Implementing the 19th ICLS resolution

How?

Through an integrated and collaborative process

All relevant partners and stakeholders should be considered in the process and included in the necessary stages as relevant. An integral and forward-looking approach should allow to consider, for example, the inclusion of different modules to cover all forms of work in the long run (even if not simultaneously).

With ILO model questionnaires

The ILO Department of Statistics has developed model questionnaires and related guidance and tools to apply the 19th ICLS standards in Labour Force Surveys. These are based on extensive LFS pilot tests, research and development conducted by the ILO.

With ILO add-on modules

The ILO Department of Statistics has also developed add-on modules to measure through Labour Force Surveys specific topics such as volunteer work and own-use provision of services.

With testing

The ILO model questionnaires results from many rounds of testing, but still rigorous testing is needed to ensure its effective adaptation to the local context, especially if translation is required.

Taking into account time and resources needed

Time and resources needed for this endeavour are often underestimated. It is crucial to allow sufficient time for each stage, including development and testing, dissemination and communications.

Developing a communications strategy

A good communications strategy is required to prepare key users and stakeholders for the changes to come and to ensure the good reception and understanding of the new estimates when released.
