation, especially through the quarterly meeting with trade unions, which has so far been conducted twice since the beginning of the new Government in the Seventh Legislature of the National Assembly in September 2023. Further evidence is the adoption of the LTU in 2016 and its amendment in 2020. The three milestones were achieved through extensive tripartite consultation enriched by insight from ILO experts. These changes were pivotal in simplifying and streamlining the registration procedure for trade unions, significantly leading to the increase in the number of registered trade unions. As of March 2024, as recently reported, we have registered 6,317 professional organizations, 1,061 of which have been registered since the amendment of the LTU in 2020. Notably, since the amendment, the new registration rate has remained stable yet progresses, with 228 new professional organizations registered in 2020, 262 new professional organizations registered in 2021, 268 new professional organizations registered in 2022 and 258 more registered in 2023. And from January to March 2024 alone, an additional 45 new professional organizations have been registered. This statistic not only demonstrates a robust landscape of professional organizations but also underscores our steadfast commitment to freedom of association. To address the concerns of a few trade unions – they still may complain about the difficulty in registration – my delegation would like to re-appeal through the ILO to provide technical support to the Ministry of Labour and Vocational Training in organizing capacity-building training for trade unions on the registration process.

As regards Case No. 2318, we fully understand the concerns regarding the need to conclude this long-standing case, but we would also like to urge other parties to take into consideration that the case is a bit challenging for us because the victim did not cooperate with the reinvestigation process. The situation regarding the location of the incident has already changed and some witnesses have disappeared, some of them have passed away, some have moved to live in other countries, and some also could not be found. Despite this obstacle, we remain committed to ensuring justice and accountability for the victims.

In respect of the right to strike, my delegation would like to reaffirm that Cambodia firmly upholds the constitutional right to strike, a commitment that is also reflected in our national law and adherence to international instruments. However, it is essential to recognize that these rights are not absolute and must be exercised within the boundary of legal frameworks, ensuring that they do not compromise public security or infringe the rights of others. These conditions actually conform to the principle of the Convention and other UN human rights instruments.

Regarding trade union protection, we remain firm that the principle of freedom of association does not provide a world for criminal activity committed purportedly under the guise of exercising labour rights. Our judicial processes are guided by principles of due process and independence, with decisions based also on evidence. We strongly support the fact that trade unionists should not be intimidated, arrested or prosecuted for their legal activities, I would like to repeat, for their legal activities. Yet, we are not convinced that they should be entitled to impunity for their illegal activities. None of us has the authority to decide the legality or illegality of trade union activity in any jurisdiction. The court has sole discretion to decide on the basis of the merits of the case and the prevailing laws. In this regard, the court decision in Cambodia is made, not based on who the perpetrators are but on what they have done. This stand is supported by the Committee on Freedom of Association, which agreed that adherence to legal statutes is mandatory. Additionally, Article 29 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights reinforces our position by stating that - and I quote - "In the exercise of his rights and freedoms, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are determined by law solely for the purpose of securing due recognition and respect for the rights and freedoms of others and of meeting the just requirements of morality, public order and the general welfare in a democratic society." I would like to re-emphasize that no individual has been arrested or convicted solely for participating in union activities. Each citizen is subject to the law equally, with judicial action based solely on the nature of the criminal offence, irrespective of individual identity or affiliation. The principle of accountability is crucial in ensuring that union rights are not misinterpreted and result in impunity. This principle must be upheld.

This balanced approach highlights the independence of our executive, legislative and judicial branches, and reaffirms the Government's commitment to non-intervention in judicial proceedings. Through such merits, Cambodia continues to safeguard legitimate union rights while also protecting the rights of others and maintaining national order and security. This ensures a stable and just environment where all parties can thrive.

With respect to the use of police during the strike, we would like to clarify that, like in other countries, the police force has the responsibility to ensure security and public order. In Cambodia, the police force does not take any action if the strike is peaceful but if the strike turns violent by blocking the public road and destroying public and private property, it is the role of the police to enforce the law to restore social order. However, to address this concern, we would like to repeat our strong request to the ILO to provide technical support to the Government in establishing guidelines for the police force in responding to peaceful strikes and demonstrations.

Regarding trade union dissolution, I would like to clarify that as of now no trade union has been dissolved, according to our statistics. The LTU provides that the trade union shall be dissolved only when the enterprise is totally closed and all benefits of workers are totally clear. Like the Labour Law, the LTU provides that the trade union at the enterprise is established to represent workers at the enterprise level. So when there is no such enterprise any more, it is not practical to require the trade union to continue to exist, because there is no worker to represent, there is no member, there is no employer. It is a question of whether we want quality or numbers with regard to trade unions. I believe everyone wants to have quality, not numbers. So it is not practical to suggest, to require, to request the trade union to continue to exist when the enterprise is totally closed and all worker benefits have been cleared, according to the law.

On the issue of the 2014 peaceful demonstration, I do not know how to define the word peaceful, when workers block the road at night and destroy private and public property. So I would like to suggest to the Committee to review the expression “peaceful demonstration” with regard to the incident which happened in early 2014.

Regarding civil and domestic workers, I would like to emphasize that Cambodia does not provide only one way for workers to form a trade union. We have many ways. Although civil servants and domestic workers are not entitled to set up or lead a trade union under the LTU, they have the right to form an association under the law. This is not against the Convention. If there is any clause in the Convention providing that the exercise of the right to freedom of association must be made under only one law, then Cambodia would consider rewriting the LTU to comply with that. But if there is no such requirement, what we want to have is trade unions or freedom of association. If you want to have trade unions, civil servants and domestic workers cannot form unions. But if you want to see only freedom of association exercised freely in the country, it should not be limited to only one law, as long as the law provides the right to exercise the freedom to form their own association or trade union.

With regard to financial audits, I would like to emphasize that the LTU, since the amendment, does not require trade unions to submit their financial reports to the Government any more and the financial audit can only be requested by their members or by their donors. The Government does not have the right to order the financial audit of the financial report of the trade union, it depends on their members or their donors, and this obligation is not exceptional. Every organization receives funding from donors and contributions from their members. They are accountable to their donors. If their donors require them to have the financial audit of their financial report, this is not unusual. So we do not understand why this is a problem because it is actually common practice. I believe even the ILO is also subject to financial audits when requested by donors. So it is not exceptional for the LTU to require the financial report of the trade union to be audited when it is requested by their members or donors.

Regarding the Arbitration Council (AC), we keep receiving the same concerns but the situation is completely different. We appreciate that many countries raise issues about the AC. What we want to tell you is that the AC is in danger now because the funding from two donors, Sweden and USAID, will be over by the end of this year. And from January 2025, the AC will only have funding covering 15 per cent of total expenditure. So what will happen in the near future is that the Arbitration Council may die because there is no funding. So what we are talking about now is keeping the AC independent, but why do we not talk about its sustainability? To address this issue, just for your information, the Government had met with the AC several times and it was agreed that the Government will maintain our position to finance this traditional body, if there is no funding from any donor, to make it sustainable after the end of 2024. In regard to the independence of the Arbitration Council, I would like to emphasize that the Government understands that the value of the AC is its impartiality and its independence in its decisions. We will not compromise this value by just giving it financial support in order to take over its independence and impartiality, and this must be taken into account when we talk about the Arbitration Council.

Worker members – We reiterate our deep concern at the persistence of acts of violence committed against workers and the arrests of trade unionists in connection with their legitimate and peaceful activities. We regret that no serious, prompt action has been taken to investigate these acts and that the perpetrators have not been prosecuted and convicted for their crimes. It is time for the Government to conduct an inquiry into all the incidents of violence against workers and trade unionists which have been reported to it, into arbitrary detentions suffered by workers and their union representatives, and into the murders of the trade union leaders Chea Vichea, Ros Sovannareth and Hy Vuthy. The Government must guarantee that the peaceful exercise of freedom of association is not subjected to any form of repression in the country.

We have heard that acts of violence or destruction during collective actions are not exempt from the application of the law. What we denounce is the misuse by the authorities of criminal provisions to repress the legitimate and peaceful exercise of trade union activities covered by the Convention. And we cannot fail to notice that this is far too often the case in Cambodia. Many trade unionists are subjected to judicial prosecution. The most recent examples are the conviction and imprisonment of the president of the LRSU, Chhim Sithar. The same applies to the president of a union federation, Morm Rithy. The Workers' group expresses its wholehearted solidarity with them.

The Government needs to review all proceedings that are under way against trade unionists, in consultation with the trade unions concerned. All charges against trade unionists who have engaged in legitimate trade union activity must be dropped and all convictions must be overturned. The Government must take all necessary steps to ensure that such prosecutions and convictions do not recur in the future, especially by providing regular and systematic training for labour inspectors, officials responsible for the settlement of disputes, and also police officers. Guidelines for the police and for the handling of collective actions must be developed for the law enforcement bodies, recalling the need to guarantee the peaceful exercise of freedom of association.

The Government will ensure that all acts of anti-union discrimination are the subject of an investigation, that adequate reparations are provided for and that penalties that act as a deterrent are applied. We recommend that the Government amends the Law on Trade Unions, so as to ensure the conformity of this law with the Convention. The Government will abolish the requirement of knowledge of Khmer for entry to trade union office. It will also repeal section 28(2) of the Law, which provides for the automatic dissolution of a trade union in the event of closure of the enterprise. It will also repeal section 29, which provides for the possibility for any person to request the court to dissolve the union. Lastly, sections 17 and 27 of this Law will also be reviewed so that disproportionate requirements are removed with regard to financial audits. We also ask the Government to take all necessary legislative measures to ensure that teachers, domestic workers, public officials and workers in the informal economy enjoy all rights deriving from freedom of association.

The Government will also examine with the social partners the possibility of enabling unions to be established by sector or by occupation.

The Government will put in place procedures for the registration of trade unions which are simple, objective and transparent, in particular by establishing an online database, removing practical obstacles to training and to the functioning of trade unions, by getting rid of all discretionary authority and by training Ministry of Labour officials. The Government will implement the road map which has been drawn up and will simplify procedures for monitoring its implementation, in consultation with the social partners. It will identify priority areas for action and will establish a time frame for achieving the established objectives.

The Government will send information to the Committee of Experts on the steps taken to amend section 326 of the Labour Law and will provide information on its application in practice.

It will be essential for the Government to review the rules that govern the exercise of collective action, especially by ending the current practice of replacing workers taking part in collective actions, and by ceasing to issue injunctions to prevent industrial action, even though the unions have complied with all procedures. The role of the committee responsible for the handling of collective disputes must also be clarified so that it cannot restrict the legitimate right of workers' organizations to carry out trade union actions to defend the interests of their members.

The Government will take steps to ensure that the Arbitration Council is an effective and durable institution in the settlement of collective disputes and that its decisions are binding and effectively implemented in law and in practice. New arbitrators will be recruited and trained, and union federations and confederations will be entitled to represent their members without prior authorization.

We think it important that the Government of Cambodia should request ILO technical assistance to implement the recommendations which the Committee will make to it. In order to be able to follow up on the situation next year, the Government should provide a full report to the Committee of Experts by 1 September 2024.

Lastly, the case of Cambodia has been classified as a double-footnoted case by the Committee of Experts on the basis of criteria which establish the seriousness of the situation. We have emphasized and heard, in the course of our discussions, the persistent nature of serious violations of the Convention in Cambodia. The ongoing climate of violence and impunity remains a source of deep concern for the Workers' group. For this reason we ask the Government to accept a high-level tripartite mission before the next session of the Conference.

Employer members – We have heard all the comments made by all the participants from the Workers, from the Governments and from a range of others and taken careful note of those. This is, as the Workers' spokesperson has just said, a long-standing case, and I think that we all accept that; the record shows that it has been heard and commented upon on many occasions. But we are also talking about, not quite a statute of limitations, but there are some things that time passes by, and they become less of an appropriate focus than things that are happening now. As I said before, the long-standing nature of the case is one of the factors in its being labelled as double-footnoted this year. A lack of progress in the view of the Committee of Experts, new allegations of violence or repression of trade union rights and, I think, probably the most tellingly of all, the lack of a report for this year, were factors that I think weighed on the Committee of Experts' mind when it decided to double-footnote the case. That said though, when you look at the individual elements of those particular factors, apart from allegations of serious repression of trade unionists and their rights, a number of others have been looked at a number of times over the years and it is hard to see how they become more serious when the same effects continue to apply. So, just with that as a context, just going through some of the particular points that have been made, and I made the point earlier, that when we look at some of the instances or the allegations, it is very necessary to separate out what was done and who it was done by.

The fact that somebody who was arrested happens to be a trade unionist does not, of itself, make it definitive that that person was arrested because he/she was a trade unionist, and it is very necessary for us, as a Committee, to look at these facts in the light of whether or not we have the appropriate jurisdiction to look at these things. If, for instance, the person was arrested because they were throwing Molotov cocktails at a police line-up, then that, I would have to suggest, is not something that we would have the purview or mandate to examine. That is for the criminal court of the nation concerned. On the other hand, if that person is arrested purely and simply because they are standing on a podium in front of a gathering of otherwise peaceful trade union members, then that is a measure of suppression of freedom of association. So, these things are necessary to examine before this Committee picks up the reins and starts to examine it and I have to suggest that in a number of instances, including in this case, we are not that clear, we do not have enough of that information and we are therefore making comments on something which ultimately may not be in our purview.

So, again, a contextual note, when we look at the case of Cambodia, when we look at other cases that are before us, we really do need this, and so I do echo the Workers' request for more information. The Workers have made a long list of requests for information and I think that those, in the main, are valid, because what we need to do in this Committee is to make our judgements or our calls on a true representation of whether or not something is transgressing the Convention that we are examining.

When we look at the overall situation in Cambodia we have seen and we have heard instances of progress. We have seen the work being done by the Government in a range of areas and I touch particularly on the issue of the ability of the forces of law and order to distinguish between what is peaceful and what is not. For instance, the training that is required for the police and the law enforcement agencies when they are dealing with a public gathering. We note with pleasure that the Government has in fact taken some steps in this regard to train people. What we would like to see, and what we have not seen evidence of yet, is that this is an ongoing feature of the normal day-to-day duties and training of such agencies.

What we have heard is evidence of some events and some programmes that took place with a specific number of people that have been trained. What we would like to see from the Employers' side is that this sort of training and knowledge is imparted to people as a normal part of developing the skills as a law enforcement officer, so that they are constantly updated and equipped with the knowledge to make an informed judgement at the time they confront, for instance, a public gathering. With regard to the legal issues, there are a variety in listening to the Government in relation to, and I am sort of working backwards a bit here, in relation to the dissolution of unions. One of the intriguing features about Cambodia is the prevalence of unions that are enterprise-based. In other words, one company, one set of workers, one union, one employer. That is not as common elsewhere in the world, and one of the things we need to appreciate in this Committee is that this not quite uniqueness, but this relatively unique feature of trade unionism is itself a factor in how some things work. I can certainly take the Government's point that a union goes because the enterprise in which its members sit has gone, but that too is not necessarily sufficient to justify a law that says that the union then automatically goes. Because it can happen that those workers can become associated with each other again under the guise of another employer, and the vehicle that has protected them in the past could easily be the vehicle that protects them in the future. I think there is a call for a review or appeal of the provisions that automate the process of dissolution. Instead, there is a need to reflect the requirement of the Convention that the affairs of trade union organizations and employers are for them to regulate, including dissolution. So those are the general points as far as the law is concerned. In relation to trade union registration, I think this is almost a comment back to the Committee of Experts in that their commentary that there continues to be difficulties with registration is not reflected in reality when you consider the vast expansion of the number of unions in Cambodia. That would suggest that registration there is almost too easy, because the rate of expansion, not just the numbers, would suggest that there are not as many obstacles as may be thought. That said, the direct contacts mission did make a recommendation that ways of simplifying the process be found, by all accounts some of the bureaucracy involved is perhaps more than might be efficient, but as a deliberate obstacle, there seems to be less evidence than would be suggested by reality. So we would ask that the Government work on the simplicity of the process and of course we would suggest back to the Committee of Experts that they review their views on that particular matter. Overall, the recommendations of the direct contacts mission to review and implement the road map and provide progress reports, this week has called for further reports on that by the reporting date for next year's Conference, which is 1 September this year. With all of that in mind, this is really a case where it should not have been a double-footnoted case, and I suspect that perhaps not reporting last year was the thing that tipped the balance. This is a case that has gone on too long, it has features that perhaps should be looked at in a different light, as I mentioned, the fact that we need to distinguish between what is peaceful and what is not. But all of those things together do not make this a case of serious deterioration, there is a case of frustration maybe, the fact that these things have gone on for so long, we have had the direct contacts mission in 2022.

It seems that there is a need to push the Government to get on with the things that have been recommended by the direct contacts mission, to get on with the things that they are already doing, and we have heard the evidence of the things that they have been doing, but with all of those things in mind, I think it is probably premature to call for something as clinical as a high-level tripartite mission, as that is a process which is typically reserved for situations where there are particular and serious issues that are clearly within the mandate of the Committee. While that may in fact be the case that the Government is unable to resolve some of these issues, I think in the light of the more recent mission that this would be a premature call.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed. The Committee also noted the conclusions and recommendations of the ILO Direct Contacts Mission to Cambodia, which took place from 28 March 2022 to 1 April 2022.

The Committee noted the long-standing nature of this case in the Committee and deeply regretted the lack of timely reporting by the Government on the application of the Convention to the Committee of Experts. Taking into account the discussion, the Committee urged the Government of Cambodia to:

- take all necessary measures to prevent the arbitrary arrest, detention and prosecution of trade unionists for undertaking legitimate trade union activity;
- conclude the ongoing investigations into the murders of trade union leaders Chea Vichea and Ros Sovannareth (in 2004) and Hy Vuthy (in 2007) and expedite the investigations of all other allegations of violence perpetrated against trade unionists;
- review the list of pending cases related to the January 2014 demonstrations with the trade unions concerned;
- ensure that no criminal charges or sanctions are imposed in relation to the peaceful exercise of trade union activities and that trade unionists detained for undertaking legitimate trade union activity are immediately released;
- develop guidelines and provide regular and systematic training to all relevant public officers with a view to ensuring that legitimate trade union activity is not suppressed;
- take further appropriate measures to facilitate registration of trade unions through a simple, objective and transparent process;
- promote the effective enjoyment of the rights under the Convention by civil servants, including public sector teachers, and by domestic workers and workers in the informal economy;
- amend sections 17 and 27 of the LTU, so that audits to the financial statements and activity reports are only required if there are serious grounds for believing that the actions of an organization are contrary to its rules or to the law;
- amend the relevant provisions of the LTU to ensure that workers' or employers' organizations can only be dissolved on the basis of the procedures laid down by their statutes, or by a court ruling, and that the determination of the procedures for dissolution by members is left to the trade unions' or employers' associations own rules and by-laws;
- take appropriate measures to ensure that all trade unions have the right to represent their members in collective disputes in grievance proceedings at the enterprise level and the ministerial level, as well as before the Arbitration Council; and
- increase efforts to make the Arbitration Council an effective and sustainable institution in handling labour disputes.

The Committee called on the Government of Cambodia to provide any outstanding information requested by the Committee of Experts before its next session together with detailed information on the measures taken to implement these recommendations, and on the results achieved.

The Committee also requested the Government to fully implement the road map and simplify its progress report, in full consultation with the social partners and with the support of the ILO.

The Committee noted the willingness of the Government to cooperate with the ILO and invited it to avail itself of ILO technical assistance to effectively implement all of the Committee's recommendations.

Government representative – My delegation has taken due note of the comments and recommendations made by the Committee. We will take them into serious consideration and make the utmost efforts to implement those recommendations as much as possible based on our prevailing laws and regulations and the international labour Conventions to which Cambodia is a party.

Allow me to take this opportunity to reaffirm Cambodia's commitment to promoting freedom of association through our Labour Law and the Law on Trade Unions, which offer better conditions than those of some countries in the region, and the ILO recommendations.

Having endured decades of civil war, Cambodia highly values its hard-earned peace and social stability. Peace is priceless and everything for Cambodia and its people. Therefore, we are determined to protect peace at all costs. In this connection, promoting the sustainable industrial harmony is indispensable. Protecting this peace and sustainable industrial harmony requires the joint efforts of the Government, the Employers, and the Workers.

Freedom of association does not shield criminal actions. Trade union rights cannot infringe the rights of others, as outlined in article 29 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Cambodia adheres to this principle and considers workers' rights as human rights. Therefore, no trade unionists have been and will be prosecuted for legal activities, but illegal action will be addressed by law.

We are made to believe that trade union impunity has no place under Convention No. 87, which Cambodia upholds. As for the case of Mr Ros Sovannareth, I wish to emphasize that the perpetrator, Mr Thach Saveth, has been convicted and is now serving his term in prison. Therefore, my delegation would like to reiterate our request to the Committee to withdraw the Case No. 2318. Furthermore, there is no pending case in relation to the January 2014 riot, but if trade unions have information, they should submit it to the Ministry of Labour and Vocational Training. Otherwise, these concerns are just rumours.

In respect of the trade union dissolution, we would like to emphasize that our Law on Trade Unions does not grant the power to the authority to dissolve trade unions; only the court can do so. Our Law is better than the laws of some countries, where a trade union can be dissolved by the administrative authorities.

Regarding the Arbitration Council, we would like to re-appeal for financial support from the donors to keep this quasi-judicial institution running after the end of this year.

In a nutshell, Cambodia remains committed to collaborating with the social partners to strengthen industrial relations and looks forward to further technical assistance from the ILO.

Colombia (ratification: 1989)

Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159)

Written information provided by the Government

The Government respects and complies with the recommendations made by the ILO supervisory bodies. We therefore wish to first highlight that the Government's labour reforms intended to promote dignified and decent work, currently being considered by Congress, include, inter alia, an approach that will ensure the social and labour inclusion of persons with disabilities, provisions relating to their right to work and regulations governing legal capacity, reasonable accommodations, non-discrimination, a private-sector recruitment quota and job stability.

The relevant draft legislation includes specific obligations for employers in relation to the removal of barriers, accessibility and the adoption of reasonable accommodations so that persons with disabilities may enjoy their right to work. In this respect, the main focus of the barrier removal strategy should be reasonable accommodations, which should be linked to the concept of universal design for efficiency and collective well-being in a differential approach for the inclusion of persons with disabilities.

Regulations that allow for the removal of barriers to employment for persons with disabilities will be introduced as part of the labour reforms, including:

- guarantees of the right to work and the legal capacity of persons with disabilities to enter into employment contracts;
- an obligation for employers to make the reasonable accommodations required by persons with disabilities to allow them to undertake their work and remain in employment;
- regulation of strengthened job security in relation to the termination of the employment relationship of persons with disabilities;
- non-discrimination measures to assist persons with disabilities in gaining access to, and remaining in, employment, and the establishment of a recruitment quota for persons with disabilities in the private sector: “Companies with between 50 and 100 employees must recruit or retain, as applicable, at least one employee with a disability; companies with 101 or more employees must recruit or retain employees with disabilities so that such persons comprise at least 2 per cent of their workforce”.

The draft legislation bases the protective environment on the greater job security enjoyed by workers with disabilities who are in employment relationships governed by contracts setting out their declared disabilities, reversing the burden of proof when discrimination is suspected. At the same time, it sets out specific obligations for employers to remove barriers so that persons with disabilities may enjoy the right to work.

New regulations

National Development Plan 2022–26

The Government has included in the National Development Plan a chapter on guarantees to bring about a world without barriers for persons with disabilities. The chapter recognizes that, historically, persons with disabilities have suffered social and institutional exclusion, both in law and as a result of limited access to public services, rights and State provision. Consequently, it proposes around seven actions in that regard: strengthening the National Disability System so that the services offered to persons with disabilities align adequately with the State’s commitments under the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities; education and employment as vital tools in developing the skills of persons with disabilities given their contribution to reducing poverty; accessibility for the social and productive inclusion of persons with disabilities; realizing equality before the law and guaranteeing access to justice; and designing strategies to empower persons with disabilities in terms of citizen, electoral and political participation, ensuring reasonable accommodations that enable their participation. These actions are currently being planned and developed by the various ministries responsible, particularly the recently created Ministry of Equality and Equity, and it will therefore be possible to extend the documents and policies created in the coming months.

Decree No. 533 of 29 April 2024 represents a significant step forward, allowing the Ministry of Labour to introduce incentives for employers who recruit workers with disabilities in accordance with section 79 of Act No. 2294 of 19 May 2023. This programme, led by the Ministry of Labour, seeks to promote formal employment through financial incentives and remove barriers to access for specific groups.

The Decree aims to regulate incentives for the recruitment and retention of new formal jobs and is aimed at employers that create jobs employing new employees for at least six months. The Decree's provisions include a State contribution of 35 per cent of the statutory monthly minimum wage for the recruitment of persons with disabilities, thereby illustrating the affirmative action taken, with State funding, to create new jobs using a differentiated approach for persons with disabilities.

The Decree also provides for a contribution of 30 per cent of the wage when new workers aged between 18 and 28 years are employed formally, 20 per cent in the case of new female workers aged over 28 years and 15 per cent in the case of new male workers over 28 years. An additional 10 per cent will be granted where the new worker has not made social security contributions in at least the four months prior to the minimum six-month employment relationship required to receive the incentive.

Furthermore, the Government issued Presidential Directive No. 005 of 25 August 2023 with the aim of helping persons with disabilities lead decent lives with equal opportunities, free from exclusion and discrimination.

Similarly, since the issuance of Decree No. 2011 of 2017, there has been a significant increase in the recruitment of persons with disabilities in public bodies; while there were 1,192 public officials with disabilities when the Decree was issued, data from the Public Employment Information and Management System demonstrates that, in 2023, up to 31 December, 13,581 persons with disabilities were recruited or contracted by 913 public sector bodies, including 11,424 public officials and 2,157 contract workers.

More specific action

To date in 2024, the Ministry of Labour, together with the Administrative Department of the Public Service and the Public Employment Service (PSE), and with the support of strategic partners such as the National Institute for the Blind and the National Institute for the Deaf, has planned four regional training workshops for employment managers in local government. Those workshops took place virtually and sought to strengthen the support provided by the relevant bodies and help regulate recruitment quotas for persons with disabilities in public bodies at the local level.

The Ministry of Labour, in coordination with the Public Employment Service Unit and employment agencies, has managed the placement of around 12,808 persons with disabilities over the last four years. Placements were found for 3,959 persons with disabilities in 2022, rising to 4,265 persons with disabilities in 2023.

Moreover, the Ministry of Labour has provided training to public officials and the social partners.

The Government, through the Ministry of Labour, has undertaken promotional activities in conjunction with the National Disability System, the Administrative Department of the Public Service, the Public Employment Service Unit and the National Training Service (SENA) with the aim of facilitating and gradually increasing the placement of persons with disabilities in the public and private sectors under the Labour Inclusion Model, with a focus on closing gaps.

Between 2020 and 2023, the Ministry of Labour participated in the implementation of 282 in-person, online and hybrid activities to promote the labour market inclusion of persons with disabilities, from which over 18,626 persons benefited.

A labour market inclusion strategy for persons with disabilities has been developed. The strategy aims to provide technical and operational capacity to the network of public employment service providers to ensure the adequate delivery of services for persons with disabilities and employers, thus allowing for the population to enter and remain in the workforce.

The Public Employment Service Unit has provided advisory services for employees of compensation funds on the labour market inclusion of persons with disabilities on the employability road map of the Public Employment Service Unit for the first and second levels of the employability road map.

During the implementation of the project financed by the International Organization for Migration and the United States Agency for International Development to strengthen management and placement services providing assistance to persons with disabilities and members of ethnic groups, five workshops were held for SPE providers, which focused on the provision of support by management and placement services for persons with disabilities belonging to ethnic groups.

An 80-hour workshop on Colombian sign language (levels I and II) was held with the participation of 23 SPE providers, and training and advisory services on web accessibility were provided to ten SPE providers. A toolbox was delivered with seven videos, five printed media documents in accessible format and three collections of recommendations, which strengthen the employment road map services for persons with disabilities, with a focus on members of ethnic groups.

A Colombian sign language course was delivered to SPE providers. The first online course was completed and was attended by 28 collaborators from the SPE provider network and two public officials from the SPE's citizen assistance group.

Furthermore, the SPE has made available to the network of providers an online course aimed at public officials with the aim of strengthening skills for the labour inclusion of persons with disabilities. A total of 831 persons enrolled on the course and, by November 2021, 580 trainees had been certified.

Through an online event, 23 employment centres from 11 SPE providers were recognized as being inclusive of persons with disabilities and for the effective implementation of changes to the employability road map for the provision of assistance to persons with disabilities under the labour inclusion model, with the focus on closing gaps and the labour inclusion model for persons with disabilities. The ABC guide to promoting the labour market inclusion of persons with disabilities in the SPE was developed, which was aimed at the SPE network of providers, employers, persons with disabilities and the general public, and which sets out the management and placement services, and the main tax benefits for hiring persons with disabilities.

The document annexed to the recommendations and guidelines for the provision of assistance to persons with psychosocial disabilities has been developed and delivered in the context of the SPE employability road map with the aim of providing the SPE network of providers with recommendations and guidelines that promote assistance for persons with such disabilities.

Advisory services and support for business management were provided to promote the inclusion of persons with disabilities in the department of Caquetá, with the aim of fostering the employment of persons with disabilities. Forty employers participated.

The organization of a meeting with employers was promoted in the department of Meta, with the participation of the employment agencies, COFREM and APE SENA, the municipality of Villavicencio, the subcommittee for the labour market inclusion of persons with disabilities in the department, and the Ministry of Labour, as well as 13 employers.

An in-person meeting was held with employers in the Bogota Chamber of Commerce, at which the employability road map and the labour inclusion model were presented, with a focus on closing gaps. The meeting was held in coordination with the Presidential Council on Disability, the Ministry of Labour, the National Training Service, the Secretariat of Economic Development of Bogota, and seven public employment service providers from Bogota. Twenty five employers participated.

Advisory services were provided to 17 enterprises from the city of Bogota on the tax and financial benefits available for hiring persons with disabilities.

In 2023, assistance and training were provided on the National Care System, and discussions were held on basic concepts, the contents of the law and the priorities of the National Council for Economic and Social Policy (CONPES) regarding care and the adoption of the decree creating the Intersectoral Commission for the National Care Service.

Assistance was provided at the event “Business Roundtable and Inclusive Entrepreneurship”, which was held at the headquarters of the Kennedy Chamber of Commerce, where the progress of the district secretariats for social integration and economic development for groups requiring special attention was presented, with emphasis on the inclusion of persons with disabilities. The experience of the “Network for Inclusion”, led by the Bogota Chamber of Commerce, was discussed, and awards were presented to employers and entities that have worked actively on the labour and productive inclusion of persons with disabilities.

In coordination with the National Institute for the Blind, training was provided for the network of providers located in Valledupar, Armenia, Bucaramanga, Cali, Popayán, Soacha and Riohacha, on topics such as general information on visual impairment, disability certificates and tax benefits. Online training was also provided for the entire network of SPE providers on accessibility in digital environments, in which 134 public officials participated.

Furthermore, in coordination with the National Institute for the Deaf, the network of providers was strengthened through a workshop entitled “Learning about deaf culture: Generating inclusive care for the promotion of the rights of deaf persons”, in which providers from Fusagasugá, Girardot, Medellín, Cali, Santa Marta and Pereira participated.

Within the framework of the national public policy on disability, progress is being made with the process of reformulating the policy, with the participation in the development of the road map of social and institutional entities and forums working with persons with disabilities, carers and/or families.

In coordination with the population itself, networks have been created to disseminate information on the development of the process of the reformulation of the Public Policy on Disability and the stakeholders have been diversified, which include:

- persons with disabilities with the seven types of disability (physical, visual, cognitive, multiple, cognitive, psychosocial, auditive, deaf and blind);
- carers, family members of persons with disabilities who need a high level of support for their participation;
- children and young people with disabilities;
- organizations of and for persons with disabilities (formal or informal);
- organizations of carers of persons with disabilities (formal or informal);
- social movements for the defence of the rights of persons with disabilities;
- cooperatives of persons with disabilities;
- sports clubs for persons with disabilities;
- artistic groups of persons with disabilities;
- organizations, movements, communities and networks of women, carers of persons with disabilities, young people, victims of armed conflict, migrants, ethnic groups, lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex social sectors, citizen watchdogs, university networks and rural populations.

As noted by the Committee of Experts, the Government is complying in both law and practice with the Convention.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the Government representative of Colombia, the Deputy Minister of Employment and Pensions, who on an exceptional basis has been authorized by the Officers of the Committee to intervene remotely.

Government representative – First, I would like to thank you all for allowing me this opportunity to address you remotely, as my health means that it is impossible for me to make the journey and share with the Committee our reflections on the Convention.

In the first place, I would like to say that this intervention, in addition to being made in my capacity as Deputy Minister of Employment and Pensions, as kindly indicated by the Chairperson, is being made in my modest capacity as a citizen with disabilities, from which I can confirm and bear witness to the situation of persons with disabilities in relation to employment, which is the area covered by the Convention.

Since the last report was provided on compliance with the Convention, Colombia has been in the process of adopting a public policy which represents significant progress in the application of the Convention, in accordance with the guidance provided by the Convention and the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities of 2006, which Colombia has ratified and has been implementing through specific statutory legislation, as well as through measures combining active policies and a national employment policy, as called for by the Convention, for the integration of persons with disabilities into the world of work.

We cannot overlook the fact that it is estimated that there are currently around 1,000 million persons in the world with some type of disability, which corresponds to 15 per cent of the world population. Most of these persons are of working age. In Colombia, we have 3.5 million persons with disabilities. We have made progress on the methodology for the measurement of this population group with a view to being able to adopt public policies. More specifically, since 2021, the major integrated household survey, which is the methodology for measuring the unemployment rate in Colombia, has included disaggregated data to identify the employment possibilities, or not, of persons with disabilities, which indicate that 42.3 per cent of persons with disabilities have fewer employment opportunities than those who do not have disabilities.

Similarly, the Government of Colombia has endorsed the overall commitment to remove physical, attitudinal and communication barriers, which are the factors that impede them from benefiting from the right to work, and in particular from decent jobs in accordance with ILO guidance. Colombia aspires to remove those barriers. Colombia has implemented a series of policies so that no one is left behind, so that policies are designed and developed with the participation of persons with disabilities, and focus on the removal of barriers and on social inclusion.

Who are the persons whom we are targeting? Who are the persons with disabilities for whom the Government of Colombia, and indeed the world, is developing these policies? They are those who, during the period of the Inquisition were seen as persons deserving of criticism, as persons who merited judgement or assessment for their conduct, because they had surely done something for God to impose this punishment, and they were accordingly harshly treated. Humanity then moved towards a supportive approach, with the focus on the medical aspects of disability, in the belief that persons with disabilities are deserving of medical attention, an approach involving scientific adaptation of our situation, but still of isolation from the enjoyment of rights.

It is in this light that the Government of Colombia understands the social approach set out in this Convention and the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, and it is adopting it and incorporating it into the design of public policies and rules with a view to modernizing the whole system of regulation and the design of interventions so that persons with disabilities merit support, based on a differentiated approach with the focus on social inclusion, in the present case in the world of work.

For this purpose, Colombia has adopted measures for the entry into work and reassignment of persons with disabilities, always focussing on the transversal principle of stability, within the context of the affirmative measures that are merited in the case of persons with disabilities.

We included all measures of reasonable accommodation in Act No. 1618 of 2013, which is the law that gives statutory expression to the whole policy of the removal of barriers in the country, and we have also moved forward with the inclusion of specific requirements for employers in relation to access to work based on the removal of barriers.

Colombia is currently at a special moment in the process of the adoption of social reforms for the modernization of our regulatory system which, unfortunately, is not sufficiently in compliance and accordance with international labour standards. With specific reference to this Convention, the Negotiation Commission on Wages and Labour Policies, which has met on at least 12 occasions, reached agreement (it was one of the measures agreed to by employers, workers and the Government) on the inclusion of a requirement for employment quotas for persons with disabilities in the private sector.

Colombia already has employment quotas in the public sector, as set out in Decree No. 2011 of 2017. Through tripartite dialogue, with the participation of employers, workers and the Government, we agreed in Colombia on the inclusion in the draft labour reform of a provision for the inclusion of employment quotas for persons with disabilities (one worker with disabilities in enterprises with between 50 and 100 workers, and 2 per cent in enterprises with over 100 workers).

We call on employers, and of course workers, who have supported us, and the Congress of the Republic, to bring safely to port this initiative of the labour reform, which adopts in domestic law all the parameters and requirements of the ILO standards ratified by Colombia.

This is a Convention that has been ratified by Colombia, and Colombia is undergoing a transition towards the adoption of public policies in our labour law, with specific quotas. We therefore call on employers to focus on this Convention by supporting the labour reform, not opposing it, and welcoming into the world of work persons with disabilities who are deserving of rights, deserving of the removal of physical, attitudinal and communication barriers as a key component of the response for the inclusion and transformation of the social approach to disability, governed by the guidance set out in Convention No. 159 and the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities.

Accordingly, the Colombian National Development Plan, a World Power for Life 2022–26, includes a specific provision, section 79, for the promotion through the Jobs for Life Policy of incentives for the recruitment of persons with disabilities.

Employment policy in Colombia includes initiatives for the recruitment of young persons, women and men over 18 years of age with disabilities. Through this policy, emphasis is placed on persons with disabilities and the provision of greater financial incentives to enterprises for the recruitment of persons with disabilities through a differentiated approach.

An incentive is offered of between 35 and 45 per cent of the minimum wage. If the person with disabilities has been off work or unemployed for four months, or has not been able to find a job, the 35 per cent incentive offered by the programme is increased by 10 per cent, which means an incentive of 45 per cent to promote their recruitment through the Jobs for Life programme, which is already being implemented under Decree No. 533 of 2024, and which will become operational from the end of June for the first two categories of employers who wish to participate, with the provision of incentives as an active policy for the recruitment of persons with disabilities.

Colombia has a specific policy of incentives through the Jobs for Life Programme for the recruitment of persons with disabilities. This involves a sufficiently robust budgetary effort in support of our policy, with 400,000 million pesos already allocated for the programme in support of this initiative, which is an active policy, and I believe it is pioneering at the global level, for the recruitment of persons with disabilities.

The labour reform has not only been developed and designed through tripartism, as invitations were extended through the so-called tripartism plus approach to concerned social organizations for the design of the labour reform, with support from the Employers' group and the Workers' group. On this, I want to be very clear: persons with disabilities participated and made proposals, and they were well received by employers and workers and, I insist, the Employers' group and the Workers' group.

The proposals made by organizations of persons with disabilities sought fundamentally to: (1) include in the Labour Code the specific requirement for employers to remove physical, attitudinal and communication barriers so that they are no longer an impediment to the enjoyment of rights, and in this case the right to decent work; and (2) a relaxation of the guarantee of strengthened stability when a worker with disabilities is employed and the employer is aware of the situation, which is included in the contract and relaxes the presumption of discrimination in the event of termination, when the burden of proving discrimination in relation to termination lies with the worker, but there is no presumption of discrimination. This is a measure that was put forward by organizations of persons with disabilities, and was welcomed in particular by employers, while being accepted by workers and the Government, with a view to its inclusion in a specific statute. The development process was therefore not only tripartite, but also tripartite plus, for which reason we once again call on employers, workers and the Congress of the Republic to adopt this approach to the modernization of our rules, the modernization of the right to work as a key to improving rights, and as a key to harmonization with international standards. We, in the national Government, understand that these are international standards, standards that correct social dysfunctions, with the aspiration of remedying dysfunctions that are increasingly global and increasingly common in our society. Just as humanity transcends frontiers, so does the commitment to the inclusion of persons with disabilities in the world of work, in the context of the enjoyment of rights (in this case the right to decent work), as promised by the 1998 Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work and the Political Constitution of Colombia, in article 25.

The positions taken up within the Congress of the Republic not to support the reform with the inclusion of the measures that I have just described are clearly a cause for concern, and are clearly related to the effect given to the Convention. However, the national Government is also promoting a reform of the system of protection for invalidity, old age and survivors for the citizens of the country.

In this pension reform, a reform of the invalidity, old-age and survivors' protection system, there are also differentiated measures. The solidarity pillar, through which cash transfers are made to adults in a situation of vulnerability, will also have a differentiated approach under which persons with disabilities will become eligible from the age of 55 (men) and 50 (women). The general population is eligible for the cash transfer benefits of the solidarity pillar from the age of 65 (men) and 60 (women). In recognition of the lower life expectancy of persons with disabilities, there is a differentiation measure in the Bill that is currently being examined by the Chamber of Representatives, the lower house in Colombia.

Similarly, the revision includes a modification of invalidity pensions and includes a second activity policy, that is for persons who are recognized as suffering from invalidity for the purposes of entitlement to a pension. Their situation cannot be reviewed if they engage in an activity different from the one in which they have been recognized as suffering from invalidity for the purposes of eligibility to a benefit, in order to ensure that such persons, if they engage in another activity, with another skill, are not penalized through the loss of the benefit. This is a situation that needs to be brought up to date in accordance with the draft legislation that we are bringing forward. And finally, there needs to be an improvement in the recognition rate for invalidity pensions.

All of these plans have been thought out and are focused on the recognition of our own differences. We all aspire to being treated equally, and to effect being given to the principle of equality set out in the Convention, which the Committee very rightly proclaims. But, as also recognized by the Convention, we all aspire to our own differences being recognized, as they are recognized in the Convention, in relation to the obligations that are incumbent upon us under the policies that we have developed.

I have given a very brief summary of the policy for the labour and pension reform, the Jobs for Life Programme, the National Development Plan, all the plans that we have for vocational training as a route to improving the employability of persons with disabilities, with emphasis on the work of the National Training Service (SENA).

I would like to conclude by urging everyone to support this process that is being led by the Government of Colombia, and which I consider can be seen as an example at the global level of commitment to the inclusion of persons with disabilities. We have persons in the national Government who have disabilities who are taking the lead on very serious public policies. And we have a very specific commitment to labour reform and pension reform, a commitment to life, to the differentiated approach and the support that is merited by persons with disabilities, more as citizens than in any other role that they can play in society.

Employer members – Colombia ratified Convention No. 159 in 1989 and, since then, the Committee of Experts has made three observations, in 2011, 2015 and 2023. It is the first occasion on which the Committee has discussed this case.

In the first place, we thank the Government of Colombia for the information provided to the Committee on the application of the Convention in law and practice. We find this information very promising, as is the commitment expressed by the Government representative. However, it is necessary to take into consideration the following shortcomings identified by the Committee of Experts.

With reference to Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention on the national policy and the vocational rehabilitation of persons with disabilities, respectively, the Committee emphasizes the fact that, despite the existence of a national policy, only 2.5 per cent of persons with disabilities are in formal employment or have an income equivalent to the minimum wage.

Taking into account the policies and measures reported by the Government, it is necessary to consider two issues.

First, the factors that are limiting the scope and effectiveness of the action taken, in contrast with the figures provided by the Administrative Department for Statistics, and in particular the procedures for the design and adoption of the policies described. In view of the persistence of shortcomings in the inclusion of persons with disabilities, the Employers echo the request made by the Committee of Experts for the Government to provide more detailed information on the manner in which it is ensured in both law and practice that adequate vocational rehabilitation measures are made available to all persons with disabilities and to supply updated information on the nature, scope and impact of these measures on the creation of opportunities on the formal labour market.

We also request the Government to continue its political and legislative efforts for the development of policies for the labour market integration of persons with disabilities by promoting their inclusion in the context of a regulatory framework that is conducive to the development of sustainable enterprises.

A substantive element of the Convention is the requirement to consult representative organizations of workers and employers. It is not clear from the written information provided by the Government that tripartite consultations were held in the various bodies involved in the design and implementation of the measures that have been reported, particularly at the level of the National Development Plan, as well as in relation to the detailed process of the formulation of the new disability and inclusion policy. Moreover, according to the report of the Committee of Experts, workers' organizations in Colombia have indicated that consultation procedures have not been created for the discussion of policies affecting workers with disabilities.

The Government has reported in its written information, and has just reiterated this orally to the Committee, the existence of draft labour reform legislation which would include a social and labour inclusion approach for persons with disabilities, but nor is reference made in the written information to whether the views of the social partners were included in its development in any way. In this regard, we respectfully invite the Government to specify whether the 12 meetings referred to within the framework of the Negotiation Commission on Wages and Labour Policies were held to discuss the draft labour reform that is currently before the Congress of the Republic.

It hardly seems necessary to remind this Committee that the sustainability and effectiveness of labour market policies are closely related to effective consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers. This is especially true for the development of vocational rehabilitation and training measures, for which the social partners are the ones who can offer a comprehensive vision of the strategic skills needed in the labour market, the challenges and opportunities that arise and the measures that can best improve the employability of persons with disabilities. We therefore call on the Government to make every effort to ensure institutionalized and effective consultation with the social partners in the design, implementation, revision and follow-up stages of such policies, and more specifically to provide detailed information on the process of the formulation of the new policy on disability and inclusion.

We then need to consider the recommendations of the Committee of Experts in relation to Articles 7, 8 and 9 of the Convention on vocational training for persons with disabilities, services in rural areas and the training of qualified staff.

The Employer members note the information provided by the Government on the programmes and action taken to promote equality of opportunity and the elimination of segregated action for persons with disabilities in the field of education.

However, we also need to take into consideration the Government's statistics, according to which only 10 per cent of persons with disabilities are able to enter the formal education system, or of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), which indicate that only 56 per cent of young persons with disabilities in Colombia between the ages of 15 and 24 are able to read and write. In the words of the Committee of Experts, this compromises the future of young persons with disabilities, especially in light of the technological transformations in the world of work.

In light of this data, we call on the Government to renew its efforts to collaborate with the social partners to ensure the participation of young persons with disabilities in the education system and in vocational training programmes, and to ensure inclusive access at the various levels, as well as the design of relevant curricula in consultation with the social partners which include technological skills and transferable skills, which are of strategic importance for the employability of young persons.

We also request the Government to provide detailed information on the policies implemented to promote access to the various levels of vocational training, the consultations held with the social partners, their outcome, the number of persons reached disaggregated by age and their impact in terms of access to formal employment, including information on rural areas and remote communities in the country, as well as the enterprises covered by the incentive policies implemented.

The Employer members reiterate our thanks for the information provided to the Committee and we hope that the strong commitment expressed by the Government will be translated into action based on dialogue to improve the inclusion and vocational training of persons with disabilities.

We reiterate our request for the Government to intensify its efforts for the development and implementation of policies for the inclusion and vocational training of persons with disabilities, with an improvement in the allocation of resources and guaranteeing that the views of the most representative organizations of employers are taken into account through institutionalized consultations at all the stages of the development, review and implementation of these policies. We also request the Government to provide detailed information on the implementation and results of the policies developed to remedy the shortcomings of compliance in law and practice.

Worker members – We thank the Deputy Minister of Labour of the Government of Colombia for the outstanding quality of the information provided to the ILO on the effect given to the Convention. It is only the third time in history that this Convention has been examined by our Committee. The two previous cases, in 2006 and 2013, were considered to be cases of progress.

The Government has demonstrated, based on specific figures and data, the importance that it places on training and employment generation for persons with disabilities.

We note with satisfaction the adoption in May 2023 of the National Development Plan 2022–2026 which, among other measures, provides guarantees of inclusive education and work for persons with disabilities. As reported to the Committee of Experts, they include a broadened range of institutional training programmes for inclusive and accessible work, initiatives to facilitate access to work for persons with disabilities in the public sector and the strengthening strategies for SPE providers to promote the employment of persons with disabilities.

The Government has also reported that funding has been provided for enterprise initiatives for by persons with disabilities. It should be noted that outreach activities have been conducted targeting employers and representatives of various national bodies, and enterprises have been advised on labour inclusion mechanisms and employment services for persons with disabilities.

The Committee of Experts has also received information from the Government on the development of a new disability and inclusion policy that envisages the adoption of measures to provide opportunities for the development of persons with disabilities in education and production.

The Government of Colombia has also reported that it has submitted to the Congress of the Republic a labour reform to ensure decent and dignified work. The reform includes an approach for the social and labour inclusion of persons with disabilities, provisions on their right to work and regulations on their legal capacity, reasonable accommodations, non-discrimination, a private-sector recruitment quota and job stability. We encourage the Government to adopt the reforms without delay.

We welcome the Government's initiatives and the action intended to give effect to the Convention, and we request it to continue providing updated information on the progress made in that regard.

Employer member, Colombia – We would first like to present some of the main labour market figures for persons with disabilities in the labour market in Colombia. Some 76 per cent of working-age persons with disabilities are outside the workforce, while informality among this group currently stands at 75.8 per cent.

Similarly, when we examine the education levels of persons with disabilities, we find that 41.6 per cent have completed basic primary education and just 5.1 per cent hold a university degree. These figures show a complex situation, in which persons with disabilities have been excluded from settings that are vital for their development, particularly in the world of work.

Moreover, a broader overview of the problem is provided by the World Bank calculation that unemployment among persons with disabilities in Colombia represents a loss of between 5.35 and 6.97 per cent of the country's gross domestic product (GDP).

This exclusion from economic and social life is often linked to misconceptions of persons with disabilities, including persistent stereotypes that perpetuate the cycle of poverty.

All of this highlights the urgent need to work in a tripartite context on public policy for vocational training to improve the employability of this population group.

Secondly, I would like to refer to the two types of action to which Colombian employers are committed with the aim of creating and promoting inclusive jobs: (i) the Inclusion Label Programme that verifies and endorses employers' corporate responsibility as inclusive organizations; and (ii) the creation of specific productive strategies that seek to promote the formal recruitment of persons with disabilities.

A specific example of this action is the Productivity Pact, an initiative involving around 1,700 companies across Colombia, some 30 per cent of which have so far recruited workers with disabilities. The business sector is also working in partnership with a public institution, the National Training Service (SENA), to provide vocational training for 1,116 persons with disabilities through some 106 technical and technological programmes.

Thirdly, the guide entitled "Beyond Disability: an opportunity for labour market inclusion", provides a road map to help companies identify the necessary steps for the development of successful inclusion processes.

These are just some specific examples of the action taken by the business sector to ensure the training and inclusion of persons with disabilities, demonstrating that employers are vital actors in the implementation of inclusive policies targeting this population group.

Thirdly, and also to conclude, after recalling the statistics on persons with disabilities and the examples of the action taken by employers, we reiterate the need for the Government of Colombia to work together with the most representative social partners to identify and overcome the most significant shortcomings.

We believe that this is the only way that, in both theory and practice, public policy will succeed in overcoming barriers, support successful labour inclusion processes and develop new incentives to increase the employability rate of this vulnerable group.

We must point out that, regrettably, in recent years neither we nor the other representative social partners have been consulted, thereby ignoring the need to take our views into account when developing a public policy on labour market inclusion.

In this regard, it has not gone unnoticed that the Government has referred, in its intervention and in the additional information sent to the Committee, to the chapter of the labour reform bill currently being examined in Congress that deals with the inclusion of workers with disabilities. The Government's indication is particularly striking that this bill, which is currently before Congress, was the result of tripartite dialogue.

It must be clarified before the Committee that the dialogue to which the Deputy Minister referred during his intervention addressed a labour reform bill that was submitted in March 2023, which was not approved by the Congress and was therefore set aside. The examination of that bill ended in June 2023. The meetings of the Negotiating Committee on Labour and Wage Policies, to which the Deputy Minister referred, related to a previous and separate bill.

As employer representatives, we wish to emphasize that the most representative social partners were not consulted on the labour reform bill currently before Congress, as it was not submitted to the Negotiating Committee on Labour and Wage Policies, which is the natural setting for the tripartite dialogue envisaged in the Colombian Constitution. It therefore cannot be said that the bill currently under discussion includes the views of employers.

We want to emphasize that progress in the labour market inclusion of persons with disabilities is an objective that should unite employers, workers and, of course, the Government.

The call by the Committee for Colombia to give effect to instruments that extend protection for persons with disabilities and support their inclusion in the areas of education and work should come as no surprise to trade unions, particularly as the Committee of Experts based its conclusions on the comments and concerns expressed by their own trade union confederations, that is the observations made by the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT), the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC) and the General Confederation of Labour (CGT).

Political ideology should not carry more weight than the defence of the rights of vulnerable groups, a cause that should bring us together as social partners in constructive dialogue.

There is no doubt that the employment of persons with disabilities strengthens their autonomy, and enables them to gain access to education, work and leisure pursuits, while allowing them to participate in economic growth and feel that they are playing an active and useful role in the society to which they belong.

On behalf of the employers of Colombia, we therefore once again call for tripartite dialogue to identify the way forward for the achievement of worthwhile objectives in this important area.

The provision of taxes for the health and pension systems, boosting the economy, improving poverty indicators and consumption all contribute to national economic growth.

Worker member, Colombia – On behalf of the workers of Colombia, I wish to inform this honourable Committee of our perplexity at the inexplicable inclusion of Colombia in the list of countries called upon to appear at this year's Conference at the request of the Employers. In the past, there were different circumstances surrounding violations of the fundamental labour Conventions, and the situation was very different. It is surprising that they have now managed to include our country for alleged non-compliance with the Convention.

It should be noted that the conclusions of the Committee of Experts relate to 2021, when the President of the Republic was Mr Iván Duque, a Government against which the trade union confederations, together with other social sectors and pensioners, led the "social uprising".

On this specific subject, we have to inform this Committee that the Government of change has been adopting inclusive measures for persons with disabilities, with the result that we have jointly submitted a draft labour reform to the Congress of the Republic. Although this draft was discussed in the committee in a tripartite context, the employers did not submit any proposals of the kind that they are now making in response to the proposals put forward by the Government and the workers.

In the reform proposal we seek to strengthen the employment stability of persons with disabilities, including by prohibiting discrimination on the grounds of disability, together with initiatives to prevent dismissal by the employer and to eliminate harassment and violence in the workplace, while offering flexible working hours for workers with family care responsibilities and for carers of persons with disabilities.

In 2021, we commented on the non-compliance of previous Government's. However, we recognize that the current Government has shown political will to improve the situation of persons with disabilities, as set out in the National Development Plan, including guarantees for a world without barriers, and inclusive measures and other legislative initiatives, such as the labour reform that seeks to improve the working conditions of persons with disabilities and their vocational rehabilitation and employment. Recent figures from the National Department of Statistics show greater employment stability and a decrease in unemployment for persons with disabilities. Nevertheless, we reiterate that the figures cited by the Committee of Experts are not recent.

It is striking that, while the current Government is demonstrating its political will to comply with the provisions of the Convention, it is precisely the employers in our country who are opposing the implementation of these types of measures and related policies, as shown by their opposition to the approval of the current draft labour reform, which collapsed during the Government's first legislature, undermining the possibility of proposing improvements to the legislation.

However, this has not been their main interest, nor have they demonstrated their commitment in this regard, since in practice it is clear that most of them do not employ persons with disabilities and do not adopt support measures. Persons with disabilities there have to work in the informal economy and in self-employment, thereby endangering their right to a life under decent and fair conditions.

Not many years ago in Colombia, many workers were victims of violence, and we are now engaged in a collective compensation process, in respect of which we receive expressions of solidarity from employers, for which we are grateful. However, we are not aware of good practices for the inclusion of those who became disabled during the conflict. In this context, we must affirm that, on the contrary, most employers do not seem to be willing to include and respect employment for persons with disabilities, and therefore are failing to set an example on what they are calling for. We therefore invite them to comply with the provisions of this Convention, for example in relation to the employment stability of persons with disabilities, who in many cases are dismissed, in disregard for the specific protection afforded to them by the law and case law on employment protection.

The participation of Dr Iván Daniel Jaramillo in the Government as Deputy Minister of Labour and Pensions is a clear example of the progress that has been made in compliance with the Convention in this regard. Moreover, incentives have been made available for employers to recruit persons with disabilities in their enterprises, such as the provision of a subsidy of 35 per cent of the value of the minimum wage, and an additional 30 per cent for persons between 18 and 28 years of age. In addition, a presidential directive was issued in August 2023 that seeks to promote a decent life with equal opportunities and without any form of discrimination for persons with disabilities.

We must also recognize that, through the Ministry of Labour, training has been provided through the National Institute for the Blind and the National Institute for the Deaf, together with municipalities and local administrations, to facilitate the inclusion of people and their interaction in society. The Ministry of Labour has also been undertaking activities through the National Disability System and other public authorities, including the public employment service, the National Training Service (SENA) and the Administrative Department of the Public Service, to facilitate the employment in the public service of persons with disabilities. However, with rare exceptions, we are not aware of private employers promoting such social inclusion.

In conclusion, the current Government has been taking measures for the protection of the rights of workers with disabilities, which has seldom happened in the past, and we hope that it will continue to do so for the good of this vulnerable population group. We also hope that employers will set an example and approve policies for the employment of persons with disabilities and allow them the right to associate and negotiate the conditions of their jobs as a basis for the development of the right to a decent life for everyone.

In light of the above, as has happened before when the application of this Convention has been examined, it should be considered as a case of progress.

Government member, Mexico, speaking on behalf of the group of Latin American and Caribbean countries (GRULAC) – We welcome the information provided by the Government of Colombia in relation to the comments made by the Committee of Experts on the Convention. We appreciate the information provided by the Government on the policies adopted to ensure a world without barriers for persons with disabilities, which include a system of incentives for jobs for life, the provision of between 35 and 45 per cent of the minimum wage for recruiting members of this group, in accordance with the national legislation adopted by the Government of Colombia.

We urge the ILO to continue providing technical assistance to the Government so that it can continue making progress in promoting the access to employment of persons with disabilities and continue the process of the adoption of the labour reforms that are currently before the Congress, setting out the requirement for the recruitment of persons with disabilities, based on the size of the enterprise.

Finally, we invite the Government of Colombia to continue to move forward with its strategy of removing barriers to inclusion in the world of work for persons with disabilities using the differentiated approach that it has adopted so far.

Employer member, Mexico – Firstly, we would like to thank the Government of Colombia for the information provided on this case. However, it is extremely important to focus on one crucial aspect, which is tripartite consultation and the pursuit of social dialogue.

We cannot overlook the following aspects of the Convention, which are of fundamental importance: (1) Article 1(2) provides that “each Member shall consider the purpose of vocational rehabilitation as being to enable” a person with disabilities “to secure, retain and advance in suitable employment and thereby to further such person’s integration or reintegration into society”; (2) Article 2 explicitly provides that each Member shall “formulate, implement and periodically review a national policy on vocational rehabilitation and employment” of persons with disabilities; and (3) Article 5 of the Convention provides that the “representative organisations of employers and workers shall be consulted on the implementation of the said policy, including the measures to be taken to promote co-operation and co-ordination between the public and private bodies engaged in vocational rehabilitation activities”.

These provisions lead us to make a number of observations, as access cannot be provided to suitable employment without listening to the most representative organizations of both employers and workers, as they are the ones who, in everyday life, are aware of the existing needs of employment sources.

Similarly, one of the most important measures to be taken to promote the inclusion of persons with disabilities is the adjustment of the respective national regulatory framework. This adjustment process should generate adequate social dialogue with a view to establishing a regulatory framework consistent with the needs of persons with disabilities.

It should also be recalled that the Government of Colombia, on 9 November 1999, ratified the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), which provides in Article 1 that “the term representative organisations means the most representative organisations of employers and workers enjoying the right of freedom of association” and in Article 2 that “Each Member of the International Labour Organisation which ratifies this Convention undertakes to operate procedures which ensure effective consultations [...] between representatives of the government, of employers and of workers”. And although that Convention covers matters related to the activities of the International Labour Organization, it is a clear example of the importance of social dialogue through the most representative organizations.

Social dialogue is a means of harmonizing conflicting interests, and as both employers and workers are the main providers of goods and services, and creators of wealth, they are undoubtedly two important stakeholders in any market economy, according to a December 2023 analysis carried out by the International Organisation of Employers.

In light of the above, the Employers respectfully request this Committee to continue following this case to ensure that the Government of Colombia, at the earliest opportunity, has recourse to tripartite consultation to strengthen social dialogue and avoid continuing to be in violation of Conventions Nos 144 and 159.

Finally, merely drawing attention to the fact that persons with disabilities have historically been a vulnerable group that has suffered discrimination, and their undoubted need for an adequate legislative framework, should be sufficient in itself to encourage the holding of consultations so as to ensure the inclusion of all the necessary aspects and that nothing is left out.

Worker member, Costa Rica – The Convention seeks to promote inclusive policies and equitable employment opportunities, with the aim of integrating persons with disabilities into the open labour market, encouraging vocational rehabilitation measures that respond to their specific needs and eliminating barriers to their full participation in economic and social life.

According to the report, the Government has adopted measures, such as Decree No. 2011 of 2017 and Decree No. 392 of 2018, establishing employment quotas in the public sector and incentives for enterprises.

The National Development Plan 2022–2026 also includes measures for inclusive education and work, and a new inclusive disability policy is being formulated. The report also refers to the Productivity Pact, which has been implemented in collaboration with various entities and has benefited many enterprises. However, only 15.5 per cent of persons with disabilities have work and only 2.5 per cent are in formal employment. The public employment service has also implemented programmes for the labour market inclusion of persons with disabilities. Between 2018 and 2020, 12,255 persons with disabilities were registered and 4,852 were placed in employment.

With regard to the institutional framework, the report refers to the Disability Inclusion Council, which coordinates labour inclusion initiatives, and the National Training Service (SENA), which adapts its programmes to the needs of persons with disabilities.

The trade union confederations note that the measures taken have not had the desired impact due to educational barriers and misperceptions among employers. Continued efforts are required to improve opportunities in both the public and private sectors.

In its comments, the Committee of Experts considers that more information is required to adequately monitor the problem. For example, it requests the Government to continue its efforts in both the political and legal fields, including in relation to monitoring and the allocation of the necessary funding for the implementation of the measures taken to secure, retain and promote opportunities for persons with disabilities to find employment in the open labour market in the public and private sectors, including the measures targeting small and medium-sized enterprises. It requests the Government to provide more detailed information on how it ensures, in both law and in practice, that appropriate vocational rehabilitation measures are made available to all persons with disabilities and requests the provision of detailed information on the manner in which representative organizations of employers and workers and of persons with disabilities are consulted on the implementation and periodic review of the national policy for vocational rehabilitation.

In conclusion, the Committee would like the Government to intensify its efforts in collaboration with the social partners with a view to addressing the extremely low levels of participation by young persons with disabilities in the education system, and to continue providing updated information on the nature, scope and impact of the measures taken to promote non-discrimination, accessibility, and the establishment and development of vocational rehabilitation and employment services.

These requests for further information also include the measures taken to train rehabilitation officers and other qualified staff involved in vocational guidance, vocational training, placement and employment of persons with disabilities in the open labour market. The extensive information requested is, in our view, nothing more than recognition of the efforts being made in the country in relation to the issue addressed by this Committee.

Employer member, Honduras – We have had the opportunity to analyse this case relating to compliance by Colombia with Convention No. 159, which has been a matter of concern for the Committee of Experts based on a complaint by workers indicating that, according to statistics that we have been able to review, there is room for improvement in the opportunities that the State of Colombia is required to ensure for persons with disabilities.

It should be emphasized that it is the duty of States to develop public policies to promote equality of opportunity for everyone, but in the design of these policies, it is necessary to be able to consult the social partners.

We see that, in the case at hand, the main problem that has prevented the Government of Colombia from complying with the provisions of the Convention is the failure to hold effective consultations with the social partners for the design and implementation of public policy measures to ensure the rehabilitation and integration of persons with disabilities. We therefore request the Government of Colombia to allow the social partners to be part of the solutions to the problems that it is currently facing in giving effect to this Convention, as there can only be effective compliance with ILO Conventions where there is social dialogue and respect for the social partners.

Finally, we call for the conclusions to urge the Government to make every effort to ensure effective institutionalized consultation with the social partners in the design, implementation, review and monitoring of the public policies adopted to ensure compliance with the Convention and, more specifically, to provide detailed information on the process of the formulation of the new disability policy and the inclusion of the social partners, thereby guaranteeing an inclusive future in Colombia.

Worker member, Spain – This is a joint statement that I am making on behalf of the General Union of Workers (UGT) and the Trade Union Confederation of Workers' Commissions of Spain (CCOO). First, I wish to recall that this Committee is examining compliance with Convention No. 159, not Convention No. 144.

Workers with disabilities throughout the world suffer from greater discrimination at work, both in access to employment and in the performance of their work, as well as in any vocational rehabilitation that is required, including in cases where their disabilities are due to industrial accidents. We therefore welcome the concern of the Employer and Worker members with regard to compliance with Convention No. 159.

The report of the Committee of Experts makes repeated reference to the need for the Government of Colombia to provide information on the results of the policies implemented in relation to the Convention.

The report recognizes that since the Committee “last examined the application of the Convention by Colombia, the Government has taken various measures to promote the employment of persons with disabilities, including in the period immediately preceding the examination”.

We welcome the updated information provided by the Government of Colombia, which we have taken into account and examined. Analysis of this information leads us to the conclusion that the current Government has adopted many measures, including a chapter of the National Development Plan (PND) 2022–2026 on guarantees to bring about a world without barriers for persons with disabilities. The chapter not only recognizes the historical discrimination against persons with disabilities, but also proposes action in seven specific areas to promote their rights.

Decree No. 533 of this year, adopted only a month and a half ago, introduces a system of incentives for employers which recruit workers with disabilities. The workers of Colombia view this Decree very positively, and it will surely also be warmly welcomed by employers, as the programme initiated by the Ministry of Labour seeks to promote formal employment through incentives for employers.

The Presidential Directive of 2023 was issued with the aim of making progress towards a decent life with equality of opportunity, without exclusion or discrimination, for persons with disabilities.

In its report, the Committee of Experts also highlights the tax incentives introduced by the Government for employers that recruit persons with disabilities.

But clearly, and in light of the provisions of Article 5 of the Convention on the consultation of the representative organizations of employers and workers on the implementation of the national policy on vocational rehabilitation and employment of persons with disabilities, the most relevant initiative that should be noted is the labour reform promoted by the Government of Colombia.

Based on the assessment carried out by the workers, we know that the labour reform proposed by the Government includes specific obligations for employers, such as making the necessary accommodations required by persons with disabilities to be able to work and remain in employment, and a recruitment quota for enterprises which, depending on their size, have to recruit or retain either one person with disabilities or at least 2 per cent of the labour force.

Furthermore, under the proposed reforms, employers will be required to assume responsibility for removing barriers and ensuring accessibility, and for guaranteeing the employment stability of persons with disabilities.

The adoption of the labour reform in Colombia could therefore represent a significant step towards full compliance with Convention No. 159 and the decent work objectives on which the proposals, are based, as indicated by the workers' organizations, and as we hope will be endorsed by employers.

Close analysis of this case reveals promising signs. The Government of Colombia has provided information on the progress made in recent years and is also promoting a comprehensive labour reform that is supported by workers' organizations and includes specific measures that respond to the concerns of employers. As well pointed out by the Employer member of Colombia, political ideology should carry no weight when promoting a fundamental labour reform to improve labour regulation in general, and the application of this Convention in particular in Colombia.

Employer member, Costa Rica – This Organization has emphasized that, for all countries, irrespective of their level of development, the basis for the sustainable and growing promotion of prosperity, inclusion and social cohesion is the availability of sufficient jobs.

Work allows people to overcome poverty, and the route to growth and economic diversification is productive and decent employment. For this reason, the labour market inclusion of persons with disabilities has to be a priority and constant objective of our societies with a view to the eradication of any form of discrimination that is contrary to human dignity.

The report of the Committee of Experts requests the Government of the Republic of Colombia to develop policies and action with a view to promoting efforts for the creation of more job opportunities for persons with disabilities on the open labour market, in both the public and private sectors, including in small and medium-sized enterprises, with special emphasis on the employment of young persons. It also calls for the development of vocational rehabilitation services in urban areas and the most remote areas and communities in the country.

What we are calling for is that the development of any policy related to employment, and particularly the employment of persons with disabilities, is carried out within the framework of tripartite social dialogue. Social dialogue strengthens us as societies, and in enterprises and employers' organizations we have understood that, in order to go further, we have to travel together.

We have seen this in the case of Costa Rica, as a result of which, in recent times, we have managed to make progress in areas of transcendent importance, through tripartite dialogue, for example in the beginnings of the development of a national employment policy and the establishment of the fundamental pillars for the formulation of a national decent work plan, both of which will seek to promote fundamental principles and rights at work.

The employers of Costa Rica call on the Government, in collaboration with the social partners, who are strategic allies for the construction of a country which complies effectively with national and international standards to offer more quality employment opportunities and remove the barriers that are preventing the integration of vulnerable groups. And we advocate all of this in our awareness of our responsibilities as enterprises in our society.

Worker member, Finland – I am speaking on behalf of the trade unions of the Nordic countries. A Convention by itself, without respect for the rights and obligations arising therefrom, is rarely a guarantee of anything. All international obligations also need to be complied with.

With the case under examination, that is Colombia, one cannot underline enough the significance of the expressions used by the Committee of Experts in its report. Also, no Convention is unimportant. These are legally binding instruments whether we consider them fundamental, governance or technical by nature. They form the basis of what the ILO Member States have taken upon themselves to respect. The principle goes far beyond this particular case of Colombia. We are speaking of the very fundamentals of the supervision of international obligations. In this sense, the follow up of a case by the Committee of Experts is naturally an integral part of this supervisory process and, in this case, the comments of the Committee of Experts in the report place strong emphasis on this function. Here, the Committee of Experts explicitly recognizes that the Government has taken various measures to promote the employment of persons with disabilities, which is exactly what should be done with respect to the Convention.

The measures taken by the Government of Colombia, such as the adoption of the National Development Plan and the adoption of Decree No. 21/77 of 22 December 2017 establishing the Disability Inclusion Council (CID) are more than welcome steps towards full conformity with Convention No. 159. Yet, the improvements driven by the current Government do not stop there. There are proposals on the way, such as the labour reform that demonstrates even further commitment to ILO Conventions and to the improvement of the regulatory framework of working conditions in the country. All these developments will present significant opportunities for all the social partners in Colombia in the near future.

Most importantly, however, all these measures are a concrete indication of the fact that Colombia has, as noted by the Committee of Experts, aimed for improvements of workers' rights by recognizing both obligations and rights arising from fundamental and other Conventions alike. While the work is far from done, indeed Colombia is currently acting as an encouraging example of both the willingness and ambition that are necessary for a better society and, ultimately, the full realization of workers' rights.

Observer, IndustriALL Global Union (IndustriALL) – My organization represents trade unions in the mining, energy and manufacturing sectors in Colombia. IndustriALL finds it difficult to understand why Colombia has been included in the list of cases for the examination of the application of Convention No. 159.

Our organization has not received any response from our affiliated unions. Naturally, we recognize and respect the case presented by the Employers.

However, this situation raises the question of whether this is the main problem in industrial relations and working life in Colombia. In this regard, I would like to highlight the realities on the ground in the sectors that we cover, so that they can be taken into account by the Committee.

Coal exports from Colombia account for 14 per cent of its total exports, and the country is now an important battleground for the principles of the just transition, as discussed at the Conference last year. The Government of Colombia has taken positive steps by committing to a National Just Transition Strategy, which forms part of the country's green growth policy. This Strategy places emphasis on genuine social dialogue involving all the social partners.

In this regard, I would like to highlight certain examples in these sectors. There is a mining enterprise that initially suspended operations in the Calenturitas and La Jagua mines due to low coal prices. The enterprise then definitively closed these mines, resulting in the loss of thousands of jobs. Unfortunately, this closure also left a worrying legacy of violence and pollution, as three villages had to be relocated due to the environmental destruction.

It is shocking that there was no compensation plan for the environmental damage caused, let alone a just transition plan to help the workers and communities affected by the move away from coal.

Following the dismissal of the workers, the enterprise rehired them under subcontracts without engaging in any social dialogue with the workers.

Similarly, at another mine, the enterprise's contract with the Government ends in 2034, which could lead to the closure of the mine. Regrettably, the workers and their unions do not know what the future holds in store for them. It is crucial for workers to know when there is a plan for closure and how it will affect them, taking into account labour, community and environmental aspects. This also requires the genuine commitment of all the social partners to dialogue and action.

It is crucial for the social partners to give priority to industrial relations and to engage in meaningful social dialogue on urgent matters directly related to the situation on the ground.

As trade unions, we are committed to this cause. We appreciate and support the progressive social and labour policies of the current Government and we hope that employers will follow in this positive direction, taking into account the real situation in the country.

Chairperson – I see no more requests for the floor. I now invite the Government representative of Colombia, the Deputy Minister, to take the floor.

Government representative – Many thanks for giving us the floor once again, and for all your interventions, which we value and have listened to carefully.

We wish to reiterate our commitment to continuing along the road to compliance with the Convention in respect of the rights of persons with disabilities in accordance with the international and global approach.

Colombia, in addition to legislative measures to promote the employability of this population group, which faces additional barriers in access to the world of work, is committed to the design of institutional support. Act No 2297 of 2023 was proposed by this Government, under the leadership of the Ministry of Equality and the Vice-President, with the support of the Ministry of Labour and all the related institutions. The Act contains specific provisions to promote recognition of the rights of carers and support personnel for persons with disabilities.

Colombia is showing leadership, in addition to the whole approach to recruitment and adaptation through the removal of barriers for the inclusion of persons with disabilities, in the recognition of carers, whose role is essential for the inclusion and removal of barriers for persons with disabilities.

We are supporting the rights of carers and the right to be cared for. To a large extent, I am addressing you here today because there is a carer behind me who can help me into my wheelchair and attach my cannula, which allows me to move, who has brought me here and has made this conversation possible. This recognition is being pioneered in Colombia and we are setting out a route for any system of regulation that promotes all the support policies that are required by persons with the various types of disabilities. Disability is evidently not always the same, as there are very many causes, very many reasons and very many visible and invisible measures, which are increasingly invisible, and that the Government of Colombia is committed to pioneering and implementing.

I would also like to appreciate very positively all the interventions. But I repeat that the policies that we have designed have been developed in accordance with tripartism, with employers, workers and the Government. Employers participate in the Board of the National Training Service, where they establish vocational training policies. We agree that training paths for persons with disabilities are key determinants in their access to employment.

The lack of knowledge of dialogue institutions is strange, as there are at least 12 of them. Between October 2022 and March 2023, when the labour reform was presented to employers, who are bringing this case before the Committee, when the same discussions are being held in the democratic institutions of the country, where the provisions of the new labour legislation are being discussed with the representatives of the people, on a text that incorporates all the international guidance of the ILO and of the various international bodies into our labour legislation. And we wish to offer genuine thanks for the participation and support of countries, including Spain, Chile, Mexico, the United States of America and Canada, which accompanied and can bear witness to the efforts at tripartite dialogue during the development of the reform. Tripartite plus dialogue was also held so that those affected by differentiated measures, the measures that are guiding the removal of barriers for persons with disabilities, could participate in the development of the policies. The Government of Colombia wishes to give special recognition to the importance of social dialogue and tripartism in the development and determination of the pathways to the improvement of employability through legal intervention and public policies initiated by the national Government.

The whole development plan was built up with the participation of organizations of persons with disabilities. Colombia does not cold shoulder the participation of the various employers' and workers' organizations in the various bodies for the development of public policies and regulation. Indeed, Decree No. 533 of 2024, which has been welcomed, as we are delighted to see, is designed to provide support to employers of between 35 and 45 per cent of the minimum wage to encourage the recruitment of persons with disabilities and to remove the physical, attitudinal and communication barriers which sometimes prevent their recruitment. And yes, we have included conditions. The worker has to be recruited for at least six months for the incentive to be payable, because in our understanding decent work is intimately related to stability, a transversal principle of the labour reform and of the recuperation of rights through the design and direction of the labour reform, which is undergoing parliamentary scrutiny in the lower house (the Chamber of Representatives of Colombia). The reform aspires to update, amalgamate and offer up for discussion the whole system of international regulations in contrast with the outdated Colombian Labour Code adopted in the 1950s, when such issues were certainly not prominent and disability was surely not seen from a viewpoint of support.

This transition to the social inclusion approach, the bio-psychosocial approach, is precisely the objective of a Government of change, and it is precisely through social dialogue and the participation of all parties that it will be possible to develop the best possible standards for our society.

This is a contract as a society rather than a mere labour reform, and we aspire as a national Government to the recognition by employers that their participation in the Negotiation Commission was appropriate in over 12 meetings and that the debate is now being held in the forum that is the depository of the people's sovereignty in Colombia, namely the Parliament and the Congress of the Republic. We are also aware that hearings have been held there of representatives of academia, employers' and workers' organizations, but the decision lies with the Parliament, as the independence of the authorities is respected in Colombia.

Colombia is maintaining its intention to continue building and laying the basis for pathways for the transition of persons with disabilities to the world of work, but to a world of work with rights and to decent work.

I agree that we have high levels of informality, but precisely for this reason the objective has been established of inclusion through recruitment quotas for persons with disabilities in the public sector under Decree No. 2011 of 2017, and employment quotas in the private sector through the labour reform. These incentives for the recruitment of persons with disabilities with the accompanying social conditions can be a pathway that is pioneered at the global level as an example for the world to follow, for society to be welcoming, to give hope and to build the path for the integration of persons with disabilities in the world of work. It is often the case, and I know this from experience, that therapeutic care is provided with a view to labour market inclusion, and it is provided to value persons with disabilities as being worthy of and meriting participation in the productive life of our countries. For this purpose, the Government of change has to continue building the pathway, clearly with employers and workers, but also with persons with disabilities, because nihil de nobis, sine nobis, or nothing about us without us, because today we are united at the international level, in Europe, in Geneva, and the anthem for this continent, the melody that inspired the union of European peoples was written by a person with a disability. In May, we celebrated the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, a composer who never heard this marvel that we have all heard, and who did not hear the ovation in the theatre in Vienna when he first performed the Ninth Symphony.

We, in the Government of change, understand disability as going beyond figures, which of course are of interest to us for the design and development of public policies by persons and citizens until they become law. We need them to be integrated, and thankfully, in addition to employer representatives, there were persons with disabilities and their organizations participating actively in the meetings so that development was not imposed on us, but with us.

Disability has to be seen as a gift. This is the objective of the Government of change, and is what has been left to us by Borges, one of the best Latin American writers, who was blind and taught his alter ego that the progressive loss of vision is like a slow summer evening.

This is the vision of the Government of change, thinking of each person, each citizen who deserves decent work, not only in terms of social and therapeutic measures, but also in relation to the social contract. This is a Convention that we recognize as being of great relevance and which requires commitment more as societies than governments, as humanity. That is why this meeting is so important and it is so important for us to transmit and leave before you the declaration and manifesto of the commitment of the Government of change led by President Gustavo Pérez Petro to develop policies with persons with disabilities as the centre of gravity of their construction, with employers, of course, and with workers. But democratic forums have already been open, and participatory forums have already had their say, and it is now going through the parliamentary process. The participation of employers, and of course of workers and the Government, cannot be disregarded in the project that we have submitted to the Congress. And this covers not only labour matters, I insist, but also pensions, because we adults with disabilities live shorter lives and are therefore deserving of differentiated treatment.

I insist that women at the age of 50 and men at the age of 55 will be deserving of a transfer to unconditional solidarity to give them dignity in old age, through an old-age benefit that claims to repay in just proportions their contribution to society. But persons without disabilities will benefit from cash transfers from the age of 60 in the case of women and 65 in the case of men. As can be seen, there is differentiated treatment that is recognized and accepted by the Government, and we are absolutely convinced of the importance of the commitment of society, and of everyone, to a better old age for our persons with disabilities.

In addition, we are adopting a social approach that is changing and, by order to the Constitutional Court, we are updating all the legislation to ensure that it no longer refers to “invalids” or the “handicapped”, terms that are frequently used in the legislation, and which end up being burdensome in the terminology, which we want to update to “persons with disabilities”. “Handicap”, as I was taught by some of my English teachers, includes the word “cap”, with the connotation of going cap in hand for charity. This vision of assistance is what we are trying to change, to persons with disabilities who are deserving of having rights and duties, with a differentiated approach.

The report provided to the ILO sets out the progress and compliance by Colombia with the obligations set out in the Convention in relation to aspects such as employment quotas, the quotas included in the labour reform for the private sector, and all the reasons for our commitment as a society.

I insist that all the incentives and the whole design of the policy is directed towards and benefits employers, precisely by recognizing their efforts for the removal of barriers. And we know that there is a very strong cultural burden, which we are removing and which we have to be capable of removing as a society, because we cannot be left at a time of global economic recovery without the contribution of 15 per cent of the world's population to this recovery.

This commitment is recognized by President Gustavo Petro, who has given us instructions to include it in each and every policy.

We once again give thanks for this invitation and hope that we have provided satisfactory information in the report that was sent.

I would like you to close your eyes for a second and think about the anthem of the continent where you are today which, thanks to life and this wonderful meeting, was inspired by a person with a disability, who if he could hear us would say: “We persons with disabilities aspire to the removal of barriers, we aspire that the whole legislative and policy structure that we are developing, over and above its design and its success or failure, has our participation.” What would he say about all this if he could hear us? That he would be happy to participate in this development, that he would like to finish his Ninth Symphony, which he had been composing for 12 years. But that is another story because, although depressed by his deafness, he was capable of writing the most beautiful notes in history which have come to encapsulate European unity. These are the people we are working for, and it is to these people that we are sending the message, to employers, to workers of course, and to the national Government, in the hope that the Congress of the Republic will be capable of taking its place in history and will adopt these reforms to update the Colombian legislation of 50 years ago and adapt it to the humane standards that now prevail in society.

Worker members – We note the exemplary and valuable information provided by the Government, and all the valuable contributions that have enriched this discussion. As we stated in our opening intervention, the Worker members applaud the initiatives and actions of the Government of Colombia to comply, in law and practice, with the provisions of the Convention. We request it to continue submitting updates on the progress made in its implementation.

Employer members – In our final considerations, the Employer members wish to thank the other delegates for their contributions and we once again express our gratitude to the Government of Colombia for the information provided to the Committee.

In the first place, I want to make a special point, as it is not acceptable to us that this case has repeatedly been referred to as an Employers' case. It is necessary in this regard to recall that, in accordance with the working methods of the Committee, all the cases examined by the Committee are selected by consensus by workers and employers.

After listening carefully to the statements made to the Committee by the Employer and Worker representatives of Colombia, we would like to be clear: we cannot accept this being treated as a case of progress. There is no case of progress when explicit complaints have been made for over a year that the existing tripartite social dialogue mechanisms in the country are not working, and that the consultations required by the Convention are not being held.

Consultation with civil society organizations, in what has been referred to as tripartite plus, does not in any way replace the requirement to consult the representative organizations of employers in their capacity as partners in the world of work, just as it does not replace the legislative examination of legal texts by the body that exercises legislative power in the country.

We therefore call upon the Government to engage in deeper tripartite social dialogue. We trust that the commitment expressed by the Government will be translated into the effective consultation of the representative organizations of employers and workers to reach agreement on strategic action and promote coordination between the public and private bodies engaged in vocational training activities, as set out in Article 5 of the Convention.

The Employer members reaffirm our commitment to the inclusion of persons with disabilities in workplaces and we emphasize the positive impact of work teams that are diverse in terms of both sustainability and productivity.

Greater participation in the labour market always results in improvements in the productive and social development of our countries. However, this can only be achieved in a sustainable manner, in the presence of public policies that level the playing field to enable the participation of persons with disabilities. Policies which ensure their access to education and vocational training, and which take into account the characteristics of the productive fabric and enterprises in each country, through the provision of support for the integration of persons with disabilities into the labour force.

These are the objectives of the Convention that is under examination.

In light of the characteristics of the case, the Employer members reiterate our request to the Government of Colombia to hold relevant consultations with the representative organizations of employers to ensure that their views are taken into account in the development and review of labour market policies and regulation.

We therefore request the provision of detailed information on the process of the formulation of the new policy on disability and inclusion, and on the social dialogue processes carried out in relation to the Bill on labour reform referred to by the Government.

In addition, we request the Government to renew its efforts, in collaboration with the social partners, to increase the participation of young persons with disabilities in the education system and in vocational training programmes, and to provide detailed information on the policies implemented, the results achieved, the number of beneficiaries disaggregated by age, and their impact in terms of access to formal employment, as well as information on rural areas and remote communities in the country, and the number and characteristics of the enterprises covered by the incentive policies implemented.

Finally, we reiterate our expectation that the strong commitment expressed by the Government will be translated into coordinated and concerted action to improve the inclusion and vocational training of persons with disabilities with a view to promoting their access to productive and quality jobs, taking advantage of the opportunities that arise in the productive system of the country.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the oral and written information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted with satisfaction the Government's indication that it continues to develop, periodically review and implement a national policy on vocational rehabilitation and employment of persons with disabilities based on the principles of equality of opportunity and treatment and non-discrimination.

Taking the discussion into account, the Committee requested the Government to:

- continue to ensure that social partners, persons with disabilities and representative organizations of persons with disabilities are consulted and their views are fully considered in the design, implementation and review of labour market policies and regulations, in line with the Convention;
- redouble its efforts, in collaboration with the social partners to continue to applying the Convention in law and practice.

The Committee requested the Government to submit a report to the Committee of Experts in accordance with the regular reporting cycle on these measures.

Government representative – We thank the Committee for these very important conclusions that are being transmitted to the Government of the Republic of Colombia, for your interest in emphasizing the policy for the inclusion of persons with disabilities in the world of work and for having afforded us the opportunity to show the world what the Government is doing in Colombia, in focusing on the issues of labour and equality, through the National Planning Department and all the institutions of the Government, under the leadership of President Gustavo Petro, in order to welcome persons with disabilities into the world of work.

We take note of your observations, which we welcome and call on employer representatives. We have had meetings with the National Employers Association of Colombia (ANDI), with Teleformas, with chambers of commerce, with Corabastos, which groups together market segments, with the ANDI Foundation, with a view to the integration of the policy for the inclusion of persons with disabilities, as set out in Decree No. 5.33, issuing the National Development Plan, to reward employers that recruit persons with disabilities, although always giving centre stage to the development of the policy for persons with disabilities.

Nihil de nobis, sine nobis, nothing about us without us.

The economic recovery policy, the policy of leveraging, economic growth and social progress in our countries cannot leave aside 15 per cent of the population of the world.

We persons with disabilities can talk and are central to the development of active policies and employability policies. The citizenship passport that grants access to decent work has to be provided to persons with disabilities through the policies of the Government of change.

The Government of change has taken action and is already examining an advisory paper on economic and social policy for the integration of action, spaces for productive inclusion and employability of persons with disabilities.

Your conclusions are therefore welcomed by the Government of Colombia. The Republic of Colombia wishes to lead a global exercise of brotherhood, humanity and inclusion of persons with disabilities so that the 15 per cent of the world's population has access to the passport to citizenship that is decent work.

Ecuador (ratification: 1967)

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

Written information provided by the Government

The Government has provided the following written information on 18 May 2024.

Ecuador ratified the Convention on 13 March 1967 and on this basis focuses on the following main aspects:

- Freedom of association: Workers and employers have the right to draw up their constitutions, elect their representatives, organize their administration and activities, and formulate their programmes.
- Protection of the right to organize: The Convention lays down principles to protect the right of workers to establish trade unions and participate in union activities without undue interference. On this basis, freedom of association in Ecuador is a subject of great relevance in the context of national labour legislation and policy. These include the right to organize, which is protected by international conventions such as Convention No. 87 and the ILO Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

The Labour Code also regulates the formation of trade unions, their rights and obligations, empowering the Ministry of Labour to register and activate these organizations.

In order to have clear internal standards which allow the free exercise of rights without any interference from the State, the Ministry of Labour issued Ministerial Decision No. MDT-2024-012, published in the Official Register on 24 February 2024, issuing the "Regulations on labour organizations with regard to the exercise of the right to trade union freedom and autonomy".

The Government has provided the following supplementary written information on 3 June 2024.

Article 154(1) of the Constitution of the Republic of Ecuador (National Constitution) provides that the duties of the Ministry of Labour are to direct public policies in its area of responsibility and to issue administrative decisions as required within its managerial function.

Consequently, the "Regulations on labour organizations" were issued via Ministerial Decision No. 130, regulating the establishment and registration of trade unions and their constitutions, as well as the procedures for the reform of constitutions and the registration of the union executive committee in accordance with the provisions of the Labour Code. However, this legal instrument lacked provisions relating to second- and third-level organizations, and contained regulatory standards which were not consistent with the Labour Code. Hence it was essential to create machinery for the recognition and implementation of the rights granted to labour organizations.

This state ministry, on the basis of the commitments entered into by Ecuador which feature in international treaties and conventions, as well as recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies and their main elements, in order to put the country in a position to honour its international commitments and comply with international standards relating to labour, trade union and universal social security rights, has even considered requests from trade unions.

Article 326(7) and (8) of the Ecuadorian Constitution establish the right to freedom of association, which must be complied with, especially as the international instruments which recognize it do not limit the right to freedom of assembly or association under any circumstances. Consequently, this state ministry, in observance of the National Constitution and Convention No. 87 ratified by Ecuador, which establishes the right to freedom of association and protection of the right to organize, issued Ministerial Decision No. MDT-2024-012 issuing the “Regulations on labour organizations with regard to the exercise of the right to trade union freedom and autonomy”. These Regulations incorporate requirements, guidelines, procedures and actions aimed at ensuring trade unions’ right to freedom of association and simplifying formalities so as to issue a timely response to users in accordance with the Labour Code.

On 9 May 2024, Executive Decree 255 (“Regulations on occupational safety and health (OSH)”) was published in the Official Register. The main objective of these Regulations is to promote a culture of prevention and protection with regard to OSH and strengthen its regulatory framework, through the implementation of public policies and actions enabling the reinforcement of OSH. These Regulations are applicable throughout the country and are binding on all public and private officials, employers and workers, including the armed forces and civic safety and public order entities, as well as paid homeworkers who are autonomous and not in a dependent employment relationship.

Accordingly, Ecuador has a regulatory framework which promotes the fundamental rights, health, safety and well-being of workers.

Lastly, the Government, through the Ministry of Labour, in accordance with the principle of good public administration, remains firm in meeting its obligations and handling requests from trade unions in a timely manner, providing its services in strict adherence to the principles of efficacy, efficiency, quality, hierarchy, devolution, decentralization, coordination, participation, planning, transparency and evaluation, in accordance with the requirements and procedures applicable to each case. Hence, on the basis of the provisions of article 326(7) and (8) of the National Constitution, and Article 3(1) and (2) of ILO Convention No. 87, trade union executive committees are registered, with respect for their freedom of association and their right to organize. This enables them to carry out the activities inherent to their institutional life in full autonomy, safeguarding legal certainty through the corresponding legal analysis, which includes verification of the basic requirements, and also through section 449 of the Labour Code and the legal authority of whoever convenes, legitimizes and certifies the election process.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the representative of the Government of Ecuador, Ambassador and Permanent Representative of Ecuador to the United Nations Office in Geneva, to take the floor.

Government representative – The Government of the Republic of Ecuador thanks the Secretariat of the Committee for the assistance provided in ensuring the participation of the Ecuadorian delegation at this session with regard to the application of Convention No. 87 in our country.

Despite the complex situation faced by Ecuador because of the internal armed conflict, which is public knowledge, the Government has endeavoured to send updated information on the progress made regarding the requests for information from the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) and the Committee of Experts.

Irrespective of this information and the replies, I would like to begin my statement by pointing out that article 326(7) and (8) of the Ecuadorian Constitution expressly guarantees freedom of association, recognizing the right of workers to establish trade unions and associations and to join them freely.

Specifically, article 326(7) provides as follows: “The right and freedom to organize shall be guaranteed to workers, without prior authorization. This right includes that of forming trade unions, guilds, associations and other forms of organization, joining those of their choice and freely withdrawing from them. The right to organize is likewise granted to employers.”

Article 326(8) provides as follows: “The State shall encourage the creation of workers’ and employers’ organizations, pursuant to the law; and shall promote the democratic, participatory and transparent functioning thereof, with rotation of leadership.”

Furthermore, section 440 of the Labour Code provides that workers and employers, without distinction and without the need for prior authorization, shall have the right to constitute professional associations or trade unions of their choosing.

Article 441 establishes the purposes of labour organizations, whether professional associations or trade unions. These purposes are as follows: “(...) vocational training, culture and education whether general or applied to a specific branch of work, mutual support through the formation of cooperatives or savings banks; and any others aimed at the economic and social improvement of workers and the defence of their class interests”.

Other provisions of Ecuadorian labour legislation consistent with the principles of the Convention prohibit any form of discrimination against workers on account of trade union membership and establish mechanisms for the protection of the rights of trade unions.

On the basis of this regulatory framework, the Ecuadorian Government actively promotes social dialogue and the participation of the trade unions in the formulation of labour policies and decisions that affect the workers.

To this end, consultation and collective bargaining bodies have been established to address relevant subjects such as the creation of employment, the analysis of economic and labour trends and fixing of wages, through the National Labour and Wages Board, which holds ongoing meetings on a bimonthly basis with a view to facilitating dialogue between the parties and reaching greater consensus.

The inclusion of the trade unions in decision-making processes helps to strengthen democracy and ensure that labour policies are inclusive and representative of the workers’ interests.

However, in order to facilitate and strengthen the full exercise of these rights, the Ministry of Labour recently issued the “Regulations on labour organizations with regard to the exercise of the right to trade union freedom and autonomy”, via Ministerial Decision No. MDT-2024-012 of 24 February 2024. The purpose of these Regulations is set out in section 1, as follows: “(...) standardization of procedures for the establishment of workers’ organizations in general; approval, reform and codification of their constitutions; and registration of executive committees and other acts related to the judicial life of labour organizations within the legal powers conferred on the Ministry of Labour. In the application of these regulations, account shall be taken of the legal principles and doctrines which govern this matter such as freedom of association and trade union autonomy, and also minimum intervention and the absence of any interference in the internal life of organizations that would restrict their rights or hamper the legal exercise thereof (...)”.

These Regulations seek to guarantee the exercise of freedom of association and trade union autonomy in Ecuador, and to establish a detailed regulatory framework for the establishment, functioning and dissolution of trade unions. Through this instrument, and in accordance with the provisions of the Ecuadorian Constitution and international standards, including the Convention in particular, the Ecuadorian State brings clarity and transparency to procedures relating to the establishment of trade unions and labour federations and confederations. The application of the Convention also promotes internal democracy within these organizations by regulating electoral processes for the election of executive committees and by establishing mechanisms for the resolution of internal disputes, thereby guaranteeing an environment conducive to the full exercise of trade union rights and greater representativeness of the workers. The importance of these Regulations lies in their contribution towards strengthening the trade union fabric in Ecuador, facilitating the active participation of the workers in the defence of their interests, and in the construction of fair and equitable labour relations.

In addition, in order to handle formalities for labour organizations with greater and more effective diligence, Ministerial Decision No. MDT 2024-040 of 19 March 2024 was issued, whereby the implementation of decentralized procedures for labour and social organizations was delegated to the regional labour and public service directorates and labour organizations directorate. As indicated in the above-mentioned Ministerial Decision, the decentralization of procedures relating to labour organizations enables quicker and more direct access to formalities for labour organizations throughout the country, delegating the implementation of these procedures to the regional labour and public service directorates of the Ministry of Labour. In this way, there is less need for the organizations to go to the headquarters of the Ministry, thereby saving time and resources, as well as enabling the handling of these formalities to be geared to the specific needs and realities of each region, with the regional authorities having better knowledge of particular local features, providing a more personalized and efficient service to labour organizations.

Even though it is very early for evaluating the application of these Regulations, so far 520 procedures have been registered, of which 464 have been processed and the remainder are awaiting finalization.

It is also important to emphasize that these actions and developments in terms of standards and public policies relating to freedom of association and trade union autonomy form part of other, wider actions and policies of the Government aimed at the creation of new jobs, guaranteeing compliance with other workers’ rights and conformity with the actions of the “Development plan for a new Ecuador 2024-25” and efforts to achieve a deep and open transformation in order to make improvements in the labour sphere involving the entry of young persons into the job market and the availability of inclusive work.

An example of this is the compliance of the Ministry of Labour with Constitutional Court ruling No. 141-18-SP-CC, which found that the constitutional rights of former outsourced workers of the Cervecería Nacional company had been violated and ordered the Ministry of Labour to determine the beneficiaries and the overall amount of earnings corresponding to the years 1990–2005. The total number of former outsourced workers was established at 2,626 persons, with total earnings amounting to more than US$51 million, the payment of which was undertaken via the relevant administrative procedures in over 80 per cent of cases.

Another example of the Government's political will to fully honour its international commitments in labour matters through concrete actions is the recent holding of the 5th Ibero-American Conference of Ministers of Labour, which was held on 22 May 2024 as part of the 29th Ibero-American Summit of Heads of State and Government. This involved the participation of 23 countries represented by labour ministers and deputy ministers and labour ministry delegates from the region and also from the accredited diplomatic corps in Ecuador, in addition to four countries which participated online.

At the end of this Conference, a ministerial declaration was adopted for the promotion of youth employment and inclusive employment in Ibero-America, in which Ecuador together with the other countries of the region undertook to boost decent employability taking account of training, linkages with job opportunities and the necessary skills for entry into the job market and inclusion, including access to social security systems.

Moreover, through this declaration, the signatory countries agreed to recognize, value, redistribute and reduce care work done by young women and underlined the need to adopt comprehensive and differentiated public policies providing active support for employment, especially for young persons and groups in situations of vulnerability, and for indigenous and Afro-Ecuadorian groups.

In this regard, at the national level Ecuador adopted in December 2023 the Economic Efficiency and Employment Creation Act, which seeks to foster sustainable economic development and the creation of jobs for young persons through tax incentives, as well as providing training free of charge to strengthen occupational profiles and facilitate linkages with the job market by strengthening the public employment service in line with the Sustainable Development Goals of the 2030 Agenda.

Furthermore, as part of the efforts to improve timely access to work, from 20 December 2023 to mid-April 2024, some 150,050 employment contracts were registered in the various business and production sectors of the country for young persons in the 18–29 age group.

In addition, in order to promote the entry of women into the labour market under equal conditions, Ecuador has established, as part of the implementation of its obligations and public policies, the creation of equality plans, the Sello Violeta (violet seal) award as well as other awareness-raising and capacity-building tools to strengthen compliance with laws such as the Violet Economy Act, the Basic Act on Equal Pay for Women and Men and the Basic Disability Act, which establishes a compulsory 4 per cent quota for persons with disabilities.

At the regional level, the Government of Ecuador is seeking to increase cooperation mechanisms and exchanges of experience to facilitate access to new opportunities in the labour sphere and the development of joint projects, among other alternatives for workers and employers.

In this regard, next July, the Labour and Employment Promotion Minister of Peru and the Labour Minister of Ecuador will sign an interinstitutional cooperation agreement which will serve as the basis for the implementation of the 2024–25 work plan relating to the “Bi-national network for cooperation and international affairs”, promoting the exchange of knowledge and good practices, implementing joint actions to boost improvements in the areas of bilateral cooperation on labour and employment promotion, putting emphasis on inclusive youth employment, fostering social dialogue, facilitating dispute settlement tools through mediation, and working towards eliminating gaps and discrimination, with priority given to vulnerable groups.

In short, the approval and execution of the above-mentioned laws, public policies and programmes demonstrate the firm will of the Government of Ecuador to continue ensuring full compliance with the Convention and with promotion of freedom of association, protection of workers’ rights and the creation of employment. The actions taken by the Ecuadorian Government reflect a strong commitment to the principles established in this Convention and we are ready to continue collaborating with the ILO and other international actors to intensify these efforts even further and guarantee full respect for labour rights and to promote employment in Ecuador.

On the basis of this will and these commitments, I would like to finish by calling on the tripartite constituents to recognize the significant progress made by Ecuador in this sphere and to provide the assistance which, at the request of the Government and the social partners, is required to consolidate the results of this progress.

Employer members – Firstly, I would like to say that the very least that this Committee can do, in accordance with article 3(1) of the ILO constitution, is to remind the Government of its obligation to appoint a tripartite delegation to the Conference, an obligation which the Government has not fulfilled. In sending an exclusively governmental delegation, the Government deprives the country’s employers and workers of the right to be represented at the ILO’s highest decision-making body and to participate in its work. Without the participation of representatives of the Government, employers and workers, the Conference cannot function properly or achieve its objectives. The case is being examined by the Credentials Committee.

I will now begin my comments on the case with which we are concerned.

We thank the Government representative for his presentation and we note his statements on the scope of the “Regulations on labour organizations with regard to the exercise of the right to trade union freedom and autonomy” (Ministerial Decision No. MDT-2024-012). We hope that this will indeed contribute in practice to resolving the issues raised by the Committee of Experts and we will be happy to know how the aforementioned Committee evaluates these Regulations. At all events, we are aware that these provisions only give effect to certain aspects of those contained in higher laws, and it is the handling of this matter which is the subject of our discussions.

We will now comment on the various aspects of this case.

Here we have a long-standing case which has been examined on multiple occasions by the Committee, the last time having been in 2022. The Government has indicated that the political situation in the country has prevented the implementation of the direct contacts mission agreed upon in 2022. We trust that this mission will finally go ahead in practice very soon and achieve results, from now on with social dialogue at national level as its core component. Regardless of the foregoing, we think it necessary to make specific reference to certain aspects, as follows:

Trade union rights and civil liberties. The Committee of Experts deplored the murder of Mr Sandro Arteaga Quiroz and we echo this stance. The judicial system must investigate the violent death of the secretary of the Union of Workers of the Manabí Provincial Government and punish those responsible, and do this within a reasonable period of time. We strongly condemn all acts of violence, especially when they result in the loss of human life, and we highlight the obligation of all States to guarantee that employers' and workers' organizations can freely exercise their legitimate rights under the Convention.

Excessive number of workers (30) required for the establishment of workers' associations and enterprise committees. Possibility of creating trade union organizations by branch of activity. As regards the restrictions established in the Ecuadorian Labour Code and the request of the Committee of Experts to amend the sections relating to these aspects, we agree with that Committee's approach that workers must be able to freely establish organizations of their own choosing and that a reasonable level of representativeness must be required in order to sign collective agreements.

As we have said previously, in similar cases and precisely in the discussion of this one in 2022, there is a need to underline the fact that the Committee of Experts recommends the revision of standards which refer to one of the institutions which incorporate the collective right to work, without entering into aspects relating to other such institutions. We understand that what is needed is a comprehensive review of all elements constituting the collective right to work so that the latter maintains its internal coherence.

As we have said previously and we reiterate, the amendment of one standard in isolation will always have repercussions on the others. So the reform needs to be comprehensive, otherwise the system will become dysfunctional.

The isolated assessment of the number of persons needed for forming a union seems limited since it does not address the criteria for representativeness in collective bargaining or in such a way that there would be an undesirable fragmentation of trade union organizations.

At any rate, the Committee of Experts' comments could serve as the starting point for a national tripartite discussion which, taking account of the collective bargaining culture – especially at enterprise level – which has existed in Ecuador, would create a consistent system of standards that responds to the wishes of workers who want to organize as a union, without any further requirements or obstacles and without discarding the representativeness needed to give authority to bargain collectively, thereby guaranteeing to the employers of the country a system that offers legal certainty and peaceful labour relations.

As regards the comments of the Committee of Experts regarding training and the representativeness of branch trade unions, it should be recalled that the standards that govern bargaining at the enterprise level would be difficult to apply directly to collective bargaining by branch of activity. As we have already said, tripartite dialogue should be the way towards drawing up a legislative proposal which addresses this sensitive subject appropriately.

As regards compulsory time limits for convening trade union elections and the requirement to be of Ecuadorian nationality to hold trade union office or for non-unionized workers to be elected to an enterprise committee, we call on the Government to respect the freedom of employers' and workers' organizations to organize freely in accordance with the Convention and we echo the comments of the Committee of Experts when inviting the authorities to hold consultations with the social partners to establish a dialogue on the aspects that call for revision.

As regards the application of the Convention to the public sector, we urge the Government to provide any information requested by the Committee of Experts in order to cast light on the issues raised.

In conclusion, the Employers trust that the visit of a direct contacts mission to Ecuador as agreed in 2022 will actually take place very soon and the Government will avail itself of ILO technical assistance in order to align its labour legislation, in accordance with specific national features and in consultation with the workers' and employers' organizations.

Worker members – Firstly, as spokesperson of the Workers' group, I would like to express our vigorous rejection of the refusal of the Ecuadorian Government to register a tripartite delegation to participate in this Conference. This omission is not only serious in itself but since it relates to a case which will be examined by this Committee it is a direct affront to the ILO standards system.

The Ecuadorian Government was notified well in advance that this case might be examined by the Committee. However, it chose directly to ignore its international responsibilities and commitments, although in the end, and only after intense persuasion on the part of the ILO, the Government decided to take part. The refusal to register a tripartite delegation restricts in an unacceptable manner the right of the workers' and employers' representatives to participate in this Committee and at this Conference. Ecuador has shown blatant disrespect not only towards the ILO but also towards every delegate at this Conference, thereby undermining the integrity and effectiveness of the international labour standards system.

The Committee of Experts is spending time putting forward a series of important observations on law and practice relating to freedom of association and collective bargaining in Ecuador. We also discussed this at the 110th Session of the International Labour Conference in 2022. But regrettably there have still been no improvements made.

The Worker members regret that two years since the Committee, in the context of examination of the Convention, invited the Government to avail itself of technical assistance and accept a direct contacts mission, no progress has been made, and so we are obliged to return to discussing the enormous challenges to freedom of association faced by the workers in the country. Our group deeply regrets that no progress has been made in elucidating the facts of the murder of Mr Sandro Arteaga Quiroz, secretary of the Union of Workers of the Manabí Provincial Government, which occurred on 24 January 2022. This is an unacceptable situation and calls for immediate action on the part of the Government to ensure that justice is done for Mr Quiroz, his family and his friends.

The situation of insecurity in Ecuador has given rise to a considerable and very worrying increase in the number of complaints of violence against trade union leaders, including murders and threats. In this regard, the Workers' group expresses its concern at the implementation of new Executive Degree No. 730, ordering the armed forces to take action to suppress organized crime, since the wording thereof could enable it to be applied against any attempt at mobilization of the people or social activism.

The standards referred to this afternoon by the Government relating to trade union autonomy are clear evidence of interference in the trade unions, since the State does not grant autonomy to trade unions to self-regulate but merely recognizes them. Moreover, these standards do not provide a structural solution to the issues which I am about to describe.

For a number of years, the Committee of Experts has been indicating to the Government the need to amend sections 443, 449, 452 and 459 of the Labour Code to reduce the minimum number of members required for establishing workers' associations and enterprise committees, and to enable the establishment of primary-level trade unions which comprise workers from several enterprises.

We regret to note that despite repeated calls to bring the legislation into line with the Convention and the offer of technical assistance, the Government has not launched any process, in consultation with the social partners, to revise the sections relating to the number of workers needed to establish workers' associations and enterprise committees.

We observe that the major enterprises in the country only represent 0.5 per cent and so it would be impossible to form unions in over 90 per cent of production units. Apart from this, section 49 of the Labour Justice Act that would have amended section 459(4) of the Labour Code and removed the requirement of Ecuadorian nationality to stand for union office was declared unconstitutional. As a corollary to the declaration of unconstitutionality, the aforementioned section reverted to its original wording and imposes the requirement of Ecuadorian nationality to be eligible to be an officer of an enterprise committee.

Furthermore, the Committee of Experts had referred to the need to amend section 459(3) of the Labour Code, which provided that the role of officer of an enterprise committee may be filled by any worker, whether or not a union member, who stands for office.

Regrettably, the above-mentioned 2018 ruling of the Constitutional Court also affected the wording of this article, which reverted to its original wording, according to which there is no provision for non-unionized workers to be able to participate in enterprise committee elections.

An urgent matter for the workers in Ecuador which has been the subject of repeated observations from the ILO supervisory bodies relates to section 11 of the Basic Act reforming the legislation governing the public sector (Basic Reform Act), adopted in 2017, which establishes the right to organize for public servants. However, certain categories of public employees were excluded from that right, especially those under contract for occasional services, those subject to free appointment and removal from office, and those on statutory, fixed-term contracts.

Despite receiving repeated appeals, the Government has shown absolutely no political will to initiate a process of change. Such is the Government's omission that it has not even sent information to the Committee of Experts in relation to this request.

Lastly, the Committee of Experts has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to amend section 346 of the Basic Comprehensive Penal Code – which provides for imprisonment of one to three years for stopping or obstructing the normal provision of a public service – so as to prevent the imposition of criminal penalties on workers engaged in a peaceful strike.

Once again, the Government is failing to implement the recommendations of the Committee of Experts and is not making any progress in this respect.

The Worker members regret that despite the existence of a ruling handed down in 2021, which ordered the Ministry of Labour to register the Trade Union Association of Agricultural, Banana and Rural Workers (ASTAC) as a branch union, and also ordered the Ministry to adopt regulations for the registration of unions by branch of activity, the Ministry has not fully complied with the ruling, refusing to adopt regulations for the establishment of branch unions and asserting that the ruling on the registration of ASTAC is only applicable between the parties and its legal effects do not extend beyond them.

The comment of the Committee of Experts should be recalled, that under the terms of Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention, workers must be able, if they so wish, to establish primary-level organizations at a level higher than the enterprise.

Lastly, we are bound to mention the decision concerning the administrative dissolution of the National Federation of Education Workers (UNE), which still awaits a definitive ruling eight years later. We note the Constitutional Court ruling of 12 July 2023 on this case. But we wish to reiterate the position of the Ecuadorian trade unions that the Government should revise its own acts and overturn the administrative act which dissolved the UNE, without a judicial order to that effect being essential.

With the passing of the years, violations of the Convention on the part of the Government are accumulating. The workers of Ecuador deserve to enjoy trade union rights. The Government should fulfil its international commitments and show a real willingness to apply our Committee's recommendations.

Government member, Belgium – I have the honour to speak on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States. The candidate countries, Albania, Montenegro, North Macedonia and the Republic of Moldova, and the European Free Trade Association country Norway, member of the European Economic Area, align themselves with this statement.

The EU and its Member States are committed to the respect, protection, and fulfilment of human rights, including labour rights. We promote universal ratification and effective implementation of fundamental ILO Conventions and support the ILO in developing and promoting international labour standards and supervising their application.

Following the Conference Committee's conclusions in June 2022, the Government of Ecuador was invited to avail itself of technical assistance from the Office and was requested to accept a direct contacts mission. We note the Government's indication that it will resume talks with the ILO this year with a view to a possible direct contacts mission. We express our hope that swift progress will be made in this regard.

We note the allegations submitted by trade unions and the Government's partial reply, including on the alleged detention of demonstrators during a national strike in 2021, the remaining obstacles to the functioning of trade unions, and the possible repression of social mobilization or protests. We echo the call of the Committee of Experts to provide more information on these issues.

We note with regret that no progress has been made in the investigation of the murder in January 2022 of Mr Sandro Arteaga Quiroz, secretary of the Union of Workers of the Manabí Provincial Government. We strongly urge the Government to take the necessary actions without delay to ensure criminal prosecution and sentencing for this crime.

We take note of the serious restrictions on freedom of association and the right to organize in the private sector. We echo the Committee of Experts' call urging the Government to review several sections of its legislation, in consultation with the social partners. Several sections of the Labour Code need to be revised to reduce the minimum number of members required to establish workers' associations and enterprise committees, enable the establishment of trade unions organizations by branch of activity, remove the requirement of Ecuadorian nationality to be eligible to be an officer of an enterprise committee, and authorize non-unionized workers to participate in enterprise committee elections. We recall that trade union elections are an internal matter for the organizations. For this reason, we also expect the amendment of the “Regulations on labour organizations” (Ministerial Decision No. 0130 of 2013), which provides for compulsory time limits for convening trade union elections.

We also note concerns raised by the Committee of Experts in relation to freedom of association and the right to organize in the public sector. Given the exclusion of certain categories of public employees from the right to organize, we urge the Government to bring its legislation into conformity to ensure that all workers, with the sole exception of the police and armed forces, are able to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. Moreover, we recall that no organization of public servants should be deprived of the essential means for defending the occupational interests of its members and request the Government to ensure trade union pluralism. The Basic Comprehensive Penal Code should also be amended in order to avoid the criminalization of social protest.

Regarding the dissolution of public servants’ associations, we urge the Government to ensure that the provisions of Decree No. 193, which maintain engagement in political activities as grounds for dissolution, are not applied to associations of public servants whose purpose is to defend the economic and social interests of their members. Finally, we echo the request of the Committee of experts to obtain additional information on the case of the administrative dissolution of the National Federation of Education Workers.

We encourage the Government to make progress in the adoption of specific, effective and time-bound measures, in consultation with the social partners, in order to bring the legislation into conformity with this fundamental Convention. The EU and its Member States remain committed to a joint constructive engagement with Ecuador.

Government member, Peru – I make this intervention on behalf of the group of Latin American and Caribbean countries (GRULAC). We appreciate the information provided by the Republic of Ecuador regarding the observations made by the Committee of Experts on the Convention. In this regard, GRULAC takes note of the efforts of the Ecuadorian State to strengthen social dialogue in the country, including by issuing the “Regulations on labour organizations with regard to the exercise of the right to trade union freedom and autonomy”. These Regulations incorporate requirements, guidelines, procedures and actions aimed at ensuring trade unions’ right to freedom of association and simplifying formalities so as to issue a timely response to users in accordance with the Labour Code.

We value the recent adoption of the “Regulations on occupational safety and health (OSH)”, whose main objective is to promote a culture of prevention and protection with regard to OSH and strengthen its regulatory framework, through the implementation of public policies and actions.

We appreciate the information provided on the registration of the executive committees of trade unions, and encourage Ecuador to continue its efforts to undertake such registration, observing the principle of freedom of association and the right to organize, so that these executive committees can carry out the activities inherent to their institutional life in full autonomy, safeguarding legal certainty through the corresponding analysis, which includes verification of the substantive requirements, and also through section 449 of the Labour Code and the legal authority of whoever convenes, legitimizes and certifies the election process.

On the basis of the above, we encourage the Ecuadorian State to continue with the promotion of social dialogue and tripartism, as well as the efforts made to apply the Convention both in law and in practice. Lastly, we urge the ILO Office to continue providing technical cooperation for Ecuador.

Worker member, United States of America – American workers stand in full solidarity with Ecuadorian trade unions as they continue to face threats, violence and unjust dismissals for exercising their right to organize under the Convention. For several years, the Committee of Experts has repeatedly asked the Government of Ecuador to revise its Labour Code to remove several arbitrary restrictions on the right of workers to freely organize trade unions. The Committee of Experts has provided the Government with clear and specific guidance, but regrettably we are still waiting for the law to be amended.

This is an important case as the deficiencies in the Labour Code identified by the Committee of Experts go directly to the heart of the ability of workers to organize trade unions at both the enterprise and sectoral level. For example, the Committee of Experts has found that the existing requirement of a minimum of 30 workers to form a trade union is simply too high and constitutes an unreasonable obstacle to the formation of trade unions. Since the vast majority of Ecuadorians work in small and medium-sized enterprises with fewer than 30 employees, they are effectively denied the right to organize and bargain collectively.

In addition, the Committee of Experts has repeatedly asked the Government to lift the current ban on sectoral trade unions, which has been used by the Ministry of Labour to deny workers their right to organize and bargain at the sectoral level. Workers in the public sector are still denied their right to bargain collectively or take industrial action to defend their rights and economic interests. Taken together, these legal restrictions on the formation of trade unions are clearly intended to frustrate legitimate trade union activity and represent a clear violation of the Convention.

These violations are especially relevant as the Government of Ecuador seeks closer trade and investment ties with the United States. United States trade policy explicitly links access to our market to the adoption and enforcement of labour laws consistent with the 1998 ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work. Accordingly, we call on the Government of Ecuador to accept a direct contacts mission as soon as possible and take action to revise its Labour Code to come into compliance with the Convention.

Worker member, Spain – I am speaking on behalf of the Spanish General Union of Workers (UGT) and the Trade Union Confederation of Workers' Commissions (CCOO). Firstly, I would like to lend my voice to the workers' and employers' repudiation of the Ecuadorian Government's refusal to register a delegation to participate in the Conference.

With regard to the content of the case under consideration by the Committee, it is important to recall that this Committee's task is to examine the content of the case, not to analyse the country's labour policy more generally. Like in 2022, Ecuador is once again under examination regarding its compliance with the Convention.

One of the aspects under consideration by the Committee is the Government's application of Article 2 of the Convention, specifically the possibility of creating trade unions by branch of activity. In this regard, regrettably, we must highlight the fact that the Ecuadorian Government continues to violate the provisions of this Article.

Although, as noted in the report of the Committee of Experts, the Government registered ASTAC as a branch union in accordance with a 2021 ruling, it continues to restrict the possibility of creating trade unions by branch for other organizations that have requested to do so.

Curiously, and contrary to the views expressed by the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA), the Ecuadorian Government bases its refusal to register branch unions on the surprising argument that its legislation does not allow for such a possibility. This position constitutes an unacceptable attempt by the Government to justify its violation of the Convention.

This is demonstrated mainly by two issues summarized once again this year in the report of the Committee of Experts.

Firstly, the Ecuadorian Government has applied for an extraordinary protection order against the ruling, which remains pending in the Constitutional Court.

It is worrying that the Government has decided to apply for such an order against a ruling that has been considered by the Committee of Experts in its reports, and by this Committee in its recommendations, as progress in its observance of the Convention and after those bodies had urged it to provide information on its compliance.

In other words, the response of the Ecuadorian Government has been to do the opposite of what was recommended by the Conference Committee and by the CFA, adopting an unacceptable attitude to justify its non-compliance with the Convention.

The Ecuadorian Government seems to think, once again, that it can put forward arguments to justify violating a fundamental Convention. Clearly, and luckily, that is not how the ILO standards supervisory system works.

Secondly, as if lodging an appeal against a ruling that would improve compliance with the Convention were not bad enough, the Ecuadorian Government has refused to comply fully with that ruling by refusing to adopt regulations for the establishment of branch unions.

The seriousness of the Ecuadorian Government's refusal to comply with that part of the ruling is clearly reflected in the report of the Committee of Experts, which refers to the examination by the CFA in Cases Nos 3148 and 3437, where it "noted with regret that, despite its recommendations and follow-up by the Committee, both the national legislation and the practice of the Ministry of Labour still did not allow the establishment of primary-level unions comprising workers from various enterprises."

Lastly, to this history of non-compliance by the Ecuadorian Government we must add its ongoing failure to put in place the direct contacts mission requested by the Committee in 2022.

While the Government's repeated violation of Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention is serious in and of itself, the actions described, which run counter to the recommendations of the Conference Committee and the CFA, require this Committee to adopt the strongest possible measures to ensure that the Ecuadorian Government ceases its strategy of undermining the Convention.

Worker member, Uruguay – With regard to the report of the Committee of Experts, we would like to focus on the particular situation of the UNE, whose complaints were supported by Education International (EI) as well as national organizations. The background to this case is well known and involves clear contraventions of the Convention by Ecuador, and in this case of Article 4 in particular.

With regard to the facts on which the Committee of Experts has requested information, we can confirm categorically that the Government of Ecuador continues to violate Article 4 of the Convention and is ignoring the recommendations of the supervisory bodies regarding the administrative dissolution of the UNE.

The registration of the UNE with the Ministry of Education is the result of the efforts of its affiliates to restore its legal personality, not of a decision by the State to restore it. It should be noted that the Ecuadorian State does not recognize this new organization as a trade union, but as a civil society organization, thereby limiting its trade union action. Because the UNE's legal personality has not been restored and another organization with a similar name, UNEE, has been created, the seized property has not been returned, and nor have all other consequences resulting from the administrative dissolution of the UNE been removed. This affects the organization's normal functioning because the seized property remains in the hands of the liquidation board, leading to the accumulation of debts with local governments, potentially resulting in confiscation of the property.

We agree with the comments made in this room with regard to the absence of a tripartite delegation to this Conference, and we add that we are deeply concerned at the Government representative's statement before this Committee. The seriousness of the reported facts means that there is an urgent need for all reports, which in general are divorced from reality, to be replaced with facts. The partial rectification of this rights violation resulted from the State's processing of the appeal lodged by the UNE, which was partially granted by the Constitutional Court, ordering the restoration of the UNE's legal personality by the Ministry of Education and the return of all its property.

Observer, Public Services International (PSI) – I would like to begin by expressing profound regret at the Government's poor attitude to the consideration of this case by the Committee. Its late request for accreditation, which prevented the social partners from participating in the Conference and in this Committee in particular, and above all its copying and pasting of legal provisions which it has attempted to pass off as additional information, demonstrate, yet again, its lack of commitment and seriousness in relation to the work of this Committee and compliance with the legal obligations arising from its ratification of ILO Conventions.

The Committee of Experts has also highlighted this behaviour. In its observation on Ecuador's application of the Convention it states that no measures have been adopted to follow up the conclusions of the previous discussion in 2022, and, in particular, no progress has been made as regards the direct contacts mission or the Office's proposed technical assistance. The Committee of Experts also regrets at various points in its observation the Government's failure to provide information on its application of the Convention in the public sector, obliging the Committee of Experts to repeat its previous observations.

I would also like to point out that this is the fourth consecutive Government that has appeared before the Committee to offer explanations. Some have even made promises, none of which have been kept by any of these governments, unfortunately.

We have been lodging complaints of blatant violations of public servants' freedom of association for almost 30 years, and we will keep on doing so, here and in other national and international forums, if necessary.

In that connection, and in line with the conclusions of the last discussion, we once again demand full respect for the Convention and compliance with the observations and recommendations of the different ILO supervisory bodies in this regard.

In particular, we demand respect for the right of workers, including public sector workers, to establish the trade unions of their own choosing and formulate their programmes; the launching of consultations with the social partners to reform the current legal framework to align it with the Convention; and the implementation of the road map presented in December 2019 by the ILO technical assistance mission, which remains relevant.

In summary, we hope that the conclusions in this case reflect once more the seriousness of the reported facts and the different governments' persistent ignoring of them.

Observer, International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) – I am speaking before this Committee on behalf of the Ecuadorian Confederation of Free Trade Unions (CEOSL) as a delegate of our international umbrella trade union organization, ITUC, owing to the Ecuadorian State's failure to request official accreditation. We strongly deplore the systematic violation of the Convention in Ecuador. This case has been examined by the Committee of Experts 28 times in the last 34 years and has been examined by this Committee on four occasions in the last decade: in 2014, 2019, 2022 and now, in 2024.

On this occasion, the Government did not request accreditation for worker or employer delegates in an attempt to shirk its international obligations. No State should be allowed to take such action, which would set a regrettable precedent for this Committee and harm the efficiency of the standards system.

In the Committee's 2022 conclusions, the Ecuadorian State was urged to avail itself of technical assistance and to accept a direct contacts mission. It did not make use of either mechanism.

Currently, against a backdrop of a declaration of internal armed conflict – which we believe to be unconstitutional – the militarization of the country and the linking of any form of opposition to organized crime, organized workers are at risk. No progress has been made in the investigations into the murder of Mr Sandro Arteaga Quiroz, a trade union leader from Manabí, on 24 January 2022.

This context is made worse by long-standing restrictions, including:

- (i) the inability of public sector workers designated as “public servants” to establish trade unions or engage in collective bargaining; and
- (ii) the excessive number of workers required to establish trade unions and the impossibility of creating trade union organizations by branch of activity.

With regard to the latter point, we must point out that microenterprises make up 93.3 per cent of production units. These enterprises employ fewer than ten workers. The percentage of workers able to organize is therefore negligible if the number of workers required to establish a trade union is 30, if trade unions cannot be created by branch of activity and if the unionization of “public servants” is limited.

We estimate that collective bargaining covers less than 1 per cent of the economically active population.

To this, we must add a series of anti-union practices, such as the division of organizations, the creation of employers' organizations, and the persecution and harassment of trade union leaders and members, including through anti-union blacklists. In addition to imposing requirements not set out in regulations, the Ministry of Labour also causes arbitrary delays to the registration of new trade unions and union executive committees.

In response, and in the face of the State's continued failure to bring national regulations into line with the Convention, we as trade union organizations have drafted, debated and submitted to the National Assembly, a few days ago, a bill which would guarantee freedom of association and which incorporates the comments of this Committee and the Committee of Experts. We hope that the Ecuadorian State will seize the opportunity presented by the bill to meet its international obligations and guarantee workers' rights.

We ask this Committee to request the Government to establish a high-level commission to set out a road map for dialogue that addresses and resolves the aforementioned problems.

Observer, Confederation of University Workers of the Americas (CONTUA) – Without attempting to be original, and at the risk of repeating a phrase uttered in this very Committee two years ago when our group of workers came under a severe verbal attack by the then-Minister of Labour of Ecuador, we believe that this is a case in which we must adopt a strong, exemplary position to prevent non-compliant governments from dismissing our agreed conclusions.

As mentioned by my Ecuadorian colleague, we have dealt with Ecuador four times in the last ten years. In that time, coincidentally, there have been four governments of differing political persuasions, but all, absolutely all, failed to fulfil their commitments.

It could be said that Ecuador is guilty of serial non-observance of international labour standards. If that were not enough, this year it also wins the prize for the country most unwilling to honour its commitments to the ILO thanks to the delays, of which we are all aware, in the accreditation of its delegation, which also prevented the democratic inclusion of the social partners who are employers' and workers' official representatives in this discussion. This hinders the mission of the ILO supervisory bodies, and we absolutely cannot accept it.

My colleagues in the Workers' group have been forceful, and owing to the lack of time I will sum up the situation in a few sentences:

- The number of workers required to establish trade unions in Ecuador is very high in relation to the productive system, and this hinders and practically prevents unionization.
- This problem is exacerbated by the prohibition of trade unions by branch of activity, rendering collective bargaining almost impossible.
- Public sector workers in Ecuador are divided into "public servants" and "public workers". Public servants, who constitute the majority, are denied the right to organize, and I remind you that these are not officials in positions of trust.
- Anti-union practices are commonplace, namely the creation of company-controlled unions and the restriction and persecution of trade union leaders in a social context worsened by urban violence and drug-dealing gangs.
- The current transitional Government in Ecuador is pursuing the most aggressive labour reforms in the region, undoing historic labour gains. That said, the President of my country is willing to fight it for first place, with only the reining in of his unconstitutional decree by the Supreme Court of Argentina so far preventing him from doing so.

It only remains for me to recall, once again, that in the 2022 conclusions a direct contacts mission was agreed upon and that the Government has delayed such a mission for two years and has yet to accept one.

In that connection, I wish to inform the Committee that through Public Services International (PSI), a global trade union that has always expressed a critical position in this forum, and in an effort to seek dialogue, we agreed to a meeting with the Government in Ecuador. Our global leader headed a mission to the country in October 2022, only for the Government to cancel all the planned meetings after the mission had arrived, offering unacceptable excuses. We cannot allow such practices to be repeated.

We therefore request that our conclusions carry the force merited by the continued lack of compliance on the part of the Government of Ecuador.

Observer, International Transport Workers' Federation (ITF) – At the heart of the Convention is the unambiguous obligation of States to ensure that all workers, without distinction whatsoever, have the right to establish and join trade unions of their own choosing. This obligation needs to be applied without discrimination of any kind based on occupation or the existence of an employment relationship.

As the Committee of Experts has noted, self-employed and informal workers in Ecuador do not enjoy trade union rights under the Labour Code. This is a clear violation of the Convention.

Workers in the country's wild-capture tuna fleet in the port city of Manta have been trying for years to legally constitute their union – the Sindicato de Marineros de Manabí. Ecuador has the largest tuna fleet in the Pacific Ocean and the second biggest tuna industry in the world. There are hundreds of active self-employed fishers on Ecuador's central coast. Yet, these fishers in Manta, who contribute massively to this billion-dollar national industry, are prohibited in law from exercising their trade union rights.

In a letter dated 27 January 2020, Ecuador's Ministry of Labour confirmed to the union that section 443 of the Labour Code does not recognize the freedom of association of self-employed workers. The letter also went on to cite the provisions of the Labour Code establishing the 30-worker threshold for trade unions at the enterprise level. So, essentially, even if these workers were classified as employees, they would still be unable to form a union and this is because generally each tuna vessel is registered as a single company. Fishers regularly change vessels, and the average number of crew is 21. Given the nature of the work, fishing contracts are by nature by trip, which is usually between 20 and 40 days. Fishers do not have permanent contracts so organizing by vessel simply would not work. There needs to be a more suitable model adapted to the reality of the industry.

Fishers have conditions of work that are different from those experienced by workers in other sectors. The fatality rate of fishers is typically several times higher than for other workers. Tragically, four fishers died in a vessel fire in Manta just two weeks ago. In April, a vessel observer was killed when two trawlers collided. This is an extremely hazardous occupation, and the proliferation of foreign-flagged fishing raises other concerns, including social protection coverage.

These fishers need and deserve a union to be able to bargain collectively – at the most appropriate level suitable to this most particular industry. This could include a form of sectoral bargaining.

We urge the Government to amend the Labour Code in line with the Committee of Experts' observations and our Committee's previous conclusions without delay to ensure that the fishers in Manta, and other informal and self-employed workers, can enjoy freedom of association in law and practice.

In the spirit of social dialogue and cooperation, the ITF would be happy to work with and assist the Government and the national social partners to rapidly bring about this necessary labour law reform.

Observer, Building and Wood Workers' International (BWI) – The issue of the application of the Convention in the private sector, tied to the fact that the Labour Code requires an excessive number of 30 workers for the establishment of workers' associations and enterprise committees, is one of the most significant barriers for workers to exercise their trade union rights in the sectors that we represent – construction, forestry and building materials – due to the widespread use of contractualization. Despite the fact that this Committee for several years presented a need to amend the Labour Code in such a way as to reduce the minimum number of members required to establish workers' associations and enterprise committees and enable the establishment of primary-level unions comprising workers from several enterprises, no such actions have been taken. The current law means that the majority of construction workers working under subcontracted labour providers and forestry workers working under the various types of working groups do not effectively have any way to exercise their right to freedom of association. In addition, we want to support the emphasis that many in this room have placed on the need for the possibility of organizing through branch unions and that this must be guaranteed for all workers, including informal and self-employed.

Despite the 2022 development of registering the first branch union in the country, we are concerned that the legality of its registration is still pending in the Constitutional Court. We strongly reiterate our call in line with that of the Committee for the Government to take immediate action in consultation with the social partners to revise the sections of the law that today limit the workers' right to organize. This revision should include reducing the minimum number of members required to establish workers' associations and enterprise committees, and enable the establishment of primary-level unions comprising workers from several enterprises.

Observer, International Organisation of Employers (IOE) – We wish to make the following comments on the observations regarding the application and observance of the Convention's provisions in Ecuador.

In 2022 the Committee invited the Government of Ecuador to avail itself of the Office's technical assistance and requested it to accept a direct contacts mission. The country's situation at the time, including a change of government, and the security problems that we are currently experiencing mean that assistance has not yet taken place. We are confident that the Committee's request will be met in the near future so that, in consultation with the social partners, the observations put forward may be analysed and, as soon as possible, the agreements reached by the parties through tripartite dialogue are given effect.

In its report, the Committee of Experts deplored the murder of the secretary of the Union of Workers of the Manabí Provincial Government in 2022. While condemning that violent act, we support the request for the competent judicial authorities to make the necessary effort to clarify the circumstances surrounding this abominable crime and sanction the perpetrators with the full force of the law.

With regard to the Convention's application in the private sector, in its comments the Committee of Experts reiterates the need to amend sections 443, 449, 452 and 459 of the Labour Code in such a way as to reduce the minimum number of members required to establish workers' associations and enterprise committees. Here we must repeat what the employers of Ecuador have stated on numerous occasions: no Convention ratified by Ecuador contains any provision that specifies the minimum number of members required to establish a trade union. Consequently, the Committee of Experts' view that the figure of at least 30 workers "is disproportionate and unreasonable in view of the Ecuadorian business structure" is totally subjective, not based on any national or international regulatory provision and, worst of all, made without any understanding of the situation in the Ecuadorian business sector, the labour market or the difference between the formal and informal sectors in our country. In addition, the Committee of Experts has been informed that even if reforms were necessary in this regard, it would not be a matter of simply amending those four sections of the Labour Code. Indeed, it would not only be a question of changing the number of workers required to establish a trade union but also, and necessarily, of reviewing and changing the entire framework surrounding collective labour law and collective bargaining, among others, and the ensuing consequences.

As we have stated repeatedly, the employers' position is that in labour regulations, for the purposes of collective labour and legal relations, it is vital that the parties' representatives are sufficiently representative and express unequivocally the majority view. This forum for dialogue and consensus cannot be undermined since it provides the necessary legitimacy for reaching agreements that are appropriate for the parties.

Therefore, we restate our continued openness to conversations on this matter via social dialogue at the National Labour and Wages Board of Ecuador, a national tripartite body to which I am one of the principal employer delegates. Just yesterday, at a session of that Board, we reached a unanimous agreement with the worker representatives on the establishment of two working groups, for the moment: one to address work and employment in general, which could include the matter at hand, and another to address the fundamental matter of vocational training for workers. They will meet in two weeks' time.

If necessary, the possible routes to reform in this area will be analysed so that any agreements reached can be translated into reforms which are approved by the public authorities but which must also, without fail, have the prior agreement of the social partners.

We believe that the Office can provide advice to assist and support efforts to undertake this dialogue and ensure that it leads to results applicable to the situation in Ecuador. While it is true that the analysis relates to freedom of association, to bring about any type of reform it is vital to first understand the real situation in the labour market in Ecuador – where four out of ten persons have adequate work – in order to gear the reforms towards job creation, respect for labour rights and harmonious relations between the parties.

Lastly, as has already been mentioned, between January and March 2024 the Ministry of Labour adopted ministerial decisions on these matters, including Ministerial Decision No. 012 issuing the "Regulations on labour organizations with regard to the exercise of the right to trade union freedom and autonomy". The purpose of that Decision is to establish rules for procedures relating to the establishment of workers' organizations in general, the adoption and review of their constitutions and the registration of their executive committees. These provisions are covered by the previously mentioned article 326(7) and (8) of the National Constitution (in line with the Labour Code, specifically sections 440 et seq.) and in accordance with the provisions of the Convention.

Chairperson – I now invite the representative of the Government of Ecuador, Ambassador, to take the floor for his concluding remarks.

Government representative – I would like to thank the Chair and other officers of this Committee for the attention that you have given to our statement. I would like to thank all persons present for the way in which they have listened to, and taken account of, the explanations given regarding the situation in Ecuador.

We note the statements which have been made today. They are important and we have clearly recorded the comments made by the Employer, Worker and Government representatives, and by all the representatives of civil society who took the floor, and obviously the views that all have expressed on the labour situation that exists in Ecuador.

We note the comments that have been made on the lack of representatives from the three groups, the lack of tripartite representation in the Ecuadorian delegation. Today we have sent a clear explanation to the Secretariat regarding the reasons why Ecuador, because of violence, internal armed conflict and a serious economic crisis in the country, has limited its participation in these meetings of the International Labour Conference and of this Conference Committee.

I hope that these explanations will be understood. Ecuador is going through some difficult moments and for that reason only those already in Geneva representing the Ecuadorian Government, the Ecuadorian State at our country's Permanent Mission, have been able to be present.

We are grateful for the comments which have been made, we have noted all the opinions, and we will take great care to continue collaborating with the Conference Committee, with the Committee of Experts, with the ILO as a whole, in order to implement appropriate changes to the labour conditions referred to by the Convention. As we have said, Ecuador has made great efforts to ensure and maintain compliance with the provisions of the Convention.

I am officially available, here in Geneva, to respond to any other questions asked.

Worker members – I have noted attentively that the Government of Ecuador has taken note. We would be very happy if it not only takes note but also takes action.

Once again, we vigorously reject the refusal of the Ecuadorian Government to register a tripartite delegation for this Conference, something which violates ILO standards. This decision places unacceptable restrictions on the participation of workers and employers, once again showing, as I have said, disregard for the ILO and compromising the integrity of the labour standards system. It is one more example of Ecuador's systematic violations of fundamental labour standards and of the Convention in particular.

The Committee of Experts is taking time planning a series of important observations on law and practice with regard to freedom of association and collective bargaining in Ecuador. We also discussed this at the 110th Session of the Conference in 2022 but, regrettably, improvements have still not been made.

Two years after the Government, in the context of dealing with this Convention, was invited to avail itself of technical assistance and accept a direct contacts mission, no progress has been made, and today we are once again discussing the enormous challenges to freedom of association faced by the workers of the country.

In addition, the situation of insecurity in Ecuador has led to a considerable and very worrying increase in the number of complaints of violence against trade union leaders, including murders and threats.

For a number of years, the Committee of Experts has been emphasizing to the Government the need to amend various sections of the Labour Code to reduce the minimum number of members required for establishing workers' associations and enterprise committees, and to enable the establishment of primary-level unions comprising various workers from different enterprises, among other urgent legislative changes. We regret that despite the repeated calls to bring the legislation into line with the Convention and the offer of technical assistance to the Government, the Government has not launched any reform process.

The Government has failed to implement all these repeated recommendations and is not making any progress in this regard. The workers of Ecuador deserve to enjoy trade union rights. The Government must fulfil its international obligations and show a real will to give effect to the recommendations of this Committee.

In view of the above, the following points should form part of this Committee's conclusions on this case. Accordingly, we urge the Government to:

- make all the necessary efforts, as a matter of urgency and priority, to expedite and conclude all the investigations into the murders of trade union leaders, so that the instigators and perpetrators of the murders are identified and punished as soon as possible;
- guarantee full respect for the right of workers, including public servants, to establish organizations of their own choosing, for the collective defence of their interests, including protection against dissolution or administrative suspension, and the right to organize by branch of activity;
- ensure the registration of the UNE;
- give effect to the road map presented in December 2019 by the ILO technical assistance mission, whose points are still valid but have never been resolved;
- initiate a process of consultation with the social partners to reform the current legislative framework with a view to strengthening coherence and ensuring that all relevant legislation is brought into line with the Convention;
- amend sections 459(3) and (4) of the Labour Code so that they are fully aligned to the principle of trade union autonomy;
- amend sections 443, 449, 452 and 459 of the Labour Code to reduce the minimum number of workers required for creating workers' associations and enterprise committees, and to enable the establishment of primary-level trade unions comprising workers from various enterprises; and
- take the necessary steps to amend section 346 of the Basic Comprehensive Penal Code and, until such measures are taken, guarantee that the aforementioned section is not used to criminalize social protest.

We urge the Government to present to the Committee of Experts, before 1 September 2024, a report prepared in consultation with the social partners containing information on the application of the Convention in law and in practice, and also the measures taken to implement the conclusions in the present case.

Lastly, we urge the Government to accept an ILO tripartite mission and also a special paragraph.

Employer members – We have followed this discussion very closely. We trust that finally the Government of Ecuador will: firstly, investigate the violent death of Mr Sandro Arteaga Quiroz and establish the responsibility of the perpetrators, with the need to keep the Committee of Experts informed of progress in the case; secondly, take the necessary steps to bring its legislation into line with the Convention, from now on in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations in the country; thirdly, ensure that the direct contacts mission agreed upon since 2022 takes place as soon as possible; and, fourthly, avail itself of ILO technical assistance.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted the long-standing nature and the prior discussion of this case in the Committee, most recently in 2022. In this context, it expressed concern that the Government has so far not accepted a direct contacts mission or availed itself of ILO technical assistance, as previously requested by the Committee.

The Committee deplored the failure of the Government to register a tripartite delegation to the Conference and noted with concern the general anti-trade union climate prevailing in country which is not conducive to the free exercise and full enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set out in the Convention.

Taking into account the discussion, the Committee urged the Government of Ecuador to take effective and urgent measures to:

- immediately and effectively take the necessary steps to determine culpability and punish the perpetrators of the murder of Mr Sandro Arteaga Quiroz;
- prevent violence in relation to the exercise of trade unions' legitimate activities;
- ensure that trade unionists are able to exercise their activities in a climate free from violence, harassment and intimidation, and within the framework of a system which guarantees the effective respect of civil liberties and freedom of association rights;
- ensure that all workers, without distinction whatsoever, including self-employed and informal workers, have the right to establish and join trade unions of their own choosing in law and practice;
- amend, in full consultation with the social partners, the following legal provisions in order to bring them into line with the Convention:
 - sections 443, 449, 452 and 459 of the Labour Code which require an excessive number of workers for the establishment of workers' associations and limit the possibility of creating trade unions by branch of activity;
 - section 10(c) of Ministerial Decision No. 0130 of 2013 on compulsory time limits for convening trade union elections;
 - section 459(4) of the Labour Code which requires Ecuadorian nationality to be eligible for trade union office;
 - section 459(3) of the Labour Code which allows the role of an enterprise committee to be filled by any worker, whether or not trade union member;
 - section 11 of the Basic Reform Act which excludes certain categories of public workers from the right to form and join trade unions;
 - provisions of the Basic Reform Act which grant privileges to majority committees of public servants and deprives all other organizations of the possibility to defend the interests of their members; and
 - decree No. 193 which allows for administrative dissolution of public servants' unions;
- take all possible measures to register the National Federation of Education Workers (UNE) without delay.

The Committee requested the Government to provide information on progress made and results achieved on all of the above points to the Committee of Experts by 1 September 2024.

The Committee invited the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance to effectively implement all of the Committee's recommendations.

Government representative – The Government of Ecuador thanks the Committee for the presentation of the report on the adoption of the conclusions on the individual case of Ecuador relating to Convention No. 87.

With regard to these conclusions, it should be noted that, as soon as the draft conclusions were known, my delegation requested that the report should record the fact that the Government presented, during the meeting and in writing, an explanation of the reasons why Ecuador was unable, on this occasion, to have a tripartite delegation from the capital.

The report on the dialogue held on 11 June with this Committee was duly forwarded to the Ministry of Labour via the Foreign Office in Ecuador with the request that the actions corresponding to its area of competence be taken, and also that the necessary coordination with other bodies and functions of the Ecuadorian State be undertaken as appropriate.

In the same way, the conclusions adopted by this Committee will also be transmitted immediately to the Ministry of Labour to give additional context to the above-mentioned report as appropriate.

Lastly, the Government takes the opportunity to reiterate its ongoing support and respect for the ILO, its principles and standards and for the Conventions which it has ratified, and it hopes to strengthen technical collaboration with a view to improving the implementation of its standards framework for the benefit of the whole population.

El Salvador (ratification: 2006)

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the Government representative of El Salvador, the Ministerial Office adviser, to take the floor.

Government representative – Chair, members of the Committee and other tripartite representatives present in the room, I convey a fraternal greeting from El Salvador. I also convey warm greetings on behalf of President Nayib Bukele and the Minister of Labour, Rolando Castro.

As a founding Member, we respect the international Conventions of the ILO, its Constitution and its supervisory bodies, which include this Committee. Accordingly, in view of the importance of this Committee, we have come to present our report on the effect given to the Convention.

In the first place, we wish to recall that El Salvador is undergoing a process of deep-rooted transformation. For decades, the country was buried under the scourge of crime and gangs. And whole generations suffered from the strife and violations caused by these groups.

By way of illustration, according to official figures, in 2015, the murder rate was as high as 106 murders for every 100,000 inhabitants, and for much of that time we were the most violent country in the world. This had a far-reaching effect on our social fabric, giving rise to family break-ups, irregular migration, worsening poverty, unemployment and informality. It also had an important impact on culture, leisure and education. Generations of young persons were not able to continue their studies for security reasons and because they were recruited by these groups.

What I want to say is that in El Salvador, there were generations of children and young persons who did not know what it was to play freely in parks or to meet up with their friends in the street in front of their houses. Who did not know what it meant to visit their aunts and uncles or their grandparents, for fear of losing their lives.

Our society was so shaken by this problem that violence came to seem normal and we learned to survive with the permanent fear of being killed, suffering the death of a family member, a father, mother, child or brother or sister. The question always existed in the collective conscience of how many more generations we had to lose before El Salvador could overcome this problem. And let me tell you that the answer was never encouraging.

In El Salvador, we have grieved for the deaths of thousands of loved ones, young persons who were denied their future, girls who were humiliated with an overbearing barbarity that it would be difficult to describe in this forum. And we grieved for the deaths of trade unionists, workers and employers who were murdered by the gangs.

The Government of President Nayib Bukele has carried out a successful security plan, which has resulted in a dramatic reduction in delinquency and has reduced the murder rate to a minimum which places us as one of the safest countries in the hemisphere, which has allowed our population to breathe and to dream of being a free and prosperous country, with more and better jobs, and the full exercise of freedom of association and the right to organize.

In this context, it is very important for us to explain the situation in relation to the murders of Weder Arturo Meléndez Ramírez, who was employed by the municipality of San Salvador, and of Victoriano Abel Vega, who when alive was employed by the municipality of Santa Ana. As a State, we greatly regret both cases. Indeed, in the case of Mr Meléndez, it was the Government of El Salvador that lodged the complaint with the ILO, in our firm conviction that no murder of a trade unionist should go unpunished, for which reason we need international scrutiny to clarify the motives of the murder.

As we have indicated in our reports, there have already been results in the case. The investigations have found that the murder was carried out by members of gangs for reasons not related to his union activities. Based on the information gathered by the Office of the Prosecutor General of the Republic and the National Civil Police, we can inform you that exhaustive investigations have been carried out in both cases and we are now at the stage of being able to identify those responsible.

In the specific case of Mr Weder Meléndez, those involved were members of the revolutionary 18 gang. In the early morning of 20 October 2023, in a joint operation with the responsible authorities, 15 gang members were apprehended for the crime of aggravated homicide and unlawful association, including three persons accused of crimes committed in 2020 and 2021, with one of the cases being the murder of Mr Weder Meléndez. We will be providing the corresponding information to the Committee on Freedom of Association.

Every public policy has its pros and cons. The objective sought is the maximum social benefit. This commitment to security in the country has been carried out with the lowest number of civil and military victims possible, which has even given rise to surprise at the international level, but in particular has the support of the immense majority of citizens, who now see a safe environment. It is not us who are saying this, it is being said in the independent survey carried out by think tanks with various ideological leanings, universities and other observers of public opinion.

Now concerns are focusing on the economy and the cost of living, which is entirely normal. Before, the principal concern was to guarantee the fundamental right to life. Now we are in a second phase of ensuring decent employment opportunities. In that regard, based on a renewed agreement with the people of El Salvador, the Government is embarking on economic measures.

The fact of having a safe country is making it possible to promote internal and external tourism, attract investment, reduce the security costs of enterprises and offer conditions of legal security for employers and workers.

This economic and social challenge requires the collaboration of all actors and sectors. It requires the active participation of employers, workers, civil society organizations and all the citizens of El Salvador. It also requires the support and assistance of international organizations, such as the ILO.

Fortunately, this Governmental call for unity has been heard and heeded by all sectors. The people as a whole, unions and employers' organizations have publicly expressed their support for the Government and the agreement to build a better El Salvador together.

We have accordingly promoted programmes to connect people who are seeking employment and persons who are in need of human talent, modernizing our public employment service and succeeding in placing thousands of workers every year.

Programmes have also been developed to support categories which face the greatest barriers to labour market access, such as single mothers, persons with disabilities, young persons in their first job and unemployed persons over 40 years of age.

We are implementing programmes of subsidies to finance the learning curve of these groups, such as an incentive for enterprises to recruit human talent from these groups. We have thousands of success stories from these programmes.

The national decent work prize has also been promoted and institutionalized to recognize good practices in giving effect to national and international labour standards. The philosophy of the prize is to establish it as a symbol of distinction for all enterprises, so that they all seek to achieve this standard, thereby promoting a culture of compliance with the law.

A national collective bargaining prize has also been introduced, which recognizes the capacity for dialogue between employers and workers for the establishment of better conditions of work, as collective bargaining is one of the primary expressions of freedom of association.

A process of institutional modernization has been promoted which has made it possible to standardize processes and bring services closer to their users through digital platforms, such as the opportunities platform, which is an important tool for the digitalization of services, such as employment placement, the registration of enterprises, the conclusion of individual employment contracts and internal work rules. Any person or enterprise can have access to our platform from anywhere in the country.

With a view to the protection of workers' rights, we have launched special inspection programmes for the verification of occupational safety conditions in the construction sector, where there has been a high compliance rate with the reports issued, and inspection in the delivery platform sector, thereby achieving social guarantees for the occupational safety of workers. We have guaranteed the conditions of work of professional footballers and municipal employees, and we have ensured year after year the payment of the Christmas bonus.

Similarly, we have created the SOS Workers platform to receive complaints of harassment at work and ensure a response by a specialized team of trained inspectors, as well as from the general inspection service, which responds to all complaints through the various means available for this purpose.

We are about to launch a modern system of inspection with a view to ensuring, not only better conditions for inspectors, but also better facilities for employers and workers to manage their registers, comments and decisions.

We have taken action to combat irregular migration, knocking on doors and launching cooperative action with other countries, with recognition from various organizations.

At the national level, the El Salvador Pensions Institute has been created as a new institutionalized tripartite body that promotes compliance with international social welfare standards.

The Ministry of Labour has launched the design of the Labour Market Information System (SIMEL) as an important tool to give greater transparency to and democratize labour market data and to provide an evidence base for public policy measures. The SIMEL is a useful tool for employers, workers, universities, thinktanks and civil society in general.

We are grateful for ILO technical cooperation in the implementation of the SIMEL. This has made El Salvador into a regional reference point, as the first Central American country, and the second in Latin America, to have a labour information system which meets the standards of developed countries, as confirmed by the ILO.

This is only a sample of the progress achieved over the past five years in the field of labour. El Salvador is very committed to the ILO, as demonstrated by the recent ratification of five international labour Conventions. This had been a historical commitment to the working class and their ratification reflects the political commitment of our Government to international labour standards, which become a source of law to promote the development of better labour policies in the fields of social security, collective bargaining, maternity protection, occupational safety and health and the prevention of harassment and violence in the world of work. We have requested ILO technical cooperation for their application.

Freedom of association is respected in our country, as demonstrated by the existence of various mass manifestations or demonstrations of freedom of expression, in which the working class marched alongside other social movements without importance being given to the degree of affinity of the objectives pursued. These were not repressed or threatened in any way. Indeed, in its respect for freedom of association, the Government has provided a police presence to protect the safety of the participants, open their way along roads and enjoy the use of public spaces without any restrictions.

Moreover, taking into account the comments made concerning the period of validity of the credentials of trade unions, we have already indicated our intention to undertake a comprehensive reform of the Labour Code to extend its scope, and to review other trade union freedoms and rights which have been the subject of comments by the Committee of Experts. However, as it is not a rapid process, the Trade Union Office has been established. The Office has provided advice to unions on 12 278 occasions over the past year. In addition, 526 executive bodies of trade union confederations, federations and branches have been registered, of which 15 are for new trade union organizations, composed of six new federations, two new confederations, six new unions and one new branch union, which demonstrates the growth in the trade union movement in the country. The credentials were issued in an average of five working days, which is a reduction from the ten or 15 days reported previously.

As a country, we express our openness to dialogue and cooperation with the ILO. We are aware of the challenges that are present. We therefore undertake to continue working to overcome these challenges, and we will make efforts to comply with the constitutional requirements of the ILO, ratified Conventions, and of course we undertake to continue reporting the progress made.

We are convinced that we now have a conducive environment to promote the generation of opportunities for and the welfare of our population, and we accordingly invite all the social partners to unite for this purpose.

Employer members – First, we would like to give thanks for the report provided by the Government to the Committee. Congratulations on the many changes. However, unfortunately, we note that none of the changes reported are related to the comments made by the Committee of Experts or the Conference Committee.

Nevertheless, and over and above the explanations provided, we are bound to express deep concern at the situation that is prevailing in the country, a situation that is reflected in a certain way in the report of the Committee of Experts, which continues to emphasize serious failures of compliance by the Government, now with regard to the application of this Convention.

El Salvador ratified the Convention in 2006, and although it is the first time that a case concerning compliance with this Convention has been discussed by the Conference Committee, the Committee of Experts has made observations on six occasions since 2009, and only in 2023 we were discussing in this room the various violations identified in the report of the Committee of Experts concerning the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), when reference was made to facts, omissions and circumstances that are clearly closely related to this case, that is with Convention No. 87, as recognized by the Committee of Experts, and which reveal an attitude of repeated incompliance by the Government, despite the intentions that it has expressed to comply fully and formally with the commitments taken on.

It is not out of place to emphasize that several of the facts related to this case were discussed in the context of the reports of the Committee of Experts on the failure to give effect to Convention No. 144, which have been discussed by this Committee on six occasions in 2017, 2018, 2019, 2021, 2022 and 2023, in which the issues were regrettably recurrent.

It is therefore relevant to recall some of the most pertinent conclusions formulated by this Committee at the Conference in 2023 in relation to issues related to freedom of association and action which amounts to acts preventing the lawful exercise of this right and interference that restricts or undermines it.

More precisely, at the beginning of those conclusions, as a first point, it urged the Government to immediately cease all acts of violence, threats, persecution, stigmatization, intimidation or any other form of aggression against individuals or organizations in connection with both the exercise of legitimate trade union activities and the activities of employers' organizations, and adopt measures to ensure that such acts are not repeated, in particular for the National Business Association (ANEP) and its members. We have not heard any explanations from the Government on these issues, which we truly regret.

In this regard, the Conference Committee has maintained that full “respect for civil liberties is an essential prerequisite for freedom of association” and that the rights conferred upon workers’ and employers’ organizations can only be exercised in a context of respect and the guarantee of civil and political rights, such as freedom of expression, the safety of persons and the rights of defence and due process, as guaranteed by the prohibition of arbitrary detention. We regret that up to now the Government, to the prejudice of these liberties, has not taken the action required by this Committee and has not, in consultation with the social partners, taken each and every measure that it was urged to adopt by this Committee in 2023. We therefore call for this request to be repeated with a view to their urgent and immediate implementation. We need to take advantage of the good will expressed by the Government to ensure that they are given effect.

In addition, we have to request the Government to provide detailed information indicating the measures adopted to ensure that other acts of hostility and interference are not repeated against workers’ and employers’ organizations, and very particularly against the ANEP and its member organizations and leaders, and that the freedom of employers is fully respected to establish organizations of their own choosing, organize their administration and activities and formulate the programmes without hindrance and without interference by the public authorities.

The Employers also place great emphasis on our concern that, after so much time, we are continuing to see an absence of progress in the investigation of murders of trade union leaders, the proposed reform of the Penal Code and, in general, the lack of compliance with the commitments entered into freely with this Organization. For this reason, it is necessary to send a direct contacts mission to ensure full compliance with the Conventions that have up to now been unjustifiably pending.

The Government has indicated that it is always ready to receive the support of organizations such as the ILO and this proposal goes along with the interest in compliance indicated by the Government, even though there has not been any progress in the measures adopted.

Merely to emphasize the relevance of this request, we wish to recall that the Government, in its statement last year, reaffirmed that it would be “unshakeable in [its] support for the principles of ILO standards”, so that the support of the Organization and its specialists will be key.

With regard to Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention, we echo the request made by the Committee of Experts and we urge the Government to adopt the necessary measures.

With reference to the comments of the Committee of Experts in relation to the right to strike, we make no comment. We recall our position on this subject and we ask for it not to be referred to in the Committee’s conclusions.

We note a series of violations that require urgent action. In particular, we call on the Government to make greater efforts and to make progress with the proposed legislative reform.

The Employers note the references made by the Government to a series of constitutional and legislative reforms, including a reform of the Labour Code which, according to what we are told, is under examination by the Legislative Assembly. In this regard, we request the Government to provide detailed information on the content and stage of the parliamentary examination of these reforms, as well as on the processes of consultation undertaken with the representative organizations of employers and workers.

We also take note of the references made by the Government to credentials and registers, but we nevertheless urge it, in consultation with the organizations, to take the necessary measures to revise the rules applicable to registration of the executive bodies in order to guarantee the right of organizations to be established freely.

We once again give thanks to the Government of El Salvador for the information provided and we emphasize our enormous concern at this case, in which the situations discussed on the basis of the report of the Committee of Experts have been continuing for a long time and require the Government's urgent attention, and follow up by this Committee and the other ILO supervisory mechanisms. Of greater importance, and indeed urgency, is for the Government to receive ILO technical assistance to strengthen its capacities and hold effective consultations with the most representative and independent employers' and workers' organizations.

Before ending, we would like to inform the Committee that we have noted other issues that reveal an attitude that is the contrary of the one indicated by the Government to us, of the unshakeable commitment to the values and principles of the ILO that it vaunts, a turn of phrase which makes us very calm. But there is no coherence between what the Government says and what is happening.

Thirty years ago, the El Salvador Institute for Vocational Training (INSAFORP) was created, which is tripartite in composition and financed through employers' contributions of 1 per cent of the payroll in the formal sector. This institution has recently been abolished by the Government, in December last year, and replaced by a new one, currently only under the management of the Government, without the involvement of the social partners. Even though employers' contributions are maintained, only 20 per cent of those resources will be used for training. This reveals a series of problems in itself, as the participation has been ended of workers and employers, and the proportion of funding assigned to aspects relating to training has been reduced.

I reserve the right to make certain additional comments in my second intervention.

Worker members – This is the ninth consecutive time that our Committee has examined a case from El Salvador. In the past nine years, we have analysed compliance with Convention No. 87 on two occasions, in 2015 and 2016, although with another Government.

In our last analysis of El Salvador, regarding issues related to Convention No. 144, the Workers' group noted some progress made by the Government. In particular, we welcomed the ratification of several ILO Conventions in response to demands from Salvadoran trade union organizations. Many of these positive steps were a consequence of the High-Level Tripartite Mission of the ILO that took place in May 2022. However, since then, we regret that several commitments made by the Government have not been fulfilled.

The Committee of Experts once again mentions the lack of concrete progress regarding the murder of union leader Victoriano Abel Vega in 2010. The Committee on Freedom of Association has also urged the Government and the competent authorities to make every effort to identify and punish those materially and intellectually responsible for this crime.

For several years, the Committee of Experts has requested the Government to take the necessary measures to review various constitutional and legislative provisions that do not comply with the Convention. Among the legislative changes recommended by the Committee of Experts are Articles 219 and 236 of the Constitution and section 73 of the Civil Service Law, which exclude certain categories of public servants from the right to unionize. Also, section 211 of the Labour Code establishes the need for a minimum of 35 members to form a workers' union.

Additionally, the requirement to be Salvadoran by birth to be a member of a union's board of directors hinders the organization of migrant workers, particularly in sectors where they are more present, such as the construction industry and agricultural work.

One of the greatest obstacles to the exercise of trade union freedom, and which has been the subject of conclusions by our Commission for several years, is the requirement established in the Labour Code that obliges workers' organizations to renew the composition of their boards of directors every 12 months. For many workers' organizations, the credential extension process lasts up to nine months, causing various hardships, including the inability to request labour inspections, not being authorized to collect union dues, the immobilization of their bank accounts, and even the inability to negotiate collectively.

The Committee on Freedom of Association has made specific recommendations regarding the excessive requirements for the registration and delivery of credentials to union executive councils, such as the submission of copies of unique identity documents and pay stubs to verify that board members are Salvadoran by birth or to verify the type of contract with the worker. But to date, none of these recommendations have been implemented.

The Government indicates that the aforementioned constitutional and legislative reforms, including a reform of the Labour Code, are under study in the Legislative Assembly. However, it is very concerning that the Labour Committee of the Legislative Assembly was dissolved on 1 June 2024, ten days ago. To date, it is not known which of the new committees will handle the issues that were previously under the jurisdiction of that committee. Therefore, any reform of the legislation or the Constitution that was with the dissolved committee could be shelved, as often happens in such cases.

At the June 2023 meeting, our Committee urged the Government to reactivate the full functioning of the Higher Labour Council and other tripartite bodies. In particular, it requested the Government to ensure the development and adoption of clear, objective, predictable, and legally binding standards to guarantee their effective and independent functioning, without any external interference.

However, according to information we have received from the country's social partners, the Higher Labour Council has not met since its session on 5 May 2022, when it was attended by the High-Level Tripartite Mission of the ILO.

Moreover, in other tripartite instances, such as the Salvadoran Social Security Institute, there has been no union representation since June 2023. The INSAFORP has been completely dissolved, and in its place, a new organization has been created with only Government representation.

The effective application of the Convention by El Salvador remains deficient. Serious legislative restrictions and practices continue to limit trade union freedom and the right of workers to organize. Excessive bureaucratic requirements and the lack of genuine social dialogue have hindered the development of a truly free and autonomous trade union environment.

Therefore, it is urgent for the Government to take concrete measures to eliminate these barriers and to ensure that all workers, without discrimination, can fully exercise their freedom of association rights.

Worker member, El Salvador – We thank the Government, workers and employers and the spokespersons of the respective groups for their reports and the positions that they have shared.

I am speaking today on behalf of the Trade Union Unity Confederation of El Salvador, the organization that brings together the vast majority of legally accredited trade union organizations, federations and confederations in El Salvador, which represent the authentic trade union movement and the comprehensive principles of trade unionism in El Salvador.

Firstly, the labour movement deplores the murder in 2020 of our colleague and trade union leader Weder Arturo Meléndez Ramírez, and we have asked the Government to clarify the circumstances of his death and ensure that the perpetrators are brought to justice. We would like to acknowledge the exhaustive investigations undertaken by the competent authorities which have resulted in the murderers being identified and subsequently detained. We hope that their roles in his murder will be determined in accordance with the law and sentences handed down in line with their crimes, and that the Government will monitor the case and ensure that it reaches a conclusion. We have the same hopes for the case of Victoriano Abel Vega.

In our view, this is representative of freedom of association in El Salvador. While we regret the historic level of endemic evil of the gangs in our country that claimed so many victims, including colleagues in the trade union movement, the security measures implemented in response are also strengthening the full exercise of freedom of association.

As the authentic trade union movement, we would like to recognize the manner in which the Government of El Salvador has confronted crime head-on, how it is liberating our country from the cancer of the gangs that for so many years brought pain and grief to the families of El Salvador. We are the ones who witnessed many of our work colleagues and family members die at the hands of the gangs, it was our worker colleagues who risked their lives day after day to go to work or to carry out their daily activities. The increase in security therefore principally benefits workers and their families, as well as society as a whole. It also provides a secure environment for trade union activity.

Proof of this is that on 1 May 2024, for the second consecutive year following the COVID-19 pandemic, we organized a mass march in memory of the martyrs who, throughout history, have given their lives to improve working conditions.

I wish to remind you, particularly the trade union representatives who have been here for many years, that this was not possible five or ten years ago due to the repression of the trade union movement. Back then, however, those persons who now claim that the situation is serious did not raise their voices to denounce what was happening. We would like to think that this was because they felt the same fear as us, and not because they sought to benefit personally.

We can confirm that currently in El Salvador there is respect for trade union activity, free from repression, allowing the trade union movement to participate in dialogue bodies to contribute to the country's economic and social development. It is therefore deeply regrettable that there are movements that promote hate speech both nationally and in the international community under the banner of trade unionism.

We wish to emphasize that, as the authentic trade union movement, we do not support the actions of a small group of trade unionists who have made death threats against public officials or those who have used intimidation for political and private purposes, which does not reflect trade union values. We believe that it is important to promote dialogue and partnership, and we therefore urge the Government to continue with the measures implemented in that regard.

Last year, in this very place, the representative of the Trade Union Unity Confederation of El Salvador highlighted the hypocrisy of the employer representatives, who were using and politicizing this forum. In our view, this has evolved from an inconvenience into a source of frustration, as private newspapers in El Salvador have published large numbers of reports of accusations apparently made by the trade union movement, but that are in fact voiced by a minority sponsored by the ANEP. The articles even report that there have been meetings with ILO bodies, but the authentic trade union movement has not been included in those forums. I therefore repeat our call from a year ago for the authentic trade union movement to be included in international discussion forums and those relating to El Salvador.

We welcome the acknowledgement of trade union work at the national level through the recognition of measures to promote decent work and collective bargaining.

We urge the Government to continue its strategy to secure economic growth focusing on employment generation. As the authentic working class, we will always focus on the progress of the most disadvantaged groups, and we are confident that an environment of security is a determining factor in promoting economic growth. We therefore encourage the representatives of employers who have yet to join those national efforts to leave party political interests to one side and give greater support for development.

We also ask the Government to ratify the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187), as we are committed to fighting for continuous improvements in the safety and health of our worker colleagues. At the same time, we appreciate the progress made in this area by employers in the construction sector who have taken heed of the workers' recommendations and requests, with a reduction in the number of accidents in this sector over the past year, thereby illustrating the will to respect workers' fundamental rights and regulate labour relations to bring about and maintain industrial peace.

We acknowledge the creation of the SIMEL, the first such system in Central America and the second in Latin America, which serves to democratize information and render it transparent, thereby contributing to decision-making.

We call on employers, workers and the Government to engage in ongoing dialogue in accordance with the principles of transparency, respect and mutual recognition in order to achieve the shared vision of improving working conditions for the workers of El Salvador, guaranteeing labour stability and freedom of association.

We call for the reforms of the current Labour Code to be promoted to ensure that the legal status of trade unions is recognized in a timely manner. We welcome the efficient delivery of credentials by the National Department of Social Organizations of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare as a result of the establishment of the Trade Union Office, the advice and guidance of which has assisted our trade union colleagues in receiving their credentials within five to ten days.

Honourable members of the Committee, on behalf of the Trade Union Unity Confederation of El Salvador I can say with certainty that, although there remain challenges in our legal framework, trade unionism in El Salvador is growing, with increasing numbers of trade unions, branches and federations joining us, which fills us with hope.

As worker representatives, we reaffirm our commitment to working together to create decent working conditions, thereby bringing about a better El Salvador, and we reiterate our urgent call on other trade unions, employers' organizations and the Government to refrain from political discourse that serves only to hinder concerted national action.

We also reiterate our fraternal request to international workers' organizations and ILO bodies to listen to the united trade union movement as a whole, rather than smaller representative bodies. Finally, we invite the Government and the ILO to agree on the technical assistance measures needed to address our requests and strengthen the positive progress that we have recognized.

Government member, Belgium – I have the honour to speak on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States. The candidate countries, Albania, Montenegro, North Macedonia, Republic of Moldova and Ukraine, and the European Free Trade Association country, Norway, member of the European Economic Area, align themselves with this statement.

The EU and its Member States are committed to the respect, protection, and fulfilment of human rights, including labour rights. We promote universal ratification and effective implementation of fundamental ILO Conventions and support the ILO in developing and promoting international labour standards and supervising their application.

The EU and its Member States stand with the people of El Salvador and are committed to strengthening our political and trade ties, as well as our important cooperation portfolio. The EU-Central America Association Agreement provides a framework for further developing our partnership, including through cooperation on trade, sustainable development and the effective implementation, in law and practice, of the fundamental ILO Conventions. Furthermore, we have established a Memorandum of Understanding on Bilateral Consultations, which will allow for intensified bilateral engagement and dialogue with El Salvador.

We note with concern the allegations brought forward by the ANEP concerning the defamation and intimidation of the organization and of its President. Despite the requests of the Committee on Freedom of Association and this Committee, which have already examined this issue in 2022 and 2023, continued interference by the Government with the organization is reported by the International Organisation of Employers in its submission of November 2022. We understand that open public hostilities against ANEP have ceased over the last year, nevertheless interference in the autonomy of the organisation continues. The previous acts of intimidation seem to have effectively diminished the role of the ANEP. We also note that no employers' representative has been accredited as part of the delegation of El Salvador. We request the Government to indicate which measures it has taken to re-establish an open dialogue with the ANEP and to stop interfering in its activities.

Regrettably, we note the lack of tangible progress in the investigation of the murder of trade union leader Victoriano Abel Vega, and the lack of information on progress in the investigation into the murder of Weder Arturo Meléndez Ramírez, despite the continued requests of the Committee on Freedom of Association. We call on the Government to deploy all necessary efforts to identify the instigators and the perpetrators and conclude the investigation. In this regard, we note the Government's proposal to reform the Criminal Code, with a view to improving the protection of freedom of association for trade union leaders and members. We echo the call of the Committee of Experts to provide information on the progress achieved on this matter.

We call on the Government to make meaningful progress on long-pending legislative reforms in order to amend several legislative and constitutional provisions, in consultation with the social partners, on all matters referred to by the Committee of Experts to abolish restrictions on freedom of association and the right to organize.

The Government indicates that several of the proposed constitutional and legislative reforms are under examination by the Legislative Assembly. The Government mentions the establishment of a Trade Union Office, which has facilitated the issuing of trade union credentials and registrations. We however echo the Committee's call to stop the delayed issuing of credentials for workers' and employers' organizations, including the ANEP. We furthermore encourage the Government to simplify the requirements for the registration of unions and as regards the prison sector to ensure the full recognition of the right to organize of workers. We note and welcome the commitment of the Government to undertake these reforms and its intention to continue engaging in dialogue with the social partners.

The EU and its Member States remain committed to a joint constructive engagement with El Salvador, with the aim of strengthening the Government's capacity to address the issues raised in the Committee of Experts' report.

Government member, Mexico – I am making this intervention on behalf of a large majority of countries of the group of Latin American and Caribbean countries (GRULAC). We thank the Government of the Republic of El Salvador for the feedback provided in relation to compliance with the Convention. We appreciate the information provided on the investigation of the murder of trade unionist Mr Weder Arturo Meléndez and we encourage the Government of El Salvador to continue reinforcing measures for the legal protection of trade unionists in El Salvador.

We note the progress reported by the Government of El Salvador and we invite it to continue ensuring the legal security of workers and employers, and to bear in mind the provisions of the ILO Constitution and of its ratified Conventions in all the measures adopted at the national level.

We also give thanks for the information provided on the efforts made by the Government to make employment opportunities available to vulnerable groups and its commitment to give effect to the Conventions ratified in June 2022.

In light of the above, we welcome the commitment of the Government of El Salvador to the application of the Convention, and we encourage the ILO to continue providing technical cooperation to the Government of El Salvador.

Employer member, Colombia – First, it is important to take into consideration the fact that this is the seventh time that compliance by El Salvador with ILO Conventions has been examined by this Committee. Now it is Convention No. 87. Last year the Committee adopted a series of conclusions, but regrettably the most serious issues raised by the Employers have persisted.

In this regard, I would like to refer to two aspects of the case.

In its report on compliance with Convention No. 87, the Committee of Experts refers to Convention No. 144, and particularly Article 2, which sets out the commitment to hold effective tripartite consultations and is fundamentally based on social dialogue, which is an essential means of developing joint proposals by workers, employers and the Government.

We reiterate that it is of the greatest importance for consultations to be held in a context of good faith and trust, in which employers and workers are able to express their views, analysis and proposals to achieve true agreements and move forward in the quest to improve industrial relations through social dialogue. These consultations can only be carried out in respect of the freedom of employers' organizations, which requires the Government to recognize the ANEP as the most representative organization of employers in El Salvador.

Second, in relation to the representatives of workers and employers, it is important to emphasize that they have to be freely elected and be represented on an equal footing, as set out in Convention No. 87 and Convention No. 144 in Article 3.

The Committee of Experts has indicated repeatedly that it is for workers' and employers' organizations to determine the conditions for the election of their leaders, and that the authorities should refrain from any undue interference in the exercise of this right.

In view of the above, we note with concern that the Government, on the one hand, is continuing to disregard the ANEP as the most representative organization of employers in El Salvador and, on the other, has not accredited employers to participate in this conference, in disregard for the spirit of the ILO Constitution and thereby denying the right of the most representative organization of employers to nominate its delegates.

This violation forms part of an environment in El Salvador in which freedoms are denied, and particularly freedom of association.

In conclusion, we request the Government, in respect for and compliance with Convention No. 87, and with ILO technical assistance, to respect freedom of association and to recognize the ANEP as the most representative employers' organization.

Government member, Paraguay – In the first place, Paraguay recognizes the work carried out by the Government of the Republic of El Salvador in providing information on compliance with the Convention.

Paraguay also appreciates the efforts made and all the measures adopted to investigate the murder of the trade unionist Mr Weder Meléndez and urges the Government of El Salvador to continue guaranteeing the lawful protection of trade unionists.

We also welcome the progress described by the Government of El Salvador in aligning its action with the provisions of the ILO Constitution and ratified Conventions.

We further emphasize the information provided on the initiatives adopted for the provision of employment opportunities for vulnerable groups and the commitment to give effect to the Conventions ratified in June 2022.

Finally, we appreciate the commitment of El Salvador to give effect to the Convention and we encourage the ILO to continue providing technical cooperation to all Members to make progress in the application of the various Conventions.

Employer member, Honduras – As employer representatives, we are concerned at the direction in which social dialogue in El Salvador is heading, away from respect for the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, and the failure to acknowledge that social dialogue is the only mechanism that can contribute to legitimizing and strengthening democracy.

The ILO must promote institutionalized dialogue and social partnership to build consensus that facilitates a process of development with inclusion and social justice, based on the promotion of decent work for all. We therefore request respect for the right to social dialogue of the most representative organizations in El Salvador, and in this case the ANEP, an organization that has been excluded from the various tripartite consultation forums, such as in the recent case of the closure of INSAFORP by decree and the creation of a new vocational training institution without the involvement of employers' or workers' representatives.

In recent years, the Committee has been examining the case of El Salvador, without being able to note any progress in the functioning of social dialogue, where we continue to see the same violations of Convention No. 144, which I will list:

- (1) structures and processes for effective tripartite consultation have not been established, with the Government of El Salvador adopting an intentionally passive role, creating an uncertain political climate in terms of development and social progress policies;
- (2) a policy to discredit the ANEP has been implemented with the aim of weakening it as an organization;
- (3) the Government of El Salvador has failed to fulfil its obligation to consult the ANEP as the most representative organization of employers, thereby violating Article 5 of Convention No. 144.

For these reasons, we request the Committee to adopt effective measures to ensure respect for the independence of ANEP as the most representative organization of employers in El Salvador, thereby allowing it to participate fully in the various tripartite dialogue and consultation forums.

Worker member, Uruguay – The Committee of Experts has no option than to repeat in its report the same facts and failures to comply with international standards on freedom of association caused by the failings of the successive governments of El Salvador.

This long and repeated series of obstacles to the full exercise of freedom of association includes serious violations of the right to life and security, as well as legislative reforms that are announced but never implemented, resulting in a legal regime that significantly limits trade union activity.

There are provisions across the length and breadth of legislation, and in some cases in the Constitution itself, that raise unsurmountable obstacles to the development of trade union organizations.

We refer, for example, to the exclusion of some categories of public officials from the right to organize, the ban on workers joining more than one trade union, the need for at least 35 members to form a trade union, employers' certification of the employment status of the founding members of a union during the process of registration and the various ways in which the right to strike is limited.

We are also extremely aware of the arguments and promises surrounding the existence of a process of legislative reform that is never completed, and we know that the holding of tripartite meetings, such as at the Higher Labour Council and the National Minimum Wage Council, is always around the corner, but also always delayed.

This includes the observations of the Committee of Experts which take up the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association on the excessive requirements for the registration of and issuing of credentials for union executive boards, such as the submission of copies of identity documents and payslips to verify whether executive board members are Salvadoran by birth or to verify their type of employment contract.

We note with concern the scant replies of the Government of El Salvador here, to this Committee, with regard to the subject under examination and the observations of the Committee of Experts in relation to the implementation of the Convention.

Freedom of association in El Salvador requires definitive affirmation giving effect to the commitments that the Government has set out in its reports and to the Conference Committee.

The trade unions will repay this recognition with democratic participation for the benefit of the country as a whole.

Employer member, Costa Rica – Costa Rican employers note with grave concern the case of the repeated violations of the Convention by the State of El Salvador.

This is a fundamental Convention, and, as indicated by the ILO itself, such Conventions are fundamental to the rights of human beings at work, irrespective of the level of development of individual Member States. These rights are a precondition for all the others in that they provide a necessary framework from which to strive freely for the improvement of individual and collective conditions of work.

These Conventions provide the foundations for the functioning of the international labour standards system. A society that does not promote social dialogue and does not ensure, at the domestic level in each country, the participation of employers and workers is not a full democracy and will not achieve equitable terms and conditions of employment or decent working conditions for the benefit of all.

Disregarding the role of the most representative organizations, whether of employers or workers, and forcing their members to give up their membership through the refusal of routine and special authorizations which are administered by public offices, and which are required by enterprises to function, such as construction, export, import, health and environmental permits, are coercive and abusive practices that are in violation of freedom of association as set out in the Convention.

Like the Committee of Experts, Costa Rican employers urge the Government of the Republic of El Salvador to refrain from its ongoing acts of hostility, intimidation and aggression and from interfering in the establishment and activities of employers' and workers' organizations, and particularly the ANEP.

Social dialogue and tripartism require the existence of solid and independent employers' and workers' organizations with technical capacity and access to the necessary information, political will, respect for the parties involved and the commitment of all to respect fundamental rights, including freedom of association. It is therefore important for the ANEP to be allowed to participate in the appropriate social dialogue forums so as to strengthen democracy, which will inevitably benefit the country's development.

Finally, we request the Government to reinstate the ANEP in tripartite dialogue forums as the most representative employers' organization in El Salvador.

Worker member, Mexico – I am speaking on behalf of the National Union of Workers of Mexico to comment on the persistent situation of the systematic violation of the Convention. One illustration is the requirement of 35 members to establish a union of workers in the public sector. The Committee on Freedom of Association has considered that a minimum of 20 members to establish a union does not appear to be too high, but that the requirement of a minimum of 35 is an obstacle to the establishment of unions and is not in accordance with the Convention, as it is in violation of the right to establish unions through the imposition of conditions that are difficult to meet.

It is absolutely unacceptable for the Government of El Salvador to continue delaying the delivery of credentials for workers' organizations, which is a practice that is in clear violation of the right to organize. This administrative obstacle not only prevents the effective operation of organizations in El Salvador, but also undermines their capacity to adequately represent and defend the interests of their members. By raising obstacles to the process of accreditation, it is denying workers the fundamental right to associate and to organize freely, which is an essential pillar of any democratic and just society.

The Committee on Freedom of Association has repeatedly indicated that delays in the registration of organizations and excessive discretion by the competent authorities are serious impediments to the establishment of unions. These practices are a flagrant violation of the Convention, which guarantees the right to establish organizations without previous authorization. By persisting with these measures, the Government is not only disregarding international standards, but is also eroding confidence in institutions and violating the rights of workers by undermining the very basis of freedom of association.

And the requirement to be a national of El Salvador by birth to be a member of the executive board of a union constitutes discrimination on grounds of nationality against foreign nationals in relation to holding trade union office, which is contrary to the provisions of the Convention and is a situation that must not continue.

It is imperative for the Government to accept technical assistance to bring the domestic legislation into compliance with the principles of freedom of association and the right to organize. The harmonization of national laws with these principles is fundamental for the promotion of social dialogue. We therefore call on the Committee to urge the Government of El Salvador to take specific and proactive measures to take advantage of the technical assistance that is provided and ensure full respect for the principles of freedom of association and the right to organize.

Employer member, Mexico – The Employers' delegation of Mexico expresses deep concern at the action and behaviour of the Government of this country. It should be emphasized that El Salvador has been brought before the Committee on more than six occasions for various violations of Conventions, most recently in 2023 for Convention No. 144. It should also be emphasized that the Committee of Experts has made over nine observations since 2013, the most recent of which was in 2023.

It is important to note that in 2023 the Conference Committee urged the Government to immediately cease all acts of violence, threats, persecution, stigmatization, intimidation or any other form of aggression against individuals or organizations in connection with both the exercise of legitimate trade union activities and the activities of employers' organizations, and adopt measures to ensure that such acts are not repeated, in particular for the ANEP and its members.

It should be recalled that the 2024 World Report on human rights indicates that, in El Salvador, in relation to freedom of association and assembly, the Government was undermining the independence and effectiveness of trade unions. The Government has also imposed unjustified restrictions on the processes of the registration of unions and the accreditation of their officers, while the Government and its allies in the Legislative Assembly have systematically dismantled the system of democratic checks and balances.

It is clear that the Government took note of the High-level Tripartite Mission, which was accepted by the Government in May 2022. However, unfortunately, five ILO Conventions were ratified by El Salvador without consulting the most representative employers' organizations.

That is why we are calling for the inclusion in the Committee's conclusions of a repeat of the call for the Government to refrain from any aggression or interference in the establishment and activities of employers' organizations, and particularly the ANEP, to respect the full independence of the most representative employers' organizations and to ensure their full operation through social dialogue without any interference.

Employer member, Argentina – The employers from Argentina are grateful for the information provided to this Committee by the authorities of El Salvador. However, in view of the elements in this case, we are bound to express deep concern at the situation of serious breaches of compliance with the principles of freedom of association.

Despite the fact that it is the first year that the application of this Convention has been discussed by the Committee, we note with concern that measures have not been taken to give effect in the country to the recommendations made by the Committee in 2023 which, even though they related to Convention No. 144, are fully relevant to this case.

In its 2023 conclusions, the Committee noted with deep concern the multiple allegations of interference by the authorities in the appointment of employers' and workers' representatives in public tripartite and joint bodies, and urged the Government to immediately cease all acts of violence and intimidation and to refrain from any undue interference in the internal affairs of employers' and workers' organizations. These requests continue to be topical.

In this regard, it is necessary to emphasize that in the Conference Committee the position has been maintained that: full respect for civil liberties is an essential requirement for the exercise of freedom of association and that the rights conferred on workers' and employers' organizations can only be achieved in a context of respect and guarantees for civil and political rights, including freedom of expression, the security of the person and the rights to legal defence and due process, as a guarantee of the prohibition of arbitrary detentions.

We hope that the commitment expressed by the Government will be translated into the early implementation of the necessary measures to guarantee the cessation of all acts of violence, intimidation or any other form of aggression against persons or workers' and employers' organizations, and that measures will be taken to ensure that such acts do not reoccur, particularly in relation to the most representative employers' organization in the country, the ANEP, and its members.

We note the request made by the Government for technical assistance and we encourage it to work with the Office to follow up the recommendations made by this Committee to ensure the conformity of national law and practice with the Convention.

Employer member, Brazil – As you know, this is not the first time that this case has come before this Committee, or the Committee on Freedom of Association. The ILO has been examining the continuing contempt by El Salvador for the principle and fundamental right of freedom of association and the right to organize, particularly as it pertains to employers, for almost a decade.

Over the past 12 months, as part of its comments on Convention No. 144, the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee have recognized that ANEP's rights as a representative of employers have not been respected in recent years. It has been highlighted that the situation remains broadly the same and has worsened in some respects.

It should therefore be emphasized that the 2024 report of the Committee of Experts, after summarizing the observations of the International Organisation of Employers that the ANEP continues to suffer from aggression and interference, contains an explicit request for an end to all acts of violence, threats and stigmatization against individuals or organizations to with a view to guaranteeing, in law and practice, freedom of association and the right to organize, which protects both employers and workers.

I reiterate: disregard for freedom of association and the right to organize is a matter of the utmost seriousness in the employers' view. Not for nothing are they fundamental labour principles and rights, meaning that there is an increasingly urgent need to resolve this persistent case of El Salvador.

There is therefore no doubt of the need for this Committee to adopt the necessary measures to restore and guarantee the independence of employers' representation in El Salvador. It is also necessary to restore the right of enterprises to exercise freely their right to association. We therefore understand that the ILO will continue to take action, while affording the case the necessary urgency, to restore respect and independence to the representatives of employers in El Salvador, and particularly the ANEP.

Employer member, Chile – Freedom of association, as envisaged in the Convention, is derived from the right to organize, and the related Conventions recognize and protect the rights of workers and employers. The Convention is clear in recognizing that States have to guarantee the exercise of freedom of association, without imposing arbitrary conditions or requirements for the establishment and functioning of workers' and employers' organizations.

The Committee concluded last year that in El Salvador there are multiple forms of interference by the authorities in the nomination of employer and worker representatives on tripartite and joint dialogue bodies. Regrettably, we have to say that this situation has not changed, and is prejudicial to the activities of the ANEP in its capacity as the most representative organization of employers in El Salvador.

There is also a point that should be emphasized, as it is not always heard: the work of employers' organizations is to promote free private initiative and the best possible conditions for the creation of more and better sustainable enterprises. In this regard, it is their duty to put forward proposals to the authorities that are in office to facilitate entrepreneurial activity and the generation of formal employment.

This is worth emphasizing as Governments sometimes think that employers' organizations engage in and promote political activities. In this regard, it should be specified that everyone has the individual right to hold political views, but that employers' organizations work on behalf of the general interests of their member enterprises, irrespective of whether the Government that is in office is on the left, the centre or the right.

Finally, it should be recalled that freedom of association is both positive and negative, because no person or enterprise can be denied the right to join a union or an employers' organization, but no one can be required to do so in order to be able to work or engage successfully in entrepreneurship. This is very important, because there can always be the temptation to create unions or employers' organizations that are close to the Government that is in office, which is in violation of freedom of association.

Finally, we call on the Government of El Salvador to take up once again as soon as possible dialogue with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations in the country, and to cultivate a genuine and sincere reunion between the various social partners with a view to rekindling the social dialogue that is required in El Salvador for the joint pursuit of the common good.

Observer, International Organisation of Employers (IOE) – I am speaking on behalf of the International Organisation of Employers, an organization that brings together independent employers' organizations from over 145 countries. As indicated in previous interventions, the case of El Salvador in relation to the violations of various Conventions has been examined by the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts for over eight years.

It is clear that the Government of El Salvador has committed and is continuing to commit acts of interference, threats and intimidation against the most representative employers' organization, the ANEP.

Ultimately, these acts have been channelled through direct threats to enterprises or the presidents of the member associations of the ANEP. They are required to withdraw their membership of the ANEP and they are even issued with threats against their assets.

The Committee of Experts continues to urge the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to take as soon as possible each and every measure that it has been requested to adopt by the present Committee with a view to ceasing hostilities.

This year, the ANEP has not been accredited to participate in this Conference. If the Government excludes the ANEP from tripartite representation in international meetings, what can happen on a daily basis at the national level is clear. However much the Government representative fills this Committee with words, the facts show that the ANEP continues to be excluded.

The Government of El Salvador claims improvements in individual security and political stability. We are convinced that there can be no sustainability without the rule of law and freedom of association, which is what we are examining in relation to this Convention.

Respect for freedom of association has to be ascertained irrespective of the colour or ideology of the Government, including in the case of Governments which are presumed to favour enterprise development. This is what makes us credible. Action that is so flagrantly and obscenely detrimental to the rule of law, the independence of the judiciary and freedom of association is not sustainable or compatible with the ILO's fundamental principles and rights. Anyone who wishes to examine in greater depth the situation in El Salvador barely needs to refer to all the various media reporting violations of freedom of expression.

Once again we consider this to be a case of concern and we urge the Government to adopt measures that respect the representativeness of the ANEP. Any measure adopted in this respect, I would like to emphasize, will have our constructive support.

Chairperson – There are no more requests for the floor. So, now I invite the Government representative to take the floor for his final remarks.

Government representative – We have taken note of the comments made by workers' and employers' representatives and Governments. Despite our knowledge of this Committee, we are surprised by the language used in their statements. In our case, we have come to provide our report with the best will to address and clarify the comments of the Committee of Experts. Nevertheless, despite noting that this openness is not shared by all parties, we will respond to the comments made here.

With reference to the progress made in the cases of the trade unionists, namely Victoriano Abel Vega and Weder Arturo Meléndez, I reiterate the information provided in my initial intervention.

With regard to Mr Meléndez, I have indicated that the Office of the Prosecutor-General of the Republic identified and captured those responsible, who were three members of the 18 revolutionaries gang, who are awaiting trial and, once the final judgement has been handed down, we will provide the relevant report to the Committee on Freedom of Association. We consider that, in the context of the criminality experienced by the country, the current outcome is very significant.

On the other hand, in the same way as in the case of Mr Meléndez, exhaustive investigations have been carried out in the case of Mr Vega which, as I said early, are at the stage of the identification of those responsible with a view to bringing them to trial. It should be recalled that this case had been shelved by the judicial authorities and that it was precisely the present Government which requested its re-opening with a view to a prompt and final conclusion. In our respect for the separation of powers, and in our awareness of our duties, we will follow up the progress made.

With reference to the comments on the ANEP, we wish to emphasize that the action of the various employers' organizations is fully respected in the country, including that of the ANEP. This includes the free and independent election of its representatives. All of its leaders, in the same way as all citizens, are assured of the right to freedom of expression and association. This does not preclude the possibility of informing you of the real situation concerning the ANEP.

We are surprised by its proclamations and its allegations would appear to be eminently political, which is in the nature of the ANEP. I have here copies of the publications issued by the member organizations of the ANEP: the American Chamber of Commerce of El Salvador, the Chamber of the Textile Industry, the Chamber of the Construction Industry, the Corporation of El Salvador Exporters, the Pharmaceutical Industry, the El Salvador Association of Cattle and Dairy Industries, the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of El Salvador, the El Salvador Industrial Association, the El Salvador Coffee Association and the German Chamber of Commerce and Industry. All of these are affiliates of the ANEP and they all show support for the Government, and they have all shown their commitment to building a better country together.

The position of the ANEP is contrary to the sectors that it claims to represent, which therefore raises a reasonable doubt about its representativeness, and moreover, there are thousands of employers of all sizes and sectors who indicate that they feel safe. They previously suffered the death of their employees and enormous extortion. They express their support and commitment to benefiting from this forum for the generation of opportunities and entrepreneurship in the country.

It should be known in this Committee that the ANEP never denounced the situation at the international level during the 20 years of the ARENA Government, as they were the ones who took over the State.

During the ANEP governments, bipartite bodies were created and they never worried about including workers in those bodies. The considerations put forward by the ANEP correspond to its partial ideology which prevailed in the country at that time. It was its leaders who took the decisions within the Government, who placed in power and ejected presidents and ministers, and who decided which laws to approve and which would not be. It is simply the memory they have of other times that makes them wish to stay in the bodies under discussion, but for political, not entrepreneurial reasons.

Nevertheless, in awareness of its political nature, the ANEP can be active in our country and is fully respected and can do so in a climate of total security.

With regard to the need for labour reforms, this is a subject that is well known and we agree that the requirements for the establishment of unions need to be reduced, while extending the validity of credentials and reducing the procedures for their delivery, reducing the number of workers required to establish a union and the possibility to belong to more than one union, among the other matters commented by the Committee of Experts.

We are aware that we have a Labour Code that dates from 1972 and no longer corresponds to the real situation in the world of work now. Moreover, it contains many heavy restrictions on the defence of workers' rights and prerogatives that were established by the groups holding power at the time. This is a challenge that requires broad discussion and consensus from all sides. We therefore invite them to contribute to this process of discussing the reform of the Labour Code, and we request ILO technical assistance for that purpose.

With reference to the dissolution of bodies and the creation of new bodies, this is in line with a process of the modernization of the State, which has all been undertaken following the procedures and bodies set out by law.

In relation to the accreditation of employers, it should be noted that the report has already been submitted to the Credentials Committee.

We note the broad interest displayed by Employers in this case. We therefore take advantage of the occasion to extend an invitation to our country to see the conditions through their own eyes. We also invite them to promote conditions for the generation of decent jobs, which is one of the main objectives that we have to pursue.

As time does not allow us to address individually all the comments made, we have taken note of them and we will prepare the corresponding reports to the ILO supervisory bodies, but not without first reiterating our request for ILO support and technical cooperation with a view to making progress in giving full effect to freedom of association in El Salvador.

Worker members – During previous sessions of our Committee, the Worker members acknowledged some progress by the Government, such as the ratification of several ILO Conventions in response to demands by trade union organizations. However, it is evident that these advances have been minimal and mostly symbolic, as many of the commitments made have not been fulfilled since the High-Level Tripartite Mission of the ILO in May 2022.

The Committee of Experts has repeatedly highlighted the lack of concrete action regarding the murder of union leader Victoriano Abel Vega in 2010. Despite repeated requests from the Committee on Freedom of Association for the Government to identify and sanction those responsible, no real progress has been made. I welcome the statement by the Government that this will be done in the short term. But let us hope.

Additionally, the Government continues to ignore recommendations to review constitutional and legislative provisions that exclude certain categories of public servants from the right to organize and hinder the formation of unions.

The requirement to renew union executive boards annually, established in the Labour Code, is a clear obstacle to trade union freedom. This is a very bureaucratic process, it can take up to nine months, sometimes five days, but also nine months, and this paralyzes union activity, it prevents requests for labour inspection, it blocks collective bargaining and the Government has ignored recommendations to eliminate these excessive requirements, demonstrating a lack of real commitment to freedom of association.

In June 2023, the Government was urged to reactivate the Higher Labour Council and other tripartite bodies with clear and objective standards. However, the Higher Labour Council has not met since May 2022, and other tripartite instances lack union representation. The recent dissolution of the Labour Committee of the Legislative Assembly in June of this year has only aggravated the situation, leaving any pending legislative reform in limbo. What will happen to it?

So the lack of effective action and continuous legislative and practical restrictions demonstrate a worrying negligence by the Government in guaranteeing the trade union rights of Salvadoran workers.

And for this reason, we are compelled to reiterate some of the conclusions of previous sessions of our Committee.

We urge the Government to:

- (1) urgently and as a priority, dedicate all necessary efforts to expedite and conclude all investigations related to the murders of union leaders, so that those responsible, both material and intellectual, are identified but also sanctioned as soon as possible;
- (2) end delays in the issuance of credentials to workers' organizations;
- (3) ensure that all workers' organizations enjoy the rights and freedoms established in the Convention and that they are fully included in tripartite consultation and social dialogue;
- (4) reactivate, without delay, the full functioning of the Higher Labour Council and other tripartite bodies;
- (5) adopt without delay all necessary measures to repeal the legal obligation for unions to request the renewal of their legal status every 12 months;
- (6) develop a road map with determined deadlines to promptly implement all the recommendations made by the 2022 High-Level Tripartite Mission of the ILO and the Committee's recommendations related to the Convention.

Employer members – In our final considerations, we would first like to reiterate once again our thanks to the Government of El Salvador for the information provided to the Committee, and we say openly and sincerely that we hope that its commitment to the ILO will take the form of specific action and full compliance with the recommendations and requirements outlined.

I wish to refer to an example of the discrepancies that we observe between what the Government says and what it does. A simple example. The Government did not consult the ANEP on the nomination of the delegates to this Conference. What more can I say? Let us go on.

The Employers also wish to thank those delegates that have participated in this meeting and the contributions that they have made to the case. We echo the words of the Worker spokesperson, which clearly reflects the Government's failure to comply, which it has been demonstrating up to now, and we share the concerns expressed. The recommendations outlined by the representative of the Workers' Group are totally acceptable to us, and we therefore reproduce them.

We wish to add that the conclusions must refer to and replicate the conclusions adopted during the discussion in 2023 on Convention No. 144. In view of the links between the two cases, as outlined not only by myself, but as also specifically recognized by the Committee of Experts in its report.

It also appears to us to be necessary to lay down the following:

- (1) that following prior consultation between independent and representative organizations of employers and workers, it takes measures to ensure the definitive ending of any form of aggression against persons or organizations in relation to the exercise of both lawful trade union activities and the activities of employers' organizations, their leaders and members, and to prevent this reoccurring in future. It must be guaranteed that there is no repetition of these and other acts of hostility and interference against the ANEP and its members and that the freedom of employers in relation to their organizations is respected. The political role that the Government representative attributes to the ANEP is outside this discussion. If, in the past, there were bodies that were only bipartite, it is a responsibility of the Government and cannot be attributed to trade unions or employers' organizations. The corresponding claims were undoubtedly put forward at the time. This absolutely does not justify at the present time a representative organization such as the ANEP from being sidelined and ignored.

- (2) immediately provides detailed information indicating the measures adopted to ensure that there is no repetition of these or other acts of hostility and interference and to guarantee respect for the freedom of workers and employers to establish the organizations of their choosing, organize their administration and activities and formulate their programmes without interference by the public authorities and free from the acts of aggression described above;
- (3) directs all its efforts as a priority at facilitating and concluding the investigations into the murders referred to above;
- (4) provides detailed information on the content and progress of the parliamentary examination of the reforms intended to ensure the harmonization of the national legislation with the Convention, including the proposed reform of the Penal Code and the consultation procedures with the social partners in relation to these initiatives and the results achieved; and
- (5) takes the necessary measures to revise the rules applicable to the registration of executive boards to guarantee in the right of organizations to be established and to elect their representatives in full freedom.

It is clear, as indicated by the Committee of Experts in its report, that the situation and corresponding violations of the Convention are intimately related to the discussion held in 2023 on Convention No. 144, as I have already noted. For this reason, we reiterate the demands set out by this Committee in its conclusions on that case. In this regard, it is necessary to establish a direct contacts mission.

We wish to make the explicit request to establish this direct contacts mission. It appears to us to be totally coherent with all of our concerns, with the interest expressed by the Government in complying with all of the commitments that have been taken on through the ratification of Conventions and the road map that must be developed for compliance with the commitments already assumed.

Committee's conclusions

The Committee took note of the oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted with concern the allegations of ongoing violations of the Convention by the Government, including the absence of tangible progress in the investigations into the murders of trade unionists and reported acts of harassment against an employers' organization (ANEP).

The Committee also expressed concern regarding the allegations of interference by the authorities in the appointment of employers' and workers' representatives in public tripartite and joint bodies.

Taking the discussion into account, the Committee urged the Government, in consultation with independent and representative employers' and workers' organizations, to:

- immediately cease all acts of violence, threats, persecution, stigmatization, intimidation or any other form of aggression against individuals or organizations in connection with both the exercise of legitimate trade union activities and the activities of employers' organizations, and adopt measures to ensure that such acts are not repeated;
- re-ensure respect for the freedom of workers and employers to constitute the organizations of their choosing, organize their administration and activities and formulate their programme of action without interference from the public authorities;
- expedite and conclude the ongoing investigations into the murders of trade union leaders with a view to establishing the facts, determining culpability and punishing the perpetrators;
- provide detailed information on the content and status of the parliamentary process of the proposed reform to the Penal Code, the consultation processes with social actors that exist in relation to this initiative and the results obtained;
- expedite the processes of registration and issuing credentials to boards of directors to ensure the right of workers' and employers' organizations to form and freely elect their representatives;
- repeal the legal obligation for trade unions to request the renewal of their legal status every 12 months;
- reactivate, without delay, the Higher Labour Council (CST) to ensure the full participation of workers' and employers' organizations in social dialogue and tripartite consultation;
- develop a time-bound road map to implement without delay all recommendations made by the ILO high-level tripartite mission of 2022 and the Committee's previous recommendations relating to the Convention; and
- send information on the institutional change from INSAFORP to INCAF and ensure that it has a tripartite structure.

The Committee requested the Government to submit a detailed report on the implementation of the Convention in law and practice, with regard to all of the above matters, including information on the content and outcome of tripartite consultations, to the Committee of Experts before its next meeting.

Government representative – On behalf of the delegation of El Salvador, I note the conclusions adopted by the Committee.

I take this opportunity to indicate that El Salvador respects the ILO supervisory bodies. We are therefore grateful for this opportunity to provide information on the progress achieved in the implementation of the Convention. We also note the comments made by the social partners.

With reference to the progress made in the cases of the trade unionists, I wish to reiterate the significant progress achieved. I will do so slowly to facilitate interpretation.

We have repeatedly indicated that, with regard to Mr Weder Meléndez, the Office of the Prosecutor-General of the Republic, together with the National Civil Police, following exhaustive investigations, identified and captured those responsible, who were three members of the “18 revolutionary” gang, who are awaiting trial and that, when the final verdict has been issued, we will send the corresponding report to the Committee on Freedom of Association. Nevertheless, we consider that in the context of the criminality experienced by the country, the outcome achieved constitutes very significant progress.

Moreover, as in the case of Mr Meléndez, exhaustive investigations have been carried out in the case of Mr Abel Vega and, as I indicated, they are at the stage of the identification of those responsible with a view to their prosecution. It should be recalled that this case had been shelved by the judicial authorities and it was precisely the State of El Salvador which called for the case to be reopened. The objective is to ensure prompt and full justice.

In our respect for the separation of powers, and in our awareness of our duties, we will follow up the progress made. We are fully determined, as a State, that no death of a trade unionist will go unpunished.

With reference to the comments on employers’ organizations, we wish to emphasize that there is full respect in the country for the activities of the various employers’ organizations, including the free and independent election of their representatives. All their leaders, in the same way as all citizens, are assured of the right to freedom of expression and association.

For the rest, we accept the declaration and we undertake to give it due effect, taking into account our commitment to continue providing information on the progress achieved.

We reaffirm our unshakeable commitment to the principles and values of the ILO, for which reason we will continue to make progress in the achievement of decent work, placing emphasis on social dialogue with all partners and sectors. We are grateful in this process for the valuable cooperation and technical assistance of the ILO.

Eswatini (ratification: 1978)

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

Written information provided by the Government

Firstly, it is noted from the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations (Committee of Experts), following its examination of the country’s article 22 report on the Convention, that the Committee of Experts already requested the Government to submit full information in response to its observations and direct requests outside the reporting period, in an out-of-cycle report, in 2025.

Secondly, the Committee on Freedom of Association has not as yet examined the report of the Independent Investigation Committee that was appointed to investigate the justification for the action of the police denounced by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in relation to the industrial actions of 2018 and 2019. Furthermore, the Committee on Freedom of Association was still to examine the report of the National Voluntary Conciliation process that was adopted by the Government and the Trade Union Congress of Swaziland (TUCOSWA) on 15 September 2023 in relation to the complaints that were reported to the Committee on Freedom of Association by TUCOSWA.

Thirdly, the Government has availed itself of, and is already receiving, ILO technical assistance to address the recommendations contained in the report of the Independent Investigation Committee that was appointed to investigate the justification for the action of the police denounced by ITUC in relation to the industrial actions of 2018 and 2019, as detailed in the report of the Independent Investigation Committee. In the same vein, the Government has already availed itself of, and is currently receiving, ILO technical assistance to implement the recommendations contained in the report of the National Voluntary Conciliation process that both the Government and TUCOSWA agreed to act on last year in an effort to resolve a number of complaints reported by TUCOSWA to the Committee on Freedom of Association. As indicated in the covering letter to the report of the National Voluntary Conciliation process submitted on 25 September 2023, and the follow-up letter submitted by the Government on 25 January 2024, the Government requested the ILO to provide technical assistance with the development of a time-bound implementation plan, in order to ensure the effective implementation of the recommendations of the National Voluntary Conciliation process. This request was made in the spirit of paragraph 10, page 31, of the National Voluntary Conciliation report wherein the Government and TUCOSWA agreed that the implementation plan should have a monitoring and evaluation structure. The Office agreed to provide the requested technical support to the Government, in an endeavour to follow up on the reports of the national bodies and the comments of the Committee of Experts adopted following its examination of the country's article 22 reports in November and December 2023. Furthermore, in oral engagements between the Government and the Office, the reason given to explain why the technical mission requested by the Government in September 2023 had to be delayed until February 2024 was that, strategically, it would allow the mission to combine its technical assistance by addressing, not only the recommendations of the reports of the Independent Investigation Committee and the National Voluntary Conciliation, but also the comments of the Committee of Experts, following its examination of the country's article 22 reports on Conventions Nos 87 and 98).

Therefore, from 22 to 23 February 2024, a first technical mission, consisting of four ILO experts, one from the International Labour Office and three from the Pretoria-based Decent Work Technical Support Team for Eastern and Southern Africa, visited the Kingdom of Eswatini. A mission report prepared by the technical mission, and a table of recommendations (a draft implementation or action plan), were submitted to the Government and TUCOSWA on 2 May 2024. As indicated in the mission report, the technical mission met with the parties to the complaints and several institutions and other stakeholders, from among both the Government and the social partners, who would be involved in the implementation plan. A meeting was also held between the mission and the United Nations Resident Coordinator Office to discuss the country's context and the coordinated support to be provided to the Eswatini Government on issues of common interest. Finally, the mission met with the Minister of Labour and Social Security, the Honourable Phila Buthelezi, to report on the mission's findings. In its report, the mission indicates its appreciation of the opportunity for frank and open discussion with all interlocutors. The mission report contains a summary table of the outstanding issues, together with observations and the timetable for the examination by the ILO supervisory bodies and invites the parties to commit to drawing up a time-bound plan for follow-ups. This document would also serve as a road map for resolving outstanding issues relating to the complaints presented before the Committee on Freedom of Association. In this respect, the mission recalled that issues relating to legislative reform and acts of anti-union discrimination have also been dealt with by the ILO supervisory bodies, namely the Committee of Experts and the Committee on the Application of Standards in the past. In its report, the mission indicates that it is convinced that the road map of action to follow up on the reports of the national bodies set up in relation to the reported complaints will help the Government and the stakeholders to take ownership of the policy and regulatory reforms. The mission is also of the opinion that the monitoring of progress relating to compliance with ratified international labour standards will enable all stakeholders to have a better grasp of the interlinkage of these reforms with comments made by the ILO supervisory mechanisms, supported by the Office's technical assistance, towards a peaceful and lasting social dialogue, in conformity with universally recognized freedom of association and collective bargaining rights. Finally, and in view of the magnitude of the tasks and topics that will fall to the Ministry of Labour and Social Security in ensuring proper follow-up to the road map and in reporting to the ILO supervisory bodies, the mission recommends that the Ministry set up a specific monitoring team, as it would benefit from reinforcements from other relevant institutions, in order to carry out its mission successfully. The table of recommendations attached to the mission report summarizes the outcomes and recommendations of the national bodies, namely, the Independent Investigation Committee and the report of the National Voluntary Conciliation process, as well as the comments of the Committee of Experts that were adopted by the Committee in its session held from November to December 2023.

The parties, namely, the Government and TUCOSWA, arranged a meeting for Friday, 17 May 2024 for the purposes of discussing the first technical mission report. Suffice it to underscore that this is the first technical mission activity, which both the aforementioned parties understood would be followed by a second technical mission to finalize and validate the implementation plan. The second technical mission will involve all institutions that have a role to play in the implementation plan, plus strategic political figures, in order to obtain political support, including the Cabinet and the Parliamentary Portfolio Committees for the Ministry of Labour and Social Security.

Moreover, it suffices also to recall that both national processes were pitched at the highest level by Government, as demonstrated by the fact that the Independent Investigation Committee was chaired by a Principal Magistrate, sitting with a panel of experienced industrial relations practitioners. The Government treats the findings of the Independent Investigation Committee in a very serious light and is committed to implementing them fully. In addition, the National Voluntary Conciliation process was chaired by the Judge President of the Industrial Court of Appeal who was selected by the agreement of both parties, namely, the Government and TUCOSWA; sitting with him were two senior Commissioners of the Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration Commission (CMAC) including the Executive Director of CMAC. The Government provided full financial support, including travel, subsistence and hotel accommodation expenses to all members involved in the above-mentioned national processes, including the members of the National Voluntary Conciliation process, which was composed of seven officials or representatives from each side, that is, seven Government members and seven TUCOSWA members, the panel of Commissioners, as well as the secretariat, amounting to a total of 22 officials.

On the aspect of civil liberties and trade union rights, it was reported in the information supplied to the Committee of Experts in December 2023 that police investigations are ongoing to identify and punish the perpetrators of the civil unrest, which started in June 2021 and continued up to 2023. This unrest included the brutal killing of civilians, a senior prince from the royal family (who was brutally murdered and videotaped live pleading for mercy from his killers), police and public officers, and traditional leaders, including Mr Thulani Maseko. The Government submits that investigations are continuing earnestly, and that the net is closing in on those perpetrators. By any yardstick, the investigations are credible and transparent. It is very unfortunate that in some matters, in particular that of Mr Maseko, police investigations and requests for interviews with people who are reasonably considered to have some information to assist the investigations, or who are in possession of electronic gadgets that are reasonably suspected to contain vital information that could assist in the investigations, are hampered by strong hostilities and non-cooperation by potential witnesses, including very close family members of the deceased (Mr Maseko). Nonetheless, the police investigations will not be dampened by the very strange tendencies and hostilities, coming even from people from whom the highest level of cooperation was anticipated, especially because the Government's reputational image continues to be tainted by the unfounded and disparaging theories circulating on various platforms, especially on social media. The outcome of these investigations will be furnished to the Committee of Experts in 2025, as requested.

On the issue of harassment in the education sector, which involves Mr Mbongwa Dlamini, the Government submits that this matter remains pending between the employee (Mr Dlamini) and the Teaching Service Commission (employer), in the light of the judgment delivered by the Industrial Court on 21 March 2024, which declared his purported dismissal from the teaching service to be null and void and set it aside. The Court ordered the Teaching Service Commission to start the disciplinary process afresh. The Government maintains that this is a pure disciplinary process relating to allegations of misconduct on the part of the worker, namely, unauthorized absenteeism for a prolonged period of time by the employee. This has nothing to do with Mr Dlamini's role as a leader of the Swaziland National Association of Teachers (SNAT). It should be recalled that SNAT is one of the oldest trade unions in the country and that it has a recognition agreement with the Government dating back over 40 years. The social partnership between the Government and SNAT has weathered so many storms that it can now be assumed that a mere disciplinary process against a SNAT official is an act of union bashing that seeks to derecognize SNAT. Once finalized, the Committee of Experts will be furnished with the outcome of the judicial appeals.

In respect of Article 3 of the Convention, the Government confirms that the ILO technical mission held in February 2024 was able to interview officials from the Ministry of Housing and Urban Development, as well as chief executive officers from the country's municipal councils. Gatherings continue to be convened in the country by interested organizations, including trade unions, under the terms of the Public Order Act of 2017, as read together with the supporting codes of good practice, without any impediment whatsoever. The most recent such gatherings have included the 1 May 2024 Workers' Day mass gatherings, to which the Government was also invited, and it did attend the May Day celebrations convened by TUCOSWA in Mbabane, the capital city of Eswatini, and by the Federation of Swaziland Trade Unions in Simunye town, respectively. Countless other gatherings and protest marches to deliver petitions to Government ministries have been held by trade unions in the country following the civil unrest without being denied their right to gather and associate. In respect of ongoing law reforms, in particular the Industrial Relations Amendment Bill, the Government is pleased to report that the ILO succeeded in finalizing its review of the Amendment Bill and submitted its Memorandum of Technical Comments in November 2023. Social dialogue discussions relating to the Office's Memorandum of Technical Comments are ongoing at the Labour Advisory Board (LAB). In this regard, the Government has availed itself of the ILO's financial and technical support which has been granted by the Office. A three-day residential meeting of the LAB has already been approved by the officers of the LAB, to be scheduled for 19 to 21 June 2024. The outcome of this process will be provided to the Committee of Experts in 2025.

We therefore appeal to all concerned that Eswatini be given a chance to implement the recommendations made by the national bodies, that is, the Independent Investigation Committee and the National Voluntary Conciliation, as well as those made by the Committee of Experts, and report progress in 2025, as requested by the Committee of Experts. The country has already availed itself of, and is receiving, ILO technical support in this regard.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the Government representative, the Minister of Labour and Social Security, to take the floor.

Government representative – I bring to you, Vice-Chairpersons, and the representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference, warm regards from the Government and people of Eswatini. I also congratulate you on your appointment to chair the work of this Committee.

May I apologize up front that I will be slightly longer in this opening submission, but I have apportioned the time by reducing my last intervention so as to finally be within the total allocated time for my Government.

The last time my Government was called upon to provide information on the Convention to the Committee was during the 105th Session of the International Labour Conference in 2016. It is pleasing to report that most of the recommendations that were made by the Committee have been implemented in full, except for only one which remains pending. All the bills that the Government of Eswatini was requested to amend have been duly amended to be in conformity with the Convention and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

The completed legislative reforms include the following pieces of legislation:

- The Public Order Act of 1963 which has been repealed and replaced by the Public Order Act, No. 12 of 2017.
- The Suppression of Terrorism Act, 2008 has been amended through the Suppression of Terrorism (Amendment) Act, No. 11 of 2017.
- The Prisons Act, No. 40 of 1964 has been repealed and replaced by the Correctional Services Act, No. 13 of 2017. Part XIII of the new Act provides for the right of Correctional Services staff or employees to form staff associations for the purpose of negotiating terms and conditions of service, including wages and hours of work, as well as to represent their members in any proceedings before their employer. As a result of this amendment, on 20 February 2022, the Eswatini Correctional Services Staff Association was duly registered by the Ministry of Labour and Social Security and its name entered into the register of labour market organizations.
- The Civil Service Order No. 16 of 1973 has been repealed and replaced by the Public Service Act No. 5 of 2018.
- A code of good practice for managing industrial and protest actions has been promulgated through Legal Notice No. 202 of 2015 to provide guidelines, procedures and responsibilities for protestors, the police, municipalities, and other relevant stakeholders before, during and after any industrial action or protest action. This was with the sole objective of promoting peaceful industrial and protest actions in the country as per the recommendations of the Committee.

- A code of good practice for managing public gatherings and events has also been promulgated through Legal Notice No. 201 of 2017 to provide guidelines, procedures and responsibilities to conveners, the police, municipalities, and other relevant stakeholders in respect of public gatherings, events, protest actions and strikes held in a public space. This was with a view to ensuring that freedom of association is exercised in an environment that is free of intimidation, promoting peaceful gatherings and protest actions and holding accountable any perpetrators of violence during industrial actions, public gatherings and events, in line with the recommendations of the Committee in 2016.
- The Police Service Act, No. 22 of 2018, repealing the Police Act No. 29 of 1957, has also been passed into law. The Police Service Act contains provisions which promote the exercise of the right to freedom of association without violence against workers, trade unions and employers in that it makes it a disciplinary offence for any police officer to unlawfully use or abuse authority, including making an unlawful, unnecessary, unjustifiable, or unwarranted arrest. This is contained in section 49 of the Act.
- The amendment of section 32 of the Industrial Relations Act to eliminate the discretion of the registrar of organizations when registering trade unions is still ongoing. By resolution of the tripartite Labour Advisory Board (LAB), this amendment process was delayed in order to give room for a comprehensive and holistic review of the whole legislation. This decision was informed by the realization that the Industrial Relations Act No. 1 of 2000 has been amended several times within a relatively short space of time since 2014: this legislation has already been amended four times, something that was observed to be quite anomalous for a piece of legislation that was enacted in the year 2000 and therefore has a lifespan of only 14 years.
- Moreover, the LAB observed that a number of other provisions of this Act needed to be reviewed in the interests of stakeholders, besides section 32. It was, therefore, unanimously decided that instead of continuing with piecemeal reviews of the Act, it was instead advisable to conduct a holistic review of this legislation in order to align it with the latest jurisprudence in labour law and trends in the labour market.
- It is pleasing to report to the Committee that the holistic review process of the Industrial Relations Act was completed by the LAB in October 2022, subsequent to which and by letter dated 24 November 2022, the Bill was submitted to the ILO for expert commentary.
- My Government is pleased to report that the ILO finalized its consideration of the Industrial Relations Amendment Bill and submitted its detailed Memorandum of Technical Comments in November 2023, and the memorandum was tabled before the LAB in its meeting held from 7 to 8 December 2023. Social dialogue discussions on the Office's Memorandum of Technical Comments are ongoing at the LAB. In this regard, we are happy to report to you that the ILO continues to provide financial and technical support to this law reform process. As a result, and through the support of the ILO, a three-day residential meeting of the LAB has already been approved by the officers of the Board to be held from 19 to 21 June 2024. The outcome of this process will be provided to the Committee of Experts in 2025, as requested.
- Lastly, and still in compliance with this Committee's recommendations made in 2016, the Government of Eswatini also warmly arranged and received the direct contacts mission sent by the ILO in April 2017.

Throughout the legislative process of amending and promulgating the above-mentioned laws, the social partners were consulted by the Government in line with the Committee's recommendations of 2016. Moreover, through technical assistance received from the ILO, several workshops were held in the country in 2018 and 2019 with the objective of disseminating the code of good practice for industrial and protest actions, the Public Order Act and the code of good practice on gatherings. Participating in these workshops were the police, union leaders, employers, members of parliament and municipalities, among others.

The need for resuming these workshops has been restated by the recommendations of the Independent Investigation Committee which was appointed to investigate the justification of the action of the police denounced by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in relation to the industrial actions of 2018 and 2019 as detailed in the report of the Independent Investigation Committee. The Independent Investigation Committee, which was appointed through Legal Notice No. 183 of 2019, was chaired by a Principal Magistrate and a panel of experienced labour law practitioners, one of whom is now a judge of the Industrial Court of Eswatini.

The Independent Investigation Committee, appointed at the request of the Committee on Freedom of Association, submitted its final report to the Government on 1 June 2023 and, by letter dated 11 June 2023, the report was transmitted and brought to the attention of the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee on Freedom of Association is yet to examine this report.

In its report, the Independent Investigation Committee made findings that the organizers of gatherings and public protests do not comply with the provisions of the prevailing legal instruments on gatherings and industrial actions and highlighted the compliance gaps. On the basis of these findings, the Independent Investigation Committee therefore proceeded to recommend training for all players involved in organizing public gatherings, including the police, trade union leaders and marshals.

In its lengthy and well-written report, the Independent Investigation Committee made 11 solid recommendations to ensure that freedom of association can be exercised in a climate free of intimidation and without violence against workers, trade unions and employers. These recommendations are due to be taken into account and included in the implementation plan which the Government and the Trade Union Congress of Eswatini (TUCOSWA) have already begun developing under the technical assistance of the ILO.

The Government has already availed itself of, and is currently receiving, ILO technical assistance to implement the outcomes of the National Voluntary Conciliation report that both the Government and TUCOSWA agreed to embark upon in 2022 and finished in September 2023 in an effort to resolve a number of complaints that had been reported by TUCOSWA to the Committee on Freedom of Association. As could be seen from the covering letter to the report of the National Voluntary Conciliation process submitted on 25 September 2023, coupled with the follow-up letter submitted by the Government on 25 January 2024, the Government requested the ILO to provide technical assistance in developing a time-bound implementation plan in order to ensure effective implementation of the outcomes of the National Voluntary Conciliation process.

This request was made in the spirit of paragraph 10, page 31 of the National Voluntary Conciliation report wherein the Government and TUCOSWA agreed that the implementation plan should have a monitoring and evaluation structure. The ILO gladly agreed to provide the requested technical support to the Government in an endeavour to follow up on the reports of the national bodies and the comments of the Committee of Experts adopted when examining the country's article 22 reports in November and December 2023.

In fact, in oral agreements and engagements between the Government and the ILO, the reason for delaying the technical mission to February 2024 was strategically to allow the mission to combine its technical assistance by addressing not only the recommendations of the reports of the Independent Investigation Committee and the National Voluntary Conciliation, but also the comments of the Committee of Experts following its examination of the country's article 22 reports on Conventions Nos 87 and 98.

Therefore, from 22 to 23 February 2024, a first technical mission visited the Kingdom of Eswatini. A mission report prepared by the technical mission, and a table of recommendations were submitted to the Government and TUCOSWA on 2 May 2024. As indicated in the mission report, the technical mission met with the parties to the complaints and several other institutions and stakeholders, from among the Government and the social partners, who would be involved in the implementation plan. A meeting was also held between the mission and the United Nations Resident Coordinator Office to discuss the country's context and the coordinated support to be provided to the Eswatini Government on issues of common interest. Finally, the mission met with myself to report on the mission's findings. The mission report contains a summary table of the outstanding issues, together with observations and details of the timetable for the examination by the ILO supervisory bodies and invites the parties to commit to drawing up a time-bound plan for follow-ups. This document would also serve as a road map for resolving outstanding issues relating to the complaints presented before the Committee on Freedom of Association.

In its report, the mission indicates that it is convinced that the road map of action to follow up on the reports of the national bodies set up in relation to the reported complaints will help the Government and the stakeholders to take ownership of the policy and regulatory reforms. The mission is also of the opinion that the monitoring of progress relating to compliance with ratified international labour standards will enable all stakeholders to have a better grasp of the interlinkage of these reforms with comments made by the ILO supervisory mechanisms, supported by the Office's technical assistance, towards a peaceful and lasting social dialogue, in conformity with universally recognized freedom of association and collective bargaining rights. In view of the magnitude of the tasks and topics that will fall to the Ministry of Labour and Social Security in ensuring a proper follow-up to the road map and in reporting to the ILO supervisory bodies, the mission recommends that the Ministry set up a specific monitoring team, as it would benefit from reinforcements from other relevant institutions in order to carry out its mission successfully.

Having received the mission report on 2 May 2024, the parties were already working on making arrangements to have a meeting where they would jointly go through the mission report, in particular by checking any missing recommendations or outcomes from the reports of the national bodies, as well as populating the last two columns of the draft implementation plan in terms of fixing timelines and expected results, accordingly. Other pressing commitments from both ends could not allow the Government and TUCOSWA to secure time to discuss the first technical mission report before departure to this Conference. Otherwise, earnest attempts were made and having considered all dates in May, both parties mutually considered that it was impossible to secure time before departing for the International Labour Conference. Other dates will obviously be considered immediately after the Conference.

Suffice it to underscore that this is the first technical mission activity, which both the aforementioned parties have understood will be followed by a second technical mission to finalize and validate the implementation plan.

It remains important to recall that both national processes were pitched at the highest level by the Government, as demonstrated by the fact that the Independent Investigation Committee was chaired by a Principal Magistrate, sitting with a panel of experienced industrial relations practitioners, one of whom is now a judge of the Industrial Court. The Government treats the findings of the Independent Investigation Committee in a very serious light and is committed to implementing them fully. In addition, the National Voluntary Conciliation process was chaired by the Judge President of the Industrial Court of Appeal who was selected by the agreement of both parties; sitting with him were two senior Commissioners of the Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration Commission, an independent labour dispute resolution institution in Eswatini, established by Industrial Relations Act, No. 1 of 2000. The Government provided full financial support to the process, catering for all expenses, including those of members of the National Voluntary Conciliation process which was composed of seven officials or representatives from each side.

In the previous two annual meetings of the Southern African Development Community (SADC), Ministers of Labour and Employment and Social Partners, otherwise known as the SADC Employment and Labour Sector (SADC ELS), which is held under the auspices of the SADC (that regional integration structure has a robust agenda where we discuss even the status of implementation of international labour standards among the SADC Member countries), my Government is on record as having demonstrated the highest level of openness to engage with our social partners even at a regional level, by extending an invitation to the Southern Africa Trade Union Coordination Council (SATUCC) on two consecutive occasions, for engagements on the issues that were contained in the SATUCC report as presented to the meeting. We also requested the ILO to assist in ensuring that that meeting take place.

As observed by the ILO technical mission, the relations between the Government and our social partners are very healthy. The massive gains obtained from the optional voluntary conciliation process are evidence of a healthy social partnership. Having already availed ourselves of, and while already receiving, ILO technical assistance, we should be allowed to resolve any emerging issues at a national level as part of the action plan that is being developed to implement the outcomes of the national bodies, coupled with the comments of the Committee of Experts.

On the issues bordering on civil liberties and trade union rights and the issue of alleged harassment in the education sector involving the president of SNAT, I must hasten to state that I am afraid to enter into the merits of these matters, especially the SNAT president disciplinary matter and the Sticks Nkambule matter, because these are still pending in court. Mr Mbongwa Dlamini is challenging his dismissal by the Teaching Service Commission, which was issued in August, last year. Otherwise, the employer has instituted disciplinary proceedings against him based on charges of perennial unauthorized absenteeism. The outcome of this disciplinary process is still being contested by the parties in court and we have been advised that the date set to argue the review application that has been filed by the Teaching Service Commission is 26 June, this year, ten days from now, at the High Court of Eswatini.

The same applies to the Sticks Nkambule matter: he was charged nomino officio for contempt of an order of court issued by the Industrial Court of Appeal on 9 December 2022 under Case No. 398 of 2022, declaring an industrial action he had called with his union for 13 and 14 December 2022 to be unprocedural and therefore unlawful. They violated this order of court by proceeding with the unlawful strike action despite the existence of a valid court order, and the Government instituted contempt of court proceedings against Mr Nkambule and the union. This matter has not been finalized and is still pending in court. Mr Nkambule is legally represented by a competent admitted attorney in the court proceedings. The Government is not aware of the reasons why Mr Nkambule is now in hiding.

For us, our system of law does not allow other forums to adjudicate or commentate on the merits or demerits of a matter that is still pending in court under the principle of sub judice, lest you find yourself to be in contempt of court. It suffices, however, to mention that these two issues in particular have not as yet been officially brought to the attention of the Government by our social partners, as requiring our engagement and resolution, I guess, that is simply because of the same reason that these matters are still pending in court.

As I conclude, allow me to point out that the discussion of Eswatini by this Committee is rather premature in light of the elaborate magnitude of what the Government has done since 2016 and continues to do even at this present moment, in consultation with the social partners, in an effort to improve the implementation of the Convention.

Worker members – This is the 16th time that the Committee has examined the application of the Convention by the Government of Eswatini. Our latest examination was in 2016. Since then, the environment for the exercise of trade union rights in the country has severely deteriorated. In the last three years, in particular, the Government has further increased its repression against workers and has suppressed democratic freedoms and civil liberties. The Workers' group expresses its deep concern at the prevalence of anti-union violence and state repression in Eswatini where trade union leaders and human rights activists are persecuted and murdered.

The Workers' group mourns the death of Thulani Maseko, a human and trade union rights lawyer. From 2012 to 2015, Thulani Maseko defended the rights of TUCOSWA following its deregistration by the Government. Subsequently, he provided legal advice to the Eswatini trade union movement. He was also Chair of the Multi-Stakeholder Forum that represented progressive groups working for democracy in Eswatini following the banning of political parties. Thulani was shot dead in front of his family on 21 January 2023 at his home in Manzini. We recall that, in 2015 and 2016, the Committee discussed the unjust imprisonment of Thulani Maseko, who had been sentenced to a two-year prison term in March 2014 for having criticized the judiciary while acting for TUCOSWA in court. In 2009, Thulani had already been charged with sedition for his May Day speech. Despite the threats and persecution of the authorities, Thulani Maseko continued his fight for democracy and workers' rights through dialogue. Thulani's brutal murder was widely condemned by the global community. Despite calls, including from the SADC governments, for investigations into his death, to date, no arrest has been made. Thulani's family are under surveillance. It appears that Thulani's death was orchestrated by the instigators to have a chilling effect on human and labour rights. Combined with the current repression on trade unions, we are deeply concerned that an environment of fear is taking hold. We call on the Government of Eswatini to take immediate measures to investigate, prosecute and convict the perpetrators and instigators of this crime. Justice must be done for Thulani Maseko's memory and for his family.

The climate for the exercise of labour and trade union rights in Eswatini is dangerous. Persecution, threats and physical attacks of trade unionists are common practice, leaving them no choice but to flee the country. Sticks Nkambule, Secretary-General of the Swaziland Transport, Communication and Allied Workers' Union (SWATCAWU), was forced into exile after being the victim of an assassination attempt on 28 December 2022. The day after, armed police raided his village and harassed his family. His crime was to call for a "job stay-away" to demand better working conditions. The Government did not stop there, on 11 January 2023, his name was published by police as a wanted person for alleged criminal conduct. He now faces a baseless contempt charge, while the staff of the union he belongs to are under constant surveillance by the police who regularly raid their offices.

In January 2023, Mbongwa Dlamini, President of the Swaziland National Association of Teachers (SNAT), was also forced into exile after receiving death threats. Since his election as union president, Mbongwa has been persecuted by the authorities. In April 2022, his home was attacked by security forces with live bullets. Following a call for a strike by his union, the authorities harassed him with misconduct charges, leading to decisions of suspension of pay and transfer. Despite a decision of the Industrial Court dated May 2023, the authorities have still failed to pay him and have appealed the court decision. He has now been dismissed from his duties by his public employer, the Teaching Service Commission.

The Teaching Service Commission is now threatening the Secretary-General of SNAT, Mr Lot Mduduzi Vilakati, for defending the president and SNAT members. In addition, in 2023, the Government stopped the collection and remittance of trade union fees for SNAT members and refused a check-off system for SNAT's newly recruited members, in a bid to reduce the membership of the union below the required threshold so that it can deregister the union.

Civil liberties in Eswatini have been drastically curtailed by the authorities, and workers are prevented from exercising their right to peaceful assembly, a fundamental freedom. Trade union gatherings and protest actions were banned by the Government in October 2021. Despite a court ruling lifting the ban in 2022, the Government of Eswatini continues to prohibit and ruthlessly crack down on gatherings and protests. In July 2023, the Government allegedly relaxed the ban and allowed municipal councils to issue permits for gatherings not exceeding ten people. This excessive limitation is a clear violation of the right of trade unions to organize their activities, as protected by Article 3 of the Convention. We recall that under the Public Order Act, 2017, gatherings of not more than 50 people are permitted without notice requirements, a number which is already extremely low. This new limitation virtually annihilates the capacity of trade unions to organize gatherings. The situation is akin to an undeclared state of emergency.

Furthermore, security forces deployed around the country use brutal force against citizens and workers. More than 80 people are reported to have lost their lives because of the police crackdown on protests demanding democracy and wage increases. In their 2024 comments, the Committee of Experts recalled that the rights of workers' organizations can only develop in a climate free of violence, threats and pressure, and that it is for the Government to guarantee that these rights can be exercised normally. We echo the Committee of Experts' call and urge the Government of Eswatini to take all necessary measures to ensure, in law and practice, that trade unions fully enjoy the right to hold public meetings enshrined in the Convention, and therefore to repeal any text the application of which would considerably limit the possibilities of trade unions to hold large-scale public meetings to defend and advance the rights and interests of their members.

We further note with deep concern the pervasive anti-union climate fostered by the authorities in Eswatini and its stifling impact on the capacity of trade unions to freely function and carry out their activities. In November 2022, armed security forces disrupted a TUCOSWA workshop and confiscated participants' mobile phones and laptops. The teachers' union, SNAT, continues to be the victim of a union-bashing campaign as the State attacks the union, including through disciplinary sanctions against leaders, union members and officers, police surveillance and the vilification of SNAT members in the media.

The Worker members strongly denounce the state repression and escalating physical violence and threats against workers and their representatives and the curtailment of democratic freedoms in the country. We are deeply concerned that the climate of fear and violence maintained by the authorities is aimed at preventing workers and trade unionists from exercising their rights. The Government of Eswatini must put an end to the ongoing intimidation, extrajudicial killings, threats of arrests, raids and unprovoked brutal beatings of workers and trade unionists. We reiterate that workers and trade unions calling for democracy is in line with the legitimate expectations of the Government's obligations under the Convention. We urge the Government to engage in meaningful dialogue with trade unions to address the pressing issues that face the country.

Employer members – This case is about the application in law and in practice of the fundamental Convention No. 87 by Eswatini, which the Government ratified in 1978. This is a long-standing case before the Committee in which the Committee of Experts has made observations 25 times since 1990 and has been discussed by the Committee 15 times since 1996, the last examination being in 2016.

We thank the Government for the written and oral information submitted, which we have noted. The Committee of Experts has made several observations in this case, and I will go through them.

The first observation relates to civil liberties and trade union rights, especially alleged anti-union repression involving serious allegations of persecution and murders of trade unionists and excessive violence against strikers that increased in 2022 and 2023, with allegedly more than 80 people reported to have lost their lives because of police crackdowns on protests demanding democracy and wage increases. In this respect, the Committee of Experts requested the Government to provide copies of court decisions against public transport workers who were charged with assault during the protests, as well as information on the outcome of police investigations into alleged violence by the security forces during protests.

The second observation relates to harassment in the education sector, where the Committee of Experts noted with deep concern the serious allegations of violations of trade union rights in the education sector, in particular against the Swaziland National Association of Teachers (SNAT), including its President, Mr Mbongwa Dlamini, who allegedly faced harassment through dismissal from work, as well as threats to his life. The complaints include allegations of a concerted effort by the Government to undermine and possibly deregister SNAT.

The third observation relates to a ban on trade union gatherings by administrative order. The allegations are that the Ministry of Housing and Urban Development's October 2021 administrative order effectively suspended the laws regulating gatherings by limiting the number of people who may demonstrate or march together to deliver petitions in urban areas and towns. Although the Government countermanded the administrative order by raising the limit of gatherings to ten people, the number still fell short of the permitted 50 people under the terms of the Public Order Act of 2017.

The fourth area of observation relates to police violence against industrial actions. The Committee of Experts took note of the findings of the Independent Investigation Committee into allegations of police violence against peaceful industrial actions made in September 2018 and September 2019. The Investigation Committee had made recommendations including: (i) training of lower-ranked police officers, the union leadership and marshals, and the public at large in trade union rights and the handling of industrial actions; (ii) that both the police and union leadership should commit to upholding the law during industrial actions and develop a culture of cooperation; (iii) that video recording of industrial actions should be considered for review purposes; and (iv) that an independent monitor (whether an individual or an organization) should be involved in the preparation of, and during, the industrial action.

From the Government's written and oral information, the Employer members note the various encouraging developments in this case:

First, the Government and TUCOSWA agreed during 2023 to submit to a national voluntary conciliation process to address the various complaints submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association, which also formed the basis of some of the Committee of Experts' observations on anti-union repression.

Second, the Government requested and is receiving technical assistance from the ILO to address the various concerns and observations. Both the report of the National Voluntary Conciliation process and the report of the Independent Investigation Committee will be considered to generate a time-bound implementation plan, with ILO technical assistance.

Third, the ILO technical mission visited the country in February and delivered its report to the parties on 2 May this year, with a draft action plan.

The Employer members commend both the Government and the trade union federation in their demonstrated cooperation at national level and encourage the Government to continue social dialogue with the social partners to resolve the outstanding concerns.

Where trade union rights, including the right to gather in large numbers to protect or promote the occupational interests of their members, are unduly limited by administrative action, the Employers encourage the Government to remove such administrative action or take appropriate measures to protect such rights.

With regard to the codes of good practice and legislation on protests and industrial action, which aim to ensure proper management of these actions and prevent confrontations and violence between protestors and members of the law enforcement agencies, we encourage the Government, in collaboration with social partners, to disseminate these as part of its capacity-building strategy for all relevant stakeholders. We also encourage the Government to expedite the ongoing police investigations into the violence and deaths that occurred between 2021 and 2023 and to provide all outstanding information to the Committee of Experts as requested in 2025. Finally, we encourage the Government to continue with the ILO technical assistance to finalize all outstanding matters.

Worker member, Eswatini – On behalf of the workers of Eswatini, I concur with the opening statement of our spokesperson. Having faced a series of sustained attacks since 2018, our federation filed a complaint to the Committee on Freedom of Association on 22 March 2022 which is recorded as Case No. 3425. The Committee recommended to the parties to undertake a national voluntary conciliation process.

TUCOSWA reaffirms its belief in dialogue as the only means to resolution of any challenges related to compliance with the international labour standards set out in various ILO Conventions. The Trade Union Congress never hesitated to take the opportunity for a voluntary mediation process as was presented as an option by the Committee on Freedom of Association. The National Voluntary Conciliation process was, however, not smooth sailing and it nearly collapsed, as the Eswatini Water Services, a state-owned enterprise, was refusing to release the Deputy President of the Federation, Mr Nicholas Nkomondze, to attend the voluntary conciliation meetings despite his name being gazetted in a legal notice as part of the Federation's representatives. To date, he is denied release to attend any Federation activities as his employer alleges not to recognize the Federation. The mediation was concluded in July 2023. No resolutions were found on fundamental complaints that threaten the very existence of trade unions and the rights guaranteed by the Convention. The issues are as follows:

The administrative instruction issued by the Minister of Housing and Urban Development on 21 October 2021 prohibiting municipal councils from issuing compliance certificates remains in force. In the administration of that order only three persons were permitted to gather in a public place. During the mediation process, the Minister in a press statement alleged to be relaxing the instructions by communicating that the municipal councils can now permit only ten persons to assemble. On 2 November 2023, the Federation took part in a gathering organized by its affiliate, the Swaziland Democratic Nurses Union, to deliver a petition on the acute shortage of medical drugs in hospitals. The union had followed all the requirements of the Public Order Act and under the terms of the Act the gathering was legal. The police, however, violently dispersed the gathering claiming that the gathered people exceeded the ten prescribed by the Minister. Many workers were injured and hospitalized.

Ms Maureen Nkambule, the then Secretary-General of the Swaziland Electricity Supply, Maintenance and Allied Workers Union (SESMAWU), an energy union organized in a state-owned enterprise, remains dismissed for allegedly allowing herself to be interviewed by the media on matters pertaining to the activities of the union.

Cases of union officials who had long been abandoned by state prosecutors were resuscitated in response to our mediation demand that they be quashed, as they were victimization cases. Mr Mcolisi Ngcamphalala, Deputy Secretary of SNAT, was isolated from a group of people in Manzini city as he was going to a union meeting, arrested and charged with jaywalking.

Mr Kwazi Simelane, a Chairperson of the Federation's Young Workers Forum was seriously assaulted by the police in Manzini for wearing the Federation's beret and was later charged for allegedly singing an inciting song. These cases were not prosecuted for more than two years until revived when they were raised during the mediation. The union officials are, to date, being prosecuted without finalization of their cases.

The President of SNAT, Mr Mbongwa Dlamini, an employee of the Government, remains dismissed notwithstanding court judgments declaring his dismissal null and void.

Officials of the Amalgamated Trade Union of Swaziland (ATUSWA) were assaulted by members of another union favoured by the employer as they were recruiting workers. The police, instead of arresting the perpetrators of the violence, arrested the ATUSWA officials and they went through a prolonged and very costly exercise defending themselves only to be acquitted by the courts in April 2023. Notwithstanding that finding, the perpetrators of the violence were never arrested for their criminal activity.

Over 400 workers who were retrenched by a wood and pulp multinational company were not paid their terminal benefits in accordance with an existent collective agreement, despite numerous parliament select committee resolutions which found that they were unfairly treated. Another parliamentary select committee was established and finished its work in August 2023. Parliament was, however, dissolved in September without having adopted the report.

Ms Xolile Mnisi Sacolo, Chairperson of the Limkokwing branch of the National Workers Union of Higher Institutions (NAWUSHI), was wrongfully dismissed without a hearing after she approached the Industrial Court to intervene on a predetermined disciplinary action clearly targeting her as a union official on claims that she was causing a delay on the hearing, notwithstanding her constitutional right to approach the court for redress on such matters.

The conduct of dismissing trade union officials without affording them an opportunity to be heard has become prevalent. Even in the case of the SNAT President, Mbongwa Dlamini, it was the same: he was dismissed without a hearing.

All the cases were mediated and remain unresolved at the mediation. There are no processes that have been put in place even for resolution in the near future. Any claims that may be designed to insinuate that there are internal processes for their resolution would be misinformation.

Meanwhile, the Secretary-General of SWATCAWU, Mr Sticks Nkambule, is now living in exile in neighbouring countries, following the issuance of a warrant for his arrest. He was individually targeted for a collective decision of his union which had sanctioned an industrial action in defence of the occupational rights and interests of its members.

It is important to state at this stage that there was never a gathering that was convened by the Federation or its affiliates which had not followed the law. The police brutality against public sector workers in October 2022 occurred despite the fact that they were carrying a certificate of compliance issued by the municipal council of Mbabane. This was before the ban which happened in the same month. The workers were brutalized whilst they were inside buses where tear smoke canisters were thrown inside the bus and the workers were beaten and shot at with rubber bullets. They never at any point and stage burned tyres, blocked the roads or engaged in any violent or disorderly act as they were ambushed by the police before they disembarked and were brutalized.

The space for the operation of independent trade unions and the exercise of their rights in Eswatini is generally clouded with fear of reprisal. The numerous incidents, I have mentioned above, and those mentioned by our spokesperson, make it clear to the Committee that our Government is violating the Convention.

Employer member, Eswatini – As I take the floor I do so on behalf of Business Eswatini, which is an apex private sector representative body of employers in the country. Together with their workers under TUCOSWA, Business Eswatini is responsible for over 90 per cent of the private sector contribution to the national gross domestic product. The Government and TUCOSWA have been, and still are, viable and indispensable social partners with whom Business Eswatini have achieved incredible feats.

Not too long ago, the Trade Union Congress and Business Eswatini convened a landmark bipartite jobs summit to dialogue on how we can leverage our partnership in order to expand the footprint of businesses in the country and create the jobs desperately needed by our people. In the same meeting, challenges standing in the way of progress were identified and a formal report prepared and subsequently submitted to the Government for scrutiny. In the same report was an express request for a full tripartite dialogue to advance the resolutions of the bipartite dialogue between labour and the private sector. However, while awaiting the Government's response to the request, Business Eswatini proceeded to convene a fruitful business-to-Government engagement a few weeks ago, the aim of which was also to mitigate issues that stand in the way of attracting investments and creating jobs. I highlight the aforementioned achievements in order to demonstrate to this house that tripartism in Eswatini is still alive and well, and that there is a conducive space for open dialogue and constructive engagement.

There are only two sides to a story precisely because the third is always overlooked. And I appreciate the privilege today to be the third voice that bears witness to these things. Let me say this up front though, on behalf of the employer community in Eswatini, we respectfully request that this Committee consider the substantial progress made by our Government and social partners in upholding the principles of the Convention. To this end, we wish to underscore the following points for your special consideration:

- (1) The context of 2021 and 2022 events: The issues at the core of the complaints today arise mainly from the events of 2021 and 2022, a period marked by unprecedented social unrest and the COVID-19 pandemic. These events conspired to create unprecedented challenges for all social partners in Eswatini, the deleterious effects of which continue to impact us to this day as a business community.
- (2) During the social unrest, the scale of which was unparalleled in the long and peaceful history of the Kingdom, many businesses suffered incalculable losses due, for example, to arson attacks and looting, costing employers millions of US dollars in rebuilding efforts.
- (3) This situation was exacerbated by the prolonged pandemic, during which employers continued to pay salaries despite lockdowns and business closures. During the same period the private sector funded vaccination logistics for private sector employees and, as a result, many lives were saved as workers received the protection they desperately needed.
- (4) Mitigation measures: it took considerable effort from both the Government and social partners to make significant strides. In response to these crises, however, the Government showed its zeal to support affected businesses and workers via various intervention processes, as measures were eventually taken to restore law and order.
- (5) Dialogue mentioned earlier: Business Eswatini and TUCOSWA or, alternatively, workers' and employers' federations, jointly convened the inaugural bipartite dialogue on jobs, which we sense has significantly contributed to the restoration of industrial harmony, at least at enterprise level. The ILO was on the ground to witness this ground-breaking concept of which both federations are still most proud.
- (6) Commitment to constructive dialogue: both the Government and social partners have shown a strong commitment to constructive dialogue to resolve issues by participating in the inaugural voluntary conciliation. Through this process, the social partners have been able to settle a number of issues, including consulting employers on the implementation of recommendations. Business Eswatini acknowledges that there are outstanding issues that were not completely resolved in this process owing to time constraints and other unforeseen exigences or disruptions, but we strongly believe that, from the commitment shown by both parties to date, more time to engage and dialogue will definitely yield positive outcomes.
- (7) Legal reforms: it would be blatantly remiss of Business Eswatini to dispute the Government's commitment to legal reforms, in collaboration with the social partners. We have seen the implementation of the decent work priorities for Eswatini which were agreed upon in tripartite forums. These include important legislation, such as the Industrial Relations Amendment Bill of 2022, the Employment Bill of 2023, the Occupational Safety and Health Policy of 2023, and other ongoing reforms, all of which bear the fingerprints of active participation by all social partners.
- (8) Utilization of ILO technical assistance: As the Minister has said, the Government has utilized the ILO's technical assistance and is making credible efforts in addressing issues identified by the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association, with a clear road map and an implementation plan in place.

In light of the above, as I conclude, we therefore believe without an inkling of a doubt that the ongoing efforts, and particularly the commitment demonstrated by all stakeholders in Eswatini, deserve recognition and support. It is on these grounds that I, on behalf of Business Eswatini, hereby move that we allow for progress to continue uninterrupted – but only expeditiously this time around, without the additional pressure of international scrutiny, whose peripheral ramifications could potentially attract unintended consequences on economic development and the country's external trade relations.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Government member, Angola – The Government of the Republic of Angola, on behalf of all Southern African Development Community (SADC) Member States, and in its capacity as the Chairperson of the SADC employment and labour sector, takes note of the issues brought to the attention of the Committee concerning the application by the Kingdom of Eswatini of the Convention.

As the Committee is aware, the SADC has a very vibrant and robust tripartite structure within which governments and social partners deliberate on a range of employment and labour issues, including the implementation of international labour standards at country level. We are pleased to inform the Committee that this mechanism has consistently been utilized to deliberate on all issues of interest to our tripartite constituents, including finding solutions to contentious issues.

In this context, during the SADC Ministers of Employment and Labour and Social Partners meeting held in March 2024 in the Republic of Angola, the Government of the Kingdom of Eswatini informed the tripartite constituents of the steps being taken through dialogue at the country level to address various issues of concern to workers relating to the Convention. The Government also made a commitment to work very closely with the regional trade union organization in the SADC, the Southern Africa Trade Union Coordination Council (SATUCC, to address these issues.

We are very encouraged by the Kingdom of Eswatini's response to the Committee. It has reiterated its continuing willingness to receive technical assistance from the ILO and to work with the ILO supervisory bodies to fully meet its obligations under the Convention.

We urge the Committee, therefore, to recognize the commitment and strides made by the Kingdom of Eswatini and hereby request the Office to continue strengthening the capacity of the constituents in the country and at the regional level to resolve any outstanding issues of concern through social dialogue.

Government member, Belgium – I have the honour to speak on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States. The candidate countries Albania, Montenegro, North Macedonia, the Republic of Moldova and Ukraine and the European Free Trade Association country Norway, member of the European Economic Area, align themselves with this statement.

The EU and its Member States are committed to the respect, protection and fulfilment of human rights, including labour rights. We promote universal ratification and effective implementation of fundamental ILO Conventions and support the ILO in developing and promoting international labour standards and supervising their application.

We are deeply concerned about the serious allegations regarding the deteriorating state of trade union rights, the excessive violence of the police forces against gatherings and marches organized by trade unions, the persecution, harassment and death threats against union leaders, and the murder in January 2023 of Mr Thulani Maseko, a human rights and trade union rights defender. We recall that the rights of workers' and employers' organizations can only be exercised in a climate free of violence, threats and pressure. We underline the importance of investigations and appropriate convictions in order to combat impunity and we ask the Government to report on these issues. We echo the request of the Committee of Experts to the Government to provide copies of the court decisions against the five public transport workers charged with assault, as well as information on the outcome of the police investigations.

We also note with deep concern the serious allegations of violations of trade union rights in the education sector. Alongside the Committee of Experts, we request the Government to provide comments about the acts, denounced by trade unions, of anti-union discrimination, harassment and death threats towards Mr Mbongwa Dlamini, President of SNAT, now in hiding outside of Eswatini, and the threats against the Secretary-General, Mr Lot Mduduzi Vilakati.

We note that the alleged Government actions to weaken SNAT are understood by the trade unions as leading to increased intimidation, a decrease in SNAT membership, an increase in conflicts and grievances in schools, incapacitated leadership leading to a fear of assuming union positions, and low turnout in union activities. Therefore, we urge the Government to indicate any measures taken to enable SNAT to develop its activities in the education sector without threats against its leadership or interference and to provide information about the present status of Mr Mbongwa Dlamini.

We are concerned about the information from trade unions on suspension of the laws regulating gatherings by an administrative order of October 2021 of the Ministry of Housing and Urban Development, which extended the ban on demonstrations, marches and petition deliveries and we regret that trade union gatherings remain banned in Eswatini. We urge the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure, in law and in practice, that representative organizations fully enjoy the right to hold public meetings, and therefore to repeal any text limiting considerably the possibilities of representative organizations to hold large-scale public meetings.

We welcome the ILO technical assistance provided to the Government regarding police violence against industrial actions. While we acknowledge the tangible measures taken by the Government in 2022 and 2023, we expect the Government to take additional measures without delay, in consultation with the social partners, for the dissemination of codes of good practice so that trade union rights to engage in protest and industrial action are indeed protected, both in law and practice. We encourage further technical assistance from the ILO in this regard.

We request the Government to report fully on the progress made and to provide information on violations identified and penalties imposed regarding disciplinary action against abuse of power by members of the police.

We note that a first technical mission took place in February 2024 and we encourage the Government to further engage with the ILO in order to address all the outstanding issues regarding freedom of association. The EU and its Member States will continue to closely monitor the situation in Eswatini.

Government member, Canada – I am speaking on behalf of Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. We thank the Government of Eswatini for the recent information provided on the implementation of the Convention. We have been deeply concerned about reports of the deteriorating state of trade union rights and allegations of violence during gatherings and marches organized by trade unions. We were profoundly saddened by the loss of life of at least 43, and possibly more than 70 individuals, involved during civil unrest in 2021 and 2022, including members of the trade union movement, and remain concerned that the deaths of most of those killed during this period are unresolved to this day. We were likewise shocked by the assassination of Mr Thulani Maseko, an advocate of peaceful engagement and protest. We are dismayed that no arrest in connection with the murder of Mr Maseko has been made to date, and we trust that the investigations currently under way are comprehensive, transparent and objective and will be concluded expeditiously. We are nevertheless encouraged by the Government's substantive recent cooperation with the ILO to address the past and present observations of the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association, including through technical assistance and several missions, and the recent development of a road map. We will give the road map our thorough consideration as soon as it becomes available.

To realize fully the recommendations of the Committee of Experts, as well as Eswatini's Independent Investigation Committee and National Voluntary Conciliation, we encourage the Government of Eswatini to develop further its engagement and dialogue with social partners, and continue its close collaboration with the Office, including by availing itself of additional technical assistance, in order to promote the trust and cooperation that will most effectively serve the interests of Eswatini.

We welcome the fact that the Government has already committed to supply information concerning several outstanding issues to the Committee of Experts in 2025. We sincerely hope that the Government's next report to the Committee of Experts will not only highlight the progress made in resolving long-standing disputes but also identify further steps to ensure that all workers and employers across the Kingdom of Eswatini may exercise the rights accorded to them under the Convention.

Government member, Zambia – As the Zambian Government is taking the floor for the first time since you started presiding over the affairs of this Committee, I wish to join the previous speakers in congratulating you on your election as Chairperson of this Committee that undoubtedly forms the bedrock of the effective regulatory mechanism for international labour standards. Zambia also wishes to extend its warmest regard to the entire Office.

The Government of the Republic of Zambia undoubtedly appreciates the fundamental role that the Committee of Experts continues to play in formulating its annual report which ultimately forms the basis for the sittings of this Committee. To that end, Zambia notes the information supplied by the Kingdom of Eswatini relating to the various observations and recommendations of the Committee of Experts on the Convention.

Zambia has also noted that the Kingdom of Eswatini had availed itself of, and is receiving, technical assistance from the ILO to address the recommendations contained in the report of the Independent Investigation Committee. Zambia has equally observed that the report of the Independent Investigation Committee, which was appointed to investigate the justification for the action of the police denounced by ITUC in relation to the industrial actions of 2018 and 2019, has not been examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association.

However, Zambia applauds the commitment by the Kingdom of Eswatini to develop, with the assistance of the ILO, a time-bound implementation plan aimed at ensuring effective implementation of the outcomes of the National Voluntary Conciliation process.

In essence, the efforts being made by Eswatini underscore its commitment towards upholding tripartism to enhance the protection of workers while acknowledging that there is scope to progressively resolve the challenges on implementation of ratified Conventions through home-grown solutions.

In conclusion, Zambia salutes these efforts and implores the ILO to continue to avail itself of the support requested in this regard.

Worker member, Nigeria – I take the floor to inform the Committee how the Public Order Act of 2017 is used to infringe trade union rights in Eswatini and that it should be reformed, as the Committee has agreed and concluded several times in the discussion of Eswatini.

The Public Order Act, 2017, is an Act which regulates the conduct of gatherings and is applied in a manner that impairs the exercise of rights guaranteed by the Convention. The Act purports to generally guarantee the right to assembly. However, it takes away, through various limitations, the exercise of that right. I will give an example. Section 3(1) guarantees the right of persons to gather. However, section 3(2) prohibits a gathering in any building in which a national or local representative organ of State is situated or within a 100-meter radius of such a building, unless written permission has been obtained from a Principal Magistrate. A national or local representative organ of State is not defined: it is left to the discretion of the police.

The National Commissioner of Police and the municipal councils command arbitrary powers to disallow public gatherings under the veil that the workers and people's gathering will compromise peace, order and security.

Under section 9(2) of the Act; the Commissioner of Police is given the powers to prohibit an intended gathering, whether or not such a gathering is in compliance with this Act, if the National Commissioner has reason to believe that the gathering will endanger the maintenance of public order and public safety. This is the provision most often used by the police to prohibit trade union gatherings, as the police would not even give the reasons for their belief that public order and safety would be compromised, as they would claim that issues of security are not for public consumption and not subject to discussion.

Despite the fact that section 9(9) requires the police to provide reasons for their prohibition of a gathering, this has never happened since the enactment of the Act in 2017. All the prohibitions of gatherings were carried out arbitrarily, with impunity and most unfortunately with violence to the always peacefully gathered workers.

In our country, Nigeria, any known entity, including trade unions, that wants to organize a civil gathering, simply has to inform the relevant agencies, including the police, who are required to provide security to protect the crowd and the process. Of course, this situation in Nigeria was won through sustained dialogue and demand for reform to rid the country of colonial and autocratic rules and practices that gag and undermine citizens' participation in democracy and governance. We urge the Eswatini Government to genuinely commit to the reform of the Public Order Act 2017.

Government member, Mozambique – It is our understanding that the Government of the Kingdom of Eswatini has already been requested by the Committee of Experts to report out of cycle in respect of this Convention, with the expectation of submitting responses to the Committee's comments in 2025. The Government is committed to providing this information within the stipulated deadline, which shows the Government's commitment to fulfilling its obligations in this regard.

The report of the Independent Investigation Committee on the police action denounced by ITUC regarding industrial actions has not yet been examined. It would be reasonable to wait for its analysis to allow us to reach firm conclusions about the situation in the Kingdom of Eswatini. Even before that, the Government and TUCOSWA are committed to include the recommendations of that report into the implementation plan that is being developed to implement the outcomes of the National Voluntary Conciliation report.

According to the information provided, the Government has already availed itself of, and is receiving, technical assistance from the ILO to implement the recommendations of the Independent Investigation Committee and the National Voluntary Conciliation process by developing an implementation plan with defined deadlines. The ILO's first technical mission took place from 22 to 23 February 2024, resulting in an initial technical mission report and a table of recommendations delivered to the Government and TUCOSWA on 2 May 2024.

The Government and TUCOSWA show that they are committed to discussing the report of the technical mission after the Conference, leading us to understand that the steps taken by the Kingdom of Eswatini go towards openness and commitment in fulfilling their obligations.

Furthermore, the Kingdom of Eswatini at the level of the SADC region demonstrates the opening of social dialogue with the Southern Africa Trade Union Coordination Council (SATUCC) on labour issues and their commitment to the implementation of international labour standards.

Finally, we understand that the Kingdom of Eswatini is committed to continuing to work with the ILO and all social partners to implement the recommendations made by national bodies and the Committee of Experts, whose progress will be reported in 2025, as was made known to us.

Worker member, Costa Rica – The case concerns violations of Convention No. 87 in Eswatini, which as we know is one of the fundamental Conventions of the ILO, establishing fundamental rights and principles, which are minimum values applicable and enforceable for all countries regardless of their level of development.

The Committee of Experts has previously reported on this case, including observations by ITUC, TUCOSWA and global unions, denouncing the use of various forms of violence by the Eswatini security forces against peaceful trade union protests in 2018 and 2019, including threats, arrests, beatings, shootings, intimidation of trade union leaders and the refusal of enterprises to recognize trade union activity.

The detail of the cases of violence is truly overwhelming.

Previous reports indicate that the Government has set up an Investigation Committee to address the situation of police violence, and has developed specific regulations to reduce violence by the police force.

However, the current report of the Committee of Experts reiterates the many observations received from national and international trade union organizations, which highlight the alarming increase in violence and repression against various trade union leaders and demonstrators.

Worryingly, they indicate that between 2022 and 2023, police repression led to the deaths of more than 80 people during protests demanding democracy and better wages.

The report refers to the murder of Mr Thulani Maseko, a human rights and trade union lawyer, who was brutally shot dead on 23 January 2023 at his home. To date, no one has been arrested in connection with his murder, thus highlighting a high degree of impunity.

Other trade union leaders have also been intimidated through death threats and harassment, including Mr Mbongwa Dlamini, President of SNAT.

Most alarmingly, however, the Government's response to the serious acts of violence mentioned is that they were in response to riots and looting that have reportedly been ongoing since June 2021. According to the Government, the police used the minimum amount of force necessary to restore order during the protests.

The seriousness is such that it affects the rule of law and basic human rights guarantees. This is a case of extreme and serious violations of the Convention and of human rights in general by the Government of Eswatini. In conclusion, it is hard to imagine in this Committee a case of such disregard for human and trade union rights, and urgent measures are required to prevent this truly chaotic situation from continuing.

Government member, Malawi – Malawi has taken note of the information provided by the Kingdom of Eswatini on the efforts being made regarding the implementation of the provisions of the Convention. We note the tremendous efforts by the Kingdom of Eswatini relating to legal reforms and the voluntary reconciliation process aimed at resolving the issues at hand, after the appearance in the Committee on the same Convention in 2016.

Malawi would like to applaud the ILO for providing technical assistance to Eswatini to ensure that the recommendations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association and the 2016 conclusions of the case made by this Committee are implemented.

However, we feel that the Kingdom of Eswatini and its social partners should have been given adequate time following the submission of the mission report in May 2024 to implement the recommendations made through the time-bound road map.

Worker member, Ghana – I take the floor to address the grave violations of human and trade union rights in Eswatini, with a Government that has been systematically dismantling the Convention. The persecution and excessive violence against unionists and activists have reached a critical level, particularly in the years 2018 to 2023. It is reported that more than 80 individuals have lost their lives due to police crackdowns on protests demanding democracy and fair wages.

What I see in this matter is an entrenched systematic culture of violence and impunity promoted by the Government of Eswatini. I say this because this is not the first or second time that Eswatini has appeared before the Committee. The records of the Committee show that this is the 16th time Eswatini is under discussion for the same Convention.

This Committee is not the only one that has been making interventions: several governments, human rights organizations and the SADC's Extra-Ordinary Organ Troika Summit of Heads of State and Government on 31 January 2023 condemned all killings and damage to property in the Kingdom of Eswatini and urged the Government of the Kingdom of Eswatini to urgently initiate the process of the national dialogue and urged all stakeholders in the Kingdom of Eswatini to remain calm and participate peacefully in the national dialogue. We have not heard of any meaningful dialogue so far.

The African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights, in its resolution of 11 June 2023, "calls on the Government of the Kingdom of Eswatini to refrain from any form of victimization, harassment, intimidation and targeting of human rights defenders, political parties, protesters, pro-democracy leaders and campaigners through the arbitrary use of the police and security forces".

The Government has attempted to justify its actions by claiming that the protests were not peaceful, citing incidents of looting and arson. However, these justifications fly in the face of the overwhelming evidence of disproportionate and brutal responses by state forces. The so-called "minimum force" applied has resulted in the loss of lives and severe injuries, far beyond what can be considered justifiable.

In conclusion, I passionately implore the Committee to hold the Government of Eswatini accountable and ensure that it adheres to its international obligations under the Convention. I hope that this is the last time we will have an Eswatini case on the Committee and hope to see a democratic and prosperous Eswatini.

Government member, Namibia – My delegation has taken note of the Committee’s report and information provided by the Government of Eswatini. The Government’s commitment to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee of 2016 is noted. To this end, most of the recommendations of the Committee have been implemented and resulted in the amendment of several pieces of legislation to conform with both Conventions Nos 87 and 98.

The Memorandum of Technical Comments was submitted towards the end of 2023 by the ILO on the Industrial Relations Amendment Bill. The Government of Eswatini, through its social dialogue institution, namely the Labour Advisory Board, has commenced discussions on the ILO Memorandum of Technical Comments. We have confidence that the outcome in this regard will be communicated to the Committee of Experts within the deadline provided for by the Committee.

As part of its effort to ensure that trade unions render service to their members, the Government accorded preferential treatment to the public sector union, namely SNAT, for its Executive Secretary to be seconded on a full-time basis in the office of the union for the duration of his or her term.

The incidents that occurred from June 2021 to 2023 resulted in the brutal killing of civilians, a senior prince from the royal family, police officers, and traditional leaders, including Mr Thulani Maseko, a human rights lawyer. We commend the Government’s determination to ensure ongoing credible and transparent investigations and that arrests are continuing to be made of the perpetrators.

In conclusion, Namibia appreciates the continuing efforts and concrete measures made by the Government to implement the recommendations of the Independent Investigation Committee and the National Voluntary Conciliation report and trusts that the Government of Eswatini will provide a progress report to the Committee of Experts in 2025.

Interpretation from German: Worker member, Germany – I speak for the German trade unions. Our colleague, Thulani Maseko, was killed. He was a lawyer who worked actively for the rule of law and democracy. He defended TUCOSWA against the State when the registration was withdrawn by the authorities. When he was killed, he was a Chairperson of the Multi-Stakeholder Forum, which sought to set itself the task of common discourse for positive change in Eswatini. On 21 January 2023, Thulani Maseko was brutally killed. He was shot in his very own house right in front of his wife and children. In the hours before the death, the King of Eswatini declared, and I quote, that “critics should not complain if mercenaries then killed them”. The African Union, the SADC, the European Parliament, and the High Commissioner for Human Rights of the United Nations all together vehemently condemned the cowardly killing of Thulani Maseko, and the death has still not been clarified today. To date, no one has been brought to justice. Quite the opposite has happened. His widow, Tanele Maseko, is being defamed and harassed by the state authorities. The killing of Thulani Maseko is a clear example of the wave of state violence; it is a case of the daily violence. In the last two years, more than 80 people have been the victims of brutal crackdowns by the police, and only because they fought for democracy and living wages for their colleagues. Particularly horrific on this note was the attack against a bus of activists with tear gas. Those who sought to escape were shot with live ammunition. Countless trade unionists have had to leave the country and, to date, live in exile. Trade union rights are human rights. Those who fight for legitimate wages should never be met with violence. The Committee of Experts explicitly states in its report that a climate free of violence and threats and pressure – this is a prerequisite for the Convention and social dialogue.

We call on the Government of Eswatini to stop violations of the right of workers to organize. There must be an end to the violence and the repression. Furthermore, we call on the Government to conduct an independent, transparent investigation into the murder of Thulani Maseko. And finally, we ask that the Government seriously undertake dialogue with the various social partners in Eswatini to create a peaceful climate and find common solutions.

Government member, Zimbabwe – We align ourselves with the statement delivered by Angola on behalf of the SADC. Zimbabwe has followed the discussion on the application of the Convention by the Kingdom of Eswatini. We take note of the information provided by the Government and the submissions of both the Employers and Workers that have been made today. Zimbabwe welcomes the progress that has been reported and would like to encourage the continuation of sustainable dialogue in respect of areas that still need to be addressed. This is in view of the fact that the SADC, Ministers of Employment and Labour Sector (ELS) and the social partners received an update on the case of Eswatini in respect of its application of the Convention at its annual meeting in April this year, held in Lubango, Angola. The SADC ELS urged the tripartite partners to continue working together for the resolution of outstanding issues, with the engagement of the regional body of workers, the Southern Africa Trade Union Coordination Council (SATUCC). At the same meeting, ministers and social partners noted that SATUCC is committed to continue working with governments and employers' organizations and it is in this same spirit that we encourage the continuation of social dialogue.

It is Zimbabwe's considered view that the tripartite partners should be afforded an opportunity to implement the outstanding issues that have been raised by the ILO supervisory bodies. We take note of the development of a road map for the implementation of these recommendations and call on the ILO to deepen its support to Eswatini. The tripartite partners should be allowed time to engage and collectively work on solutions to the challenges being faced.

Worker member, United Kingdom – I also speak on behalf of Dutch trade unions. Going back through the comments on Eswatini of both the Committee of Experts and this Committee over the years, I reached 2014 before I found one that did not express concern over violence against trade unionists. Five times since then, including this year, violent repression of trade union activities has been at the heart of Eswatini's egregious failures on the Convention. And, with deep concern, I note the situation is getting worse, not better.

In 2015 the Committee called for the release from prison of Thulani Maseko, a lawyer for the Eswatini trade union congress, TUCOSWA. Those of us who believe firmly in the positive influence of the Committee can only be dismayed by the news in this year's report of his horrific murder in 2023 and the lack of any prosecution. Mr Maseko was not alone. For example, police violently dispersed a peaceful protest at Luyengo, and in the process shot and killed Mr Sabelo Dlamini, leading to questions in the Parliament of the United Kingdom as to whether Eswatini was fit to be a member of the Commonwealth.

Torture and brutality are likewise tools of the State. As we have heard, police shot tear-gas canisters into a bus carrying workers to a protest, forcing the workers to jump out the windows to escape the gas, a hazardous process compounded by the police shooting at them with rubber bullets and hitting them with batons as they did so. Workers from the agricultural union SAPAWU, also heading to a protest, had their bus waylaid by army personnel, and were forced to drive to a secluded area where the 50 workers were then viciously beaten with sticks and sjamboks – a kind of heavy leather whip. As they were brutalized, they were forced to denounce their own trade union federation.

In 2021, following a Government attempt to stop the union gathering to deliver petitions to the Prime Minister, the Chair of TUCOSWA's youth federation was assaulted in public by the police for wearing a union t-shirt, leaving him hospitalized. The police later charged him for, according to reports, singing an inciting song.

As one goes further back in the Committee records, the Committee of Experts' concerns about violence resume. It is a persistent and appalling reflex by an authoritarian State by which the very existence of independent trade unions appears to be treated as an affront to be violently challenged. But as the 2012 report notes, the "rights of workers' and employers' organizations can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations."

Eswatini has been falling woefully short of this standard for years and seems as far away from compliance as it has ever been. I hope the Committee can finally convince the authorities to take their responsibilities seriously as members of this house and act in both law and practice to free trade unionists from the threat of violence.

Government member, United States of America – We thank the Government of Eswatini for providing additional information to this Committee in response to the recent observations of the Committee of Experts.

The United States is deeply concerned by the reports of violence, persecution, harassment and death threats against independent trade unionists. We are particularly concerned by the excessive use of force against gatherings and marches organized by trade unions, and we reiterate our call for transparent investigations into the 2023 killing of Mr Thulani Maseko, a human rights and trade union rights defender. We regrettably note Government inaction in cases where investigations concluded abuse against trade unionists.

We urge the Government to ensure that authorities charged with maintaining law and order receive adequate instructions on the proportional use of force to manage public gatherings. We also urge the Government to conduct investigations on reported trade union violence in an independent and credible manner.

We acknowledge the tangible measures taken by the Government in 2022 and 2023 to investigate the matters previously raised by the unions and to seek corrective measures. We particularly note the creation of the National Voluntary Conciliation process that was adopted by the Government and TUCOSWA, and the ongoing ILO technical assistance. We urge the Government to engage with the ILO and to fully implement the recommendations made by the ILO technical mission.

The United States remains committed to engaging with the Government to advance workers' rights in Eswatini.

Worker member, Senegal – I am speaking on behalf of the workers of West Africa. We commend the quality and relevance of the work of the Committee of Experts. We have also noted the replies of the Government of Eswatini. However, we express our bitterness and deep concern about the deteriorating situation of trade union rights in Eswatini, particularly with regard to freedom of association.

We have noted several cases of violations of freedom of association and, unfortunately, the Government has not taken any tangible or appropriate measures to remedy this troubling situation. On the contrary, measures are regularly taken to weaken the trade union movement. Some examples include:

- the increase in cases of excessive persecution and violence against trade union officials;
- impeding the exercise of freedom of association by refusing to admit new members recruited by SNAT;
- the dismissal of Mbongwa Dlamini, President of SNAT, from his teaching post;
- the forced exile of Sticks Nkambule, Secretary-General of SWATCAWU;
- On 30 August 2023, tear-gas canisters and rubber bullets were fired at a peaceful gathering of a number of members of the Swaziland Nurses Association, who were calling for high-quality public healthcare.

This violence is compounded by smear campaigns against trade unions and bans on trade union and civil society demonstrations. The situation with regard to trade union rights is of great concern and requires urgent and tangible measures. We urge the Government of Eswatini to respect, in law and practice, the obligations arising from the ratification of this Convention, in particular by:

- ending persecution and violence against trade union leaders and their members;
- recognizing in practice the freedom of workers to join the trade union of their own choosing;
- reinstating members removed from union registers;
- authorizing trade union demonstrations;
- respecting and protecting freedom of expression and association; and
- establishing genuine social dialogue with the social partners to promote peace, social harmony and socio-economic development.

Government member, Cameroon – Cameroon notes the Committee of Experts' report, particularly the comments made on the case of Eswatini concerning the application of the Convention.

The Government of Eswatini has taken a number of conciliation and appeasement measures with the national trade union organizations. A National Voluntary Conciliation process, agreed on 15 September 2023 by the Government and TUCOSWA, has been established and is under way. The Government has requested, and is already receiving, ILO technical assistance to implement the recommendations contained in the report of the Independent Investigation Committee set up to examine the justification for the police action denounced by ITUC in relation to the industrial actions of 2018 and 2019 and to implement the recommendations contained in the report of the National Voluntary Conciliation committee, which the Government and TUCOSWA agreed to implement last year with the aim of resolving a number of complaints made to the Committee on Freedom of Association by TUCOSWA.

The ILO's technical assistance involves the preparation of a time-bound implementation plan. This plan is steered by a monitoring and evaluation mechanism, and is intended to ensure the implementation of the recommendations of the National Voluntary Conciliation process and to follow up on the reports of the national bodies and the comments of the Committee of Experts adopted during the examination, in November 2023, of the country's reports under article 22. The Government's commitment and spirit of conciliation are to be commended.

A technical mission comprising four ILO experts visited the Kingdom of Eswatini in February 2024 and produced a report with a table of recommendations which was submitted to the Government and TUCOSWA on 2 May 2024. In its report, the mission indicates that it is convinced that the road map for the follow-up of the national bodies' reports, drawn up in relation to the submitted complaints, will be useful to the Government and stakeholders in taking ownership of the policy and regulatory reforms. The mission is also of the opinion that monitoring progress in compliance with ratified international labour standards will enable all stakeholders to better understand the links between these reforms and the comments made by the ILO's supervisory mechanisms.

A second technical mission is planned, involving a broader participatory approach. The Government takes into account the findings of the Independent Investigation Committee and is committed to their full implementation. Furthermore, the National Voluntary Conciliation process is chaired by a senior judge of the Industrial Court of Appeal, who was selected by mutual agreement of the parties. The Kingdom has requested and is already benefiting from ILO technical assistance. In this regard, the ILO would like to ensure that social dialogue is safeguarded through continued mediation between the parties.

Cameroon appreciates the Government's commitment to social justice and invites all parties concerned to give Eswatini the opportunity to implement the recommendations made by the national authorities.

Worker member, Norway – I am speaking on behalf of the trade unions in the Nordic countries. The report from the Committee of Experts once again raises strong criticism of the authorities in Eswatini. This is in line with the convincing and severe facts presented by many other credible sources and institutions on workers' rights in the country.

I find it appropriate to mention that, in the annual ITUC Global Rights Index of 2023, Eswatini was categorized as one of the world's worst countries in terms of workers' rights. On Wednesday, the ITUC report for 2024 will be released, and it will not be surprising if Eswatini is once again high on the list of countries with serious violations of fundamental rights for workers. The report of the Committee of Experts provides a detailed review of grave violations of the Convention. We find it extremely worrying that trade union activists have been killed. This is simply unacceptable. We all have a responsibility to act.

From the Nordic side, we would like to highlight the challenges facing women who are engaged in trade union work. Women involved in trade union work experience high levels of violence and other forms of intimidation and threats. This requires an immediate and effective response by the Government. We demand that the Government place the issue high up on their agenda in deeds, not just words, and provide sufficient resources to implement laws and policies that seek to guarantee the safety of women engaged in union activities. We also encourage the authorities in Eswatini to seek inspiration from other countries where gender-balanced and well-functioning tripartite cooperation contributes to economic prosperity and social security for all.

Our call is clear. We appeal for an immediate end to all forms of repression against trade union leaders, men and women alike. We ask that the authorities immediately respect the ILO's Conventions. And we demand that the authorities contribute to the protection of all the brave women involved in trade union work in Eswatini.

Worker member, Botswana – I am speaking on behalf of the workers in Botswana (the Botswana Federation of Trade Unions (BFTU) and the Botswana Federation of Public, Private & Parastatal Sector Unions (BOFEPUSU)). As the report of the Committee of Experts states, the events unfolding in Eswatini have been noted with great concern. For us as the workers of Botswana, we have noted and observed these events with great sadness. Any State that calls itself a democratic State must guarantee its citizens an environment that respects human rights, fundamental freedoms and in which the will of the people is freely exercised. This, unfortunately, is not what we see in Eswatini. The continued repression of workers' rights to associate and express themselves is a cause for concern. The persecution and murders of trade unionists and the excessive violence against strikers that increased in 2022 and 2023, with allegedly more than 80 people reported to have lost their lives because of police crackdowns on protests that demanded democracy and wage increases can never and should never be left unchallenged.

We can never speak of democracy and leave out justice, as it is a key principle in a democratic society. The brutal killing of Thulani Maseko, where to date no arrest has been made, is a clear example of a lack of justice in society. There is no justice for Thulani Maseko as a victim of murder and, most importantly, there is no justice for his wife who remains with the trauma and no closure. Justice for Thulani is what we must demand and we hereby do so, from the Government of Eswatini. And this justice, we couple it with the demand for accountability.

The ILO Committee on Freedom of Association has held on many occasions that a system of democracy is fundamental for the free exercise of trade union rights. Furthermore, the Committee emphasized the importance of the principle affirmed in 1970 by the International Conference in its resolution concerning trade union rights and their relation to civil liberties, which recognizes that the rights conferred upon workers' and employers' organizations must be based on respect for those civil liberties which have been enunciated in particular in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and that the absence of these civil liberties removes all meaning from the concept of trade union rights. It cannot be correct and acceptable that in a democratic society, in the twenty-first century, there could be people in exile for fear of arrest just for having divergent views with the ruling elite.

We call on the Government of Eswatini to guarantee and restore the rights of workers in that country, allow them the freedom to associate and, most profoundly, allow them to respectfully have divergent views from those of their Government where such arises. That is what democracy is all about and that is how social justice can be achieved.

Observer, International Transport Workers' Federation (ITF) – I was sitting just a few rows behind from here when the Committee examined this case in 2015. I can still remember the impassioned plea to our Committee by Thulani Maseko's wife calling for the release of her husband, the renowned trade union and human rights lawyer, who had been sentenced to a two-year prison term simply for having criticized the injustice a worker had faced through the judiciary. That year, the Committee unambiguously called on the Government to unconditionally release Mr Maseko who had merely exercised his rights to freedom of speech and expression. Mr Maseko was subsequently released, but only after he completed his entire sentence. Chairperson, as you have already heard, Mr Maseko is no more. He was brutally shot at his home last year. As we mourn Mr Maseko's death, it is our duty to continue his fight for the protection of the right to freedom of association in Eswatini.

On 12 and 13 December 2022, the ITF-affiliated SWATCAWU called a "job stay-away", with demands to improve working conditions and the release of jailed political leaders. A few weeks later, on 28 December 2022, Mr Sticks Nkambule, the Secretary-General of the union survived an assassination attempt. No perpetrators have yet been identified. On 29 December 2022, a team of heavily armed state forces led a militia-style raid on his home and village, but Mr Nkambule was able to evade the ambush, and has been forced to remain in exile since. These are the reasons he was forced to flee. On 11 January 2023, Mr Nkambule was declared a “wanted person” in a spurious contempt of court charge. Since his forced exile, the SWATCAWU union office has come under constant surveillance. Armed police regularly enter the premises.

We have also received reports of state security personnel entering bus terminals with a view to conducting surveillance on trade union members. This is no way for trade unionists to conduct their activities in full freedom.

Just as the previous speaker did, I also have to recall the International Labour Conference resolution from 54 years ago. Indeed, the absence of these civil liberties removes all meaning from the concept of trade union rights protected under the Convention.

The Government of Eswatini must refrain from the violent treatment and harassment, including judicial harassment, of trade unionists. The Government must release, quash convictions and drop all charges against individuals, including Mr Nkambule, for having exercised legitimate trade union activities.

Observer, Education International (EI) – I am speaking on behalf of SNAT. The President of SNAT, Mr Mbongwa Dlamini, whose name has already been mentioned a number of times, should have been speaking here this evening. Unfortunately, despite submitting a request at the beginning of May, he was not granted a visa to come and explain to the Committee the plan to destroy SNAT, a democratic trade union. The anti-union harassment of Mbongwa Dlamini and Secretary-General Lot Vilakati is widely mentioned in the Committee of Experts’ report. Mbongwa Dlamini has been subjected to harassment since he became involved in the union in 2016, and particularly since he became president of SNAT in 2018. On 21 September 2022, his teaching salary was withdrawn. The disciplinary measure mentioned by the Minister concerns an absence authorized by the school’s management to take part in lawful union activity. Despite a positive decision by the Industrial Court on 8 May 2023, Mr Dlamini has not been reinstated as a teacher and has not received his back pay. The authorities have disregarded the court ruling. Worse still, on 30 August 2023, he was dismissed by the Teaching Service Commission. On 21 March, the Eswatini Industrial Court ruled in favour of the teacher-unionist. The authorities are therefore refusing to follow two court rulings in favour of the trade unionist, and have even lodged an appeal.

A number of speakers have also referred to Mbongwa Dlamini’s forced temporary exile in 2023 due to a threat to his physical integrity when the authorities mounted a smear campaign against the teachers’ union. Since his rapid return to the country, the authorities have refused to allow the SNAT President to meet anyone from the Ministry of Education, the Ministry of Public Services or the Teaching Service Commission. He is also prohibited from taking part in the joint negotiating forum.

After petitioning the Ministry for the reinstatement of the SNAT President, Secretary-General Lot Vilakati received a letter from the Ministry of Education threatening to cancel his union leave.

Harassment of union leaders, smear campaigns against the union in the media, refusing to register new members, pressure on temporary teachers of not renewing their contracts if they join the union and refusing to increase union dues: that is how the authorities are weakening a union that was negotiating for its members in a difficult context. Despite a steep decline in membership from 14,500 to 10,800 teachers, SNAT continues to work for democracy and workers' rights in Eswatini.

Observer, IndustriALL Global Union (IndustriALL) – My organization represents two unions from Eswatini, namely ATUSWA and SESMAWU, which organize thousands of workers in the energy, mining, textile, and garment sectors. IndustriALL remains deeply concerned about ongoing violations of freedom of association and other fundamental trade union rights in the country. Some employers are not honouring recognition agreements with trade unions, despite unions fulfilling legal membership requirements. Workers are being denied their lawful right to form and join trade unions, the right to peaceful assembly and protest is being undermined; and workers are being terminated unfairly.

Trade union leaders face huge challenges. Former SESMAWU Secretary-General, Ms Maureen Nkambule, for example, was unfairly terminated from a state-owned utility company. Ms Nkambule was initially suspended, together with other workers, and charged for organizing a strike. She challenged the suspension in the Industrial Court in 2021 and won the case. The Court ruled that the suspension was unfair because the employer failed to give her a fair hearing. However, she was again later dismissed, and is again taking the dismissal to the Industrial Court, which is yet to issue the court dates when the matter will be heard.

Another case is related to Mr Wander Mkhonza, the Secretary-General of ATUSWA. His house was petrol bombed in 2022 during a strike of textile and garment workers. Several workers were injured as the police used violence to disperse the workers. These actions were meant to intimidate and weaken the trade unions. However, the unions launched Industrial Court challenges and approached the Conciliation Mediation and Arbitration Commission to have their disputes with employers resolved.

In some instances, the employers used strategies to out-finance unions through delaying tactics and appeals to drag on court processes. This had the effect of depleting scarce union resources through legal fees.

Furthermore, the Government has used disproportionate force to disperse striking workers. Over 80 pro-democracy protesters, including workers, have also been killed by law enforcement agencies, while several were injured.

Therefore, IndustriALL calls on the Government of Eswatini to:

- respect and facilitate democratic spaces for the people of Eswatini to make their demands through protests;
- stop gross human rights violations and the use of excessive and lethal force against protestors by the police and the army;
- ensure law enforcement providing safety and security take place without harming or injuring unarmed civilians;
- facilitate an investigation into the death of civilians as demanded by trade unions and civil society organizations;
- respect and implement the recommendations of the Committee of Experts.

Observer, Building and Wood Workers' International (BWI) – In solidarity with our fellow trade unionists in Eswatini, we make this intervention to address the escalation of violence, persecution and murders of trade unionists and workers during their right to take industrial action and the state of the mentioned initiated conciliation process. The extreme development has continued despite the clear recommendations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association regarding Case No. 3425 of 2022. These include, among others, establishing a National Voluntary Conciliation process.

Unfortunately, when the conciliation process was held between February and July 2023, the Government showed a lack of both will and commitment to the process. Despite 15 issues being agreed upon and referred to the relevant Government bodies for resolution, one year after the referral, there has been no resolution of any of the identified issues.

We want to underscore the importance of the conditions presented by this house as crucial for effective social dialogue and which also needs to be present for any conciliation process. This includes:

- the political will and commitment to engage in good faith in a dialogue on the part of all parties;
- strong, free, independent representative workers' and employers' organizations, together with trust, commitment and respect by the Government for the autonomy of these social partners.

The Committee on Freedom of Association has also established the principle that "the rights of workers' and employers' organizations can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations, and it is for the governments to ensure that this principle is respected".

The Government's attacks on the trade union and the ban on trade union gatherings are stark evidence that the necessary conditions for conciliation are absent in Eswatini.

We therefore support the Committee on Freedom of Association's call for the Government to take measures without delay that the trade unions' rights to engage in protest and take industrial actions are protected, both in law and in practice. We also want to reiterate the need for the Government to identify and impose penalties pursuant to violations of the national legislation on disciplinary actions against abuse of power by members of the police and security forces.

Chairperson – I invite now, the Government representative of Eswatini, the Minister of Labour and Social Security to make his concluding remarks.

Government representative – First of all, let me appreciate the words of support and encouragement that we have received. Many have spoken in support of what we have been trying to do as a Government, in trying to abide as much as possible, to the Convention which we have accordingly ratified.

In the same vein, let me express my dismay at the information that is appearing in some of the submissions that have been presented before the Committee. Let me just put on record that gatherings are open, they are not banned as some of the submissions have indicated, it is a pity that it appears workers do not want to seek permission when they want to meet from a number of 50 to above, because that is basically for their own protection and safety. This is what is contained in the Public Order Act, which was amended in 2017, amending a 1963 Order and it is in place. Its enforcement is to ensure that they are safe, their gatherings, well in order and they are all protected.

The case of Thulani Maseko has been highlighted here. Between 2021 to early 2023 we lost quite a number of people, including chiefs, including law enforcement officers. It is not just a secluded case to one trade union player. So, investigations are ongoing as the Government has been giving reports to that effect. It is unfortunate that some of those that are very close to Mr Maseko, some close family members to the late lawyer, are evasive with information, which is one of the reasons why they are taking too long for this case to be concluded. But nonetheless, it is an ongoing process. On behalf of the Government that may also extend open hands to the Committee to say, if it is possible, and if it pleases the Committee, a team of experts can be sent to the country to verify some of the serious allegations that have been raised here by some of the speakers.

As I am presenting before you today, not even one protester died in a protest action for wages as it has been mentioned. Not even one trade unionist is in jail as we speak today. Not even one trade unionist has been killed by the Government as of today. But nonetheless we are willing to accept teams which may come and verify some of these issues that have been raised here. There is the issue of Mr Sticks Nkambule – some people say that he is in exile. Mr Nkambule is in the country; his case is ongoing in court. Just last week, together with all public sector unions, we had a fruitful meeting with the Prime Minister, after meeting our office as the Minister of Labour executive on the ground.

And let me also mention that we just recently had celebrated May Day. We were invited by the trade unions, and the Government attended with the Prime Minister. Unfortunately, we could not be given a platform to engage with them and we were hurled at with stones and bottles. That is, well, the kind of reception that you sometimes receive when you try to engage, when you try to extend an olive branch. But nonetheless, let me also indicate that as Government, we are not aware of any assassination attempt on Mr Nkambule, as it has been mentioned here. We just know that there is a pending case before court, just to answer after defying a court order because we strongly believe that being a unionist does not mean you are immune to law. You have to respect court processes as a court order had been defied, that is why there is a case that is pending for him to answer.

The Government of the Kingdom of Eswatini is committed to ensuring that to work together with all our social partners in making sure that more especially for the Convention we are as compliant as possible. Let me also indicate that there have been a lot of talks and misconceptions in various forums about Eswatini. It is one country which I can probably say is democratic. I am a product of that democracy. I am elected directly by the people to which I am accountable to. It is my third term in office, and I am not ashamed to say it is a democratic country. Who can say they have the best democracy? In what form does it come? In different forms. We are one democratic State which is fully committed to ensuring that we are compliant with all laws which we have ratified as a country, just like the Convention. There have been allegations that the Government stopped remittance of trade union fees for SNAT members. We are the Ministry responsible for registration and deregistration. We have not made even a single attempt to that. The Committee is welcome to send a team to come and verify some of these serious allegations that have been put forth before it.

With regard to gatherings, they are open, and there is law and order for which those participating need to follow. There is no harassment of trade union activists. Some of the union leaders are part of political parties and they are political activists. During the unrest period, there were instances where political gatherings were hidden under the banner of unionism. It has been alleged that some workers were tear-gassed in the past, nothing of that sort happened. The Government or the police have never thrown tear gas to a bus full of workers. People were restricted to movement during that period due to COVID-19 regulations and to unrest restrictions. But some were defying the restrictions that were put in place. And unfortunately, the Government has some law enforcement agencies who work with them in trying to restore law and order, but it is no case against workers specifically.

In a nutshell, I just want to reiterate our commitment to ensuring that we work together with all our partners, there is a reconciliation process, a voluntary conciliation process, which is in progress. There is an implementation plan which we are working together with our partners which we are pleading that is given the room to get to its finality and then maybe if there are any underlying matters which need consideration, we can work on that. Yes, we agree there are some pending issues, one or two, which we have been working on with our social partners. So we are pleading with the Committee to please allow us time to conclude this process which you have allowed us to embark on and if there are any issues that will be raised, we are more than ready to sit down and engage and find lasting solutions. So that may be my presentation for now, and we are more than ready to receive any guidance from the Committee and any other players who have been assisting us over time, mainly the ILO, on all our issues.

Employer members – We take this opportunity to thank the representative of the Government of Eswatini for both the written and oral information shared with the Committee. We also thank all the speakers who took the floor for contributing to the discussion of this case.

Given the ongoing processes in the country, the Employers recommend that the Government to do the following in order to achieve conformity with the Convention:

- (1) Conclude the road map to implement the recommendations of the Independent Investigation Committee and the National Voluntary Conciliation processes.
- (2) Expedite the outstanding police investigations into the violence and killings that took place between 2021 and 2023.
- (3) In consultation with social partners, disseminate the codes of good practice and legislation to prevent violent confrontation during protests and industrial action to relevant stakeholders.
- (4) Submit all outstanding information to the Committee of Experts in 2025.

Worker members – We thank the Government of Eswatini for its participation and the information provided. We also thank all the delegates who took part in this discussion.

The Workers' group reiterates its deep concern at the increasing state repression and escalating physical violence and threats against workers and their representatives and the curtailment of democratic freedoms in the country.

We note that in September 2019, an Independent Investigation Committee was appointed to give effect to the recommendation of the Committee on Freedom of Association to initiate an independent investigation to determine the justification of the violent police crackdown against peaceful industrial actions, which had been denounced in September 2018 by TUCOSWA and ITUC. We take note of the recommendations of the Independent Investigation Committee, which include, inter alia, the provision of training activities for lower-ranked police officers, marshals, and the public at large on trade union rights and the handling of industrial actions.

We further note that the Government benefited from the technical assistance of the Office regarding the handling of industrial action and public gatherings organized by trade unions. In this context, the Government adopted and disseminated the code of good practice for industrial and protest actions and the code of good practice on gatherings, as a capacity-building strategy of the various stakeholders on how to manage industrial and protest actions, in order to minimize unwarranted confrontations between protestors and members of law enforcement. But given the increased violence of police and security forces during gatherings and demonstrations organized by trade unions in recent years, we can only observe that the dissemination of these codes of good practice has had virtually no effect and that workers and trade unionists organizing or participating in gatherings are still at high risk of being beaten up and arbitrarily arrested.

Furthermore, we note that in the context of a complaint before the Committee on Freedom of Association submitted by TUCOSWA in 2022, the Government and the trade union agreed to voluntary conciliation, which occurred between February and July 2023. Despite this agreement, the Government has failed to engage in meaningful dialogue with the union and most of the issues raised by the union remain unresolved. Meanwhile, state attacks against TUCOSWA have continued.

The state of human and trade union rights in Eswatini is deeply worrying. We have submitted here today evidence of harassment and violence against trade unionists and a lack of engagement of the Government with trade unions. We urge the Government to respect its obligations under the Convention and abide by the observations and conclusions of the ILO supervisory bodies which so far have remained a dead letter.

We specifically urge the Government to take immediate measures to investigate, prosecute and convict the perpetrators and instigators of crimes against trade unionists, including the murder of Thulani Maseko.

We urge the Government to refrain from any acts of interference in the activities of trade unions, including TUCOSWA, SNAT and SWATCAWU, and to cease its anti-union smearing campaign.

We urge the Government to refrain from any acts of intimidation, harassment, threats or physical, violent attacks against trade union leaders and members, including the SNAT President and Secretary-General, Mbongwa Dlamini and Lot Mduduzi Vilakati.

The Government must guarantee the safe return home of all trade unionists living in exile, including the Secretary of SWATCAWU, Sticks Nkambule.

We urge the Government to remove all restrictions on trade union gatherings and protest actions. The Government must withdraw all criminal charges pending against trade unionists and workers arrested during these protests.

We urge the Government to adopt and implement effective measures to provide training to police and security forces, municipal councils and the judiciary on trade union rights and the peaceful handling of industrial actions.

We urge the Government to engage in meaningful dialogue with trade unions to address the pressing issues and violations they face.

We welcome the invitation that the Minister of the Government of Eswatini made to this Committee just now for a direct contacts mission. We request the Government to submit its full report on the measures taken to implement the Committee's conclusions and on all outstanding information requested by the Committee of Experts by 1 September 2024. Finally, we request this Committee to include its conclusions in a special paragraph of its report.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the oral and written information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted with deep concern the deteriorating state of public order and its negative impact on trade union rights in the country as well as a culture of impunity for the perpetrators of crimes against trade unionists.

Taking into account the discussion, the Committee urged the Government to take effective, urgent and time-bound measures to:

- refrain from the violent treatment, intimidation or harassment, including judicial harassment, of leaders and members of trade unions in the education sector conducting lawful trade union activities, including the Swaziland National Association of Teachers (SNAT) President and Secretary-General Messrs Mbongwa Dlamini and Lot Mduduzi Vilakati;
- release, quash convictions and drop all charges brought against individuals for having exercised lawful trade union activities and ensure the safe return home of all trade unionists living in exile, including the Secretary-General of the Swaziland Transport, Communication and Allied Workers' Union (SWATCAWU), Sticks Nkambule;
- conduct without delay independent investigations into: (i) alleged instances of intimidation, harassment or violence, including the murder of Mr Thulani Maseko and the persecution of Mr Mbongwa Dlamini, with a view to determining culpability and punishing the perpetrators and instigators of these crimes; and (ii) investigate violence and interference by the police in lawful, peaceful and legitimate trade union activities and hold accountable those responsible;
- ensure that employers' and workers' organizations, including the Trade Union Congress of Swaziland (TUCOSWA), the SNAT and the SWATCAWU, are given the autonomy and independence they need to fulfil their mandate and represent their members;
- repeal any administrative orders or legislative provisions that have the effect of prohibiting or restricting the right to freedom of assembly of trade unions and ensure in practice that trade unions fully enjoy the right to hold public meetings as enshrined in the Convention, including by training police and security forces, municipal councils and the judiciary; and
- address the findings of the Investigation Committee and the National Voluntary Conciliation and implement the planned sensitization campaign on the codes of practice in full consultation with the social partners and with the technical assistance of the ILO.

The Committee requested the Government to submit a detailed report on the measures taken and progress achieved with regard to the above recommendations, including all outstanding information requested by the Committee of Experts by 1 September 2024.

Government representative – Obviously at this stage it only remains for me to extend my wealth of appreciation to you, your Vice-Chairpersons and Madam Corinne Vargha, who represents the Director-General in the work of this Committee, for the courtesy which you reserved me. I have taken due note of the conclusions of your Committee, and I wish to state that the Government of Eswatini came here with a spirit of positively engaging with this Committee and demonstrate the bounds being made at a national level to implement the Convention. We are engaged with you in an honest conversation because we have ratified the Convention and must be soon to be implementing it. We are not in a fighting mode and shall never be. We are therefore not resistant to the conclusions that your Committee has since deemed appropriate. I want to say, on record, that my Government accepts these conclusions and shall endeavour to implement them together with our social partners. We need them in this journey, and we plead for constructiveness and honesty with each other. We would like to avail ourselves of the Office's continued technical assistance which has already been provided for anyway.

Gambia (ratification: 2000)

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138)

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the Government representative of Gambia, First Secretary of the Permanent Mission of the Republic of the Gambia to the United Nations Office and other international organizations in Geneva, to take the floor.

Government representative – Gambia has ratified Convention No. 138 which specifies a minimum age for admission to employment, setting it at 14 years. However, there are proposals put forward to bring it down to 12 years from other sectors. The ratification occurred on 4 September 2000, and the Convention is currently enforced in Gambia.

Additionally, Gambia ratified the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), which addresses the worst forms of child labour, on 3 June 2003. These ratifications demonstrate Gambia's commitment to promoting decent work for young people and safeguarding their rights. Last year, the Ministry of Trade and Employment developed a child labour policy, followed by a cabinet information paper that will be subsequently presented at the National Assembly for consideration.

In our effort to pursue a national policy designed to ensure the effective abolition of child labour and to raise progressively the minimum age for admission to employment or work to a level consistent with the fullest physical and mental development of young persons, our Labour Act states that children under the age of 18 cannot work. They are only permitted to do light work.

Gambia is making a lot of effort to ensure that children under the age of 18 are not engaged in employment. This has also been captured in our Children's Act.

The challenge that Gambia is facing concerns the domestic sector but, as part of the progressive measure to ensure that all sectors are protected, the Labour Act 2023 has covered the issue of domestic workers.

This has given the Government the opportunity to monitor children working in the domestic sector to ensure that they are not subjected to labour and sexual exploitation. These are the new developments regarding Gambia as we strive to ensure that we implement issues regarding the Convention. We hope to ensure that all efforts are undertaken to ensure the full implementation of this Convention, and we hope that we will be able to make all efforts to produce the highest possible impact, as far as Gambia is concerned.

Employer members – The objective of the Convention under discussion today is the effective abolition of child labour, which is understood as work that poses a danger to the health, safety or morals of children, or work that interferes with compulsory education or for which children are simply too young.

It is our duty to protect the rights of children and their well-being, and to protect them from child labour, and it is imperative for States to comply with this Convention which requires countries to set a minimum age for admission to employment and to establish national policies for the elimination of child labour.

Gambia ratified the Convention in 2000. The Committee of Experts made two observations on this case, in 2019 and 2023, and today is the first time that we are discussing in this Committee the application of the Convention by Gambia. We regret that the Government has not provided updated information on this case with regard to the application of the Convention in law and in practice.

The observations of the Committee of Experts indicate serious shortcomings in Gambia's compliance with the Convention which must be addressed.

Firstly, in relation to Article 2(3) on compulsory education, the Committee of Experts requested the Government to provide information on legal provisions on compulsory schooling in Gambia. To this end, the Government replied that, as part of the revision of the current Children's Act of 2005, a provision will be introduced to establish an age of completion of compulsory schooling that will be in line with the minimum age for admission to employment or work. However, this is a request that has been made since 2009, and the regulation has not been brought into line with the provisions of the Convention.

The Employer members echo the request of the Committee of Experts for the Government to adopt, without delay, measures to ensure that the revision of the Children's Act introduces compulsory schooling until the minimum age of admission to employment or work, of 14 years, in accordance with Article 2(3) of the Convention.

The Employer members wish to highlight here that education is key to eradicating child labour. It is well-known that compulsory education and child labour interventions are mutually reinforcing. Furthermore, there is a clear correlation between greater access to education and the reduction of the number of children engaged in work.

Secondly, the observations of the Committee of Experts concern Article 6 on vocational training and apprenticeship. The Employer members regret that, in practice, the issue of minimum age for admission to apprenticeship remains unresolved, insofar as the Labour Act still does not include it in sections 78 and 79 that regulate apprenticeship. This means that the minimum age for admission to apprenticeship is currently 12 years of age in the informal economy under sections 50 and 51 of the Children's Act, and that there is no minimum age for apprenticeship in the formal economy, pursuant to the Labour Act of 2007.

Child labour is work that undermines the well-being of children and jeopardizes their education, development and future livelihood. Two ILO Conventions – the Convention under discussion and Convention No. 182 – provide the framework for national legislation to establish clear limits on what is and is not acceptable. Not all work carried out by a person under the age of 18 is considered child labour. It is necessary to take into account not only age but also working conditions and type of work. Young people should be able to obtain decent work, but still need protection. The ILO, in its numerous investigations on child labour, has placed an emphasis on the prevalence of the engagement of children in work and its correlation with the minimum age for access to employment.

We consider that it is insufficient for the National Steering Committee on Child Labour to have made recommendations in this respect, as indicated by the Government, and that more effective action is required. The Employer members therefore support the request of the Committee of Experts for the Government to adopt the necessary measures to ensure the establishment, by law, of a minimum age of admission to apprenticeship of at least 14 years, both in the formal and informal economy.

Thirdly, the Committee of Experts makes observations on Article 7 of the Convention with regard to light work. Article 7 of the Convention requires Governments to establish national laws regulating the engagement of children aged 13 to 15 years in light work. Light work for children aged 13 to 15 years is only permitted when it is not likely to be harmful to their health or development, and when it is not such as to prejudice their attendance at school, their participation in vocational orientation or training programmes, approved by the competent authority or their capacity to benefit from the instruction received.

In reply to the request by the Committee of Experts, the Government once again stated that it would increase the minimum age for light work from 12 to 14 years in accordance with the forthcoming amendments to the Labour Bill and the Children's Bill. The Government also indicated that the forthcoming amendments would address types of activity, number of hours and conditions in which light work can be carried out.

The Employer members echo the Committee of Experts' request for the Government to adopt measures, without delay, to ensure that the revision of the Children's Bill and the Labour Bill introduces minimum standards on light work for children under the age of 14 years.

Lastly, with regard to Article 9(1) on penalties and labour inspection, the Employer members note the serious lack of staff and material resources to effectively conduct routine inspections, and the support provided by the ILO in terms of training and capacity-building for labour inspectors.

The Employer members echo the Committee of Experts and urge the Government to strengthen its measures to ensure that labour inspectors are properly trained and possess the necessary resources to detect cases of child labour. These measures, however, will not be sufficient, effective or sustainable if they are not implemented together with strategic policies aimed at addressing the root causes, risk factors and socio-economic circumstances that drive or lead to the exploitation of children.

We are aware of the intense activity of the Office regarding the prevention and eradication of child labour. We encourage the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in order to apply effective strategies to ensure compliance with the provisions of the Convention following timely and effective consultation with the social partners.

To conclude, we wish to point out that, in order to achieve target 8.7 of the Sustainable Development Goals on ending child labour in all its forms, it is necessary for all governments, employers' and workers' organizations, and the ILO itself, to continue to work conscientiously.

Worker members – Firstly, allow me to express my personal regret and the regret of this Committee's Worker members at the absence of the Workers' delegate from Gambia who, despite making a number of requests to the Government, never received a response regarding his accreditation and was therefore unable to take part in this important discussion. We cannot overemphasize the need to ensure the tripartite participation of delegations in the International Labour Conference in general and therefore in this important body, the Committee, in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution and the Standing Orders of the Conference.

Combating the economic exploitation of children is at the heart of the ILO's mandate. This has been a key concern of the ILO since its establishment. In 1919, the first standard governing the minimum age for admission to employment in industry was adopted. Over the years, international standards on the minimum age have proliferated in a number of sectors. It was in 1973 that the Convention, intended to be cross-sectoral, was adopted.

This instrument calls on Member States to pursue a national policy designed to ensure the effective abolition of child labour. Establishing a minimum age for admission to employment implies:

- guaranteeing and ensuring that children are able to attend school;
- regulating the forms of economic activity in which they are permitted to engage; and
- protecting their health and safety.

This Convention enshrines the profound conviction of the ILO's constituents that childhood should be a period of life devoted to children's physical and mental development, not a period spent working at an early age.

Like virtually all of our Organization's Member States, Gambia has also ratified the Convention. The application of the Convention by Gambia was the subject of observations by the Committee of Experts in 2019 and 2023, but has been the subject of repeated direct requests since 2009. The case is now before our Committee.

According to ILO statistics, the proportion of children aged between 5 and 11 years engaged in economic activity was 17.3 per cent in 2018 in Gambia, or nearly one child in five. The proportion of children aged between 12 and 14 years engaged in economic activity was 12.8 per cent in 2018.

UNICEF's 2022 poverty report indicates that nine out of ten children live in poverty in Gambia. In addition, while article 30 of the Gambian Constitution recognizes the fundamental right of children to education, UNICEF figures indicate that only 78 per cent of children attend primary school. Although this rate is a sign of measured progress over the previous decade, the education system still has major bottlenecks that prevent it from providing high-quality service, according to the 2022 UNICEF report. Preschool education is underdeveloped, both in terms of curricula and in terms of laying a solid foundation for lifelong learning. In addition, more than 20 per cent of school age children are out of school.

There is undoubtedly a strong link between education and the minimum age for admission to employment. Depriving children of the opportunity for education and training severely damages their prospects and increases their likelihood of entering the world of work permanently and prematurely. Compulsory schooling is the most effective way of protecting children from the risk of child labour.

It is therefore essential that compulsory schooling is introduced at least until the minimum age for admission to employment. According to the Committee of Experts' report, the Government indicates that a provision setting an age of completion of compulsory schooling, aligned with the minimum age for admission to employment or work, will be introduced in the framework of the revision of the current Children's Act, 2005. We therefore understand that, up to now and since 2009, there has been no provision setting an age of completion of compulsory schooling. It is essential to bring Gambian legislation into line with the provisions of the Convention at the earliest opportunity.

In relation to apprenticeships, and while Article 6 of the Convention also provides that the minimum age for admission to apprenticeship is 14 years, it is regrettable to note, as pointed out by the Committee of Experts, the lack of harmonization of key provisions including those in the Children's Act, 2005, and the Labour Act. Sections 78 and 79 of the Labour Bill, which regulate apprenticeships, do not set a minimum age for admission to apprenticeship. The same applies to sections 50 and 51 of the Children's Act, which set the minimum age for admission to apprenticeship at 12 years, but only in the informal economy, not in the formal economy, which causes confusion, especially as the minimum age set for the informal economy remains too low.

The Government indicates that the National Steering Committee on Child Labour has made recommendations to raise the minimum age for apprenticeships in the informal economy and to set it in the formal economy, and that the minimum age of admission to apprenticeship will be considered in the Labour Bill in parallel with the review of the Children's Act, with a view to aligning the provisions of the two laws. We trust that these reforms will be implemented quickly.

As regards light work, it is positive that the Government is planning to set the minimum age at 14 years and to determine the types of activities, the number of hours and the conditions in which light work may be undertaken by children. These details will be included in the Labour Bill and the Children's Bill. Once again, this is merely a stated intention by the Government, which should be acted upon without delay.

Article 9 of the Convention provides that the competent authority shall take all necessary measures, including appropriate penalties, to ensure the effective enforcement of the provisions of the Convention.

However, the Committee of Experts' report indicates that, according to the statistics communicated by the Government for the first quarter of 2022, the labour inspectorate conducted only seven inspections in the greater Banjul area and 28 inspections in the rest of the country, and did not conduct any inspections in the second quarter of 2022.

These are alarming figures, which can be explained by the glaring lack of staff and resources in the country's labour inspectorate. Under such conditions, it will be difficult to ensure the effective application of the law in the country if the labour inspectorate is so lacking in staff and resources.

The Government should make it a priority to strengthen the labour inspectorate in order to combat child labour more effectively in the country and ensure compliance with the Convention in practice. The Government itself acknowledges the need for further technical assistance in this regard, and we are confident that the Office will meet this request.

Government member, Switzerland – Education, through its essential role of transferring knowledge and skills, contributes to the personal and professional development of every individual. This is especially true for young children.

Switzerland therefore notes with interest the information provided by the Government that legislative revisions are under way to bring the minimum age of completion of compulsory schooling into line with the minimum age for admission to employment, as defined by the Gambian authorities, at 14 years. As regards light work, the Government should define, in consultation with the social partners, the conditions under which such work may be carried out.

In view of the many forthcoming legislative changes, Switzerland requests the Government to provide the Committee of Experts with information on the new laws adopted in a timely manner. To ensure that these legislative reforms are applied effectively and have a tangible impact in combating child labour, the labour inspectorate will play an essential role. In this regard, Switzerland notes with concern the low number of inspections carried out in the country in 2022 due to the lack of available staff and material resources. Switzerland therefore calls on the Government to take the necessary measures to increase the number of labour inspectors and the resources available to them to carry out inspections. Finally, Switzerland encourages the Government to make use of ILO technical assistance and trusts that this will help to promote the application of the Convention in law and practice.

Worker member, Togo – I am speaking as a representative of the workers of Togo. The Committee of Experts has made pertinent observations and recommendations on the application of the Convention by Gambia, which require the Government's attention. While we recognize the moderate progress achieved in the Government's efforts to combat child labour and to protect children's rights in general, significant challenges remain, requiring immediate and robust action to protect our children and ensure compliance with the Convention.

In Gambia, children are exploited in commercial sexual activity, often as a result of trafficking, and are subjected to forced begging. Boys are sent to Qur'anic teachers, or marabouts, to be educated, and are sometimes forced to beg, sell on the street or engage in farm work. Children also work in hazardous conditions, for example shovelling white sand in coastal mines for the construction industry. These practices are not only exploitative, they are also deeply damaging to the physical and psychological well-being of our children.

In 2022, Gambia took steps to combat the worst forms of child labour. The Government signed a memorandum of understanding with Nigeria to step up efforts to combat trafficking in women and children. This partnership is crucial, as it facilitates the sharing of vital information and the coordination of efforts to combat human trafficking. The Government has also opened four centres to help survivors of sexual violence and trafficking, including children, by providing them with essential services such as legal aid, healthcare and psychological support.

However, the effective application of the law remains a major challenge, as the Government admits in the report. The labour inspectorate is woefully understaffed and underfunded. It is also essential to build the capacity of law enforcement agencies by providing comprehensive training on child labour, including commercial sexual exploitation, forced labour and the use of children in unlawful activities. Ensuring that penalties for child labour violations are applied consistently will also act as a deterrent to potential offenders.

Although the National Agency against Trafficking in Persons (NAATIP) has made progress, including by increasing its funding and carrying out awareness-raising activities, it remains dependent on international support. The National Agency's ability to investigate and prosecute cases of child trafficking is hampered by inadequate resources and insufficient training of law enforcement officials on the worst forms of child labour. The coordination of processes for applying child labour legislation must be improved. The National Coordination Committee on Child Labour, intended to oversee the application of the law and prosecutions, is largely inactive. The reinstatement of this committee and its effective functioning are essential for a coherent and comprehensive approach to combating child labour.

Gambia's social programmes to combat child labour are also lacking in scope. Programmes such as the child protection shelters of the Department for Social Welfare and conditional cash transfers to Islamic religious schools need to be scaled up and made fully operational. The Government must ensure that these programmes cover all children at risk, including those working in farming, domestic work and street activities. Furthermore, barriers to education, such as inadequate infrastructure, lack of transport and the cost of schooling, need to be removed in order to reduce children's vulnerability to exploitation.

In conclusion, while Gambia has achieved moderate progress, much remains to be done. By closing legislative loopholes, ensuring adequate funding and resources for law enforcement agencies, improving coordination and developing social welfare programmes, we can protect our children from the worst forms of child labour. Our collective commitment to these efforts will safeguard our children's future and ensure compliance with the Convention.

Worker member, Uganda – I take cognizance of the observations of the Committee of Experts with reference to Article 2(3) of the Convention on compulsory education, Article 6 on vocational training and apprenticeship, Article 7 on light work and Article 9(1) on penalties and labour inspection. I therefore wish to reiterate my support for the Committee of Experts' observations as follows:

Child labour remains a global challenge that is mainly attributed to poverty. Aristotle also said that "poverty is the parent of revolution and crime", and hence the dire need to combat child labour anywhere. Child labour presents itself with various ever-changing complexities that then require multifaceted approaches to best deal with it and its consequences.

In most developing countries, many young men and women who face difficulties are actually compelled to engage in child labour practices and early marriages for survival. This then poses other serious challenges as we have witnessed with the rise in young parenthood.

This, therefore, calls for inclusive, continuous and regulated efforts and strategies for consistent awareness creation and capacity building for stakeholders to eliminate child labour in Gambia, among other countries.

One of the measures the Government must take is the inclusion of stakeholders, that is trade unions, employers' organizations, civil society organizations, community leaders and donor communities to assist the Government so as to best implement this Convention.

It is important to note that trade unions could play a role in assisting the Government, but I am informed that one of the trade leaders has failed to attend this Conference because the Government refused to facilitate or support him. This attitude by the Government shows that it does not have a culture of inclusiveness in its actions, programmes and policy development.

In conclusion, I wish to urge the Government to undertake the following: first, the Government should engage in consultations with the tripartite social partners and other stakeholders to review all the legislation that is mentioned by the Committee of Experts so that they can bring it into conformity with the Convention; and secondly, the Government should also mobilize resources so as to address the root causes of child labour in Gambia.

Worker member, Zimbabwe – It is quite important to note that the Committee of Experts' report has raised four critical issues in respect to which the Government, to date, has not provided satisfactory responses. These issues concern: Article 2(3) of the Convention which deals with compulsory education for children; Article 6, which addresses issues about vocational training and minimum age for apprenticeship; Article 7 on the minimum age for light work; and Article 9(1) which requires the establishment of penalties and a system of labour inspection.

The Committee of Experts has been raising these matters since 2009, requesting the Government to set up a legal framework that sets out an age of completion of compulsory schooling that is aligned with the minimum age for admission to employment of 14 years of age as per the Convention, and the revision of the Children's Act. We note that the Government has nothing to show despite several observations from the Committee of Experts..

Regarding the observation on vocational training and apprenticeship, the Committee of Experts also noted with regret that the Government has nothing to show again. The issue of setting a minimum age for apprenticeship is not even addressed in sections 78 and 79 of the Labour Bill. Furthermore, the Children's Act of 2005 remains the substantive law that provides for a minimum age of 12 years for the informal economy, which is way below the 14 years required by Article 6 of the Convention, and there is no minimum age set for the formal economy.

We also note that the Constitution of Gambia, 1996, then revised in 2018, provides that children under the age of 16 years are entitled to be protected from economic exploitation and shall not be employed in or required to perform work that is likely to be hazardous. We note that the interference with their education is continuing in Gambia and is likely to be hazardous. We also take note of the harmful practices to health that it causes, even to their physical, mental, spiritual, moral or social development. However, the Government still has a lot to do to comply with its own Constitution and this Convention.

The Government ratified this Convention on 4 September 2000 and its obligations deriving from the Convention have existed since 3 September 2001. The cumulative period of non-compliance is about 22 years. This shows a serious violation of the Convention, and we continue to urge the Government to remedy the shortcomings in the law and improve the practice to save its children. Children remain important in each and every country. Therefore, it is obligatory for the Government to make sure they protect and serve the children in Gambia.

Worker member, Eswatini – In its sitting in Durban, in the Republic of South Africa, the 5th Global Conference on the Elimination of Child Labour recalled that the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development had set a target to end child labour in all its forms by 2025. We are left with only six months until 2025.

The Government can, however, still put in place measures towards achieving this development target. Decent work for all, including women, in all their diversity, and adequate income for adults, inclusive well-performing education systems, and adequate social protection systems are essential for child labour elimination and for protection against poverty, which is the main cause of child labour.

Education is a human right, and providing children with universal access to free, compulsory quality basic education is important to ensure that human beings reach their full potential, so that socially excluded children and adults have greater opportunities to lift themselves out of poverty. The Government is encouraged to recognize children's capacity to form their own views and their right to effectively participate and express their views freely in all matters affecting them. Policies must be put in place for businesses to contribute to the elimination of child labour by carrying out due diligence in their operations and supply chains and ensuring responsible and sustainable business practices that address the root causes of child labour. The Government must reinforce the effective implementation of national laws, regulations and policies on child labour and by strengthening the capacity of law enforcement bodies, labour inspectorates, child protection and education services, and other relevant authorities.

Measures must be taken to increase efforts to formalize the informal economy, and to extend the coverage of labour laws, particularly in agriculture, where most child labour occurs.

The elimination of direct and indirect barriers to quality compulsory education for girls and boys, such as distance, cost, safety, security and gender- and disability-specific barriers, by eliminating fees, as appropriate, promoting universal scholarships and school feeding, and ensuring no one is excluded from quality education by taking into account the particular needs of children in the most vulnerable situations, including those with disabilities and marginalized children, is essential for the eradication of child labour, even through minimum-age setting. I urge the Government to seriously take strategic measures without further delay.

Worker member, South Africa – The Government has made minimal advancements to eliminate child labour. I have taken note of the Government's admission that enforcement of the law remains a challenge in the country, as well as the issues concerning labour inspection to detect cases of child labour. The Committee of Experts expressed its concern about the seven inspections carried out in the greater Banjul area and the 28 in the rest of the country during the first quarter of 2022, with no inspections in the second quarter. The Government also admitted its failure to provide adequate resources to the Inspectorate Unit of the Labour Department, as well as human resources. The Committee of Experts noted the difficulties and urged the Government to take the necessary measures in the provision of resources to the Department of Inspections.

The Government should not hide behind the scarcity of resources as an excuse. The lack of resources does not dispense the Government's obligation under the Convention. The Government should adopt measures to improve its resources. That is its responsibility.

There are reports of children being subjected to the worst forms of child labour including, but not limited to, commercial sex exploitation and street begging perpetuated by some religious schools and tourists, as the country is a tourist destination and, due to poverty, children end up being exploited.

I urge the Government to take, without delay, the following measures:

- (1) ratify the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), for greater protection of children;
- (2) strengthen labour inspection facilities and systems to ensure compliance with labour laws and standards, thereby protecting the rights and safety of children;
- (3) ensure that sanctions for non-compliance are enforced and are a deterrent to potential offenders, in order to stop the practice;
- (4) increase educational awareness among communities and schoolchildren and parents about the detrimental effects of child labour.

Lastly, we advise the Government to consider visiting our country and have an information-sharing meeting with our Government and its social partners.

Worker member, Belgium – This fundamental ILO Convention aims to effectively abolish child labour by setting a minimum age for admission to employment and introducing national policies to abolish child labour. While some modest progress has been achieved in terms of school enrolment rates, there remain many difficulties in properly protecting children against forced labour, particularly in the tourism sector where children are sexually exploited, in farming, through forced begging or domestic work.

Article 9 of the Convention requires States to take all necessary measures, including appropriate penalties, to ensure the effective enforcement of its provisions.

In Gambia, sections 47 and 48 of the Labour Act provide for prison sentences and fines for violations of child labour regulations. However, despite repeated direct requests by the Committee of Experts since 2009, we have very little information on the number and nature of violations recorded by labour inspectors, or on the number and nature of penalties imposed.

As already mentioned, in its 2023 observation, the Committee of Experts indicated that, according to the statistics communicated by the Government for the first quarter of 2022, the labour inspectorate conducted only seven inspections in the greater Banjul area and 28 inspections in the rest of the country. No inspections took place in the second quarter of 2022. This situation is truly worrying.

In view of the scourge of child labour, it is crucial that the Government take all the necessary measures to adapt and strengthen the labour inspection services through commitments and additional resources. It is also important to continue efforts to train inspectors on child labour matters in order to improve their ability to detect and deal with such cases.

In accordance with the ILO's guidelines on labour legislation, the law on minimum age must be applied together with effective penalties and all other necessary measures in the event of violation of child labour provisions. These penalties must target all persons responsible for the illegal employment of minors (employers, parents, guardians) and must be sufficiently dissuasive. They must cover the criminal, civil and administrative spheres, and be differentiated according to the seriousness of the offence. It is also important that children have access to legal protection and remedies, for example by being represented by a trade union. Finally, children who work under the required age, if in an illegal activity, should not incur any penalty.

It is therefore essential that resources and strategies are put in place so that the Gambian judicial system can effectively prosecute offenders, protect victims and combat impunity, in accordance with the principle of the rule of law. We urge the authorities to do their utmost to ensure that child labour is detected, and that effective and dissuasive penalties are applied against the perpetrators.

Chairperson – I can see no more requests for the floor, so now I invite the Government representative of Gambia to take the floor for his final remarks.

Government representative – I thank all the individuals that reacted to Gambia as we strive to implement the Convention. All recommendations and points are well noted. The role of our Mission will be now to escalate some of these issues critically with our Government to ensure that the critical recommendations that are vital to our efforts are duly addressed. So, we will escalate this to the Government.

We regret that the Government delegation that was supposed to come is not here. We just had this information very late, and we offer our apologies, but we will try to ensure that, although we have registered some level of progress regarding the Convention, we still continue to strive for further progress. The recommendation that we should explore technical assistance with the ILO will also be taken into account. All recommendations will be taken on board, and I thank everyone.

Worker members – I would like to thank all the speakers on this case, and in particular the Government representative for the information provided to the Committee and for demonstrating the Government's willingness to press ahead with legal reform and the implementation of the Convention. Gambia's children are the country's future. They must enjoy their right to education and to an environment conducive to their development and the fulfilment of their potential, in accordance with the provisions of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. This will enable them to make a significant contribution to the social and economic development of the country. Guaranteeing them a basic education means keeping them out of employment by scrupulously observing the provisions of the Convention.

The Government must make combating child labour a national priority in order to achieve SDG target 8.7. To this end, protecting children from the risk of child labour, through a multi-dimensional policy, is vital. We have noted a number of shortcomings in Gambian legislation. The Government will, or at least must, ensure that these shortcomings are overcome.

We support the Committee of Experts' recommendations to the Government, starting with its plans to amend the legislation to introduce a minimum age for admission to employment or work. The same applies to completing the draft amendments to the Labour Act and the Children's Act to raise the minimum age for admission to apprenticeship in the informal economy and to introduce a minimum age for admission to apprenticeship in the formal economy. Finally, the last legislative amendment required is to set the minimum age at 14 years and to determine the types of activities, the number of hours and the conditions in which light work may be undertaken by children.

As of today, and even when these legislative amendments have been made, Gambian children should also be able to count on the enforcement of these regulations. Alongside the support measures to be implemented in tandem with the legislative amendments, the enforcement of these regulations will require stronger inspection services. This strengthening requires an increase in the staff, material resources and budget allocated to the labour inspectorate, as well as adequate training for labour inspectors to improve their ability to detect cases of child labour. The Government has indicated its willingness to receive ILO technical assistance. We welcome the constructive spirit shown towards remedying the remaining shortcomings in the application of the Convention. For this reason, like the Committee of Experts, we recommend that the Government seek ILO technical assistance to implement the recommendations to be made by our Committee.

Employer members – In our final remarks on this case, the Employer members would like once again to express their regret at not having been able to receive, in advance, additional information from this Committee. However, we welcome the information provided orally today by the Government and trust in the willingness demonstrated to address the recommendations highlighted here. We also thank all the delegates for their participation and ideas.

In general, we share the concerns expressed by the Committee in this case and encourage the Government to take, without delay, appropriate measures to effectively introduce compulsory schooling until the minimum age for admission to employment or work of 14 years, in conformity with Article 2(3) of the Convention.

Increasing access to a basic, free, compulsory and quality education is crucial to reduce child labour, and both are interrelated objectives.

The legislation on the minimum age for access to work can only be effective if children are required to attend school. Children who do not have access to free and compulsory education are at a greater risk of early entry into the informal labour market, where they are usually obliged to work in hazardous and exploitative conditions.

Furthermore, child labour is a significant obstacle to achieving education for all. Children who do not attend school are at a much greater risk of becoming engaged in work.

It is also paramount for the Government to adopt the necessary measures to ensure the establishment, by law, of a minimum age for admission to apprenticeship of at least 14 years, in both the formal and informal economy, and to introduce minimum standards on light work for children under the age of 14 years in the revision of the Children's Bill and the Labour Bill.

In light of the discussion, the Employer members also would like to recommend that the Government step up its efforts to ensure that labour inspectors are properly trained, have the necessary resources and are able to detect cases of child labour, and that the Government guarantee that standards providing for penalties, in the case of violation of provisions on the engagement of children and young people in work, are applied effectively.

We insist that, in addition to these measures, it is essential to implement strategic policies aimed at addressing the root causes, risk factors and socio-economic circumstances that drive or result in the exploitation of children.

Lastly, the Employer members encourage the Government to continue to work with the Office, which is already supporting the country, in its efforts to bring its legislation and practice into line with the Convention, and to ensure the protection of children in Gambia.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the oral and written information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted with concern the high incidence of child labour in the country and the numerous gaps remaining in legislation.

Taking into account the discussion, the Committee urged the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to:

- effectively introduce, as soon as possible, compulsory schooling up to the minimum age for admission to employment or work of 14 years;
- ensure that a minimum age for admission to apprenticeship of at least 14 years is established by law in both the formal and informal economy and that the types of activities, the number of hours and the conditions under which children under 14 years can carry out light work are introduced in the revision of the Children's Bill and the Labour Bill;
- intensify its efforts to ensure that labour inspectors are adequately trained and resourced to be able to detect cases of child labour;
- ensure that regulations providing for sanctions in case of violation of provisions on the employment of children and young persons are effectively enforced;
- implement strategic policies aimed at addressing the root causes, risk factors and socio-economic circumstances that lead to or result in the exploitation of children; and
- continue to work with the ILO with a view to bringing legislation and practice in line with the Convention.

The Committee requested the Government to continue to avail itself of ILO technical assistance to ensure full and expedited implementation of the Convention in law and practice.

The Committee further requested the Government to provide a detailed report on the measures taken to implement the above recommendations before 1 September 2024.

Government representative – The Government of Gambia acknowledges receipt of the conclusions from the Committee and duly noted all the measures put forward. The Government recognizes the importance of the Convention, and it will make all efforts to ensure the full implementation of the Convention. We also took due note of the various concerns raised by countries, employers and workers. The Government will ensure that it will fully address all the concerns raised and will utilize ILO technical assistance to ensure the effective implementation of the Convention. We will also work with the ILO regarding legislation and other matters. Gambia hopes that the conclusions agreed here will continue to have a relevance beyond the original composition and that the concerns raised will be watered up to produce the highest possible effect.

Georgia (ratification: 1993)

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100)

Written information provided by the Government

The promotion of decent working conditions for all Georgian workers irrespective of their sex has always been a top priority for the Government. To this end, Georgia has made remarkable progress in ensuring gender equality at work and promoting women's economic empowerment through legislative amendments and policy reforms. The promotion of equal pay for equal work started with the creation of a legislative basis. The latest amendments to the labour legislation outstandingly strengthen the legal framework for the protection of the labour rights of Georgian workers. Amendments include the adoption of the principle of equal pay for equal work, the definition of harassment in the workplace (including sexual harassment) as a form of discrimination, and a definition of sexual harassment. Discrimination in employment and precontractual relations (including when posting a job vacancy and at the selection stage), and in professional activities is prohibited.

Apart from the Labour Code of Georgia, all the main legislative acts of Georgia include clauses prohibiting all types of discrimination. In addition, there is a special law against discrimination, namely, the Law on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination adopted on 2 May 2014. The purpose of the Law is to eliminate every form of discrimination and to ensure equal rights for every natural and legal person under the legislation of Georgia, irrespective of race, skin colour, language, sex, age, citizenship, origin, place of birth or residence, property or social status, religion or belief, national, ethnic or social origin, profession, marital status, health, disability, sexual orientation, gender identity and expression, political or other opinions, or other characteristics. This Law is of paramount importance for the development and well-being of Georgian society. The Law includes the definition of direct and indirect discrimination and has introduced the concept of multiple discrimination and the prohibition of supporting or encouraging discriminatory actions.

The amendments of 19 February 2019 to the above-mentioned Law further specify the sectors and relations where discrimination is prohibited. Namely, the legislative changes address both procedural and substantive issues: the deadline for appealing to the court has been extended for individuals, the mandate of the Public Defender of Georgia has been strengthened and sexual harassment has been regulated. According to the Law, the concept of equal treatment shall also apply to:

- (a) employment and precontractual relationships, including:

- (a.a) selection criteria and recruitment conditions, access to career development promotion, professional hierarchy at all levels and irrespective of the branch of activity;
- (a.b) access to all types and to all levels of vocational guidance, vocational training, advanced vocational training and retraining, including practical work experience;
- (a.c) employment and working conditions, including dismissals and pay;
- (b) membership of, and involvement in, an organization of workers or employers, or any organization whose members carry on a particular profession, including the benefits provided by such organizations.
- (c) social protection and healthcare, education and the provision of goods and services, including:
 - (c.a) social protection, social security, social benefits, and others;
 - (c.b) healthcare services;
 - (c.c) access to education;
 - (c.d) access to and supply of goods and services, which are available to the public (including living space).

To promote the employment of Georgian citizens, the Government established the State Employment Support Agency under the Ministry of Internal Affairs. The promotion of employment and an active labour market policy (ALMP) as a measure to promote employment is one of the top priorities of the Georgian Government. The Government has been implementing an ALMP since 2015, which includes training and retraining, as well as employment support for various groups, including people with disabilities, women and young people, vocational counselling consultations, and career guidance. Women are a top priority when implementing employment support programmes. All the employment services are free of charge; the source of financing is the State budget.

The national labour and employment policy strategy envisages means of promoting gender equality and women's participation in the labour market and entrepreneurship. The Labour Code encourages a work-life balance for both parents. Higher standards of maternity leave and parental leave that can be used by both parents have been introduced. In addition, the Labour Code provides that women who are breastfeeding infants under the age of 12 months may request an additional break of at least one hour a day. The Code also provides for additional unpaid parental leave of 12 weeks until the child turns 5. Additional parental leave may be granted to any employee who actually cares for the child. It should also be noted that the Labour Code guarantees the rights of a legal representative or supporter of a person with a disability who may, in addition to rest days, enjoy an additional paid rest day once a month, or agree on working time other than that provided for by the internal labour regulations. The Code also guarantees access to training. After the end of a period of maternity leave, parental leave or newborn adoption leave, at the request of the employee, the employer shall ensure that the qualifications of the employee are upgraded if this is necessary for the performance of the work under the employment agreement, and does not impose a disproportionate burden on the employer.

The Code introduces the notion of part-time employment. The Code provides for the protection of part-time workers from discrimination based on their status. Namely, part-time employees shall not be treated in a less favourable manner than comparable full-time employees solely because they work part-time, unless different treatment is justified on objective grounds. The employment agreement with an employee shall not be terminated because of the employee's refusal to transfer from full-time to part-time work, or from part-time to full-time work, unless the employer has the right to terminate the employment agreement with the employee, subject to the relevant preconditions.

Following the large-scale labour law reform, a fully-fledged Labour Inspection Office has been in place since 1 January 2021. As per the Law of Georgia on Labour Inspection, among others, the Labour Inspection Office is entitled to supervise the implementation of standards related to the prohibition of discrimination in labour relations, including precontractual relations. This includes investigating allegations of discrimination, identifying instances of discrimination and applying relevant administrative measures, if confirmed. Since its creation, the institutional development of the Labour Inspection Office has been constantly ongoing, meaning that two regional offices have been opened, the budget and number of inspectors have increased, and labour inspectors are being trained and retrained, among other developments. In order for the Labour Inspection Office to increase action and ensure effective oversight, a new special division dealing with workplace discrimination, the prohibition of sexual harassment and gender equality issues has been created. During the reference period 2021–23, the Labour Inspection Office identified 144 cases of discrimination, with 120 concerning precontractual relations and 14 concerning ongoing or terminated employment. Additionally, one confirmed case of sexual harassment and two cases of employer inaction were identified. Moreover, during the mentioned reference period, unhealthy or hostile work environments were identified in 15 business entities, affecting both current and terminated employment relations. Furthermore, 57 cases of gender-based discrimination were identified, both in precontractual and current or terminated labour relations.

The Labour Inspection Office prioritizes raising awareness of workers' rights. Since 2021, it has conducted over 250 information meetings, with more than 100 focused on recent legal changes to labour rights. To further educate the public, the Labour Inspection Office has produced 29 videos, including four specifically on preventing discrimination in the workplace. These resources, along with various manuals (four on discrimination topics), are available on the website of the Labour Inspection Office (lio.moh.gov.ge), Facebook and YouTube. Article 4 of the Organic Law of Georgia, the Georgian Labour Code, provides that "employers shall ensure equal remuneration for female and male employees for equal work performed".

To effectively implement the equal pay for work of equal value principle, a proper methodology for employers, and the Labour Inspection Office, is of utmost importance. To this end, since 2021 UN Women has been supporting Georgia in developing the methodology used to calculate equal remuneration. Currently, with the support of UN Women, work on two documents is under way, namely a methodological document on the principle of equal remuneration in labour relations and detailed instructions or guidelines on the prevention, detection and response to unfair remuneration. This will help close the gender pay gap and ensure equal pay for equal work. The National Statistics Office of Georgia (GEOSTAT) analyses adjusted gender pay gaps, which consider various factors beyond gender. This data helps to monitor progress towards equal pay. The adjusted gender pay gap takes into account the demographic (age, education, marital status, place of residence – region/type of settlement, etc.) and job characteristics (economic activity, occupation, etc.) of the individuals. The adjusted gender pay gap is calculated using a regression model for the employed population aged between 15 and 64 years. Since the current statistical survey of enterprises and organizations contains very poor information on individual and job characteristics, the calculation of the adjusted gender pay gap data in the Labour Force Survey is used, covering more than 15,000 respondents quarterly. The adjusted gender pay gap has been launched by GEOSTAT, with the technical assistance of UN Women since 2021. The recent statistics on the gender pay gap in Georgia are available on the GEOSTAT website.

In addition, the Tripartite Social Partnership Commission's action plan outlines various topics for discussion through social dialogue, leading to tripartite decisions. These include further improvements to labour legislation, the feasibility of ratifying specific ILO Conventions, such as those relating to wage policy (minimum wages), and unemployment insurance. Therefore, the Government acknowledges that gaps may still exist and expresses its commitment to working with the social partners to promote decent working conditions for all men and women, free from discrimination.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the Government representative of Georgia, Deputy Minister of Internally Displaced Persons from the Occupied Territories, Labour, Health and Social Affairs of Georgia, to take the floor.

Government representative – On behalf of the Government of Georgia, I have the honour of presenting the measures that the Government has undertaken towards gender equality and equal remuneration for men and women and of introducing future steps planned to decrease the pay gap in the country. In my address, I will also consider the observations raised by the Committee of Experts.

Until 2013, Georgia had the most unregulated labour legislation, with no enforcement mechanisms in place for the Labour Code. It resulted in many inequalities in the labour market, including in unequal remuneration for men and women. Over the last couple of years, Georgia has made significant progress in adopting legislative changes and implementing policy reforms to foster gender equality and encourage the economic empowerment of women. Georgian law and policy have been improved to promote gender equality, to prohibit all forms of discrimination towards women and girls and to encourage women's participation in the political, economic and social spheres in the country. Promotion of equal pay for equal work started by creating a legislative basis. The latest amendments to the labour legislation outstandingly strengthen the legal framework for the protection of labour rights of Georgian workers. Amendments included the adoption of the principle of equal pay for equal work and the definition of harassment in the workplace (including sexual harassment) as a form of discrimination. Also, discrimination in employment and precontractual relations, and in employment and professional activities is prohibited.

Apart from the Labour Code of Georgia, all legislative acts include clauses prohibiting all types of discrimination. In addition, we have a special law against discrimination, namely, the Law on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination, adopted in 2014. The purpose of the Law is to eliminate every form of discrimination and to ensure equal rights for every natural and legal person under the legislation of Georgia, irrespective of race, skin colour, language, sex, age, citizenship, or other characteristics. Besides, the Law includes the definition of direct and indirect discrimination and has introduced the concept of multiple discrimination and the prohibition of supporting or encouraging discriminatory actions. The amendments of 2019 to the mentioned Law further specified the sectors and relations where discrimination is prohibited regarding both procedural and substantive issues: the deadline for appealing to the court was extended to individuals; the mandate of the public defender of Georgia was strengthened; and sexual harassment was regulated.

According to the above-mentioned Law, the concept of equal treatment should also apply to:

- (a) employment and precontractual relationships, including:

- (i) selection criteria and recruitment conditions, access to career development promotion, professional hierarchy at all levels and whatever the branch of activity;
 - (ii) employment and working conditions, including dismissals and pay;
- (b) membership of, and involvement in, an organization of workers or employers, or any organization whose members carry out a particular profession, including the benefits provided for by such organizations;
- (c) social protection and healthcare, education, and supply of goods and services, including:
 - (i) social protection, social security, social benefits and others;
 - (ii) healthcare services;
 - (iii) access to education.

In order to promote the employment of Georgian citizens, the Government established a legal entity, the State Employment Support Agency. The promotion of employment and active labour market policy is one of the top priorities of the Georgian Government. The Government has been implementing the policy since 2015, which includes training and employment support for different groups, including persons with disabilities, women and young people, and consultations and career guidance. Women are a top priority when implementing employment support programmes. All the employment services are free of charge, the source of financing being the State budget. The National Labour and Policy Strategy envisages issues of promoting equality and women's participation in the labour market and entrepreneurship.

The Labour Code encourages a work-life balance for both parents. Higher standards of maternity and paternal leave that can be used by both parents have been introduced. Apart from that, the Labour Code determines that women who are breastfeeding infants under the age of 12 months may request an additional break of at least one hour a day. The Labour Code also provides for additional unpaid parental leave for 12 weeks until the child turns 5. Additional parental leave may be granted to any employee who actually takes care of the child. The Labour Code guarantees access to training, namely, after the end of a period of maternity leave, parental leave, or newborn adoption leave, upon the request of the employee. The employer shall ensure that the qualifications of the employee are upgraded if it is necessary for the performance of their work under the employment agreement, and does not impose a disproportionate burden on the employee. The Labour Code introduces the notion of part-time employment. The Code provides for the protection of part-time workers from discrimination based on their status: namely, part-time employees shall not be treated in a less favourable manner than comparable full-time employees solely because they work part time, unless the different treatment is justified on objective grounds. An employment agreement shall not be terminated because of the employee's refusal to transfer from full-time to part-time work, or vice versa, unless the employer has the right to terminate the employment agreement according to the relevant preconditions.

In 2023, the Parliament of Georgia adopted the National Concept Document on Women's Economic Empowerment. The framework concept was created with the active support of the United Nations Development Programme. The document aims to establish a framework for women's economic empowerment, taking into account the specific challenges of gender equality in Georgia, which includes interventions at the individual and public levels both in private practices and at the level of State institutions.

The process of creating the document was preceded by conducting interviews with the main actors and stakeholders of economic development in the country to identify the main challenges and opportunities in the direction of women's economic empowerment, and the development of a desk study which gathered the main economic characteristics around the seven drivers of women's economic development and Sustainable Development Goals. It was within the framework of the research that the current trends were identified:

- women constitute the majority of the poor population and this trend is, unfortunately, increasing;
- families of single women are the poorest and the cycle of poverty also passes onto their children;
- due to gender inequality, it is more difficult for women to escape poverty than men;
- in the case of Georgia, gender inequality in labour market participation results in about 11.3 per cent loss of gross domestic product (GDP) per capita.

The National Concept Document on Women's Economic Empowerment is related to the priorities defined by the new Georgia–European Union (EU) Association agenda, which should ensure the political association and economic integration of the country. The concept also echoes the implementation of point 9 of the 12 recommendations of the European Union: consolidated efforts to enhance gender equality and fight violence against women. However, the concept contains an important note regarding equal pay. Since 2021, Georgia has been a member of the Equal Pay International Coalition. Membership of this Coalition is important as Georgia has the opportunity to share best international practices to ensure equality in the labour market and women's economic empowerment. A record of this same content about equal pay can be found in the State Concept on Gender Equality.

In addition, as already mentioned, the Labour Code of Georgia provides for the principle of equal pay for equal work. Therefore, it is important to promote actively the implementation of the measures.

According to the data of the National Statistics Office of Georgia, the unadjusted pay gap in recent years was as follows: 2018, about 35 per cent; 2019, about 36 per cent; 2020, about 32 per cent; 2021, about 31 per cent. But I would like to add that the National Statistics Office of Georgia implemented a methodology for calculating the adjusted gender pay gap in 2021. The statistics based on this methodology are a bit different and look as follows: in 2020, the pay gap was about 21 per cent; in 2021, also about 21 per cent; in 2022, about 23 per cent, so much less than in the case of unadjusted data.

One of the tried-and-tested methods for women's economic empowerment is to employ them in a high-paying sector, such as innovation and technology. For this purpose, Georgia also joined the Generation Equality Forum held in Paris in 2021. The event was held with the support of UN Women and the French Government, and its purpose was to voice specific commitments from the international community to achieve progress in gender equality. In this context, Georgia became a member of two coalitions and undertook commitments to achieve progress in the following directions: gender-based violence, and technology and innovations for gender equality. To ensure the smooth fulfilment of the obligations, a monitoring group was created at the initiative of the Gender Equality Council. An internal action plan was created, the addressees of which are the relevant departments, agencies and institutions. Active work is being carried out, both on the implementation of the action plan and on the monitoring of the performed activities.

The Gender Equality Council conducted a thematic enquiry on women's participation in the shadow economy, and the impact of COVID-19 on their activities within the framework of the Rule of Law Programme of the United States Agency for International Development. The paper identified the main needs related to women's involvement in the shadow economy. Within the scope of the thematic enquiry, 16 recommendations were developed, including an obligation to sign contracts for employers and the creation of minimum working conditions for employed persons, as well as promoting women's involvement in pension accumulation schemes. The thematic group studied practices and experiences in other countries in this regard; recommendations were developed taking them into account and sent to the relevant agencies.

Encouraging the formalization of the economic activity of women employed in the shadow economy – by raising women's awareness and overcoming stereotypical attitudes – is one of the main aims defined in the National Concept Document on Women's Economic Empowerment. In 2022, the Gender Equality Council carried out a thematic enquiry on access to financial resources for women and girls within the framework of the parliamentary oversight function. The representatives of State institutions, the banking and financial sector, civil society, and donor organizations were involved in the research process and presented their opinions.

The assessment identified a number of gaps that still exist and recommends amending legislation and introducing certain policies. To highlight some of them, I would like to draw your attention to specific recommendations: introducing paternity leave through legislative changes; creation of a gender-sensitive working environment; and improvement of gender statistics. The Civil Service Bureau is working on the improvement of the practice of collecting gender-related statistics. In this regard, gender indicators have been identified which will ensure that the Civil Service Bureau analyses gender-related situations in the civil service, and implements a human resources management policy based on gender analyses.

As to enforcement, I would like to once again inform the Committee that, following the large-scale labour law reform, a fully-fledged Labour Inspection Office has been in place since January 2021. The Labour Inspection Office is entitled to supervise the implementation of standards related to the prohibition of discrimination in labour relations, including precontractual relations. This includes investigating allegations of discrimination, identifying instances of discrimination, and applying relevant administrative measures if confirmed.

In the reference period of 2021–23, the Labour Inspection Office identified more than 100 cases of discrimination, 120 concerning precontractual relations and 14 concerning ongoing or terminated employment. Additionally, one confirmed case of sexual harassment and two cases of employer's inaction were identified.

Apart from the above-mentioned steps that have been taken, I would like to highlight the importance of social dialogue in ensuring a decent working environment, and inform the Committee that the Tripartite Social Partnership Commission's action plan outlines various topics for discussion through social dialogue, leading to tripartite decisions.

In conclusion, the Government of Georgia reiterates its unwavering commitment to working with social partners to ensure decent working conditions free from discrimination for all men and women.

Worker members – This is the second time that our Committee has examined the application of the Convention by the Government of Georgia. In its first examination in 2018, our Committee requested the Government to undertake a number of actions, including:

- ensuring that national legislation expressly commits to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value in consultation with the social partners;

- implementing effective enforcement and detection mechanisms to ensure that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is applied in practice; and
- taking steps to raise awareness among workers, employers and their organizations of the laws and procedures available in order to allow them to avail themselves of their rights.

Six years later, the Government has yet to take some concrete measures to give full effect to these conclusions.

In its 2024 observation, the Committee of Experts noted that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is not properly reflected in the legislation: neither the Labour Law, nor the Law on Public Service entitle workers to equal remuneration for work that is entirely different but nonetheless of equal “value”.

We recall that legal provisions that are narrower than the principle laid down in the Convention hinder progress in eradicating gender-based pay discrimination. Therefore, we urge the Government of Georgia to amend the Labour Law and the Law on the Public Service, in cooperation with the social partners, in order to give full legislative expression to the principle of “equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value”.

Furthermore, in line with Article 3 of the Convention, we stress the importance of elaborating techniques and methodologies to measure and compare objectively the relative value of the jobs performed. We recall that, because men and women often perform different jobs that may be valued in different ways by societies, a technique to measure the relative value of jobs with varying content is critical to eliminating discrimination in the remuneration of men and women.

Secondly, we take note of several policy initiatives adopted by the Government of Georgia to address gender inequalities, including the adoption of the State Concept on Gender Equality in December 2022 and the National Concept Document on Women’s Economic Empowerment in March 2023; the 2022–24 Action Plan and communication strategy; and its participation in the Equal Pay International Coalition since 2021. We also note that the Civil Service Bureau started a Gender Impact Assessment of the Civil Service Law to reveal gender inequities in professional development and in work-life balance and pay gaps. In this framework, wages and pay arrangements within the civil service will be analysed to find and address gender discrimination. Finally, we note that a working group was created to conduct a thematic enquiry into the rights of women in the informal economy and the impact of COVID-19 and that this working group issued 29 recommendations.

Despite these efforts, results are slow to materialize, as in most sectors of activity there has been little to no improvement in reducing the gender pay gap.

More specifically, the gender pay gap still stands at 23 per cent. Despite representing 52 per cent of the population, only 40.5 per cent of women participate in the labour market. Furthermore, there appears to be a discrepancy between women’s levels of education in Georgia and their access to gainful employment: 57.9 per cent of unemployed women have obtained higher or secondary vocational education.

This lack of progress has been observed by the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women which expressed its concerns, in its 2023 conclusions, regarding the widening gender gap, despite economic and income growth.

We recall that, to achieve effective equality, it is essential to identify the structural inequalities that disadvantage women and exclude them from acceding to the labour market and to quality jobs, or from enjoying decent work, such as vertical and horizontal occupational segregation and their over-representation in non-standard forms of employment. These include stereotypes about the respective roles of men and women in society, their capabilities and aspirations. Alongside these stereotypes, other phenomena that perpetuate gender inequalities at work need to be addressed, such as the gender remuneration gaps and access to managerial positions, leadership and decision-making roles. The unequal distribution of unpaid care work and its links to motherhood and family responsibilities remains, in this regard, one of the key elements to be addressed, as it is the main reason for women remaining outside the labour force.

We call on the Government of Georgia to take measures to effectively address the persisting horizontal and vertical segregation prevailing in the country, in particular the underlying causes of inequalities in remuneration, such as occupational gender segregation into lower-paying jobs or occupations or positions without career opportunities, including through targeted vocational training, occupational quotas, incentives and awareness-raising activities. We also call on the Government to regularly review wages in sectors in which women are concentrated and to raise the minimum wage, which was last fixed 25 years ago, in 1999.

Finally, we take note of the observations of the Committee of Experts regarding the extension of the mandate of the labour inspectorate in 2020 to enforce the prohibition of discrimination. It appears, however, that in 2021–22, out of 5,295 inspections carried out, no violations regarding equal remuneration were found. Similarly, the courts have reported no cases regarding equal pay between men and women.

We echo the observation of the Committee of Experts that, when no cases or complaints are being lodged, it is likely to indicate a lack of an appropriate legal framework, lack of awareness of rights, lack of confidence in, or absence of practical access to procedures, or fear of reprisals. We call on the Government to take measures to review existing complaint mechanisms so as to ensure that procedures are easily accessible, effective and speedy. We also request the Government to train and raise awareness of labour administration staff, the judiciary and the general population on the principle of the Convention.

Employer members – The Employer members have taken note of the information provided by the Government and would like to thank the representative for the explanations.

Georgia ratified the Convention in 1993. The Committee of Experts made observations on this case in 2018, 2020 and 2023. Today is the second time after 2018 that the Committee has examined the application of the Convention by Georgia.

From the outset, the Employer members want to highlight the importance of the Convention, which is one of the ten ILO fundamental Conventions, which has received 174 ratifications.

The Employer members would like to recall that Article 2 of the Convention requires that States must ensure the application of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value to all workers. We would also like to highlight that, according to Article 4, States shall cooperate, as appropriate, with the employers' and workers' organizations concerned for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the Convention.

The case consists of three parts:

The first is about the national legislation on equal remuneration for work of equal value. In its recent report, the Committee of Experts stressed that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is not properly reflected in the national legislation.

They argue that neither the Labour Law, nor the Law on the Public Service entitle workers to equal remuneration for work of equal value. In its written report of 23 May 2024, the Government argued that the latest amendments to the labour legislation “outstandingly strengthen the legal framework for the protection of the labour rights of Georgian workers”. They mentioned that amendments include the adoption of the principle of equal pay for equal work. Furthermore, reference was made to the special law against discrimination, the Law on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination. The Employer members have taken note of this development. However, we would like to mention the Committee of Experts’ indication that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is not properly reflected in the legislation. Therefore, we urgently ask the Government to provide more detailed information on the recent developments and to report back to the Committee of Experts. Furthermore, we recommend that the Government amend the labour legislation, in cooperation with the representative employers’ and workers’ organizations, in order to implement the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value.

The second part of this case deals with the measures taken by the Government. The Employer members note that several activities have been undertaken by the Government:

- In 2021, Georgia joined the Equal Pay International Coalition.
- In December 2022, the Government adopted a State Concept on Gender Equality.
- In March 2023, it developed a National Concept Document on Women’s Economic Empowerment.
- A subsequent 2022-24 action plan and communication strategy were developed.

In its statement of 23 May 2024, the Government argued that the national labour and employment policy strategy envisages means of promoting gender equality and women’s participation in the labour market and entrepreneurship. For example, the Labour Code encourages a work-life balance for both parents and introduces the notion of part-time employment. However, it should be noted that the Committee of Experts observed in its recent report that there has been little to no improvement in reducing the gender pay gap, despite economic and income growth. Therefore, the Employer members ask the Government to provide detailed information on the specific measures taken to improve the situation on the ground and to provide detailed and comprehensive statistical data on the number of men and women unemployed, disaggregated by economic sector and occupational level. We would also like to recall that the Committee of Experts already requested the Government to step up its efforts to address the underlying causes of inequalities in remuneration.

The third part of this case is about enforcement. In 2020, the Labour Inspection’s mandate was extended to enforce the prohibition of discrimination and section 78 of the Labour Code established sanctions for violating the provision of equal remuneration for equal work. Since 1 January 2021, a Labour Inspection Office has been in place. The Labour Inspection Office is entitled to supervise the implementation of standards related to the prohibition of discrimination in labour relations. This includes investigating allegations of discrimination, identifying instances of discrimination and applying relevant administrative measures, if confirmed. However, the Committee of Experts noted in its latest report that from 2021 to 2022, out of about 5,295 inspections carried out at 2,767 workplaces, no violations regarding equal remuneration were found. Furthermore, courts have reported no cases regarding equal pay between men and women. In its recent report of 23 May 2024, the Government pointed out that during the 2021–23 reference period, the Labour Inspection Office identified 144 cases of discrimination, 120 concerning precontractual relations and 14 concerning ongoing or terminated employment. The Employer members have taken note of the ongoing developments, especially that two regional offices have been opened, the budget and number of inspectors have increased, and labour inspectors are trained and retrained. However, we ask the Government to provide detailed and comprehensive information on its efforts to train and raise awareness on the principles of the Convention.

We welcome the expressed commitment of the Government to work with the employers' and workers' organizations to promote decent working conditions for all men and women, free from discrimination.

To conclude, we ask the Government to effectively consult and cooperate with the representative employers' and workers' organizations concerning all measures and initiatives they take with regard to the application of the Convention.

Worker member, Georgia – It is my honour to speak on behalf of the Georgian Trade Union Confederation (GTUC). Despite a number of significant reforms carried out in Georgia with the participation and involvement of the GTUC in recent years, gender inequality in Georgia remains a challenge.

It should also be noted that recently, in April of this year, the Parliament of Georgia abolished the gender quotas established in the Electoral Code, which is another step backwards on the road towards ensuring gender equality. To this day, stereotypes associated with women in leadership and decision-making positions are still deeply rooted in society.

Since there is an imbalance and inconsistency between family responsibilities and work, women are affected by pregnancy, birth and childcare. Gender inequality is clearly visible in official statistics. According to GEOSTAT, the Georgian Department of Statistics, women comprise 52 per cent of Georgia's population, only 40.5 per cent of working-age women participate in the labour market and we have a 22 per cent gap between the economic activity of men and that of women. It is also important to note that the level of education of women is not properly reflected in their economic activity. Indeed, 57.9 per cent of unemployed women have completed higher or secondary vocational education. This is accompanied by a noticeable gender division of professions and a wage gap. According to the World Bank, more efficient use of the economic resources of women in Georgia, in particular eliminating gender inequality in the labour market, will lead to an increase in GDP of 11.3 per cent.

Today, the gender pay gap is an important issue in terms of women's economic activity. According to statistics from 2022, the gap between the average salary of women and men in Georgia was 31.7 per cent. This wage gap is decreasing, although the decline has slowed in the last three years. According to GEOSTAT the adjusted wage gap in Georgia, according to statistics from 2022, was 23 per cent. As mentioned many times before, wages are traditionally lowest in areas where the largest number of women are employed and concentrated.

In 2018 the Committee considered Georgia's case because of its non-implementation of the Convention, and, as a result, Georgia took some steps during the labour reforms of 2020, introduced several changes to labour legislation and also introduced one article into the Labour Code, article 4, according to which employers are obliged to provide equal pay for men and women for equal work. Unequal pay is already considered as one form of discrimination. Starting from 2021, control of this issue, also covering the pay gap and discrimination in general, has been entrusted to the Labour Inspection Service.

The Labour Code does not have any additional provisions regarding the rules for calculating remuneration, institutional transparency of the above and/or other similar aspects.

In another law, also on the public service, we have a definition in article 57 according to which the remuneration system for public servants is based on the principles of transparency and fairness, which imply equal pay for equal work.

As we see from both definitions which we have in the Labour Code and in the Law on the Public Service, both contain a legal flaw and do not comply with the Convention, which refers to work of equal value, not equal work in general as it is in our national legislation. It also does not address any specific mechanism for women and men to receive equal pay, as there is currently no methodology to guide employers to define “work of equal value.” As a result, this only adds a declarative value to the specified normative mechanism and cannot be presented as an effective mechanism.

As we know, the Convention provides a definition of “equal remuneration for work of equal value”, which is different from the Georgian standard and not only implies equal remuneration for persons working in the same position, but also evaluates the work of persons employed in different positions and compares these values against each other. Thus, according to the ILO standard, within an enterprise (or any organization), the value of work performed in all positions must be assessed, and work of equal value must be paid equally.

Without a methodology for assessing equal work, it is difficult, if not impossible, to enforce the obligation to pay equal pay for work of equal value. In the future, we also should take into consideration that the wage gap will also create a gender gap in pension provision, so a pension gap, because Georgia switched to an accumulative pension scheme several years ago.

Therefore, it is not surprising that neither the court nor the Labour Inspection or Public Defenders Office has a single case where the issue of the gender pay gap is considered; all three institutions which are dealing with non-discrimination cases and the pay gap have had not one single case, even until today.

To eliminate wage inequality, it is also necessary to define in legislation a decent minimum wage and collect and analyse wage data. Also, control over the implementation in practice of the principle of equal pay for work of equal value should be carried out through control bodies.

It should be noted that the GTUC has repeatedly put forward an initiative on a decent minimum wage for consideration by the Tripartite Commission and the Parliament as well, but to no avail.

Therefore, the Government needs to make appropriate steps in legislation and practice in order to implement the Convention and also implement all recommendations of the Committee of Experts from the past years.

In particular, in consultation with social partners, the following steps should be taken: (i) defining the term and principle of equal pay for work of equal value in labour legislation, both in the Labour Code and in the Law on the Public Service; (ii) creating a methodology for assessing/measuring the value of work; (iii) creating and implementing effective rules for pay transparency systems; (iv) ensuring maternity protection according to international labour standards; and (v) ratifying the ILO Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131), to establish a minimum wage that takes into account the economic factors of workers and their families, including the current level of economic development, based on social dialogue, and a mechanism for the annual adjustment/revision of the minimum wage.

We do hope that the Georgian Government will make further progress in the process of implementing ILO Conventions and international labour standards and will adopt the relevant legislation and take steps as already provided in the recommendations of the ILO Committee of Experts.

Government member, Belgium – I have the honour to speak on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States. The candidate countries Albania, Montenegro and North Macedonia, and the European Free Trade Agreement country Norway, member of the European Economic Area, align themselves with this statement.

The EU and its Member States are committed to the respect, protection and fulfilment of human rights, including labour rights. We promote universal ratification and effective implementation of ILO fundamental Conventions and support the ILO in developing and promoting international labour standards and supervising their application.

The EU and its Member States granted Georgia candidate status in December 2023 on the understanding that Georgia takes relevant steps in the area of the proper functioning of democratic institutions and reforms related to justice and the rule of law. Since 2016, an association agreement between the EU and Georgia is in force, and together we have been deepening political association and economic integration with the European Union, including through a commitment to respect and implement the internationally recognized core labour standards, as embodied in the ILO fundamental Conventions.

We acknowledge that in recent years, Georgia has adopted important reforms of its labour legislation, including key amendments to the Labour Code in 2020, which, among others, introduced the principle of equal pay for equal work. However, despite the requests of the Committee of Experts and the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards of 2018, the principles of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is not properly reflected in the legislation. In line with the observations of the Committee of Experts, we encourage the Government to amend labour legislation to include the principles of “equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value” and to revise relevant sections of the 2015 Law on the Public Service to include the concept of “work of equal value”.

We welcome that Georgia has developed several instruments to reduce the gender pay gap and promote equal remuneration, such as the National Concept Document on Women’s Economic Empowerment and the Gender Impact Assessment of the Civil Service Law. The country has also joined the Equal Pay International Coalition and adopted in 2022 the State Concept on Gender Equality, which aims to eliminate all forms of gender-based discrimination.

We however note that despite these and other measures, horizontal and vertical segregation persists in the country. The EU and its Member States encourage the Government to increase its efforts to address unequal remuneration and provide additional information on the measures taken within the framework of the previously mentioned instruments. Regarding the Gender Impact Assessment of the Civil Service Law, we echo the call of the Committee of Experts to provide a summary of its findings, as well as to continue providing to the Committee gender-disaggregated data on employment in the country.

As regards enforcement, we welcome the continued development and capacity-building of the Labour Inspection Office, tasked, among others, with the investigation of allegations of discrimination and the organization of awareness-raising trainings. We also note, from the Government’s information, the establishment of a special division to investigate workplace discrimination and sexual harassment. Despite these measures, the Committee notes that in the 2021–22 period, the Labour Inspection Office did not find any violations related to equal remuneration. Moreover, the additional written information submitted by the Government does not develop on whether the trainings organized by the Labour Inspection Office included components on equal pay.

In line with the General Survey of 2012, we would like to recall that when no cases or complaints are being lodged it is a likely indication of a lack of an appropriate legal framework; lack of awareness of rights; lack of confidence in, or absence of practical access to, procedures; or fear of reprisals. We encourage the Government to provide more information on measures taken to organize awareness-raising trainings for various categories of State officials, workers and employers, and on the accessibility and availability of existing complaint mechanisms.

We welcome the Government's recognition that gaps may still exist in their legislation and the commitment to collaborating with the social partners to ensure decent work for all. The EU and its Member States are ready to cooperate constructively with Georgia with the aim of strengthening the Government's capacity to address the issues raised in the Committee of Experts' report.

Worker member, Belgium – The Committee of Experts noted in 2023 that across all economic activities, women earn 69 per cent of the average male salary, a wage gap of 31 per cent. In some sectors, women's salaries are half those of men. That is the result of persistent horizontal and vertical segregation in the labour market.

This striking wage gap owes to a series of factors. The perpetuation of gender stereotypes in education leads a high proportion of women and girls to study in fields seen as "feminine". Consequently, they are limited to poorly paid jobs and sectors such as education and social care and are employed mainly in the informal economy as care assistants, nannies or cleaners.

Even if they have a higher level of education than men, women undertake a disproportionate amount of household tasks and childcare, which are unpaid. They are also often subject to discriminatory social norms.

These conditions prevent them from gaining professional experience and hinder their access to training, which also has an impact on their salaries.

It is therefore vital to close the gap between women's and men's levels of economic activity, particularly by endeavouring to ensure a better division of domestic tasks. An equal wage for work of equal value would encourage women to increase their involvement in economic activities and would certainly influence family decisions. There is also a need to combat gender stereotypes that channel women into less well-paid areas of training and sectors of activity.

In particular, we would like to highlight the impact of gaps in social protection on poverty among women. Inequality and labour informality lead to a reduction or deprivation of the rights to work, decent working and living conditions, and social protection. This is particularly flagrant when it comes to pension rights and the inequalities suffered by women throughout their professional lives that expose older women workers who are in the most precarious position to poverty.

There are also many problems in relation to maternity protection. Issues surrounding maternity allowances in the private sector remain an acute problem since it is still up to employers to decide whether to provide maternity pay beyond that granted by the State. In practice, legislation leads women employees to return to work as soon as possible in order to earn a wage, violating their right to maternity protection. Moreover, given that their low salaries and insufficient financial resources do not allow them to pay for childcare, women are often forced to leave their jobs to look after their children. Lastly, the Labour Code does not afford protection against dismissal following the expiry of maternity leave in the private sector.

In order to reach minimum standards of maternity protection in Georgia, including ensuring that women and their children can stay in proper conditions of health and with a suitable standard of living, it is vital that the Government ratifies the Maternity Protection Convention, 2000 (No. 183).

Specific measures should also be adopted to grant informal economy workers access to jobs in the formal economy, enabling them to benefit from social guarantees and labour rights protection.

In conclusion, reforms to social protection systems can alleviate inequalities and help extend social protection coverage to women excluded from it and at risk of poverty. This requires appropriate non-contributory social protection schemes such as base pensions, sufficient maternity allowances and adequate minimum unemployment benefits in order to combat inequality and poverty.

Worker member, Sweden – I am speaking on behalf of the Nordic trade unions in Sweden, Finland, Norway, Denmark and Iceland. Georgian labour law fails to capture the concept of “work of equal value” which is a breach of the Convention. Georgia has a gender pay gap of a staggering 31.7 per cent, the global average being 20 per cent, and I might add that in Sweden we have 10 per cent, so a lower number is possible. To close the pay gap, the Government of Georgia needs to adapt labour law to the Convention and then make sure that employers apply the law.

In 2021–22, labour inspectors in Georgia visited 2,767 workplaces, and they did not find any violations regarding equal remuneration. And this in a country where the gender pay gap is 31.7 per cent. This suggests that labour inspectors need to receive training on equal pay for work of equal value.

Gender pay gaps have a multitude of reasons, and all of them must be addressed in order to close the gap. What Georgia has in common with many countries in the world is a segregated labour market where you traditionally will find female workers in sectors with low wages and male workers in sectors with high wages. Even when the work is of equal value it is not paid equally.

As parents we can encourage our sons and daughters to make educational and professional choices outside of gender stereotypes, but we need the Government to have legislation in place that takes into account the concept of “work of equal value”. The Government should also work with incentives and awareness-raising activities; this includes encouraging girls to study in science, technology, engineering and mathematics (STEM) programmes at university. Currently only 16 per cent of graduates from STEM programmes are women.

In Georgia, as in many other countries, women are now better educated than men. Despite this fact that more women than men have received a higher education, the pay gap is still 31.7 per cent. In Georgia, having a Y chromosome really pays off.

The Nordic trade unions call upon the Government of Georgia to amend the labour legislation to capture the concept of work of equal value, to give adequate training to labour inspectors and to work with incentives and awareness-raising activities in order to help the young to choose a profession in spite of existing stereotypes.

Observer, Building and Wood Workers' International (BWI) – Various measures could be applied to close the gender pay gap and ensure equal pay for equal work in compliance with the ILO Convention. One such measure is to set a decent minimum wage. Georgia's private sector minimum wage was, as mentioned by a previous speaker, updated in 1999 and currently stands at 20 laris, which is equal to US$7.50 per month. This makes it one of the lowest monthly minimum wages in the world.

It is unlikely that anyone in Georgia earns 20 laris per month, but instead Georgia's median wage was 1,040 laris, which equals US$390, in 2022. However, it gives employers a powerful tool to manipulate workers when a fixed part of the wage is secured at the minimum wage level and the rest is paid as a bonus.

An extremely low minimum wage does not allow for an effective and equal wage system in the country. Low-paid sectors stagnate as low-wage sectors for decades. Women's segregation by industry and occupation locks them into economic activities with lower earnings. Often, female jobs are underappreciated and under-remunerated compared to work of equal value performed by men when determining wage rates. This violates the key concept of the Convention, which defines equal value as equal or identical work in equal, identical or similar conditions or different kinds of work that, based on an objective criterion, are of equal value.

The conclusions of the ILO expert meetings on wage setting and living wages of this year established, as has been done many times in this house, that collective bargaining and statutory minimum wages, through tripartite social dialogue, should be the proper modality for setting and adjusting wages. However, the wage-setting method aimed at achieving this should also ensure gender equality and non-discrimination and that wage policies and wage-setting mechanisms should promote gender equality, equity and non-discrimination.

We hence argue that adjusting the minimum wage to allow for a decent standard of living for workers and their families will be instrumental in reducing the gender pay gap in the economy.

Therefore, we call on the Office to provide technical assistance to the social partners in Georgia to establish an effective mechanism for increasing the minimum wage, to close the gender pay gap in Georgia, as well as to reach a wage level that is necessary to afford a decent standard of living for all workers and their families.

Chairperson – I can see no more requests for the floor, so now I invite the Government representative of Georgia to make her concluding remarks.

Government representative – I do not really have much to add for the moment. The fact is that we have done much, and we have to do more. We definitely do understand that there is a difference between equal remuneration for equal work and equal remuneration for work of equal value. But the issue is that we have to elaborate and implement relevant methodology regarding the assessment of work of equal value, to have clarity in the understanding of its content and procedure, and currently we are working on it. In conclusion, I would like to thank the ILO for its permanent interest and support to Georgia.

Employer members – The Employer members would like to thank the Government of Georgia and the various speakers who took the floor for their interventions and information provided of which we fully have taken note.

We reiterate the importance of the Convention as one of the ten fundamental Conventions with a very high ratification rate. We welcome signs of the Government's willingness and expressed commitment to improve the situation concerning the application of the Convention and ask the Government to report on the progress being made.

We recommend that the national authorities effectively consult and cooperate with the representative employers' and workers' organizations. Specifically, we recommend that the Government:

- First, further amends the labour legislation, in cooperation with the representative employers' and workers' organizations, to implement the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value.
- Second, take further measures to implement the Convention and to provide information on the progress achieved in this regard.
- Third, provide detailed information on specific measures taken under the framework of the Equal Pay International Coalition, the State Concept on Gender Equality, the National Concept Document on Women's Economic Empowerment and the associated 2022–24 Action Plan.
- Fourth, continue to provide statistical data on the number of men and women employed, disaggregated by economic sector and occupational level.
- Fifth, provide information on efforts to train and raise awareness. Finally, provide information to the Committee of Experts before its next meeting on the issues discussed and measures taken.

Worker members – We thank the Government of Georgia for its participation and its remarks. We also thank all the delegates who took the floor.

We take note of the persisting gender pay gap and the structural horizontal and vertical segregation prevailing in the country which prevent women from accessing higher-paying jobs and from fully participating in the labour market.

The Government must take proactive measures, in cooperation with the employers' and workers' organizations concerned, to give full effect to the provisions of the Convention, in line with the comments of the Committee of Experts.

More specifically, we call on the Government to amend the Labour Law and the Law on the Public Service, in cooperation with the social partners, in order to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value.

We request the Government to take measures in cooperation with the social partners to effectively address the persisting horizontal and vertical segregation prevailing in the country, in particular the underlying causes of inequalities in remuneration, such as occupational gender segregation into lower-paying jobs or occupations or positions without career opportunities, including through targeted vocational training, occupational quotas, incentives and awareness-raising activities.

We also request the Government to elaborate techniques and methodologies to measure and compare objectively the relative value of the jobs performed in line with Article 3 of the Convention. Guidance and technical assistance from the ILO could be sought in that regard.

Noting that the gender pay gap still stands at 23 per cent, we urge the Government to regularly review wages in sectors in which women are concentrated and to raise the minimum wage, which was last fixed 25 years ago in 1999.

In addition, we request the Government to take measures to implement effective enforcement and detection mechanisms. The Government should also review existing complaint mechanisms so as to guarantee easily accessible, effective and speedy procedures to workers. We further request the Government to train and raise awareness of labour inspectors, judges, lawyers, public officials, workers, employers and their organizations, as well as the public, on the principle of this Convention.

Finally, we request the Government to regularly collect and analyse statistical data on the number of men and women employed, disaggregated by economic sector and occupational level, as a useful basis for policymaking. We call on the Government of Georgia to accept a technical advisory mission.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

Taking into account the discussion, the Committee urged the Government to take effective measures, in consultation with the representative employers' and workers' organizations, to:

- amend the Labour Law and the Law on the Public Service in order to give full legislative expression to the principle of "equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value";
- effectively address the persisting horizontal and vertical segregation prevailing in the country, including through targeted vocational training, occupational quotas, incentives and awareness-raising activities;
- regularly review wages in sectors in which women are concentrated;
- implement effective enforcement and detection mechanisms;
- review existing complaint mechanisms so as to ensure that procedures are easily accessible, effective and speedy;
- provide detailed and comprehensive information on its efforts to train and raise public awareness on the principle of the Convention;
- regularly collect and analyse statistical data on the number of men and women employed, disaggregated by economic sector and occupational level; and
- provide the Committee of Experts with any outstanding information it requested.

The Committee invited the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance.

Guinea (ratification: 1961)

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105)

Written information provided by the Government

The Government communicated the following written information and a copy of Decree No. 2016/309/PRG/SGG of 31 October 2016 establishing the prison regulations, Act No. 2015/009/AN on preserving the public order and Act No. 2005/013/AN of 4 July 2005 issuing regulations for associations in Guinea.

The Guinean legal framework provides a solid basis for the protection of persons against labour exploitation and strictly prohibits forced or compulsory labour in all its forms. This prohibition is contained in the provisions of the Transitional Charter, the Criminal Code and the Labour Code. In this connection, the Government notes the recommendations of the Committee of Experts to continue providing information on any criminal penalty handed down for violations of the provisions of Act No. L/2005/013/AN establishing the system of associations (under section 37 of the Act), and, where possible, on the acts giving rise to these convictions. It undertakes to send a copy of any new legislation amending the Act establishing the system of associations to the Committee of Experts as soon as it is adopted.

The Government notes the recommendations of the Committee of Experts to take the necessary measures to ensure that no punishments involving compulsory labour, including as part of a prison sentence, may be imposed on persons who express certain political opinions or who peacefully express views ideologically opposed to the established system, including in the context of peaceful public demonstrations. The Government indicates that with regard to the abolition of punishments involving compulsory prison work, section 38 of the Criminal Code provides for three types of alternative punishment for such offences, namely a fine paid daily, community service and reparations. Community service, which involves performing work for the benefit of the community as a whole, is explicitly set out in the draft to ensure that such work is not akin to punishment by forced labour as prohibited by Guinean law and the Constitution.

Section 44 of the Criminal Code provides that a sentence of community service may not be applied to a person who refuses to serve it or who does not attend the hearing. The person involved is reminded of their right to refuse, after being declared guilty and the determination of the sentence. However, the Government insists that the Committee's recommendations will be taken into account within the framework of the reform undertaken by the Government. The reform processes started by the transitional authorities provide for the adoption of a new Constitution and an overhaul of the political system, which will undoubtedly lead to a revision of the Charter of Political Parties. The Government informs the Committee that the sentences issued in accordance with the above-mentioned provisions very often concern the organization of or participation in unnotified or banned demonstrations. Prison sentences of 4 to 18 months are often handed down. There have been no court proceedings based on the provisions of the Criminal Code referred to by the Committee of Experts and, as a result, no sentences have been issued by invoking these provisions. The Government will keep the Committee informed of any future developments in this regard.

With regard to press offences, no such offence has been sentenced with compulsory prison labour. It should be noted that compulsory prison labour is no longer authorized in accordance with the provisions of the 2016 Criminal Code. Lastly, with regard to section 660 of the Criminal Code and sections 30 and 31 of Act No. 91/02/CTRN establishing a Charter of Political Parties, to date there have been no court proceedings on the basis of these provisions and therefore no sentence has been handed down in this area. The Government will keep the Committee of Experts informed of any future developments in this regard.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the representative of the Government, the Minister of Labour and the Civil Service, to take the floor.

Government representative – It is an honour for me, on behalf of the Government of Guinea, to take the floor before the Committee that you have the important responsibility of guiding. I thank you for giving me the opportunity to present and defend Guinea's position in the face of the allegations that provisions of the Convention are violated in the execution of prison sentences imposed on persons who express certain political opinions or who peacefully express views ideologically opposed to the established system, including in the context of peaceful public demonstrations. These accusations, which tarnish the image of my country, are entirely baseless. By way of background, since gaining independence Guinea has participated in all United Nations human rights bodies. As such, as a member of the ILO since 1959, it has ratified all the Conventions linked to fundamental principles and rights at work, including the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29); the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87); the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98); the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100); the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111); the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138); the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182); the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187); and the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189). These ratifications demonstrate my country's respect for human rights.

Guinea has made efforts to adopt measures to align its national legislation with international labour standards. To that end, it has revised its Criminal Code to remove sentences involving hard labour and has included in the draft labour code, which is under review, provisions that prohibit labour exploitation. The observations of the Committee of Experts that are the reason for our appearance before this Committee relate to non-respect for the provisions of Article 1 of the Convention. It should be noted that my country ratified the Convention on 11 July 1961, four years after the Convention's adoption by the ILO, three years after gaining independence and two years after joining the Organization, thereby demonstrating its will to adhere to the principles and regulations established to protect individual well-being and to apply them, whatever their category.

In its observations, the Committee of Experts refers to several provisions of national legislation providing for prison sentences involving compulsory labour under Decree No. 247 of 20 September 1972 concerning the establishment and structure of the prison administration and Decree No. 624 of 13 November 1981 supplementing Decree No. 247 of 1972. Firstly, I would like to inform the Committee that the Decrees to which the Committee of Experts refers, and which form the basis for these allegations, were abrogated in 2016 by means of Decree No. 309 establishing a legal regime for prisons. I note that a copy of that Decree was submitted to the Committee of Experts on 20 May 2024. It is important to highlight that the adoption of Decree No. 309 led to significant improvements in conditions of imprisonment for convicted persons in Guinea. Contrary to Decree No. 247 of 1972, the new legislation removed any possibility of compulsory labour in prisons. For all prisoners, from remand prisoners to those who have been convicted, the regulations set out the manner in which sentences must be executed and the related conditions. Firstly, article 14 of Decree No. 309 provides that remand prisoners are not required to undertake prison work in Guinea, but they may, if they wish, request to work. Secondly, article 22 of the Decree indicates clearly that convicted persons must be encouraged to participate in devising their own sentence plan as part of ongoing dialogue. Procedures are also established to regularly revise prisoners' individual plans, with their participation. This is a process of co-construction with detainees, according to their wishes.

Furthermore, it should be highlighted that sentence plans drawn up with the participation of convicted persons must involve, where possible, work, education, preparation for release and other activities, as is done in so-called great democracies. In other words, prison regulations in Guinea provide for the devising of a sentence plan with each detainee. Plans should focus in particular on the assistance to be offered to convicted persons, the possibility of working, access to training or advanced training and preparation for release.

Article 112 of the Decree provides that the work to which convicted persons are assigned may not be considered a sanction or punishment, but a means to allow them to prepare for reintegration into society. Moreover, it provides that, to the extent possible, detainees must be able to choose the type of work that they wish to undertake. Article 113 provides that the working day must not exceed eight hours. Detainees do not work on Sundays or public holidays. This means that, in Guinea, not only do convicted persons have the freedom to choose whether to work or not during their sentences, the work that they undertake is also regulated.

This demonstrates how no element of law or fact can justify the allegations that the Convention's provisions are violated in Guinea. With regard to the request of the Committee of Experts to ensure that no sanctions involving compulsory labour may be imposed, under the application of certain criminal provisions, on persons who express certain political opinions or who express views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system, I am pleased to inform the Committee that, as indicated in our last report on the application of the Convention, no prison sentence involving compulsory labour has been imposed on any individual. I am comfortable saying that: I have been involved in political struggles in my country for ten years.

Firstly, no aspect of the provisions of the Criminal Code to which the Committee of Experts refers imposes compulsory labour on persons convicted of crimes concerning insults or defamation against public administration bodies or public employees, unlawful assemblies or prohibited gatherings. The sentences handed down for such violations are either prison sentences or fines that do not involve compulsory or prison labour. Next, it should be stressed that forced or compulsory labour is prohibited by our laws and the Transitional Charter, and by article 4 of the Labour Code, which provides that forced or compulsory labour is banned in Guinea. I reiterate once more that no prosecutions have been brought and, therefore, no sentences handed down on the basis of the provisions of the Criminal Code mentioned by the Committee of Experts. Clearly, the violation of an established regulation by any individual is sanctioned, but it should be noted that the Guinean legislative framework provides a solid foundation for protecting the fundamental rights of all individuals against labour exploitation and strongly prohibits all forms of forced or compulsory labour. This principle is embodied in the Transitional Charter, article 8 of which provides that fundamental rights and freedoms are recognized and their exercise by citizens guaranteed in the conditions and forms set out in law.

With regard to the application of sentences, the Criminal Code provides for ancillary and complementary penalties, which are added ipso jure to main sentences. A list of such penalties has been drawn up and does not include, in any form, penalties involving forced or compulsory labour for prisoners. The authorities ensure that detention conditions and the treatment of persons deprived of liberty adhere to national law and international standards.

To conclude, I would like to note that no sentence involving forced labour is applied to detainees in Guinea in general, including persons convicted for expressing opposition to the established system. I therefore respectfully request that the members of the Committee reconsider Guinea's summons.

Employer members – The Employer members thank the Government for their oral and written information on this case. The Employer members emphasize the importance of governments' compliance with the Convention which, as a fundamental Convention, requires special attention.

From the outset, the Employer members wish to stress their deep commitment towards the eradication of forced labour and the great importance attached to the Convention. We are firmly convinced that no relevant stakeholder should turn a blind eye to any such practices, especially if they are planned, conducted or tolerated by central authorities.

We would like to start off by providing some background information and context. The Republic of Guinea joined the ILO in 1959. It has ratified a total of 62 Conventions, including nine fundamental Conventions, three governance Conventions, and 50 technical Conventions. Of the 62 Conventions that have been ratified, 52 remain in force. The Republic of Guinea ratified the Convention in 1961. The Committee of Experts has provided observations before on the Government's compliance with the Convention, most recently in 2018 and 2023.

We also note that the Committee of Experts has made direct requests from 2005 to 2023 to the Government regarding the Convention. The Employer members understand that the ILO is not currently providing technical assistance to the Republic of Guinea in relation to forced labour issues. We note, however, that a mission to the Republic of Guinea was undertaken in May 2024 to draw up a new Decent Work Country Programme, which includes a standards component. The mission also included training for members of the National Council for Social Dialogue (CNDS).

This year is the first time that the Committee has examined the Government's application of the Convention.

The Committee of Experts' comments specifically relate to issues regarding the Republic of Guinea's compliance with Article 1(a) of the Convention. Countries who have ratified the Convention commit, under Article 1(a), to protecting those who engage in peaceful activities related to freedom of political expression and freedom of the press from punishment by way of compulsory labour, including through prison sentences.

The comments of the Committee of Experts highlight two specific issues regarding the Government's compliance with Article 1(a) of the Convention.

Firstly, the Committee of Experts refers to several provisions of the Republic of Guinea's national legislation imposing punishments involving compulsory labour for the commission of certain protected activities that fall within the scope of Article 1(a) of the Convention. Secondly, the Committee of Experts takes note of a recent order by the transitional Government that prohibits demonstrations that likely compromise social peace and public order, specifying that any breach of this order would result in legal consequences.

The Employer members will now address these two issues in further detail.

With respect to the first issue, the Employer members note the observations of the Committee of Experts on the national legislative provisions imposing punishment involving compulsory labour on persons who peacefully hold or express political views or otherwise hold or express views that are ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system.

The Committee of Experts refer to a list of these acts or behaviours outlined in national legislation. Examples of these acts or behaviours include defamation; organizing an unauthorized demonstration; participating in an unauthorized demonstration; organizing a meeting on a public thoroughfare; insulting the Head of State, officers of the law, the national anthem or the national flag; founding, directing or administering a political party in violation of the law; and directing, administering, or reconstituting a dissolved political party.

The Employer members also note the information provided by the Government which indicates that no prosecutions have been brought on the basis of any of the provisions in the national legislation noted in the Committee of Experts' observation and that no press-related offences have been punishable by compulsory prison labour.

The Employer members recall that compliance with ILO fundamental Conventions must be both in law and in practice. Therefore, while the Government appears not to have enforced these laws in practice, the national legislative provisions noted by the Committee of Experts, by law, are not compliant with Article 1(a) of the Convention. As such, they do not protect against punishment, by way of compulsory labour, those who peacefully hold or express political views or those who hold or express views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system.

The Employer members strongly encourage the Government to provide the Committee of Experts with the requested information relating to any convictions for the offences outlined in the national legislative provisions noted in the Committee of Experts' comments, including the alleged acts or behaviours underlying those convictions.

With respect to the second issue, the Employer members note the comments of the Committee of Experts regarding the decision of the transitional Government of 13 May 2022 prohibiting any demonstrations that are likely to compromise social peace and the proper development of Government activities. The decision specified that any breach would result in legal consequences.

The Employer members also note the comments of the Committee of Experts recalling a letter from the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights to the President of the Republic of Guinea expressing deep concern about the large number of demonstrators arrested, as well as an August 2022 decision dissolving the National Front for the Defence of the Constitution, a coalition including political parties and civil society organizations.

The Employer members note the commitment provided by the Government to undertaking a substantive reform of national legislation to potentially limit the scope of the application of the legislative provisions noted earlier. This undertaking was first noted by the Committee of Experts in its 2023 observation on the Republic of Guinea's compliance with the Convention, and no additional information with respect to this review has been noted in the Committee of Experts' observation this year. The Employer members strongly encourage the Government to commit to its undertaking to review the legislative provisions noted by the Committee of Experts in its report.

Worker members – Our Committee has been led to examine for the first time the Government's application of the Convention, which is a fundamental Convention that enjoys one of the highest ratification rates, with 178 ratifications, and that Guinea ratified in 1961, as confirmed by the Minister. The Convention forms part of the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work and states that employment relationships should be freely chosen and free from threats, as well as requiring Member States to eradicate forced labour.

The Worker members note the comments of the Committee of Experts that identify several provisions in Guinean legislation that allow prison sentences involving compulsory labour to be handed down for acts or behaviour through which persons express views opposed to the established political, social or economic system. Participation in an undeclared or unauthorized demonstration also falls under these provisions.

The Committee of Experts highlights that these activities fall within the scope of application of Article 1(a) of the Convention, which provides that “[e]ach Member of the International Labour Organisation which ratifies this Convention undertakes to suppress and not to make use of any form of forced or compulsory labour... as a means of political coercion or education or as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system.”

The criminal provisions in question constitute, quite simply, the criminalization of language, of mere words and of acts expressing dissident political views, in violation of the Convention.

We recall that, by decision of 13 May 2022, the transitional government prohibited any demonstration on public thoroughfares likely to compromise the social peace – and we note the generalized nature of that concept – and the proper development of the activities in its calendar, specifying that any breach of this order would entail legal consequences against the perpetrator(s). Moreover, the freedom of the press has been under attack since 2022, leading to the closure of some media outlets, with others forced to put workers on indefinite leave owing to the ongoing restrictions.

Against a backdrop of highly restricted civil liberties, there are concerns that these provisions are being implemented with the aim of silencing the opposition, particularly trade unions. Restricting trade unions’ scope of action means dangling the sword of Damocles over them by criminalizing strike action, which is covered in Article 1(d) of the Convention which prohibits the adoption of such measures as a punishment for having participated in strikes.

The international community has already stated its concerns at the deterioration in civil liberties in Guinea. In a letter addressed to the President of the Republic on 15 August 2022, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights expressed her deep concern at recent developments in the human rights situation in the country, referring to a large number of arrests of demonstrators, including members of the political opposition and civil society. The High Commissioner also referred to a decision of the Government of 9 August 2022 aimed at dissolving the National Front for the Defence of the Constitution (FNDC), a collective of opposition political parties, trade unions and civil society organizations, which had initiated demonstrations.

The deterioration in the human and trade union rights situation in Guinea is obvious and has only worsened since 2022.

We recall that on 19 January 2024 Sékou Jamal Pendessa, Secretary-General of the Guinean Press Professionals’ Union (SPPG), was arrested and sentenced to six months’ imprisonment, three of which were suspended, and a fine of 500,000 Guinean francs.

His arrest came after his union, on 18 January 2024, called for protests against the media restrictions imposed by the Government since May 2023. Demonstrators who gathered at the Press House on 18 January 2024 were physically assaulted and arrested for participating in an “unauthorized assembly”, before being released.

We note with concern that, during his six weeks in prison, Sékou Jamal Pendessa was subject to hard labour. He was finally released on 28 February 2024 by the Conakry Court of Appeal after three days of strikes and street protests.

The freedoms of peaceful assembly, association and expression are fundamental pillars of democracy that must be defended and protected at all times. Workers must be allowed to express their views on the country's economic situation without fear, intimidation or imprisonment.

We call on the Government to adopt the necessary measures to ensure that no sentence, including prison sentences, that may involve compulsory labour can be imposed on persons who express certain political opinions or who peacefully express views ideologically opposed to the established system, including in the context of peaceful public demonstrations.

We note the process of legislative reform initiated by the Government. We call on it to review its legislation according to the guidance of the Committee of Experts in order to ensure that the provisions of the Criminal Code and of the Act of 23 December 1991 establishing a charter of political parties are in compliance with the Convention.

Worker member, Guinea – Since its accession to the ILO in 1959, the Republic of Guinea has ratified several ILO Conventions, including Convention No. 105 in 1961. This commitment has resulted in the adaptation of national legislation in general, and labour legislation in particular, through the Labour Code of 1960 and the Labour Codes of 1988 and 2010. However, these historic achievements by the First Republic, which have been respected to a large extent by the successive governments in power, are currently under threat from administrative and judicial practices that seriously undermine the rights of workers, particularly in the press sector.

In this context, several media outlets have been suspended by the High Authority for Communication, which wrote to the General Director of television company Canal + Guinée on 6 and 9 December 2023 to request him to stop broadcasting by Djoma FM and TV, Espace FM and TV, and Évasion FM and TV, channels available with the Canal + Guinée package, for “national security reasons”. On 12 December 2023, another distributor, StarTimes, announced the cancellation of Djoma TV, Espace TV and Évasion TV on the same grounds.

These repressive measures were denounced by the trade union movement through various statements that have failed to shake the administrative authorities from their determination to silence all dissonant voices, despite the multiple calls for the fundamental rights of citizens to be respected, in particular freedom of expression and demonstration, which are all recognized by the Transitional Charter drafted by the National Committee for Reconciliation and Development.

The Guinean trade union movement takes this opportunity to reaffirm its concerns and fears regarding the direction that the decisions of the transitional Government are taking with respect to the exercise of the profession of journalism in the private sector.

Today, there are hundreds of Guinean families who have been hit hard by the closure of private radio stations and television channels, despite the fact that these stations and channels have enabled the recruitment of many young jobless graduates, affected by unemployment and underemployment, while contributing to the education of citizens on democratic values, social peace and harmonious coexistence.

The trade union movement denounces the conviction of our comrade the Secretary-General of the SPPG, who, in addition to being arrested and detained for over one month, received a suspended sentence of three months' imprisonment.

The trade union movement takes this opportunity to express its profound gratitude to all trade union organizations around the world for their full support with a view to upholding the rights of the press in Guinea.

It particularly wishes to thank the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and its African regional branch, the Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) and the ILO for the various efforts made to further the aspirations of the Guinean trade union movement in its quest for social justice, freedom and democracy.

In the face of the numerous challenges that threaten to undermine the social achievements made at such a high price, often through bloodshed, during Guinea's years of upheaval, the trade union movement appeals strongly to the ILO to provide sustained support to ensure the fulfilment of the Republic of Guinea's commitments, freely undertaken through the ratification of ILO Conventions, in particular Conventions Nos 87, 98 and 105, and all other Conventions concerning human rights.

Lastly, the Guinean trade union movement reaffirms its long-standing commitment to a framework of constructive and sustainable social dialogue, the foundations and instruments for which now exist in Guinea thanks to the establishment of the CNDS with a multi-dimensional remit, particularly with regard to prevention, advice and management in the case of collective labour disputes for all sectors of activity nationwide.

Government member, Belgium – I have the honour to speak on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States. The candidate countries, Albania, Montenegro, North Macedonia, the Republic of Moldova and Ukraine, and the European Free Trade Association country Norway, member of the European Economic Area, align themselves with this statement.

The EU and its Member States are committed to the respect, protection and fulfilment of human rights, including labour rights. We promote universal ratification and effective implementation of fundamental ILO Conventions and support the ILO in developing and promoting international labour standards and supervising their application.

The EU and its Member States have been committed development partners of Guinea, including through the "Everything But Arms" (EBA) arrangement under the EU's General Scheme of Preferences, granting duty-free and quota-free access to the EU market, resulting in sustained growth and job creation in the past decades. The trade benefits granted under the EBA arrangement are subject to the condition that Guinea respects core international principles, enshrined in core UN and ILO Conventions.

We note with concern the Committee of Experts' indication that several provisions of national legislation provide for prison sentences involving compulsory labour for activities within the scope of application of the Convention.

We also take note that in August 2022, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights expressed deep concern at recent developments in the human rights situation in the country, referring to a large number of arrests of demonstrators, including members of the political opposition and civil society. The Committee of Experts also referred to the Government's decision aiming at the dissolution of a collective of opposition political parties, trade unions and civil society organizations, which had held demonstrations.

We note that the Government states in its report that no convictions have been handed down on the basis of the provisions referred to by the Committee of Experts. Moreover, the Government indicates that although no measures have been envisaged to limit the scope of these provisions, it will undertake a substantive reform to this end. We also take note of the written information recently submitted by the Government, in particular the affirmation that the Guinean legislative framework provides a solid basis for the protection of human beings against labour exploitation and strictly prohibits forced or compulsory labour in all its forms.

In line with the Committee of Experts, we request the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that no punishments involving compulsory labour, including as part of a prison sentence, may be imposed on persons who express certain political opinions or who peacefully express views ideologically opposed to the established system, including in the context of peaceful public demonstrations.

In this regard, we echo the hope of the Committee of Experts that the provisions of the Criminal Code and of the Act of 23 December 1991 establishing a charter of political parties will be reviewed in accordance with the Convention. We therefore expect that in the framework of the reform undertaken, the Government will either clearly restrict the scope of the mentioned provisions to situations connected with the use of violence or incitement to violence, or repeal penalties involving compulsory labour to ensure that their application in practice does not lead to the violation of the Convention.

Finally, we request the Government to provide information to the ILO on any conviction handed down under the above-mentioned provisions, on the acts giving rise to the convictions, as well as on the penalties imposed for participating in demonstrations on public thoroughfares.

The EU and its Member States remain committed to a joint constructive engagement with Guinea to address the issues raised in order to comply with the Convention.

Government member, Switzerland – Switzerland expresses its deep concern regarding the provisions of Guinean legislation that establish prison sentences involving compulsory labour. Against a backdrop of deteriorating human rights marked, inter alia, by a high number of arrests of demonstrators, political opponents and members of civil society, these provisions can be applied to punish persons who have expressed their opposition to the established political, social or economic order.

In this regard, Switzerland would like to recall that freedom of opinion and expression, and freedom of assembly and association, are fundamental rights that must not be trampled. Furthermore, in accordance with Article 1 of the Convention, the exercise of these freedoms – for example, during peaceful protests – must not result in prison sentences involving compulsory labour.

While expressing its deep concern, with regard to both the legislative framework in force and the repression of Guinean demonstrators and opponents, Switzerland hopes that the broad reform undertaken by the Government will lead to significant legislative amendments. The Government must ensure that, in close consultation with the social partners, future legislative provisions will be in full compliance with the standards guaranteed by the Convention. Lastly, Switzerland also calls on the Government to communicate actively with regard to any measure taken or progress made in this respect.

Worker member, Senegal – I am speaking on behalf of the workers of Senegal in order to offer our support and solidarity to the workers of the Republic of Guinea with regard to the application of the Convention in their country. We wish to welcome the remarkable work carried out by the Committee of Experts on the matter.

We note the information provided by the Government, in particular on the proposed reform of the legal framework. It is important to underscore, however, that despite the commitments undertaken, the situation regarding freedom of expression and association continues to deteriorate, which could lead to prison sentences involving compulsory labour in accordance with Decrees No. 247/72/PREG of 20 September 1972 concerning the establishment and structure of the prison administration and No. 624/PRG/81 of 13 November 1981 supplementing Decree No. 247/72/PREG, and the Criminal Code of 2016. Our concern is all the more justified given that the Government is restricting civic space and stepping up the number of arrests of trade union leaders who may be subjected to compulsory labour if the current legal framework is not amended.

Recently we witnessed the arbitrary arrests of journalists, including the Secretary-General of the SPPG, Sékou Jamal Pendessa, for having called for demonstrations against the restrictions affecting the internet and the media in Guinea. An endless list of violations of the right to freedom of expression and peaceful assembly demonstrates the willingness of the authorities to bring the opposition to heel. Those who protest against such violations are arrested and detained arbitrarily. The Government is threatening to withdraw the accreditation of trade union organizations involved in unauthorized protests, even though all protests have been prohibited since May 2022 in Guinea. Trade union leaders are accused, through smear campaigns, of acting on behalf of political actors or civil society.

Furthermore, articles 363 to 366 of the Criminal Code regarding defamation and insult constitute a genuine threat to the freedom of trade union leaders. Given the current situation in the Republic of Guinea, it is necessary to request, as a matter of urgency, the Government to take measures to ensure the freedom and safety of workers, while complying in law and in practice with the Convention. In our view, this will mean:

- stopping all arrests and harassment of trade union leaders and members;
- ceasing the smear campaigns against trade union organizations;
- respecting trade union freedom, freedom of association and freedom of expression;
- implementing a genuine policy of social dialogue with the social partners with regard to addressing the concerns of the world of work;
- cooperating with the social partners to reform the legal framework, taking the necessary measures and abolishing all sentences involving compulsory prison labour.

Government member, Cameroon – Cameroon has taken note of the comments on Guinea contained in the Committee of Experts' report. We welcome the fact that the Government has duly noted the allegations against it in relation to the application of the Convention. The Government has committed to adopting the necessary measures to ensure that no sentence involving compulsory labour, particularly in the context of a prison sentence, the expression of political opinions or a peaceful protest in ideological opposition to the established system, is actually applied.

Some provisions of the Criminal Code, in particular article 38, establish three types of alternative sentences for offences: day fines, community work and compensatory penalties. Community work, which consists of carrying out work for the benefit of the community, is applied in many countries, although it has often been abused. The Government maintains that community work is strictly supervised to prevent it from being equated with hard labour, which is prohibited by national laws and the Constitution.

Article 44 of the Criminal Code establishes that community work cannot be imposed on accused persons who refuse or are not present at the hearing. The person concerned is reminded of their right to refuse after the conviction is issued and the penalty has been set.

Guinea is committed to applying the recommendations of the Committee of Experts though a series of reforms based on the adoption of a new Constitution and the revision of the political system.

Furthermore, public protests must be carried out in compliance with the law in order to avoid any abuse or manipulation of opinion.

We also invite the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance for its proposed legislative reform and in order to conduct participatory, structured and constructive social dialogue among the tripartite constituents.

Worker member, Botswana – I will be speaking on behalf of the workers of Botswana under the two federations: the Botswana Federation of Trade Unions (BFTU) and the Botswana Federation of Public, Private and Parastatal Sector Unions (BOFEPUSU).

We take note that Guinea did indeed ratify the Convention in 1961. However, 63 years after ratification, there are still laws or provisions of the law that permit work to be exacted from persons under the menace of penalties in Guinea.

The Decrees of September 1972, and November 1981 and the Criminal Code of 2016 are clear examples of such laws. Our emphasis is not on the statistics on the number of cases in which these laws have been applied and created victims; rather, their existence in legislation in Guinea is the main worry.

What is even more worrying is that they are prone to abuse and subjective in nature. To give an example, one can be charged for what may be termed insulting behaviour towards the Head of State, officers of the law, the national anthem or the national or a foreign flag. The question then is: how do we arrive at agreeing on what constitutes an insult? On one extreme, the laws are, or can be, used against any demonstrations in the country. We note the response of the Government to the Committee of Experts' report that there have been no convictions by virtue of the said laws or provisions, but we are aware of the arrest, detention and subsequent conviction of Sékou Jamal Pendessa, the Secretary-General of the SPPG, on 19 January 2024.

We take this time to implore the Government to look into repealing such laws and conform to the dictates of the Convention, as stated in the report. Further, we implore the Government to engage in social dialogue with all the social partners in this process of review.

It is only through social dialogue that this process of review can be meaningful and reflect the needs and aspirations of all. A meaningful social dialogue in line with the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) is what we desire and, most importantly what the process itself requires.

Finally, we want to offer our solidarity to the labour movement in Guinea in their quest for these law reforms which have the potential to harm their freedom to express themselves freely and associate without any fear.

Worker member, Philippines – Our solidarity to the workers of Guinea. The Worker members of the Philippines take the floor to stress the urgent need for the Government to strengthen its labour inspection regime, especially regarding its obligations under the Convention, which was ratified in 1961.

Forced labour is a severe violation of human rights and an affront to individual dignity and freedom. Article 1, paragraph (a) of the Convention explicitly prohibits prison sentences involving compulsory labour as punishment for expressing political views or views opposed to the established political, social or economic system.

Despite this, several provisions in Guinea's national legislation still impose prison sentences involving compulsory labour for such activities. This is unacceptable and must be addressed immediately.

A country can only claim to be genuinely committed to combating forced labour if it has a robust labour inspection system. In Guinea, the current state of the labour inspection regime falls short of the standards under the Convention.

While it was reported that the Government significantly increased the budget for labour inspections in 2022 to over 15 times the 2021 budget, the labour inspectorate continued to maintain only a single vehicle and provided insufficient resources for fuel, restricting the labour inspectorate's ability to conduct labour inspections. The number of inspectors decreased from 167 in 2021 to 159 in 2022. Despite the budget increase, it remains unclear where the additional funds were allocated.

Article 2 of the Convention requires each member that has ratified the Convention to take effective measures to secure the immediate and complete abolition of forced or compulsory labour. A robust labour inspection system in Guinea must be reinforced with sufficient human resources. The number of inspectors should be increased to ensure comprehensive coverage across all sectors.

They must be well-trained to identify and address instances of forced labour, and they should be empowered to conduct thorough investigations without fear of retribution.

In 2022, it was reported by the United States Department of Labor that the labour inspectorate conducted inspections in Conakry, Boke in Lower Guinea, and Siguiri in Upper Guinea. The sectors inspected included mining, education, health and auto garages. However, inspections were uneven and irregular. There was no evidence that the Government conducted inspections in the agricultural sector, where child labour is known to be rampant. Information is wanting on the number of child labour violations found, penalties imposed and penalties collected.

The Government's commitment to reforming the laws within the framework of state restructuring is commendable, but words must be translated into tangible actions. The Committee of Experts expects Guinea to provide detailed information on any convictions handed down and the acts that led to such convictions. Transparency and accountability are critical in this regard.

Likewise, public awareness and education are crucial for an effective labour inspection system. The Government should amplify and broaden awareness campaigns, focusing especially on vulnerable populations and employers. These campaigns should educate citizens about their rights and the legal consequences of forced labour. Additionally, awareness efforts should reach the security sector, which often hinders people's freedom of expression. Expanding these initiatives can empower individuals and create a more informed and vigilant society against labour exploitation.

Actions, not promises, will measure Guinea's commitment to the Convention. A robust labour inspection system is crucial. We urge the Government to take immediate steps to reinforce its labour inspection regime, eradicate forced labour and uphold the rights and dignity of all individuals.

Chairperson – I can see no more requests for the floor, so now I invite the distinguished representative of the Government to take the floor for his concluding remarks.

Government representative – I would like to begin by recalling Article 1 of the Convention, which reads, and I quote: "Each Member of the International Labour Organisation which ratifies this Convention undertakes to suppress and not to make use of any form of forced or compulsory labour: (a) as a means of political coercion or education or as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system; (b) as a method of mobilising and using labour for purposes of economic development; (c) as a means of labour discipline; (d) as a punishment for having participated in strikes; (e) as a means of racial, social, national or religious discrimination.”

I think that this must be recalled to ensure that our discussion remains on the subject of the comments of the Committee of Experts on the use of forced labour in our country. As I recalled in my previous statement, reference is being made to certain laws that are no longer in force in Guinea. The Decree of 1972 has been abrogated, as has the Decree of 1981. The provisions of Decree No. 305 replace all the provisions of the Decrees of 1972 and 1981. We should not spend time on legislation that is no longer in force in my country. In terms of respect for fundamental rights, I would like to highlight our robust legislative framework, which forms a very solid foundation for the protection of human beings from labour exploitation. That legislation strongly prohibits all forms of forced or compulsory labour, which is no longer imposed in Guinea. To demonstrate our conviction and our compliance with all international human rights instruments, I would like to point out that Guinea has ratified the main international and regional legal human rights instruments, including the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948; the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of 1966; the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights of 1966; the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment of 1984; the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women of 1979; the Convention on the Rights of the Child of 1989 and the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights of 21 October 1986. Today, we have a Constitution, the Transitional Charter, that strengthens these international commitments of the State in the area of human rights protection.

In addition to this Transitional Charter, Guinea has an array of legal instruments that protect human rights, such as the current Criminal Code, which revokes all the provisions of the various codes that preceded it and the Code of Criminal Procedure. The Civil Code, moreover, complies fully with all international human rights instruments. The Government has established a national committee to combat trafficking in persons. I would like to acknowledge the EU, which has funded the implementation of this programme, thereby facilitating the setting up of a mechanism for operating procedures relating to the referral, identification, guidance and care of victims of trafficking in Guinea.

Forced labour is one of the practices linked to trafficking in persons. This all serves to illustrate the country's institutional legal provisions that promote respect for human rights. With regard to the institutions responsible for promoting social dialogue, Guinea has been successful in recent years in establishing the National Social Dialogue Council to strengthen social dialogue and promote it among actors, that is, the tripartite constituents: the Government, trade unions and employers. The Council is currently operational and resourced.

Freedom of association is intertwined with the history of Guinea. It was the trade union movement that gave Guinea its independence. Guinea could never challenge the exercise of trade union rights. The first President of Guinea was a trade union leader. If you look at the table of countries that have ratified the Convention, Guinea is among the first. We joined the ILO one year after our country gained independence. I am sharing all this information to stress our political will to respect human rights and the exercise of trade union rights in our country. Today, we are one of the few countries that support trade union organizations, which are included in the annual national development budget so as to afford them State funding for the implementation of their action plans, with the aim of improving working conditions and also engaging in dialogue with the different tripartite constituents. I recall that Guinea does not impose forced labour, in any form. Reference has been made to particular events relating to journalists; it is true that the journalist Mr Pendessa was arrested.

We are a country, we are a Republic; there are laws. We cannot do whatever we want just because we have liberty, just as I cannot leave this room and start doing whatever I want. I must respect your liberties. We have regulations that monitor trade union activity, political activity, civil society activity and the activity of social actors. As our trade union colleagues in the room know, the current Government is making great effort to respect, and ensure respect for, these types of regulations. Turning to the media: there are currently more than 20 private radio stations in Guinea. We have around ten national television stations in operation. But a radio station that has been set up still has rules to follow. You are signing up to terms of reference. When you violate those terms, which are a standard requirement in all countries, you receive the relevant sanctions, and that is what is being imposed today. There are two or three media outlets that are subject to these sanctions.

At the institutional level, it should be noted that we have an authority responsible for regulating the sector which applies disciplinary measures, rather than criminal measures. We have the High Authority for Communication, which questions journalists and media organizations that violate regulations. Arbitration must take place, and, in most cases, journalists recognize the error of their ways. Mechanisms are established through dialogue and consultation to ensure that order is restored. This allows mechanisms to be put in place to strengthen skills and professionalization in the media. Beyond that, I would like to recall one fact: we have spoken about the closure of radio stations. Press organizations are aware. They themselves recently decided, and you can find this on the internet, that a self-regulatory body should be established, because there is misconduct. Do not forget that Guinea is working to ensure internal stability, but also subregional stability. We border the Sahel. Subregional stability in West Africa depends on the peace and stability guaranteed in Guinea. For that reason, we must not allow a journalist, or any actor, including government actors, to commit acts that create instability in the country and instability in the subregion.

Guinea respects all the principles of fundamental rights, Guinea respects all principles in line with international human rights instruments, but we are a well-run republic, and we require all actors to respect republican principles. I will conclude my remarks by assuring you that Guinea will continue its reforms. I am sure, after all the statements made, that each speaker has noted that we have a legislative framework that abolishes forced labour, that abolishes compulsory labour. We commend all those speakers who have recognized the efforts under way at the government level. On that note, I reiterate Guinea's call for the ILO to continue to support it in strengthening its legislative and institutional framework, strengthening social dialogue – as I stated a short while ago, we have a National Social Dialogue Council – and strengthening its capacities so that the Council can further promote social dialogue for the benefit of human rights and the improvement of working conditions. Once more, please accept that Guinea does not today impose forced labour or compulsory labour.

Worker members – The Worker members repeat their concern at the deteriorating situation of human and trade union rights in Guinea, as reflected in several reports. Demonstrations on public thoroughfares have been prohibited since 13 May 2022. Press organizations are attacked and forced to close. Civil liberties are heavily curtailed, and all acts of opposition are swiftly repressed by the authorities.

We also note with concern and worry the conviction and imprisonment of the SPPG Secretary-General, Sékou Jamal Pendessa, who was subjected to hard labour during his detention. We must take into account the comments of the Committee of Experts, in a direct request in a similar case adopted in 2019 and published at the 109th (2021) Session of the International Labour Conference, on the impact on the application of the Convention of criminal sanctions involving compulsory work. The Committee of Experts recalled that the Convention does not only protect persons who express political views from sentences of forced labour, but it also prohibits in general the imposition of compulsory labour on such persons. This is the case when persons who express political views are given prison sentences and national legislation also provides for compulsory labour in prisons.

In this context, which we consider to be repressive, we note that criminal law in Guinea contains provisions that run contrary to Article 1(a) of the Convention, which covers prison sentences involving compulsory labour; these sentences may be imposed for acts or behaviour through which persons express views or oppose the established political, social or economic system or for participating in an undeclared or unauthorized demonstration.

It is vital to ensure that no one is punished through forced labour for having expressed political views or participated in peaceful demonstrations. The State must create the material and institutional conditions required to give full effect to the prohibition of forced labour, in law and in practice, starting by updating its legislation and aligning it with the fundamental Conventions, particularly the Convention at hand, that is, Convention No. 105.

The Government has confirmed that some Decrees – at least two – have been abrogated. We call on the Government to give full effect to the comments of the Committee of Experts and to review, without delay, articles 363 to 366, 629 to 637, 658 to 660, 662 to 665 and 689 to 703 of the Criminal Code and articles 30 and 31 of Organic Act No. 91/02/CTRN of 23 December 1991 establishing a charter of political parties. We also call on the Government to accept a direct contacts mission.

Employer members – The Employer members remind the Committee that the Convention is a fundamental Convention and, therefore, requires special attention and consideration by the ILO, governments, workers, and employers. The Employer members emphasize the importance of prohibiting punishment, by way of forced labour, of persons who hold or express political opinions or who hold or express opinions that are ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Employer members recommend that the Government:

- take necessary measures, including through a review in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, of the related legislative provisions to ensure that no person is punished, by way of compulsory labour, for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social, or economic system;
- provide the Committee of Experts with the requested information on any convictions for the offences outlined in the national legislative provisions noted in the comments of the Committee of Experts, including the alleged acts or behaviours underlying those convictions;
- request to avail itself of technical assistance from the ILO to address legislative gaps through tripartite consultations and to build capacities within the Government.

We trust that the Government will provide the requested information by 1 September and adopt the measures indicated by this Committee in a timely manner.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee deeply deplored the deterioration of trade union rights in the country.

Taking into account the discussion, the Committee urged the Government to take effective and time-bound measures, in consultation with the representative employers' and workers' organizations, to:

- quash the convictions brought against Sékou Jamal Pendessa, Secretary-General of the Guinean Press Professionals' Union (SPPG);
- ensure that no punishments involving compulsory labour, including as part of a prison sentence, may be imposed on persons who express certain political opinions or who peacefully express views ideologically opposed to the established system, including in the context of peaceful public demonstrations;
- take necessary measures, including through a review of the relevant provisions of the Criminal Code and of the Act of 23 December 1991 establishing a charter of political parties in order to restrict the scope of these provisions to meet the requirements of Article 1(a) of the Convention; and
- provide information on (i) any convictions handed down under the above-mentioned provisions, including the alleged acts giving rise to the convictions and the penalties imposed; and (ii) specific penalties imposed for violating the prohibition on demonstrations on public thoroughfares.

The Committee invited the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance to address the issues identified and to report the requested information by 1 September 2024.

Government representative – The Government of the Republic of Guinea thanks the delegates who participated in the examination of the individual case on our country with regard to the criticisms of the Committee of Experts concerning the alleged violation of certain provisions of the Convention. The Government notes the failure to take into account certain efforts made to comply with the Convention. The Republic of Guinea, which is constantly striving to bring its national legislation into conformity with international labour standards, notes the recommendations made by members of the Committee, governments and social partners following the examination of this case. It commits to taking measures to provide all the information requested by the Committee by 1 September 2024. The Government wishes to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in order to continue to honour its commitments regarding the application of labour standards.

Japan (ratification: 1965)

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

Written information provided by the Government

(i) Right to organize of firefighting personnel

From 18 January 2019 to 26 June 2023, the Ministry of Internal Affairs and Communications (MIC) held regular consultations with the employees' side, in response to the summary of the Chairperson.

The 11th consultation, held on 26 June 2023, entailed substantive consultation on the ambulance system during the COVID-19 pandemic. At this consultation, the MIC explained that the number of firefighters, including ambulance team members and ambulance vehicles, had been consistently increased over the past years, even during the COVID-19 pandemic and the Government has taken financial measures to strengthen both, and that the Fire and Disaster Management Agency (FDMA) introduced effective methods at the fire department headquarters in order to reduce the burden on ambulance team members. The FDMA regularly takes measures to digitize, expedite, and facilitate ambulance services by utilizing the Individual Number Card and to promote the timely and appropriate use of ambulances. The employees' side stated that they would continue exchanges on the issues of firefighters in coordination with the MIC.

On 1 January 2024, a large-scale earthquake (the 2024 Noto Peninsula earthquake) occurred in Ishikawa Prefecture, and a total of 4,919 units of 211 headquarters from 21 prefectures converged on the disaster area on the instructions of the Commissioner of the FDMA, saved lives and transported the victims, in cooperation with the police and Self-Defense Force. In Japan, a disaster-prone country where large-scale earthquakes and other disasters occur frequently, a unified command and integrated actions with related organizations are required to ensure prompt and effective disaster response.

With regard to the Fire Defense Personnel Committee (FDPC) System, the MIC has conducted a survey reflecting the employees' side's opinion to understand the operational status of the FDPC, and found improvements on many points. For further improvement, the MIC notified fire department headquarters across the country of elements to note about the operation of the FDPC.

(ii) Right to organize of prison staff

(1) As stated in the previous reports, a prison officer has the duty to incarcerate persons sentenced to imprisonment, accused, suspects and those sentenced to death in penal institutions. Further, a prison officer, being granted the authority to investigate crimes in penal institutions and to arrest inmates, controls judicial police work in penal institutions and, in addition, is permitted by law to carry and use a weapon, just like police officials. In view of the purport of Article 9 of the Convention, therefore, prison officers are considered to be included in the "police" as mentioned in the Article. Regarding the Government's view above, the Government acknowledges that this is recognized by the ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association in its 12th Report and 54th Report as well.

In cases where any emergency occurs in a penal institution, the institution is required to promptly and properly bring the situation under control by force, if necessary, in accordance with the direction and supervision of the officer who has the highest rank of all personnel at the site. The personnel of penal institutions in Japan work together to respond to such an emergency situation. It is not appropriate to give the personnel of penal institutions the right to organize, because it poses a problem for the appropriate performance of the above-mentioned duties and proper maintenance of discipline and order in penal institutions.

(2) Based on the views stated in subparagraph (1) above, the personnel of penal institutions are not entitled to the right to organize. However, based on the observations in the report of the Committee of Experts in 2018, the Government created new, and expanded the existing, opportunities for the personnel of penal institutions to express their own opinions on their working environment. Specifically, as stated in the report submitted by the Government in 2023, the Government has been continually organizing meetings for exchanging views between executives of each regional correction headquarters and general staff members and holding annual conferences of Penal Institutions for Female Prisoners, in order to solve its unique challenges.

Furthermore, since June 2003, “consultation services for staff”, which accept anonymous consultations/complaints, have been introduced at the Correction Bureau, regional correction headquarters and the Training Institution for Correctional Personnel. In May 2023, in addition to further improving the working environment and promoting work–life balance among staff, the Government widely informed staff about not only consultation services within the correctional organizations, but also the various services provided by external organizations such as the National Personnel Authority (NPA), by setting up a “Strengthening Consultation Period”, aimed at intensively accepting suggestions from and consultations with staff. Since 1 April 2024, the Government has been assigning mental health counsellors to all penal institutions in order to enhance mental health measures for correctional staff who work in unique environments involving stress, and to ensure their psychological safety in the workplace. As stated in subparagraph (1), the personnel of penal institutions are not entitled to the right to organize. However, the Government is seeking to improve their workplace environment through various measures including those that are not stated above.

(iii) Public service employees

The basic labour rights of public service employees of Japan are, to some extent, restricted, due to their distinctive status as “servants of all citizens” and the public nature of the functions they are required to perform, in order to guarantee all citizens’ common interests. Instead, they benefit from the NPA recommendation system and other compensatory measures. The Government, taking a basic position of respecting the NPA recommendation system, drafts bills, which are deliberated in the Diet, and then revises remuneration. These compensatory measures have ensured that the working conditions of national public service employees are appropriate. The Supreme Court of Japan judged that guarantees made by the NPA recommendation system and other related measures have been established as a system and administered as compensation for certain restrictions on their basic labour rights (judgment made by the Grand Bench of the Supreme Court on 25 April 1973).

In order to perform such compensatory functions properly, where a recommendation is made by which remuneration and other working conditions of national public service employees will be brought into line with the general conditions of society, the NPA examines the general conditions of society and carries out surveys on working conditions, such as remuneration in the private sector. The NPA has established a Deputy Director-General for Employee Organizations' Affairs and a Counsellor to hear opinions from employee organizations. In making recommendations about working conditions of officials to the Diet and the Cabinet, and enacting, revising, or abolishing the Rules, the NPA hears employee organizations' opinions or requests through meetings and reflects these in its recommendations as far as possible.

The NPA listened to and exchanged opinions with employee organizations at 186 official meetings in 2023 (100 meetings were held before recommendations and reports were drafted from January to August).

The Government, taking a basic stance of respecting the NPA recommendation system, reviews decisions regarding national public service employees' remuneration from the viewpoint of national administration in general, and has submitted, to the Diet, the Amendment Bill of the Act on Remuneration of Officials in the Regular Service concerning the revision of remuneration. Thus, laws are revised swiftly.

As was also taken into consideration in the conclusions of the Conference Committee in 2018, there are various issues concerning measures for the autonomous labour-employer relations system, including that "negotiation costs will increase, which may lead to some confusion" and that "prolonged labour-employer negotiations may affect execution of operations".

In addition, as reported in the previous reports of the Government, the Amendment Act of the National Public Service Act, enacted in April 2014 was formulated on the premise of the current situation, in which a part of the basic labour rights of national public service employees is restricted, and does not provide measures for an autonomous labour-employer relations system.

The reason for this is that, in light of the fact that the four civil service reform related bills, which provided for the establishment of an autonomous labour-employer relations system, received various opinions from the public and were subsequently abolished, and in light of the changes in the situation and environment since then, there are a wide range of issues that have yet to be understood by the public. This situation remains unchanged today. For these reasons, the Government believes that the measures for an autonomous labour-employer relations system are an issue that should be carefully examined while continuing to exchange opinions with employee organizations in Japan.

The Government has exchanged views annually with individual employee organizations at various levels, from ministers to officials in charge, on various cases including the autonomous labour-employer relations system according to the situations at the time each year, including in spring and after the NPA recommendations are issued. The topics include: remuneration; part-time employees; work-life balance; and matters related to the autonomous labour-employer relations system, such as in the spring period, and the handling of the NPA recommendation after its issue. In addition, based on requests from employee organizations, opinions are exchanged on individual measures, including the improved treatment of part-time officials such as "eliminating gaps regarding working conditions including remuneration, allowances, and leave", "prohibiting so-called 'termination of employment'", and "introducing a permanent employment conversion system similar to that in private sectors" as well as improved treatment of female national public employees such as through "expanding recruitment and promotions" and "preventing various types of harassment".

Also, as for the basic labour rights of local public service employees, based on the examination of national civil service reform that is stated in the Government's report in response to the Conference Committee's conclusions on the application of the Convention, the Government will carry out careful examinations regarding measures for local public service, and listen to the opinions of related organizations.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I kindly invite the Government representative of Japan to take the floor.

Interpretation from Japanese: Government representative – On behalf of the Japanese Government, I would like to present our basic position concerning the observations of the Committee of Experts.

Firstly, I would like to explain the local Government officer, especially the fire defence personnel. The fire defence in Japan doesn't have the right to organize, as is also the case with police officials, because for the purport of Article 9 of the Convention they are considered to be included in "the police" under the Article due to the historical background, natural and social environment and its duties. The recognition that the fire defence in Japan plays a similar role to the police remains unchanged to this day, given its development of being, historically, a part of police and the duties based on legislation. Moreover, in 1965, Japan ratified the Convention, based on the Committee on Freedom of Association conclusions, which had shown twice, that this matter causes no problems in the application of the Convention, regarding the firefighting services in Japan as "certain services assimilated to the police". In response to the conclusion adopted by this Committee in 2018, we have held 11 consultations with our social partners about the view of the Government that firefighters are considered to be included in the police, et cetera, and have deepened our understanding of each other's arguments. We will continue to promote dialogue and to strive for mutual understanding.

Japan is one of the most disaster-prone countries that approximately 20 per cent of the world's earthquakes of magnitude 6.0 or greater occur in, around of, and approximately 10 per cent of the world's active volcanoes exist in. That is why a high-level of service discipline is essential for fire defence in Japan to protect the lives, bodies and properties of citizens. Once a disaster occurs in Japan, firefighting units from all over the country converge on the disaster area as Emergency Fire Response Teams and are put under duty of response to disasters under a unified command by the direction of the Commissioner of the Fire and Disaster Management Agency (FDMA), in a very close relationship with the police and the self-defence forces. Actually, at the time of the 2024 Noto Peninsula Earthquake, which occurred in Ishikawa Prefecture on 1 January 2024, a total of 4,919 units of 211 headquarters from 21 prefectures sequentially converged on the disaster area by the direction of the Commissioner of the FDMA, rescued lives and transported the victims, and were put under extremely high-skilled and dangerous duty of response to the disaster at the forefront in a very close relationship with the police and the self-defence forces. We fully respect such dedication of fire defence personnel, and current status that they are working in a very close relationship with the police and self-defence forces should be recognized.

Next, I would like to mention that as an alternative for the right to organize, the Fire Defense Personnel Committee System has taken root. The role of it is to deliberate opinions submitted from fire defence personnel and utter opinions to the fire chief about the results of deliberation. This system is introduced by the amendment of the law based on the top-level agreement between the Minister of Internal Affairs and the Commissioner of the All-Japan Prefectural and Municipal Workers Union (ICHIRO-RENGO), in June 1995 as the solution which can gain a national consensus, and is fully functioning to resolve problems related to working conditions.

The Fire Defense Personnel Committee System, while more than a quarter of a century has passed since its establishment, is set up by all fire department headquarters and held at least once each fiscal year by all. It has deliberated on about 5,000 opinions each year recently, from fire defence personnel. It has deliberated on approximately 140,000 opinions in total since its establishment, and about 40 per cent of these opinions have been decided as “appropriate to be implemented” by the Committee. In addition, about 50 per cent or more of them have already been realized. Those opinions are in urgent need of the fire defence personnel such as requests for countermeasures for harassment and establishment of Epidemic Prevention Work Allowance, which is paid to ambulance team members and others engaged in work to deal with COVID-19. It clearly shows that the Fire Defense Personnel Committee System contributes to the realization of their demands.

In addition to the fact that the Fire Defense Personnel Committee is fully functioning, we also would like to stress that the Government of Japan has tried to improve the current system. In order to create an environment in which fire defence personnel can more easily submit their opinions, the implementation policy about the Fire Defense Personnel Committee System was revised in 2005 and, based on the conclusions of this Committee, in 2018. Based on the results of the survey that we have conducted reflecting the employees’ side’s opinion to understand the operational status of the Fire Defense Personnel Committee, we notified fire department headquarters across the country of things to note about the operation of the Fire Defense Personnel Committee System to discuss actively on the Committee and to ensure transparency of its procedures. As the results of these measures, we found out the improvements in many points.

We will continue to understand the operational status of the Fire Defense Personnel Committee and improve its operation through dialogue with the related organizations including social partners, and JICHIRO-RENGO.

The personnel of penal institutions, who are national government officials, are not granted the right to organize either, as is also the case with police officials. This is because, for the purport of Article 9 of the Convention, prison officers, who constitute most of the personnel, are considered to be included in “the police” as stipulated in the Article for the following reason. The reason behind this is that prison officers conduct judicial police work in penal institutions and they are permitted by law to carry and use a weapon, just as the police officials. In cases where an emergency occurs in a penal institution, it is required to work together in order to bring the situation under control promptly and properly by force, if necessary, in accordance with the direction and supervision of the highest-ranking personnel at the site. Therefore, giving the right to organize to the personnel of penal institutions will pose a problem for appropriate performance of the above-mentioned duties and proper maintenance of discipline and order in penal institutions.

In this regard, aiming at furthering and defending the interests of the personnel of penal institutions, the Government newly created and expanded the opportunities for them to express their own opinions on the working environment, which is based on the observations on the report from the Committee of Experts in 2018. Specifically, as stated in the report submitted by the Government in 2023, the Government has been continually organizing meetings on exchanging views between executives of each regional correction headquarters and general staff members, and holding annual conferences of penal institutions for females, in order to solve its unique challenges.

In addition, since June 2003, “consultation services for staff”, which accept anonymous consultations and complaints, have been introduced into the Correction Bureau, regional correction headquarters and the Training Institution for Correctional Personnel. In May 2023, to further improve the working environment and promote the work–life balance among staff, the Government widely informed the staff about not only such consultation services within the correctional organizations but also the various services provided by external organizations such as the National Personnel Authority (NPA), by setting a “strengthening consultation period”, aimed at accepting suggestions and consultations from the staff. Furthermore, since 1 April 2024, the Government has been assigning mental health counsellors to all penal institutions in order to enhance mental health measures for correctional staff who work in its unique environments involving stress and to ensure their psychological safety in the workplace. The Government will continue to implement those various initiatives to further and defend the interests of them.

Finally, I would like to address the basic labour rights of public service employees. In the latest report of the Committee of Experts, Japan has received the comments on the basic labour rights, in particular the right to industrial action, of public service employees. However, the question of whether the right to strike is protected under the Convention is currently referred to the International Court of Justice and its proceedings are in process. We should refrain, therefore, from discussing the issue with the assumption that the right to strike is protected under this Convention.

Now, I will explain the basic labour rights of national public employees. The basic labour rights of the national public employees of Japan are, to some extent, restricted. However, they benefit from the NPA recommendation system and other compensatory measures. Specifically, remuneration, working hours, leave, and other working conditions of the national public employees are modified as follows:

- The NPA provides recommendations to the Diet, which is comprised of representatives of the Japanese public, and the Cabinet.
- In response to the recommendations, the Government drafts the bills to modify working conditions, and the Diet deliberates and passes them.

The NPA independently makes its own judgements and decisions on the NPA recommendation system and other affairs under its jurisdiction as a third-party neutral to employers and employees. As for remuneration levels in particular, after carrying out nationwide fact-finding surveys on the remuneration of national public employees and employees at private offices, the NPA makes the recommendations basically for the purpose of balancing the remuneration level of national public employees and private sector employees by filling the gap in their remuneration through hearing the opinions both from employers and employees and precisely comparing the remuneration of national public employees with that in the private sector every year.

In response to the NPA recommendation, the Government, taking a basic stance of respecting that system and hearing opinions from employee organizations, has drafted the bills, which are deliberated by the Diet, and revised remuneration. Over the past decade, for example, the Government has revised remuneration in accordance with the NPA recommendation, and base pay and bonuses have both been increased each year, except for 2020 and 2021, when the remuneration in the private sector had been affected by COVID-19. This has been the long-standing method to revise remuneration of national public employees since the 1960s. Therefore, the functions of the NPA, which includes providing compensatory measures for restricted basic labour rights, are maintained.

The Government is confident that the working conditions of public service employees are appropriately maintained through the aforementioned process, where the bills submitted in response to the recommendation from the NPA, a neutral and third-party organization, are deliberated at the Diet.

There are currently various concerns and opinions regarding the autonomous labour–employer relations system, including that “negotiation costs will increase, which may lead to some confusion” as well as that “prolonged labour–employer negotiations may affect execution of operations”. In light of the fact that the bills, which provided for the establishment of an autonomous labour–employer relations system, received various opinions from the public and were subsequently abolished, and in light of the changes in the situation and environment since then, there are a wide range of issues that have yet to be understood by the public. Therefore, the Government needs to continue careful examination of the issue.

Additionally, the Government of Japan makes efforts to communicate with employee organizations by holding regular consultations, which generally cover a wide range of topics, including not only remuneration but also working hours and vacation time. Also, high-level meetings with the Minister in charge are arranged at those consultations. Therefore, the Government believes that these consultations function effectively as a channel for dialogue with employee organizations.

In addition to regular consultations, when establishing or revising a national public employees working system, it is customary to carefully explain and exchange opinions with employee organizations beforehand. For instance, in the process of making a law in force in 2023 which gradually raise the mandatory retirement age for national public employees from age 60, a total of 25 meetings were held to exchange opinions. Further, in 2023, when the law regulating working hours for national public employees was amended to expand the application of the flexitime system, there was an example where consultations with employee organizations were held during the course of drafting the bill.

The Government of Japan shall continue to have social dialogue with employee organizations, including through consultations on the working conditions.

I have explained the basic position of the Japanese Government. Also, the Government will report information concerning these matters as much as possible, taking into consideration the latest observation of the Committee of Experts. It would be grateful if the ILO would respect the view of the Government and the circumstances unique to our country and wait and see the conclusion of the domestic consultations in Japan.

Worker members – This is the ninth time we are discussing the Government’s application of this fundamental and enabling Convention. I will focus my intervention on what, in our view, is at the heart of this long-standing issue of the right to organize for firefighters and other public and local service employees.

Japan ratified the Convention in 1965, and at least since 1973, our Committee has been seized with this matter, so for already 50 years, that is half a century. From the outset, we are bound to state that Japan is not one of those Member States of the ILO who persist in antagonizing social partners, attacking their independence or, for that matter, disregarding the role or guidance of the Committee of Experts, on the contrary. But on this very fundamental issue, we must express our deepest disappointment that the right to organize for firefighters and others in public service remains unresolved. In 2018, our consensual recommendations as a Committee, called on the Government, to: (i) hold consultations with the social partners at the national level on the view of the Government that firefighters are considered police and how this view corresponds to the application of the Convention and provide information on the outcome of this consultation; (ii) consider, in consultation with the social partners, what categories of prison officers are considered part of the police, thus exempted from the right to organize, and those categories that are not considered part of the police, and having the right to organize; and, finally, (iii) develop a time-bound action plan together with the social partners in order to implement these recommendations and report to the Committee of Experts before its next meeting in November 2018.

For years, nothing has happened. The Government has not implemented any of this. In addition to denial of the rights of firefighters, the rights for local service employees have deteriorated since the change of legislation in April 2020. We deplore this fact. More concerning is the fact that the Government continues to hold on to justifications for the exclusion of firefighters and other public servants from exercising the right to organize which does not hold water.

As the plain language of Article 9 of the Convention indicates, not even the police or armed forces are automatically exempted from the Convention. The extent to which the guarantees provided for in the Convention applies to them, shall be determined by national laws or regulations. So clearly, it is a matter of the extent of the application of the guarantees in the Convention that is at stake here, not an outright exclusion from its coverage.

In Japan, firefighters are not police or army, and therefore, the idea that the Japanese Government can just categorize firefighters or other public servants as police or having a command or rank structure or are gun-holding personnel, in an effort to exclude them from the guarantees provided by the Convention is arbitrary and inconsistent with the scope of the Convention. Unless we are wrong, and the Japanese Government can tell us, the basic functions of the Japanese police include, for example, the authority to investigate crimes, the authority to make arrests, and the carrying and use of weapons for these purposes.

Firefighters do not have these powers. They are emergency workers and to that extent peace officers. This is the same for a majority of prison officers.

As we speak, labour standard inspectors, who are authorized to investigate crimes, have the right to organize, and narcotics agents, who are authorized to carry and use weapons, also have the right to organize.

So, if you actually look at what these public servants do in reality instead of their titles or the ranked system in which they work, there is no doubt that firefighters and prison officers are not military or police. We must be forthright, that the way the Government is treating these categories of workers for purposes of the right to organize is discriminatory.

The Government cannot just call any group as they wish in order to deny them the right to organize. The justification for any limitations on this enabling right must find its grounds in article 9 of the Convention.

The burden for justifying any such limitation is on the Government not the workers. In the absence of this justification, the default position should be that, in accordance with their legitimate expectation, firefighters and public servants can form or join a trade union of their choice with any necessary limitations arising from their functions.

In giving consideration to the reality of the workers, we invite the Government to recognize that during the spread of the COVID-19, the personnel involved in emergency services showed a high sense of mission and a high level of professionalism to protect the lives of patients without regard for the risk of infection to themselves and their families. The idea that these colleagues will be less patriotic or professional if they exercise their right to organize cannot be further from the truth and the reality. Their professionalism only increased their popularity among the population and created a real leverage for the improvement of their rights. The sad part is that the sanitary crisis during the COVID-19 pandemic led to worsened working conditions for emergency personnel and in particular the ambulance services. And despite clear proposals, gathered from the first-responder firefighters, their organization was unable to engage with management on urgent remedial measures in the absence of a system where labour and management could cooperate.

Ironically, the organization voluntary formed by the firefighting personnel and ambulance workers have handled issues regarding equipment and working conditions since 1977 but without any right to negotiate or to be consulted by management because their right to organize has not been recognized.

The report of the Committee of Experts indicates that the Fire Chief's Association oppose the recognition of the right for ordinary firefighters because of fears that they will disrupt organizational order. This fear is obviously unfounded.

The Government has also provided information regarding the use of the Fire Defense Personnel Committee System, even during the Covid-19 crisis which enabled the review of about 5,000 opinions per year, of which 40 per cent are considered appropriate for implementation. But clearly, soliciting opinions and having the right to be consulted or to negotiate with is not the same. Where one has a right, it cannot be treated as a mere extension of courtesy. Based on their experiences with extreme emergency transport difficulties, these workers are stressing the necessity of labour–employer relations in the context of the right to organize so they can bring matter to the table of discussion and be taken seriously and to prepare for the next infectious disease crisis.

We are at pains to reiterate that the use of fact-finding and opinion surveys can complement but not replace the right to organize for workers.

As workers, we are determined that this fundamental and enabling right is treated as sacrosanct. It has taken too long for the Government to address our concerns, in this regard. Fifty years of requesting and waiting, half a century but still the Government has not provided any reasonable justification in line with the Convention. We must begin to consider very serious measures to protect the exercise of this right.

Employer members – This case concerns the application in practice of fundamental Convention No. 87 in Japan. Japan ratified the Convention in 1965. And since then, the Committee of Experts has made observations 24 times and this is the eighth time this Committee is discussing the case, the last being in 2018.

We would like to thank the Government of Japan for the comprehensive information they shared with the Committee today. At the outset, we would like to recall that some of the legislative issues referred to in the Committee of Experts' observations are related to the right to strike. We would like to recall our firm conviction that neither Convention No. 87 nor any other ILO Convention protects the right to strike. The Government group of the Governing Body confirmed in March 2015 that: "The scope and conditions of this right are regulated at the national level." We also believe that, in view of the pending International Court of Justice advisory opinion proceedings, the Committee of Experts should have refrained from referring to the right to industrial action in its comments, both to protect the integrity of the International Court of Justice proceedings and to demonstrate its own neutrality in relation to these proceedings.

The Employer members would like to comment on three issues identified in the Committee of Experts observations:

We take note of the information provided by the Government supporting its view that firefighting personnel in Japan is assimilated into category of police, given its historical development, as well as the nature of their duties.

The Government pointed out that Japan is one of the most disaster-prone countries. Firefighting services in Japan have a key role to play in the management of these disasters and their functions therefore extend beyond firefighting in the traditional sense. When the large-scale earthquake occurred this year, thousands of firefighters' units from all over the country were on duty to respond to the disaster in close relationship with the police and the self-defence forces. The Government stresses that a high level of discipline is essential for firefighting staff and that the granting of the right to organize may disrupt organizational order and affect the functioning of the service during wide-scale disasters.

The Government also explains that, when it ratified the Convention in 1965, it did so on the basis of earlier decisions of the Committee on Freedom of Association which saw no problem in considering the firefighting service in Japan as a service assimilated to the police. The Employers would point out here that there has been much confusion recently about the mandate of the Committee on Freedom of Association, which has no competence in supervising and interpreting Conventions, including Convention No. 87. Nevertheless, the Committee of Experts should have taken into account that the Government relied on the validity of the Committee on Freedom of Association decisions and ratified the Convention in the belief that its interpretation of firefighting services as part of the police was correct.

The Government, in its report, also referred to the Fire Defense Personnel Committee System which is meant to identify and resolve problems related to the working conditions of fire defence personnel. This system was introduced by amendment of the law based on an agreement between employers and workers, and is widely accepted. We understand that the system has been rolled out nationwide and has already contributed to the improvement of many work environments. We also note that the Government makes continuous efforts to further improve the system.

The Committee of Experts on the other hand finds that the implementation policy of the Fire Defense Personnel Committee remains distinct from the recognition of the right to organize under Article 2 of the Convention. Accordingly, the Committee of Experts repeats its expectation that there will be further progress towards ensuring the right of firefighting personnel to form and join an organization of their own choosing to defend their occupational interests.

The Employer members believe that things may not be as straightforward as the Committee of Experts suggests. While the only possible exceptions to the scope of the Convention concern the police and the armed forces, these terms do not always have exactly the same meaning in the national context. It may be argued that both terms are synonyms for situations that are of fundamental importance for the internal and external security of a State, and thus for areas that fall within the core area of national sovereignty which the Convention did not want to interfere with. From this point of view, it can be argued that the firefighting service in Japan, which is responsible for dealing with natural disasters, is of similar importance for the protection of people's lives, health and property as the police in a narrower sense, given the frequent natural disasters in Japan. One could further argue that the reasons in favour of excluding the police and armed forces from the scope of the Convention apply equally to the fire service in Japan. Against this background, the Employers appreciate the Government's efforts to pursue an approach that combines compliance with the requirements of the Convention as well as with its specific national needs. We encourage the Government to continue on this way, in close consultation with the social partners. In doing so, the Employers suggest to the Government, to seek further guidance and ideas from good practice in other countries with similar systems and needs.

The second area of observation relates to the right to organize of prison officers. We also take note of the Government's submission that, in Japan, prison officers conduct duties as judicial police officers stipulated in the Code of Criminal Procedure. Prison officers are also permitted by law to carry and use a weapon just as police officials. The Government further reiterates that, "in cases where any emergency occurs in a penal institution, it is required to bring the situation under control, by force if necessary; therefore, granting the right to organize to the personnel in penal institutions could pose a problem for the performance of their duties and maintenance of discipline and order." In view of this, we note that the Government argues that prison officers in Japan should be considered to be included in the "police" in the sense of Article 9 of the Convention.

In terms of compensation for the right to organize, the Government reported that, since 2019, it granted expanded opportunities for the personnel of penal institutions to express their opinions in the eight regional correctional headquarters across the country. Moreover, in 2022, sessions took place partly online with the participation of 222 general staff members (from 75 penal institutions). In these sessions, the participants were able to exchange opinions on various topics including improvements in the work environment, staff training and reduction of the workload. The Committee of Experts, on the other hand, expresses the view that these initiatives remained distinct from the recognition of the right to organize under Article 2 of the Convention. Consequently, the Committee of Experts urged the Government to take the necessary measures, in consultation with the social partners and other stakeholders concerned, to ensure that prison officers, other than those with the specific duties of the judicial police may form and join an organization of their own choosing to defend their occupational interests.

The Employer members, here too, would like to put on record their recognition for the Governments' continuous commitment to make progress and to find ways of implementation that both meet the requirements of the Convention and its specific needs is the way to go. The Employer members encourage the Government to continue its efforts in this regard, in close consultation with the social partners. Similar to what we proposed for the firefighter issue, the Employers suggest to the Government, to seek further guidance and ideas from good practice in other countries with similar needs and systems.

The Employer members further take note that the Committee of Experts urges the Government to engage in consultations with the social partners and other stakeholders concerned to ensure that public service employees fully enjoy their basic labour rights.

The Government reports in this regard that, while the labour rights of public service employees in Japan are to some extent restricted due to their status, they benefit from the NPA system and other compensatory measures. The NPA system, which was approved by the Supreme Court of Japan in 1973, examines the general conditions of society and carries out surveys on working conditions, such as the remuneration in the private sector. Before making its recommendations about working conditions, the NPA also hears employees' organizations' opinions or requests through meetings.

As regards measures for the autonomous labour-employer relation system, referred to in the 2018 Committee's conclusions, the Government reports that there have been various issues. Moreover, the Amendment Act of the National Public Service Act of April 2014 did not provide for such measures as understanding by the public was not yet achieved. The Government considers that the autonomous labour–employer relations system needs further careful examination while the exchange of opinion with employee organizations is continued.

The Employer members recognize the efforts of the Government and the NPA to organize and conduct continuous dialogue with social partners on the autonomous labour–employer relations system. We consider that these consultations are helpful in exchanging opinions and gathering information on a wide range of issues. While the Employer members encourage the Government to continue on this way, they understand that a time-bound action plan on measures for the autonomous labour–employer relations system, as requested by the Committee in 2018, may not be appropriate, given the complexity of the issues involved.

Finally, we ask the Government to report on its progress by 1 September 2024 to allow the Committee of Experts to review further developments in 2025.

*Interpretation from Japanese: Worker member, Japan – First of all, regarding the legal system of labour relations for public service employees, which is in violation of Conventions Nos 87 and 98, the Government of Japan has totally failed to respond to any of the requests of the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association made over many years. It is with extremely grave concern that I bring to the attention of this Committee that the Government has even closed the path to finding a solution to this matter.

When the individual review was conducted in 2018, the conclusions of the Chairperson of the Committee, identified five issues and called on the Government “to develop a time-bound action plan together with the social partners in order to implement its recommendations.”

However, despite the fact that six years has passed since then, the Japanese Government continues its unjust and deliberate negligence by stating “we continue to carefully consider how we will respond to the requests of the Chairperson.” The Government has also stated “we are also exchanging views with JTUC–RENGO on how to respond to the requests in the Chairperson’s conclusion”, although in reality they are taking no such action. In order to shed light on the unjust stance of the Japanese Government, I would like to describe the actual situation and assessment of the five issues pointed out in the Chairperson’s conclusions of the Committee in 2018.

First, I would like to discuss “the consideration of the autonomous labour–employer relations system through consultation with social partners.” The Japanese Government points out that it “has been exchanging views with employee organizations,” but this is completely false. Thus far, the Government has only revealed its views if and only when requested by the organizations and has shown no willingness to take the initiative on such consultations. Moreover, for over ten years, since 2014, the Government has maintained the insincere stance of repeating the same response, and I quote “due to a wide range of issues, we will consider the matter carefully while exchanging views in good faith.”

The second issue is “the formulation of a plan to improve the functions of the Fire Defense Committee through continuous labour–employer consultations.” The Fire Defense Committee system was put into effect in 1996, and nearly 30 years have passed since then. In recent years, it has become clear that the system is a mere formality, with the Ministry of Internal Affairs and Communications Fire and Disaster Management Agency issuing a notification to request that local fire department headquarters make improvements in the operation of the system. The system clearly differs from collective labour–employer relations under the right to organize, and its limitations have become extremely clear.

The third issue is “consultation with social partners at the national level on the Government’s view that firefighting personnel are considered to be police and how that view fits with the current state of application of the Convention.” Based on the 2018 conclusions of the Chairperson of the Committee, I recognize that this is the only issue on which concrete discussions are taking place. Having said so, the Japanese Government’s report to the Committee of Experts, issued four months after the Chairperson’s conclusion, stated “Japanese firefighting personnel need to pay full attention to the fact that there is no problem in the application of the Convention as it is regarded that there is “a certain part of their duties that should be considered to be the same as the police,” and we will hold discussions with the labour side during exchanges of opinions.”

In other words, since the Japanese Government has been conducting consultations on the premise that “firefighting personnel are the same as the police,” the consultations have been limited to an exchange of each other’s arguments. I would like to point out that unless the Government changes its stance, namely, the premise that firefighters are denied their right to organize, no further progress can be expected from these consultations.

The fourth issue is the “consultation and review with social partners on categories of prison officers that are considered to be part of the police and whose right to organize is denied, and categories that are not considered to be part of the police and thus have the right to organize.”.

Due to the unfair inaction of the Japanese Government on this issue, as pointed out in the statement of the representative of the Employers at the 2018 Committee, not only has there been no progress whatsoever, even the first steps are yet to be taken.

At the same time, Japan’s prisons are undemocratic workplaces in which the right to organize is denied. Incidents of violence against inmates by staff, something that should never happen under any circumstance, have occurred, since the 2018 conclusions of the Chairperson of the Committee. The turnover of young prison staff and officers is also significantly higher than in other occupations.

I would like to express a strong protest for the fact that, despite this, the Japanese Government has deliberately denied the existence of social partners with whom it should be consulting on and considering these matters, as requested in the conclusions of the Chairperson of the 2018 Committee, thereby denying the idea of consultation itself.

The fifth issue is the “consultation and review with social partners on whether the NPA procedures provide neutral and prompt mediation and arbitration.”

The Japanese Government emphasizes only the number of meetings between the NPA and the employee organizations to simply hear opinions that are not really consultations. Furthermore, the Japanese Government insists on the compensatory measures in Japan’s Supreme Court verdict of 50 years ago. Based on its unilateral evaluation that the functions of the NPA have been adequately fulfilled, the Government maintains its stance of refusing to engage in discussion or review of the NPA’s procedures.

Thus far, I have reported on the Japanese Government’s stance and responses regarding the actual situation and assessment of the five issues pointed out in the 2018 conclusions of the Chairperson of the Committee, six years ago.

I am aware that the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association have already drawn universal and firm conclusions on all five of these issues.

However, I once again draw the attention of the Chairperson and the entire Committee to the fact that the Japanese Government has continued to intentionally avoid taking action in accordance with the 2018 conclusions of the Chairperson of the Committee.

I would like to add, that with regards to the public service employee labour–employer relations system, the establishment of basic labour rights is extremely meaningful in that it would allow the participation of employees and labour unions in the administrative management.

“Trade unions represent employees directly engaged in administration,” and given that they “have insights regarding the entire administration from the accumulated experience of employees in workplaces,” it would be extremely useful to have their involvement.

It would be possible to utilize these insights to provide higher quality public services through labour–employer negotiations. I believe that this is the significance and good sense underpinning labour–employer relations systems in which basic labour rights have been implemented in all countries around the world, with the notable exception of Japan.

It would follow therefore, that restrictions on the basic labour rights of public service employees in fact have a negative impact on the management of the administration and these restrictions are hindering public service employees from approaching their duties with wisdom and with passion.

In conclusion, in view of the responsibilities and obligations of the Government of Japan vis-à-vis the international community and vis-à-vis the ILO, I would like to request that, in examining this case, the Committee discuss and reach firm conclusions that will lead to a sincere response from the Japanese Government that they will take sincere steps toward a fundamental and thorough solution to the issue of the basic labour rights of public service employees in Japan.

Employer member, Japan – I speak on behalf of the Japanese employers regarding this case on the effective implementation, in law and practice, of the Convention in Japan. We thank the Government of Japan for their comprehensive information shared with us in this sitting.

First of all, we would like to stress that Japanese employers’ organizations support the Government of Japan’s report on the Committee of Experts’ observations regarding the application of the Convention sent in 2021. We note that here there is no difference in the Government’s position today.

Before I turn to the main issue of this case, I wish to recall discussions in previous years on the issue of the Committee of Experts making observations regarding the right to strike in the context of the Convention. It is not necessary to repeat the employers’ position at length, I will limit myself to noting that in 2015 the Governments’ group position has been that the right to strike is to be regulated at the national level. We agree with this and note the national level regulation of the right to strike in Japan.

Concerning the present case, the contentious issues on the Japanese Governments’ ratification of the Convention relates to compensatory measures for the basic labour rights of firefighting personnel, prison officers and civil servants, including national civil servants.

First, I would like to discuss the situation of firefighting personnel and prison officers in Japan. As highlighted by the Government of Japan on multiple occasions, unlike other countries, Japan frequently faces natural disasters including huge earthquakes and tsunamis. For this reason, we consider that it is appropriate for the Government to treat firefighting personnel like police, for the purpose of effectively coordinating their actions to protect peoples' lives, health, and property when crisis occurs.

On the other hand, it is undisputed that it is extremely important to improve the working conditions and benefits of firefighting personnel and prison officers, taking into account the realities of their workplaces. For this reason, it is extremely important that there are continuous exchanges of views within the Fire Defense Personnel Committee and also the regional correction headquarters. Furthermore, we note the importance for the Government to address the concerns of the firefighting personnel and prison officers to the extent possible.

In this regard, the Government of Japan claims that it is making further amendments to its operational policy in light of the 2018 Committee of Experts' comments, but the workers repeatedly argue that such efforts are inadequate. From the other view, the Japanese employers regret this situation has persisted for so long.

Therefore, the Japanese employers would like the Japanese Government to provide detailed information on the Fire Defense Personnel Committee System and the exchange of views with prison officers and the efforts of the penal institutions for females, in particular on the various measures and improvements the Japanese Government has implemented for firefighting personnel and prison officers that they are convinced and satisfied with. It is important to share with Japanese workers and management materials that show that they are satisfied with the various measures and improvements that have been implemented by the Japanese Government, and to hold regular discussions at tripartite forums between Government workers and employers in Japan.

Next, I would like to address the issue concerning civil servants, including national civil servants. Japanese employers' organizations support the Japanese Government's view that the National Personnel Authority (NPA) recommendation system is a compensatory measure to regulate the basic labour rights of public servants in our country. This system has traditionally worked well thus far.

Regarding the autonomous labour-employer relations system, it should be noted that not only the draft law amendment stipulating measures for an autonomous labour-employer relations system was repealed, but the public comments on the draft law amendment conducted by the Japanese Government between 2010 and 2011, also showed that there is not sufficient understanding and support for the autonomous labour-employer relations system from the public. In order for the system to be implemented in Japan, it is essential to gain the understanding and also support from the public.

The Japanese employers therefore call on the Japanese Government to continue promoting dialogue with social partners, including exchanging views to ensure that the NPA recommendation system is properly implemented.

To conclude, this is the eighth time that the Committee has discussed this case. We strongly hope that there will not be a ninth discussion.

Worker member, New Zealand – I am representing the New Zealand Council of Trades Unions and it is in my experience as the National Secretary of the New Zealand Professional Firefighters Union that I intervene to dispel the misunderstandings of those opposed to Japan's firefighters exercising their right to organize.

Firefighters put their quality and quantity of life on the line every time they respond, protecting and serving the community. It takes a special person to walk into fire, crawl into confined spaces during powerful aftershocks, perform complex rescues at the risk of exploding vehicles and to continue to respond knowing they are being exposed to carcinogens at every fire, and trauma on almost every shift. Their dedication and service to the public does not diminish when they become a union member. The right to organize is a positive outcome for the firefighting profession and the public they protect.

Globally, we can provide many examples where it was only through the advocacy of the firefighters' union that safe staffing levels and systems were implemented. The community is better protected with sufficient firefighters arriving faster, well-trained and qualified, armed with the necessary equipment to perform whatever task it takes to rescue and protect.

Fire services are emergency services and must be able to react and adapt effectively and efficiently. The current Japanese Fire Defense Committee is a process that does not provide a mechanism for implementation of change such as improvement in working conditions and duties under urgency. At the height of the COVID-19 pandemic, the Japanese emergency services were stretched beyond their limit with the Fire Defense Committee unable to meet the challenges of the ever-changing response environment with urgency.

In comparison, in New Zealand, the union and the employer worked constructively to implement the necessary changes to protective equipment and response procedures. The changes were implemented seamlessly and accepted immediately by the firefighters as they knew changes were agreed with their health and safety held paramount. The right to organize does not detrimentally interfere with incident control or the duties on the incident ground. The involvement of unionized workers in developing the training and qualification programmes enhances the command structures.

There are significant differences between police and firefighters. Firefighters are protectors, not enforcers and their duties and authorities are founded on that important difference.

And I would just like to remind the hall that New Zealanders are also very prone to large-scale events, extreme weather events, earthquakes, cyclones and therefore the New Zealand firefighters are responding in a very similar context to that of the Japanese firefighters.

The refusal to grant firefighters their right to organize is to deny them their right to actively participate in matters directly impacting their health, safety and well-being. It denies their rightful place in enhancing the emergency's response provided to their communities. The Japanese firefighters have been excluded from this right for 76 years. They must be afforded their fundamental rights in accordance with the Convention now.

We implore the Committee to take every available action to ensure that the Japanese Government implements this fundamental right to organize for the health, safety and well-being of Japanese firefighters and the communities they serve.

Employer member, Brazil – Discussions on the extension of freedom of association and the right to organize are among the most important in terms of such fundamental principles and rights at work. Their importance is reiterated by the number of cases under discussion in the debate of the Committee of this year. There are nine. Not to mention the existence of a specific Committee just to deal with such issues, the Committee on Freedom of Association. The information presented today at the CAS reiterates the importance of the topic. They also reiterate, in line with what the Committee on Freedom of Association has already decided, that the unquestionably fundamental freedom of association and the right to organize are not absolute and unlimited. In this sense, I see that the Convention itself in its Article 9 makes it clear that there is reasonableness in some cases, especially with regard to the armed forces and the police, for limits to be defined in the internal laws of each country in accordance with the reality of the countries. Also, Convention No. 98, which although is not subject to the present case also deals with the right to organize, in its Article 5, establishes that the extent to which this right will be extended to the armed forces and the police will be determined by national legislation. It is worth saying, the Committee on Freedom of Association itself has already recognized the regularity of the limitations to freedom of association and the right to organize when examining exactly the case of prison staff in Japan.

Therefore, I understand as reasonable and proportional that there are limitations on freedom of association and the right to organize in exceptional cases, such as the armed forces and police, categories in which it is possible for countries to frame, according to their specific reality, professionals from the fire department and those from prison establishments due to the very nature of their activities. Of course, the continuous dialogue between the public administrations of each country and the professionals essential for the security of each nation must be sought and deepened, as it seemed to us to be the case, as it is unquestionably necessary and important. And this is independent of the limitations to freedom of association. In this way, I pray that the mentioned dialogue suitable to the reality of the country can continue.

Worker member, Republic of Korea – I would like to address the absence of the right of firefighters to organize in Japan. Since 1973, the Committee of Experts has examined their exclusion and considered that this is not compliant with the Convention. In its report this year, the Committee of Experts continue to urge the Government of Japan to: “fully grant the right to organize and collective bargaining to firefighters”. The Committee expects the continuing consultations between the Government and trade unions would lead to progress.

The Japanese Government’s claim that granting firefighters the right to organize would negatively impact their duties is utterly unfounded. On similar ground, the firefighters in the Republic of Korea had not been able to organize, form or join a trade union. The restrictions on such rights were upheld by the Constitutional Court decision handed down in December 2008. However, as part of the process of ratification of the Convention, the Korean National Assembly adopted a legislative amendment to uplift these restrictions in December 2020, as a first step towards observing the Republic of Korea’s obligations under the Convention.

Aligning domestic laws with the ratified ILO Conventions is a commitment and an obligation of Member States.

By now, their right to organize has been granted to firefighters in the Republic of Korea. This has had no adverse effect whatsoever on their duties. My fellow workers had illustrated similar experiences in their countries.

We reiterate the comment of the Committee of Experts that job performance is entirely distinctive from the right to freedom of association of firefighters, which is the subject matter of examination concerning compliance under the Convention.

We deeply regret that the Government and the Fire Chiefs’ Association of Japan are holding on to the same argument for decades to deny the firefighters from enjoying the rights protected under the Convention. This argument that firefighters forming into trade unions would critically hamper life-saving rescues and operations does not have reasonable grounds compared to the experiences of their counterparts in Member States, including the Republic of Korea where their right to organize has been respected and enforced.

Firefighters all over the world pose, first and foremost, a profound sense of duty to protect lives and properties. The Japanese Government’s speculative arguments on the negative impacts of unionization of the firefighters are disrespectful of the mission and professionalism upheld by the firefighters. Such arguments are nothing but mere excuses of the Government's lack of commitment to implementing their obligation under the Convention.

Employer member, Republic of Korea – I am here today to convey my solidarity with the Japanese Government's efforts to respect the freedom of association in its country. To begin, I would like to stress that, unlike the Republic of Korea, Japan is a country that often experiences natural disasters, including tsunami and earthquakes, due to its unique geography. Accordingly, the Korean Employers acknowledged that the Government of Japan has adopted specific laws that are specifically adapted to the national circumstances in Japan.

Furthermore, the Korean Employers take note of the measures that the Government of Japan has taken towards addressing the issues on firefighters and prison officers, including civil servants and local officials. The Government's recent actions demonstrate its commitment to establishing an environment that facilitates the free association of these workers.

Moreover, the Korean Employers consider that it is imperative to recognize that the Government is not the sole entity responsible for implementing these changes. In order to guarantee the success of these initiatives, it is imperative that workers and other stakeholders take concrete actions. The Japanese tripartite stakeholders should collaborate to accomplish a shared objective that is governed by mutual trust, respect, and good faith. Genuine social dialogue should be prioritized, with transparency and consensus-building as the guiding principles. Stakeholders can guarantee that their concerns are fully investigated and that the appropriate measures are implemented by participating in a dialogue-based approach.

In conclusion, the Korean Employers hope that the Government of Japan will continue its efforts to safeguard and advance freedom of association and to provide information to the Committee of Experts in a timely manner.

Worker member, United States of America – My remarks will focus on the Government of Japan's long-standing policy of denying the employees of correctional facilities their right to organize under the Convention.

Over the past 70 years, the Japanese Government has provided various justifications for its refusal to grant correctional workers their right to organize. Upon examination, none of these withstand scrutiny and it is past time that they provide these workers with their fundamental right to organize a trade union.

For decades, the ILO supervisory mechanisms have rejected Japan's attempt to claim that all corrections employees are "police officers" and thus exempt from the Convention's guarantee of freedom of association.

It is particularly regrettable that Japan has deliberately denied the existence of social partners and ignored the Committee of Experts' recommendations including the request of the Chairperson of this Committee in 2018 that they "consider, in close consultation with the social partners, which categories of prison staff could be considered part of the police – and therefore exempt from the Convention – and which could not."

The Committee of Experts has also rejected Japan's claim that simply because some correctional officers are authorized to carry firearms in the course of their duties, that they must be considered as part of the police or armed forces. The Government of Japan has also advanced the argument that providing correctional employees with the right to organize would be too dangerous and might undermine discipline and order at penal institutions. However, this argument is easily dismissed by the fact that many ILO Member States provide their prison officers and other corrections employees with the right to organize with no apparent effect on public safety or order in correctional institutions. For example, in the United States, prison guards enjoy the right to organize trade unions, and this has enhanced, not weakened, the safety and security of our penal institutions. Indeed, unions representing correctional officers and employees in the United States have been instrumental in addressing issues of understaffing and poor working conditions in both minimum and maximum security facilities.

It is simply outrageous that the Government of Japan continues to ignore the clear recommendations of the ILO's supervisory mechanisms to reform its unsupportable blanket denial of freedom of association to correctional workers, firefighters, and other categories of public servants. It should immediately recognize the right of correctional employees to organize to have a voice in the workplace, free from any restraint from management. Doing so should be seen as the one and only measure that would improve their closed work environment, providing them a fair, open and democratic one.

Worker member, Italy – I take the floor on behalf of the Italian trade union confederations (Italian General Confederation of Labour, Italian Confederation of Workers' Trade Unions, Italian Union of Labour), and the British federation of trade unions, the Trades Union Congress, the French Trade Union Confederation, the German Trade Union Confederation, representing together more than 22 million workers.

The Committee of Experts noted with deep concerns the observations from the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC-RENGO) regretting the Government's long-standing reluctant position on the reform of the autonomous labour-employer relations system, and the failure to initiate consultations with the social partners, in particular the lack of will to reconsider the NPA mechanism.

According to that, more than 3 million Japanese public servants do not have the right to bargain or conclude collective agreements at the local or national level, and have only a defective and unilateral consultation process without any possibility of involving workers bodies. Their wages and working conditions are set by law and/or regulations, based on the recommendations issued by the NPA.

The effects of COVID-19 imposed an economic contraction in the private sector and, in response, the NPA's recommendations in 2021 called for lowering national public servants' salaries. Due to political circumstances, including the schedule for elections, there was not enough time to take the legal measures to implement the salary change that year. As a result, the 2021 revision of salaries of national public servants was applied the following year, in June 2022, bringing anxiety, doubt and misunderstanding among staff who had been struggling with COVID-19 restrictions in their daily work.

The pandemic, with its severe socio-economic impact, has shown once again that such a mechanism is dysfunctional as a compensatory measure and inadequate in times of social crises to ensure an autonomous industrial relations system or to improve working conditions and wages in the public sector.

In Italy, Legislative Decree No. 165/2001 defines the general rules on representativeness and organization of work in public administrations and enables the negotiation process at all levels for establishing wage and working conditions. Unlike in Japan, more than 3 million Italian public servants are subject to the regulation set out in national collective agreements, signed by the most representative trade unions and the Agency for the Negotiation Representation of Public Administrations (ARAN).

In the United Kingdom, there are multiple, distinct pay review bodies for the public sector, including different committees for pay in hospitals, prisons, schools and the civil service. The bodies are not – despite their official designation – independent, as the Government sets budgetary limits on what they can recommend, nor does the Government have to accept their recommendations. But neither do the unions representing the workers have to accept the Government's decisions, sometimes leading to new negotiations. Union negotiating, for example leading to the 2023 public sector pay awards, can significantly improve the budgetary limits set by the Government, and the Government's acceptance of the recommended pay increase.

Chair, in the light of the critical defects and limitations in the NPA illustrated so far, that demonstrated that this mechanism is an obstacle to genuine enforcement of rights under the Convention, Italian, British, French and German workers demand as follows.

As requested by reports of the Committee of Experts over the last years and this Committee's conclusions in 2018, we urge the Japanese Government to start a consultation process with social partners in order to review the NPA system and introduce a new system to ensure neutral and prompt mediation and arbitration, in addition to guarantee that public service employees fully enjoy their basic labour rights.

Observer, Educational International (EI) – I will focus my statement on the rights of education workers. Public teachers, everywhere including in Japan, request a commitment from public authorities to promote and realize their rights at work through an institutionalized and autonomous labour-employer relationship. While their right to collective bargaining is recognized, public teachers' unions cannot conclude collective agreements.

One issue that should be addressed through collective agreement is overtime and burnout. Overtime is a grave issue for teachers in Japan. On average they accumulate 81 hours overtime each month in junior high schools and 59 hours in elementary schools. The 1971 Act on Special Measures concerning Salaries and Other Conditions for Education Personnel of Public Schools does not permit extra work allowances except for certain limited work such as out-of-school training, school events, staff meetings and emergency disasters. However, the Act provided for a 4 per cent adjustment for overtime hours in teaching, which was limited to eight hours a month. And I recall, on average, teachers in Japan, work 81 hours extra every month.

In 2022, excessive burdens pushed over 12,000 junior high school teachers and over 6,500 elementary teachers to be on absence leave of over 1 month for mental related illnesses. The excessive workload and mental pressure are pushing workers away from a career in teaching. Staff shortage is acute. A survey from the Ministry of Education in 2021 highlighted that 2,065 positions in teaching were vacant. Shortages increase every year, leaving tens of thousands of children without a teacher.

Teacher shortage is one of the reasons why the United Nations called for a summit on the teaching profession; 59 strong recommendations emerged from this summit dealing among others with social dialogue and the well-being of teachers. Recommendation 15 requests Governments to ensure that teachers and their organizations can engage in social dialogue, including collective bargaining, on policy dialogue, on all matters affecting the profession. This UN recommendation, endorsed by the ILO and UNESCO, is another international instrument supporting the claim for the working conditions in the education sector to be improved through collective agreements.

Observer, Public Service International (PSI) – I would like to focus my intervention on the establishment of an autonomous labour–employer relations system for national public service employees in Japan.

In June 2008, Japan enacted the National Civil Service System Reform Basic Act which included a significant measure: a clause stating that “the Government shall take measures to implement an autonomous labour–employer relations system” in the public sector. This was a clear demand from the Diet, Japan’s legislative body, for the Government to not just “consider”, but to materialize these measures.

In 2011, the Government submitted a related bill to the Diet, but regrettably, it was scrapped without deliberation. Since then, the Government’s response has been a repetitive catch phrase, a mantra, that “there is a wide range of issues which we will consider carefully” This response has been the status quo for over a decade.

When the case of Japan on the Convention was discussed in this Committee, in 2018, its conclusions pointed out the lack of meaningful progress in taking necessary measures regarding the autonomous labour–employer relations system, and more specifically requested the Government to examine carefully this measure in consultation with the social partners. However, six years have passed and as noted by the Committee of Experts, no concrete examination has been made.

The Government’s inaction is not only a disregard for the will of the Diet, representing citizens of Japan, but also a neglect of its obligations under the Convention, which Japan voluntarily ratified in 1965.

This attitude reflects an attempt to evade its responsibility while hoping the workers concerned will forget about the issue. The Government has made claims that the “benefits and costs” of granting public service workers the right to enter into agreements require careful consideration. However, the rights of working people should not be judged purely in monetary terms. The Bill submitted to the Diet in 2011 stated that an autonomous labour–employer relations system is “an agile, flexible system that grants new rights to clerical employees to enter into agreements, abolishes third-party recommendation systems such as the National Personnel Authority, and allows workers and employers to determine working conditions autonomously”. This system can be established simply and clearly. The constant delay by the Government is intolerable given its obligations at both domestic and international levels.

This case is one of the oldest, if not the oldest, in this Committee. For five decades, Japan has failed to honour its obligations under the Convention, a cornerstone of international labour rights. This prolonged inaction is deeply concerning and unacceptable for a nation that prides itself on democratic values and the rule of law.

We urge Japan to immediately rectify this egregious neglect and align its practices with its international commitments, reaffirming its dedication to the principles of justice and equality for all workers.

Chairperson – I can see no more requests for the floor, so I have the honour to give the floor to the Government representative of Japan.

Interpretation from Japanese: Government representative – I would like to explain our basic position again after the statement made by the other representatives.

First of all, I would like to reiterate the particularity of fire defence in Japan. The fire defence personnel in Japan do not have the right to organize because “the services in which they engage are to be assimilated to that of the police”, and for the purport of Article 9 of the Convention, they are considered to be included in the “police” as stipulated in the Article. In other words, fire defence in Japan has a history in that it has been a part of the police, and once a disaster occurs in Japan which is one of the foremost nations frequently hit by disasters, the fire defence personnel are put under duty of response to disasters in a very close relationship with the police and the Self-Defense Forces.

Our country has experienced several large-scale disasters, like the Great East Japan Earthquake in 2011, the 2016 Kumamoto Earthquake, the northern Kyushu heavy rain in July 2017, 2018 West Japan heavy rain and this year, 2024, the Noto Peninsula Earthquake, etc., so we fully respect such dedication of the fire defence personnel who are put under extremely high-skilled and dangerous duty of response to the disaster at the forefront under a unified command on each occasion. Under the situation where earthquakes and tsunamis that are expected to cause devastating damage over a wide area including Tokyo, such as the Nankai Trough megathrust quake and Tokyo inland earthquake, are expected to occur at a fairly high probability in the near future, the current status that they are required to work in a very close relationship with the police and Self-Defense Forces should be recognized.

Moreover, I would like to mention again the effectiveness of the Fire Defense Personnel Committee System which is the alternative of the right to organize. Through the system, about 40 per cent of the opinions which have been deliberated were decided as “appropriate to be implemented” by the Committee and about 50 per cent or more of them have already been realized. Those opinions are urgent needs of the fire defence personnel, such as requests for countermeasures for harassment, establishment of the Epidemic Prevention Work Allowance, which is paid to ambulance team members and others engaged in work to deal with COVID-19, and equipment to prevent them from harmful COVID-19 infections. The Fire Defense Personnel Committee System was introduced as the solution which can gain a national consensus based on the agreement between the Government of Japan and the employees’ side. We will continue to appropriately understand the operational status of the Committee of each fire department headquarters and work to improve its operation with related organizations, including social partners, JICHIRO-RENGO. In order to deepen mutual understanding regarding fire defence, including the Fire Defense Personnel Committee System, we continue to have social dialogue with social partners regularly and to strive for communication.

The Government would like to reiterate the peculiarity of the prison officer. The Government repeats that the prison officers, who are national government officials, are not granted the right to organize as is also the case with police officials. This is because, for the purport of the Convention, prison officers are considered to be included in “the police” as stipulated in Article 9 of the Convention. The reason behind this is that prison officers have the duty of incarcerating persons sentenced to imprisonment in penal institutions; and they are responsible for controlling judicial police work in penal institutions, such as investigation of crimes and arrests of inmates; as well as being permitted by law to carry and use weapons, just as police officials.

Aiming at furthering and defending the interests of the personnel of penal institutions, the Government will continue to implement those various initiatives introduced at the beginning.

As I mentioned at the beginning, we should refrain from discussing the right to strike at this point. In any case, compensatory measures for the restrictions on basic labour rights of the national public employees function properly. There are various concerns and opinions regarding the autonomous labour-employer relations system, and a wide range of issues that have yet to be understood by the public. Therefore, the Government needs to continue careful examination of the issues. The Government shall continue to strive for mutual understanding and to have social dialogue on various themes including the autonomous labour–employer relations system with the social partners including employee organizations.

Employer members – Once again, the Employer members would like to thank the speakers who took the floor on this case to contribute to our discussion. We would also like to thank the Government of Japan for their participation in our discussion and for providing information for us to consider in our assessment of the case. We thank them for the explanations that they have given, especially on the national context which will give us insights for our assessment. So, in that context, the Employer members would like to ask the Government to continue social dialogue with the social partners at the national level on the issues identified and to report on its progress by 1 September 2024 to allow the Committee of Experts to review further developments in 2025.

Worker members – We thank the Government of Japan for their statement, and we also thank all those who intervened.

Since the Employers' group has reiterated its position on the right to strike, the Workers' group feels compelled to reiterate its own, as referenced during the opening sitting of our Committee. There has been a difference in opinion on the right to strike. We nevertheless found a modus operandi in 2015, ten years ago, and the referral of the question by the ILO Governing Body to the International Court of Justice should not affect it and therefore the functioning of our Committee in this regard. Also, the references made to the 2015 statement of the Government group in this discussion are one-sided and do not reflect the statement of the Government group read as whole. Moreover, our debate here is not about the right to strike, but about the right of firefighters and other public and local service employees to organize.

Getting back to this case, it is said that the first organized emergency services in the world began in Vienna in 1881. I am sure other emergency services were also operating in other parts of the world unknown to the recorder. Be that as it may, since then, emergency services have been established as institutions all over the world. Although there are differences in some or all of these, it is assumed that firefighting organizations are responsible for emergency services in many countries and cities. So, we are concerned that the views expressed here by the Government of Japan harbour a core misconception – as if the mere fact of being an emergency worker exclude one from the right to organize or that as soon as one exercises the right to organize, all professional ethics and disciplines is thrown out of the window.

As we said in the opening speech, this is not the case. The right to organize is sacrosanct but not absolute. There can be limitations on the exercise of the right, as one employer said, but there is no automatic exclusion from the right to organize. The Convention is clear, I quote: "Workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish and, subject only to the rules of the organisation concerned, to join organisations of their own choosing without previous authorisation ..." that is Article 2 of the Convention, and I quote again Article 9 of the Convention: "The extent to which the guarantees provided for in this Convention shall apply to the armed forces and the police shall be determined by national laws or regulations."

The report of the Committee of Experts stated in 1973 that "The Committee does not consider that the duties of firefighting personnel are of such a nature as to justify the exclusion of this type of worker under Article 9 of the Convention concerning the military and police. The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will take appropriate measures to ensure that the right to organize is also recognized for this type of worker." So, the Workers are on solid ground here. The Government must justify the non-recognition of their right to organize, otherwise you must allow its exercise without further delay.

In conclusion, we must highlight that in June 2019, as part of the ILO Centenary, the House of Representatives and the House of Councillors of the Japanese National Diet unanimously passed and adopted the resolution concerning Japan's further contributions to the International Labour Organization on the commemoration of the Centenary of its foundation. This was an important moment in the relationship between Japan and the ILO.

The resolution recalled that "Japan, as one of the founding members of the ILO holding a titular seat in the ILO Governing Body as one of the states of chief industrial importance since 1954, has played a leading role in promoting ILO's activities, not only in Japan but also elsewhere in the world, and that our continued contribution is strongly expected by the international community." The resolution further states that "we hereby reconfirm the leading roles of Japan to be played within the ILO, and express our commitment to make our utmost contributions to pursuing and achieving the principle and objectives of the ILO in cooperation with the Member States throughout the world, leading to the development of the ILO in the next 100 years."

The resolution pointed out that Japan "must make additional efforts toward ratification of the remaining unratified fundamental Conventions" and "... must make additional efforts with the international community to ensure the sincere implementation of ratified Conventions" as a specific issue.

We welcome the commitment by Japan to ensure sincere implementation of ratified Conventions. This commitment must surely include Convention No. 87 and the right to organize.

At the moment, we call on the Government, in consultation with social partners, to adopt a timebound road map and action plan as soon as possible and submit the road map and action plan to the Committee of Experts by the end of September 2024. The road map and action plan must provide the pathway to resolving this matter by 2026.

We are at a loss why the Government has not, as part of its national consultations on this matter, sought information and advice from the ILO. We urge the Government of Japan to do so without delay and so to avoid a tenth discussion of this case because the eighth discussion took place in 2018 to correct one of the employers, and this year we have already the ninth discussion, he was hoping that that would never take place.

Given the fundamental and enabling nature of the right to organize under the Convention and the persistent refusal, without reasonable justification, to ensure that firefighters and other public servants not performing core police or military duties can fully exercise and benefit from the protections guaranteed under the Convention, this case merits a special paragraph. Without such a serious step, the right to organize will be emptied of all meaning.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the oral and written information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted the long-standing nature and the prior discussion of this case in the Committee, most recently in 2018.

Taking into account the discussion, the Committee requested the Government, to consider, in line with the Convention and in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations:

- further improvements of the status and labour conditions of firefighters;
- what categories of prison officers are considered part of the police, thus exempted from the right to organize, and those categories that are not considered part of the police, and having the right to organize;
- with regard to public service employees:
 - ensure that the National Personnel Authority (NPA) procedures guarantee effective, impartial and speedy conciliation and arbitration procedures;
 - continue to examine carefully the autonomous labour-employer relations system and seek solutions to the various obstacles to it, in line with the Convention; and
- review the Local Public Service Act and any other related legislation to ensure that local public sector workers enjoy the rights and guarantees set out in the Convention.

The Committee requested the Government to submit a report to the Committee of Experts on progress achieved on all of the above matters by 1 September 2024.

Interpretation from Japanese: Government representative – On behalf of the Japanese Government, I would like to express our opinions in response to the conclusion.

Regarding the right to organize of the fire defence personnel, the Government would comprehend the operation of the Fire Defense Personnel Committee System as an alternative to granting the right to organize and work to improve its operation with related organizations including social partners.

Regarding the right to organize of the personnel of penal institutions, the Government will strive to achieve the furthering and defending of their interests by implementing and expanding various initiatives such as organizing meetings on exchanging views between executives of each regional correction headquarters and general staff members.

Regarding the autonomous labour-employer relations system, there are various concerns and opinions and a wide range of issues that have yet to be understood by the public. Therefore, the Government needs to continue careful examination of the issue. The Government continues to strive for mutual understanding with the social partners, including employee organizations.

Kazakhstan (ratification: 2001)

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81)

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129)

Written information provided by the Government

In accordance with the Laws of the Republic of Kazakhstan "On Ratification of the Convention concerning Labour Inspection in Industry and Commerce" (No. 81) and "On Ratification of the Convention concerning Labour Inspection in Agriculture" (No. 129), adopted in May 2001, labour inspection is mandated to be under the supervision and control of the central Government. Since 1993, a state labour inspectorate has been operational in Kazakhstan, in line with these Conventions' provisions. As per section 191 of the Republic of Kazakhstan's Labour Code, state labour inspectors are tasked with enforcing compliance with labour legislation. This enforcement takes the form of inspection and preventive control, involving visits to the control subjects, as stipulated by the Entrepreneurship Code of the Republic of Kazakhstan. The inspections are carried out through on-site visits to the inspected entity in accordance with the approved checklist, which contains 38 items and fully covers the requirements of the labour legislation.

In 2023, labour inspectors conducted 6,927 on-site inspections of compliance with the labour legislation. It should be noted that 173 inspections were carried out on a scheduling order and 6,754 inspections were carried out on the basis of applications received. As a result of these inspections, 10,370 violations of labour legislation were identified, 4,369 orders to eliminate the identified violations were issued, and 2,401 administrative fines were imposed for a total of 401 million tenge. At the same time, since 2023, control subjects have failed to comply with 82 orders of labour inspectors in due time, including 63 in 2023 and 19 in 2024. In accordance with section 462.3 of the Administrative Offences Code of the Republic of Kazakhstan, 31 administrative fines (2023) were imposed on control subjects for failure to comply with the instructions on the protocols of labour inspections by judicial authorities and 11 materials are under consideration in court (10 materials in 2024 and 1 material in 2023).

In the course of the performance of the duties imposed on state labour inspectors to comply with the labour legislation, there were facts of obstruction on the part of inspected entities in the conduct of inspection activities, expressed in the failure to provide the documents requested by inspectors. At the same time, in each case, the response measures stipulated by the legislation were taken, in the form of bringing the subject of control to administrative responsibility. Thus, in 2023, 56 cases of obstruction of state labour inspectors in the implementation of state control were identified. Administrative fines totalling 12.8 million tenge were imposed on these cases. In the first four months of 2024, 17 similar cases were identified, as a result of which employers were imposed administrative fines for the amount of 4 million tenge. Concurrently, since the beginning of 2023, there have been no cases of bringing state labour inspectors to disciplinary responsibility under section 50(12) of the Law on Civil Service of the Republic of Kazakhstan. Meanwhile, the moratorium on inspections of micro and small enterprises ended on 1 January 2024. Since then, state labour inspectors have conducted 2,366 inspections nationwide, uncovering 3,144 violations. These inspections led to 1,409 instructions issued to employers and 1,780 administrative fines totalling 178 million tenge. As of 1 April 2024, there are 276 units of state labour inspectors in the staff of local labour inspection bodies.

It should be noted that the experts of the ILO in 2018 conducted an audit of the labour inspection activities of the Republic of Kazakhstan, which resulted in recommendations to strengthen the role of labour inspection by transferring it to the subordination of the central executive body. In this regard, a draft Law on Amendments and Additions to Certain Legislative Acts of the Republic of Kazakhstan on Improvement of Safe Labour Conditions and Protection of Labour Rights of Employees has been prepared within the framework of which the following issues are considered:

- transfer of state inspection from local executive bodies to the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection of the Population (MLSPP);
- empowerment of state labour inspectors to conduct inspections without prior notice in the field of safety and labour protection at dangerous production facilities.

As of today, the proposal to transfer state labour inspection from local executive bodies to the Ministry has been approved by the President of the Republic of Kazakhstan. The MLSPP is carrying out preparatory work to establish a separate state labour inspection committee with territorial subdivisions in the regions. A detailed action plan for the establishment of a state labour inspection committee in the Ministry has been developed and is being implemented.

In compliance with Article 20 of Convention No. 81 and Article 26 of Convention No. 129, the MLSPP is working on a comprehensive annual report on the work of labour inspection for 2023. This report will be submitted to the ILO as a mandatory requirement. Furthermore, the Ministry regularly prepares the National Review of Occupational Safety and Health in the Republic of Kazakhstan in the framework of cooperation with the Subregional Office for Eastern Europe and Central Asia of the ILO in accordance with the “Methodological Guidelines for Compilation of the National Review of Occupational Safety and Health”. The recent national review was published in 2023, which covers the years 2020–22, with statistical information. In addition to these efforts on an ongoing basis, the Ministry systematically publishes, in the media, information on the work of labour inspection in monitoring compliance with labour legislation.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I kindly invite the Government representative of Kazakhstan, Vice-Minister of Labour and Social Protection of the Population, to take the floor.

Interpretation from Russian: Government representative – Allow me to express gratitude for having this opportunity to take the floor today on behalf of the Republic of Kazakhstan at this meeting of the Committee. Our Government attaches great importance to issues of application of labour standards, and we are of course grateful for the support and partnership that has been shown to us on an ongoing basis by the International Labour Organization (ILO). We acknowledge the importance of the ratified Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), and we take note of the comments expressed by the Committee of Experts with regard to the current situation in Kazakhstan and the actions of the state labour inspectorate.

I would like to dwell first on the topics which are the subject of the current consideration. Firstly, with regard to the moratorium on state labour inspection activities, I should indicate at this point that the moratorium brought in by presidential decree on 1 January 2020 was aimed at improving the conditions of development of small businesses and only affected small businesses. This moratorium was extended until the end of 2022. I should indicate here that the state oversight system has three forms. General checks are one of them, preventive controls with visits are another, and this moratorium only affected this second form of inspection – namely preventive controls with visits. Accordingly, limitations were imposed on that type of preventive control in the micro and small enterprise arena. According to the statistics of 2023, over 6,000 checks were carried out and, of those, a little over 100 were to this type of business. Accordingly, the number of visits to small enterprises was clearly limited. All the other inspections at the request of the trade unions and workers themselves are aimed at protecting the health and life of workers, and there were no limits imposed on that form of inspection, so as to uphold the labour rights of our Kazakh workers. Over the period covered by the moratorium, 22,000 inspections were carried out and some 12,000 violations were found. Some 13,000 warnings were handed out, with a total sum of 1.2 million tenge in administrative fines imposed, meaning that the inspectorate was operational and carrying out its functions fully. At the current time, there are no longer any limitations on these two types of inspections. As of 1 January 2024, the moratorium has been fully lifted. This is the first issue I would like to address.

Secondly, regarding the regulatory backdrop for direct inspections, we currently have two oversight systems in place. The first is, of course, control in the form of an internal audit, and the second, what is known as public controls initiatives by trade unions. More than 18,000 such checks have taken place and more than 24,000 technical inspections are in operation. I turn now to the state labour inspectorate. As such, it discharges state functions, carrying out a significant number of inspections. This is ongoing. We are also working to enhance the operation of our labour inspectorate with the introduction of an automated system to identify dubious, suspect workplaces where violations could take place, with an IT system that enables us to decide where to undertake inspections with the data in hand. This enables us to react and take corrective measures if necessary. We take note of all the comments as to the need for a fuller mandate to be given to labour inspectors to undertake unscheduled inspections at their own free initiative. I will return to this when it comes to our regulatory framework. With regard to investigations of accidents, there are no limitations at all on them, with the relevant investigations being undertaken in specific cases. In terms of the number of preventive inspections, this is defined based on the degree of risk of workplaces, with measures to review this and to ensure more often that inspections are carried out at the relevant time and place. We are also planning to improve the risk assessment system such that labour inspectors are able to identify and prevent risks in the workplace, and to rapidly react. This would include conveying cases to the judicial and law enforcement bodies. With regard to direct oversight, the state labour inspectorate is being strengthened by all means possible from our part. In 2023, 1,505 cases were transmitted to the law enforcement authorities, and 150 criminal cases were launched as a result. With regard to bad faith employers who were not applying the rules, over 2,300 checks were carried out. In addition to that, numerous violations were uncovered with some 1,400 warnings issued and significant fines imposed, in addition to certain numbers of cases being transmitted to the law enforcement authorities. In addition, with the oversight system, measures are being taken to introduce the Vision Zero approach to accident prevention, and we have 580 enterprises now involved in this Vision Zero programme. More than 18,000 works councils have been established and operate at enterprises. We have brought about changes to the Labour Code in order to ensure general coordination of work to apply and enforce labour standards in the workplace. At the same time, we have put in place vertical oversight on building sites. A total of 3,214 enterprises have committed to implementing special occupational safety and health standards, while also putting in place systems of risk assessment.

Employers also have access to an online labour consultancy system to enable all employers to undertake a self-check on compliance with labour legislation, with more than 13,000 employers already accessing the system and using it. With regard to the comprehensive analysis of labour inspection work and accountability under Conventions Nos 81 and 129, we have an annual report which is discussed in the tripartite commission under the Prime Minister, with information broadcast in the media and to global labour inspection bodies. With regard to legislation, I can tell you that the Parliament is currently debating relevant legislation, with social partners involved in this discussion. In addition, a number of changes are anticipated. The main one of these is the transfer of labour inspection powers from local authorities to a direct, vertical control structure deriving from the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection of the Population, and in the coming months there will be a single body, a labour inspection system with local sections covering the entire territory, with the material and technological tools to make this change happen. For our labour inspectorate, we hope that this Bill has already been adopted by the Lower House of Parliament, and will also be approved by the Upper House and signed by the Head of State into law. In addition, as part of work to enhance our legislation, we are making efforts to define the relevant accountability and responsibility of the parties in the event of accidents, with clear-cut instructions for medical organization, labour inspection, the identification of accidents in the workplace and support for potential victims of accidents, also, probably, defining powers in the healthcare sphere, as well as guidelines for assessing the degree of injury of workers. All of those regulations are being considered by the Lower House of Parliament at the current time. In addition, all of those issues are subject to ongoing review with our social partners, and we would like to express our immense gratitude to the ILO for its support. I can tell you that in fact, today, we have signed with the ILO a road map on support for true decent work in the Republic of Kazakhstan. This has been signed by all our social partners, some of whom are here today. This includes five key areas of work, for joint work, and one of the key areas is a safe and healthy workplace, to be achieved through overcoming shortcomings in labour inspection. This is to be implemented in the coming years and we hope that we will be able to achieve notable results. As part of this, we will of course reassess our existing legislation and practice once again, ensuring that it comes into line with the provisions of Conventions Nos 81 and 129. We trust that we will receive ongoing technical support from the ILO in order to improve and harmonize our domestic legislation on labour inspection with the Conventions. I should once again like to assure the Committee that the Government of Kazakhstan will take all steps to overcome the problems that have been identified and ensure that our legislation is in line with ILO standards. We will work in close cooperation with the ILO and all other interested parties in order to improve conditions of labour and to protect the rights of workers.

Worker members – Our Committee’s attention has often been focused on examining the Government of Kazakhstan’s compliance with Convention No. 87. The situation regarding respect for trade union freedoms in Kazakhstan has always been of concern to us all. Numerous initiatives are nevertheless under way to resolve the problems of compliance noted in this respect.

The situation of respect for trade union freedoms is certainly not unrelated to the situation of respect for Conventions Nos 81 and 129 in the country. An environment conducive to the exercise of freedom of association would certainly enable progress to be made in many areas of work, including labour inspection. Labour inspection plays a fundamental role in ensuring decent working conditions for workers. It is therefore essential to provide the inspection services with all the necessary means to function optimally and ensure the protection of workers. It has come to our attention that, in this regard, the capacities of labour inspection in Kazakhstan have been decreasing, with today only 225 labour inspectors for the whole country.

This is the first time that our Committee is examining the application of these Conventions in Kazakhstan. The Committee of Experts has made a number of observations which point to failures to comply with these Conventions.

The most troubling of these is the moratorium on inspection services in Kazakhstan, which was in force until 1 January 2024. The problem of a moratorium on inspection services, while apparent in the case of Kazakhstan, is nevertheless endemic to the region. We fear that this moratorium could be reintroduced at some point, as we have sadly already seen in another country of the region after examination of its case before our Committee.

However, the Committee of Experts’ 2019 general comment on Convention No. 81 recalls that any moratorium imposed on labour inspection is a serious violation of the Convention.

Such a moratorium considerably weakens the inherent functioning of labour inspection, to the detriment of decent work and the protection of workers' rights.

More specifically, the moratorium in Kazakhstan applied to labour inspection in private and public enterprises that fall into the categories of micro and small enterprises, with a few exceptions provided for in very restrictively enumerated cases. Furthermore, on the basis of the Entrepreneur Code, the Government is empowered to suspend state supervision and control of private commercial entities for a certain period.

It also appears that when the labour inspectorate receives complaints, its intervention is not in practice decisive in bringing about a rapid, effective and appropriate solution to the subject of the complaint. For example, the observations of the Trade Union of Workers in the Fuel and Energy Complex (TUWFEC) show that the labour inspectorate has only been able to help complainants formulate their complaints for submission to the court, and to write to employers about the need to comply with labour legislation, without this having any legal consequences as regards the infringements found.

In addition to this moratorium, labour inspectors suffer from other limitations and restrictions to their powers.

The first of these is the requirement for labour inspectors to register scheduled inspections 30 days in advance, and unannounced inspections 24 hours in advance, with the Public Prosecutor, who has the right to refuse registration. It is regrettable to note that the Government has given in to the Public Authority for Enterprises and employers' representatives, who have refused to implement the measure to allow workplace inspections without prior warning, even though this measure was provided for in the Action Plan to guarantee safety at work.

Another important restriction on the power of labour inspectors is the strict definition of the frequency and types of inspection possible in the country. The maximum inspection frequency is determined according to the risk identified by the risk assessment and management system. Different risk-based categories of employers are defined on the basis of that system.

The minimum inspection frequency is also defined according to those risk-based categories. However, no minimum inspection frequency has been set for low-risk employers. Employers in this risk category are thus not subjected to scheduled monitoring and inspection activities.

Despite the revision of the Entrepreneur Code at the end of 2022, it still contains restrictions on the powers of labour inspectors, particularly as regards their ability to carry out inspection visits without prior warning, their free initiative and the scope of the inspections they can carry out. Only the conditions set out in the established checklist may be subject to verification and preventive control.

Another important restriction is that laid down in section 12 of the Entrepreneur Code, which allows employers to deny the inspection by officials from state control and supervision bodies. This right to deny is likely to render ineffective the provisions on penalties for obstructing the work of officials from the state inspectorate and other state supervisory and control bodies. Labour inspectors who take control initiatives that go beyond the strict framework of regulations governing the organization and conduct of inspections are liable to disciplinary action. Other provisions stipulate that inspections carried out without prior warning and without respecting the prescribed notice period are considered invalid.

It is also stipulated that labour inspectors may not impose immediate penalties if they discover infringements during preventive inspections. In such cases, they can only issue a warning. Similarly, rapid reaction measures can only be taken in cases identified by law and for violations of items on the inspection checklist.

However, the Conventions stipulate that, with certain exceptions, persons who violate or neglect to observe the legal provisions whose application is subject to the control of labour inspectors, are liable to immediate legal action, without prior warning, and that it is left to the discretion of labour inspectors to issue warnings or give advice rather than initiate or recommend prosecution, and that labour inspectors are authorized to take measures to eliminate defects in installations, fittings or working methods which they may have reasonable cause to consider a threat to the health or safety of workers. In that regard, we are of the view that labour inspection should have the capacity to act upon signals received from workers or their representatives about occupational hazards they are facing. If the labour inspectorate had been more responsive, many of the particularly serious accidents that have occurred recently in Kazakhstan could have been avoided.

We also note with concern that no annual report on the activity of the labour inspection services has been transmitted to the ILO since the ratification of the Conventions in 2001.

All these elements constitute serious breaches of Conventions Nos 81 and 129, and the Government of Kazakhstan will have to ensure that its legislation and practice comply with those Conventions.

Employer members – The Employer members have taken note of the information provided by the Government and would like to thank the distinguished representative for the explanation provided.

Kazakhstan ratified Convention No. 81 and Convention No. 129 in 2001. The Committee of Experts made observations on this case in 2015, 2021 and 2023. Today is the first time the Committee is examining the application of Conventions Nos 81 and 129 by Kazakhstan. From the outset, the Employer members want to highlight the importance of Conventions Nos 81 and 129, which are governance Conventions that have received 150 and 57 ratifications, respectively.

The case consists of five parts. The first is about the moratorium on labour inspections. The moratorium had been in place since January 2020 and applied to labour inspections for micro and small enterprises. It should be noted that practice had shown that the introduction of the moratorium did not affect large and medium-sized enterprises, where inspections have been carried out. Furthermore, the moratorium on inspections for micro and small enterprises is no longer in force. It ended on 1 January 2024.

Since then, according to information provided by the Government on 20 May 2024, state labour inspectors have conducted 2,366 inspections nationwide, uncovering 3,144 violations. These inspections led to 1,409 instructions issued to companies and 1,780 administrative fines. As of 1 April 2024, there are 276 units of state labour inspectors in local labour inspection bodies.

The second part is about other restrictions on inspection powers. The Committee of Experts noted in its recent report that restrictions on the powers of labour inspectors established by the Entrepreneur Code of 2015 are still in force. These limitations affect, inter alia, the ability of labour inspectors to undertake inspection visits without previous notice and the free initiative of labour inspectors.

The Committee also noted that labour inspectors are liable to disciplinary proceedings if they fail to respect the provisions in relation to prior notification of the inspection to the subject of control, or if the deadline for such notification is not respected.

In its recent written report from 20 May 2024, the Government informed the Committee that a draft Law on Amendments and Additions to Certain Legislative Acts on Improvement of Safe Labour Conditions and Protection of Labour Rights of Employees has been prepared. It would empower state labour inspectors to conduct inspections without prior notice in the field of safety and labour protection at dangerous production facilities. However, in this regard it should be noted that the proposal to transfer state labour inspection from local executive bodies to the Ministry has been approved. The Ministry of Labour and Social Protection of the Population is carrying out preparatory work to establish a separate state labour inspection committee with subdivisions in the regions.

A detailed action plan for the establishment of a state labour inspection committee in the Ministry has been developed and is being implemented. However, we ask the Government to provide further detailed information on restrictions on the powers of labour inspectors and to take the necessary initiatives to bring the laws into conformity with Article 12(1) of Convention No. 81.

The third part is about adequate penalties. The Committee of Experts noted limitations imposed by the Entrepreneur Code with respect to the powers of labour inspectors to ensure the effective application of legal provisions. In particular, the Committee noted that the Code provides that, in cases of violations identified in the course of preventive inspections, inspectors are obliged to issue a warning without the possibility of initiating proceedings. According to information provided by the Government on 20 May 2024, in 2023, labour inspectors conducted 6,927 on-site inspections. A total of 173 inspections were carried out on a scheduling order and 6,754 inspections were carried out on the basis of applications received. As a result of these inspections, 10,370 violations of labour legislation were identified, 4,369 orders to eliminate the identified violations were issued, and 2,401 administrative fines were imposed.

The Employer members ask the Government to provide further detailed information about limitations imposed on the power of labour inspectors with regard to penalties. Furthermore, we ask the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that labour inspectors do not encounter undue obstruction while performing their duties.

The fourth part is about the right to deny the inspection. The Committee of Experts argued that the Entrepreneur Code includes a provision that provides for the right of companies to deny the inspection by officials from state control and supervision bodies. It requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that labour inspectors do not encounter undue obstruction while performing their duties. The Employers' group has taken note. We request the Government to provide detailed information on the issue and on the number of cases in which inspectors have been denied access to workplaces.

The fifth part of this case is about reporting. The Committee of Experts noted that since the ratification of the Conventions in 2001, the ILO has not received an annual report on the activities of the labour inspection services. According to Article 20 of Convention No. 81, the central inspection authority shall publish an annual general report on the work of the inspection services under its control and copies of the annual reports shall be transmitted to the ILO within a reasonable period after their publication and in any case within three months. The Government announced that the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection of the Population is working on a comprehensive annual report on labour inspection activities for 2023. They stated that this report will be submitted to the ILO. The Employers' group welcomes this development. We ask the Government to walk the talk and to submit an annual report to the ILO in accordance with the respective time limits.

To conclude, the Employer members welcome the expressed willingness and shown commitment of the Government. We encourage and ask the Government to effectively consult with the representative employers' and workers' organizations concerning all measures and initiatives they take regarding the application of Conventions Nos 81 and 129.

*Interpretation from Russian: Worker member, Kazakhstan – I am grateful to the ILO for ensuring that the issues relating to Convention No. 81 can be discussed today. The fact that we are on the short list gives us the opportunity to broaden horizons and exchange practices, learn best practices from other States, and take on board the methods of working mechanisms of the ILO.

I will dwell on the compensation model under the labour protection system and the occupational safety and health concept and, in addition, the centralization of labour inspection with a single state inspectorate and transfer paths from the local authority. Here it is important to note that this is in line with Convention No. 81 and to avoid any potential negative influence at the local level on labour inspection.

As of 1 January 2024, the moratorium on inspections of micro and small enterprises has been lifted. It is important to note that this will not affect the inspection system based on complaints. Further work will be ensured to assess the remit of inspectors, as promoted by the trade unions. That said, problems do remain in terms of the numbers of labour inspectors and the powers that they have, which are highly limited under the Entrepreneur Code.

There are currently only 245 inspectors, and this means that they do not have the possibility to fully discharge their functions. The requirements of the Entrepreneur Code curb their powers with a ban on registered inspections. These have to be registered with the authorities and the employers need to be informed. I trust that we will be able to work in the coming times on this issue, bringing about substantive changes to the legislation. This is important to us. We need to ensure that this will be done within the framework of social dialogue and partnership, bearing in mind the opinions of trade unions.

The Federation of Trade Unions will, as it has done before, continue to work to ensure safety in the workplace on the basis of specific assumptions. People should not be killed or injured at work. You should not die as a result of trying to earn a living in a workplace, and any improvement in occupational safety and health is something that we will of course always welcome. We look forward to future cooperation with the ILO and the necessary technical assistance to this end.

*Interpretation from Russian: Employer member, Kazakhstan – I would like to first and foremost thank the ILO for its cooperation and support. We take note of the recommendations of the Committee in recent years and the steady progress made in social dialogue in Kazakhstan. I am a delegate of the employers of Kazakhstan, I represent their interests on behalf of the national Confederation of Employers. Our confederation has been recognized by the ILO as an independent employers' organization. This independence is a core value of ours in our work. With our social partners we work at the practical level of social dialogue at the national and regional levels.

I would now like to move to a set of comments on the Committee of Experts' remarks on the application of Conventions Nos 81 and 129. In order to enhance the development of micro and small enterprises, a moratorium was imposed as of 1 January 2020 on preventive controls with visits for this type of enterprise. Practice has shown that over this period the moratorium had no effect on large and medium-sized enterprises where periodic inspections continued. Of course we are guided by and welcome international labour standards and partnership with social partners and the ILO. We are making efforts to implement best practices, and this includes the standards covered in Conventions Nos 81 and 129 but at the same time, as an employers' organization, we are always in favour of ensuring balance. As such, when it comes to taking important decisions, we should take into account all aspects including the willingness and ability of state bodies to implement standards under the Conventions. We consider that the limited powers of inspectors could lead to both positive and negative consequences. Statistics also indicate this.

During the period of the moratorium, we saw that there was a positive impact on the subjects being inspected. There was a more than twofold reduction in the number of inspections in 2023 compared to 2019, while there was almost a 70 per cent increase in numbers of small businesses in existence. With this in mind, I think we need to move towards a more effective way of implementing ratified Conventions. Results can be seen in this regard also, for example, as of 1 January 2024, when there was a full lifting of the moratorium, with no further restrictions currently in force on the work of labour inspectors.

Turning to the comments on the limited powers of labour inspectors when it comes to the Entrepreneur Code, I would like to say that, at the current time, preventing violations and the rationale for observance by businesses is set up by law, with priority attached to enforcement rather than compliance. This is a frequent trend in Kazakhstan but particularly in labour. We want to move towards a more preventive approach, but if there are repeated violations, fines may be applied as well as criminal proceedings if necessary. In line with the Entrepreneur Code, the labour inspectorate may undertake a preventive control, followed by an unscheduled visit with a further inspection, if necessary, but this may take place only with 24 hours warning in certain instances.

Pursuant to the law, inspections may not be refused. In addition, we have seen that ever more violations have been uncovered by inspections, with more than 10,000 in 2023. We, as Employer representatives, consider that things are going in the right direction and that there needs to be gradual change. If we want to radically expand the powers of state labour inspectors, then we need to think through the right system of checks and balances, since failing to do this properly could lead to a curb on entrepreneurial activity and an increase in the administrative burden.

There is a need to ensure, as we implement the Conventions, that the social partners are borne in mind. This has been seen, for example, in the transfer of powers from local to central level. We consider that this is another positive step forward. I would also like to note that, as part of the work between the ILO and the social partners, a road map was signed to promote decent work in the Republic of Kazakhstan. In this road map, there are five strategic areas: labour protection, social protection, employment, social dialogue and tripartism. We consider the joint work with the ILO on this road map will enable us to improve our position vis-à-vis the comments issued by the Committee of Experts.

In conclusion, I would underscore that in our work we are guided by the ideas of tripartism where all partners work together in harmony and in a responsible way. Only in this way will it be possible to ensure civilized dialogue to the interest of all. We, for our part as Employers, are committed to this and we will put all our efforts and resources into these endeavours.

Government member, Belgium – I have the honour to speak on behalf of the European Union and its Member States. The candidate countries, Montenegro and North Macedonia, and the European Free Trade Association country Norway, member of the European Economic Area, align themselves with this statement.

The EU and its Member States are committed to the respect, protection and fulfilment of human rights, including labour rights. We actively promote universal ratification and effective implementation of fundamental ILO Conventions and support the ILO in developing and promoting international labour standards and supervising their application.

The European Union and Kazakhstan signed an Enhanced Partnership and Cooperation Agreement in 2020, advancing and strengthening cooperation with the country in key policy areas such as trade and investment, sustainable development, economic cooperation and employment and social affairs.

We note with concern that the moratorium on labour inspections for private and state-owned micro and small enterprises introduced in January 2020 was further extended until January 2024. We deplore that, based on information from national trade unions, none of the complaints related to violations of labour rights in agriculture were inspected due to the moratorium. While we acknowledge that, according to the recently submitted information from the Government, the moratorium ended in January 2024 and that since then around 2,300 inspections have been conducted, we would be interested to know the reasons leading to the Government introducing this moratorium, which is a serious violation of the ratified labour inspections Conventions Nos 81 and 129. We also call on the Government to ensure that inspectors can conduct labour inspections as often and as thoroughly as necessary.

We note that the Entrepreneur Code prescribes prior registration of inspections with the Public Prosecutor's office, which can refuse registrations. Moreover, the Entrepreneur Code contains provisions that limit the free initiative of inspectors and their ability to conduct inspections without prior notice. We echo the Committee of Experts' call on the Government to take the necessary legislative measures to ensure that inspectors can undertake inspections without prior notice and conduct any examination they deem necessary. Moreover, following the revocation of section 197 of the Labour Code, we request the Government to indicate to the ILO whether inspectors are entitled to conduct inspections at any time of the day and night.

Concerning the frequency of labour inspections, we note that according to the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), there is no minimum frequency of inspections established for low-risk employers, who are therefore not covered by scheduled monitoring activities. In line with the Committee of Experts, we urge the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that risk assessment criteria do not limit the powers of labour inspectors.

We remark that section 151 of the Entrepreneur Code stipulates that labour inspectors are not allowed to undertake inspections on elements that are not included in the inspection checklist, and that, according to section 156, inspections are considered invalid in the absence of a prior notification to the concerned workplaces. Based on information from the Government, a draft law on safe labour conditions that would permit unannounced inspections is under consideration. However, we note that this provision would only apply to dangerous production facilities. As requested by the Committee of Experts, we ask the Government to revise the above-mentioned sections in line with Conventions Nos 81 and 129.

We also note that according to the Entrepreneur Code, in cases where violations are detected during preventive inspections, labour inspectors are obliged to issue a warning and cannot initiate proceedings, and that rapid response measures can only be adopted in the cases identified by the law and for violations of items included in the inspection checklist. In line with the Committee of Experts, we request the Government to take the necessary measures to allow inspectors to initiate legal proceedings without previous warning and to provide information on the changes made on this matter.

Recalling that the Entrepreneur Code allows for employers to refuse inspections, we request the Government to take measures to ensure that the work of labour inspectors is not unduly obstructed.

We are concerned that no annual reports on the activities of the labour inspectorate have been received by the ILO since the ratification of both Conventions. We therefore welcome the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection of the Population is preparing a comprehensive annual report on the work undertaken by labour inspectors in 2023. We encourage the Government to make this a regular practice and to transmit the reports to the ILO.

The European Union stands ready to support Kazakhstan with the aim of strengthening the Government's capacity to address the issues raised and meet its obligations under the ratified Conventions.

*Interpretation from German: Worker member, Germany – I speak on behalf of the German Confederation of Trade Unions. In its Centenary Declaration of 2019, the ILO once again confirmed that labour inspection, as outlined in Conventions Nos 81 and 129, is a cornerstone of the ILO's strategy for a people-friendly future of work. This approach focuses on the rights and needs of workers, their protection and their health. The Committee of Experts, in its 2019 general observation on these Conventions, established that several ILO Member States, particularly those in Eastern Europe and Central Asia, have adopted laws and decrees that contradict Conventions Nos 81 and 129 and undermine the proper functioning of labour inspection systems. Unfortunately, the Government of Kazakhstan has also suspended comprehensive labour inspection by decree. This moratorium was in force from January 2020 until 2024 and affected micro and small enterprises.

We welcome the fact that the Kazakh Government has not extended the moratorium on labour inspection and has brought itself into line with the legal requirements of Conventions Nos 81 and 129 since then. However, in the past, we have seen examples of countries who have reintroduced such a moratorium. For example, Tajikistan, only months after its case was discussed here in the Committee, suspended labour inspection, against the recommendations. We call on the Government of Kazakhstan to refrain from any moratorium in the future and instead, in legal and administrative terms, ensure legal inspection and that inspectors can carry out their work to ensure that the occupational safety and health of all workers in Kazakhstan is guaranteed. Because, although the moratorium has expired, as was stated, there are other serious problems. As reported by the Trade Union of Workers in the Fuel and Energy Complex (TUWFEC), in many places there have been no consequences for enterprises responsible for occupational safety and health infringements. Moreover, in the area of agriculture, no inspections are carried out, although many complaints have been submitted to the labour inspection authorities. Furthermore, the powers of labour inspectors are restricted. The Kazakh Government must adapt its national law so as to ensure that inspectors can carry out their work as frequently as they so choose, and as thoroughly as is necessary, to ensure that the Conventions are upheld. We would like to emphasize the following: the hushing up of occupational accidents, wage arrears and labour disputes by enterprises must end. To this end, equipping the labour inspection authorities is essential. According to our information, there are only 225 state inspectors for the entire country.

We call on the Government to take more steps to improve labour inspection. Firstly, this means preparing a draft law, ensuring that the unions are involved in this; secondly, centralizing labour inspection; and thirdly, putting together an action plan. We call on the Government to continue these positive steps and to send reports to the ILO. At the same time, we call on the Kazakh employers to support these positive developments as well. The aforementioned Action Plan to Ensure Safe Work has not received support from the Employer representative. For us it is very clear: there should be no lobbying against occupational safety and health. The desire for profit must not take precedence over occupational safety and health.

Government member, Azerbaijan – The Azerbaijani delegation would like to thank the Government representative for providing replies to the questions raised by the Committee of Experts on the application of Conventions Nos 81 and 129. We welcome the progress made by the Government in responding to the recommendations made by this Committee. We appreciate the process initiated to amend labour legislation in order to ensure the protection of workers. Kazakhstan is party to the international legal instruments on labour inspection and duly fulfils its international obligations in good faith. It should be noted that, through their work in providing guidance and information by conducting inspections, the labour inspection services monitor the situation of fundamental rights in respect of labour relations and work conditions and consequently play an important role in the enforcement of those rights.

My delegation welcomes the relevant information provided by the Government representative in the context of the efforts to ensure effective labour inspection and to ensure that workplaces are inspected as frequently and as thoroughly as necessary, particularly in relation to occupational safety and health. We welcome the decision taken by the Government to transfer state inspection powers from local executive bodies to the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection of the Population, as well as the initiative to empower state labour inspectors to conduct inspections without prior notice in the field of safety and labour protection at dangerous production facilities. The measures outlined by the Government representative demonstrate Kazakhstan's efforts to give full effect to Conventions Nos 81 and 129. We appreciate the Government's provision of detailed information and statistics on labour inspections under various laws and regulations regarding working life. We also take note that the Government is working closely with the ILO to ensure that the legislative reforms are consistent with ILO Conventions, and we note the openness to addressing the comments of the supervisory bodies. We encourage the Government to continue working closely with the ILO to follow up on the Committee of Experts' recommendations. Finally, my country believes that issues relating to the general improvement of working conditions should be addressed as part of constructive and mutually beneficial dialogue with all actors, including representatives of employers and trade union organizations. The Azerbaijani delegation commends Kazakhstan on the results obtained to date and encourages the Government to continue working to strengthen the capacity and resources of the labour inspection services, in line with the national legal system and the international labour instruments in force.

Interpretation from Russian: Worker member, Russian Federation – The Workers' delegation of the Russian Federation thanks the Government of the Republic of Kazakhstan for the information provided. The Committee of Experts' report notes significant problems in the practical implementation of Convention No. 81. One of the main factors hindering the preventive role of the labour inspectorate in Kazakhstan is, of course, the highly limited set of powers of the inspectors. The remit for inspections after action is agreed is subject to agreement by the Public Prosecutor in the event of direct complaints, and this leads to the refusal of inspections and ineffective work. The number of labour inspectors in Kazakhstan stands at 225; bearing in mind that there are more than 9 million people in the labour market, this is a twofold deficit in comparison with what is provided for in Article 10 of Convention No. 81. In addition, the labour inspection services are based in the main urban areas, and this gives rise to problems in the major industrial and agricultural areas of the country, particularly the more remote ones, as inspectors cannot react rapidly. In addition to this, they are subject to the powers of local authorities in violation of the Convention. The financing of inspection comes from local budgets. This can lead to a dependent relationship as well as influence from local authorities or employers, which we have seen, for example, in the numerous unfounded refusals to register trade union sections in the oil and energy complex, making it difficult for workers, effectively, to realize freedom of association due to refused registrations, and this has led to a very negative result. There is a need, as we have seen, for reforms through legislation broadening the powers of the labour inspectorate such that it covers, and has a real impact on, all areas of life of work, including trade union rights. We should note that an effective state policy on labour inspection and protection directly depends on the implementation of the rights of workers, including independent trade union membership, as well as the establishment of collective bargaining. As such, we hope that the Government will continue its work to define the next steps for the proper implementation of the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association and will ensure that proper oversight and enforcement of labour rights will take place.

Government member, Kyrgyzstan – The Kyrgyz delegation expresses its gratitude to the Government of Kazakhstan, employers and trade unions for providing comprehensive information on the efforts and measures taken to comply with international labour obligations.

We commend Kazakhstan for adopting the “Concept of Safe Labour for 2024–30”, which aims to enhance the safety and well-being of workers. A key component of this concept is to bolster worker protection by improving the activities of the state labour inspectorate. To increase the effectiveness of control and monitoring in labour protection, preventive inspections by the state labour inspectorate will be conducted only at enterprises where there is an objective risk to workers’ life and health. This risk will be identified not manually, based on previous inspections and the type of activity of the enterprise, as it is currently done, but through the application of digital technologies. To facilitate this, a unified automated information system has been implemented to provide accurate data on occupational risks at workplaces. In conclusion, we sincerely thank Kazakhstan for its commitment to constructive dialogue with the ILO and encourage the continuation of active engagement with ILO bodies for the common good.

Government member, Turkmenistan – Turkmenistan welcomes the distinguished delegation of the Republic of Kazakhstan and expresses its gratitude for the detailed information on the current situation related to the implementation of Conventions Nos 81 and 129, as well as the related recommendations of the Commission of Experts. At the outset, we would like to note the efforts made by the Government of Kazakhstan to ensure decent working conditions through consistent scheduled and spot inspections on the basis of applications received.

At the same time, it is important to note that there are dozens of times more spot checks – based on appeals or complaints – than planned ones. This is a good indicator of the State’s response to these issues.

We also would like to highlight the measures taken by the Government of Kazakhstan to improve legislation, in particular concerning safe labour conditions and the protection of the labour rights of employees. It once again demonstrates the commitment of Kazakhstan to its obligations to promote decent work. We believe that the aforementioned state labour inspection committee planned to be established within the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection of the Population will give an additional impetus.

In conclusion, Turkmenistan wishes the Government of Kazakhstan a successful discussion.

Interpretation from Russian: Government member, Belarus – We thank the delegation of Kazakhstan for the detailed information on the question under consideration. We welcome the progress achieved by Kazakhstan in implementing the recommendations of the Committee of Experts, as well as the Kazakh Government's commitment to partnership with the International Labour Organization.

We note the efforts of the Government of Kazakhstan to ensure the functioning of the state labour inspectorate, which monitors compliance with workers' fundamental rights and working conditions. The information provided on the number of checks carried out in 2023, as well as the violations uncovered, speaks to the effectiveness of the work of this institution. In line with ILO recommendations, a decision has been made to transfer the functions of labour inspection from local bodies to the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection of the Population. In addition, the state labour inspectorate has been given powers to undertake unannounced inspections at potentially dangerous facilities. This will serve to further improve the general effectiveness of the oversight system and enforce the legislation in practice.

We believe that employers' and workers' organizations should, guided by tripartism, provide assistance to the Government in its efforts to improve working conditions both in industry and in agriculture. We call upon the ILO to continue to provide technical assistance to the Government of Kazakhstan in order to ensure further progress in protecting the rights and interests of workers.

Government member, Türkiye – We welcome the Kazakh Government's initiative to establish a more effective and coordinated, as well as separate, labour inspection system under the relevant Articles of Conventions Nos 81 and 129.

We appreciate the process initiated to amend labour legislation, especially the empowerment of state labour inspectors to conduct inspections without prior notice to ensure the protection of workers at dangerous production facilities. We are confident that the Kazakh Parliament will enact the necessary amendments in this respect as soon as possible.

It is worth noting that the visionary conceptual framework document, which covers the next seven years, will lay the groundwork for a more institutionalized and effective functioning of the Kazakh labour inspection system and will serve to increase the level of protection of workers using a proactive approach.

The implementation of a unified automated information system by the Kazakh Government, which will ensure its operation in the light of stable and up-to-date information, should be considered a very important development by the Committee of Experts.

The measures outlined by the Kazakh Government within the constructive and mutually beneficial dialogue with all stakeholders demonstrate Kazakhstan's efforts to give full effect to Conventions Nos 81 and 129. We encourage the Government to continue working closely with the ILO to follow up on the Committee's recommendations.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Saudi Arabia – The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia welcomes the progress achieved by the Republic of Kazakhstan in response to the recommendations made by the Committee of Experts. We welcome the relevant information provided by the Government in the context of its efforts to ensure regular, comprehensive and effective inspection of workplaces, especially in relation to occupational health and safety.

We note that the Government is working closely with the ILO in order to make sure that its legislative reforms are consistent with ILO Conventions, and that it is open to address the recommendations and observations of the supervisory bodies. We affirm that all measures related to ensuring good conditions at work should be addressed through constructive and effective dialogue with all stakeholders.

In conclusion, we commend the results achieved so far and we encourage the Government to continue its efforts to strengthen the capacities and resources of the labour inspection services in line with the national legal system and applicable ILO instruments.

Government member, China – We appreciated the detailed presentations by the representative of the Government of Kazakhstan. We have carefully reviewed the report by the Committee of Experts as well as the supplementary materials submitted by the Government to this Committee.

The Government is taking steps to move the national labour inspection functions from regional to national institutions. They are planning to establish a specific road map and to set up a national labour inspection committee within the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection of the Population. The Parliament of Kazakhstan is also drafting relevant legal amendments. In 2023, labour inspectors conducted nearly 7,000 on-site inspections under labour laws, including around 200 routine inspections and over 6,700 inspections upon request. These inspections uncovered over 10,000 violations of labour laws resulting in enforcement actions and other administrative fines.

It is commendable that the Government has issued the “Concept of Safe Labour for 2024–30”, continuously strengthening the implementation of labour inspections and enhancing worker protection. The Government is also leveraging digital technologies, alongside traditional methods, to effectively identify subjects for inspection based on past inspection records and on the nature of business operations. To achieve these goals, Kazakhstan is implementing unified automated information systems to promptly capture occupational risk data in workplaces. These efforts, measures and achievements should be acknowledged and encouraged by the Committee.

We support the ILO Secretariat and its regular supervisory mechanism in strengthening communication and exchanges with the Government, continuously promoting mutual understanding and cooperation. We also support the provision of relevant and technical assistance to the Government as needed to help them improve their compliance capacity and further promote their economic and social development.

Government member, Pakistan – We recognize the Republic of Kazakhstan for its comprehensive response to the questions raised by the Committee of Experts on the application of the Conventions. We acknowledge the progress made by Kazakhstan in addressing the recommendations of the Committee of Experts and welcome the initiative to amend labour legislation to further enhance the protection of workers. Pakistan welcomes the decision to transfer state inspection to the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection of the Population and empower inspectors to make unannounced inspections in high-risk workplaces. These measures demonstrate Kazakhstan’s commitment to effectively implement the Conventions. We acknowledge the ongoing collaboration with the ILO to ensure that legislative reforms align with international standards, and the openness to address concerns raised by the supervisory bodies. We encourage this continued partnership to further address the Committee’s recommendations. We believe that continuous and constructive dialogue with all stakeholders, including employers and trade union representatives, is crucial for further improving working conditions.

Government member, United States of America – We thank the Government of Kazakhstan for providing additional information to this Committee in response to the recent observations of the Committee of Experts. We welcome the fact that the moratorium on labour inspections at small and medium-sized enterprises was allowed to expire on 1 January 2024. We note with concern, however, that restrictions on unannounced workplace inspections remain in place. These restrictions may leave violations and abuses of workers' rights undetected.

We note in particular that the Entrepreneur Code limits inspectors' ability to undertake inspections without prior notice; to conduct self-initiated inspections, and to undertake labour inspections as often and as thoroughly as is necessary. Unannounced inspections are crucial to ensure employers cannot conceal labour rights abuses, change usual working conditions, prevent a witness from being present, or make it impossible to carry out an inspection. Limitations on self-initiated inspections and on the frequency of inspections undermine an effective risk-based inspection framework by preventing inspectors from effectively targeting enforcement efforts or monitoring the compliance of recidivist employers. While Kazakhstan's Administrative Offences Code provides for monetary penalties for enterprises that impede the work of inspectors, as of January 2023, the statutory maximum of these penalties was insufficiently dissuasive.

The stakes of labour law compliance can be life and death, as seen in the tragic loss of 46 workers' lives at a mining company on 28 October 2023. In the 30 years prior to this tragedy, at least 180 workers lost their lives in the same company's facilities in Kazakhstan, despite complaints from workers to the labour inspectorate that went unresolved. Government restrictions on labour inspections impeded inspectors' ability to properly ascertain and address dangerous conditions, prevented a follow-up inspection for at least one year, and imposed nominal penalties for labour rights abuses that failed to result in meaningful corrective action. We also note that restrictions on freedom of association in Kazakhstan have limited workers' ability to effectively address severe safety concerns in the workplace, especially in the mining and extractive sectors.

We urge the Government to take measures to ensure that penalties for labour rights abuses are sufficiently dissuasive and enable labour inspectors to undertake labour inspections as often and as thoroughly as necessary.

We note with interest the Government's draft law that, among other things, empowers state labour inspectors to conduct inspections at dangerous production facilities without prior notice. We hope this change, if and when passed, will help effectuate inspections in practice.

We join the Committee of Experts in urging the Government to bring its laws into alignment with the Conventions.

The United States remains committed to engaging with the Government to advance worker rights in Kazakhstan.

Observer, Building and Wood Workers' International (BWI) – As representatives of workers in the construction industry, one of the most hazardous sectors, we are deeply troubled by the constraints imposed on the labour inspectorate through the Entrepreneur Code as amended in 2022. These limitations directly impact the safety and well-being of our workers.

Kazakhstan witnesses over 2,600 workplace accidents annually, with more than 240 resulting in fatalities. Among the various sectors of the economy, after the mining sector, the construction industry has the highest number of casualties, representing 10 per cent of these fatalities. A robust labour inspectorate is not just a necessity, but a life-saving mission for workers. It is, therefore, imperative that Kazakhstan's national legislation aligns with the provisions of the Conventions we are discussing here today.

The role of labour inspections in monitoring and improving the application of occupational health and safety regulations, among other things, is not just important, it is instrumental in addressing the high level of fatalities and acting as a preventive function. Unfortunately, as the report by the Committee of Experts presents, the labour inspections do not have the liberty or the capacity to fulfil these functions in Kazakhstan today.

Most concerning for us are the limitations set on the labour inspectors' ability to act in conformance with national health and safety laws. It is instrumental for labour inspectors to take immediate action on findings, ensuring that they, rather than only acting as an instrument to help complainants prepare statements of claims to the court, instead are empowered to take measures with immediate executory force and initiate legal proceedings without previous warning.

Finally, we are seriously concerned about the reports of cases where employers deny inspectors access to workplaces and about local government interference in labour inspectors' reports. Hence, we want to emphasize the importance of the Government taking the necessary measures, including protections, to ensure that labour inspectors do not encounter undue obstruction while performing their duties.

In conclusion, we reiterate the Committee of Experts' recommendation for the Government to urgently initiate reforms, to support the inherent functioning of labour inspection systems and to protect workers' fundamental right to a safe and healthy working environment.

Chairperson – I can see no more requests for the floor, so I now invite the Government representative of Kazakhstan, the Vice-Minister, to take the floor for his final remarks.

Interpretation from Russian: Government representative – First of all, allow me to express my gratitude to our social partners and to all of those who offered recommendations aimed at bolstering the labour inspection system in the Republic of Kazakhstan, as well as enhancing the role of our social partners in that endeavour.

I will take all of these remarks in no particular order. We have heard from our social partners and certain countries that Kazakhstan is a country that has faced shortcomings. I think people are well informed about this, but that said, and in view of the tragedies that took place in some workplaces last year, there have been checks carried out and the necessary response has been given by the Government. I should underscore, therefore, that the general trend in terms of workplace accident and injury is positive. The related decisions have been taken, and the Government has adopted and implemented the "Concept of Safe Labour for 2024–30", on which we will now work in more detail with our social partners.

With regards to specific recommendations, in addition to what I said in my opening statement, we have in place a unified labour inspection system in Kazakhstan. We have heard that the inspectorate is limited in its remit. However, the labour inspectorate has a full mandate to uncover violations and to ensure the accountability of employers who are not doing what they should be. If such violation is found, a warning may be issued. This is a state document issued in the event of a violation. If that warning is not heeded, the employer may be subject to administrative responsibility and a fine may be issued. When it comes to administrative responsibility, we have essentially two avenues. The first is a warning. This is for a first violation, and is part of the system of administrative responsibility. The second is a fine. These are administrative fines, applied by the labour inspectorate.

We are currently undertaking an analysis of the application of our legislation. The penalties that currently exist in our regulations do not always necessarily have a preventive effect among employers who are not respecting the law. However, we are actively working with specialized committees and legal commissions in this regard, in order to update our legislation. We hope to strengthen administrative penalties, make them more severe and ensure that those found responsible for administrative offences can be issued a warning first and then a sensible fine. State officials who may be influenced may also be subject to administrative responsibility. Section 4 of the Administrative Offences Code covers occupational safety and health, and we intend to broaden its scope, with further penalties for such administrative offences, such as failure to comply with measures to protect the life and health of workers. All of these proposals are currently being considered by specialist commissions within the Ministry of Justice, and we hope that the relevant decisions will soon be agreed upon and the relevant actions taken by the Government. With regard to the limited remit of the state labour inspectorate, there are certain limitations that do need to be observed in view of the legislation. Hindrance of the work of inspectors has been reported. There were around 50 cases reported last year, and when they were uncovered, relevant administrative actions were taken. So far this year, 17 similar cases have been uncovered and all relevant administrative actions have been taken. I once again underscore the fact that a review of the national occupational safety and health standards is taking place with the social partners. It will be published and will cover the work of the state inspectors, and will result from the work of the relevant tripartite committee. We will, of course, be delighted to convey the outcomes of the work of this tripartite committee to the ILO, this reporting being on an ongoing basis, as per our obligations under the Conventions.

Overall, we intend to further systematize our work. This began in December last year with the inclusion of key definitions. This includes our national labour inspectorate, with proper monitoring of its work and of the operation of certain branches of industry, which have not always been fully covered by labour inspections, including agriculture. In terms of action to be taken in the coming years, we intend to introduce a new labour protection model with an integrated assessment of labour conditions in specific workplaces. This is something we have already started to do in relation to certain specific enterprises, in order to compile a full set of information on the risks associated with those workplaces.

Furthermore, all enterprises that have been subject to assessment in terms of working conditions will receive accreditation from the relevant inspection. This is something that we intend to work on together with our social partners. We also want to develop a systematic approach to the collective and personal protection of workers, to be worked on with our specialist labour protection institutions.

These measures are part of our work to digitally map our workplace landscape and assess the risks that may exist in specific workplaces and with regard to specific workers in each of our country's enterprises.

In addition, we intend to make it more economically viable for employers to increase the level of labour protection through various changes to be made to accident insurance. We will fully redesign our training system for labour inspectors under the aegis of the Ministry, including technical labour protection inspectors, with the establishment of a single training centre responsible for umbrella coordination and skills development and training for the inspection services.

We are currently working with the National Office of Statistics to review our statistics gathering and reporting system. The remaining challenge concerns gathering reliable statistics, in terms of internal checks undertaken by employers, trade unions and the national labour inspectorate.

Over the next two years, we plan to take into account a comprehensive range of information that will enable us to improve the situation in terms of occupational safety and health for workers, while also improving financial conditions for employers and strengthening working conditions and entrepreneurship, for the purposes of the social and economic development of our country. I wish to assure you once again that Kazakhstan will make every effort to ensure that it is operating in line with the Conventions.

Employer members – The Employer members would like to thank the Government and the various speakers who took the floor for their interventions and information provided of which we fully have taken note.

We reiterate the importance of both these governance Conventions. We welcome signs of the Government's willingness and expressed commitment to improve the situation concerning the application of the Conventions.

We recommend that the national authorities effectively consult the representative employers' and workers' organizations. Specifically, we recommend the following:

- First, the Government should provide further detailed information on restrictions and limitations on the powers of labour inspectors.
- Second, the Government should take the necessary initiatives to bring the laws into conformity with Article 12(1) of Convention No. 81 and take measures so that labour inspectors do not encounter undue obstruction while performing their duties.
- Third, the Government should provide detailed information on the number of cases in which inspectors are denied access to workplaces and the grounds for such denial.
- Fourth, the Government should submit an annual report to the ILO in accordance with the time limits of the Conventions.
- Finally, the Government should provide information to the Committee of Experts before its next meeting on the issues discussed and measures taken.

Worker members – We would like to thank the Government for the written and oral information it provided, and the participants for their contributions.

As we have already had occasion to say in our introductory remarks, labour inspection plays a fundamental role in the practical realization of decent working conditions for workers, including the realization of their right to freedom of association and to a safe and healthy working environment. It is therefore essential to provide inspection services with all the resources they need to function optimally and to ensure the protection of workers.

To function optimally, labour inspection services obviously need human and material resources, but they also need a legal framework that enables them to carry out their functions in the best possible conditions. It is of outmost importance that the Government of Kazakhstan engages in social dialogue with the social partners in order to improve the functioning of the labour inspectorate.

We highlighted the insufficient number of labour inspectors in Kazakhstan and urge the Government to recruit a sufficient number of labour inspectors and to provide them with sufficient material, financial and operational resources, such as training and skills development, taking into account the specific needs of the country, in order to ensure the proper functioning of the labour inspectorate.

We also took note of the audit of the activities of the labour inspectorate of Kazakhstan conducted by the Committee of Experts in 2018. We would recommend strengthening the role of labour inspection by transferring it to the subordination of the central executive body, which will be provided with sufficient resources, including human resources, and providing information to the Committee of Experts on the measures taken in this regard. We welcome the information provided about the draft law to address some of the issues in focus that would also recentralize and reintegrate labour inspection under the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection of the Population. We expect this will be followed by the necessary practical steps in close cooperation with the social partners.

During the discussion, we noted that the legal framework applicable to labour inspection services in Kazakhstan is far too restrictive, depriving labour inspectors of the powers they need to fully carry out their duties. The Government of Kazakhstan should lift these restrictions as soon as possible.

We therefore recommend that the Government of Kazakhstan repeal all legal provisions permitting the introduction of a moratorium on labour inspections by presidential decree and take no steps in the future to reinstate a moratorium on inspection services.

The Government will ensure that labour inspectors can carry out labour inspections as often and as carefully as is necessary to ensure the effective application of legal provisions, in accordance with Article 16 of Convention No. 81 and Article 21 of Convention No. 129. To this end, the Government shall:

- take the necessary legislative measures to give labour inspectors the power to visit workplaces without prior warning, and to carry out any examinations, tests or investigations they deem necessary;
- indicate whether inspectors are now empowered to carry out inspection visits at any time of the day or night, following the repeal of section 197 of the Labour Code and section 147(2) of the Entrepreneur Code;
- take the necessary steps to revise section 141 of the Entrepreneur Code, which provides for the frequency and types of inspections that are permitted depending on the degree of risk determined by the risk assessment and management system, so that labour inspectors can carry out labour inspections as often and as thoroughly as necessary to ensure the effective enforcement of the relevant legal provisions;
- take the necessary steps to ensure that risk-assessment criteria do not restrict the powers of labour inspectors or the performance of labour inspections;
- revise sections 151 and 156 of the Entrepreneur Code and section 50(12) of the Law on Civil Service to ensure that investigations carried out by labour inspectors are not limited in scope or invalidated, and that no penalties are imposed on labour inspectors who exercise more extensive control than is permitted by law;
- take the necessary steps, including the revision of legislation, to ensure that labour inspectors are empowered to take immediately enforceable measures and are able to initiate legal proceedings without prior warning;

- take the necessary measures to ensure that no acts of undue obstruction are committed against labour inspectors in the performance of their duties, including the repeal of section 12 of the Entrepreneur Code, which still provides for the right of employers to refuse inspection by officials of state supervisory and control bodies;
- take the necessary steps to draw up and publish an annual report on the activities of the inspection services and forward it to the ILO.

The Government will ensure that it provides all the information requested by the Committee of Experts in its observation and that it also provides all the information on the measures taken to implement the recommendations to be made by our Committee by 1 September 2024.

We also recommend that the Government of Kazakhstan accept the visit of a technical advisory mission before the next session of the International Labour Conference.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted with concern various issues relating to the effective functioning of the labour inspection system in the country due to numerous restrictions to the powers of labour inspectors such as prior authorizations needed to conduct an inspection, limitations on the number of inspections to be conducted, limitations to the measures labour inspectors can take when confronted with hazardous working conditions and limitations to the scope of the inspections.

Taking into account the discussion, the Committee urged the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to:

- recruit a sufficient number of labour inspectors and provide them with sufficient material, financial and operational resources in order to ensure the proper functioning of the labour inspectorate;
- strengthen the role of labour inspection by transferring them to the subordination of the central executive body as recommended by ILO experts in 2018;
- ensure that labour inspectors can carry out labour inspections as often and as carefully as is necessary to ensure the effective application of legal provisions, in line with the Conventions;
- amend sections 144(3) and (4), 156 (2), 144(13), 144-1, 144-2, 145, 146, 143(3) and 151 of the Entrepreneur Code in order to ensure that labour inspectors are empowered to make visits to workplaces without previous notice, and to carry out any examination, test or enquiry which they may consider necessary;
- indicate whether inspectors are now empowered to undertake inspection visits at any time of the day and night following the repealing of section 197 of the Labour Code and section 147(2) of the Entrepreneur Code, in line with the Convention;
- amend section 141 of the Entrepreneur Code in order to ensure that labour inspectors are able to undertake labour inspections as is necessary to ensure the effective application in line with the Conventions;

- revise section 50(12) of the Law on Civil Service and sections 151 and 156 of the Entrepreneur Code in order to ensure that investigations carried out by labour inspectors are not limited in scope or invalidated, and that no penalties are imposed on labour inspectors authorized by law;
- amend sections 136, 144-1 and 144-2 of the Entrepreneur Code to ensure that labour inspectors are empowered to take measures with immediate executory force and are able to initiate legal proceedings without previous warning, where required;
- ensure that labour inspectors do not encounter undue obstruction while performing their duties, including by amending section 12 of the Entrepreneur Code; and
- ensure the establishment and publication of an annual report on the work of the inspection services containing all the subjects listed under Article 21 of Convention No. 81 and Article 27 of Convention No. 129 and to transmit it to the ILO.

The Committee requested the Government to report to the Committee of Experts by 1 September 2024 on the measures taken to implement the Committee's recommendations and to provide all outstanding information requested by the Committee of Experts.

Government representative – Our Government attaches great importance to the issue of the application of labour standards, and we are grateful for the support and partnership that has been shown to us on an ongoing basis by the ILO. We respect the system and the ILO supervisory bodies.

We reaffirm our commitment to ensure full implementation of ratified Conventions Nos 81 and 129, and we are grateful for the opportunity to share the information on the progress made with regard to the implementation of these Conventions.

We have taken note of all the conclusions and the Government will take all steps to address the issues that have been identified. We will work in close cooperation with the ILO and the social partners in order to improve conditions of work and protect the rights of workers.

Lao People's Democratic Republic (ratification: 2008)

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)

Written information provided by the Government

On 17 May 2024, the Government provided the following written information.

The Government would like to express its deep regret for failing to provide responses to the questions made by the Committee of Experts under the Convention. In this regard, the Government has worked in collaboration and consultation with its tripartite partners and relevant sectors in the preparation of the report.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Protection of workers against discrimination. Legislation. Scope of application

In the Ministerial Decision on Domestic Workers No. 4369/MOLSW, article 25, section 5, prohibits any direct or indirect discrimination against domestic workers.

The Law on Government Officials No. 74/NA of 2015: article 4, State Policy for Public Servants, section 1: “The State considers the work of public servants as important and promotes through the implementation of policies as defined in the law, creating all conditions for public servants of all genders and ethnicities based on their actual abilities to receive political development, thinking, ethics, upgrading of specialized knowledge and skills”; as well as article 5, Fundamental Principles of Management for Civil Servants, section 6: “There is equality between men and women and promotion of the advancement of women in all ethnic groups.”

The Constitution of Lao People’s Democratic Republic (Revised) No. 63/NA, dated 8 December 2015, provides in:

- Article 35. Lao citizens are all equal before the law irrespective of their gender, social status, education, beliefs and ethnic group.
- Article 37. Citizens of both genders enjoy equal rights in the political, economic, cultural and social fields and in family affairs.

The Law on Lao Women’s Union 2013 and the Law on Preventing and Combating Violence against Women and Children No. 56/NA dated 23 December 2014 were adopted to progressively achieve the equality of both genders. Furthermore, any violent act against women and trafficking in women are criminalized under the Penal Law, particularly article 177, which stipulates that any person who discriminates against any women, or who keeps any women separate from, prevents or restricts the participation of any women in a political, economic, socio-cultural or family activity, based on gender, shall be punished by imprisonment of from one year to three years and shall be fined from 1 million to 3 million Lao kip.

The Law on Preventing and Combating Violence against Women and Children 2014, article 20, provides that the “Promotion of the advancement of women and gender equality is one of the measures of the State to ensure women and men have the same values and equal opportunities in politics, economy, education, society and culture, family affairs, national defence and security, and foreign affairs, as provided in the Constitution and laws”.

Article 1(1)(a). Prohibition of discrimination

(i)(ii) (now article 143(9)). The Government will take the Convention into consideration for incorporating it into the next revision of the Labour Law.

(iii)(i) The prohibition based on discrimination which is stated in the Labour Law concerns both employment and occupation because there are no separate definitions given. Employers are prohibited from discriminating by article 143, while workers are covered by article 144, even though it does not specifically mention discrimination.

(ii) Article 96 of the Labour Law. Female employees have the right to employment and professions in every sector that do not conflict with the law, including production, business and management, and may participate in training, labour skills improvement and the provision of expertise. Female employees shall receive a salary or wages equal to those of male employees, except for some forms of work that have negative effects upon the reproductive health of women, which must be protected in every case.

Discrimination based on sex. Sexual harassment

(i)(ii)(iii) Currently, articles 86 and 143 of the Labour Law specifically cover this issue. The Government will take the Convention into consideration to incorporate it into the next revision of the Labour Law.

If there are cases of sexual harassment in employment and occupation, they go to a dispute resolution mechanism, including labour, under the relevant regulations and laws.

(iv) Article 83(4). From the labour perspective, apart from protecting their interests through the termination of their contract, workers can refer their case to the labour management authority and the Labour Court to seek other benefits.

(v) Article 141(4) (now article 143(4)). From the labour perspective, workers can protect their interests through the termination of their contract and receive compensation, and/or refer their case to the labour management authority and the Labour Court to seek justice.

Article 1(1)(b). Additional grounds of discrimination

In addition to the Labour Law of 2007 and 2014, there is also the Ministerial Decision on the Permission of Foreign Employees Working in Lao People's Democratic Republic No. 3667/MoLSW, dated 27 September 2023. Under article 8, the rights of foreign employees are the following:

- (1) receive payment or wage and other benefits in accordance with their contract and the legislation;
- (2) protection of their rights and benefits, in accordance with the laws and regulations of Lao People's Democratic Republic;
- (3) become affiliated with the social security in accordance with the Law on Social Security;
- (4) ability to transfer their remittances and belongings which are legal back to their country;
- (5) access to relevant sources of information;
- (6) travel within Lao People's Democratic Republic as permitted;
- (7) change workplace based on the conditions and relevant regulations;
- (8) seek remedy or the possibility to make their case concerning rights and benefits to the relevant authorities; and

Article 4. Activities prejudicial to the security of the State

The Constitution of Lao People's Democratic Republic (Revised) No. 63/NA, dated 8 December 2015:

- Article 39. Lao citizens have the right to work and engage in occupations which are not contrary to the laws. Working people have the right to rest, to receive medical treatment in times of illness, [and] to receive assistance in the event of incapacity or disability, in old age, and in other cases as provided by the laws.
- Article 43. (Amended) Lao citizens have the right and freedom to believe or not to believe in religions.

This report was written in consultation and with the full agreement of the employees' representative organization (Lao Federation of Trade Unions) and the employers' representative organization (Lao National Chamber of Commerce and Industry).

On 21 May 2024, the Government provided the following supplementary information.

Article 1(2) of the Convention. Inherent requirements

Article 33, section 3, of the Labour Law of 2014 is not intended to discriminate against foreign workers, because the reserved jobs are related to the unique art and culture of Lao PDR. The list of occupations reserved for Lao citizens is still in the process of consultation with the relevant sectors to create legislation defining the reserved list of occupations for Lao citizens. The Government has applied a list of types of businesses reserved for Lao citizens under the Lao Standard Industrial Classification of all Economic Activities No 1328/MoIC, dated 13 July 2015 (as amended).

Article 2. Equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women

The Government has been stepping up its efforts to promote and develop relevant legislation by implementing the Law on Gender Equality No. 77/NA, dated 28 November 2019, article 12.

- (i) The measures taken in the framework of the Women's Development Plan (2021–25) are specified in Chapter VII, sections 1 and 2, of the Implementing Guidelines for the 2nd National Action Plan to Prevent and Eliminate Violence against Women and Children over a five-year period (2021–2025) No. 206/NCAWMC, dated 29 September 2021; the National Strategy for Gender Equality (2016–2025), in section II, chapter III; and the National Action Plan for Gender Equality, in chapter II, section 2.3 (2016–20).
- (ii) The specific provisions which relate to the prohibition of discrimination in employment and occupation are included in chapter II, article 8, of the Law on Gender Equality No. 77/NA, dated 28 November 2019.
- (iii) The Amending Committees of the Labour Law plan to evaluate the implementation of the Labour Law (2014) in order to improve and continue research in consultation with the relevant parties to take the issue into consideration.
- (iv) According to the third Labour Force Survey Report in Lao PDR, 2022, there are 2.475 million people employed, including 1.1 million women, in the public and private sectors; and in the informal economy, there are 2.1 million people employed, including 990,000 women. However, the data on participation in education and vocational training has not yet been provided by the related sector (Ministry of Education and Sports).

Equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of religion and ethnicity

In conformity with article 22 of the Constitution (amended 2015) No. 63/NA, dated 8 December 2015, the State has made great efforts to narrow the gap between ethnic groups by focusing on the implementation of the national education policy in order to strengthen the Lao people with regard to decent citizenship, qualifications, knowledge and careers, as well as to actively develop national education to improve its quality and create opportunities and conditions for people to receive education throughout the country, especially people in rural areas, ethnic groups, women, children, the underprivileged and people with disabilities. In addition, the Decree on Ethnic Groups No. 207/GoV, dated 20 March 2020, article 4, states that the State does not allow any act and behaviour which leads to any discrimination within and between ethnic groups.

Persons with disabilities and older workers

Based on the implementation of the Law on Persons with Disabilities, the Party – Government – has applied the Decree on Endorsement and Publication of Policies, Strategy, and the National Action Plan for Persons with Disabilities No. 539/GoV, dated 12 December 2020, as well as the Strategy of Social Protection. According to the statistics on disabilities, of the total population of 6.4 million in the country in 2015 aged 5 years and older, there are 160,881 persons with disabilities, of whom 80,115 are women. The types of disabilities are visual (78,175 persons, including 40,753 women), hearing (71,667 persons, 37,826 women), physical (75,506 persons, 40,640 women), memory loss (69,743 persons, 38,891 women), self-care (63,665 persons, 35,226) and communication (54,964 persons, 29,732 women). For the resolution of discrimination in employment and occupations against persons with disabilities, the implementation is based on the Law on Employment No. 37/NA, dated 17 July 2023. Article 5 pledges that the right of access to employment and information on the labour market and the workforce should include the disadvantaged, and persons with disabilities who are able to work.

Article 5. Special measures. Women

The measures taken are only limited to maternity protection based on occupational safety and health risk assessments and the protection of mother and child. They do not constitute obstacles to the employment of women, or their access to posts with career prospects and responsibilities.

Enforcement

The Government promotes equality without discrimination, as set forth in article 8 of the Constitution. The Labour Inspectorate has not found or received any complaints in regard to cases of discrimination.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I would like to extend my heartfelt congratulations to you, Chair, on your election as the Chair of this Conference. My congratulations also to the International Labour Organization of which Lao PDR has been a Member since 1964. Chair, the comment to which the Government of Lao PDR is invited to respond today is an observation of the Committee of Experts on the application of the Convention which Lao PDR ratified in June 2008.

At the outset, the Government of Lao PDR would like to express its deep regret regarding the submission of the responses to the observation on the Convention made by the Committee of Experts. In this regard, allow me to begin with:

Observation No. 1. Protection of workers against discrimination. Legislation. Scope of application. Let me assure the Committee that Lao PDR is fully committed to promoting the fair and decent employment and occupation as well as undertaking all efforts to ensure decent work is in all workplaces. The Ministerial Decision on Domestic Workers was adopted, which specifies, in article 25, the prohibition of any direct or indirect discrimination against domestic workers. In addition, the 2015 Law on Government Officials indicates, in article 4 on state policy for public servants, that, “The State considers the work of public servants as important and promotes through the implementation of policies as defined in the law, creating all conditions for public servants of all genders and ethnicities based on their actual abilities to receive political development, thinking, ethics, upgrading of specialized knowledge and skills”, and states, in article 5 on fundamental principles of management for the civil servants section, that, “There is an equality between men and women and promote the advancement of women in all ethnic groups”. In this connection, the Constitution of Lao PDR (revised in 2015), in article 35, provides that Lao citizens are all equal before the law, irrespective of their gender, social status, education, beliefs and ethnic group. Article 37 also states that citizens of both genders enjoy equal rights in the political, economic, cultural and social fields, and in family affairs. Besides, the Law on Preventing and Combating Violence against Women and Children (2014) and the Law on Lao Women’s Union (2013) were adopted to progressively achieve the equality of both genders.

Furthermore, any violent act against women and trafficking in women is criminalized under the Penal Law, and particularly article 177 stipulates that any person who discriminates against any women, or who keeps any women separate from, or prevents or restricts the participation of any women in a political, economic, sociocultural or family activity, based on gender, shall be punished by imprisonment from one year to three years. In the Law on Preventing and Combating Violence against Women and Children, article 20 also provides that promotion of the advancement of women and gender equality is one of the measures of the State to ensure women and men have the same values and equal opportunities in politics, economy, education, society and culture, family affairs, national defence and security, and foreign affairs as provided in the Constitution and laws.

Observation No. 2. Prohibition of discrimination. The Government will take the Convention into consideration for incorporating its contents into the next Labour Law revision. The prohibition based on discrimination which is stated in the Labour Law concerns both employment and occupation because there are no separate definitions given. Employers are prohibited by article 143 with regard to discrimination, while workers are prohibited by article 144, even though it does not specifically mention discrimination. According to article 96 of the Labour Law, female employees have the right to employment and professions in every sector that do not conflict with the law and female employees shall receive a wage equal to that of male employees.

Observation No. 3. Discrimination based on sex. Sexual harassment. Currently, there are articles 86 and 143 of the Labour Law specifically set for this issue. The Government will take the Convention into consideration for incorporating it into the revision of the Labour Law. If there is a case of sexual harassment in employment and occupation, it will enter a dispute resolution mechanism based on the relevant regulations and laws. Additionally, article 83 from the labour perspective, aside from protecting their interests through termination of contract, workers can refer their case to the labour management authority and the Labour Court to seek benefits and justice. Also, under article 143, workers can protect their interests through termination of contract and receive compensation and refer their case to the labour management authority and the Labour Court to seek justice.

Observation No. 4. Additional grounds of discrimination. The Government of Lao PDR has applied, alongside the Labour Law of 2007 and 2014, the Ministerial Decision on the Permission of Foreign Employees Working in Lao PDR (2023), in which article 8 on the rights of foreign employees states that these are legally entitled to: (1) receive payment or wage and other benefits in accordance to their work contract and the law; (2) receive protection of their rights and benefits in accordance with the laws and regulations of Lao PDR; (3) become a member of a social security scheme in accordance with the Law on Social Security; (4) transfer their remittance and other belongings which are legal back to their original country; (5) have access to the relevant sources of information; (6) travel within Lao PDR as permitted; (7) change workplace based on the conditions and relevant regulations; (8) seek remedy or make their case, concerning rights and benefits, to the relevant authorities; and (9) exercise the rights given by the relevant laws and regulations.

Observation No. 5. Activities prejudicial to the security of the State. I would like to reiterate that the Government, at all times, promotes fair and decent employment and occupation. The Constitution stipulates, in article 39, that Lao citizens have the right to work and engage in occupations which are not conflicting with the law. Working people have the right to rest, to receive medical treatment in times of illness, to receive assistance in the event of incapacity or disability, in old age, and in other cases as provided by the law. Article 43 provides that Lao citizens have the right and freedom to believe or not to believe in religions. Chair, to further ensure social justice advancement and decent work promotion without any discrimination, the Government has been accelerating the implementation of the National Social Protection Strategy (NSPS). The Strategy aims to: promote and improve the implementation of social protection policies; contribute to human capital development; and contribute to the goals and objectives of other relevant sectoral and socio-economic development plans. To achieve these, the Strategy sets its vision until 2030 of achieving, for the Lao people, access to basic social protection services, consisting of health insurance, social security and social welfare.

Besides, the continuation of the Decent Work Country Programme for the period 2022–26 is another good work that brings sustainable benefits to workers, employers and national citizens. It also supports the implementation of decent work elements in the 9th National Socio-Economic Development Plan as well as contributing to the long-term realization of the Lao PDR's Vision 2030, the National Sustainable Development Goal Roadmap, and to relevant national laws, policies, strategies and plans. This further aligns with the ILO Global call to action for a human-centred recovery from the COVID-19 crisis that is inclusive, sustainable and resilient.

In conclusion, the Government of Lao PDR reaffirms its commitment to continuing to observe and implement the ratified Conventions through close consultation with tripartite partners and relevant stakeholders. In this regard, Lao PDR would like to take this opportunity to request the Committee, the ILO, all international development partners and social partners to acknowledge the Government of Lao PDR's constraints and its efforts to achieve fair and decent employment and occupation, and to end discrimination in employment and occupation.

Let me end by expressing my sincere gratitude to the Committee in advance for its advice in these matters and assuring it of Lao PDR's fullest cooperation so we can end the case of discrimination in employment and occupation once and for all.

Employer members – I thank the Government of Lao PDR for its oral and written information on this case.

The Employer members stress the importance of States' compliance with the Convention. Convention No. 111 is one of the fundamental Conventions of the ILO and, as such, should be given special attention. This fundamental Convention aims to guarantee human dignity and equality of opportunity and treatment for all workers, by prohibiting any discrimination on the basis of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction or social origin in employment or occupation.

By way of background, Lao PDR joined the ILO in 1964 and has ratified a total of 12 Conventions including seven fundamental Conventions, one governance Convention and four technical Conventions (three of which remain in force). Lao PDR ratified the Convention in 2008. We note that the Committee of Experts has provided three observations on this case, namely in 2018, 2020 and 2023.

We understand that the ILO does not currently have projects, nor technical assistance in place focused on implementing the Convention in Lao PDR. However, the ILO, through the support of the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) is supporting the Government to increase net income and productive employment, among other things, in rural areas through the Rural Employment Promotion Project.

Today is the first time that the Conference Committee examines the Government of Lao PDR's application of the Convention.

Turning to the issues in this case, countries that have ratified the Convention have committed to implementing a national policy of equality, with a view to eliminating discrimination in the world of work, and to reporting on their compliance with this important commitment.

The Committee of Experts has identified four main concerns with Lao PDR's compliance with its commitments in this case.

First, the scope of application of protection of workers against discrimination provided for under Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention, namely the application of such protection to domestic workers and civil servants.

Second, the protection against discrimination in employment and occupation on all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, namely the protected ground of sex, and relatedly, the extent of protection against sexual harassment in employment and occupation.

Third, the protection against discrimination based on additional grounds of discrimination in accordance with Article 1(1)(b) of the Convention, namely protection against discrimination on the basis of nationality, age or socio-economic status in this case.

And fourth, the extent to which laws prohibiting activities considered to be prejudicial to the security of the State, including "propaganda activities", do not, in practice, result in discrimination in employment and occupation on the basis of political opinion, subject to and in line with Article 4 of the Convention.

On the first issue, the Employer members note the comments of the Committee of Experts on the apparent exclusion of civil servants from the application of Lao PDR's Labour Law of 2014. The Committee of Experts also noted that, by requiring domestic workers to "comply with the working contract", that law excludes them from protections of the Labour Law. Recalling that the principle of the Convention applies to all workers, the Committee of Experts asked the Government to indicate how civil servants and domestic workers are protected against discrimination in employment and occupation, and to identify the specific provisions that protect civil servants from discrimination in employment and occupation on the grounds set out in the Convention.

The Employer members also note the Government of Lao PDR's response, according to which the Government adopted a Ministerial Decision on Domestic Workers on 2 November 2022. The Government points to article 25 which prohibits any direct or indirect discrimination against domestic workers, though it has not identified the applicable grounds of protected discrimination.

It also points to the Law on Government Officials of 2015, article 4 of which creates all conditions for public servants of all genders and ethnicities based on their actual abilities to receive political development, thinking, ethics, upgrading of specialized knowledge and skills. It further points to article 5 on the fundamental principles of the management for civil servants, section 6 of which provides for equality between men and women and promotes the advancement of women in all ethnic groups.

Furthermore, it notes that the Constitution of Lao PDR contains broad protections against discrimination for all citizens before the law, and points to specific laws that prohibit violence against, and the trafficking of, women, including the restriction of their participation in economic activities based on their gender, which, it notes, were adopted in order to progressively achieve equality for both genders.

The Employer members note, however, that it appears that there could remain certain gaps in coverage for civil servants and domestic workers with respect to Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. The Employers therefore ask the Government of Lao PDR to:

- first, take the necessary steps to ensure that the Ministerial Decision on Domestic Workers is aligned with the Convention by expressly listing the grounds for prohibited discrimination in accordance with Article 1(1)(a);
- second, to take the necessary steps, in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, to bring its local laws into conformity with the Convention by ensuring that the various protections against discrimination extend to civil servants under local law.

On the second issue, the Committee of Experts took note of the Government of Lao PDR's statement that a new provision protecting gender equality in the workplace was introduced in the Labour Law of 2014, though it also noted that the Government did not provide information on the content of this new protection in its report. The Committee of Experts thus noted with concern that the Government of Lao PDR does not appear to have taken any steps to bring its legislation into conformity with the requirements of the Convention to protect against discrimination in employment on the basis of sex.

The Government indicated in its submissions that discrimination against workers is implicitly protected by article 144 of the Labour Law. It also points to article 96 as enshrining the rights of female employees to employment and professions in every sector that do not conflict with the law, among other things.

Despite the indication by the Government that it intends to amend its Labour Law of 2014 through the Labour Development Plan, the Employers note that currently existing laws do not appear to provide for universal prohibition of discrimination on the basis of sex in employment and occupation.

The Employer members also take note of the concern raised by the Committee of Experts that the Government of Lao PDR did not reply to its previous requests regarding the extent of its protections against sexual harassment, instead merely indicating that it intended to amend its Labour Law.

We note that the Government, in its submissions, said that, if there are cases of sexual harassment in employment and occupation, those cases will enter a dispute resolution mechanism. It also noted that, in addition to withdrawing their labour and seeking compensation, workers can refer their cases to labour management authorities and the Labour Court to seek other benefits.

The Employer members, however, urge the Government to take the necessary measures to clearly define, prevent and prohibit sexual harassment in both employment and occupation, and to ensure that protections for victims of harassment are provided for in legislation and in practice.

We also ask the Government of Lao PDR to take the necessary steps, in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, to ensure that the Labour Law expressly prohibits discrimination in employment and occupation on at least all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, including sex, and to provide the necessary information to the Committee of Experts on the progress achieved in this regard.

The Employer members also ask the Government to provide information on the application in practice of article 83(4) of the Labour Law and article 141(4) which prohibit employers from violating the personal rights of employees, including in cases of sexual harassment.

On the third issue, the Committee of Experts previously noted that the Labour Law no longer prohibits discrimination based on nationality, age or socio-economic status – all grounds that were previously included in the Labour Law of 2007.

The Government of Lao PDR, for its part, responded by pointing to the Ministerial Decision on the Permission of Foreign Employees Working in Lao PDR, which contains limited rights for foreign workers. It has not identified any applicable existing prohibitions with respect to age or socio-economic status.

The Employer members welcome the amendments introduced to ensure certain equality between foreign workers. However, we note that the Government has not provided information in respect of age and socio-economic status in employment and occupation, and therefore asks the Government to take the necessary steps, in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, to ensure that its domestic legislation affords equal protection against discrimination on the grounds of nationality, age and socio-economic status.

On the last issue, the Employer members observe that, in 2011, the Committee of Experts noted that the Penal Law of 2005 set out broad prohibitions on activities considered to be prejudicial to the security of the State. We notice further that, since then, the Committee of Experts has asked for information on the practical application of such provision. We note in this year's observations, the Committee of Experts expressed concern that, in response to its various requests, the Government has reiterated its statement that there is no such information.

However, the Employer members would urge the Government to collect the requested information on the practical application of the Penal Law and to provide it to the Committee of Experts.

Worker members – This is the first time that the Conference Committee has examined the application by Lao PDR of the Convention, which was ratified in 2008. Since its first comments in 2011, the Committee of Experts has been pointing out a number of shortcomings in the national legislation protecting workers against discrimination in employment and occupation. The Government has so far failed to remedy these gaps.

More specifically, the national legislation fails to give effect to the key tenets of the Convention. It does not clearly define direct and indirect discrimination and it does not expressly prohibit discrimination for each of the seven grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a). The legislation is also unclear as to whether it concerns both employment and occupation and whether it applies equally to employers and employees.

We recall the obligation of the Government under the Convention to ensure that discrimination in employment and occupation is prohibited with respect to all the grounds of discrimination laid out in Article 1(1)(a) and to adopt clear and comprehensive definitions of what constitutes discrimination.

We further note from the Committee of Experts' report that significant legislative gaps remain in the protection of workers against sexual harassment, and that in the absence of information from the Government, it remains unclear whether the 2014 Labour Law, which is the central piece of national legislation on the protection of workers against discrimination, fully gives effect to the Convention with regard to additional grounds of discrimination, including nationality, age and socio-economic status.

Regarding the personal scope of the 2014 Labour Law, we note that domestic workers and civil servants are excluded from it. While noting that the Government refers to specific regulatory texts which could provide the same guarantees to these two categories of workers, we note with regret that the Government fails to provide information on the content of these provisions.

In the absence of a clear legislative framework supporting equality and non-discrimination, it needs to be shown how such rights are ensured for excluded groups of workers. We recall the obligation of the Government under the Convention to ensure and promote the application of the principles of the Convention to all workers, both nationals and non-nationals, in all sectors of activity, in the public and private sectors, and in the formal and informal economy.

We are particularly concerned by the persistent failure of the Government to clarify the scope of article 117 of the 2017 Penal Law previously article 65 of the 2005 Penal Code. Article 117 establishes a broad prohibition of activities considered to be prejudicial to the security of the State, including propaganda activities. We recall that, under this provision, any person conducting propaganda activities and slandering Lao PDR, or circulating false rumours causing disorder by words, in writing through print, newspapers, motion pictures, videos, photographs, documents or electronic media, or other means which are detrimental to Lao PDR or for the purposes of undermining or weakening State authority, shall be punished by one year to five years of imprisonment and shall be fined from 5 million to 20 million kip.

Since 2011, the Committee of Experts have stressed the risk that this provision results in discrimination in employment and occupation on the basis of political opinion and have asked the Government to take measures to ensure that workers are protected against discrimination on the basis of political opinion. So far, the Government has failed to provide any information on this point.

The 13-year silence on this matter has done little to reduce our fears. We recall once again that, under the Convention, national legislation must cover political opinion as a prohibited ground of discrimination. This implies protection of all workers in respect of the activities of expressing or demonstrating opposition to established political principles and opinions. We urge the Government to ensure that no provision in the domestic legal order can be used to discriminate against workers for their political opinion.

Finally, we note that the Government has adopted several national plans and programmes aimed at promoting gender equality, fostering equality of opportunity and treatment in education for all ethnic groups and increasing access to employment for persons with disabilities and older workers.

While these policy initiatives constitute a positive step taken by the Government to give effect to the Convention on several prohibited grounds of discrimination, we recall that, under Article 2 of the Convention, the Government must declare and pursue a national policy designed to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of at least all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a).

We regret that the Government provides no information regarding the adoption of a comprehensive national policy, and that it gives very little information on the implementation of its plans and programmes and the concrete results achieved.

We acknowledge the statement that the Government has just provided to the Committee today. However, the Government has still not provided clarification on all of the requests that were raised by the Committee of Experts.

We urge the Government to adopt and implement, in full cooperation with the social partners, a comprehensive national equality policy. We also request the Government to provide detailed information on the concrete impact of the ongoing plans and programmes on the reduction of inequalities and discrimination in employment and occupation in Lao PDR.

Worker member, Lao People's Democratic Republic – Please accept my sincere apologies for not being able to attend the Committee in person.

Discrimination stifles opportunities, wasting the human talent needed for economic progress, and accentuates social tensions and inequalities. Combating discrimination is an essential part of promoting decent work.

I will speak on several issues as commented by the Committee of Expert in its report, such as the legislation, prohibition of discrimination, the Penal Law and our efforts to eliminate discrimination.

In Lao PDR, as in many other countries, a lack of formal protection for domestic workers has been a long-standing concern of human rights and trade union organizations. Domestic work is frequently not perceived as “employment”.

Domestic workers, as in many other countries, endure very poor working conditions, including underpayment of wages, long working hours, inadequate privacy and lack of safety and health conditions. Furthermore, domestic workers – whether national or migrant – have limited bargaining power, and often cannot complain about abusive conditions.

In this regard, we believe that the Government should work in collaboration and consultation with the social partners and the relevant sectors to strengthen the protection of domestic workers. Furthermore, we support the amendments of labour law that respect fundamental principles and rights at work derived from ILO Conventions and Recommendations, including this Convention.

The Law on Government Officials No. 74 of 2015: Article 4 on state policy for public servants, section 1, provides that: “The State considers the work of public servants as important and promotes through the implementation of policies as defined in the law, creating all conditions for public servants of all genders and ethnicities based on their actual abilities to receive political development, thinking, ethics, upgrading of specialized knowledge and skills”.

On this matter, we share the view of the Committee that specific provisions under the Law on Government Officials that protect civil servants from discrimination in employment and occupation set out in the Convention are needed.

We, trade unions, will work with the Government and other sectors to continue our efforts to promote gender equality through legislation and national policies. This includes the effective implementation of the Law on Gender Equality and regular review of its impact, in consultation with the social partners, and the development, implementation and monitoring of targeted policy measures, including in the framework of the Women's Development Plan 2021–25. These measures should be designed and monitored in full consultation with the social partners.

In relation to the prohibition of discrimination, we noted that the Government will take the Convention into consideration in the next revision of the Labour Law. We urge the Government to ensure that any amendments of the Labour Law 2014 are in conformity with the spirit and the letter of the Convention. More importantly, the social partners must be properly consulted.

The Lao Federation of Trade Unions (LFTU), as the representations of workers in the country that protect and defend workers' rights, have distributed and disseminated various documents and publications to our members, union officials and union leaders related to the elimination of discrimination in respect of employment and occupation.

We also have educated LFTU members on Lao labour law and its regulations, such as the Law on Prevention and Combating Violence against Women and Children, Law on Lao Women's Union, Law on Social Security Law, Ministerial Decision on Domestic Workers, and Law on Government Officials, international labour standards. We also negotiated for collective bargaining for better workers' protection in the country and to ensure the elimination of discrimination in various aspects.

Apart from the abovementioned, we have worked in close collaboration with social partners to implement various activities in ensuring the respect for human and trade union rights in the country.

Concerning the implementation of the Penal Law, we believe that the Government should ensure that this provision does not result, in practice, in discrimination based on employment and occupation.

Finally, we support the speech of the Government and strongly believe that the Lao Government will continue its effort to eliminate discrimination in respect to employment and occupation in full consultation with the social partners.

Employer member, Lao People's Democratic Republic – I speak on behalf of the Lao National Chamber of Commerce and Industry (LNCCI). I am honoured to express our strong support for the Government's Strategic Framework and National Plan of Action for the Decent Work Country Programme. We also commend the ongoing efforts to improve relevant labour laws and regulations concerned.

Tripartite collaboration, involving social and development partners alongside the Government, plays a crucial role. By actively participating in discussions and implementing strategies, plans and activities, we can collectively strengthen decent work practices, address concerns, and disseminate best practices throughout the business sector. Effective information sharing, for instance, empowers businesses to promote better workplaces and combat workplace discrimination.

The Government's focus on promoting investment aligns with our commitment to enhancing social dialogue. We believe this dialogue is key to effectively implementing and enforcing laws and regulations related to core International Labour Organization Conventions, including this Convention.

The LNCCI recognizes its role in this process. We actively provide our members, including those operating in the informal economy, with guidance on labour law and social security regulations. This empowers them to run profitable businesses, integrate into the formal sector, and adopt best practices in business management, skills development, and social responsibility.

Employers go beyond mere tripartite participation. We play a critical role in guiding our members on labour law, social security regulations and relevant conventions. This ensures adherence to the fundamental rights of workers, promotes equality and non-discrimination, and ultimately contributes to the well-being of workers and their families. Additionally, the LNCCI collaborates with development partners to conduct training programmes, strengthen our member base, and actively promote gender equality, reskilling, and upskilling within the workplace.

In closing, on behalf of the LNCCI, I extend our sincere gratitude to the ILO for its ongoing financial, technical, and other forms of support to Lao PDR. We particularly appreciate the focus on strengthening the tripartite mechanism and promoting social dialogue for the implementation of the Decent Work Framework.

Thank you once again for your support and collaboration with development partners. We look forward to working together toward a common goal.

Government member, Belgium – I have the honour to speak on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States. The candidate countries Albania, Montenegro, North Macedonia and the Republic of Moldova, and the European Free Trade Association country Norway, member of the European Economic Area, align themselves with this statement.

The EU and its Member States are committed to the respect, protection, and fulfilment of human rights, including labour rights. We promote the universal ratification and effective implementation of fundamental ILO Conventions and support the ILO in developing and promoting international labour standards and supervising their application.

The EU and its Member States have been committed development partners of Lao PDR, including through the “Everything but Arms” (EBA) arrangement under the EU’s General Scheme of Preferences, granting duty-free and quota-free access to the EU markets, contributing to sustained growth and job creation in the past decades. The trade benefits granted under the EBA arrangement are subject to the condition that Lao PDR respects core international principles, enshrined in core UN and ILO Conventions.

Concerning the protection of workers against discrimination, we note the Government’s adoption of a Ministerial Decision on Domestic Workers in 2022, in order to extend protection against discrimination to this category of workers. We encourage the Government to provide information on the content of the Ministerial Decision to the Committee of Experts to ascertain that the decision is fully compliant with the principles set out in the Convention. Recalling that the Labour Law of 2014 excludes civil servants from its application, we encourage the Government to provide further information on the provisions protecting civil servants from employment discrimination.

We note the inclusion of a new article in the Labour Law of 2014 that provides for equality between foreign workers and Lao workers, and we request the Government to provide more information in this regard, including on the measures taken, in consultation with the social partners, to maintain the same level of protection against discrimination based on nationality, age or socio-economic status as previously contained in the Labour Law of 2007.

We welcome the inclusion of a new article on gender equality in the Labour Law of 2014, and the planned amendment of the Law, as indicated in the Government's Labour Development Plan 2026–30 and in the supplementary information provided ahead of the International Labour Conference. We are, however, concerned that the legislation remains non-compliant with the Convention, and therefore urge the Government to clearly define what constitutes discrimination under the Labour Law and explicitly prohibit discrimination on at least all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. We also ask the Government to provide additional information on the content of the new article 96 on gender equality.

Concerning sex-based discrimination and sexual harassment, we note with concern the continuing lack of provision of information by the Government to the Committee of Experts and we urge the Government to take the necessary measures to define, prevent and prohibit sexual harassment in employment and occupation and to ensure adequate sanctions and remedies.

We also highlight that, under current legislation, the sole remedy available to victims of sexual harassment is the possibility to resign. We stress that this measure is not sufficient or adequate to protect victims of sexual harassment. In line with the Committee of Experts, we call on the Government to amend the labour law accordingly. In addition, we would ask the Government to provide information on the application in practice of provisions allowing workers to end their employment in the event of sexual harassment and of provisions which prohibit employers from violating the personal rights of employees.

Lastly, we note with concern that the Penal Law of 2017 prohibits a range of activities considered to be detrimental to the security of the State, including so-defined propaganda activities. We also regret that the Government's lack of information on this matter. Recalling that the Committee of Experts has been raising this issue since 2011, we request the Government to provide information on the steps taken to ensure that this legislation does not, in practice, result in discrimination in employment and occupation based on political opinion.

Going beyond the case in point, we appreciate that Lao PDR ratified, in 2022, the two new fundamental ILO Conventions – the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155) and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187) – and we look forward to their effective implementation.

We recall the importance of the fundamental ILO Conventions not yet ratified by Lao PDR, namely the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), along with the governance Convention on labour inspection, the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81).

The ratification and effective implementation of these Conventions, together with other Conventions on human rights, the environment and good governance, will constitute a prerequisite for Lao PDR to apply to become a beneficiary of the Generalised System of Preferences Plus trade scheme with the EU, once the country graduates from its least developed country status.

The EU and its Member States remain committed to a joint constructive engagement with Lao PDR with the aim of strengthening the Government's capacity to address the issues raised in the Committee of Experts' report.

Government member, Indonesia, speaking on behalf of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) Member States – We took note of the report of the Committee of Experts and the comprehensive updates by the Lao Government. The ASEAN Member States commend Lao PDR's firm commitment to and active engagement with the ILO supervisory mechanism, particularly in the implementation of the Convention.

We acknowledge and appreciate the progress made by Lao PDR. These notable signs of progress include comprehensive tripartite and national labour committee consultations, in enhancing its legal framework and ensuring effective implementation of relevant laws and regulations, particularly the Constitution of Lao PDR, Labour Law, Lao Women's Union Law, Government Officials Law and other related laws including the decrees related to the rights, the protection of workers against discrimination. Furthermore, the Government would also incorporate the Convention into the next revision of the Labour Law.

ASEAN members appreciate Lao PDR's efforts in promoting the rights and the protection of workers against discrimination including the critical matters related to the rights of workers through its mechanism under the Tripartite and National Labour Management Committee, which has been created from the national to the local level. We, ASEAN Member States, notice the progress of Lao PDR in promoting the rule of law and implementing obligations under ratified ILO Conventions, including the protection of workers against discrimination and related labour rights.

ASEAN members would like to commend Lao PDR for playing a leading role in working with stakeholders in the implementation of related ILO Conventions and the supported projects, the Decent Work Country Programme, and the Global Deal initiative.

In light of the above-mentioned progress in the application of the Convention, ASEAN members call on the ILO and all international partners to support and engage with Lao PDR to further nurture an environment conducive to the exercise of protection of workers against discrimination and enrich harmonious industrial relations.

Interpretation from Russian: Government member, Belarus – We thank the Government of Lao PDR for the detailed information submitted on the issue under consideration. We welcome the commitment of Lao PDR to cooperation with the ILO supervisory bodies, and we also welcome the progress made in implementing the Convention at the national level.

We note the comprehensive insertion into the legislation of the country of provisions that are focused on eradicating all kinds of discrimination in labour and employment. In particular, we note measures that have been undertaken, taking due account of national conditions and practice, and that are intended to advance the principles of gender equality to protect the rights of women on the labour market.

Further, we commend the efforts made by the country to extend equality of opportunity to older persons, and also those living with disabilities, when it comes to employment. We applaud the active interaction of the Government with the social partners in giving effect to decent work country programmes in accordance with ILO Conventions.

We call upon the ILO supervisory bodies to take due account of progress made by Lao PDR in eradicating all types of discrimination and to reflect appropriately the work done by the Government in the conclusions of those supervisory bodies.

However, we do have to state that it is our view that the recommendations made by the ILO supervisory bodies to make changes to the Penal Law are not fully in line with the provisions of the Convention. They do not have a direct link with ensuring that labour standards are respected, and they go beyond the mandate of the ILO. In fact, this is something that could be used by third parties as an attempt to interfere within the domestic affairs of Lao PDR. We call on the ILO to continue to provide technical assistance to Lao PDR in order to make further progress in protecting the rights and interests of workers.

Employer member, Cambodia – I am offering this statement to support Lao PDR and its endeavour to safeguard and advance the equality of opportunities, employment and occupation for its citizens under the purview of Convention.

Despite the constraints it is facing, it is commendable that the Government relentlessly pursues the creation and promotion of fair and decent employment and equality of opportunities for its citizens, including by embracing and continuing the executions of the ILO Decent Work Country Programme and in partnership with the ILO and other stakeholders.

We observe that the Government of Lao PDR has expressed its intention and commitment to make necessary updates to its national labour legislation in order to bring it into better alignment with the Convention, and this constructive attitude should be duly noted and welcomed by the Committee.

And we also note that Lao PDR ratified the Convention in 2008, making it one of the most recent countries, if not the latest country to have ratified the Convention. “Better late than never”, as the saying goes, and the courageous attitude of Lao PDR should be encouraged. It is important to take this fact into account and we view that a more appropriate and suitable solution that will benefit Lao PDR is the provision of expert technical support and guidance and, in this respect, technical support and guidance of the ILO has played a pivotal role in strengthening and enhancing the implementation of ILO Conventions and the Recommendations by Member States. We therefore strongly support the Government to seek the technical support and guidance from the ILO to help it achieve the desired objective.

We also view that Lao PDR will gain valuable benefits by providing reports regularly to the Committee of Experts to promote appreciation and understanding by the Committee of Experts of its national realities, the challenges and constraints it is facing as well as the progress that has been achieved.

Worker member, Republic of Korea – The Labour Law of 2014 provides for gender equality in the workplace in the new article 96, and equal pay for equal work between foreign and Lao workers in article 69. The Law provides for protection from discrimination against pregnant women and new mothers in recruitment and termination of employment in articles 87 and 100 and prohibits direct and indirect discrimination by employers against employees based on marital status, gender discrimination or HIV infection in article 143(2). The Law defines “discrimination in the workplace” as “all actions by the employer that hinder, are biased, or limit opportunity for promotion, and confidence on the part of the employee” in article 3(28).

As the Committee of Experts pointed out, it is still unclear whether the legislation is fully in conformity with the Convention.

First, the Law fails to expressly prohibit discrimination on at least all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention.

Secondly, “discrimination in the workplace” is defined in a narrow way and fails to encompass various types of discrimination that workers can expect to experience in the workplace, such as discrimination in wage, in-kind payment and benefits, in opportunities for reskilling and upskilling, in personnel placement, and in retirement.

Thirdly, due to the lack of definition of “direct” and “indirect” discrimination, it would make it difficult to introduce the special measures provided for in Article 5(2) of the Convention.

Without proper information on reality, it is difficult to examine how the Government enforces the Law effectively. However, according to the limited information available, gender gaps continue to persist in Lao PDR. According to the UNDP, although almost equal to men in labour market participation, women’s average monthly income is just 77 per cent of that of men, and women are over-represented in low-skill occupations and spend a disproportionate amount of time on unpaid family and care work. Just 21.9 per cent of Members of Parliament are women and the number is even lower at subnational levels. Women’s share of the labour force in the formal economy is very low, only 15 per cent according to the Labour Force Survey of 2016–17. Many women still join the informal sector and lower skills industries such as retail and services, which means they are not entitled to relevant employment benefits and social protections.

In conclusion, I hope the Committee is able to discuss the implementation of the Convention by Lao PDR with more concrete information on how the laws are implemented in practice, provided by the social partners as well as by the Government in the future.

Government member, Viet Nam – I would like to align myself with the statement delivered by the distinguished delegate of Indonesia on behalf of the ASEAN Members States. Viet Nam took note of the Committee of Experts’ report and the comprehensive updates communicated by the Lao Government on the application of the Convention. Viet Nam commends the commitment and progress that Lao PDR has made in the promotion of workers’ rights and protection of workers against discrimination through the implementation of the Convention. Particularly, we welcome the Government of Lao PDR’s continued efforts to strengthen its legislative framework to address discrimination at the workplace on all grounds, including the effort to incorporate the Convention into the next revision of the Labour Law. It is also appreciated that all these efforts are conducted through comprehensive Tripartite and National Labour Management Committee consultations.

We also applaud Lao PDR’s efforts to enhance access to vocational and skill training for people, including through the Decent Work Country Programme supported by the ILO, forming a firm basis to prevent discrimination at workplaces. We welcome Lao PDR’s constructive engagement with the ILO supervisory mechanisms and call on the ILO and international partners to continue their support and engagement with Lao PDR for further strengthening the protection of workers against discrimination and the implementation of the Convention.

Worker member, Singapore – On behalf of the Singapore National Trades Union Congress, I wish to address the continued discrimination based on gender still taking place in Lao PDR, and I urge the Government to strengthen its Labour Law of 2014 to address these concerns.

Based on research conducted by the Association for Development of Women and Legal Education in 2017, involving views from workers in the garment factory, restaurants and state enterprises in Lao PDR, women faced as high as 90 per cent chance of sexual harassment, either verbally or physically, in the workplace.

The same Association conducted further research in 2023, and it is alarming that the newer research findings showed that, while over 50 per cent of the employee respondents have experienced sexual harassment in their life, and over 30 per cent have experienced it in the workplace, most companies do not organize any form of training about sexual harassment.

Needless to say, most companies also do not have a workplace harassment policy, a code of conduct or proper grievance handling.

We need to have very clear and substantive legislative guidance and measures in workplaces to prevent breeding grounds for the occurrence of all types of sexual harassment, such as unwelcome sharing, offensive materials and remarks, sexual comments and also invasions of personal space, overt sexual touching, unwanted non-sexual touching, following or threatening and flashing.

This is unacceptable and should be addressed immediately. We need to ensure that every worker has a safe working environment and is not subjected to such treatment.

The Lao social partners, especially the Government and employers, should join the Lao trade unions and collectively take a serious stand against sexual harassment through a range of laws that guard against various forms of sexual harassment, including workplace sexual harassment. We join the call for the Lao Government to comply with the ILO request for updated information and work with the ILO to strengthen the new measures, together with the social partners.

Interpretation from Chinese: Government member, China – We have read the detailed presentation by the representative of the Government, and we have carefully reviewed the report of the Committee of Experts and the supplementary materials submitted by the Lao Government to the Committee.

We have noticed that the Constitution and laws have clear provisions for protecting workers from various forms of discrimination. The Government also plans to include relevant provisions of the Convention on the prohibition of employment and occupation discrimination, sex discrimination and sexual harassment in the next revision of its Labour Law.

The Government also plans to deal with relevant issues through appropriate dispute resolution mechanisms with the protection of the law. We have noticed that the Lao Government has continuously strengthened its efforts to promote the implementation of the Law on Gender Equality, formulated various development plans, comprehensively protected women and children from violence and prohibited gender-based employment and occupational discrimination.

The country has resolutely prohibited ethnic discrimination, focusing on implementing national education policies and gradually narrowed the gap between different ethnic groups. The Government has continuously improved peoples' living standards, educational level and professional development ability, and protected the rights and interests of the disabled and older workers. The Government has earnestly complied with the Convention in light of its actual development situation and has made certain achievements and progress, so we highly recognize and appreciate these achievements.

We hope the ILO secretariat can strengthen its communication with the Lao PDR Government and provide appropriate technical support.

Worker member, New Zealand – I am the New Zealand Council of Trade Unions' representative, and I will use this opportunity to discuss the Lao PDR 2017 Penal Law and how it is used to suppress complaints of discrimination. Article 224 of the Penal Law does provide that discrimination against women is punishable by fine, re-education and imprisonment. Article 117 punishes with prison terms from one to five years and significant fines for anyone who is deemed to be conducting propaganda activities and slandering Lao PDR or distorting the guidelines of the Party and policies of the Government, by circulating false rumours or causing disorder by words, which are detrimental to Lao PDR or are for the purpose of undermining or weakening State authority.

Various international organizations report that the Government is stepping up its use of the powers under this legislation to punish people considered dissidents solely based on their use of social media and other outlets to publicly expose serious human right breaches.

The Amnesty International Annual Report released this year, highlighted the attacks on human right defenders in Lao PDR with arbitrary detention, enforced disappearance and killings.

The US Department of State Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor 2023 Report on Human Rights Practices, found significant human rights issues and included credible reports of arbitrary or unlawful killings, including extrajudicial killings, cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment by government officials, arbitrary arrests or detentions, serious problems with the independence of the judiciary, serious government corruption, serious government restrictions on domestic and international human rights organizations, extensive gender-based violence, including domestic or intimate partner violence, sexual violence, and child, early and forced marriage and prohibiting independent trade unions.

The report acknowledged the existence of legislation prohibiting direct or indirect discrimination by employers against employees based on sex and providing for equal rights for women and men including equal pay for equal work, but stated that the Government did not enforce the law effectively, resulting in ongoing discriminatory behaviour keeping women in subordinate positions and denying them equal access to education and employment.

We are requesting that the Committee and the ILO use their supervisory mechanisms to intervene through diplomatic channels to give effect to the necessary changes to ensure the Convention is properly implemented to have genuine and effective application for women workers without fear of retribution and retaliation.

Government member, Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela – The Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela has noted the statement by the Government representative of Lao PDR. We recognize the efforts made by the Government of Lao PDR to promote a national policy of equality and non-discrimination in employment.

We are aware that the fight against discrimination is arduous and complex.

The Government of Lao PDR has developed a body of legal standards that establish tools to incorporate the standards set out in the Convention.

We therefore consider that the recommendations on adapting the legislation to the provisions of this Convention correspond in this respect.

In this regard, the Government of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela recognizes the progress made and encourages the Government of Lao PDR to continue to develop sound and successful social policies to support the working population, and to continue to strengthen its legal framework and institutional mechanisms.

Employer member, Indonesia – I am making the statement here with the support of the fellow members of the ASEAN Confederation of Employers (ACE). Non-discrimination in respect of employment and occupation is a cornerstone of the decent work concept, and we join Lao PDR in re-affirming adherence and support for non-discrimination in the workplace.

Concerning Lao PDR's case on the Convention, we consider that Lao PDR has set out a strong and compelling case for its compliance, while also providing valuable contextual information. This case also underscores that the effective implementation of the law and regulations require social dialogue (bipartite and tripartite) to promote decent work and non-discrimination.

We value the effectiveness of Member States' national systems to address important issues of interest, and consensus building as it contributes to the advancement of industrial peace which ultimately benefits workers, employers and economic and social development in our countries.

Interpretation from Russian: Government member, Russian Federation – We have carefully read the observation from the Committee of Experts with reference to the implementation by Lao PDR of the Convention. We note the substantial progress that has been made by the Government in giving effect to obligations that are foreseen under that Convention. We highly commend the efforts focused on combatting discrimination including in terms of guaranteeing labour rights. In that context, we note the work of the Tripartite and National Labour Management Committee and the establishment of that committee has enabled us to see an increase in the level of social protection in the country. Also, we commend the progress made in terms of the legal regulation of labour relationships within Lao PDR. This is a positive dynamic that is shown, for instance, by the fact that the Government intends to incorporate provisions of the Convention directly into the national labour legislation. We are convinced that Lao PDR will continue to combat labour cooperation in close cooperation with social partners. We therefore call upon the ILO to work constructively with the tripartite partnership that exists within Lao PDR. This would include providing technical assistance to all interested parties.

Government member, Cuba – We thank the Government of Lao PDR for the submission of additional information, and we note that Government expresses its willingness to advance tripartite social dialogue in the country, which is working with the ILO, in particular with regard to the implementation of the Convention. This information and reasoning show the willingness of the Government to honour its commitments undertaken in this Organization.

The Government of Lao has provided information on the implementation of legislation in recent years focused on the protection of labour rights and of workers against discrimination in employment. Such actions include the establishment of the Tripartite and National Labour Management Committee. This is very important information that should be assessed appropriately.

We reiterate that mechanisms of cooperation and collaboration should take precedence over mechanisms of coercion. In the analysis of any case, we must favour the path of negotiations, respectful dialogue, assistance and cooperation.

We invite the ILO to collaborate with Lao PDR to continue to foster an environment conducive to the protection of workers against discrimination, and to enrich labour relations in general.

The measures taken against the will of governments, far from promoting dialogue and cooperation, prolong confrontation and do not have the desired results. Therefore, it is important to maintain respect for tripartite dialogue and consensus building, which are both fundamental principles of this Organization.

Chairperson – I can see no more requests for the floor. Now I invite the Government representative of Lao People's Democratic Republic for his concluding remarks.

Government representative – We listened carefully to and take note of the advice, comments, recommendations, as well as suggestions from all interventions in this session today with regard to the observation of the Committee of Experts on the Convention by Lao PDR.

It is observed that all interventions are constructive and practical in nature. The comments and recommendations are taken into account and will further serve as guidance in improving and enhancing our ongoing efforts in the realization of obligations under the Convention.

It is recognized that discrimination in employment and occupation is clearly an unacceptable practice in all nations and that it also needs immediate resolution. In this regard, I would like to reiterate that Lao PDR has been strictly enforcing the Labour Law, other related laws and regulations as well as working in collaboration with social partners and stakeholders to prevent all forms of discrimination.

However, poverty eradication has long been an integral part of Lao PDR's national policies and priorities. The Government has emphasized its strong commitment and undertaken its utmost efforts to graduate from the least developed country status for over a decade, and the Government has recently adopted a new poverty graduation strategy entitled "Lao PDR Smooth Transition Strategy for LDC Graduation in 2026 and beyond". Additionally, the country's line agencies concerned are still facing challenges and difficulties such as technical expertise, legal advice and financial resources in fulfilling our obligation under the ILO Conventions and other related instruments. We therefore would like to call on the ILO, international communities, social partners and stakeholders to continue providing us the assistance and support.

In this connection, I would like to assure the Committee that the Government is fully committed to the Convention and other related instruments, including at the regional level. For instance, ASEAN labour-related frameworks to ensure that fair and decent employment and occupation exist in all workplaces and assure the Committee that discrimination in employment and occupation is eliminated or ended in all workplaces.

Last but not least, I would like to conclude by expressing my sincere appreciation to the Committee of Experts for the observations. My thanks also go to all Governments, ASEAN Member States, representatives of workers' and employers' organizations and others for their constructive interventions and support extended to the Government of Lao PDR in this regard.

Worker members – We would like to thank Lao PDR for its remarks and also thank all the speakers who took the floor.

We note that, 16 years after ratifying the Convention, the Government has yet to take the necessary steps to bring its legislation into conformity with the instrument. We note in this regard the Government's indication that it intends to amend the 2014 Labour Law through the Labour Development Plan 2026–30. Therefore, we urge the Government to take immediate steps to review its national legislation to: clearly define direct and indirect discrimination; expressly prohibit discrimination at least for the seven grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a); clarify whether the relevant legislation concerns both employment and occupation and whether it applies equally to employers and employees; ensure that domestic workers and civil servants enjoy the same protections and guarantees as other workers; ensure that no provision in the domestic legal order can be used to discriminate against workers for their political opinion; define, prevent and prohibit sexual harassment in employment and occupation including, both, quid pro quo, or blackmail, and hostile environment sexual harassment; and provide for adequate sanctions and remedies.

Furthermore, we urge the Government to adopt and implement, in full cooperation with the social partners, a comprehensive national policy for equality of opportunity and treatment for at least for all the grounds laid out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention.

While taking due note of the financial constraints of the Government, we recall that the Convention is a fundamental Convention and that the Government should make every effort to give it full effect. We also request the Government to provide detailed information on the concrete impact of the ongoing plans and programmes on the reduction of inequalities and discrimination in employment and occupation in Lao PDR.

Employer members – The Employer members thank the various speakers who took the floor and notably the Government of Lao PDR for the information provided and for its interventions. We remind the Committee that the Convention is a fundamental Convention which therefore requires special consideration by the ILO, Governments, Workers and Employers.

Our position in this case aligns with the recommendations of the Committee of Experts. The Employer members stand against discrimination in the field of employment and occupation. The Employer members urge the Government to take the necessary steps, in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations where applicable, to ensure that its labour law and other domestic legislation and ministerial directions are aligned with the Convention, namely:

- (1) ensuring that protections against discrimination in employment and occupation on at least all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention are captured including the protected ground of sex and ensuring that these protections extend to domestic workers and civil servants;
- (2) ensuring that its domestic legislation affords equal protection against discrimination on the basis of nationality, age and socio-economic status with respect to all aspects of employment and occupation; and
- (3) providing information to the Committee of Experts on the progress achieved in this regard including information with respect to the application of such prohibitions against discrimination in practice.

The Employer members also urge the Government to collect information on the practical application of the prohibitions of activities considered to be prejudicial to the security of the State and to provide such information to the Committee of Experts to ensure that, in practice, such laws do not result in discrimination in employment and occupation based on political opinion.

We count on the Government to provide the requested information by 1 September and remind it that, if needed, it can request ILO technical assistance with a view to implementing the above-mentioned recommendations in a timely manner and ensuring full implementation of the Convention both in law and in practice.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the oral and written information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted with concern, that 16 years after the ratification the Government has yet to take the necessary steps to bring its legislation fully into conformity with the Convention.

Taking the discussion into account, the Committee urged the Government, in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, to take effective measures to:

- clearly define direct and indirect discrimination in law;
- clearly define, prevent and prohibit sexual harassment in both employment and occupation and ensure that protections and adequate remedies for victims of harassment are provided for in law and practice;
- ensure that the Ministerial Decision on domestic workers is aligned with Convention No. 111 by expressly listing the grounds for prohibited discrimination in accordance with Article 1(1)(a);
- ensure that the prohibitions of discrimination contained in Article 1(1)(a) apply to civil servants and that those protections as contained in the Labour Law and related legislation cover both employment and occupation;
- amend the Labour Law (2014) to expressly prohibit discrimination in employment and occupation on at least all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, including sex; and
- provide information on the application in practice of (i) section 83(4) of the Labour Law, which allows a worker to bring an end to the employment contract in the event of sexual harassment; and (ii) section 141(4), which prohibits employers from violating the personal rights of employees, including with respect to cases of sexual harassment.

The Committee requested the Government to provide a detailed report on the measures taken to implement the Convention in law and practice, notably the above-mentioned recommendations, and progress achieved before the deadline of 1 September 2024.

Government representative – We, the delegation of the Government of Lao People's Democratic Republic, have listened carefully to the conclusions and take note of all concluding advice, comments and recommendations made by the Committee.

It is obvious that solving the discrimination against employment and occupation is complicated and the resolution needs collective actions from relevant stakeholders, particularly social partners. In this regard, the Government of Lao People's Democratic Republic requests active and full participation and involvement of the social partners in the development of the legislation and its enforcement.

The Government, however, reaffirms the Committee that it will play its full leading roles in resolving the discrimination on employment and occupation through following up and applying the advice, comments, and recommendations provided by the Committee in the conclusion. In this connection, the Government urges the ILO, international development partners and international social partners to continue providing the assistance and support to the relevant national counterparts in resolving the discrimination on employment and occupation. We also encourage the ILO country office to play a more active role in communicating and collaborating with the Government and the tripartite institutions to provide a more effective technical guidance and advice.

Lastly, may I take this opportunity to express our sincere gratitude to the Committee for the conclusion on this case. We also would like to thank those who have contributed with their comments, advice, recommendations and suggestions on this case. We wish the Committee and colleagues to stay healthy and have a safe journey home.

Mexico (ratification: 1952)

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100)

Written information provided by the Government

In Mexico, equality for women and men is set out in article 4 of the Political Constitution of the United States of Mexico. In respect of labour, article 123(A)(VII) provides that equal wages shall be paid for equal work, without any discrimination. This provision reinforces the right to decent work, including work that respects the human dignity of workers. With reference to the requirement of equal wages for equal work, this is set out in section 2 of the Federal Labour Act. Accordingly, conditions of work based on the principle of substantive equality between women and men cannot be lower than those set out in the law, and have to be proportional to the importance of the services provided and equal for equal work, while differences and/or exclusions cannot be established on grounds of ethnic origin or nationality, sex, gender, age, disability, social condition, health conditions, religion, opinion, sexual preference, pregnancy, family responsibilities or civil status, as set out in section 56 of the Act.

The establishment of the general minimum wage and occupational minimum wages is agreed through negotiations and agreement between employers, workers and the Federal Government, which are members of the Council of Representatives of the National Minimum Wage Board. This process is undertaken while ensuring compatibility between the requirements of the labour legislation and the economic and social conditions of the country, thereby promoting equity and justice between production factors in a context of respect for the dignity of workers and their families. The proposals that the Government of Mexico makes to the social partners in respect of wages are based on technical studies which assess for their determination the economic branch or activity, and the profession, occupation or trade concerned and, in the case of wage increases, the impact of previous increases on inflation, employment, poverty, the gender gap and the macroeconomic environment.

The reduction of the gender wage gap is a Government commitment, as set out in the Sectoral Labour and Social Welfare Programme 2020–24 which, in priority objective No. 3, proposes to recover the purchasing power of minimum wages and incomes in order to improve the quality of life of workers, particularly in action point “3.1.5 Contributing to the reduction of wage gaps in some categories of the occupational minimum wage system in order to improve the purchasing power of women and youth”, within the context of strategic priority 3.1. In this regard, Mexican labour policy is based on bodies such as the National Institute of Statistics and Geography which, in its biennial survey, entitled “National Survey of Household Income and Expenditure”, provides information on fluctuations in various areas related to the income and expenditure of Mexican households, based on the publication of their occupational and socio-demographic characteristics. Among its indicators, since 2016, it has regularly published the relationship between the average income received by men and women, which allows the measurement of its evolution.

In the context of the new minimum wage policy, over the past five years, the increase in the minimum wage has reduced the gap between women and men and has supported wage equality. This is due to a higher increase in the average wages of women in comparison with the increase for men, as a higher proportion of women than of men have benefited from minimum wage increases. The latest available data, from March 2024, shows that women workers insured by the Mexican Social Security Institute saw an annual increase of 5.9 per cent in their average wages, compared with an average of 5.1 per cent for men, or a difference of 0.8 percentage points in favour of women. When compared with the beginning of this six-year period, the average wages of women have increased by 22.6 per cent and those of men by 20.5 per cent (a difference of 2.1 percentage points). The rises in minimum wages between 2019 and 2024 therefore reduced the wage gap by 27.7 per cent at the municipal level in the formal sector. The impact has been greater in municipalities in which the poorest women are resident, where the gender wage gap fell by 63.8 per cent. It was also found that the increase of 20 per cent in the minimum wage in 2023 led to an increase in the average wages of formal women workers covered by insurance, who benefited from wage rises that were 0.3 percentage points higher than those of men in the Northern Frontier Free Zone (ZLFN) and 0.6 percentage points in the rest of the country, resulting in a reduction in the wage gap of 0.5 per cent in the ZLFN and 0.6 per cent in the rest of the country.

When taking into consideration both formal and informal workers, based on the data of the National Survey of Occupations and Employment, it can be seen that the average wage of women has increased by 14.1 per cent and that of men by 13.0 per cent (a difference of 1.1 percentage points). Based on data from the National Survey of Household Income and Expenditure, the hourly wage gap in 2018 was 12.5 per cent, compared with 12 per cent in 2022, or a reduction of 0.5 percentage points. In contrast, the gender labour income gap (which includes income in addition to wages, such as bonuses, shares in enterprise earnings, overtime pay, commissions and tips) was 18.1 per cent in 2018 and 14.6 per cent in 2022, representing a reduction of 3.4 percentage points. The National Minimum Wage Board, within the context of its mandate, has followed fluctuations in the gender wage gap through studies and reports, with a view to continuing to promote a minimum wage policy which has a positive effect on the reduction of wage gaps, particularly for women with the lowest earnings.

With reference to the Mexican Standard on Labour Equality and Non-Discrimination, the Government of Mexico provides the information and tools to workplaces to promote the exercise of the labour rights of workers, such as worthy and decent work, equality of opportunity and treatment, non-discrimination and labour inclusion, among others, which make it possible to address, prevent and eradicate labour discrimination. The measures adopted to ensure its application include criterion No. 7, entitled "Guaranteeing equality of wages and the provision of staff benefits and compensation", with a view to ensuring that workplaces have the information to establish criteria for the evaluation of jobs with a view to fixing and raising wages, without gender discrimination. Other elements include the list of jobs, categories, wages by sex and the allocation of compensation and other financial incentives in addition to those set out by law, based on transparent procedures determined by the workplace. These elements have to be established through an evidence-based process, that is documents that identify wage equality, including manuals and operating documents and/or procedures, guidelines, guides for the allocation of compensation based on performance assessment, all of which are disaggregated by wages, categories and sex. The procedures undertaken within the framework of the Standard include internal hearings and supervision, which are overseen and undertaken by both the workplace and by certifying bodies outside the Federal Government, in accordance with the applicable provisions.

With regard to progress in the revision of the Standard, it should be recalled that the Interinstitutional Council for NMX-025, composed of the Secretariat for Labour and Social Welfare, the National Institute of Women and the National Council for the Prevention of Discrimination, already has earlier work undertaken with similar aims during the presentation of the draft Standard on Labour Equality and Non-Discrimination to the Office of the Secretary for the Economy. The principal purpose is the establishment of the requirements to ensure that public, private and social workplaces, irrespective of their sector and size, integrate, implement and execute, within the context of their management and human resources procedures, practices that are free from violence, with wage equality between men and women, and without discrimination, and which promote the comprehensive development of women and men workers. With a view to completing the formal transformation of the NMX into a Standard, it is necessary to follow certain relevant normative procedures which form part of this process, including issuing the Regulations of the Act on Quality Infrastructure, which will set out the specific rules on the basis of which the Interinstitutional Council of the NMX will implement the change in this procedure.

Finally, it should be emphasized that, with a view to improving the quality of the labour environment in Mexico and ensuring compliance with national and international labour standards, on 8 March 2024, the Secretariat for Labour and Social Welfare submitted the Protocol for Labour Inspection from a Gender Perspective. The Protocol is a tool that provides guidance on the normative scope and action available to the labour authorities for the establishment of the criteria governing inspection at the workplace. The key indicators envisaged by the Protocol include the verification of wage equality between men and women, the existence of measures to prevent and combat violence and sexual harassment, as well as safe conditions of work for pregnant and nursing women. The implementation of equality and non-discrimination policies are also covered by the internal rules of workplaces. The inclusion of the gender perspective in labour inspection will make it possible to assess the situation in relation to compliance with the labour rights of women and men, and give visibility to the needs and specific action required to ensure for all women workers the effective exercise of their labour rights from a gender perspective. It will also make it possible to observe gender gaps in labour conditions with a view to the adoption of the relevant inspection measures to promote their reduction. Moreover, it is hoped that the accumulation of strategic information on labour inspection will be used to take decisions, such as the adoption and implementation of measures to ensure progress towards gender equality in the effective exercise of the labour rights of men and women.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the Government representative of Mexico, Head of the Labour Policy and Institutional Relations Unit, Ministry of Labour and Social Security, to take the floor.

Government representative – I will begin this intervention by recalling Mexico's commitment to the International Labour Organization, the standards supervisory system and the Conventions ratified by our country.

As of now, of the 191 Conventions adopted by the ILO, Mexico has ratified 82, and 10 of the 11 considered to be fundamental.

During the present administration of President Andrés Manuel López Obrador, Mexico has made substantial progress in compliance with its commitment to the elimination of discrimination in employment and occupation.

In this area, which is related to the Convention, that was ratified by our country in 1952, the Government notes that the Committee of Experts has noted on occasion the efforts made to reduce the wage gap and has noted with interest the initiatives taken by the legislative authorities to strengthen those efforts.

In consideration of this, as well as the labour reforms and the direction taken by public policy for the dignity and well-being of workers in our country, our attention is drawn to the fact that the individual case of Mexico is being examined by the Committee today.

Nevertheless, we see this as an opportunity to exchange information on the most relevant achievements and future challenges in the implementation of the commitments taken on by the Government in relation to the Convention.

As will be indicated below, the achievements are quantifiable, have been assessed and have largely been achieved through tripartite social dialogue and coordination between the various Government authorities and levels.

These results can be set out under three headings: legislative reforms, public policies and voluntary mechanisms promoted by the Government.

In that order, we will first describe the reforms adopted to the national legislation to promote equal remuneration.

As from 2019, Mexican labour legislation has endorsed full respect for the human dignity of workers and prohibits discrimination. Among other conditions, it guarantees access to a remunerative wage and respect for the collective and individual rights of workers.

In 2021, the requirement was established that the minimum wage shall be sufficient to meet the normal material, social and cultural needs of a family, and added that the annual adjustment of the minimum wage rates shall never be below the inflation rate, which has a direct impact in terms of improving the remuneration of workers.

A policy was also adopted of the gender perspective, equality and non-discrimination so as to ensure that, under equal conditions, perceptions are the same for women and men in the public service.

In 2022, provisions were included in the General Act for equality between men and women, and in 33 federal, general and secondary legislative texts guaranteeing access to the same possibilities and opportunities in the use, control and benefits derived from enterprise assets, services and resources, and in decision-making.

It should be noted that, although measures have not been finalized to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, as set out in the Convention, the recent changes in the labour legislation reflect the Government's commitment to the implementation of the principle of non-discrimination in employment and the elimination of gender gaps, and more specifically the wage gap.

This is demonstrated by the fact that dialogue is still active in Mexico to promote progress in the achievement of substantive equality in the labour market. The dialogue has resulted in an initiative for the reform of 13 laws, which has been approved by the upper chamber, and its full approval by the Congress will be sought during the second legislative period, thereby giving full expression in the national legislation to the provisions of the international instrument that we are discussing today.

This reform initiative will strengthen the existing legislation in Mexico on equality of remuneration, as already indicated, and also the principle set out in article 123 of the Constitution and sections 2 and 86 of the Federal Labour Act, which provides that "wages shall be equal for equal work, without taking the sex of the worker into account", and discrimination is prohibited on grounds of gender for worthy and decent work.

Moreover, as indicated earlier, the Government is adopting public policies and developing activities to promote the achievement of worthy and decent work, and the elimination of gender gaps in the labour market.

Both the National Policy for Equality between Women and Men, and the National Programme for Equality between Women and Men, the establishment of gender units in Government institutions and the earmarked federal budget have promoted the inclusion of the gender perspective and equality and non-discrimination in the work of the three Government authorities and orders.

In accordance with the guiding principle of the National Development Plan “not to leave anyone behind, not to leave anyone outside”, the specific needs have been addressed of vulnerable groups from a human rights and gender intersectionality and transversality perspective.

The Government is therefore convinced that, to democratize the world of work, women must occupy central positions in the leadership of trade unions. For that reason, as part of the labour reform in relation to labour justice, freedom of association and collective bargaining, in 2019 the requirement was introduced for the executive bodies of trade unions, when first established or upon renewal, to comply with proportional gender representation.

Through the promotion of women’s participation in collective bargaining, the election of their representatives, reporting and the inclusion of the gender perspective in the life of trade unions, the development of labour is guaranteed under just and equitable conditions with a view to the elimination of gender gaps.

Similarly, during the present administration, there has been a progressive and historic increase in the minimum wage, year after year, which has had a substantive positive effect on reducing the remuneration gap between men and women.

Since 2019, general and occupational minimum wages have undergone responsible and sustained increases.

Through these increases, the minimum wage has recovered 116 per cent of its purchasing power at the national level, and 226 per cent along the northern border, benefiting workers with the lowest earnings and their families. Mexico is at the head of the world list of increases in the minimum wage.

It is important to recall that the minimum wage rate is agreed through negotiations and agreement between the representatives of employers, workers and the Federal Government. This process is carried out in a manner that ensures coherence between the provisions of the national legislation and the economic and social conditions of the country, therefore facilitating equity and justice between the factors of production, in a context of respect for the dignity of workers and their families.

The proposals that the Government makes to the social partners in relation to wages are based on technical studies evaluating the economic branch or activity, the occupation or trade and, in the case of wage increases, the impact of past wage increases on inflation, employment, poverty, the gender gap and the macroeconomic situation.

Those who have most benefited from this minimum wage policy are women:

- Women registered with the social security system have seen their average wages rise by 5.9 per cent a year.

- Between the end of 2018 and now, the average wages of women have increased by 22.6 per cent.
- The increases in minimum wages between 2019 and 2024 had the effect of reducing the gender wage gap by 27.7 per cent at the municipal level in the formal sector, and it should be emphasized that the impact has been greater in municipal areas where the poorest women live, where the gender wage gap has fallen by 63.8 per cent.
- The gender gap in income from labour, which includes income in addition to wages, such as the Christmas bonus, shares in enterprise earnings, overtime pay, commissions and tips, fell by 3.4 percentage points.
- The increase in minimum wages has also resulted in a decrease in the working poor to the lowest level since 2007.
- Of the 5.1 million people who escaped poverty between 2018 and 2022, some 4.1 million can be attributed exclusively to the increases in the minimum wage.

On the other hand, with a view to improving the quality of the labour situation in Mexico and ensuring compliance with national and international labour standards, on 8 March this year a Protocol was submitted on labour inspection from a gender perspective.

The key indicators covered by the Protocol include the monitoring of wage equality between men and women, the adoption of measures to prevent and address violence and sexual harassment, as well as safe conditions of work for pregnant and breastfeeding women.

Moreover, the implementation is reviewed of equality and non-discrimination policies in the internal rules of workplaces.

The inclusion of the gender perspective in labour inspection will make it possible to assess the situation in relation to compliance with the labour rights of women and men, and to give visibility to the specific needs and action to be taken to guarantee the effective exercise of the labour rights of women and men.

It will also make it possible to observe gaps in labour conditions for reasons of gender with a view to the adoption of inspection measures with a view to closing such gaps.

The integration of the gender perspective in labour inspection will make it possible to assess the situation of compliance with the labour rights of women and men, and provide visibility to the needs and specific action to be taken to ensure the effective exercise of labour rights from a gender perspective.

Finally, we refer here to voluntary measures promoted by the Government, and particularly Official Mexican Standard NMX-025 on Labour Equality and Non-discrimination, the System for the accreditation of good labour practices and decent work and the efforts made at the state level to reduce the wage gap.

Official Mexican Standard NMX-025 on Labour Equality and Non-discrimination covers public, private and social workplaces with a view to the integration, implementation and execution, in their human resources management processes, of labour equality and non-discrimination practices. Among the requirements for certification are guaranteeing equality of wages, representation and compensation.

As of May 2024, a total of 652 workplaces had been certified, benefiting 975,049 workers, of whom 54.6 per cent are women. This data can be viewed in the National Register of Workplaces Certified under the Standard, which demonstrates the continuing certification of workplaces.

The Government is continuing to work on the revision of the Standard, based on the adaptation of the measurement methodology used in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, which has been shared with Mexico, with a view to the measurement of the wage gap using a practical and simple methodology and the development of strategies and action to narrow the wage gap in organizations.

Furthermore, during the present administration, a system has been developed for the accreditation of good labour practices and decent work, which allows workplaces to declare their level of compliance with labour standards, including equality and non-discrimination, to be certified in relation to practices which go beyond the legal requirements and to receive support for the implementation of occupational safety and health management systems. For its development and implementation, a conceptual link was developed with other international standards, such as ISO 26 000 and World Bank Performance Standard 2.

In Mexico, efforts are also being made at the state level to promote and provide incentives for the implementation of practices and policies that promote a reduction in the wage gap through responsible labour labels.

In summary, the Government has taken multiple substantial forms of action in accordance with the Convention. With these results and those to come, Mexico is seeking to ensure in practice that women and men receive equal remuneration for work of equal value and that discriminatory practices are eliminated at the workplace. In this regard, we hope that the Committee will recognize in its conclusions that the progress described constitutes a case of progress in the application of the provisions of the Convention.

Finally, we should emphasize that, since it was confirmed that the case of Mexico would be examined by the Committee, we have approached the social partners, within the context of the Conference, to hear their concerns and to ensure that they are used as inputs to guide the Government's future action.

In this regard, as a further demonstration of Mexico's commitment to the ILO and its standards supervisory system, and our belief in social dialogue, we welcome the exchange of views in the Committee today and the possibility of ILO technical assistance.

Employer members – In the first place, we wish to thank the Government for the written and oral information provided on compliance in law and practice with the Convention. In line with usual practice, we wish to provide contextual information to assist in understanding the case.

This is the first occasion on which this case has been examined by the Committee. Mexico ratified the Convention in 1952, and the Committee of Experts has made observations on this subject on ten occasions, with the latest observations being made in 2023, in which note was taken of the Government's reports and the observations made by employers and workers.

Before looking more closely at the comments of the Committee of Experts, we wish to place emphasis on the importance of the Convention as one of the ten fundamental Conventions. The Convention requires States to promote and, in so far as is possible, ensure the application to all workers of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value. In this regard, it is important to bear in mind the provisions of Article 4, which sets out the requirement for States to cooperate "as appropriate with the employers' and workers' organisations concerned for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of this Convention."

For the Employers, compliance with this Convention is of the greatest importance for the promotion of equal remuneration for men and women, and also to retain and attract talent, contribute to sustainable development and gender equality in the world of work.

In this specific case, it should be noted that the Committee of Experts refers to the application of Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention, which establish the principle of equal remuneration for men and women workers, and the objective appraisal of jobs.

In the first place, the Committee of Experts noted that section 86 of the Federal Labour Act provides that there shall be equal pay for equal work performed in the same post, the same working day and conditions of efficiency.

The Committee of Experts has recalled in this respect that the legislation should not only provide for equal remuneration for "equal", "the same" or "similar" work, but should also address situations where men and women perform different work that is nevertheless of the same value.

In this regard, the Committee of Experts considers that this provision is not adequately reflected in Mexican legislation. More specifically, in 2020, the Committee of Experts requested the Government to take measures to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. In view of the above, the Employers consider it necessary to assess compliance with these Articles of the Convention in light of the whole legislative framework in Mexico.

Mexico has much legislation on the subject, which would appear to have accurately transposed the provisions of the Convention. This is seen in the first article of the Mexican Constitution (the Chapter on human rights and their guarantees), which prohibits any discrimination on a series of grounds, including gender. Similarly, article 4 provides that "Women and men shall be equal before the law", and article 123 specifies that "there shall be equal pay for equal work, without taking into account sex or nationality".

The constitutional framework in Mexico is sufficiently broad to give the most solid guarantees against any type of discrimination on grounds of sex, including wages.

Mexico also has the Federal Labour Act, which provides in section 2 that: "men and women workers shall enjoy substantive and material equality in relation to the employer", and that substantive equality "consists of access to the same opportunities, taking into consideration the biological, social and cultural differences between women and men". Section 3 of the Act provides that labour is not a commercial commodity and requires "recognition of the differences between men and women with a view to achieving their equality before the law.

For this reason, the Employers consider that Mexican legislation broadly sets out the requirement of the Convention and that it promotes equality of opportunity for men and women. Nevertheless, much remains to be done in practice for the implementation of the Convention, particularly in relation to wage equality.

According to recent information, women who work are at a clear disadvantage in respect of men, since their annual average income is 54.5 per cent lower, the third highest gender wage gap in the 37 countries that are ILO Members in the region.

According to the global gender gap index 2023, wage disparity is the second worst condition assessed in Mexico for women. In general terms, the country is in 33rd place in the global ranking which covers 146 economies. However, in relation to wage equality for similar work, it is in 117th position.

We wish to emphasize that it is not sufficient for the Government to ratify standards and include them in the legislation, if there is no effective implementation in practice giving specific and measurable results.

Second, in the recent comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has been requested to provide information on progress in the reform of Mexican Official Standard NMX-025 and the measures adopted for its enforcement. In this regard, we thank the Government for the information provided on the progress of the draft Standard on Labour Equality, which has still not yet been submitted to the Secretariat for the Economy, and we recall the importance of ensuring effective consultation with employers and workers for the development of a proposal that reflects genuine social dialogue.

As maintained in this Committee, the sustainability and effectiveness of labour market policies are dependent on the effective consultation of the representative organizations of employers and workers.

Finally, we recognize the abundant legislation in Mexico for the application of the Convention and the measures adopted by the Government to achieve its implementation in practice.

In particular, we note with interest the statistical information provided to the Committee. We call on the Government to make greater efforts to give effect to the Convention in practice and to continue making progress in the reduction of the wage gap between men and women.

We also request the Government to ensure that the legislative amendments and reforms that are proposed are developed through social dialogue and consultation of the most representative social partners, and to continue with the compilation of statistical data and the reinforcement of labour inspection.

Worker members – We thank the Government for the information provided to the Committee. This is the first occasion on which we have examined a case concerning Mexico in relation to the Convention. The last time we examined a case concerning the country was in 2018, in relation to the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

We note the information provided by the Government on the approval by the Senate and the referral to the Chamber of Deputies of the draft Decree to reform 13 laws on wage equality, including:

- section 86 of the Federal labour Act to recognize “equal remuneration for work of equal value”; and
- section 6 of the General Act on the access of women to a life free from violence, to include in economic violence “the receipt of a low wage for equal work or work of equal value”.

Although these legislative reforms have the potential to remedy the current deficiencies in relation to the Convention, the necessary changes have not yet materialized.

Labour relations in Mexico are currently based on the principle of “equal wages for equal work”, without taking into consideration the “value of work” as a crucial factor in the determination of remuneration.

This principle is set out in the Constitution, especially in article 123(A)(VII), which envisages the principle as a guarantee for the protection of wages, and provides that “equal wages shall be paid for equal work, without taking into account sex or nationality”.

However, this provision is limited to guaranteeing similar remuneration for “equal” work, without specifying what is meant by equality, and without recognizing that gender must not influence the wage rate.

The Federal Labour Act, which fills out the minimum rights set out in the Constitution, specifies what is meant by equal work in section 86, which provides that: “there shall be equal pay for equal work, performed in the same post, the same working day and conditions of efficiency”.

It should be noted that there has not been any modification of the wording of section 86, for which reason the “value of work” is still not taken into consideration in the determination of wages.

We know the importance of the concept of work of equal value for the ILO, and I quote literally:

The “principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value”, as set out in the Preamble to the ILO Constitution, is not the same as equal remuneration for equal work. Equal remuneration for the same work limits the application of the principle of equal remuneration to work carried out by two or more persons in the same type of work and in the same enterprise.

The concept of equal remuneration for work of equal value is broader and includes situations in which men and women perform different jobs. With a view to determining whether different types of work are of the same value, work can be assessed through the application of a method of evaluation”.

Based on a literal interpretation, the Federal Labour Act is in line with the Constitutional principle of “equal wages for equal work”. However, an interpretation that takes into account the principles of the Convention would offer greater protection for men and women workers, with the wording adapted more precisely to set out the scope of the principle of equality, in line with international standards and allowing the inclusion of the “value of work” in its daily application.

Lack of knowledge of what is implied by work of equal value is very general, including employers, workers’ organizations and, regrettably, also the courts. However, as I have said, up to now no binding criteria have been adopted which faithfully reflect the provisions of the Convention.

The most common criteria for the establishment of the similarity of jobs are working hours and efficiency, even though we know that different work can have equal value irrespective of skill, effort, responsibilities and conditions of work.

Moreover, the labour authorities do not provide appropriate advice, nor do they apply these criteria in the annual determination of minimum wages or the salaries of public officials, as indicated in the Equal Remuneration Recommendation, 1951 (No. 90).

The inclusion of the specification “work of equal value” in the legislation and in the practical application of the principle of equality would make it possible to improve conditions for the effective reduction of the wage gap between men and women. And, even though the Government indicates that this gap has narrowed, analysis is still needed of the behaviour of the gap at a more disaggregated level than that set out in the Mexican report.

It is crucial that efforts are made for the introduction of the necessary changes to ensure the effective application of the Convention in Mexico.

Employer member, Mexico – Many thanks to the Government for the information that it has provided to the Committee in relation to the comments made by the Committee of Experts in its latest report. These comments amount to no more than a paragraph, which appears on page 750 of the Spanish version.

We note with interest the reference to article 123 of the Constitution which, by the way, dates from 1917 and was the first to elevate social guarantees linked to work and social welfare to constitutional status. Before the Convention under discussion had even been drafted, the Constitution contained protection for equal remuneration, with article 123(VII) providing that “there shall be equal pay for equal work”. Just a few years later, the words “without taking into account sex or nationality” were added.

Clearly, such protection is guaranteed by law, specifically in the Federal Labour Act, to which previous speakers have referred. I wish to emphasize, however, that the Act sets out a series of protections. First, decent work is addressed in section 2, which provides emphatically that there shall be no discrimination on grounds of ethnic origin, nationality, gender, age, disability, social condition, health, religion, migratory situation, opinion or sexual preference, or civil status, as can be read in that provision.

Moreover, section 5 provides that any condition that requires workers to give up the rights or prerogatives granted to them by the legislation shall have no legal effect and shall not hinder their enjoyment or exercise of such rights. This is an extremely important guarantee which is implemented in my country.

Lastly, section 86 echoes the Constitution, with the updated text establishing that “there shall be equal pay for equal work performed in the same post, the same working day and conditions of efficiency”.

It must therefore be recognized that my country’s constitutional and legal provisions are aligned with the protections granted by the Convention. I would even go so far as to say that the Mexican texts are clearer than the Convention with regard to equal remuneration protections.

It is likely that the Committee, unaware of this background or circumstances, was struck by the proposed reform to the Federal Labour Act submitted to Congress that incorporated literally the idea of “work of equal value”, in line with the Convention, without noting that such reforms are not truly necessary. We believe that the text currently in force fits with the Convention’s objectives. However, everything can be improved, although I repeat that in this case we at least do not believe it to be essential. What is required, in any case, is the effective implementation of the existing provisions.

We cannot ignore the fact that in Mexico, as in all other countries of the world, there is a wage gap affecting women. However, and although public policies have been introduced to reduce the gap, we must recognize that the gap is linked mainly to the informal economy, in which approximately 56 per cent of my country’s economically active population are engaged. Therefore, rather than legislative amendments which, as we have seen, may not be indispensable, what is required is the continuation of the action taken to close the gap and the redoubling of efforts to implement effective policies on the transition to formality, which would undoubtedly have an impact on closing existing wage gaps, among other areas.

Given the circumstances, we believe that note should be taken of the report provided by the Government and of the legal situation in relation to the content of this Convention, and the Government should be encouraged, in consultation with the country's most representative social partners, to make progress in developing effective policies that address the causes and roots of these wage gaps. Of course, we commend the Government's request for technical assistance from the Office. We know that the Office can play a significant role in solving these problems through technical assistance, which we also welcome.

Worker member, Mexico – I am speaking on behalf of the National Union of Mexican Workers (UNT-MÉXICO) to report on the ongoing situation with regard to the principle of “equal pay for equal work” and its application, since this principle is not compatible with the Convention because the legislation does not include the principle of the value of work.

Although the 2019 labour reforms made progress on the independence of freedom of association and collective bargaining with participation in decision-making and the democratization of labour regulated by the Constitution and by international conventions, such as the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and the Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190), the major outstanding issue is the implementation of these reforms through adequate social dialogue that includes continuous and ongoing consultation with the most representative workers' organizations.

At the same time, we emphasize the Government's failure to comply with the Convention, which includes its inadequate reporting mechanism, as we have encountered difficulties on several occasions in dealing with issues arising from the mechanism implemented by the Government.

We would like to indicate that the Government has yet to adopt legislative measures to fulfil the Committee's recommendations on ensuring wage equality not only for the same work, but also for work of equal value.

The failure to regulate the principle of work of equal value permeates the Mexican judiciary's current restrictive interpretation, which draws solely on the concepts of the working day and productivity, omitting factors such as care work, skills, responsibilities, effort and working conditions, which should be considered irrespective of job titles and free from gender stereotypes, among other elements that are essential in determining the true value of work. For that reason, legislative harmonization should include the reform of article 123(A)(VII) of the Constitution, which provides that “there shall be equal pay for equal work, without taking into account sex or nationality”, and not be limited to section 86 of the Federal Labour Act, which provides that “there shall be equal pay for equal work performed in the same post, the same working day and conditions of efficiency”.

Moreover, it is a matter of concern that there are no indices, statistics or measurements to determine wage gaps by occupation and gender in Mexico, and especially that the labour authorities do not provide suitable guidance on the subject or use job evaluation criteria when fixing annual minimum wages for the various occupations and trades in the private sector or the wages of public officials, as indicated in Recommendation No. 90.

It is vital that the rights and benefits established in collective labour agreements are fully compatible with human rights related to work, equality and non-discrimination, as well as the principle of work of equal value.

In the private sector, a mechanism has been established to determine minimum and occupational wage increases under the auspices of the National Minimum Wage Board (CONASAMI), a body that, although tripartite, lacks rules on equal membership and the chairperson.

This means that women do not enjoy constant representation and are unable to ensure that the determination of wages and the value of work includes a gender approach and considers the necessary indices and factors.

Although the CONASAMI has made gradual and significant increases to minimum wages over the past six years, that has not led to a closing of the wage gap, as the minimum wage, as its name suggests, establishes the minimum that workers can receive. The only requirement applicable to employers is that they pay at least that minimum amount, and they can make distinctions that allow some workers to earn more.

In addition, without the existence of real inspection to ensure that all workers receive the same amount for similar work, and the fact that wage increases in some workplaces are linked to productivity or earned through overtime, higher wages become inaccessible to women in view of their family responsibilities or lack of vocational training.

Similarly, it is essential that factors such as the date of commencement of employment are not taken into consideration when establishing the collective labour contract and the applicable benefits. Making such aspects determining factors enshrines discrimination and the renunciation of labour rights, and they should not therefore be taken into account.

There is an urgent need for a new labour inspection process, which should make use of tools and instruments that allow trade unions and workers to lodge complaints and the labour inspectorate to effectively investigate and sanction any violation of labour rights. In this regard, we would like to inform you that, since the constitutional reform of 2016, minimum wages have been removed as a reference for various prices, procedures, fines, taxes and benefits. This was intended to increase the purchasing power of minimum wages by gradually clawing back the loss accumulated over more than 40 years.

This change was a significant part of our country's economic policy to improve the living conditions of millions of workers. However, more than eight years later, we find ourselves in a complex situation. Even though minimum wages in Mexico have seen increases above the annual rate of inflation, this progress has had a worrying collateral effect in the form of the stagnation of wages fixed by collective bargaining.

In general, these wages have not increased at the same pace as inflation and have even, alarmingly, fallen below the minimum wage. Each year, the CONASAMI issues a decision setting general and occupational wages.

The decision for 2024 provides for a rise of 20 per cent in the minimum wage, comprising a 6 per cent increase, plus a separate increase of 27.20 Mexican pesos, or US$1.90. This is a set amount intended only to help restore the purchasing power of the minimum wage, but which cannot be used as a reference for the determination of increases to other wages in the labour market, including contractual wages.

This restriction, which applies to both the public and private sectors, is a direct obstacle to increases to contractual wages through collective bargaining. It has had a striking effect on public universities in Mexico, where contractual wages have not risen in proportion to the general minimum wage. In addition, the reduction in the higher education budget has exacerbated the situation, as there has been no significant change to the education budget over the past decade.

In the private sector, outsourcing has resulted in workers who lose their jobs and are taken over by contracting enterprises receiving lower remuneration than workers who are covered by collective agreements.

This is leading to systematic discrimination that is in contradiction to the principles of decent work, such as the right to receive a remunerative wage and to collective bargaining. This systematic violation of labour rights is a disincentive to trade union membership and collective bargaining, and creates a paradoxical situation in which it appears to be more beneficial not to have a collective labour contract.

We must recall that Recommendation No. 90 suggests several measures to raise the productive efficiency of women workers, as a means of facilitating the application of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value. These include promotion, equality of facilities for vocational guidance, vocational training and placement, and the provision of social services that meet the needs of working mothers and women with family responsibilities.

Although the current Government has provided significant support to the feminist agenda, there has been little promotional action or information on the wage gap and the proper application of the principle of equal remuneration, or on mechanisms to render it binding. And there is no national care system, which ensures not only that women are continuing to provide most care, and in so doing giving up work and work opportunities, and the possibility of achieving better positions and pay.

Although Mexico has seen a historic transformation with the election of its first woman President, who will have majority support in the legislature, there is an urgent need for ILO technical support to improve genuine and effective social dialogue between the Government, trade unions and employers.

It is necessary to create an annual database using an appropriate methodology as a means of guiding the necessary constitutional reforms and legislative amendments and the design of institutions that are capable of determining the value of work and upholding the principles of the Convention and of Recommendation No. 90.

Government member, Chile, speaking on behalf of the group of Latin American and Caribbean countries (GRULAC) – We appreciate the information provided by the Government of Mexico on the measures promoted to achieve substantive equality between women and men on the labour market, and specifically to ensure equal remuneration.

We take note of the congruence between the legislative changes promoted in recent years and the public policies on labour matters implemented by the Government of Mexico for the achievement of a reduction in the gender wage gap and the recovery of the purchasing power of minimum wages, with a positive impact on women.

We observe with interest the actions aimed at verifying compliance with labour legislation in relation to the provisions of the Convention, and particularly the recent launch of the Protocol on labour inspection with a gender perspective.

We also take note of the development and promotion of the various voluntary instruments to foster a working culture aimed at guaranteeing equality of opportunity and treatment, non-discrimination and labour inclusion.

We urge the Government of Mexico to continue its efforts, social dialogue and coordination between authorities and levels of Government to ensure that the principle of equal remuneration is adopted in all economic sectors and activities.

Finally, GRULAC urges the ILO to provide the assistance that, at the request of the Government and the social partners, is required to consolidate the results of the progress described by the Government of Mexico.

Employer member, Argentina – The Employer members of Argentina thank the Government for the information provided and its commitment to complying with the Convention that we are discussing.

First, we wish to highlight the importance of the Convention as a fundamental Convention and our firm commitment to wage equality between women and men.

In particular, we believe that in this case it is necessary to emphasize the importance of the provisions of Article 4 of the Convention on the duty of States to cooperate as appropriate with employers' and workers' organizations for the purpose of giving effect to its provisions.

We note that the Government has provided information on the preparation of a number of legislative amendments intended to integrate the principle of gender equality into the national legislation, and the mechanisms for the supervision and revision of public policies.

We have listened carefully to the information provided by the Government on social dialogue forums with employers' and workers' organizations to define the various measures promoted, and we request it to provide further information on the manner in which it is cooperating with employers' and workers' organizations in this regard.

We encourage the Government to make its best efforts at the national level to further close the wage gap between women and men in practice and to ensure effective institutionalized consultation with the social partners on the design, implementation, review and follow-up of such policies as a means of ensuring the design of effective and balanced strategies.

Worker member, Peru – I am speaking on behalf of the workers of the Autonomous Workers' Confederation of Peru. The right to receive equal remuneration is related to the prohibition of discrimination, as set out in international standards. The Convention, which was ratified by Mexico in 1952, regulates the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value, not work that is identical. The Government has had more than 70 years to implement the Convention through its national legislation. Section 86 of the Federal Labour Act provides that "there shall be equal pay for equal work performed in the same post, the same working day and conditions of efficiency".

As we can see, this regulation places conditions and restrictions on the principle, limiting it to a matter of working days and efficiency rather than the value of the work itself. Legislative harmonization with the provisions of the Convention is therefore required.

In addition, it is important to note that the conditions imposed by this provision particularly affect women, who often become mothers during their working lives and do not work full time when they take the leave to which they are entitled, and do not therefore have the same productivity as others because they are temporarily away from work. That is to say, the fact of exercising their rights as working mothers can be prejudicial to their remuneration.

Article 4 of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women requires States to implement temporary special measures aimed at accelerating de facto equality between men and women. In this regard, States are not therefore expected to refrain from taking action or to remain neutral in relation to the gender wage gap, but on the contrary to create the necessary conditions to resolve any situation of inequality that may arise.

The Government should therefore undertake studies of wage gaps in accordance with the provisions of the Convention in order to identify and rectify wage discrimination and determine the real value of work.

For that purpose, the Government could adopt legislation with a view to achieving target 8.5 of the Sustainable Development Goals, which focuses on equal pay for women and men for work of equal value, for which it can count on the technical assistance of the ILO.

Lastly, we welcome the Government's confirmation of the Protocol on labour inspection with a gender perspective, which should have been the subject of consultation with the constituents. Such a document cannot be drafted by the Government alone, but must be agreed upon following dialogue and the exchange of views to ensure that it is more effective in practice.

Furthermore, we believe that the inspection system must be strengthened, not only through texts, but also through the recruitment of a sufficient number of labour inspectors. Moreover, if there is a specialized protocol, a body should be created that is specialized in equality and non-discrimination to verify compliance with national and international standards.

An inspection system with sufficient numbers of inspectors. In 2020, there was one inspector for every 160,000 workers, four times lower than the number recommended by the ILO. That year, there were a total of 400 inspectors. With regard to inspection, there is much work to be done in these areas, and we need the political will, budget and desire to improve, and what better in that regard than social dialogue?

Worker member, Spain – This is a Convention of which the genuine application depends on the whole Mexican population, as the principle of equal pay for men and women for work of equal value concerns the country as a whole, not just women. We all, women and men, gain when progress is made on equality in a country, whether in Mexico, Spain or Costa Rica.

Fairness in remuneration concerns us all: Governments, employers and workers. Violence against women, whether physical, psychological or financial, is a global scourge. And anyone who uses it for anything other than its eradication deserves the greatest contempt.

Mexico has one of the widest wage gaps of the countries of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD), at around 35 per cent. Furthermore, and as in many other parts of the world, Mexican women are engaged in work and sectors that are worse paid than those of their male colleagues.

As well we know in Spain, and as has been mentioned, for the elimination of the wage gap, it is first necessary to undertake a detailed study based on data disaggregated by gender, economic activity, age, occupational category, benefits, working hours, as well as figures for undesired part-time work.

The Mexican trade unions have made enormous strides in the area of equality, as has the Government, to which I will refer later. The figures however show that it is employers who have done the least. Certification of adherence to the Mexican Standard on Labour Equality and Non-Discrimination, which is voluntary, and could include this data, is a good example. We are surprised to see that, of the 604 certified workplaces, only half are private, which provides a good picture of the true interest of the private sector. Only 300 private workplaces in Mexico have decided to take the principle of "equal pay for work of equal value" seriously.

When the Government, in accordance with Article 4, as just recalled by the Employers, calls on employers to combat discrimination, it seems that they do not know, and do not want to know, what is happening, or why, or what work and jobs are carried out by the women and men in their workforce. In short, Mexican employers do not want, voluntarily or as an obligation, official statistics, including a list of jobs and all the forms of remuneration, as set out in Article 1 of the Convention.

Curiously, when employers need to make mass redundancies, it seems that they have undertaken such studies and know perfectly well the jobs carried out by each worker, the bonuses that they receive, and have full information on the workforce.

I said at the outset that we must fight for equality, and the weak participation by employers in this initiative makes it clear that we need to make progress on legislation, not just voluntary measures, to secure the commitment of employers.

As we have seen, the Government has adopted some measures, although they are insufficient. It has adopted impressive increases to the minimum wage, which is received by more women than men, and any increase in the minimum wage leads to an immediate improvement in the living conditions of millions of women.

But more is needed because, despite the increases in the minimum wage, the reality shows, for example, that there is no equal pay for men and women in teaching and administrative roles in the education system, who undertake work of equal value.

Mexico is about to have the first woman President in a North American country. This is a unique opportunity to do things differently after years of companies failing to pay men and women equally for work of equal value, despite the Government's struggle to bring an end to such discrimination.

I therefore urge this Committee to call for technical assistance, and I encourage the new President to promote collective bargaining to pursue the legal mandate set out in section 153-K(XIV) of the Federal Labour Act and amend the restrictive constitutional and legal provisions so that Mexico is in full compliance with the Convention.

Employer member, Costa Rica – First, the employers of Costa Rica would like to thank the Government for the information provided to this Committee on its compliance with the Convention.

As our spokesperson has indicated, the Employer members emphasize the enormous significance of the Convention, an instrument that seeks to ensure that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value is applied to all workers.

The Convention is one of the so-called fundamental Conventions which, as the Office itself points out, are “fundamental to the rights of human beings at work, irrespective of the level of development of individual Member States. These rights are a precondition for all the others in that they provide a necessary framework from which to strive freely for the improvement of individual and collective conditions of work.”

Our societies must make firm progress towards closing gender gaps in the world of work. We need to promote reforms to the legal framework and adopt the public policies necessary to avoid discrimination against women in the world of work, within the framework of tripartism and social dialogue.

We believe that the Mexican legislation affords a suitable and reasonable level of protection for the principle of equal remuneration since, as has been noted previously, the Constitution itself guarantees equality before the law for men and women and, more specifically, provides that there shall be equal pay for equal work, irrespective of sex or nationality.

The Government has also provided information on the progress made in the review of Mexican Official Standard NMX-025 and other legislative and administrative measures that, in our view, demonstrate progress in the implementation of the Convention.

In conclusion, we urge the Government to pursue its efforts to strengthen the legislation, and particularly to achieve better and more effective implementation in practice, always within a framework of direct consultation and dialogue with the most representative social partners.

Worker member, Honduras – We note that, after six years, Mexico has once again been included on the short list for this Committee. It is vital that the Committee reminds the Mexican Government that by freely choosing to join the ILO, it has accepted the principles and rights set out in the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia, committing itself to meeting its general objectives, including freedom of association, collective bargaining and the fundamental principle of equal remuneration.

In accordance with Article 2 of the Convention, the principle of “work of equal value” must be applied by means of collective agreements. We recognize that in Mexico there has been progress in the legal provisions respecting collective bargaining. Nevertheless, the 2019 labour reforms were undertaken without due social dialogue or consultation of workers. This is reflected in various aspects, such as the failure to implement legislative measures intended to ensure compliance with the Committee’s recommendations.

Women in Mexico face significant barriers in access to management and senior management positions, which contributes to wage inequality. Posts with more responsibility, which are better paid, are often held principally by men. A 2022 OECD study found that just 10 per cent of directors of finance and 21 per cent of directors in enterprise legal departments have been women. And it should not be forgotten that women are predominantly occupied in sectors such as education, health and social work where, significantly, wages are traditionally lower than in sectors such as engineering and information technology, which are dominated by men.

The lack of transparency in Government wage policies and the scarcity of data disaggregated by gender make it difficult to identify and eradicate wage discrimination and to determine the real value of work. Unless mechanisms able to monitor and report on wage differences are put in place as a matter of urgency, the violations of the Convention will persist and it will not be possible to address them effectively.

The limited Constitutional provision addressing this principle dates from 1917, and it is therefore worrying that 72 years after the ratification of the Convention, Mexican legislation has not included the principle of “work of equal value”, and even more worrying that the comments in the report are limited to acts of good faith and secondary reforms.

Observer, Confederation of Workers of the Universities of the Americas (CONTUA) – I am speaking on behalf of CONTUA with reference to the level of commitment of Mexico to compliance with the requirements of the Convention, which was adopted in 1951 and immediately afterwards, the next year, ratified by Mexico.

In this regard, we wish to start by recognizing the progress that has been achieved in social policy in Mexico over the past six years, which is undoubtedly reflected in the major election achieved by the recently elected President Claudia Sheinbaum, who will be the first woman in history to achieve such high office, and who has announced during her election campaign a policy of open arms to the trade union movement. We welcome her election and trust that she will honour her commitment.

The ILO Conventions on wages make up a comprehensive system that seeks to guarantee labour justice and equity throughout the world. Of these Conventions, we draw attention to Convention No. 100, which is under examination, as well as the Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131), and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

Convention No. 100 provides for equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value, thereby directly addressing the issue of wage discrimination on grounds of gender. Convention No. 131 promotes the fixing of adequate minimum wages, thereby ensuring that all workers receive remuneration that enables them to live with dignity, while Convention No. 111 combats discrimination in employment and occupation, including wage discrimination, on any grounds, including race, religion, political opinion and national extraction.

These Conventions do not operate in isolation. Together, they form a cohesive system which addresses various aspects of remuneration and equality at work. While Conventions Nos 100 and 111 are focused on the elimination of wage gaps and discrimination, Convention No. 131 ensures the existence of a minimum level of wages for all workers. This overall approach allows for fuller and more effective protection of labour rights, thereby promoting a just and equitable labour environment.

It is based on this overall vision of the standards system that we can make specific observations. In the countries in our region, there are major social deficits, injustices and inequalities, which in some cases affect very important categories of persons, despite the existence of national and international standards which require action to meet these needs.

In view of the above, we call on the Government to take urgent action to address the situation of university workers in Mexico.

Over and above the significant achievements in the application of policies which have resulted in increases in the minimum wage in Mexico, the contractual wages of university workers have not risen at the same pace, which has resulted in there currently being over 45,000 university workers with wages that are below the constitutional minimum.

This group of workers, who we have the honour of representing in CONTUA and Public Services International, are the only ones in the country in the public and private sectors who are in this situation. It is for this reason that we have been urging the allocation of the necessary budget to at least bring these workers level with the minimum wage rate set in Mexico, as a basis, of course, for reaching the right level.

We are calling on the Government representative here to establish an urgent dialogue round table to resolve this situation by granting dignified wage conditions for our colleagues.

Chairperson – I can see no more requests for the floor, so I now invite the Government representative of Mexico to deliver his concluding remarks.

Government representative – We give thanks for the views and positions expressed by the groups of the three ILO constituents in relation to this case. We have taken note of each of the views and positions expressed.

As we indicated in our first intervention, our Government has maintained a constant dialogue on this important subject with the representatives of workers and employers in Mexico, before and during this Conference. Our relations with them are close and our communication is constant.

The subject of equal remuneration is one of many themes in the world of work on which the three groups engage in dialogue and reach agreements, always respecting our differences and independence.

As you will have noted throughout the Conference, in this and other Committees, the workers, employers and Government of Mexico participate actively in dialogue, negotiations, drafting and amendments. The Mexican delegation demonstrates in the ILO a vigour and spirit of dialogue of which we are sincerely very proud.

With regard to the Convention, we wish to reaffirm six points that appear to us to be central on its application in Mexico and objectives for the future.

First, with regard to the Mexican national legislation, the labour legislation in Mexico has been reformed progressively to ensure that the application of the principle of equal remuneration at work is respected and given effect. This was said in the first intervention and the representatives of employers and workers have so indicated clearly and in detail.

We are convinced that, through continued dialogue on the path to be followed to give effect to the provisions of the Convention, we will be able to reach agreement on the next steps to be taken in the reform of the legislation. This will include the initiative to reform the Federal Labour Act and other provisions, which has already been approved in Congress in part, with a view to greater harmonization with the Convention.

Second, in relation to the reduction of the gender wage gap, we have described the manner in which the wage policy of the administration of President Andrés Manuel López Obrador, which is unprecedented in our country, has made a significant contribution to the reduction of the gender wage gap.

We have provided hard statistics on this. To repeat a fundamental fact, we noted that between 2019 and 2024 the gender wage gap was reduced by 27.7 per cent at the municipal level in the formal sector, and in municipal areas where the poorest women are resident, it fell by almost 64 per cent. This is the practical situation with regard to the wage gap in our country. Moreover, this achievement has demonstrated in practice that an increase to the minimum wage does not cause inflation or unemployment.

The data provided, from the National Survey of Employment and Occupation, as well as various surveys carried out by the National Minimum Wage Board, demonstrate the importance attached by the Government of Mexico to substantive equality between men and women, and more specifically in relation to remuneration.

It is important to recall that President López Obrador recently submitted to Congress a reform initiative to set out at the constitutional level the requirement to increase the minimum wage each year above the inflation rate.

Third, in relation to labour inspection from a gender perspective, we are aware that the efforts undertaken will have to be reinforced with monitoring of compliance with labour legislation. It is for that reason that labour inspection is being transformed. Over the past five years, inspection activities have been strengthened through the improvement of the tools available based on a new perspective which makes safeguarding the rights of workers and compliance with labour legislation central to the role of inspection.

Inspection is currently undertaken using all available technological, normative and information resources.

With regard to the content of the Convention, through the Protocol on labour inspection with a gender perspective, as we indicated previously, we will be able to analyse the current situation of the gender gap in employment, which will enable us to identify needs and specific action to be taken jointly with our social partners.

Fourth, with reference to voluntary action, progress has been made in Mexico in the strengthening and promotion of the framework of labour legislation to ensure that work is worthy and decent. Similarly, we will continue to promote a labour culture of knowledge and respect for human and labour rights with a focus on shared responsibility. This will be done through various voluntary mechanisms that will be adopted to enable both workplaces and those who are responsible for assessing the level of compliance with labour legislation to determine relevant areas and take the corresponding action. The example to which we referred previously, Mexican Standard No. 025, has led to clear and quantifiable progress, as indicated earlier. Tripartite discussion will continue on the development of this Standard to expand its scope, including the possibility of converting it into binding legislation.

On the other hand, dialogue will continue with state governments on existing mechanisms with a view to exploring areas for collaboration. And we will also continue the broad dissemination campaigns of labour rights, which have been initiated by the current administration, while at the same time promoting closer collaboration between employers and workers and guidance, legal advisory and training services.

Fifth, I would like to inform you that the ILO recently approached the Government of Mexico to invite it to join the Equal Pay International Coalition (EPIC), considering that our country is in compliance with nine of the eleven criteria adopted for membership by countries.

Although we have not yet joined the Coalition, Mexico's possible membership would offer an opportunity to strengthen the national gender and labour agendas, and to maximize the progress already made in these areas.

And sixth, with regard to tripartite co-responsibility, the consolidation of this progress requires working together for union and social justice to protect and safeguard the freedoms and rights of all workers. It is therefore necessary to continue to promote consultation and tripartite dialogue based on an approach of shared responsibilities of all the labour market parties.

This will enable us to develop common strategies to promote productivity and the stability of sources of employment, while at the same time guaranteeing and constantly improving the wages, benefits and working conditions of workers and cementing the constant improvement of the labour market in our country.

In conclusion, we wish to inform you that in Mexico we enjoy the social, economic and political stability necessary to be able to continue with social dialogue and to make progress with the future objectives that we have set in relation to the Convention.

As you know, one-and-a-half weeks ago, we held a historic election in Mexico, when for the first time a woman was elected to the highest elected office in our country, Ms Claudia Sheinbaum Pardo, who will be the President of Mexico from 1 October.

This implies continuity in the close relations with workers and employers and a transversal feminist agenda.

With the other Government authorities, both legislative and judicial, we will undoubtedly find common ground to pursue this agenda, more specifically with reference to equal remuneration for men and women, with a view to the definitive elimination of the gender wage gap.

As for now, we will receive attentively and respectfully the comments and recommendations of the Committee of Experts.

Worker members – We thank the Government of Mexico for the information provided to our Committee. We have listened carefully to the Government's intervention, and particularly its proposals for legislative changes to give effect to the Convention.

Despite the potential of these legislative reforms to remedy deficiencies in relation to international standards, they are not yet totally materialized. Labour relations in Mexico are currently based on the principle of equal wages for equal work, without the value of work being taken into consideration for the determination of remuneration.

The Constitution and the Federal Labour Act provide guarantees of similar remuneration for equal work, but do not specify what is meant by equality, nor do they recognize that gender must not have an influence on the level of wages.

The concept of equal remuneration for work of equal value, according to the ILO, is broader than equal remuneration for equal work. This concept includes situations in which men and women perform different jobs, and its application requires the evaluation of work activities through an appropriate method. However, the Federal Labour Act still has not incorporated this principle effectively.

An interpretation which integrates the principles of the Convention would provide greater protection to men and women workers, in line with international standards, and would allow the inclusion of the value of work in everyday practice.

The issue of work being of equal value affects men and women workers, employers and the courts, and it is necessary to set out a binding criterion that faithfully respects the provisions of the Convention. Similarly, the legislative guarantee of the joint composition of the National Minimum Wage Board is indispensable.

Nevertheless, we take note of the Government's commitment to tripartite dialogue and we therefore encourage it to take the following action: first, through social dialogue, to undertake an objective assessment of employment and wages in Mexico using the necessary technical methods that taken into account job descriptions, the classification of their content on the basis of factors such as skills, responsibilities, effort and conditions of work, irrespective of the job titles and free from gender stereotypes, among others; second, to engage in consultations with the social partners to improve the definition of labour inspection protocols; third, to continue promoting the necessary legislative reforms for the full inclusion of the principle of work of equal value into the Mexican Constitution and labour legislation, and adapt the respective Government institutions; fourth, to promote actively equal remuneration when it is not possible to ensure it directly; and fifth and finally, to continue taking into account ILO technical assistance.

We urge the Government to continue working on the implementation in practice of these reforms with a view to guaranteeing equal remuneration for work of equal value.

We appreciate the legislative progress made, but it is essential to make further efforts to ensure the effective application of the Convention in Mexico and accordingly reduce the wage gap between men and women.

Employer members – The Employers wish to thank the various speakers who have taken the floor, and particularly the Government of Mexico for its interventions and the information provided.

In our final observations, we wish to emphasize the importance of the Convention as a fundamental Convention and as an instrument for the promotion of equal remuneration for men and women, thereby contributing to sustainable development and gender equity in the world of work.

With reference to the interventions of certain speakers, we wish to clarify two points:

- (i) the minimum wage has been increased substantially in Mexico as a result of the agreement concluded between employers and workers which has supported and accompanied the Government. These increases started in 2017 and have continued up to now; and
- (ii) the CONASAMI currently includes women in its composition. Indeed, 50 per cent (that is, 19 members) are women and they participate actively in the definition of the minimum wage in Mexico.

We also recall that that the Committee that brings us together today is called upon to assess compliance with a Convention by the Government, not the private sector.

On the other hand, we take note of the initiatives described by the Government and the progress that has been made in achieving compliance with the Convention.

The Employer members conclude that the legislation that is in force appears to address adequately the issue that essentially consists of the implementation of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women workers, and we consider it necessary to encourage the Government to make greater efforts at the national level, in collaboration with the most representative social partners, to make progress in the reduction of the wage gap between men and women and to achieve effective compliance in practice with the Convention.

We reiterate that it is not sufficient for the Government to ratify and include standards in its legislation if there is no effective implementation in practice resulting in specific and measurable results.

Finally, we request the Government, in line with the comments of the Committee of Experts:

- (i) to provide detailed information on the application of the Convention by 1 September this year;
- (ii) to ensure that all the legislative amendments and reforms referred to by the Government and that are introduced in future are undertaken through effective social dialogue and consultation with the most representative social partners; and
- (iii) to continue the compilation of statistical data so as to be able to continue analysing in greater depth compliance with the Convention in practice, and particularly the wage gap between men and women.

We echo the Government's indications, and we encourage it to request ILO technical assistance to continue making progress in the application of the Convention.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

While welcoming the legislative proposals by the Government to comply with the Convention, the Committee noted that these reforms still require a thorough assessment to ensure full compliance with the Convention.

Taking into account the discussion, the Committee called upon the Government, in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, to:

- conduct an in-depth study on employment and wages in the country, including wage disparities, by taking into account factors such as skills, responsibilities, tasks and working conditions, irrespective of job title and free from any gender stereotypes;
- give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for "work of equal value" as enshrined in the Convention;
- promote and implement effective detection and enforcement mechanisms to ensure that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is applied in practice; and
- collect statistical information to analyse in greater depth compliance with the Convention in practice and the pay gap between men and women.

The Committee invited the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance to ensure full compliance with its obligations under the Convention in law and in practice.

Government representative – We thank the Committee for its conclusions on the individual case concerning Mexico. We are convinced that the work of the Committee enriches dialogue between the partners in the world of work, which enables us to make progress through an approach of shared responsibilities towards social justice and decent work. In this regard, we welcome Mexico's commitment to the ILO, with its standards supervisory system and tripartite social dialogue. We note the conclusions adopted and we thank the Office for its readiness to provide technical assistance to the Government and the social partners with a view to the consolidation of the results achieved. Finally, we reiterate the willingness of the Government to continue making progress in guaranteeing the principle of equal remuneration set out in the Convention.

Netherlands, Sint Maarten (ratification: 1951)

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

Written information provided by the Government

On 3 May 2024, a new Government took office in Sint Maarten. The Government was informed of the ongoing case and has committed itself to giving this matter its highest priority. International as well as local labour issues are highly regarded by the Government and will be addressed with the utmost urgency. In order to give the necessary attention to this subject matter, the new Ministers are in the process of a rigorous onboarding within which the ongoing labour dispute is featured, with the intent of ensuring that all parties are heard. It is important to underscore the Government's commitment to recognizing and supporting social dialogue as part and parcel of good governance.

Furthermore, it should be stated that the Government, upon the recommendation of the Committee, has contacted the ILO Regional Office in Trinidad with a request for technical assistance on this matter and has been in constant contact with the said Office. The Government assures the Committee that the matters addressed in its recommendations will be duly dealt with in accordance with approved and accepted international standards.

The Government is therefore of the opinion that a third appearance before the Committee will be counterproductive at this time.

Actions undertaken by the Government since the 111th Session (2023) of the Conference include:

- the Government, in its quest to resolve the Committee's case, kept in contact with the ILO Regional Office;
- the ILO Regional Office concluded that the Soualiga Employer Association (SEA) is not recognized by the ILO as an employers' organization and therefore requested the assistance of the Government in facilitating the consultation with them;
- the Government complied with the request of the ILO Regional Office to facilitate a discussion with both the SEA and the Employers' Council of Sint Maarten (ECSM). These meetings were held separately and were facilitated by the Honourable Minister of Labour on 3 August 2023 and 11 September 2023;
- as a result of these discussions, the SEA amended their statutes/articles of incorporation in order to be in compliance with the Convention, and the amended articles were sent to the ILO Regional Office on 5 December 2023;
- the ILO Regional Office confirmed receipt of the amended statutes/articles of incorporation on 5 December 2023 and said that the documents would be shared with colleagues at headquarters in Geneva for review and advice on follow-up;
- the Government met with the ILO Regional Office in December 2023 to discuss the amended statutes/articles of incorporation. The ILO Regional Office took note of the changes and indicated that these were to be sent to headquarters in Geneva for an expert to review;
- on Wednesday, 31 January 2024, a follow-up meeting with the ILO Regional Office and an ILO expert from headquarters in Geneva regarding the statutes/articles of incorporation was held;
- the Government was informed that the amended statutes/articles of incorporation were sent to the Conference Committee and/or the Committee of Experts and that within ten days the Government would receive recommendations from the Committee of Experts on how best to proceed. The expert suggested that the Government meet with the social partners (ECSM) to get their feedback on the matter;
- the Director of the ILO Regional Office concluded that it is the Government's responsibility to appoint the members of the Social Economic Council (SER) Board. As such the Government has begun the process.

The Government requests the Conference Committee's indulgence and understanding with the hope for a positive consideration of its request. The Government will continue to strive for full compliance with international standards as stipulated in the respective ILO Conventions that are applicable to Sint Maarten.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the representative of the Government of Sint Maarten, Kingdom of the Netherlands, the Minister of Public Health, Social Development and Labour, to take the floor.

Government representative – Upon becoming an autonomous country within the Kingdom of the Netherlands in 2010, Sint Maarten has made a commitment to adhere to all ILO Conventions made applicable to us, and to strive to bring its legislation in line with those Conventions. In this context Sint Maarten has undertaken the following actions:

- We have established a Tripartite Advisory Committee (TPC) to the Minister of Public Health, Social Development and Labour in 2011.
- We have prepared a gap analysis regarding the adherence to Conventions of the ILO. The intention is to eliminate the gaps by bringing the legislation up to par with the Conventions in 2013.
- Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention (No. 144), 1976, was made applicable to Sint Maarten in 2013.
- The Penal Code was amended and the articles prohibiting the right to strike were revoked in 2015.
- A Consensus Document regarding the amended articles in Book 7, title 10 of the Civil Code of Sint Maarten in conjunction with major labour reform, was signed with the social partners in 2019.

The above is clear evidence that the Government of Sint Maarten has embraced the concept of social dialogue from day one and continues to be committed to working towards the further enhancement of that concept.

Sint Maarten, in previous correspondence and reports has made all efforts to address all conclusions and recommendations made by your esteemed Committee. The Government notes, as indicated in the report of the Committee of Experts of May 2024, that the issue of adherence to Article 3 of the Convention still needs further clarification and I will do so now.

The statements previously made by Government that the Soualiga Employers Association (SEA) is a legally established organization, and that section 3 of the National Ordinance of the Social Economic Council of Sint Maarten allows for multiple employer organizations to be represented on the Social Economic Council are statements of fact as laid down in national legislation and upheld by the Joint Court of Justice of Aruba, Curacao, Sint Maarten and Bonaire, Sint Eustatius and Saba.

These statements, however, do not speak to the discussion at hand regarding the manner in which the establishment of the SEA took place.

The Government also notes that the Committee of Experts has stated to have noted with deep regret that the Government has sent nomination letters dated 23 May 2023 to the Employers' Council Sint Maarten and the SEA to ask them to jointly select three members for the term 2023–26 of the Social Economic Council.

The Government acknowledges this fact, however notes that this action was undertaken prior to the session with your esteemed Committee, thus prior to having taken note of your conclusions of 12 June 2023. Based on the aforementioned conclusions the Government has re-evaluated its position and has therefore decided not to include the SEA in the process of nominating members to the Social Economic Council. The necessary documentation to that effect has been submitted to His Excellency the Governor of Sint Maarten for final approval. The Government considers the action that led to the conclusion that the Government acted in contravention of Article 3 of the Convention “an unfortunate mistake based on good intentions, nevertheless a mistake”. The Government however deems it necessary to state that it is the Government’s duty and obligation to create an environment where all social partners have the equal opportunity to make their voices heard regarding matters affecting them, their members and their communities as a whole. It is equally important that no one organization, including the Government, dominates the narrative as this would conflict with the spirit of social dialogue.

With regard to the rights of workers’ organizations to organize their administration and activities, the Committee of Experts states that it noted with regret that the Government has not provided the information requested whether public employees who were prevented from striking by section 374(a), (b) and (c) of the old Penal Code are forbidden from striking under the most recent Penal Code of 2015. The Committee of Experts also states that it has noted that the National Ordinance on Substantive Civil Service Law has been amended to allow the Courts to forbid strikes which threaten the public welfare or safety, and requests the Government to provide information on the circumstances in which strikes may be prohibited on the basis of that Ordinance.

The Government in its response, dated 18 November 2022, to the observations of the Committee of Experts regarding the right to strike addressed these concerns and will once more do so. Neither the new Penal Code, nor the Civil Code nor the Civil Service Law contain any articles that infringe on the right to strike of any workers in the private or public sector. This right is derived from the European Social Charter Article 6.4 and from case law. Eleven paragraphs of the European Social Charter, namely, Articles 1, 5, 6 and 16 of the 1961 Charter and Article 1 of the 1988 Additional Protocol, remain applicable to Aruba, Curacao, Sint Maarten and the Caribbean Part (Bonaire, Sint Eustatius and Saba).

Article 6 reads as follows: In order to ensure the effective exercise of the right to collective bargaining, the Parties undertake to: (i) promote joint consultation between employees and employers; (ii) promote, where necessary and useful, the establishment of a procedure for voluntary bargaining between employers or employers’ organizations and workers’ organizations, with a view to determining remuneration and working conditions by means of collective agreements; (iii) promote the establishment and implementation of an effective mediation and voluntary arbitration procedure for the settlement of labour disputes; and (iv) acknowledge the right of workers and employers to take collective action in cases of conflicts of interest, including the right to strike, subject to obligations under previously concluded collective agreements.

Employees, public servants, including teachers, or their representative workers’ organizations, have the right to collective action. These employees or their representative workers’ organizations have the freedom to choose the means of action, such as strike.

The Government of Sint Maarten has no intentions or desire to restrict the rights of any person or organization. However, while safeguarding the rights of all individuals, the Government must also make sure that those rights do not infringe on the rights and freedoms of others, and protect law and order, and national security.

The Government also commits to convening a special tripartite consultation meeting with the social partners to evaluate these experiences and decide how best we can move forward while respecting each other's rights and obligations. The Government looks forward to convening this meeting before year's end.

On behalf of the Government of Sint Maarten, I thank your esteemed Committee for the opportunity for us to be able to convey to you our commitment to adhering to international standards and to recognize the tremendous contribution of the ILO to Social Justice worldwide.

Worker members – This will be the third consecutive time that our Committee has examined the application of the Convention by the Government of Sint Maarten.

We note that this case concerns the practice of the authorities in Sint Maarten which affects the right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom and, more specifically, the concerns raised that a Governmental agency in Sint Maarten has established the SEA, an umbrella organization, to represent employers within the tripartite Social Economic Council (SER), to the detriment of the Employers' Council of Sint Maarten (ECSM).

In its 2023 report to the Committee of Experts, the Government indicated that the SEA is a legally established organization, that section 3 of the National Ordinance of the Social Economic Council of Sint Maarten allows for multiple employer organizations to be represented on the Council, and that nomination letters were sent to the ECSM and the SEA to ask them to jointly select three members for the 2023–26 Council's term.

The Committee of Experts noted the persistence of undue interference in the right to freedom of association and requested once again the Government of Sint Maarten to take measures to ensure that the Employers' representatives to the Social Economic Council are only appointed by organizations which are freely established or chosen by employers.

We note that in view of the discussion in our Committee, the Government provided additional information in May 2024, indicating that technical assistance was being provided by the ILO. However, no specifics were supplied as to the framework and scope of the technical assistance, nor was any clarification provided regarding progress made towards the full implementation of the 2023 conclusions of this Committee.

The Worker members wish to reiterate the importance that should be attached to the right for organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom and to be free from any undue interference of the authorities in the exercise of this right, as provided by Article 3 of the Convention.

The provisions in the Convention exist to ensure the independence of the social partners. For the social partners, independence is an absolute concept. A workers' or employers' organization cannot be slightly independent. Any form of Government interference represents an attempt, whether successful or not, to control the behaviour of social partners and is unacceptable.

The Government must take steps to ensure that employers' and workers' organizations can independently and genuinely represent the economic and social interests of their members. We urge the Government to continue to avail itself of the ILO technical assistance with a view to giving full effect to the observations of the Committee of Experts and the previous conclusions of this Committee.

These developments should not detract from the persistent obstacles faced by workers and trade unions of Sint Maarten in exercising their right to organize and to carry out activities. Reports from trade unions indicate that employers in Sint Maarten regularly engage in union busting practices and acts of antiunion discrimination. Employers also interfere in referendum processes for the recognition of collective bargaining units, by artificially lowering the size of the workforce to under the statutory threshold. Contract workers do not count towards the calculation of the size of the workforce for recognition purposes. Such workers are also particularly vulnerable to antiunion practices as they face non-renewal of their contract, or the threat thereof, if they attempt to establish or join a trade union. The national legal framework does not provide adequate protection to workers against acts of interference.

We urge the Government of Sint Maarten to take the necessary measures to ensure that workers and trade unions are adequately protected against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference, in line with Article 3, paragraph 2 of the Convention.

Finally, the Worker members note that for the past seven years, the Committee of Experts has raised serious issues regarding the right of public employees to take collective action and that these issues remain pending to this day. More specifically, since the introduction of the revised Penal Code in 2015, it is unclear whether the provisions prescribing prison terms for public employees, including teachers, taking part in collective action remain in force.

We recall that no one should be deprived of their freedom or be subject to penal sanctions for the mere fact of organizing or participating in collective action. Therefore, we call on the Government to ensure, in law and in practice, that public employees can fully exercise their right to organize and organize their activities and to repeal any provisions in its legislation imposing penalties.

Employer members – I would like to thank the representative of the Government of the Netherlands – Sint Maarten for the explanation on the national situation and for the written information provided. This case is being heard by the Committee for the third consecutive year. We will, therefore, get right to the heart of the matter without repeating the entire history of this challenging case.

Until yesterday, we were faced with the unfortunate lack of total progress on the part of the previous Government to respect the principles of the Convention, despite our Committee's recommendations from 2022 and 2023. However, we were informed informally yesterday afternoon, that the new Government of Sint Maarten has taken the initiative to amend the composition of the employer representation on the country's Social Economic Council (SER).

We have heard similar oral explanations from the Government today. Unfortunately, in the absence of written and verified information, it is impossible for the Employers' group to take a definitive position on this development. It is unclear for example, whether this announcement is merely performative or whether it is in fact an important and meaningful step to resolve the issue of the free appointment of employers' representatives, though we certainly hope it is the latter.

What is at stake in this case? In short, in 2022 and 2023 the Committee requested the Government to refrain from any interference in the exercise by the social partners of their freedom of association in general, and to refrain from promoting organizations that were not freely established or chosen by the workers and the employers of Sint Maarten. The Committee also requested the Government to consult with the organizations of workers and employers in order to designate their respective representatives in the country's Social Economic Council and to provide information on the outcome of the legal appeal concerning the composition of that council.

As already explained both last year and the year before, the Government of Sint Maarten created the SER by national decree following the granting, in 2010, of its semi-autonomy status vis-à-vis the Kingdom of the Netherlands. The SER is intended to be a tripartite economic and social council.

In practice, through the Chamber of Commerce, the Government created the SEA, a so-called representative organization of employers. The Government explains that the SEA is an umbrella organization responsible for representing employers in a balanced way within the SER. This is disputed by the Employers' group, because neither the Chamber of Commerce nor the SEA reflects a freely chosen and freely organized representation of the employers of Sint Maarten.

Unfortunately, Sint Maarten has been without a functioning Social Economic Council for several years, preventing employers and employees from playing their vital role in the governing and legislative process. In particular, the SER-meetings were suspended by the previous Government. It has not been composed, renewed or convened for four years now. During this time, the social partners have not been consulted on social legislation or on the issues affecting their interests, including the preparation of the Government's reports to the ILO, as well as on laws regarding minimum wage, social security and taxation.

In 2023, national legislation pertaining to the SER was amended. Additional requirements were put in place that further restrict the freedom of employers and employees to elect their representatives. A provision to create a member profile by national decree was added and a two-term limit for membership was introduced. These amendments allow the authorities to set up additional criteria for membership eligibility at any time. We note with deep regret that it appears that national legislation has in fact gone in the opposite direction from the recommendations of this Committee.

The ECSM met the previous Government on 3 August 2023, after last year's CAS discussion. On 15 March 2024, it met again with the Government about the division of SER seats as between the SEA and the ECSM. At this meeting with the Prime Minister, the SEA and SER staff, the ECSM was informed about the change to the statutes of the SER. There was little room for discussion, however.

Yesterday, we were informed that the new Government, in place since early May 2024, no longer intends to nominate an employers' member of the SEA to the SER, but rather somebody from a third association. However, we note with concern that this third association appears to have close connections with the Government and thus that the Government still does not appear to have understood the principles of freedom of association provided for under Article 3 of the Convention.

Under Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention, workers and employers are free to form organizations of their own choosing, without prior authorization, and to join them and to elect their representatives in full autonomy. The Government should, under all circumstances, refrain from any interference in this regard. I quote article 3 in full: "1. Workers' and employers' organizations shall have the right to draw up their constitutions and rules, to elect their representatives in full freedom, to organise their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes. 2. The public authorities shall refrain from any interference which would restrict this right or impede the lawful exercise thereof."

Freedom of association is a fundamental democratic principle, which applies in particular to representative organizations of employers and workers.

As explained in the 2012 General Survey, "Giving globalization a human face", public authorities must respect freedom of association absolutely. The prohibition of any public interference translates in particular into a prohibition on creating, in place of the social partners, a coercive organization or an organization benefiting from preferential treatment.

Last year and the year before, we quoted paragraphs 95 and 108 of this General Survey, which condemn in particular any favouritism, any unequal treatment between organizations and which recommend that the legal framework be limited to a global framework that leaves organizations maximum autonomy in their operation and management. Restrictions on this principle should have the sole purpose of safeguarding the interests of members and guaranteeing the democratic functioning of organizations.

In consideration of the context of this particular case, and as there is no clear criteria contained in national legislation, any action of the Government to unilaterally choose a representative organization should be considered interference in employers' rights to freely elect their representatives.

In conclusion, the Employer members regret that the dialogue between the Government and the autonomous organization of employers has not been able to lead to a satisfactory result, despite the conclusions of our Committee in 2022 and 2023. We, therefore, once again are calling on the Government to take the necessary measures, in consultation with the social partners, to ensure that workers' and employers' representatives on the SER are only appointed by organizations freely established or chosen by workers and employers, as well as to engage in dialogue with the ECSM on issues that affect the interests of private sector employers. This would ensure full respect for the rights of employers and their organizations to form and join organizations of their own choosing, and to elect their representatives in total freedom, and to remedy any interference by public authorities in this regard.

Before concluding, I will make a brief remark concerning the Committee of Experts' comments regarding the exercise of the right to strike. The Employers recall their disagreement with the Committee of Experts' view concerning Convention No. 87 and the right to strike. They wish to emphasize that neither Convention No. 87 nor any other ILO Convention contain rules on the right to strike. This fact has also been highlighted by the Government group in their position statement of March 2015 according to which "The scope and conditions of this right are regulated at the national level." As a consequence, governments can legitimately determine their own approach to the right to strike. The Employers will therefore abstain from commenting on these points.

Worker member, Netherlands – I am the Workers' representative for Sint Maarten, and as the Workers' representative, I would like to highlight the significant issues we are facing, particularly regarding the Convention and the right to strike. These concerns are deeply affecting our workers, especially contract workers, who are often the most vulnerable to abuse and intimidation. I would repeat a lot of what the Worker members' spokesperson said with an elucidation here and there.

When it comes to freedom of association, employers in Sint Maarten are currently allowed to determine who can be represented by workers' organizations. This is particularly problematic for contract workers, who fear that their contracts will not be renewed if they assert their rights to elect representation. Teachers are affected as certain faith-based school boards do not allow representation at their schools. This situation is exacerbated by the Government's role in referendums. It has also come to my attention that the word referendum is not clear, so I will clarify.

In order for a union to gain sole bargaining power for workers, there must be 50 per cent plus one of the workforce that would show interest by registering for the worker representative of their choice in order for a referendum to be organized by the Government mediator. Should a 50 plus one not be achieved, then even those members that would have requested representation would not be allowed to be represented by the workers' representative as the score needed to obtain sole bargaining power was not achieved despite their being workers seeking representation.

The Government of Sint Maarten acknowledges and recognizes the Convention. However, as explained previously, during referendums, the employer is allowed to decide who can participate in the referendum, or the electing of a union to represent the workers of the company. This often results in employers opting for contract workers to be excluded from the referendum. Repercussions that a contract worker would usually experience are: the non-renewal of the contract, intimidation on the job, and these are among other disciplinary actions.

We, as representatives, knowing the outcome of a contract worker yielding towards representation of the union, tend to go along with the decision or the option taken by the employer, in order not to undermine the workers' rights. The current situation with the Employers' Council and the Government also has an impact on workers as the Social Economic Council is not able to implement its function, thus decisions are being made that can affect the workers negatively as the SER is non-functioning.

I will go over to the right to strike. While the removal of the articles of the old Penal Code that hindered the workers from striking is applauded, the situation regarding the right to strike is still very concerning. In order for workers not to feel intimidated, we, the workers' representatives, use the term "urgent meeting during work hours" even though the outcome is the same; workers down their tools or they strike. This is done as workers are intimidated by the word "strike" because of the consequences that will follow. Employers include clauses in contracts prohibiting strikes or any industrial action, leading to immediate dismissal if these clauses are breached. In the public sector, workers face penalties such as no pay, forced use of vacation time, or warnings if they engage in any form of industrial action. This high level of intimidation discourages workers from exercising their rights.

These issues were discussed with the Government, and there is a commitment to address them in a tripartite session. However, the installation of the Social Economic Council, once again, which is crucial for these discussions, has not yet taken place due to ongoing debates with the Employers' Council and the Government.

Employer member, Germany – On behalf of the Employer Council Sint Maarten (ECSM), I would like to present the following statement. This is the third time in three years that the case Netherlands – Sint Maarten on the Convention is being handled by the Committee.

Employers consider all statements made in the previous sessions as repeated. The same applies to all the Committee of Experts' comments and recommendations. The Convention is a fundamental Convention. The right of freedom of association for employers and employees and their right to freely elect their representatives without interference by the authorities is fundamental.

We refer to the ILO Declaration of Philadelphia in its entirety and Part I(d) specifically. Sint Maarten's Constitution outlines legal regulations in article 81. Sint Maarten's Constitution recognizes freedom of association under its article 12. The Charter of the Kingdom refers to fundamental rights in article 43: "1) Each of the countries is responsible for the realization of fundamental human rights and freedoms, legal certainty and sound governance. 2) Guaranteeing these rights, freedoms, legal certainty and sound governance is a matter for the Kingdom."

It appears to the Employer representative organizations of Sint Maarten, that the fundamental right, the Convention, is not being respected in Sint Maarten. The national Government has continuously interfered with employer representation and has admitted such to the Committee previously.

The SEA, as the original statutes clearly show, was established by the Chamber of Commerce, a public law entity with mandatory membership on the request of the Prime Minister.

The first time the case was heard by the Committee, the Government made the following statement: "The Minister of General Affairs decided, based on section 2 of the Business Ordinance of Sint Maarten, to mandate the Sint Maarten Chamber of Commerce and Industry to establish a working group to structure an umbrella employer organization. The intention of the Minister of General Affairs was to ensure a balanced structure with respect to the representatives of the umbrella employer organization. The actions of the SHTA, inter alia, to establish the ECSM, have since been perceived as not respecting the democratic process of the Government as prescribed by national law.

These actions are also perceived as an objection to the intention of the Government to ensure that a broad-based representation of employers is established to ensure we adhere to the international normative framework in this regard."

The written comments by the Government in preparation for the 2024 Committee read as follows: "The Government complied with the request of the ILO Regional Office to facilitate a discussion with both the SEA and ECSM. These meetings were held separately and were facilitated by the Honourable Minister of Labour on 3 August 2023 and 11 September 2023. As a result of these discussions, the SEA amended their statutes/articles of incorporation in order to be in compliance with the Convention and the amended articles were sent to the ILO Regional Office on 5 December 2023."

It would appear that the results from various meetings were the Government interceding on the SEA's behalf and facilitating a change in statutes of the SEA. This change of statutes amounted to erasing all reference of the Government instruction to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry, a public law entity with mandatory membership, to establish the SEA. It is the Employers' understanding that the authorities communicated with the ILO regarding changing SEA statutes, since the ILO does not recognize the SEA. This would again appear to be interference on the part of the authorities.

The often-repeated recommendation for dialogue was not followed up on by the authorities. In 2023 national legislation pertaining to the social economic council was changed. Additional requirements were put in place that restrict the freedom of employers and employees to elect their representatives. A provision to create a member "profile" by national decree was added. This would in fact allow for the authorities to set additional criteria for membership eligibility at any time, bypassing a parliamentary vote that doing so by law would require.

A two-term limit for members was also introduced in the national legislation. Employers feel this is a restriction on their right to freely elect their representatives. It should be the sole right of employers and workers to decide whether they nominate their representatives for more than two terms.

On the morning of 7 June 2024, the ECSM was informed that the Government no longer intends to nominate a member of the SEA to the SER. This nomination will not be done by the ECSM, but by a third organization. ECSM was established by four recognized employer organizations. Collectively ECSM represents approximately 420 employers and approximately 7,000 jobs, that is about 30 per cent of the national workforce.

Employers question on what basis this third organization is deemed representative for employers by the authorities. It was clearly not deemed representative by the authorities over the course of the last three years, and never mentioned in the Committee before. Indications are that this third organization was, much like the SEA, established through facilitation of the Chamber of Commerce and has the Chamber of Commerce as an Honorary member.

Where the representativity of employers' and workers' organizations participating in social dialogue at national level, such as in the Social Economic Council, is concerned, it would appear that in the absence of objective, pre-established and precise criteria to determine the representativity of any organization of employers established in legislation, the authorities continue to exercise a wide margin of discretion.

In consideration of the context of this particular case, since there is no clear criteria contained in national legislation, any action of the Government to unilaterally choose a representative organization should be considered interference in employers' rights to freely elect their representatives.

It would appear that the authorities have not followed the Recommendations of the Committee of Experts where it pertains to bringing national legislation in line with the Convention. To the contrary, it appears that national legislation now contains more conflicts with the Convention. One of the results of the national authorities' actions is that for over a year, no appointments have been made to the Social Economic Council of Sint Maarten.

A higher advisory council established by law, was made up of representatives of employers, workers and independent members to advise our national Government. An entity whose advice is mandatory when it comes to legislative changes in many areas such as minimum wages and social security. This is a de facto suspension of the highest level of social dialogue, unilaterally by the national authorities, without any legal basis. Not only does this appear to employers as a violation of fundamental rights, it also violates the principles of legal certainty and sound governance. While these points fall under the national Government to realize, they fall under the kingdom Government to ensure.

In conclusion, the ECSM hope that with the attention provided us here, the recommendations from the Committee and the Committee of Experts will provide clear guidance to both the national Government as well as the kingdom Government, to ensure both employers and workers have access to their rightful spaces, as prescribed by the Convention, by law, which is fundamental to the proper functioning of our constitutional democracy.

Observer, Public Service International (PSI) – We would like to echo the comments raised in her intervention by the Workers' representative of Sint Maarten and stress the importance of complying with the fundamental principles enshrined in the Convention, also in practice.

We would also like to underline that many of these issues were previously raised by the Workers' representative during the discussion in 2023, and we hope that they are duly acknowledged in the conclusions of this case.

In this regard, it was mentioned that in Sint Maarten, the ability of workers to freely organize and be represented by Workers' organizations is compromised, and that employers seem to have the ability to determine who can be represented by these organizations. This situation is especially problematic for contract workers who live in constant fear that asserting their rights will result in their contracts being terminated. This fear, in addition, creates a culture of silence and compliance, where workers are unable to advocate for better conditions or challenge unfair treatment without risking their livelihood.

Moreover, employers seem to have the ability to decide who can participate in referendums on union representation. This often leads to contract workers, again, being excluded to avoid conflict, effectively undermining their rights and perpetuating a cycle of neglect. Incidentally, the threshold for these referendums, 50 per cent plus 1 of workers – seem to be excessive, as per previous observations by the Committee of Experts.

Teachers, particularly those in certain faith-based schools, face significant barriers as some school boards do not allow representation at their institutions. This exclusion is not just a violation of their rights but also a step back in ensuring a fair and equitable working environment for all educators.

While we acknowledge and applaud the removal of articles in the old Penal Code that prevented workers from taking industrial action, the situation in practice remains problematic.

It was mentioned that employers frequently include clauses in contracts that prohibit any form of industrial action and that breaching these clauses often leads to immediate dismissal, effectively silencing workers and stripping them of their right to protest unfair conditions. Also, in the public sector, workers who engage in any form of industrial action face penalties. This level of intimidation, as we all know, is a powerful deterrent, discouraging workers from exercising their legitimate rights to collective action and protest.

We heard that these issues have been brought to the attention of the Government, and there is a commitment to address them through tripartite discussions, which we celebrate. However, the establishment of the Social Economic Council, which is essential for facilitating these discussions, has been delayed due to the ongoing discussions between the Employers' Council of Sint Maarten and the Government. This delay is unacceptable and further compounds the challenges faced by workers.

Therefore, to conclude, we hope that the Government gives due consideration to the Employers' group's concerns in this case and restores the capacity of the Social Economic Council to address and resolve important issues raised by the Workers' delegate.

Chairperson – I give the floor to the representative of the Government of Sint Maarten for her concluding remarks.

Government representative – We have taken note of the comments made by the social partners especially those of the Worker representatives of Sint Maarten and others. We will weigh those comments when finalizing our path forward.

We have already committed ourselves to convene a session with our social partners being employers' and workers' representatives on the Tripartite Committee to discuss the implications of ILO Conventions Nos 87 and 144. I am convinced that once we conclude that exercise, we would be in a better position to resolve the challenges encountered.

It would be remiss of me not to mention that although it is constantly mentioned here about the SEA and the Chamber of Commerce input in the SER, at this time, those two organizations are not included in our SER. I have also taken note of the ECSM's standpoint as was brought forward by their representative, in indication that the Government has close ties with the third Employer organization, this, I can emphatically say, is not so. The Prime Minister has met with the ECSM representatives and up to two days ago felt as if we were on the right page. It is very important for our small community to have the SER, the tripartite organization in place. Not having it in place hampers a lot of our decision-making on the island. As such, we emphasize that we are doing everything possible to put the SER in place. Our new Government was sworn in on the 3 May 2024, a little bit more than a month ago, and we have since tried to put the SER in place.

Employer members – We thank the various speakers, including notably, Madam Minister, representing the Government of Netherlands Sint Maarten.

On the substance, we insist on the fact that the Convention is a fundamental convention and that as such, it requires special attention from the ILO, from Governments and from social partners. Our position with regards to Netherlands Sint Maarten is clear: we do not compromise on the freedom of association of employers. The Employer members therefore urge the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that, both in law and in continued practice, freedom of association for employers is fully guaranteed in its territory.

We ask the Government to take the following measures:

- define objective criteria of representativeness of social partners organizations, in order to avoid arbitrary political decisions;
- start an effective dialogue with the Employers' organizations on the composition of the Social Economic Council (SER), in full respect of the Convention;
- take the necessary measures, in consultation with the social partners, to ensure that workers' and employers' representatives on the SER are appointed by organizations that are completely autonomous and freely established by workers and employers;
- fully respond to the Committee of Experts' comments that have remained pending since 2017. We emphasize relevance of regular reports and the importance of their quality, in order to be able to assess the effective progress in law and practice in the application of the Convention.

To follow up, in a constructive manner, on the conclusions of our Commission, we urge the Government to request technical assistance from the ILO, with a view of bringing the national situation into conformity with the Convention. We really hope to see a positive approach by the Government to ensure that this national case does not need to appear for a fourth time before our Committee.

Worker members – Thank you to the Minister from Sint Maarten for her helpful and constructive remarks. We also thank all the speakers who took the floor. We welcome the information provided by the Government indicating that the Soualiga Employers' Association has been excluded from the composition of the Social Economic Council, which gives us hope that this matter will finally be resolved. We trust that the Government will follow up its positive statements with actions carried out in consultations with the social partners and with the continued assistance of ILO technical assistance. We look forward to hearing further evidence of the Government's commitment through the ILO, which we hope will also be confirmed by our Worker colleagues in Sint Maarten. We emphasize that the authorities have an obligation to promote and ensure the effective application of the Convention, including the rights of organizations to elect their representatives and to establish higher-level organizations in full freedom as prescribed by the provisions of the Convention. Furthermore, we urge the Government of Sint Maarten to take the necessary measures to ensure that workers and trade unions are adequately protected against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference in line with Article 3(2) of the Convention. Regarding the right of public employees to take collective action, we call on the Government to ensure in law and in practice that public employees can fully exercise this right and to repeal any provisions in its legislation imposing penalties.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the oral and written information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

Taking the discussions into account, the Committee requested the Government to:

- define in meaningful and effective consultation with respective social partners, criteria of representativeness of employers' and workers' organizations that are clear, pre-determined and objective;
- engage in meaningful and effective dialogue with workers' and employers' organizations on all matters affecting their interests or of their members, in full compliance with the Convention, including on the composition of the Social-Economic Council (SER); and
- take the necessary measures to ensure that workers' and employers' representatives on the SER are only appointed by fully autonomous organizations freely established or chosen by workers and employers and convene the SER without delay.

The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the above measures including all outstanding information requested by the Committee of Experts by 1 September 2024.

Government representative – The Government has taken note of the comments made by the various parties who gave their opinion during this hearing and thanks them for their input.

I believe that the Government of Sint Maarten has addressed the most important points brought forward by both Employer and Worker representatives. The Government has withdrawn its request to the SEA to nominate representatives to be appointed as member and substitute member respectively. The Government has requested technical assistance from the ILO as was concluded by your Committee. The Government commits to organize a session with the Tripartite Committee on Labour to discuss the way forward in compliance with Conventions Nos 87 and 144.

As was stated in the presentation on Monday, it is the Government's duty and obligation to create an environment where all social partners have equal opportunity to make their voices heard regarding matters affecting them, their members, and their communities as a whole. It is equally important that no one organization, including the Government, dominates the narrative as this would be in conflict with the spirit of social dialogue.

Sint Maarten will put action to the words spoken at this hearing and I am confident that the Government and the social partners will resolve these matters in the spirit of social dialogue.

In ending, allow me on behalf of the Government of Sint Maarten to thank you, the members of your Committee and all who have, in one way or the other, gave their input during this hearing. A special thank you to the delegation members of the Netherlands, Aruba and Curaçao for their support and advice.

Nicaragua (ratification: 1967)

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the Government representative of Nicaragua, Her Excellency the Minister of Labour, to take the floor.

Government representative – The President of the Republic of Nicaragua, Mr Daniel Ortega Saavedra, and the accompanying Vice-President, Ms Rosario Murillo Zambrana, convey their greetings to you, Mr Chair, and to all involved in chairing this Committee.

Today, on behalf of the State of Nicaragua, I refer to the report of the Committee of Experts, in which we have noted repeated references to the complaint of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), which has been making allegations of non-observance of the Convention, further to the conclusions of the Committee of Experts urging our Government to implement the recommendations made by the Conference Committee and to provide information in consultation with the social partners in the country.

In this regard, and on behalf of the Government of Reconciliation and National Unity, I would like to make the following points. We once again uphold our position and utterly reject the content of the Committee of Experts' report referring to violations of the Convention. We obviously consider that this content lies outside the labour law context of the ILO in accordance with the provisions of its Constitution and Regulations. Rather, this represents ongoing politicization with arguments outside the logic, spirit and mandate of the ILO, since this subject has already been reviewed, reported on and addressed in depth at the 110th and 111th Sessions of the International Labour Conference. We therefore request the Committee of Experts that this complaint be withdrawn from the report since it is outside the context of discussion of this important Conference in which Member States appear in order to address and resolve issues connected with the working lives of Nicaraguans.

Furthermore, with regard to the ILO recommendation on amending sections 389 and 390 of the Labour Code of Nicaragua, the State of Nicaragua indicates once again that, in line with the principle of sovereignty established in our Political Constitution, this decision to reform and adopt laws and standards or legal provisions is strictly for the sovereign people of Nicaragua to make. It does not derive from recommendations which ultimately affect labour rights restored for the benefit of Nicaraguan families who have been both recipients and supporters of improvements to a national plan for poverty reduction and human development, which is designed and implemented strictly to ensure the well-being of Nicaraguan families and, consequently, stability in their work.

Article 98, second paragraph, of the Nicaraguan Constitution provides that the Nicaraguan workers shall participate in dialogue or strike processes in Nicaragua, our Labour Code provides that workers have the right to strike. And these dialogue processes have enabled the immediate resolution of labour disputes or strikes as a very important strategy for making progress towards the eradication of poverty in defence of the social and labour harmony of our country, because when a strike occurs, not only does this slow down the economic development of enterprises but it also affects workers and their families.

Thus, the State of Nicaragua has been ensuring compliance with our laws, the Political Constitution, our national labour laws and the ratified ILO Conventions. In this way we will follow up and continue to ensure the right to the freedom to organize of the Nicaraguan workers, so that they can fully exercise the right to establish trade unions, to carry out their union activities in full freedom, and to formulate their programmes within each federation, confederation or union. The workers can participate and indeed have done so in the running of enterprises through their unions, that is to say, they are part of the full and active management of every enterprise.

Moreover, the State of Nicaragua has been duly informing the ILO, through the corresponding reports, of compliance and ongoing progress in unionization in all sectors of the national economy. As we have said and demonstrated, these reports have been transmitted to the most representative workers' and employers' organizations in the country.

In light of the above, the State of Nicaragua will continue this firm commitment to work for the well-being of Nicaraguans, who are fully entitled to organize in the union which suits them best. We firmly emphasize that we reject all comments or interference, regarding internal matters, that undermine peace, sovereignty, and the labour and social stability of Nicaraguan families.

In short, we reiterate this ongoing commitment to go further, that the Government of Reconciliation and National Unity has been working in unity with the workers of Nicaragua and to achieve the common objective of the restoration of the labour and social rights of the people of Nicaragua. These include the right to ongoing labour stability and freedom of association, and so we can assure you here and now that all the registration applications made to the Ministry of Labour have been addressed, these have been duly certified and have been delivered to all the trade union organizations concerned.

We are also defending peace and social harmony and strengthening tripartism through various forms of dialogue in the National Minimum Wage Committees, the National Occupational Safety and Health Council, and the territorial committees, in order to speak directly with the workers, and all dialogue and conciliation processes aimed at restoring workers' rights. We are also strengthening a collective agreement which brings ongoing improvements to each sector for the workers, including the working women of Nicaragua.

We can tell you categorically that freedom of association in Nicaragua is a fact. Since 2007 we have had clear reports, and we are dealing with the reports of the first quarter of 2024.

As a result of this development of policies of promotion and growth, of unionization driven by our Government of Reconciliation and National Unity, we can tell you that during the period from 2007 to the first quarter of 2024, a total of 1,649 new trade unions have been established, with a founding membership of 56,266 workers.

A total of 18,391 unions have been updated, with a total membership of 656,137 men and 571,096 women, giving a total of 1,234,000 men and women workers belonging to different organizations, which also enjoy freedom. Women and young people play an active role in trade unions and from that basis they defend the sacred right to stability in employment, which will enable us to achieve our future aim of eradicating poverty.

We have this evidence of freedom of association, where no request for registration of a union has been obstructed, where there are no complaints from workers who have been denied certification for exercising their full right to freedom of association. This is the clear position of the Government of Nicaragua, this is the one we maintain, this is the course we have adopted towards the development of a people which has worked ceaselessly, regardless of any situations that have arisen.

Worker members – Allow me to begin by saying that many of the issues which will be examined by our Committee with regard to Nicaragua are already being examined by the Governing Body.

In fact, several Employer delegates made a request at the last session of the Conference calling for a Commission of Inquiry to be set up under article 26 of the ILO Constitution. Since then, the Governing Body has made a series of recommendations to the Government regarding the application of Convention No. 87, the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). These recommendations do not differ either from the conclusions of our Committee or from the recommendations of the Committee of Experts.

This is the third year in succession that our Committee is examining the application of the Convention by the Government of Nicaragua. At its last session, our Committee reached a series of conclusions, including requests to the Government to cease all acts of violence and persecution against the social partners, and to promote social dialogue through the establishment of a tripartite round table.

Nicaragua was also urged to avail itself of ILO technical assistance. As the Committee of Experts indicated, there is no indication that the Government has taken any steps to give effect to the recommendations made by our Committee in 2022 and 2023.

In particular, it does not appear that any efforts have been made to establish a tripartite dialogue round table under the auspices of the ILO. In this regard, as we already said last year, we urge the Government to provide the Committee of Experts with all information on any measures taken to ensure compliance with the recommendations.

I would like to reiterate the systematic position of the Workers' group both in our Committee and in the Governing Body with regard to Nicaragua.

We fully support the principle that all governments must respect freedom of association. We are bound to emphasize, as recalled by the Committee of Experts, that the rights protected by the Convention are totally devoid of meaning when there is no respect for fundamental freedoms, the right to protection against arbitrary detention and imprisonment, and the right to a fair trial by an independent and impartial tribunal.

The Committee of Experts has noted with concern a series of arbitrary detentions against leaders of the Higher Council for Private Enterprise (COSEP) of Nicaragua. Moreover, both the Inter-American Court of Human Rights and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights has urged the Government to proceed with their immediate release.

In this regard, we once again request the Government of Nicaragua to provide the Committee of Experts with all material information relating to the accusations made against these employers, the legal or judicial proceedings instituted, and the outcome thereof.

We are bound to emphasize, echoing the Committee of Experts, the vital importance of tripartite social dialogue to make progress. Consequently, the Workers' group also requests the Government to enable this dialogue and to include the guidance provided by the ILO.

We reiterate the recommendation that we made last year, namely we urge the Government to establish without delay a tripartite dialogue round table and to avail itself of ILO technical assistance to comply fully with its obligations under the Convention.

A vital element that forms part of the comments of the Committee of Experts on the application of the Convention by Nicaragua is connected with the amendment of sections 389 and 390 of the Labour Code, which provide that collective disputes shall be submitted to compulsory arbitration after 30 days have elapsed since the strike call.

We echo the comments of the Committee of Experts that the imposition of compulsory arbitration to end a strike, in cases other than those where a strike can be limited or even prohibited, is contrary to the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes in full freedom.

We note once again the Government's efforts to reinforce the right to freedom of association, in which it provided the ILO with information on the number of trade unions established and the number of their members. However, the Workers' group recalls that a climate of violence, coercion and threats of any kind directed against workers' and employers' organizations is not conducive to the free exercise and full enjoyment of the rights and freedoms established in the Conventions.

In this regard, we call on the Government to cease all acts of violence, threats, persecution, stigmatization and intimidation in relation to the exercise of legitimate activities by the social partners.

We therefore urge the Government of Nicaragua to provide all the information requested by the Committee of Experts in this regard and to take all the necessary measures, with ILO technical assistance, to comply with its recommendations.

Employer members – We thank the Government representative of Nicaragua for her greetings and the information presented.

Sadly, we also note, since the beginning of her intervention, an explicit rejection of the reports of the Committee of Experts, and of the recommendations made by this Committee. However, the Workers, the Employers and the Committee of Experts all observe an extremely serious situation which violates freedom of association.

It seems to me that the Government should become aware of this discrepancy of views and really open up to the possibility, using the tools provided by the ILO, to seek dialogue, understand the issues and seeks solutions, where necessary. In our view, sticking with false claims that problems do not exist is of no help. We believe that the proximity of the Office – the International Labour Organization, an organization of good faith – together with tripartite support from the sectors, can be of great help in resolving this problem.

This case is of special importance for everyone and hence for our group, on account of the serious, recurrent violations of the Convention which can be seen with complete clarity in the report of the Committee of Experts.

This case has been discussed many times in the Committee, more than we would have liked, and sadly without recording positive results. It suffices to recall the work done, the various declarations made, the actions taken and the conclusions formulated in this regard, particularly in 2022 and 2023, let alone going back any further. However, despite the consistency of the requests made to the Government, the deep concern and encouragement expressed, the Government still has not taken any steps to guarantee the free and full exercise of the right to organize by either workers or employers. Nor do we find any positive response to at least 19 observations made by the Committee of Experts since 1991 on this Convention alone, and during this new phase within the Conference Committee, in 2022, 2023 and now in 2024.

Regrettably, this year we observe once again that the Committee of Experts reiterates its deep concern at the lack of progress and the absence of positive reports by the Government regarding the familiar non-observance of the obligations entered into within this Organization, observing in the various reports received that the conditions we are examining are still the same and surely getting worse. We suppose that everyone here in this room shares the enormous concern arising from this.

The case that we are looking at today is no different from that of previous years. The main facts and conditions observed in 2023 were as follows: detention and prosecution of leaders of workers' and employers' unions; confiscation of private property of employers' leaders; eviction of a number of union leaders and stripping of their citizenship; smear campaigns against the employers' organization; removal of the legal personality of 19 employers' organizations, including COSEP, an old organization which has represented the employers for many years at the ILO, for supposed non-compliance with the laws that govern them; seizure of private property and freezing of the accounts of dissolved trade unions; accreditation vis-à-vis the Conference of organizations close to the Government with a view to replacing the most representative employers' organization, which everyone knows to be COSEP.

In this regard, this Committee, in its previous conclusions, especially in 2023, observed with deep concern that there persists a climate of intimidation and harassment with regard to independent workers' and employers' organizations, and also allegations of arrest and detention of employers' leaders and a further deterioration in the situation.

The lack of progress or cooperation on the part of the Government is quite clear. The Government was urged, inter alia, to: ensure that workers and employers can establish their own organizations and operate without interference from the Government; cease all acts of violence and intimidation against individuals and organizations in connection with the exercise of legitimate trade union activities and the activities of employers' organizations; release employers and trade unionists imprisoned in connection with the exercise of the legitimate activities of their organizations; establish without delay a tripartite dialogue round table, with ILO technical assistance, which respects the representativeness of the organizations, proposed by the workers and with which we totally agree.

These agreements were tripartite, and now we find, in line with the observations of the Committee of Experts, that nothing has happened and no effect has been given to the recommendations. However, these are the results of discussions in this Committee and these have been addressed in other bodies within this Organization and in the context of the United Nations (UN) and other bodies.

Not only have no steps been taken with regard to the alleged facts but the Government also denies most of them, stating that – as we have just heard, and I quote – “in the country there is full freedom of association without any kind of discrimination, no trade union leaders have been deprived of their freedom for exercising the right to organize or carry out union activities, there are no restrictions on the freedom to organize, and there is no trade union persecution or repression”. Issues that are not recognized cannot be resolved.

Meanwhile COSEP has not recovered its legal personality and remains dissolved, in violation of Article 4 of the Convention, and its leaders have been unable to recover their Nicaraguan nationality or their property or that of the dissolved organizations. Furthermore, recently we have had to lament the death of one of our leaders in exile, Mr Michael Hayley.

Here we are speaking of events which demonstrate that the social partners are not protected in Nicaragua by the provisions of the Convention under discussion in this Committee. Moreover, as indicated by the Committee of Experts, allegations have been made in this context regarding the most flagrant human rights violations, a situation which has been addressed by various UN bodies, including the Human Rights Council, the Group of Human Rights Experts on Nicaragua and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights.

We agree with all the comments made by the Committee of Experts which appear in the report, though I will not repeat them here. Nor will we make any statement on the subject of strikes. You know what the Employers' position on this and I do not think it would serve any purpose to repeat it.

We are still very concerned, we hope that the Government will raise its awareness and will understand that what this Committee is doing is to reach out in order to find a way whereby, through technical assistance, we can identify issues much more closely, speaking with the social partners, with those affected in this way, listening to the problems. In this way legitimate solutions to these issues can be sought.

Rather than sticking to entrenched positions, here we have the possibility to continue moving forward with the tools provided by the Constitution. But the problems in Nicaragua persist, and the situation of the workers and employers stays the same, and frankly this is of no use to anybody.

I will now break off to listen to the other already registered speakers with a view to making a second statement with a submission and a concrete proposal on this matter.

Worker member, Nicaragua – I am speaking on behalf of all our country's trade union confederations, without exception. From the outset we want to make clear that we do not accept this Committee's treatment of our country's case as a violation of the Convention; doing so constitutes a continuation of the political attacks on our country. Regrettably, this body continues being used to repeat the disinformation promoted by those who think they are the masters of the world.

You should note that although these individuals have rejected the right to strike as set out in the Convention, which is the right that underpins freedom of association, in their obsession to attack our Government they argue for it before this Committee.

It should be recalled that it is the private employers' sector that restricts and attacks workers who decide to organize in trade unions.

Furthermore, these individuals who claim to represent the employers of my country do nothing but voice opinions and information controlled by mercenaries of disinformation. Their accusations do not differ at all from those of the governments that promote attacks and interventions against our country.

The individuals who claim to represent the employers of my country lean on certain arguments without being familiar with the reality in Nicaragua. While the principle of tripartism is upheld by employers and workers like us, who believe peace to be essential to our country's development, a group of persons clinging to powers not granted to them under the country's legal system attempted to mount a coup d'état to destroy the progress made in our country's economic, social and political sectors.

While these individuals who claim to represent the employer sector in my country point fingers without providing evidence, trade union officials have been detained on totally false grounds for undertaking union activities. We challenge them to provide details of their accusations, because we, for our part, are able to recount how the persons that they are defending murdered Mr Bismark Martínez, a union official in the municipality sector, and Mr Alfredo Jirón, a union official in the education sector.

We can also list the workers who were abducted and tortured by the perpetrators of the attempted coup d'état who they are so keen to defend. More than 250,000 workers in the private sector, who were used to further these individuals' political interests and create instability, were dismissed, with a significant effect on their families.

Our development model is based on dialogue and consensus, something that was broken by those who answered the imperialists' call to destabilize and damage the economy.

If you take the time to read the newspapers from 2018, you will see how one of the main tactics of the perpetrators of the attempted coup d'état was to call on their representatives to abandon the tripartite committees.

During national dialogue promoted by the Government they demanded the resignation of the President, claiming not to be interested in the economy, and asked him to eradicate the so-called "roadblocks of death" promoted by the perpetrators of the attempted coup. Today they whinge, beat their chests and claim to be victims.

Their argument that Nicaraguans' human rights are being violated could not be further from the truth: is it a human rights violation when 99 per cent of homes have electricity? When public education, from preschool to university, is free? When 1.2 million children receive free food at school? What is more, more than 70 hospitals – with another 7 under construction – provide free care to the population, projects to improve access to drinking water are under way and road infrastructure is being built to transport persons and goods. Why are we mentioning this? Simply because these are sources of employment for families, for the children of the workers who benefit from these social projects. Let us discuss human rights based on reality, not on unfounded assumptions.

Committee members, the obsession of those who claim to represent employers in my country drives them to use this forum to express their discomfort with a country that respects itself. They do not condemn or note the economic attacks on Nicaragua by the countries "in the back yard" of the country that sees itself as the "master of the world", thereby harming the Nicaraguan economy and hence our people.

The Sandinista Government led by Commander Daniel Ortega has demonstrated flexibility and openness to dialogue according to the principles of respect, sovereignty and self-determination. The working class, despite the criticisms and attempts to discredit us, therefore lends its unconditional support to the Government's policies and actions.

While we discuss unfounded issues like this case, thousands of children are being murdered by the bombs and weapons wielded by the Zionists against the Palestinian people. The United Nations and its mechanisms are incapable of halting that genocide, its resolutions on ceasefires are not recognized by the Government that is supplying the weapons or the Government that is murdering civilians in Gaza.

Those who consider themselves to be the world's guardians, arguing in favour of guaranteeing their national security, push for soft coups, using the bodies of the United Nations as tools at their service. Nicaragua, dignified and proud of its history, will not be subdued or submit to the orders of the imperial master. In that regard they have not succeeded, nor will they.

(The Chairperson interrupts)

Chairperson – Sir, as the Chair, I would like to remind you that according to the rules of decorum all of those in the room have agreed to follow, your intervention should be focused on the subject of our deliberation. Thank you and I count on your understanding.

(The Worker member of Nicaragua continues.)

We repeat our regret that this sector, which claims to represent the employer sector in my country, is using this forum to convey interests unrelated to labour issues. Its political agenda includes the denial of any information that does not align with its interests or the position taken against our country.

As trade union officials, we continue to support dialogue and peace, which are vital elements of the country's development. When I read and listen to the arguments put forward by these individuals, I wonder, do they not have any information on labour in our country? And I wonder this because we continue to negotiate with employers and increase the minimum wage; we continue to negotiate and sign collective agreements, including with transnational companies through their representatives; we continue to fulfil our responsibility to protect work environments, together with company representatives. Do they realize that most employers in Nicaragua are not aware of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE)? It seems to be a closed-off world for a privileged few.

No one should claim to be representative if that representativeness is not based on the express mandate of those whom they represent. No one can call themselves the majority if they are unable to prove it.

As trade unions, we represent and answer to our members, whereas non-governmental organizations are private and do not answer to any sector in Nicaragua.

There is a legal framework, and the trade union movement is respectful of, and complies with, the mandates set out in our Labour Code. However, we know of non-profit foundations that do not respect the legal framework that governs them.

We request respect and support for our process of dialogue and consensus, which we undertake according to the principles of our sovereignty and the freedom that we as a people enjoy today.

We resolve any difficulties or problems that arise through respectful dialogue. The main enemy of Nicaragua is the poverty that it inherited after the imposition of neoliberal policies, and we are on the path to economic growth, which involves the continued improvement of Nicaraguans' living standards.

Nicaragua is a peace-loving country, and for that reason we desire calm. We ask the Committee to listen to us, to at least think twice and not to reject our arguments, because they are the lived reality of Nicaraguans. We live in peace, tranquillity and harmony, and our growing economy is improving Nicaraguans' living standards. It seems, however, that no argument is accepted when an ideology has taken hold. For that reason, we ask all members of this Committee to listen to Nicaragua, to listen to the workers, because there is no more genuine development than the popular Sandinista revolution, which we therefore defend, because it grants us a forum in which we workers may voice our views, have influence and determine the policies developed by our country.

If you would like to see how workers use their power, visit Nicaragua, get to know Nicaragua, go with an open mind, do not go with biases promoted by the transnationals that have spread disinformation and falsehoods. We will respect, safeguard, protect and defend our revolution at all costs.

Employer member, Nicaragua – On 7 February 2024, we were invited by the ILO through the Ministry of Labour of Nicaragua to the 112th Session of the International Labour Conference, as tripartite constituents and as employers for the fourth consecutive year.

I have heard a number of speakers here express great concern about aspects of Nicaragua that bear no relation to the objective of this Conference.

Regarding our participation in the Conference, we have reviewed its content and, in particular, we have reviewed statements that lack objectivity and are far removed from the national reality, with a total lack of awareness, or with interests that distort our country's economic and labour activity. So much so that, as an Employer member, we are prompted to make a number of recommendations from the Nicaraguan business sector to the Committee of Experts, concerning Nicaragua's alleged non-observance of the Convention, to ensure that they are not tainted by political considerations.

In this regard, I would like to make the following comments on relevant aspects of our country with the participation of the private sector, the workers and the Government of Nicaragua.

For several years now, the minimum wage for workers has been defined jointly by the members of the tripartite committee with the participation of the most representative organizations.

The nation's economic and social situation continues to experience solid growth in 2024, trending at 4.5 per cent, according to the latest official economic indicator, demonstrating that the economy is on track to end the year at 5.6 per cent growth. This means that the economy is performing well and this year's prospects are good, exceeding initial projections, and reflecting a positive outlook for both consumption and investment.

There has been substantial private investment in trade and services, while foreign investment has experienced significant growth, particularly in road infrastructure works, bridges, health, primary-care facilities, stadiums, drinking water and sanitation projects, and other strategic development projects, such as deepwater ports in the Atlantic, a new airport and a railway development plan, and the provision of means of transport.

The measure implemented at the beginning of the year to establish an exchange rate slippage of 0 per cent of the córdoba against the US dollar has bolstered financial stability, boosted credit and prompted an increase in consumption. It has also contributed to an increase in international reserves, thereby demonstrating greater economic robustness. International reserves exceed 5.7 billion US dollars, the highest level ever recorded in our country. This was recently confirmed by the Fitch credit rating agency, which rated us as B+.

We permanently monitor the country's economic situation, the development of Nicaragua's business sector, and all aspects of welfare and the working environment, to improve competitiveness, effectiveness and efficiency, and thereby strengthen the business sector.

We are aware of measures that encourage trade unionism and the right to organize in all enterprises and active agents in the country. The complaints submitted to the ILO are highly politically charged and, in the absence of concrete, verifiable and credible evidence, are unanimously rejected by all members of the employers' sector.

Regarding freedom of association and the protection of the right to organize, the number of trade unions has grown, and the labour authorities ensure that they are freely organized in enterprises by creating conditions for their development through the establishment of labour agreements protecting workers' interests.

We have held meetings and reached agreements with the entire Nicaraguan business sector, regardless of political or religious affiliation, to consolidate joint work for Nicaragua's economic and social development and sustainability, in order to strengthen the substantial progress achieved in the economic and business sector in recent years.

We will continue to support the Government of Nicaragua's economic and social programmes, by participating actively in the investment processes in the national economy's various sectors, particularly those benefiting development, the technical capacity of our workers and the sustainable growth of our enterprises.

Before ending, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the ILO staff and recognize their hard work and, in order to improve and to achieve the results set out in the Organization's objectives, we request or recommend that the ILO define initiatives to help eliminate political approaches by the members of the corresponding committee, to avoid wasting time, unnecessary discussions and, worst of all, interference in matters that should only be dealt with by peoples and governments exercising their sovereignty.

Government member, Belgium – I have the honour to speak on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States. The candidate countries, Albania, Montenegro, North Macedonia, the Republic of Moldova and Ukraine, and the European Free Trade Association country Norway, member of the European Economic Area, align themselves with this statement.

The EU and its Member States are committed to the respect, protection and fulfilment of human rights, including labour rights. We promote universal ratification and effective implementation of fundamental ILO Conventions and support the ILO in developing and promoting international labour standards and supervising their application.

The EU and Central America, including Nicaragua, have an Association Agreement which has recently entered into force. Its objectives are to develop and deepen a privileged political and economic partnership based on values, principles and common objectives.

We remain concerned about the labour rights situation in Nicaragua, including reported acts of intimidation and harassment against independent workers' and employers' organizations as well as the allegations of arbitrary arrests and detentions. Various United Nations (UN) bodies including the United Nations Human Rights Council have also expressed their concern at the human rights situation, including the destruction of civic and democratic space in Nicaragua. We deplore the fact that human rights violations are continuing in the country.

We regret that the authorities have failed so far to follow up on the 2022 and 2023 conclusions of the Committee. We reiterate the conclusions adopted last year urging the Government to immediately cease all acts of violence, threats, persecution, stigmatization, intimidation or any other form of aggression against individuals or organizations in connection with both the exercise of legitimate trade union activities and the activities of employers' organizations.

We note that the Government of Nicaragua reiterates that since 2007 it has been working to ensure the restoration and protection of the labour rights of workers through tripartite dialogue, but we regret that, despite the Committee urging the Government in 2022 and 2023 to promote social dialogue without delay through the establishment of a tripartite dialogue round table under the auspices of the ILO, no tangible progress has been made on that matter. We therefore call on the Government to establish without delay a tripartite dialogue round table.

Noting the serious non-compliance with this fundamental ILO Convention and the absence of progress, despite several discussions in this Committee and more recently in the Governing Body, we urge the Government to adopt as soon as possible, in consultation with the social partners, each and every measure that it has been invited to take by the Conference Committee. We request the Government to provide information to the ILO in this regard. We also invite the Government to accept ILO technical assistance to that effect.

We reiterate the Committee of Experts' call to amend sections 389 and 390 of the Labour Code, which provide that collective disputes shall be referred to compulsory arbitration once 30 days have elapsed since the calling of the strike. Under the terms of Convention No. 87, the imposition of compulsory arbitration to end a strike, beyond the cases in which a strike may be limited or even prohibited, is contrary to the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes in full freedom.

While noting the information provided by the Government that it is continuing to promote initiatives in support of the right to organize, that policies have been adopted to promote and encourage trade union organization and that, between 2018 and the first quarter of 2023, 156 new trade unions were established, we recall that to guarantee the rights of employers' and workers' organizations protected by the Convention it is essential to respect fundamental freedoms, the right to protection against arbitrary detention and imprisonment, and the right to a fair trial by an independent and impartial tribunal. Therefore, we echo the request of the Committee of Experts and invite the Government to provide detailed information to the ILO on the initiatives adopted to guarantee the free exercise of the right to organize by both workers and employers. The EU and its Member States will remain closely informed of the situation in Nicaragua.

Government member, Cuba – I would like to ask the Secretariat not to start the clock yet because, before I begin my speech, I would like to make the following comment. I was surprised at the treatment of the Nicaraguan Worker representative. In my opinion, it was disrespectful to say the least. If there is one thing that has characterized the ILO for decades, it is dialogue. If we cannot engage in dialogue, if we cannot freely express what we think, what is the point of these discussions? Therefore, on behalf of the broad diplomatic community, and I say this as Ambassador and Permanent Representative of Cuba in Geneva, I offer, on behalf of the broad diplomatic community here in this city, our apologies to the Worker representative for having been interrupted during his speech.

And now, Mr Chairperson, I shall begin my speech. We thank the Government of Nicaragua for the submission of additional information. We appreciate that the information provided by the Sandinista Government includes details of the exercise of freedom of association in the country, and demonstrates the Government's will to maintain communication and cooperation with the Committee of Experts, and to fulfil its commitments to the ILO and the Nicaraguan people within the framework of its legal system and with full respect for its sovereignty.

During previous discussions in the Governing Body, we have listened to various Government, Worker and Employer representatives placing emphasis on aspects such as the cooperation of the countries concerned in the submission of reports and, above all, the need to avoid politicization. In this regard, my delegation would like to emphasize that the Committee should attach greater importance to the information provided by the governments, considering the efforts made by national authorities to comply with the requirements of the ILO supervisory machinery.

In addition, Cuba has on several occasions expressed its rejection of the politicization of the ILO supervisory machinery and its use as a channel for allegations that are not aimed at defending the interests of workers or employers, but rather at calling into question the performance of governments in labour matters. We believe that the policies implemented by the Sandinista Government to support workers should be examined impartially.

According to the information provided, the number of new trade union organizations established in recent years is significant, and the status of other representative trade union organizations has also been updated. I would like to emphasize that the Government of Nicaragua cannot be asked to act contrary to its Constitution, laws or national policies, as doing so would violate the principles of sovereignty and self-determination.

In conclusion, I underline the importance of continuing to promote tripartism and respectful exchange with each country, in a spirit of dialogue and cooperation.

We trust that the conclusions drawn from this exercise will be objective, technical and balanced, and that the views and information provided by the Nicaraguan authorities will be taken into account.

Employer member, Colombia – Firstly, I would like to refer to the serious and repeated allegations made within the framework of this Committee concerning acts of persecution and systematic repression by the Government of Nicaragua against the most representative social partners, in particular against COSEP.

Last year's meeting of the Conference Committee noted with deep concern the persistent climate of intimidation and harassment of independent workers' and employers' organizations, and the allegations of the arrest and detention of employer leaders, the further deterioration of the situation, and the absence of any progress or cooperation by the Government.

Regrettably, today, we are faced with a scenario that has deteriorated even further. The Government has not adopted any measures to address the allegations, and has not acted on any of the recommendations made by the ILO supervisory bodies, and serious violations of freedom of association and of the guarantee of the rights of the social partners persist.

With regard to this serious situation, it is important to recall that freedom of association is completely meaningless if civil liberties are not respected. The rights conferred on workers' and employers' associations are based on the recognition, protection, guarantee and securing of civil liberties, such as personal safety and the prohibition of arbitrary detention.

It is vital to call on the Government of Nicaragua to comply with its obligations as a Member State of the ILO. We reiterate the call for Nicaragua to initiate the rebuilding of processes of trust and to ensure full respect for freedom of association.

Secondly, it is important to underscore that workers' and employers' representatives must be freely elected and represented on an equal footing, as established in Article 3 of Conventions Nos 87 and 144.

The Committee of Experts has indicated repeatedly that it is the prerogative of workers' and employers' organizations to determine the conditions for the election of their leaders. The authorities should refrain from any undue interference in the exercise of this right.

The serious acts that persist in Nicaragua against trade union leaders make it more difficult to build tripartite social dialogue and to engage with employer representatives from Nicaragua in accordance with international labour standards.

Worker member, Honduras – The report of the Committee of Experts must be read in its entirety as it refers to some issues that should not be overshadowed by the aspects that are most commonly highlighted in the comments of this Committee regarding the case of Nicaragua. I am referring specifically to two points which are made in the report and which I will underscore in this brief statement.

The first point is related to the repeated observation, which was made over ten years ago, regarding the need to amend sections 389 and 390 of the Labour Code, two provisions that require compulsory arbitration when 30 days have elapsed since a strike call.

The arbitration procedure for the settlement of disputes must be used only where there is agreement by the parties and not where it is imposed by some of the sectors, so as to avoid a division among stakeholders in the work of work. Only in extreme cases, such as those in which there may be an impact on essential services in the strict sense of the term, or a risk to the life, health or safety of all or part of the population, can a solution by a third party be imposed, which is a position that has been held by the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association for many years.

The second aspect that should not be overlooked in the main discussion of the report of the Committee of Experts concerns the number of trade unions that have recently been recognized, according to information provided by the Government. It is important to have statistical data on the establishment of new trade unions to ensure continuity in the exercise and full development of freedom of association. However, given the examples of cases from many countries that we have seen, and that we will surely continue to see in this Committee, regarding situations in which the right to form trade unions is severely restricted, it is promising news that the right to organize is being promoted in Nicaragua through facilitation of its recognition.

We have always said, and we would like to reiterate, that freedom of association is more than the right to establish and join organizations, it is an essential measure that should not be overlooked.

Interpretation from Russian: Government member, Belarus – We are grateful to Nicaragua for the information they have provided on the question under consideration. We note the willingness of the Government to engage in constructive cooperation with the ILO. We welcome the efforts the Government has been making to encourage and protect the rights of workers through tripartite dialogue and consensus as a fundamental principle and a way of achieving social and labour stability in the country and peaceful development.

At the same time, we would like to make the following points. Being a member of a union or of an employers' organization, and this is stated in the Convention, does not absolve anyone from responsibility for illegal action not related to the protection of the rights and interests of workers and employers under the law.

We urge the ILO to take that into account and to be neutral and impartial when we are looking at an individual case. We believe that the recommendations of these supervisory bodies and the calls by some delegations for Nicaragua to review some of its national legislation, including the law on the protection of the country, its independent sovereignty and self-determination in the name of peace, are not the ILO's job and are interference in the internal affairs of Nicaragua.

Employer member, Mexico – In relation to the case of Nicaragua, it should be recalled that, at the 2022 and 2023 sessions of the International Labour Conferences, this Committee deplored the persistent climate of intimidation and harassment of independent workers' and employers' organizations.

It also noted with great concern the arrest and detention of leaders of employers' organizations and urged the Government of Nicaragua to immediately cease all acts of violence, threats, persecution, intimidation or any other form of aggression against individuals or organizations.

Unfortunately, as noted, this regrettable climate and environment have persisted, despite having been duly and thoroughly denounced in previous years.

We would like to recall that this Committee recommended that the Government avail itself of ILO technical assistance to ensure full compliance with its obligations under the Convention and, in particular, that it accept a direct contacts mission for an investigation with full access to the situation of the violation of the trade union rights of workers' and employers' organizations.

Claims of interference cannot be made when, unfortunately, violations of the human rights to freedom enshrined in the Convention exist and persist.

It should be noted that the UN Human Rights Council, which is the intergovernmental body responsible for strengthening the promotion and protection of human rights throughout the world, in the report of the Group of Human Rights Experts on Nicaragua submitted in March 2023 this year, indicated that, and I quote: "Agents and public officials of various agencies and structures of the Government, and non-State actors participated, and continue to participate, as of the date of writing of this report, in serious and systematic human rights violations and abuses against a sector of the Nicaraguan population, including extrajudicial executions and arbitrary detentions ...".

For this reason, we insist on the urgent need for technical assistance from this Organization and for social dialogue.

Worker member, Togo – The Committee of Experts' observation on the case of Nicaragua and the Convention highlights, among other things, the work carried out by the ILO in supervising the application and improvement of labour standards. In particular, I would like to refer to the Committee of Experts' comments reiterating its very positive position on the right of trade union organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes, in accordance with Article 3 of the Convention.

It is widely known that compulsory arbitration severely restricts trade union autonomy and, in the event of a collective dispute, can lead to the removal of mechanisms ensuring the applicability of other rights protected by industrial action. This means that compulsory arbitration is restricting freedom of association by limiting measures and restricting the guarantees of the rights protected in the event of a dispute. This twofold infringement of workers' rights leads the Committee to consider that the imposition of compulsory arbitration to end a strike, beyond the cases in which a strike may be limited or even prohibited, is contrary to the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes in full freedom.

We, the Workers, fully support the request to the Government to take the necessary measures to amend sections 389 and 390 of the Labour Code in order to ensure that compulsory arbitration is only possible in cases where strikes may be limited under absolutely exceptional circumstances, namely in essential services in the strict sense of the term or in the event of an acute national crisis.

We have positive expectations of the Committee's handling of this matter, which should lead to a change towards full recognition of freedom of association in Nicaragua.

Interpretation from Chinese: Government member, China – We appreciate Nicaragua's presentation. After careful review of the Committee of Experts' report, we take note of the important information and facts submitted by the Government. Nicaragua's diligent fulfilment of its obligations under the Convention with steady progress in freedom of association and protection of the right to organize merits the full endorsement of this Committee.

The Government has worked closely with businesses and other stakeholders to combat poverty. During the 2018–21 period alone, 111 trade unions were established covering nearly 4,000 workers, and almost 3,000 existing unions representing over 220,000 workers were revamped.

The country has strengthened tripartite consultations to optimize the minimum wage system. We applaud such efforts. We emphasize that any union or employers' organization should comply with the Constitution and law of its country and act within the bounds of national legislation.

The standards supervisory system is to facilitate better fulfilment of obligations under international Conventions by Member States. Its measures should be constructive and positive rather than destructive. The examination of country-specific cases should focus on the ILO's core functions and core mandate under the principles of fairness and impartiality. It is also paramount to give due weight to the authoritative information and important positions submitted by Member States.

We encourage the Government to continue strengthening its communication and exchange with the ILO and the standard supervisory system. We also call on this Committee to value the information provided by the Nicaraguan Government and to engage in constructive dialogue with it in a rational and practical manner. We also encourage the Committee to provide more standing technical support to assist the Nicaraguan authorities with resolving differences, achieving consensus and solving problems with partners through social dialogue, so that it fulfils its obligations with regard to the international labour Conventions.

Employer member, Spain – The employers of Spain deeply regret the facts under discussion here that constitute a serious violation of the fundamental Conventions, such as Convention No. 87, by the Government of Nicaragua, which does not appear to acknowledge the allegations.

It is impossible to envisage social dialogue in Nicaragua when the most representative employers' organizations have been arbitrarily dissolved and their members imprisoned and forced into exile. We strongly condemn these acts, which are contrary to the ILO fundamental Conventions and which blatantly violate internationally recognized human rights.

The Convention ensures the freedom of employers and workers to form their own organizations and elect their own representatives, and it is not up to the Government to choose the representatives with whom it will engage in social dialogue. The Government of Nicaragua must apply the fundamental Conventions, as soon as possible and in an effective manner, in law and in practice, and comply with its obligations as a Member of the ILO.

Government member, Honduras – We welcome the report presented by the Committee, whose function is to promote the universal ratification and application of fundamental international labour standards, including this Convention.

We support the ILO in its role of developing, promoting and supervising the application of ratified international labour standards, and of the fundamental Conventions in particular.

We also welcome the information provided by the Government of Nicaragua concerning its national legislation and with regard to the Convention. We acknowledge and appreciate the commitment by Nicaragua to aligning its actions with the Convention. We consider it appropriate to highlight the work carried out by the Government of Nicaragua regarding the establishment of trade unions and the updating of existing trade union organizations, and the other forms of progress demonstrated in this room by the delegates representing Nicaragua. We therefore recognize the work carried out by Nicaragua to promote social dialogue and tripartism, and the efforts made to apply the Convention.

Honduras hopes that the conclusions of this Committee will be technical and balanced, taking into consideration the information provided by the Nicaraguan Government and continuing to call for the promotion of decent work and fundamental rights and principles.

Government member, Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela – The Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela thanks Nicaragua for the information provided which details the significant progress made in the area of freedom of association and protection of the right to organize.

It also welcomes the Government's fulfilment of its obligations by promoting cooperation with the social partners, as reflected in its strengthened relationship with employers' organizations, and the creation and updating of trade union organizations in recent years, which bring together a significant number of the country's workers. We appreciate the Government's willingness and desire to make further concrete progress as it has done so far in the world of work in Nicaragua, in accordance with the principles of sovereignty, self-determination and non-interference.

Lastly, we call on the ILO to promote social dialogue between the actors in the world of work in Nicaragua, supporting the country with constructive, objective, lawful measures that will consolidate harmonious labour relations and guarantee protection for the working people of Nicaragua.

Interpretation from Russian: Government member, Russian Federation – We are grateful to the Government of Nicaragua's representative for providing explanations on the heart of the matter being discussed today: its compliance with Convention No. 87.

We believe that the allegations against Nicaragua of violating the right to freedom of association and the right to organize are unfounded. We echo the concern which is being expressed about the presence in this case of a certain amount of politics.

We believe that neither the Committee nor the ILO in its entirety has the authority to comment on the actions of national law enforcement agencies and/or courts. Equally, we do not consider that it is acceptable to have so-called recommendations concerning the need to review provisions of Nicaraguan legislation, especially individual articles of the Labour Code of that country. Such "recommendations" rather look like undue interference in the internal affairs of the State concerned.

Taking all that into account, we urge this Committee to note with satisfaction the report which has been made to you today by the Government of Nicaragua.

We have to put on record the fact that this case is yet another indication of a trend towards politicization of the work of the International Labour Organization, and an attempt to tie technical country reports to domestic events in a given nation. This particular practice leads to the politicization of the decisions then taken and that reduces quite considerably the possibility of their actually being carried out. In the final analysis it also undermines the authority of the Organization.

Employer member, Honduras – Once again, we observe with utmost concern how, after examination of this case by the Committee in the last two years, the Government of Nicaragua continues to violate the Convention. These repeated actions require the Committee to take robust, exemplary action against the Government since they are setting a negative precedent in terms of the respect that States must demonstrate for international labour standards.

Under the Convention, employers' organizations and trade unions do not require governments' authorization with regard to how they wish to organize themselves. That is a fundamental right that must be guaranteed by each of this Organization's Member States; governments are not authorized to decide which organizations can or cannot operate in their countries. In the case of Nicaragua, however, we have received reports on several occasions that the Government has taken action against the organizational structure of employers' organizations and trade unions, totally preventing social dialogue, which is the foundation of tripartism and the cornerstone of social peace.

I must stress that it is unacceptable that the Government of Nicaragua has launched arbitrary legal proceedings against representatives of employers and workers and even issued decrees to close their organizations. This is among the biggest violations ever brought before this Committee, and we therefore ask it to appoint a high-level tripartite mission to ensure compliance with its conclusions.

We must question the closures of employers' organizations in Nicaragua, which now total 19, including COSEP, as well as the expulsion from the country of many employer representatives, going so far as to deprive them of their nationality, in violation not only of the Convention, but also of the human rights of those individuals, who were simply fighting for their rights.

We regret that the Government of Nicaragua has given no indication of a desire to engage in dialogue with the social partners and has been extremely inflexible with regard to the Committee's conclusions. We hope that the situation will improve on this occasion and that this Organization will safeguard respect for the fundamental rights of employers and workers as social partners.

Interpretation from Arabic: Government member, Saudi Arabia – My country would like to express its thanks to the ILO for preparing the document and we thank the Government of Nicaragua for the information and clarification presented on the progress made regarding respect for freedom of association and protection of the right to organize. In view of the efforts undertaken to combat poverty, we welcome the constructive measures taken by the Republic of Nicaragua and we value its close cooperation and response to the standards supervisory bodies. One example relates to tripartism increasing wages by 10.1 per cent, which was negotiated between workers, employers and the Government. In this context, my country urges the ILO to provide the Republic of Nicaragua with sufficient time and the necessary technical assistance in order to achieve the objectives of the ILO.

Government member, Algeria – The Algerian delegation has listened attentively to the statement by the representative of the Government of Nicaragua. We note the information provided indicating that specific measures have been taken to safeguard trade union rights, enabling trade union organizations to be fully established and to operate freely, collective bargaining to be promoted and tripartite consultations to be held in accordance with the provisions of international Conventions. We note with satisfaction that the Government of Nicaragua remains committed to ensuring compliance with its Constitution, and with all national labour legislation. It is therefore confident that Nicaragua, despite the challenges it faces, remains firmly committed to observance of these Conventions. Algeria strongly advocates maintaining an open dialogue between Nicaragua and the competent ILO bodies, to achieve mutual understanding and to resolve the concerns expressed in a spirit of collaboration and mutual respect.

Government member, Tunisia – We welcome Her Excellency the Ministry of Labour of Nicaragua, and we thank her for the information provided on the progress made towards the application of the Convention.

We underline the importance given by Tunisia to rights and principles protected by the Convention and we value the work of this Committee in order to examine their application in law and in practice.

We appreciate the Government of Nicaragua's engagement to maintain communication and cooperation with the ILO and its supervisory bodies and see it as a proof of openness and dedication to the application of international labour standards. In particular, we welcome the renewed commitment and engagement expressed today to tripartism and social dialogue as a tool to promote social and labour rights.

We take note of the information provided by the delegation of Nicaragua related to the existing cooperation between the Government, employers and workers in order to implement the national plan to fight poverty, along with the increase in the number of union organizations. Such cooperation with social partners is necessary for social justice and for the successful and sustainable implementation of social policies. We therefore encourage the Government of Nicaragua to continue and expand such cooperation, and to pursue its efforts in advancing its national policies, taking into consideration the observations of the Committee of Experts.

Government member, Plurinational State of Bolivia – At the outset I would like to endorse the comment made by the distinguished Ambassador of Cuba: Government delegates and Employer and Worker delegates should be afforded the same respect. That is a basic principle in this tripartite forum.

The Plurinational State of Bolivia welcomes the distinguished delegation of the Government of Nicaragua and thanks it for the information provided with regard to its observance of the Convention.

My country promotes respect for the right of all workers to organize in trade unions under the trade union principles of unity, union democracy, solidarity and internationalization. We have therefore listened closely to the information provided and the efforts made by the Government of Nicaragua to guarantee respect for those rights.

We acknowledge those efforts and urge the authorities to continue strengthening the measures adopted to protect the right to organize and freedom of association. We welcome the good cooperation between the Chamber of Employers and government bodies, a relationship that contributes to the implementation of the national plan for poverty reduction. We also highlight the fact that, between 2018 and 2021, more than 111 new trade union organizations were formed. We believe that it is important to draw attention to such progress.

We note the report of the Committee of Experts and we urge them to promote rapprochement, dialogue and cooperation in creating trust with governments, workers and employers. These forums must be free of any attempts at politicization, and work towards the Convention's implementation must be undertaken in the manner set out in the text itself, with respect and in accordance with the laws and regulations of each country.

Chairperson – Thank you. I can see no more requests from the floor. Now I invite the Government representative of Nicaragua, Her Excellency the Minister of Labour, to make her concluding remarks.

Government representative – Our attention is drawn to what has been said by the Employers' representatives in this important session, especially the unfounded indications that the Convention is being violated in Nicaragua and that there are violations because there are workers, trade unionists or representatives of trade unions or union federations who have been detained or deprived of their freedom.

Allow me to say with all the respect which characterizes the people of Nicaragua, the model of government that we are developing, and our authorities: that there are no trade unionists who have been detained, that this was incomplete information, because when we appear at these meetings where we are seeking the way to elucidate facts and achieve clarity regarding the resolution of a supposed labour dispute, we must do so on the basis of the truth above all.

We are astonished because in Nicaragua we say that freedom of association exists because we have the evidence, the proof, we have the voice of the workers, and here at the ILO there are no complaints from any section of the Nicaraguan workers, from any trade union federation, from any trade union. If one or two Employers' representatives made comments regarding violation of the rights of an employers' association, if we are talking about COSEP, it does not exist in legal terms because it was abolished, not because it was annulled but because it did not comply with its requirements and financial responsibilities as an organization. And COSEP was never an employers' organization: COSEP was a non-governmental non-profit organization. This point has been clarified so that we can better understand how this situation has arisen. Hence we cannot make a connection with this matter and politicize it here when it is not a matter that comes within the scope of Convention No. 87.

They were and are not trade unionists. They were employers that formed a non-governmental organization, this is clear. I clarify this because this was done repeatedly, and I think we are here to avoid this bias when all is said and done. We have the responsibility to clarify this to the Employers that COSEP and its 18 affiliated associations were not unionized employers, COSEP and its associates never appeared in the Ministry of Labour's register.

All enterprises work freely in Nicaragua because in Nicaragua trade union organizations enjoy total autonomy as given to them by law in their action and their administration. However, we need to know this and take it into account when examining the fundamental subject of freedom of association. We must not address unrelated topics and get involved in discussions on them here. The Government of Reconciliation and National Unity led worthily by Commander Daniel Ortega is willing to engage in dialogue. This has been an effective instrument for the resolution of labour disputes in Nicaragua, preventing us getting into more serious disputes leading to strikes. We have not had any calls for strikes. The ministries, the Government and all the actors involved in the labour relationship are talking with the workers day and night. We are talking with the employers to reach a consensus as the effective way to prompt resolution of disputes in which neither the employers nor the workers lose. This is about both the business economy and the well-being of the workers and this is why we advocate it. We are focused on things being this way. We wish to arrive at the truth and we have presented the truth with data and reports. We hope that when reaching an intelligent solution we are able to filter out unrelated subjects and above all focus on the key issues.

We are willing to engage in dialogue provided that we revisit the spirit of the law, the spirit of the Convention, and this is what we ask of this honourable Committee.

In clarifying this stirring theme, we were surprised to have to say it but, as regards labour policy, our Government has been integrating the national poverty reduction and development plan, training activities, knowledge targeting various sectors of workers, trade unions, unionized women and young people in the unions, enabling them to create or better carry out their union activities, in relation to labour rights and occupational safety and health.

We are greatly concerned about the conditions faced by men and women workers. This is why there is free health care in Nicaragua and good social security conditions for the workers.

It is also important to clarify on the basis of the comments heard – and the Office should be clearer on this – that no complaints have been received from the workers and those that previously existed have been resolved in a very responsible and mature manner.

Consequently we cannot come here and hold a discussion on persecution of trade unions. There is no persecution of trade unions in Nicaragua. I do not say this because I am here in front of the delegates and the Committee, I say it because in Nicaragua at the present time there are no pending requests for legal registration of any trade union; all applications are processed within eight days. So we cannot come here and say that there is anti-union persecution.

Our Government works closely with the trade unions in order to establish agreements that improve conditions for men and women workers, agreements which contain clauses that create improvements for women workers in the different sectors of the economy, something which did not exist before 2007, and this means the eradication of poverty.

Eradicating poverty does not mean dealing with a strike and otherwise doing nothing. Creating wealth to eradicate poverty means dealing with a labour dispute at the same time as finding key solutions for both workers and employers. This is what we are doing in Nicaragua.

So we are astonished that we are being told here that we are violating the Convention and the right to organize.

We ask the honourable members of this Committee to work in accordance with these laws, the already established laws which govern activity in Nicaragua. These are already known by the workers, by the employers and by the people of Nicaragua because it is the people of Nicaragua which formulates and approves the legislation.

So let us respect this unique and absolute sovereignty of peoples. What we ask is that when reaching decisions on this aspect of the Convention we take account of all the progress that Nicaragua has made and that there is an ongoing commitment to the people of Nicaragua to continue working to ensure that every day the workers have better working conditions.

In Nicaragua there is no arbitrary action against a trade union leader. In Nicaragua a clearly defined labour administrative procedure has to be followed to secure the release of this trade union leader.

The Government of Nicaragua has laws which protect the workers because the development and future of Nicaraguan families depend on this. This is why we have to fight for this because some of us are in similar situations. We have to work to ensure that the families of these workers, this people and future generations have conditions of freedom and dignity and are committed to nurturing and defending peace and sovereignty.

We ask for this respect and change of view. We ask for an end to the politicization of these matters which lead somewhere else because Nicaragua is committed to negotiating with the workers on a daily basis.

This dialogue should be a healthy dialogue, a quality dialogue, which does not take us away from the context where we need to be. We will negotiate with those we need to negotiate with, with the men and women workers and the employers of this country who are playing an active part in the economy, to ensure the progress of Nicaragua. Surely this is our common goal?

We stress that we are willing to continue working together with the workers to progress in the elimination of poverty. But we will not let topics be imposed on us which do not come within the scope of the discussions of this Committee.

With all respect, as we have already said, we are concerned at the scenario in which the Employers' representatives provide us with inaccurate information. First let us have the facts, then let us talk if we really have a basis for saying that freedom of association is being violated in Nicaragua. But if we do not have a basis, we cannot make such a claim and say that "things have to be done". Nicaragua is free, sovereign and independent.

We thank all the countries which have supported us in these efforts aimed at the well-being of our nations, the well-being of Nicaragua.

Employer members – I will begin with some points of order. First, Mr Chair, I would like to ask that the inappropriate expressions used by the Worker representative of Nicaragua which are unconnected with this case be left out of the record. We consider that the comment regarding the IOE is inappropriate and we want this to be noted in the record.

We are listening with the utmost respect, and we think that the Office should note the invitation made by the Workers' representative to know what is happening in situ. This is precisely what we have been saying, perhaps with some familiar expressions which we understand clearly, but in plain term, this is about technical assistance.

So there is an invitation by the Worker representative and I listened to everything he said with the greatest respect. But it does seem to me that there are some inappropriate expressions which should be left off the record, above all because they are outside the context of the case we are dealing with. I also ask that this invitation is noted, which appears to me to be in good faith, and that in good faith we will need to find a way to accept it.

On the other hand, and before making my prepared statement, I am going to refer to some questions that the Government representative mentioned, which I also listened to with absolute respect. It seems to me that ultimately there is a lack of proper understanding of the scope of the Convention since I celebrate the existence of these dialogues, these negotiations, these registrations of trade unions, etc., and what is real cause for celebration is the exercise of workers' rights. But this exercise of rights is also for the employers, the scope of the Convention is for both and does not refer to the registration of trade unions but to the right enjoyed by employers and workers to establish organizations. The Convention provides that this shall be without prior authorization and also that these organizations shall not be subject to administrative dissolution. It is not about trade union registration, though I celebrate the fact that this is done with such efficacy and that all trade union registration is up to date. But the Convention has a greater scope. It is the capacity possessed by all workers and employers – many workers are employers, and many employers are workers – to establish their own organizations and to organize, to create these third entities through which common interests are shared and mutual rights and interests are defended.

So I think I should make this clarification because it seems that the technical assistance of the Office would be key in terms of understanding the scope of the Convention on the basis of the current reality.

Forgive me for repeating this: it seems that the Committee of Experts uses an expression which is very clear, that both the representatives of the Workers and those of the Government have celebrated the work of the Office and the work of the Office is enshrined in the work of the Committee of Experts. So everything that we have been saying in this meeting is based on what the Committee of Experts says, not on conjecture or on what we believe or wish to believe. These discussions are based on the report of the Committee of Experts, in which we all believe. And this report contains all the facts that we have all related this afternoon, though obviously with some exceptions, which I also respect.

The Committee of Experts says that the rights of employers' and workers' organizations protected by the Convention are utterly devoid of meaning when there is no respect for all fundamental freedoms. We are not referring to the registration of a union but to fundamental freedoms, including freedom of association, the right to protection against arbitrary detention and imprisonment, and the right to a fair trial by an independent and impartial tribunal. This is very important and is in line with the Committee of Experts' report, not the speculations of an official. This is what we are discussing today.

It seems that what needs to be made clear, and what we have tried to get the Government to see, is that what has appeared these last two years to be a discussion between conflicting views has not been intended in that way. It seems to me that all of us sitting here share principles and values; that is why we are here, that is why we are subject to Conventions which we ratify voluntarily. These Conventions contain certain rights and establish certain limitations and obligations for governments.

So what I very much regret is that, despite this constructive invitation which we formulated in our first statement today, we find the same resistance to, and rejection of, any kind of solution to the issues raised by the Government. This is despite the fact that, regardless of what the Government thinks, a reading of the report of the Committee of Experts reveals a very serious situation and we have to attend to it.

Under these conditions, we would like the conclusions agreed upon in 2023 to be reiterated with much greater vigour. We wish to propose – and we ask the Workers to back the request or otherwise that we discuss it in the conclusions – that we need a high-level tripartite mission. This is the only way to tackle the problem, to see it as guidance, not as a penalty. It is a mechanism for understanding the issues where there is non-observance of Conventions and how to resolve them where necessary. If it is established on the ground that the issues do not exist, the high-level tripartite mission will certainly take account of that and report on it; otherwise it will come up with solutions to the issues through technical assistance.

On the other hand, in view of the seriousness of the case, we also ask for a special paragraph to be included. It is very important that we have these two elements in the conclusions. I have heard that the majority here in the room agree that a solution to this problem cannot be delayed any further. It seems essential that we act immediately and decisively. Otherwise we will run the risk that in 2025 we will find the same situation or one that is even worse.

I think it essential that we attend to this matter, not only urging and inviting the Government but also hoping that it will attend to all the aspects which were mentioned in the conclusions of 2023, and otherwise that we can actually set up this high-level tripartite mission and that we leave a special paragraph for anything. I hope that in 2025 we will only have good news and that the Government will be willing to cooperate so that we can understand and find a solution to the issue once and for all. As I previously mentioned, problems that are not recognized cannot be resolved.

This is the Employers' position. We ask that due note is taken of our requests in the conclusions.

Worker members – We note the information and the replies given by the Government of Nicaragua. We also thank the speakers for all their valuable statements.

We would like to recall that the Convention covers both the employers and the workers and this principle must be respected.

Our group emphasizes once again the importance of continuing to promote tripartite social dialogue at national level and encourages the Government to take steps to facilitate social dialogue with ILO assistance.

We encourage the Government to continue to launch initiatives and activities to ensure the free exercise of the right to organize. In this regard, we also urge the Government to put an end to all acts of violence, threats, persecution, stigmatization and intimidation with regard to the exercise of the legitimate activities of the social partners.

We also urge the Government to amend sections 389 and 390 of the Labour Code so as to ensure that compulsory arbitration is only possible in cases where strike action can be restricted or even prohibited – that is to say, in cases of disputes within the public service involving officials exercising authority in the name of the State, in essential services in the strict sense of the term or in the event of an acute national crisis, and we invite the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance.

The Worker members encourage the Government of Nicaragua to take all necessary steps to ensure compliance with the Committee's recommendations and invite the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee deeply deplored the persistent climate of intimidation and harassment of independent workers' and employers' organizations.

The Committee noted with deep concern the allegations of the arrest and detention of employer leaders since last year and the further deterioration of the situation.

The Committee also noted with deep concern the absence of any progress and cooperation on the part of the Government since last year's discussion.

Taking into account the discussion, the Committee urged the Government, in the strongest terms, to:

- ensure that workers and employers can establish their own organizations and operate without interference and in that regard ensure that, the Higher Council for Private Enterprise of Nicaragua (COSEP) is able to operate again without previous authorization in line with article 2 of the Convention;

- immediately cease all acts of violence, threats, persecution, stigmatization, intimidation or any other form of aggression against individuals or organizations in connection with both the exercise of legitimate activities of trade unions and employers' organizations, and adopt measures to ensure that such acts are not repeated;
- ensure that representatives of employers' organizations who have been deprived of the Nicaraguan nationality have it restored without delay;
- take all measures to ensure that there is a climate free of fear and intimidation regarding the exercise of freedom of association rights;
- immediately release any employer or trade union member who may be imprisoned in connection with the exercise of the legitimate activities of their organizations and report on all the measures adopted to ensure compliance with such request;
- restore social dialogue with its independent social partners without further delay including the establishment of a tripartite dialogue round table under the auspices of the ILO, as recommended by the Conference Committee in 2022 and 2023; and
- provide information on all the measures adopted to ensure that effect is given to each of the recommendations made by the Conference Committee and on any progress achieved in the implementation of these measures.

The Committee urged the Government to fully respect the conclusions of the Committee on this matter and to avail itself of the technical assistance of the ILO to ensure full compliance with them.

Government representative – The State of Nicaragua deeply regrets the content of the conclusions issued by the Committee because we consider them to be totally excessive and to constitute clear interference in the internal, sovereign decisions of our country.

In that regard, we therefore wish to say that from the point of view of the law and the commitment of our people, our country and our Government, these conclusions are totally divorced from the work of this esteemed Organization and Committee.

Taking into account the content and the spirit of the Convention, which is what we are dealing with in this case, Nicaragua has demonstrated compliance and has given evidence, documentation and information through its reports to the organization regarding the progress and actual work done with regard to ensuring freedom of association in Nicaragua.

We therefore say once again, with the greatest respect, that we, the workers and Government of Nicaragua, totally reject the content of these conclusions since we consider that they violate the peace, sovereignty and self-determination of our people.

We also wish to record the fact that our people, our Government and the workers and employers of Nicaragua are willing to continue ensuring an in-depth, quality dialogue strictly within the framework of the labour rights of the workers. So we say that the dialogue is ongoing provided that it is not distorted and separated from our intention, provided that it does not interfere in the internal affairs of Nicaragua, in the legal framework, in the application of our laws, and does not undermine the peace and sovereignty of our country.

This is what we are obliged to say today, to request the ILO, with all due respect, that we should work to ensure and value the results and progress that Nicaragua has made regarding the restitution of the right to freedom of association and the right to organize; and as we said earlier, to assess those results positively because we know that we have been working to ensure the labour stability of a working people, to ensure the confidence of the employers so that we can continue developing the country and creating jobs that bring development to Nicaraguan families; and that we should value the existing results and continue to pursue them, despite their having been obscured through political bias.

Paraguay (ratification: 1967)

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81)

Written information provided by the Government

It should be noted that since the current Administration took office in August 2023, it has worked to make comprehensive improvements to the services provided by the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security (MTESS), including labour inspection and monitoring, which the Government deems a priority in reaching its objectives.

In this regard, we have noted the concerns expressed by the Ibero-American Confederation of Labour Inspectors (CIIT) regarding the implementation of the Convention. It is important to highlight, however, that the Government's aim from the beginning has been to improve the process implemented by the MTESS, which involves undertaking reviews and relevant investigations so as to resolve any irregularities, thereby ensuring that it can effectively carry out its functions. With this point in mind, specifically in relation to the request of the Committee of Experts, the Government provides the following information.

Articles 6 and 7 of the Convention. Status, conditions of service and recruitment of labour inspectors

With regard to the recruitment and current status of labour inspectors under the Ministry, the Government wishes to outline the process applicable to them since their recruitment to the MTESS in 2015. A total of 29 officials were recruited to the post of labour inspectors under MTESS Resolution No. 984/2015. They received training from the ILO from February to April 2016, and in October 2017 a 100-hour labour inspector training programme, led by ILO specialists and national and international consultants, was introduced for all officials with inspection duties within the General Labour Inspectorate, including directors, heads of department and labour inspectors.

It should be noted that, although the labour inspectors recruited under MTESS Resolution No. 984/2015 were engaged under annual service contracts with the MTESS, they enjoy the same rights and responsibilities as permanent MTESS officials, including paid annual holiday, statutory leave and breaks, an annual bonus, health insurance, childcare, education grants for each school-age child and grants paid upon the birth or death of a first-degree relative.

With regard to contract staff, under Act No. 5554/16 and Decree No. 4774/16, the Public Service Secretariat introduced a policy to reduce precarious work by recruiting such staff as permanent officials through selection processes and internal institutional competitions, in line with the criteria set out in the regulations in force. In December 2021, the MTESS launched an ad referendum process to reduce precarious work through which contract staff joined the payroll of appointed (permanent) MTESS staff.

The MTESS labour inspectors recruited in 2015 were included in that process to reduce precarious work, and their wages have increased since they joined the Ministry. It should also be mentioned that the same process for MTESS contract staff was formalized through Presidential Decree No. 8773 of 26 January 2023. The inspectors selected and recruited as permanent MTESS staff are listed below:

No.	Full name	Identity card number
1	Luisana Patricia Duarte	3.700.257
2	Ana Karen Casco	4.016.608
3	Jorge Adalberto Aguayo Nacimiento	2.291.422
4	Ronald Rodrigo Quintana Coronel	3.439.754
5	Eligio Gómez Candia	3.425.006
6	Félix Vidal Melgarejo Mosqueira	3.189.738
7	Irene Montserrat Pereira Giménez	4.178.516
8	Santiago Luis Rótela Roa	2.022.490

The current Government, since it took up office on 15 August 2023, has taken very seriously the number of active labour inspectors and their situation within the institution, as it is aware of the importance of inspectors for the performance of the competencies of the MTESS in the area of inspection. For that reason, as soon as it took office, it proceeded to promote two inspectors who had been recruited through the above-mentioned Resolution No. 984/2015 and who were trained by the ILO in 2016 and 2017, and included in the process to reduce precarious work in 2023. These two inspectors currently hold the posts of Director of Labour and Occupational Safety Inspection and Head of the Labour Inspection Department.

In line with the seriousness with which the current Government is taking the situation, as mentioned above, the Minister of Labour, Employment and Social Security, Ms Mónica Recalde, through a ministerial resolution, decided to reassign civil servants to the General Labour Inspectorate. It should be highlighted that, as set out in article 216 of the National Constitution, the Bill on the national general expenditure budget should be presented annually by the executive branch by 1 September at the latest. Hence, we are currently implementing a budget established by the previous Government which did not provide for new recruits to increase the number of the inspectors. However, the current Government has requested that the budget be increased in order to recruit 25 new inspectors as permanent officials of the MTESS, approval of which is to be authorized by the National Congress.

With regard to the pay scale and benefits applicable to labour inspectors compared with other public servants performing similar functions, on average a labour inspector of the Ministry of Labour currently receives 5,500,000 Paraguayan guaraníes per month as pay and 1,650,000 guaraníes per month in bonuses, amounting to a monthly average of 7,150,000 guaraníes. This is in line with a comparison with data published by the Ministry of Industry and Trade of Paraguay, in accordance with Act No. 5.189, which establishes the obligation to provide information on the utilization of public resources for pay and other remuneration assigned to public servants of the Republic of Paraguay. An inspector of the Ministry of Industry and Trade receives an average of 3,518,750 guaraníes, detailed as follows:

No.	Full name	Identity card number	Previous salary (guaranies)	Current salary
1	Fernando Báez	2.545.748	3,950,000	Contracted
2	Jorge Cabrera	662.627	3,600,000	Permanent
3	Ezequiel Domínguez	751.261	3,600,000	Permanent
4	Aníbal Mendieta	992.818	3,000,000	Permanent
5	Jorge Chaparro	1.998.892	4,900,000	Permanent
6	Wilson Villalba	3.176.299	3,400,000	Permanent
7	Elida Chamorro	3.215.276	2,700,000	Permanent
8	José María Ríos	3.489.553	3,000,000	Permanent
Average			3,518,750

Articles 10 and 11. Number of labour inspectors. Material conditions of work

The total number of inspectors assigned to the General Labour Inspectorate of the MTESS is currently 15, as established by Ministerial Resolution.

Although 10 of the 15 inspectors are assigned to the country's capital, these inspectors carry out inspection orders throughout the country, as the legislation is not federal and nor are restrictions imposed on it at department level. Considering that geographical distances in Paraguay are relatively short and that a labour inspector can travel from the capital to any part of the country within hours by land transport, it is therefore not strictly necessary to assign inspectors to all of the country's departments, as they can travel easily to carry out the work that falls within their competence.

Regarding the allocation of vehicles exclusively for inspectors to carry out their inspection duties, it should be mentioned that the MTESS currently has a digital system for requesting the provision of work vehicles, which improves organizational efficiency. Through this system, requests for vehicles are made for the work required and are processed immediately for the effective transport of officials.

There are also regional labour offices in the country, under the MTESS, in the following departments: Alto Paraná, Amambay, Mariscal Estigarribia, Caaguazú, Canindeyú, Central, Concepción, Guairá, Itapúa, Cordillera, Ñeembucú, Paraguari, Presidente Hayes, San Pedro and Boquerón, data on which are available on the MTESS website. Five of these departments have labour inspectors specifically assigned to the territory.

It should be mentioned that the current administration is developing the policy of public expenditure rationalization initiated in previous years, with clear restrictions on non-priority expenditures, such as travel allowances, tickets, overtime, fuel, and staff appointments and recruitment.

It should also be noted that the Civil Service Bill is currently before the national Parliament, in view of the need for institutional strengthening of the civil service. The main objective of the Bill is to establish the general provisions governing the civil service, to regulate specifically civil service careers, and to determine the regulatory competence in this area for public institutions within the executive branch.

This initiative is in line with the many other efforts being undertaken by this Government as a whole to initiate the systematic and specific process of restructuring the State, the goal of which is to make the administration more agile, predictable, transparent and open to citizens.

Articles 12(1)(a) and (c)(ii), 16 and 18. Restrictions on the power of labour inspectors to enter freely workplaces liable to inspection. Limitations on carrying out labour inspections.

Regarding the draft amendments to Resolutions Nos 47/2016, 56/2017, 217/2021 and 29/2023, it should be noted that Resolution No. 90/2023 of 6 September 2023 is currently in force, authorizing the formation of a technical team to review and amend the ministerial regulations governing inspection procedures and the establishment of a protocol for receiving complaints, in order to refer them to the General Labour Inspectorate, which has resulted in a new ministerial resolution approving a new inspection procedure

Lastly, according to the information provided by the General Labour Inspectorate, all inspections are confidential and are carried out without prior notice to the employer, in compliance with the labour standards and administrative procedures in force.

Inspection period	Number of inspections carried out
January – August 2023	187
August 2023 – May 2024	66

Approximately 80 per cent of the inspections carried out on the basis of complaints and accidents at work are in the capital and metropolitan area.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the Government representative of Paraguay, Deputy Minister of Labour, to take the floor.

Government representative – It is an honour for me to address you today on behalf of the Government to discuss and defend our position in relation to the implementation of Convention No. 81. Since taking office as the new Government in August 2023, we have been working indefatigably to improve and strengthen the services of the MTESS, with a particular focus on labour inspection and compliance, which we consider to be fundamental pillars for the achievement of our national objectives.

We, as a Government, value the comments made by the Committee of Experts and the concerns expressed by the CIIT. I will discuss in detail below our action and responses to the matters raised.

Contractual terms and conditions of service of labour inspectors. Since 2015, we have recruited 29 labour inspectors in accordance with MTESS Resolution No. 984/2015, who have received specialized training from the ILO through programmes undertaken by specialists, national and international consultants, for the benefit of all officials involved in inspection activities, including department directors and chiefs and labour inspectors.

Despite the fact that these officials were originally recruited under annual contracts for the provision of services between the MTESS and the labour inspectors, it should be emphasized that they benefit from rights equivalent to those of permanent officials, including paid holiday, medical insurance and various allowances.

With reference to the personnel who were recruited, the Secretariat of the Public Service, through Act No. 5554/16 and Decree No. 4774/16, have initiated a policy to overcome precarious work. This policy consists of the inclusion of contract personnel as permanent officials through a selection or an internal competition procedure, in accordance with the criteria set out in the regulations in force. In December 2021, the MTESS commenced a process of eliminating precarious work ad referendum, thereby permitting contract staff to join the permanent staff of the MTESS.

It is pertinent to note that, in August 2023, when the new Government took office, there were 19 MTESS inspectors who had been recruited in 2015, who were among the staff of the Ministry, and who were included in the process of combating precarious work under Presidential Decree No. 8773, of 26 January 2023, and half of them have been included in the permanent personnel.

Since the present Government took office on 15 August 2023, we have noted with great interest and concern the actual number of labour inspectors and their situation within the institution, in our awareness of the importance of these professionals in giving effect to the mandate of the MTESS. For that reason, immediately after taking office, we promoted two inspectors recruited under Resolution No. 984/2015, who had been trained by the ILO in 2016 and 2017, who were removed from their precarious status in 2023. These inspection personnel currently occupy the positions of Director of Labour and Occupational Safety Inspection and Head of the Department of Labour Inspection.

In line with the above, the Minister, Ms Mónica Recalde, through MTESS Resolution No. 331/2024, has updated the list of officials of the General Directorate of Labour Inspection, in which 15 officials exercise the functions of inspectors and the rest are support staff.

On the wage structure. We have worked hard to ensure that labour inspectors receive just and competitive remuneration. Inspectors currently receive a monthly average of 7,150,000 guaranies, which is significantly higher than the average of 3,518,750 guaranies received by inspectors in other public institutions, such as the Ministry of Trade and Industry. This adjustment reflects our recognition of the vital work performed by our inspectors and our will to adopt appropriate salary levels.

On the number of inspectors and their material conditions of work. We recognize the need to increase the number of inspectors to ensure adequate and effective coverage. There are currently 15 inspectors appointed under MTESS Resolution No. 331/2024. An application has also been made to the National Congress for an increase in the budget to recruit 25 new permanent inspectors. The file is currently with the Ministry of Finance under SIME No. 42.569/2024

It is important to note that, in accordance with the national Constitution, the Bill on the general expenditure of the nation has to be submitted annually by the executive authorities to the National Congress by 1 September each year. Taking into account that the current Government recently took office on 15 August 2023, that is 15 days before the Constitutional delay for the submission of the budgetary law, the present Government is implementing the budget prepared by the previous Government.

The 15 inspectors who are currently carrying out their duties are assigned to the capital and the interior of the country. It is important to note that our country is a unitary Republic, in which the legislation governs the whole of the country, despite our division into departments, which does not involve the adoption of special legislation. The geography of Paraguay makes it possible for inspectors to travel from the capital to any point in the country in a few hours using land transport, which facilitates their work, without the need to assign inspectors to all departments.

We have also introduced a digital system to request institutional vehicles, thereby facilitating the mobility and the work of inspectors throughout the national territory.

It is also the case that certain departments of significant economic importance, such as Alto Paraná, have three inspectors who cover this frontier area with Brazil and the department of Canindeyú.

In parallel, the Parliament is examining the Civil Service Act. This Act seeks to strengthen the institutional nature of the public service through the establishment of general provisions governing civil service careers and determining regulatory competence in respect of public institutions under the executive authorities. This Bill is undergoing broad discussion with the various trade unions.

On the free access of inspectors to workplaces, the situation regarding the amendment of resolutions and the suspension of inspections. In accordance with our national legislation, in cases where inspectors cannot have free access to private establishments, the MTESS has the power to request precautionary measures through the appropriate jurisdiction to allow entry, in accordance with section 18 of Act No. 5115/2013.

It is also important to note that, under the terms of Resolution No. 90/2023, of 6 September, a technical team was set up for the amendment of the ministerial rules, which resulted in Resolution No. 356 of 21 May 2024, setting aside Resolution No. 47/2016 and MTESS Resolution No. 56/2017, and repealing sections 3 and 4 of MTESS Resolution No. 29/2023, and the adoption of the Manual of Labour Inspection and Monitoring Procedures. On this point, I wish to point out in particular that Resolution No. 29 does not in any way establish a moratorium or the suspension of labour inspections, but rather calls for procedures to be governed by an inspection order issued by the highest institutional authority. As this provision has been repealed, the responsibility lies once again with the General Directorate of Labour Inspection.

In light of the above, it is clear that at no time did the Government suspend inspections. Moreover, with reference to labour inspection and monitoring between August 2023 and May 2024, a total of 66 inspection procedures were carried out on compliance with decent work and occupational safety and health provisions.

It is also important to indicate that the MTESS carries out inspections together with the Paraguay Social Welfare Institute (IPS) and the Deputy Minister of Transport within their respective areas, making a total of 175 enterprise monitoring procedures by labour inspectors during that period. During the inspection activities, over 1,000 workers were interviewed on a random basis and over 6,500 workers were detected in those enterprises through administrative monitoring.

Failure to comply with labour provisions resulted in penalties and fines amounting to a total of 9,101,112,804 guaraníes over the period.

I would add that, taking into account the observation of the Committee of Experts, as indicated previously, Resolution MTESS No. 346 was issued establishing more flexible procedures which will result in much more efficient and rapid inspection.

Focusing on the flowchart of the labour inspection circuit, it includes various units in the Ministry of Labour, culminating with the legal office of the Ministry.

On inspections and penalties. Since taking office, we have intensified inspections without previous warning in order to ensure compliance with labour provisions. In accordance with the Convention, inspectors are authorized to enter premises freely without previous notice, upon presentation of the respective inspection order, and may be accompanied by other public officials and, where appropriate, a member of the union or workers' committee.

It is important to refer to and to express gratitude for the support provided by the ILO throughout the existence of the MTESS in Paraguay, which was created only ten years ago. In this regard, we request ILO technical cooperation to continue strengthening inspection and other areas covered by the Ministry.

We emphasize the valuable contribution of the Tripartite Advisory Board, a body created by executive decree with representatives of the trade union confederations, employers' organizations and the national Government, which is carrying out action to contribute to the defence of labour rights.

It is important to refer to the opening of various dialogue roundtables, such as the social security roundtable, which resulted in the Act creating the Pensions Superintendence of Paraguay, which was submitted in a consensual manner to this tripartite body (worker, employer and Government representatives), the draft text of which has been approved by the national Parliament.

Roundtables have also been established for housing and freedom of association, of which the latter is very important and in which we have been working with our trade union colleagues to endeavour to improve this fundamental workers' right. We wish to emphasize that these bodies are strengthening the role of tripartism as a component of social cohesion, in accordance with the ILO's mandate.

In conclusion, the Government is firmly committed to the continued improvement of labour inspection services, thereby ensuring just and decent conditions of work for all our workers. We thank this prestigious Committee for its attention and we reiterate our readiness to continue working with the ILO and other international organizations

Employer members – We thank the Government for the oral and written information provided, of which we have taken full note.

The Employers' Group emphasizes the importance of compliance with the Convention, which is one of the ILO's four priority governance Conventions and was ratified by Paraguay in 1967.

By way of background, this case is not new, as the Committee discussed comments on compliance with the Convention at the 1993 session of the International Labour Conference. Moreover, since 2013, the Committee of Experts has made observations on the application of this Convention on three occasions, namely in 2013, 2020 and 2023.

In its report, the Committee of Experts identifies the following issues that should be reviewed by the Conference in this case:

- (1) the persistence of issues relating to the insufficient number of labour inspectors and material resources allocated to the labour inspectorate. In this regard, the Committee noted in particular the indications by the CIIT that inspectors are assigned to only four departments and to the capital district, while the remaining 12 departments have no assigned inspectors;

- (2) the failure of the Government to lift the restrictions established by MTESS Resolutions Nos 47 of 2016 and 56 of 2017 on the powers of inspectors to enter freely and without prior notice any workplace liable to inspection, and the frequency and thoroughness of labour inspections;
- (3) that, with the adoption of MTESS Resolution No. 29 of 2023, inspection activities have been further restricted by the need to obtain an inspection order issued by the highest MTESS authority.

With regard to the relevant data, the Employer members observe that the Committee of Experts noted the report submitted by the Government, which essentially stated that through MTESS Resolution No. 984/2015:

- (1) a total of 29 officials were recruited as labour inspectors and were trained by the ILO between February and April 2016 and, subsequently, in October 2017 a labour inspector training programme was established;
- (2) the labour inspectors were recruited under annual service contracts and that, under Act No. 5554/2016 and Decree No. 4774/16, the MTESS provided for contract staff to join the permanent staff.

It also noted that most inspectors are centralized in the capital, and it can be considered that, in the absence of departmental restrictions, and as the distances between regions are not great, labour inspectors have the logistical resources to travel from one place to another, according to the information provided by the Government. In short, the assignation of inspectors to all the country's departments would not be necessary.

Lastly, in relation to the limitations on the powers of inspectors to undertake their inspection activities freely, Paraguayan legislation does not in effect allow inspectors to enter private establishments freely without the authorization of management and, in the event of obstruction, the MTESS can ask the courts to impose precautionary measures to allow them to enter, in accordance with section 18 of Act No. 5115/13.

With regard to the analysis and consideration of this case, the Employer members consider it important to recall that, during the drafting of the Plan of action (2010-2016) to achieve widespread ratification and effective implementation of the governance Conventions, which was adopted by the Governing Body at its 306th Session in November 2009, it was considered that ensuring compliance with labour standards is vital to the ongoing promotion of decent work, and that one of the most important mechanisms to that end is the establishment of effective labour inspection services to enhance social protection.

On the basis of the guidance set out in the Convention, the importance can be seen of labour inspection services that are well structured, not only administratively but also in terms of sufficient institutional strength, with an appropriate number of inspectors so that they can play an effective role in verifying and ensuring the full implementation of labour regulations in complete compliance with Articles 9 and 10 of the Convention.

We are sure, indeed convinced, that the best way to improve the inspection system is through the provision of resources that ensure that, through its structure and organization, the system:

- (1) fulfils its role in an impartial, comprehensive and specialized manner with a view to achieving greater formalization in the country;
- (2) provides the necessary operational and logistical resources to inspectors;

- (3) comprises sufficient numbers of inspectors to provide adequate coverage for the effective supervision of labour regulations; and, finally,
- (4) grants inspectors appropriate wage levels that recognize the professionalization and specialization required of them.

In light of the above, the Employer members believe that it is important for the national authorities to intensify their efforts to explore options that allow the continuous improvement of the labour inspection system, appropriately regulating its scope and ensuring that there are no unjustified or bureaucratic limitations on the discharge by inspectors of their role of labour supervision, with the possibility of requesting the technical assistance of the ILO in all cases

Worker members – This individual case relates to the application by Paraguay of Convention No. 81. By way of context, we would like to recall that our Committee has examined compliance with international labour Conventions by Paraguay on several occasions, and most recently in 2017 for violations of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29).

Since then, we have been hoping that Paraguay would finally take the necessary steps to improve its situation in relation to trade union rights. Regrettably, that is not the case. The situation of workers has not improved and, in some respects, has even got worse. The measures adopted in recent years show that there has been practically no impact.

It is clear that, in a country in which over 60 per cent of the active population is working in the informal economy, the action of the labour inspection services concerns, in a certain manner, a small visible part of a much greater universe of precarious workers.

The report of the Committee of Experts leaves no room for doubt that Convention No. 81 is essential in guaranteeing the effectiveness of labour inspection, which is being flagrantly ignored by the Government, thereby endangering labour rights and social stability.

In the first place, the legal status and conditions of work of labour inspectors are a matter of concern. According to the information provided in the report of the Committee of Experts, the labour inspectors recruited in 2015 were engaged through a merit-based competition and not a competitive selection process for permanent positions. Moreover, those who were successful in the merit-based competition in 2015 were engaged under annual service contracts, and their status is therefore that of self-employed workers providing civil or commercial services for the MTESS.

This recruitment system makes inspectors precarious in the absence of employment stability. According to the information provided to the Committee of Experts, of the 19 inspectors who are still engaged, only eight enjoy employment stability, and the other 11 still have annual contracts. This not only affects their employment stability, but also their capacity to discharge their duties independently and effectively.

The report of the Committee of Experts also notes another very significant issue: the salaries of inspectors have not been increased since 2015. This not only considerably reduces the purchasing power of inspectors, affecting their quality of life and well-being, but also has an impact on the operation and efficiency of the system.

Another critical issue, in relation to compliance with the Convention, is the inadequate numbers of labour inspectors. The report of the Committee of Experts indicates that, of the 30 recruited in 2015, only 19 are still in their posts. These inspectors are distributed unequally: 13 are in Asunción, three in Alto Paraná and one each in the departments of Cordillera, Paraguarí and Ñeembucú. The most serious aspect of this is that the other 12 departments of Paraguay, which I will not name, only have one inspector assigned. This means that there is a complete absence of labour inspection in a large part of the national territory of Paraguay.

Moreover, inspectors lack the appropriate material conditions to carry out their work. For example, they do not have vehicles for transport, which is a basic tool for the discharge of their duties in different places and in travelling from one place to another. This lack of logistical resources is a severe obstacle to the capacity of inspectors to carry out their functions efficiently, and particularly, in a timely manner in response to complaints or the detection of the need for inspection.

The Committee of Experts noted with concern that the Government has not adopted any measures to remove the restrictions on the freedom of inspectors to enter workplaces liable to inspection. As indicated in the report of the Committee of Experts, it is a matter of great concern that the Government has not lifted the restrictions established by MTESS Resolutions Nos 47 of 2016 and 56 of 2017 on the power of labour inspectors to enter freely and without previous notice any workplace liable to inspection and that workplaces are inspected as often and as thoroughly as is necessary, as provided in the Convention. It is also a cause for concern that, through the adoption of resolution No. 29 of 2023 of the Ministry, inspection activities have been further restricted by the need to obtain an inspection order issued by the highest authority of the Ministry.

We share the deep concern expressed by the Committee of Experts at the persistence of the problems relating to the insufficient number of labour inspectors and, we repeat, the material resources allocated to the labour inspection services.

Since August 2023, we have seen a systematic dismantling of the labour inspection system in Paraguay, with the suspension of inspections under the pretext or the claim of preventing corruption and reviewing internal procedures. This retrogression, which is delivering the country to damaging practices, is compromising the safety and well-being of millions of women and men workers in Paraguay.

It is vital to recall that Paraguay had a set of highly trained inspectors due to the efforts made, including with ILO support, who played a vital role in the protection of labour rights.

This Committee must not allow this progress that had been made in Paraguay with the technical assistance provided by the ILO to become a shadow of past achievements.

The lack of compliance with the Convention is not only a violation of labour rights, but also, as we all know, a threat to social justice and progress in the country. The country is in deficit in relation to its workers and its international commitment to give effect to the provisions of the Convention in law and practice.

We demand the Government to take urgent measures to remedy the situation by guaranteeing the stability and dignity of labour inspectors and ensuring respect for the rights of all workers in Paraguay.

Employer member, Paraguay – We are pleased that we can meet again at this session of the Committee, where the observance of Convention No. 81 by Paraguay is being examined in the context of this Conference. In this context, the Employers have fully analysed and evaluated the report of the Committee of Experts, and on the basis of this analysis I would like to make a number of points.

Employers in Paraguay support the initiatives taken by the Government since it came into office in August 2023, aimed at improving labour inspection conditions and efficiency. These actions show a commitment to strengthening the labour inspection system and complying with the provisions of Convention No. 81, ensuring fair and decent working conditions for all workers.

We commend the efforts to increase the number of inspectors, improve their training and ensure fair remuneration for them, which will contribute to a safer and more equitable working environment in our country.

Furthermore, it is vitally important to recognize that improvements to the employment status of inspectors have a direct impact on the effectiveness of inspections and, consequently, on compliance with labour standards. A well-trained corps of inspectors, adequately paid and with stable conditions of employment, is essential to ensure that workers' rights are respected and that enterprises operate within the framework of the law.

The professionalization and strengthening of the inspectorate not only benefits workers, but also promotes an environment of fair competition and enterprise sustainability, which is essential for the economic development of the country.

Lastly, I would like to reiterate that employers in Paraguay see firm determination and political will on the part of the Government authorities to take the necessary remedial measures to improve the labour inspection system, despite the difficulties which are a feature of a developing country.

Worker member, Paraguay – Our presence here relates to the report of the Committee of Experts, which has issued an observation to the Government of my country for non-compliance and serious and repeated violations of the Convention.

In its observation, the Committee of Experts has taken special account of the information and complaints of the CIIT received on 31 August and 5 September 2023.

The men and women workers that I represent have indicated that they support and endorse the report of the Committee of Experts on the current situation of labour inspection in Paraguay.

Despite this agreement with the comments of the Committee of Experts, I would like to make a few additional points. Firstly, with regard to Articles 10 and 11 of the Convention, the Committee of Experts noted the Government's indication in its report that the possibility of increasing the number of labour inspectors depended on the budget allocated to the Ministry of Labour under the overall national budget, and that this entailed not only an increase in the cost of salaries but also in the costs of training, equipment and means of transport needed for the performance of their duties.

At the same time, the Committee of Experts took account of the fact that the international representatives of the labour inspectors had indicated that of the 30 inspectors recruited in 2015, only 19 remained in post. Of these, 13 were assigned to the capital Asunción, three to the department of Alto Paraná, and one each to the departments of Cordillera, Paraguari and Ñeembucú, with none assigned to the remaining 12 departments. It was also reported that the labour inspection services still have no vehicles for the performance of their duties.

The extreme institutional precariousness of labour inspection in Paraguay should be noted. This involves:

- non-existent monitoring of compliance with conditions of work;
- no verification of legal standards, terms of collective agreements or regulations; and

- in practice, abandoning any measures to ensure accident prevention or occupational safety and health.

If we look at coverage of the territory, we quickly conclude that it is minimal. 90 per cent of the country does not have inspection services, which increases the possibility of the widespread and ongoing lack of compliance with standards designed to protect working people.

In locations such as the department of Alto Paraná, an industrialized area with a large number of maquila factories – and we know how maquilas operate – it is impossible to carry out any kind of monitoring given the lack of inspectors.

Nor are there any inspectors in other places such as the Central department, where a major industrial park is located.

As a result of this vacuum in the supervision of working conditions in Paraguay, a tragic incident occurred this year which was a direct result of the lack of inspection in relation to occupational safety standards. The accident involved the explosion of an ammonia cylinder in a sausage factory, resulting in the death of four workers.

Workers are putting their very lives at risk in order to work. It is an essential function of the State to monitor compliance with safety standards in order to protect the life and health of those who need to secure a livelihood, and at times it is this very need which obliges them to perform their work in utterly precarious conditions.

At the 2022 session of the Conference, the ILO recognized a safe and healthy working environment as being a fundamental principle and right at work, incorporating it into the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work (1998) as amended in 2022, together with freedom of association, non-discrimination in employment and occupation, the elimination of forced labour and the abolition of child labour.

With regard to Article 12(1)(a) and (c) of the Convention, the Committee of Experts notes with concern that the necessary measures have not been taken to amend Ministerial Resolutions Nos 47 of 2016 and 56 of 2017 on the inspection procedure for ensuring compliance with labour, social security and occupational safety and health standards, which restrict the powers of labour inspectors and the conduct of inspections.

In particular, I would like to mention the restrictions on free access to workplaces.

This fact is a given in many enterprises, essentially in the refrigeration sector, private ports and other workplaces, whose owners prohibit the entry of inspectors to their premises for in situ verification of the hazardous nature of the work.

Here, it must be said, in many cases the workers make a complaint and accompany the inspectors during the inspection, but they are denied access to carry out the inspection unless there is a requirement to grant entry.

The limitations described not only result in non-compliance with occupational safety and health standards, but also violations of the right to work through the loss of jobs and violations of freedom of association, which is enshrined in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Lastly, with regard to the legal status of labour inspectors, the majority are recruited through a merit-based competition, but even so they are subject to national legislation in the public sector and to the general budget. This results in precarious employment and restrictive policies, ultimately obstructing fresh recruitment. The conditions of work of inspectors are also precarious, because the tools needed for the effective performance of their work are not provided.

Although it is true that the new administration is making efforts to increase the number of inspectors, so far it has not been possible to achieve this objective. Everything has remained at the level of intentions, without anything being done in practice.

We consider that there is an urgent need to take the relevant steps to make improvements and, in short, to ensure the effective observance of Convention No. 81 by means of:

- a significant increase in the number of labour inspectors so that they cover all of the national territory and all sectoral activities and enterprises for the better protection of workers in terms of their working conditions, freedom of association and occupational safety and health;
- the implementation of enforcement mechanisms which enable access to enterprise premises without bureaucratic obstacles that complicate and hold up action that is urgently needed in many cases;
- the provision of work equipment, especially vehicles, to enable the geographical range of inspection services to be increased; and
- lastly, ensuring the employment stability and technical independence of labour inspectors.

We have positive expectations that the Committee will support the strengthening of the labour inspection system in our country.

Government member, Belgium – I have the honour to speak on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States. The candidate countries Albania, Montenegro, North Macedonia, the Republic of Moldova and Ukraine, and the European Free Trade Association countries Iceland and Norway, members of the European Economic Area, align themselves with this statement.

The EU and its Member States are committed to the respect, protection and fulfilment of human rights, including labour rights. We promote universal ratification and effective implementation of fundamental ILO Conventions and support the ILO in developing and promoting international labour standards and supervising their application.

Labour inspection, as provided for in Convention No. 81, is key in ensuring the effective implementation in practice of ratified ILO Conventions and, more broadly, in promoting and safeguarding decent working conditions.

We note the latest information provided by the Government of Paraguay which confirms the information from the Committee of Experts report that only eight labour inspectors have so far been appointed as permanent officials. We call on the Government to ensure that all labour inspectors are appointed on a permanent basis as public officials. We also note the latest information provided by the Government of Paraguay about the salary and benefits structure applicable to labour inspectors in relation to the salary and benefits structure of public servants who perform similar functions.

We note with concern the persistently low and insufficient number of labour inspectors, whose number has further decreased from 19 to 15, based on the latest information provided by the Government, as well as the limited operational resources assigned to the labour inspectorate. We note that ten inspectors assigned to the capital deliver services across the whole territory, including 12 departments where no local inspectors are assigned.

In line with the Committee of Experts' recommendation, we urge the Paraguayan Government to take the necessary measures to increase the number of serving labour inspectors so as to ensure the efficient functioning of labour inspection services and effective coverage across the Paraguayan territory. This is crucial to ensure full respect of labour rights in practice. We recall the discussion in the Committee in 2017 and the subsequent observation of the Committee of Experts in 2019 regarding forced labour, requesting the Government to ensure the presence of labour inspectors in the most remote areas of the Chaco region. We note with concern that insufficient progress has been made to address this.

Based on the latest information submitted by the Government, we note a relatively sharp decrease in the number of inspections, namely 66, between August 2023 and May 2024, compared to the previous period of January to August 2023, when 187 inspections were realized. We would like to ask the Government to share information on the reasons for this decrease. We underline the importance of the Labour Inspectorate in upholding labour standards

The EU and its Member States note with interest that the Paraguayan Parliament is considering a budget increase that would provide for 25 additional labour inspectors. We express our hope for a swift approval of this budget and for adequate resources to be provided in future national budgets. We also urge the Government to provide labour inspectors with the necessary equipment, offices and means of transport necessary for the performance of their duties.

We are concerned that the powers of labour inspectors in Paraguay and the conduct of their inspections remain restricted under the different Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security Resolutions as referred to by the Committee of Experts. In this regard, we note the Resolution of the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security No. 90 of 2023 that establishes a task force to modify the existing Ministerial resolutions and hope to see progress in the near future.

We appeal to the Government to remove the restrictions and limitations for labour inspectors in order to ensure that they are empowered to enter freely and without previous notice any workplace liable to inspection and to undertake inspections as often and as thoroughly as necessary without requiring prior authorization. We therefore urge the Government of Paraguay to bring its national legislation into full conformity with the Convention. We encourage the Government of Paraguay to follow-up on the request by the Committee of Experts to provide information and statistics in this regard.

The EU and its Member States remain committed to a constructive engagement with Paraguay to address the issues raised.

Government member, Mexico, speaking on behalf of the group of Latin American and Caribbean countries (GRULAC) – A group of GRULAC countries would like to draw attention to the initiatives taken by the Government of Paraguay since its inauguration in August 2023 to improve the conditions and efficiency of the labour inspection system. The group notes the Government's commitment to aligning its action with the provisions of the Convention in order to ensure fair and decent working conditions for all workers.

The measures taken by Paraguay to increase the number of labour inspectors, improve their continuous training, and ensure fair and competitive remuneration can contribute to strengthening the capacity of the labour inspection system and promoting a safe and equitable working environment.

Another important step is the Government's decision to recruit new permanent inspectors and the new regulations adopted to bring inspection procedures into conformity with Convention No. 81

Finally, a group of GRULAC countries urges Paraguay to continue the action taken to professionalize and strengthen labour inspectors with a view to promoting an environment of fair competition and sustainable enterprise.

Government member, Switzerland – Switzerland supports the statement made by the European Union and wishes to make the following point. Convention No. 81 establishes the fundamental principles that must be respected in order to ensure the proper functioning of any labour inspection system, and therefore contributes to the effective application, in practice, of international labour standards and national labour law. While underscoring this vital role of labour inspection, Switzerland expresses its concern regarding the numerous practical and legislative shortcomings reported by the Committee of Experts with respect to the labour inspection system in Paraguay.

The lack of employment stability resulting from the temporary nature of contracts, the extremely limited number of labour inspectors throughout the country, the lack of material resources available to carry out labour inspections effectively, and restrictions on unannounced inspections, are all factors which severely hamper the proper functioning of the labour inspectorate in Paraguay, and which are contrary to the Convention.

Switzerland recalls that inspectors must have sufficient material resources to be able to carry out their work, and that their independence and impartiality must be fully guaranteed. In this regard, the Swiss Government calls on the Government of Paraguay to urgently take all the necessary measures to: firstly, significantly increase the number of labour inspectors and the material means available to them; and, secondly, adapt its legislation, in particular on inspection authorization procedures, in order to bring it into full conformity with the Convention. Switzerland also encourages the Paraguayan Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and, in future, to systematically provide statistics on the number of inspections conducted and the penalties imposed.

Worker member, Brazil – I note with deep regret that the case of Paraguay is serious, persistent and endangers workers' fundamental rights to health, safety and well-being, which justifies the urgency of analysing the case.

Convention No. 81 is of unique importance, as labour inspection performs duties not only related to supervision and penalties, but also, and perhaps more importantly, to prevention.

Compensation for any harm or violations is important. Ideally, however, there should be no harm or violations, especially where the fundamental rights to the health, safety and welfare of workers are concerned.

Non-compliance with the Convention cannot be overlooked or minimized. Otherwise, all fundamental rights protected by this Organization would potentially be at constant risk of violation.

The absence of labour inspection, in the terms established by Convention No. 81, ultimately results in the loss of lives.

I would like to once again express my great regret that the Government, in presenting its considerations after learning of its inclusion in the long list, did not provide any information on the worrying situation in the Chaco region, even though it is covered by the latest direct request of the Committee of Experts.

In 2008, 2013 and 2017, Paraguay came before this Committee for violations of Convention No. 29, especially in the Chaco region, related to the working conditions of indigenous workers.

Since 1997, the Committee of Experts has commented on these situations of debt bondage in the country, which were extensively documented in a 2005 ILO report.

In this, we can objectively and concretely see the results of non-compliance with the Convention. For almost 20 years, the worrying situation in the Chaco region has been recorded, analysed and commented on by the supervisory bodies.

Despite this, the Government has repeatedly failed to give effect to the Convention and, consequently, to carry out the corresponding inspections, which is the only way of ensuring the preventive effect we so desire.

We urge the country to increase urgently and significantly the number of inspectors, guaranteeing them the mandate and material conditions for the performance of their duties, and to ensure that the Chaco region is the subject of a more assertive, immediate and targeted policy.

Government member, El Salvador – El Salvador has noted the information provided by the Government representative, in relation to this case. We understand the challenges involved in taking office as a new administration in relation to such structural matters. We appreciate the commitment of the new Government to improve the conditions and efficiency of the labour inspection system.

The Convention aims precisely to ensure the appropriate conditions for those who seek and promote compliance with workers' labour rights. We therefore recognize the measures taken in the short time that this new administration has been in place, and we encourage the Government of Paraguay to continue to promote the improvement of its labour inspectorate with measures such as increasing the number of labour inspectors, providing them with continuous training, and ensuring fair remuneration.

Our region has positive experiences of labour inspection that can be shared through various means, including South-South cooperation, which could offer an opportunity to promote not only progress in this respect, but also unity among our peoples.

Finally, our delegation encourages the Government to continue its efforts to implement the Convention.

Worker member, Spain – The report of the Committee of Experts, in relation to compliance with Convention No. 81 in Paraguay, describes a situation of extreme precarity in the country's labour inspection system, thereby showing that it was appropriate to choose this case for examination by the Committee as a double footnoted case.

The low number of inspectors, the lack of resources for the performance of their duties, the precarity of their working conditions and the limited coverage of labour inspection in vast areas of the country reveal the incapacity of the Paraguayan labour inspection system to comply with the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee of Experts' report reflects this precarious situation of labour inspection in Paraguay, and also includes the Government's arguments. The Government indicates in its report that the possibility of increasing the number of labour inspectors depends on the budget allocated to the Ministry of Labour from the overall national budget.

Thus, the Government claims that the failure to comply with the Convention is due to a lack of budget, which the Government itself has failed to allocate. Furthermore, the Committee of Experts notes the Government's indication in its report that increasing the number of inspectors entails not only the cost of their salaries, but also the associated costs of training, equipment and means of transport necessary for the performance of their duties. The Government thus describes precisely the content of the Convention to justify its failure to comply with it.

It is important to recall that the Convention ratified by Paraguay almost 60 years ago provides in Article 6 that "inspection staff shall be composed of public officials whose status and conditions of service are such that they are assured of stability of employment".

Article 7(3) provides that "Labour inspectors shall be adequately trained for the performance of their duties". Article 10 adds that the "number of labour inspectors shall be sufficient to secure the effective discharge of the duties of the inspectorate", while Article 11 requires the competent authority to "make the necessary arrangements to furnish labour inspectors with" material means and transport facilities for the performance of their duties.

Thus, all these Articles of the Convention are clear with respect to the obligation to ensure the provision of resources for the inspection system.

Therefore, non-compliance with the Convention on the grounds that there is no budget available for its funding is not an option, just as it is not an option in any Convention, and since budget allocation is a political function, compliance with the law is not a political choice.

In the case of Paraguay, the political decision not to allocate sufficient resources serves to guarantee the failure to comply with the Convention, with the serious consequences that ensue for compliance with labour rights in the country, as emphasized by the Worker representatives.

Finally, I would like to reiterate that the seriousness of this case requires the commitment by the Government, as a signatory to the Convention, through the allocation of sufficient budgetary resources to comply with all the provisions included in this Convention.

Observer, Confederation of University Workers in the Americas (CONTUA) – We said that, without doubt, the selection of this case will enable us to broaden the discussions that we had only yesterday on the General Survey of the Committee of Experts and, in this regard, to examine the system for the protection of labour relations in the wider context of the framework of national and international standards, ensuring compliance and effective supervision as three seamless and indivisible steps.

Unless there is a willingness to set out social and labour relations in a social contract, there is no possibility of social peace, which is the basis for the adoption of standards. Anomie favours the strongest, and the recognition that work is not a commodity involves the protection of the weakest, which is the basis of our standard-setting system.

However, a standard-setting system that does not require mandatory compliance through the responsibility of the State for enforcement can be nothing more than anecdotal and declamatory. It becomes a literary text, and once again favours the maintenance of the status quo by the strongest due to their strength or political or economic power.

Therefore, supervision of compliance with standards is an essential part of the system, and also constitutes a fundamental obligation of States, exercised within the framework of tripartite social dialogue.

There may be perfect standards, there may be a majority will to comply, but if there is no effective supervision and penalties for failure to comply, there will be those who abuse, fail to comply with and violate agreements, and those worst affected will of course be the workers.

We are speaking about this with regard to Paraguay, we are speaking about a State that has abandoned its obligation to ensure compliance with the standards in force, where labour inspection is practically non-existent, and therefore, violations of workers' rights are generalized, as well as attacks on trade unions which, alone and with great courage, not only defend the interests of their members, but also denounce enterprise practices that destroy the environment, collusion with corrupt officials who turn a blind eye, tax fraud and failure to comply with health standards.

There is little or no inspection in the capital city and absolutely no inspection in the remotest areas of Paraguay. There is a total lack of employment stability for public employees in the labour inspectorate, which makes them vulnerable to political pressure and pressure from unscrupulous employers. There is a lack of independent and transparent procedures for the selection of enterprises to be inspected, so that the system favours arbitrary action and political intervention. There are no resources to conduct inspections, no vehicles, no basic technology and even less a policy of human resources training. And, of course, poor wages.

As indicated by the Worker representative of Paraguay, the lack of inspection has claimed the lives of workers. In order to ensure decent working conditions, strong action is required by States to curb the impunity of exploitative profit-making, which has existed since the first industrial revolution until the present day, and which is fuelled by the lack of scruples of certain employers, who take advantage of needy workers.

Inspection is at the heart of the system of protection. Without inspection, Conventions risk becoming a catalogue of illusions. The workers of Paraguay hope that this discussion will result in clear commitments to reverse the current situation of non-compliance.

Government representative – St. Thomas Aquinas is a saint of the Catholic church and a philosopher. Many of us undoubtedly know and follow St. Thomas, because seeing is believing is something of a custom for us. For this reason, I raised with the Officers at the beginning the possibility of innovating in relation to the ILO, because a large part of the observations made in relation to Paraguay have been resolved.

We, as a new Government – and this is the democratic rule, one Government leaves, and a new Government takes power, and makes its mark in its own way. This Government of President Santiago Peña is keeping its commitment to comply with international Conventions.

We are told that resolutions Nos 47 of 2016, 56 of 2017 and 29 of 2023 restrict the work of inspectors, but these Resolutions have been withdrawn. If anyone looks on the webpage of the MTESS, they will see that Resolution No. 346/2024 repeals those that have been criticized, namely Resolutions Nos 47, 56 and 29.

The criticism is made that inspectors earn less, but this Government has increased the salaries of inspectors by 30 per cent. I said this in my statement, but perhaps as this is my first time I was not sufficiently vehement in saying that, from the 5,500,000 guarani that inspectors earned, they now earn 7,150,000 guarani.

No reference was made to Chaco. We should look at the webpage of the MTESS, where there is a very interesting project in the Paraguayan Chaco with the financing of the Department of Labor of the United States, executed by the ILO, which was launched in September last year. We will therefore, and we are already addressing the situation of the Paraguayan Chaco, which is such a sensitive area.

We are criticized because there have been no inspections. I would like to invite you, I know that this is not usual, but today technology, spurred on by the pandemic, has enabled us to use the tool of the intelligent telephone on which, if you type MTESS, you will find that the Resolution, that was referred to by both Worker and Employer representatives, has been repealed. Inspectors can now enter workplaces freely, in accordance with the law.

If you go on the MTESS website, you will see a series of inspections that have been carried out by the MTESS. I will take some, at random. On Twitter, it can be seen that on 20 March there was an inspection in a building company. It can also be seen that inspections were carried out in the Capiatá area, where there was an ammonia leak, which has indeed been mentioned. It will also be seen that the MTESS closed this food company until compliance was achieved with the law, following joint work with the Ministry of the Environment and the regional municipal authorities. The suspension has now been lifted.

We were criticized for not carrying out inspections in the interior of the country. It is indicated on the Twitter account of the MTESS that an inspection was carried out in the city of Concepción, a beautiful city in the North of my country, where inspections were being carried out on 2 May.

We were criticized for not carrying out inspections in the interior of the country. It is indicated on the Twitter account of the MTESS that an inspection was carried out in the city of Concepción, a beautiful city in the North of my country, where inspections were being carried out on 2 May.

There is a silo in the department of Misiones, and there are many in my country, where inspections were undertaken on 29 May.

You will also see that in the Alto Paraná, where it was also said that there were no inspectors present, ten inspections have been carried out in recent months.

You can also access the Interinstitutional Transport Commission, which is a tripartite body.

You can also see that my trade union colleagues are present on the roundtable working with us, because this is how we work in Paraguay. I ask your indulgence, as perhaps the approach that I am taking is not very usual, but I believe that we are here to seek the truth.

We are taking note. We are told that inspectors are contract workers. We agree, but 50 per cent of them have been removed from their precarious status. We are increasing the budget, and I even gave you the file number. In view of the lack of trust, and that is normal, I have given you the file number, which is real, and the file indicates that there will be appointments, that there will be a competition, and Paraguay will increase the number of inspectors.

We are also criticized about salary levels. As I indicated, this has been increased by 30 per cent.

I assume responsibility for the Government, despite the fact that it was another Government that provided the original information. But I am here today before you and, I have to say, we have taken note and I believe that almost all the comments of the Committee of Experts are being given effect. And I insist that the ILO and the present Committee should envisage the possibly, because this is automatic information, and the Committee of Experts often does very good work, but I have heard of times when it has been three, four or six months behind. In today's world, this is not up to date, and you don't need to believe me, because we all have the necessary knowledge. And for this purpose, we have a small tool that allows us, when we use it, to add transparency. In relation to the salary level, in Paraguay we have the law on transparency, which requires us to publish the salaries of public officials. So if you don't believe me, go and see what inspectors earn, and you will see that they earn 30 per cent more under the present Government.

A small detail, and my apologies for referring to the spokesperson of the European Union. Our legislation is very special, and the process of inspection starts with the General Directorate of Labour Inspection, but the fines that are applied are determined by the legal office in the case of contraventions. Officials are assigned, and this explains the difference that emerged between 15 and 19 inspectors. As you can see, I was careful in my statement. They are in the area of inspection, and I am therefore grateful for this opportunity to clarify this point.

So, as a country, we call for continued support, because ILO support is very important. We believe that the group of inspectors who are to be appointed will require training, and ILO cooperation will be necessary for this purpose.

We welcome the offers from many countries which have more experience, which have a body of inspectors, and we accept it very willingly, and perhaps we can make some bilateral agreements.

The Government is 100 per cent willing, but I would like to suggest to the Officers of the Committee that we make use of technological means to keep our information more up to date, more accurate, more rapid, because otherwise we sometimes engage in unnecessary argument. And so, as I am a follower of St. Thomas Aquinas, I sometimes need to see to be able to believe, and I once again invite my colleagues, Chair, with due respect, to change to a certain extent the traditional presentation, and I would like to present the webpage, and I would like it to be seen. Because there is another characteristic of Paraguay, which is that inspections are not only carried out by the Ministry of Labour, but also by the IPS for social security. We carry out joint and very numerous inspections with them. And once again, on the same webpage, you will find publications on joint action with the IPS and you will see what we have been doing.

We also have labour inspectors in the field of transport, which once again you will find on the webpage of the Ministry, dated September, August and November last year. And you will find a series of inspections which show, not because the Deputy Minister came here and said so, and not because the Government says so, but because technological tools allow us to show what is happening.

We appreciate your comments, but we believe that it would be a little unjust to continue beating us over the head for the deficiencies of the previous Government. The present Government is committed to doing things well, and we want you to keep on watching us and providing advice, because we believe that will benefit not only the country, but also the most vulnerable sectors.

We have a tripartite body, and I can contradict my friends from the trade unions, in which we have the freedom of association roundtable, in which we are working together. We also have the social security roundtable, in which, following ten years of efforts to adopt the Pension Superintendence Act, it was possible to achieve results, based on agreement between employers, trade unionists and the Government, following much discussion. This is the result of the new approach by the Government.

Chairperson – Thank you very much, Minister, for your in-depth explanation and the information you provided. Now I give the floor to the Worker and Employer spokespersons, to make their final remarks.

Worker members – The situation of labour inspection in Paraguay requires real firm commitment from the Government to adopt all the necessary measures to ensure compliance with the provisions of the Convention.

It is crucial for the Government to commit to the establishment of this framework of policies and laws so as to be able to guarantee labour inspectors stability of employment so that they are all engaged on a permanent basis as public officials in accordance with Article 6 of the Convention.

The Government must adopt, and also make use of, an adequate budget to make a significant increase in the number, or in other words, the quantity of active labour inspectors with a physical presence in all the departments of the country to ensure the effective discharge of the work of the inspection services.

There can be no doubt that the Government must provide labour inspectors with duly equipped offices, safety and health equipment and appropriate vocational training, and the necessary means of transport to carry out their functions.

On this point, we would like to emphasize two considerations. The first is that failure to comply with Convention No. 81 has an impact on forced labour in general, on Convention No. 29 and the Protocols, and on child labour, with a view to its eradication, as well as on the labour situation, or exploitation of indigenous groups. The presence of the State through labour inspection throughout the national territory is therefore of great importance.

And the second consideration relates to the national territory. I recall that when I indicated that there are 12 departments, which I did not name, where there are no inspectors assigned, I believe that this Committee should be aware, to have an idea of the scope, that the 12 departments make up 90 per cent of the national territory of Paraguay. So, 90 per cent of Paraguay does not have inspectors and, to have an idea of the size of Paraguay, these 12 departments are nine times bigger than a country such as Switzerland. There are therefore no inspectors in 90 per cent of Paraguay, while there are inspectors in the cities that I mentioned in the remaining 10 per cent of the country. Our conclusion is therefore that, in terms of resources to facilitate transport and all other action, we are speaking of significant journeys in a large country.

We therefore urge the Government to bring the national legislation into full conformity with the Convention and the recommendations of the Committee of Experts, and to adopt, without delay, the necessary measures to ensure that labour inspectors with proper credentials are able to enter freely and without previous notice at any hour of the day or night any workplace liable to inspection, without having to obtain previous authorization from a higher authority. Second, workplaces need to be inspected as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions. Third, all restrictions need to be lifted on the power of inspectors to enter freely and without previous notice any workplace liable to inspection, which have to be inspected, I repeat, as often and as thoroughly as is necessary. In particular, it is of great importance to repeal all the measures that prevent the General Directorate of Labour Inspection from discharging its duties in an independent manner, including those that subject its action to previous authorization by the MTESS.

We remind the Government that the ILO has recently adopted the Guidelines on general principles of labour inspection, which offer detailed technical guidance on the fundamental principles set out in the Convention.

The Worker members invite the Government to accept technical assistance from the Office with a view to carrying forward the legislative reforms and their effective and immediate implementation. And, in light of what the Government representative has said, I think that we are really on the way to this being accepted.

Employer members – We are grateful for the further information and clarifications provided by the Government of Paraguay, as well as for the contributions of all those who took part in the discussion.

As Employer members, as well as focusing specifically on Convention No. 81, which is the basis of this case, rather than the effect that it may or may not have on other Conventions, it falls to us to point out that to achieve decent work and the formalization of employment it is undoubtedly essential to have the policies and institutions for an adequate labour inspection system, both in terms of a sufficient number of inspectors and the provision of operational and logistical resources to them. All of this should be geared towards effective compliance with labour regulations, which also requires an additional mechanism for reducing informality in the economy, which has such a significant effect on the progressive development of all countries.

The effective realization of the objectives described depends both on the availability of budgetary resources allocated by the Government and on the political will and interaction of all the partners involved. We cannot overlook, however, the vital need to review the legislation in force in the country to ensure that its regulations allow for full compliance with the provisions of the Convention.

In conclusion, having taken note of the explanations provided by the Government today, and emphasizing the need for such information to be disseminated to provide a detailed picture of the country's progress, or not, in relation to the Convention, we recommend the Government to intensify its efforts to improve the labour inspection system, ensuring that it has sufficient inspectors to undertake effective monitoring of labour regulations and that those inspectors have the necessary operational, administrative and logistical resources to fulfil their roles, all within the scope of the Convention. The Government should also promote the effective functioning of the inspectorate system without creating bureaucratic limitations that prevent the system from operating efficiently in monitoring compliance with, and observance of, the concept of decent work and the reduction of informality in employment.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted with concern various issues relating to the effective functioning of the labour inspection system in the country, including a lack of human and material resources, the instability of employment of labour inspectors, and the absence of means to function effectively and independently through the unrestricted access of labour inspectors to workplaces without prior authorization.

Taking into account the discussion, the Committee requested the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to take effective and time-bound measures to:

- intensify efforts to ensure that: (i) the number of serving labour inspectors is sufficient to enable the efficient and effective functioning of the inspection services, including in areas which are underserved at present; and (ii) labour inspectors are provided with material, operational, financial, administrative and logistical resources necessary for the performance of their duties;
- ensure that all labour inspectors are appointed as public officials on a permanent basis in order to secure their stability of employment and continue to ensure that their salaries and benefits are at least commensurate with the remuneration arrangements in place for other public officials;
- promote the effective functioning of the inspection system by removing the legal and practical constraints that hinder the effective work of labour inspectors, in order to, among other things, ensure that labour inspectors are empowered to make visits without previous notice and without requiring prior authorization from a higher authority, and that they are able to undertake labour inspections as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions, in line with the Convention; and
- provide all outstanding information requested by the Committee of Experts.

The Committee requested the Government to submit a detailed report, including the above-mentioned information as well as the measures taken and progress achieved on the implementation of the Convention by 1 September 2024.

The Committee further requested the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance to implement the Committee's recommendations and to ensure full compliance with its obligations under the Convention in law and in practice.

Government representative – Allow me to express our thanks for the conclusions issued by the Committee relating to the individual case of Paraguay on the Convention, ratified by our country in 1967.

We recognize the exhaustive work and the dedication of this Committee in examining our situation and providing guidance for improvement.

We pay special attention to the Committee's conclusions that we have received. We reaffirm our commitment as the Government to pursue the actions already undertaken by the current administration, with a view to the implementation of the Convention.

Taking into consideration the conclusions issued today by the Committee, along with the observations of the Committee of Experts, we are firmly committed to strengthening the inspection staff under the MTESS, improving inspection procedures in line with the standards set out in the Convention, and ensuring that labour inspection is increased effectively at the national level. We are aware of the importance of this work for the protection of labour rights and the promotion of fair and decent working conditions for all.

As the Government, we assume the responsibility and challenge of implementing the ILO recommendations and of continuing to make progress to fulfil our international obligations regarding labour matters.

We consider it supremely important to have the ongoing technical cooperation of the ILO, as well as to share experiences with the Member States of this august house to enable us to improve on the issues raised in the conclusions and recommendations received today. These experiences and support are essential in order to build our capacities and ensure the effective implementation of the proposed measures. To this end, we are committed to promoting decent work and workers' rights in Paraguay.

I note lastly that the Government of Paraguay has once again taken on the role of a deputy member of the ILO Governing Body, and we thereby reaffirm our commitment.

We sincerely thank everyone here for your support and collaboration in this important work.

Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169)

Written information provided by the Government

Article 1. Peoples

The identification of indigenous/native peoples is carried out on the basis of identification criteria in accordance with the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169) and Act No. 29785. This enables the Official Database of Indigenous and Native Peoples (BDPI) to be updated so that public services can be provided according to cultural/linguistic characteristics.

According to the BDPI, 55 indigenous or native peoples have a traditional presence divided up into 9,211 localities (5,153 are peasant farming (campesino) communities, 2,303 are native, 1,708 have no identified type and there are 47 indigenous peoples in initial contact). Of these localities, 4,327 are georeferenced (49 per cent), 7,455 are recognized (81 per cent), and 5,825 are titled (63 per cent), covering a total of 2,880,352 persons (9.8 per cent of the population).

Since 2022, the BDPI has undertaken visits to 144 communities in 12 departments in order to identify peoples, since there was no information from 1,393 communities. In 2023, that figure decreased to 1,251 and there were four updates of the list (in May, June, September and December), incorporating 192 new localities.

Article 3. Human rights and fundamental rights

Under Act No. 31405, which promotes the protection and comprehensive development of orphaned children and young persons, assistance was provided according to the register of beneficiaries:

Deceased defender	Orphaned minor(s)	Current status

After being apprised of possible risk situations for relatives of the deceased persons (11 September 2023) in the context of the “Intersectoral mechanism for the protection of human rights defenders”, the Ministry of Justice and Human Rights (Ministry of Justice) asked for the relatives to be given personal guarantees, which was duly done (29 September 2023).

Various entities met with relatives on 4 December 2023 to report on progress of the Saweto Action Plan.

On 11 April 2024, logging contractors Mr Hugo Soria and Mr José Estrada (instigators) and Mr Josimar and Mr Segundo Atachi (co-perpetrators) were sentenced to 28 years and 3 months’ imprisonment by the Collegiate Criminal Court within the High Court of Ucayali for the aggravated homicide of indigenous leaders, and were ordered to pay 200,000 Peruvian soles in civil compensation. Trial proceedings relating to another accused, Mr Eurico Mapes, were deferred pending his arrest.

In the context of the “Intersectoral mechanism for the protection of human rights defenders”, the “Register of risk situations for human rights defenders” detailed the following information as of 31 March 2024:

- There were 339 registered risk situations involving 599 rights defenders. Of these persons, 397 (66.28 per cent) self-identified as belonging to the following peoples: Shipibo-Konibo (74), Kichwa (65), Ashaninka (42), Tallán (41) and Kakataibo (38).
- These 397 persons indicated that they faced one or more types of risk, such as threats to safety (59.43 per cent), assaults (16.67 per cent), destruction of property (5.98 per cent), defamation (4.89 per cent) and harassment (4.71 per cent).
- As regards risk situations for self-identified indigenous rights defenders, 170 were linked to activities such as illegal logging (87), illicit drug trafficking (74), illegal mining (36) and land trafficking (35).

In order to reinforce the intersectoral mechanism, the following activities were carried out:

- Installation of seven regional round tables for the protection of human rights defenders (Madre de Dios, Ucayali, San Martín, Loreto, Amazonas, Junín and Piura) with a view to territorial coordination in relation to risk situations connected with illegal activities, with the participation of the Government and social actors.

The executive branch submitted Bill No. 7752/2023-PE, in which the Ministry of Culture proposes paragraph 3.8.5 for the “amendment of sections 108, 108-C and 200 of the Penal Code”, in order to introduce aggravating circumstances for cases in which victims are indigenous rights defenders.

Measures to prevent the excessive use of force include: Ministerial Decision No. 952 2018-IN; Directives Nos 015-2022-CG PNP-EM, 008-2022-IN, 13-2023-CG PNP/EMG and 014-2023-CG PNP/EMG; and National Police General Headquarters Decision No. 280-2023-CG PNP/EMG. Articles 7 and 15. Consultation and mining projects

On 22 December 2023, the Ministry of Culture issued 181 opinions at the request of SENACE and the Ministry of Energy, of which three are binding.

Regarding the Ministry of Energy criteria for identifying which indigenous peoples must be consulted concerning a project, each promoting body must identify measures that may be related to the collective rights of indigenous peoples and, where indigenous peoples may be affected, prior consultation must be carried out.

With regard to measures to inform indigenous peoples of the importance of consultation and encourage their participation in such processes, the following actions were carried out in 2023:

- participation of 16 entities: 5 ministries (Ministry of Energy, Ministry of Education, Ministry of Culture, Ministry of Transport and Communications, and Ministry of the Environment), 3 public bodies (National Service for State-Protected Areas, National Intercultural Health Centre, and National Forestry and Forest Fauna Service), 4 regional governments (Loreto, Cusco, Huancavelica and Ucayali), and 3 local governments (Ucayali, Manseriche and Nueva Requena), on matters related to natural protected areas, mining projects and hydrocarbon plots;

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I have the honour to invite the Government representative of Peru, his Excellency, the Minister of Labour and Employment Promotion, to take the floor.

Government representative – Chair, ladies and gentlemen, it is an honour for me to appear before you on behalf of the State of Peru to reaffirm my country's commitment to fulfilling the legal obligations deriving from the ILO Conventions, to express gratitude for the constant support from the international standards supervisory bodies and the recommendations they make to us, and to address the comments and concerns of the various social partners who drive us forward to continue making improvements.

The Convention, which has been in force for Peru since 1995, supposes not only the right of these peoples to preserve their cultures and their ways of life but also the right to participate effectively in the decisions which affect them. In this regard, I would like to provide information on our application of the Convention, and on the judicial proceedings instituted in the wake of the murders of indigenous leaders.

With regard to the murders of indigenous leaders Edwin Chota, Leoncio Quintísima, Jorge Ríos and Francisco Pinedo, I must point out that the Government, through the Attorney General's Office attached to the Ministry of Justice, together with the Public Prosecutor's Office, has handed down a historic ruling against the perpetrators, having adopted an effective strategy based on circumstantial evidence.

I can confirm that recently, through a ruling dated 11 April 2024, the accused were sentenced to 28 years and 3 months' imprisonment for the aggravated homicide of our indigenous leader comrades, and were ordered to pay civil compensation to the leaders' relatives.

The ruling in the Saweto case constitutes a landmark for justice in the Amazon and for human rights defenders, achieved after almost ten years of arduous judicial proceedings. This will certainly be a major precedent for my country and for all ILO Member States.

On the day when the sentence was read, the Minister of Justice and Human Rights, Mr Eduardo Arana Ysa, was present at the hearing, as a demonstration of the commitment to and support for the victims of this execrable act.

I must also inform this esteemed Committee that the Government has taken steps to protect the physical safety and psychological well-being of the relatives of the victims. In this regard, their young children have been incorporated into the register of beneficiaries, thereby enabling them to receive financial and psychological assistance. Furthermore, the widows have been incorporated into the programme of protection and assistance for victims and witnesses, and all have been given personal guarantees against possible risks.

In addition, the Government has been driving an initiative called the Saweto Action Plan to improve the living conditions of the community through projects related to production, infrastructure, sanitation, transport, safety and the provision of electricity, among others.

With regard to the new cases of murders of indigenous leaders such as Mr Quinto Inuma, leader of the Kichwa and Yanayacu native community, and Mr Santiago Contoricón, chief of the Puerto Ocopa-Junín native community, the Government has responded immediately, appointing the prosecutors in the investigation conducted by the Public Prosecutor's Office in order to identify those responsible and impose severe penalties.

Moreover, the Committee should be informed that the Government has been carrying out specific actions to tackle the practices of forced labour, illegal logging and illegal mining, as follows: the adoption of a comprehensive approach based not only on prosecution and punishment of the crime but also on providing support for the victims and ensuring their reintegration; the approval of the third National Plan against Forced Labour, with an intercultural and intersectional perspective in the labour and employment promotion sphere; the setting up of the National Observatory on Forced Labour; the establishment of the 1819 phoneline to receive complaints from the public regarding forced labour, protecting the identity of all persons where requested. The "Intersectoral protocol against forced labour" has been adopted. In addition, the pilot project for the reintegration of forced labour victims into employment is under way.

Regarding the excessive use of force against indigenous rights defenders in the context of protests, and the dissemination of stigmatizing speeches and racist harassment against indigenous communities, the events described above are under investigation by the Public Prosecutor's Office. The Government has transferred 99 million soles to strengthen the investigation teams at this institution. The Public Prosecutor's Office is a body which enjoys constitutional autonomy and does not depend on either the executive branch or the judiciary.

Consequently, this Office will provide information on these events in due course and, if applicable, will identify the perpetrators so that they can be punished severely.

The Government rejects all forms of discrimination. In this regard we are implementing public policies aimed at eradicating these practices, some of which we describe below.

The corpus of standards applicable to the use of force has been strengthened, incorporating an intercultural and human rights-oriented approach into the activities of the police, prosecutors and armed forces.

Awareness-raising and training actions have been carried out benefiting 11,571 police officers, as well as officers and sub-officers in the armed forces.

The “Peru without racism” strategy has been formulated, in order to promote respect and appreciation of our cultural diversity to help reduce practices of ethnic and racial discrimination in the context of inclusive public policies.

With regard to the protection of human rights defenders, the Government has been reinforcing the operation of the intersectoral mechanism for the protection of human rights defenders. The existence of this mechanism is a reflection of the need to protect, in particular, indigenous rights defenders, who are confronted with illicit activities such as illegal logging and mining, and gives expression to the obligations of all sectors to engage in protection and awareness-raising with the participation of the Government and social partners.

Seven regional round tables have thus been established for decision-making on risk situations for rights defenders, early warning projects have been implemented to prevent illicit drug trafficking and identify risk situations for human rights defenders.

Seven courses have been held on the role of human rights defenders, focusing on protection and responses to risk situations, with the participation of 210 police officers, 266 leaders from 53 indigenous organizations, 120 judges and 40 prosecutors specializing in human rights and intercultural matters.

Regarding the right to consultation, on the basis of work done by the Multisectoral Committee for the Application of the Right to Prior Consultation, a total of 88 prior consultation processes have been concluded, of which 59 culminated in agreements relating to the consultations. In addition, 1,238 agreements have been signed which are being followed up by the Multisectoral Committee.

As regards consultation processes in the mining sector, the criteria for prior consultation are in accordance with the methodological guide for the identification of indigenous and native peoples prepared by the Ministry of Culture. The Government has been promoting dialogue mechanisms provided for in the Right to Consultation Act, applying the principles of timeliness, interculturality, good faith, lack of coercion or restriction, and timely information, in order to achieve harmonious relations among the sectors and communities involved.

In order to move forward in the processes of identification, demarcation and regularization of lands traditionally occupied by indigenous peoples, guidelines have been issued to simplify the processes of recognition, regularization and titling of campesino (peasant farming) and native communities.

We are providing technical assistance to regional governments to set up technical round tables on titling in order to carry out the procedure for demarcation and titling of territory.

We hope that in the short time allocated to us we have been able to provide the required information relating to our application of the Convention. As you will see, Peru, like many countries, is facing major structural challenges, and it is clear that we are implementing policies that promote the application of the Convention.

These are advanced policies which position us as a country that is making efforts to tackle these challenges.

For our country, this is a great opportunity for us, in conjunction with other countries at the ILO, to combine efforts and experiences and, within the context of the Convention, continue to implement public policies for the protection of the human rights of our peoples.

The poverty and extreme poverty that exist in our region constitute the worst violation of human rights, as it prevents access to food and basic services such as education and training, without which it is impossible to develop skills enabling entry to the formal labour market. It is vitally important to break this chain of poverty binding generations because poverty and extreme poverty are the root cause of forced labour, child labour, the informal economy and other ills.

In accordance with its fundamental role, the ILO can be the perfect partner for coordinating the efforts of employers, workers and governments for the benefit of the human rights of our peoples.

Worker members – The Convention is a fundamental pillar for the worldwide protection of the rights of indigenous peoples. However, in Peru, the implementation of the Convention has been grossly inadequate, resulting in serious and ongoing violations of the rights of these peoples.

It is a source of concern and regret that this is not the first time that we are having to address the case of Peru for serious violations of the Convention. In 2009 and 2010, our Committee examined the situation of violence against indigenous peoples. In particular, we addressed the serious incidents which occurred in Bagua.

In June 2009, thousands of indigenous demonstrators blocked the road to Bagua in the Amazon region for over 50 days. This act of protest was a response to a series of legislative decrees issued without prior consultation, which threatened indigenous peoples' fundamental rights to land and natural resources. This episode culminated in a massacre which left 33 people dead, a dark and bloody chapter in the history of Peru.

Fourteen years later, the Peruvian Government continues to demonstrate an alarming lack of commitment to indigenous rights and observance of the Convention. We are bound to mention the case that occurred in 2014 which became a symbol of how the Peruvian State has been flouting the human rights of indigenous peoples.

For years, the Committee of Experts has insisted that the Government take the necessary steps to investigate and punish those responsible for the murders of four leaders of the indigenous Asháninka community of Saweto, which occurred in September 2014.

These leaders were murdered after reporting illegal logging in their community. Although a judgment was handed down sentencing the perpetrators to 28 years' imprisonment, six months later the High Court of Ucayali overturned the judgment and ordered a fresh trial, claiming insufficient evidence and inadequate grounds. These flawed proceedings reflect the lack of political will by the Government to ensure justice and protect indigenous rights defenders.

According to the information which we have received from the trade unions in Peru, the Government stated that on 11 April 2024 the Criminal Court once again convicted the accused.

However, according to the information received, none of the convicted individuals is currently in prison.

Ten years later, impunity continues to prevail in the murders of the Saweto leaders, and threats against the families of the victims have not stopped. The main spokesperson for these families has been the victim of reprisals in Pucallpa, which is evidence of the ongoing risk that they face.

As indicated by the Committee of Experts, it is vitally important that judicial proceedings are resolved rapidly, since justice delayed amounts to justice denied.

The Saweto case is a reflection of a much bigger problem – namely, the illegal trafficking of wood, facilitated by a system of forced labour which exploits indigenous persons through an unending cycle of debt. The Committee of Experts expressed regret that the Government did not provide information on any progress in the investigation into these illegal practices or on forced labour in Ucayali. This inaction not only perpetuates exploitation and violence but also undermines confidence in the Peruvian justice system.

Furthermore, the protocol on prosecution action for the prevention and investigation of crimes against human rights defenders, approved in 2022, is paralysed because of lack of financial resources.

This is a source of great concern, given the increase in illegal activities such as logging and mining in indigenous territories, and the constant threats faced by those defending their lands and the environment. Recent examples include the murder of Mr Santiago Contoricón in 2023. In April this year, park ranger Mr Victorio Dariquebe, of the Harakbut people, was murdered in the Peruvian Amazon region, after receiving threats for defending his community and ancestral lands. The indigenous leader was killed as he was returning to his native community on a Friday night, presumably by mafia elements associated with illegal logging. In addition, his 18-year-old son was pursued, beaten and tortured by the assailants.

According to the Interethnic Association for the Development of the Peruvian Rainforest – comprising nine decentralized indigenous organizations of the Amazon region located in the north, centre and south of the Peruvian rainforest – in the last ten years a total of 33 persons have been killed while defending their territories and forests.

The Committee of Experts also noted the observations of the Office of the United Nations (UN) High Commissioner for Human Rights on the excessive use of force and stigmatizing speeches against indigenous demonstrators during the protests from December 2022 to September 2023. Moreover, a report of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights highlighted the fact that the protests in Apurímac, Ayacucho, Puno and Arequipa, most of which were led by indigenous peoples, were the most violent, recording the highest numbers of victims.

Another fundamental point in the Convention relates to Articles 7 and 15 regarding consultation and impact assessment. For a number of years in Peru, the lack of consultation especially in relation to mining projects has been denounced.

A 2022 report of the Ombuds Office indicates that there is no guarantee of consultation during the environmental impact assessment of projects which directly affect indigenous communities. There is an evident lack of clarity in identification of the peoples to be consulted and in procedures where communities refuse to participate. This is a direct violation of the Convention, which requires the consultation and active participation of indigenous communities in decisions that affect their lands and resources.

Lastly, the Committee of Experts expressed regret at the lack of progress on the identification, demarcation and titling of lands traditionally occupied by indigenous peoples. According to the Ombuds Office, some 1,700 communities are awaiting titling, and there is a need to simplify administrative procedures relating to the physical and legal regularization of these communities.

It is important to emphasize that the procedures for land titling for native communities are based on the Political Constitution of 1933. The Peruvian State has a historic debt towards the Amazonian peoples because it needs to amend the domestic legislation to guarantee land rights, in accordance with international standards, and not continue to hand over lands on the basis of transfer of use.

The UN Human Rights Committee has also expressed concern at the legal uncertainty and heavy pollution in native territories as a result of oil, gas and mineral exploitation.

In conclusion, the implementation of the Convention continues to be inadequate. We call for a real and effective commitment to guarantee the rights of indigenous peoples, not only in theory but also in day-to-day practice. It is vitally important that the Government take concrete steps as a matter of urgency to protect those who have been marginalized historically and ensure that their rights and territories are fully respected. The international community and the ILO supervisory bodies must continue its monitoring and put pressure on the Government to fulfil its international obligations and guarantee justice and dignity for the indigenous peoples.

Employer members – Firstly, we would like to thank the Government of Peru for the oral and written information provided on compliance with the Convention in law and in practice.

In the usual way, we would like to provide information on the context of the case to ensure better understanding. As the Worker spokesperson mentioned, this is the third time that the Committee is discussing this case. The first time was in 2009, and it was discussed again in 2010. Since then, the Committee of Experts made observations on the case in 2017 and 2021 and, most recently, in 2023, taking note of the Government's reports and the observations of both workers and employers.

In its follow-up to its last observations in 2023, the Committee of Experts has raised some highly relevant issues. First, with regard to compliance with Article 3 of the Convention.

Regarding the judicial proceedings relating to the murders of indigenous leaders in Alto Tamaya-Saweto, the Committee of Experts deplored the lack of progress on the imposition of penalties for the murders of the four union leaders more than ten years ago. The Committee of Experts also noted with concern the complaints of threats and assaults on relatives of the victims and urged the Government to take the necessary steps to settle the case and protect the victims' relatives.

The Employer members are concerned at and reject any violence or threats and are also concerned at the excessive delay of the justice system in resolving cases such as those presented. This shows the existence of a structural problem in the administration of justice in Peru which must be tackled as a matter of urgency and as a priority.

We are aware that Peru has experienced a climate of widespread violence, as stated by the Committee of Experts, which we understand to exist especially in some territories where illegal economic activities proliferate, such as illegal mining and logging.

It would therefore be important to clarify whether the violence is linked to membership of an indigenous people, to the climate of violence in these territories, or to the illegal activities practised in these territories.

The Employer members recognize the progress described by the Government through various initiatives for the protection of indigenous rights defenders, both in the Committee of Experts' report and in the supplementary information presented to this Committee. However, the murders of other indigenous leaders in 2023 and other acts of violence against these peoples in the context of protests in Peru in 2022 highlight the fact that the Government should address these matters using a more holistic approach.

The national employers, through the National Confederation of Private Business Institutions (CONFIEP), have expressed their concern, as stated in the report, at the increase in illegal and informal activities such as illegal logging and mining on the territories of indigenous peoples and the need to take preventive measures.

We urge the Government to intensify its efforts within the justice system and in relation to the protection of the rights of indigenous peoples, as well in combating informality and the illegal activities carried out in these territories which particularly affect these peoples.

Secondly, with regard to Articles 6, 7 and 8 on the holding of consultations, the Employer members wish to emphasize that Peru is one of the few countries in the region which has a regulated consultation process and an institutional structure which accompanies it. We take account of the fact that Peru ratified the Convention in 1994 and that the Prior Consultation Act was enacted in 2011, with the implementing regulations for the Act issued in 2012.

Under the terms of the Prior Consultation Act and its regulations, the consultation process in Peru is composed of seven stages, and in this connection the Employers would like to highlight some positive aspects which have enabled implementation of the process to progress. These include: the relationship initiated between officials of the State and the indigenous peoples; the use of measures which should expedite the process and make it more participatory; the early termination of consultation processes when so decided by the indigenous peoples; accreditation of non-existence of indigenous peoples by the Cabinet when relevant and adequate information is available; and the opportunity of reaching agreements in the intercultural context, which are the result of proposals made by the representatives of the indigenous peoples. These are all important forms of progress.

Despite such progress, the Committee of Experts, after analysing the regulations in force and the report issued by the Ombuds Office, indicated that the Government should take steps to identify and address issues in the implementation of consultation processes in the mining sector and requested additional information.

In this regard, the national employers pointed out that there is a lack of clarity regarding the ways of identifying the indigenous peoples to be consulted, and also regarding the ways of deciding whether peoples are affected. Nor is it clear what procedure should be followed when indigenous peoples refuse to participate in consultation.

We would like to highlight some of the issues related to consultations.

Firstly, the database of indigenous peoples is merely a reference tool, so there is no predictability in the identification of indigenous peoples. For the identification of indigenous peoples and their registration in the database, there is no guarantee of the application of objective criteria or of historical continuity. Nor is it clear how it is decided whether a project can directly affect the collective rights of indigenous peoples, and the time frames for implementing the prior consultation processes are excessive.

First of all, there are no time limits for the evaluation stage, which means that many projects can remain at the evaluation stage for months or even years. Against this background, in practice, the state decision-making body does not give any continuity to the process to close it and decide on the adoption of a decision. The risk then arises of a de facto veto on investment projects and therefore on progress.

The above aspects have a direct impact on investment and they cause enormous economic and social losses, because the creation of thousands of formal jobs is blocked and the possibility of making progress in areas which need it is lost.

The above aspects show the need for measures to be adopted that ensure that consultations are held under the good faith principle, in accordance with the terms of the Convention, and that the development of productive products and the creation of formal employment are enabled.

Lastly, we echo the observations of the Committee of Experts and request the Government to: take action to protect the life, physical safety and psychological well-being of the relatives of the murdered indigenous leaders; make available all necessary resources to ensure that all instigators and perpetrators of these murders are prosecuted and punished once and for all; provide information on the criteria used to decide which peoples must be consulted; and take all necessary measures to prevent, investigate and punish the excessive use of public force against indigenous persons in the context of protests in defence of their rights.

Worker member, Peru – I begin this intervention by stating that the murders of Edwin Chota, Jorge Ríos, Leoncio Quintisima and Francisco Pinedo, leaders and defenders of the rights of the indigenous peoples of the Ashaninka de Saweto community, demonstrate the State's negligence and a blatant climate of impunity considering the lack of justice brought since their murders. More than 30 indigenous rights defenders have been murdered in Peru over the last decade and to date justice has not been done.

Regrettably, as at the previous Conference, I am reporting the Government's incomppliance with a new Convention. It is not the first time, as in 2009 violence against the indigenous peoples in Bagua was examined in this Committee.

Ten years since the murders of these four indigenous leaders by illegal loggers, on 11 April 2024, the Collegiate Penal Court of the Supreme Court of Justice of Ucayali sentenced the logging companies guilty of the leaders' murders to 28 years and three months' imprisonment. It ordered the payment of compensation amounting to 50,000 soles for each leader. The sentencing of the accused, Eurico Mapes, is pending until he is caught.

To reach this first stage of the proceedings, a long process was followed plagued by a series of irregularities dominated by the interests and pressure from criminal groups. However, the Government fails to state that none of the convicted persons is in prison. So I repeat: ten years after the murders, impunity continues around the murders of the indigenous leaders of Saweto. The Committee must also note that the ruling of 11 April 2024 has been appealed, the murderers are free to continue threatening the victims' families, in a climate of insecurity in the community and surrounding areas, which has forced the victims' families to leave their communities. Their children cannot go to school and are also victims of harassment, and although they have requested protection, it has not been provided.

The victims' families still do not know if they have to wait another ten years to secure a final sentence. Hence, the case continues without punishment.

It should be noted that the climate of violence and impunity accepted by the Peruvian authorities at the national and regional levels is a serious impediment to the exercise of indigenous people's rights in the Peruvian Amazon, enshrined in this Convention.

In Peru, human rights defenders cannot act in a safe and conducive environment. They have to contend with criminalization and stigmatization, judicial harassment, threats, attacks and intimidation, as well as lack of access to justice, non-enforcement of sentences, scarce effective protection from the police and the judicial system, and the problem of titling for indigenous communities' lands.

In general, indigenous communities, rural farmers, land rights and environmental defenders are the groups of defenders at greatest risk in Peru, despite the fact that they are doing the work of the State by monitoring and reporting cases of crimes, such as illegal logging, forced labour and illegal mining.

Furthermore, the intersectoral mechanism for the protection of human rights defenders has only built expectations. However, plainly its progress has been more towards negotiations and coordination among institutions to deal with urgent cases. It is not clear what strategies are being developed to address the fundamental issues that threaten environmental defenders and their land. The mechanism only deals with some urgent situations but does not resolve the structural issues that pose a constant threat to the persons in question. We could say the same about the regional working groups and protocols. It would appear that the Government intends to leave the defenders defenceless. Nor is the effectiveness of the mechanisms ensured through adequate budgets and prompt action.

In short, with regard to the protection of indigenous rights defenders, measures have only been taken to warn and raise awareness of the situation when there is already an impact, but there is no prevention or punishment.

Such a context creates an environment conducive to crimes, such as the murder of the indigenous leader Santiago Contoricón, in April 2023, after reporting illegal activities in the Asháninka territory, Satipo province. There was also the murder of the indigenous leader Quinto Inuma Alvarado, of the Santa Rosillo de Yanayacu indigenous community, an environmental defender who protested against illegal logging.

Do we have to wait ten years for those responsible to be punished? This shows that the Government is disregarding protection of the integrity of indigenous peoples and their leaders. Let us not forget the families of the bereaved, who are left totally defenceless, without money or social protection, threatened, unable to work or, their children, go to school. What has the State done for them during these ten years?

It is therefore vital to strengthen protection mechanisms, as well as to have political will to allocate budgets for persons who file complaints and their entourage, and resources for their survival, which must be sustainable and compatible with the people's intercultural context.

With regard to the observations on the human rights situation in the light of the protests in Peru, and as highlighted by the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, between December 2022 and September 2023, there were 49 extrajudicial executions that included persons from indigenous communities. Stigmatizing discourse and racist harassment were widespread against protesters belonging to indigenous communities. Those directly responsible remain unpunished and investigations are being deliberately drawn out in a tacit agreement among the illegitimate State authorities, against a backdrop of political, social and economic instability, and corruption.

Regarding the right to consultation, the Government has not aligned its internal legislation in keeping with its international commitments. It has not envisaged the implementation of the right to consultation with indigenous peoples, in conformity with the Convention, considering the process merely a mechanism for partial reporting.

Currently, in our country, the consultation process has still not been understood as a transparent dialogue between the Government and the indigenous peoples. While there is an entity tasked with implementing the consultation process in the mining sector, this process starts after the environmental certification has been issued and stops before authorization is granted to the mining concession. Therefore, consultation with indigenous peoples is not guaranteed during the environmental impact assessment stage, dismissing the fact that, in accordance with the Convention, Governments must ensure that wherever possible studies are conducted in cooperation with the peoples concerned.

The Committee should note that the Government is bound to guarantee free, prior and informed consultation, as set forth in the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples.

Peru is a multicultural country and the existence of diverse cultures in our country should be valued.

Lastly, we hope that the Government, now that it has been elected as a regular member of the Governing Body, will set a date for the direct contacts mission for Convention No. 87, show willing to comply with the conclusions of this Committee, and agree on the visit of a new mission.

Employer member, Peru – Thank you for allowing us to set out the position of the employers of Peru, represented by the National Confederation of Private Enterprise Institutions (CONFIEP), concerning the application of the Convention in our country.

As representatives of the employers of Peru, we reject and deplore all acts of violence and we regret that this has been a recurrent situation against indigenous leaders over recent years. We also regret that the justice system does not act promptly in relation to these crimes, which generates a situation of impunity and leaves indigenous leaders and their families in constant danger. This situation clearly runs counter to one of the objectives of the Convention, which is to ensure that indigenous peoples enjoy the same rights and opportunities granted by the national legislation to all citizens.

While we welcome the fact that almost half a decade after the actual events, sentences were handed down against those guilty of the murder of four indigenous leaders of the Alto Tamaya-Saweto community, as recently reported by the Government, we regret the information provided by the workers' representative that to date no one has been imprisoned for these deplorable acts.

We are also aware that the criminal organizations of illegal mining and logging continue to threaten and cause harm to indigenous peoples and their leaders, as CONFIEP has shown in other discussions of the case.

As reported by the worker spokesperson of my country, on 19 April 2024, Mr Victorino Dariquebe, the park ranger for the Amarakaeri community reserve, belonging to the Harakbut indigenous community, was murdered. Investigations suggest that informal miner workers are responsible for his death. The Wampís indigenous community had been alerting the Government to the invasion of its territory by illegal miners. In April this year, Wampís leaders visited Lima to call on the central governmental authorities to address the situation.

In Peru, illegal logging and mining are linked to other crimes, such as drug trafficking, forced labour, child labour, smuggling of persons, hired killers, extortion, murder, land theft and tax evasion. They also damage the environment by severely impacting forests and exacerbating climate change: between 2011 and 2022, these activities caused the deforestation of 2.6 million hectares of forest in our country.

Illegal mining has become the primary criminal economy in our country, equivalent to 2.5 per cent of our gross domestic product. We therefore urge the Government to adopt effective policies to combat organized crime, which affects the population throughout the country, particularly the most vulnerable, such as the indigenous populations. These policies must be adopted by involving all the stakeholders concerned, including workers and employers.

The employers and workers of our country have been proactive. For seven months, trade unions and employers' organizations, including CONFIEP, have been working together, seeking to reduce people's insecurity. Last month, we presented the Government with various proposals drafted by consensus to address such insecurity, which generates losses to the country estimated at 3.09 per cent of our gross domestic product.

To conclude on this point regarding compliance with Article 3 of the Convention, we recall that the application of the Convention must be guaranteed in a context of social dialogue and understanding, free from violence and intimidation.

Furthermore, in accordance with Articles 6, 7 and 15 of the Convention, the consultation process must be implemented effectively and in good faith, so that it does not become a hidden veto on private investment, which is the only mechanism for generating decent work. In Peru, the private sector generates 80 per cent of investment and 71 per cent of formal employment.

The current system must be improved. We must overcome the difficulties in applying the Convention, to allow for the creation of direct and indirect jobs, with the subsequent well-being and progress for the poorest areas, including indigenous territories. To this end, the following points need to be addressed:

First, there must not be bureaucratic delays to the process of identification of indigenous peoples.

Second, the time frames for implementing prior consultation processes must be defined, as they are excessive. On the one hand, there are no timelines for the assessment stage, which involves the identification of peoples and impact assessment concerning collective rights, which means that the evaluation of many projects takes months or even years. At the implementation stage, a time frame of 120 calendar days has been established. However, in practice, this time frame is not upheld, and this stage can last for various months or even years. For example, the case of the Antapaccay-Corocchohuayco project has lasted more than three years and the Tajo Chalcobamba project has lasted two years.

Third, consultation should not be confused with a prior approval procedure. The absence of an agreement does not mean that the consultation process has not been carried out under the terms set out in the Convention.

Another issue to resolve is the lack of clarity on situations where indigenous peoples do not participate in the consultation process. The exhaustion of efforts made by the Government in this regard should be specified, as well as the mechanisms that guarantee the application of the Convention in good faith, as established in the text itself.

Last but not least, the Government must close socio-economic gaps as a matter of priority, as they contribute to distorting the objective of consultation. Owing to the many needs of the indigenous peoples, consultation processes are mistakenly used to present social demands that should be dealt with by the Government. This situation is all the more serious in the country's current context, in which 29 per cent of the population is in a situation of poverty.

We reiterate the willingness of the employers of Peru to work in a tripartite manner to resolve the obstacles to the full application of the Convention, which will ensure the legal certainty required to develop investment for the creation of jobs that meet the standards of decent work. We also reiterate the request of the region's employers for an expert on the Convention to provide appropriate technical assistance and support.

Government member, Mexico, speaking on behalf of the group of Latin American and Caribbean Countries (GRULAC) – I am speaking on behalf of the majority of GRULAC Member countries in the light of the information provided by the Government relating to the recommendations of the Committee of Experts on the application of the Convention. GRULAC notes the Government's efforts to give visibility to and protect its indigenous peoples and tribes – a vulnerable population with particular importance to our region. We welcome the measures adopted by the Government to prevent, investigate and punish acts of violence against indigenous rights defenders, as well as efforts to promote and protect indigenous people's human rights, particularly those faced with illicit activities, such as mining and illegal logging. We note the measures taken by the Government to include indigenous peoples in assessments of mining exploitation projects, to increase the direct participation of these communities.

In light of what we have heard, we invite the Government to continue implementing and carrying out specific actions for the ongoing application of the binding principles and regulations provided for in the Convention, for which we encourage the Office to provide the relevant technical assistance.

Worker member, Spain – I am speaking on behalf of the General Union of Workers (UGT) and Trade Union Confederation of Workers' Commissions (CCOO). The report of the Committee of Experts reveals an overall lack of compliance with the Convention by the Government, referring to, for example, murders of indigenous leaders, impunity, threats to victims' families, arbitrary repression during protests, lack of consultation and dissemination of stigmatizing discourse. It is clear that we are faced with an extremely serious situation, affecting a particularly vulnerable population. The Committee of Experts itself recalls in its report that "a climate of violence and impunity constitutes a serious obstacle to the exercise of the rights of indigenous peoples established in the Convention".

If we look at the specific cases presented by the workers, such as the Saweto case, we see that behind the violations of the communities' rights, which include murders and impunity, lie social and economic stakes related to the activities of illegal economies, such as illegal logging and forced labour.

Illegal logging in Peru is a business that generates huge amounts of money for the criminal groups involved, accounting for almost 40 per cent of all timber produced in the country. The report of the Committee of Experts takes account of the information provided by the Autonomous Workers' Confederation of Peru (CATP) that the main motivation for the Saweto crime was the reporting of illicit activities subjecting indigenous people to forced labour. This is another key issue in the case: the failure of the Government to control illegal logging activities gives way to the forced labour of indigenous people who, given their precarious living conditions and lack of resources, are captured by criminal groups, who engage them informally, violating all labour regulations.

In addition, indigenous workers are obliged to accept foodstuffs from the criminal groups, generating debt bondage which condemns these workers to an endless relation of submission.

This mechanism, which is undoubtedly a situation of forced labour, is known as the habilitación system and is a clear violation of Article 20 of the Convention, which prescribes that the Government shall guarantee that workers belonging to indigenous peoples "are not subjected to coercive recruitment systems, including bonded labour and other forms of debt servitude".

It is notable that this situation has been reported not only by workers' organizations but, as already mentioned and as in the report of the Committee of Experts, also by CONFIEP, which reported an increase in illegal and informal activities, such as logging and mining, in indigenous peoples' territories in the country.

In its report, the Committee of Experts notes with regret that the Government has not provided the information requested on the investigations into illegal logging and the cases of forced labour linked to the habilitación system.

I will conclude by saying that, for this case, the Committee of Experts must firmly demand the implementation by the Government of urgent measures to prevent activities of an illegal economy that undermine rights, including those contained in the Convention and others intended to strengthen mechanisms to protect indigenous peoples' rights defenders who report these crimes.

Government member, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland – The United Kingdom closely monitors the situation of human rights and environmental defenders, including those of indigenous peoples in Peru and welcomes the opportunity to discuss these issues in this forum. The United Kingdom considers indigenous peoples and local communities to be fundamental actors, particularly in respect of the protection and sustainable use of the environment.

The United Kingdom welcomes efforts by the Government to advance the protection of the rights of these groups. The United Kingdom notes that after ten years, the Saweto case has made significant progress, and will hopefully conclude with justice served for the families of four indigenous environmental defenders killed by illegal loggers in 2014.

We also note the commitment by the Peruvian authorities to investigate the murders of indigenous leaders and environmental defenders, including Santiago Contoricón and Quinto Inuma Alvarado, and we hope that justice is served. The United Kingdom calls on the Government to intensify its efforts to guarantee the protection of indigenous peoples, meet its own commitments to uphold their fundamental and collective rights, and uphold its obligations regarding the Convention.

We encourage the Government to protect indigenous peoples' right to prior consultation and access to culturally sensitive public services. We also call on the Government to take action to tackle the illegal activities, such as illegal mining and logging, that threaten these groups and their territories.

We ask the Government to take swift action to demonstrate that anyone responsible for infringing the rights of indigenous peoples or violating their territories will be held accountable and brought to justice.

The United Kingdom has previously stated the need for impartial investigations into allegations of abuses and disproportionate action by the police and armed forces, including alleged action targeting indigenous groups, during the 2022–23 nationwide protests in Peru. The United Kingdom encourages the Government to ensure progress to advance these investigations and bring perpetrators to justice.

In conclusion, the United Kingdom welcomes the Government's continued efforts to implement the recommendations of this report and meet its commitments to the groups highlighted, and sincerely hopes that it takes expeditious action to be in full compliance with the Convention.

Employer member, Chile – We express our deep regret for the loss of lives of indigenous leaders and the delays in the Peruvian justice system in dealing with these cases, punishing those responsible and providing adequate reparation and protection to the victims and their families. It is also worrying that indigenous peoples and their leaders continue to be exposed to this type of violence.

As already mentioned, this situation of insecurity is linked to the development of activities of the illegal economy, particularly illegal logging and mining. We draw attention to the fact that one way to combat these activities is to create an enabling environment for the development of formal projects that provide communities with licit development alternatives, offering jobs that meet decent work standards and remove persons, including those belonging to indigenous peoples, from informal and precarious work with little or no security for their health and lives.

With respect to the consultation process, it has been mentioned that one of the problems facing Peru is the difficulty in clearly identifying those who should be consulted. In this respect, in 2023, the Committee of Experts stated that the Government had not provided any information on progress regarding processes for the identification, demarcation and titling of the lands traditionally occupied by the peoples covered by the Convention.

We note the information provided by the Government on the creation of the Multisectoral Committee to implement the agreements reached during the consultation processes and the assistance provided by the Ministry of Culture in these processes. These technical assistance activities are, however, insufficient. Measures must focus on guaranteeing the titling of the lands of the 1,700 communities for whom this is pending, so that the legitimate parties for the consultation process can be clearly identified.

Worker member, Honduras – We must firmly denounce, regret and condemn the Government for the violations against protesters and the impunity concerning a high number of murders of indigenous leaders. These have not stopped despite the efforts made by human rights organizations and repeated calls from the Office to the Government.

The report of the Committee of Experts once again focuses on the case of the murders of four leaders of the Ashaninka community in Alto Tamaya, in Ucayali, which seems to be taking on a nightmarish scale since it began in 2014 following reports of illegal logging in the region. Not only have the criminal proceedings for the accused been slow, but delays have also been caused because of the decision to quash the ruling of a high court ordering that the legal investigation be resumed based on alleged flaws in the proceedings. We are not against the safeguards that all accused persons must enjoy but in this case such protractedness has resulted in a situation of real impunity relating to the violent murders of persons who were merely defending the rights of their communities peacefully.

The data provided to the Committee of Experts by the trade union organizations reveal irregularities in the prosecution services themselves, which is a concerning and negative sign of the functioning of the judiciary in the country. As the administration of justice is one of the essential functions of the State, the impunity enjoyed by those who committed the murders makes it clear that there are three extremely serious problems. First, the violation of basic human rights, such as safety, physical integrity and life itself. Second, the impact on the rights of indigenous peoples, as recognized by the Convention. Third, the regular reporting of serious failures of the State, which does not manage to fulfil even its essential duties, such as doing justice properly and in good time.

Impunity is such in this case that the accused harassed and threatened the victims' families when they were still free. But, while the events and proceedings described here are tragic, they are not the only issues. Similar violence has continued, as illustrated by the recent murders of the indigenous leaders, Santiago Contoricón, in April 2023, after he reported illegal activities in the Ashaninka province of Satipo, and of comrade Quinto Inuma Alvarado in November 2023 in Santa Rocío de Yanayacu, in the region of San Martín. In addition, there have been displacements and subsequent uprooting to protect the safety of leaders and activists of other communities.

Lastly, it is equally serious that during the popular protests held in December 2022 and September 2023, an excessive use of police force was unleashed against indigenous persons in regions outside of the capital.

Employer member, Mexico – Let us not forget that the guarantors of free, informed, prior and culturally appropriate consultation are the States; and that all consultations must be carried out in “good faith” – a fundamental principle to ensure that consultation is not simply a formality, as demonstrated at the 1988 International Labour Conference. This Committee has also underscored that “an authentic dialogue must be based on respect of the rights and integrity of indigenous peoples”.

The Committee of Experts has highlighted that consultation processes help to build trust between the Government and indigenous peoples. We should recall, therefore, that consultation must provide these peoples with a real opportunity to express their views in the decision-making processes that affect them. It is therefore fundamental that the Government ensures that indigenous peoples have all the relevant information, that it is fully understandable to them, and that sufficient time is granted so that they can organize their own decision-making processes and participate effectively in the adoption of decisions.

According to the information provided by employers to the Committee of Experts, there is no clarity regarding the way in which the indigenous peoples to be consulted are identified or regarding the way in which the impact is determined; nor is there any clear framework on how to proceed when indigenous peoples refuse to participate in consultations, which generates great uncertainty in two ways: on the one hand, full access to the right to consultation is not guaranteed and, on the other, it creates a climate of legal uncertainty around employers' projects.

Furthermore, some authorities make the mistake of requesting that administrative processes that are not likely to directly affect the communities be the subject of prior consultation, which is outside the provisions of Article 15 of the Convention, since this Article stipulates that, for extractive activities, consultation applies to administrative processes authorizing the start of the exploration and exploitation of resources, but consultation is not required for environmental certification.

Worker member, Norway – The trade unions in the Nordic countries express our deep concern about the grave human rights abuses of indigenous peoples in Peru. Peru has 55 different indigenous groups within its borders. This places special responsibility on the Government to apply and safeguard the provisions of the Convention for the benefit and protection of its indigenous population.

Indigenous communities in the Peruvian Amazon are subjected to discrimination, violence, threats and forced labour related to illegal economic activities, most notoriously logging, mining and coca cultivation. All this is illustrated by the emblematic legal case on the brutal murders of four Asháninka leaders from Alto Tamaya-Saweto in 2014. Although the crime was ten years ago, and the perpetrators were convicted in 2023, their final detention is still awaiting approval by a higher court. We call for definitive justice. The victims' families and their community deserve protection. The perpetrators must be immediately detained.

Sadly, land and human rights defenders are under assault in Peru. From 2012 to 2022, 54 rights defenders were killed. Over half of the deceased are indigenous. Even though Peru has established a registry and an intersectoral mechanism for the protection of human rights defenders, these measures are, unfortunately, under-utilized since indigenous leaders are still being killed.

The Government promotes the reactivation of its economy. However, it is unacceptable that economic actors operating in indigenous lands avoid acquiring free, prior and informed consent, and opt instead for harassment and violence. By permitting impunity of such acts, the Government tacitly allows these practices against indigenous people who are merely defending their basic rights.

Finally, without recognition of basic land tenure rights of indigenous peoples, illegal actors are more easily able to enter and take control of these territories. Formalization of the 1,700 outstanding native and campesino community claims in Peru will help further strengthen indigenous peoples' rights and improve protection against illegal actors.

We call on the Government to ensure indigenous peoples' rights, improve their protection and establish their territories to confront the direct violence against them and to end impunity of the perpetrators.

Employer member, Guatemala – We align ourselves with what was said by our spokesperson and, as employers, we express our condemnation of all acts of violence or threats. We also express concern for the unjustified delays of the courts to punish those responsible for this type of crime, and to provide adequate reparation and protection mechanisms for victims and their families.

Additionally, it is worth noting that, while there is no requirement in the Convention for a national regulation on prior consultation, the Government opted for a domestic standard that in general terms adequately regulates consultation. However, in practice, this regulation is never used when resolving key issues, such as the proper identification of the populations subject to consultation, and situations in which the population refuses to participate in the consultation processes, thus moving away from the principle of good faith enshrined in the Convention. It is essential to resolve these shortcomings. To this end, two aspects need to be taken into consideration from the 2011 general observation of the Committee of Experts on this Convention, in which the Committee stated that:

- (i) “such consultations do not imply a right to veto, nor is the result of such consultations necessarily the reaching of agreement or consent” and
- (ii) “the obligation to guarantee adequate consultations lies clearly and explicitly with governments, and not with individuals or private enterprises”.

It is important to consider how the complications of the consultation processes stall formal projects that generate jobs that meet decent work standards. This in turn fosters the emergence and development of illegal activities, such as illegal logging and mining, which seriously affect the well-being and security of indigenous peoples, the environment and society in general.

We call on the Government to urgently attend to the problems mentioned, in consultation with the most representative social partners.

Worker member, Costa Rica – A fundamental component of the Convention is the right to be consulted by governments on aspects concerning the interests of these communities relating to projects to be carried out.

The purpose of consultation, under Article 7 of the Convention, is to carry out studies, in cooperation with the peoples concerned, to assess the social, spiritual, cultural and environmental impact on these peoples of development activities planned by the government. Further, under Article 15, governments are obliged to establish or maintain procedures through which they shall consult the peoples concerned, with a view to with a view to ascertaining whether and to what degree their interests would be prejudiced, before undertaking or permitting any programmes for the exploration or exploitation of such resources pertaining to their lands.

In the case of Peru, the comments of the Committee of Experts reveal that consultation with indigenous peoples was not guaranteed during the environmental impact assessment stage on measures which may affect them directly, and thus the Committee of Experts reminds the Government of its obligation to fully comply with Article 7 of the Convention.

In essence, the Committee requests the Government to take measures to identify and address the difficulties that continue to arise in the implementation of consultation processes in the mining sector.

We wish to add that it is not a matter of simply complying with the Convention by fulfilling an obligation to consult the peoples concerned, because consultation has two fundamental roles: on the one hand, its purpose is to protect an interest which may affect them directly, for example, a mining or other exploration and exploitation project; and, on the other, consultation also has the purpose of giving effect to the right to recognition of peoples as historical and unique subjects from a historical, social, spiritual and cultural perspective.

This dual role of consultation is essential in order to comply fully with the Convention. The Government must meet this obligation so that recognition and participation are not reduced to mere progress on paper.

Employer member, Honduras – At the outset, as employer members, I wish to express our rejection of all types of violence against indigenous peoples specifically and any other population group in Peru.

This case should make us think carefully about the effective application of the Convention, as its implementation has been made difficult in various countries, especially in the Latin American region. Today we are hearing the case of Peru, where acts of violence against indigenous leaders have been reported, which is condemnable in every sense. But this just shows the absence of the Government, which allows illegal activity in many sectors, including illegal mining, which operates under conditions of unfair competition. But, what is most serious, is that it endangers the integrity and lives of many people in Peru.

An important issue to highlight in the case of Peru is that there is a consultation mechanism in place, which has served as a reference for many countries. We must recognize, however, that these consultation mechanisms present many challenges. The main challenge is the intervention of other parties which have been presenting new concepts of consultation, very different from the concept of prior consultation established by the Convention. This is an emerging problem in Peru because the indigenous populations are unaware of the consultation processes, thus generating a kind of veto not envisaged in the text of the Convention. Given this reality, the Office must pay greater attention to this important Convention.

I note that on several occasions, the Office has been asked to give more attention to the Convention, particularly in countries in the Latin American region. This region must have experts to assist certain States that have ratified the Convention in establishing effective consultation mechanisms with a tripartite approach, to prevent in compliance with the Convention, and ensure monitoring and enforcement of a Convention of such importance that guarantees the right to prior consultation and other fundamental rights of indigenous peoples.

Lastly, we wish to reiterate support for the employers working in a tripartite manner to ensure implementation of the Convention.

Worker member, Canada – The Committee calls on the Government to identify and address the issues concerning the implementation of consultation processes in the mining sector. More than 70 Canadian mining firms are active in Peru, together they command nearly US$10 billion in assets equivalent to 4.5 per cent of Peru's gross domestic product in 2021. Canada, home to 75 per cent of global mining companies promotes the industry and hails Peru as a strategic mining partner.

While the Government advances a pro-mining agenda, Canada maintains that both countries stand to benefit from expanded extractive activities. But the spoils from Peru's mining friendly policies are not shared evenly: as is often the case the majority of the population is subordinated to the interests and profits of a transnational mining elite.

Indigenous partners of Canadian non-governmental organizations indicate that the industry is trying to mine wherever and however, as fast as possible with the limited participation of the people affected. For example, the southern Peruvian province of Puno, near the border with Bolivia is home to many mining operations, some in the exploration stage and others that have already begun production. During the nationwide protests in early 2023, Puno was the site of severe police repression as indigenous and campesino communities rallied to demand reforms to address the toxic environmental liabilities left behind by existing projects, and to respect their right to consent to future projects through community driven, transparent and fair processes.

Communities and local organizations have condemned the lack of transparency around forthcoming projects, and the lack of regulatory frameworks to properly manage the mines and potential risks to public health and the environment. Prioritizing the profits of transnational companies and speeding up major extractive projects runs counter to the real needs of the population who have identified food, water and the climate crisis as fundamental concerns that must be addressed, and who have said that there is not a single mention of these issues in the plans put forward by the national and regional governments.

Former United Nations Secretary-General Ban Ki moon proclaimed that there can be no development for indigenous peoples without their free, prior and informed consent and without them being involved in every step. This underscores the call from Canadian trade unions and civil society actors for a robust mandatory human rights due diligence legislation which ensures Canadian companies take the steps in their overseas operations to prevent serious negative impacts to the environment, human rights and the long-term health of communities, including the requirement to respect community members' right of participation and consultation as called for in the Convention.

Worker member, Chile – As a trade union leader and member of the Mapuche people, I regret the situation of our indigenous brothers and sisters of Peru, who denounce crimes such as illegal logging, illegal mining and forced labour, which endanger their lives and those of their families. The State does not provide them with adequate, efficient, sustainable, preventive and immediate protection mechanisms with sufficient resources or a genuine political will to provide comprehensive assistance to the Peruvian people to comply with the provisions of Article 4.1 of the Convention.

We are talking about specific cases and people with names: the case of Edwin Chota and three indigenous leaders from Saweto who were murdered for reporting illegal logging; the case of Quinto Inuma, an indigenous leader from the San Martín region, also murdered for reporting illegal logging, despite the establishment of a protection mechanism; the case of Augustina Mayán, leader of the Awajún people of El Cenepa in Amazonas, who was displaced following death threats for reporting illegal mining, for whom a protection mechanism was also established but without the assistance of the State; the case of Zebelio Kayap, leader of the Huampami community of El Cenepa in Amazonas, for whom there is protection but who has also been abandoned without state assistance; the case of Georgina Rivera Paz, an Awajún leader from the Nazareth community, in Chiriraco, Amazonas, who received death threats for denouncing drug trafficking and violations of children's rights, for whom protection was requested and who does not have state assistance; the case of Isaías Mayán, indigenous leader of the Canga community in El Cenepa, Amazonas, who does not have protection although it was requested in 2021; and the case of Julián Gonza and Batman Chujandam, indigenous leaders of the Anak Kurutuyacu community who were displaced following death threats for reporting illegal logging, and for whom a protection mechanism is in place but without state assistance.

As we can see, the early warning protection mechanisms and human rights defenders protection mechanisms for these indigenous leaders who report crimes are not effective and this inaction by the Government generates and exposes them to risks to their lives. The Government learns of these events and does not provide an immediate and targeted response, in violation of Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee must therefore demand immediate action to regulate adequate protection mechanisms with budgets, taking account of the intercultural context of the first peoples.

Worker member, Mexico – I am speaking on behalf of the National Workers' Union of Mexico. This case must be examined closely owing to the seriousness and complexity of the human rights violations against the indigenous populations of Peru. I refer in particular to two allegations in the report, which I wish to highlight in this intervention.

In Peru, the human right to expeditious, prompt, complete and impartial judicial process continues to be flagrantly violated and the situation has not changed in ten years. In the report, the Committee of Experts deeply regrets the brutal massacre of four indigenous leaders in Alto

Tamaya-Saweto in 2014, which was not only an attack on human life, but a direct affront to the fundamental rights and dignity of our indigenous brothers and sisters.

These leaders were killed for defending their lands and communities from a system that reduces people to mere commodities. In the region, the habilitación system has become a perverse cycle of modern slavery, where indigenous persons are held captive and forced to work under inhumane conditions. They are forced to provide timber to the group, accumulating endless debt in exchange for foodstuffs, thus perpetuating a system of exploitation and misery.

We firmly condemn this climate of violence that has crept into indigenous Peruvian communities, against those who defend their rights. The disproportionate use of public powers to repress indigenous persons who are only seeking justice and respect of their human rights is inadmissible. These acts of violence, along with racist discourse and hate speech inciting further violence, are totally unacceptable and must end immediately.

It is imperative that this Committee urges the Government to take robust and urgent measures to protect indigenous rights defenders in the Amazon region; to implement effective policies to ensure security and justice for indigenous communities; and to bring judicial processes that guarantee truth, justice and reparation for victims.

Justice cannot be a privilege for a few. It must be a real and accessible right for all. This Committee must not cease its work until justice is done for the murders in Alto Tamaya-Saweto and until our indigenous sisters and brothers can live free from violence and exploitation.

Chairperson – I can see no more requests for the floor, so I have the honour to invite the Government representative, to make his concluding remarks.

Government representative – Many thanks to all the delegates who have participated in recognizing our efforts, and especially to the delegates who have been more critical, because this allows us to provide clarification with regard to certain events which are taking place in my country. When I listened, I felt that I did not recognize the country being described. In truth it is a slightly complicated country where, first of all, some people have more or less said that we show a degree of tolerance towards illegal mining and logging and similar activities.

So I will start with this, by indicating what we are doing in our vigorous efforts to combat illegal mining and logging. In Peru we have declared war on these crimes. In 2023, we carried out 979 operations against illegal mining, environmental pollution and offences against fauna, flora and hydrological resources.

So far in 2024, we have carried out 1,219 operational interventions. To all the delegates who have spoken out, we would like to present the results. We have arrested 1,151 individuals involved in illegal mining and crimes against the environment. We have dismantled four criminal gangs. A total of 622 vehicles for use in illegal mining and crimes against the environment have been seized. A total of 19 boats have been placed under a ban, 19 firearms have been recovered, as well as money, and 37 million board feet of timber have been recovered.

In addition, 1,479 rafts and 3,522 engines intended for illegal mining have been seized, 38 banned mine galleries have been destroyed, 1,250 mining camps have been entered, 180,430 litres of fuel have been seized, 19 chemical products and 89 items of heavy machinery have been banned, and 312 items of heavy machinery have been seized.

I think it is good to report on all of this. Furthermore, in 2023 and 2024, six supreme decrees were issued, declaring a state of emergency in the Tambopata, Inambari, Las Piedras and Laberinto districts of Tambopato province in the Madre de Dios region, with the aim of continuing police operations to combat and neutralize illegal logging and mining and related crimes.

With this information we wish to place explicitly on record that Peru is tackling illegal mining and logging in a head-on confrontation.

I have also listened closely to the claims that my country is promoting some kind of impunity in relation to the Saweto case, basically because the proceedings have taken time. This is a complex case in which the Government, through the Attorney General's Office and the Public Prosecutor's Office, which constitute the public prosecution service in my country, has had to take bold steps through strategies based on circumstantial evidence because in my country, as in many countries of the region and worldwide, there is a separation of functions and powers. It is not the Government which secures convictions but the judiciary, which has autonomy under the terms of the National Constitution. In the Peruvian system, prosecution of crimes is the responsibility of the public prosecution service, and proceedings are arduous because there is no direct evidence and it is difficult for both lawyers and prosecutors to prove the crimes.

Fortunately, both the Attorney General's Office and the Public Prosecutor's Office, through complex evidence-gathering activity involving indirect or circumstantial evidence, have managed to authoritatively establish responsibility on the part of the perpetrators of the aggravated homicide, and for this the latter have incurred the drastic penalty of 28 years' imprisonment.

So it is an established fact that enormous efforts have been made to secure this conviction. I am sure that everyone here realizes how difficult it is for our systems to prove crimes of this kind. However, in Peru we have managed to do so, and it is a precedent for my country and for the region, as well as being a precedent for all ILO Member States.

We have also heard comments on new cases, and there has been mention of the case of Quinto Inuma Alvarado. We are bound to point out that in this case the Government has also reacted immediately. Guarantees have been given to protect the life, physical safety and mental well-being of the relatives of the leaders. Psychological support has also been given to the relatives, and they have also received financial assistance.

In the case of Santiago Contoricón Antúnez, the Government is in charge of protecting the relatives, and it has also granted an orphan's scholarship for his daughter, Yesenia Contoricón. Personal guarantees have also been given to the relatives and they have also been incorporated into the Juntos programme, which provides financial assistance for persons in situations of vulnerability.

Mr Chair, Ladies and Gentlemen, these are concrete actions.

Reference has also been made to prior consultations. I appreciate and am grateful for the fact that virtually a majority have recognized that in Peru prior consultation is institutionalized.

In Peru, indigenous and native peoples' right to prior consultation was incorporated into the Peruvian legal system with the entry into force of the Convention, which, in my country, in accordance with article 55 of the National Constitution, has constitutional rank, in other words, the highest legal status. In addition, our system also adopted the Prior Consultation Act, for which implementing regulations were adopted by Supreme Decree No. 01-2012.

The Government has also been promoting dialogue mechanisms provided for in the Prior Consultation Act and 141 technical assistance actions have been implemented for 865 officials.

What is happening in my country no doubt happens in any country: at times legislation is adopted but officials have to be put in place. This is what we have done, at the national, regional and local government levels, so that they can be fully involved in implementation.

Moreover, training has been given to 1,524 indigenous persons with the participation of five ministries. This is a multi-sectoral action involving three public agencies and four regional governments.

In addition, a capacity-building programme has been carried out for 931 public officials, 1,118 indigenous inhabitants and another 1,057 persons.

Moreover, 11 training courses have been held for 3,890 persons on the right to prior consultation and the consultation process.

We think that there may still be gaps to be filled. We think that there is still much more to do. In fact we will be grateful to receive technical assistance from the ILO so that we can learn other good practices. We will also be pleased to look at the good practices of the delegates who have made statements today so that we can also implement these practices in my country.

I have also noted from some Employers, regarding prior consultation, that this has often ended up being an obstacle to investment. They maintain, and in Peru they always maintain, that the best way to combat poverty and extreme poverty, which sometimes also occurs in native communities, is through investment so that there is access to education and food, and in this way it will be possible to emerge from the state of poverty or extreme poverty.

These are subjects which we also have to look at in my country, and certainly in all countries of the region.

With regard to the titling of lands traditionally occupied by indigenous peoples, there has not been a great deal of comment. However, we would like to point out that, in full application of Act No. 29785, there are 55 indigenous and native peoples who have a traditional presence, spread across 9,211 localities (5,135 campesino (peasant farming) communities, 2,303 native communities and 1,708 communities in the process of being identified. Of this number, 4,327 (49 per cent) are georeferenced, 7,455 (81 per cent) are recognized and 5,825 (63 per cent) have received titling. This covers a total of 2,880,552 persons, which is a significant proportion of the population.

In this context, the Government, through the Ministry of Culture, has provided support to guarantee collective rights to land and territory to 49 native and campesino communities belonging to various departments, as follows: 22 in San Martín, 9 in Ayacucho, 5 in Huánuco, 3 in Ucayali, 4 in Loreto, 3 in Pasco, 1 in Amazonas, 1 in Madre de Dios and 1 in Cusco.

In my country there is probably still much to be done and there are still significant gaps to bridge, but what is beyond doubt is that in this Government we are making an enormous effort to close these gaps. Of course we will best achieve this with support from the ILO, which will certainly provide us with the best practices of the countries in the region or other parts of the world and we will be very grateful to receive this.

Employer members – The Employer members would like to thank the various speakers who have taken the floor and in particular the Government for its statements and the information it has provided.

In our final remarks, we would like to underline the importance of the Convention as an instrument for promoting social dialogue, good governance and the necessary institutionality for fostering confidence, peace, and agreements with the indigenous peoples.

We would also like to clarify that, in accordance with Article 13 of the Convention, with respect to mining and quarrying, prior consultation applies to the administrative acts that authorize the start of exploration or exploitation of natural resources. Hence environmental certification or other administrative, additional or preparatory measures do not need to be the subject of consultation.

We take note of all the initiatives presented by the Government and the progress made during the last two years. However, in order to make progress on the application of the Convention, we think that greater efforts are needed at national level.

Therefore, in line with the recommendations of the Committee of Experts, the Employer members wish to request the Government to:

- (1) ensure that the resources and technical capacity are provided to ensure the operation of the mechanism for the protection of indigenous leaders who are human rights defenders;
- (2) take urgent steps to prevent, investigate and punish acts of violence against the indigenous population;
- (3) on the basis that the Convention requires good faith in consultations, we ask the Government to take immediate action to ensure effective consultation processes when indigenous peoples decide not to participate; and
- (4) we reiterate a request from the employers in the region to have a specialist on the Convention and, in this regard, we urge the Government to request technical assistance from the ILO to design a road map to enable it to make progress on compliance with the Convention.

Worker members – We thank the Minister for the information he has provided. Despite this, the serious violations of the rights of indigenous peoples and the constant threats and persecution to which they are exposed in Peru are a source of grave concern. At least 33 indigenous leaders have been murdered in the last ten years.

We deplore the lack of commitment on the part of the Government to providing appropriate protection for indigenous leaders and human rights defenders, which leaves them exposed to death threats and at risk of being assaulted or murdered.

We note with satisfaction that the Employer spokesperson is equally emphatic in expressing rejection of the above.

The Government cannot carry on ignoring the situation. Robust measures must be taken immediately to stop the endemic violence against the indigenous peoples and their defenders and end the deep-rooted impunity and climate of fear.

We have heard countless data from the Government on arrests but we would also like to know how many persons have actually been convicted. Unfortunately this has not been mentioned, as far as we are aware.

We also underline the need for the Government to establish adequate procedures for consultation and participation to ensure that the rights, cultures and means of subsistence of the indigenous peoples are fully respected and safeguarded.

As the Committee of Experts has stated, a climate of violence and impunity constitutes a serious obstacle to the exercise of the rights of indigenous peoples as enshrined in the Convention.

For this reason, we urge the Government to:

- (1) protect the life, physical safety and psychological well-being of the relatives of all murdered indigenous leaders, including the relatives of the victims in Alto Tamaya-Saweto;
- (2) make available all necessary resources to ensure that all instigators and perpetrators of these murders of members of indigenous people are prosecuted and punished once and for all;
- (3) ensure that the protocol on prosecution action for the prevention and investigation of crimes against human rights defenders is provided with material, human and economic resources so that it can be applied not only in a reactive manner but also, in particular, in a preventive manner;
- (4) strengthen the mechanisms for protection of human rights defenders in terms of budget and intercultural adaptation;
- (5) carry out all necessary investigations and actions in relation to the reports of illegal logging and cases of forced labour under the habilitación system in the department of Ucayali;
- (6) guarantee the right of indigenous peoples to free and informed prior consultation;
- (7) take all necessary steps to move forward in the processes of identification, demarcation and regularization of lands traditionally occupied by the peoples covered by the Convention in the various regions of the country; and
- (8) amend the domestic legislation of Peru so that the indigenous peoples are granted ownership of their lands and not transfer of use, through the formalization programmes being implemented in the country.

Lastly, we invite the Government to accept an ILO direct contacts mission.

Conclusions of the Committee

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted with deep concern the persistence of acts of violence and attempts against the life of indigenous persons when defending their rights as well as the situation of impunity that this phenomenon generates.

Taking into account the discussion, the Committee urged the Government to:

- undertake expeditious investigations into the allegations of violence and incitement to violence and ensure that the perpetrators and instigators of the murders of indigenous leaders in Alto Tamaya-Saweto are prosecuted and punished as a matter of utmost urgency;
- take all necessary measures to protect the life, physical safety and psychological well-being of the members of the families of the murdered indigenous leaders without delay;
- take, without delay, effective measures to prevent violence against indigenous persons and their defenders;
- take steps, in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, to identify and address difficulties in the implementation of consultation processes with indigenous peoples, including in relation to the mining sector;

- provide information to the Committee of Experts on:
 - measures taken to identify, demarcate and regularize the lands traditionally occupied by the peoples covered by the Convention in the various regions of the country;
 - progress on the investigations into the complaints concerning illegal logging and the cases of forced labour linked to the habilitación system in the department of Ucayali;
 - the activities of the Standing Multisectoral Committee for the Application of the Right to Consultation, explaining the manner in which the aforementioned Committee follows up on agreements and takes action in cases of non-compliance with agreements concluded in the consultation processes;
 - how provision is made to secure the cooperation of the indigenous peoples in assessing the social, spiritual, cultural and environmental impact of mining exploration or exploitation projects which may affect their rights;
 - the criteria used by the Ministry of Energy and Mining to determine which indigenous peoples must be consulted with regard to a project; and
 - the measures taken to inform indigenous peoples regarding the importance of consultation and to promote their participation in these processes.

The Committee urged the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance with a view to implementing the above recommendations and giving full implementation to the Convention and to submit a detailed report to the Committee of Experts by 1 September 2024.

Government representative – I would like to convey the greetings of the Minister of Labour and Employment Promotion of Peru, who is unable to accompany us at this sitting because of a previous appointment. On behalf of the Government of Peru, we thank the Conference Committee for the recommendations made today and we reiterate Peru's commitment to continue making progress in the application of the principles and provisions of the Convention. We express our willingness to draw up a work agenda with ILO technical assistance, which will certainly help us to continue with the successful application of the Convention.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

Written information provided by the Government

The Government has provided the following written information, as well as copies of the Anti-Terrorist Council Official Statement dated 29 April 2024, the Anti-Terrorist Council Memorandum dated 30 April 2024, the Administrative Order No. 22 dated 8 May 2024 and Supreme Court Decisions Nos 254753 and 269249.

Progress in the implementation of the tripartite road map on freedom of association

1. Actions of Executive Order No. 23 Inter-Agency Committee (EO 23-IAC)

Omnibus Guidelines on the Exercise of Freedom of Association and Civil Liberties approved by the EO 23-IAC on 26 April 2024. The Guidelines consolidate, update and strengthen two previous guidelines concerning freedom of association (FoA) issued in 2011 and 2012. The Guidelines were endorsed on 21 March 2024 by the National Tripartite Industrial Peace Council (NTIPC) after a thorough consultative process involving the Department of Labor and Employment (DOLE), other relevant agencies, and the labour and employer representatives. The Guidelines: (i) govern the conduct of government agencies, employers, and workers in the private sector in the workers' exercise of the right to organize, collectively bargain, and engage in peaceful concerted actions and other lawful trade union activities, including public assemblies; and (ii) delineate and update stakeholders' responsibilities for better coordination in labour and employment education, maintaining peace and order, case prosecution, and protecting national sovereignty and integrity, consistent with their jurisdiction and mandates.

On speeding up investigation and prosecution, the EO 23-IAC closely monitored the killing of Alex Dolorosa, although the same clearly appears not to be union-related. The alleged perpetrator, an individual, was accused of homicide in October 2023 at the Bacolod City RTC. The accused was arraigned on February 2024. The court has also set trial dates.

Following EO 23-IAC directives, related or member-agencies of the IAC took the following actions:

- The Anti-Terrorist Council (ATC) Official Statement dated 29 April 2024 was published, in relation to indiscriminate labelling, including red tagging. This affirms its sole and exclusive authority to designate individuals or groups as terrorists under the Anti-Terrorism Act of 2020 (ATA). Cognizant of concerns of trade unions and their members about being labelled as or linked to terrorists without basis and due process, the ATC reminds the public that no other government body, agency, officer or employee has the authority to label individuals or groups in a manner that can be construed as the designation of terrorists under the ATA. Designation must always be exercised with utmost diligence, in accordance with existing laws, rules and regulations to ensure that fundamental rights and due process are respected and protected.
- The ATC Memorandum dated 30 April 2024 was issued against indiscriminate labelling instructing all ATC members and support agencies to abide by the procedures and guidelines for designation of terrorists, and to monitor and report to the ATC incidents of non-compliance, unauthorized designations, or other related issues.

2. Strengthening tripartite monitoring bodies and promoting FoA

The DOLE RO XI multisectoral dialogue was held between 23 Center of United and Progressive Workers (SENTRO)-affiliated federations and Southern Mindanao Federation of Labor and law enforcement agencies on 4 March 2024, where they agreed to develop a social accord for the protection of trade union rights. Colonel Osmalik Tayaban of the 10th Infantry Division of the Philippine Army provided his personal contact number and urged the participants to directly report to him any irregularities involving military personnel in the region.

The DOLE strategic workshop was held on 8 March 2024, where DOLE regional offices: (i) formulated their respective calendar of activities to implement the strategies concerning tripartism and freedom of association; and (ii) developed a training design for the implementation of labour education for different sectors, including law enforcement agencies.

The DOLE RO VIII resolution reconstituting the Regional Tripartite Monitoring Body (RTMB) and reorientation for RTMB members was adopted on 20 March 2024, focusing on the Body's role in validating and monitoring alleged violations of freedom of association.

The first paralegal training was organized and conducted by the DOLE and the University of the Philippines (UP) Law Workers and Employees Program, pursuant to the DOLE-UP MOA, on 20 April 2024. Thirty-nine trade unionists, including representatives from SENTRO, completed the six-day training on employers' and workers' rights and obligations, available criminal, civil, and administrative remedies in case of violations, practical skills, including affidavit writing and case build-up.

Developments in promoting a whole-of-government approach to address FoA-related issues

Administrative Order No. 22 dated 8 May 2024 was issued by President Marcos, establishing a Special Committee on Human Rights Coordination to enhance existing mechanisms for the promotion and protection of human rights, particularly to sustain initiatives on investigation and accountability, data-gathering on alleged human rights violations by law enforcement agencies, and expanded civil space and engagement.

Supreme Court decisions:

- Deduro v. Vinoya, G.R. No. 254753, 4 July 2023, declaring that red-tagging, vilification, labelling, and guilt by association constitute threats to a person's right to life, liberty or security, and justify issuance of a writ of amparo [protection of constitutional rights].
- Castro and Tamano v. Dela Cruz, G.R. No. 269249, 24 October 2023, granting the writs of protection, habeas data and amparo in favour of Castro and Tamano, who were abducted by State agents allegedly for their environmental advocacies.

Concluding note

All allegations of killing and harassment of trade union members subsumed under Case No. 3185 occurred between 2013 and 2021 but were reported to the ILO only in 2016, 2019 and 2021. Regular monitoring by the RTMBs and now by the EO 23-IAC shows that concrete actions have been taken by the authorities concerned in cases where witnesses are available. Some cases have turned out to be clearly not union-related and in others, even family members themselves have desisted from pursuing the cases.

The Government points out that allegations are "extremely serious" in nature only if proven true based on verified information. The Government does not question the Committee's authority to determine what should or should not fall under the scope of its mandate. Nevertheless, it urges the Committee to ensure verification of all allegations, and to provide clear and reasonable parameters in the exercise of its mandate. The Government has shown an unprecedented level of cooperation with the ILO's supervisory bodies in the last two years. Its good faith should not be undermined by its continuing inclusion in the list of countries to be placed under examination.

Discussion by the Committee

Chairperson – I invite the Government representative of the Philippines, the Undersecretary of the Department of Labor and Employment (DOLE), to take the floor.

Government representative – The Government is grateful to the Committee for this opportunity to make its opening statement, which shall focus on the observation of the Committee of Experts issued as a follow-up to the conclusions that the Committee made during the Conference last year.

From the start of the administration of President Ferdinand R. Marcos Jr. on 30 June 2022, the Government has shown the deepest respect for the processes of this Committee, the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association, as well as for the directives of the Conference concerning the country's application of the Convention. The Government has demonstrated an unprecedented level of cooperation with the ILO supervisory bodies by providing timely and validated information on this matter. Since August 2022, the Government has submitted no less than ten reports. In this regard, while the Government appreciates that the supervisory bodies have taken note of several aspects of these submissions, it also emphasizes that the last four reports submitted already include information that addresses the current follow-up observation of the Committee of Experts. For the record, these submissions are: the 20 May 2024 reply to the Committee on new developments not yet examined by the Committee of Experts; the 16 April 2024 reply to the Committee on Freedom of Association on the 405th Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association; the 8 January 2024 reply to the Committee on Freedom of Association request for supplementary information; and the 12 December 2023 reply to the observations submitted to the Committee of Experts by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), the International Transport Workers' Federation (ITF), and the Center of United and Progressive Workers (SENTRO) on the Philippines' compliance with the Convention.

The rules of this proceeding, as well as time constraints, do not allow the Government to repeat the contents of these reports in this morning's discussions. However, the Government therefore requests that these reports be incorporated by reference to the discussions today so that this Committee may have a fuller appreciation of the facts and the actual situation in the application of the Convention in our country.

I will now focus on the three main matters contained in the observation. The first major item is on developments pertinent to the tripartite road map to ensure full compliance with the Convention. The Government informs this Committee of the following:

- First, the road map, with appropriate timelines and the responsible parties involved, was formulated with the technical support of the ILO and was approved by the National Tripartite Industrial Peace Council (NTIPC). The majority of the NTIPC members signed the resolution adopting the road map. A copy of this road map was submitted to this Committee on 1 September 2023.
- Second, the Omnibus Guidelines on Freedom of Association and Civil Liberties were approved by the Inter-Agency Committee created through Executive Order No. 23 (EO23 IAC) on 26 April 2024.

The Guidelines consolidate, update and strengthen two previous guidelines concerning freedom of association issued in 2011 and 2012. The Guidelines were the result of a thorough consultative process and have expanded the scope of the two previous guidelines in the following areas: firstly, they govern the conduct of government agencies, employers and workers in the private sector in workers' exercise of the right to organize, collectively bargain, and engage in peaceful concerted actions and other lawful trade union activities, including public assemblies; and secondly, they delineate and update stakeholders' responsibilities for better coordination in labour and employment education, maintaining peace and order, prosecution, and protecting national sovereignty and integrity.

Revision of the Guidelines is one of the major outputs included in the tripartite road map. The DOLE, as the lead agency, is now finalizing the programme of activities including capacity-building trainings and information and education materials to ensure the widest dissemination of and full compliance with the Guidelines. The Government appreciates that the Committee has taken note of the Government's interest in possible technical assistance on this activity, and hopes that such assistance materializes soon.

- Third, regarding the call for a review of Executive Order No. 23, allegedly due to lack of sectoral consultation prior to its issuance and the absence of sectoral representation in its structure, the Government clarifies that the EO23 IAC was established as a response to the recommendation of the high-level tripartite mission for the creation of a presidentially-mandated body that will coordinate the actions of various agencies on the investigation and prosecution of cases involving violations of trade union rights. The high-level tripartite mission itself did not recommend that the presidentially-mandated body have a tripartite composition. And this is for a good reason, as the agencies comprising the EO23 IAC include agencies performing investigative and prosecutorial functions, which are sovereign governmental functions that cannot be shared with private organizations. In its first year of operation, the EO23 IAC has met six times, with specific outputs. The Government will be pleased to share with this Committee, for its reference, the EO23 IAC Chairperson's First Year Report to the President of the Philippines.

On the high-level tripartite mission recommendation to establish a specialized, independent non-judicial body of eminent persons, the Government reiterates its position that the Commission on Human Rights (CHR), a body created by the Philippine Constitution, serves as such an independent body. As previously reported, the NTIPC has recognized that the CHR indeed has the mandate to perform the functions expected of this independent body.

The Government takes the view that where mechanisms already exist to address specific issues, the direction should be to strengthen these mechanisms. The high-level tripartite mission, during its visit to the Philippines, heard from various agencies and stakeholders where the priority areas for strengthening should be, namely: investigative and forensic capacity, case build-up and case management; data and information sharing; and continuous capacity-building and awareness-raising on labour and human rights. The Government continuously strives to improve on these areas, but will welcome technical cooperation programmes to further support its efforts.

The Committee may also recall that, during last year's sessions, the Government expressed openness to learning from other countries which have established a specialized body similar to the independent body recommended by the high-level tripartite mission. The Government remains open to such an opportunity, as may be suggested by the Committee, in order to improve its existing mechanisms.

On the general issue of genuine sectoral consultation, dialogue and engagement, the Government appreciates the Committee's encouragement for the continued strengthening of tripartite consultative processes. Strengthening tripartism and social dialogue is one of the key outcomes included not only in the tripartite road map but also in the Philippine Labor and Employment Plan.

In this regard, the Government informs this Committee that tripartism and social dialogue in the Philippines is firmly institutionalized. A wide range of tripartite mechanisms exist, which ensures sectoral participation and engagement in various aspects of labour and employment, such as the NTIPC, the regional Tripartite Industrial Peace Council and the tripartite wage and productivity boards under the DOLE, as well as the governing boards of other agencies involved in health, social security, housing and investment promotion. The sectoral representatives to these bodies are appointed by the President upon recommendation of their respective sectors to ensure genuine representation. Since November 2022, 103 sectoral representatives comprising 54 workers' and 49 employers' representatives, have been appointed to various tripartite bodies by the President.

On the second major item, on civil liberties and trade union rights, relevant information on the cases characterized as "previous allegations" as well as "new allegations" has been provided in the earlier reports that were submitted by the Government. On the "new allegations", the Government provides the following additional information:

- On the killing of Alex Dolorosa, allegedly an officer of the BPO Industry Employees Network (BIEN), the Government clarifies that BIEN is registered with the DOLE as a workers' association, not as a trade union. DOLE records of BIEN do not show any officer, member or organizer by the name of Dolorosa. There is also no record of any union that he might have organized. Police investigation reports do not indicate that the killing was motivated by his alleged union activities. The alleged perpetrator, a private individual, was accused of homicide in October 2023 at the Bacolod City regional trial court. The accused was arraigned in February 2024. The court has also set trial dates.

On measures to combat impunity, strengthen monitoring mechanisms, and enhance the environment for freedom of association and the right to organize, the following are some of the relevant developments:

- To help combat indiscriminate labelling, including red-tagging, the EO23 IAC coordinated with the Anti-Terrorist Council (ATC), which issued an official statement dated 29 April 2024 that the ATC is the only administrative agency that has the authority to designate individuals or groups as terrorists, strictly in accordance with existing laws, rules and regulations to ensure that fundamental rights and due process are respected and protected. The ATC also issued a Memorandum dated 30 April 2024 against indiscriminate labelling, instructing all ATC members and support agencies to abide by the procedures and guidelines for the designation of terrorists, and to monitor and report to the ATC incidents of non-compliance, unauthorized designations, or other related issues.
- At the level of regional monitoring bodies, multisectoral dialogues, including between trade unions and the military, strategic workshops on activities to promote freedom of association, and reconstitution and reorientation of the regional monitoring body have been undertaken.
- The first paralegal training organized and conducted by DOLE and the University of the Philippines College of Law, and attended by 39 trade unionists, completed the six-day training on employers' and workers' rights and obligations, available criminal, civil and administrative remedies in case of violations, and practical skills, including affidavit writing and case build-up.
- A data-sharing agreement between DOLE and the CHR on the referral and evaluation of cases allegedly arising from the exercise of union rights has been signed and is currently being implemented.

- DOLE's budget for the strengthening of tripartite monitoring mechanisms has been increased by 350 per cent in the 2024 General Appropriations Act.
- Actions of other government agencies also complement the tripartite road map and the work being done by the EO23 IAC. Administrative Order No. 22 dated 8 May 2024, issued by President Marcos, established a Special Committee on Human Rights Coordination to enhance existing mechanisms for the promotion and protection of human rights.

The third measured item is on pending legislative matters. These fall under two types: the first are those which are intended to combat impunity; the second are those intended to amend specific Labor Code provisions pertaining to freedom of association and the right to organize. The Government submits the following updates.

First, the 19th Congress when these bills were filed has adjourned and is currently in recess. The 20th Congress will convene on 22 July 2024. Technically, there are no pending bills at the moment. Bills which were filed in the 19th Congress will need to be refiled in the 20th Congress.

Second, the bills filed to address impunity were House Bills Nos 1152 and 4941, which sought to criminalize red-tagging. In this regard, Republic Act No. 9851, an act defining and penalizing crimes against international humanitarian law, genocide and other crimes against humanity and Republic Act No. 11479 (2020), an act to prevent and prohibit terrorism and to establish the ATC, may already provide remedies against red-tagging. Two recent Supreme Court decisions also lay down the remedies and reliefs against red-tagging. The Supreme Court has affirmed the legal reliefs available to persons who are indiscriminately tagged as security threats in two landmark decisions: one is Deduro v. Vinoya, declaring that red-tagging, vilification, labelling and guilt by association constitute threats to a person's right to life, liberty or security, and justify the issuance of a writ of amparo; the second is Castro and Tamano v. Dela Cruz, issued in October 2023, granting the writs of protection, habeas data and amparo in favour of Castro and Tamano.

Third, the bills seeking to amend the Labor Code are several House Bills on trade union membership, union registration, and the power of the Secretary of Labor to assume jurisdiction over labour disputes involving national interest. The executive branch of Government defers to Congress when it comes to legislative matters. However, it is prepared to work within the framework of the NTIPC to review why the bills have not progressed and to determine the bills that can be supported by consensus to further enhance the environment for the exercise of freedom of association and the right to organize.

Worker members – The Philippines has been under the regular supervision of this Organization, including six times in front of this Committee since 2007, regarding its failure to comply with the Convention. Last year, a long-delayed high-level tripartite mission to the Philippines took place to follow up on reports of extremely serious violations of freedom of association in the country, including threats and harassment, surveillance, arbitrary arrest and detention, and extrajudicial killings of union members for their legitimate union activity, among other violations of civil liberties. The mission eventually led to the adoption of a tripartite road map to address the many identified concerns, with agreed timelines. This, at first, appeared to be progress. However, we note that a significant portion of the labour representatives in the NTIPC – 12 out of 19 – either did not endorse the road map or subsequently withdrew their support for it, revealing a significant lack of consensus on the way forward by those who have been victimized by successive governments. Moreover, there remains a very significant gap between words and deeds on the part of DOLE, which has been very slow to implement the recommendations of the high-level tripartite mission in 2023.

We welcome the fact that there have been no anti-union murders in the Philippines in 2024. Nevertheless, we do note that Philippine trade unions have documented at least 72 killings of trade unionists overall. This number includes at least two who were killed in 2023, namely Alex Dolorosa and Jude Thaddeus Fernandez. At the same time, other forms of violent anti-union retaliation continue apace, including forced disappearances, arrests and detention, forced disaffiliation, and red-tagging, among others. This behaviour is evidence of a prevailing culture of anti-unionism in the country, which has continued into the Marcos administration. Cases are still rarely investigated, and few have faced any accountability.

The rampant use of “red-tagging” when state actors make baseless accusations that specific labour unions and union activists are members of so-called “communist-terrorist organizations” remains a serious problem. This accusation is often enough for trade unionists to be detained and questioned by the military and police, and discourages workers from supporting a legitimate union activity out of a quite understandable fear of retaliation. As just one example, there has been constant surveillance, harassment and monitoring of the Alliance of Concerned Teachers (ACT) and its leaders. In 2024, the ACT National Office has been under regular surveillance by the authorities. Several individuals have also been targeted. Aurora Santiago, ACT Region III Union Coordinator, has reported constant surveillance, and was charged under the Anti-Terrorism Act. Francisco Eco Dangla III, the ACT Pangasinan Provincial Coordinator, was abducted and tortured. Police and intelligence officers have also entered public schools in the National Capital Region, where leaders of the ACT are working, to spread unfounded accusations and sow fear among students, teachers and administrators. This behaviour persists because the policies that led to trade union repression under the previous administration, particularly Executive Order No. 70, remain in place today.

Mechanisms put in place to address these serious violations, such as the National Tripartite Industrial Peace Council Monitoring Body (NTIPC-MB) and the Regional Tripartite Monitoring Body (RTMB), have also failed. The monitoring bodies were regionalized through Administrative Order No. 32, mandating the direct or operational monitoring of freedom of association cases to be done by the RTMBs in the different regional offices of DOLE. The NTIPC-MB is to have oversight or a supervisory function regarding the RTMBs’ profiling and monitoring work. The Bureau of Labor Relations is tasked with monitoring freedom of association or trade union rights violation cases, but there has been no improvement in the effectiveness of its work, even though DOLE claims to have allocated additional resources to its 2024 budget. Furthermore, the lack of fully funded programmes on the promotion of human rights and trade unions rights has hampered RTMB monitoring work.

The Inter-Agency Committee on Extra-Judicial Killings, Enforced Disappearances, Torture and Other Grave Violations of the Right to Life, Liberty and Security of Persons, created under Administrative Order No. 35, was supposed to address the grave human rights violations, including labour-related killings. Based on the profiling and monitoring work of RTMBs, DOLE refers the cases relating to killings, disappearances, torture and other violations of the right to life of trade unionists to that Committee. However, unions have little understanding of its workings and, despite its resources, few cases have progressed or have been resolved. The nine resolved cases out of the 65 extrajudicial killings were all prior to the establishment of that Committee.

We echo the view of the Committee of Experts that these bodies should be allocated more resources and staff in the very near future, with a view to ensuring their full operationalization and, in turn, the effective and timely monitoring, investigation and, as appropriate, referral for prosecution of all pending labour-related cases of extrajudicial killings and other violations against trade union leaders and members.

In 2023, Executive Order No. 23 was enacted to establish an inter-agency committee to address labour issues. However, it falls short in several fundamental aspects. The EO23 IAC does not include representation from trade unions and workers' organizations, or even from employers' organizations, and neither were consulted in the drafting of Executive Order No. 23. This is despite the fact that trade unions had called for consultation and had submitted proposals well in advance. As such, it merely replicated the ineffective Administrative Order No. 35, set up by the Aquino Administration. Worse, the Government has made clear that it has no intent to amend Executive Order No. 23 to include workers' and employers' representatives or even to create regular consultations with the social partners.

In addition to acts of violence and the climate of impunity, trade unionism is also undermined by the ability of employers to engage workers through a variety of precarious and indeed illegal employment arrangements which undermine stability and empower employers to easily dismiss workers for their union activity. When workers seek to have their employment regularized, they will either be dismissed illegally or have to endure years of litigation. The illegal use of agency workers and fixed-term employment – often with contracts renewed every six months – coupled with the refusal to recognize employer–employee relationships allow employers to illegally deprive workers of the right to join a union and to bargain collectively. Several bills have been introduced to address this issue, but none have been adopted. The Secretary of Labor has long failed to fulfil his obligation under the Labor Code to restrict or prohibit the contracting out of labour to protect the rights of workers (section 106).

We also note in the report that the Government touts the recent signing of a Memorandum of Agreement (MOA) between DOLE, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Philippine Economic Zone Authority to establish an Ecozone Tripartite Advisory Council, as well as ecozone tripartite working committees. However, DOLE failed to involve the labour movement in the MOA – a pattern with this Government. This includes the exclusion of relevant labour representatives, including the Ecozone Technical Working Committee in the Mactan Export Processing Zone, established in August 2023.

Finally, I note that the Committee of Experts has raised a number of legislative issues over many years, affecting workers in the public and private sectors. Of particular concern, large swathes of public sector workers, including those hired through job orders or contracts of service, as well as firefighters, prison guards and other public workers, cannot join or form unions. Even those in the public sector who do have the right to form a union cannot take industrial action. We note from the Committee of Experts' report that, once again, several bills have been introduced to the legislature. However, it is not sufficient merely to introduce legislation. We share the Committee of Experts' regret that no concrete amendments appear to have been made in relation to the pending matters. The Workers expect that the Government will make every effort to bring national legislation into conformity with the Convention as soon as possible.

In closing, the Worker members deeply regret that the Government failed to meaningfully consult with trade unions to build consensus on an agreed way forward and continues to fail to implement the previous conclusions of this Committee. We cannot accept the continued delays. The Worker members will continue to keep a close watch on this case, until workers are able to fully exercise their fundamental rights in law, in a climate free from violence, harassment and intimidation, and within the framework of a system which guarantees the effective respect of civil liberties and freedom of association rights.

Employer members – As we know, this is a fundamental Convention, ratified by the Philippines in 1953. The case has been discussed seven times before in the Committee and the Committee of Experts has issued observations 19 times. Some of the legislative issues referred to by the Committee of Experts' observations are related to the right to strike, so here we are reminding the house of the Employers' disagreement with the Committee of Experts' views concerning a right to strike in the Convention, and we emphasize that neither the Convention nor any other ILO Convention contain rules on the right to strike and that the Government group of the Governing Body confirmed in their position statement of March 2015 that the scope and conditions of this right are regulated at the national level.

Turning to the key points of this case. This case derives from a history of complaints and allegations of serious oppression of trade union members and leaders in the Philippines over many years. Time does not allow us to go into the details. However, the concerns raised were sufficiently serious to bring up the subject of a high-level tripartite mission in January 2023. The mission made the following recommendations: greater coordination and consistency across the varying arms of Government to better guard against serious threats to freedom of association; engagement with the social partners to make genuine progress in preventing future violations of freedom of association including through the finalization of a road map with agreed timelines; establishment of a single presidentially-mandated body to identify and address all outstanding cases of alleged labour-related extrajudicial killings and abductions; establishment of an independent non-judicial body to review cases referred to it by the presidential commission with a view to receiving and documenting testimonies and making proposals for compensation; strengthening the role of the NTIPC-MB to identify and ensure rapid and effective protection measures with regard to threats to the life, security or safety of trade unionists; and full implementation of all previous recommendations.

In June 2023, the Committee urged the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to: put an immediate end to any acts of violence and intimidation against union members for the legitimate exercise of their rights under the Convention, as well as violations of freedom of association, in line with the recommendations of the high-level tripartite mission; immediately and effectively undertake investigations into the allegations of violence in relation to members of workers' organizations; operationalize the monitoring bodies; and ensure that all workers are able to form and join organizations of their own choosing in accordance with Article 2 of the Convention.

The Committee also urged the Government to take decisive and effective measures to promote a climate of non-violence, as well as constructive social dialogue and labour relations at all levels in the country, and it requested the Government to finalize, with technical assistance and in consultation with the social partners, the road map on effectively addressing all outstanding issues.

While the Committee of Experts, in its present observation, welcomed the progress achieved with respect to the elaboration of the tripartite road map and the review of the Guidelines on the conduct of stakeholders, it also noted concerns regarding certain elements linked to the recommendations of the high-level tripartite mission.

First, it noted with deep regret that no concrete progress appeared to have been made in the investigation of the killings of a number of trade unionists and other reported serious incidents, as well as the punishment of their perpetrators.

The Committee of Experts therefore expected the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that all allegations presented by various unions since 2015 are properly and fully investigated, and that the cases are reviewed by the CHR when unresolved, so that the facts are established, culpability is determined, and perpetrators are brought to justice.

The Committee of Experts also requested the Government to ensure that trade unionists are able to exercise their activities in a climate free from violence, harassment and intimidation and within the framework of a system which guarantees the effective respect of civil liberties and freedom of association rights.

It is all the more disturbing, therefore, to note further instances of killings and disappearances of trade unionists since 2019, including the murder of union leader Alex Dolorosa in April 2023.

The Committee of Experts therefore encouraged the Government to fully engage with the social partners to make progress on the operational guidelines of the monitoring mechanisms, including in the framework of the tripartite road map. It requested the Government to strengthen these mechanisms for the effective and timely monitoring and investigation of all pending labour-related cases of extrajudicial killings and other violations against trade union leaders and members.

For its part, the Government has stated that regular monitoring shows that concrete action has been taken by the concerned authorities in cases where witnesses are available; some cases have turned out to be clearly not union-related, and in others, even family members themselves have desisted from pursuing the cases. In the instance of the killing of Alex Dolorosa, which appeared not to be union-related, the alleged perpetrator, a private individual, was charged with homicide in October 2023 and arraigned on February 2024. The court has also set trial dates regarding this issue.

The concern here is that few cases have been resolved and the message is that monitoring itself does not solve crimes or uncover the truth, as that can only be achieved via investigation, evidence of which still seems lacking. We therefore urge the Government to increase its efforts in this regard.

On the topic of training and the Guidelines on the conduct of stakeholders, the Committee of Experts expected that these training activities would continue within the framework of the tripartite road map and significantly contribute to raising awareness on matters related to freedom of association and collective bargaining among state officials. Noting the Government's interest in receiving technical assistance from the Office, the Committee of Experts hoped that this assistance would be provided in the near future. The Government provides information about some current training and awareness-raising activities, but these appear to be sporadic rather than regular. Overall, little seems to be happening, and again we urge the Government to increase its efforts.

Regarding legislative matters, we note that a significant amount of draft legislation aimed at ensuring respect for civil liberties in the exercise of trade union rights is yet to be adopted and there is a large number of bills. We again encourage the Government to take concrete time-bound measures towards their adoption as soon as possible.

On a positive note, the Government adopted, on 26 April 2024, the Omnibus Guidelines on the Exercise of Freedom of Association and Civil Liberties following tripartite approval. The Guidelines, which consolidate, update and strengthen two previous guidelines concerning freedom of association issued in 2011 and 2012, govern the conduct of government agencies, employers and workers in the private sector in the workers' exercise of the right to organize, bargain, and engage in peaceful actions including public assemblies; they delineate and update stakeholders' responsibilities for better coordination in labour and employment education, maintaining peace and order, case prosecution, and protecting national sovereignty and integrity.

The Government has also taken steps in a number of other areas, but time does not allow us to go into the details. However, what is still lacking is evidence of the impact of these changes, in light of which the Employers call upon the Government to provide an explanation of the aims and effects of all of its legislative initiatives.

Notwithstanding the concerns raised above, we note that the Government has actively sought the assistance of the ILO in a number of respects. For instance, the Trade for Decent Work project in the Philippines aims to enhance the application of international labour standards, particularly focusing on freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining principles, alongside addressing COVID-19 responses. The overall objective is to contribute to the improved implementation of international labour standards as a Generalized System of Preferences Plus (GSP+) beneficiary country. The project allowed for the training of Government agencies, including the security sector, labour regulators and the armed forces, with priority sectors being garments, coconuts and sardines.

To conclude, all in all, the Employer members remain concerned that the issues brought to the Committee remain. That said, we are mindful that the recommendations of both the 2023 high-level tripartite mission and the Committee in 2023 are not easily implemented in short order. We therefore urge the Government to expedite its implementation of the various recommendations, seeking assistance from the ILO as necessary, and to provide a report on its progress by 1 September 2024 so that the situation may be objectively reviewed by this Committee in 2025.

Worker member, Philippines – Fresh in our minds, the ILO Director-General, Gilbert F. Houngbo, reminded us last Monday that poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity anywhere, and that labour is not a commodity. I will join him. Another fundamental principle from the Declaration of Philadelphia adopted 80 years ago and still relevant today states “freedom of expression and of association are essential to sustain progress”. This principle is the fundamental focus of our discussion today on the exercise of freedom of association under the Convention, as workers in trade unions continue to face a rocky road ahead in the Philippines.

A high-level tripartite mission visited the Philippines in January last year. Filipino workers continue and will probably continue to face significant obstacles in exercising the right to freedom of association if we maintain the status quo and the slow pace of reform matters. We appreciate the report of the Government, and we noted the decline in trade union killings during the first two years of the Marcos administration. However, it is to be remembered that at least two trade union leaders were killed in 2023 right after the high-level tripartite mission. One or two are too many and we cannot afford to have more. To identify the two persons, they were Alex Dolorosa and Jude Thaddeus Fernandes. Meanwhile, red-tagging, abduction, termination of employment and forced disaffiliation continue despite some formal measures adopted by the Government. We recall that six to eight victims of extrajudicial killings were documented and submitted by the ITUC affiliate and other unions under the All-Philippines Trade Unions to the high-level tripartite mission in 2023. Now there are about 72 or so unresolved cases of extrajudicial killings of trade union leaders and organizers with none seeing progress in court, save the case of Alex Dolorosa, which was filed before the regional trial court of Bacolod city. The Government referred to efforts to expedite investigation and prosecution. It stated that the EO23 IAC is closely monitoring the case of Alex Dolorosa. This case stands as an emblem of a broader pattern of unresolved injustices within our society. Due to a sloppy investigation, the Government classified Alex Dolorosa’s killing as non-union related. However, circumstances and evidence suggest that Alex was under surveillance and red-tagged by the police before his death. Alex was an active LGBTQI+ union organizer and paralegal with BIEN, a workers' association covered by freedom of association. These acts worsen the environment for freedom of association and lead to a loss of trust and confidence in our police authorities. Another glaring example is the case of Manny Asuncion, organizer of the Kilusang Mayo Uno (KMU) which the former justice leadership has deemed necessary to prosecute only to have those efforts abruptly halted by the current Secretary of the Department of Justice. The question lingers: why forego the opportunity to revisit this case? Forced disappearances are ongoing, with the latest case in April 2024 involving a trade union organizer by the name of William Larusa of the KMU. Additionally, the practice of labelling trade union movements as part of the communist insurgency, referred to as "red-tagging", persists. Unions identified with SENTRO, the KMU, the Trade Union Congress of the Philippines (TUCP), and three unions of the Federation of Free Workers were the recent recipients of this scheme. This has escalated to a workers' organization being linked to "terrorist financing". Vice-President Sara Duterte has also directly hampered an ACT collective negotiation agreement by making accusations and by red-tagging.

The Philippine National Police Non-Uniformed Personnel Association Inc. (PNP-NUPAI), the certified negotiation agent of the non-uniformed employees of the Philippine National Police and an affiliate of the Public Services Labor Independent Confederation (PSLINK) for the past three years has, until now, failed to sign a collective bargaining negotiation agreement with the management of the Philippine National Police. The union was enticed to disaffiliate from PSLINK.

As was the case for the President of the NUPAI, Sarah Lerum, women trade unionists have not been spared from the attacks, such as those from Unyon ng Manggagawa sa Agrikultura who were visited by uniformed personnel, or worse, the agricultural worker who was murdered together with her family. This culture of impunity must stop, especially in light of the Government's commitment, to end all forms of harassment and violence, including gender-based violence in the world of work, as mandated by the Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190).

The Presidential body created under Executive Order No. 23 is not a tripartite body, thus ignoring the workers' proposal for a tripartite commission. In fact, we drafted an executive order for a tripartite commission during the high-level tripartite mission. Executive Order No. 23 is meant to protect freedom of association and workers' rights, but without workers' and employers' representation. It has not met workers' expectations.

The EO23 IAC is similar to the National Task Force to End Local Communist Armed Conflict (NTF-ELCAC), which has been accused of red-tagging and pressuring trade unions to disaffiliate from their labour federations. Trade unions hold that, unless Executive Order No. 70 is rescinded and the NTF-ELCAC is dismantled, the Government retains the instruments to unleash a repressive regime against trade unionism.

There has been no progress in establishing a truth commission, a trade union proposal to gather evidence and to investigate those responsible for the killings and detention of trade unionists. This commission would also provide compensation for extrajudicial killings, to victims and their families.

The Government has created an illusion of action, but attacks on freedom of association have become more blatant. Gig economy workers are being excluded from employer-employee relationships to prevent unionizing, and the Public Utility Vehicle Modernization Program is displacing jeepney drivers and dismantling their organizations. Also, contrary to the Convention, jeepney drivers and operators are forced to join corporations or cooperatives despite their objections.

We commend the Government for ratifying the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151), and recently Convention No. 190. However, seven years after the ratification of Convention No. 151, the Philippines still lacks the Public Sector Labor Relations Bill, the enabling law needed to align our labour laws with the standards set by the Convention.

We laud the Philippine Supreme Court for the decision that red-tagging and vilification, and labelling and guilt by association threaten a person's right to life, liberty or security.

We humbly urge the Government to:

- earnestly collaborate with the social partners to finalize or further discuss the tripartite road map on freedom of association;
- heed the demands of the global labour movement to abolish the NTF-ELCAC;
- elevate the Guidelines on Freedom of Association, now known as the Omnibus Guidelines, into an Executive Order with its own enforcement mechanisms to ensure full compliance by the security forces;
- provide resources to the CHR to enable investigations into trade unionist killings and offer reparations to the victims' families; and
- demonstrate commitment to ending impunity by ensuring justice for some of the murdered individuals, starting with the reopening of the case of Manny Asuncion.

The Secretary of Labor should use his power, mandated by the Labor Code, to regulate all forms of precarious work arrangements, prioritize aligning Philippine laws and practices with ILO standards, as repeatedly urged by the ILO in recent years, and certify as urgent the legislative measures pending in Congress, including the Security of Tenure Bill and the Public Sector Labor Relations Bill.

The time to act was one and a half years ago, and there is much work to be done.

Employer member, Philippines – The Employers' Confederation of the Philippines (ECOP) deeply regrets the inclusion of the Philippines in the shortlist of cases by the Committee. Going over the observations made by the Committee of Experts gives us the impression that it failed to fully appreciate the concrete steps taken by the Philippine Government on the Convention, disregarded the robust tripartite consultation process in relation to it, and regrettably misinterpreted the legislative process in our country.

The commitment of the Government to fulfil its obligation under the Convention is clearly reflected in the substantial reforms initiated to bolster the operational effectiveness of tripartite monitoring bodies, enhance inter-agency coordination, promote an enabling environment through targeted labour education, and expedite the investigation, prosecution, and resolution of alleged violations of freedom of association.

ECOP will focus now its intervention on specific developments regarding which we now have real direct knowledge and involvement.

On the approval of the road map on freedom of association, the development of the tripartite road map in line with the recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies and the high-level tripartite mission followed a tripartite process from the very start. DOLE resumed the tripartite discussion on the road map, including the following:

- consultations with the bipartite dialogue mechanism called the "Leaders' Forum", of which ECOP is a member;

- the creation of a tripartite technical working group which finalized and consolidated the inputs on the road map gathered from the area-wide consultation; and
- a workshop with the Tripartite Executive Committee, where ECOP is likewise represented.

On 23 August 2023, the NTIPC approved resolution No. 3 to formally adopt the road map on freedom of association and express collective commitment to work towards its realization.

The Government pursues an open and constructive engagement with the sectors in addressing concerns raised. Upon the request of the labour sector, a dialogue with the Executive Secretary took place on 29 September 2023, at the Malacañang Palace, Manila. Present during the dialogue were representatives of different labour organizations and ECOP, as well as the member agencies of the EO23 IAC and the CHR.

Sectoral views were heard and addressed by the Executive Secretary during that particular dialogue. In particular, ECOP expressed the view that existing laws and mechanisms are functioning satisfactorily, and that creating another body may be redundant or unnecessary, and a counterproductive additional layer of bureaucracy. It emphasized as well that bringing before international bodies such as the ILO issues that could be resolved through national institutions creates a negative impression of the country, and that the ILO has no jurisdiction over incidents that are not genuinely related to or arising from the exercise of the right to organize.

On the approval of the Omnibus Guidelines on the Exercise of Freedom of Association and Civil Liberties. On 21 March 2024, the NTIPC approved the Omnibus Guidelines which consolidate and supersede the 2011 and 2012 guidelines concerning freedom of association. The Omnibus Guidelines govern the conduct of stakeholders from the government, and workers and employers in the private sector as it relates to the workers' exercise of freedom of association, the right to organize, collectively bargain, and engage in peaceful concerted activities, including public assemblies.

ECOP fully supported the inclusion of the various bills meant to amend the Labor Code of the Philippines in the road map on freedom of association. However, they could not be considered in isolation from the developments that are shaping the world of work in my country. We would prefer that a comprehensive rather than a piecemeal approach be taken. A balance between the interests of employers on one side, and the interest of workers should also be observed, even though we concede that a tilt in favour of the latter may be inevitable in the interest of social justice.

DOLE is part of the executive branch of the Philippine Government. It cannot mandate another legislative body, in other words, the Philippine Congress consisting of the Senate and the House of Representatives, to pass the proposed amendments to the Labor Code of the Philippines. Under our current system of government, there is a separation of powers among the three branches, namely the executive branch, legislative branch and the judiciary. Perhaps, the labour sector, which has representation and a number of constituents in the House of Representatives, could influence the expedition of the legislative process.

Government member, Belgium – I have the honour to speak on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States. The candidate countries, Albania, Montenegro, North Macedonia, and the Republic of Moldova, and the European Free Trade Association country Norway, member of the European Economic Area, align themselves with this statement.

The EU and its Member States are committed to the respect, protection and fulfilment of human rights, including labour rights. We actively promote the universal ratification and effective implementation of fundamental ILO Conventions and support the ILO in developing and promoting international labour standards and supervising their application.

The Philippines is an important partner, including with regard to supporting multilateralism and international rules-based order. Within the framework of the GSP+ and the Framework Agreement on partnership and cooperation with the EU and its Member States, the Philippines committed to ratify and effectively implement international conventions on human rights, including labour rights.

The case we are discussing today is long-standing and serious. Following last year's discussion in the Committee on violations of the Convention, the Government of the Philippines was urged to take action on several points, in particular: to put an end to any acts of violence and intimidation against union members for the legitimate exercise of their rights; to immediately and effectively undertake investigations into the allegations of violence; to operationalize the monitoring bodies; and to ensure the right to freedom of association for all workers.

We welcome the fact that the Philippines also received a high-level tripartite mission in January 2023 and has initiated discussions on a tripartite road map covering the areas of action identified in 2019 by the Committee to address these long-standing concerns. While noting the Government's initiatives taken in this regard, we echo the Committee's expectation that both the tripartite road map and the Guidelines on the conduct of stakeholders be finalized. This should be done as a matter of priority, with clear deliverables and timelines, and be incorporated in the labour and employment plans as previously indicated by the Government. We underline the importance of full consultation with the social partners on all questions affecting trade union rights.

We take note of the allegations received regarding the continued and serious violations of workers' human rights, including trade unions rights, in the Philippines, as well as the written information provided by the Government.

Regarding previous allegations of the murders of trade unionists, we deeply regret that no concrete progress has been made in investigating these incidents. Considering these serious allegations, we expect that the Government will take the necessary measures for the facts to be clearly established, so that responsibilities are determined, and persecutors do not go unpunished. Due to the repetition of these events, we express our deep concern with regard to the new allegations of killings of trade unionists. We take note of the written information provided by the Government on this matter, but we recall the importance of providing more details in view of the numerous past and more recent allegations.

We note with concern the new allegations of red-tagging and harassment. We echo the request of the Committee of Experts for the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective exercise of trade union rights in a system free from violence, harassment and intimidation, and respect of human rights, including the right to freedom of association. In that respect, I refer to the ruling by the Philippine Supreme Court of 8 May 2024.

While noting the allocation of funds in the 2024 General Appropriations Act, we expect that the monitoring bodies will be provided with sufficient resources, to ensure the effective and timely monitoring, investigation, and the appropriate referral to the courts of all pending cases of extrajudicial killings and other violations against trade union leaders and members.

We welcome the training activities with a specific focus on freedom of association and collective bargaining among state officials and we encourage the Government to continue raising awareness on these matters.

In accordance with the observations of the Committee of Experts, we once again encourage the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that its legislation complies with the Convention and to report to the ILO on the progress achieved. We particularly emphasize the importance of the adoption of House Bills Nos 1152 and 4941, which aim to define and criminalize the practice of red-tagging of trade union representatives and members. Moreover, we regret that no concrete amendments have been made to pursue the revision of the Labor Code and we expect swift progress on that matter.

We express our hope that the Government will continue to ensure that the Anti-Terrorism Act will not be implemented in a way that restricts legitimate union activities and human rights.

The EU and its Member States encourage the Government to continue its efforts to improve mechanisms for the promotion and protection of human rights, including labour rights, and pursue its collaboration with the ILO to address the issues raised.

Government member, Indonesia – On behalf of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) and its Member States, Brunei Darussalam, Cambodia, Indonesia, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Malaysia, Myanmar, Singapore, Thailand and Viet Nam, I extend our collective support for the commendable efforts of the Philippine Government in addressing labour issues and promoting freedom of association.

The Philippines has demonstrated genuine commitment through decisive actions and collaborative approaches. We recognize the significant strides made, such as establishing tripartite bodies within economic zones, empowering labour organizations through paralegal training, and strengthening investigations into labour rights violations. These initiatives showcase a proactive approach to fostering an environment where workers can freely associate and collectively bargain.

Achieving meaningful change requires the active participation of all stakeholders. Genuine achievement through social dialogue is essential, as it builds mutual trust, respect and collaboration among all parties involved. We call on all Philippine tripartite partners to collaborate with good faith, mutual trust and respect to ensure these initiatives succeed.

Despite the ongoing challenges, we commend the Philippine Government for its unwavering dedication to freedom of association. We urge all stakeholders to support these efforts, recognizing and learning from the difficulties faced and the significant progress that has been made.

Government member, United States of America – The United States thanks the Government of the Philippines for providing additional information to the Committee. We welcome, in particular, the information on the recent Supreme Court decision declaring that red-tagging, vilification, labelling and guilt by association constitute threats to a person's right to life, liberty or security, and justify the issuance of a writ of amparo.

We remain concerned, however, about the ongoing reports of red-tagging of unions and other worker organizations. We encourage the Government to publicly acknowledge that the workers and worker organizations that are or have been red-tagged for exercising their fundamental labour rights are, in fact, legal organizations that are protected by law, with the right to organize and engage in collective bargaining. We also encourage the Government to prioritize efforts toward the adoption of House Bills Nos 1152 and 4941 which, if enacted, would criminalize red-tagging.

We welcome the Government's continued commitment to thoroughly investigate and to hold the perpetrators accountable for the 2023 murder of Alex Dolorosa, a trade union leader and LGBTQI+ activist with BIEN.

Noting the important role of the independent Philippine CHR under its recent Memorandum of Understanding with DOLE, we are concerned that the CHR is facing budget cuts and is not being provided sufficient resources to undertake its constitutional duties.

Regarding the follow-up to the 2019 conclusions of the Committee, we encourage the Government to finalize the tripartite road map without delay, to include agreed timelines as requested by the high-level tripartite mission, in consultation with tripartite stakeholders.

We note the Committee of Experts' observation indicating that the issuance of Executive Order No. 23 occurred without any discussion with workers' organizations. We call on the Government to review Executive Order No. 23 in full consultation with the social partners.

We also note that no amendments have been made to address the ILO supervisory bodies' comments regarding the Labor Code reform. We encourage the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention as soon as possible. We also encourage the Government to take action to eliminate illegitimate forms of contractualization that obscure the existence of an employment relationship and erode the right to security of tenure, including in the public sector.

The United States remains committed to engaging with the Government to implement a whole-of-government approach to address freedom of association issues and advance worker rights in the Philippines.

Employer member, Malaysia – We want to express our unwavering support to the Philippines in its tireless efforts to address the long-standing issues concerning freedom of association. Since accepting the high-level tripartite mission in January 2023, the Philippines has embarked on a transformative journey, demonstrating an unyielding commitment to upholding the fundamental rights of its people.

The progress made by the Philippines thus far deserves recognition. It has taken decisive action to strengthen its legal framework, aligning it with international labour standards and ensuring the protection of workers' rights. The Government's commitment to fostering an enabling environment for trade unions and labour organizations is a testament to its genuine desire to empower its citizens and promote social justice.

We take note that, following the high-level tripartite mission, the Philippine President took direct action to implement the high-level tripartite mission's recommendations with the creation of an inter-agency committee under the Office of the President to strengthen coordination with relevant existing institutions, with a view to expediting the resolution of complaints raised.

We commend the Government's response to the concerns raised by both the workers and employers regarding the need to ensure genuine sectoral representation in tripartite bodies. The reconstitution of these tripartite bodies with the appointment of representatives nominated by the social partners should continue as a matter of policy. The strengthening of RTMBs should also continue with support, as necessary, from the ILO.

As we commend the Philippines for its efforts, we must also underscore that the journey towards the full realization of freedom of association is an ongoing one. It requires sustained commitment, vigilance and continuous dialogue among all stakeholders. It is through collaboration, empathy and a shared vision that we can collectively overcome the obstacles that impede the progress of workers' rights.

The ILO's support plays a crucial role in fostering and protecting the fundamental rights of workers in the Philippines. The technical assistance it provides, especially on freedom of association, is invaluable. In this regard, we hope that the Philippines will continue to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in order to facilitate the implementation of the recommendations.

In conclusion, let us stand in solidarity with the Philippines as it forges ahead on its path towards promoting and safeguarding freedom of association. Let us support the country's commitment to inclusive dialogue, legal reforms, and capacity-building initiatives that empower workers and unions.

Worker member, Fiji – As a member of the high-level tripartite mission that visited the country in 2023, I am deeply concerned about the implementation of the mission's recommendations. Unfortunately, the reports that I gathered are not very encouraging.

The trade union repression from 2016 up until the mission in 2023 is systemic. I witnessed the NTF-ELCAC nonchalantly red-tagging individuals during the mission's tripartite debriefing in Manila, when Colonel Medel Aguilar from the Armed Forces of the Philippines (AFP) suggested that the workers' representative at the ILO was a member of the Communist Party and that perhaps so were some members of the mission.

In 2023, at least two trade union leaders were killed, and others were abducted. From 2023 to the present, leaders from the KMU remain jailed on false charges, while members of SENTRO, the KMU, and the TUCP face red-tagging, surveillance, and profiling. These issues persist due to enduring policies from the previous administration, particularly Executive Order No. 70, which established the NTF-ELCAC.

DOLE has not only been slow to implement the recommendations from the high-level tripartite mission in 2023, it has also misrepresented several key issues: Executive Order No. 23 not only denied representation of partners, but it was also issued without consulting workers and employers. The submitted road map on freedom of association lacks genuine consensus and continues to reflect divergent views. The tripartite mechanism established in the Mactan Export Processing Zone failed to involve the trade union movement.

Meanwhile, legislative measures to align the Labor Code with the ILO standards remain pending, and the Office of the President has not prioritized them.

Contractualization remains a major barrier to the exercise of trade union rights. The Secretary of Labor has not used the power mandated by the Labor Code to regulate all forms of precarious work arrangements, therefore hindering workers' ability to organize and collectively bargain, and the right to strike.

The real measure of progress lies not only in the reduction or absence of violations against trade unions but also in the absence of all human rights violations and an increase in unionized workers.

Given these challenges, it is crucial for the Philippines to fully implement the high-level tripartite mission's recommendations. The Government must uphold its international obligations to protect its citizens. Failure to do so would send a negative message to both ILO Members and trading partners.

Employer member, Indonesia – The Indonesian Employer Association (APINDO) would like to take this important opportunity to comment on the unwavering dedication and concrete measures taken by the Philippine Government, particularly over the past year, in proactively and comprehensively addressing the challenges at hand. We take note that the Philippine Government has cooperated fully with the ILO supervisory body by accepting the high-level tripartite mission in August 2022 and receiving the mission in January 2023. To this end, the Government consistently submitted comprehensive reports on concrete action undertaken to comply with the high-level tripartite mission's recommendations. It is noteworthy to mention that significant steps to safeguard freedom of association were taken in a relatively short period, demonstrating the Philippines' commitment to progress. It is important to note, however, that our stakeholders need to play an active role through cooperation and collaboration to ensure the success of this initiative and to see real change. In this respect, we encourage the Philippine tripartite partners to work together towards achieving a common goal guided by good faith, mutual trust and respect. In conclusion, we firmly support the Republic of Philippines and hope that the Philippine Government continues its proactive and comprehensive approach, as well as its commitment to tripartism towards the realization of the principle of freedom of association.

Interpretation from Chinese: Government member, China – We thank the representative of the Philippine Government for the detailed introduction. We have also carefully read the report of the Committee of Experts and the supplementary materials submitted by the Government to other committees. We noted that the Philippine Government has been cooperating with the ILO and the Committee in a cooperative and constructive manner.

The EO23 IAC was established to earnestly implement the recommendations of the high-level tripartite mission, to promote social dialogue, to enhance the understanding of freedom of association among different stakeholders, and to make significant progress. Through concrete actions, the Philippine Government has demonstrated its determination to effectively resolve the existing problems. We hope that the ILO will strengthen communication with the Government of the Philippines to effectively protect the real rights and interests of workers and employers in the country.

Employer member, Cambodia – I am here today to convey my solidarity with the Philippines and its endeavour to safeguard and advance freedom of association. We consider that the Government of the Philippines is actively engaged in addressing the challenges faced by workers, and is neither deaf nor blind to these issues.
