INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

Non-regular work: trends, labour law policy, and industrial relations developments: the case of Japan. Working Paper No. 29

The paper shows that lack of effective autonomous governance by the social partners, based on collective representation and negotiation in addressing non-regular workforce issues, has resulted in a call for a number of policy measures providing adequate legal protection for workers.

The paper underlines the importance of advancing multiple measures and actions targeting non-regular workers, which are supported by both legislative policies and the social partners.

SOCIAL DIALOGUE

Non-regular workers in India: social dialogue and organizational and bargaining strategies and practices. Working Paper No. 30

The paper shows that a key approach to successful collective bargaining on behalf of contract workers is to ensure involving "principal employers" who hold real power in negotiating and determining terms and conditions of work (multi-employer bargaining), given that contractual employers including contracting firms are often small and medium-sized enterprises facing fierce competition and being under pressure from those with the real power over the contracting process.

The paper contains policy implications for labour law that can strengthen enabling institutional conditions to support the actions taken by the social partners and addresses other industrial relations practices with regard to non-regular workers.
