Collecting and using wage and productivity data: A guide for Pacific employer and business membership organizations

The guide examines the prospects for collecting and effectively using data on wages and productivity. It reviews the definitions of these concepts and examines case studies from other employer and business membership organizations on collecting wage and productivity data.

Inequalities and the world of work

There was already an emerging world consensus before the COVID-19 pandemic that high levels of inequality have adverse social, economic, and political consequences. The existence of high levels of inequality means in practice that millions of people are unable to meet their needs or those of their families, save for retirement or enjoy protection when they fall sick.

Reducing the footprint? How to assess carbon emissions in the garment sector in Asia

The report examines carbon emissions across the garment sector as counted using the two prominent methodologies for calculating emissions – the life cycle assessment and carbon accounting in line with the Greenhouse Gas Protocol. The purpose of this report is to provide insight into where and why the carbon intensity of textiles and garments varies across the supply chain and where activities to decarbonize the sector should be prioritized.

Is the future ready for youth? Youth employment policies for evolving labour markets

Youth labour markets have seen enormous changes in the last decade. While young people are typically more digitally capable than older generations the current employment prospects for young women and men are extremely challenging. Youth are most often the worst hit social group in times of crisis, and the COVID-19 pandemic has been devastating for young people.
