I. OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING REPORTS ON RATIFIED CONVENTIONS

(ARTICLES 22 AND 35 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. Discussion of cases of serious failure by member States to respect their reporting and other standards-related obligations

The Worker members indicated that the failure of member States to respect their reporting obligations was regrettable and constituted a serious situation. The governments mentioned had to comply with their obligations as soon as possible and the Office should accompany them in this regard.

The Employer members insisted that non-compliance with the obligation to send reports hampered the operation of the supervisory system. The majority of reports – 69.53 per cent of those requested under article 22 of the ILO Constitution and 89.78 per cent of those requested under article 35 – had been received. However, ten countries had not submitted reports that had been due for two years. For the system to function properly, reports needed to be presented regularly with high-quality information, and countries needed to consider the implication of ratifying a Convention carefully, as they were also responsible for reporting on its application. Technical assistance from the Office should be maintained in order to lighten governments’ workload in terms of reporting obligations.

(a) Failure to supply reports for the past two years or more on the application of ratified Conventions

The Committee took note of the information provided.

The Committee recalled that the transmission of reports on the application of ratified Conventions was a fundamental constitutional obligation and the basis of the system of supervision. The Committee stressed the importance of transmitting the reports, not only the transmission itself but also respecting the scheduled deadline. In this respect, the Committee recalled that the ILO could provide technical assistance in helping to achieve compliance with this obligation.

In these circumstances, the Committee expressed the firm hope that the Governments of Burundi, Equatorial Guinea, San Marino, Sierra Leone and Somalia which to date had not presented reports on the application of ratified Conventions, would do so as soon as possible, and decided to note these cases in the corresponding paragraph of the General Report.

(b) Failure to supply first reports on the application of ratified Conventions

A Government representative of Seychelles explained that the two first reports on the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147), and the Seafarers’ Hours of Work and the Manning of Ships Convention, 1996 (No. 180), were being finalized and would be submitted during the current session of the International Labour Conference. She noted that the compilation of those reports was made possible due to the ILO’s support in providing distance training on international labour standards and reports to the newly recruited cooperation officer at the Ministry of Labour and Human Resources Development. The reports were being prepared in consultation with workers’ and employers’ organizations and other stakeholders while a consultant was working on the review of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1992, and the drafting of Regulations for the domestication of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006). Once the two reports were submitted, the Government would no longer have outstanding first reports on ratified Conventions.

The Committee took note of the information provided and of the explanations given by the Government representative who had taken the floor.

The Committee reiterated the vital importance of the transmission of first reports on the application of ratified Conventions. In this respect, the Committee recalled that the ILO could provide technical assistance to contribute to compliance with this obligation.

The Committee decided to note the following cases in the corresponding paragraph of the General Report:

- Bahamas – since 2010: Convention No. 185;
- Equatorial Guinea – since 1998: Conventions Nos 68, 92;
- Kazakhstan – since 2010: Convention No. 167;
- – since 2011: Convention No. 185;
- Kyrgyzstan – since 2006: Convention No. 184;
- – since 2010: Convention No. 157;
- Sao Tome and Principe – since 2007: Convention No. 184;
- Seychelles – since 2007: Conventions Nos 147, 180;
- Vanuatu – since 2008: Conventions Nos 87, 98, 100, 111, 182;
- – since 2010: Convention No. 185.

(c) Failure to supply information in reply to comments made by the Committee of Experts

A Government representative of Mauritania recalled that his Government made every effort to transpose ratified Conventions into domestic legislation and to submit reports on their application. The failure to respond to the comments of the Committee of Experts made with respect to the Minimum Age (Fishermen) Convention, 1959 (No. 112), the Fishermen’s Articles of Agreement Convention, 1959 (No. 114), the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) and the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) was due to a lack of technical capacity as regards drafting reports. The ILO Office in Dakar had been informed of this problem and technical assistance would be offered to the Ministry of Labour. In addition, this issue was reflected in the Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) signed with the ILO in 2012, and the Government would spare no effort to reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts and to submit reports in a timely manner.

A Government representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo emphasized that her Government appreciated the importance of the comments of the Committee of Experts. Seventy per cent of all the reports due had been prepared and, now that they were complete, they could be submitted before the end of the work of this Committee. The Government committed itself to submitting the remaining reports before 1 September 2013.

A Government representative of Algeria indicated that his Government had examined this question with the competent service of the Office and that three reports had been submitted. The report on the application of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) would be communicated as soon as possible.

The Committee took note of the information provided and of the explanations given by the Government representatives who had taken the floor.
The Committee underlined the vital importance, to permit ongoing dialogue, of clear and complete information in response to comments of the Committee of Experts. In this respect, the Committee expressed serious concern at the large number of cases of failure to transmit information in response to the comments of the Committee of Experts. The Committee recalled that governments could request technical assistance from the Office to overcome any difficulties in responding to the comments of the Committee of Experts.

The Committee urged the Governments of Burundi, Comoros, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Dominica, Gambia, Grenada, Guinea-Bissau, Equatorial Guinea, Guyana, Kiribati, Libya, Mali, Mauritania, Mongolia, San Marino, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Tajikistan and Zambia, to make all efforts to transmit as soon as possible the required information. The Committee decided to note these cases in the corresponding paragraph of the General Report.

\[1\] The list of the reports received is in Appendix I.
The Government provided the following written information.

The National Action Plan against trafficking in persons and smuggling of migrants (2010–15) had been introduced. There were eight core areas covered by the Action Plan and these were as follows: (i) establishment of the Council for Anti-Trafficking in Persons and Anti-Smuggling of Migrants (the Council); (ii) strengthening of the existing law relating to anti-trafficking in persons and anti-smuggling of migrants; (iii) establishment of shelter homes; (iv) collaboration with civil society groups; (v) capacity building for enforcement agencies; (vi) documenting standard operating procedures in relation to anti-trafficking in persons and anti-smuggling of migrants; (vii) international/bilateral cooperation; and (viii) raising awareness.

The Council which was established in 2008 and headed by the Secretary-General of the Ministry of Home Affairs, had the objective of formulating and overseeing the implementation of the National Action Plan on the prevention and suppression of trafficking in persons including the support and protection of trafficked persons.

In 2010, the original Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act, 2007 (Act 670) was amended to include the following: (i) trafficking in persons which was defined as all action involved in acquiring or maintaining the labour or services of a person through coercion, for the purpose of exploitation. The profit in trafficking came not from the movement of person but from the sale of a trafficked person’s services or labour in the country of destination; and (ii) smuggling of migrants which meant arranging, facilitating or organizing, directly or indirectly, a person’s unlawful entry into or unlawful exit from any country of which the person was not a citizen or a permanent resident. There were presently six gazetted shelter homes for victims of labour trafficking. Each shelter could accommodate 200 persons at any one time and had been in operation since 15 August 2010. In addition to government-operated shelters, the Government also actively cooperated with civil society groups for the establishment of additional shelters and the provision of counselling and skills training for the trafficked victims. Capacity building was also an essential component of efforts to heighten the investigative and intelligence gathering of enforcement agencies. Towards this end, front line agencies such as the Immigration Department, the Royal Malaysia Police, the Malaysian Maritime Enforcement Agency, the Royal Malaysian Customs and the Department of Labour were actively pursuing training courses either locally or in cooperation with other countries such as Australia and Brazil. Peace, prosperity and rapid development of the country had attracted foreigners, the majority of whom were looking for job opportunities, especially those from countries which were experiencing political and economic instability. At the same time, the country needed foreign workers in certain sectors such as services, plantation, industrial, construction and manufacturing. The existence of anti-trafficking law supplemented by the Employment Act, 1955 and other labour legislation addressed the issue of labour exploitation. In order to regulate the recruitment of foreign workers, the Government had signed Memoranda of Understanding (MOU) with at least 13 countries of origin including a specific MOU on the recruitment and placement of domestic workers. All the MOUs were aimed at benefiting equally both employers and employees. A case in point was the MOU on the recruitment of Indonesian foreign workers which was signed in 2003 and subsequently there were a series of negotiations to further strengthen the greater bilateral cooperation between the Governments of Malaysia and Indonesia. The Government would not tolerate transgression of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act. As of April 2013, 442 such cases were taken to court and 174 cases were pending trial under the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act, 2007. The implementation of this law would continue to be the core commitment of the Government in handling of issues concerning forced labour.

In addition, before the Committee a Government representative, referring to and supplementing the written information provided, emphasized that his Government had taken various steps in its constant endeavour to monitor, prevent and suppress the problem of trafficking in persons, including the ratification of the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime and its Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, especially Women and Children (the “Trafficking Protocol”). In addition, 30 state specialist prosecutors had been appointed and guidelines had been issued on the handling of cases of trafficking in persons. Various measures had also been taken to avoid misidentification between the crimes of trafficking in persons and smuggling of migrants. Capacity building was essential in ensuring that the personnel of all the agencies and non-governmental organizations involved in efforts to combat trafficking in persons had the relevant knowledge and skills, particularly in the areas of policy, prevention, protection, rehabilitation and prosecution. In that respect, it was of great importance to share knowledge and experience with foreign partners. Standard operating procedures had also been developed for the committees of the Council for Anti-Trafficking and Anti-Smuggling of Migrants and a national referral system was being developed to screen all cases and reports of trafficking in persons and smuggling of migrants. Government action in the field of capacity building included the seminar conducted in 2011 by the Attorney-General’s Chambers for participants from non-governmental organizations, private agencies, universities and public agencies on the rights of employees and the roles and responsibilities of employers.

He emphasized that trafficking in persons was a complex crime that commonly involved crime syndicates operating in organized, structured and well-established networks. A comprehensive and coordinated response was therefore essential, backed up by cooperation and collaboration at the national, regional and international levels. As the problem of trafficking in persons was relatively new in the country, it had been necessary to focus on the constant and widespread dissemination of information, as well as investing in capacity building and obtaining the support of community leaders to shape public opinion. Efforts were being made to establish close cooperation and coordination between enforcement agencies, the relevant ministries and agencies, including state governments and local authorities, with regard to information sharing, entry point control, prevention, investigation and prosecution with a view to ensuring the timely protection of victims and the punishment of perpetrators. The Government was also placing emphasis on a systematic and effective information management system to improve inter-agency coordination and raise public awareness through the dissemination of the relevant information.

The Employer members emphasized their wholehearted support for the Convention and their commitment to the elimination of forced labour, including trafficking in persons for the purpose of forced labour. They also supported the initiative to set new standards to supplement the Convention. They recalled that Malaysia was primarily a country of destination of migrant labour and, in the same way as other countries of destination, there appeared to be a number of issues in the country in relation to migrant labour. There were reports of migrant workers being subjected to such practices as having their passports retained by agents, receiving no wages, remaining in their employment, deprived of their liberty, which constituted problems in relation to the application of the Convention and the law in general. Two Governments, Indonesia and Cambodia, had suspended the sending of their citizens to work in Malaysia, although the Government of Indonesia had recently lifted the suspension following the conclusion of an agreement with the Government of Malaysia that Indonesian migrant workers could retain their passports, earn market wages and benefit from one day of rest each week. The Employer members noted that there appeared to be some progress on the issue, particularly in relation to the agreement with the Government of Indonesia. They also noted the adoption of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act, 2007, which established penal sanctions for individuals convicted of trafficking for forced labour. It appeared that the Government was actively prosecuting violations of the Act and obtaining convictions. The Employer members hoped that the convictions were accompanied by adequate punishment and would like to see statistical data on that issue. The numerous other measures mentioned by the Government representative were also of interest.

The Worker members recalled that forced labour was prohibited by the Constitution and legislation. The Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act had been adopted in 2007 to combat a phenomenon that had been described as early as 2001 as a scourge that was growing with technological progress in transport and organized crime. Malaysia was a country of destination and, to a lesser extent, a country of origin and transit for trafficked men, women and children, especially for prostitution and forced labour. Although the new legislation provided for severe sanctions, there was no avoiding the fact that the Government had failed to supply any information on the sanctions imposed. An Interpol report referred specifically to the forced prostitution of Ugandan women in Malaysia, some of whom had been diverted while travelling to China or Thailand and had been forced to engage in prostitution. There were no precise figures. However, the vast majority of the victims of human trafficking were part of the 2 million workers in a regular situation and roughly 1.9 million workers in an irregular situation, essentially from Indonesia, Nepal, India, Thailand, the Philippines, Cambodia, Bangladesh, Pakistan and Viet Nam. Children were often exploited as cheap labour or for sex exploitation, forced marriage, criminal activities, armed conflict or begging. United Nations Children’s Fund (UNICEF) had highlighted the fact that the trafficking of children was considered normal in the country. Cheating migrants out of their wages, confiscating their passports, placing them in debt bondage and housing them in warehouses were common practice. The trafficking in person for the purpose of forced labour was one of the most lucrative businesses in the world. Yet the Government had cited only 844 victims of trafficking who were under court protection, pursuant to section 51 of the 2007 Act, and 2,289 others who had been granted temporary protection for 14 days under section 44 of the Act. Either the Government withheld information of accurate statistics, or its estimation of the facts was over-optimistic. In any event, a veritable gulf existed between the information that it provided and the data supplied by non-governmental organizations and international institutions.

Recalling that the Convention required the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour to be punished by penalties that were truly effective and strictly enforced, the Worker members regretted that the Government’s report contained no information on the penalties imposed in practice. That showed that the Government was not doing enough to combat the problem and was not really trying to eradicate forced labour, which had traumatic moral and physical effects on those concerned, many of whom suffered great unpaid and unrepresented attempts at integration into society. And yet, as a signatory since 2009 to the Trafficking Protocol, the Government should be aware of the provisions of article 6 on that subject. The Worker members considered that it appeared obvious that the Government was respecting neither the letter nor the spirit of the Convention and that greater efforts were needed to implement the observations of the Committee of Experts. The case under discussion was particularly serious, and probably only represented the tip of the iceberg.

The Worker member of Malaysia emphasized that the estimated 2.2 million migrant workers in a regular situation in Malaysia, as well as the estimated 2 million workers in an irregular situation, were engaged, not only in plantations, which used to be their main employer, but also in manufacturing, services and domestic work. The migrants were from neighbouring countries and were brought in by recruitment agencies. However, there was no proper monitoring mechanism for migrant workers, there had never been a comprehensive policy for foreign labour and the Government had no knowledge of the exact numbers of workers concerned. While in most cases there were no agreements between the Government and the Governments of countries of origin, in 2011 an agreement had been signed with the Government of Indonesia under which Indonesian domestic workers had the right to retain their passports, earn market wages and benefit from one rest day a week. Although the Government seemed to consider the agreement with Indonesia as the answer to the problems experienced by migrant workers, the reality was quite different. There continued to be a complete failure to speak honestly and openly about the institution-alized nature of the abuse that they suffered, while discussions between the governments concerned tended to focus on maximizing profits, minimizing costs and keeping market rates competitive. And yet, Indonesian migrant domestic workers suffered from various forms of violence. Over half of them suffered physical abuse, 15 per cent were sexually abused and their poor working conditions included no weekly paid rest day, the non-payment and wrongful deduction of wages, improper accommodations, long working hours, multiple employers, uncollected payments and precarious working environments. Investigations by non-governmental organizations showed that almost half of migrant domestic workers were below the age of 21, which was the minimum legal age for domestic work in Malaysia. Recruitment agencies subjected migrant domestic workers to harsh treatment, including the retention of their passports, searches and confiscation of the contact details of their embassies and of non-governmental organizations which could protect them. The agreement concluded with the Government of Indonesia might have been more effective if there was a proper mechanism to monitor its implementation.

Migrant workers from Bangladesh also suffered from severe abuse. Following the lifting of the ten-year freeze on their recruitment by the Government of Malaysia in 2006 and the hiring of thousands of Bangladeshi workers, they had been recruited and cheated by approved outsourcing companies, which retained their passports and failed to renew their work permits, leaving them in an irregular situation. Under a programme launched in 2011, the Government had approved 340 agents to register and legalize the migrant workers, including issuing them with new passports and work permits. However, many of the agents were, in practice, the same outsourcing companies which had subjected them to abuse. A year and a half since the launch of the programme, and six months after the final deadline for the completion of the legalization process, thousands of workers were still in an irregular situation. They had not only lost one year’s wages, but had no passports and lived in a state of constant fear of losing their jobs. In Malaysia, a country with a large informal economy, the law often threatened them. No action had been taken despite the numerous complaints made to the Malaysian authorities. The authorities of Malaysia and Bangladesh should therefore be called upon to investigate the situation immediately and to retrieve and return the workers’ passports. He called on the Government to draw up a clear roadmap to ensure the rights of all domestic and migrant workers in the country, improve screening to identify victims of abuse and trafficking, and provide victims with legal aid, counselling and other forms of assistance. The Government needed to have the political will to impose severe penalties under the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act as a deterrent to abuse by traffickers, agents and employers. The discussion of the case by the Committee was particularly welcome and offered hope to the workers concerned.

The Employer member of Malaysia, stating that forced labour could not be condoned, fully supported the initiatives and positive actions of the Government in combating and eliminating forced labour, especially trafficking in persons. The root cause of foreign workers having huge debts even before leaving their country needed to be addressed urgently. He therefore urged the ILO and the other relevant United Nations agencies to work closely with the countries of origin to address the situation of informal recruiters imposing high fees on foreign workers. Governments of the countries of origin should ensure that exorbitant fees were not imposed on their nationals seeking employment abroad as these workers were already contributing tremendously to their country through the remittances they sent home. His organization had been calling for clearer and consistent policies on the recruitment of foreign workers with a view to reducing the role of informal recruiters imposing high fees on foreign workers. Governments of the countries of origin should ensure that exorbitant fees were not imposed on their nationals seeking employment abroad as these workers were already contributing tremendously to their country through the remittances they sent home. His organization had been calling for clearer and consistent policies on the recruitment of foreign workers with a view to reducing the role of informal recruiters imposing high fees on foreign workers. In this regard, he referred to two initiatives carried out under the ILO TRIANGLE Project in which the Malaysian Employers Federation was involved notably: the study for the ASEAN (Association of Southeast Asian Nations) Confederation of Employers (ACE) to develop a compendium of best practices to be used by countries of origin and destination in managing the pre-departure, the employment and post-employment of foreign workers; and the forthcoming “Guidelines for Malaysian Employers on Managing the Employment of Foreign Workers”. He wished that similar collaborations with the ILO Regional Office in Bangkok could be replicated in other countries in the region. He expressed the sincere hope that with the positive initiatives in place, the forced labour issues, especially those pertaining to the employment of foreign workers, would be better managed and eventually eliminated.

The Worker member of Indonesia highlighted that Malaysia was one of the largest countries of destination for migrant workers in South-East Asia, and that there were approximately 2 million migrant workers from Indonesia. Due to loans at exorbitant interest rates, most migrant workers could not afford to return to their home countries, and some were in bonded labour. A large number of migrants were working in hazardous situations, including long working hours, and faced physical and sexual abuse. Turning to the specific situation of women domestic workers and their vulnerability to abuse, including harassment and rape, she recalled that the Government of Indonesia had imposed a ban imposed on sending Indonesian domestic workers to Malaysia. The ban had been lifted after the signing in 2011 by the Governments of Malaysia and Indonesia of a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) on the recruitment of domestic worker.

The Worker member of Cambodia drew attention to the exposure to forced labour of women and girls migrating to Malaysia as domestic workers. The lack of employment opportunities led many women to migrate, and out of the 20,909 workers recruited in 2010, 18,038 were migrant domestic workers. He pointed to situations of forced labour at the hands of employers or informal labour recruiters operating in Malaysia, as well as Cambodia, through illegal salary deductions, non-payment of wages, and passport confiscation. Legal protection to address excessive working hours, psychological, physical and sexual abuse against domestic workers was also insufficient as the Employment Act excluded domestic workers from key labour protections. Workers who wished to leave an abusive employer without permission lost their legal status and often faced penalties under immigration law. This increased their reluctance to leave an abusive employer exposing them to forced labour practices. While noting the Cambodian Government’s announcement to freeze the sending of migrant workers to Malaysia as a response to the abovementioned violations, he hoped that the Government of Malaysia would also stop tolerating forced labour practices against migrant domestic workers.

The Worker member of the Philippines highlighted that Malaysia had become a country of origin and destination, as well as a transit country for trafficking in persons, especially of women and children. The majority of the victims of trafficking were migrant workers from Indonesia, Nepal, India, Thailand, China, the Philippines, Burma, Cambodia, Bangladesh and Pakistan. Between 2005 and 2010, there were approximately 2 million migrant workers in a regular situation and an almost equal number in an irregular situation in the country. Migrant workers in plantations, construction sites, textile factories and domestic service experienced restrictions on movement, fraud in wages, passport confiscation or debt bondage. A significant number of young women were recruited for work in restaurants and hotels and subsequently coerced to work in the sex industry; many subcontracting companies recruited workers who were then submitted to conditions of forced labour. He drew attention to the very low number of prosecutions under the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act and the lack of information on specific sanctions applied to those convicted, as well as the deportation of some victims of trafficking who had been given protective orders and sent back to their countries of origin in an initial stage. The speaker urged the Government to intensify its efforts to: (i) investigate and prosecute labour trafficking offences; (ii) identify labour trafficking victims; (iii) prosecute cases of trafficking-related corruption by government officials; and (iv) enhance collaboration with trade unions, non-governmental organizations and international organizations to improve services for victims in public shelters.
The Government representative reaffirmed his Government’s firm commitment to regularize and increase its collaboration with the social partners in the country, and cooperate with other governments and the international community with a view to minimizing, if not eliminating, trafficking in persons across borders. As shown in the National Action Plan on trafficking in persons and smuggling of migrants (2010–15), the Government set out policies to minimize the possibility of trafficking in persons, through collaboration and constructive dialogue with the social partners and civil society. Regional cooperation with the Asian countries to regulate cross-border migration of workers, especially those without proper documentation, was also important in the context of efforts to combat trafficking in persons. Through the Council for Anti-Trafficking in Persons and Anti-Smuggling of Migrants, the Government had innovated appropriate and workable mechanisms and approaches in tackling and managing the issue over the past three years. While the concerns raised before the Committee were shared by the Government, the responsibility to address the issue of trafficking in persons should not be put on the Government alone. Rather, collective efforts were needed, involving all concerned, including the social partners. Due to the importance of enforcement, the enforcement agencies would provide full cooperation to the parties concerned to address and resolve this issue in an expeditious manner.

The Employer members stated that it was the first time that this case was being discussed in the Committee and, unlike the Worker members, they did not consider the observation of the Committee of Experts merely describing the “tip of the iceberg”. The Government did not deny that there were forced labour issues in the country and had provided information on the constructive measures it had taken to address them. The Employer members encouraged the Government to work with the social partners and with other countries in the region, in particular countries of origin, to address the issue of forced labour. In this regard, more emphasis could be placed on memoranda of understanding such as the one with the Government of Indonesia with a view to ensuring protection of the rights of workers from these countries, concerning hours of rest, leave, as well as wages, and that workers could keep their passports. They asked the Government to submit in 2014 a report to the Committee of Experts on the progress made.

The Worker members, recalling that Malaysia had ratified the Convention in November 1957, observed that there had been a sharp increase in human trafficking for forced labour in the country. Linked as it was to globalization, it was a phenomenon that was to be found in many countries. In 2007, Malaysia had adopted the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act that provided for penal sanctions of up to 20 years in prison. However, no information was available on any specific sanctions that might have been imposed under the Act. The overwhelming majority of persons trafficked in Malaysia were drawn from the 4 million foreign workers in the country, whether in a regular or irregular situation, most of them originating from South-East and South Asia. A great many of them had been deceived about the type of work they would be expected to do, about their wages and about the treatment they would be subjected to, such as sexual exploitation, debt bondage or worse. The victims of forced labour were often treated as criminals when they were found in an irregular situation.

The Worker members considered that the Government was respecting neither the letter nor the spirit of the Convention, that the case under discussion should be followed up very closely by the Committee and that the Government should implement the Committee of Experts’ recommendations without delay. They called on the Government to pursue its efforts to combat trafficking, notably as part of the National Action Plan on trafficking in persons and smuggling of migrants (2010–15), and to provide information on the steps taken and the results obtained. Recalling that under Article 25 of the Convention States were required to apply effective penal sanctions strictly in cases of forced labour, they called on the Government to provide information on the specific sanctions that had been imposed on persons sentenced under the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act. The Worker members indicated that in June 2009 the Indonesian Government had placed a moratorium on the placement of domestic workers in Malaysia in order to protect its nationals and that since then the two countries had signed a revised MOU on the employment of Indonesian domestic workers. Unlike the previous agreement, the MOU stipulated that Indonesian domestic workers were allowed to keep their passports while in Malaysia. They were also entitled to one day of rest per week and to be paid according to the going market rate. The Worker members noted, however, that the agreement did not appear at all to be respected. They urged the Government to take all necessary steps for the MOU to be applied both in law and in practice and invited it to request appropriate ILO technical assistance.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the oral and written information provided by the Government representative and the discussion that followed concerning trafficking in persons and the vulnerable situation of migrant workers with regard to the exaction of forced labour.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government representative outlining the various measures taken to combat trafficking in persons and smuggling of migrants, including the implementation of the National Action Plan against trafficking in persons and smuggling of migrants (2010–15) which encompassed capacity building for law enforcement agents and awareness raising, as well as measures to provide victims of trafficking with shelters. It also noted the Government’s information that, given the high number of migrant workers in certain sectors such as services, plantations, construction, manufacturing and domestic work, the Government had signed Memorandum of Understanding (MOUs) with 13 countries of origin to regulate the employment and recruitment of migrant workers, including a specific MOU on migrant domestic workers.

While noting the policies and programmes adopted by the Government to address trafficking in persons, as well as a number of cases filed under the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act, the Committee noted the concern expressed by several speakers regarding the magnitude of this phenomenon. The Committee therefore urged the Government to reinforce its efforts to combat trafficking in persons. In this regard, it requested the Government to pursue its efforts to strengthen the capacity of the relevant public authorities, including the labour inspectorate, so as to enable them to identify victims and deal effectively with the complaints received. In addition, it requested the Government to continue to take measures to provide victims of trafficking with adequate protection and compensation. Moreover, noting an absence of information in this regard, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the specific penalties imposed on persons convicted under the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act.

While noting the bilateral agreements signed between the Government of Malaysia and other countries to regulate the conditions of employment of migrant workers, the Committee noted with regret the absence of information from the Government on any additional measures taken to provide protection to the large number of migrant workers in the country. In this regard, the Committee noted the information provided by several speakers that workers who willingly entered Malaysia in search of economic opportunities subsequently encountered forced labour at the hands of employers or informal labour recruiters, through means of restrictions on movement, non-payment of wages, passport confiscation and the deprivation of liberty. The Committee recalled the importance of taking effective action to ensure that the system of employment of migrant workers did not place the workers concerned in a situation of increased vulnerability, particularly where they were subjected to abusive employer practices, which might cause their employment to be transformed into situations that could amount to forced labour. The Committee therefore urged the Government to take appropriate measures to ensure that, in practice, victims were not treated as offenders and were in a position to turn to the competent judicial authorities in order to obtain redress in cases of abuse and exploitation. Moreover, noting an absence of information on the number of prosecutions concerning the exploitative employment conditions of migrant workers, the Committee urged the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that perpetrators were prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and decisive measures were imposed. It encouraged the Government to continue to negotiate bilateral agreements with countries of origin, to ensure their full and effective implementation, so that migrant workers were protected from abusive practices and conditions that amounted to the exaction of forced labour once they were in the country, and to work with the countries of origin to take measures for their protection prior to departure.

The Committee requested the Government to accept a technical assistance mission to ensure the full and effective application of this fundamental Convention. It requested the Government to provide a detailed report to the Committee of Experts addressing all the issues raised by this Committee and the Committee of Experts for examination at its next meeting. The Committee expressed the hope that it would be able to note tangible progress in the application of the Convention in the very near future.

A Government representative expressed satisfaction at the fact that the measures adopted in the context of the application of the Convention, and the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), had been noted with interest, and that recognition had been given to the process of formulating a National Strategy for the Prevention of Forced Labour. Forced labour was a criminal offence under national law; even so, her Government considered that, to tackle this scourge, States should promote the empowerment of vulnerable groups, including indigenous peoples. Her Government recognized that the particular geographical features of the Paraguayan Chaco hampered government initiatives, since it accounted for 60 per cent of national territory while harbouring barely 2 per cent of the population, comprising, inter alia, more than a dozen indigenous peoples, large Mennonite communities, and small- and large-scale producers. The progress made since thelast meeting of the Committee of Experts included: Comprehensive Act No. 4788 of 13 December 2012 against the trafficking of persons, which contained specific definitions relating to the trafficking of persons, forced labour, economic exploitation and debt bondage; the National Strategy for the Prevention of Forced Labour, which was being formulated with the active participation of trade unions, employers’ associations and the support of the ILO Special Action Programme to Combat Forced Labour (SAP-FL); registration of, and issuing of identity cards to, more than 6,000 indigenous persons through the Civil Registry programme; the holding of workshops to raise awareness and provide information on forced labour in various locations in the interior of the country, including Chaco; the training of 898 indigenous persons by the National Service for Vocational Programmes (PRONAPI) and the inspection visits during which, as the Government representative confirmed, no instances of forced labour had been found, the fact remained that fines had been imposed and that the country’s labour legislation had been infringed. A report by an external source that was noted by the ILO had found clear evidence of forced labour in Paraguay. Furthermore, although the Government’s latest report contained fairly detailed information, there were still points on which the Committee of Experts’ comment seemed implausible. The Employers felt that further adjustments needed to be made to the administrative and penal procedures and to the bill on the prison system currently before Congress. They noted, however, that the Government was making a genuine effort to comply with the Committee of Experts’ requests and to bring its legislation into line with the spirit and substance of the Convention. That said, there were still a number of observations that needed clarification, for which the answer might well be the offered ILO technical assistance in implementing the programmes currently being carried out.

The Worker members indicated that, since 1997, the Committee of Experts had regularly made comments concerning debt bondage among the indigenous communities of the Chaco. During its examination of the case in 2008, this Committee had highlighted the unmanageable situation of indentured workers and the particular vulnerability to begging and prostitution when they were obliged to leave their lands and move to cities as a result of the intensive cultivation of soya. The Committee had also highlighted the situation of children carrying out hazardous work, such as in brickworks, quicklime factories, quarries and certain sectors of the informal economy, and violence carried out against the National Peasants’ Organization (ONAC). The Committee had expressed the firm hope that constructive measures would be taken urgently, and the Government had requested technical assistance from the Office. The election of a new President, who had announced agrarian, education and health reforms and the development of production to put an end to poverty and forced migration, had served to kindle the hope that legislation would be brought into line with ILO standards. A policy of transparent foreign investments had also been announced. However, the situation had not progressed favourably: violations had been identified that could fall under the Convention, Convention No. 169 or even the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), along with other Conventions, given that discrimination was also involved. Emphasizing the specific nature of migration in Paraguay, the Worker members referred to the report of the United Nations Committee on the Rights of Migrant Workers and Members of their Families (April 2012), which cited numerous violations, and that of the Committee Against Torture (November 2011), which continued to express its concern at the fact that indigenous peoples living in Paraguay were still being exploited for work. Moreover, the United Nations Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues had concluded, at the end of a mission to Paraguay in 2011, that a system of forced labour existed in the Chaco region and had made recommendations concerning, in particular, debt bondage and the issue of restoring land rights, which was at the root of the impoverishment and indebtedness of indigenous communities. Members of indigenous communities had lost their land to large agricultural enterprises and the ecosystem that characterized their ancestral lands had almost disappeared.

The Employer members pointed out that, however, the Constitution of Paraguay recognized the rights of indigenous peoples to have their own political, social, economic, cultural and religious systems and that indigenous languages were protected. In addition, a national policy on indigenous peoples had been adopted and the Chaco Indigenous Peoples Institute had been created. The speaker described the labour system that members of indigenous communities were subjected to in practice: transport to workplaces far from their home communities, no documents setting out working conditions, threats of reprisals if complaints were made, no wages in certain cases, etc. With regard to the comment made by the Committee of Experts, the Worker members recalled the comments of the National Peasants’ Organization, the National Confederation of Workers (CNT) concerning forced labour in agricultural ranches and factories in the Chaco and the lack of measures by the Government to end the practice, and emphasized that imposing effective penalties was an essential element in the fight against forced labour. With regard to prison work, the Worker members underlined the fact that the Government had undertaken to amend the Act on the prison system (Act No. 210 of 1970), under the terms of which work in prison was compulsory for persons subject to security measures in a prison establishment, within the framework of the adoption of a Prison Code, then through the adoption of a new Code of Penal Procedure. However, the Government had provided no information on the state of the reform process. Simple technical assistance would not suffice to overcome the mistrust that had built up between the peoples of the Chaco and the Government; action would need to be taken involving all those on the ground. Severe measures should be contemplated.

A Worker member of Paraguay stated that the Paraguayan authorities were perfectly aware that the Conventions on forced labour and on indigenous peoples were being violated. He explained that 95 per cent of the land in Paraguay belonged to big haciendas and that the extension of the development model based on cattle-raising in recent years had been at the expense of the indigenous peoples. The Government had provided little or no information on the debt bondage of indigenous communities. He drew attention to the Government’s lack of political will to take any effective steps to eliminate forced labour. The most serious problems were the expulsion of the indigenous peoples from the Chaco and the debts incurred by workers to feed themselves, as it was the employers who fixed the prices for food. He stressed the particularly grave situation of women in domestic employment and the general state of extreme poverty and destitution in the country, especially among ethnic groups in the Chaco, and urged that an agreement be reached to eliminate forced labour.

The Employer member of Paraguay highlighted that the Employer delegation agreed with the statement made by the Government that the National Confederation of Workers had expressed its commitment in helping to eradicate the problem of forced labour once and for all. The problem affected the Paraguayan Chaco, a large and sparsely populated area that was difficult to access, where inspections and monitoring were scarce owing to lack of budgetary and human resources. The employers in the country were supporting the Bill to create a Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security with the aim of tackling such problems and it had participated in tripartite work on the basis of Act No. 4788 (Comprehensive Act against Trafficking in Persons) of December 2012. The 78 inspections carried out had identified no cases of forced labour and the role of ILO technical capacity building in working towards complete eradication of the practice was important. He referred to the progress that it had been possible to make in employing public policies thanks to the creation of a national labour office in the Chaco locality of Itala Fernández, although even more offices should be established. He highlighted the awareness-raising work on labour laws and social security issues carried out by the Federation of Production, Industry and Commerce and drew attention to programmes to fight child labour in sugar cane plantations and construction material plants.
undertaken by the Paraguayan Industrial Union (UIP) – a member of the Federation – along with its participation in a forum for equal opportunities for women in the workplace, supported by the Ministry of Justice and Labour. He underlined the social responsibility programmes run by many enterprises and the judicial safety that prevailed in the country. He urged the Government of Experts to establish an office of the Department of Labour in central Chaco. She reiterated the commitment of the GRULAC countries to eradicating forced labour, particularly in the Mennonite community. This had been verified by reports from the United Nations Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues. The Mennonite community was one of the major agribusiness entrepreneurs, and had purchased a large amount of land in central Chaco. This had forced the indigenous populations to live in increasingly restricted areas, leaving only the option to work as labourers on ranches owned by Mennonites. These workers were subjected to conditions of forced labour, including women and children. The Government indicated that the problem of forced labour in Paraguay was not a recent one. The Committee of Experts had been commenting on debt bondage in the Chaco region since 1998. The majority of indigenous peoples working in the Chaco region had only temporary jobs, were hired by intermediaries, and transported to the workplace far from their communities. Their work contracts were conducted orally, so that in the event of a breach of contract, the indigenous workers had no proper recourse and could not defend their rights. Among the most serious cases were situations on cattle farms where workers had worked a lifetime without remuneration except food. Such farms also employed women as domestic workers, whose remuneration did not cover the cost of transportation from their communities. Child labour was also present on these farms. The lack of land was at the centre of the vulnerability of these indigenous peoples, as 82 per cent of the country’s land was owned by 2 per cent of landowners. The Government had adopted awareness-raising measures, but it was necessary to take action to combat the forced labour and provide protection to the victims.

The Worker member of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela highlighted that her country watched what was happening to the indigenous peoples of the Paraguayan Chaco with great concern, as getting a person into debt so that they could then be coerced into working against their will, was not only a violation of the Convention but also of the most basic human rights. The case under discussion was that much more serious because it involved indigenous peoples of the American continent, and it represented a great step backwards in the social justice enshrined in the preamble to the ILO Constitution. What difference was there between slavery in the colonial era and the inhumane practices suffered by workers in the Chaco and their families, who in many cases worked for more than 12 hours a day? The interview had indicated to the ILO that situations of forced labour had been detected, the number of fines that had been imposed on employers or the compensation that had been granted to workers. State institutions were not present in several of the areas of central Chaco, including both labour inspection and health services. Despite several recommendations that the Government adopt a regional plan of action to combat forced labour, no action had been taken in this regard. Such a plan had to include the involvement of large landowners in cases of forced labour, particularly the Mennonite community. This had been one of the worst forms of labour and exploitation. The Central Confederation of Workers (CUT) fully supported workers who were subjected to forced labour and urged the Government to take drastic and effective measures to ensure that the services of the Ministry of Justice and Labour reached the most isolated areas of the country, where both nationals and foreigners were liable to fall victim to forced labour. He requested the business sector’s support in drawing up a tripartite roadmap to prevent and eradicate forced labour in Paraguay, and emphasized the importance of the involvement of the Government and the ILO. Forced labour affected not only the indigenous peoples of the Chaco but also the populations of Caaguazú, Alto Paraná and Canindeyú.

The Government representative stated that establishing a Ministry of Labour and Social Security was one of its top 100 priorities. The Ministry should transcend the temporary nature of a government, particularly as the Committee of Experts and the trade union federations had both recommended that it be established. A department of indigenous labour and a special team of inspectors to identify forced labour should also be set up within the Ministry of Justice and Labour, with free, prior and informed consultation of indigenous peoples. Several developments had taken place in the fight against forced labour, in collaboration with the local ILO Office in Paraguay: (i) a study on the existing law on forced labour, linking it to the legislation on child labour, (ii) regional workshops to gather information, in preparation for the national strategy on the prevention of forced labour, focusing on prior consultation with indigenous peoples, so that they could set out the most appropriate and coherent roadmap with which to tackle that issue and consultations would be carried out in central Chaco, in the Department of of Itapúa, in the locality of Juan Caballero and in the capital. Specific workshops would also be organized with representatives from indigenous organizations, entrepreneurs, trade unions and civil society; and (iii) meetings with the Director of the ILO International Labour Standards Department and the Office specialists on forced labour and indigenous and tribal peoples. The Delegate highlighted some of her Government’s achievements, such as the adoption by the Executive of the National Human Rights Plan, with the involvement of civil society and the cooperation of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights. Several training and professional education courses had been organized to enable participation, especially young people of working age and members of the native communities of the Chaco and the eastern region to acquire abilities and skills that would give them access to decent work. Furthermore, restructuring had taken place within the Committee responsible for giving effect to the judgments of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights and the recommendations of the Executive Inter-Institutional Commission for Compliance with International Judgements (CICISI). It would be in charge of adapting domestic legislation in an effort to find an expedient solution to the devolution of ancestral lands to indigenous communities. Existing domestic legislation did not provide for any procedural remedies that enabled those lands to be devolved. In addition to those plans, the Government had a long history of defending workers’ rights and preventing forced labour, such as Act No. 4788 (Comprehensive Act against Trafficking in Persons) of 2012 against trafficking in persons, and the ratification of the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189). Reaffirming her Government’s commitment to fighting forced labour, in close collaboration with the social partners and the ILO, she urged the ILO to set up a permanent office in Paraguay, with the aim of making solid progress in the struggle to improve working conditions.

The Employer members took note of the Government’s goodwill to overcome the present difficulties, in particular the recent adoption of measures to prevent trafficking in persons, the continuation of the tripartite programme to prevent forced labour, awareness-raising workshops for civil servants and indigenous people and training for workers in the fishing and domestic service sectors. They also took note of the strengthening of labour inspection in the Chaco region, especially in the locality of Teniente Irala Fernández, and of the legislation that would shortly be adopted to create a Ministry of Labour and Social Security, which would have a special division for indigenous peoples. The Employer members also took note of the Paraguayan workers’ request that further measures be taken to prevent forced labour and that support be given to indigenous communities, particularly in the sugar industry, domestic work and cattle rearing. The Government should implement a regional action plan to strengthen institutions and should work with the social partners to provide opportunities to indigenous peoples with a view to preventing forced labour and child labour. The Employer members considered that the recently elected Government should continue receiving ILO technical assistance in order to bring national legislation and practice fully into line with the Convention and expressed the hope that, in its next report, the Government would be able to comment on its progress. They also asked the Office to include information on Paraguay in its general report on technical cooperation worldwide.

The Worker members underlined that, for them, there were two major issues: the question of debt bondage and more general problems relating to the rights of the indigenous peoples of Chaco; and the question of prison labour and the conformity of Act No. 210 with the Convention. With regard to those two issues, they deplored the repeated failure to comply with the provisions of the Convention and the continuing inertia of the Government. The Worker members asked for technical assistance to be strengthened and expanded to encompass all interested parties, including the indigenous peoples, who formed an alliance with the trade unions. The technical assistance might usefully focus on the following four components: drawing up a tripartite regional action plan to reinforce actions that had already been taken, but were still insufficient in terms of the prevention and elimination of forced labour and the protection of victims of forced labour and debt bondage; increasing labour inspection resources, especially in relation to work on ranches; allocating sufficient material and human resources to the competent authorities for receiving workers’ complaints and reports of forced labour; and ensuring, in connection with the application of Convention No. 169, consultations with indigenous peoples on administrative and legislative measures affecting them, particularly with respect to territorial and social security issues. The Worker members expressed their agreement with the Employer members to request the Government to prepare a report on the application of the Convention and send it as soon as possible.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the statement by the Government representative and the discussion that followed. The Committee recalled that it had discussed this case in 2008 and in particular the situation of the Paraguayan Chaco indigenous workers who were trapped in debt bondage. The Committee noted that the outstanding issues concerned the need to take measures to strengthen the action of the different entities involved in the fight against debt bondage in the Chaco region. The Committee noted the comprehensive information provided by the Government representative outlining the various measures taken to combat debt bondage in the Chaco region, in particular the formulation of a national strategy for the prevention of forced labour as well as the carrying out of awareness raising and training activities. Concerning the situation of vulnerability faced by indigenous workers, the Committee noted the information provided by the Government representative in relation to the measures taken to combat poverty, including training and professional education courses and the civil registration programme. Finally, the Committee noted that the Government would make an effort to find an effective solution to the devolution of ancestral land to indigenous communities.

The Committee also noted the deep concern expressed by several speakers regarding the persistence of the economic exploitation faced by indigenous workers in certain sectors, particularly the agricultural sector. The Committee therefore expressed the firm hope that the Government would take immediate and effective measures in the framework of a coordinated and systematic action to protect indigenous communities in the Chaco from the imposition of forced labour. The Committee stressed the importance of adopting a tripartite regional action plan, which would define priorities and specific goals, and would provide for the protection of victims, and would identify the entities responsible for the implementation of such measures.

While it considered that the measures adopted to combat poverty were important, the Committee hoped that the Government would take into account the fact that the programmes implemented needed to have the objective of ensuring the economic independence of those who were victims of debt bondage and to include support and reintegration measures for victims. The Committee requested the Government to take measures to improve the economic situation of the most vulnerable categories of the population so that they could escape from the vicious circle of dependence.

16 Part II(Rev.)/14
With regard to the issue of the prosecution of those who exact forced labour, the Committee expressed its serious concern at the lack of information on cases brought to justice. The Committee urged the Government to take appropriate measures to ensure that in practice victims were in a position to turn to the competent judicial authorities. In this regard, the Committee recalled the importance of having sufficiently specific provisions in national legislation to allow competent authorities to prosecute and punish the perpetrators of such practices. Furthermore, the Committee urged the Government to take measures to strengthen the capacity of the relevant public authorities, in particular the labour inspection, so as to enable them to deal effectively with the complaints received, to identify victims and restore their rights in order to prevent them from being trapped again in situations of forced labour. In this regard, the Committee underlined the importance, given the geographical particularities of the Chaco region, to ensure that the labour inspectorate had adequate resources to access workers in remote areas.

Regarding the need to bring the Act on the prison system (Act No. 210 of 1970) into conformity with the Convention, by ensuring that prisoners awaiting judgment and persons detained without being convicted were not subject to the obligation to perform prison work, the Committee expressed the firm hope that the Government would take the necessary measures in order to ensure that, in the framework of the adoption of the new Penal Code of Procedure, national legislation would be brought into conformity with the Convention.

Noting that the Government had reaffirmed its commitment to put an end to bonded labour in the indigenous communities of the Paraguayan Chaco as well as in other parts of the country that may be affected, the Committee hoped that the Committee of Experts would be able to note tangible progress in its next examination of the case in 2013. It also requested the Office to provide strengthened and expanded technical assistance to encompass all interested parties, including the indigenous peoples.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) Mauritania (ratification: 1963)

A Government representative emphasized that since 2009 the country’s labour administration, which had previously been somewhat abandoned, had received special attention from the President of the Republic and valuable ILO technical assistance and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). He asserted that the allegations presented by the General Confederation of Workers of Mauritania (CGTM) regarding the lack of independence of labour inspectors and the lack of resources for them to do their work were inaccurate and smacked of disinformation. The 40 labour inspectors and controllers recently recruited had been selected through a highly competitive selection process, after which they had been provided with more than two years’ high quality theoretical and practical training. Through a UNDP-administered project to improve workers’ skills in the administration and in public services, the regional labour inspectorates now had significant equipment and resources for their work. Labour inspectors, who already enjoyed a special status that guaranteed them legal protection, would shortly benefit from a status reinforced by financial benefits which would ensure their independence and impartiality. From the technical standpoint, ILO support in the form of a methodological labour inspection manual had been of great importance. The annual report of the labour inspectorate was almost ready for publication and would in future be sent on a regular basis. However, it had not been possible to put the statistics applied by regional labour inspectorates to good use because of a shortage of labour statisticians, he therefore requested ILO technical assistance to reinforce the capacity of the labour administration in that area. With regard to the CGTM’s allegations concerning occupational diseases, he insisted that they were unfounded and that neither the National Social Security Fund nor the national occupational health service had had cause to cite any occupational diseases in the enterprises referred to by the CGTM. In conclusion, he said that it was his country’s objective to build up a competent and well-equipped labour inspection system working closely with the social partners and that the conclusions of the Conference Committee would serve as a useful catalyst in that regard.

The Worker members regretted that the Government had for over 30 years, despite the insistence of the Committee of Experts, persistently refused to respect the spirit and letter of the Convention. The Government had taken no effective steps to institute a labour inspection system within the measures of Article 1 of the Convention, nor had it fulfilled its obligation under Article 6 to give labour inspectors a status guaranteeing their independence and impartiality. To show just how little importance the Government attached to labour inspection, the 2007 decree granting labour administration a special status did not grant the employees concerned the same allowance to which other administrative bodies were entitled. They referred to cases in which labour inspectors had been refused entry to workplaces in total impunity. They indicated that, in accordance with Article 3(2) of the Convention, labour inspectors should devote most of their time to monitoring workplaces. However, the real problem was that labour inspectors had neither the operational funds, the means of transport or the local offices to discharge their duties. As to human resources, there were only 70 inspectors and controllers for the entire country. They recognized the importance of the methodological manual on labour inspection that the ILO had prepared. But, they noted that it called for the extension of the scope of labour inspection to informal enterprises, the number of which was steadily increasing, which even further highlighted the inadequacy of the means available to the labour inspection services. They reaffirmed the imperative nature of the principle of employment security and the independence of labour inspectors from changes of government or from any external influence. They also expressed regret that the Government had refused to recognize the trade union that inspectors had wished to form. The Government still needed to understand that the only way of an annual report on the activities of the labour inspection services was an obligation under Article 20 of the Convention, as well as a valuable tool for assessing and enhancing the effectiveness of inspection activities. Having mentioned a number of other problems, such as difficulties of recruitment and shortcomings in the organization of labour administration, they emphasized that the allocation of funds by the Government remained the key to ensuring that the State was able to discharge its obligations under the Convention. The Committee must identify all such shortcomings and failures so as to request the Government to take all necessary steps to give full effect to a Convention the importance of which could not be underestimated.

The Employer members reviewed the background of the case, which had been double-footnoted in 2012. Although the Convention had been ratified in 1963 and the Government had shortly thereafter drawn up implementing regulations with ILO assistance, the Committee of Experts had made 14 observations drawing attention to problems of implementation. The Employer members had noted with regret in 2000 that, in view of the time that had passed since ratification and the adoption of the regulations, there had been a significant lack of progress. The lack of labour inspectors on the ground meant that the Government could not supply reports to the Committee of Experts for evaluation, and the absence of such reports indicated the absence of a functioning labour inspection system. Although the Government had indicated that it had an inspection service comprising eight regional offices coordinated by a central service, it was not able to provide details and statistics to support that claim. Despite the adoption in 2007 of special regulations for the labour administration establishing the status of labour inspectors and controllers, it remained clear to the Committee that labour inspectors still did not have the independence necessary to properly perform their functions. The Employer members noted the comments of the CGMT emphasizing that labour inspectors had less than satisfactory conditions of work and lacked financial and material resources. This year, the Government representative had stated that 40 labour inspectors had been recruited since 2009 and had undergone a two-year training course, but no such information had been included in the Government’s reports submitted from 2009 to 2012. The Government had also advised that a number of ILO training courses had been undertaken, but labour inspectors had received a methodological guide, a “tool kit” for inspectors had been devised and would be received during the course of 2013 and that, with World Bank assistance, there had been improvements in the equipment of labour inspectors. However, no information had been provided on the nature of this equipment or whether it had been deployed and training provided to inspectors in its use. The Employer members called upon the Government to provide information on projects and initiatives without delay, and to implement with ILO technical assistance the Decent Work Country Programme, which was in the process of being concluded. Finally, they urged the Government to ensure the implementation of the measures called for in previous comments of the Committee of Experts, including the need for effective cooperation between the labour inspectorate and the judiciary, the availability of statistics concerning workplaces liable to inspection, and the need for the publication of an annual report on the operation of the inspection services.

A Worker member of Mauritania emphasized that the role of labour inspectors was even more vital in Mauritania because the legislation was constantly being violated and there was no culture of social dialogue and collective bargaining. Moreover, the country was very large and remote areas were poor, numerous enterprises had set up in the country, which had increased subcontracting and precarious work, and forced labour was widespread. Despite that, and the many calls from the supervisory bodies and trade unions, the Government had remained inflexible and refused to take the necessary measures to ensure that the labour inspection services were in a position to cover the entire country effectively and guarantee legal protection for workers. For that purpose, the inspection services needed to have sufficient trained staff, adequate material and logistical resources and the power to issue warnings and penalties to enterprises that failed to respect labour legislation. Of the 13 regions, seven had inspection offices, but three were ill-suited to the task. Some had no vehicles, which meant that inspectors could not respond to requests and complaints from workers in remote areas. As a result, and as the situation had not improved, the Government should be called upon to take rapid action to create appropriate working conditions for inspectors, recruit a sufficient number of inspectors, guarantee continuous training, open properly equipped offices where they did not exist and enhance the powers of inspectors to impose sanctions.

Another Worker member of Mauritania acknowledged that labour inspection was facing several problems, which could only be resolved through common efforts. The Government had made some efforts, particularly by recruiting a number of labour inspectors, but much remained to be done, especially for training. However, he wished to highlight that national policies on labour inspection were not be brought before this international body, where some parties might be tempted to exaggerate problems for reasons of political expediency.

The Worker member of France emphasized that any legislation should be accompanied by a labour inspection system to monitor its application, in both law and practice. For some years, the Committee of Experts had been requesting the Government to make efforts to give effect to the provisions of the Convention. The function of inspection services was made even more difficult by the immense territory they had to cover with very few resources, which made supervision almost impossible. Moreover, they should be free to carry out supervision and to report any violations they identified in full transparency. The Government had confined itself to reiterating its 2009 statements concerning the recruitment of 40 labour inspectors. However, the Government had been requested to take the necessary steps to ensure that labour inspectors received adequate training and had the powers and resources necessary to take effective action. The Government had made no progress in that regard. As a result, it should again be requested to take prompt action to enable labour inspectors to fulfill their supervisory and advisory functions by providing them with material resources, and to focus on inspection with a view to eliminating child labour, which was becoming increasingly widespread.

The Worker member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Worker members of other Nordic trade unions, expressed deep concern at the complete lack of a labour inspection system in Mauritania. He recalled that there were 80 inspectors in total and only one inspector was appointed to cover five regions without access to indispensable transport and communication facilities. The lack of a sufficient number of inspectors made it impossible to guarantee the confidentiality of inspections and to ensure an effective collaboration between inspectors, employers and workers. Furthermore, labour inspectors were the only public employees who had not been granted the allowance awarded to all other administrative departments by a 2007 decree. The inadequacies of the labour inspectorate had a particular impact in Mauritania. Although the United Nations Children’s Fund (UNICEF) and the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child reported a high incidence of child labour, particularly in the agricultural sector, and the existence of caste-based slavery, no child labour investigation had taken place for the past year. He concluded that the Government had offered no proof of its commitment to comply with its obligations under the Convention. The Committee should therefore urge the Government to establish a functioning labour inspection system.

The Government representative wished to dispel some confusion which seemed to have arisen during the discussion concerning the surface area of the country. Although Mauritania was a vast country of 1.3 million square kilometres, only one third of that area was inhabited. The number of employment centres was 90,000 concentrated in four urban centres. The inspection offices were located in areas where there was a concentration of enterprises and it would be unreasonable to open inspection offices in areas where there were no workers. Moreover, it should be noted that the situation had changed in Mauritania since the examination of the case in 2000 by the Conference Committee. All inspection services now had vehicles and offices which were properly equipped with computers, telephones, etc. With regard to the question of the allowance that had not been paid to labour inspectors, the decree granting the allowance was being finalized. Finally, he acknowledged that the absence of annual reports represented a problem, as such reports enabled an evaluation of the inspection services. ILO assistance would be very useful in that respect and to help the country compile reliable labour statistics.

The Worker members emphasized that the present case was a serious one, as shown by the footnote to the observation of the Committee of Expert. The key question was whether or not inspectors were in a position to discharge their mandate. The Government should therefore take the following measures: the establishment of a labour inspection system based on the socio-economic aims contained in the Convention; the creation of a system to monitor application of the Convention; the strengthening of human resources in the inspection service by recruiting a sufficient number of labour inspectors; the provision to labour inspection services of operational offices; the allocation to inspection services of financial and material resources; and the provision of annual reports to the Office on the activities of the inspection services and a report on the progress achieved for examination by the Committee of Experts at its next session.

The Employer members reiterated that labour inspection was crucial for any labour relations system to function properly. While it might be true, as the Government claimed, that the number of labour inspectors had increased and that the labour inspection services were concentrated in urban areas rather than being spread out, the Government had not provided any indication on the effectiveness of those services. Labour inspection was the face of accountability in matters of labour relations in a country and therefore labour inspectors should be professional and independent, should carry a sense of authority and their work should be backed by effective sanctions.

Conclusions

The Committee noted the statement by the Government representative and the discussion that followed relating to various issues including the effective functioning of the labour inspection system on the territory of the country, the lack of human and material resources including transport facilities, insufficient salaries and benefits and the lack of independence and stability of employment of labour inspectors.

The Committee noted the Government’s indications concerning its efforts to establish an effective and well-structured labour inspection system with the necessary material and human resources. It noted the information on the recent recruitment of 40 additional labour inspectors and controllers and their subsequent training for two years at the National Administration Institute (ENA) in addition to practical training, and the indications that labour inspectors had at their disposal improved equipment and material means, as well as a methodological guide and a “tool kit” that had been drafted with ILO support. The Committee also took note of the information that labour inspectors would soon be granted a particular status with financial advantages of a nature such as to guarantee their independence and impartiality, and that the Government was in the process of finalizing the annual report for submission to the ILO. It noted the Government’s request for technical assistance.

While noting the information on the progress made, the Committee also noted that the issues concerning the insufficient wages and benefits of inspectors, the lack of independence and stability of employment of labour inspectors, as well as the failure to communicate to the ILO annual reports on the work of the labour inspection services were all issues which had already been raised in the discussion of the case in 2000, as well as in the Committee of Experts’ reports for three decades. The Committee deeply regretted the lack of progress made since that time.

With regard to the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors in particular and the recruitment of inspectors with sole regard to their competence and qualifications, the Committee emphasized that failing to provide inspectors with remuneration commensurate with their responsibilities was likely to lead to situations in which labour inspectors would find themselves treated with disrespect, detracting from their authority. Emphasizing that these matters had been pending for decades, the Committee expressed the firm hope that the Government would soon take the necessary action in keeping with Article 6 of the Convention to take the announced measures that offered labour inspectors stability of employment and independence as regards changes of government and improper external influences. It further stressed that the publication of annual inspection reports containing the statistical information required under Article 21 of the Convention was important to enable an objective evaluation of the progress referred to by the Government.

The Committee emphasized the importance of the functioning of an effective inspection system in the country and the need to strengthen the human, financial and material means available to the labour inspection services to enable them to cover all workplaces liable to inspection. It expressed the firm hope that labour inspectors would have suitably equipped offices and would be able to carry out effective inspections and to prepare and send annual inspection reports to the ILO. It also requested the Government to provide a detailed report to the Committee of Experts addressing all the issues raised by this Committee and the Committee of Experts for examination at its next meeting. The Committee asked the ILO to provide technical assistance to the Government as requested by it to strengthen the labour inspectorate. It requested the Government to put in place a national mechanism to follow up on the application of the Convention in the country.

PAKISTAN (ratification: 1953)

The Government provided the following written information.

The Committee of Experts had requested the Government, in its observation made at its last session (November–December 2012), to clarify the extent to which the provinces, following the Constitutional Amendments of 2010, were still subject to legally binding guidance given at the federal level in the field of labour, including on labour inspection, and the extent to which competence in the field of labour in this respect would remain at the federal level. The Government, in reply to this request, indicated that following the 18th amendment to the Constitution, the subject of labour had been devolved to the provincial governments, which now assumed full responsibility for labour legislation and administration. Through the enactment of the Industrial Relation Act of 2012, the federal Government assumed the function of registration of inter-provincial trade unions, conciliation and adjudication on industrial disputes, and some other related matters. The former Ministry of Human Resource Development, now regrouped under the Ministry of Overseas Pakistanis and Human Resource Development, continued to assume the responsibility to interact with provincial labour departments on the application of international labour standards and to report within the supervisory mechanism on ratified ILO Conventions.

The Committee of Experts had further asked the Government to specify the implementation measures that had been taken at provincial level with regard to the subjects and points raised by the Committee previously in relation to the 2006 and 2010 labour inspection policy documents.

and, if so, to specify those measures. The Government indicated in that regard that, under the 18th Amendment to the Constitution, all previous laws and regulations on workers’ rights at the workplace were protected under the new article 270 AA, until they were annulled, amended or repealed by provincial parliaments being the competent authority to do so. The 18th Amendment states: "Nothing in this Article shall be so construed as to result in changes in the organization and legal framework applicable to the labour inspection system in the provinces, the Committee of Experts had also expressed its wish to receive more information, in accordance with Parts I and II of the report form, including, but not limited to, (i) the organizational structure (if possible with organizational chart) and administrative arrangements; the central authority at the provincial level competent for labour inspection in each province; (ii) the legislative framework for labour inspection at the provincial level, including any law on labour inspection, concerning the status, powers and obligations of labour inspectors in each province; (iii) statistics on the number of labour inspection staff per office in each province; and (iv) the material means available, such as office facilities, means of transport for inspections and applicable reimbursement rules. The Government had indicated in this regard that the provinces were responsible for the implementation of labour laws in industrial and commercial establishments. The Provincial Directorate of Labour Welfare through their field formation carried out inspections in establishments under various labour laws. The field formation comprised labour inspectors, labour officers, Assistant Directors, Deputy Directors and Director/Joint Directors. Labour inspectors carried out inspections in shops and establishments, while labour officers were responsible for conducting inspections in industrial units under the various labour laws applicable. Assistant Directors, Deputy Directors and Director/Joint Directors conducted super inspections of the work carried out by labour inspectors and labour officers. In case of violations of labour laws, those responsible were prosecuted by the concerned inspectors. Following the 18th Constitutional Amendment, a coordination mechanism existed at the federal level. Transport facilities were given to the inspection staff in Balochistan. In other provinces, this facility was available to Joint Directors and above.

Finally, the Committee of Experts had asked the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that annual inspection reports were published by each province containing detailed up-to-date information on the subjects covered by Article 21 of the Convention. The Government, in reply to this request, indicated that the report has been published up to 2007 and that the observation of the Committee had been noted with a view to compliance.

In addition, before the Committee, a Government representative stated that his Government attached great importance to the work of this Committee and considered that the expertise provided through the ILO supervisory system and the social partners helped governments to apply ILO Conventions in a more effective and fruitful manner. Over the past three months, Pakistan had been in the process of democratic transition with an interim government in place for conducting national and provincial elections. He sought the social partners’ understanding for the fact that the interim government had not been able to make adequate preparations for participation in the Conference, and that the newly elected Government had only recently been able to finalize the workers’ and employers’ delegations that would be reaching Geneva on 11 June 2013. He emphasized that the Government deeply deplored the tragic accident at a factory in Karachi in which many innocent lives had been lost, and assured the Committee of its strong commitment to fully investigate the accident through a judicial tribunal and to work on an urgent basis in consultation with the workers’ and employers’ federations, as well as the ILO, to avoid the recurrence of such accidents in future. The Government had also taken steps to provide compensation to the victims and their families.

He added that the Government had signed a Joint Statement of Commitment with the ILO and the social partners, on the basis of which a plan of action would soon be finalized which would address the issue of labour inspection and safety of workers in its entirety. As regards the specific comments of the Committee of Experts, Pakistan had ratified the Convention in 1953. Ever since ratification, the Government had enacted a number of laws and policies to give effect to the measures laid down in the Convention and had also put in place inspection machinery which administered those laws. He concluded that, by empowering the provincial governments on the legislative and technical fronts, the inspection system would be strengthened. The Government would continue to place considerable emphasis on improving the working environment. The focus of the inspection system in the country would be on the prevention, protection and improvement of conditions of work for all workers in all workplaces, including those employed in small and medium-sized enterprises or engaged in informal economic activities, with punishment for non-compliance.

The Worker members wished to make a preliminary statement concerning the late appointment of Workers’ and Employers’ delegates of Pakistan to the Conference. Even though the Conference invitation had been sent to the Government in February 2013, it was only in May that a very small delegation had been formed and approved for a limited period of ten days (11–21 June). That decision had been taken even though the Government knew that the case of Pakistan appeared on the long list of cases before the present Committee. It should be emphasized that the situation was unjustifiable and therefore unacceptable, since it was absolutely impossible for the workers of Pakistan to report on their situation in the Committee. Such a situation should not have the effect of weakening the conclusions that the Committee would adopt.

The Worker members said that for a very long time the Government of Pakistan had not sent any report or information due under Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention or, if it had, such information was incomplete and did not allow any evaluation of whether the Convention was actually being implemented. Furthermore, the concise information provided in 2008 did not contain any reply to the points raised in 2006 and 2007 by the Pakistan Workers Federation (PWF), and the report sent by the Government in 2010 merely reproduced the information which had previously been sent in 2007. In 2011, the Committee of Experts had pointed out that the report due had not been received. However, the Government had replied to the observations made by the Pakistan Workers Confederation (PWC) in March 2012 on the implementation of labour inspection policy and had indicated that the planned policy (establishment of computerized registries, the “one inspector, one enterprise” approach, training of inspectors, etc.) had encountered institutional problems relating to the division of legislative powers between the provinces and the centre. They regretted that that reform had been blocked even if, according to the Government’s last report, the new organizations were in the process of drawing up new labour legislation, including in the area of occupational safety and health, as part of the ILO Decent Work Country Programme. The Government had not supplied any information on the specific question of the establishment of a new labour inspectorate. Moreover, it could not use the argument relating to the distribution of powers between the provinces and the central level to evade its obligations under the Convention. The wording of article 19(7)(b) of the ILO Constitution dealing with the application of standards by federal States showed clearly that that argument was baseless. Furthermore, they recalled that the PWC and the All Pakistan Federation of United Trade Unions (APFTU) had indicated that the labour inspection system of Punjab and Sindh provinces needed to be further strengthened further to the adoption of restrictive policies obliging labour inspectors to obtain the employer’s permission before carrying out an inspection. These organizations had also drawn attention to the abolition of inspection visits and their replacement by a voluntary self-declaration mechanism, and also to federal restrictions, which had resulted in an increase in child labour. It should be noted that the Government had stated in March 2012 that the Government of Punjab had abolished the system which had been the subject of criticism.

The Worker members declared that it would be interesting to receive full information from the Federal Government on the situation of labour inspection in all provinces, especially the number of enterprises by province, the exact number of workers and of inspections actually carried out, and also on issues raised during inspections. However, that information could not result from annual inspection reports which had to be supplied under the Convention. The Government initiative to draw up a summary table of the situation for four months of 2012 which, incidentally, showed a total lack of efficiency, should be pursued and expanded, and the annual inspection reports should be published as requested by the Committee of Experts. Recalling the central role of the priority Conventions, and particularly Convention No. 81, the Worker members emphasized that it was necessary not only to pursue the strategic approach envisaged by the Governing Body, but also to adopt a realistic approach to make the Government understand that the Convention was not the source of administrative burdens, but constituted a tool at the service of employers, workers and the Government itself.

The Employer members expressed their regret that Workers’ and Employers’ delegates had only received that very day approval to attend the Conference. This situation undermined the tripartite nature of the Committee and the ability to have a constructive dialogue, particularly in view of the fact that this case was being heard for the first time. The present case related to Convention No. 81, which was one of the four ILO governance Conventions. The Convention dealt with the service of labour inspection which, as regards organs of the public authority, mostly concerned governments. However, its implementation impacted on employers and on the general perception of investors in a country with respect to a variety of matters such as the rule of law and the ease of doing business. The Employer members considered that labour inspection should be flexible and able to respond to the challenges of the world of work through an adequate use of resources. Resources should also be devoted to health and safety protection for workers. That allocation of resources would benefit both the employer and the worker. A good system of labour inspection was a fundamental element for effective labour administration: labour inspection was at the service of employers, as well as workers, and both workers and employers should benefit from information, services and better understanding of their respective responsibilities.

The Employer members observed that in general that the Committee of Experts had raised concerns about the labour inspection system following the adoption of restrictive policies in the provinces. It was the 14th observation made by the Committee of Experts on the application of the Convention in Pakistan. Positively, while the Worker members had reiterated the restrictions contained in the laws, the Employer members wished to highlight that the Government had also indicated that certain strategies in the Punjab province had not had the desired effect, which demonstrated a critical reflection on what was working and what was not. The information requested by the Committee of Experts on how labour inspection was structured would have facilitated the necessity of setting priorities for inspection. The Punjab authorities had an exclusive remit in the province, and there was no legal vacuum. It was also important to determine the priority mechanisms for inspection and the resources available (people and materials) so that resources could be allocated to the publication and distribution of annual inspection reports. The Employer members noted the reference to increases in child labour due to inadequate labour inspection and considered it a matter of concern, although the information provided had not come with a data-driven baseline and required careful monitoring. They emphasized that Convention No. 81 was a flexible instrument, as it allowed the exclusion of some sectors from its application (for instance mining or transport) and the definition of the branches subject to inspection (through a declaration annexed to the ratification of the Convention). They considered that the main challenge related to this Convention was the lack of resources to effectively or continuously functioning of labour inspection. Therefore, countries such as developing countries were obliged to give priority to some types of inspection. The labour market in Pakistan was characterized by a higher degree of informality (around 80 per cent) and it was important that particular priorities were established to ensure the effective functioning of labour inspection, which was arguably in a very early phase of development.

They referred to their comments during the general discussion concerning the relevant General Survey on labour inspection to the effect that it was necessary to be realistic, for example, through the definition of priorities that could be covered with existing resources, finding new ways to use resources more effectively, especially by employing new technologies and elaborating strategies aimed at extending labour inspection progressively. In this regard, they encouraged the Government to take a strategic approach to managing the challenges at hand, in consultation with the representative employers’ and workers’ organizations, so as to avoid serious matters, such as the increase on child labour due to the inadequacy of labour inspection systems.

The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran highlighted the recent democratic election in Pakistan and the peaceful transfer of power. Although belatedly, he acknowledged the Government’s commitment to give priority to some types of inspection. The labour market in Pakistan was characterized by a high degree of informality (around 80 per cent) and it was important that particular priorities were established to ensure the effective functioning of labour inspection, which was arguably in a very early phase of development.

The Worker member of Japan stressed that effective labour inspection was essential to ensure that the rights of workers as expressed in domestic law were protected. As in Bangladesh, the absence of effective labour inspection in Pakistan had far-reaching consequences for workers, the employers, and the government. He expressed his Government’s hope that the ILO would appreciate the gravity of the complex transitional process. His Government also expected that the Office would allocate additional resources to the promotion of the ILO priority Conventions in the Asia and Pacific region, particularly for highly populated States like Pakistan, where the full implementation of those Conventions remained a priority.

wards the work of the ILO. In conclusion, he underlined the will of the Government to fully implement its international obligations concerning labour matters.

The Worker member of Singapore indicated that there was a critical shortage of labour inspectors in the country. In Baluchistan, a province with hundreds of coal mines in which workers had been killed in the past, there were only 59 inspectors (43 workers had been killed in 2011 following a series of explosions at a coal mine at Sorang near Quetta, where workers had reported that they were working virtually without protective equipment and that the mine owners took few if any safety precautions). In the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa (KP) province, there were only 62 inspectors, and in Sindh only 130. Concerning the requirement of adequate training, most inspectors were given the most rudimentary training, and only very few were provided with specialized training to identify potential problems in specific industries. With respect to the requirement to provide transport facilities, in most cases inspectors were required to use their own vehicles and to bear the travel costs, which substantially limited the effectiveness of labour inspection. As regards the requirement of adequate penalties for violations of the legal provisions enforceable by labour inspectors or the obstruction of inspectors in the performance of their duties, this requirement was not met in Pakistan. While labour inspectors had a legal right to access company records, this rarely happened in practice as management either refused access or provided false records. Although an inspector could apply to court for access, the process could last many months and only led to an inconsequential fine. The fines for violation of the labour law were extremely low (5,000 Pakistan rupees (PKR) or approximately US$55) and did not dissuade management from violating the law. Since 2007, there had been no published report on labour inspection, as there was no authority to even collect this information. The labour inspection crisis in Pakistan was measured in the number of workers killed and injured every year because the State had failed to enforce the law. She recommended: that labour inspection laws and procedures be immediately promulgated, in consultation with workers’ and employers’ organizations; that the provincial governments develop a well-trained force of inspectors to carry out inspections; that inspectors be able to inspect without prior notice to management; that, when an inspector had reasonable cause to believe a situation to constitute a threat to the health or safety of workers, the inspectors be empowered to act immediately; that occupational health laws be passed at the level that covered all industrial, commercial and other establishments, strictly enforced and provide for dissuasive penalties for violators and compensation for victims; and that a mechanism be put in place whereby labour inspections were closely supervised through a tripartite committee to bring an end to the blatant violations of the law.

The Government member of China stressed that the 18th Amendment to the Constitution guaranteed the full autonomy of the provinces and that a number of labour inspection powers had been devolved to them. The Government was currently in a transitional phase and needed more powers had been devolved to them. The Government member of China noted the various measures being taken by the various provinces to strengthen their institutions to assist with the development of an effective labour inspection system. He underlined that such devolution of power to the provincial level would strengthen and institutionalize democratic federalism in Pakistan, she underlined that such a process involved complex transition, including the restructuring of federal and provincial bureaucracy, a factor that the Conference needed to take into account. She expressed concern that the level of enforcement in Pakistan and the peaceful transfer of power and emphasized the overlapping of the dates of the ILC with the formation and taking of the oath by the new Government. She highlighted the Government’s will to fully implement its international obligations concerning labour issues.

The Government member of Sri Lanka underlined that Pakistan was an important member of the ILO and that its huge population and projected industrial expansion added to its importance. She expressed appreciation of Pakistan’s active engagement with the ILO and its long-standing efforts to fully meet its international obligations in the field of labour. She noted the 18th Amendment to the Constitution of Pakistan which ensured maximum provincial autonomy. While considering that such devolution of power to the provincial level would strengthen and institutionalize democratic federalism in Pakistan, she underlined that such a process involved complex transition, including the restructuring of federal and provincial bureaucracy, a factor that the Conference needed to take into account. She expressed concern that the level of enforcement in Pakistan and the peaceful transfer of power and emphasized the overlapping of the dates of the ILC with the formation and taking of the oath by the new Government. She highlighted the Government’s will to fully implement its international obligations concerning labour issues.

The Government member of India indicated that a sound legislative framework backed by an effective labour inspection system was the key to ensuring the welfare of workers. Under the Convention, labour inspection was a sovereign function to be effectively discharged by national governments. He underlined the very important role of the ILO in helping member States, especially developing countries, strengthen their regulatory system. Having heard the statement of the Government representative of Pakistan, he noted the various measures by the Government of Pakistan developed this certification had licensed an Italian corporation controversial for its high rate of certification. She expressed doubts as to whether the social auditing industry which had grown to a multi-billion dollar per year activity was effectively protecting the rights of workers. Private inspections were usually scheduled allowing factories time to prepare. The inspectors at the enterprise in Karachi had been given forms supposedly signed by employees stating that they had received safety and evacuation training, but this had not been the case. She expressed astonishment that the certification society had refused to release the inspection report on the factory citing confidentiality requirements. Often the information collected during these private inspections remained the property of the factories, and the employees, unions and even governments never received any information that had been discovered. According to the requirements of the Convention, the essential work of labour and safety inspections should not be carried out by private auditing. To this end, the Government should pass legislation that created an effective labour inspection system that was consistent with the Convention. She urged the Government to provide all the information requested by the Committee of Experts and suggested that the ILO send a technical mission to Pakistan to assist with the development of an effective labour inspection system.
stances that had led to the delay in participation of the national social partners. In light of the valuable guidance provided by the Committee, he expressed his Government’s commitment to work hard to address the important issues that had been highlighted so as to improve compliance with international obligations, maintain high standards of safety and security at the workplace, and improve the labour inspection system. He once again expressed his Government’s regret at the tragic incident that had taken place in a Karachi factory and its deep commitment to take steps to rectify the situation. In this regard, the Government had taken immediate measures to compensate the victims of the incident: the families of 214 out of 259 dead workers had received an amount of PKR900,000 per person; an additional amount of PKR400,000 per person was likely to be paid to the legal heirs under the Workers’ Compensation Act; all of the injured had been paid compensation of PKR150,000 per person; and employers’ associations had undertaken to make employment arrangements for those who had been rendered jobless in the wake of the accident. He once again referred to the Joint Statement of Commitment signed by his Government with the ILO and the social partners. As regards labour inspection, the Government would take measures in line with international standards and in consultation with the social partners. The new mechanism for coordination between the centre and the provinces was in place and would soon be up and running. The mechanism would resolve institutional problems, since the provinces would share their work with the centre, help address the issue of the capacity of inspectors, follow a preventive approach instead of just focusing on awarding fines and penalties, by reaching out to the informal economy, and provide data for scrutiny by civil society and the social partners. Due note had been taken of the comments on the need to put in place adequate penalties for violations of legal provisions, to provide adequate transport facilities and bear other costs for inspection, and to ensure that data were effectively collected and reports were published regularly. He reaffirmed that inspections were not banned in Pakistan and that the Government would work towards the removal of any existing impediments in the conduct of inspections in any of the provinces. As regards the number of inspectors, the data were as follows: 83 in Punjab; 81 in Sindh; 68 in KPK; and 59 in Balochistan. The Government was committed to work towards the improvement of the situation, keeping in view the availability of resources. While highlighting the challenges arising from the distribution of legislative powers to provincial governments, he emphasized that the federal Government would remain seized of its responsibilities in terms of reporting on the relevant ILO Conventions and their implementation. He requested ILO technical assistance to help improve the labour inspection system in Pakistan.

The Worker members said that the Committee’s conclusions should cover three points. Firstly, the Government should ensure that the provinces provided the conditions necessary for the application of the Convention throughout the entire territory, without exception. Secondly, it should supplement the information it had provided in 2012 in order to paint a full picture of the situation of labour inspection in all the provinces, specifically indicating for each province the exact number of workers, regardless of their status, the visits that inspectors had conducted and the issues examined during inspections. Thirdly, it was necessary to ensure that the Government would, on the one hand, collaborate with the ILO both to apply the Convention and to monitor the progress made on decent work on the ground and, on the other, receive technical assistance from the ILO in order to achieve the full application of the Convention. That would facilitate the application of other Conventions, especially those on occupational safety and health. Technical assistance should also be provided on the obligations concerning inspection reports, as set out in Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention. In addition, the initial results of the legislative reforms should be reflected in the report that was due in 2013. They also emphasized that, in view of the Government’s strong position of the case and its attitude, it would be impossible for Pakistani workers to speak out, owing to the Government’s attitude, they could have asked for the case to be placed in a special paragraph. They had, nonetheless, requested that the protests of the Worker and Employer members should be clearly reflected in the report and stated that they would not hesitate to highlight the situation at the plenary session of the Conference.

The Employer members, while understanding that a tremendous reform was taking place in Pakistan, notably with regard to decentralization, urged the Government to provide all the information requested by the Committee of Experts and to meet all of its reporting requirements. They encouraged the Government to continue its efforts towards strengthening labour inspection, to accept ILO technical assistance and to uphold its cooperation with the ILO so as to ensure lasting progress.

Conclusions

The Committee noted at the outset its disappointment at the failure of the Government to accredit its workers’ and employers’ organizations in time for their attendance at the discussion of this case before the Committee.

The Committee noted the oral and written information provided by the Government representative and the discussion that followed concerning the effectiveness of labour inspections and the enforcement of legal provisions in the context of the delegation of competence to the provinces in the area of labour legislation and administration, as well as the recent fire in a garment factory in Karachi, in which nearly 300 workers had lost their lives. The specific issues addressed included the human and material resources of the labour inspectorate, restrictive policies for inspections, private and voluntary self-assessments in enterprises and the regular publication and communication to the ILO of annual inspection reports.

The Committee noted the Government’s commitment to address all the issues that had been raised and its assurance to the Committee that there were no bans on inspections in any province. It noted the Government’s indications that, through the delegation of powers to the provincial governments, the inspection regime would be strengthened and would enable inspectors to work more efficiently and effectively adopting a preventive approach. It also noted the measures announced by the Government to compensate the victims and their families affected by the factory fire in Karachi and to avoid the recurrence of such incidents in the future. The Committee also took note of the information concerning the signing of a Joint Statement of Commitment in the province of Sindh with the ILO and the social partners for the establishment of a plan of action to address the issues of labour inspection and occupational safety and health in view of the serious accident that had taken place in the country. The Committee further noted the Government’s request for technical assistance.

The Committee emphasized the importance of an effective system of labour inspection in all provinces for both employers and workers, including the need for adequate training of labour inspectors and the provision of sufficient human and material resources. While being aware of the financial conditions the country was facing, the Committee expressed the hope that adequate resources would be allocated to the labour inspection services and that priorities would be agreed upon and a strategic and flexible approach adopted, in consultation with the representatives of the social partners. The Committee recalled that the publication of annual inspection
The higher court for justice. The federation could appeal to the Labour Court. If the allegation was proved, the union could lose its registration. The case was still pending in the court and unfair labour practices by the BGIWF, the Delegation, could act as bargaining agents at workplaces under special circumstances. But this would not be a substitute for the trade union, and would rather obstruct trade union activities and collective bargaining. The amendment would thus bring the Labour Act more into conformity with international labour standards.

Regarding export processing zones (EPZs), the EPZ Workers’ Welfare Associations and Industrial Relations Act, 2010 (EWWAIRA 2010) provided for the formation of workers’ welfare associations (WWAs) with a right of collective bargaining. All elected executive committees of WWAs were actively performing their activities as collective bargaining agents with full freedom. Between January 2010 and March 2013, the Bangladesh Export Processing Zone Authority (BEPZA) had arranged referendums in 260 enterprises out of 339 eligible enterprises. Accordingly, 186 WWAs had so far been constituted. The BEPZA planned to arrange referendums in all the factories by 31 December 2013. WWAs would also have the right to call strike/work stoppages at the workplace from 1 January 2014. In order to promote the welfare of the workers in EPZs, the Government had formulated the “Constitution and Operation Procedures of EPZ Workers’ Welfare Fund, 2012”, which was already in force. In case of grievances, any worker could get an amicable solution by consultation with the counsellors appointed in EPZs. Additionally, EPZ Labour Tribunals and the EPZ Labour Appellate Tribunal had also been established in EPZ areas. The BEPZA had already organized 392 training/awareness/motivational programmes for WWA members and workers regarding their rights and responsibilities and would ensure training programmes for WWA members/workers once a month in all zones. The BEPZA was always positive towards the formation of a WWA federation which would ensure full freedom of rights for workers. EPZ workers’ welfare associations were restricted in their activities in EPZs and the BEPZA was committed to ensuring the security of foreign nationals and Foreign Direct Investment (FDI). However, workers/WWA members were at liberty to do anything within the legal framework of the Constitution of Bangladesh outside the bonded area. Development partners had visited the different EPZ areas of Bangladesh and witnessed some referendums and elections for workers’ associations with full freedom. EPZ workers’ welfare associations and EPZs had expressed their satisfaction over free, fair and credible elections. The Government of Bangladesh was very committed to ensuring collective bargaining in EPZs. The EWWAIRA 2010 was only valid up to 31 December, 2013. It was planned to work with the ILO to find ways of bringing the EPZ areas under the purview of national labour law to ensure freedom of association, the right to bargaining and other issues concerning labour standards.

Concerning the exercise of the authority given by Rule 10 of the Industrial Relations Rules (IRR), 1977, to the Registrar of Trade Unions (RTU) to enter trade union offices, inspect documents without judicial review, it should be considered in normal situations the RTU did not enter the office of any trade union or federation for inspection unless the secretary or president of the trade union applied to the RTU for the removal of irregularities. In the context of Bangladesh, generally trade unions were reluctant to hand over offices and documents to the newly elected executives. Besides, the RTU frequently received complaints about embezzlement of union funds resulting in chaos in the establishment affecting productivity and the good environment. The RTU was the registering authority and could play a vital role in settling issues as per the provisions of the law. The role of the RTU in the matter was always subject to review by the judicial authority which guaranteed impartiality and objectivity. After the adoption of the rules under the Labour Act which had already been drafted, the IRR 1977 would no longer be applicable. This issue would be addressed after the amendment of the Labour Act when formulating the rules.

ILO technical assistance was already being provided to improve compliance with the Convention, particularly in the ready-made garment and shrimp industries. The initiatives taken included implementation of an ILO–International Finance Corporation (IFC) funded the better work programme in the ready-made garment sector and a USAID-funded project in the shrimp sector. In the ready-made garment sector, the preparatory phase of the better work programme had been under implementation, namely “Promoting Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work in Bangladesh”. The project would contribute to ensuring the successful implementation of a potential fully-fledged better work programme in Bangladesh. The project aimed to support the amendment of the BLA 2006, improving the trade union registration system, capacity building for employers and trade unions and awareness raising. There were some concerns among the better work programme team relating to its implementation in Bangladesh. With the revision of the BLA 2006, the concerns would be alayed and the programme could be started soon. Further, to improve the labour standards situation in the shrimp sector, the Government of Bangladesh, the Bangladesh Shrimp and Fish Foundation (BSFF) and the Bangladesh Frozen Food Exporters Association (BBFEA) had already signed an agreement with the IFC in the framework of the IFC funded project.

The BEPZA was looking forward to ILO technical cooperation for the further improvement of the workers’ rights in EPZs in Bangladesh.

In conclusion, it should be noted that the high propensity for the migration of workers from one factory to another had been a major reason for trade unionism not having taken root in Bangladesh, particularly in the garment sector. Other factors in the non-expansion of trade unions could be lack of education and awareness. The Government was trying to address this situation by organizing education, training and awareness programmes for workers through industrial relations institutes. The Government had recently introduced the online registration of trade unions on a pilot basis. The implementation of programmes taken root under the ILO should surely improve labour law compliance in the country, including ensuring freedom of association and the right to bargaining in accordance with the Convention.

In addition, before the Committee, a Government representative referred in particular to the range of measures taken with respect to the allegations of harassment of trade unionists and trade union leaders; the registration of the BGWIF; the amendment of the Bangladesh Labour Act, 2006; EPZs; Rule 10 of the Industrial Relations Rules, 1977; and the technical assistance received from the ILO.

The Employer members indicated that the Committee had examined this case on 18 occasions since 1983, most recently in 2008. At that time, the Committee requested the Government to eliminate all restrictions on freedom of association and to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Government had reiterated on different occasions that it was working on the amendment of its legislation, but that there were no positive results. The Committee had expressed the hope, when it last examined this case, that the new Labour Act would be in conformity with the Convention. However, when the Committee of Experts had examined the Bangladeshi Labour Act, 2006, it observed that all the provisions considered contrary to the Convention had remained. The Conference Committee had been then forced to request the Government once again to amend its legislation. The Employer members indicated that, according to their understanding, the Bangladesh Employers’ Federation (BEF) had participated in the elaboration of a new Labour Act in the framework of the Tripartite Labour Law Review Committee and that the new Labour Act would be enacted by Parliament in June 2013. The Employer members expressed the hope that this could be considered as a positive development and that the new law would be in full conformity with the Convention. With respect to the implementation of the Convention in practice, the Employer members agreed with the Committee of Experts that workers’ and employers’ organizations could only exercise their rights in conditions free from threats, pressure and intimidation of any kind. This year, the case concerned allegations of violence and harassment of trade union leaders and trade unionists and the refusal to register unions in several sectors. The Employer members urged the Government to take the necessary measures to investigate the allegations related to violence and harassment of workers and to ensure full compliance with the Convention.

With respect to the EWWAIRA, the Employer members noted that the Committee of Experts had made 13 observations on the provisions of the Act with respect to the right to organize and the right to strike. Concerning the right to strike, they recalled their opinions as put forward in the framework of the examination of the General Survey and the general discussion in 2012. They reiterated that the right to independent representation was not expressly mentioned in the Convention and that there was no consensus in the Committee in that respect. The Committee of Experts had also referred to the existence of a multitude of complex regulations related to the EWWAIRA that hindered the establishment of workers’ organizations and, in this respect, had urged the Government to bring its legislation into full compliance with the Convention. With respect to Rule 10 of the Industrial Relations Rules, 1977, the Employer members expressed their understanding that this provision had been repealed by virtue of the adoption of the Bangladesh Labour Act, 2006. They welcomed the establishment in EPZs of industrial relations offices to settle complaints and requested the Government to provide additional information in that regard. They also welcomed the information provided by the Government concerning the technical assistance already provided by the ILO, as well as the better work programme under implementation, and expressed the hope that it would successfully implement the Convention in the ready-made garment sector. They expressed their support for the amendment of the Bangladesh Labour Act, 2006, the improvement of the procedures for trade union registration and the development of awareness-raising activities.
the Government to request ILO technical assistance to help it bring its law and practice into full compliance with the Convention.

The Worker members observed that, since the Conference Committee had last met, the world had watched in horror as over 1,000 garment workers had perished in Bangladesh. The Worker members also recalled that, in April 2012, in the Tazreen Fashions factory in Dhaka, over 100 workers trapped inside by locked doors had died either from the smoke and the flames, or as they leapt from the windows in a desperate attempt to escape. In April 2013, the nine-story Rana Plaza building had collapsed on the outskirts of the capital city. The building had housed garment factories that produced apparel goods for retailers based in the United States and the European Union (EU). Large cracks in the walls had appeared the previous day, alarming both workers and building engineers. Nevertheless, the management of the garment companies had insisted that the workers report to work. Both of these unimaginable tragedies were, in part, the result of the fact that, until very recently, unions had been essentially prohibited from operating in the massive garment industry. With collective representation, workers could have more easily removed themselves from the hazardous workplaces before it was too late and insisted that the hazards be addressed. Furthermore, it had been reported that the previous week the police had opened fire at a protest by former workers at Rana Plaza factories who had taken to the streets to complain of their treatment by the authorities.

For many years, the Committee of Experts had reiterated its serious concerns with regard to the numerous deficiencies in the laws as they related to freedom of association and the utter failure of the Government to ensure that workers could exercise this fundamental right in practice. Regrettably, up to now, the Government had failed to act on the Committee of Experts’ recommendations. Moreover, in its current report the Committee of Experts requested the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to carry out investigations regarding the murder of trade unionists. The Worker members recalled that Mr Aminul Islam, President of the BGIWF Savar and Ashulia regional committee, had been found dead on 5 April 2012. His corpse showed signs of torture and, from the information available, it appeared that he had not been the victim of random violence, but rather targeted for his trade union work. His murder had no doubt been meant to send a clear message to trade unions not to organize. These did not exist today in Bangladesh. The Worker members expressed concern regarding the revisions of the Labour Act as they understood that the proposals had just been submitted to Parliament for deliberation. In their view, addressing only one issue fully would represent serious contempt for the work of the Committee of Experts. Although the amendments proposed some improvements in areas unrelated to freedom of association, they introduced other changes prejudicial to unions and workers.

The Worker members assured that the Government had again permitted unions to be registered. Although the Government had still not signalled its intent to amend the Act, thereby depriving workers in EPZs of the possibility of even forming or joining trade unions. With regard to the Labour Act, the Worker members observed that the Committee of Experts had, since its promulgation, expressed deep regret that it did not contain improvements over the Industrial Relations Ordinance of 1969 and, in some respects, made the situation worse. There had in fact been a tripartite process to revise the Labour Act for over a year, and indeed worker representatives had participated actively in this process. As the Committee of Experts had noted, however, the revisions being considered when the report had been prepared “do not take into account most of the observations previously raised by the Committee”. That still remained true and, in fact, even fewer issues with regard to freedom of association were addressed in the proposed amendments. Additionally, the Worker members expressed concern regarding the revision of the Labour Act as they understood that the proposals had just been submitted to Parliament for deliberation. In their view, addressing only one issue fully would represent serious contempt for the work of the Committee of Experts. Although the amendments proposed some improvements in areas unrelated to freedom of association, they introduced other changes prejudicial to unions and workers. The Government needed to take this opportunity to ensure that the amendments addressed the observations of the Committee of Experts.

Finally, roughly 29 new unions have been registered in the last few months. The long standing failure, or indeed refusal, to register trade unions, particularly in the garment sector, had always been a question of political will, and not a legal matter. Because of the substantial external pressure applied by the international community, the Government had again permitted unions to be registered. It was obvious that the Government would stop registering unions as soon as the pressure was off. Indeed, that had been the case before. The registration of trade unions or employer associations should be a mere formality. For too long, the registration process had been tantamount to obtaining previous authorization. Industrial relations were built on the foundation of a sound legal framework, recognized worker and employer representatives, and collective bargaining. These did not exist today in Bangladesh. Instead, the legal framework was deeply flawed, most workers worked without representation due to a long-standing policy of refusing to register unions and collective bargaining coverage was minimal at best. If the Committee was to avoid the tragedies of recent months, it should consider to make the following changes.

The Worker member of Bangladesh expressed his shock following the recent incidents in the ready-made garment sector where numerous lives had been lost. While acknowledging the Government’s efforts in the rescue operations, in the provision of medical treatment and compensation, as well as in rehabilitation programmes, he considered that the tragedy could have been avoided had... there been adequate supervisory and monitoring mechanisms in the country. Inadequate security and inspection services had failed to ensure industrial safety. He urged the Government to take the necessary steps to strengthen labour inspection, the fire services and building inspection and to identify those buildings that were currently at risk in the Bangladesh ready-made garments sector. He also urged the Government to take measures so that those responsible were punished. He emphasized that the ready-made garment sector employed 3.5 million workers, most of whom were rural women. This had helped the empowerment of women. However, the profits had not been adequately distributed and workers in the sector did not enjoy decent working conditions. He expressed his support for sustainable development in the ready-made garment sector. The effective implementation and enforcement of international labour standards, including the right to organize and to bargain collectively, were the only alternative to uphold labour rights. He believed that the better work programme would help in this regard and urged the Government to take steps to ensure its full implementation. With respect to the registration of trade unions, he indicated that, under the Labour Act, upon receiving an application for registration of a new trade union, the registry authority had to provide the list of leaders to the employer. This gave the opportunity for unscrupulous employers to dismiss trade union leaders.
He welcomed the fact that the proposed new Labour Act, as amended, would repeal this provision and expressed the hope that it would be enacted in the near future. He referred to other provisions of the Labour Act that were not in conformity with the Convention. With respect to measures for online trade union registration, he called on the Government to take steps to improve the system and to train workers to familiarize them with it. While welcoming the steps taken by the Government in order to allow labour courts and the Labour Appellate Tribunal in EPZs, he indicated that freedom of association almost did not exist there. Moreover, the Labour Act was not applicable in EPZs. He emphasized that participation committees and workers’ welfare associations could not replace the work of trade unions.

The Worker member of the United States stated that horrendous yet preventable disasters in the Bangladesh garment industry since 2005 had taken the lives of over 1,800 workers. In the shipbreaking industry, there were over 40,000 workers, among them many teenagers migrating from the poorest parts of the country, who worked without protective gear, with no provisions for registration or representation. Three attempts to create workplace-based unions had been denied registration by local governments, even though 70–95 per cent of workers supported the union and allies had provided expert advice. In this industry, under at least one worker had died every month since 2005. The National Institute of Preventive and Social Medicine (NIPSM) had found that 86 per cent of the workers interterviewed had suffered some form of accidental injury while working in the Chittagong shipbreaking yards. At least now, after the death of well over 1,000 workers at Rana Plaza, people in positions of power were noting that the freedom to form unions was central to any solution.
The highest United States diplomat for South Asia had bluntly stated in his Senate testimony the previous week that: “had there been a union representative on the ground at Rana Plaza it would not have heeded the call”.
Among the many well-documented, continuous and systematic violations of the Convention that explained why there was no union representative present, the persistent refusal of the Government to register trade unions was obvious, basic and undeniable. No doubt the Government would point to the very recent registration of over 27 garment workers’ unions. However, 21 of these were registered after the November 2012 Tazreen fire and increased media attention. How many lives would have been saved by making it possible to have a union repres-sentative present by taking the first simple step of recognizing a union’s legal existence by processing and communicating its registration to workers and their elected leaders? Yet, even when this simple step was taken, it was necessary to remain vigilant. Most of the garment workers who had successfully registered new unions since the Tazreen fire had faced termination and other anti-union discrimination and none had been able to secure formal collective bargaining agreements. Given the difficulties faced by workers in organizing unions, their survival was dependent on broader civil society allies, nationally and internationally. Worker allies, like the Bangladesh Centre for Workers Solidarity, had repeatedly been harassed and charged with criminal offences and had their legal registration challenged and revoked. Once again, in the context of international pressure, the Government had undertaken to restoring this registration, which it had to honour. The accord on fire and building safety that had been negotiated and signed by local unions, the Industrial Global Union and UNI Global Union, and non-governmental organizations all in the intention of a new trade union recognized and registered workplace unions were central to this solution. The tripartite accord urgently required the Government to register and respect the growth and day-to-day operations of real unions with a strong presence in the workplace, as well as action from the Government and and the ILO. More multinational companies whose supply chains drew heavily from the Bangladesh garment industry should sign on. He called on the Government to honour many recent commitments to register unions and respect organizing and bargaining rights. The international labour movement would remain watchful for positive developments, and return to this and other forums to support Bangladesh’s workers as they sought to claim their rights.

The Employer member of Bangladesh reaffirmed the confirmation of the BEF to the promotion of freedom of association in the country. Despite being one of the least-developed countries in the world, confronted with many challenges and upheavals, Bangladesh had made remarkable progress in terms of exports, particularly ready-made garments, shrimps, leather and leather goods, frozen foods, jute and jute goods. However, Bangladesh needed to sigificantly improve its overall governance standards, attain sound political systems and stability and address social safety nets and security issues so that it offered decent work for all its citizens. While appreciating the observations made by the Committee of Experts, he stressed that, while workers had the right to negotiate and resolve isues through discussion, in practice, in most cases, a dif-
f erent scenario was observed, involving vandalism, blockades, fires, the destruction of equipment and machinery. This took place with the support of certain external miscreants, who were in no way believed to be actual workers or trade union leaders, resulting in a chaotic situation at the factories. At times, such unrest had taken place based on rumours spread by some external quarters to serve narrow interests. In such cases, the police and law enforcement agencies needed to take immediate action to protect the life and properties of workers and employers.
The BEF had never supported any illegal arrests or harassment; rather, it strongly believed that freedom of asso-
The Government should exercise its regulatory tools more efficiently to better facilitate the functioning of trade unions in the country, taking into account workers’ and employers’ welfare.

The Government member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden, expressed deep concern about the working conditions in Bangladesh, including in the areas of occupational safety and health.

They commended the country for the steps taken so far by the authorities, she strongly encouraged them to continue working closely with the ILO to make sure that the amended legislation addressed the requests of the supervisory bodies. The adoption of amendments to the legislation was a crucial, but only first step, in the process, and subsequent measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the new legislation were equally critical. Recognizing the significant efforts the Government had made in this regard, she welcomed the adoption of a joint statement by the tripartite partners with the ILO, on 4 May 2013, expressing the hope that this would help to ensure workers’ rights and representation, but emphasized that this was first and foremost the responsibility of the Government. She urged the Government to cooperate fully and to respond in substance to the requests made by the Committee of Experts, and endorsed the efforts of the Office to help with this regard. It was only by doing so, and working closely with the social partners that compliance could be secured in national laws with ILO Conventions, among which Conventions Nos 87 and 98 were of particular importance. The adoption of the Labour Act which had been facilitated by the ILO and its members was of particular importance. The setting up of an effective labour inspection was equally important. The authorities should work with the social partners, producers and buyers to take measures to ensure responsible supply chains, in line with ILO standards and corporate social responsibility principles. To this end, the Government should strongly advise to continue to fully avail itself of the technical assistance of the ILO, including comments and advice made on all relevant draft legislation.

The Government member of Switzerland expressed her country’s support for the people of Bangladesh following one of the worst industrial disasters of recent years. The Government members of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden, expressed deep concern about the working conditions in Bangladesh, including in the areas of occupational safety and health. The Government should promote freedom of association and ensure that its law and practice were fully in line with the Convention. It should also enter into genuine social dialogue, which was the only guarantee of the effective application of occupational safety and health legislation, as textile workers must be assured of safe and decent working conditions as a matter of urgency. In that regard, the Government and the social partners should agree to establish a better work programme as quickly as possible after Parliament’s adoption of the labour law reform, in accordance with international Conventions. The Office should ensure coordination between activities relating to respect for fundamental principles and rights at work, the national security plan and the agreement signed by multinationals in the textile sector.

The Worker member of Australia emphasized that, in the wake of the Tazreen and Rana Plaza disasters, much had rightly been heard about the responsibility of employers, and the global brands which sourced their garments through those employers, to ensure that workplaces were safe and that they complied with labour laws. However, as the fundamental ILO Conventions made clear, it was the responsibility of the Government to adopt, maintain and enforce laws that secured and protected fundamental labour rights of its workers. At present, the Government of Bangladesh was failing to fulfil that responsibility, and in particular it was failing to meet its international obligations to ensuring the conformity of its labour laws with the Convention. The provisions of the Labour Act which gave rise to the greatest concern, included those excluding entire classes of workers from the rights and protections under the Act, or from key parts of the Act. Establishing workers’ organizations was made extremely difficult and to organize. Other provisions in the Act imposed an excessively high minimum membership requirement for union registration. Restrictions were placed on anyone holding office in a union who was not employed or engaged in the establishment covered by that union. New provisions of the Act establishing a penalty of imprisonment for acts by workers or trade unions aimed at “intimidating” any person to become, continue as, or remain a trade union member or officer were excessively broad and risked capturing legitimate trade union activities. There were also a range of provisions which constituted unacceptable administrative interference in the rules, elections, affairs and activities of trade unions. There was a lack of clarity in the Act concerning the extent to which collective bargaining was permitted above the enterprise level and what restrictions were imposed on the right to strike which were inconsistent with the Convention. There were also many other restrictive provisions in other laws. She acknowledged that a process was under way in Bangladesh to reform a limited number of provisions in the Labour Act which had been facilitated by the ILO and had involved consultation with the social partners. However, the proposed package of amendments, as it currently stood, only directly addressed one of the many legal problems identified by the Committee of Experts, which continued to call for more extensive changes. The Government should bear in mind that the adoption and enforcement of laws fully guaranteeing and protecting freedom of association and collective bargaining was in the longer term a benefit to Bangladesh. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights and freedom were critical to ensuring that workers could join together to defend and pursue their rights, and therefore to ensuring that the workers were better placed to respond to the immense challenges that they faced within and outside their workplaces. They were also critical to the attainment of decent work in Bangladesh and to the country meeting its ambitious objective of moving from a low- to a middle-income country by 2021.

The Government member of the United States said that recent tragic events in Bangladesh that had resulted in immense loss of life, with over 1,000 people killed in the Rana Plaza building collapse in late April and over 100 in the Tazreen factory fire in November 2012, served to re-emphasize the importance of discussing the application of the Convention by Bangladesh. Sadly, the link between worker safety and health and the right to freedom of association had never been clearer. Workers who could organize robust unions were better able to advocate adequate working conditions, including workplace safety. Consequently, the prevention of future tragedies would require improved guarantees of a stronger voice and role for workers and the protection of freedom of association, the right to organize and collective bargaining. Her country retained long-standing and serious concerns relating to workers’ rights and working conditions in Bangladesh. A petition filed by the American Federation of Labour and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL–CIO) under the Generalized System of Preferences Act remained under review and a decision on how to proceed would be taken soon. The recent tragedies demonstrated the need for more urgent and coordinated action among all stakeholders, and especially the Government, to address those concerns by improving legal protections and the good governance necessary to enforce their implementation. The highest priorities were the enactment of robust amendments to the Labour Act, beyond those presently under consideration, alongside improvements in union registration procedures and the improved enforcement of laws and regulations. The aim was to secure genuine and sustainable protection of the fundamental rights to freedom of association and to organize, as well as occupational safety and health, focusing on the garment sector and EPZs, but also more broadly throughout Bangladesh. She expressed appreciation of the positive statements by the Government following the recent workplace tragedies and welcomed its stated commitment to ensuring compliance with the Convention and promoting freedom of association in Bangladesh. However, it was now time to move from words to actions. She urged Bangladesh to take the measures recommended by the Committee of Experts to bring its law and practice into full conformity with the Convention and to make use of the expert advice and assistance of the ILO for that purpose.

The Worker member of the Philippines emphasized that the universal right of workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing was not observed in law or practice in Bangladesh. The experience of the Philippines demonstrated the exploitation faced by workers in EPZs, who often faced dismissal or discrimination for trade union activities, while employers could refuse to recognize unions or to negotiate, or might even set up their own company-dominated or “yellow” unions. Over the years, very many workers had lost their jobs, been harassed, beaten or arrested when attempting to exercise their fundamental right to freedom of association in EPZs. Some 360,000 workers were employed in the eight EPZs in Bangladesh. However, even as reforms were considered to the Labour Act, EPZ workers remained excluded and relegated to a separate law that prohibited them from establishing unions. The Government appeared to have promoted investors in EPZs by declaring unions illegal, and workers’ rights and working conditions in EPZs, largely due to BEPZA’s position concerning EPZs, largely due to BEPZA’s position. However, the Act fell well short of international standards. In place of unions, the Act currently provided for the establishment of “workers’ welfare associations”, on which the workers’ representatives were often handpicked or appointed by employers. The formation of many such associations had been at the initiative of the BEPZA, not the workers. There had been almost no progress on collective bargaining in EPZs, largely due to BEPZA’s position that workers could not bargain on working conditions above the minimum standards established in the Act and in BEPZA instructions, even though the law clearly established the full entitlement of workers to negotiate collectively over wages, hours and conditions of work. Many workers’ association leaders reported that they had been harassed, suspended, dismissed without cause and/or subject to other forms of retaliation. In one case, workers from the Ishwardi EPZ had held a demonstration in 2012 concerning serious violations of their rights, including harassment and discrepancies over wages and leave. Following the unrest, 291 workers, including the presidents of workers’ associations, had been dismissed. In negotiations with international buyers and the owner, the factories had agreed to reinstate the leaders and the other 289 workers and had sought BEPZA’s approval to remove them from an EPZ “blacklist”. However, BEPZA had refused permission to reinstate the workers on the grounds that there was no prior practice or any provision in BEPZA rules and regulations allowing for the reinstatement of a terminated worker. Most troubling, the communication from the owner confirmed the existence of a blacklist. The Government member of Canada offered sincere condolences to the people of Bangladesh following the collapse of the Rana Plaza building. He emphasized that Canada remained concerned about dangerous working conditions in the garment sector in Bangladesh and expected all of its trading partners to ensure safe working conditions, consistent with international standards. He applauded the recent ILO high-level mission to Bangladesh and the Office’s coordination efforts in the country. He urged the Government to implement in full the resulting plan of action and to work together for that purpose with the ILO, employers, workers and other stakeholders. He also urged the Government to take all the necessary measures to bring the national legislation into full conformity with the Convention, in accordance with the comments of the Committee of Experts. While noting the proposed amendments to the Labour Act, which had been submitted to Parliament, he observed with concern that they were not consistent with international standards. He emphasized that freedom of association was an essential element for the functioning of the labour system, such as enabling workers to protect themselves including through participation in occupational safety and health measures. He therefore hoped that the collective energy following the recent tragic industrial accidents would be sustained and would result in measurable progress on many fronts. The Worker member of Italy said that it was not surprising that Bangladesh was receiving a high level of international attention concerning its poor working conditions, lack of health and safety, low wages, long working hours... and repression of labour rights, particularly in the ready-made garment industry. The Rana Plaza disaster had shown once again the many situations of violation of basic human rights and fundamental labour standards. Nor was it the only deadly workplace tragedy, as around 600 workers in the garment sector had been killed by fires started by their employer, up to now not brought to justice. Garment production represented 80 per cent of Bangladesh manufacturing exports, employing around 3.5 million people, mostly women. The rapidly growing number of factories mainly produced for Western brands, through a supply chain that placed increasing pressure on rights and labour costs. The race to the bottom in search of the lowest wages made Bangladesh a very attractive country for many suppliers who considered trade unions a danger to their profits. Until now the Government had facilitated this easy area for exploitation to attract foreign investment. She added that for many years the situation in the garment industry in Bangladesh had been characterized by anti-union violence, harassment and arrests. With the collusion of the authorities, employers in the sector had filed complaints against workers, unions and non-governmental organizations in criminal courts. Those cases were very costly, making it extremely difficult for workers to defend themselves. They often drugged on indefinitely and carried heavier sentences than cases in labour courts, thereby serving to intimidate workers engaged in trade union activities. One of the best known cases was that of Aminul Islam, who had been detained by the National Security Intelligence in 2010, beaten severely and sustained a fractured leg. The circumstances of his detention and the attempt to elicit a confession pointed to a targeted campaign against organizations that endeavoured to organize workers in the garment sector. Shortly afterwards, Aminul Islam had been abducted, tortured and his body dumped by the roadside. Now, a year after his death, little progress had been made in identifying and prosecuting those responsible and there were many indications of the involvement of the intelligence agencies in his death. She urged Bangladesh to ensure the effective implementation of fundamental United Nations and ILO human rights and labour instruments. The Government could not give the appearance to the world of expressing sorrow at the loss of life suffered without taking immediate action to ensure that workers enjoyed the basic right of association and that factories across the country complied with international labour standards.

The Government member of India noted with satisfaction that the amendments were to amend the Labour Act and believed that the progress made towards the amendment of the Act constituted a positive step that would help to resolve the issue. His Government had consistently encouraged dialogue and cooperation between the ILO and member States with a view to resolving all outstanding issues. Member States could also provide support to Bangladesh in view of the efforts that were being made by the Government for the implementation of the Convention.

The Government representative thanked the social partners for their comments and expressed appreciation of constructive criticisms, which could lead to positive developments. His Government always adhered to the recommendations of the Conference Committee and had carefully noted the points made during the discussion. He added that it was imperative for Bangladesh to comply with the ILO, notwithstanding of the Convention, which had been ratified in 1972, one year after the country’s independence. He reaffirmed that the Government was taking steps to address all the comments made by the Committee of Experts. Those included the amendment of the Labour Act through the inclusion of special provisions respecting the registration of trade unions to ensure that the situation was more comfortable for workers’ organizations. The amendments included the removal of the requirement to provide employers with lists of trade union members. The workers would undoubtedly benefit from the extension of collective bargaining. With regard to workers in EPZs, he recalled that they enjoyed a form of participation through welfare associations which, although not a substitute for trade unions, constituted an attempt to fully compensate for the lack of trade union action. It was to be hoped that they would be instrumental in the improvement of working conditions through improved social dialogue. The proposed amendments also included restrictions on the dismissal of workers during the process of the formation of trade unions. The amendments had been submitted to Parliament on 8 June. They were not yet in their final form and other suggestions could still be taken into account.

He emphasized the deep shock felt by the Government at the deaths in the Rana Plaza disaster. Special attempts had been made by all the respective services to rescue the victims, under high-level supervision, including the personal involvement of the Prime Minister. The Government had taken all the necessary steps for the criminal investigation of the Tazreen and Rana Plaza disasters. The criminal investigation of the Tazreen disaster had led to the arrest of some of those responsible, as well as the suspension of a number of inspectors. Following the Rana Plaza collapse, criminal charges had been brought against the owner of the building, the owners of the factory and the municipality. The owners of the building and the factory had been placed under arrest and the Department of Factories and Inspection had filed a case. The national occupational safety and health policy was in the final stages of preparation. He added that 22 unions had been registered during the first five months of 2013. The action taken in response to the recent tragedies in the garment sector included the recruitment of 800 additional inspectors by the Department of Factories and Inspection. The Deputy Director-General of the ILO had visited the country following the collapse of the Rana Plaza factory and had held discussions with the various stakeholders, including the Prime Minister. A national tripartite plan of action on constructions had been adopted, which included an assessment of factories in the ready-made garments sector using a high technology scanner. With regard to the case of Aminul Islam, he noted that the criminal investigation had recently identified two principal suspects. In conclusion, he expressed the willingness of the Government to enter into dialogue with all the concerned stakeholders, development partners and other interested parties. The issues raised concerning the rights of workers and their safety were of great importance, not only in the ready-made garment sector, but also in such other important export sectors as shipbuilding and machinery production. The constructive suggestions and criticisms made by the Employer and Worker members, as well as the Government members, were to be welcomed. Through the amendments that were before Parliament it was hoped to address all the comments of the Conference Committee.

Everyone was working towards the common goal of national development, which would be for the benefit of all citizens.

The Employer members thanked the Government representative for his responses to the statements made by various members of the Committee during the discussion. They welcomed the recognition by the Government of the need to change the national law to bring it into full compliance with the Convention and the commitment expressed to the principles of freedom of association. The Government should build on the steps that had already been taken to achieve full conformity with the Convention and supply a report on the steps taken this year to the Committee of Experts so that it could assess the progress made and consider any further measures that would need to be adopted. The Employer members therefore encouraged the Government to ensure that the Labour Act was in full conformity with the Convention and to accept the technical assistance offered. They also encouraged it to continue and strengthen social dialogue so that the social partners could be involved in bringing national law and practice into conformity with the Convention.

The Worker members recalled that the Committee of Experts had called on the Government to carry out investigations into the serious allegations made, including murder, with a view to punishing those responsible. They therefore deeply regretted that the Government had taken little action in that respect and urged it immediately to investigate, arrest and prosecute those responsible for such crimes, and particularly the murder of Aminul Islam. The Committee of Experts had also repeatedly commented on the numerous flaws in the Labour Act, the EWWAIRA and the Industrial Relations Rules. Although the Government had made no effort to ensure that workers in EPZs had the right to organize into trade unions and were able to bargain collectively in practice, the offer to extend the provisions of the Labour Act to EPZ workers was to be welcomed. However, the Worker members were less disposed to support the Government’s ambition to address the many issues raised concerning the Labour Act. They urged Parliament not to rush through the amendments as they currently stood, but to work with the ILO to ensure their compliance with the observations of the Committee of Experts. The ILO should intensify existing efforts in that respect.

The Worker members added that the recent registration of trade unions appeared to depend entirely on the will of the Government. For years, it had refused to register new unions in many sectors, including the garment sector, and there was little to suggest that it would continue their registration once the spotlight began to dim. Moreover, they expressed concern at the continued defence of intervention in union affairs in the closing statement by the Government representative. They emphasized that one of the best ways to avoid another industrial disaster in Bangladesh was to ensure that workers could exercise their rights guaranteed by the Convention. They therefore expressed their appreciation to the international brands that had signed, with the global unions, the international accord on fire and building safety, which recognized the importance of trade union action in fire and building safety. They called on the ILO to intervene immediately with the Government to ensure that the labour legislation currently before Parliament was in compliance with the observations of the Committee of Experts, as there was no reason why those observations could not be addressed in full. The ILO should significantly increase its capacity for technical cooperation at the Dhaka Office in relation to freedom of association and collective bargaining including, but not limited to, the garment sector. The ILO and the relevant international organizations should work to ensure that those responsible for the murder of trade unionists were arrested and prosecuted. The Government should be requested to provide a report this year on compliance with its obligations under the Convention. Finally, the ILO Dhaka Office should submit full reports to the October 2013 and March 2014 sessions of the Governing Body on its activities and on the situation in the country with regard to freedom of association and fire and building safety.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that ensued.

The Committee noted that the outstanding issues concerned: numerous allegations of arrests, harassment and detention of trade unionists and trade union leaders, notably in the garment sector, and refusals by the Registrar to register new trade unions; the need to ensure freedom of association rights to workers in export processing zones (EPZs); and numerous provisions of the 2006 Labour Act and the 1977 Industrial Relations Rules which were not in conformity with this fundamental Convention.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government, in particular that: the Bangladesh Garments and Industrial Sramik Federation (BGIWF) was functioning without any obstacle, pending the decision of the Labour Court before which the Government had filed a case for cancellation of its registration in 2008; and amendments to the 2006 Labour Act had been submitted to Parliament, following intensive tripartite consultations and advice from the ILO. The Committee further noted the information on: the number and function of workers’ welfare associations under the EPZ Workers’ Welfare Association and Industrial Relations Act of 2010 and the Government’s plans, when it expired in 2014, to bring EPZs under the purview of the Labour Act with ILO assistance; the intention to formulate new industrial relations rules following the adoption of the amendments to the Labour Act; and the technical cooperation provided by the ILO to ensure the further improvement of workers’ rights in EPZs.

The Committee did not address the right to strike in this case, as the employers do not agree that there is a right to strike recognized in Convention No. 87.

Stressing that a climate of full respect for freedom of association can make a significant contribution towards the effective protection of workers’ safety, the Committee highlighted the fundamental nature of this right. The Committee called on the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that workers and employers can exercise their freedom of association rights in a climate that is free from threats, pressure and intimidation of any kind and to carry out independent investigations into the allegations of arrest, harassment and violence against trade unionists. The Committee took note of the important commitments made by the Government to bring the law and practice into conformity with the Convention and urged the Government to ensure that the amendments to the Labour Act were adopted without delay and addressed the numerous points raised by the Committee of Experts concerning the Convention’s application. The Committee expected that these changes would further give rise to a simplified and effective registration process. Noting the Government’s statement that participation committees would not be used as a substitute for trade union activities and collective bargaining, the Committee urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the amendments to the Labour Act did not undermine trade union rights. Encouraged by the Government’s statement concerning the lapsing of the EWWAIRA in 2014, the Committee invited the Government to availing itself of ILO technical assistance aimed at ensuring that workers in EPZs were fully guaranteed their rights under the Convention. The Committee requested the Government to provide a detailed report on the progress made with respect to all the above matters for examination by the Committee of Experts at its meeting this year. The Committee also invited the Director-General to submit to the Governing Body in 2014 a detailed report on the situation regarding respect for freedom of association in the country.

Belarus (ratification: 1956)

The Government provided the following written information.

In recent years, relations between the social partners have substantially stabilized. As at 1 January 2013, 554 agreements (one general agreement, 47 sectoral wage agreements and 506 local agreements) and 18,351 collective agreements were in force in Belarus; at the various levels (national, sectoral, provincial, district and municipal), there were 319 councils for labour and social issues. In the last ten years, the number of agreements increased by 50 per cent and the number of collective agreements by 40 per cent, while the number of councils has doubled.

All interested parties are involved in work on the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry, including the Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus (FPB), the Belarusian Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (CDTU) and employers’ associations. In this regard, it is particularly necessary to highlight the positive role played by the Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere (hereinafter the Council), which has met twice in 2013, on 26 March and 30 May.

In 2012 there were no cases of trade unions being refused registration. There have been no instances in the Republic of Belarus of citizens being punished by being charged with administrative or criminal offences in respect of trade union activities. This issue is under special state supervision. All complaints are examined carefully. The results indicate that the cases of individual trade union activists being charged with administrative or criminal offences to which the CDTU refers, are in no way connected with the trade union activities of the individuals concerned. With regard to the cases of Mr M. Kovalkov and Mr P. Stanevsky referred to by the CDTU, Mr Kovalkov was charged with an administrative offence and fined 35,000 Belarus rubles (around €3) for committing an administrative violation under section 18.14 of the Code of Administrative Offences of the Republic of Belarus (failure to observe road traffic signals and breaking rules on carrying passengers). Mr Kovalkov was not held in administrative detention. Mr Stanevsky, according to information from the Ministry of Internal Affairs, was in a public place near 38 Serdich Street (in Minsk) when he started being openly disrespectful to those around him and swearing obscenely at passers-by. Mr Stanevsky failed to react to repeated warnings from police officers and became aggressive. In order to put a stop to Mr Stanevsky’s unlawful actions, the police officers used force and special measures (handcuffs). On 21 April 2011, the Frunzensky district court in Minsk found Mr Stanevsky guilty of an administrative offence under section 17.1 of the Code of Administrative Offences (petty hooliganism) and sentenced him to administrative detention for eight days.

With regard to trade union compliance with the provisions of Presidential Decree No. 24 “On receiving and using foreign direct aid” (28 November 2003), in 2012, the FPB and the Mogilev provincial organization of the Belarusian Agricultural Sector Workers’ Union (ASWU) registered foreign direct aid for social assistance amounting to US$23,031 with the Department of Humanitarian Activities of the Office of the President of the Republic of Belarus. There have been no instances of trade unions being refused registration of foreign direct aid. Thus, despite a number of unresolved disputes, recent years have seen a clear tendency towards stabilization in Belarus. Tension between the social partners has eased. There are still a significant number of controversial issues. It is obvious, however, that this is an integral part of the process of social dialogue, which is not free from disputes in any country.

The Government of the Republic of Belarus and the social partners are devoting the utmost attention to improving legislation, in line with the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry. In this regard, at a meeting of the Council for Improving Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere, held on 30 May 2013, the issue was raised of the need to abolish the requirement that at least 10 per cent of the total number of workers in an enterprise was needed to found a trade union, during discussion of the measures being taken in the country to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and suggestions for further work. This requirement is contained in Presidential Decree No. 2 “On various measures to regulate the activities of political parties, trade unions and other public associations” of 29 January 1999 (“Decree No. 2”). The Council supported the proposal made by the Government that it would be appropriate to exclude this provision from Decree No. 2 and instructed the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, in its capacity as secretariat to the Council, to inform the Government of the Republic of Belarus accordingly so that the necessary action could be taken. The Ministry of Labour and Social Protection transmitted this suggestion to the Cabinet on 4 June 2013. A definite step has thus been taken towards implementing the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry in terms of improving legislation on registering trade unions. It should be emphasized that the Government of Belarus is open to dialogue and the discussion of all problematic issues with the social partners and the ILO. In this regard, the Government of Belarus would favour holding a seminar, in conjunction with the social partners and the ILO, on developing social dialogue in the Republic of Belarus, at which future steps towards implementing the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry should be identified. The Government of Belarus has repeatedly suggested such a seminar to the ILO, and also to the social partners within the framework of the Council for Improving Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere.

In addition, before the Committee, a Government representative, referring to the written information provided concerning the application of the Convention, wished to add that trade unions were the most important organizations in society and represented 90 per cent of the economically active population. Her Government supported and applied the principles of trade union pluralism. The right of every person to join any trade union without prior authorization, provided that they respected the union’s by-laws, was guaranteed in law. The two trade union federations operating in the country were the FPB and the CDTU. They participated in social dialogue and advisory bodies and in the preparation and conclusion of collective agreements. Unions, whether large or small, could take part in collective bargaining, as demonstrated by bargaining in two large enterprises, where the two organizations had been involved in preparing the collective agreement. The recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry provided guidance for the Government and the social partners with the aim of developing constructive cooperation. A positive trend had been seen in recent years, with no cases in 2012 of a trade union being refused registration. The Government paid particular attention to issues relating to the non-interference by enterprise managers in the internal affairs of trade unions, irrespective of the size of affiliation of trade unions. The Trade Unions Act made a guarantee of trade unions’ independence in exercising their prerogatives, and any violation in that regard involved liability to criminal sanctions. If it was so provided for in a collective agreement, the law authorized an employer to work with trade unions to regulate certain matters.

With regard to social dialogue, the positive role played by the tripartite Council, which had been operating in its new format since 2009, should be stressed. The tripartite Council consisted of seven members from each of the three sides, including representatives of the FPB and the CDTU. The Council functioned as an independent body, founded on the principle of pluralism and providing a forum in which each party could propose topical issues for inclusion on the agenda concerning the right to freedom of association, with a view to resolving them. The meetings held in 2013
had taken into account the proposals made by the FPB and the CDTU. The FPB’s proposal to amend legislation on the conclusion of collective agreements had resulted in the creation of a tripartite working group that had been asked to make proposals in that regard. For its part, the CDTU had asked for the situation at the enterprise Grantit to be discussed at some meetings to provide an opportunity for a constructive exchange of views and had again demonstrated the complexity of the current situation. Amending legislation was not a straightforward process, as it required balanced solutions to be found that were acceptable to all parties. Nevertheless, the Government realized that it was necessary to make progress towards implementing the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry on legislative matters. The tripartite Council was the body best suited to do that. It had examined the issues at its last meeting, on 30 May 2013, at which it had supported the Government’s proposal to amend Presidential Decree No. 2 by revoking the requirement for a minimum of 10 per cent of workers in an enterprise to establish a trade union. The Government and the social partners now needed ILO support to hold a tripartite seminar on developing social dialogue and tripartism. It had been proposed by the ILO in 2011, but it had not yet proved possible to organize, as the CDTU was opposed to holding a seminar with the participation of the ILO. Such a seminar could, however, make a useful contribution to the development of social dialogue in Belarus, in the same way as the 2009 Minsk seminar, organized jointly by the ILO, the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), had done in enabling the creation of the tripartite Council.

The Government respected the principles on which the ILO was founded and the procedures relating to international labour standards. It also greatly appreciated the cooperation with the ILO, which had often helped to bring the parties closer together. The Government was open to dialogue and ready to discuss any problematic issues. It was fully aware of the fact that it had not yet fully carried out the tasks set out in the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. It therefore did not wish to delay, but would make all the necessary efforts to develop constructive relations with the social partners and cooperation with the ILO.

The Worker members said that it was discouraging to have to discuss once again a case on which the Committee of Experts had been commenting for over 20 years concerning the failure to comply with Convention No. 87 and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). The Conference Committee had also adopted a number of conclusions in view of the Government’s failure to intensify its efforts to ensure that freedom of association and civil liberties were fully ensured. Numerous complaints had also been made to the Committee on Freedom of Association. In 2003, a complaint under article 26 of the Constitution had resulted in a Commission of Inquiry. The report of which contained 11 recommendations calling, inter alia, for free and independent trade unions to be able to play their proper role in the country’s social and economic development. In 2010, when the situation in Belarus, in relation to the Convention, had been examined, the Conference Committee had noted a number of apparently positive developments involving the Council and the registration of some trade unions; at the same time, the Conference Committee had nevertheless regretted that there had been no concrete proposals to amend Presidential Decree No. 2 on trade union registration, the Act on Mass Activities or Presidential Decree No. 24 on the use of foreign gratuitous aid, as requested by the Commission of Inquiry. In 2011, the Conference Committee had again discussed Belarus in the context of Convention No. 98 and had noted with regret new allegations of interference in trade union activities, pressure and harassment. It had expressed its concern that the determination of trade union representativeness could not be meaningful until the Government first put in place the necessary measures to ensure full respect for freedom of association for all workers, and guarantees for the registration of freely chosen workers’ organizations and for the promotion of their right to collective bargaining. The European Union (EU) had also voiced its concern at the failure of Belarus to respect human rights and had emphasized the need to put a stop to the harassment of members of the opposition and civil society and decided to take restrictive measures so as to maintain the pressure on the country at least until October 2013. Because the rights guaranteed by Conventions Nos 87 and 98 were human rights, Belarus would have to respect them before those restrictions could be lifted.

They noted the Employer members had emphasized, that in 2012, the Government had been unwilling to send a report of its own accord in response to the many observations made by the Committee of Experts. This year’s report again contained no new information concerning the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and the Committee on Freedom of Association had also expressed its deep concern at the Government’s lack of cooperation. The situation was therefore deteriorating after the glimmer of hope that had emerged from the discussion in 2010. There was a lack of willingness to cooperate with the ILO and there was more of a tendency to destroy independent trade unionism.

The request to amend Presidential Decree No. 2 on the registration of trade unions and its implementing regulations had not been welcomed by the Government, thereby perpetuating the minimum threshold of 10 per cent of the workforce. Under the new interpretation of paragraph 3 of Decree No. 2, other obstacles seemed to be raised for registration, the right of trade unions to elect their representatives in full freedom and to organize their administration. Other cases should also be noted. The management of the Grantit enterprise had refused, in violation of the Convention, to grant the legal address required by Presidential Decree No. 2 to a new first-level organization, the Belarus Independent Trade Union (BITU); registration had been denied to independent trade unions, such as the Razam Union and Delta Style, and the leaders of the independent trade unions in several enterprises had all been dismissed; the CDTU had referred a case to the National Council of Labour and Social Issues concerning the refusal to register a first-level union, and the Conference Committee had noted a number of apparently positive developments involving the Council and the registration of some trade unions; temporary employment contracts were being used systematically to exert greater control over workers in order to obstruct the development of independent unions; and practices tantamount to forced labour existed in the wood processing industry.

The Worker members emphasized that the case merited the Committee’s full attention since both the credibility of the ILO supervisory mechanisms and respect for the workers who belonged to independent trade unions were at stake. The EU, which had expressed its dismay with regard to the issues under discussion, was also concerned by the work of the Committee, which should take a firm stand regarding the Government’s obligation to intensify its efforts to ensure that freedom of association and respect for civil liberties were fully guaranteed in law and practice.

The Employer members recalled that when the present case had been discussed by the Committee in 2007, they had noted an apparent change in the attitude of the Government towards the issues raised. On that occasion, the Government had recognized that the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry did not need to be adjusted to national conditions, had dropped the legislative proposals that went in the wrong direction, and had instituted social dialogue. Following the discussion of the case in 2010, the Employer members had considered that the Government had been cooperating with the ILO and that there was no consensus in the Conference Committee. However, they had noted that much still needed to be done as fundamental legislative issues had not yet been addressed. Although the Government was faced with the diverging interests of employers and workers, the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry addressed issues relating to anti-union discrimination and the registration of trade unions. At that time, it had then been the opinion of the Employer members that it was time for the Government to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry in law and practice.

The Employer members noted that the most recent comments by the Committee of Experts consisted of a follow-up to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, although they wished to recall that the Committee of Experts had made comments on provisions of the Labour Code dealing with the right to strike, even though there was no consensus in the Conference Committee that the right to strike was recognized under Convention No. 87. The position of the Employer members on that issue had been stated clearly during this year’s discussion of the General Survey and the General Report of the Committee of Experts, and it was their view that those points could not be reflected in the conclusions of the Conference Committee. The Committee of Experts had noted with regret that the Government’s report contained no new information on the measures taken to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry or the requests made by the Conference Committee. The Committee of Experts had urged the Government to take the necessary measures to amend Presidential Decree No. 2, to eliminate the obstacles to trade union registration, although no information had been provided in that respect. The Employer members expressed deep concern at the failure of the Government to provide information concerning the status of Presidential Decree No. 2 and therefore assumed that no tangible measures had been taken for its amendment. However, they welcomed the indication by the Government representative that the tripartite Council had been operating again since 2009, that the relations between the social partners had stabilized and that a number of collective agreements had been concluded. They noted that there had been a refusal to register trade unions in 2012 and that the Government had indicated an openness to enter into dialogue with the social partners and the ILO, as well as suggesting the holding of a seminar which could examine future measures to give effect to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

The Employer members noted with deep regret that it appeared that no substantial progress had been made in the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. They therefore urged the Government to take the necessary steps, in consultation with the social partners, to ensure that freedom of association was guaranteed in law and practice. They called upon the Government to intensify its cooperation with the social partners for that purpose and to avail itself of the expert advice and assistance of the ILO. It was also imperative for the Government to provide a report on the measures implemented. They regretted to note that the progress hoped for, when the case had last been addressed by the Conference Committee, had not been achieved and emphasized that it was now time to move from words to action. They hoped to be able to note changes in the situation in the immediate future.

The Employer member of Belarus indicated that progress had been made with the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, particularly with regard to the national legislation, including more detailed regulations regarding the relations between the social partners. He referred to the equal treatment of all trade unions by employers; the eligibility for collective bargaining by the FPB and other unions, including the CDTU; and the coverage of all workers by the law on unjustified dismissal irrespective of their membership in a particular trade union. Trade unions were being actively involved in the improvement of legislation in the National Council on Labour and Social Issues, and had participated in the development and implementation of the national policy on wages and working conditions. He considered that social dialogue was now systematically applied in the country and indicated that further technical assistance would contribute to a better understanding of social dialogue. In the current conditions and the problems the country was facing, sanctions were not justified. He would therefore welcome the decision of the United States Labor Department and the European Union to lift sanctions. Referring to the cooperation project “Eastern Partnership” he hoped for the normalization in the relations between Belarus and the European Union. The Employers recognized that the 10 per cent threshold to establish a union was an issue, and indicated that a decision should be made taking into account the interests of both employers and workers. He requested a realistic assessment by the Committee concerning the development of social dialogue in the country.

The Worker member of Belarus recalled that the ILO had been making recommendations with regard to freedom of association in Belarus for almost ten years now, and the Government had been working on them constantly. He indicated that the FPB had more than 4 million members, which was almost half of the population of the country and could not be compared to very small unions. While in 2002, neither social dialogue nor collective agreements had existed, more than 550 wage agreements and more than 18,000 collective agreements were now in force in the country. However, despite invitations from the FPB, other trade unions participated very little in collective bargaining. In order to defend the interests of workers and the population, the FPB was working with the Government to further its claims, particularly in terms of employment creation and social protection. He drew attention to the similarities between several elements of the ILO Director-General’s Report and the action of the FPB, and expressed at the same time that none of the criticisms had been levelled at his Federation by the smaller unions in the country on the pretext that it had achieved wage increases in some sectors only. The Worker member spoke out against the sanctions the EU had imposed on several bodies in Belarus. Those measures were harmful, particularly for the well-being of the population. He highlighted the fact that the ILO and the EU were radically different institutions and any confusion in that respect should be avoided. He then stated that ten of the 12 recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry had already been implemented and that the Government was currently working on the 10 per cent membership threshold required to form a union in an enterprise. Turning to the general issue of the registration of unions, he noted that the issue had been discussed for ten years and was no longer on the agenda. As illustrated by the fact that there were only private enterprises solely in Minsk which did not require a legal address to create a trade union organization, although small trade unions not affiliated to FPB did not use this opportunity, though they had such right. He also asked the Conference Committee to support the efforts being made by the Government, and supported the proposal of the Government to organize a meeting in Minsk, which would provide the opportunity to address the issues that still had to be discussed.

A representative of the European Union, speaking on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States, as well as Croatia, Iceland, Montenegro, Serbia and The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina and Norway, pointed out that the experts had remained gravely concerned about the lack of respect for human rights, democracy and rule of law in Belarus. Democracy could not exist without freedom of expression, opinion, assembly and association. They called on the Government to cooperate fully with the ILO to provide information on the follow-up given to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and to eliminate obstacles to trade union registration, in particular the requirements imposed by Decree No. 2. Necessary measures had to be taken in consultation with the social partners, so as to ensure that the right to organize was effectively guaranteed. Presidential Decree No. 9, signed on 7 December 2012, which prevented the employees in the wood-processing sector from resigning unilaterally until the end of the modernization of their companies, was concerning. Also the legislation that further restricted the Belarusian freedoms of assembly gave rise to great concern and any penalization or discrimination against those exercising their right to freedom of expression and freedom of assembly had to be ended. They requested the authorities to amend or repeal legislation not in conformity with the right of workers to organize, in line with the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry made in 2004. The speaker expressed the commitment of the countries on behalf of which he spoke to a policy of critical engagement, including through dialogue and participation in the Eastern Partnership, and recalled that the development of bilateral relations under the Eastern Partnership was conditional on progress towards respect by Belarus for the principles of democracy, the rule of law and human rights. They were willing to assist the Government to meet its obligations in this regard and would continue to monitor closely the situation in the country.

The Employer member of Uzbekistan considered that significant progress had been made with the strengthening of social dialogue in accordance with ILO standards, for instance through the conclusion of collective agreements in all sectors and the registration of the CDTU. The technical assistance provided by the ILO had proved beneficial in this regard. He insisted that sanctions undermined social partners and were unacceptable, not suitable to solve the problems, and only exacerbated the situation for workers and enterprises. Constructive dialogue should be continued.

An observer representing the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) emphasized that in Belarus state control over the trade union movement was total and it was impossible to establish independent trade unions. He cited several examples of mass dismissals of workers who had taken part in the formation of trade unions, and those practices had subsequently been endorsed by the courts. Administrative sanctions were also used as a means of pressure without provoking any response from the public prosecutor. Moreover, work meetings aimed at expressing solidarity during the 1 May celebrations had been banned. In more general terms, the mechanisms for implementing the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry had been used in a manipulative way and the real issues had not been tackled at all. The observer hoped that the ILO would persist in its efforts to ensure that freedom of association would finally be respected in Belarus. The defenders of freedom had to pay a very high price in Belarus but no price could be put on democracy.

The Government member of the Russian Federation stated that the report submitted and the statements made by the Government were comprehensive and showed its commitment to cooperate and maintain a dialogue with the ILO. He understood that the Council of Ministers of Belarus was currently considering proposals for the amendment of Presidential Decree No. 9. He expressed the hope that the amendment of this Decree would be accompanied with a view to abolishing the 10 per cent minimum membership requirement for the registration of trade unions. The allegations of numerous violations, harassment, denial of registration and arrest were not supported by facts. He was also surprised by the fact that the Committee of Experts had not taken into account the explanations of the Government with regard to the situation in the two enterprises mentioned in the Committee of Experts’ report. His Government called on this Committee to strive for an objective and unbiased assessment of the situation with regard to the implementation of ILO Conventions.

The Government member of Cuba stated that ILO technical cooperation had played a key role, making a tangible contribution to the implementation of the Convention. There had been progress in social dialogue, as illustrated by the increase over the previous ten years in the number of collective agreements and the fact that in 2012, no cases had been submitted concerning the denial of trade union registration. The Government, together with the social partners, attributed great importance to improving the legislation, in accordance with the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. Recently, there had been specific proposals and measures in that regard, particularly on registering trade unions. Her Government welcomed the Government’s willingness and its efforts to maintain constructive relations, social dialogue and to work in close cooperation with the ILO, and called for the continuation of technical assistance in order to achieve the objectives established by the Convention.

The Government member of Canada indicated that his Government was gravely concerned by the overall situation of human rights, including labour rights, in Belarus. His Government was disturbed by continued reports of numerous violations of the Convention, including interference by the authorities in the activities of trade unions, arrests and detention of members of independent trade unions, anti-union dismissals, threats and harassment. His Government urged the Government to take the necessary measures to address these serious allegations and to make a real effort to eliminate violations of trade union rights, including the right of workers to participate in peaceful protests to defend their occupational interests, in their country. His Government was also gravely concerned by the very minimal degree of cooperation exhibited by the Government with the supervisory bodies of the ILO. The Government was failing to provide follow-up information to the 2004 recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. The observations of the Committee of Experts also detailed numerous other instances where the Government had failed to provide responses or had failed to cooperate in other ways. Cooperation with the ILO supervisory mechanisms was a critical component of good faith membership in the Organization. His Government urged the Government to respect its obligations and to cooperate fully with the ILO.

The Worker member of the Russian Federation stated that freedom of association could not be freely exercised in Belarus. The observer emphasized that the ILO conventions allowed Russian trade unions access to reliable information sources revealing police pressure, mass dismissal of union leaders and an absence of social dialogue. Furthermore, there had been reports of some instances of forced labour. He regretted that a kind of feudal system still existed in the heart of Europe and that the Commission of Inquiry’s recommendations remained empty words. He said that a proper system to monitor the situation should be put in place and requested the Government to present concrete evidence which might refute the ongoing allegations of violations of the Convention.

The Government member of China indicated that the issue of trade union registration improved every year and that the government had passed Decree No. 2 in 2012; Decree No. 2 should be applied. She stressed the important role of the Council and requested that the Government’s efforts to implement fully the Convention be supported in the context of technical assistance.

The Worker member of Poland considered that no progress had been made towards implementing the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and improving the application of the Convention. She regretted to inform the Committee of new cases of violations of trade unions’ rights which had occurred in several companies. The violations of trade union rights included the denial to register the independent unions, harassment and dismissal of new union leaders and activists, interference in the union activities, excluding the independent trade unions from collective bargaining, the denial of the right to run meetings and manifestations, and prosecuting trade union leaders under criminal pretexts. In addition, the existing legislation was also being used against workers and members of the independent trade unions, as illustrated by the difficulties encountered by the newly established independent union at the Granit Company in Mikashevice to register and pursue claims of reinstatement of their leaders who had been dismissed on the basis of the provisions of the Labour Code. The requirement of a legal address and the 10 per cent threshold for trade union registration were some of the main obstacles for the independent trade unions to act freely. From the reports of the Committee of Experts and the statements made by the Government, it could be concluded that no concrete, effective measures had been taken to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. The Government’s declarations on social dialogue were empty and improved in no way the situation of workers and independent trade unions. The Government’s declarations should be reflected in concrete actions. She recalled that freedom of association could not be fully exercised in a context in which civil liberties were not respected. She was therefore convinced that the Government should first introduce a system which guaranteed and would respect such civil liberties for all. As long as the Government failed to comply with its international obligations, the international pressure would continue.

The Worker member of Egypt endorsed the position of the Worker member of Belarus with respect to the positive steps taken by the Government on the Convention. He underlined that tripartite social dialogue was an important tool to ensure the progress of any country and the observance of ILO Conventions and workers’ rights. Referring to the social dialogue system, he described it as efficient through the National Council of Labour and Social Issues which included an equal number of representatives from trade unions, employers and the Government. Most trade unions participated in the negotiation of collective agreements and in the elaboration of legislation which was the basis of social dialogue. In this respect, 18,000 collective agreements had been adopted by workers’ and employers’ organizations in the country. The speaker concluded by this regard had been of a continued dialogue between the ILO and Belarus and that over the years, and that there was progress in implementing Convention No. 87.

The Government member of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela stated that his Government welcomed the strengthening of social dialogue in the country, which had resulted in the full recognition of trade union rights, and an increase in the number of collective agreements and councils for labour and social issues. His Government was confident that the Government would continue adopting measures that would benefit the stability of the country in terms of freedom of association and protection of the rights to organize, between the government and the opposition, that endeavor, as illustrated by the ILO proposal to organize a seminar with the social partners on the work of the Council, with the participation of the FPB and the CDTU. His Government called for the Committee to highlight the Government’s progress in terms of implementing the recommendations the Commission of Inquiry had made concerning the Convention.

The Worker member of Sudan supported the position of the Worker member of Belarus and other members of the Committee about some positive changes that could be noted with regard to the application of the Convention. He was encouraged by the participation of all social partners in a broad dialogue with the ILO, and noted the participation of the trade unions of Belarus in the process of implementing ILO recommendations. Noting with interest the absence of problems with registration of unions since 2012, the positive steps taken in improving the legislation, and the broad social dialogue, he concluded that compliance with the Convention had improved through the efforts of the ILO.

The Government member of Uzbekistan stated that the written and oral information provided by the Government showed that the situation regarding freedom of association in the country had stabilized and that the Government had been able to collaborate with all trade unions (including the FPB and the CDTU). The Council was working to improve the situation and resolve contentious issues. There had been no issues relating to the registration of trade unions in 2012, which showed that progress had been made. The discussion on the removal of the 10 per cent threshold for trade union registration was also one of the positive steps taken, and all these initiatives should be duly reflected in the Committee’s discussions.

An observer representing the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) fully endorsed the stance of the FPB, which represented 4 million workers throughout the country. She was familiar with the labour and economic situation of Belarus and expressed satisfaction at the significant progress that had been made in the country. Belarus currently had an unemployment rate of just 1.6 per cent, it occupied ninth place in the world in terms of the level of employment and was 10th in the league table of the literacy-free countries. It was the richest State in the Eurasian Economic Community and one of the most industrialized countries in the region. In her visit to the country in 2012 she had been able to verify the high level of participation in enterprises enjoyed by workers and the guarantees they had with regard to freedom of association and workers’ rights. Moreover, she had been able to confirm the conditions in which more than 30 national trade unions were able to fight for and defend the social and economic rights of workers without any discrimination on the part of the authorities. She emphasized that all the social partners were working to implement the recommendations of the Committee of Experts and the Commission of Inquiry.

The Government member of the United States expressed her Government’s regret regarding the serious lack of progress made by the Government in implementing the 2004 recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry in view of the time that had passed. This was especially troubling given the detail with which this situation had been examined throughout the ILO’s supervisory system, and the extent to which the ILO Office had provided its technical advice and assistance. Hence, her Government urged the Government once again to take all necessary measures without further delay to ensure that freedom of association was effectively guaranteed, and again strongly encouraged the Government to work closely with the social partners and to hold regular consultations with the ILO, so that the ILO supervisory bodies would soon be in a position to adopt a substantive evaluation of association and tripartism progress. Recalling the joint statement on democracy and human rights made by the Governments of the United States and Belarus in 2010, she noted that free and vibrant trade unions were vital to democracy. Her Government was looking forward to the day when the ILO supervisory bodies could confirm this statement.

The Government member of Switzerland stated that her Government shared the concern expressed by the European Union regarding the democratic situation in Belarus in general and freedom of association in particular. It was, therefore, vital to ensure that the Commission of Inquiry’s recommendations were followed up. The Government, in collaboration with the social partners, should do all it could to ensure the effective application of the Convention.

The Government member of Switzerland stated that her Government would continue to take steps to develop pluralism. International labour standards were given a prominent place in national legislation and observance of ratified Conventions was a priority. Her Government fully observed its commitments towards the ILO supervisory bodies and had submitted two reports to the Committee on Freedom of Association as well as the report on the application of the Convention under article 22 of the ILO Constitution. The situation in the “Granit” enterprise had been reviewed and the results had been communicated to the Office. With respect to Presidential Decree No. 2, the proposal from the Council in June of this year related not to the creation of the Government’s standards but amendments to the Decree that would remove the 10 per cent minimum membership requirement. This amendment had been designed to meet the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. Industrial relations gave rise to conflicts all around the world, particularly concerning the relationship between employers and trade union organizations in the workplace, and there were different causes for the conflicts independent from national legislation or policy. Recalling a case in which the former vice-president of a trade union had been dismissed from the trade union congress, which was thereafter sanctioned for not respecting the time frame for such dismissal, the speaker stated that when employers clearly violated workers’ rights, even if they were trade unions, the Government was obliged to respond in accordance with the provisions of existing legislation or international law. While specialists had given different assessments of the level of progress achieved in Belarus in implementing the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, there were objective facts that could not be denied, including the opportunity for all trade unions to represent workers regardless of the number of workers they represented. All social partners could engage in social dialogue. The Council was in operation and was taking a special decision on the effectiveness of the amendments to the legislation on trade unions. The speaker proposed that a tripartite seminar be held with the participation of the ILO. She assured the Committee that her Government would continue to be a firm advocate of the principles of the ILO in the areas of freedom of association and tripartism.

The Worker members said that the picture painted by the Government representative did not match the reality experienced by the independent trade unions. The situation, far from improving, was getting worse. The tripartite body no longer meeting and there had been no significant follow-up to the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry. Perhaps a decisive point had been reached, but nobody knew in which direction. The only direction that could be taken was towards implementing the Commission’s recommendations. The Council had examined the question of founding trade unions, but there was nothing to indicate that its examination would be followed up, and the independent trade unions doubted the Council’s credibility. With regard to the proposal by the Government, the Worker members expected nothing to come of it. The legislation restricting trade unions’ rights should be revised, taking into account the comments of the supervisory bodies. Given how old the case was, and in view of the Government’s inertia, sending a direct contacts mission was entirely justified in order to obtain a legal and institutional response to the acts suffered by the independent trade unions. The Government should be invited to provide information on progress made in that regard. The Worker members also asked for the conclusions on the case to be included in a special paragraph in the Committee’s report.

The Employer members concluded that this was a serious issue in relation to the exercise of trade union rights and issues with respect to the freedom of association but remained optimistic in view of the developments that had taken place since 2007. There had been progress although it was slow. Currently, the situation was at crossroads: the Government could choose to either continue to progress at a gradual rate, or commit to accelerating its efforts in order to achieve compliance with the provisions of the Convention. The social dialogue process that had begun was essential and should continue. The full application of the Convention could only be secured through the adoption and strict implementation of necessary legislation and compliance could only be achieved by beginning to change the situation both in law and in practice. The Employer members requested the Government to intensify its cooperation with the social partners and to avail itself of the expert advice and assistance of the ILO. In this regard, the Employer members supported the request of the Worker members that the Government should accept a direct contacts mission.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government representative and the discussion that ensued.

The Committee recalled that the outstanding issues in this case concerned the need to ensure the right of workers to establish organizations of their own choosing and organize their activities and programmes free from interference by the public authorities in law and in practice. The Committee further highlighted the long outstanding recommendations from the Commission of Inquiry for amendments to be made to Presidential Decree No. 2 dealing with trade union registration, Decree No. 24 concerning the use of foreign gratuitous aid and the Law on Mass Activities.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government on the work of the tripartite Council for the Improvement of Legislation on the Social and Labour Sphere and, in particular, its decision to support the amendment of Decree No. 2 by repealing the 10 per cent minimum membership requirement for the establishment of trade unions at the enterprise level. The Committee further noted the Government’s stated commitment to social dialogue and cooperation with the ILO.

The Committee observed with deep regret that no new information was provided by the Government nor had any tangible result been achieved in implementing the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry of 2004.

Recalling the intrinsic link between freedom of association, democracy, the respect for basic civil liberties and human rights, the Committee urged the Government to intensify its efforts to bring the law and practice into full conformity with international obligations, in close consultation with all social partners and with the assistance of the ILO. The Committee urged the Government to take immediately all measures necessary to ensure that all workers and employers in the country may fully exercise their rights to freedom of expression and of assembly. The Committee invited the Government to accept a direct contacts mission with a view to obtaining a full picture of the trade union rights situation in the country and assisting the Government in the rapid and effective implementation of all outstanding recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. It expected that the Government would submit detailed information on proposed amendments to the abovementioned laws and decrees to the Committee of Experts at its meeting this year and trusted that it would be in a position to note significant progress with respect to all remaining matters at its next session.

The Committee decided to include its conclusions in a special paragraph of the report.

The Government representative indicated that her Government had taken note of the conclusions but would give its final decision on whether they were acceptable and well-founded only after examining very carefully the discussions that had taken place in this Committee.

CAMBODIA (ratification: 1999)

A Government representative, referring to the case of Chea Vichea, Hy Vuthy and Ros Sovannareth (Committee on Freedom of Association, Case No. 2318), indicated that the Prime Minister had recently issued an order (letter No. 397 of 6 March 2013) to establish a Coordinating Committee with the exclusive mandate to coordinate the ministries involved to respond to the questions relating to Case No. 2318. In addition, the Prime Minister had issued a second order (letter No. 1080 of 6 June 2013) to establish a permanent committee which would include all social partners and 20 different ministries and which was mandated to develop the national employment policy and to respond to all questions raised by the ILO. The two orders would be translated and submitted to the Committee of Experts in due course. Concerning the freedom of association issues, his Government respected the principles underlying the Convention and the Cambodian labour legislation gave full effect to its provisions. Professional organizations of employers and workers could freely organize and exercise their rights. To date, there were 12 union chambers, 76 union federations and 2,765 trade unions at the enterprise level, mostly in the garment and shoe sector comprising around 460 enterprises. Moreover, workers’ organizations were playing a crucial role in drafting national legislation and were actively participating in discussions on labour issues. In its effort to address a variety of industrial relations challenges and strengthen social dialogue, the Government had established a tripartite committee to monitor strike actions, another tripartite committee on labour contracts and yet another tripartite committee on minimum wages. Workers to three committees were composed of representatives of employers and workers who were freely elected by their respective organizations.

Moreover, the speaker recalled that a new draft Trade Union Law had been drawn up with the active involvement of social partners and technical assistance from the Office. The new draft legislation was now being considered by the Council of Lawyers of the Council of Ministers. Upon receiving the finalised draft, the Ministry of Labour and Vocational Training would forward it to the Committee of Experts. Furthermore, the Ministry of Justice was instructed to draft the labour court law in consultation with all social partners, as per established practice. In relation with the independence of the judiciary and the Government’s reporting obligations regarding recently developed laws, such as the Anti-Corruption Law, the speaker indicated that one of the new committees referred to above would take responsibility for responding to the Committee of Experts’ requests, probably after the general elections of July 2013 and as soon as it had been familiarized with the ILO procedures, in particular the work of the supervisory bodies, and he requested the Office to provide assistance and training in this regard. In addition, the Government had appointed a labour attaché to Cambodia’s diplomatic mission in Geneva who would facilitate communication and dialogue between the Office and concerned bodies in Cambodia. Finally, the Government representative stated that significant progress had been made over the years but as the labour market changed and industrial relations diversified, there was need to continue to respond to the needs of employers and workers through appropriate legislation and social dialogue.

The Worker members recalled that, in its 2007 and 2011 conclusions, the Committee had already referred to the murder of trade unionists, to harassment, to the arrest and disappearance of union leaders, to the inefficiency and lack of independence of the justice system and to the climate of impunity. The Committee of Experts had used the very same words in its comments to the Government ever since 2003. In its latest observation, it noted that the murder of trade unionists Chea Vichea, Ros Sovannareth and Hy Vuthy, had still not been elucidated and once again raised the question of the efficient and independent functioning of the system of justice and of the climate of impunity. Although the Government had been requested to take concrete measures and, specifically, to adopt the draft laws on the status of judges and attorneys and on the functioning of tribunals without delay and to send copies to the Committee, there had been no progress for all this time. The harassment encountered by the members of the Cambodian Independent Teachers Association (CITA), that was a reflection of the more general problem that civil service unions were not covered by the draft Trade Union Law and were treated as ordinary associations. Moreover, as in many countries, the use of temporary contracts and proliferation of short-term contracts in Cambodia directly or indirectly undermined the possibility for workers to join trade unions. All workers without distinction had to be allowed to join the trade union of their choice. The Worker members stressed that the problems referred to were particularly serious in the textile sector, which was an essential part of the Cambodian economy as it accounted for 80 per cent of the country’s exports. Although it employed skilled manpower, the workers’ conditions of pay and employment were bad and workers were under tremendous pressure. The enterprises that imposed the conditions under which they worked were subcontractors to world-famous trade names that were not bothered by such practices. Yet, there was an obvious link between decent working conditions and freedom of association in a country, such as a 60 per cent of employers' consent, prevailed rendered the trade unions' task difficult and it was the workers who suffered. A free trade union movement that was not exposed to violence, pressure and threats was essential if the social partners were to conduct an effective dialogue and thus guarantee conditions of employment that were in line with ILO standards. The detention of trade unionists for reasons connected with their activities in defence of the interests of workers constituted a serious interference with civil liberties in general and with trade union rights in particular. The major economic interests of the textile sector would be much better protected if freedom of association was guaranteed.

The Employer members noted that this case constituted a challenge for the Committee because, despite seven observations addressed by the Committee of Experts since 2007, a direct contacts mission in 2008, a double footnote in the Committee of Experts' report, and a reference during the previous Session, little progress had been made. A law on peaceful demonstrations had been adopted in 2009 but appeared to be at variance with the provisions of the Convention. Issues such as a climate of impunity, a context of violence directed at union leaders and lack of independence of the judiciary remained unresolved. Workers continued to denounce acts of violence and harassment, labour courts still did not exist, and the United Nations (UN) Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Cambodia had recommended that measures should be taken to enhance the independence of the judiciary. The Employer members welcomed the Government's indication that it had adopted anti-corruption legislation and put in place an anti-corruption unit, and requested it to provide information on the composition and mandate of that unit, together with a copy of the law, to enable the Committee of Experts to better understand the new measures. In addition, the Employer members urged the Government to provide in its next report information on any progress made with regard to the creation of labour courts. They also urged the Government to take steps to provide for an independent and efficient judicial system as a matter of urgency, and adopt without delay the proposed law on the status of judges and prosecutors and the law on the organization and functioning of the courts. The Employer members regretted that the Government was silent with respect to observations about violations of trade union rights, including allegations of serious acts of violence and harassment of trade union members, and requested the Government to provide its views on this matter. They also urged the Government to intensify its efforts, in full consultation with the social partners and with ILO assistance, to ensure that the final draft legislation on freedom of association and trade unions would be in full conformity with the Convention. The Employer members insisted that the Government had to move forward and build on the measures it had taken in order to ensure progress both in law and in practice.

The Worker member of Cambodia referred, first, to the use of short-term or fixed-duration contracts (FDCs), and stated that almost 60 per cent of employers subcontracted and short-term contracts to avoid the establishment of trade unions in their enterprises, thereby undermining the workers' rights to freedom of association and collective bargaining. Moreover, short-term contract workers often enjoyed less favourable working conditions, such as lower wages and limited social security benefits. With respect to the assassination of union lead- ers, the speaker recalled that the actual perpetrators of the murder of Chea Vichea, Ros Sovanareth and Hy Vuthy in 2004 had still not been identified. In another incident, Governor Chhouk Bandith, who shot and seriously injured three striking women workers in February 2012, had not been prosecuted due to the reluctance of the judicial authorities to investigate corruption, and the measures were therefore needed to investigate the murders, prosecute the perpetrators to the fullest extent of the law and ensure that justice was done. The speaker referred also to the violence and threats against union leaders and activists, as it happened regularly that persons were hired to attack leaders and members of independent unions. In 2013, there was such a criminal attack on leaders of the Coalition of Cambodian Apparel Workers' Democratic Union (CCAWDU). In a related development, the number of dismissed union leaders had increased from 40 in 2010 to 45 in 2011 and 116 in 2012. Another matter of concern was the registration of trade unions as all unions wishing to register with the Ministry of Labour had to first give notice to the company while the Ministry of Labour often delayed the provision of the registration certificate, thus preventing the union from functioning properly. On the other hand, political parties and employers occasionally sought to establish unions that could not be regarded as independent, and thereby violating Article 3 of the Convention. As regards the draft Trade Union Law, improvements were necessary as the draft legislation did not cover workers from the public sector (civil servants, teachers, police, air and maritime transportation workers, judges) and domestic workers. The speaker also raised the issue of poor occupational safety and health standards, including insufficient ventilation and unsafe working conditions often resulting in tragic accidents and loss of life.

The Employer member of Cambodia stated that the freedom of association and right to organize was extremely well practised in Cambodia and refuted the reference in the Committee of Experts' report to a "persistent climate of violence and intimidation towards union members" as being entirely false. Freedom of association was enshrined in article 36 of the Constitution and sections 266–278 of Chapter 11 of the Labour Law. Furthermore, the Labour Law did not require a minimum number of members for one union to be established, therefore one enterprise might have more than one union, sometimes as many as ten unions. Recalling the Committee's discussion in 2011, she noted that despite the challenging economic environment, progress continued and multiple priorities were being addressed. In 2011, the number of dismissed union leaders had increased from 40 in 2010 to 45 in 2011 and 116 in 2012. From an employer's point of view, the real challenge was the multiplicity of unions and the violent character of demonstrations used by some of a youthful industrial relations environment and a new union movement that needed maturity, consolidation and more cohesiveness. In relation to the Government's reporting obligations, the speaker welcomed the establishment of the new inter-ministerial working group bringing together relevant ministries involved in reporting, which would greatly assist in collecting and transmitting information in a timely manner. ILO assistance with building the capacity of the abovementioned group would help the bodies represented in that group to better discharge their responsibilities. With respect to the allegations concerning FDCs, the speaker expressed the view that issues around employment contracts were being taken out of context to push a finished agenda line. Employers and union leaders agreed that it was necessary to look at the changing economic environment and the challenges of FDCs without blowing this question out of proportion and creating a bad profile for Cambodia’s investment environment. Concerning the forthcoming adoption of the draft Trade Union Law, the speaker stated that the new legislation was initiated and drafted through a truly tripartite process and therefore was not a matter of serious violation of the Convention to be deliberated in this Committee. Using the draft Trade Union Law as a tool for suggesting that there was no freedom of association in Cambodia risked undermining this genuinely tripartite and ground-breaking legislative development. With respect to the deaths of union members, she recognized the seriousness of the matter but hoped that due process would be followed in investigating and delivering justice. Recognizing the challenges that lay ahead, the speaker expressed the hope that the ILO would continue to support the social partners in Cambodia in their endeavours for further strengthening industrial relations systems and mechanisms.

An observer representing Education International (EI) agreed with the Committee of Experts’ previous comments that the draft Trade Union Law did not comply with Convention No. 87 or the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). Recalling this Committee’s conclusion in 2011 that the Government should intensify its efforts, in full consultation with the social partners and with the assistance of the ILO, the speaker regretted that the final draft Trade Union Law was moving nowhere fast. Although the draft law, which was communicated in 2011, had addressed some of the Committee of Experts’ observations, it was unclear how it might have been modified since then. A critical issue remained the continued exclusion of civil servants, including teachers, from the scope of the draft union law. The Government had again refused to register the Cambodian Confederation of Unions (CCU) as a union confederation because most of its members were teachers, and this illustrated the Government’s failure to abide by the Convention. Unions in the public sector were still denied union rights and had to operate under the Law on Associations and Non-Governmental Organizations, which was problematic. ILO technical assistance had been provided, yet the Government did not have the will to move forward. The speaker called upon the Government to again take up the draft Trade Union Law, ensure that it complied with international labour standards, including coverage of civil servants, and adopt it immediately.

The Worker member of Indonesia referred to the dramatic rise in the use of FDCs, particularly in the garment industry, which had created substantial employment insecurity, damaged industrial relations, contributed to the increase in plant-level strikes since 2005, and undermined the power of existing trade unions. In most cases, the duration of FDCs was less than three months, and workers feared that their contracts might not be renewed if they participated in union activities or became union members. The Government’s strategy to mobilize and control by using FDC workers and excessive types of precarious work would only result in economic and political vulnerability. Many garment factories were now entirely composed of a workforce with repeatedly renewed short-term FDCs, which, according to the speaker, violated labour law, in particular section 67 of the Labour Law, 1997, limiting the maximum period for an individual labour contract to two years. The Arbitration Council had ruled that this provision imposed a two-year cap on FDC renewals, but the garment manufacturers ignored the ruling. In practice, the shift from undetermined-duration contracts (UDCs) to FDCs undermined freedom of association and collective bargaining. Short-term contracts also prevented organized labour from identifying and developing trade union leaders, and this had a serious impact on the efficacy of leadership and the ability of the union to effect change in the workplace. Further, the labour law required union leaders to have one year’s work experience in the factory, which was hard to accrue under FDCs. Many garment factories had converted most, if not all, of their UDCs to FDCs through a variety of tactics including fake factory shutdowns whereby the factory would reopen immediately under a different name and would “rehire” the workforce under FDCs.

The Worker member of Sweden, speaking on behalf of the Worker members of other Nordic trade unions, stated that anti-union discrimination in Cambodia continued to be a serious problem and workers who were fired for their union activity rarely had access to effective remedies. To date, the Arbitration Council remained the only mechanism for the resolution of labour disputes in the absence of a labour court. The Council addressed disputes in a transparent and balanced manner but its decisions were not binding while its continued existence was compromised due to limited funding. There were many examples where employers engaged in anti-union discrimination and simply disregarded the Council’s decisions with impunity. Hence, the Cambodian unions and workers needed an effective remedy against anti-union discrimination. For all its merit, the Arbitration Council was routinely ignored, leaving workers to have to suffer lengthy and expensive legal proceedings or to take to the streets with the hope of defending their rights.

The Worker member of the Philippines stated that freedom of association could only be effectively exercised in a climate free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against trade union members and leaders, which was not the case in Cambodia. The speaker gave a detailed account of two cases that highlighted the conditions of intimidation, harassment and violence that workers were facing in Cambodia. In the first case, on 20 February 2012, Governor Chhouk Bandith shot and seriously wounded a group of striking workers. He was charged in April 2012 with “unintentional injury” despite overwhelming evidence from over two dozen witness testimonies that Mr. Bandith could not possibly have been present on the scene of the shooting. He was later acquitted after a retrial by the Supreme Court, the Appeals Court had upheld the original verdict. The Cambodian authorities needed to initiate a thorough, independent and impartial investigation into those cases. Since Chea Vichea’s death, another two FTU activists had been murdered in Phnom Penh, adding to the long series of unjustifiable acts against civil liberties and trade union rights.

The Government representative expressed gratitude for the comments made by the Employer and Worker members reflecting the efforts made by the Government in the implementation of the provisions of Cambodian legislation in line with the Convention. In order to encourage freedom of association, the Government provided all workers with the opportunity to freely organize and exercise their rights. To date, there were 12 union chambers, 76 union federations and 2,765 trade unions at the enterprise level in Cambodia. In 2012 alone, 74 collective bargaining agreements had been registered with the Ministry of Labour and Vocational Training. He further indicated that trade unions had played a crucial role in the drafting of national legislation and in various discussions on labor issues. Trade unions had made significant progress over the years, the Government representative stated, and responding to questions raised by the ILO. The Government representative expressed regret about some of the comments made, which did not reflect the real situation in Cambodia and did not recognize the efforts undertaken to pursue the effective implementation of the provisions of Cambodian labour law in compliance with the Convention. He stressed that the Government had continued to respond to the needs of employers and workers and to the changing industrial environment. Lastly, despite having made significant progress over the years, the Government was aware of the need to continue to develop national laws and regulations and to build on an already solid foundation of social dialogue.

The Employer members stated that, in order to redress the deficiencies that had been highlighted in terms of freedom of association and protection of trade union rights, the Government should, without delay: (i) adopt, before the end of 2013, a law on trade unions that was in accordance with the Convention and that covered all private and public sector workers, regardless of their contract type (permanent, temporary, part-time or full-time); in consultation with the representative organizations of workers and employers and with technical assistance from the ILO; (ii) ensure that the perpetrators of acts of violence against trade unionists and workers were prosecuted and punished by the courts promptly and transparently; (iii) convene a tripartite committee to reach agreement on temporary contracts within six months; and (iv) ensure ongoing funding for the Arbitration Council and authorize it to take binding decisions.

The Employer members expressed their wish to see the comments they had made at the opening of this case with regard to the deficiencies in government action, reflected in the Committee’s conclusions. They believed that the case could be summarized in four broad areas that required the Government’s immediate action: the silence of the Government in respect of the situation of freedom of association, as well as the independence and effectiveness of the judiciary; the adoption of the Anti-Corruption Law together with its five-year strategic plan as well as the establishment of an anti-corruption unit; and the engagement of the social partners. The Employer members encouraged the Government to adopt a law dealing with the issue of freedom of association of trade unions and to ensure that violence against workers was not permitted. They urged the Government to guarantee the independence and effectiveness of the judicial system, including by focusing on capacity-building measures and the institution of safeguards against corruption. In that regard, the Employer members also urged the Government to adopt without delay the proposed law on the status of judges and prosecutors and the law on the organization and functioning of the courts; and to take measures in order to ensure their full implementation. They requested the Government to adopt a law providing effective information on the progress being made in this respect and in particular with regard to any measures taken to establish labour courts. Furthermore, they encouraged the Government to provide information on the mandate of the anti-corruption institution and its activities together with a copy of the law, the strategic plan and any other relevant document. The Employer members indicated that they were encouraged by some of the measures taken, for example the Government’s consultation of the social partners with respect to the draft Trade Union Law; however, they noted that it was important that the Government continue to engage the social partners in its efforts to achieve compliance both in law and practice with the Convention. The Employer members expressed the hope that they would be able to note progress in each of the aforementioned four categories.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the statement made by the Government representative, as well as the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted that the grave issues in this case concerned a climate of impunity in the country and seriously flawed judicial processes with respect to the trials of the presumed authors of the assassinations of three trade union leaders, as well as the need to ensure an independent and effective functioning of the judiciary. Other matters concerned long-standing discrepancies between the legislation and the practice, and the Convention.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative concerning the establishment of a coordinating committee to coordinate all relevant ministries to respond to the questions relating to the administrations of trade union members, as well as a permanent committee on employment policy, also charged with responding to questions raised by the ILO. The Government representative also referred to the elaboration of a draft trade union law with the technical assistance provided by the ILO, as well as to the intention of drafting a labour court law.

The Committee deplored the fact that, despite the remand of the Chea Vichea case to the trial court, full, independent and impartial investigations had not been carried out into his assassination and the previously convicted persons had been returned to prison without any new evidence being produced. The Committee further noted with concern the allegations of continuing violence, threats and intimidation suffered by trade union leaders and members. Recalling that the freedom of association rights of workers and employers could only be exercised in a climate free from violence, pressure and threats of any kind, it urged the Government to take the necessary measures to bring an end to impunity in relation to violent acts against trade unionists and requested it once again to institute independent investigations so as to ensure that the perpetrators and the instigators of these heinous crimes are brought to justice.

The Committee noted the concerns raised with respect to the judicial system by the Committee of Experts. It recalled its previous recommendation urging the Government to adopt without delay the proposed law on the status of judges and prosecutors and the law on the organization and functioning of the courts and ensure their full implementation, and expected that the Government would be in a position to report on the progress made in this regard without delay.

The Committee further observed that the legislative reform process was still under way and once again called on the Government to intensify its efforts, in full consultation with the social partners and with the assistance of the ILO, to ensure the rapid adoption of the draft Trade Union Law by the end of 2013 so as to more fully guarantee the rights under the Convention. It also requested the Government to take further measures to ensure freedom of association rights to public service workers and all types of contract workers. It specifically requested the Government to provide the Committee of Experts with the means of the Anti-Corruption Law and its strategic plan, and expected that the necessary resources would be provided for their effective implementation. Adequate resources should also be allocated for the proper functioning of an independent judiciary. It also requested the Government to transmit to the Committee... of Experts all other draft texts referred to so that it would be in a position to comment as to their conformity with the Convention and expected that it would be in a position to observe concrete progress in this regard in the near future.

Canada (ratification: 1972)

A Government representative recalled that, in 2010, her Government had addressed this Committee explaining in detail the nature of the Canadian Constitution, under which the federal Government and each of the ten provincial and three territorial governments had exclusive authority to legislate with respect to labour matters within their respective jurisdictions. Considerable emphasis had been placed at that time by the Committee on the challenges of such division of legislative authority under the Constitution. She highlighted a number of initiatives and mechanisms designed to address this issue. For instance, the Government engaged with the provincial and territorial governments with a view to promoting implementation of Canada’s international labour obligations. The main forum for these discussions was the Canadian Association of Administrators of Labour Legislation. Also, an annual workshop brought together officials from the federal, provincial and territorial governments to discuss ILO issues, including reports to the ILO on ratified Conventions, comments by ILO supervisory bodies and the review of ILO Conventions for possible ratification, and the social partners were regularly invited. In addition, tripartite round tables on international labour issues were held annually, with the participation of ILO officials. In November 2010, the federal Minister of Labour had established the Advisory Council on Workplace and Labour Affairs, consisting of employer and worker representatives, which served as a forum for discussion and advice to the Minister on workplace and labour issues of federal, national and international importance.

Concerning the observations of the Committee of Experts, the Government representative indicated, with reference to the detailed 2011 and 2012 Government reports, that she would focus primarily on developments and information since the last report. As regards the allegations submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC) and the Confederation of National Trade Unions (CNTU) in July and August 2012, some addressed cases before the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) that were closed, some did not relate to the application of the Convention and others would be addressed in the Government’s next reports on the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). As to the allegation of increasing violations of the Convention by the federal Government, there had been no recent amendments to industrial relations legislation. However, since 2011, there had been three instances where the federal Government had introduced legislation to prevent or end work stoppages that threatened the public interest and the Canadian economy. Two of these cases were currently before the CFA. Following a recommendation of an independent study on the causes and impacts of work stoppages in the federal private sector, and the consensus of union and employer stakeholders on the need to work on their relationships, the Government had increased in 2011 resources for its Preventive Mediation Program, which provided services including training sessions on how to move from competition to more collaborative labour-management relations, approaches to problem solving and improving collective bargaining skills, as well as facilitating the resolution of workplace grievances. With respect to the 2007 Supreme Court Decision Health Services and Support – Facilities Subsector Bargaining Assn. v. British Columbia, 2007 SCC 27 (hereinafter: B.C. Health Services) referred to by the unions, in which the Court had found that the protection of freedom of association enshrined in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms extended to collective bargaining, the Government representative indicated, with reference to that, in 2011, in its ruling Ontario (Attorney-General) v. Fraser, 2011 SCC 20 (hereinafter: Fraser), the Supreme Court had revisited its decision and had narrowed the protection afforded to collective bargaining under the Charter. As a result, there was continuing litigation regarding the scope of Charter protections.

Concerning the follow-up by provincial governments, she indicated that a recent case before the CFA concerned Ontario legislation of 2012 (Bill 115) that imposed contracts on Ontario teachers. In January 2013, that Bill had been rejected by the Government of Ontario and the imposed contracts had since been amended through further collective bargaining. With regard to the right to organize of part-time employees of public colleges, the Government of Ontario wished to inform the Committee that the certification applications filed by the Ontario Public Sector Employees Union were being dealt with by the Ontario Labour Relations Board, an independent quasijudicial body. There had been significant delays in the resolution of this application due to numerous procedural issues raised by both the applicant union and the employer, but the counting of the ballots was now expected to proceed. As to the exclusion, in some jurisdictions, of groups such as members of the medical, dental, architectural, legal and engineering professions, principals and vice-principals from industrial relations legislation, the speaker stressed that these groups were entitled to join associations of their own choosing for the defence of their professional interests. In relation to domestic workers, the New Brunswick Government wished to inform the Committee that it continued discussions regarding potential amendments to the Industrial Relations Act to remove or modify the exclusion of domestic workers. Further information would be provided to the Committee of Experts in the next report. The Government of Saskatchewan indicated that, in the context of its review of labour legislation, the definition of “employee” had been clarified and a new definition of “supervisory employee” had been added confirming their right to organize for collective bargaining, in bargaining units separate from the employees they supervised. Furthermore, in relation to Saskatchewan Bills 5 and 6, the Public Service Essential Service Act, the speaker informed that the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal had found, in a decision dated 26 April 2013, that both acts were constitutionally valid. A copy of the decision would be provided with the Government’s next report. The Committee of Experts had also identified a number of legislative provisions which it considered to be inconsistent with the Convention. However, the social partners at the national level had not raised concerns about these longstanding provisions. The Government representative cited the following examples: (i) the legislation in Nova Scotia, Ontario and Prince Edward Island which designated individual trade unions as bargaining agents; (ii) the current system of binding arbitration under the Manitoba Public Schools Act; and (iii) section 87.1 of Manitoba’s Labour Relations Act which permitted the independent panel of arbitrators to modify the exclusion of bargaining agents by the Labour Board at the request of one party after 60 days of a work stoppage (it should be noted that section 87.4 of the Act required that the Labour Management Review Committee review the operation of this section every two years and provide a report to the minister on its findings; the next review would be conducted in 2013). The Government recognized that the Canadian labour relations system was not perfect, and that work remained to be done to address a number of inconsistencies with respect to the Convention, as evidenced by legislation in all Canadian jurisdictions that recognized freedom of association and included measures to protect the exercise of the right to organize. However, her Government had formulated in 2012 and of the discussion on the mandate of the Committee of Experts and the link between freedom of association and the right to strike. Recalling the provisions of the Convention, they stressed that freedom of association was a human right and a precondition for healthy collective bargaining and social dialogue that benefited employers, workers and social peace. The Conference Committee and the CFA contributed to resolving difficulties in applying this fundamental right in countries all over the world, including Canada. The Worker members highlighted the complexity of Canada’s legislation on trade union rights and referred to the resolution of the Committee of Experts’ in-depth analysis in its comment. In many provinces, the right to organize was still hampered as regards many groups of workers, especially agricultural workers in Ontario and Alberta, and domestic workers who were denied any legal trade union protection in Ontario, Nova Scotia, Alberta and Saskatchewan. Depending on the province, liberal professions might or might not be allowed to organize. There were also obstacles to freedom of association in the teaching profession in several provinces. In Ontario and Nova Scotia and in Prince Edward Island (as far as the civil service was concerned), only one union was recognized as being entitled to engage in collective bargaining. In Saskatchewan, the membership threshold for accreditation as a trade union was 45 per cent of the workforce. As to the right of trade unions to organize their activities, the Worker members cited the restrictions that several provinces placed on the education sector (British Columbia, Manitoba and soon Ontario) and on the health sector (a ban on collective action in Alberta). Moreover, in Manitoba, arbitration could be imposed unilaterally by one of the parties to the negotiations, while in Quebec the application of collective agreements could be imposed, thereby putting an end to the negotiations. The Worker members emphasized that trade union rights were more and more frequently being violated in Canada and that the provincial authorities appeared to be in no hurry to apply the Convention.

The Worker member of Canada observed that many of the Committee of Experts’ comments were a near repetition from previous reports, thus indicating that little progress had been achieved in improving legislation or practice. This year, the Committee of Experts had requested the Government to respond to allegations that violations of freedom of association had become the norm in Canada. In this regard, the speaker denounced the slowness of provincial authorities in giving effect to the Committee of Experts’ recommendations, which was illustrated by the long-standing comments relating to the exclusion in law and practice from the right to organize of domestic workers, architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers, engineers and doctors. While some provincial governments had corrected this shortcoming, huge gaps still remained. She highlighted the slow pace of progress for domestic workers not only in Alberta and Ontario but in all provinces, as well as the situation of agriculture and horticulture workers in Alberta and Ontario, despite the decision of an Ontario court ruling that the AEPA recognized the right of agricultural employees to form or join employees’ associations. Nurse practitioners in Alberta still did not have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. She also denounced slowness to act with regard to education workers in Alberta and teachers in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Ontario. The speaker further expressed concern about a questionable strategy by the Ontario Government in relation to the certification of part-time academic and support staff and the false argument made by the provincial Government that its decision not to interfere in the resolution of the case was shared by the National Union of Public and General Employees. She also expressed concern about the deteriorating circumstances in terms of negotiation process and abuses in defining the term “essential services” in the public sector, including in the education and health sectors of Alberta, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Quebec. The speaker further denounced the fact... that the federal Government had spearheaded attacks on collective bargaining by threatening or legislating workers back to work from a strike, although the Government had recognized the right to strike in other forums, such as in its trade agreement with Costa Rica, where this right was explicitly referred to. She expressed concerns about Bill C-525 amending the certification and decertification processes of a bargaining agent in the federally regulated jurisdiction by making it harder to win representation and easier to decertify bargaining agents, and a proposal to eliminate the dues check-off system in Canada, known as the Rand Formula, which was a fundamental component of the Canadian labour relations system.

The Employer member of Canada agreed substantially with the observations of the Government representative. Labour legislation in all ten Canadian provinces and the federal jurisdiction were highly detailed and directed towards ensuring an equality of bargaining power between employers and unions, and the promotion of voluntary negotiations and freely negotiated collective agreements. This legislation provided both parties with certain rights and obligations in the collective bargaining process, government support for collective bargaining including comprehensive conciliation, mediation and facilitation services, and strong protection against unfair practices. Notably, an important feature of this system was a prohibition on strike and lockout activity during the term of a collective agreement, and until certain stages of the collective bargaining process had been reached. The Canadian labour relations system also provided for extremely comprehensive quasi-judicial dispute resolution processes including compulsory arbitration of grievances regarding the interpretation of collective agreements, tripartite labour relations boards to interpret and adjudicate disputes under the labour relations acts and, if necessary, access to the judicial system. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms required that employee associations or unions be able to participate in a meaningful workplace dialogue with their employer, which included the right to make collective representations to the employer and to have those representations considered by the employer in good faith. The Supreme Court had determined that section 2(d) of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms required that employee associations (including unions) be able to participate in a meaningful workplace dialogue with their employer, which included the right to make collective representations to the employer and to have those representations considered by the employer in good faith. The Supreme Court had further stated that only legislation that made good faith resolution of workplace issues between employers and their employees effectively impossible would be found to violate freedom of association. Moreover, the Supreme Court had rejected the argument that freedom of association guaranteed employees access to a particular model of labour relations, or access to specific dispute resolution mechanisms of their choice. Rather, freedom of association guaranteed employees a process of meaningful consultation and negotiation with their employer.

The Worker member of Germany stated that consideration should also be given by the Committee to the following developments and circumstances prevailing both in Germany and Canada since several years, which impacted negatively on the exercise of freedom of association and the right to strike: high levels of unemployment, increase in precarious employment and low-paid jobs, growing number of fixed-term contracts, increase in temporary agency work, privatization of the health sector, etc. These factors had resulted in a considerable and ever increasing number of employees who were no longer able to survive on their wages and thus depended on social security benefits (“working poor”). This bitter reality substantially undermined the ability of employees to negotiate terms and conditions of employment; if state interference was significant but occurred alongside a process of good faith consultation that reflected the principles of voluntary collective bargaining, it was unlikely that the protection for freedom of association would be violated. In its 2011 Fraser decision, the Supreme Court had clarified the scope of the constitutional protection for freedom of association in the labour relations context. In particular, the Supreme Court had determined that section 2(d) of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms required that employee associations (including unions) be able to participate in a meaningful workplace dialogue with their employer, which included the right to make collective representations to the employer and to have those representations considered by the employer in good faith. The Supreme Court had further stated that only legislation that made good faith resolution of workplace issues between employers and their employees effectively impossible would be found to violate freedom of association. Moreover, the Supreme Court had rejected the argument that freedom of association guaranteed employees access to a particular model of labour relations, or access to specific dispute resolution mechanisms of their choice. Rather, freedom of association guaranteed employees a process of meaningful consultation and negotiation with their employer.

FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION AND PROTECTION OF THE RIGHT TO ORGANISE CONVENTION, 1948 (NO. 87)

collective bargaining rights of public sector workers. Collective bargaining was deteriorating as the Government was attacking the negotiation process directly, restricting the terms for organizing workers, or changing the use of the term “essential services” to restrict workers or unions from striking. It was troubling to find so many examples where the exercise of the right to strike had been restricted in the country, especially at the federal level. It was also worrisome that some countries, such as Canada, where Nigeria’s public service had drawn inspiration to improve the lives of its citizens and communities through promotional service delivery, were considerably demoting these gains, in spite of the economic difficulties faced by their citizens.

The Worker member of the United States declared that her union, United Steelworkers, represented workers in the United States and Canada. She was troubled to learn that some legislators in Canada wanted to abolish the “Rand formula”, or the dues check-off system. Legislative changes would seek to weaken unions by making it harder for them to sustain themselves financially. Politicians trying to eliminate the right to bargain a dues check-off provision claimed that doing so would create jobs and boost productivity. However, some legislators in the United States were pushing similar laws prohibiting union security clauses in some states. Studies had concluded that these laws had no significant impact on job creation whatsoever. States with these laws, such as North Carolina, Mississippi, South Carolina and Nevada, had some of the highest unemployment rates in the country, as well as the lowest rates of unionization. However, states like Vermont and Hawaii, permitting workers to negotiate union security clauses, had some of the lowest unemployment rates in the United States. She also underlined that American workers in states without union security clauses made less money than those living in states that permit these clauses. She expressed the hope that the Government would comply fully with the Convention and preserve the dues check-off system.

The Worker member of the Netherlands underlined that violations of trade union rights were widespread in the country and affected a diverse group of workers, in both the private and public sector, including domestic workers, architects, lawyers, doctors, agricultural workers and educational workers. Despite the specific federal governance structure of the country, it appeared that federal and provincial authorities were blaming each other, while justifying and continuing serious violations of trade union rights. The provincial government had been slow to implement the Convention, and the federal Government had not been proactive in ensuring that these provincial governments fully guaranteed the rights of workers to organize freely and to benefit from the necessary protection of their rights. Respect for fundamental labour standards, including the Convention, at all levels of government was particularly important in light of ongoing negotiations between the Government and the European Union (EU) on economic and trade cooperation. All parties to any agreement in this regard should commit to the full and effective implementation of the core labour standards of the ILO, including those related to freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining.

The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran recalled that freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining were human rights and were principles at the core of the ILO mandate. He stated that an increasing number of violations of freedom of association took place in Canada and had become the norm for the federal Government. He called on the Government to uphold its international obligations, including those related to freedom of association. He mentioned other issues which were considered not relevant as regards the application of the Convention in Canada by the Chairperson of the Conference Committee, following a point of order raised by the Employer and Worker members.

The Worker member of Colombia considered it unacceptable that the Government of a developed country was preventing the free exercise of freedom of association on the basis of arguments that were outdated in the context of the world’s working class, and especially to the working class in the developing world. Freedom of association must be ensured by all countries, even those that took refuge in not having ratified the Convention. Attempting to justify failure to comply fully with the Convention on the grounds of the type of activities that workers carried out was unacceptable. The ILO itself recognized, in a number of instruments, that workers in rural areas were an integral part of the working class, and this applied equally to health, education and other workers. He emphasized that it did not make sense for the Government to invoke a voluntary agreement of 1956 to maintain that workers had renounced the exercise of the right to strike, as that would invalidate 57 years of concessions. As the economy had become globalized, so had rights, and he therefore demanded equal rights for all.

The Government member of Canada indicated that the report and the conclusions of the Conference Committee would be brought to the attention of the federal, provincial and territorial governments. The Government remained committed to full cooperation with the ILO and the supervisory system, and would continue to welcome technical assistance and advice from the International Labour Standards Department on the application of Convention No. 87 and other Conventions. Acknowledging that the Committee of Experts had identified a number of areas that were not, in its view, in strict conformity with the Convention, the speaker highlighted that these anomalies existed in a broad labour relations and human rights system that supported the right to organize, and supported independent workers’ and employers’ organizations. Turning to the legislation in Manitoba, which permitted the imposition of binding arbitration by the Labour Board at the request of one party after 60 days of work stoppage, the speaker underlined that the only requests made in this regard had been from trade unions. In addition, no government in Canada had adopted any legislation which sought to revoke the “Rand formula”. When a proposition in this respect had been made by an opposition party in one province, it had been rejected by the provincial government. The Government would provide further information in response to the Committee of Experts’ observation in its report due in September 2013.

The Employer members acknowledged that, due to the unique federal system in the country, it would be difficult for the federal Government to make demands on the provincial governments regarding compliance with the Convention. It appeared that the Government was doing what was necessary with regard to the application of the Convention. The conclusions of the Conference Committee should focus only on issues raised by the Committee of Experts relating to Canada’s application of the Convention, and not to issues raised by the Committee on Freedom of Association or relating to other Conventions. The Employer members welcomed the Government’s indication that it was interested in ILO technical assistance.

The Worker members indicated that the situation of trade union rights in Canada had further deteriorated. They called on the Government to do everything it could to persuade the provincial authorities to bring their legislation into line with the Convention. They also requested that a list be made of the laws and regulations that needed to be reviewed in light of the Convention.
Conclusions

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government representative and the discussion that followed. It noted that the Committee has examined a number of discrepancies between the law and practice in various provinces, on the one hand, and the Convention, on the other. The Committee noted that the issues that were pending relating in particular to the exclusion of a variety of workers from the coverage of the labour relations legislation in a number of provinces.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative that, while it was true that not all workers in Canadian jurisdictions were covered by industrial relations legislation, they were entitled to join associations of their own choosing. In addition, the Government once again stressed that some inconsistencies raised by the Committee of Experts had not given rise to concerns at the national level. The Government representative referred to initiatives and mechanisms designed to bring the provincial and territorial governments and the social partners together to address ILO and international labour issues and promote implementation of its international obligations. The Committee further noted the Government’s indication that resources for its Preventive Mediation Program were increased in 2011. As for the provinces, the Committee noted with interest the rejection of the Ontario Bill 115, which imposed contract settlements; the Government of New Brunswick’s indication that it is discussing potential amendments to remove or modify the exclusion of domestic workers from the coverage of the Industrial Relations Act; and the clarification in Saskatchewan labour legislation of the definition of “employee” and the addition of “supervisory employee”.

The Committee did not address the right to strike in this case as the employers do not agree that there is a right to strike recognized in Convention No. 87.

The Committee recalled that certain legislative texts needed to be amended in some provinces with a view to guaranteeing the full application of the Convention. In particular, it stressed the importance of ensuring to all workers, without distinction whatsoever, the right to form and join the organization of their own choosing. It asked the Government to pursue its efforts to bring these matters to the attention of the provincial authorities and expressed the firm expectation that appropriate solutions in conformity with the Convention would be found in the near future in full consultation with the social partners concerned. The Committee requested the Government to provide detailed information in its next report to the Committee of Experts on the measures adopted in this connection.

EGYPT (ratification: 1957)

The Government provided the following written information.

With reference to the issuance of the Declaration on Freedom of Association following the 25 January Revolution in 2011, the Government states that it is committed to ensuring conformity with international labour standards relating to freedom of association. To this end, efforts have been made and numerous measures have been taken to deal with the issues raised in the area of freedom of association. In particular, the Government wishes to highlight the following. Egypt hosted in Cairo, in collaboration with the ILO, the workshop on the “Perspectives of Freedom of Association” on 9 April 2013 and numerous societal dialogue sessions, which resulted in a broad agreement to establish a national committee entrusted with the comprehensive review of all relevant labour legislation. The Ministry of Manpower and Immigration extended an invitation to all relevant stakeholders to be part of this national committee, including representatives of workers, independent unions, the Egyptian Trade Union Federation (ETUF), employers, relevant government entities, the Ministry of Justice, the Shura Council and civil society organizations. The national committee held ten sessions and issued a final recommendation to repeal Trade Union Act No. 35 of 1976 and replace it with the new draft law that had previously been proposed. The latter was passed during the last session of the dissolved Parliament, as amended, to take into consideration the comments of the ILO Committee of Experts as well as other relevant international labour Conventions ratified by Egypt. After the national committee discussed and reviewed each section of the new draft law, the latter was submitted to the Council of Ministers, which approved it on 29 May 2013. The draft law was then submitted to the Shura Council, currently in charge of legislation, for discussion and approval. The current trade union session that was supposed to end by 27 May 2013 was extended for one year or until the promulgation of the new law by the Shura Council, whichever is earlier. This action was taken to avoid having a gap and allow for a comprehensive discussion of the new law on freedom of association. The representatives of the newly formed independent unions have been able to freely participate in various ILO conferences and meetings in various venues and settings and conferences, including in the International Labour Conference in 2011, 2012 and in the current 102nd Session of the ILC.

In addition, before the committee a Government representative expressed his Government’s astonishment at the Committee of Experts’ observation on the absence of legislation on trade unions ensuring their independence and freedom in Egypt while the new Constitution provided for such guarantees in its article 53. Furthermore, the authorities could not dissolve unions, federations and cooperatives, or dissolve their executive boards unless it was by virtue of a court order.

Turning to the challenges in implementing the Convention, he emphasized the need to have a clear understanding of the general social and political context in Egypt if comprehensive and balanced conclusions were to be reached. Egypt had witnessed a revolution on 25 January 2011 against a regime which for many years had flouted the rights of Egyptians, including workers. While the phase of political transition provided a valuable opportunity for society, it also posed important challenges. The most important was the absence of elected legislative institutions for consecutive periods in addition to their dissolution by virtue of judicial decisions issued by the Constitutional Court. Consequently, Egypt has been delayed in completing the comprehensive review of all its legislation in order to bring it into conformity with the new Constitution.

In addition to the written information by the Government on some of the measures taken to ensure the observance of the Convention, including the new draft law on freedom of association, he indicated that the Government had regularly informed the ILO of the developments in the process so as to benefit from its technical expertise. Although the Manpower and Migration Committee at Parliament, had finished the discussion of the draft law, a court order had dissolved Parliament, which had delayed promulgation of the law. However, the delay did not mean that there was no freedom of association and trade union pluralism in Egypt. By virtue of the Declaration on Freedom of Association issued in March 2011, there were 13 independent general federations and 1,228 branch trade union committees which worked in all freedom and independence without any interference from the State. The Committee of Experts had also expressed its satisfaction with respect to some measures taken by Egypt on Convention No. 87, and had emphasized the role of technical assistance in that regard.
With respect to the impact of the delay in the promulgation of the draft law on freedom of association, he drew the attention of the Committee to the fact that the Egyptian delegation participating in the present Conference was composed of six independent general federations, which was a new development in the history of Egyptian trade union movement in international conferences. Reflecting on the aim of freedom of association, he considered that if the aim was to guarantee such freedom, Egypt’s new Constitution provided more guarantees than any other law. If the aim was to regulate trade union work, this had already been discussed with the participation of all parties, as well as the ILO. It had also been approved by the Council of Ministers, and was currently before the Shura Council. If the aim was to verify practice, the speaker invited the Conference Committee to address the six federations present at the Conference. Egypt had exerted unremitting efforts to meet its legal obligations under international labour Conventions including Convention No. 87. His country had therefore expected a vote of confidence and encouragement from the ILO so as to continue on the right track and he expressed his Government’s deep disappointment at the outcome in the list of individual cases. This could only be due to a lack of accurate information and an erroneous appreciation in the examination of the case of Egypt, and he referred the Conference Committee members to the written information provided by his Government which included information that was absent in the Committee of Experts’ report.

He reiterated his Government’s request to reform the work of the Conference Committee to guarantee transparency, objectivity, a geographical balance on the annual list of cases, and to avoid it being turned into a means of retribution against countries which had a sincere will to move ahead on the path of reform for the sake of protecting and promoting workers’ rights. In light of the above, he called upon the Conference Committee to consider removing Egypt from the list of individual cases and to consider it in future as a case of progress.

The Employer members noted that this case had last been discussed in 2010 and it was necessary to take into account the context of the country. The new Parliament was yet to be elected and the election was scheduled for later in 2013. He recalled that this case was initiated by observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), rather than a national trade union, and related to: (i) the predominance of the Egyptian Trade Union Federation (ETUF); (ii) the imprisonment of Kamal Abbas, a representative of the Centre for Trade Union and Worker Services; and (iii) provisions of Trade Union Act No. 35 of 1976 and the Labour Code concerning the single integrated trade union system, controls over subsidiary unions, and restrictions to the exercise of the right to strike and recourse to compulsory arbitration.

The Employer members noted that the Government had taken steps including the drafting of a new comprehensive Labour Code for consideration by Parliament to be elected, and that this law addressed the issues raised by the ITUC. Even without the passage of the draft Code, unions, including unions not affiliated to the ETUF, had begun to proliferate in the country and the Employer members therefore tend to agree that the Government was not exercising control over unions. With respect to restrictions on trade union rights in the existing legislation, which was the subject of this case, the Employer members considered that these did not appear to be operating in practice. The recent proliferation of unions had generated considerable confusion and many unions, especially the new ones, did not understand their obligations; strikes, which were unlawful in many jurisdictions, were apparently common practice. This did not enhance harmonious workplaces and undermined the stability of a properly functioning labour relations environment. The interim Government should ensure that such activities were addressed quickly, effectively and specifically by national laws and regulations. The Employer members reiterated the view that guidance on the right to strike could not be derived from Convention No. 87. With respect to the alleged unjustified treatment of union officials, they noted that the case of Mr Abbas had been taken by the ETUF itself, and considered that his release by the court showed that justice prevailed. With respect to the delays in the enactment of the draft Code, the Employer members considered that the argument that it had to wait for the election of the new Parliament might be seen as excuses for inaction. They therefore urged the interim Government to at least examine the draft Code on its full compliance with international treaty obligations. The interim Government should also strengthen its efforts towards early implementation of laws which complied with and gave practical effect to the Convention.

Lastly, the Employer members reiterated the view that this case seemed to have been taken out of context. The current practice of unions demonstrated little or no restrictions on freedom of association and might affect overall law and order, which was not what the freedom of association was about. Therefore the draft Code should be processed without delay and the Employer members agreed with the Committee of Experts that draft laws should be submitted to the social partners for a better evaluation of the situation. If the new legislation reflected the text and spirit of the Convention, the Employer members should indeed be able to regard it as a case of progress.

The Worker members, taking account of the comments of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) of 29 August 2012, the discussions of the previous week on the mandate of the Committee of Experts and the link between freedom of association and the right to strike, wished to recall that Convention No. 87 enshrined the right of workers and employers to establish and to join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. Workers’ and employers’ organizations organized freely and could not be dissolved or suspended by an administrative authority. Freedom of association was a human right and was the prerequisite for sound collective bargaining and social dialogue for the benefit of employers, workers and social peace. Together, the Conference Committee and the Committee on Freedom of Association contributed to the enforcement of the right to strike and international treaties. The Employer members expressed their appreciation of the work of the Conference Committee and the Worker members of the Committee of Experts for the cooperation and a constructive application of that fundamental right worldwide. The Worker members also wished to emphasize that they wholeheartedly supported the Committee of Experts and the legal significance of their observations. The Worker members maintained that the existence of the right to strike derived from reading Article 3 in conjunction with Article 10 of the Convention.

The Worker members recalled that, time and again, most recently in 2010, the Conference Committee had called into question Trade Union Act No. 35 of 1976 for the following reasons: the institutionalization of a single trade union system; the control over trade union organizations and over the nomination and election procedures to their executive committees; the control over their financial management; the requirement of the prior approval for any strike action; and lastly, the possibility of dismissing, without justification, workers who acted outside the existing union structure. They emphasized the extent to which the Egyptian trade union landscape had developed. While the ETUF continued to be the dominant trade union, other federations had emerged and, between 2004 and 2011, had mobilized some 1.7 million workers in collective action.
The Worker members stressed, however, that the country’s legislation had not kept pace with developments in trade unions and in society, and the ETUF seemed to have retained the benefit of the State monopoly. That was, in any case, what could be inferred from the new Constitution that had been adopted at the end of the previous year. Article 127 of the new Constitution protected employers’ rights better than those of workers, given that the provisions concerning workers were not binding on either employers or the State. Those developments were at odds with the Government’s stated intentions, contained in its “Freedom of Association Declaration” of March 2011, to observe all ratified Conventions. Moreover, there had been a delay in adopting the new freedom of association law owing to successive political hitches. Recently, however, the process had resumed with the organization of a workshop on freedom of association in collaboration with the ILO, followed by the setting up of a national committee to review all the relevant legislation. According to the Government’s statements, the committee had already begun its work with an agreement to replace Trade Union Act No. 35 with a new legal instrument. A draft law had been prepared and amended to take account of the observations of the Committee of Experts and, once it had been approved by the Council of Ministers, it would be submitted to the Shura Council, which was in charge of legislative issues. The Worker members looked forward to a successful conclusion to that matter.

A Worker member of Egypt informed the Conference Committee that the ETUF had suffered, since the election of its new executive committee in November 2011, several instances of interference from the public authorities based on the Trade Union Act. The Government had withheld the elections of the executive committees of more than 500 trade union organizations established by the ETUF at undertakings in the past two years. Recalling that the Trade Union Act also imposed a restriction on the right of trade union organizations to formulate their basic statutes and financial regulations, the speaker further expressed his refusal of any form of Government interference and any administrative oversight over trade union organizations or the monopoly by any political party or religious faction of the trade union movement.

At present, the ETUF was exerting pressure on the Government so as to finalize the new draft law on freedom of association before sending it to the ILO in order to ensure compliance with the Trade Union Act. The ETUF’s entire labour legislation. The Government of Algeria congratulated Egypt on its inclusive approach, which was an outcome of a tripartite social dialogue led by the Ministry of Manpower and Migration. The conference organized by the Government in partnership with the ILO definitely indicated the positive intent of the Government to comply with the Convention. In particular, after several successive political hitches, the present session of the Conference, which was an unprecedented situation. He added that freedoms, especially those of expression and association, naturally had to be respected, but that did not rule out the possibility of all stakeholders endeavouring to support the economy. Laws had to be observed and laws in turn needed to respect the rights of citizens.

The Employer member declared that it would have been judicious to show more patience towards Egypt, not only for the reasons set out above but also because of the difficult economic circumstances experienced by the country. Some parts of the Committee of Experts’ comments were concerned with minor issues which might be better resolved at local level. Finally, he asked that Egypt should be able to avail itself of more extensive technical cooperation programmes for the benefit of all parties.

The Government member of India congratulated Egypt on its inclusive approach, which was an outcome of a tripartite social dialogue led by the Ministry of Manpower and Migration. The conference organized by the Government in partnership with the ILO definitely indicated the positive intent of the Government to comply with the Convention. In particular, after several successive political hitches, the present session of the Conference, which was an unprecedented situation. He added that freedoms, especially those of expression and association, naturally had to be respected, but that did not rule out the possibility of all stakeholders endeavouring to support the economy. Laws had to be observed and laws in turn needed to respect the rights of citizens.

and strikes would never have arisen. The speaker de- spaired at the thought that the next legislative assembly might produce no results and that the adoption of the Code might be further postponed. He said that he had been imprisoned for three years because of his trade union activities. Trade unionism in the country operated in a climate of brutality and harassment, against which the Labour Code would provide protection.

Another Worker member of Egypt stated that his Federa- tion represented more than 3 million Egyptian agricultural workers and asked the ILO to be more accurate in re- cording the number of members belonging to the coun- try’s various trade unions. He asked for a clear strategy to be adopted leading to the rapid adoption of a new Labour Code and urged all the tripartite partners to cooperate fully to that end.

The Government member of Uzbekistan commended the Government on the many measures taken to implement the Convention. Many trade unions had been set up to protect different types of workers and the presence of six trade unions in this Conference Committee showed that the Government was committed to the application of the Convention. Many bills had been drafted concerning free- dom of association, and there were tripartite consultations in the process. The Government was trying to eliminate obstacles to the activities of the independent trade unions and was taking targeted measures to implement the Conven- tion.

An observer representing the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), considered that the practice of so- cial dialogue by the Government was merely a tactic, as demonstrated by the lack of consultation concerning the draft Labour Code. He referred to cases of abuse commit- ted against trade union leaders and indicated that during the course of the year, workers demonstrating peacefully had been the subject of violent attacks, in some cases by the police, and in others, by employers; 15 workers had been arrested at Petrojet and 11 had been suspended. He said that the Trade Union Act No. 35 should be brought into line with the Convention, that the Labour Code should be adopted and that the Government should stop interfering in trade union affairs.

The Government member of Libya considered that the high number of ratifications of ILO Conventions by Egypt and the reports submitted on their application, clearly attested to its goodwill in observing these instruments, and to its efforts in reflecting the provisions of the Conven- tion in its national legislation. Recalling that Egypt had undergone a period of change in its political system, he requested that the International Labour Office provide its technical assistance to assist the country in the prepara- tion of the required replies to the Committee of Experts’ comments on some of the ratified Conventions.

The Worker member of Tunisia regretted that the new regime in Egypt had only changed in appearance but, in reality, continued to use the same methods of repression and harassment against the trade union movement. Faced with an unprecedented 3,817 protest actions in 2012, the Government resorted to the same abusive practices, such as dismissals, arrests, physical violence, threats and salary deductions instead of changing the economic and social policies that were at the origin of the unrest. The speaker noted that ever since the Convention had been ratified in 1957, successive labour laws failed to give full effect to the principle of freedom of association and recognized instead the Government’s prerogative to interfere in union activities and control union funding. The Trade Union Act No. 35 of 1976 was still in force while the right to strike, which was expressly recognized in the Labour Code of 2003, was rendered ineffective, especially after the adopt- tion of Act No. 96 of 2012 on the protection of the revolu- tion. The speaker welcomed the workshop organized on 9 April 2013 on freedom of association issues and the ap- proval of the draft freedom of association law by the Council of Ministers on 29 May 2013, and expressed the hope that the Government would put an end to all forms of abuse against trade unions and their members.

The Worker member of Libya stated that union elections could not take place without not only trade unions, courts and the Labour Code which allowed for Government interference in union ac- tivities and was therefore contrary to the provisions of the Convention. He questioned the Government’s goodwill and declared readiness to ensure trade union rights and observed that the situation was, in fact, worsening. There were four times more strikes and protest actions than at the time of the Mubarak regime. He asked why it had so far not been possible for unions to hold elections or adopt their own by-laws if there was a free and independent trade union movement, as the Government claimed. Moreover, it was difficult to understand the reason for extending the mandate of the Shura Council, which should have normally ended in 2010. He wondered how was it possible for the Government to organize presiden- tial and parliamentary elections and then claim that it was not possible to organize union elections. The Government should stop patronizing trade unions and should establish the appropriate framework in order to ensure compliance with the Convention.

The Government member of Turkey welcomed the Gov- ernment’s efforts to adopt a new draft law on freedom of association and stated that the process of adoption was based on social dialogue which demonstrated the Gov- ernment’s commitment to tripartism. The speaker appreci- ated the establishment of hundreds of new independent trade unions and committees, and the participation of trade unions and confederations at regional and interna- tional levels, which was a clear sign of the exercise of freedom of association rights. He had no doubt that the Government had brought a new era of democracy to the country and that it would intensify its efforts to reach full compliance with international labour standards.

The Worker member of Italy, speaking also on behalf of the Worker members of Belgium, France, Germany, Greece, the Netherlands, Poland, Romania, Slovakia, Spain and the Nordic countries, expressed deep concern about the violations of the Convention in Egypt. She indi- cated that, despite promises that the Trade Union Act and the Labour Code would be aligned with the requirements of the Convention and that the right to establish trade union organizations would be recognized and protected, the Government had made no progress in addressing the re- peated observations of the Committee of Experts. Serious efforts were needed to guarantee freedom of association and the establishment of independent trade unions as es- sential elements of a democratic society, but the Govern- ment had approved instead, in August 2012, a new emer- gency law which restricted civil liberties and reintroduced military courts under the pretext of combating violence.

The speaker drew attention to article 52 of the new Con- stitution, which destroyed trade union rights, allowed only one union per sector and gave sweeping powers to the Government to control union activity and even the right to dissolve trade unions. In addition, provisions which would have supported women’s rights had been struck out of the Constitution. None of the 234 articles of the Constitu- tion clearly guaranteed women’s rights and gender equality while provisions against child labour and forced labour were so vague that they were virtually meaning- less. Moreover, judicial decisions, such as the Cairo Criminal Court decision of 4 June 2013, by which 43 workers had been convicted, further attested to a system where the freedom of association was denied and re- pressed. The Government needed to move quickly to address these basic concerns of the Egyptian workers and the international community.

The Government member of Sri Lanka echoed statements of previous speakers that Egypt was in a transition period and faced a number of challenges. It was important to understand the nature and depth of the political and social transformation Egypt was going through. The Government had taken a number of measures to improve compliance with its obligations under the Convention, including the new draft freedom of association law that had been formulated through lengthy tripartite social dialogue, with ILO support, and had been submitted for parliamentary approval. This was a good example of the commitment and willingness to implement freedom of association in law and in practice. The ILO should continue to provide technical assistance and capacity building by addressing the real needs of Egypt and should allow more time for the problem to be addressed effectively.

The Worker member of Belarus expressed support for the Egyptian workers and noted that the Government had called upon all trade unions and employers’ organizations to be involved in the discussions on the draft freedom of association law. This legislative development constituted a positive step for promoting the principles of freedom and justice. The Committee of Experts should be satisfied with the measures taken by the Government regarding the application of the Convention and ILO technical assistance would be helpful to this effect.

The Government member of Bahrain stated that he was conscious that the Government was facing huge challenges, which was common in countries going through historical changes. Nevertheless, the Government had carried out all of the steps in its power to fully implement the provisions of the Convention. Egypt had an ancient history in trade union freedoms and stood out as a model for other countries in the region. His Government called upon the Committee to take into consideration all of the positive efforts made so far and the challenges that Egypt was currently facing and hoped that the conclusions would objectively reflect the situation.

The Worker member of Benin expressed his support for the Egyptian workers, who were fighting to improve their working and living conditions and to uphold their trade union rights. The Government was in control of the police force and was preventing the workers from exercising their rights, particularly the right to strike, which was, however, inalienable. Likewise, it was unacceptable that the Government was interfering in the internal affairs of trade unions. The Committee had to remain attentive and ensure that the Government honoured its commitments, applied the Convention fully and handled complaints submitted by trade unions with due diligence.

Another observer representing the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) said that trade unions which had fought the old regime were facing repression and some of their members had been imprisoned. The Government did not seem to have drawn lessons from the past, or understood that economic development was not possible without freedom. Egypt had to develop and set an example of a democratic society. The speaker requested an end to the repression of the union movement and employer interference in union affairs. Trade unions should be able to work with elected representatives of the employers, collective agreements should be respected and the single trade union system provided for in the Constitution should be discontinued.

The Government member of Senegal welcomed the steps taken by the Government during a period of transition marked by profound political, economic and social changes in the country. Certain achievements already stood out: the pursuit of social dialogue, to which the broader tripartite consultation attested; the inclusive negotiations underlying the new legislation, which the Government stated would comply with ILO standards; and the progress noted by the Committee of Experts, such as the repeal of the provisional law on protests and striking on worksites. The social partners should be encouraged to pursue untiringly their efforts to ensure that social standards were respected and the Government should be urged to pursue its efforts to comply fully with the Convention.

A Worker member of Bahrain stated on behalf of the Bahrain Free Labour Unions Federation (BFLUF) that it was not fair to have included Egypt on the list of cases. The Government had returned authority to the hands of the people and the elected officials needed more time to achieve results. Social dialogue led by the Government had resulted in new draft legislation which had been referred to the Council of Ministers for adoption. As for the union movement, it had proved its maturity in adopting, in April 2013, a declaration by which the Egyptian Trade Union Federation (ETUF) reached out to international trade union confederations for enhanced cooperation and confirmed that all restrictions on each organization had been lifted. Concerning the allegations of Government-controlled unions, simply because they were not affiliated with the ITUC, the Government should not be criticized on that basis. The Committee should stand clear of this controversy and should not use the discussion of the case to exert pressure on non-affiliated unions.

The Government member of South Sudan stated that it was important for workers to better understand the current situation, which required working collectively for the adoption of the new legislation on freedom of association rather than disregarding all efforts that were being made. For its part, the Government should remain open to peaceful dialogue and consider the comments of the Committee of Experts to ensure compliance with the provisions of the Convention. The ILO should continue to provide technical assistance and capacity building since Egypt was going through difficult times.

The Worker member of Sudan said that free trade unions had become a reality since the revolution of 25 January 2011. However, time was needed to permit consolidation and maturity of the new experiences while laws pertaining to union rights should be applied in accordance with social dialogue and the participation of all the parties concerned.

The Government member of Iraq recalled that the situation in Egypt was evolving fast and was very sensitive. The Government should be praised for its determination to meet all the challenges. There were objective indications that the Government was acting in full conformity with its constitutional obligations, including respect for the principle of freedom of association. Many meetings had been held culminating in the adoption of the “Freedom of Association Declaration” of March 2011, which recognized the freedom of establishing trade union organizations, and led to the setting up of numerous trade union organizations, committees and federations.

The Government representative thanked those who had participated in the discussion and noted that 13 of the 21 speakers were appreciative of the Government’s efforts and expressed their encouragement. In response to the statement of the Worker members, he clarified that article 53 of the Constitution, which they had relied on, dealt with occupational unions and the right to pursue a profession, whereas freedom of association was addressed only in article 52. Concerning some statements that alluded to emergency laws and military rule, the Government representative clarified that such misconceptions had nothing to do with present realities. His country had, for the first time, an elected civilian President. He emphasized the importance of having updated and correct in-
The Committee did not address the right to strike in this case as the employers do not agree that there is a right to strike recognized in Convention No. 87.

While regretting that many years have passed since the Government was asked to bring its law and practice into conformity with the Convention without any concrete results having been achieved, the Committee noted with interest the recent and positive steps taken by the Government in this regard. The Committee therefore expressed the firm expectation that a law ensuring full respect for the freedom of association rights of workers and of employers would be adopted in the very near future. It requested the Government to provide a copy of the draft that was before the Shura Council to the ILO and to ensure appropriate consultations with the social partners. The Committee expressed its firm expectation that, in the meantime and as the Government had committed, all trade unions in Egypt would be able to exercise their activities and elect their officers in full freedom in accordance with the Convention pending the adoption of the freedom of association law. It encouraged the Government to continue to have recourse to ILO technical assistance and capacity building for all the social partners. The Committee requested the Government to provide a detailed report to the Committee of Experts at its meeting this year and expected that it would be in a position to observe significant and concrete progress in the country to ensure respect for trade union rights both in law and in practice.

The Government representative stated that he had listened closely to the conclusions, but that his Government would communicate its comments in writing to the Chairperson of the Conference Committee and the Office, after giving them a careful reading.

Fiji (ratification: 2002)

The Government provided the following written information.

As regards transparent rules of governance, in March this year, the draft Constitution was released which guarantees universally accepted principles and values of equality and justice to all Fijians. Consultations were held and numerous submissions were received on the draft Constitution. After consideration of all the submissions and after making such improvements as necessary, the draft Constitution will be promulgated by August 2013. It contains an extensive chapter on fundamental human rights, which guarantees the promotion and protection of rights and freedoms of all Fijians including workers, and, for the first time in Fiji, there are provisions guaranteeing socio-economic rights. Under the draft Constitution elections must be held no later than 30 September 2014. The voting system adopted in the draft Constitution is the open-list system of proportional representation which will ensure that a truly free and fair parliamentary election is held in 2014. On 10 June 2013, an international coordinating committee comprising ambassadors and representatives from Australia, France, India, Indonesia, Japan, Republic of Korea, New Zealand, United Kingdom, and United States as well as representatives from the European Union, United Nations Development Programme and the Commonwealth Secretariat, has been convened in Fiji to discuss assistance for the elections. The coordinating committee will be responsible for organizing and coordinating member countries’ assistance for the 2014 elections. This partnership with the international community through the Coordinating Committee will help Fiji achieve an election that is conducted in a smooth, transparent and apolitical manner, using best international practices, unlike elections in the past.

With respect to labour reforms, notable reforms have been undertaken by the Government to preserve and create jobs, sustain industries essential to the economy, and improve the living standards of all Fijians. These include substantial reduction in income and corporate taxes for over 99 per cent of all Fijian workers and employer organizations. Labour laws are currently being reviewed by the tripartite partners to ensure conformity with ILO instruments ratified. A report of the tripartite body will be presented to the Minister of Labour later in 2013 to provide guidance on the workers' compensation scheme is also being reviewed with a view to implementing a no-fault compensation system. The Government has also established a national employment centre to generate employment.

The Government affirms that, concerning legal and institutional processes, in the area of trade union rights and civil liberties, there are adequate and effective institutional processes, in the area of trade union rights and employment centre to generate employment.

A no-fault workers' compensation scheme is also being reviewed with a view to implementing a no-fault compensation system. The Government has also established a national employment centre to generate employment.

As to freedom of association and movement, the Public Emergency Regulations were revoked in January 2012. All persons including trade unions, workers, political parties and civil society groups can meet in any public place without the need to obtain a permit.

In relation to fundamental principles and rights at work of government employees, the law guarantees the right to join trade unions and to judicially challenge any decision which adversely affects the employee, including termination of employment. Collective agreements have recently been concluded between the Government and public service unions with respect to government wage earners.

With regard to the Essential National Industries Decree, this Decree upholds the principles on freedom of association and collective bargaining. Workers in essential industries have the right to organize and form bargaining units of their choice, the right to independently elect their representatives, the right to collectively bargain, the right to strike and to devise their own dispute resolution processes. The Decree only applies to certain industries essential to the Fijian economy and does not cover the majority of the workers in Fiji that are not part of these industries. The Decree has been successfully implemented without any government interference. In one essential industry, workers have been able to negotiate salary increases of up to 25 per cent, guaranteed pay increases and also a share of the profits. In any event, the incoming Parliament in 2014 is empowered by the Draft Constitution to amend or repeal any existing laws, including the ones mentioned in the Report of the Committee of Experts.

In addition, before the Committee, a Government representative highlighted the substantial reforms that the Government was undertaking to create transparent rules of governance and a legal system that was based on substantive equality and justice. The speaker stated that the hallmark of these reforms was the publication of the draft Constitution which guaranteed universally accepted principles, including common and equal citizenship, prohibition of all forms of discrimination, a secular State, eradication of systemic corruption, protection and promotion of human rights, an independent judiciary, and a voting system based on one person, one vote, one value. Following the release of the draft Constitution in March 2013, all Fijians had been provided with the opportunity to make submissions in April and May. During this period, over 1,000 written submissions had been received by the Ministry of Labour and the ERAB. The public consultation forums had been held throughout Fiji. Following a thorough consideration of all submissions and after making such improvements as might be necessary, the draft Constitution would be promulgated by August 2013. It contained an extensive chapter on human rights, including provisions guaranteeing freedom from slavery, servitude, forced labour and human trafficking; freedom from cruel and degrading treatment; the right to executive and administrative justice; freedom of expression; freedom of assembly; freedom of association; the right to fair employment practices; the right to humane and proper working conditions; and the right of all workers to economic participation and to a just minimum wage. Discrimination on the basis of sex, pregnancy and marital status, among many other grounds, was prohibited, and all Fijian workers enjoyed socio-economic rights under the draft Constitution, including the rights to food and water, housing and sanitation, health, and social security schemes. The speaker added that Fiji was making substantial progress towards holding truly democratic and transparent parliamentary elections, which under the draft Constitution must be held before 30 September 2014. In July 2012, Fiji had commenced its electronic voter registration programme. Out of a total population of 900,000, more than 500,000 voters over the age of 18 years had been registered. In addition, the speaker referred to a number of significant labour reforms. For instance, the Government was working towards introducing a national minimum wage. The Government had also activated a tripartite process under the Employment Relations Advisory Board (ERAB) to review the existing labour laws. A report would be submitted by the ERAB later in 2013 to the Minister of Labour for consideration. The Government also considered making the necessary amendments to the labour law to ensure compliance with a large number of ILO instruments which Fiji had recently ratified.

The Government representative stated that, in light of the above constitutional and labour reforms, many of the issues raised in the Committee of Experts’ report did not reflect the correct legal and factual situation in Fiji. With respect to trade union rights and civil liberties, the Government had the necessary processes in place to ensure that the fundamental rights of all Fijians were adequately protected and enforced. All breaches of criminal law and public order were investigated and prosecuted in accordance with established legal procedures. All incidents of criminal offences were independently and thoroughly investigated upon the lodgement of a complaint with the police department. All criminal prosecutions were conducted by the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions without any interference. Ultimately, any criminal proceeding would be adjudicated upon by an independent judiciary. The speaker recalled that the Public Emergency Regulations (PER) had been revoked in January 2012. The Public Order Act, which had been enacted to nationally accepted and modern provisions to combat terrorism and other serious public order offences. All persons and entities were now able to associate, organize and meet in any public place without the need for a permit.

Indeed, trade unions, political parties and civil society groups had been regularly holding public meetings, and freely expressing their views in the media. All forms of media censorship had now been removed. As regards the media, the Public Service (Amendment) Decree of July 2011 expressly guaranteed the fundamental principles and rights at work of all Government employees, including their right to join trade unions. Public servants also had access to courts for judicial review of decisions against them, as recently decided by the High Court of Fiji. Concerning the Essential National Industries Decree (END), the speaker stated that the Decree was designed to create growth and ensure the long-term viability of essential industries, protect jobs, and at the same time safeguard the fundamental rights of workers. The Decree upheld the right of workers to form and join bargaining units of their choice, which could also be registered as a trade union, and the right to elect their own representatives who were empowered to bargain collectively. The Employer was obligated to recognize and bargain with these representatives. The Decree was comparable to similar laws in other countries. The Government was pleased to report that workers in essential industries had been able to freely organize, form bargaining units and elect representatives. They had reached collective agreements with employers and had devised their own dispute resolution processes. All this had been done without any Government or third party intervention.

The Government representative reaffirmed his Government’s strong commitment to not only promoting and safeguarding the rights of workers and employers in Fiji, but also to sustaining and creating employment and economic growth. Considering that it was important for the ILO to be fully aware of the actual facts and circumstances in Fiji, he was pleased to announce that the Prime Minister of Fiji had conveyed in May to the ILO Director-General that Fiji welcomed a visit of the ILO direct contacts mission. In light of the anticipated promulgation of the new Constitution, the need for further harmonization of national laws and the preparations of the 2014 parliamentary elections, the Government looked forward to receiving the mission in December 2013 upon the finalization of references. The mission was currently liaising with the Office to finalize the terms of reference, so as to ensure that they were acceptable to all parties.

The Worker members noted the comments which had been made by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) in 2012 and the discussions on the mandate of the Committee of Experts and the link between freedom of association and the right to strike which had taken place during the general discussion. After recalling the provisions of Convention No. 87, they emphasized that freedom of association was a human right and constituted a precondition for healthy collective bargaining and social dialogue for the benefit of employers, workers and social peace. This Committee and the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) contributed to resolving the difficulties surrounding the application of that fundamental right throughout the world. The Worker members also emphasized that they fully supported the Committee of Experts and the legal implications of its comments and also the existence of the right to strike as resulting from a combined reading of Articles 3 and 10 of Convention No. 87.

Since two years, the message from the ILO and its constituents could not have been clearer: The Government was going in the wrong direction and must immediately get back on course. On each occasion, however, the Government had tightened the screws on the trade union movement, had adopted new provisions that were even more repressive, had banned meetings and had prosecuted trade unionists engaging in legitimate trade union activities. The Worker members had drawn up a detailed list of the numerous pastect criticisms formulated by the ILO supervisory bodies, the ILO Governing Body and the ILO Committee of Experts, in the observation due to have been held in August 2011. The CFA (Case No. 2723), and to find, with the social partners, appropriate solutions that complied, in law and in practice, with the principles of freedom of association. The CFA had emphasized that the case of Fiji was one of the five most serious and urgent cases of violations concerning the right to organize, collective bargaining and social dialogue. Having noted the lack of cooperation by the Government, the Governing Body, in March 2013, had repeated its request to find appropriate solutions and to accept a direct contacts mission. The Government had not accepted that the mission should go to the country in time for a report to be submitted to the Governing Body in March 2013, and was now stating that it could receive the mission in December. All of that was unacceptable, since the Government was merely seeking to delay the discussion within the Governing Body and would certainly find other excuses later, for example the 2014 elections. Not only had no progress been achieved to bring law and practice into line with the Convention but the situation had also grown even worse, especially because of the changes to the Constitution which were likely to undermine the fundamental rights of workers, including that of freedom of association.

With regard to the acts of violence against trade unionists, the Committee of Experts had asked the Government to expedite without delay an independent investigation into the alleged acts of violence, harassment and intimidation against Mr Felix Anthony, Mr Mohammed Khalil, Mr Attar Singh, Mr Taniela Tabu and Mr Anand Singh. No measures had been taken by the Government, even though, contrary to what it had stated in its report, complaints had been filed in July 2012. Regarding the arrest and detention of trade unionists (Mr Felix Anthony, Mr Daniel Urai and Mr Nitendra Goundar), their cases were still pending. Iearing the legislation, the Worker members emphasized that many of the powers granted in the repealed PER had been reproduced and expanded in the Public Order (Amendment) Decree of 2012 (POAD) and, contrary to what had been requested by the Committee of Experts, the Government had not repealed the POAD. While noting that section 8 of the POAD had been suspended during the process of revising the Constitution, the Worker members had expressed concern at the fact that it would soon be reactivated and that other repressive provisions remained in force. Not only had the ENID not been repealed or amended but it also appeared that the Government was on the point of extending its scope. Regarding the provisions of the Employment Relations Promulgation of 2007 (ERP), amendments to which had been called for by the Committee of Experts for several years, the Worker members stressed that the Government had not adopted any measures in that regard and that the meeting of the tripartite ERAP subcommittee which had been held in August 2012 for that purpose had not yielded any results.

The Worker members also expressed concern with regard to the Political Parties Decree and the draft new Constitution, which represented a threat to the exercise of freedom of association. It was clear that the Fijian dictatorship was treating the ILO with contempt. The authoritarianism against which the Organization had warned as of 2011 had done nothing but increase and none of the information supplied to the Committee by the Government and the tripartite ERAB fed into the situation.

The Employer members stated that the Committee of Experts had undertaken a solid analysis of this case, identified in 2012 as a “double footnote case” on the basis of numerous troubling facts. They agreed with the Worker members that the Government was not on the right path. With reference to the ILO direct contacts mission of September 2012, the Employer members considered that it was absolutely unacceptable for the Government to undermine the mandate bestowed upon the mission by the international community. While being encouraged by the Government’s willingness to accept another direct contacts mission, they were concerned about its timing and the fact that the Government still wished to negotiate its mandate, which was generally unacceptable to the Employer members. They further indicated that they shared the Committee of Experts’ concerns about the acts of assault, harassment, intimidation and arrest of trade union leaders for the legitimate exercise of freedom of association, as well as about the POAD, which placed restrictions on freedom of assembly and expression, with prison sentences of up to five years for meeting without permit. They also expressed concern about some provisions of the ERP, especially those restricting internal trade union governance, for example the requirement for trade union officers to have worked in the relevant trade for a certain period of time. Further to the Committee of Experts’ comments concerning certain ERP provisions relating to trade union leaders, they recalled their position on the right to strike. Lastly, the Employer members stated that they were encouraged by the fact that the new Constitution would reflect the fundamental Conventions and hoped that the tripartite ERAB would be able to continue its work.

The Worker member of Fiji indicated that since 2009 the Government had been constantly reaffirming to the international community its commitment to workers’ rights and core labour standards. In parallel, the Government had issued decree after decree curtailing or denying workers their fundamental rights both in government-owned enterprises and in private entities. These decrees had denied civil service workers the right to collective bargaining and redress of grievances and disputes, had cancelled all existing collective agreements and had prohibited the deduction of union dues. Moreover, the direct contacts mission had been expelled as soon as it had convened its work in Fiji. Numerous attempts, including two resolutions of the Governing Body calling on the Government to accept the Mission back, had gone unheeded. The Government was attempting to dictate to the ILO the terms on which it would allow a direct contacts mission, as evidenced by the Prime Minister’s most recent communication to the ILO. The constitutional review process previously announced by the Government had been abandoned. The Government had now taken upon itself to rewrite the Fiji Constitution disregarding the 7,000 submissions which the public had made to the Constitution Review Commission. Media freedom remained curtailed and the international community would really encourage free and fair elections, remained seriously concerned about the process. Intimidation and assault of trade unionists and other citizens including deaths and other violations of human rights had still not been investigated despite the fact that the perpetrators had been identified. The Government had granted itself absolute immunity from any prosecution for actions or crimes that might have been committed or would be committed until the first sitting of the new Parliament. The Government’s rhetoric on accountability, transparency and fight against corruption was not implemented in practice.

The tripartite ERAB had met and agreed unanimously to recommend to the Government to revoke the decrees that violated the ILO Conventions, the Administration of Justice Decree and its amendment, the ENID, the Civil Service Decree, the POAD and the Media Decree. The ERAB meetings had been abruptly stopped without explanation, and the agreement to recommend revocation of the decrees had since been ignored. Just prior to this Conference, the Conference had recommenced discussions on the review of the labour legislation, but had refused to deal with the Decrees. A meaningful review of the labour law could not be envisaged without the revocation of these Decrees. While the PER had been revoked in January 2012, the POAD had been issued one week later. This even more draconian Decree seriously curtailed rights and freedoms and expanded the definition of treason and sedition to almost any activity or pronouncement in opposition to the regime. The provision on the requirement for permits for meetings had been temporarily suspended but the police and the military continued to monitor any gathering. As regards the public sector, the Government had claimed that public sector employees enjoyed the same guarantees for redress of their grievances as other employees covered by the ERP. This was factually incorrect. Civil servants did not enjoy the right of access to an independent labour court or arbitration tribunal. Moreover, the speaker informed the Committee that, on 6 May 2013, one month before the Conference, the Government had issued a circular creating a task force with the mandate to report on the possibility of extending the coverage of the ENID to local government workers which included staff, gardeners, cleaners and those doing the most menial work. The sugar industry had been put on notice that it could also be included under the ENID. To further suppress unions and workers, the Government had issued decrees in January 2013 defining any trade union official, employee or consultant as “public officers” similar to civil servants, thus prohibiting them from taking part in any political activity.

The speaker stated that most unions were barely surviving, and some had actually had to close their offices and operate from homes due to the impact of the aforementioned Decrees. Many unions were not able to operate fully and meet the expectations of their members owing to the many restrictions and constraints due to the removal of the deduction of union dues. Union officials were barred from entering workplaces. Collective bargaining in Fiji was now a luxury for just a few unions. The majority of workers in Fiji did no longer have the right to collective bargaining and for the first time in Fiji’s history, an estimated 60 per cent of unionized workers were living below the poverty line. Since the last Conference, the situation had not improved rather than improved, and the Government remained determined to destroy the trade union movement in Fiji.

The Employer member of Fiji expressed appreciation to the ILO Country Office in Suva for its tireless efforts in trying to bring the social partners together to address issues concerning the world of work during these difficult times. On 23 May 2012, the Prime Minister had written to the ILO Director-General to explain Fiji’s position and reasons for adopting the policies that had raised concerns, and to map out the way forward, including the Government’s aspirations to a non-ethnic based Constitution, free and fair elections and modernization of labour laws. In this regard, the speaker indicated that the ERAB had first met on 11 April 2012 to initiate steps to reform and modernize Fiji’s labour laws. A subcommittee of the ERAB had been appointed, and ILO technical and financial assistance had been provided to the tripartite partners to ensure quality deliberations. Tripartite partners had met on eight occasions beginning 16 May 2012 and concluding on 13 August 2012. Meetings had recommenced one year later from 15 to 17 May 2013 and 27 to 28 May 2013, but this latter subcommittee had been set up for the specific purpose of assisting the ERAB in initiating steps to reform and modernize the current labour laws relative to the eight ILO core Conventions and other relevant Conventions ratified by Fiji, and to amend the ERP, so as to domesticate four newly ratified ILO Conventions, namely the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142), the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181), the Maternity Protection Convention, 2000 (No. 183) and the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006). The speaker underlined that the ERAB subcommittee had reviewed the ENID and the Employment Relations (Amendment) Decree of 2011. The ENID was commonly viewed as favouring the employers, and the Fiji Commerce and Employers Federation freely admitted that some of its members supported this Decree. The Employment (Amendment) (Enactment) Decree had excluded all civil servants from the ERP, and thus from provisions guaranteeing collective bargaining and dispute resolution mechanisms. The ERAB subcommittee had resolved that some provisions of these two Decrees were inconsistent with ILO Conventions Nos 87 and 98 and had agreed to recommend the repeal of both Decrees, while capturing into the existing ERP some of the pertinent concerns of the Government that had been accommodated in the ENID. The speaker highlighted that a tripartite forum was currently receiving the Government’s submission on the proposed changes, and meetings had last been adjourned on 28 May 2013 with a view to reconvene in July. The speaker believed that tripartite dialogue could work to the benefit of the social partners, and assured that the employers of Fiji would continue to use this process to address labour concerns. He appealed to the ILO constitutents for their understanding and empathy in relation to Fiji. It would not be in the best interest of the global community to isolate Fiji any further. He also considered that the Government should be commended for bringing about many positive reforms.

The Worker member of Indonesia expressed concern that civil liberties in Fiji were increasingly threatened. She recalled the issues raised in the observation formulated by the Committee of Experts, such as the numerous acts of harassment, assassination, intimidation and arrest of trade union leaders and members for their exercise of the right to freedom of association. Moreover, stressing that the PER were certain to give the authorities any excuses to prevent a trade union from ever holding a public meeting, the speaker called on the international community to act.

The Government member of Papua New Guinea recalled that the Government had engaged the tripartite ERAB and its subcommittee to review current labour laws to ensure compliance with all ratified ILO Conventions, including Convention No. 87. The Government had made significant progress to address the issues raised by the Committee of Experts concerning the application of this Convention, as evidenced by the progress of the ERAB and its subcommittee, which had met a total of 16 times within the last year. The speaker expressed the hope that the Government would give due consideration to the comments of the Committee of Experts, as well as the amendments recommended by the tripartite ERAB, to resolve issues relating to compliance with the Convention.

The Government had engaged in an inclusive and open process in the development of the new Constitution, which was due for completion by August 2013. This Constitution would restore civil liberties for workers as well as the general public and pave the way for a democratic election by September 2014. The speaker encouraged the ILO to elaborate terms of reference acceptable to all parties for its direct contacts mission to Fiji, so as to help resolve the issues raised in an objective and transparent manner.

The Employer member of Australia expressed concern regarding the observations of the Committee of Experts, and indicated that the Australian employers supported the private sector in Fiji (whether employers, employees or their representatives) in its efforts to operate in an environment where full freedom was exercised. Australian employers had joined with ILO constituents on multiple occasions in recent years to signify their support for measures to remedy the breaches of freedom of association in Fiji. Regrettably, despite collective action by the Governing Body, the CFA, the Asia and the Pacific Regional Meeting in 2011, the breaches reported by the Committee of Experts had not been rectified. Violations were serious and included interference with trade union rights and civil liberties; acts of assault, arrest and detention; restrictions to freedom of assembly and expression; and a variety of legislative issues. He declared that, while the Employer members had their disagreement concerning this Convention, there was no grey area in this case. The breaches had been found to exist, they were not a matter of nuance, they were serious, and they continued. He urged the ILO direct contacts mission to return to Fiji in the near future, within the framework of the mandate bestowed upon it by the international community.

The Worker member of Japan recalled that the ENID had designated 11 corporations in the finance, telecommunications, aviation, and public utilities sectors as essential industries. Under the ENID, collective bargaining agreements had been abrogated and some bargaining units had been eliminated for not meeting new minimum membership requirements. The ENID also prevented pre-existing unions from representing their members in collective bargaining, and new units could only be registered with the personal approval of the Prime Minister. In addition, the leaders of re-registered unions were required to be employed by the designated corporations they represented, a practice which conflicted with the principle concerning workers’ right to elect representatives of their choice. These measures, as well as the elimination of the deduction of union dues in the essential industries, were a significant setback for workers’ rights, and had had an extremely negative impact on the functioning of the Bank and Finance Sector Employees Union. With reference to the earlier draft of the Constitution which had been withdrawn, the speaker noted that this draft had contained provisions for workers’ rights, including the repeal of the ENID.

The Worker member of Australia indicated that Australian workers and unions had watched with deep concern and dismay the continuing deterioration of the worker and human rights situation in Fiji. Union members from Australia and New Zealand had tried to visit Fiji in December 2011 to speak with unions, community groups and others to try to find out more about what had happened but they had not been permitted to set foot in the country. She declared that it was hard to believe that the Government had any intention of restoring rights to Fijian workers and unions, or democracy to Fiji. The Political Parties Decree excluded any elected or appointed trade union officer, or officer of any federation, congress, council or affiliation of trade unions from applying for, being a member of, or holding office in a political party. The Decree also prohibited trade union officers from expressing support for a political party. The Government had discarded the draft Constitution prepared by the Independent Constitution.
Review Commission, which had specifically called for the repeal of the ENID. The speaker called on the Government to immediately repeal the Political Parties Decree and other decrees which had the effect of stripping citizens of their basic rights.

The Government member of the United States expressed deep concerns about the situation of democracy as well as human and labour rights in the country, particularly with respect to Government measures to restrict the rights of trade unions to meet, organize and exercise fundamental rights; reported acts of harassment and discrimination; restrictions to freedom of assembly and expression; and shortcomings in the legislation that gave rise to serious violations of the principles of freedom of association, the right to organize and collective bargaining. She expressed disappointment that the ILO direct contacts mission of September 2012 had not been allowed to complete its work. The terms of reference developed for this mission had been formulated on the basis of well-established procedures for ILO direct contacts, and included full guarantees that all relevant parties and points of view would be heard objectively and impartially. An important opportunity had been squandered to clarify the facts on the ground and to assist the Government, together with the social partners, in finding appropriate solutions. Considering that the Government was in the process of promulgating a new Constitution, and was undertaking a review of labour legislation, the assistance of the ILO would be especially valuable. It was therefore regrettable that the Government had again proposed that the ILO direct contacts mission be delayed until December 2013. The speaker therefore urged the Government to cooperate constructively with the ILO in order to dispatch an ILO direct contacts mission to the country as soon as possible, under terms of reference that would enable the mission to adequately assist the Government.

The Worker member of France declared that the public service in Fiji was under serious threat. Under the pretext of reducing expenditure, the Government had unilaterally eliminated over 2,000 jobs in the public service by reducing the retirement age from 60 to 55 years, without consulting or negotiating with the trade unions. Public employees were recruited under individual contracts that were not negotiated collectively and therefore offered fewer guarantees. Public service trade unions were denied the possibility of representing or defending their members, as the latter were now excluded from the scope of the ERP. The Public Service (Amendment) Decree, to which the Government had referred, dealt in fact only with the issue of equal treatment and offered no guarantee of collective bargaining or compensatory mechanisms. The circular published by the Government which provided for the introduction of mediation and conciliation procedures in the public service was completely ineffective, since no independent commission had been established to deal with complaints regarding transfers, appointments, promotion and disciplinary measures. There was no mention of any participation in the process by the trade unions. Moreover, and contrary to the Government’s claims with regard to the Public Service (Amendment) Decree, the possibility of lodging an appeal did not exist in practice for public service employees.

The Government member of New Zealand indicated that, despite some deviations from the previously announced roadmap, Fiji had made some positive progress towards preparing for elections next year, including the registration of four political parties and the increasing media coverage and public debate on political issues. Continuing with these efforts would contribute to making the election credible and the outcome acceptable to the people of Fiji. This should include ensuring that basic freedoms, including labour rights, were respected in the process and enshrined in the Constitution, which was in the process of being finalized. It was regrettable that the ILO direct contacts mission had not yet been able to return to Fiji. He reiterated his Government’s support for, and willingness to assist Fiji to return to democracy.

The Government member of Japan indicated that his Government had been encouraging the Government to promote democratization in Fiji through steady dialogue. It would be beneficial for the country to receive the ILO direct contacts mission, to be able to present to the international community its democratization process, including recent developments towards the promulgation of a new Constitution. The speaker welcomed the intention of the Government to accept a visit of the ILO direct contacts mission. He expressed the hope that the Government would receive this mission at the earliest possible date, on the previously agreed upon terms of reference and based on the decision of the Governing Body.

The Worker member of Brazil recalled that several decrees in Fiji currently prevented workers in the public and private sector from exercising their trade union rights. Legitimate union activities could now be deemed criminal as they were liable to be deemed as terrorist acts. Teachers had been excluded from labour legislation, which meant that they had no recourse when they were victims of injustice, discrimination or unequal treatment. Unionized teachers were subjected to constant monitoring and harassment and their conversations were tapped. Children and young persons were raised in a school atmosphere in which they were aware that their teachers were denied their fundamental rights. In 2012, the Government had decided unilaterally to reform the retirement system for teachers who had been obliged to leave their jobs in schools and teaching institutions. These experienced professionals had, either not been replaced or had been replaced by teachers with no prior training, which compounded the negative impact on the quality of teaching. A quality education system, with well-trained teachers working in decent conditions and entitled to exercise, and benefit from, their trade union rights was a sine qua non for the productive development of all nations. Students needed to evolve in a context in which civil liberties, and therefore trade union rights, were respected.

The Government member of Australia declared that his Government, along with its social partners, once again expressed concern at the ongoing violation of human and labour rights in Fiji. Legislation clearly constituted a serious infringement of the principles underpinning the right to freedom of association and collective bargaining, enshrined by Conventions Nos 87 and 98. He reiterated the ILO’s and the international community’s call for the Government to rescind laws that violated ILO Conventions. Decrees severely restricting workers’ rights to freely organize were still in force. In particular, the POAD reproduced key provisions of the PER, which had been lifted on 7 January 2012, thus contravening the recommendations of the high-level mission of August 2012. He acknowledged the decision by the Fiji authorities to grant a permit for the biennial meeting of the Fiji Trades Union Congress in May 2012, though with the condition of police attendance. Fiji workers were among the most affected by the decrees imposed by the Government. Cases of harassment, arrest and intimidation of trade union representatives were an affront to the fundamental principles of ILO conventions. He indicated that his Government, along with the social partners, strongly urged the Government of Fiji to respond in full to the Committee of Experts’ observations, as well as to implement its recommendations and those of the CFA, to ensure conformity with the obligations under ratified ILO Conventions. The speaker also urged the Government to work with the ILO to arrange for a direct contacts mission.
as soon as possible, reflecting the mandate of the Organiza-

The Government member of Canada noted with great concern the degree to which freedom of association and protection of the right to organize had been repressed in Fiji in law and practice. Allegations of assault, harassment, and intimidation to civil society and workers groups had been alarming, as was the environment of impunity resulting from a lack of investigations or penalties against the perpetrators. He further noted with concern that the 2012 ILO direct contacts mission had not been able to continue its work. In addition, the reported assault against a trade union leader in retaliation for statements made by a colleague at the 2011 session of the Conference was a serious threat to the freedom of speech of all delegates, and threatened the functioning of the Conference. The speaker urged the Government to take concrete and decisive actions to provide and protect freedom of speech, freedom of association and the right to organize. He also urged the Government to cooperate with the ILO to identify and implement the necessary measures to fulfil its obligations under the Convention, including relevant legislative amendments.

The Government representative, referring to the ILO direct contacts mission of 2012, indicated that the terms of reference of this mission had been too vague, open-ended and had not been outcome-oriented. The Government had committed to accepting a direct contacts mission that would be able to speak to all parties, and that would provide solutions based on the correct legal and factual situation. The fact that the terms of reference of the mission in 2012 had not been acceptable should not prevent a mission from taking place in 2013. In this regard, the Government reiterated its commitment to welcoming an ILO direct contacts mission in December 2013, based on terms of reference that were acceptable to all. Concerning restrictions on public meetings, the speaker underlined that all persons and entities were now able to associate, organize and meet in any public place without the need for a permit. Trade unions, political parties, and civil society groups had been regularly holding public meetings, and freely expressing their views in the media. Allegations that minutes had to be kept of meetings and speeches were not true. Turning to issues raised concerning several pieces of legislation, the speaker underlined that the serious offence provisions contained in the Public Order Act only applied to offences such as treason, sedition and religious and racial vilification. Moreover, the definition of the term "political party" in the Public Order Act was similar to legislation in many other countries. Furthermore, the Political Parties Decree did not take away any rights from workers. This Decree sought to maintain political neutrality of public officials, but did not prevent workers who were not trade union officials from becoming members of a political party. The Decree also introduced greater transparency and accountability with respect to political parties. In addition, the draft Constitution, which provided for fundamental civil and political rights as well as socio-economic rights, would also provide the right of any person affected by an executive and administrative decision to seek the review of this decision in a court of law or before an independent tribunal. The draft Constitution also contained provisions that would contribute to the creation of transparent rules of government. With regard to civil liberties, the Government representative indicated that once a complaint or allegation of a criminal offence was made, this complaint was thoroughly investigated, evidence was collected and an assessment was made whether prosecution would be pursued. He reiterated that such cases had to be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, and reaffirmed that breaches of law would be investigated in accordance with established legal procedures, based on evidence in a court of law.

The Worker members indicated that they were extremely concerned about the trade union situation in Fiji. There had been no concrete response by the Government with regard to the matters outlined in the observations of the Committee of Experts. The Government continued to find new ways to repress the rights of workers, through unilateral executive decrees that were unreviewable by any court. Some of these measures might be perpetuated by the draft Constitution proposed by the Government. This case was serious and urgent as freedom of association was under attack and would be more so when the suspended portions of the POAD would come back into force, thus requiring prior Government authorization to hold union meetings, authorization which had rarely been granted in the past. The Worker members therefore urged the Government to: (i) accept the ILO direct contacts mission as set out in the resolution adopted by the Governing Body in 2012 so that it might take place in time for its report to be discussed at the October 2013 session of the Governing Body; (ii) take the necessary measures to ensure that all charges against Mr Daniel Urai and Mr Nitendra Goundar were dropped without delay; (iii) undertake an ex officio and independent investigation without delay into the alleged acts of assault, harassment and intimidation of Mr Felix Anthony, Mr Mohammed Khalil, Mr Attar Singh, Mr Taniela Tabu and Mr Anand Singh, and initiate an investigation into the complaint lodged by Mr Felix Anthony in 2012; (iv) abrogate or amend the Public Order Act so as to ensure that the right to assembly might be freely exercised; and (v) convene the ERAB subcommittee to establish a tripartite process in order to amend, within six months, the laws and decrees to ensure conformity with the obligations under Conventions Nos 87 and 98. The Worker members requested the ILO Suva Office to make the necessary efforts to facilitate dialogue among employers, workers, and the Government to restore industrial relations practices, particularly in the sugar industry. They also requested that the conclusions in this case be reflected in a special paragraph of the Committee’s report.

The Employer members observed that the facts and elements of this case appeared not to have changed since their examination by the Committee of Experts. They recalled that the conclusions of the Committee should only address the Government’s compliance with the Convention, and not the political situation in the country or the application of other Conventions. An ILO direct contacts mission was important in order to assess the facts on the ground, due to the disparity between the information provided by the Government and the information contained in the report of the Committee of Experts. It was intolerable that a member State could essentially eject an invited direct contacts mission due to a disagreement with its terms of reference, particularly as those corresponded to the standard terms of reference established by the Governing Body. The Employer members therefore urged the Government to accept the ILO direct contacts mission, with the mandate that was originally provided, and not a mandate set or negotiated by the Government. The Employer members agreed that the conclusions in this case should be reflected in a special paragraph of the Committee’s report.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the statement made by the Government representative and of the discussion that followed.

The Committee observed that the outstanding issues in this case concerned numerous and grave allegations of the violations of the basic civil liberties of trade unionists, including arrest, detention and assaults and restrictions of freedom of expression and assembly. The Committee further observed the issues relating to a number of discrepancies between the labour legislation, in particular the Public Order (Amendment) Decree (POAD), the Employment Relations Promulgation and the Essential National Industries Deed, and the provisions of the Convention. The Committee further recalled the resolution adopted by the ILO Governing Body in November 2012 calling on the Government to accept a direct contacts mission under previously agreed terms of reference based on conclusions and recommendations of the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2723.

The Committee noted the Government’s statement that the draft Constitution ensured protections for human and socio-economic rights and the independence of the judiciary, and the Government was intensively preparing for democratic elections in September 2014. It further noted the Government’s commitment to: finalize the review of the labour legislation with the social partners within the framework of the Employment Relations Advisory Board (ERAB) so as to bring it into conformity with ratified international labour Conventions; and ensure that all cases of breaches of Fijians’ fundamental rights would be investigated and independently prosecuted by the independent Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions. The Government representative indicated that they would welcome the visit of the ILO direct contacts mission on mutually acceptable terms of reference in December 2013.

The Committee did not address the right to strike in this case as the employers do not agree that there is a right to strike recognized in Convention No. 87.

The Committee noted with concern the recently adopted Political Parties Decree and certain provisions of the draft Constitution that were alleged to pose risks to the exercise of freedom of association and the basic civil liberties of trade unionists and the officers of employers’ organizations. Recalling the intrinsic link between freedom of association, expression and assembly, on the one hand, and democracy and human rights on the other, the Committee urged the Government to undertake an ex officio independent investigation without further delay into the alleged acts of assault, harassment and intimidation against Felix Anthony, Mohammed Khalil, Attar Singh, Taniela Tabu and Anand Singh and to drop the charges against Daniel Usai and Nitendra Goundar. The Committee urged the Government to amend the POAD so as to ensure that the right to assembly may be freely exercised and expected that the ERAB would, upon consideration of all written and oral statements, examine them in detail, prior to giving its comments in writing.

GUATEMALA (ratification: 1952)

The Government provided the following written information.

The concerns which had been expressed by the Committee of Experts for a number of years were shared by the Government which had taken office in January 2012. In order to address such issues, specific actions had been implemented with a view to producing changes in the management of labour matters. In its 2013 report, the Committee of Experts had noted that the Government had reported progress in the following areas: the implementation of the new national policy on secure, decent, high-quality employment and of the ongoing policy on social dialogue; the strengthening of the Ministries of Labour and Social Security in budgetary, regulatory and institutional terms, including increasing the coverage of the general labour inspectorate; the signature of an agreement between the Public Prosecutor’s Office and the International Labour Standards Department of the ILO concerning subjects of relevance to the supervisory bodies; the strengthening of national tripartite dialogue, the first result of which had been the signature of the Memorandum of Understanding relating to the implementation of the ILO Technical Cooperation Framework: Decent Work Programme for Guatemala; the coordination among State institutions to give priority to dealing with complaints concerning acts of violence against trade unionists and impunity, which regrettably also affected the whole population; the application of the protection mechanism to trade unionists who request it; the participation of the Public Prosecutor’s Office in the Inter-Institutional Labour Commission and the Tripartite Committee for International Labour Affairs; and the reinforcement of the investigation capacity of the Public Prosecutor’s Office by increasing staff numbers and establishing working methods for resolving cases involving acts of violence against trade unionists. The Committee of Experts had also welcomed in its report the following information supplied by the Government: the re-establishment of the special prosecution service for investigating offences against trade unionists; the conclusion of a cooperation agreement between the Public Prosecutor’s Office and the ILO, with initial action already taken to train prosecutors with regard to typical scenarios of anti-trade union violence and the factors behind such violence; and the inclusion in the National Tripartite Commission of trade union federations and confederations which had been excluded in the recent past.

Further to the report of the Committee of Experts submitted to this session of the Conference, the Government had taken steps to resolve the majority of the issues raised by the Committee of Experts, including the following: the streamlining of the procedure for the registration of trade unions, reducing the time taken for such registration from 226 to 20 working days; the establishment of a monthly working group with the participation of the Prosecutor General and trade union representatives, to keep them informed of the progress made in cases involving acts of violence which were under investigation and to record all important information which came to the attention of the Prosecutor General; the discussion of a draft cooperation agreement between the Public Prosecutor’s Office and the International Commission against Impunity in Guatemala (CICIG); the issue by the Public Prosecutor’s Office of a general instruction to regulate criminal prosecution in the event of non-compliance with rulings handed down by labour and social security courts; ILO technical assistance to the Public Prosecutor’s Office relating to the exchange... of positive experiences with countries in the region in order to tackle anti-union violence and amend existing legislation with a view to improving criminal prosecution; meetings with the main trade union leaders of Guatemala, the Ministry of Labour and the Ministry of the Interior in order to reach decisions and take action in the quest for solutions affecting workers, and the special labour inspectorate, under the direct responsibility of the Ministry of the Interior of the ministerial agreement concerning the inclusion of the Standing Trade Union Technical Committee on Comprehensive Protection with a view to implementing public policies for the protection of trade unionists, based on processes for prevention and comprehensive protection, with the direct presence of trade union leaders and the Higher Office of the Ministry of the Interior; the presentation of the Labour Sanctions Bill, which amends the Labour Code, for adoption by the National Congress; the issue by the Ministry of Labour of the ministerial agreement containing instructions to deal with cases involving the closure of enterprises without appropriate payments to the workers, which would prevent such situations and strengthen the labour inspectorate; budget increases and reinforcement of the investigation capacity of the Public Prosecutor's Office and the National Police to combat impunity; the full operationalization of the judiciary's Centre for Labour Justice, bringing together in a single physical space the relevant courts and administrative units; the significant reduction in the average time and duration of judicial proceedings from 19 to six months on average; the full operation of the unit for the implementation and verification of reinstatement orders and special labour procedures, which monitored due compliance with court rulings in order to ensure the restoration of workers' labour rights; the establishment of the Economic and Social Council, which included representatives of Employers, trade unions and cooperatives; and discussion in the Tripartite Commission of the recommendations on judicial reform made by the Committee of Experts to agree on the action to be taken with a view to referral to the National Congress.

The Government would continue to make every effort to resolve the issues that were still pending and to implement the Committee of Experts' recommendations, which were the issues behind the submission by a number of Workers' delegates to the 101st Session of the Conference of a complaint under article 26 of the ILO Constitution, which was before the Governing Body. Accordingly, the Government of Guatemala had reported periodically to the Governing Body on progress made. Furthermore, the Government had noted that the measures that had been implemented, or were due to be implemented, on 26 March 2013, of a Memorandum of Understanding between the Government and the Workers' group of the Governing Body, on the basis of which tripartite measures would be taken to ensure the full observance by Guatemala of the Convention. Such measures were intended, inter alia, to prevent acts of violence against trade unionists, create conditions to ensure that the latter can work in a favourable environment and also strengthen the justice system, all with ILO assistance. The Government had requested the Office to establish quickly high-level tripartite representation in the country, as stipulated in the above instrument, and it would do its utmost to continue implementing its provisions, on a tripartite basis and with ILO support, in order to achieve the full and effective application of the Convention in the country.

The Government representative stated that since the current President of Guatemala had been elected, the Government had been engaged in a sustained process of ensuring full compliance with national legislation, international Conventions and fundamental labour principles. The many efforts of national tripartite dialogue and international contacts in recent months had resulted in the signing of two particularly relevant documents: the Memorandum of Understanding concluded in March 2013 between the Government and the Workers' group of the ILO Governing Body; and the good faith agreement between the Government and that of the United States which brought to a close the dispute that the latter had initiated under the Dominican Republic–Central America Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA–DR). The two agreements, which were complementary, constituted a roadmap for an agreed long-term solution to the problems besetting labour relations in Guatemala. The agreements had been endorsed by the social partners in the Tripartite Committee for International Labour Affairs and had opened up a historical process of social dialogue. In practical terms the implications of the agreements were of transcendental importance for the long-term resolution of the conflicts, which had been made possible in Guatemala. Among such consequences, he stressed the creation of a sub-committee within the Tripartite Committee and the fact that the mentioned committee had decided to address the negotiation and follow-up of international agreements with a scheduled working programme. He emphasized that the Government regretted and condemned the crimes that had been committed against union leaders, against their headquarter and against both unionized and non-unionized workers and that it had taken steps through the General Prosecutor's Office to step up its investigation into the identity of the perpetrators and to have them brought to trial. Suspects had been arrested in connection with the recent murder of Ovidio Ortiz and Carlos Hernández. Better and more effective protection had been granted to union leaders who had requested police protection, a strategic alliance had been promoted between the General Prosecutor’s Office and CICIG to ensure the independent investigation of crimes, and inter-institutional cooperation machinery had been set up between the Public Prosecutor, the Ministry of Interior and the trade union organizations to shed light on crimes against union leaders.

As to the legislative aspects of the case, a consensus had been sought by the Government within the framework of the National Tripartite Commission to amend the legislation, but without success. In fact, the National Tripartite Commission had refused to inform Congress on the matter. Although the executive had the authority to present proposals for reform to the legislature, it had been deemed more prudent to abide by the recommendations of the National Tripartite Commission on respect for the strengthening of social dialogue. Regarding the register of trade unions, the latter had been informed that the data collected made it possible for registration to be completed within the 20 working days provided for in the legislation. As to the Committee of Experts' request for detailed statistics on the number of existing trade unions by economic sector, notably in the export processing sector (maquilas) and in the public and private sector, and on the number of collective accords that had been concluded, the Government was actively engaged in their compilation, for which it was seeking the ILO's technical assistance. Finally, the Government representative thanked the Office and the Director-General for their contribution to the mission of the Director of the International Labour Standards Department that had taken place in February 2013 upon request of the Government and for the high-level tripartite mission that was shortly to visit Guatemala which would give assistance to the Government and to the Committee of Experts.

He was certain that the two missions would contribute to furthering and enhancing the Government's efforts. The Government representative indicated that his presence during the examination of this case was proof of his Government's commitment and political will, although this case was also being examined in the context of a complaint under article 26 of the ILO Constitution, which meant there was a double procedure in this regard. He expressed the hope that the conclusions of this Committee would contribute to the efforts already undertaken by Guatemala with the support of the international community and the ILO, including through the implementation of the Memorandum of Understanding of 26 March 2013. He requested the ILO’s support to ensure a positive outcome to the efforts already undertaken.

The Worker members observed that the case appeared in the list of individual cases this year further to the agreement reached between the Worker and Employer members of the Committee to examine all the “double-footnoted” cases from the 2012 report of the Committee of Experts, which it had not been possible to discuss the previous year. Briefly summarizing the background to the case, they recalled that: the case had been examined by the Committee on 14 occasions; further to a discussion in the Committee concerning the application of the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the high-level mission which had visited Guatemala in April 2008 had also examined issues relating to the application of the Convention, which had resulted in the National Tripartite Commission adopting an agreement aimed at eliminating anti-union violence, improving and modernizing the legislation and ensuring better application of Conventions Nos 87 and 98; in 2009, a mission comprising the Employer and Worker spokespersons had visited the country to assist with efforts to find sustainable solutions to all the issues raised, in accordance with the request made by the Committee in June 2008; a new high-level mission had visited the country in 2011; in 2012, a complaint had been submitted against the Government of Guatemala under article 26 of the ILO Constitution for violation of the Convention; at the request of the highest State authorities, an ILO mission had visited the country from 25 February to 1 March 2013; a Memorandum of Understanding had been signed on 26 March 2013 between the Government and the Workers’ group of the ILO Governing Body, in the presence of the ILO Director-General, with a view to deferring the decision of the Governing Body to establish a commission of inquiry. The Memorandum of Understanding was a positive sign and the Committee should encourage what had been set in motion by the Governing Body. It was now important to give the Government a chance to honour its commitments.

The Employer members noted the Government’s full willingness to submit information on the measures it had adopted in accordance with the complaint of the Workers’ group. The case under examination was being considered by different monitoring bodies at the same time. While it was a “double-footnoted” case, which is why it had been included in the list of cases before the Committee, the situation had changed drastically since the Committee of Experts had last examined it, as a complaint had been submitted under article 26 of the Constitution. It should be recalled that the situation of Guatemala had been examined at the last meeting of the Committee on Freedom of Association within the framework of five specific cases, three of which had been considered to be serious and urgent. The Governing Body would examine both the report of the Committee on Freedom of Association and the analysis of the complaint under article 26 of the Constitution. The observation of the Committee of Experts made reference to a “NO’s” support for measures which could be grouped into four clusters: the complaint under article 26 of the Constitution, the situation of violence, legislative problems and other matters including the maquilas, the national tripartite commissions and statistical matters. As for legislative issues related to the right to strike, they referred to the 2012 discussions in which they had indicated that the Committee of Experts was not competent to interpret Conventions and that Convention No. 87 did not address the right to strike. They recalled that a high-level mission had been conducted in 2011, and they highlighted the written information that the Government had provided on the measures adopted further to the mission’s recommendations. They particularly emphasized the measures that had been adopted, the adoption of the tripartite commissions, to speed up court proceedings and to set up the Economic and Social Council. They also referred to the measures adopted with regard to the Memorandum of Understanding that had been signed in March 2013. They emphasized the measures to strengthen the legal system, and particularly to shed light on acts of violence. Swift and specific judicial investigations were needed to identify and punish the perpetrators and ensure that the same acts were not committed again in the future. They highlighted the importance of continued technical assistance from the Office. They noted with interest the Government’s decision to accept a new high-level mission and hoped that it would take place without delay.

The Worker member of Guatemala recalled that in 2012 the workers had presented a complaint under article 26 of the Constitution in view of the murders, attacks, harassment and threats against union leaders, and the failure by both public and private employers of trade unions and the failure to comply with national and international standards, and particularly the present Convention. The presentation of the complaint had provided the occasion for the Government to take a number of political and diplomatic steps that had resulted in the signing of a Memorandum of Understanding with the Workers’ group and the Office. Guatemalan workers endorsed the Memorandum of Understanding, which gave the Government six months, from April to October 2013, to draw up and implement the operational plan that was currently being validated by the Tripartite Committee on International Labour Affairs. However, the Memorandum did not resolve structural problems and the anti-union policy continued to remain in place. For employers and some public officials, the best trade union was no trade union at all. New unions could not be established in the production and public service sectors, at either the national or municipal level. Workers who decided to organize in accordance with national and international legislation were immediately dismissed. Employers disregarded warnings and refused to comply with judicial rulings ordering them to reinstate dismissed workers immediately and to respect the trade union rights were denied. The executive, the judiciary and the legislative authorities were jointly responsible for the situation, as they did not enforce the law or comply with their obligations. At a time when the world was watching the historic trial of Guatemalan generals for genocide and crimes against humanity, trade unionists, indigenous peoples, women and human rights activists were being persecuted in ways that brought back memories of the atrocities perpetrated during the 1980s. And while “development” projects were imposed on the country without consulting or seeking the consent of those concerned, causing the displacement of families, the disruption of public services and the contamination of natural resources, the indigenous peoples and peasant communities were once again fighting economic and social inequality and to demand that their own view of development be respected. As the movements grew, so too did the violence, which had given rise to a wave of repression and selective killings, and the International Criminal Court investigations of crimes against humanity and war crimes.

The Employer member of Guatemala indicated that he considered it was inadequate that this Committee was dealing with the present case in the current circumstances, in which a whole process was under way to seek solutions to the problems identified by the Committee of Experts, and which was based on the Memorandum of Understanding signed by the Government and the Workers’ group at the last meeting of the Governing Body, as a follow-up to the complaint brought under article 26 of the ILO Constitution. He also recalled that the Committee of Experts had taken into account the progress made in recent years and the information submitted by the Government, in particular with regard to the issues of most concern during the process, namely the violent attacks against union leaders and union members. He indicated that the Tripartite Committee for International Labour Affairs had been informed by the responsible persons of the Public Prosecutor’s office of cases mentioned in the report of the Committee of Experts. It was positive that there was a high percentage of cases with final sentences and cases in which the investigations had sufficiently advanced to expect results shortly. In this regard, he reminded the discussions in the Committee on other occasions on the violence that had affected the whole population of Guatemala. He expressed concern at the fact that it seemed that it was concluded a priori that in most cases the violence was motivated by trade union activities. He emphasized that the employers were the first to call for the investigation of crimes and for the perpetrators to be severely punished. Another aspect that should be noted positively was the progress that had been made in strengthening the institutions responsible for enforcing respect for trade unions, and particularly the general labour inspection and labour courts. The allocation of specific resources had resulted in capacity building and the recruitment of labour inspectors, who had been accused in the past of inefficiency and corruption. Moreover, the number of labour tribunals and the human resources available had increased. Even more important, procedures had been improved. Emphasis should be placed on the efforts made with regard to social dialogue in the Tripartite Committee for International Labour Affairs and the Economic and Social Council. These national bodies were responsible for following up the issues raised by the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee. Some of these issues had also been recognized by the Government and the Workers’ group in the Memorandum. He emphasized the commitment of the employers to pursue tripartite dialogue and to come up with solutions to the problems raised. He invited all the social partners to participate constructively in the whole process and to give up their sectoral positions, which were not conducive to finding solutions to the problems and obstructed fluid and effective social dialogue. He recognized that of the many problems the people of Guatemala, one was to collect decent work and sustainable companies, which was the only way of generating wealth and tackling the problem of informal employment. He emphasized the need to continue the fight against corruption and to guarantee the effective application of the Labour and Penal Codes by the Supreme Court of Justice and the Office of the Public Prosecutor. National authorities were striving to strengthen solutions through dialogue with a view to creating jobs under decent conditions. In conclusion, he was aware that solutions needed to be found and hoped that they could be achieved in the medium term. He urged the Committee to contribute to the national efforts that were being made and recalled once again the important progress that had already been made to safeguard freedom of association and collective bargaining and taking action against impunity. She highlighted the high-level mission that had taken place in February 2013 and the Memorandum of Understanding on the application of the Convention signed in March 2013. In that regard, she drew attention to the measures that the Government had taken since the adoption of the Memorandum, particularly the initiatives following the adoption of the Memorandum. Some of these measures were established high-level tripartite representation, as agreed in the Memorandum. She expressed the hope that the Government and the social partners would continue taking action to apply the Memorandum, with ILO assistance, with a view to making progress in applying the Convention. In conclusion, she expressed concern at the simultaneous use of multiple mechanisms to deal with the same case, considering that such duplication could weaken the functioning of the ILO supervisory system.

An observer representing the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), referring to the murders of 58 trade unionists over the past six years, expressed regret that none of them had been solved and that the Government claimed that only two of them involved anti-union motives, despite the fact that investigations were still continuing. Seven workers had already been murdered in 2013. He referred to the situation of persecution, threats and harassment suffered by trade unionists and the dismantling of trade unions, giving specific examples from the maquila and public sectors. Despite the fact that the judicial authorities had ordered protection measures for union leaders and members, they had yet to be taken. He pointed out that the Memorandum of Understanding might be the first step towards solving the country’s problems, highlighted the commitment of trade union confederations to the Memorandum and expressed regret that it had not been signed by the employers. Guatemala had been declared the most dangerous country in the world for trade unionists. The Government therefore needed to demonstrate that it was taking real action on the issue.

The Government member of the United States referred to the enforcement plan agreed with Guatemala to solve the concerns raised in a labour case brought by the United States against the Government under the CAFTA-DR. The enforcement plan consisted of 18 concrete actions to improve enforcement of labour laws to be implemented within specific time frames. She said that, if fully implemented, it would address some of the same issues dealt with by the Committee of Experts, the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Conference Committee. She also referred to the recently signed Memorandum of Understanding and her Government was encouraged that the Guatemalan Government had acknowledged the challenges it faced in effectively enforcing its labour laws and protecting workers’ rights, and looked forward to their continued collaboration to address labour right concerns.
However, she expressed deep concern at the continuing violence against trade unionists, the high levels of impunity and the on-going challenges in the criminal justice system. The Government of Guatemala was urged to fulfil its commitments within the established time frames under both the enforcement plan and the Memorandum of Understandings set out in Convention No. 87 and other ILO standards. In 2008, unions from Guatemala and the United States had filed a petition calling for the investigation of labour abuses under the labour chapter of the CAFTA–DR in the binational and multilateral agreements that were becoming increasingly important as they were used in the binational and multilateral agreements that were key to international trade and industrial relations in multinational companies. After reviewing the petition, the United States Government in 2009 had reported finding significant weaknesses in labour law enforcement in Guatemala and, following the holding of consultations, had requested the establishment of an arbitral panel in 2011. However, despite the failure of the Government to take sufficient action to remedy the continuous and systematic failure to protect fundamental workers’ rights, it had been granted yet another reprieve in April 2013, when the United States had suspended the arbitral panel and negotiated a comprehensive enforcement plan with the Government. Since the filing of the petition, over 50 trade unionists had been killed in Guatemala and there were many doubts that another action plan would bring about real changes in law and practice, or the allocation of sufficient resources to improve compliance with the Convention. Moreover, although ambitious, there were numerous shortcomings in the plan, which failed to take into account the critical needs expressed by Guatemalan workers. The shortcomings included the failure to address union registration, including the 45-day deadline set out in the Labour Code, the question of impunity for violations of labour law as well as illegal subcontracting, the non-payment of social security contributions, widespread minimum wage violations, factory closures and the accurate legal registration of factory ownership and assets. Nevertheless, despite the many criticisms, the commitment made would be taken very seriously by the trade union movement, with particular regard to the provisions on transparency and tripartite coordination for enforcement, which explicitly referred to the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). In conclusion, he emphasized that the enforcement component of the plan needed to include the real possibility of returning to the CAFTA–DR labour dispute mechanism for violations of labour rights before the next session of the Conference.

The Employer member of Honduras stated that, in the light of the developments that had taken place in the country, it was not necessary to examine the case before this Committee. The Government should be given time to implement the measures it had pledged to take. The Governing Body would examine the report of the country mission, which contained information on the Government’s achievements that clearly indicated its desire to solve the problems. The violence in the country was general in nature and the Government and the employers recognized the need to take measures in that regard.

The Employer member of Mexico stated that the examination of a single case by several bodies went against the principle of judicial safety and proposed that this Committee should not examine the matters covered by the complaint submitted under article 26 of the Constitution. He emphasized that the problems presented were being addressed at the national level within the framework of the Tripartite Commission, which demonstrated the increase in social dialogue. It was also important to highlight the re-establishment of the Office of the Special Prosecutor to investigate crimes against trade unionists. He hoped that the work of the Tripartite Commission would help to determine the real causes of the violence and whether it was directed particularly against unionists.

An observer representing Public Services International (PSI) expressed deep concern at the situation of impunity and violence against trade unions in Guatemala. The anti-union culture was frequently demonstrated and had recently become more serious. Trade unionists were threatened, attacked and murdered. She referred to the murders of the trade unionists in the country, and characterized the situation as a clear violation of labour standards and as evidence of the failure of the Government to fully respect the rights of trade unionists. She expressed her concern about the activities of the CREOMIS and the repression of the trade union movements, which were being subjected to constant harassment.

The Observer member of Spain also expressed her concern in the light of the developments that had taken place in the country. She welcomed the re-establishment of the Office of the Special Prosecutor to investigate crimes against trade unionists and emphasized the need for the Government to take concrete and substantial measures to address the serious problems of insecurity and injustice that were described as cases of uniform and widespread violence. She expressed her concern at the situation of impunity for the violation of workers’ rights and the failure of the Government to implement the recommendations made by the UN special rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Guatemala. She regretted that the Government had not taken the necessary steps to address the serious problems of insecurity and injustice that were described by the author of the report.

The Government member of the United States recalled that, under the terms of the CAFTA–DR, Guatemala was required to comply with its obligations as a member of the ILO, including the obligation to respect the rights set out in Convention No. 87 and other ILO standards. In 2008, unions from Guatemala and the United States had filed a petition calling for the investigation of labour abuses under the labour chapter of the CAFTA–DR. He added that the ILO supervisory bodies played a vital role in the supervision of those standards, which were becoming increasingly important as they were used in the bi-lateral and multilateral agreements that were mum of extreme anti-union violence, the ineffective justice system and the failure to protect trade unionists, which made exercising the right to freedom of association much more dramatic. Although violence was widespread across the country, the denial of the anti-union nature of most murders of trade union leaders was a smokescreen to hide the truth. Wherever that occurred, the existence of an institutalized anti-union culture that did not baulk at murdering trade unionists to instil terror and fear in those exercising trade union rights. In Guatemala, whatever attempts were made to pass off the murders of trade unionists as ordinary crimes resulting from the situation of general insecurity, the State was still responsible for its own lack of diligence in investigating the facts and for failing to prevent such incidents from occurring. In other words, it was responsible for its failure to fulfill its duty to guarantee trade unionists the right to life.

The Worker member of Colombia said that the situation of the violation of human and trade union rights in Guatemala had existed for years and, despite the efforts of the trade union movement to avoid elimination, it had proved impossible to resolve. Indeed, on the contrary, there had been a constant increase in acts of violence in the form of murders, threats and harassment, which meant that the exercise of trade union activities in Guatemala had become the most dangerous of occupations, paid for in life, with such violence becoming more widespread in Latin America. The Committee of Experts had repeatedly asked the Government to take prompt and effective action to ensure the full observance of human and trade union rights, and especially that murder cases be investigated and the perpetrators prosecuted and punished in accordance with the law. But since no such action had been taken in practice, the number of trade union leaders who had been murdered since 2007 now stood at 58, and those responsible for such appalling crimes had not been identified. Impunity reigned in Guatemala, and the Government showed absolute indifference to the fate of trade unionists. The results spoke for themselves: to date, nobody had been tried or even charged for the crimes, despite grave suspicions against certain persons as the instigators of the murders. The prevailing situation of impunity was very serious, as it paved the way for other murders, with criminals being fully aware that they could go calmly about their business, as there were no authorities or judges ready to prosecute, arrest or convict them. He added that some individuals who had been prosecuted and convicted for such crimes against humanity had subsequently been granted judicial reprieve and were once again in full liberty. Responsibility had also been ascribed to others to conceal the identity of the true perpetrators of the crimes. The impunity rate was virtually 100 per cent, with the aggravating circumstance that there was deliberate intent on the part of certain government officials to distort the true motives for the killings, claiming grounds other than trade union activity for the deaths, which was a further violation of rights in addition to the loss of their lives, it stripped the victims, and also their families and colleagues, of their honour and dignity. The ILO now had a major responsibility to determine the appropriate measures to help put an end to such a grave situation of violence against the trade union movement, since such deeds were a continuation of what had been happening elsewhere in Latin America, including in his own country. Colombia. When that occurred, there was a lack of democracy and social justice.

The Worker member of Brazil said that in Latin America even the most progressive governments were overlooking the fact that the Government of Guatemala was allowing its trade union leaders to be murdered. There was a popular saying that silence implied consent. To bring an end to the killings of trade union leaders, agreement was needed between governments to establish an observatory and to follow up violations of trade union rights, and particularly murders. In the midst of this barbarity, the ITUC had promoted an agreement with the Government of Guatemala to bring an end to the murder of trade union leaders once and for all, and also to restore trade union rights and the right to life. He called on all governments and countries to open their eyes to the murders and to halt the genocide of workers and their organizations. They needed to help the Government of Guatemala to maintain stability and defend the right to life and safety of trade union leaders and their organizations. Everyone should join in that effort.

An observer representing the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) emphasized the importance of the Conference Committee taking into account the processes that were under way in Guatemala to improve the situation, as well as the existing cooperation programmes. The Memorandum of Understanding concluded between the Government of Guatemala and the President of the Workers’ group, in parallel to a session of the Governing Body, demonstrated a willingness that should be appreciated. Formal issues appeared to be preventing the adhesion of the Employers’ group to the agreement, but it was prepared to collaborate actively in its development. That willingness did not deny or mask the gravity of the issues of violence, which required urgent investigation, within a climate of generalized violence in certain areas of the country. The employers were aware of that and wished to show their active commitment to improving the situation in Guatemala. The ILO supervisory system needed to promote effectively the achievement of progress and the active involvement of the Government and the social partners. That was important not only in relation to the examination of the present case, but also its content. That commitment would need to be taken into account in future if significant progress was achieved.

The Government representative emphasized the notion of process that pervaded the current debate. His country had for many years been experiencing a situation that could be characterized as a sustained process of omission in the construction of democratic institutions capable of ensuring legality and the rule of law in Guatemala. Over the previous 15 months, under the Government of President Otto Pérez Molina, there had been a sustained and substantive effort to build democratic institutions that guaranteed the full realization of the rights of Guatemalans, the right to life, to physical integrity and to public safety. That was an effort to free the country from a process that pervaded the current debate. The Employer members expressed concern at the generalised climate of violence affecting the freedom of workers’ and employers’ organisations to pursue their activities. They condemned all acts of violence, whatever their origin. They therefore considered it necessary for the independent judicial authorities in Guatemala to identify the real causes behind the violence and its relation to freedom of association. It was urgent for the Government and public institutions to harness their efforts to that end. They said that social dialogue, through the National Tripartite Commission and the Economic and Social Council, would enable solutions to be found to labour issues. They took note with interest of the Memorandum of Understanding signed in March 2013 by the Government of Guatemala and the Workers’ group of the Governing Body and hoped that the issues that it covered would be addressed fully, with ILO assistance. They also hoped that the high-level tripartite representation would be established in the country soon and that the Office would be informed of the conclusions reached and the progress made, so that they could be included in the next report of the Committee of Experts. They considered that the coordinated work of the supervisory bodies and the Government would allow the processes of administrative and judicial reform identified in the report referred to in the report. They emphasized that it was for the Governing Body to deal with matters relating to complaints submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association and the complaint presented the previous year under article 26 of the Constitution. The Conference Committee should therefore await the decisions taken in that regard. On the issue of legislation, they reiterated the position they had stated the previous year concerning the provisions of Convention No. 87. They firmly believed that the right to strike was neither contained in, nor recognized by the Convention, as they had fully explained to the Committee of Experts in a communication dated 29 August 2012. Finally, they emphasized that the current Government of Guatemala had shown its full willingness to find solutions with ILO technical support and that results were starting to be seen in terms of tripartite dialogue, trade union registration, the involvement of public institutions in the protection of trade unionists, the reduction in the length of legal proceedings, and particularly in solving the crimes committed. They also emphasized the increase in the budget of the Ministry of Labour to strengthen labour inspection, and the personal commitment of the President of Guatemala.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the oral and written information provided by the Government and the discussion that took place thereafter.

The Committee observed that the issues in this case concerning this fundamental Convention related to: acts of violence against trade union leaders and members and the situation of impunity in that regard; certain legislative problems, in particular relating to restrictions on the freedom to form organizations and the right to elect trade union leaders in full freedom; limitations in the trade union rights situation in the maquilas and in relation to some public sector workers, as well as in relation to the trade union registration process.

The Committee noted that, in June 2012, some Workers’ delegates to the 101st Session of the International Labour Conference had presented a complaint under article 26 of the ILO Constitution for violation of the Convention. The Committee noted with interest in that regard that the Government, with the involvement and commitment of the President of the Republic, and the Workers’ group of the ILO Governing Body had signed a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU), in the presence of the ILO Director-General, on the basis of which tripartite measures would be taken to ensure the full application of the Convention. The Committee noted that the Governing Body would examine in the near future up-to-date information on the progress made in this regard. The Committee welcomed the information that an ILO representative would be sent to Guatemala in the coming days to assist in solving the problems faced. The Committee also welcomed the announced tripartite high-level mission.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Minister of Labour that, in the framework of a policy of strengthening institutions, a number of steps had been taken to resolve the issues raised, particularly with regard to: establishment of a working group with the participation of the Public Prosecutor and trade union representatives to report on progress in investigating cases of violence; ILO technical assistance for the Office of the Public Prosecutor; increasing the Office of the Public Prosecutor’s budget to fight impunity; promulgation by the Office of the Public Prosecutor of a general instruction on criminal prosecutions in the event of non-compliance with judicial rulings; presentation of a Labour Sanctions Bill; moving labour courts to a single location and reducing the length of judicial proceedings from 19 to six months on average; accelerating the process of registration; a commitment to reduce it from 226 to 20 working days; the important strengthening of the labour inspectorate; the reinforcement of the tripartite national committee; and the establishment and appointment of the Economic and Social Council.

The Committee did not address the right to strike in this case as the employers do not agree that there is a right to strike recognized in Convention No. 87. The Committee took note with concern of the generalized climate of violence in the country and regretted the new allegations of murder and other acts of violence against trade union leaders and members in 2013. While it took note of the important steps taken by the Office of the Public Prosecutor to investigate acts of violence, and of some concrete results with respect to some investigations, the Committee recalled that the freedom of association rights of workers and employers could only be exercised in a climate that was free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind. It urged the Government to continue taking the steps necessary to provide protection for trade union leaders and members under threat with a view to bringing an end to impunity related to acts of violence affecting the trade union movement, and to carry out investigations so that those responsible would be prosecuted and punished.

The Committee emphasized the urgency of fully implementing the Memorandum of Understanding signed between the Government and the Workers’ group of the ILO Governing Body. The Committee urged the Government to take the necessary measures, in consultation with all the social partners, to amend legislation with regard to the issues raised with a view to bringing it fully into conformity with the Convention. The Committee took note that the Government had agreed to work together.

The Speaker referred to a written response his Government had submitted in Case No. 2949, lodged by the Trade Union Congress of Swaziland (TUCOSWA) with the Committee on Freedom of Association, in which it had explained the reasons for the removal of the workers’ federation from the Register of Federations. The Committee on Freedom of Association had considered this case in March 2013 and on that occasion had suggested the amendment of the IRA so as to allow for the registration of federations. The Government, working together with the social partners, had taken concrete steps to comply with the Industrial Court directive and to address the recommendations of the Committee. In this regard, several consultative meetings between the Government, Worker and Employer representatives had been held. Following these consultations, the parties had agreed on the principles that would guide tripartite relations in the country. These principles, which were a product of consultation and consensus, had been published in the Government Gazette as General Notice No. 56 of 2013 (cited as Principles Guiding Tripartite Labour Relations between Swaziland Government, Workers and Employers Notice, 2013). They allowed for the restoration of all tripartite structures, collective bargaining and tripartite consultations. The speaker indicated that the Government had received a letter from TUCOSWA advising of its decision to resume participation in all tripartite structures. This demonstrated unequivocally the full resumption of the good relations between the Government and its social partners. Thus, upon the return of the tripartite delegation to Swaziland, a meeting of the Social Dialogue Committee would be called to develop a plan of action for the next 12 months. The Government had approved and published the amendments to the IRA to provide for the registration of federations, which had been prepared in consultation with the social partners and the ILO (Bill No. 14 of 2013). The Bill was now on its way to Parliament, where further inputs were required from all stakeholders.

In October 2010, the Government, in line with the recommendations of the Committee of Experts, had received a Tripartite High-level Mission, which investigated the country’s compliance with the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). A report of the High-level Mission, together with its recommendations, had been received in December 2010. In order to facilitate the implementation of the recommendations, the ILO had provided technical assistance to, among other things, review the selected legislation. The report from the ILO consultancy had been circulated among the social partners in January 2012 and had formed the agenda for meetings of the Social Dialogue Committee, scheduled for February and March 2012. These visits had been cancelled at the request of workers. Following the High-level Mission, the Government had made some progress, but updates in this respect could not be provided, mainly due to the fact that tripartite consultations and social dialogue in the country had encountered serious challenges throughout 2012 and the first quarter of 2013, which resulted in the tripartite structures not being operational. However, now that the tripartite partners had agreed on working arrangements, the Government was of the view that all of the outstanding issues, as set out in the report of the Committee of Experts, would be attended to as a matter of urgency. Notwithstanding the challenges highlighted above, the Government had made progress on the following issues. The Public Service Bill had been resubmitted to the social partners for review and consideration. The Government stood ready to finalize the Bill in consultation with the social partners and the ILO. With regard to the determination of a minimum service in the sanitary services, the Government was confident that, with the restoration of relations with the social partners, this matter would be finalized before the end of 2013. A proposal to amend sections 40 and 97 of the IRA had been tabled before the Labour Advisory Board for consideration in 2012 and formed part of the agenda for the Social Dialogue Committee. The Government firmly hoped that the amendments would be effected. Moreover, a Bill (Correctional Services Bill) had been drafted and tabled before the National Steering Committee on Social Dialogue for its consideration and input in 2012. However, progress on this issue would be realised once the Committee resumed its business. The plan of action would give priority to all issues relating to freedom of association and collective bargaining. With regard to the King’s 1973 Proclamation, in the Government’s view, (given to the ILO and acknowledged in the 2013 Report of the Committee of Experts) there was no state of emergency in the country. Extensive information in this regard had been provided to the social partners. As proposed by the Committee of Experts, the Government would nevertheless convene a meeting with the social partners to discuss this issue and was confident that this would put the matter to rest. Following the Government’s request, the amendment of the Public Order Act was being amended. It was necessary to finalize and adopt the code, which should continue to be a blueprint guiding relations in industrial action. The Government had also agreed to amend the Suppression of Terrorism Act, especially the definition of “terrorist” and, in this respect, the Attorney-General was working with the line ministries and international agencies concerned. The Government was committed to streamlining social dialogue activities. In 2012–13, two tripartite delegations had visited South Africa and Norway on study tours. These visits had enabled the team to benchmark mandates, governance structures and best practice for meaningful and effective social dialogue in Swaziland. The Government expressed its thanks and gratitude to the Governments and social partners of these two countries for imparting their experiences, sharing their knowledge and providing advice on good practice.

The speaker noted that May Day was a paid public holiday and that workers celebrated this day. As was the practice, the police meet with organizers of any public gathering in order to discuss, among other issues, logistics and security. This year, plans for May Day demonstrations and other industrial action, as an interim measure, while the Public Order Act was being amended. It was necessary to finalize and adopt the code, which should continue to be a blueprint guiding relations in industrial action. 2013 which, in addition, ordered the Government and TUCOSWA to negotiate a solution to the federation’s registration. The Worker members stressed the Committee on Freedom of Association’s declaration that a ban on the registration of a trade union that had previously been legally recognized could not take effect until before the deadline for appealing against the decision had expired, if a decision taken by a court of first instance had not yet been confirmed on appeal. Setting conditions for registration that were tantamount to requiring prior authorization from the public authorities to set up a trade union or for it to function was incontrovertibly a violation of the Convention. In practical terms, such a situation was liable to hinder severely the possibility of establishing a trade union and thereby constituted a denial of the right to do so without prior authorization. The administrative authorities should not be able to deny an organization registration simply because they considered that it might engage in activities that went beyond normal trade union matters. Respect for freedom of association was part and parcel of a democracy, and vice versa. The Worker members emphasized that, according to the principles embodied in the Convention, the public authorities must refrain from any form of intervention that might restrict the exercise of the right to establish and join trade unions. Yet several legal texts in force in Swaziland did not respect the principle of non-interference at all. Article 14 of the Constitution stipulated that peaceful assembly and association was inviolable, but, at the same time, article 25 provided that the principle could be restricted in the interest, inter alia, of public morality. Although the Committee on Freedom of Association had declared that the right to hold meetings was an essential component of freedom of association and that public authorities must refrain from any form of intervention that was liable to restrict that right, unless its exercise was such as to endanger public morality, reasons that were vaguely defined as involving public morality could not be deemed to be a threat to public order.

With regard to the public service, the Worker members recalled that a Bill was currently being discussed in the two chambers of Parliament but that it had not been adopted within the deadline and the procedure had had to begin all over again, which showed the advantage of the workers’ organizations being freely and broadly consulted during the preparation and implementation of legislation affecting their interests. The Worker members noted for several years that the Committee had been asking the Government to have the 1963 Public Order Act amended, yet the Government had still not supplied any information on steps it might have taken to ensure that the Act was not used to justify interference in union meetings or activities in support of union demands. As to the amendment of the legislation guaranteeing prison staff the right to organize in defence of their economic and social interests, the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Affairs had submitted the Correctional Services (Prison) Bill to the Social Dialogue Committee on 13 July 2011. Not being able to examine the Bill, however, the social Dialogue Committee passed it on to the Cabinet. The Cabinet, in turn, considering that the social partners should have a say in the drafting of the text, had transmitted it to the Labour Advisory Council in September 2012. The Worker members were worried that the Bill appeared to have been set aside.

The Employer members expressed the hope that the Government would continue and that the Government would pursue its work in cooperation with the ILO.

Regarding the determination of the minimum services in the sanitary services, the Employer members noted that the Committee of Experts had been requesting the Government to amend the IRA in order to recognize the right to strike in the sanitary services. In this respect, the Employer members reiterated their position that the Convention did not contain an explicit reference to the right to strike and recalled that their position had been established in detail during last year’s discussion on the General Report and General Survey. They continued to rely on this position. There was no consensus in this Committee concerning the fact that the right to strike was recognized in the Convention. Accordingly, they were of the view that the Committee of Experts should refrain in the future and detain trade union leaders constituted a serious violation of the principle of freedom of association. The right to organize public meetings, including rallies, constituted an important aspect of trade union rights. The case had unfortunately been on the Committee’s agenda for far too long and there seemed to be no way of pressuring the Government to take decisive action. The Committee should therefore adopt a firm conclusion.

The Employer members welcomed the information provided by the Government indicating that steps were being taken to deal with the registration of trade unions and to strengthen social dialogue. Although they considered that it was an extremely serious case, they perceived some progress from the information provided by the Government, which would have to be assessed by the Committee of Experts. The Committee of Experts had examined this case on 19 occasions and the Conference Committee had included this case in a special paragraph in 2009 and 2010. This case was also examined in 2011 when this Committee considered the conclusions and recommendations of the Tripartite High-level Mission that had visited the country in October 2010. The following three issues were considered in 2011: the violation of civil liberties; the interference in the exercise of the right to form trade union activities; and the lack of social dialogue. On that occasion, the Employer members had already noted a change in the Government’s attitude. However, they considered that this change of attitude had to be confirmed by future actions and thus encouraged the Government to make use of ILO technical assistance. In 2011, the Committee concluded that as long as the legislation restricting freedom of association and basic civil liberties was in force, compliance with the Convention was not ensured. It thus requested the Government to intensify its efforts to institutionalize social dialogue and to provide a roadmap for the implementation of the long-called-for measures. This year, the Committee of Experts’ observation dealt with the same three issues.

With regard to the Public Service Bill, noting the Government’s willingness to work with the social partners in order to enact the law, the Employer members encouraged the Government to provide information on the progress made and expressed the hope that it would be in full compliance with the Convention, and that it would include access to a complaints procedure with the possibility of judicial proceedings with enforcement authority. The Employer members expressed the hope that the Government would resume discussions with the social partners in the framework of the Social Dialogue Committee on the recommendations made by the ILO. The progress could be reported in the near future in this regard. In particular, the Employer members encouraged the Government to provide information on the outcome of the discussions carried out with the social partners on the status of the 1973 Proclamation, as well as on the amendment of the 1963 Public Order Act. They expressed the hope that the progress achieved during the last 12 months would continue and that the Government would pursue its work in cooperation with the ILO.
from requesting the Government to amend the IRA in order to recognize the right to strike in the sanitary services because this fell outside the scope of its mandate. This should not be construed as an indication that this was not an important case. The Government had to reply on many other issues and the Employer members hoped that the Court would be able to note progress in the next months and that the Government would continue to cooperate with the ILO.

The Worker member of Swaziland recalled that the national Constitution, adopted in 2005, contained a Bill of Rights, which guaranteed freedom of association. However, the Government had continued to violate these rights flagrantly. TUCOSWA had been registered on 25 January 2012, following a consultative process with the Government. It was the only national centre, a product of the merging of the SFTU and the SFL, which had been dissolved in accordance with their constitutions and the national laws, paving the way for the establishment of the new entity. The coming into being of TUCOSWA and the unification of the labour movement had been commended by the Government. However, the Government had deregistered TUCOSWA, allegedly because there was no provision in the IRA for the registration and merging of federations. This was despite the fact that sections 32 and 41 of the Act provided for the existence, regulation and merging of federations. Consequently, workers were not represented within the industrial sphere, in particular in the tripartite structures. Social dialogue was virtually dead in the country. This was a clear violation of Conventions Nos 87 and 98. As a result, tripartism and social dialogue were non-functional; all the Federation's activities had been banned. Furthermore, on 1 May 2012, the police had brutally confiscated all of the Federation's belongings and arrested and harassed trade union leaders and their members. On 1 May 2013, the police had once again removed and confiscated the Federation's belongings, brutally arrested and confined, detained and kept under house arrest the TUCOSWA leadership and raided its offices. The commemoration of TUCOSWA's anniversary on 9 March 2013, had been brutally stopped by a battalion of military and police. The shop stewards meeting for the Federation had also been brutally stopped on 19 April 2013. In an attempt to legalize the unlawful act of deregistration of TUCOSWA, the Government had approached the Industrial Court for an order declaring that TUCOSWA was not a federation in terms of the IRA. The Court had ruled in total disregard of ILO standards and the spirit of section 4 of the Convention an earlier Interim Court of Appeal, which held that ILO Conventions were part of the labour laws of Swaziland. The Government's misleading interpretation of the word "organization" in considering that it excluded "federations" was contrary to Article 10 of the Convention. Despite a directive of the Court ordering the parties to agree on a method of operation, the Government had refused to sign the memorandum of agreement which had been agreed to by the parties on 24 May 2013. It was the Union's understanding that this agreement was the modus operandi as directed by the Court. However, acting in bad faith, the Government unilaterally produced a general notice. Ever since the Government had discovered the alleged lacuna in the Act in 2011, it had not taken any steps to remedy the defect. Notwithstanding the encouragement by the Court in February 2013 that the Government should facilitate the legislative process as a matter of urgency, it had failed to do so until 23 May 2013 when the purported amendments had been published in the Government Gazette. The mere publication did not mean that the amendment was before Parliament. As of now, there had been no prospects of the Bill, whether agreed by the parties or not, being passed into law, given that Parliament was probably bound to be dissolved by the end of June, giving way to national parliamentary elections. It was important to stress that the Bill had been unilaterally crafted by the Government and was not a product of consultation. As a result, the Bill contained provisions which were in conflict with the provisions of the Convention.

The King's Proclamation was still part of the laws of Swaziland as it had not been expressly repealed by the King, as required by the same Proclamation. It could therefore not be argued that, by virtue of section 2 of the Constitution, the Proclamation had “died a natural death". He recalled that the Proclamation violated the workers' fundamental rights and civil liberties and that the ILO consultancy had recommended that the Government institute legal proceedings to obtain a definitive ruling from the country's highest court as to the status of provisions of the Proclamation. The Government had so far ignored and rejected this recommendation. The Government had also ignored the recommendation to amend the 1963 Public Order Act so as to ensure that legitimate and peaceful trade union activities could take place without interference. Instead, the Government used the police and the army to prevent workers from engaging in legitimate and peaceful activity, all the while excluding federations. As a result, the Police had refused to recognize the workers' representatives in the tripartite structures. In view of the above, it was clear that the situation in Swaziland must be thoroughly investigated.

The Employer member of Swaziland referred to the situation faced by workers' and employers' federations in the country, which, though still difficult, had improved. She indicated that the IRA, while defining what a federation was, did not make provisions for their registration. As a consequence, the registration of TUCOSWA, which was the result of a merging of workers' federations, was considered by the Industrial Court as null and void. This was confirmed by subsequent judicial decisions. According to the speaker, the rights of workers, which were guaranteed by the Constitution, could not be restricted to unions, while excluding federations. As a result, none of the following tripartite statutory boards and committees could function: the National Steering Committee on Social Dialogue, the Labour Advisory Board and the Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration Commission. Several meetings had been carried out and a mission from the Southern Africa Trade Union Co-ordination Council (SATUCC) had taken place in order to overcome the impasse. Finally, the parties had agreed to a modus operandi: the Government had issued a general notice where it recognised the workers' and employers' federations to exist "in terms of their own Constitutions". Furthermore, the Government issued the Industrial Relation (Amendment) Bill No. 14 of 2013, which provided for the registration of federations. However, as long as this Bill was not approved, the decision of the Court prevailed.

In respect of the May Day reported house arrests, the speaker indicated that following the Court decision, workers' federations could not participate in the celebrations and that the leaders had been reportedly placed under house arrest. She considered that this was a devastating assault on freedom of association and assembly. Concerning the right to strike, the speaker recalled that the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) had indicated over the years that the right to strike was not mentioned in the Convention. With respect to the Public Service Bill, she indicated that it had been debated by the Labour Advisory Board, that the social partners had had the occasion to point out some provisions as unconstitutional and that ILO assistance was sought in this respect. The Correctional Services (Prison) Bill, which provided organizational rights to prison staff, was on the agenda of the Labour Advisory Board which had recently finalized the Employment Bill 2012. The Code of Good Practices on Managing Industrial and Protest Action was awaiting adoption by the National Steering Committee on Social Dialogue, after having been discussed with the social partners and the police service in order to define the role of the police in protests and industrial actions. Regarding the report requested to assist the Government in aligning its laws with ILO Conventions, which examined the 1973 Proclamation, the 1963 Public Order Act and the 2011 Suppression of Terrorism Act, the speaker indicated that it was tabled in a meeting of the National Steering Committee on Social Dialogue. She noted that the progress achieved justified that her country be removed from the special paragraph and that all technical assistance be provided to ensure that the respect of fundamental rights was balanced with economic growth.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom pointed out that in Swaziland, expressing support for TUCOSWA was proscribed and that being associated with, or mentioning this federation could be the basis for an arrest. She questioned the Government’s stated intention to bring the IRA, the 1973 Proclamation, the 1963 Public Order Act and other enactments into conformity with the Convention and refuted the Government’s suggestion that the social partners were somehow responsible for the delay of consultations in this regard. The truth was very different: TUCOSWA had been registered for only two months in 2012 before it had announced a boycott of the election; the discussions referred to by the Government had been arranged for a time known to be impossible for the Federation to participate; the deregistration of the Federation in April 2012 had ended any chance of discussion with a view to changing the legislation. The Industrial Court had decided that the Government should change the law so as to allow TUCOSWA to operate. If the Government failed to do this immediately, it would show that the Government was still far from being ready to end its persecution and harassment of trade unionists and that further urgent action must be taken to guarantee fundamental trade union and human rights.

The Worker member of Norway, referring also to the trade unions of other Nordic countries, observed that the Committee of Experts had once again noted the continuation of a series of long-standing violations of the Convention in Swaziland, concerning which the Government had already appeared before the Committee on numerous occasions. The Government appeared to be engaged in a continuous trade union and had failed to register the new representative trade union, TUCOSWA, which it regarded as illegal, even though it had been entered in the tax register. Examples of the continued repression of activities by trade unions and civil society included the prevention by the police, without a court order, of a prayer session to commemorate the first anniversary of TUCOSWA. A peaceful demonstration and a march had resulted in acts of violence, resulting in the shooting of several demonstrators. The 2013 May Day celebrations of TUCOSWA had also been repressed, with the trade union leaders being placed under house arrest. It was clear that systematic violations were continuing of the right to organize, to assembly and to peaceful protest, which were protected by the Convention and the 1998 ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work.

The Government member of the United States stated that her Government had been following the case closely for several years, particularly in the context of Swaziland’s continued eligibility for trade preferences under the African Growth and Opportunity Act. The long-standing case essentially comprised three themes: violation of civil liberties, interference in trade union affairs, and lack of effective social dialogue. While acknowledging that some steps had been taken, much still remained to be done to give effect to the recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies which, together with the technical advice and assistance provided, offered a detailed outline for bringing national law and practice into compliance with the Convention. In that regard, she referred to the Committee of Experts’ concerns over the continued interference in peaceful public gatherings, including the detention of trade union leaders during the 2013 May Day celebration. Moreover, many legislative texts and orders permitted the authorities to repress or penalize legitimate trade union activities, and there was a continued absence of legislation to recognize labour federations, as demonstrated by the deregistration of TUCOSWA in April 2012. She also noted the continued lack of a robust and institutionalized process for genuine and meaningful social dialogue. As the Government had frequently expressed its commitment to ensuring compliance with the Convention, her Government urged it to promote and protect freedom of association and of assembly, as outlined in ILO Conventions and the national Constitution. The Government should continue to work closely with the ILO to carry out all of the legislative reforms recommended by the Committee of Experts, and to implement those measures with a rigorous system of labour inspection, an administrative complaints process and an independent judiciary with enforcement authority. With reference to TUCOSWA, and noting the Government’s efforts to engage with the federation temporarily under a general notice, her Government urged it to expedite efforts to adopt legislation recognizing the right of labour federations to exist and operate fully under the Industrial Relations Act. Her Government hoped that it would very soon be possible to record concrete and sustainable progress towards full conformity with the letter and spirit of the Convention.

The Government member of Norway, also speaking on behalf of the Government members of Denmark, Finland, Iceland and Sweden, stated that, although action had been taken to give effect to the rights of freedom of expression, organization and association in the Constitution, the social partners had indicated that those rights were not effective in practice. There appeared to be a general lack of progress in giving effect to the constitutional provisions on those matters, despite the present case being examined by the Committee on numerous occasions. They therefore urged the Government not to remove all obstacles to the enjoyment in practice of the rights set out in the Convention. The Government should also take action to comply with the request by the Committee of Experts that it take all necessary steps to proceed to the registration of TUCOSWA, including legislative measures if necessary. In that respect, they noted the proposal to amend the IRA and recalled that the Committee of Experts had highlighted several legislative problems, including those relating to the 1963 Public Order Act. They therefore urged the Government to ensure that all its legislation was in conformity with the Convention and to avail itself of ILO technical assistance for that purpose.

The Worker member of Nigeria emphasized that the systematic and consistent violations of the rights of workers, which had been examined by the Committee on numerous occasions, were growing worse than ever and had become entrenched in Government action, with administrative and security measures being used to thwart any semblance of freedom and statutory rights. In particular, the Government and the security agencies had aggressively augmented their attacks against the workers, their organizations, leaders and activities. In March 2013, the workers in the country had been forcibly prevented from holding a thanksgiving prayer meeting to commemorate the first anniversary of TUCOSWA. Earlier, in February, the police had used... force to prevent the holding of a prayer session by civil society organizations to address the deterioration in the national socio-economic situation. In so doing, the police had disregarded the national Constitution, which guaranteed the rights of association, assembly and religion. In April, civil society organizations had once again been prevented from organizing a session on the state of democracy and human rights in the country following 40 years of the state of emergency. The authorities did not hide their determination to clamp down on the right of workers to assemble freely and independently, and were treating TUCOSWA as an illegitimate organization, in contradiction with the latest judicial ruling on its registration. Examples of anti-trade union repression included the action taken against the May Day celebration, which had led to ten trade union leaders being placed under house arrest and the detention of workers wearing TUCOSWA T-shirts. Wonder Mkhonza, Secretary-General of the Swaziland Processing, Refining and Allied Workers Union (SPRAWU), had recently been granted bail, after over 45 days in jail, as a result of a global campaign launched out of fear for his physical safety. It should be recalled that Sipho Jele, a trade union activist, had died in a police cell in 2010 in similar circumstances. It had also been recently reported by the media that the Prime Minister had instructed the heads of parastatal institutions not to recognize trade unions affiliated to TUCOSWA. The Committee should therefore take due note of the ceaseless attacks by the Government on democratic and civil liberties with a view to defending and protecting the abused and harassed workers.

The Government member of Zambia stated that her Government commended the Government on the progress made in redressing the core issues that had led to the stand-off between the Government and the social partners. Her Government encouraged the Government to take decisive steps, through a consultative process, to adapt the legal framework to allow for the registration of trade union federations. It should also follow the principles of the promotion of tripartism, which would be vital for continued progress at the national level. Her Government commended the ILO for the technical and other support that had been provided to Swaziland. Her Government hoped that the Government would make further progress in putting in place the necessary measures to resolve the other outstanding issues and in ensuring the effective implementation of the legal measures that had been adopted.

The Worker member of Brazil expressed the solidarity and indignation of Brazilian workers in supporting a democracy that was directly linked to the principle of freedom of association. In Swaziland, there was a climate of police violence and persecution against trade unionists and union leaders that was incompatible with both freedom of association and democracy. In Brazil, workers had experienced persecution, having lived through over 20 years of dictatorship. Possibly the best example of the parallel and interdependent growth of democracy and freedom of association in Brazil had been the election of a trade unionist as President. Today, the workers of Brazil were organizing events in 27 of the federal states against a Bill that would reduce rights through flexibility and increase outsourcing. He referred to his own country in order to provide an historical context to illustrate how violations of the rights enshrined in the Convention ended up creating barriers to the development of democracy by limiting and criminalizing social movements. The violations of the rights of workers in Swaziland were outrageous and it was imperative that the requisite measures were taken to address them.

The Government member of Zimbabwe stated that, having listened carefully to the information provided by all parties, his Government urged the Government and the social partners to continue their engagement in good faith with a view to dealing with the issues under discussion. The Government was also called on to continue providing support to the Government and the social partners. He added that, within the context of the Southern African Development Community (SADC) Employment and Labour Sector Issue Platform under the Chairmanship of Swaziland, the issues under discussion were not only to Swaziland, but also other countries in the subregion as they moved towards economic integration as part of the efforts made to improve compliance with international labour standards. The discussions, which included workers and employers, were focussed on the need to harmonize labour laws and practices entailed by the process of economic integration.

The Worker member of the United States indicated that Swaziland was part of the Southern African Customs Union and the Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa, both of which had trade agreements with the United States. It was also eligible for preferential trade benefits under the United States African Growth and Opportunity Act, which established the requirement for the countries concerned not to engage in violations of internationally recognized human rights and to cooperate in international efforts to eliminate violations of those rights, which included the right of association and the right to organize and bargain collectively. It was clear that the Government was utterly failing to protect those rights, and indeed was working to deny them to its citizens. The primary exports from Swaziland to the United States were textiles and apparel. Yet, it was reported that many textile workers were not even paid the national minimum wage, which varied between US$5 and US$81 a month. In addition, the right to freedom of association and to organize, through which working conditions could be improved, were severely restricted and workers who attempted to exercise those rights were faced by a harsh legal environment and often by severe and violent repression. National law required police consent and a permit from the municipal council to hold meetings, marches or demonstrations in a public place, but the authorities routinely withheld their consent for such events. The law also required the registration of unions, but granted far-reaching powers to the Government to determine eligibility for registration, and the decisions taken were not subject to judicial scrutiny. Employers were granted discretion under the law on whether or not to recognize labour organizations where fewer than 50 per cent of employees were members of the organization, while workers in many occupations, including police and firefighters, health workers and many parts of the civil service, were prohibited from forming unions. The severe and violent repression of trade unionists by the police and the Government sent a clear message that attempts to organize would be met with harsh resistance. The Government therefore needed to cooperate with the ILO and undertake serious reform measures to meet its obligations under the Convention.

The Government member of Morocco stated that the measures adopted by the Government fell into two categories: legislative and regulatory; and promotional, through social dialogue. Respect for freedom of association in practice presupposed tripartite collaboration, the promotion of a culture of social dialogue and negotiation. As the Government had expressed its willingness to respect the freedom of association, the Office should support it in the practical implementation of the Convention, especially as the Government acknowledged that there were gaps and shortcomings in the legislation. In addition, as the Government had stated its willingness to amend the legislation, to revise the Industrial Relations Act and to opt for tripartism, it was important that it should be given time to overcome the difficulties identified.
The Worker member of South Africa observed that the contribution made by South African workers to defeating apartheid and the development of multi-party constitutional democracy was well documented. Their recent wretched experiences had taught them that in the absence of pluralism in a manifestly discriminatory regime, civil liberties and human dignity could continue with business as usual. He therefore urged the Committee to stand up to those repressive practices and to encourage social dialogue to promote the decent work agenda in the country. The ILO's efforts to develop arrangements to promote the decent work agenda in the country had never demonstrated any genuine commitment to rectify that situation, that the issue of intimidation, harassment and the oppression of trade union rights, the Government remained obstinate and unwieldy to offer assistance to help reform and improve its democratic and human rights processes. The assistance offered by the South African Parliament and of interaction with the National Economic Development and Labour Council (NEDLAC) had been rebuffed and the Swazi Government had never demonstrated any genuine commitment to reforming its Practice with a view to improving respect for civil liberties. The ILO's efforts to develop arrangements to promote the decent work agenda in the country had been frustrated by the Government. The situation with regard to civil liberties in the country was dire and deteriorating. It was clear that the Government wished to wear out progressive forces and voices of reason so that it could continue with business as usual. He therefore urged the Committee to stand up to those repressive practices and to remain firm in the defence and protection of civil liberties and human dignity.

The Government member of Kenya affirmed his Government's commitment to freedom of association and noted the progress made in Swaziland, particularly in terms of institutional and legislative change. However, his Government appreciated that there were still some milestones to be covered and that challenges lay ahead. The Government was urged to continue engaging in dialogue with the social partners with a view to further consolidating the foundations for continuous consultation, participation and engagement.

The Government member of South Sudan stated the efforts that were being made by the Government to promote the participation of the social partners, the public and the Labour Advisory Board and ensure their input into legislation. However, his Government recognized that there was a gap in the IRA, and that action to remedy this gap would have to be accelerated. It should be noted that the amendment proposed had been confirmed by the Industrial Court, which included representation of employers and workers. He stated that progress was being made on the issues under discussion. The Public Service Bill, which had lapsed, was again before the social partners. A Correctional Services Bill had also been prepared, and the Government would inform the Committee of the progress made in that regard. The amendments to the Suppression of Terrorism Act would also be communicated, as was improving respect for the Convention.

The Government representative thanked all the speakers, particularly those who had acknowledged the efforts made by the social partners and the Government. In response to the issues raised, he indicated that the question of the invasion of trade union offices was still under investigation. He added that, although Wonder Mkhonza was a trade union member, he had been detained and arrested for matters unrelated to his trade union activities. Sipho Jele had never been a trade union member, and indeed had never worked. Moreover, the reports that the Prime Minister had ordered employers not to deal with TUCOSWA affiliates was merely a media creation. In fact, the Prime Minister had referred to unions that were not recognized by law. He stated, with regard to the general notice, that a letter had been received from the Secretary-General of the TUCOSWA that it would resume participation in all tripartite structures. The suspension of those structures had been lifted. It should also be noted that Swazi workers had engaged in activities with their counterparts in South Africa and other countries, including with NEDLAC, which had been contacted by a tripartite delegation to see how the social dialogue system worked in South Africa. It should be noted that no trade union in Swaziland was proscribed. However, his Government recognized that there was a gap in the IRA, and that action to remedy this gap would have to be accelerated. It should be noted that the amendment proposed had been confirmed by the Industrial Court, which included representation of employers and workers. He stated that progress was being made on the issues under discussion. The Public Service Bill, which had lapsed, was again before the social partners. A Correctional Services Bill had also been prepared, and the Government would inform the Committee of the progress made in that regard. The amendments to the Suppression of Terrorism Act would also be communicated, as was improving respect for the Convention.

The Worker members recalled that in 2011 the Committee had urged the Government to intensify its efforts to institutionalize social dialogue in the long term at the various levels of government and to ensure a climate of democracy in which fundamental human rights were fully guaranteed. A schedule for the discussion of the issues raised by the Committee of Experts should also be adopted as soon as possible in consultation with the social partners and with ILO technical assistance, as well as a roadmap for the effective implementation of a series of measures that had long been identified. They included amending the Public Order Act of 1963 so that legitimate and peaceful union activity could be carried out without interference; receiving ILO technical assistance for police training and the drafting of guidelines to ensure observance of the fundamental rights established in the Convention; amending the Suppression of Terrorism Act so that it could not be used to restrict trade union activities; and placing the Public Service Bill on the agenda of the Steering Committee on Social Dialogue to ensure tripartite discussion before it was adopted. No measures had been implemented since the previous examination. The Committee should therefore adopt very firm conclusions and propose that the Government accept a high-level tripartite fact-finding mission to assess the issue of non-compliance with the Convention with the support of government officials and ILO experts, accompanied by representatives from the Bureau for Workers' Activities (ACTRAV) and the Bureau for Employers' Activities (ACT/EMP). The Committee should also ensure that urgent measures were taken to establish the independence of an independent judiciary, without which respect for human rights in general and for freedom of association in particular could not be guaranteed. The Worker members considered that the gravity of the case justified its inclusion in a special paragraph of the Committee's report.

The Employer members acknowledged the promising developments made by the Government. However, much still remained to be done to achieve full compliance with the Convention. The information provided by the Government showed that there was now a basis for expediting the work towards achieving compliance with the Convention in law and practice with ILO assistance. Efforts should be concentrated on helping the Government to finalise its legislation on addressing the legislative and practical issues identified in a meaningful manner. ILO technical assistance would be essential for progress to be made and the Employer members therefore called on the Government to continue its cooperation with the Office. They also supported the suggestion that a fact-finding mission should visit the country, consisting of ILO officials and representatives of ACT/EMP and ACTRAV. The Employer members hoped that the Committee’s conclusions would reflect their longstanding views on the right to strike under the Convention. They hoped that the Government would continue to build on the small steps that had been taken up to now to achieve compliance with the Convention and that social dialogue would be improved as part of its efforts to give full effect to the Convention.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that ensued.

The Committee noted the grave issues in this case concerning this fundamental Convention refer, in particular, to the revocation of the registration of the voluntarily unified Trade Union Congress of Swaziland (TUCOSWA) in April 2012 and the determination that the legislation left a lacuna concerning the registration of any federation of workers or employers; and the impact of the various legislative texts, including the 1963 Public Order Act, on the exercise of freedom of association rights.

The Committee welcomed the information provided by the Government on the publication of the Industrial Relations (Amendment) Bill aimed at providing a legislative framework in which federations of trade unions and of employers could be registered, as well as the principles guiding tripartite labour relations between the Swaziland Government, Workers and Employers, to which the Government asserted all social partners had agreed and which would enable the effective functioning of the tripartite structures in the country pending the adoption of the Industrial Relations Amendment Bill. The Committee also noted the Government’s statement that all pending legislative issues would be attended to within the framework of the relevant tripartite institutions as a matter of urgency, including the recommendation made by the ILO consultancy in relation to the 1973 King’s Proclamation, the 1963 Public Order Act and the Suppression of Terrorism Act. Finally, the Committee noted that the Government reiterated its commitment to observe and implement Convention No. 87 in respect of federations of workers and employers. The Government undertakes to give full updates by the next session of the Committee of Experts in 2013.

The Committee did not address the right to strike in this case as the employers do not agree that there is a right to strike provided in Convention No. 87.

The Committee strongly urged the Government to immediately take the necessary steps to ensure that the social partners’ views were duly taken into account in the finalisation of the Industrial Relations Amendment Bill and that it would be adopted without delay. It is expected that this action will enable all the social partners in the country to be recognized and registered under the law, in full conformity with the Convention. In the meantime, it also expected that the tripartite structures in the country would effectively function with the full participation of TUCOSWA, the Federation of Swazi Employers and Chamber of Commerce, and the Federation of the Swazi Business Community and that the Government would guarantee that these organizations could exercise their rights under the Convention and the Industrial Relations Act of 2000. The Committee further urged the Government to ensure that immediate, significant and concrete progress shall be made within the framework of the social dialogue mechanisms in the country in relation to the other pending matters on which it has been commenting for many years, in particular, the improvement in the training of police forces to this end. The Committee expected that the Government will adopt, in consultation with the social partners, a code of conduct relating to the application of the Public Order Act. The Committee further recalled the intrinsic link between freedom of association and democracy and the importance of an independent judiciary in order to guarantee full respect for these fundamental rights. The Committee called on the Government to accept a high-level ILO fact-finding mission to assess the tangible progress made on all of the abovementioned matters and requested that this information, as well as a detailed report from the Government, be transmitted to the Committee of Experts for examination at its next meeting this year.

The Worker members stated that the Government should immediately proceed to the registration of TUCOSWA and give full effect to all the rights that are recognized to it in the IRA.

ZIMBABWE (ratification: 2003)

A Government representative indicated that his Government had accepted all seven recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and the ILO technical assistance package and that it had committed itself to working together with the social partners and the Office for the implementation of those recommendations. In accordance with the Committee’s conclusions adopted in 2011, the Government was making progress towards the implementation of the Action Plan which had been endorsed by the social partners as a roadmap for carrying out the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry in a focused and systematic manner. His Government appreciated the fact that the Committee of Experts had noted the progress made in the area of capacity building involving several state actors who interfaced directly or indirectly with trade unionists. However, capacity-building activities had not been limited to state actors but were extended to non-state actors such as independent arbitrators, designated agents of the employment councils/bargaining councils and lawyers in private practice. Subject to availability of resources, the capacity-building training programmes should be taken regularly to involve new players. Progress had also been noted by the Committee of Experts in the area of strengthening social dialogue, particularly as regards the proposed establishment of a chamber for social dialogue. A zero draft of the Tripartite Negotiating Forum (TNF) Bill was now in place. This draft was drawn up in December 2012 after approval by Cabinet of the principles of the TNF legislation and the Attorney-General’s Office was currently working towards the actual draft bill. The speaker went on to say that the Zimbabwe Human Rights Commission Act was passed into law in October 2012 paving the way for the Commission to start its work. However, due to budgetary constraints, the Commission did not have readily available resources to roll out its programmes. Yet, the Government and the social partners held information-sharing sessions with the members of the Commission as well as the Organ on National Healing, Reconciliation and Integration (ONHR). These two structures needed to mainstream human rights in the world of work and to this end, senior officials from the ONHR were part of the state players who received capacity building in the area of international labour standards. As regards the complaint submitted to the ILO by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning alleged cases of suspension and mass dismissal of workers who had participated in strikes and protests at their respective workplaces, the speaker stated that such challenges also extend to the workplace. The trade unions provided for in the Labour Act. The Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) should advise the concerned workers to approach the district labour offices in their respective areas. Otherwise, the Ministry of Labour had no information about the alleged cases of suspension and mass dismissal of workers. Concerning the situation of Ms Hambira, the General Secretary of the General Agricultural and Plantation Workers’ Union of Zimbabwe (GAPWUZ) who was allegedly in forced exile, the Government representative reiterated that Ms Hambira had no pending case and that she was never arrested nor was she a wanted person. Just like any other Zimbabwean living abroad, Ms Hambira was free to return when she deemed fit and therefore the recommendation that the Government should take necessary measures to ensure her safety upon her return was unfounded.

Referring to the comments of the Committee of Experts concerning the Public Order and Security Act (POSA) and the alleged difficulties of the ZCTU in organizing public gatherings to commemorate the International Women’s Day and Labour Day in 2012, the speaker acknowledged that the ZCTU encountered similar problems in Masvingo, a provincial capital, during preparations for the 2013 Workers Day celebrations. The POSA was never meant to apply to bona fide trade union activities and it had an exclusion provision to that effect. Through information-sharing sessions pertaining to the relationship between international labour standards and national laws and practices, state actors were becoming increasingly aware of the thin dividing line between trade unionism and politics. Only three such information-sharing sessions had been conducted since 2011 involving about 90 law enforcement agents and many of the law enforcement agencies in the outer areas still needed to be included. Once those agencies were covered, there would be zero incidents in which POSA would be invoked. Three more workshops were planned with the law enforcement agencies at the national level in July/August 2013, as well as the organization of information-sharing sessions to all of the ten provinces, and of a tripartite workshop before the end of the year with the participation of law enforcement agencies and the tripartite social partners in the labour market. The Employer members urged the Government to provide further information without delay concerning initiatives to undertake a full review, in cooperation with the social partners, of the application of the POSA in practice, concrete steps to enable the promulgation of clear lines of conduct for the police and security forces in terms of the POSA and the Human Rights Bill to operationalize the Human Rights Commission. In addition, the Cabinet was currently discussing the draft principles for the harmonization and review of labour laws and a Cabinet task force had been constituted in October 2012 to examine them. The Government representative concluded by thanking the Office for providing technical and financial support in connection with the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. His Government would not only ensure that the resources were used well but would also ensure that there was compliance with the provisions of Convention No. 87 and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), both in law and practice.

The Employer members recalled the historical developments leading up to the present discussion, including the ILO technical assistance package launched in Harare in August 2010, which involved a high-level information-sharing session with senior ILO officials, an agreed upon roadmap of key activities between September and December 2010 and consultations with the social partners concerning a February 2011 timeline to implement those activities. The Government had, prior to the discussion of the case in 2011, provided information in writing regarding the measures it had purportedly taken to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and the Committee of Experts’ requests, and had indicated that it would submit a detailed reply concerning those measures in its next report. However, before the 2011 discussion, the Government indicated that progress had not been made owing to administrative obstacles, although work had begun on the basis of the roadmap, and that, if it was listed by the Committee in a future session, it would be able to report on its progress. Although the report submitted in 2011 was constructive, the Government needed to adopt substantive changes in line with the Convention’s requirements. The Employer members urged the Government to provide a detailed report outlining the outcome and status of reported initiatives, including the participation of Supreme Court judges in a training course on international labour standards. Through workshops to foster the exchange of information on the application of human rights and trade union rights for the police, security forces and the Attorney-General’s Office, the recently approved principles for the TNF legislation and the Human Rights Bill to operationalize the Human Rights Commission that had been passed by Parliament and was before the President. They additionally requested further information without delay concerning initiatives to undertake a full review, in cooperation with the social partners, of the application of the POSA in practice, concrete steps to enable the promulgation of clear lines of conduct for the police and security forces with respect to human and trade union rights, as well as the establishment, in cooperation with the ILO, of a handbook of international labour standards and national legislation for various actors in the labour market. The Employer members urged the Government to provide a detailed report outlining the measures it had purportedly taken to bring the POSA into line with the Convention, in consultation with the social partners, as well as on developments regarding the revision of the Labour Act, the Public Service Act and other relevant laws and regulations, and the December 2012 consensus-building workshop towards drafting a labour law reform bill. The Employer members concluded by stressing the importance of bringing both national law and practice fully into compliance with the Convention and reporting on progress made in this regard.

The Worker members recalled that the question of respecting the principles of freedom of association in Zimbabwe had given rise to the establishment of a Commission of Inquiry in 2009 that had been called upon to act as an independent agency with a mandate to investigate violations and had submitted a series of recommendations to the Government. The first recommendation dealt with harmonizing legislation, and it was evident that the Government had shown a certain resistance in that area because the draft principles adopted by the social partners had not yet been approved by the Cabinet and the Senate had rejected the amendments to the POSA. Regarding the second recommendation (the cessation with immediate effect of all anti-union practices), certain cases had been withdrawn but anti-union practices still occurred: the dismissal of union delegates in June 2012 during a collective action in a diamond mining enterprise, the exile of the General Secretary of GAPWUZ following threats made against her; and interference by the police and security forces in union affairs. The third recommendation concerned the creation of a Human Rights Commission to receive and deal with complaints, but it had not yet been set up. The fourth recommendation dealt with legal training for the social partners and security forces. Training had been given, with ILO technical assistance, but it was not enough. While progress had been noted in the labour courts, the same could not be said for Supreme Court magistrates or for the police, whose attitudes had not changed. With regard to the fifth recommendation (strengthening the rule of law), seminars had been organized for magistrates but had not yet produced conclusive results. Lastly, in respect of the sixth recommendation (strengthening social dialogue), the bill to establish the TNF, which would signify progress, had yet to be adopted by the Cabinet. Training workshops on freedom of association and collective bargaining had nevertheless been planned for conciliators and arbitrators. In practice, however, difficulties remained: for example, for seven years the public authorities had refused to grant authorization to the metal and energy union, and employers did not negotiate in good faith or respect signed agreements or arbitration decisions, and even withheld union dues. The Worker members considered that while some slight progress was noticeable in the implementation of the Commission of Inquiry’s recommendations, the Government seemed unwilling to make the legislative changes requested or to ensure implementation of the relevant international instruments. In the meantime, union rights were being systematically violated.

The Employer member of Zimbabwe stated that the Government’s attitude had significantly improved since the time the complaint under article 26 of the Constitution was filed. Considerable ground had been covered and the progress now reported by the Government was real. The Government had been fortunate to receive technical assistance from the ILO although more had yet to be done. Concerning the harassment of trade unionists by law enforcement agents, the speaker preferred not to comment on this issue as employers were not directly affected. Referring to the TNF legislation, which was being drafted, he confirmed that employers had agreed on the guiding principles. The speaker concluded by stating that, in view of the marked progress, the examination of this case should be brought to a close.

The Worker member of Senegal recalled the seriousness of the case, which had been examined several times by this Committee in view of the harassment and persecution of trade union officials and the existence of a number of acts that were not in line with the Convention and encouraged anti-union practices. The legislative amendments required were taking time to materialize and the police and security forces were still using the POSA against trade unionists with total impunity. The Government should acknowledge the seriousness of the situation and show evidence of its will to change. It should make the legislative amendments requested and ensure that they were applied through a rigorous labour inspection system. The Government had not yet shown a commitment towards workers and trade unionists not to use the POSA but rather than not to penalize trade unionists and issue clear instructions to the police in that regard, and also build police capacity and enhance their knowledge of international human rights instruments; and guarantee sustainable social dialogue mechanisms that would ensure social stability. In so far as the replies given by the Government to the supervisory bodies’ questions did not demonstrate any real change, no commitment could be made, and the Committee should make explicit and firm recommendations to the Government.

The Worker member of Zimbabwe stated that when workers in Zimbabwe wished to join unions, they were not only likely to face discrimination by their employers but also harassment and attacks by the law enforcement agencies, particularly workers from the diamond mining sector. The Commission of Inquiry, which had found that systematic harassment of trade unionists had taken place, had been perpetuated by the State and its law enforcement agencies, had requested the Government to bring its laws, in particular the Labour Act, the Public Service Act and the POSA, into compliance with international labour standards. The Government had also been requested to end all anti-union practices, to operationalize the Human Rights Commission and to strengthen social dialogue. However, the legislative reform process was still stagnant. While tripartite discussions had resulted in a draft labour law amendment in 2012, Cabinet had not yet brought the amendment to Parliament. This led to believe that the Government had never had the intention to amend neither the labour laws nor the POSA, which meant that workers were still governed by laws which made them vulnerable and subject to violations. Another important recommendation of the Commission of Inquiry was to bring all outstanding and pending court cases against trade unionists to an end. However, only seven out of 12 criminal cases had been withdrawn, notably the charges against union leaders remained. Police and state intelligence services were regularly attending the meetings of unions. Police had banned the International Human Rights Day celebrations on 10 December 2012 and had first prohibited the May Day processions in 2013 in one of the commemoration venues and had then permitted them under very strict and harsh regulations. Anti-union discrimination in employment also continued, in particular in state-owned companies. In a company in the diamond mining sector, partly owned by the Government, 1,022 workers had been dismissed by the company for participating in a strike. The dismissed workers had appealed to the Labour Court for reinstatement but the matter was pending since one year. So far, the Government had only carried out two trainings for police and security forces. Given the systematic nature of attacks against trade unionists conducted by police, the significance of these trainings was only minimal, and no orders to respect and protect trade union rights had been given to guide and inform law enforcement agencies. The speaker expressed concern at the emergence of new cases of violations of trade union and human rights that perpetuated attacks on workers and trade unionists exercising their legitimate rights as guaranteed by Convention No. 87. Three years after the adoption of the report of the Commission of Inquiry, as well as technical and financial support offered by the ILO, there were no tangible changes in law or practice. The Government continued to display its lack of political will to comply with the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and respect for the rule of law.

The Government member of Swaziland stated that the statement made by the Government representative demonstrated the significant progress made by Zimbabwe in addressing the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and the principles for harmonization of the labour legislation, which had been agreed upon by the Government and the social partners, were being discussed in Cabinet, and the recently adopted Constitution effectively domesticated Conventions Nos 87 and 98. Her Government encouraged the Government of Zimbabwe to address the outstanding issues such as the finalization of the lines of conduct for the police and the security forces, and called on the Office to continue to provide the necessary support to the Government, in particular technical assistance to enhance capacity.

The Worker member of Denmark recalled that since 2002, this Committee had been attempting to establish a constructive dialogue with the Government of Zimbabwe with a view to finding solutions to the serious violations of these Conventions. On several occasions, the Government of Zimbabwe had made promises but nothing or little had been done. Among its many recommendations, the Commission of Inquiry had called for the Human Rights Commission to be rendered operational as soon as possible. It had also recommended ensuring that the Human Rights Commission and the Organ for National Healing and Reconciliation were adequately resourced so that they could contribute to the defence of trade union and human rights in the future. He took note of the indications provided by the Government concerning the passing of the Human Rights Bill and the drafting of activities involving these institutions. However, four years after its establishment, the Human Rights Commission was still not operational and its Chairperson had resigned in December 2012 due to lack of independence and funding of the Commission. In April 2012, the African Commission on Human and People’s Rights had found the Government guilty of human rights violations, and this decision had been endorsed at the African Union Heads of State Summit in January 2013. Moreover, the ZCTU had announced in May 2013 that they would mobilize workers to boycott the forthcoming polls if reforms agreed in the Global Political Agreement were not implemented.

The Government member of Zambia acknowledged the efforts made by the Government of Zimbabwe in addressing the key outstanding issues raised by the Committee, with respect to trade union rights and governance under Conventions Nos 87 and 98. Based on the Government’s report, the country had made significant strides in tackling the matters before this Committee. The Government, in consultation with the social partners, had agreed on principles for the harmonization of labour legislation, had reviewed the labour laws which were now being considered in Cabinet, and had addressed issues relating to the domestication of Convention No. 98. The Government was in the process of putting in place the TNF aimed at strengthening social dialogue and had undertaken a series of training of Government officials and social partners, from 2011 to 2013, in an effort to build capacity. Her Government considered that such efforts ought to be encouraged and called upon the Office and the Committee to note and continue to support the joint implementation efforts of the Government and the social partners.

The Worker member of Swaziland expressed his disappointment that the POSA was still in force and had been systematically used in order to repress basic civil liberties and trade union rights. Police and security forces had been harassing trade unionists with interrogations and interruptions of trade union meetings which could often only be conducted with the presence of security agents. Any opinion or act considered detrimental to public order or interest was punishable by imprisonment. The Government had done nothing to prove its commitment to amend the aforementioned Act. In 2013, a private member bill, that could have introduced changes, was rejected by the Senate of the National Assembly. Moreover, the Supreme Court had ruled that Cabinet could initiate legislative amendments. He also expressed serious concern about the situation of Ms Hambira.

The Government member of Malawi took note of the progress made in the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry regarding the observance by Zimbabwe of Conventions Nos 87 and 98. Her Government called on the ILO to continue providing technical assistance to the Government so as to ensure that the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry were fully implemented.

The Worker member of Australia expressed deep concern over the continuing lack of progress with respect to workers’ and trade union rights in Zimbabwe, including the right to organize for workers in the public service. The various restrictions imposed on the basic labour rights of public sector workers had been the subject of criticism by the Committee and the Commission of Inquiry. Public servants in Zimbabwe only had limited rights to form and join trade unions, to collectively negotiate and to strike. The law also prohibited strikes in “essential services”, a term used in a much broader way than permitted by ILO jurisprudence, which included, for example, occupations such as railway engineers, electricians and pharmacists. In addition, other services could be deemed “essential” by the Minister, with the effect of arbitrarily depriving workers in these occupations of any right to take industrial action, without granting them any compensatory guarantees. The Commission of Inquiry had also observed the extensive violation of trade union rights of teachers, including numerous cases of dismissal or transfer for participating in legitimate trade union activities. Since 2009, the Government had been repeatedly assuring the international community that it intended to address all these deficiencies, in particular to reform the law in relation to the basic rights of public servants to organize and to collectively bargain by harmonizing the Labour Act and the Public Service Act. It had also taken advantage of ILO technical assistance in this respect without showing any real, tangible and substantial progress on these issues. The Teachers Union of Zimbabwe continued to report harassment of union members for participating in legitimate trade union and governance under Conventions Nos 87 and 98. The Government had initiated a labour law reform and had strengthened social dialogue, and underlined the Government’s need for sustained technical assistance to implement the remaining recommendations and entrench freedom of association. The Government was urged to build national laws and practice into conformity with Convention No. 87, including with respect to workers engaged in the public service.

The Government member of Kenya noted the progress made by the Government in implementing the principles of Convention No. 87 and its commitment to continue conforming to the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry in 2009. He further noted that the Government had initiated a labour law reform and had strengthened social dialogue, and underlined the Government’s need for sustained technical assistance to implement the remaining recommendations and entrench freedom of association. The Government was urged to pursue its efforts to promote the principles of Convention No. 87 with a view to implementing an inclusive social dialogue, in particular within the framework of the TNF.

The Worker member of Angola expressed her dissatisfaction with the continued lack of progress in the adoption of the agreed measures to promote civil rights. She recalled that the Committee of Experts had called for improved social dialogue and that several seminars had been held with ILO technical assistance. However, despite the social partners’ agreement, there had been no legislation on a forum for tripartite negotiations. Moreover, the set of draft guidelines for legislation on the subject that had been adopted and approved by Cabinet in June 2012 had not yet been promulgated. She pointed out that the current mandate of Cabinet and Parliament ended on 29 June 2013 and that the next government would have to take over again. The Government had endorsed the Kadoma Declaration “Towards a Shared National Social and Economic Vision” but, although the document emphasized the importance of good labour relations and trade union rights, the mutually agreed mechanism for the social partners to follow up the declaration had never materialized. Given the lack of progress that had been made towards social dialogue, she appealed to the Committee to insist on active, immediate and sincere participation by the social partners in bringing about changes that could ensure full application of Convention No. 87.

The Government member of Botswana recalling that this case had been discussed for a long time, stated that notable progress had been achieved. His Government expressed satisfaction at the efforts and the commitment made by the Government and the social partners towards full compliance with Convention No. 87, and called on the Committee to encourage and support the Government to achieve this outcome.

The Worker member of Nigeria stated that the application of the current legal framework had continued to bypass workers and their organizations and make mockery of the application of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), ratified by Zimbabwe. The need for an urgent, timely and collaborative reform process had been underlined by the Commission of Inquiry, and Zimbabwe had benefited from technical assistance to achieve this outcome with very little to show. The speaker added that acts of anti-union discrimination against trade union members and officials remained widespread, and workers were not adequately protected due to legislative gaps and insufficient measures to curtail anti-union discrimination. The Supreme Court continued to issue decisions that licensed employers to refuse to reinstate unlawfully dismissed workers. The Court had developed the principle that unlawfully dismissed workers must look for alternative employment. If workers failed to prove that they had taken measures to this end, the damages awarded to them, which were neither adequate nor dissuasive, would be reduced even further (for example, Olvine Industries (Pvt) Ltd v. Chim大陸 Sharaara (Pvt) Ltd, Case No. SC88/05).

The Speaker also indicated that the right to establish workers’ organizations without previous authorization was seriously hampered by the registration procedure. Pursuant to section 33 of the Labour Law any person who wished to make any representation to the registrar relating to the application could do so, and the registrar had to follow a request by the Registrar of Trade Unions. The application procedure was rather long and complicated. The Government had not yet taken any steps to simplify the registration process. The speaker asked the Government to take steps to improve the registration process in order to enable workers to establish their organizations without delays.

The Government representative noted with appreciation the statements acknowledging the progress that had been achieved so far and encouraging the Government to pursue its work. The incidents mentioned by the Worker members had not been brought to the attention of the Government and would be duly examined as soon as signalled to the authorities. With respect to Ms Hambira, Secretary-General of the GAPWUZ, the Government representative stated that she was free to return to Zimbabwe and that the Government was ready to consider proposals from the workers, if any, so that this matter could be resolved. Concerning the labour law reform, while noting the desire to move forward with greater speed, the speaker indicated that this was a process and results could not be expected overnight. As regards the situation in the diamond sector, the issues needed to be brought to the attention of the Ministry of Labour so as to enable the Ministry to engage in finding solutions to obstacles encountered by workers in this industry. The lack of resources of the Human Rights Commission was due to the fact that the entire Government did not have adequate resources at its disposal. The speaker highlighted his Government’s commitment to continue to give effect to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and to keep the Office and the Committee of Experts up to date on future developments.

The Employer members expressed their appreciation to the Government for its responsiveness to the submissions of the Commission of Inquiry and to note that the Government had accepted the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and had taken some positive steps towards bringing national legislation into line with Conventions Nos 87 and 98. It was clear, however, that more needed to be done to ensure full compliance with these Conventions. The Employer members urged the Government to continue taking positive steps together with the social partners. They expected that the steps taken to enact the legislative reform would soon be completed and that information in this regard would be provided at the next meeting of the Committee of Experts. The Employer members further encouraged the Government to dedicate resources for the education and training of police and security forces so as to enhance understanding of Convention No. 87 and ensure that the application of the POSA was in line with that Convention. As regards the strengthening of social dialogue, they expected that the measures taken to enact the legislative reform would be adopted without delay. The Employer members also encouraged the Government to fully operationalize the Human Rights Commission. Lastly, they supported the upcoming proposal of the Worker members for a technical assistance mission in order to ensure continued progress in Zimbabwe.

The Worker members recalled that in 2009, the Commission of Inquiry had found systematic violations of trade union rights and had issued several recommendations, the implementation of which had been assessed by the different speakers. The Government had certainly introduced some measures, but none of them had resulted in definitive decisions or specific results. Moreover, it had never undertaken to put an end to the discrimination and violence suffered by trade unionists, and the police and security forces continued to commit violent acts and interfere in union business, and social dialogue had scarcely been strengthened. The Worker members requested that the Commission of Inquiry’s recommendations be implemented forthwith. They also requested the Government to accept a high-level technical assistance mission in order to speed up the implementation of the recommendations, identify the obstacles and ensure the full respect of Convention No. 87 in law and in practice, and to report back to the Committee of Experts. If the Committee would still be unable, the following year, to see evidence of effective progress in the application of the Commission of Inquiry’s recommendations, serious consideration would be given to using article 33 of the ILO Constitution, which provided for measures to be taken in such cases.

The Committee took note of the oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted that the outstanding issues concerned the need to bring the relevant legislative texts into line with the Convention so as to guarantee freedom of association rights to workers, both in the private and public sectors, and the need to ensure that the POSA was not used to infringe upon legitimate trade union rights and in this respect, to ensure that training on human and trade union rights for the police and security forces continued, to carry out together with the social partners a review of the application of the POSA in practice, and to elaborate and promulgate clear lines of conduct for the police and security forces.

The Committee noted the information on the capacity-building activities for social partners and non-state actors that had taken place in 2012 and 2013 with the ILO technical assistance. It further noted the planned activities for July–August 2013 with law enforcement agencies and the cascading of such sessions to all ten provinces. The Committee further noted the information on the process of the labour law review and harmonization, which, according to the Government, involved the social partners, as well as on the guarantees for freedom of association, in both the private and the public sectors, and the right to demonstrate under the new Constitution.

The Committee expressed the firm hope that the law and practice, including the Labour Act and the Public Service Act, would be brought fully into line with the Convention in the very near future and encouraged the Government to continue cooperating with the ILO and the social partners in this respect. The Committee requested the Government to ensure the continued training of the police and security forces with a view to ensuring the full respect of human and trade union rights; take steps for the elaboration and promulgation of clear lines of conduct for the police and security forces; and ensure the POSA is applied in a manner that is in conformity with the Convention. The Committee urged the Government to provide the resources necessary for the full and rapid operationalization of the Human Rights Commission. The Committee further requests the Government, as it had suggested, to discuss the proposals of the workers’ organizations on possible concrete steps to be taken to ensure the safety of Ms Hambira, General Secretary of the General Agriculture and Plantation Workers’ Union of Zimbabwe (GAPWUZ), upon her return to the country. The Committee invited the Government to accept a high-level technical assistance mission to assess the obstacles to the rapid implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and the full implementation of Convention No. 87, both in law and in practice. The Committee requested that this information, as well as a detailed report from the Government, be transmitted to the Committee of Experts for examination at its next meeting this year.

A Government representative welcomed the acknowledgement by the Committee of Experts of the grave and exceptional circumstances experienced in Greece. Her Government welcomed the recognition by the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) of the exceptional and particularly dire conditions brought about by the financial fiscal crisis in Greece, and of the continuous efforts made by all the parties, the Government and the social partners, to address them. In June 2011, this Committee had had the opportunity to discuss this case and had recommended in its conclusions, that an ILO high-level mission visit Greece in order to explore the complexity of the issues involved. The Government representative reiterated that the bailout plan for the Greek economy envisaged the implementation of measures that would enhance labour market flexibility and ensure, at the same time, both the protection of workers and the competitiveness of the Greek economy. Measures had been adopted to restructure the system of free collective bargaining, in compliance with the principles set in the Convention. These measures had reformed the collective bargaining system by establishing decentralization in the implementation of collective agreements, placing emphasis on the enterprise level in order to facilitate the adjustment of wages to the economic potential of enterprises. Furthermore, the statutory minimum wages complemented the wage-setting system, filling the gaps between the collective agreements, as the statutory extension of collective agreements had been suspended since November 2011 by Act No. 4024/2011, together with the application of the favourability principle in case of conflict between collective agreements concluded at different levels. These reforms had been outlined in the Memoranda attached to the revised economic adjustment plans of the international loan agreements, signed between the Government of Greece and the Troika (the European Commission, the European Central Bank (ECB) and the International Monetary Fund (IMF)). However, despite the provisions included in the Memoranda for social dialogue on all issues related to labour market reforms, political conditions and timetables had hindered such a process.

In light of the above, and in particular with regard to comments of the Committee of Experts on the development of a comprehensive vision for labour relations, she stated that the Minister of Labour, Social Security and Welfare had initiated, since July 2012, a new round of consultations with the representatives of the social partners, in the belief that social dialogue, on the one hand, would contribute to the restoration of balance in the labour market and, on the other, would enhance its efficiency and smooth operation. With regard to the importance of a space for social dialogue and the role of social partners in reviewing the measures already taken, the speaker indicated that in relation to setting minimum wages, a new system for fixing the statutory minimum wage had been introduced in December 2012 by Act No. 4093/2012. The Act stipulated that by virtue of a Ministerial Cabinet Decree, the statutory minimum wage-fixing process would be defined taking into account the state and prospects of the economy and of the labour market (especially in terms of employment and unemployment rates). Consultations between the Government and representatives of the social partners, as well as specialized scientific, research and other bodies would be held in this process. Meanwhile, Act No. 4093/2012 determined the statutory minimum daily and monthly wages as provided for by Ministerial Cabinet Decree No. 6/2012. The minimum wage served as a safety threshold for all workers in the country, which meant that all types of collective agreements, including the National General Collective Agreement (NGCA), might establish wages higher than the statutory minimum wages. The NGCA remained the cornerstone of the collective bargaining and ensured the general implementation of its non-wage clauses, whereas wage clauses of the NGCA applied only to employees working for employers represented by the signatory employers’ organizations. On 14 May 2013, a new NGCA had been signed, demonstrating the consensus of the signatory parties to reinforce bipartite social dialogue. Moreover, since July 2012, successful collective bargaining had taken place at the sectoral level, resulting in the conclusion of collective agreements in major sectors of the Greek economy, such as tourism, commerce, private health services and the banking sector. With regard to collective bargaining at the enterprise level, 976 collective agreements had been signed in 2012 compared to 179 in 2011. These agreements were signed by trade unions or associations of persons. The association of persons gave a collective voice to employees at the enterprise level and was legally qualified as a trade union, according to Act No. 1264/1982. Furthermore, by virtue of Act No. 4024/2011, it was possible to establish an association of persons in small firms of less than 20 employees. These associations of persons ensured high union density due to a participation requirement of three-fifths of the employees in the enterprise, and they acquired the right to sign a collective agreement only if there were no enterprise trade unions. The speaker observed that the requirement for the establishment of a trade union, was at least 20 members, and the union was nullified when its members were less than ten. She emphasized that the above clarifications demonstrated the compliance of all reforms with the provisions of the Convention. While ensuring the rights to freedom of association and collective bargaining, the Conference did not imply a certain system to be applicable and did not prohibit the reform of a national system, provided that the core of these rights was respected. Regarding the funding of the Organization for Mediation and Arbitration (OMED), the “Special Fund for the Implementation of Social Policies” (ELEKP) had been established in 2013, by virtue of Act No. 4144. The operation of this fund lay within the competence of the Manpower Employment Organization (OAED), which had assumed the responsibilities of the Workers’ Social Fund (OEE), including the funding of OMED.

The report of the ILO high-level mission had already provided valuable insight into the positions shared by the Government, the social partners and the international bodies involved in the international loan agreement, namely the Troika. In light of the above, the Government welcomed the cooperation with the ILO. The Government representative indicated that she was looking forward to the national seminar in the framework of the initiative “Promoting a balanced and inclusive recovery from the crisis in Europe through sound industrial relations and social dialogue” organized jointly by the ILO and the European Commission in Greece at the end of June 2013. The Government expected that this seminar could initiate the re-engagement in social dialogue and collective bargaining, enabling the social partners to participate fully in the determination of any subsequent amendments to the agreements with the Troika, relating to aspects that represented the very core of industrial relations, social dialogue and social peace. With a view to enabling a job-rich recovery, consultations needed to be held between the Government and the social partners regarding: the protection of wages and their purchasing power; the formulation and implementation of labour market policy measures; the means of tackling pay inequality issues, including collective bargaining; the future of social security; the reform of the labour administration system; and collective bargaining in the public service. The Worker members echoed the concerns of the Committee of Experts regarding the measures taken under the law of 12 February 2012, concerning the approval of the European Financial Stability Facility (EFSF). That law unilaterally legislated a 22 per cent slash in the national minimum wage, despite its pledges to respect social dialogue outcomes, this was incredibly relevant in this context, as the country was debt-laden and experiencing a financial and economic crisis.

The Worker members recalled that the case raised the issue of the relevance of the austerity policies pursued within the European Union, particularly the Eurozone. According to the Committee of Experts, the measures adopted had been practically dictated by the Troika in exchange for the provision of loans which the country urgently needed. The report of the ILO high-level mission was largely supportive of the Government. Nevertheless, the Government remained ultimately responsible for the policies that it was implementing. The conclusions of the Ninth European Regional Meeting held in Oslo in 2013 reaffirmed the desire of the tripartite constituents to pursue an upward course out of the crisis. In the present case, there was a visible need to increase the coherence of policies with international and regional organizations and institutions on macroeconomic, labour market, employment and social protection issues, as underlined by the Oslo Declaration in 2013. The Worker members endorsed the Committee of Experts’ request for the creation of a space in which the social partners would be able to participate fully in the determination of any subsequent amendments to the agreements with the Troika, relating to aspects that represented the very core of industrial relations, social dialogue and social peace. With a view to enabling a job-rich recovery, consultations needed to be held between the Government and the social partners regarding: the protection of wages and their purchasing power; the formulation and implementation of labour market policy measures; the means of tackling pay inequality issues, including collective bargaining; the future of social security; the reform of the labour administration system; and collective bargaining in the public service. The Worker members echoed the concerns of the Committee of Experts regarding the measures taken under the law of 12 February 2012, concerning the approval of the plan for credit facilitation agreements in the context of the European Financial Stability Facility (EFSF). That law aggravated the situation by imposing the abolition or renegotiation of collective labour agreements, which had been converted into agreements of indefinite duration. In particular, it enabled collective agreements to be concluded, on the workers’ side, not by representative trade unions but by “associations of persons” which did not offer the guarantees of independence corresponding to workers’ representatives. Finally, the Government had unilaterally imposed social dialogue and collective bargaining on the workers, which gave employers numerous possibilities for making unilateral changes to key conditions in employment contracts. Voicing their deep concern for the Greek workers, the Worker members endorsed the declaration in the report of the ILO high-level mission to the effect that the ILO should have the capacity to assist the social partners in discussions regarding a model for social dialogue and collective bargaining, enabling them to readily acquire their role especially in collective bargaining at sectoral level.

The Worker member of Greece expressed the view that social dialogue and collective bargaining had been used as leverage tools for the negotiations of the loan mechanism and that authoritarian unilateralism had replaced democratic tripartism, thus making the social partners redundant. In February 2012, the social partners in Greece had been engaged in talks on a broad agenda, including the freezing of the national minimum wage for the next two or three years. The social partners had been renegotiating an agreement that was to expire after a year. However, this round of collective bargaining had never been concluded: the Government, under pressure from the Troika, had, despite its pledges to respect social dialogue outcomes, unilaterally legislated a 22 per cent slash in the national minimum wage, thereby bringing wages to below subsistence levels. This interference by the Government had given the final blow to labour institutions. Moreover, the Government had virtually abolished collective bargaining outcomes, as set out in the NGCA; had wiped out jointly agreed-upon minimum standards of work; had pushed hundreds of thousands of workers below the poverty line; had reduced minimum welfare benefits that were directly linked by law to the minimum wage. She declared that since 2010, there had been a steady disintegration of a once functioning industrial relations system. While the IMF and the European Commission had described government interventions to reduce the scope of collective bargaining rights and diminish the wage-setting powers of trade unions as “employment friendly” policies, this was a sorely tested fallacy: spiralling unemployment, poverty, relentless recession, bankrupt businesses and households, and a gravely disinvested economy confirmed their wholesale failure. The IMF itself had recently admitted this failure.

Referring to the Committee of Experts, she stressed that weakening collective bargaining had hurt recovery; that collective bargaining was key for constructive processes that linked crisis responses to the real economy; and that social dialogue was vital in crisis situations. Moreover, the speaker pointed out that workers had been doubly disempowered: serious economic disempowerment was compounded by a critical loss of institutional capability to survive in an increasingly hostile labour market. She emphasized the need for intensive, frank, constructive and meaningful social dialogue, which was key for a comprehensive vision of labour relations. One starting point for such a vision was the NGCA and the notion that the wage-setting mechanism should fully conform to international labour standards, which means that it should be governed by collective bargaining. Taking into account the recommendations made by the ILO on various occasions, the speaker argued that overt intervention in lawful wage-setting mechanisms violated the core of the Convention, expressed grave concern with regard to the impact of the situation on collective bargaining processes, and expressed the hope that the Committee would deliver a strong message on the imperative need to respect labour rights as fundamental human rights, while implementing fiscal and social strategy measures. Lastly, she emphasized that the argument that social dialogue was an unaffordable luxury in times of crisis and that it was better for the State to simply intervene, was unwise and politically hazardous, as it ignored the political and economic added value of social dialogue for the operation of the system and for social cohesion. Social dialogue was not an idle discussion between opposing parties but a fundamental political and social process which, when destroyed, led to the vices of undemocratic decision-making.

The Member of Greece stated that, in the report of the Committee of Experts, five points of alleged non-conformity of the national legislation with the Convention could be identified. With regard to the first two points, the Committee had said that there had been no violation of the Convention considering that the legal imposition of a maximum three-year period for collective agreements was not contrary to the Convention, provided that the employer was free to agree on a shorter duration. The same applied to the abolition of unilateral recourse to compulsory arbitration under Act No. 4046 of 2012 and Act No. 6 of 28 February 2012 of the Council of Ministers. Currently, recourse to arbitration was only possible with the consent of all the interested parties. Furthermore, the CFA had adopted the same position regarding the abolition of compulsory arbitration in Greece. The legislation was thus in conformity with the provisions of Article 6 of the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154), Voluntary Conciliation and Arbitration Recommendation, 1951 (No. 92), and Collective Bargaining Recommendation, 1981 (No. 163). The speaker considered that the most difficult issue concerned the third point relating to interventions by the Authority regarding threshold durations, which was the NGCA, which in fact played the role of an inter-occupational collective agreement. For decades, this collective agreement had determined wages and other minimum conditions of work applicable to all employers and all workers in the country, regardless of their trade union affiliation. However, the legislative intervention had had the effect of significantly reducing the minimum wages fixed by the 2010 inter-occupational collective agreement. This intervention had also suspended wage increases and the payment of seniority bonuses provided for in collective agreements at all levels. Furthermore, she specified that the levels of wages and all other forms of remuneration provided for in an inter-occupational collective agreement would only be compulsory for employers affiliated to signatory organizations. As regards other questions (for example, additional paid holidays), the inter-occupational collective agreement would apply to all employers and workers in the country. Minimum wages would from now on be determined through administrative means, after consultation of, inter alia, the social partners. In that context, the legal reduction of minimum wages laid down in the inter-occupational collective agreement was certainly contrary to Article 4 of the Convention, as was the suspension of the clauses relating to wage increases of the basis of seniority. However, the same did not apply to the future fixing of wages by administrative means, to which the Convention was not opposed. It should be noted that all interferences in the content of collective agreements, whether or not justified by the gravity and exceptional nature of the economic crisis in the country, concerned the collective agreements in force at the time of publication of the respective laws. Currently, the contracting parties were not subject to any restriction regarding the content of collective agreements. However, in the current absence of a NGCA, it was up to the former signatory parties to find the means to emerge from the impasse. Referring to the definition of “collective agreements” in the Collective Agreements Recommendation, 1951 (No. 91), the speaker indicated that, to facilitate the conclusion of a collective agreement in an enterprise which did not have any enterprise union, Act No. 4024/2011 allowed a union that fulfilled the requirements, which was the role of the NGCA, to appoint a competent representative by a “association of persons”. The association of persons actually belonged to the category of primary-level trade unions which had been recognized since 1982 by the basic law on trade unions. It had always enjoyed the right to strike without any concerns being raised in this regard. The recognition of the association of persons as a social partner actually represented a logical and even necessary development, since it constituted no more than a supplementary form of trade union organization. However, these associations had to account for at least 60 per cent of the workers of the enterprise, whereas enterprise trade unions were authorized to conclude a collective agreement regardless of the size of its membership. The last point concerned the relationship between enterprise collective agreements and branch collective agreements. Initially, in the event of a conflict between these two types of collective agreements, the agreement most favourable to the employees prevailed. Nowadays, enterprise collective agreements, even the least advantageous to the employees, always prevailed over branch collective agreements. The favourability principle had therefore given way to the “speciality” principle, inasmuch as the agreement closest to the employment relationship to be regulated applied.
Since there did not appear to be any international rule establishing a hierarchy among the various levels of collective agreements, the legislative reform would enable enterprises to adjust their wage bill to their own economic situation, in such a manner as to preserve jobs.

In conclusion, the speaker recognized that collective bargaining systems were generally going through a difficult period, since the change in the legal context having somewhat disrupted collective labour relations. Hence the issues in question were not legal ones but rather of a political and economic nature. Lastly, the speaker indicated that the Hellenic Federation of Enterprises and Industries (SEV), as the most representative employers’ organization, had several times expressed its commitment to social dialogue and collective bargaining, and had declared its willingness to participate, with the workers’ confederation and the Government, in any joint platform at the appropriate level with a view to finding adequate solutions to the current situation, with the assistance of the Office.

The Government member of France, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Cyprus, Germany, Italy, Portugal and Spain, considered that social dialogue was a privileged instrument for government action, in particular through the consultation of the social partners in the process of economic reform. Greece was currently facing an unprecedented crisis the effects of which had been particularly severe for the country. In such a difficult context, due note should be taken of the Government’s undertaking vis-à-vis the Committee to respect the principles of the Convention and of its intention to protect workers’ living standards. The Government could only be encouraged to continue along those lines.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom stated that the application of the Convention was a fundamental building block in enhancing social protection and strengthening social dialogue. Greece had established well-developed machinery and institutions for collective bargaining, which were now experiencing wide interference, with profound effects on the lives of workers, their families and communities. The measures of the Memorandum of Economic and Financial Policies were dismantling almost every aspect of the collective bargaining system. The NGCA had been abolished. Ninety per cent of the workforce in small enterprises could not join a union. With pay cuts and slashed pensions, poverty in Greece was soaring. More than one third of the population had an income of less than the poverty line set at just over €7,000 per year per person in 2012, and almost 44 per cent of children in Greece the poverty line was reached. There was little social assistance and few received unemployment benefits. It was estimated that at least 40,000 people were homeless. There had been an explosive growth in soup kitchens and a sharp drop in access to medicine and health services. She considered that this Committee must demand that the Convention be respected, that social dialogue be reinstated, and that workers and their organizations be able to participate in decisions about labour market and living standards. The fact of an economic crisis made these demands even more critical, not less.

The Worker member of France observed that, for three years, Greek workers had suffered from unusually brutal and widespread austerity measures, which had plunged the country into deep recession and seriously restricted the economic and social rights of employees and pensioners. The most vulnerable sectors of society had been particularly affected by the measures that the Government had implemented in an effort to apply the policies imposed by the European Union and the IMF. In that regard, the Government had passed several laws since 2010; on 5 March 2010, an austerity law (No. 3833/2010) had imposed severe wage and paid leave cuts in the public and private sectors, which had already been cut, once again, under a subsequent law. The right to collective bargaining was controlled by the Government, which prohibited the conclusion of collective agreements that might lead to a wage increase. The favourability principle that had guaranteed that collective agreements at company or local levels could not derogate from the provisions of national or sectoral conventions, could not be used, or could only be used in the most difficult cases, had been discontinued. The situation was made worse by the prohibition against forming trade unions in small and medium-sized enterprises. The Committee of Experts had rightly considered that the Government should allow the exercise of freedom of association in small and medium-sized enterprises with 20 workers or fewer in order to guarantee that trade union organizations could exercise the right to collective bargaining and maintain the favourable principle, as enshrined in Recommendation No. 91. The Government had also taken measures deregulating the labour market and making it more flexible, and had reduced the amount of welfare benefits. All those restrictive and socially repressive measured openly violated Greece’s international commitments. Nonetheless, on 5 May 2013, a national collective agreement had been signed by the majority of employers’ organizations and trade unions in all economic fields. It was estimated that at least 40,000 people were homeless. There had been an explosive growth in soup kitchens and a sharp drop in access to medicine and health services. She considered that this Committee must denounce all violations of the Convention. The 2012 report of the Commissioner for Human Rights of the Council of Europe, the 2011 report of the ILO high-level mission and the more recent report of the CFA, all corroborated the opinion of the Committee of Experts that there had been serious violations of fundamental workers’ rights. If emergency measures had been necessary, they should have been the subject of prior consultations and negotiations should have been in force for a very limited time. However, the Government had chosen to deny all social rights as well as the established jurisprudence. The violations of the Convention observed by the supervisory bodies were the result of deliberate political decisions which affected trade unions’ right to organize and the right to collective bargaining, thus hugely and needlessly reducing workers’ and pensioners’ standards of living, instead of planning to restructure the debt over the longer term, or taking other measures that would not ruin the economy. The Committee should strongly denounce that situation and receive the Government on the question of freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining, and to put an end to socially repressive policies.

The Worker member of Italy stated that the labour market restructuring and austerity measures had had a very high cost for Greek society, hitting harder the most vulnerable: children, the elderly and migrants, especially women in those groups. As a consequence, the right to work had been severely compromised, which set a dangerous precedent for the European social model and governance. Unemployment was today more than double the Eurozone average rate, registering a 95 per cent increase in three years (2009–11) and reaching 27 per cent in February 2013. Austerity measures widened inequality and the gender gap in employment: unemployment for women was much higher than that of men, and women were more affected by legislative measures, which hit a labour market. The Greek Ombudsperson had reported a steady increase of complaints concerning unfair dismissals due to pregnancy or maternity leave or sexual harassment. The blind attack led against collective bargaining systems had entailed the deliberate dismantling of the welfare state on one side and a growing black market for labour on another side. Decentralization of the labour market was Indeed the central objective of the Troika. The UN Independent Expert on the effects of foreign debt, had noted, on his recent mission to Greece, that the prospects of a significant part of the population to access the job market and secure an adequate standard of living in line with international human rights standards had been compromised by highly educated workers were leaving the country, posing a threat to the national potential. These facts proved that austerity policies were only worsening the situation.

An observer representing Public Services International (PSI) stated that successive “rescue” packages were presented as an extreme remedy to save Greece from bankruptcy. Their provisions were summarily incorporated into Greek legislation and implemented instead of using collective bargaining as a means of achieving greater efficiency and better management of enterprises and public institutions. Moreover, the Troika had been pressuring the Government since February 2012 to cut 150,000 public sector jobs by 2015, which would have a wide impact on living standards and the potential for employment of future and current generations. She pointed out that quality public services were the foundation of democratic societies and economies. The driving force behind the privatization of these services was the maximization of corporate profits rather than public interest. One of the key demands of the Troika was that the Government undertake massive privatizations to raise funds (€50 billion) so as to reduce the public debt. Among the enterprises targeted for privatization were public utilities which provided essential public services such as water and sanitation and energy. Moreover, public health systems had become increasingly inaccessible, in particular for poor citizens and marginalized groups, due to increased fees and co-payments, closure of hospitals and health care centres, and more and more people losing public health insurance cover, mainly due to prolonged unemployment. She recalled that the Convention applied to public service workers, with the only possible exception of the police and armed forces, and public servants engaged in the administration of the State, and demanded that public sector workers’ rights to collective bargaining be respected and that the current crisis should not be used as an excuse for dismantling social dialogue mechanisms in Greece. The austerity programme was being implemented in the context of a social protection system, which was characterized by protection gaps and which, in its current form, was not able to absorb the shock of unemployment, reductions in tax revenues, and increasing social spending, and was also affecting social security liabilities. The Convention recognized the social partners’ right to participate in the collective bargaining system and affirmed the importance of social dialogue and collective bargaining. Therefore, and recalling that the CFA had referred to the situation in Greece and the national crisis, the Committee of Experts expressed the view that further extensions of the social partners’ mandate to the arbitrators to issue awards only upon basic wages, did not prevent the social partners to agree upon a different system of collective dispute resolution that would provide a wider mandate to the arbitrators for all issues of common concern. This possibility was established in section 14 of Act 1876/1990 and, if included in the NGCA, could be binding for all employers and employees in the country. Lastly, she pointed out that the abovementioned issues demonstrated the need for a comprehensive social dialogue at all levels which had to be embraced by the social partners. To this end, the Government looked forward to the active engagement of the ILO to help build solid and effective social dialogue to overcome the economic crisis.

The Employer members expressed their appreciation for the robust discussion on this case. While hearing a lot of serious concern expressed by various speakers in their contributions, they pointed out that many statements related to the economic upheaval in Greece and not to its compliance with the Convention. They referred to the massive changes taking place in Greece and underlined that it took time to adapt to change. In this regard, the Convention did not require a specific system of collective bargaining. Therefore, and recalling that the CFA had referred to the situation in Greece as grave and excepting from the Employer members’ expression of concern over the need for social partners to be more fully involved in the determination of any further alterations within the framework of the agreements with the Troika, that touched upon matters that went to the heart of labour relations, social dialogue and social peace. They echoed the Committee of Experts’ call on the Government to review within that forum, in conjunction with the social partners, all the measures that had been discussed before the Conference of Employers, with a view to limiting their impact and duration and to ensuring proper guarantees to protect workers’ living standards. The Worker members strongly urged the Government to ensure that the social partners could play an active role in any wage-setting mechanism. The Worker members strongly urged the Government, within the framework of the follow-up to the 2011 high-level mission, to accept, as a matter of urgency, a programme of technical assistance and cooperation for itself and the social partners to help create a space for social dialogue, taking as a starting point the NGCA and aiming at the implementation of the comments of the Committee of Experts. The Government should submit a report to the Committee of Experts at its next meeting to enable it to assess the progress achieved.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the statement made by the Government representative and the discussion that followed.

The Committee observed that the outstanding issues in this case concerned numerous interventions in collective agreements and allegations that, within the context of austerity measures imposed by loan agreements between the European Commission, the European Central Bank and the International Monetary Fund and the Greek Government in a context characterized as grave and exceptional, collective bargaining was seriously weakened and the autonomy of the bargaining partners violated.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government representative concerning the reform of the collective bargaining legal framework through the establishment of decentralization in the implementation of collective agreements due to the economic crisis. She further provided information on the Special Fund for the Implementation of Social Policies (ELEKP) that had been established in 2013 and was being operated by the Manpower Employment Organization (OAED), which had assumed responsibility for the Workers’ Social Fund, including the funding of the Organization for Mediation and Arbitration (OMED). She stated, however, that the statutory minimum wage fixing process which would be established by ministerial decree would be defined in consultation with the social partners. She reiterated that the critical economic situation and the complicated negotiations at international level provided no room for consultation with the social partners prior to the legislative reforms. She observed that the national seminar on promoting a balanced and inclusive recovery through industrial relations and social dialogue, jointly organized by the ILO and the European Commission on 25 and 26 June, would provide an important opportunity to capitalize on ILO experience to reinforce trust on common goals and confidence between social partners and the Government. She expressed her expectation that this event would initiate the re-engagement in social dialogue to implement policies enhancing economic growth, combating unemployment and protecting workers’ living standards.

The Committee recalled that the interference in collective agreements as part of a stabilization policy should only be imposed as an exceptional measure, limited in time and degree, and accompanied by adequate safeguards to protect workers’ living standards. Mindful of the importance of full and frank dialogue with the social partners concerned to review the impact of austerity measures and the measures to be taken in times of crisis, the Committee requested the Government to intensify its efforts, with ILO technical assistance, to establish a functioning model of social dialogue on all issues of concern with a view to promoting collective bargaining, social cohesion and social peace in full conformity with the Convention. The Committee urged the Government to take steps to create a space for the social partners that would enable them to be fully involved in the determination of any further alterations that touched upon aspects going to the heart of labour relations and social dialogue. It invited the Government to provide additional detailed information to the Committee of Experts this year on the matters raised and on the impact of the above-mentioned measures on the application of the Convention.

With technical support from the ILO, a Labour Code Reform Committee of the Ministry of Labour was currently preparing a draft text focusing on 13 sections of the Labour Code to bring it into line with the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and four sections to bring the Labour Code into line with Convention No. 98 (including section 469 of the Code dealing with sanctions in cases of anti-union discrimination). The draft sections, which would take due account of the recommendations of the Committee of Experts, will be submitted first to the Ministry of Labour and Social Security and then to the Economic and Social Council (CES). Draft section 469 specifically provides that the fines should be increased, from the present level of 200 to 10,000 Honduran lempiras (HNL), to five to 20 times the minimum wage, that is from HNL32,650 to HNL130,600 at the current average minimum wage of HNL6,550 (US$310), and that for repeat offences the relevant fine should be increased by a further 50 per cent.

The Committee of Experts also requested that it be informed of the judicial sentences handed down by courts for acts of anti-union discrimination. The Ministry of Labour and Social Security expects to receive this information from the Public Prosecutor’s Office shortly and it will be sent to the Committee of Experts in due course. As to the absence of adequate and comprehensive protection against all acts of interference and of sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanction for such acts, the Committee of Experts requested the Government to take into account that the protection afforded by Article 2 of the Convention is broader in scope than that provided for under section 511 of the Labour Code. As indicated above, a committee within the Ministry of Labour and Social Security was working, with technical support from the ILO, on a proposal to amend section 511 and bring it into line with Article 2 of the Convention. In due course, this proposal would be submitted to the authorities at the Ministry of Labour Social Security and subsequently to the CES, taking full account of the recommendations of the Committee of Experts. The draft reform of section 511 of the Code provides for fines for acts of interference on the part of employers of between five and 20 times the minimum wage, which would be imposed by the General Labour Inspectorate. The draft also provides that, when members who represent the employers, or who hold managerial posts, or are in positions of trust are elected to a trade union board, the elections will be declared null and void.

Turning to Article 6 of Convention No. 98 (the right to collective bargaining of public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State), the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, following up on the recommendations of the Committee of Experts, had drawn up a proposal to amend sections 534 and 536 on public servants’ right of association and limitations thereto. The draft amendments provide that public servant trade unions have the right to submit petitions in order to improve their representation from the Public Prosecutor’s Office shortly and it would be submitted to the authorities at the Ministry of Labour Social Security and subsequently to the CES, taking full account of the recommendations of the Committee of Experts. The draft reform of section 511 of the Code provides for fines for acts of interference on the part of employers of between five and 20 times the minimum wage, which would be imposed by the General Labour Inspectorate. The draft also provides that, when members who represent the employers, or who hold managerial posts, or are in positions of trust are elected to a trade union board, the elections will be declared null and void.

In due course, this proposal would be submitted to the authorities at the Ministry of Labour Social Security and subsequently to the CES, taking full account of the recommendations of the Committee of Experts. The draft reform of section 511 of the Code provides for fines for acts of interference on the part of employers of between five and 20 times the minimum wage, which would be imposed by the General Labour Inspectorate. The draft also provides that, when members who represent the employers, or who hold managerial posts, or are in positions of trust are elected to a trade union board, the elections will be declared null and void.

In addition, before the Committee, a Government representative referred to the political, economic and social conditions of his country that were having an impact on the subject under discussion. He mentioned the achievements of the current administration in the areas of planning, civic participation, productivity, development and... minimum wages, and endorsed and updated the replies to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2009, 2011 and 2012. With regard to the lack of adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination owing to the penalties established in section 469 of the Labour Code, he stated that section 469, as amended would read as follows:

Any person who by violations or threats in any way infringes the right to freedom of association shall incur a fine of five to 20 times the minimum wage, to be imposed by the General Labour Inspectorate, subject to full verification of the facts of the violation concerned.

For repeated offences, the standard fine shall be increased by 50 per cent.

Regarding cases in which criminal penalties had been imposed for acts of anti-union discrimination, he mentioned that the requested information was still awaited from the Public Prosecutor’s Office, which was undergoing a reform process further to the work of an audit board appointed by the National Congress. Nevertheless, he observed that precedents already existed in the Supreme Court of Justice (such as appeal cases Nos 401-2005, 326-2009 and 54-2005), and that the abovementioned information would be sent through official channels in due course. With respect to the absence of protection against all acts of interference and the lack of penalties that acted were sufficiently dissuasive, he indicated that work was in progress to amend section 511 of the Labour Code with a view to bringing it into line with Article 2 of Convention No. 98. Section 511 as amended would read as follows:

Trade union members who, by virtue of their posts in the enterprise, represent the employer or hold managerial posts or positions of trust or are easily able to exert undue pressure on their colleagues shall be barred from election to the executive committee of a primary level or enterprise trade union or from appointment as union officers. The foregoing provision applies to managers, deputy managers, heads of personnel, private secretaries working for the executive committee, the management or the administration, department directors (chief engineer, chief medical officer, legal adviser, technical directors, etc.) and any other similar posts. Should any union member holding any of the abovementioned posts be elected, the election shall be deemed null and void. Any union member who has been duly elected and then takes up one of the abovementioned posts shall automatically relinquish his/her trade union office.

Should any of the situations described in the first paragraph of this section occur, it shall be deemed an act of interference by the employers against the workers or workers’ organizations and shall incur a penalty of five to 20 times the minimum wage, to be imposed by the General Labour Inspectorate.

With regard to the right to collective bargaining of officials not engaged in the administration of the State, work had been undertaken on a proposal to amend sections 534 and 536 of the Labour Code relating to the right of association of public employees and the limitations thereon.

Section 534 as amended would read as follows:

The right to organize in trade unions shall extend to workers throughout the public service, with the exception of members of the armed forces of Honduras and police forces of any kind. Public employee trade unions shall have the power to submit to representatives of the institutions listed in this section demands designed to improve their general conditions of employment, as established in section 56 of the present Code.

Section 536 as amended would read as follows:

Public employee trade unions shall have all the powers of other workers’ unions and their lists of demands shall be handled on the same basis as all others, even when they are not entitled to call or conduct a strike.

The Government of Honduras was ready to submit a report to the Committee of Experts containing updated information on further developments regarding the steps taken to bring the labour legislation into line with the ratified Conventions, in the framework of the CES, with support from the ILO. The Government considered that as a result of the efforts made, it would be possible to make progress on the preliminary drafts for the reform of the Labour Code, and those drafts would require a consensus involving workers and employers to achieve the proposed objectives.

The Worker members recalled that, since 1998, ten observations on the application of Convention No. 98, in particular on the need for sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference by employers or their organizations in trade union affairs, were addressed to the Government. No developments had taken place to date. Yet, in 2001, the Government had announced a revision of the Labour Code with respect to two points: sanctions against persons violating the right to organize freely and protection against dismissal of workers envisaging to establish a trade union. The Government had also committed to set up a system of dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination. With regard to the issue of protection against acts of interference raised by the Committee of Experts, national legislation merely provided that unionized workers who, on account of their duties in the enterprise, held management posts or positions of trust or who were easily able to exercise undue pressure on their colleagues, could not be part of the executive committee of a union. The comments contained in the reports of the Committee of Experts in 2005, 2007, 2009, 2011 and 2013 demonstrated the continued unwillingness of the Government with regard to the follow-up measures requested.

The Worker members recalled that this “double footnote case” illustrated the criteria used to identify such cases (seriousness and persistence of the problem, urgency of the situation, quality and scope of the Government’s response, and in particular the clear and repeated refusal on the part of a State to comply with its obligations). They referred to the written information supplied by the Government in which it announced a series of reforms underway with the objective of bringing the Labour Code in line with Conventions Nos 87 and 98 and to modify the amount of fines. However, the Worker members emphasized the lateness of this announcement and the persistence problem that arose in this regard—since this document authorities could have submitted these legislative changes to the workers a long time ago so that they could have been discussed within the competent tripartite bodies. In its 2009 report, the Committee of Experts had raised new questions to which no answers were provided by the Government, for instance as regards: anti-union practices in export processing zones; delays in the administration of justice in cases of anti-union practices; non-compliance with court orders to reinstate trade unionists; the setting up of parallel organizations by employers; a draft act which could limit the right of collective bargaining to unions representing more than 50 per cent of the total number of employees in the enterprise; and numerous anti-union dismissals in various enterprises in the export processing zones, cement and bakery industries. Thus, the issue of the right to collective bargaining for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State had also been raised. In this regard, the Committee of Experts had indicated in 2009 that the procedure of “respectful statements” referred to by the Government, could not be considered as being in accordance with Convention No. 98. All issues had once again been raised in the 2012 observation.
The Worker members recalled that the fundamental right to collective bargaining was only meaningful and effective if workers’ organizations were independent, outside the employers’ control and free from interference from the authorities. They emphasized that serious problems persisted concerning the right to collective bargaining, particularly in the public sector, where a virulent anti-union harassment was exercised against unions. Twenty-three union leaders of four organizations of teachers had been removed from office and dismissed; only two had been reinstated in their former jobs. In March 2012, the Ministry of Education had eliminated, without negotiation, the principle of deduction of union dues at source, thereby depriving unions of their financial resources. More than 1,000 teachers had been suspended for several days for taking part in union meetings. Without the ability to organize and participate in union meetings, and with the unions being beheaded, one could wonder how collective bargaining could be free and effective within the meaning of Convention No. 98. In the public sector, wages were frozen, collective bargaining was paralyzed and, when negotiations took place, collective agreements were not applied. Precarious work, called “hourly work”, without a contract and not covered by collective bargaining, was on the rise. Recalling more generally that, in terms of observance of working conditions, the fines were so low that it was cheaper to pay them than to remedy the situation, they stated that, although technical assistance had often been proposed, the present situation illustrated the persistent refusal of the Government to take appropriate measures to ensure that the right to collective bargaining was upheld.

The Employer members stated that the comments of the Committee of Experts were based on observations made some years ago by the ITUC relating to legislative matters, the creation of parallel unions and anti-union practices. With regard to legislative matters, they indicated that they did not agree with the Committee of Experts that there was insufficient protection against anti-union acts and that penalties were inadequate. In fact, the Convention did not provide for specific measures; rather, mechanisms appropriate to national circumstances should be put in place. The Convention did not require the imposition of fines. The fines established in the Labour Code ranged from US$12 to US$200, to ensure that they could be adapted to the severity of the offence and an employer’s ability to pay. It was impossible, without supplementary information, to determine whether the amount of the fines was proportionate to the gravity of the offence and an employer’s ability to pay. The Employer members also had sought additional statistics on cases of anti-union discrimination, instead of requesting that the fines be increased.

With regard to section 511 of the Labour Code, the Employer members recalled that the Committee of Experts had considered that sufficiently dissuasive sanctions should also be imposed against acts of interference by employers in workers’ organizations. In that respect, they indicated that the situation and the type of protection necessary should have been investigated. In fact, section 511 provided for mechanisms to be established only where necessary. The observation of the Committee of Experts did not mention problems of interference by employers in the operation or administration of trade union organizations. Neither did it indicate that the protection provided for in section 511 was insufficient. With regard to the right of public servants not employed in the state administration to bargain collectively, the Employer members agreed with the Committee of Experts that sections 534 and 536 of the Labour Code should be amended to allow unions of public employees to submit lists of claims and sign collective agreements. At the same time, they took note of the Government’s statement that such matters would be examined by the CES in the framework of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards Convention), 1976 (No. 144).

A Worker member of Honduras stated that the situation of systematic violations of workers’ labour and human rights in Honduras was the result of non-compliance with the convention and the national law on union rights. He denounced the fact that acquired rights were being restricted or removed altogether, the rights to organize and collective bargaining were not being respected, there was undue interference in internal trade union affairs, the unions’ executive committees received threats, trade union leave was cancelled and the entire trade union movement was constantly being harassed.

Another Worker member of Honduras observed that the government neither safeguarded nor protected labour rights and human rights. Section 120 of the general provisions of the General Budget of the Republic approved by the National Congress for 2013 had frozen civil servants’ salaries and collective bargaining in decentralized, devolved and independent state enterprises. He also denounced the dismissals of union leaders, in violation of trade union immunity, the creation of parallel unions and the dismantling of unions that had been legally established. With respect to the Workers’ Union of the National Autonomous University of Honduras (SITRAUNAH), the speaker observed that since 2007 it had not been possible to negotiate a collective agreement. The situation had become so serious that the union leadership had been dismissed and complaints had been submitted to the criminal courts. The establishment of a parallel union had been encouraged with a view to its participation in collective bargaining. Regarding the Workers’ Union of the National Pedagogical University (SITRAUPN), he drew attention to the non-compliance with and failure to negotiate collective agreements and to the creation of a parallel workers’ association. The speaker also mentioned the non-compliance with and failure to negotiate collective agreements in the cases of the Workers’ Union of the Danli municipality, the Diario Tiempo Workers’ Union, the Workers’ Union of the Institute for Public Servants’ Retirement and Pensions (SITRAJUPEM), the Workers’ Union of the Executive Directorate of Revenues (DEI), the Workers’ Union of the National Vocational Training Institute (SITRAINFOP), the Workers’ Union of the National Agrarian Institute (INA), the Beverage and Allied Industries Workers’ Union (STIBYS), the workers of the Comayagua municipality and the Workers’ Union of Children and the Family (SITRAHNFA). In view of the above, he requested that a direct contacts mission be sent to investigate in situ the allegations made in plenary.

An observer representing Education International (EI), denounced the refusal of trade union leave to the members of central executive committees of four educational organizations, the dismissal of 20 union leaders who had retained their posts thanks to trade union immunity and the dismissal of over 1,000 education workers on the ground that they had attended assemblies in 2012 and 2013; 50 workers were in the process of being dismissed. She also mentioned interference in trade union affairs, the suspension since March 2011 of deductions of union dues, the criminalization of protests and strikes, and the existence of a smear campaign by the Government. Moreover, the police attacks during peaceful demonstrations that had led to the death of Ms Ilse Ivánia Velásquez Rodríguez in March 2011, had remained unpunished.

The Employer member of Honduras stated that, while allegations had been made of acts of anti-union discrimination (without however making reference to any specific cases), he considered that there was adequate protection of the rights to freedom of association and collective bargaining in the country. The speaker refuted the view that the amount of the fines prescribed for acts of anti-union discrimination was too low. Moreover, he considered that the amount of the fine did not impact on the ability of the administrative and judicial authorities to impose sanctions on both private and public parties that violated those provisions. The American member of the Committee had indeed been amended without consultation; however, the amendment in no way hindered protection of freedom of association and collective bargaining from an administrative or judicial point of view. He expressed support for the proposed revision of section 469 of the Labour Code and recalled that from 1992 to 1995, with assistance from ILO experts, a tripartite consultation process had taken place with a view to revising the Labour Code. The draft revision, which included the elements that had been referred to during the current discussion, should have been taken up by the CES. Regrettably, it had not been submitted to the legislative body by the Government of the time. Turning to the lack of adequate protection against acts of interference, he agreed that section 511 of the Labour Code needed to be revised, as did all other provisions that would be deemed unnecessary. He added that he would not pronounce himself on that case since none were mentioned in the allegations. As for the prohibition of concluding collective agreements in the public sector, it was clear that, in that regard, the allegations were false, since there were collective agreements in central Government, in the municipalities, in the autonomous institutions and in the decentralized institutions. He regretted that the Government had not submitted the information on time and correctly. He also drew attention to the fact that all issues highlighted by the Committee of Experts must be examined and approved by the CES before being sent to the National Congress. The Labour Code needed to be revised, in line with the provisions of Convention No. 144, with a view to bringing it into conformity with the Conventions that had been ratified.

The Government member of Colombia, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Committee which were members of the Group of Latin American and Caribbean countries (GRULAC), welcomed the initiatives of the Government to reform the provisions of the Labour Code which were highlighted in the report of the Committee of Experts, and thanked the Government representative for the additional information provided which illustrated its commitment to comply with Convention No. 98, taking into account the recommendations formulated by the Committee of Experts. Cooperation was of the utmost importance, and they trusted that the ILO would continue to provide the necessary technical assistance to Honduras, and encouraged all social partners to spare no efforts to maintain a constructive dialogue so that the labour law reform would culminate in a satisfactory solution for the three parties.

The Worker member of Mexico indicated that the seriousness and urgency of this case justified sending a direct contacts mission to the country so as to promote the rule of law based on a legal system that guaranteed the workers’ right to organize and collective bargaining. The Government did not recognize the legal personality of genuine unions but granted it to purported unions created by employers. When, exceptionally, workers succeeded in concluding a collective agreement, it was not recognized. The Company had indeed been accused of failing to receive notice of the union’s legal registration, and the newly elected union leaders had been dismissed. In March 2012, 25 Honduran unions and labour federations (joint venture between United States’ and Korean companies), which employed approximately 4,000 workers for export production purposes, had refused to receive notice of the union’s legal registration, had rejected the bargaining proposal duly presented in 2011 and had illegally dismissed the elected union leaders in January and February 2012. The Government had consistently failed to enforce laws to reinstate those union leaders. In March 2012, the union had agreed on terms of bargaining. On 6 March, the company and the Ministry of Labour and Social Security had requested the Ministry to move to the mediation phase. Throughout April, the management had held mandatory meetings with workers, threatening to close the factory because of the union, and had dismissed at least 108 union members, including all remaining elected union leaders. Yet, in November 2012, the company had been hiring hundreds of workers, reaching a total of 4,200 workers before the mass firings had begun. As documented in numerous human rights reports, the Government regularly used its powers, including the police and military, to enforce law and order during protests of civil society, teachers and unions. However, in the case of enforcing workers’ rights, the State did not use those or any of its powers. He expressed concerns about broader political freedoms and human rights in civil society in Honduras. He noted that the Government had taken steps to ensure that the Committee could reach meaningful conclusions regarding the facts in the present case, and considered that a direct contacts mission of the ILO would be necessary to address the consistent failure of the Government to respect the right to organize and collective bargaining.

The Worker member of Panama considered that the Committee had the responsibility to take measures and follow up on the request of the Honduran workers to send a direct contacts mission to the country, taking into account the seriousness of the allegations (deaths and imprisonments). It was necessary to send a message of peace to the region. He also deemed regrettable that, as in Panama, union leaders were being called to trial and made subject to precautionary measures.

The Worker member of Nicaragua, referring also to the Convention Trade Union Platform for Central America (PSCCC), the Federation of Teachers’ Organizations of Central America (FOMCA) and Education International for Latin America, endorsed and supported the allegations and demands made. The authorities had consistently violated labour legislation with regard to freedom of association and collective bargaining. Despite having resulted from collective bargaining and being enshrined in the Constitution, the Teachers Statute had been violated. Education workers who had taken part in protests had had their wages reduced. He also referred to the audit undertaken in the Institute for the Social Security of Teachers.

The Worker member of Brazil recalled that the Committee of Experts had been citing the Government’s non-compliance with Conventions Nos 87 and 98 for years. If democracy was to work properly, it was essential that the rights embodied in those Conventions be respected. The legal system in force in the country did not allow workers to establish and join organizations freely or to engage in collective bargaining, and it encouraged political and financial interference in trade unions by the employers. There was no effective legal machinery to prevent such anti-union behaviour because the fines imposed were not dissuasive and because the judicial procedures were slow. Moreover, the right to strike was hampered by the fact that the requisite quorums for taking strike action were too high. Those requirements were also contrary to the principles laid down by the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The Government representative said that much effort had been invested in bringing the Labour Code into line with the Conventions, which illustrated the Government’s goodwill. He also stated that tripartism was one of the Government’s objectives. To that end, measures were being taken with a view to amending the regulatory framework of the CES. Likewise, within this body, discussions were being planned on the new labour inspection law and on amending the sections of the Labour Code in order to bring it into line with Conventions Nos 87 and 98. Nonetheless, Honduras was embarking on an election period which would culminate in November 2013; the necessary reforms would therefore have to wait until the new government had been elected.

The Worker members recalled the comments that the Committee of Experts had been formulating since 1998 and noted with regret the Government’s lack of will to implement its recommendations, even though they were very clear. According to the report, the Convention was not currently being applied in Honduras. However, the Government had recently requested the technical assistance of the ILO that the ILO had been offering for years, which suggested that the situation had evolved and was a sign of goodwill on the part of the Government. As the Worker members saw it, one constructive move would be to propose that a direct contacts mission be sent to the country to facilitate the reforms that the Government had announced and to ensure that their implementation benefited from tripartite dialogue. The mission could present an annual follow-up report to the Committee of Experts which would examine the case as long as necessary in a special chapter of its report.

The Employer members, noting that the discussion was about compliance with one of the fundamental Conventions, it was a double footnoted case, and it had already been examined on numerous occasions, it was a case of serious problems of compliance with the Convention. They therefore supported the Worker members proposal for a direct contacts mission so that, with ILO assistance and the participation of the social partners, the Government could take steps to have the legislation amended so as to bring it into line with the Convention.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the oral and written information provided by the Government and the discussion that ensued.

The Committee noted that the outstanding issues concerned the need for protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference in both law and practice, including in the export processing zones, and the right to collective bargaining for public employees.

The Committee noted the Government’s statements according to which the authorities were currently working on a partial reform of the Labour Code with the technical assistance of the ILO, taking into account the recommendations of the Committee of Experts, in order to strengthen the protection in law against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. Furthermore, there was a proposal by the Secretary of Labour to amend the Labour Code so as to ensure that the representatives of employees of public institutions would be able to present lists of claims, just like other unions; these texts would then be submitted to the CES, before being submitted to Parliament.

The Committee stressed the importance of the reform process being carried out in consultation with all the workers’ and employers’ organizations concerned. Observing that these matters have been pending for many years, the Committee expressed the firm hope that the abovementioned amendments would be submitted to the legislature in the near future so that it would be able to note tangible progress towards full compliance of the legislation and practice with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requested the Government to accept a direct contacts mission to ensure the effective modification of the law and the practice for the full application of this fundamental Convention and to develop tripartite dialogue to resolve the matters concerned.

The Committee requested the Government to provide a detailed report to the Committee of Experts for examination at its next meeting in 2013.

The Government representative indicated that his Government was creating the right environment for social dialogue so as to promote tripartism and freedom of association. The CES was the appropriate forum for the issue to be dealt with as a priority. The next step would be to transmit it to the National Congress. His Government did not believe that a direct contacts mission was necessary, but would nevertheless receive it and facilitate its work. He was certain that, when the next report was submitted, this Committee would be able to applaud the progress made.
A Government representative expressed his Government’s deep regret at his country being included in the final list of individual cases for Convention No. 98. The Government understood that the credibility and the supervisory mechanism, implying that political considerations outweighed substantive and technical aspects. The decision of the Committee was contradictory since major progress and reforms had been achieved in the area of labour legislation on the basis of which the Committee of Experts had expressed its satisfaction with regard to the application of the Convention. He indicated that these legislative reforms showed the commitment of the Government to apply the Convention. The Government representative indicated that progress included amendments to the national Constitution in 2010, which had paved the way for reforms in labour legislation including the adoption of Act No. 6356 on trade unions and collective agreements, and amendments to Act No. 4688 on public servants’ trade unions, which had been sent to the ILO. The amendments to Act No. 4688 enabled representatives of civil servants to negotiate and sign collective agreements. Furthermore, the scope of unionization in the public sector had been extended by reducing the exceptions provided for in law, and following a recent decision of the Constitutional Court, the ban on trade union rights for civilian personnel working at the military institutions had been eliminated. According to the Government representative, the most important changes had been made through the simplification of Act No. 6356, which had not only replaced the trade union legislation imposed by the military, but had also created conditions for more democratic and free industrial relations. The new features of the Act included: (i) the extension of the scope of application of the right to organize to self-employed workers; (ii) the repeal of restrictions on the establishment, composition and requirements to be a founding member of a trade union; (iii) the simplification of the procedure for the establishment of trade unions; (iv) the reorganization or reduction in the number of branches of activity from 28 to 20; (v) the repeal of the requirement for notarial attestation to join or resign from a trade union; (vi) the authorization of multiple trade union memberships for workers employed at different workplaces in the same branch of activity; (vii) the determination by the trade union statute of the maximum amount of union dues; (viii) the authorization of multiple trade union memberships during temporary unemployment; (ix) the extension of authorized international activities of trade unions; (x) the separation of individual liability from that of the legal personality of the trade union; (xi) the financial auditing by independent chartered accountants; (xii) the strengthening of freedom of association; and (xiii) the free determination of affiliation with a branch of activity by trade unions. Furthermore, the Act had introduced major improvements for collective agreements, and had thereby addressed the comments made by the Committee of Experts in its report, namely through: (i) the enabling of multilevel collective agreements via framework agreements; (ii) the establishment of a legal framework for the regulation of group collective agreements; (iii) the guarantee of the continuity of collective agreement after a full or partial transfer of business ownership; (iv) the introduction of a new definition of strike bans; (v) the lifting of restrictions on various forms of strikes, industrial actions and picketing; (vi) the immunity of trade union liability for damages at workplaces during strikes; (vii) the authorization of all confederations to be represented before the Higher Board of Arbitration; and (viii) the replacement of prison sentences by administrative fines for certain infringements included in the previous Act.

With regard to the critical observations made by the Committee of Experts regarding threshold levels and the requirements to sign collective agreements, the Government representative indicated that the new Act had amended the branch of activity threshold from 10 to 3 per cent. Nevertheless, to give trade unions time to adapt to the new conditions, the threshold was maintained until July 2016. On the other hand, thresholds for enterprises concluding collective agreements at the enterprise level were reduced from 50 to 40 per cent of the number of workers at the workplace. Concerning the protection of trade union members, he indicated that the Act regulated the protection of trade union officials, shop stewards and individual freedom of association with reference to the relevant ILO Conventions. Furthermore, union officials and shop stewards were given an absolute right of reinstatement. Shop stewards could not be dismissed without a justified reason, which had to be clearly and precisely stated in written form in full conformity with the Workers’ Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135). Individual freedom of association was guaranteed in the recruitment procedure, employment and the termination of employment. In any lawsuit brought concerning the termination of an employment contract due to trade union affiliation, the burden of proof that the dismissal was not caused by trade union membership laid with the employer. It was frequently claimed, with regard to section 25(5) of Act No. 6356, that workers employed in workplaces employing less than 30 workers were excluded from special compensation for trade union violations. This statement was unfounded since it did not take into account the last sentence of paragraph 5 guaranteeing special compensation for all workers in the case of anti-union dismissal, which could not be inferior to a year’s salary. Even if workers did not bring a case to court on the basis of the provisions on protection against dismissal, they were entitled to claim union compensation, which should not be lower than the worker’s annual wage. The Government representative further stated that a case had been brought to the Constitutional Court concerning the annulment of the abovementioned provision and a decision was expected soon. His Government considered that the Committee should have awaited the implementation in practice of the new laws before including his country in the list of individual cases.

The Worker members said that they were following the events currently unfolding in the major cities in Turkey with deep concern. They condemned the disproportionate police brutality and expressed their solidarity with the workers fighting for the application of democratic, social and trade union rights. They highlighted the fact that several trade union organizations in Turkey, supported by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), had denounced the particularly frequent discrimination against trade unions in the public and private sectors. It would be helpful if the Government would indicate the procedure for examining complaints of anti-union discrimination in the public sector and would forward statistics on the examination of cases of anti-union discrimination and interference in practice in both the public and private sectors. The Government claimed only to have such statistics for the public sector. Without specific statistics on complaints made and how they had been dealt with, the Committee could not carry out its work. With regard to the public sector, the Worker members recalled that Article 8 of the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151), provided a certain degree of leeway in the choice of procedures for settling disputes, they nevertheless needed to be quick, impartial and perceived as such by the parties concerned. The procedure for the public sector in Turkey involved submitting written or oral statements to superiors, with the possibility to have recourse to administrative proceedings as a second step. They considered that that procedure, in particular the first stage thereof, did not guarantee impartiality. The Worker members highlighted problems posed by the adoption, on 18 October 2012, of the new Collective Labour Relations Act, which applied to the private sector. The Bill eventually adopted had been rejected several times by the trade unions. According to information available, the Act contained provisions that were a regression compared to those previously in force. Regarding the thresholds for forming enterprise trade unions, the legislative reform presented new obstacles and indirectly prevented the creation of new organizations in enterprises that already had a union. It was regrettable that the Committee of Experts had not been able to undertake an in-depth analysis of the new Act.

The Worker members noted that there had been significant changes regarding collective bargaining in the public sector. The 2010 constitutional reform had introduced the right of civil servants and public employees to conclude collective agreements. Several legislative amendments, including the adoption of Act No. 6289 amending Act No. 4688 of 25 June 2001 on public servants’ trade unions, had subsequently been made in 2012 to give effect to the constitutional amendment. That Act had some positive aspects, for example, concerning the length of the bargaining period, but the effects of the changes in practice remained to be clarified. The Committee of Experts had, however, emphasized that some of its comments had not been taken into account, particularly regarding the direct participation of employers in bargaining, alongside the financial authorities, and the significant role played by participation of employers in bargaining, alongside the financial authorities. They highlighted the legislative reform strengthening the rights of public servants and other state employees in the workplace and 40 per cent of the workers at enterprise level, which had been maintained in the new Act. In addition, while the certificate of competence for collective bargaining of unions was issued by the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, an appeal against this certificate could be launched by the employer or another trade union, and necessary arrangements had to be made in consultation with the parties concerned. Turning to the implementation gaps of other fundamental Conventions, in particular the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), he pointed out that the approach to search for loopholes in the legislation to keep the union away from the workplace still prevailed and was the biggest obstacle to the effective implementation of national legislation, Convention No. 87 and other Conventions. In this context, he referred to the difficulties encountered by the Food and Tobacco Workers Union in reaching a consensus with the public employer, including through a strike covering 10,000 workers, and by the Aviation Workers Union in trying to reach a consensus to reinstate 806 of the 3500 employees who had been dismissed due to their trade union activities.

Another Worker member of Turkey noted the legislative amendments and indicated that while improvements had been made, as underlined in the report of the Committee of Experts, there were still enormous problems for public employees or even drawbacks with regard to the application of the Convention, despite the visit of the high-level missions to the country in 2008 and 2010. He pointed to the number of difficulties: while the Act extended the period of collective bargaining to 30 days, in practice, collective bargaining was only possible over a period of 15 days, which was insufficient; the exclusive right of the heads of the respective parties to turn to the arbitration board in the event of disagreements; the dominant position of employers in the public workers arbitration board; the absence of the right of appeal with regard to a binding decision; the remaining exclusion of public servants in military institutions and security guards from the right to organize under the amended Act No. 4688 (in this regard, he referred to dismissals of members of the police trade union “Emniyet-Sen”); the lack of regulations provided in the amended Act No. 4688 to prevent double standards among trade unions; and the non-recognition of any type of of collective action such as strikes for public servants. Finally, the Worker member expressed the view that the current events in Turkey were a result of the lack of social dialogue between the Government and the social partners.

The Employer member of Turkey indicated that the country had just undergone a radical reform process regarding the existing industrial relations framework. This had meant that the case should be removed from the list of individual cases. The ex-President of Turkey was expressing his view in view of the substantial legislative changes that had taken place in the country. The achievements included in the new Act reflected a broad consensus among the social partners of a Joint Declaration in 2013, in which the Minister and a large number of the Turkish social partners signed. He further referred to the fact that the new Act had been adopted in a wide process of social dialogue, so that almost 95 per cent of the provisions included in the new Act reflected a broad consensus among the social partners. He further referred to the involvement of the Labour Minister and a large number of the social partners of a Joint Declaration in 2013, in which support was expressed for opening the Social and Employment Chapter in European Union membership negotiations.

The new laws had been adopted after intense dialogue with the social partners, which demonstrated that tripartism was functioning well in the country.

The Worker member of France, referring also to Education International, underlined the importance of effective tripartite social dialogue for social justice, the fight against inequality and respect for fundamental principles and rights at work, such as the right to assembly. She went on to point out that the Committee on Freedom of Association, in its March 2012 conclusions on a complaint against Turkey, had recognized the violation of Convention No. 98. However, it said that the current discussion had recognized the tripartite social dialogue in Turkey as fundamental to developing social dialogue, which was far from being a reality in Turkey. She went on to point out that the Committee on Freedom of Association had pointed out that the country had just undergone a radical reform process regarding the existing industrial relations framework.

The Government member of Pakistan indicated that Turkey had ratified all the fundamental Conventions, and that the application of Convention No. 98 had been noted with satisfaction by the Committee of Experts. It was therefore disappointing to see the case included in the list of individual cases.

ions since the unions were not able to afford any protection to their members. He went on to state that the difficulties had not stopped with the adoption of the new Act. The new Act maintained thresholds for collective bargaining certification which still constituted barriers to the exercise of freedom of association and collective bargaining since unions were likely to lose the protection of the new Act with the creation of larger sectors. Turkey was the only country where a sectoral threshold was necessary for workplace collective bargaining and one third of union members did not have access to bargaining rights. In the meantime, workplace thresholds were still too high, creating huge difficulties for the unions. In addition, the new legislation did not provide any solution to the long-standing judicial processes resulting from the employers’ common practice of challenging the issuance of certificates of competence by the Ministry of Labour. During such legal proceedings, union members were often dismissed, as shown by many concrete cases of famous brands in the textile, chemical and metal sectors.

The Government of Egypt stated that the Government had taken significant steps to amend national legislation so as to ensure its conformity with international Conventions. The amendments had been made within the framework of constructive social dialogue and with the participation of all of the social partners. It should likewise be noted that a new Act on collective bargaining in the public service, in line with the principles set out in Conventions Nos 87 and 98, had been adopted in April 2012 and that certain provisions of the Constitution that restricted the right to bargain collectively had been abrogated. The speaker therefore considered that the case should not be examined further by this Committee.

The Worker of Germany stated that the acts of discrimination in the private and public sectors aimed at trade unionists were a matter of concern and discrimination against people who wanted to organize constituted a clear violation of the Convention. The situation affected not only Turkish companies but also international corporations operating in Turkey. The speaker provided examples of employees who had been intimidated because they had wanted to join unions, including on 20 November 2007 when 17 organized employees were arrested in Ankara for allegedly creating a terrorist organization which, according to the union, were baseless claims. The employees were released after 200 days in prison and the Government had provided no information in that regard. In December 2012, 11 employees were sentenced by the court in accordance with the law for having participated in protest actions. The speaker observed that the sole intention of the new draft labour law reform was to make it increasingly difficult for unions to register and bargain collectively and that it was essentially another element of the Government’s anti-union strategy. She called upon the Government to put an end to the intimidation and harassment of trade union members and leaders, to promptly release those detained and to undertake the revision of the labour law reform.

The Worker of the Netherlands focused her comments on three issues. First, referring to the May Day celebration, she regretted that excessive police violence used in this year’s gathering in Taksim Square had cast a shadow over the Government’s initiative to declare 1 May as a public holiday, which had been generally accepted as progress. Secondly, concerning the protection against discrimination for trade union membership and activities, the speaker stressed that collective bargaining was one of the main instruments for income redistribution and, because it was so excessively restricted in law and practice, Turkey was among the top three countries identified by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) for income inequality. It was of the utmost importance that the new law on trade unions and collective bargaining agreements effectively removed legal barriers to collective bargaining. That was the only way that the Government could align its legislation with the Convention, and it was unfortunate that the Committee of Experts had not been able to comment on the new law which would have allowed for a discussion in the Committee. Thirdly, she regretted that the so-called “double threshold”, which imposed on trade unions a high requirement of representation before they could qualify for participation in collective bargaining, the speaker indicated that, from the information available, as well as the statement of the Government representative, it was understood that the double threshold still existed. It had been criticized by the Committee of Experts and by this Committee on several occasions. The percentage of required representation would be increasing from the current 1 per cent. The Committee had been asking the Government to bring its legislation into line with the Convention, which could include not increasing the representation threshold for the sector above 1 per cent. She recalled that workers in companies with less than 30 workers enjoyed less protection against anti-union discrimination. However, section 25(5) of the new Act was ambiguous and could be understood as implying that workers in small companies with less than 30 workers could no longer go to court to obtain compensation in case of unfair dismissal for trade union activities. The Government should be asked, at a minimum, to remove this blatant form of trade union discrimination as soon as possible. Economic growth should be based on a level playing field of fundamental labour standards, including Convention No. 98, which should apply to all workers, regardless of company size, for a period of one to six years. Those cases demonstrated the extent of trade union discrimination and were a matter of great concern which should continue to be monitored closely.

An observer representing Public Services International (PSI) recalled that in the last year, there had been unprecedented attacks on trade union rights in Turkey, including the arrest in February 2013 of 151 trade union representatives, mostly members of KESK, and the detention of 15 female trade unionists in February 2012 and of another 67 trade unionists in June 2012. Some of those arrested had since been released but others were still imprisoned without formal charges having been filed against them. She indicated that armed police raids on union offices, using excessive violence, had been reported in recent months while a few days ago, municipal workers in Ankara were threatened with the loss of their positions in protest actions. The speaker observed that the sole intention of the new draft labour law reform was to make it increasingly difficult for unions to register and bargain collectively and that it was essentially another element of the Government’s anti-union strategy. She called upon the Government to put an end to the intimidation and harassment of trade union members and leaders, to promptly release those detained and to undertake the revision of the labour law reform.

Turkey was a democratic country based on the rule of law and had an independent judiciary. If any trade union members had been arrested or put on trial, this was not associated with their trade union activities but rather with their involvement in violent terrorist activities or the setting up of terrorist organizations. Information received from the Advisory Group on Justice and Crime and from the Workers suggested that certain trade unionists had been arrested for breaching the Penal Code Act No. 5237, the Fighting Terrorism Act No. 3713 and the Demonstrations and Marches Act No. 2911. As for the “double threshold” system as a barrier to collective bargaining, the speaker explained that the sector-level threshold would be lowered to 3 per cent as of July 2018 but added that the Government was prepared to consider the request of the Worker members not to increase that threshold above 1 per cent. Concerning the declining number of trade unions authorized to sign collective agreements, the speaker observed that the certification of competence for a trade union to conclude a collective agreement was previously determined by reference to inaccurate and inflated statistical data provided by the trade unions themselves. The Government had introduced a new system based on cross-checking the figures of the Social Security Institute since 2009, providing more accurate figures regarding trade union membership and unionization rates. According to recent statistics, in 2013, the rate of unionization in Turkey was 9.21 per cent, which was of course lower than previously established figures. It would now be for the trade unions to intensify their efforts so as to increase the number of their members.

With reference to the incidents surrounding the May Day celebrations at Taksim Square, his Government could not accept any accusations and he indicated that the Government had opened the way for May Day celebrations in Taksim Square after a long period of prohibition. With one exception, May Day was peacefully celebrated throughout the country with 136 events in 76 provinces and the participation of 250,000 people. That year, Taksim Square was closed to mass gatherings for safety reasons due to ongoing construction works. Some marginal groups provoked violent incidents damaging public and private property but police action was at no point directed against any trade union premises or any group exercising its right to freedom of association or freedom of speech.

The Worker members emphasized the fact that the Government should be asked to submit the statistical data that the Committee of Experts had requested so that it could verify whether the procedure used for complaints of anti-union discrimination in the public sector afforded sufficient protection. As for the private sector, since the Government had said that there were no statistics available on cases of anti-union discrimination, it should be asked to implement a reliable system for identifying such cases. In addition, the Government should also provide detailed information on how the new law governing labour relations had taken account of the comments of the Committee of Experts over many years, as some of the requirements of the law appeared to run contrary to the provisions of the Convention. The Worker members concluded by emphasizing that since the collaboration between the Office and the Government had not yet produced the desired results, technical cooperation should be strengthened in order to resolve the urgent issues: removing the provisos from the new law on labour relations that could result in discrimination between workers in small and large enterprises; not increasing the threshold that had been set for the establishment of trade unions, given that the Government had expressed its goodwill in that regard; and removing the obstacles to freedom of expression and trade union industrial action.

The Employer members appreciated the progress that had been made in terms of labour legislation, particularly as it was the result of tripartite social dialogue. However, additional information was required, including specific statistical data, in order to determine the extent of the problem in the public sector. In addition, the legislation should be amended in consultation with the social partners to be in full conformity with the Convention. To that end, the Government should accept technical assistance from the Office, undertake to gather the information that had been requested and send a detailed account in time for the forthcoming session of the Committee of Experts.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the oral information provided by the Government and the discussion that ensued.

The Committee noted that the outstanding issues concerned numerous allegations of acts of anti-union discrimination in both the public and private sectors and the national mechanisms available to enable complaints about such acts, as well as the need to ensure a legislative framework for free and voluntary collective bargaining.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government concerning the adoption of the law on trade unions and collective agreements No. 6356 and the law concerning collective bargaining in the public service No. 6289, adopted in the spirit of tripartism and intensive social dialogue, as well as with ILO standards as a main reference point. It further observed the Government’s enumeration of a number of provisions that were brought into closer conformity with the Convention. The Government also stated that the comments of the workers’ representatives concerning the double threshold system would also be taken into consideration.

The Committee welcomed the elements of progress that had been observed in this case through the adoption of the law concerning collective bargaining in the public service but further noted the need to intensify efforts related to certain categories of public service workers who were not covered by this law as well as other limitations to collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the legislation, and its practical implementation, would ensure fuller conformity with the Convention and invited the Government to avail itself of the technical cooperation of the ILO in this regard. In particular, the Committee requested the Government to establish a system for collecting data on anti-union discrimination in the private sector and to ensure the removal of any ambiguities in the new legislation in light of its assessment by the Committee of Experts. The Committee requested the Government to provide all relevant information, including as regards the functioning of national complaints mechanisms and all statistical data related to anti-union discrimination in the private and public sectors. Finally, the Committee requested the Government to supply a detailed report to the Committee of Experts for examination at its next meeting this year.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC (ratification: 1964)

The Government provided the following written information.

On 26 January 2010, the National Congress adopted the final amendment to the Constitution, reaffirming the nation’s commitment to respect the prohibition of any act considered discriminatory. Article 38 stipulates: “The State is founded upon respect for the dignity of the individual and is organized for the real and effective protection of the fundamental rights inherent to every person. The dignity of human beings is sacred, innate and invio-able. Public authorities have a fundamental duty to respect and protect human dignity.” Likewise, principle VII of the Labour Code states that: “Any discrimination, exclusion or preference on grounds of sex, age, race, colour, national extraction, origin, political opinion, trade union activity or religious belief is prohibited, apart from those made in law for the purposes of equal treatment of individual workers.” Principle IV of the Labour Code stipulates: “Labour laws shall be territorial in scope and shall apply without distinction to Dominicans and foreigners.” This means that the obligations and rights provided for in labour standards apply equally to Dominican and foreign workers, regardless of their migration status, and the benefits deriving from the employment relationship are therefore exactly the same and are provided on an equal footing.

In addition section 6 of Act 135-11 states: “Any person living with HIV or AIDS has the right to work; consequently, any labour discrimination by an employer, whether physical or legal, public or private, Dominican or foreign, is prohibited; and the employer shall not, directly or indirectly, request a test to detect HIV or its antibodies as a condition for obtaining or keeping a post or for promotion.”

As evidence of the integration of policies on migration with the world of work, the inter-institutional agreement reached between the Ministry of Labour, the Ministry of External Relations and the Directorate General for Migration has been used to coordinate action on requests for registration of contracts of employment for people who are not Dominican. Specifically, a visa is issued, once a contract has been offered by an enterprise, then the contract is registered with the Ministry of Labour. Lastly, the migrant worker is issued with an identity document by the Directorate General for Migration. As an example of this procedure, a pilot programme was undertaken at an enterprise in the Dominican Republic’s agricultural sector, under which working visas were granted to 325 workers of Haitian origin. Their contracts were registered and the Directorate General for Migration issued an official document regulating their migration and work status. The Ministry of Labour, the Ministry of External Relations and the Directorate General for Migration have organized three activities in the last seven months: a workshop for employers in the hotel sector; a workshop for the construction sector, held jointly with the National Construction Association; and a workshop for all those in charge of local offices and heads of department of the Ministry of Labour related to contracts of employment between Dominican and foreign workers in the construction sector, it should be pointed out that the training programme covered the issue of equal pay between men and women and between Dominican and foreign workers, as provided in the Labour Code.

The Government also highlights the work of the Department for Legal Assistance, which operates within the Ministry of Labour and provides free legal assistance to all workers, including workers of Haitian origin. In March this year, with assistance from the International Organization for Migration (IOM), a leaflet produced by the Ministry of Labour was translated into Creole, which gives specific information on how to file any kind of labour-related complaint and on fundamental rights. In 2013, the Supreme Court had ruled on 2 June 2012, that foreigners who desired or were obliged to make use of the justice system, either as complainant or defendant, did not have to post a bond; they could therefore pursue litigation without cost. The speaker also mentioned the adoption of the Regulations to the General Migration Act, in October 2011, which applied not only to those who wished to enter the Dominican Republic, but also to those living in the country in an irregular status. The Regulations to the General Migration Act of 2011, was devising a mechanism to monitor all workers through the Labour Registration System (SIRLA). In 2012, 14,676 foreign workers had been registered, of whom 5,662 were Haitian. As of May 2013, 5,585 contracts for Haitian workers had been registered. The Government had introduced an orientation and training programme for employers and workers on relevant legislation in force. The Department for Labour Inspection also operated a preventative inspection system to monitor effective compliance with standards, which included the issue of equal pay. In 2012, the Labour Migration Unit had been established, under decision No. 14/2012.

In 2013, it was agreed with several laboratories that they would not carry out tests that were not covered by the country’s existing standards without the consent of the individuals concerned. In particular, the Government maintained legal provisions expressly prohibiting tests that could give rise to discriminatory acts against men or women. The Government representative also provided information on gender and anti-discrimination training measures for staff of the Ministry of Labour and on other training and awareness-raising activities carried out. His Government requested the Office to continue offering technical assistance and underlined the Government’s commitment to providing information on all measures taken to apply the Convention.

The Employer members recalled that the case had been double footnoted by the Committee of Experts in 2012. The Committee of Experts had made 12 observations on the Convention, on the difficulties faced by these workers, especially young women working in garment factories in EPZs who, in violation of the Convention, were subjected to mandatory pregnancy testing before being hired, with the results of such tests being sent to the employers. However, the Government had not supplied any information on the progress made in the adoption of amendments to the Labour Code or on the application in practice of section 47(9) of the Labour Code, which prohibited sexual harassment by representatives of the employer. Apart from awareness-raising measures for medical laboratories, the Government had provided no clear indication of its intentions to combat such practices. Regarding real or perceived HIV status, it should be welcomed that under the 2011 Act it was forbidden to require HIV testing as a condition for obtaining or keeping a job, or for promotion, and any dismissal on that basis would be deemed null and void and punishable by heavy fines. It remained to be seen whether those measures would be effective, as there was evidence that HIV detection tests were continuing in practice. The situation was unacceptable and warranted very close scrutiny by the Committee.

The Employer member of the Dominican Republic stated that the current legislation made it possible to strengthen non-discriminatory practices, as well as the additional measures that the Government was taking. It was perhaps as a result of the recommendations of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and related intolerance and of the Independent Expert on minority issues, cited in the observation of the Committee of Experts, that the Government was taking effective action that was increasingly in line with the Convention. The Employer members noted the Government’s willingness to receive technical assistance from the Office and its commitment to keep the ILO informed of the progress achieved.

The Worker members observed that the Committee had already been examining for some 20 years the application of the Convention not only to migrant workers of Haitian origin, but also to dark-skinned Dominican nationals. Other serious forms of discrimination included HIV testing, pregnancy testing in export processing zones (EPZs) and cases of sexual harassment in industry. Regarding discrimination based on colour, race or national extraction, a new Regulation on migration had been adopted on 19 October 2011 providing that foreign residents were guaranteed fundamental rights on equal terms with Dominican nationals. According to the report of the Committee of Experts, migrant workers in an irregular situation were subject to real or perceived discrimination from social security coverage on an equal footing with national workers. Nevertheless, the national trade unions still considered that the discrimination problems of Haitian migrants persisted, even the second or third generation who had been born on Dominican territory. It was reported that the poorest inhabitants of the country were of African extraction and included some 800,000 immigrants from Haiti, most of whom did not have an identity card and therefore had no access to social security. They were paid significantly lower wages than national workers particularly in the construction and agriculture sectors. It was, therefore, necessary to check the facts on the ground in order to establish the situation of migrants who were non-resident in legal terms, namely those who had no residence permits.

The Employer from the Government that national law prohibited all forms of discrimination, thousands of Haitians living and working on the national territory were still without equal rights as a result of being without identity documents, while the only figure put forward by the Government concerned a measure to give legal status to 325 workers in agriculture. Attention should also be drawn to the difficulties faced by these workers, especially young women working in garment factories in EPZs who, in violation of the Convention, were subjected to mandatory pregnancy testing before being hired, with the results of such tests being sent to the employers. However, the Government had not supplied any information on the progress made in the adoption of amendments to the Labour Code or on the application in practice of section 47(9) of the Labour Code, which prohibited sexual harassment by representatives of the employer. Apart from awareness-raising measures for medical laboratories, the Government had provided no clear indication of its intentions to combat such practices. Regarding real or perceived HIV status, it should be welcomed that under the 2011 Act it was forbidden to require HIV testing as a condition for obtaining or keeping a job, or for promotion, and any dismissal on that basis would be deemed null and void and punishable by heavy fines. It remained to be seen whether those measures would be effective, as there was evidence that HIV detection tests were continuing in practice. The situation was unacceptable and warranted very close scrutiny by the Committee.

The Employer member of the Dominican Republic stated that the current legislation made it possible to strengthen non-discriminatory practices, as well as the additional measures that the Government was taking. It was perhaps as a result of the recommendations of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and related intolerance and of the Independent Expert on minority issues, cited in the observation of the Committee of Experts, that the Government was taking effective action that was increasingly in line with the Convention. The Employer members noted the Government’s willingness to receive technical assistance from the Office and its commitment to keep the ILO informed of the progress achieved.

The Worker members observed that the Committee had already been examining for some 20 years the application of the Convention not only to migrant workers of Haitian origin, but also to dark-skinned Dominican nationals. Other serious forms of discrimination included HIV testing, pregnancy testing in export processing zones (EPZs) and cases of sexual harassment in industry. Regarding discrimination based on colour, race or national extraction, a new Regulation on migration had been adopted on 19 October 2011 providing that foreign residents were guaranteed fundamental rights on equal terms with Dominican nationals. According to the report of the Committee of Experts, migrant workers in an irregular situation were subject to real or perceived discrimination from social security coverage on an equal footing with national workers. Nevertheless, the national trade unions still considered that the discrimination problems of Haitian migrants persisted, even the second or third generation who had been born on Dominican territory. It was reported that the poorest inhabitants of the country were of African extraction and included some 800,000 immigrants from Haiti, most of whom did not have an identity card and therefore had no access to social security. They were paid significantly lower wages than national workers particularly in the construction and agriculture sectors. It was, therefore, necessary to check the facts on the ground in order to establish the situation of migrants who were non-resident in legal terms, namely those who had no residence permits.

The Employer from the Government that national law prohibited all forms of discrimination, thousands of Haitians living and working on the national territory were still without equal rights as a result of being without identity documents, while the only figure put forward by the Government concerned a measure to give legal status to 325 workers in agriculture. ployment of Haitian workers. The CASC also received complaints of discrimination based on sex or on real or supposed HIV status from workers in EPZs, although this only occurred where there were no workers’ organizations, which demonstrated the relationship between the Convention under examination and other workers’ rights. The Government had established the Committee for Equal Opportunities and the Committee of Experts. Those comments related to the Regulation of the General Migration Act and the establishment in 2012 of a labour migration unit in the Ministry of Labour with the objectives of ensuring compliance with the rights of migrants through inspection procedures, guaranteeing compliance with labour laws applicable to foreign nationals and disseminating information on the rights of foreigners. She also stated that in 2012 the Ministry of Labour had approved the plant closure with the Ministry of Labour had approved the plant closure with due regard to the rights of migrant workers.

The Government member of Colombia, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Committee, which were members of the Group of Latin American and Caribbean Countries (GRULAC), said that they had listened carefully to the details provided by the Government representative concerning the action taken in relation to the Convention and the comments made by the Committee of Experts. Those comments related to the Regulation to the General Migration Act and the establishment in 2012 of a labour migration unit in the Ministry of Labour with the objectives of ensuring compliance with the rights of migrants through inspection procedures, guaranteeing compliance with labour laws applicable to foreign nationals and disseminating information on the rights of foreigners. She also stated that in 2012 the Ministry of Labour had established the Committee for Equal Opportunities and Non-discrimination, which sought to raise the awareness of workers and employers concerning the application of labour laws from the perspective of equality and equity between all the partners in the world of work. She reiterated the commitment of GRULAC to the protection and promotion of equality of opportunity and non-discrimination in employment in all parts of the world. They welcomed the efforts made by the Government and encouraged it to continue with the measures taken with a view to fuller implementation of the objectives of the Convention under examination and other workers’ rights.

The Worker member of the United States recalled that the Dominican Republic – Central America–United States Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA–DR), signed in 2004 by the Governments of the Dominican Republic, the United States and other countries, required the Dominican Republic to comply with its national laws and ILO standards. However, the Government had long delayed the promised action to address persistent problems of workplace discrimination faced by women, people of colour and migrant workers. For a number of years, the Committee of Experts had raised concerns about the persistence of discrimination based on sex, and particularly mandatory pregnancy testing, sexual harassment and the failure to apply the legislation effectively, especially in EPZs. Although the action taken included training and awareness raising efforts, the Government had failed to provide adequate information on the related laws and on practices to prevent or eliminate such recurring practices. Moreover, workers and unions continued to report systematic practices of gender discrimination in EPZs and elsewhere. Most workers in EPZs were poor, young, unmarried mothers between the ages of 19 and 25, whose workplace experiences left them devastated. Many reported pressure to have sex with their supervisors under threat of dismissal or punishment if they refused. Others continued to report compulsory pre-employment HIV and pregnancy tests, as well as recurrent questions on their marital status. If they tried to form unions to put an end to harassment, they were dismissed. Although women’s employment had increased positive impact on social development in most countries, that could only happen when it was decent work in terms of wages, and the right to organize and to non-discrimination. She also drew attention to a recent case concerning discrimination in supply chains. Following the dismissal of 84 Haitian coconut peelers from a coconut farm, the plant owner had closed the facility and disappeared without paying the wages and severance payments due after up to 13 years of service. Dominican union leaders who had accompanied representatives of the workers found that many of those concerned had been brought to the country illegally, some as children, to work in inhumane conditions. Disturbingly, the Ministry of Labour had approved the plant closure without any investigation into the wages, severance and other payments due to the workers, who were all Haitian migrants. Similar problems had been made concerning the supply chain for aloe-based products. Although the focus was most frequently on problems of freedom of association in global supply chains, the examples provided showed that the private voluntary audit and certification systems used by multinational corporations and major brands failed almost completely to identify serious workplace discrimination on grounds of gender, race and the national origin of migrant workers.

The Worker member of Brazil stated that the situation in Haiti was forcing Haitians to migrate to various neighbouring countries, with the majority going to the Dominican Republic. Haitians suffered systematic discrimination in terms of wages and social security, among other areas. The documentation problems that they suffered from as a result of not being appropriately regularized made them especially vulnerable and employers took advantage of that vulnerability to increase their own profits and to pay them less or not at all. The lack of documents made it much more difficult for those workers to exercise their rights. There was legislation in the Dominican Republic which, if applied, would resolve the problem and guarantee Haitian workers the same rights as the rest of the population. He mentioned a coconut husking enterprise in San Cristóbal where workers had not received their wages and had protested for 20 days in front of the Ministry of Labour. Worse still, the enterprise had been authorized by the Ministry of Labour without paying the workers, which was unacceptable. If people could be hired and dismissed without being paid, there was a serious problem which could not be resolved merely through discussion in this Committee. There should be a mission to address these problems in the country through a process of dialogue with all the social partners.

The Worker member of Costa Rica emphasized the gravity of the situation faced by women in the Dominican Republic. Discrimination against women took various forms. The requirement for negative pregnancy tests prior to recruitment was highly discriminatory as it was in violation of the protection required for reproduction. Women should only inform employers that they were pregnant if they were or had been married. The ILOrag against discrimination. Such information should not be required in the interests of employers. Equality of opportunities and of remuneration did not exist for women, even though they were engaged in work of equal value requiring the same level of skills as the work performed by men. The existence of sexual harassment was a matter of concern in EPZs, transport and the banana industry. Many employers also required
The rights of the workers had been ensured. The Government had been set aside and a definitive solution reached. The amicable settlement. That implied that the case had closed in accordance with the national legislation, his authorities of Puerto Rico? In relation to the references in small boats and were detained by the authorities? Were Haitian and dark-skinned Dominican workers how they challenged anyone who so wished to ask the thousands of workers, and education for Haitian children. His Government chambered anyone who so wished to ask the thousands of Haitian and dark-skinned Dominican workers how they felt working in the Dominican Republic in the tourism, telecommunications, telemarketing and construction sectors. With regard to discrimination on grounds of sex, he indicated that the previous week discussions had recommenced on possible amendments to the Labour Code, with the establishment of a tripartite commission for that purpose. In January 2013, the Ministry of Labour had prepared a strategic plan for 2013–16, which contained a component on equality of opportunities and non-discrimination, and which built on a similar plan for 2009–12. A total of 81 seminars had been organized for persons responsible for communications, and for disseminating additional progress.

The Worker members emphasized the serious problems that arose in the application of the Convention with hundreds of thousands of migrants of Haitian origin living and working in the Dominican Republic who did not enjoy equality of treatment with Dominican nationals, and who were without identity documents and excluded from social security. Although it knew of the situation, the Government pretended to be unaware of it. The Committee should therefore continue to follow the case closely. In addition to noting that the legislation was not in full conformity with the Convention, attitudes would have to change with a view to attaining greater mutual respect between individuals. The points raised by the Committee of Experts needed to be resolved without delay as it was a long-standing case, which had warranted a double footnote in 2012. The Government should therefore: (i) report to the Committee of Experts on the measures taken to give full effect to Regulation No. 631-11 of 2011 of the General Migration Act and to ensure that migrant workers did not suffer any discrimination based on any of the grounds set out in the Convention; and (ii) take measures requiring employers to comply with the provisions of the Labour Code, with particular reference to such despicable practices as pregnancy tests prior to recruitment and tests for HIV status. Information demonstrating the effective implementation of these measures for companies was provided to the Committee of Experts for its 2013 session. The Government should be called upon to avail itself of ILO technical assistance on those issues.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the oral and written information provided by the Government representative and the discussion that followed. The Committee recalled that it had last examined this case in 2008, and that it raised issues with respect to discrimination in employment and occupation against Haitians and dark-skinned Dominicans, discrimination based on sex, including mandatory pregnancy testing and sexual harassment, and mandatory testing to establish HIV status. The Committee noted the information provided by the Government in relation to recent developments, including with respect to the strengthened legislative and regulatory framework addressing discrimination generally, and discrimination against migrants in particular, as well as clearly prohibiting HIV testing as a requirement for obtaining or keeping a job. It also noted the inter-institutional agreement aimed at ensuring coordinated action regarding requests for registration of employment contracts of migrants and the issue of visas and identity documents, as well as the awareness-raising activities that had been undertaken. It noted further the establishment of the Technical Committee for Equal Opportunities and Non-discrimination, and the elaboration of the Strategic Development Plan, 2013–16.

Welcoming the initiatives taken by the Government, the Convention committee noted that the draft proposal of the new bill incorporating, among other points, the views of the Council on Technical Safety and Occupational Health. The proposed bill was submitted to Parliament on 22 October 2012. Prior to its final approval, the social partners. The new amendment had duly provided for the establishment of free trade unions and their confederations at the enterprise, and/or industry levels. Referring to the concerns expressed by the Committee of Experts in respect of the absence of an appropriate legal framework for freedom of association and social dialogue, the Government categorically rejected any such assumptions and reiterated its strong adherence to the principles of social dialogue. The Government interacted with social partners not only out of obligation, but also due to the necessity to ensure sustainable development and social justice. Institutions such as the High Tripartite Labour Council, the High Tripartite Employment Council, the High Tripartite Council of Safety and Occupational Health were just a few examples of the numerous national frameworks that practiced social dialogue in an environment of freedom of association. In addition to the above national tripartite structures, workers’ and employers’ associations were also consulted on the establishment of the National Tripartite Committee on the Labour Law Amendment.

In this respect, the Government initiatives for the promotion of the status of women in the world of work. He also reiterated the Government’s earlier statement to the effect that the Family Protection Bill had been officially approved by Parliament in 2011 and had entered into force. Regarding the early retirement of women Bill, he recalled that based on the Civil Service Early Retirement Act adopted in 2007, the Government was only authorized to practice the retirement scheme for official and contractual employees with at least 25 years of service by granting them a maximum of five years annual incentives. Contrary to the finding of the Committee of Experts, there was no coercion in this respect. The Bill did not impose any age condition and it was only enforced provided that the employee applied voluntarily, irrespective of their age and gender. Furthermore, the Family Allowance Amendment Bill had been officially approved by the National Assembly on 20 November 2011. The family allowance had been granted to both male and female workers, and the provision of a family allowance for both male and female workers (even for a couple working at the same workplace). As per section 86 of the Social Security Act, the salary and fringe benefits specified in the Labour Law were paid based on the work value and irrespective of the gender of the worker. Hence, a husband and wife working at the same enterprise were equally and indiscriminately entitled to housing, food allowances, and family allowances. With regard to section 1117 of the Civil Code, the speaker reiterated that this provision had been officially superseded by the Family Protection Bill that granted equal rights to both spouses to prevent each other from taking up a job or profession that may adversely affect the dignity, integrity and the interests of the family. Any such decision by a spouse could be appealed in court, pursuant to the new Family Protection Law. Accordingly, section 1117 of the Civil Code had been irrevocably repealed.

Regarding the alleged denial of access to top management positions to women, there was no legislation or procedure that could either explicitly or implicitly encourage such practice. To the contrary, women’s role in administrative and legislative decision-making positions, as in the Parliament, the Council of Ministers and the judiciary, showed significant progress in terms of women’s access to higher managerial positions, both in the public and private sectors. Nowadays, women occupied the position of advisors and vice-advisors to the President, Parliament, etc. Many of them were also members of parliamentary standing committees, government decision-making committees and commissions. In the basis of International Labour Standards, the Islamic Republic of Iran was among the countries with the widest gender gap in the world. They recalled that in 2010 this Committee expressed its deep disappointment that firm promises made by the Government in 2006 to take all appropriate measures to bring its legislation and practice into line with the Convention had not been fulfilled. While noting that the Government had submitted a report on the implementation of the Convention in August 2011, the Worker members found the content of the report unsatisfactory. They shared the Committee of Expert’s deep regret regarding the lack of progress in revising the legal framework and pointed out that none of the legal revisions requested by the Conference Committee in 2010 and before, had been put in place. Legislation prohibiting discrimination in employment and education had still not been adopted, a National Committee to Monitor the Application of International Labour Standards was still identifying its goals, and section 1117 of the Civil Code, which provided that a husband could prevent his wife from taking up a job or profession, as well as the obligatory dress code, had still not been repealed.

While recognizing that the Government had adopted several measures which, at first glance, appeared to be promoting women’s employment, the Worker members expressed concern that the measures were to promote the role of women as mothers and housewives, rather than to support female participation in the workforce. They stressed that the newly proposed legislation might in fact deteriorate access to employment and education for women, in particular for single women. They also deplored proposals that, although not accepted, were indicative of the restrictive atmosphere in which women sought employment, such as the obligation for single women below the age of 40 to require permission from a tutor or an Islamic lawyer to apply for a passport. Moreover, the recent restriction in the access of women to certain university courses could reverse the trend in women’s access to higher education and further limit their access to higher level employment and decision-making positions. The Worker members reiterated their concerns with respect to long periods of imprisonment. Restrictions on the right to organize and to trade union freedom and independence were hindering effective social dialogue that could address the issue of discrimination in employment and education.

The Employer members noted with regret that no concrete results had been achieved even though for many years, both the Committee of Experts and this Committee had been raising concerns regarding the laws and regulations that discriminated against women. While the Committee of Experts had noted in 2009 certain improvements in the areas of social security, the Government had not addressed the issue of discrimination in employment of women, it remained concerned about the lack of evidence of real progress regarding the situation of women in the labour market. The Employer members stressed that despite the Family Protection Act, section 1117 of the Civil Code, which provided for the right of a husband to object to his wife’s profession, still had not been repealed or amended. While the Employer members welcomed the Government’s indication that the number of female judges had increased, the Committee of Experts observed that the Government had not addressed the issue of giving women access to all positions in the judiciary, including those qualified to hand down judgments, as no steps appeared to have been taken to address these limitations set out in the 1982 Law on the selection of judges and Decree No. 5080 of 1979. The Employer members noted the Government’s indication that both men and women were not hired after the age of 40, with a possible extension of five years. In this respect, they pointed out obstacles for women being employed after the age of 30, and were concerned about the lack of information regarding the number of women in the labour market. They also raised concerns about the legislation imposing a dress code and the discrimination in social security provisions. All these legislative measures had a negative impact on the employment of women. The Employer members urged the Government to take concrete steps to ensure comprehensive protection against direct and indirect discrimination on all the grounds enumerated in the Convention.

The Worker member of Canada indicated that Iranian Gross Domestic Product (GDP) increased by 2.5 per cent annually and was expected to double in the next five years resulting in a 45 per cent inflation rate. This meant that married women needed more than ever to work to satisfy the needs of their families. However, according to the Government’s report concerning the implementation of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), only 16 per cent of women participated in the labour market. Only 3.5 million Iranian women, compared to 24 million men, received a salary, were entitled to holidays, maternity leave and pension. There were many more women in the informal economy in a wide range of jobs where they represented from 50 to 90 per cent of the workforce. In addition, working women still had the primary obligation for domestic responsibilities. Women were trapped between two conflicting trends: with some pushing for law reform to remove employment restrictions for women, while others preferred that women stayed at home as provided for in the current Civil Code, which empowered... men to bar their wives from taking up work. Despite the high literacy rate for both men and women (90 per cent), women were restricted to some areas of education and excluded from the core industrial and economic sectors. While 60 per cent of students in medicine, humanities, arts and science were women, only 20 to 30 per cent of technical or vocational studies were for women. Almost 25 per cent of women and 43.8 per cent of young persons were unemployed. In its report in the framework of Convention No. 122, the Government had referred to a five-year development plan providing for a massive privatization scheme, the establishment of private employment agencies, and self-employment. This approach had already been adopted by other Asian countries in the 1980s, leading to a rampant development of young female sweatshops. In addition, women, even in family enterprises, earned one third of men’s salaries. The supervisory bodies had already referred to the growing number of forced marriages and the increase in trafficking of women and young girls. Discrimination was deeply rooted in Iranian textbooks where the dominant role of men at home and work was emphasized.

The Worker member of Turkey indicated that due to the existing discrimination on the grounds of political opinion, ethnicity and religion, young people, academics, politicians, human rights defenders and journalists were fleeing the country in order to escape imprisonment or even death. Many came to Turkey. There were more than 15 refugee camps in Turkey, six of which provided accommodation mainly to Iranians. More than 150,000 young Iranians were currently studying in Turkish universities and were afraid to return to their country. Public employees and others with a different political opinion, religion or origin from that of the national regime suffered from discrimination. This situation mainly affected women, both in law and in practice: the rate of employment of women was very low; they needed their husbands’ permission to work and travel; they had to observe a strict dress code; there were honour killings and the minimum age for marriage was set at 13. Women were discriminated in all sectors of education, and 14 fields of education were altogether forbidden to women. In contrast, men had the right to polygamy and the unilateral right to divorce. The speaker called on the Islamic Republic of Iran to comply with the Convention, and change its discriminatory legislation, taking into account the ILO’s guidance.

A representative of the European Union, speaking on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States, acknowledged that the Government of Iran was committed to the eradication of the worst forms of discrimination against women and the pervasive gender inequality, but welcomed with reservation the request by the Government to provide data on the number of women in the workforce, the decrease in unemployment, measures designed to improve women’s access to training and education, and the ongoing efforts of the Government to promote women’s entrepreneurship. She expressed deep concern at the situation of human rights in the Islamic Republic of Iran, which continued to deteriorate. They called on the Iranian authorities to live up to the international human rights obligations that the Government had entered into. Alarmed by the severe discrimination against women and the pervasive gender inequality, they urged the Government to take concrete and immediate steps to ensure that laws and practices were fully in line with the Convention, including with a view to ensuring that women in temporary and contract employment benefited from all entitlements and facilities, and eliminating the discriminatory practices against women in recruitment and in job advertisements. Deploying the systematic discrimination against religious minorities, the speaker noted that the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Islamic Republic of Iran had reported that the Baha’i were subjected to severe socioeconomic pressure and that in some cases they had been deprived of property, employment and education. They also deplored the reports of prosecution and persecution of teachers, students and trade unionists advocating for social justice, for equal rights, employment and for women’s rights. Recalling the recurrent lack of information during the discussions of this case, the Government was urged to cooperate fully with the supervisory bodies by providing the information requested on equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women, and then Government was invited to avail itself of ILO technical assistance.

The Worker member of France observed that with respect to discrimination based on political opinion, union membership and involvement in trade union or human rights activities, in particular, the Committee of Experts painted a distressing picture of the prevailing situation in the Islamic Republic of Iran, which is the reason the case had been placed before the Committee this year. However, the reality was far worse. Discrimination in employment was systematically directed against independent trade unionists, journalists, human rights defenders, teachers, lawyers and those who criticize the Government, as well as against their family members. The Islamic Republic of Iran was second among the countries with the largest number of journalists in prison, most for having expressed views that differed from those of the Government. Mr Ahmad Zaidabadi, for example, had been sentenced to six years in prison and banned for life from practicing his profession. Lawyers were also imprisoned for defending human rights and were banned from practicing their profession. Such was the case of Ms Nasrin Sotoudeh who had been awarded the Sakharov prize in 2012 and yet had been sentenced to six years in prison and banned from practicing for ten years. Many other human rights defenders and critics and opponents of the Government were being persecuted, dismissed, imprisoned or tortured simply for exercising their right of expression. Membership of a trade union such as a teachers’ union, also brought the risk of prison, exile or some other form of punishment. All demonstrations by teachers, students and trade unionists calling for social justice or equal rights in education and employment were met with extreme violence. Many trade unionists, such as Mr Rasoul Bodaghi and Mr Mahmood Baqeri, were currently serving time in prison due to the denial of freedom of expression. There was reason to fear that such information, horrific as it was, offered but a glimpse of the reality facing thousands of Iranian workers, human rights defenders and trade unionists.

The Government member of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela stated that his Government had taken note of the request of the Government of Iran to increase the number of female judges in the Iranian judiciary. The rise in equal opportunities and treatment for men and women in the workforce, the decrease in unemployment, measures designed to improve women’s access to training and education, and the ongoing efforts of the Government to promote women’s entrepreneurship had also been noted. He stated that there was legal protection to prevent gender-based discrimination. His Government considered that the Committee should take those efforts into account in its conclusions.

The Government member of Canada expressed her Government’s disappointment at the continuing discrimination against women, religious and ethnic minorities in employment and occupation in the Islamic Republic of Iran and the lack of measures taken by the Government to address the situation. Despite the strong and sustained urging of this Committee in the past to amend or repeal the legislation, employment laws and regulations discriminating against women were still in place. Section 1117 of the Civil Code, the social security regulations and obligatory dress code continued to prejudice women. Job advertisements were regularly discriminatory; women also faced unequal access to education and job training.
Religious minorities faced persistent and pervasive discrimination. Members of the Baha’i faith were discriminated against in access to education, universities and occupations in the public sector; they had been deprived of property, employment and education. The legislative and policy frameworks in place to protect workers against discrimination and sexual harassment were not proven effective. It was not sufficient for these frameworks to exist; workers must be aware of their rights and be able to access credible and effective avenues for pursuing redress. The Government’s continued failure to respect its obligations under the Convention in the face of repeated calls for change by the Committee demonstrated a lack of seriousness and good faith. Her Government urged the Government to take concrete and decisive action to end discrimination against women and ethnic and religious minorities in employment and occupation and to promote women’s empowerment and women’s entrepreneurship. Only true progress in these areas would ensure respect for the human dignity of women and ethnic and religious minorities. The Government should engage with the ILO in good faith to secure technical assistance in order to bring its legislation and practice into line with the Convention, and in particular with the recommendations of the Committee.

The Government member of Pakistan expressed appreciation for the Government’s comprehensive reply to the questions raised by the Committee of Experts. The Government had established technical groups to address amendments to the Labour Law and the Social Security Act, issues of occupational safety and health, and the promotion of social dialogue. There had also been some improvements, including the increase in the number of female judges and the efforts made regarding the new bill incorporating, among others, the views of the social partners. While expressing hope for the further strengthening of such measures and legislation, she emphasized that there was always room for improvement on the other unresolved issues. His Government therefore encouraged dialogue and appropriate resolution in this regard.

The Government member of India expressed his Government’s appreciation concerning the efforts made by the Government for the better application of the Convention, including that several measures had been taken to strengthen its supervisory mechanisms, by establishing four technical groups in the last two years to address amendments to the Labour Law and the Social Security Act. Furthermore, the Council of Ministers had succeeded in adopting a new bill incorporating, among others, the views of the social partners. While expressing hope for the further strengthening of such measures and legislation, he emphasized that there was always room for improvement on the other unresolved issues. His Government therefore encouraged dialogue and appropriate resolution in this regard.

The Government representative stated that some of the views and topics addressed in the discussion did not fall under the mandate of this Committee. He noted that comments of a political nature unrelated to the matters under discussion could jeopardize the legitimacy of the Committee. More than 70 per cent of university entrants were women, and that his Government was not aware of any legislation that either explicitly or implicitly encouraged discrimination against women in top management positions. Women’s role in administrative and decision-making positions, on the contrary, had shown significant progress in terms of women’s access to higher managerial positions, both in the public and private sectors, including as advisers to the President. All female and male judges were equally paid, and female judges enjoyed the same calibre and position in the penal courts, family courts and juvenile courts. As sitting judges, female judges could also deliver judgments in the cases before the courts. Currently, out of the 8,002 judges, 614 were female and there had been an increase of 16.2 per cent in the number of female judges since 2009.

The speaker strongly refuted that discriminatory employment advertisements were an existing practice, as constructive steps had been taken to address this. As a result of social dialogues, the Iranian Government had not/proceeded to any discriminatory agreements. Employers’ Associations had agreed to assist with defining the tasks with a view to the implementation of the Convention, which would address discriminatory recruitment processes in the private sector. Moreover, the Government had abided by the comments of the Committee of Experts to repeal the discriminatory legislation and regulations. Concrete steps had been taken to ensure the repeal or effective amendment of legislation, regulations and instructions to further promote women’s equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation, including with respect to the amendment of section 1117 of the Civil Code and the Social Security Act. Regarding the early retirement of women, he indicated that this was voluntary and did not have a negative impact on women’s career paths, including access to higher level positions, or result in women receiving lower pensions. The Government did not allow for the promotion of discrimination, stereotypical attitudes or hatred against religious minorities. Despite false information in this regard, religious minorities were respected in the country. Religious minorities, including unrecognized religious minorities, were protected against discrimination and had equal access and opportunity to employment and education. In most provinces with religious or ethnic minorities, these groups had been assigned a proportional number of managerial positions in government, and the Government would provide information to the Committee of Experts on this subject on a regular basis to confirm its commitment in this regard. All measures taken to improve labour relations and conditions had been founded on a culture which favoured the promotion of social dialogue and the extension of social protection.

The Worker members stated that in spite of numerous examinations of this case, no real progress had been made to comply with the Convention. Furthermore, the information that had been provided was of a general nature and no substantive measures and targets had been indicated. The response of the Government to discredit the concerns and deny the problems raised by the social partners, added to the Worker members’ concerns. The lack of ability of the Government to repeal even the most patently discriminatory legislation and regulations, and the current inability to comply with the Convention. Furthermore, the information provided was of a general nature and not sufficient to demonstrate the Government’s acceptance of ILO technical assistance. It was not sufficient for the Government to repeal the discriminatory legislation and regulations, and deny the problems raised by the social partners, added to the Worker members’ concerns. The lack of ability of the Government to repeal even the most patently discriminatory legislation and regulations, and the current inability to comply with the Convention. Furthermore, the information that had been provided was of a general nature and no substantive measures and targets had been indicated. The response of the Government to discredit the concerns and deny the problems raised by the social partners, added to the Worker members’ concerns. The lack of ability of the Government to repeal even the most patently discriminatory legislation and regulations, and the current inability to comply with the Convention. Furthermore, the information provided was of a general nature and not sufficient to demonstrate the Government’s acceptance of ILO technical assistance. The new measures that were being proposed further restricted access to the labour market for women, instead of guaranteeing equal access to employment and education. Difficult access to information concerning discrimination in these areas hindered the discussions between workers and the Government. Moreover, the repression of independent trade unions was a major obstacle for assessing the situation on the ground and opening a process of social dialogue to address the issues at stake. The situation was so serious and the Government’s lack of cooperation so clear, that the Worker members found every reason to file a complaint on the basis of article 26 of the ILO Constitution, but had chosen not to do so this year. The Government therefore needed to take the issue seriously and take the necessary measures. While the Government’s acceptance of ILO technical assistance was not met; (i) restrictions on trade union rights prevented meaningful social dialogue on the Convention; (ii) restricted access to independent information prevented a factual assessment of the situation; and (iii) technical assistance, required clear and time-bound objectives and implementation plans in order to be effective. The Worker members proposed that a high-level mission visit the country, as soon as possible, before the forthcoming session of the Committee of Experts, based on a clear and wide mandate for fact-finding and for setting a time-bound action plan aimed at ensuring compliance with the Convention.

The Employer members expressed the hope that the information submitted by the Government concerning access of women to certain high-level positions, including judicial positions, and the statistical data respecting women’s participation in the labour market, would be provided to the Committee of Experts to allow this Committee to engage in more careful consideration. While measures were being taken, there remained significant barriers to women’s participation in the labour market, and discrimination against women in employment continued. This serious case had been considered before by both this Committee and the Committee of Experts. The tripartite partners had expressed concerns and the Committee of Experts had repeatedly urged the Government to take immediate action to ensure the full application of the Convention in both law and practice. The Employer members once again expressed regret regarding the lack of progress made in this regard, and expected that the issues relating to the employment of women would be addressed in the near future. In this respect, the repeal of section 1117 of the Civil Code was imperative. Moreover, legislation that restricted the role of female judges, imposed a dress code, restricted access to employment for women over 40 years of age and resulted in the discriminatory application of social security provisions was unacceptable. Recalling the long-standing issues concerning compliance with the Convention, the Employer members reiterated that they would be deeply disappointed if the measures taken or envisaged by the Government did not remove restrictions on women’s employment. It was now the moment to take proper and concrete action in this regard. Therefore, the Employer members expressed support for the Worker members’ request for a high-level mission.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the oral information provided by the Government representative and the discussion that followed.

The Committee recalled that it had been raising concerns for a number of years including with respect to discrimination in law and practice against women, ethnic and religious minorities, and the absence of an environment conducive to social dialogue on the implementation of the Convention.

The Committee noted the Government’s indication that four technical groups had been established to address the amendment of the Labour Law, the Social Security Act and the Occupational Safety and Health By-laws, and the promotion of social dialogue, and that a number of amendments had been proposed. The Committee also noted the Government’s indication that more detailed information was provided to the Committee of Experts to allow this Committee and the Committee of Experts to engage in more careful consideration. While measures were being taken, there remained significant barriers to women’s participation in the labour market, and discrimination against women in employment continued. This serious case had been considered before by both this Committee and the Committee of Experts. The tripartite partners had expressed concerns and the Committee of Experts had repeatedly urged the Government to take immediate action to ensure the full application of the Convention in both law and practice.

The Government representative considered that his Government had participated in the discussions of the Committee in a transparent and constructive manner. While his Government was fully prepared to clarify any further questions and to submit a detailed report to the Committee of Experts, he stated that the outcome of the discussions might have been different had this Committee taken into account the information recently submitted by his Government. His Government had always engaged in constructive discussions and submitted detailed information and welcomed that some of the social partners had highlighted some positive measures taken, as was duly reflected in the conclusions. However, it was regrettable that some of the improvements and reforms made by his country – which had been presented to this Committee – had not been adequately reflected by the Committee of Experts. Technical cooperation was not yet forthcoming. His Government looked forward to engaging with the ILO in this regard. His Government would closely consider this Committee’s conclusions so as to address them in their entirety.

The Korean Government aimed to set best practice in the management of labour migration by implementing various policies to protect migrant workers at every stage from the “entry” and “employment” to the “departure” period. With respect to entry, migrant workers entering the Republic of Korea under the Employment Permit System (EPS) were given opportunities to work in the country in a fair and transparent manner. A fair and transparent selection system was in place to prevent EPS workers from being taken advantage of by a broker or being put in a difficult situation by irregularities or corruption. After entering the Republic of Korea, EPS workers were provided with significant integration training and awareness education concerning their legal rights. The education costs were fully borne by their employers. Workers were provided with detailed information regarding their rights under all relevant labour laws, as well as detailed instructions on the procedures for filing a complaint when their rights had been infringed upon.

During employment under the EPS, any discrimination against migrant workers was prohibited and labour laws into effect. The Employment and Labour Standards Act, the Minimum Wage Act and the Labour Standard Act were equally applied to both migrant workers and Korean nationals. The 47 local labour offices across the country were responsible for receiving and reviewing complaints submitted by migrant workers. The Government provided guidance to, and conducted roughly 5,000 inspections per year on workplaces which employed migrant workers. The 60 local job centres under the Ministry of Employment and Labour were helping migrant workers address relevant legal concerns and employment-related affairs, such as questions related to extending employment periods. A total of 34 support centres and one call centre for migrant workers were in operation in the country. They offered a variety of services to migrant workers free of charge. For instance, they provided counselling services, legal assistance, free Korean culture classes, free medical check-ups and shelters to migrant workers. Free interpretation services were at the disposal of migrant workers. Approximately 200 interpreters were in service at any given time and 500 interpreters remained available.

The Government, in cooperation with the embassies of countries of origin, organized cultural events for migrant workers so that workers from the same country had opportunities to meet and share information with one another. In 2012, nine cultural events had been organized for six countries including Thailand and the Philippines, in addition to six multi-country events which had been held. Migrant workers were provided with fully funded vocational training by the Government in a range of fields. In 2012, 4,935 migrant workers had completed vocational training in areas such as computer literacy, operation of heavy construction equipment and car repair. The Government also required insurance designed exclusively for EPS workers. Elements of the mandatory insurance required by the Government included return cost insurance for return flight ticket, casualty insurance for accident and death not associated with work, guarantee insurance for overdue wages, and departure guarantee insurance for severance pay. These represented requirements tailored to protecting workers and supporting their interests for the entire duration of their work experience.

With respect to measures to protect maternity rights, under the returnee support programme, EPS workers were invited to information sessions which were held to inform them of ways in which to prepare for the return to their home countries. Examples of instruction provided, included how to collect unpaid wages and receive insurance benefits. In 2012, 77 information sessions were held and attended by 5,122 EPS workers. The Government provided interpretation services for returnees. It held job fairs to connect jobseeking returnees with Korean companies in their home countries. In 2012, 2,087 returnees had received such job placement services and 377 of those persons succeeded in finding employment. A package of services ranging from free customized vocational training to job placement services was provided to help returnees settle in their countries within a short period of time. For migrant workers who had left Korea without receiving insurance compensation, which was due to them under the departure guarantee insurance taken out by employers, or the return cost insurance taken out by the migrant workers themselves, the Government provided services to ensure that such insurance compensation was received. In 2012, EPS workers had received 204 million won (KRW) (approximately US$182,000) under departure guarantee insurance and KRW278 million (approximately US$248,000) under return cost insurance. Under the current EPS, a migrant worker was allowed to change workplaces a maximum of three times during the first three years of employment and a maximum of two times during an extended period of employment of up to ten years. Therefore, EPS workers could change workplaces a maximum of five times over the course of four years and ten months. If EPS workers changed employment for a reason not attributable to them, such as a temporary shutdown or permanent closure of the business at which they were employed or a violation of working conditions by the employer, they could change workplaces without being subject to the limit on the maximum number of workplace changes. Under the EPS, when a migrant worker changed workplaces for any of the legitimate reasons outlined, he or she might request a change of workplace at a job centre for which no confirmation from the employer was required. Only if an EPS worker requested a change of workplace under the claim that his or her employment contract had been terminated, job centres at times verified with the employer with regard to whether the employment contract indeed had been terminated. An EPS worker needed no permission from the employer to change workplaces. Most of the violations of labour laws that were found in 2011 had been simple violations of the administrative obligations or procedures prescribed by labour laws, such as the Labour Standards Act. The violations had included failures to specify working conditions in writing (1,051 cases), failures to post the main contents of labour laws at the workplace (979 cases), failures to post a list of workers (894 cases), failures to inform workers of the minimum wage (710 cases) and failures to provide sexual harassment education (593 cases). Furthermore, there had been 341 cases of overdue wages and 63 cases of paying less than the minimum wage. With respect to equality of opportunity and treatment of women and men, the percentage of female workers and managers had risen steadily in workplaces which were subject to the Government’s affirmative action scheme: in 2009, 34.01 per cent of female workers and 14.13 per cent of female managers; in 2010, 34.12 per cent of female workers and 15.09 per cent of female managers; in 2011, 34.87 per cent of female workers and 16.09 per cent of female managers; and in 2012, 35.24 per cent of female workers and 16.62 per cent of female managers.

With respect to measures regarding maternity protection, the Government supported the need for work–family balance, the use of paid maternity leave (up to 90 days) and childcare leave available to those with a child under the age of 6 had increased. The number of workers who had taken maternity leave had increased by approximately 35 per cent between 2008 and 2012: 68,526 in 2008; 70,560 in 2009; 75,742 in 2010; 90,290 in 2011; and 93,394 in 2012. The number of workers who took childcare leave had doubled between 2008 and 2012: 29,145 in 2008; 35,400 in 2009; 41,732 in 2010; 58,137 in 2011; and 64,069 in 2012. The number of workers who took maternity leave had doubled between 2008 and 2012: 29,145 in 2008; 35,400 in 2009; 41,732 in 2010; 58,137 in 2011; and 64,069 in 2012. The number of workers who took childcare leave had doubled between 2008 and 2012: 29,145 in 2008; 35,400 in 2009; 41,732 in 2010; 58,137 in 2011; and 64,069 in 2012. To support and facilitate a healthy work and family balance, additional legal changes were made in 2012. Currently, workers were able to work shorter hours instead of taking childcare leave, and were able to take leave to care for a sick family member.

With respect to supervisory activities of labour inspectors concerning discrimination against non-regular workers, in 2012, the Government had inspected a total of 5,431 workplaces which employed a large number of non-regular workers, such as fixed-term and dispatched workers. Of the workplaces inspected, 4,267 had been found to have committed 17,103 violations of labour laws. A total of 191 cases had been sent to the prosecutors’ office, fines had been imposed in three cases and administrative action had been taken in 244 cases. The violations included failure to specify working conditions in writing (1,737 cases), failure to inform workers of the minimum wage (1,530 cases), and failure to provide the workers with wages or compensation within 14 days after they left the workplaces due to death or resignation (1,334 cases). Cases such as the hiring of workers whom dispatched workers were not allowed to work, or the dispatching of workers by unauthorized agencies (168 cases) had been sent to the prosecutors’ office. Other cases including discrimination against non-regular workers in terms of bonus compensation and vacation (108 cases) had been addressed through administrative measures.

In addition, before the Committee a Government representative highlighted that the Government had been striving to eliminate any and all forms of discrimination in employment and occupation in order to promote the overall employment quality. Migrant workers under the EPS enjoyed equal protection with nationals under labour legislation, and the migrant workers’ quality of life had been improved by a variety of support programmes provided by the Government, before entry, during employment and after departure. The EPS had been recognized by the international community as a pioneering labor migration management system. In addition, workers under the EPS were allowed to change workplaces up to five times. However, they were granted unlimited workplace changes under a certain set of criteria provided in the law, such as the temporary or permanent closure of the business, violations of employment contracts or unfair treatment by the employer. Referring to the conclusions of the Conference at its 40th Session, which had recognized that a certain degree of restriction on labour migration was necessary, the speaker underlined that frequent and unlimited workplace changes might result in illegal interventions by unauthorized brokers.

The Government had introduced comprehensive policy measures in 2011 for the protection of non-regular workers against discrimination and to reinforce the social safety net for workers in precarious situations. The measures included: (i) the extension of the application period for remedial action against discrimination from three months to six months; (ii) amendments to the Act on the Protection of Dispatched Workers in August 2012, so that illegally dispatched workers were to be hired directly and immediately by the actual employers directly overseeing them; and (iii) giving labour inspectors authority to identify and properly address discrimination against fixed-term and dispatched workers based on working conditions. These measures had been accompanied by progressive results. The speaker also indicated that giving standing to trade unions to represent non-regular workers concerning discrimination cases was not compatible with the litigation procedures, as the unions were not the party directly affected by the discriminatory treatment, nor would they benefit from remedial action.

Concerning equal opportunity and treatment between men and women, the Government had implemented policies including reduced working hours during childcare, a family care leave system and maternity protection. For female workers who had experienced career disruptions, the Government was providing comprehensive employment services such as career counselling, job placement and vocational training for their reintegration into the workforce. The Government had standard taken affirmative action measures in public institutions and private enterprises with more than 500 employees, and from May 2013, the affirmative action programmes had been expanded to cover all public institutions.

Concerning discrimination on the ground of political opinion, the Constitution mandated political impartiality on the part of all public officials, including government officials and teachers at public schools, thereby prohibiting this category of employees from engaging in political activities in favour of a specific political party or politician. In 2012, the Constitutional Court had held that the prohibition and restrictions on political activities of public officials, including schoolteachers, was constitutional. Thus, that the Government might make more efforts to ensure quality employment and fairness in its society to achieve further equality by consulting with the social partners.

The Worker members recalled that, in 2009, this Committee had concluded that protecting migrant workers against discrimination and abuse required persistent attention from the Government. They indicated that the 2012 legislative amendments to allow migrant workers to change jobs, particularly in the case of difficult working conditions or unfair treatment, were important but that problems remained in practice as a result of the fact that the burden of proof rested with the worker, and due to language problems, the absence of legal assistance and the obligation to continue working in the same workplace during the investigation. They also underlined the fact that the Government had not provided information on safeguards for workers who complained to an employer or the police, or on how “objective recognition” as a victim of discrimination, which would allow a worker to request an immediate change of workplace, could be obtained. They were surprised that, in the vast majority of cases, requests for a change of workplace were made for reasons other than a breach of employment contract. Workers were often invited, or rather forced, to change their reason in mid-procedure, for fear of their requests being rejected. Moreover, given that migrant workers who left their employers would be sent back to their country of origin if they did not find other work within three months, they often had to choose between putting up with discrimination and abuse by their employers or being deported. With regard to gender-based discrimination, the Worker members mentioned irregular work, which was largely performed by female workers, and the frequency with which workers were dismissed on the grounds of pregnancy, childbirth or having to look after a child. Another problem was the lack of financial resources and expertise in the area of equal opportunities for men and women. Although honorary inspectors for equality at work had been appointed in enterprises, few tangible results had been achieved owing to a lack of training and awareness. The Worker members also deplored the fact that discrimination on the ground of political opinion existed in the education sector.

The Employer members underlined that under the EPS introduced in 2004, more than 200,000 workers had entered the country between 2004 and 2009. Several pieces of labour legislation applied equally to migrant and Korean workers. While the EPS had initially been based on the assumption that workers would continue to work with the employer with whom they had signed a contract, the employer had to retain the worker should remain with this employer. While this was not always possible in reality, setting a limit on the number of changes of employer was therefore not, in and of itself, an act of discrimination. Nonetheless, it was not always easy for migrant workers, with considerations of different culture and language, to raise concerns about their employment, and they might experience difficulties... in the permitted changes. The Employer members therefore encouraged the Government to continue initiatives to ensure that migrant workers received the information and assistance required. The Employer members echoed the call of the Committee of Experts for the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that in practice the EPS, in particular in the agriculture and mining sectors, allowed for appropriate flexibility to change workplaces so as to avoid situations in which workers became vulnerable to abuse and discrimination on the grounds set out in the Convention.

Turning to the issue of discrimination on the basis of sex and employment, the Employer members recalled that while any form of discrimination was inappropriate, workers in non-permanent work should not automatically receive the full conditions available to permanent work, and in the case of subcontracting, it was not necessarily appropriate to apply the same conditions of work to workers hired by different companies. A key aspect in managing discrimination was the means by which workers could raise concerns and seek redress, and new measures in this regard included an increase in the time limit for filing a complaint as well as new advisory and supervisory powers for labour inspectors. Measures adopted regarding the employment of women included utilizing honorary equal employment inspectors appointed by individual enterprises, the requirement of all public organizations, and private companies of a certain size, to report annually on the employment of women, and requiring large companies with low female participation to submit affirmative action plans to the authorities. However such measures relied on commitment at the workplace level. Therefore, the Employer members requested the Government to consider additional measures that would assist in making such measures systematic, to facilitate improvement of the participation of women in the workforce.

Turning to discrimination based on political opinion, the Employers members noted that the group of teachers dismissed in 2012 had all been reinstated after court action. This indicated that protections against discrimination were in place. However, this was a complex issue, as Korean law required that public sector employees remain politically neutral. The Committee of Experts had noted that exceptions to the general protection against discrimination were in place in certain cases, but for the exception to be valid “the criteria used must correspond in a concrete and objective way to the inherent requirements of a particular job”. There was a lack of clarity on whether any of the inherent requirements of a teacher’s job had been undertaken. Therefore, the Employer members echoed the request of the Committee of Experts that the Government take measures to provide proper protection to primary and secondary teachers.

A Worker member of the Republic of Korea highlighted that despite the amendment made to section 25(1) of the Act on Foreign Workers Employment, etc. and the EPS, it was still extremely difficult for migrant workers to change workplaces due to strict restrictions. A new system introduced in 2012 had further aggravated the migrant workers’ situation. Therefore easing the criteria to allow changing of workplaces was necessary, by including the situation where there was a large discrepancy in wages and working conditions compared with other workers performing the same type of job, for the purpose of overrepresentation in precarious work, and to the fact that female non-regular workers received only 40 per cent of wages of male regular workers, the speaker highlighted that this structured gender pay gap was to be attributed to the flawed legislation. Under current legislation, it was extremely difficult for workers in precarious situations to seek remedies, due to fear of reprisals by employers, including dismissals. The speaker emphasized that due to various forms of employment created, increasing numbers of workers were outside the scope of the Labour Standards Act or the Trade Union and Labour Relations Adjustment Act, leading to deteriorating working conditions and a lack of social security. It was necessary to cover workers in special protection systems under these Acts, to include the principle of direct employment in the Labour Standards Act, and to give standing to trade unions in seeking remedies. Citing the employment rate of women, which had been 46.3 per cent in January 2013, the speaker emphasized that women, in particular female workers in precarious situations, were under pressure to leave the workforce, despite maternity and childcare leave systems provided in the legislation.

Another Worker member of the Republic of Korea stated that in-house subcontract workers were facing the worst discrimination in terms of working conditions, including wage differences and job security. The Guidelines on protection for in-house subcontract workers, published by the Government in 2011, in fact protected employers using indirect employment. In the manufacturing sector, in which the dispatch of labour was prohibited, this form of labour continued to increase continuously. A system of converting fixed-term contracts to non-fixed term ones, which had been proposed by the Government, was not effective. For example, even after the conversion to non-fixed term contracts pursuant to the instruction of the Government, these workers had been placed in a certain category with no possibility of promotion, and their wages were only 64 per cent of regular workers. A new measure taken by the Government in 2012 concerning changing of workplaces for migrant workers also constituted discrimination on the ground of country of origin. Under this new measure, migrant jobseekers were forced to wait until being contacted by employers, without knowing the type or the place of work, thereby being subjected to extreme insecurity. Concerning discrimination based on political opinion, the speaker highlighted that dismissals of teachers, members of the Korean Teachers and Education Worker’s Union (KTOU), members of the Korean Government Employee’s Union (KGEU) and public officials, were being used to deny legal recognition of these trade unions.

The Employer member of the Republic of Korea highlighted that migrant workers were permitted to change workplaces without limit for reasons not attributable to workers, and up to three times in the case of termination. The Constitutional Court had held in 2011 that the limitations on the number of times an employee was permitted to change places of work without the possibility of promotion, and their wages were only 64 per cent of regular workers. A new measure taken by the Government in 2012 concerning changing of workplaces for migrant workers also constituted discrimination on the ground of country of origin. Under this new measure, migrant jobseekers were forced to wait until being contacted by employers, without knowing the type or the place of work, thereby being subjected to extreme insecurity. Concerning discrimination based on political opinion, the speaker highlighted that dismissals of teachers, members of the Korean Teachers and Education Worker’s Union (KTOU), members of the Korean Government Employee’s Union (KGEU) and public officials, were being used to deny legal recognition of these trade unions.
of female employment and women in managerial positions, which was higher in the private than in the public sector. Concerning discrimination on the ground of political opinion, though the Supreme Court had ordered the reinstatement of the teachers concerned, it had held that the teachers had violated their duty to remain politically neutral, which was a constitutional requirement.

The Worker member of Japan declared that Korean and Japanese workers were facing many common problems, the most important of which was discrimination on the basis of sex and employment status. The most discriminated against were female non-regular workers. She underlined that when the number of non-regular workers was broken down by sex, there were more regular workers (60.9 per cent) in the case of men than non-regular ones. In the case of women, there were more non-regular workers than regular workers, and the wages of non-regular women workers were low. Also, the number of workers in "special types of employment" was increasing rapidly, and those workers were not recognized as employees in labour legislation. In the name of global competition, workers were being deprived of the rights embodied in ILO instruments and the protection for workers was weakening. The Worker member hoped that the Government would take the necessary measures to implement fully the provisions of the Convention, not only for the betterment of Korean workers, but also for the promotion of decent work in the region and in the world.

An observer representing Public Services International (PSI) rejected and expressed concern at the difficult situation faced by trade unions in the public service. Precarious work was increasing every year in the public service and the Government had reduced the budget to a minimum, which did not allow for any new recruitment. That meant that public servants were seeing an increase in their workload and that subcontracting and temporary posts were being used. For example, education support workers in precarious conditions, who made up almost half of all precarious workers in the public sector, received wages between 50 and 70 per cent lower than regular staff for the same work. Women were the most affected. Although the Government stated that it would regularize the working situation of public servants, the speaker considered that, in reality, the situation of those workers would simply get worse as fixed-term contracts were replaced by open-ended part-time contracts. The Government had in fact announced that it was thereby planning to increase the employment rate to 70 per cent. That would mean doing more work in the same time for less security at work was already so intense that the suicide rate had risen in recent months. It was regrettable that the Government considered that women preferred flexible working hours so that they could take care of their families. It served only to perpetuate gender differences and condemn women to lower-paid jobs. Rather than solving the problem of precarious work, such policies were a means of perpetuating deep-seated inequalities. Policies based on the principle of stable and secure work should be adopted instead, so as to guarantee high-quality public services.

The Worker member of the Netherlands recalled that the Government recently announced measures to create "good part-time jobs" and that the Korean trade unions were concerned that these measures would promote the increase of temporary low-quality employment instead of contributing to more decent employment and less discrimination. She noted that the Government likened the proposed measures to the "Dutch model". Consequently, she thought it relevant to share information about the Dutch experience with atypical and part-time employment relations. In 1999, a law on atypical employment had been introduced, which regulated these types of employment, instead of prohibiting fixed-term, part-time and indirect employment relations, in order to offer flexibility and security to these workers, while ensuring the application of the principle of equal pay for work of equal value, including all worker benefits. As a result, one third of the Dutch labour force no longer had permanent or open-ended employment contracts. Women, in particular, took on more part-time and temporary employment. In the case of women, care workers, workers in the agricultural and food sectors — atypical employment relations became typical. While for many of these workers, the regulation of the principle of non-discrimination had led to an improvement of their labour conditions, for a large group of workers, the quality of employment had deteriorated when permanent jobs had been replaced by fixed-term contracts, and when new forms of flexible employment had emerged, such as on-call and zero-hour contracts offering only a few hours of employment. Noting the risk of an increasingly divided labour market, the Government of the Netherlands and the social partners had agreed that additional measures were needed, including the prohibition of some forms of flexible employment, to prevent the mushrooming of bad employment contracts. Therefore, and given the huge wage gap noted by the Committee of Experts between regular and non-regular workers in the Republic of Korea, she expressed her serious concern at the Government’s statement that it aimed to follow the "Dutch model", and asked which measures it intended to take to convert non-regular employment into regular employment, to ensure the monitoring of non-discrimination, and to guarantee the full trade union and collective bargaining rights of non-regular workers.

An observer representing Education International (EI) considered that the prohibition of primary and secondary school teachers to engage in political activities, as opposed to university lecturers, was discriminatory and in clear violation of the Convention. The rationale brought forward by the Government concerning the difference in the treatment of these two categories of teachers with regard to their different roles (teaching or teaching and research, respectively) was unjustified, since all citizens were equal and should be given the same opportunity to influence decisions in the political, economic and social spheres of society, as also provided for by article 80 of the 1966 ILO–UNESCO Recommendation stating that teachers should be free to exercise all civil rights generally enjoyed by citizens. She further considered the practice of not allowing dismissed or retired teachers to unionize to be discriminatory. The Korean teachers’ union, Chun-kyung, was threatened with the closure of the Jesse Jackson Foundation because it maintained the union membership of teachers who had been dismissed based on political opinion, as well as those of retired teachers. For the same reason, the Government was also still refusing to register the Korean Government Employees’ Union (KGEU). She requested the ILO supervisory bodies to urge once again the Government to respect international labour standards by giving all teachers political rights, reinstating teachers dismissed for exercising freedom of speech, and allowing dismissed and retired teachers to unionize.

The Worker member of Nepal indicated that for many Nepalese workers, working in the Republic of Korea meant a better job with a good salary and decent working conditions. The workers believed that the involvement of the respective governments meant that their labour rights were better protected. They criticized the Korean laws on foreign and skills training, at the end of which they were placed on a roster expecting to be selected for a job. The Act on Foreign Workers Employment, etc. of 2003 prescribed that the rights and interests of foreign workers applied to them in the same way as to their Korean counterparts. According to the law, the migrant worker could seek a suitable job that they could perform well in good working conditions.
conditions, consulting a list of workplaces, which could be chosen and changed if the conditions appeared to be not suitable or in case of exploitation. The majority of migrant workers performed difficult and unwanted jobs. In August 2012, the Government enforced a new measure on the right of migrant workers to change workplaces. Under this measure, migrant workers' employment were no longer provided with a list of workplaces with job openings as they had in the past. As a result of this measure migrant workers were put in a situation where, should they be looking for a new job, they had to wait to be contacted. They had no certainty regarding the job or location that would be offered. As a consequence, migrant workers were forced to endure job searches in highly insecure conditions. Moreover, as migrant workers were required to return to their home countries if they could not find a new workplace within three months, they were either forced to sign new employment contracts, regardless of conditions, before the three months were up or had to avoid changing workplaces altogether regardless of how dissatisfactory their present workplace was. As such, the new measure constituted a violation of migrant workers' recognized right to choose their place of employment freely and freely enter into employment contracts. This was clearly a form of discrimination in employment based on country of origin. Moreover, equal opportunity for men and women did not seem to apply in the EPS system either since, despite the fact that many women passed the EPS-TOPK (Test of Proficiency in Korean), very few got the chance to work in the country. Women should enjoy equal opportunity for work.

The Government representative pointed out with regard to migrant workers, that since August 2012, the Government had started connecting employers and migrant workers directly through job centres, rather than providing workers who requested a change of workplace with the list of employers looking for migrant workers. This measure was expected to reduce the costs for both migrant workers and employers and was in no way a restriction on migrant workers' freedom of choice as they were able to ask for recommendations of workplaces at these job centres at any time. In addition, she indicated that the burden of proof in cases of unfair treatment and discrimination did not always lie with the worker, but depended on the nature of the case. Regarding the issue of in-house subcontracting, investigations were under way to determine the legality of the broader in-house subcontracting practice. Furthermore, since the Committee of Experts had also been putting forward efforts to facilitate dialogue between the social partners in order to find solutions to the number of subcontracted workers employed directly by that company. As for the In-house Subcontracting Act, the Government had not been trying to achieve the legalization of illegal dispatches for the benefit of the employers, but for the protection of working conditions and employment security. With regard to the wage gap between men and women, she indicated that there had been a significant improvement from the 35 per cent gap of 2009 to a 31 per cent gap today. The Government had introduced laws to prohibit discrimination based on gender and conducted inspections in more than 30,000 workplaces per year to ensure compliance with the law. Moreover, considering the fact that the income gap between men and women remained a source of great concern regarding protection against discrimination and was testimony to a clear lack of will on the part of the Government. Moreover, it also appeared that the Government had failed to understand that it was necessary not only to transpose the principles of the Convention into national law but also to monitor their application. Such monitoring could only be improved if the workers concerned were informed and assisted by the trade unions that represented them. Most workers who suffered discrimination were in precarious employment. In view of that growing phenomenon, it was necessary to train honorary inspectors to take charge of monitoring equal opportunities for men and women in enterprises. Furthermore, since discriminatory treatment due to political opinion especially affected teachers, the Government should take steps without delay to protect teachers at all levels. The Government should request technical assistance from the ILO to ensure the rapid adoption of the necessary amendments to the Act on Foreign Workers' Employment, etc. and to bring them into line with the provisions of the Convention. The recommendations of the Committee of Experts should be implemented without delay and the Government should provide clarifications on the following: (i) the definition of the expression "unreasonable discrimination" used in notification No. 2012-52 and also the grounds of discrimination covered; and (ii) how, and by which authority, it was “objectively recognized” that a foreign worker was a victim of discrimination and therefore did not have to wait for the outcome of the investigation to be completed before requesting a change of workplace to leave the employer. The Worker members asked the Government to take steps to supply information to all workers and employers on the new provisions of the Act on Foreign Workers' Employment, etc. especially information regarding non-discrimination, and to foreign workers in particular on the new rules regarding changes of workplace and on the current legal provi-tions and relevant procedures available concerning sexual harassment. The Worker members urged the Government to supply information on the inspection of workplaces employing migrant workers (number of enterprises inspected and workers concerned, number and nature of violations detected and remedial action taken), as well as on the nature and content of complaints brought by migrant workers before labour inspectors, the police, the courts and the National Human Rights Commission, and the follow-up action taken.

The Employer members noted the concluding statements of the Government pointing out the issues and the initiatives being taken in this regard, as well as their underlying rationale, for instance in relation to the provision of access of migrant workers to employers and the creation of job centres, and the ability of agents or brokers to take advantage of the lack of cultural familiarity and language abilities of migrant workers during the placement procedure. The Employer members endorsed the fact that the Government had taken account of these issues and was looking at ways to counter them. However, they recognized that these might not have been perfect measures and therefore endorsed the cause for further measures to be taken, in order to ensure that discrimination did not come inherent to the new practices. While there was no country that could claim to be free from discrimination, some principles needed to be observed. First of all it had to be ensured, through the creation of laws and regulations that were entirely consistent with the Convention, that no systemic or institutionalized discrimination occurred. Secondly, these rules also had to be applied in practice and should be designed so as to root out all instances of discriminatory practice, to call them to account and to discourage their emergence. The quest of governments was whether they had systems in place which were able to identify issues and discriminatory practices before they occurred or to deal with them immediately after their occurrence. Those who suffered discrimination needed to be able to bring their cases to the attention of the instances that dealt with them. They therefore encouraged the Government to continue to take measures to raise awareness among migrant workers of their rights and obligations regarding discrimination. With respect to women in the workplace, and more particularly with regard to the income gaps referred to by the Government, a distinction had to be made. The fact that women did not work in full-time jobs and therefore earned less could be either a result of choices or availability. The cases where women made the choice could not be called discrimination. Only in cases where they were not able to choose the work that they wanted to do, were there issues that could be called discrimination that should be rooted out by governments. With regard to the issue of political opinion, the Employer members drew the attention to the fact that not only the Government of the Republic of Korea, but also governments around the world, looked at their public servants performing their service without fear and expectation of favour of the government in charge, with the understanding that the government could and did change. This being an underlying principle of the public sector, the Committee of Experts had allowed for some possible restrictions, as long as they were concrete and objective and directed at a specific job. The Employer members recalled that the teachers that had been arrested had subsequently been released, which showed that the Korean legal system was balanced. The Employer members encouraged the Government to ensure that any restrictions that were placed on public servants were balanced, and noted that while primary and secondary school teachers had some constraints, other teaching personnel at the higher education level did not. They asked the Government to consider this as an issue in the future.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the oral and written information provided by the Government representative and the discussion that followed.

The Committee recalled that it had last examined this case in 2009. The Committee considered issues regarding protection of migrant workers from discrimination and abuse, discrimination on the basis of employment status, equality of opportunity and treatment of women and men, and discrimination based on political opinion.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government regarding the range of services provided to migrant workers, and the recent changes to the Employment Permit System ( EPS) expanding the list of reasons for which workers could change workplaces. Regarding discrimination based on sex and employment status, the Committee noted the Government’s indication that the time limit for filing a complaint had been increased from three to six months, and that labour inspectors had been granted powers to address discrimination against fixed-term, part-time and dispatched workers. It also noted the information provided by the Government regarding the system of appointing honorary equal-employment inspectors to assist enterprises to address gender discrimination issues, and the expansion of the requirement for companies with low female participation to file affirmative action plans.

Recalling that the issue of protecting migrant workers from discrimination and abuse required the Government’s continued attention, the Committee urged the Government to take steps, in collaboration with employers’ and workers’ organizations, and without delay, to ensure that the EPS, including the “re-entry and re-employment system”, provided appropriate flexibility for migrant workers to change employers and did not, in practice, give rise to situations in which they became vulnerable to abuse and discrimination on the grounds enumerated in the Convention. The Committee also requested the Government to continue to strengthen initiatives to ensure migrant workers received all the assistance and information they needed, and that they were made aware of their rights. Given the large and increasing number of non-regular workers, the majority of whom were women, the Committee asked the Government to examine the impact of the recent measures taken to address non-regular employment, to ensure that they were not in practice resulting in discrimination. Given the low labour market participation of women, the Committee requested the Government to take systematic measures to ensure that women could freely choose their employment and had access, in practice, to a wide range of jobs. The Committee urged the Government to ensure rapid, effective and accessible procedures to address discrimination and abuse in practice. It also urged the Government to take steps to ensure effective protection against discrimination based on political opinion, in particular for pre-school, primary and secondary school teachers, and to ensure that concrete and objective criteria were used to determine the very limited cases where political opinion could be considered an inherent requirement of a particular job.

The Committee urged the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance. It requested the Government to include in its report to the Committee of Experts due in 2013, complete information regarding all issues raised by this Committee and the Committee of Experts, for examination at its next meeting.
SAUDI ARABIA (ratification: 1978)

A Government representative referred to the ILO High-level Mission that had visited Saudi Arabia in September 2006. The mission had observed the level of economic, political and social progress achieved by the country with the changes in the composition of the labour market. The mission had drafted recommendations which were being taken into account by the relevant State bodies. Since 2006, there had been positive developments, including the promulgation of the Labour Code, which was the outcome of the inputs of national experts in consultation with ILO experts and the social partners. The Labour Code was comprehensive and took into account the major inputs of national experts in consultation with ILO experts. In this regard, the speaker underlined that the majority of laws (especially the Labour Code), regulations, instructions and the decisions of the Shura Council and the Council of Ministers, reaffirmed that the official policy was based on combating all forms of discrimination, segregation or exclusion on the grounds of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction or social origin, in conformity with Article 1 of the Convention. He stated that Saudi society was based on equality in rights and obligations, in line with the Constitution and the rules of Islamic Sharia which prohibited all forms of discrimination, exploitation or injustice. With respect to persons residing in Saudi Arabia, he indicated that there was no discriminatory policy, declared or hidden, towards these persons, whose numbers exceeded 11 million. They contributed without any discrimination or segregation to the sustainable development of Saudi Arabia as well as to the development of their countries of origin through their remittances, and the experience they acquired. Concerning the legislation in force, all regulations were based on the prohibition of discrimination or segregation in treatment between citizens or between citizens and migrant workers, as evidenced by the Labour Code. There was no distinction between men and women, or between citizens and non-citizens.

Concerning the specific issues raised by the Committee of Experts, he stated that section 6 of the Labour Code regulated casual, seasonal and temporary work without any discrimination between such workers and permanent workers as to obligations, maximum number of hours of work, weekly and daily rest periods, overtime, official holidays, training, occupational safety and health and occupational diseases. All workers could resort, on an equal footing, to dispute settlement bodies. The Ministry of Labour had launched a huge project, the cost of which exceeded US$26 million, for the development of such labour dispute settlement bodies. As regards domestic workers, the speaker highlighted that the Ministry of Labour had exerted efforts, in collaboration with the National Agency for Human Rights and the Shura Council, which in addition to the adoption of a regulation on domestic workers, which took into account the principles enshrined in international labour standards and was currently before the high authorities for decision. Concerning the legal protection of all categories of migrant workers and the regulation of the labour market, he indicated that the Ministry of Labour had taken several measures, including the protection of wages system which monitored and regulated agreements. The Council of Ministers had, therefore, authorized the Minister of Labour to negotiate and sign bilateral agreements with the countries of origin of domestic workers. A model for such a bilateral agreement inspired by international labour standards had been adopted. Its aim was to regulate the relationship between the domestic worker and the employer in order to safeguard the rights of both parties. Last month, the first of such agreements had been signed with the Government of the Philippines. Consultations were under way with other labour-supplying countries of origin for the conclusion of similar agreements.

With respect to the Committee of Experts’ observation on the sponsorship issue, the speaker stated that sponsorship did not exist in Saudi Arabia and that the Labour Code had been amended to regulate the relationship between the employer and the worker, based on a contract. The Labour Code did not discriminate between men and women in rights and obligations nor as regards equal opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation. His Government objected to the Committee of Experts’ comments concerning the term “specific nature of women’s work”. Section 149 of the Labour Code sought to prohibit employers from employing women in such occupations which jeopardized women’s health, or were likely to expose them to specific risks; such work was prohibited or restricted under specific conditions. In this context, section 150 of the Labour Code regulated night work of women. Furthermore, several measures had been taken by the Ministries of Education, of Higher Education and of Labour, the Shura Council, the General Agency for Technical and Vocational Training, the Human Resources Development Fund and other bodies, to increase women’s participation in higher-level and in non-traditional positions. Women also had the right to nomination and election for municipal councils. After the visit of the High-level mission, the Council of Ministers had promulgated Decision No. 158 of 18 June 2008 approving the national plan for training at the General Agency for Technical and Vocational Training. With respect to women’s participation in committees and courts, a Royal Decree had been promulgated to set up women’s units in courts under the supervision of an independent women’s department in the main office of the judiciary. Furthermore, programmes aimed at women’s employment had been launched with success. Thus, more than 180,000 women had been employed in the last two years, which was more than triple the number employed in three decades. A third social symposium on women’s employment was scheduled to be held in the forthcoming months, in collaboration with the ILO. With regard to sexual harassment, he underlined that the Government had, as of last year, considered that this phenomenon did not exist in Saudi Arabia. However, the penalization of sexual harassment was currently being considered by the relevant bodies. In this regard, he underlined that the right to prosecute was guaranteed to all citizens and residents in the country. In practice, labour inspectors or the bodies in charge of labour dispute settlement had not received any cases related to discrimination in employment and occupation. His Government requested that the case be removed from the list of individual cases, and it continued to be committed to collaborating with the ILO and its bodies to ensure compliance with international labour standards.

The Worker members observed that, according to the Government’s information, Saudi Arabia would appear to be an exemplary country in terms of discrimination. However, the Convention of the Government of the to take specific action to fight all discrimination in law and in practice and to have a national policy to actively promote equal opportunities and treatment in employment and occupation. They recalled that in 2006 an ILO High-level mission had made proposals to the Government, including carrying out a national survey of the situation in the country, developing an action plan and putting together a multi-stakeholder task force. With regard to legislation, the 2006 Labour Code still did not contain any specific provisions defining and prohibiting discrimination in employment and occupation. Concerning agricultural and domestic workers, according to the Government, the Ministry of Labour viewed it as a priority to draft regulations setting out a multi-cultural and multicultural employment and occupation policy. The Government had also prepared a document to ensure that domestic workers were paid their wages and had medical coverage, but this did not specifically provide for protection against discrimination. With regard to migrant workers, the Government had recognized that the recruitment system (sponsorship) could be open to exploitation and abuse and had undertaken to abolish it. Meanwhile, the Ministry of Labour had taken a number of steps to better protect migrant workers, such as: creating a department for the welfare of expatriate workers; adopting regulations on recruitment agencies; drafting a model agreement for employers and domestic workers; and authorizing the negotiation of bilateral agreements with countries of origin of migrant workers. Concerning women, occupational gender segregation remained a dominant characteristic of the country, with women being confined to jobs “suitable to their nature.” The Government did not consider this to be discrimination but was nevertheless examining the possibility of revoking it. Regarding sexual harassment, there was no legislation, but the Government had reported that it was considering prohibiting such acts. With regard to the application of legislation, the Government indicated that no complaints of discrimination in employment or occupation had been made. The Worker members considered that the absence of complaints could be the result of the lack of an appropriate legal framework, the absence of practical access to procedures, or even due to fear of reprisals. The Government had referred to a royal decree of 2008 that provided for the creation of women’s units in courts and justice departments, but had not given any specific information on the implementation of that decree.

The Employer members recalled that the issues under discussion were similar to those examined by the Committee in 2005, particularly the lack of specific provisions in national legislation, and not specific violations relating to discrimination. The Government had demonstrated progress, and the activities that had been undertaken in this regard could inform the situation, given the lack of specific provisions in legislation addressing discrimination. Turning to the issue of a national equality policy, the Employer members recalled that while Article 2 of the Convention required the adoption of such a policy, the Domestic Workers Convention did not specify what this policy should contain. In this regard, it was necessary to examine what had been done practically. Particularly, as called for by the Committee of Experts, a tripartite process to develop an action plan was underway in which the employers in the country were actively involved. However, much work remained. Saudi Arabia was a complex country, comprising a large number of specific groups within the population, as well as 10 million temporary migrant workers. On the issue of segregation, the Employer members underlined that it was important to examine whether women were actively prohibited or discouraged from working, or whether the labour force participation statistics simply reflected the particular norms in the country. Particularly, it was important to examine whether such statistics were a reflection of the fact that women were viewed as domestic workers in the industry, instead of reflecting particular barriers to participation. No country was free of discrimination, but in Saudi Arabia, discrimination did not appear to be encouraged or systemic. Referring to agricultural workers, the Employer members recalled that these workers represented a small percentage of the population, and that the Government was taking measures to address their situation. Concerning domestic workers, activities had been taken to protect this group in line with the spirit of the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189). These included the setting-up of banks accounts to ensure that domestic workers would be paid, measures against the confiscation of passports and access to dispute settlement procedures. While the Government had taken further measures, it was important that migrant domestic workers were informed of their rights, countries of origin also had to take measures to raise awareness among migrant workers. The Committee of Experts’ observation referred to different facets of discrimination. In each instance, the Government had made it clear that it did not condone discrimination, and that it was working actively, albeit not legislatively, to address this. Specific legislative measures concerning discrimination could be beneficial, and the Government should be encouraged to take steps in this regard, as well as to continue to take practical measures.

The Worker member of the Philippines highlighted that Saudi Arabia was a country where 385,000 Filipino workers were deployed, 30 per cent of whom were low-skilled workers including domestic workers. Cases had been filed before the Philippine Overseas Employment Agency by domestic workers, in particular cases of harassment, abuse and violence against women. The Labour Code of 2006 excluded domestic workers from its coverage and draft regulations to cover domestic workers had not yet been adopted. He hoped that the bilateral agreements signed between Saudi Arabia and the Philippines on migrant domestic workers, as well as on a standard employment contract governing the employment of Filipino household service workers, would lead to the adoption of national legislation or regulations for domestic workers. In addition, over 9 million migrant workers constituted more than half the workforce in Saudi Arabia. Even though the Ministry of Labour had proposed to abolish the kafala system, the change had not taken effect so far. Moreover, Islamic law in the country did not guarantee equality for women. Information concerning the definition and prohibition of sexual harassment was not available. The biases built into law and practice therefore led to the differential treatment of foreign workers, including differences in pay, depending on their country of origin.

The Worker member of Indonesia highlighted that non-Arab persons of African and Asian origin were often victims of violence including at the workplace. She expressed serious concerns about the impact of the national "Saudization" policy in which a proportion of the number of migrants in favour of Saudi workers. Labour laws required a quota for Saudi employees in all businesses, and this was punishable with fines. As employers in small and medium-sized enterprises had largely refused to pay increased fees for work permits, which were aimed at creating jobs for Saudis, most migrant workers had become illegal, and lost their jobs and livelihoods. In 2013, foreign workers had stayed away from their workplaces, as the Government had mounted a crackdown on illegal residents. Migrant workers had no basic political or democratic rights. As unions were illegal, the workers had recourse only in the labour court, but the possession of a foreign nationality could be a significant disadvantage in obtaining redress through the courts.

The Worker member of Canada highlighted that women accounted for only 4 per cent of the total workforce as well as 10.7 per cent of the national Saudi workforce, and that the labour market was segregated. Except four cases under new decrees, under the labour legislation, women must seek permission of their guardian in order to perform work that was not “suitable to their nature”. Women were not allowed to enrol in academic subjects such as legal services or engineering. The prohibition of driving... resulted in additional transportation costs for employers to employ female workers. There were no laws criminalizing violence against women nor prohibiting sexual harassment at the workplace. There was limited information on sexual harassment, since raising a complaint was also problematic. In rape cases, the courts routinely punished both victim and perpetrator and the perspective of discrimination, among over 9 million migrant workers continued to suffer multiple abuses and labour exploitation, sometimes amounting to slavery-like conditions. The proposal to abolish the kafala system had not yet taken effect. The Shia minority also faced discrimination, including in employment. The speaker expressed serious concerns about the impact of the national “Saudization” policy which aimed at reducing the number of migrant workers in favour of Saudi workers. Labour laws required a quota for Saudi employees in all businesses, and this was punishable with sanctions of fines. Labour laws also tightened the requirement that foreign workers should not be employed by anyone except their original sponsor. He also referred to discrimination concerning lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender workers, and workers with disabilities, as well as the law requiring the deportation of any migrant worker who was found to be HIV positive. The lack of effective enforcement was also an issue. He urged the Government to urgently: (i) install effective and accessible complaint mechanisms and grievance procedures; (ii) suppress the obstacles for the recruitment and employment of women; (iii) establish a multi-stakeholder task force to develop and implement a national equality policy; and (iv) adapt the Residency Law to lift the requirement of the sponsor’s consent to change jobs or leave the country.

The Employer member of Saudi Arabia indicated that employers in the country had been invited on numerous occasions to discuss with the Ministry of Labour and the workers committees, amendments and additions to some of the labour laws and regulations, including those related to non-discrimination. They had also participated in drafting new regulations concerning domestic workers. New rules for migrant workers allowed such workers to transfer to new employers, and measures had been taken to ensure that such workers had recourse to exercise their rights. Several steps had also been taken concerning women’s participation in the workplace, including the annulment of the legislation relating to segregation in the workplace, the annulment of the requirement of the consent of a woman’s guardian for the issuing of a work permit, the abolition of some job provisions for women to force more resistant private sector actors to employ them. Nonetheless the issue of discrimination remained, and further action by the society was needed to complement the action taken by the State. A recent survey had indicated that 54 per cent of women surveyed would only accept to work in a segregated environment and 80 per cent of women surveyed preferred to work from home. These were not presented as a defence of the situation, but to underline that realizing the goal of an integrated economy required a process that was inclusive, representative and respectful of differences. The situation in Saudi Arabia was complex, and therefore the employees in the country were examining methods appropriate to national conditions to address the participation of women in the workforce. This included highlighting and clarifyning the progressive nature of the role that Islam gave to women in society. Referring to several initiatives undertaken by employers in the country relating to women in the workforce, the speaker underlined that despite obvous limitations and challenges, progress in the country was clear.

The Worker member of Libya stressed that Islam drew no distinction between the rights and obligations of men and women, but that was not necessarily the case in Saudi Arabia. In that regard, the speaker referred to discrimination against women in terms of transport and recalled that Saudi Arabia was the only country that prevented women from driving cars, despite promises to change the position. The cost of transport was therefore higher for women than for men and had to be paid by drivers. Although there were opportunities for women to work in the country, the price of transport nevertheless presented an enormous obstacle, particularly if women wished to join the labour market.

The Government representative expressed appreciation for the observations made by the Employer and Worker members and indicated that all comments would be taken into consideration. The Government’s policy of non-discrimination was based on principles enshrined in its national legislation. Moreover, migrant workers were an integral part of the process of sustainable development in the country and were treated on an equal footing with Saudi nationals. The Government would continue to work with its social partners so as to ensure better integration and a better working environment. Saudi Arabia hosted one of the largest numbers of migrant workers in the world. Thousands of cases of illicit workers had been resolved. Women, like men, had always been taken into consideration in the formulation of policy on education and vocational training. The Government representative emphasized that the Government attached great importance to its relationship with the ILO and would continue to collaborate with the ILO supervisory bodies to ensure the application of international labour standards.

The Worker members emphasized that the Convention was based on the theory that no society was free of discrimination and that all societies should therefore have an equality policy, not only to remove all discrimination from legislation and administrative practices but also to implement programmes to promote equality. They de-clored the fact that the Government was making little effort to follow either the letter or the spirit of the Convention, despite the suggestions made by the ILO High-level mission in 2006. The Labour Code still did not fortormally prohibit either discrimination in employment and occupation or sexual harassment. Domestic workers enjoyed a certain degree of protection in terms of wages and medical care, but not against discrimination. Migrant workers were considered second-class workers and benefited only from certain specific provisions. Women were restricted to a limited number of occupations. The country had no judicial or administrative framework for the detection of any form of discrimination in employment. As a result, the Worker members proposed that the Government accept an ILO direct contacts mission to identify exactly which legislation should be amended and to define what policies should be formulated to promote equality, 35 years after the Convention had been ratified.

The Employer members recalled the Worker members’ statement that no society was completely free of discrimination and that all countries had occasional instances of discrimination, including Saudi Arabia. However, the Government was very clear that it was moving in a direction consistent with the Convention and its stated position was that it neither condoned nor accepted discrimination. While some aspects of life in Saudi Arabia might appear to reflect discrimination, the Employer members cautioned needless to say that Islam was not necessarily the whole picture. Particularly, segregation in the labour force could instead be a reflection of the personal preferences of women. However, any specific barriers or prohibitions that prevented the realization of aspirations were unacceptable and should be addressed. The Employer members indicated that while there might have been situations of migrant workers being treated less favourably, it was impor-
The Committee took note of the oral information provided by the Government representative and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted that it had last examined this case in 2005, at which time it raised issues concerning the need to declare and pursue a national equality policy, to provide effective legislative protection for migrant workers against discrimination, in particular to deal with the problems of domestic workers and those who required special protection against the effects of the foreign sponsorship system. The Committee had also raised concerns that women continued to be excluded from certain jobs and occupations, and requested the Government to take effective measures to promote and ensure the equal access of women to employment and all occupations.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government in relation to recent developments, including the increase in the number of women in employment and the establishment of the National Observatory for Labour and the Virtual Labour Market, which the Government considered would support strategies for decent work without discrimination, including for women, persons with disabilities and marginalized groups. Regarding the exclusion of domestic workers and agricultural workers from the Labour Code, the Government indicated that these workers could still bring cases before the courts, though none had been filed. The Committee also noted the Government’s indication that there had been several initiatives to protect specifically migrant workers, including a programme for the protection of wages, new regulations for employment agencies, and negotiations on bilateral agreements with countries of origin, with an agreement having been concluded with the Philippines.

Acknowledging that no society is free of discrimination, the Committee noted that addressing discrimination was an ongoing process requiring regular action. The Committee noted that the national equality policy required under the Convention needed to be concrete, specific and effective. As the impact of the Government’s efforts in this area remained unclear, it urged the Government to ensure that it had a national policy designed to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation, for all workers, with a view to the elimination, in the very near future, of any discrimination on all the grounds set out in the Convention. Given the very high number of migrant workers, it asked the Government to give particular attention to ensuring that the rights of migrant workers, including domestic workers, were being effectively protected, and that they were aware of their rights, and able to obtain appropriate redress in cases of discrimination and abuse. It also encouraged the Government to continue to negotiate bilateral agreements with countries of origin, which would ensure the rights of migrant workers once they were in the country, and also oblige the countries of origin to take measures for their protection.

The Committee requested the Government to accept a direct contacts mission with a view to assessing the situation on the ground and assisting the Government and the social partners to continue to make tangible progress in the application of the Convention. The Committee requested the Government to provide a report to the Committee of Experts, including detailed information regarding all issues raised by this Committee and the Committee of Experts, for examination at its next meeting.

The Government representative stated that the report and comments that the Government had provided to the Committee of Experts had been clear and comprehensive. There was strong technical cooperation with the ILO in different areas such as social dialogue and labour market policy. It would be important for the Committee to review the reports from other international organizations such as the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) and the World Bank, which illustrated the manner in which his Government had taken the lead in many crucial areas. Although there was no reason to include the recommendation for a direct contacts mission into the Committee’s conclusions, his Government would be pleased to invite an ILO mission headed by the Director-General to visit Saudi Arabia in order to enhance technical cooperation relating to the application of the Convention.

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122)

The Government provided the following written information.

The Convention provided that each ILO Member shall pursue an active policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, with the participation of the social partners. The Government’s economic and employment strategy had been established in the context of the European Semester, and its actions correspond to the priority areas identified in the Annual Growth Forecast 2013. A particular objective is to tackle unemployment and the social consequences of the crisis and also achieve the objectives of the Europe 2020 strategy. The reform of the labour market had entered into force in February 2012, and had been adopted by Parliament in Act No. 3/2012 of 6 July 2012. The labour market reform established a new framework for labour relations with a view to modifying the dynamics and adjustment pattern of the Spanish labour market, thereby constituting a key aspect of preparing the way for jobs-oriented economic recovery. Its prime objective was to promote internal flexibility measures through instruments that enable enterprises to adapt to economic circumstances without causing massive job losses and to improve the employability of workers. Monitoring of the reform would continue in 2013 through the groups and committees established and an interim evaluation report on its outcome would be drawn up by an independent body, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) during the first year of implementation. It would be published once the data from the active population survey for the first quarter of 2013 had been analysed.

Active employment policies were a new strategy designed to improve employability, especially of the youngest workers. In Spain in 2012 they had followed, and would continue to follow in 2013, a new strategy based on the following five major areas of action, agreed upon with the autonomous communities at the Sectoral Employment Conference of 11 April 2013.

Institutional aspects: Coordination, evaluation and efficiency. The Annual Employment Policy Plan 2012 was a fundamental landmark for establishing proper coordination between the various competent administrations (Autonomous Communities and the state administration) and the progressive establishment of a culture of evaluation with regard to active employment policies. During 2012, the autonomous communities, in order to determine actions under the funds distributed by the Public State Employment Service, had to follow the six priority objectives of the Annual Employment Policy Plan, namely: reducing the youth unemployment rate; improving the employability of other groups affected by unemployment; establishing social measures through income generation and sustaining them in the labour market; strengthening public–private partnerships to reinforce the search for jobs for unemployed persons; developing measures to promote employment for specific groups, with a special focus on persons with disabilities; and taking action against fraud. Moreover, the Plan incorporated, as an innovative element, indicators to show the degree of compliance with the objectives established and the evaluation of actions taken. In October 2012, through an agreement reached at the Sectoral Conference between the Ministry of Employment and Social Security and the autonomous communities, a working party had been set up to evaluate the active policies that had been implemented. During 2012, a total of 82 coordination meetings had been held. As a continuation of the 2012 strategy, the second quarter of 2013 of the Employment Policy Plan 2013 would be adopted, and the content of which had been discussed at the state-autonomous communities Sectoral Conference held in April 2013. The 2013 Plan would strengthen incentives to achieve improved efficiency through a results-based approach. The priority objectives and measures of the 2013 Plan, which would be adopted before the end of the first half of the year, would be established on the basis of the results of the evaluation which was currently in progress. Those results would determine the new distribution of funds among the autonomous communities for pursuing active employment policies, which this year amounted to €1,345 million, 15 per cent of which would be distributed among the Autonomous Communities according to the established objectives. The Autonomous Communities were collaborating in the formulation of the monitoring indicators which would determine this financing. The strategic objectives used to formulate the indicators were: improvement in the employability of young persons and support for entrepreneurship; improvement in the employability of other groups specially affected by unemployment (especially the long-term unemployed and workers over 55 years of age); improvement in the quality of vocational training for employment; and improvement in the linkage between active and passive employment policies.

Linkage between active and passive employment policies (activation). This was a question of reinforcing mechanisms designed to ensure that the recipients of unemployment benefits met their obligations relating to work and training in an appropriate and effective way. During 2012, the regulations on unemployment benefits and allowances were changed by introducing increased supervision of recipients’ compliance with their obligations, according to the job seeking and action to improve employability. The year 2013 would also see the introduction of innovative IT methods and tools which had proved effective in other spheres (taxation, social security, finance, etc.), as well as identifying possible sources of additional information with databases enabling the expansion and optimization of current procedures and improved detection of non-compliance with active job seeking and training, according to benefit levels and conditions.

Improvements in job placement services. With the aim of better matching employment supply and demand and facilitating actuation of the unemployed, the focus was being placed on measures intended to improve the quality of information and draw on the experience of private employment agencies. During 2012, the development of the Single Employment Portal had begun. This initiative, to be completed in 2013, consisted of the creation of a common database for the whole country which includes all training and employment offers managed by public, national and autonomous employment services, including European and international offers, those submitted directly by enterprises, public employment offers and those originating from public training providers (sectoral and general training services), public–private agencies. Public–private partnership in the sphere of job placement services had been launched. A framework agreement had been established which had been adopted by the Autonomous Communities for the selection of job placement service providers. The aim was to ensure uniform conditions throughout the national territory to facilitate the coordination of the public–private partnership. Furthermore, the partnership will be results-based; in other words, private agencies would be remunerated according to the characteristics of the unemployed person and the duration of the employment provided. The Autonomous Communities (14 out of the 17) had expressed their willingness to adopt this public–private partnership model (Sectoral Conference of April 2013). The model was expected to be operational by the end of October 2013.

Increasing employment opportunities through training. In order to improve employability and integration into the employment markets, in particular for the youngest workers, the focus had been placed on training measures in 2012 and 2013. The objective was to provide training that facilitates access to the labour market, for which it was crucial for such training to be geared to the needs of the productive sectors. Moreover, it was important to promote training activities which also contained the possibility of gaining occupational experience. The labour market reform adopted in February 2012 had established a new training and apprenticeship contract leading to a vocational qualification. The regulations governing such contracts and their application had also been accompanied by the establishment of a dual system of vocational training, which was already operational, for which there would be a new development strategy for 2013–15. The strategy would be accompanied by a process for monitoring the quality and impact of dual vocational training, which would result in an intermediate evaluation (due in the second half of 2014) and a final evaluation (second half of 2015). In the context of social dialogue, the training round table was revising the training model for employed and unemployed workers, funded with public resources, which aimed to promote skills among training service providers and identify priorities in this field, so that more effective use was made of the public resources concerned. The new model had already become operational in 2012 and would continue in 2013. As part of the Youth Employment and Entrepreneurship Strategy 2013–16, negotiated with the social partners, measures had been adopted to improve the vocational qualifications and employability of young people: training programmes leading to certificates of vocational competence or promises of employment – at least 30 per cent of participants in such training programmes could qualify for such promises; incentives for unemployed persons to acquire compulsory secondary education; and a reform of the legislation relating to certificates of vocational competence would be conducted in 2013. In order to adapt these certificates to the new dual vocational training model, the basic legislation had already been amended and the National Directory of Vocational Competence Certificates would be published, and updated following the revision of 585 vocational competence certificates in 2012.

Promotion of youth employment and entrepreneurship. The Youth Employment and Entrepreneurship Strategy 2013–16, negotiated with the social partners, had been adopted and was being implemented. The objective was to promote measures to reduce youth unemployment, promote youth employment/self-employment, and it was the result of a process of dialogue with the social partners. It met the recommendations of the European Commission and was geared to the objectives of the “Youth Guarantee” proposal. The Strategy contained 100 measures, of which 32 were short-term measures. Particular mention: to stimulate youth employment, contingency measures were being adopted (until the unemployment rate fell below 15 per cent); incentives for part-time employment linked to training for persons under 30 years of age without previous work experience and originating from sectors with no employment or those who have been unemployed for more than six months, counting both employment and training. Employers’ social security contributions were reduced by 75 per cent for enterprises with more than 250 workers and by 100 per cent for the rest; for the initial youth employment contract, strong incentives would be provided for conversion into indefinite contracts (€500 per year for three years and €700 for contracts for women); incentives for work experience leading to a first job would include changes to the current work experience contract so that trained young people could obtain a first job; other measures to promote entrepreneurship and self-employment for young people under 30 years of age; fixed social security contributions, with a minimum rate (€50) for the first six months of self-employment; combining unemployment benefits with starting self-employment for a maximum of six months; increased possibilities for the capitalization of unemployment benefits to start up entrepreneurial activities, so that recipients of unemployment benefits could capitalize up to 100 per cent of their benefits to contribute to the capital assets of a commercial company employing up to 50 workers, provided that there was an employment or professional link with the company; improved protection for the self-employed to facilitate a second chance, under which unemployment benefit could be paid again after a period of self-employment which ended before the fifth year; and establishment of the generations contract to promote the hiring of experienced unemployed workers by self-employed young people. In the Autonomous Communities, administrations which engaged in skills sharing with regard to active employment policies had been taking important action in 2012 and 2013 to increase the efficiency of such policies. The following actions could be singled out: giving priority to young persons in the action and modernization relating to public employment; the introduction of personalized itineraries to employment and introducing new computer applications for the provision of employment services, guidance and placement in jobs; and the reinforcement of actions designed to ensure that the recipients of unemployment benefit take part in vocational training and guidance activities, with increased linkage between active and passive employment policies.

Education policies. The school drop-out rate in Spain was twice the European Union average, with the 2011 figures being 26.5 per cent for Spain and 13.5 per cent for the European Union. The same situation had persisted throughout the last decade, although the drop-out rate fell from 31.9 per cent in 2008 to 26.5 per cent in 2011. For 2012, the latest data from the active population survey for the last quarter of 2012 gave a figure of 24.9 per cent. Nevertheless, the school drop-out data contrasted with the percentage of persons between 30 and 34 years of age who had completed tertiary-level studies. The latter figure stood at 40.6 per cent, thereby exceeding the European target of 40 per cent, and continued the progress towards the national objective of 44 per cent by 2020. The main objective of the reform of education laws, which would begin in 2014–15, was to reduce the school drop-out rate to 15 per cent by 2020. This meant that 85 per cent of pupils were expected, under the proposed new education structure, to graduate from high school or complete intermediate or basic vocational training. The aim was for the educational reform to adopt measures, inter alia, to detect learning problems at an earlier stage and implement programmes for deserters. The new provisions made training paths that best suited their profile, step up the volume of reading in key competencies for academic development and give greater autonomy to schools to develop educational projects geared to results. Furthermore, a new basic vocational training qualification would be created, which could be accessed without completion of compulsory secondary schooling, but which would continue to train the pupil concerned with a view to resuming such studies or moving on to intermediate vocational training. In addition, in 2012 two specific action plans for reducing the school drop-out rate had been launched. The first targeted the prevention of school drop outs and promoted a return to the school system, the second aimed to cater for the educational needs of the socio-cultural environment with an impact on school drop outs. Mention should also be made of: the assistance programme designed to allow unemployed youth who dropped out of compulsory schooling to resume their studies; the new system of part-time work aimed at those who wish to combine work and training; the new training contract which makes it possible to obtain a vocational training qualification or a certificate of vocational competence; the improved access to vocational training studies through online learning; the revision of the content of various vocational training qualifications and certificates to adapt them to the new professional realities and needs of the productive sectors; the launching of a plan to boost lifelong learning; a policy of efficiency with regard to scholarships; and reform of university legislation to promote excellence, competitiveness and internationalization of the university system.

Employment policy results. According to data in the state employment service registers, the number of people unemployed at the end of May 2013 had fallen by 98,265 compared with the previous month. In relative terms, this was a 1.97 per cent decrease. In May 2012, the unemployment figure fell by 30,113 compared with the previous month. With this fall, the number of people who were registered as unemployed stands at 4,890,928, which was the biggest reduction in the registered unemployment figure in the month of May. In fact, the average drop in unemployment in the month of May since 1997 had been 84,980. This month of May of official unemployment showed that it had been reduced by 43,815 more people than the average for the previous two months of May. These data clearly maintain the tendency towards a slowdown in the increase in registered unemployment, as since May 2012 the year-on-year rate had fallen by almost nine points, six this year, and now stood at 3.75 per cent. Thus, the increase in unemployment over the last 12 months has fallen below 180,000 (176,806), while in May the previous year, the year-on-year increase was over half a million (524,463).

Unemployment falling in all sectors and among young people. Among workers from the service sector, unemployment had fallen by 61,336 (1.97 per cent), among construction workers by 18,637 (-2.51 per cent), in agriculture by 9,405 (-4.56 per cent) and in industry by 8,851 (-1.61 per cent). Lastly, among persons who had not been employed previously, it had dropped by 70,374 (-21.01 per cent). Unemployment had fallen among men by 61,150 (-2.48 per cent) compared with the month of April and stood at 2,405,493. It had also fallen among women by 37,115 (-1.47 per cent) and stood at 2,485,435. It should also be emphasized that, among young people under the age of 25, unemployment has fallen by 16,735 (-3.53 per cent) compared with last month. Among those aged 25 and Over, it had dropped by €8,153 (-1.81 per cent). Registered unemployment among young people under the age of 25 over the past 12 months had dropped by more than 32,000 (32,317), which was a year-on-year fall of 6.59 per cent.

Reduction in 16 autonomous communities. Registered unemployment fell in 16 Autonomous Communities, including in particular Andalucía (26,529), Catalonia (-14,829) and the community of Valencia (-10,671). It rose, however, in the Canary Islands (538). As for data by province, unemployment fell in 47 provinces, and particularly Barcelona (-8,655), Madrid (-8,470) and the Balearic Islands (-7,917). It rose, by contrast, in five, headed by Las Palmas (309) and Tenerife (229).

Recruitment on the rise. In May, some 1,283,261 registrations were registered, representing an increase of 36,160 (2.90 per cent) on May 2012. Cumulative recruitment in the first five months of 2013 reached 5,457,691, which was an increase of 85,079 (1.58 per cent) on the same period the previous year. Positive developments had been seen in the training and apprenticeship contracts, as there had been 67 per cent more persons recruited under those contracts in 2013 compared with the same period in the previous year. Some 7,220 new “support for entrepreneurs” contracts had been reported to the public employment services, which represent 21.7 per cent of all the open-ended contracts of that type that had been reported.

Unemployment benefits. Some 871,504 cases of unemployment benefit were processed in April 2013, which was an increase of 4.2 per cent over April 2012. The total number of beneficiaries at the end of the month was 2,901,912, a reduction of 0.7 per cent on the same month of the previous year. The unemployment protection system achieved coverage of 61.28 per cent, whereas the same indicator stood at 65.45 per cent in April 2012, which was a fall of 6.4 per cent. Total expenditure in April 2013 had been €2,556 million, which was 2.5 per cent less than in the same period the previous year.

In addition, before the Committee a Government representative said that the Government was jointly responsible for policies implemented by the European Union. In late 2011, the Government had found itself faced with an international crisis aggravated by the structural characteristics of the labour market and the national economy. The first measure taken was to begin labour reforms, with the aim of building flexible industrial relations to mitigate job losses and introducing new measures to promote the recruitment of people who had difficulties accessing the job market. The reform had three main components: remote sustained economic recovery and generate employment: fiscal consolidation; the achievement of deficit goals; and the restructuring of the financial system. As a result, the labour market and enterprises had become more flexible. In addition, the Government was according special importance to active employment policies that were managed in collaboration with the Autonomous Communities. The Government was committed to laying the foundations for a solid economic recovery that would enable Spain to get back on the road to creating stable, quality employment. That was the country’s key target and the main objective of the reform agenda. In conclusion, he said that the policies adopted would allow for sustained economic growth and employment generation, especially for young people, who were the Government’s main concern.

The Worker members recalled the relevance of the Convention in the context of the crisis currently faced by Europe, where to cope with the situation many countries were pursuing policies of austerity, revising their labour legislation to make their labour markets more flexible or drastically reducing public expenditure so as to obtain financial assistance from the “Troika” – the European Central Bank (ECB), the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the European Commission. In the present case, the Committee was called upon to examine how Spain was reacting to the crisis in the light of ILO standards, and notably Convention No. 122. It highlighted the dilemma that existed between the cost of activation and the demand entered into vis-à-vis the ILO standards that they had ratiﬁed and the mechanisms that were in force in the European Union. In its report on its application of the Convention, the Government referred to the European Employment Strategy. Although the European Commission did not appear to take fundamental labour rights into account in its instructions to Eurozone countries, the ILO had nevertheless succeeded, in its contacts with the ministers of labour of the 28 countries, in gaining acceptance for the Global Jobs Pact and for the Decent Work Agenda as tools that could help countries overcome the crisis and create jobs. In analysing the case before the Committee, the conclusions adopted at the Regional Conference in Oslo, which had brought together European governments and the social partners, should be duly taken into account.

The Worker members criticized some of the measures taken by the Government to introduce more ﬂexibility into the labour market and thus create a favourable climate for job creation, as they were not an adequate response to the crisis. They referred specifically to the adoption of a new type of contract comprising a one-year trial period during which the contract could be broken without payment of any compensation, the extension of grounds for dismissal, the suppression of administrative authorization for collective dismissals, the priority given to enterprise agreements over sectoral agreements and the greater facilities accorded to employers to modify employment contracts unilaterally. Those measures were accompanied by significant cutbacks in public expenditure, which had an impact on wages, social beneﬁts and, in some sectors, employment. The trade union federations had denounced the absence of social dialogue and non-compliance with the agreements reached in the context of the Second Agreement on Employment and Collective Bargaining concluded in January 2012. All of those measures had been counter-productive in economic terms, as they had deepened the recession and increased the public deﬁcit. In the ﬁrst quarter of 2013, unemployment had risen to 27.1 per cent (compared with 26 per cent in the third quarter of 2012), while, among young people, it had reached 57.2 per cent and, among migrant workers, 39.1 per cent. Also in the ﬁrst quarter of 2013, the share of temporary employment was 22 per cent (in 90 per cent of the cases concerned, that type of employment was by choice) and the number of people with no income from employment was 1.5 million, 800,000 more than in the ﬁrst quarter of 2007. The figures showed that the steps taken had not resulted in the creation of productive and lasting employment and, consequently, did not meet the requirements of Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. The Worker members also doubted the effectiveness of the measures adopted to combat precarious employment and unemployment and in relation to other aims of the Convention. They concluded by recalling that unemployment among young people affected a large number of highly skilled workers. It was therefore essential that the Government submit a report in 2013 on the application of the Human Resource Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142), with information on the steps taken in collaboration with the social partners to ensure that the vocational guidance system corresponded to the skills requirements of the most vulnerable workers and of the regions that had been hit hardest by the crisis.

The Employer members emphasized that Spain was the country that had ratified the largest number of Conventions, which showed how ready and able it was to collaborate with the ILO. The Committee had twice analysed the situation in Spain as it related to the Convention which, as a governance Convention, was inter-related with many other instruments that aimed at ensuring that active employment policies were consistent with the full exercise of economic and social rights. Moreover, the situation in Spain was being analysed by various ILO supervisory mechanisms: a complaint before the Committee on Freedom of Association, a representation concerning non-compliance with the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No.158), and the discussion in the Conference Committee. The situation should be examined from a single perspective. In the opinion of the Employer members, the Government had provided a clear explanation of the active employment policies which it was obliged to implement under the Convention. It should be emphasized that the Convention had been adopted at a time of economic growth with no consideration of times of crisis. However, the comments of the supervisory bodies, and notably the General Survey, had taken the situation into account and indicated that exceptions to social dialogue and collective bargaining were acceptable in times of grave economic crisis. In addition to active employment policies, monetary and fiscal measures had to be adopted to generate employment and the necessary climate of confidence for investment. Moreover, the Convention had been adopted at a time when the taking of decisions was the prerogative of each State, whereas today the world was divided into blocs. Spain was part of the European Union, and therefore the measures it took had to conform to its obligations vis-à-vis the Union. They concluded that, from the information supplied by the Government, Spain’s implementation of the provisions of Article 3 of the Convention was satisfactory.

A Worker member of Spain emphasized that the country was going through one of the worst situations since the establishment of democracy, a situation that the trade unions had described as a “national emergency”. In addition to the dramatic data, what was surprising was the Government’s attitude of insisting on the same policies that had brought about this social disaster. Far from resolving the crisis, austerity policies and cuts had made it worse. Although the Government was stating that labour reform provided a framework that was conducive to the creation and maintenance of jobs, the data showed that the reform, in one year of operation, had caused job losses and increased precariousness. In bailing out the financial institutions, the Government was using the same policies that were much better employed for protecting the people who had been impoverished by its social and economic policy. Nor were the prospects very optimistic since the OECD was expecting the unemployment rate to rise to 28 per cent in 2014. Moreover, the latest reforms had been accompanied by a disregard for democratic procedures. Neither in the labour reform nor in other economic measures adopted with a major impact on employment had the Government left the trade unions space for negotiation, breaking with a rich tradition of social dialogue which had made Spain a model of dialogue. The Convention imposed on States the legal obligation to pursue an active policy designed to promote full employment, to consult the social partners and to periodically review and evaluate the effectiveness of the measures taken. None of those obligations had been met. The Worker member for the Government was to reduce the deficit, ignoring the ILO’s recommendations. Workers regretted that the Government had not asked the Office for technical assistance. It was to be hoped that it would not take another year for measures to be adopted.

Another Worker member of Spain said that, according to a survey, 27.16 per cent of the active population, and over 57 per cent of workers under 25 years of age, were currently unemployed. That was the net result of the first year of labour reform imposed by the Government in 2012 without any negotiation or consultation with the social partners. The reform had two objectives: first, to facilitate the dismissal of workers and reduce labour costs and, second, to undermine collective bargaining and the bargaining process. Government economic policy had been to cause a further increase in unemployment and to accentuate the impact of the recession, since both factors tended to reduce domestic demand. Austerity policies and structural reform were simply a means of taking away people’s rights and social benefits and had failed to help the most indebted countries to reduce their deficits to any significant degree. On the contrary, they had generated a profound political crisis in the European Union that was developing into a crisis of legitimacy of its institutions, since governments were being obliged to take decisions through undemocratic procedures on vital issues that were not within the purview of the Union. That was what the 2012 labour reform had done in Spain, when by legislative decree the Government had allowed for employers to amend a collective agreement unilaterally which had been negotiated with its social partners. The ILO’s Conventions were no longer being respected and the policies pursued were destroying jobs. Employment could only grow and jobs be created, especially for young people, by means of investment, the financing of enterprises and families, and the stimulation of demand. The workers wanted democratic policies and institutions to which everyone contributed, in order to enhance the well-being of the immense majority who needed economic growth, employment, equality, social justice and the redistribution of wealth.

The Employer member of Spain emphasized that companies and business organizations had been demanding reform of the labour legislation long before the economic crisis had hit. Spanish companies had already been experiencing lower levels of productivity and competitiveness than neighbouring countries, in particular owing to the very rigid labour legislation, as demonstrated in the recruitment and dismissal system, and to an inflexible collective bargaining regime. Alongside the enormous problem of unemployment, hundreds of thousands of businesses had closed and disappeared. Although social dialogue was the best way to achieve agreement between all relevant parties, it was not always essential and was not necessarily the only solution. She made reference to the Agreement on Employment and Collective Bargaining that had been signed by entrepreneurs and trade unions in January 2012, and the approval shortly afterwards of labour market reform measures that had failed to take the Agreement into consideration. Since the democratically elected Government was always ultimately responsible for the country’s economic policy, it was understandable that, given the circumstances, the Government was forced to treat labour market reform measures as an urgent matter. In order to ensure positive results, the Government should go hand in hand with additional measures in the area of employment and other structural reforms that would, inter alia, facilitate the balancing of public accounts and improve the business environment. In the years prior to the crisis, the budget to fund active employment policies had been increased, but the desired results had not been achieved, and business organizations had constantly demanded a rigorous and effective effectiveness. She added that a process of dialogue on vocational training for employment was under way and emphasized that it was one of the basic pillars for the competitiveness of businesses, for maintaining and creating jobs and for the employability of workers. Given the short time that had passed since the introduction of the measures that had been adopted, the results could not yet be evaluated as regarded a consolidated positive tendency. Nonetheless, encouraging signs were beginning to show. While even business organizations had indicated that it was necessary to continue moving forward through dialogue and consultation, that was not an attempt to diminish the Government’s political legitimacy to fully exercise its powers. No Government should be limited, or politically conditioned, by social dialogue. There was no doubt that social dialogue processes and the main stakeholders needed to adapt to the new requirements imposed by the realities of the ongoing crisis. The important role played by social dialogue during the decades in which numerous rights had been granted should mean that there was a greater requirement for responsibility when joining efforts to overcome difficulties.

The Worker member of Germany, also speaking on behalf of the Worker member of France, expressed great concern at the reforms pursued by the Government under the aegis of the European austerity policy, considering that these reforms in particular, and the European austerity policy in general, constituted a serious attack on social Europe. With reference to Article 1 of the Convention, which provided that each Member shall declare and pursue an active policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, he emphasized that in Spain employment was not being promoted, but rather destroyed. The rise in unemployment, particularly youth unemployment, had led to a substantial weakening of workers and unions, and was being used to implement a radical restructuring of European labour market institutions at the national level, a development that he firmly condemned. The tough cost-saving policy intended to overcome the crisis had plunged Europe back into recession in 2012. The austerity policy pursued in Spain had entailed far-reaching changes in collective bargaining, as ever more radical neoliberal labour market reforms had been calling into question sectoral and national collective agreements. For example, Decree No. 3/2012 established that collective agreements at the enterprise level took precedence over sectoral collective agreements. He expressed concerns about the fact that the Decree weakened sectoral collective agreements, and thereby trade unions. In Spain, the high unemployment rates and Government-enforced pay cuts had resulted in a decline in consumption. The consequences of the reforms in Spain and the European austerity policy had had devastating consequences in Spain and other countries, including Germany and France. He emphasized that the crisis could only be overcome by negotiated solutions, not through the State, but rather through social dialogue and the increased involvement of trade unions. Growth could only be created by strengthening social cohesion.

The Government member of France, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Cyprus, Germany, Greece, Italy and Portugal, stated that these Governments had embarked upon a joint coordinated effort to combat unemployment, especially among the young, and wished to express their solidarity with the Government of Spain in all it was doing to that end. He drew the Committee’s attention to the exceptional situation of Spain and to the determination of the Governments to combat the effects of the crisis. He reaffirmed the attachment of the Governments to social dialogue and to active policies for productive and freely chosen employment and was confident that the Government of Spain would pursue its efforts in keeping with the values and principles of the ILO.

An observer representing the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) said that, on the basis of data provided by the Government, 1,800,000 jobs had been destroyed in just two years. On the one hand, the Government had indicated to the ILO that it was expecting the GDP to rise by 4.5 per cent and unemployment to fall by 3.2 per cent. However, the Government’s own data, supplied by the Council of Ministers, predicted a 25.9 per cent unemployment rate by the end of 2015. This meant that, even in the best case scenario, the Government’s policies presumed that Spain would have around 6 million unemployed workers within the next 30 months. He believed that the employment measures, specifically the product of its obsession with budgetary consolidation, while completely overlooking the most elementary principles of social justice, and that its labour reform would go down in history as the labour relations measure that destroyed the largest number of jobs. He compared the situation of the hundreds of thousands of young people who had already emigrated or would soon have to do so with that of those who had done so in the post-war era.

Another observer representing the ITUC said that many States, and in particular international credit agencies, insisted on saying that reforms were necessary to return to the path of growth and employment creation. However, the experience of Latin American countries indicated precisely the opposite: adjustment policies magnified cyclical effects, deepened the recession and hampered any recovery in employment. The similarity between what was currently being imposed on countries such as Spain and what had been implemented in Latin America was alarming. Spain’s labour reforms showed utter disregard for democratic mechanisms and broke with the commitments that had established close ties of communication and social dialogue. He recalled that the Committee would soon discuss the case of progress of Iceland, where the financial sector had not been the primary recipient of rescue packages. Lastly, he considered that what was being witnessed was the exhaustion of the credibility of the adjustment discourse, and that workers were no longer willing to continue paying the price for a speculative feast divorced from the real economy.

The Worker member of Brazil considered that what was happening in Spain constituted a significant step backwards in both political and social terms. There had been a huge decrease in the number of jobs and the unemployment rate had reached record levels, principally affecting young people and immigrants. While the Convention was general in nature, there could be no doubt about the meaning of its provisions. The policies of member States needed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment. Moreover, the social partners had to be involved in developing and implementing such policies. Workers had not been responsible for causing the crisis, but they were the first to suffer, and even the reforms were carried out by international credit agencies, and the entrepreneurs were reaping the benefits. The question arose as to whether fiscal austerity and greater flexibility of rights had ever lifted a country out of crisis; on the contrary, such policies were leading to a greater concentration of wealth. He questioned the Government’s position, stressing that the worker’s interests should also be taken into account. He considered that only counter-cyclical policies could mitigate the social effects of the crisis and create the space in which to overcome it, giving the example of the policies in Brazil under the Lula administration. He maintained that Spanish trade union federations should be an integral part of the search for solutions, and should not be excluded from the negotiations on reforms and employment policies.

The Worker member of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela referred to very considerable loss of purchasing power, which had been a result of reductions in wages and the increase in the cost of living. Labour reforms had used the situation of austerity as an excuse to reduce severance pay, make dismissals and unilateral amendments to working conditions by the enterprise even easier, and distort collective bargaining by allowing for the non-application of collective agreements. Income from capital had, for the first time, exceeded that from labour. She expressed concern at the situation in Spain, which amounted to a violation of the Convention, particularly as regards the participation of employers’ and workers’ representatives in formulating employment promotion policies. Labour reforms had transformed labour into a commodity, involving both reducing unemployment and working conditions with little reason or need, and quick low-cost dismissal procedures. She requested the adoption of the measures requested by the Worker members.

The Government representative welcomed all the comments made, especially the words of support from the Government member of France on behalf of a large number of European Union Member States. He reiterated his Government’s stance in defence of its reforms, which were essential to return to employment generation. He particularly emphasized the effectiveness of the labour reform which had been adopted by Royal Decree, in view of its urgency, and later ratified by Act of Parliament. Encouraging the internal flexibility of enterprises would help to generate employment. The structural problems that had characterized the Spanish economy in the past, such as an unemployment rate far exceeding the European average at a time of economic growth, were unemployment. Structural unemployment was the product of an inflexible labour market. The labour reform would push the GDP growth threshold down to 0.7 per cent to generate employment. He recalled that, although huge amounts had been allocated to employment policies in the previous decade, unemployment had not only not stabilized but had actually increased, as there had been no incentive for those policies to be effective. He believed that the way ahead lay in introducing rationalization criteria and evaluating the results. He added that it was important to pursue the reforms as the only way to generate stable and sustained employment. The reform process should be underpinned by social dialogue, a key tool for achieving the objective. He referred to the initiatives in 2013, such as the signing of an agreement resulting in the Youth Employment and Entrepreneurship Strategy and the establishment of a round table for a new agreement on vocational training for employment. Recalling that participation by the social partners in employment policy-making bodies was institutionalized, he reiterated the commitment of Spain, which had ratified more Conventions than any other country, to the ILO supervisory mechanisms for international labour standards.

The Employer members had noted the information provided by the Government and of the ensuing debate. They felt that the obligation imposed by the Convention should be understood as corresponding to the level of economic development of each State and of the relationship between its employment goals and the other economic and social objectives. They believed that the content of a Government’s active employment policies depended on the specific characteristics of each State. They therefore considered that it was not for the Committee to decide on the content and implementation of those policies. According to the Convention, consultations on those policies should be conducted with the social partners so as to benefit from their experience and views and to reach agreement on policy changes. Recognizing that broad consultation on active employment policies was normal, they considered that, when faced with the serious and insurmountable problem of having to save jobs, wages, and investment, as was the case in Spain, it was acceptable to adopt exceptional measures, within the context of social dialogue and existing domestic legislation. They agreed with the requests made by the Committee of Experts for information from the Government.

The Worker members emphasized that the ILO could not turn a blind eye to the dramatic situation affecting Spanish workers and threatening European workers in general. Waiting another year or two to act would merely aggravate matters. In the context of the Convention, examining data on unemployment fell well within the competence of the ILO supervisory bodies. The Committee of Experts should also assess the impact of macro-economic policies in order to judge whether they met the requirements of the Convention, and particularly Article 1(3). In that regard, they urged the Government to provide relevant and up-to-date information in light of the aims of the Convention so that its employment policy could be examined, taking into account the application of its economic and budgetary policies. Furthermore, the Government, in conjunction with the social partners, should evaluate the results of its employment policy and amendments already made to labour market legislation and seek the widest possible consensus with the social partners to prepare an ambitious employment plan. Depleting the total breakdown in social dialogue, they also urged the Government to re-establish constructive dialogue with the social partners, in accordance with Article 3 of the Convention, and proposed a high-level technical mission to assist in implementing these requests.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the detailed written and oral information provided by the Government representative and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted that the issues concerned the deterioration of the labour market situation in the context of the adjustment measures implemented to deal with the debt crisis in the Eurozone, the difficulties with respect to social dialogue, the increasing youth unemployment and long-term unemployment and the need to ensure that educational policies met employment needs and the needs of the workers affected by the crisis.

The Committee noted the comprehensive information provided by the Government on the active labour market measures it was implementing on the economic and employment strategy adopted in the context of the European Union to tackle unemployment and the social consequences of the crisis. The Government stressed its commitment to social dialogue in order to overcome the crisis. The 2012 labour reform provided for internal flexibility measures to enable enterprises to adapt to the current economic circumstances. The new strategy also included specific measures to reduce the youth unemployment rate, strengthen public employment services and the intervention of private placement agencies, and further coordinate between the national and regional authorities to attain a better balance in the labour market.

The Committee noted that the Preamble of the Convention stated that, under the terms of the Declaration of Philadelphia, it was the responsibility of the International Labour Organization to examine and consider the bearing of economic and financial policies upon employment policy in the light of the fundamental objective that “all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue economic and social security and equal opportunity”.

The Committee considered that the outcome of the Ninth ILO European Regional Meeting was relevant to this case. It noted that the Oslo Declaration “Restoring confidence in jobs and growth” stated in particular that fiscal consolidation, structural reform and competitiveness, on the one hand, and stimulus packages, investment in the real economy, quality jobs, increased credit for enterprises, on the other, should not be competing paradigms.

The Committee expressed its concern at the persistent deterioration of the labour market and urged the Government to continue evaluating, with the participation of the social partners, the impact of the employment measures adopted to overcome the current job crisis. The Committee requested the Government to pursue, as a major goal, an active policy designed to generate sustainable employment opportunities, particularly for youth and other categories of workers affected by the crisis. The Committee requested the Government to increase its efforts to strengthen social dialogue with a view to maintaining a favourable climate for employment creation and achieving better results in the labour market. The Committee noted that the Office could contribute, through technical assistance, to promoting a sincere and constructive social dialogue among all the parties concerned to address the labour market situation in the context of Convention No. 122.

The Committee requested the Government to provide a report for the next meeting of the Committee of Experts with updated information regarding the application of the Convention.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138)

KENYA (ratification: 1979)

A Government representative recalled that when the present case had first been considered by the Committee in 2006, the only concern had been the delay in enacting the draft labour legislation. The Employer, Worker and Government members had acknowledged that the draft texts developed during the labour law reform in 2004 would adequately address the concerns raised by the Committee of Experts under Articles 2(1) and 7(1) of the Convention. The labour law reform had been completed in 2007 with the enactment of five texts, which aligned Kenyan labour legislation with international labour standards. The new laws, which had been developed through a tripartite consultative and participatory process, ensured that the principles of the Convention were well articulated in the Employment Act, Chapter VII of which was devoted to the prohibition of child employment, the extension of the minimum age to all types of work, including industrial work, the regulation of light work and the prohibition of the worst forms of child labour. Between 2007 and 2009, subsidiary rules and regulations derived from the main legislation had been developed through a tripartite process. They included a list of hazardous work, rules prescribing light work in which children between 13 and 16 years could be employed and the terms and conditions of that employment. Those texts had been forwarded to the Attorney-General for alignment with other laws before publication. The principles and requirements of the Convention were therefore fully provided for in national law.

Since 2007, other legislative, administrative, institutional and constitutional measures had been taken to ensure the protection of children against child labour. The new Constitution, promulgated in 2010, established specific rights for children, youth, persons with disabilities, marginalized groups and older members of society. Under article 53(l)(b) of the Constitution, every child had the right to free and compulsory basic education, while article 43(l) set out the right to education. In accordance with the Constitution, section 7(2) of the Children’s Act set out the right of every child to free basic education, which was compulsory. In 2010–11, the draft National Child Labour Policy had been implemented through the National Steering Committee, district child labour committees (now known as county child labour committees) and locational child labour committees, with child labour programmes and activities being carried out under the supervision of the Child Labour Division. The National Child Labour Policy was now before Cabinet for approval. The same period had seen the development and adoption of the Integrated National Social Protection Policy, under which priority was given to the social protection of orphans and vulnerable children, and the Employment Policy, under which measures were fast-tracked for the creation of employment and the promotion of the participation of women and youth to assist in combating child labour. The Basic Education Act 2013, guaranteed the right of every child to compulsory education and penalized parents who failed to ensure the school attendance of their children. The Ministry of Labour had now for the first time been allocated a budget for child labour activities, both centrally and throughout the country. Child labour had been identified as one of the priorities of the Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) 2012–15, and was covered by the Medium-Term Plan (2013–17) and the Strategic Plan.

With regard to the specific issues raised by the Committee of Experts, she stated that Kenya had continued its efforts to improve the child labour situation through legislative and constitutional reforms, technical assistance and relevant projects and programmes. These were assisted by continued support from ILO–IPEC, and more recent programmes, including the Strengthening of the National Action Plan (SNAP), Tackling Child Labour Through Education (TACKLE) and Youth Entrepreneurship Facility (YEF). It was the Government’s responsibility to provide free education to all Kenyan children and the Basic Education Act guaranteed free day secondary schooling, free primary education and free early childhood development and education. The rapid assessment survey of child labour in salt mines in Coast Province, conducted by the ILO–IPEC TACKLE programme, had found that child labour had been prevalent prior to 2006, but that children no longer worked in the salt mines. The Ministry of Labour had strengthened labour inspection to capture any child labour activities, not just in Magarini, but nationally. The Government recognized the need, identified in the rapid assessment survey, to carry out a national child labour survey; the intention was to conduct a comprehensive labour force survey with a module on child labour, although it would only be carried out once funds were available. With regard to the age of completion of compulsory schooling, under the Basic Education Act 2013, the education system included eight years of primary education, four years of secondary education and four years of university. Under section 33 of the Act, no child could be denied basic education for lack of proof of age, and discrimination against children seeking admission on any ground including age and the employment of children of compulsory school age against their will was prohibited. The Basic Education Act therefore sought to capture the requirements of the Convention and the concerns of the Government that all children, including those who commenced school after the required age or dropped in and out of school, were able to gain access to free and compulsory education, as guaranteed by the Constitution, and were at the same time protected against child labour. The efforts made emphasized the Government’s recognition that compulsory education was one of the most effective means of combating and preventing child labour.

With reference to the determination of hazardous types of work, she indicated that the first list of hazardous work had been finalized in consultation with the social partners in 2008 and forwarded to the Office of the Attorney-General. Soon after the ratification of the new Constitution had resulted in a priority legislative agenda and the requirement for all laws and subsidiary legislation to be aligned with the Constitution. The process of the alignment of labour laws with the Constitution was under way, and it would subsequently be necessary to align the subsidiary regulations. A copy of the list of hazardous work, once adopted, would be forwarded to the ILO. She added that once the regulations to the Employment Act had been adopted, in accordance with the process outlined above, the concerns raised in relation to the admission to hazardous work from the age of 16 and the determination of light work would be addressed. A consultation process was being carried out on the question of granting permits for artistic performances by children, which would also be covered by regulations. In addition, the Government acknowledged the need for an amendment to address the conflicting age provision of the term “minor” in section 8 of the Industrial Training (Amendment) Act 2011. She reaffirmed the commitment and support of her Government for the application of the standards system to ensure the promotion and achievement of social justice. Within the priorities schedule provided for under the national Constitution, the Government undertook to fully align labour laws and subsidiary regulations with the requirements of the Convention and would provide the necessary texts to the Office. In view of the above, she called her Government for further consideration of the present case by the Committee of Experts to be discontinued.

The Employer members stated that the case concerned a fundamental Convention, ratified long ago (1979), that had been the subject of numerous comments. Whenever the minimum age for admission to employment should not be lower than the age of compulsory schooling (14 years) and the minimum age for admission to employment (16 years). The Government planned to remedy the situation by waiving tuition fees for the first two years of secondary school and proposing to extend the age of compulsory school to an age higher than the minimum age for admission to employment (18 years), but neither of those measures had been adopted, despite the fact that the Convention specified that the minimum age for admission to employment should not be lower than the age of compulsory schooling. Moreover, the Government had not yet definitively established the list of types of hazardous work prohibited for children under 18 years, or the regulations concerning the hours of work and establishments in which children aged at least 16 years could work, including certain types of hazardous work. The light work covered by Article 7 of the Convention had also yet to be determined. Recalling that the Convention was a fundamental one, they urged the Government to bring its legislation into line with the Convention and to request ILO technical assistance if necessary.

The Worker members noted that, once again, the Committee of Experts had found that several provisions of the Convention were not being respected. Firstly, there was a notable lack of reliable data on the number of children enrolled in school, those in a situation of child labour or children who combined school and work. The data that were available were confusing and at times, even contradictory. A 2008 report had put the number of children in work at 296,000, whereas the 2009 census had shown that nearly 4 million children of school age were not attending school. The net enrolment rates in 2005, 2007 and 96 per cent in 2011, while at the same time other statistics indicated that about 20 per cent of all primary school children did not complete primary school. According to UNESCO data for 2011, among children aged between 5 and 14 years, three out of four attended school, and a third of them were working. While those figures appeared contradictory, they were explained by the fact that one child out of every three combined school and work. Furthermore, university research revealed that 45 per cent of children combined school and work in 2010. In addition, the Government had not yet definitely established the list of occupations in which children aged at least 16 years could be employed and the establishments in which children aged at least 16 years could work, including certain types of hazardous work. The light work covered by Article 7 of the Convention had also yet to be determined. Recalling that the Convention was a fundamental one, they urged the Government to bring its legislation into line with the Convention and to request ILO technical assistance if necessary.
ment, which was 16 years. However, seven years later the Government was still making the same promise. Although a list of hazardous work for children under 18 years of age, covering 18 types of hazardous employment, had been determined in 2008 by the Government, the Central Organization of Trade Unions and the Federation of Kenya Employers, it was unable to convince the Government to now advance the excuse that the list was currently being reviewed. Even though the Government had informed the Committee in 2006 that the Minister responsible for the Children’s Act had issued regulations respecting the hours of work and establishments in which children under the age of 16 years could work, including hazardous types of work, it was once again indicating that the relevant regulations were being reviewed and that a copy would be supplied once they had been adopted. Similarly, despite the promise made in 2006 to issue rules and regulations on light work and hours of work for children under 13 years of age, the Government had now indicated that those rules and regulations were yet to be completed and that the texts on light work in which a child of 13 years and above could be employed were still in the Office of the Attorney-General pending adoption. With regard to measures requiring permits to be issued for children participating in cultural and artistic activities, the Government had once again made its usual statement that the matter had been taken up with the relevant ministries and that the Office would soon be informed of the outcome of the discussions. He therefore called for the Government to be asked to supply full particulars in response to all the points raised by the Committee of Experts. He regretted the Government’s continued inactivity. If the issues were not addressed urgently and decisively, the future of the country could be compromised irreparably through the destruction of future generations. The Government should establish clear short-term deadlines and a roadmap for addressing all the concerns now and in the years to come. Technical assistance would be useful and the Government, in conjunction with the social partners, should also explore the feasibility of opening village polytechnics for primary school pupils who did not go on to secondary school, with the provision of soft loans to help them remain in school until the age of 16, which would also help to address youth employment. These were the issues that the newly elected Government had undertaken to deliver as flagship promises. He therefore called for practical steps to be taken for the elimination of child labour in collaboration with the social partners, instead of the protestations as an end in itself.

The Employer member of Kenya observed that since the ratification of the Convention in 1979 many efforts had been made to eliminate child labour, especially in the institutional context, and that the Committee of Experts had noted certain progress. The Government had taken initiatives and there had been a net increase in the number of children attending primary education. However, 20 per cent of all children failed to complete primary education. The Government needed to address that problem rapidly, particularly since access to free and compulsory education was now a constitutional right. The efforts made had been slowed down by the reform process, but she urged the Government to expedite its action on the issue. There had been inordinate delays in addressing the problems identified by the Committee of Experts, including the gap between the legal provisions set out in the Education Act and the reality of compulsory schooling at 14 years and the minimum age for admission to employment at 16 years. She agreed that the minimum age of completion of compulsory schooling should not be lower than the age at which young persons were allowed to start working. She also called on the Government to rapidly complete the process of the adoption of the list of hazardous types of work prohibited for young workers, on which tripartite agreement had been reached, and concerning which the delay was unwarranted. The same applied to the list of light work allowed for young workers, as well as the regulations under the Education Act, which had already been prepared in 2005, according to the Government. The Ministry of Labour should urge those responsible to act quickly when the matter was raised for the Committee of Experts, and concern itself with the issuing of permits for children wishing to participate in artistic performances, establishing their hours and conditions of work. She called on the Government to request ILO technical assistance where necessary and indicated that Kenyan employers were willing to work with the Government to address the issue conclusively.

The Worker member of Swaziland stated that over 30 years after the ratification of the Convention, the Government had failed to address the issue adequately, resulting in the worsening and growing incidence of child labour. It was particularly disturbing that since 2005 the only response by the Government to the calls made by the Committee of Experts had been limited to promises, while children continue to be abused and exploited. Although the policy measures adopted seemed impressive, putting them into practice had proved to be a challenge. Serious gaps in implementation remained, which required rapid responses if any meaningful results and changes were to be seen in the near future. There was even a temptation to question the political willingness of the Government to enforce the legal framework. Recalling that the Government had ratified the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), he emphasized the need for the collaboration and engagement of all the social partners for the achievement of the total eradication of child labour in the country. Although the trade unions had repeatedly identified and fought child labour practices, the active and effective participation of the trade unions had largely been excluded from Government responses. The spirit of social dialogue ensured collective responsibility and ownership, not only in policy formulation, but also implementation and enforcement. The Government’s past efforts had failed and there was therefore a need for a new approach to deal with the problem. Each day that passed without clear action to combat the challenge not only diluted the Government’s efforts, but had a residual effect for the future. The social impact of child labour had not only worsened the present fiscal situation, but also the country’s capacity for economic transformation in future. He therefore called for technical support to be provided to the Government within a tripartite framework as a means of finding a lasting solution to the current challenge.

The Government member of Uzbekistan stated that the Government had completed the labour law reform process in 2007 and that five texts had been adopted aligning the labour legislation with international labour standards. The Employment Act contained a chapter on the prohibition of child labour which extended the minimum age provisions to industrial work, regulated light work and prohibited the worst forms of child labour. The 2010 Constitution set out specific rights for children and other vulnerable groups, including the disabled. Over the period 2010–11, the draft National Child Labour Policy had been applied and had been sent to Cabinet for approval. Initiatives had been taken to combat child labour and an institutional framework had been established under the National Steering Committee on child labour. All these efforts had continued to align laws and regulations with the provisions set out in the new Constitution and reform measures were being adopted to ensure that all children up to the age of 18 would have access to free education. The rapid assessment survey of child labour in the salt mines in Coast Province had shown that children had worked in the mines up to 2006, but that was no longer the case. Improvements had also been made in the labour inspection system to detect cases of child labour and it was planned to include a module on child labour in the labour force survey. All of those actions emphasized the Government’s commitment to take action to eliminate child labour. The Committee should take into account the Government’s resolve to comply with the Convention and should call for further consideration of the case by the Committee of Experts to be discontinued.

The Government member of Zimbabwe expressed appreciation for the efforts made by the Government of Kenya to align the national legislation with the Convention, as well as the inclusion in the new Constitution of issues related to child labour and the employment of young persons. Those were positive developments which would help the Government and the social partners to address any remaining child labour issues.

The Worker member of Nigeria, recalling that child labour was a threat to society, observed that in Kenya many urban and rural children were not in classrooms, but rather working under harsh conditions. In the context of the lack of relevant legislation, the incidence of under-age persons engaged in paid employment continued to rise. In essence, legal and policy gaps and inadequate administrative action, especially enforcement measures, had exacerbated the plight of child workers. The duty to stand up and act for the protection of children, their development and future was a collective one, and it was therefore particularly regrettable to see child prostitution in Nairobi, Kisumu and coastal areas, in the context of increased tourism. Although the Government had ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC) 23 years ago, the Education For All (EFA) objective had not yet been met and a report of a non-governmental organization concerning the application of the CRC showed that 46 per cent of school children (5–14 years) were out of school, largely due to the 65 per cent contribution that parents had to make to school costs. Although the report of the Committee of Experts noted the indication by the ILO–IPEC TACKLE project that net enrolment rates at the primary level had increased from 83.2 per cent in 2005 to 92.5 per cent in 2008, those percentages clouded the urgency of the situation. The Government bore the responsibility to drive effective social dialogue at the national level, and needed to mobilize and engage the other social partners, as well as other segments of civil society in the fight to eliminate child labour. He therefore urged the Government to enact the Children’s Bill and implement the Act effectively, and to address the enforcement of regulations aggressively.

The Government member of Zambia welcomed the efforts made by the Government to address the outstanding issues relating to the minimum age and the right to education. Noting the legislative reforms and the legal framework developed to address those challenges, the Government was wished success with their effective implementation.

The Government representative thanked all those who had contributed to the discussion and who had recognized the efforts made in her country to combat child labour, with particular reference to the comprehensive legislative and constitutional reform measures. The Government was seeking to increase the enrolment and retention of children in primary and secondary school, for which purpose specific legislative measures had been adopted, free primary and secondary education was being provided and initiatives were being taken to combat child labour. The Government also reiterated its recognition of the need for high-quality data on the child labour situation in the country and its commitment to including a child labour module in the labour force survey, subject to the availability of resources. It also reaffirmed that copies of the list of hazardous types of work would be provided to the Office once it had been reviewed and adopted, as would the other subsidiary regulations that were currently being reviewed. The delay in the adoption process had been due to the need to give priority to the constitutional reforms and to the other legislation required to address issues arising from other requirements of the Convention. It would request technical assistance to address the related issues. With regard to artistic performances, the Government would continue the consultation process with a view to achieving an amicable settlement on the issue, which would then be included in the regulations to be adopted in accordance with the procedure under the national Constitution. She reaffirmed the Government’s commitment to combat child labour and to comply with the requirements of the Convention.

The Worker members noted that child labour was a major challenge for development in Kenya, where an estimated 4 million children of school age were not in school, many of whom continued to work despite the hazardous conditions. Some progress had been made in education and literacy and the Government had made an effort to ensure access to free primary schooling; however, a million children were still outside the education system. The county programmes and IPEC had managed to remove a limited number of children from work and prevent others from dropping out of school in order to work. In light of this progress, modest though it was, the question arose as to why the Government had not accompanied this progress by bringing the national legislation into line with the Convention. The Government needed to have a credible plan for the progressive elimination of child labour. For that, it needed to: (i) establish a reliable database on children in school and/or at work; (ii) undertake a detailed analysis of the reasons why so many children worked when they should be enrolled in school; (iii) bring the legislation without delay into line with the provisions of the Convention respecting the minimum age for admission to work, the age of completion of compulsory education and the list of hazardous types of work prohibited for children under 18 years of age; and (iv) take steps to ensure the effective application of the Convention. They urged the Government to specify its intentions as soon as possible and to accept a direct contacts mission on these matters.

The Employer members reiterated that it was now some 30 years since the Convention had been ratified, during which time the Committee of Experts had made numerous comments. The time had come for concrete results in terms of legislation, and surveys should be conducted in order to ascertain the magnitude of the problem in practice. The forthcoming session of this Committee needed to be in a position to examine updated information on specific legislative measures that had been adopted. The Employer members were not opposed to a direct contacts mission, as requested by the Worker members.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the oral information provided by the Government representative and the discussion that followed relating to various issues, including the high number of children who were not attending school and who were involved in child labour, the age of completion of compulsory schooling, and the lack of legislation determining hazardous work, and regulating light work and artistic performances.

The Committee noted the Government’s indication that it was taking several measures to keep children in school and that it was committed to the elimination of child labour in the country. The Committee further took note of the Government’s commitment to implement the Convention through various measures, including the ILO–IPEC project to tackle child labour through education (TACKLE) and the ILO–IPEC project to support the implementation of the National Action Plan (SNAP). The Committee also noted the Government’s indication that it intended to conduct a comprehensive labour force survey with a module on child labour.

The Committee noted that several draft laws referred to by the Committee of Experts in its observations were still due for submission to Parliament for debate and adoption. While noting the various measures taken by the Government to combat child labour, the Committee expressed its deep concern regarding the high number of children who were not attending school and were involved in child labour, including hazardous work, in Kenya. It urged the Government to strengthen its efforts to combat child labour in the country with a view to eliminating it progressively within a defined time frame. Moreover, in light of the contradictory data on the number of children working under the minimum age, the Committee urged the Government to undertake a national child labour survey in the very near future.

Noting that the Education Act, which was adopted in January 2013, extended the compulsory schooling age up to 18 years, which was higher than the minimum age for admission to work (16 years), the Committee recalled that the Convention required member States to set a minimum age for work that was not less than the age of completion of compulsory schooling, and further emphasized the desirability of linking these two ages, as advocated by Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146).

The Committee noted the Government’s indication that it intended to prioritize and expedite the adoption of the necessary legislation to address the existing discrepancies with the provisions of the Convention. It recalled that this Convention had been ratified more than 30 years ago, that this case had been discussed by the Conference at its 95th Session in June 2006, and that the Government had expressed its intention to adopt the necessary legislation on children and child labour in conformity to the provisions of the Convention. The Committee shared the serious concern expressed by several speakers that the review of the draft laws in question, which had been undertaken in consultation with the social partners and with ILO technical assistance, was completed in April 2004, but had yet to be adopted by Parliament. The Committee strongly urged the Government to ensure the adoption, in the very near future, of the necessary provisions to address all the issues of non-compliance with the Convention, including the determination of the types of hazardous work to be prohibited for children under 18 years of age, the regulation of periods of work and establishments where children aged at least 16 years may perform hazardous work, and the regulation of light work activities and of artistic performances.

The Committee requested the Government to accept a direct contact mission to ensure the full and effective application of this fundamental Convention including the adoption of a time-bound action plan in this regard. It requested the Government to include in its report to the Committee of Experts, for examination at its next session in 2013, complete information regarding all issues raised by this Committee and the Committee of Experts. The Committee expressed the hope that it would be able to note tangible progress in the very near future.

A Government representative emphasized that the Republic of Chad fully supported the Convention, which had led to the creation of tripartite bodies, as was the case of the Higher Committee for Labour and Social Security, which dealt with all matters relating to action for the application of labour standards. Reference should also be made to the National Social Dialogue Committee, which had contributed to resolving the social crisis that the country had experienced. Tripartite consultation was therefore not ignored, and the Government hoped that the Committee would take that into account.

The Worker members emphasized that, since 2000, the Committee of Experts had regularly asked the Government to provide the necessary information to enable it to fully assess the effect given to the Convention. In 2013, the Committee of Experts had again noted with regret that the Government had still not met its obligations under the Convention and, in the absence of a report, had had to reiterate its 2006 observation, which referred to a national plan for the implementation of the African Union Plan of Action for the promotion of employment and poverty alleviation. One of the objectives of the national plan was to promote social dialogue and tripartism by giving social dialogue institutions the means to operate and by strengthening the capacities of the social partners through training and information. In October 2009, a very brief report had been provided, merely stating that information on each of the matters covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention was not available. The Government had just submitted a two-page report during the current session of the Conference, providing little more information than the previous one, which dated from 2009. It appeared from the report that there was some confusion regarding the scope of certain provisions of the Convention, in particular Articles 4 and Article 5(1)(a) to (e). The consultations provided for in Article 5 were also intended to help governments when taking decisions on specific issues. What was important was for all the views to be heard, but without the Convention imposing an obligation to reach consensus, however desirable that might be. The Convention was therefore fairly flexible, leaving it to each country to determine the most appropriate form of consultation from among the many options available: advisory committees, economic and social councils, labour councils or tripartite commissions directly inspired by the Convention. The 2006, 2009 and 2013 reports mentioned the existence of a Higher Committee for Labour, Employment and Social Security, which was described as being responsible for the tripartite consultations required under the Convention. The Committee, however, did not require consultations on economic and social policy issues, so the question arose as to why efforts had not been pursued to put appropriate mechanisms in place for tripartite consultations on ILO Conventions. For several years, the Committee of Experts had been referring to the 2008 Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization, which considered social dialogue and the practice of tripartism within and across borders to be more relevant than ever to achieving solutions and to building up social cohesion and the rule of law through, among other means, international labour standards. In the same way as the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), Convention No. 144 was a so-called “governance” Convention, the aim of which was to promote tripartism and social dialogue at the national level.
level by ensuring that employers’ and workers’ organizations were involved in all stages of ILO standard-setting activities. It was difficult to understand the Government’s continued failure to follow up the comments made by the Committee of Experts as anything other than a lack of understanding of the Convention. In conclusion, the Workers’ Committee pointed out that the comments had not been reflected in the conclusions on the case, which should identify means of assisting the Government in that regard.

The Employer members noted that, although the Committee of Experts had continued to request reports on the application of the Convention, there had been no response from the Government. They recalled that Chad was classified as a low-income country. From what the workers said, it was not clear whether social dialogue existed in the country and was not reported, or whether it did not exist. There was also clearly a lack of understanding of the reporting system. With regard to social dialogue, it should be recalled that the 2008 ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization indicated that “social dialogue and the practice of tripartism between governments and the representative organizations of workers and employers within and across borders are now more relevant to achieving solutions and to building up social cohesion and the rule of law through, among other means, international labour standards”. Emphasis should also be placed on the importance of the reporting requirements. It was to be hoped that the reports supplied would enable the Committee to note tangible efforts to strengthen social dialogue with the representatives of employers and workers.

The Worker member of Chad recalled that social dialogue and tripartism were the form of governance that was most conducive to social justice and to equitable and harmonious labour relations, presupposing as they did the right to participate in decision-making. Collective bargaining was therefore at the very heart of social dialogue. However, even though social dialogue did exist in Chad, it did not function according to the principles defined by the ILO, as it did not encompass all the forms of negotiation, consultation and exchange of information on the country’s economic and social policies between the three parties. At best, social dialogue in Chad was sporadic and incapable of getting to the root of problems. Workers’ organizations, and the Trade Union Federation of Chad (UST) in particular, had always called for permanent dialogue to forestall collective and individual disputes before they became too difficult to solve. Harsh reality had shown that there was no such dialogue seen in the 2012 strike that was called to demand the implementation of an agreement signed by the trade unions and the Government. The authorities’ failure to react with regard to the one-month period of notice had led to its extension and to a succession of three-day strikes pending negotiations. The strike had lasted for two months, during which mock negotiations interspersed with threats and anti-union attacks had been the order of the day. As positions had hardened on both sides, the movement had spread, and had paralysed the entire public administration for six months, when dialogue could have avoided both the economic costs and the loss of lives. The Government’s refusal to make any concessions had resulted in the adoption, at a general assembly held on 1 September 2012, of a petition denouncing the poor governance of the country and was not reported, or whether it did not exist. There was also clearly a lack of understanding of the reporting system. With regard to social dialogue, it should be recalled that the 2008 ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization indicated that “social dialogue and the practice of tripartism between governments and the representative organizations of workers and employers within and across borders are now more relevant to achieving solutions and to building up social cohesion and the rule of law through, among other means, international labour standards”. Emphasis should also be placed on the importance of the reporting requirements. It was to be hoped that the reports supplied would enable the Committee to note tangible efforts to strengthen social dialogue with the representatives of employers and workers.

The Worker member of France emphasized that Chad was the fourth least-developed country in the world, with a human development index of 0.340. Effective tripartite social dialogue was essential for the pursuit of the objectives of social justice, the fight against inequality and respect for fundamental principles and rights at work. It required a climate of freedom of expression in a democratic framework which did not exist in practice in Chad. Journalists were intimidated and harassed by the Government, which was prejudicial to their independence. Trade unionists were also exposed to harassment and many were penalized for taking part in strikes. Fearing for their safety, human rights defenders and members of the political opposition had been driven into exile. The “Workers’ tribunal” radio programme presented by a trade unionist to inform workers of their labour rights and obligations had been discontinued. Today the Government was referring to the Higher Committee for Labour and Social Security, set up in 2002, as a forum for discussion. That forum had not applied to the repeated requests of the Committee to supply information on the agreements reached in the Higher Committee. Moreover, even though the functions of that body included the application of the laws and regulations in force, the regulations adopted by the President following a strike for the purpose of substantially adjusting wage and minimum wage levels up to 2014, in line with an agreement with the Union of Trade Unions of Chad (UST) and the Free Confederation of Workers of Chad (CLTT), had never been adopted by the ministries concerned. That confirmed that freedom of expression was non-existent and that the process of conducting balanced tripartite social dialogue was being undermined for lack of political will.
The Worker member of New Zealand, noting the weakness of tripartite consultation in the country, drew attention to more recent breaches of ILO Conventions since the preparation of the report by the Committee of Experts. In December 2013, following a strike in the public sector, three trade union leaders, including Michel Barka, the head of the UST, had been given 18-month suspended jail sentences for “defamation” and “incitement to hatred.” The strike had been called following the unilateral repudiation by the Government of a national minimum wage award. The charges against the union leaders had been condemned by human rights and international union groups. The strike, which had begun in July, had been suspended in September to allow for negotiations. The sentences had been accompanied by fines equivalent to over a whole year’s full wages. The complaints of the workers concerned poverty, the high cost of living and corruption. There had also been a tragic aspect to the events. When being sentenced, one union leader had apparently smiled, for which he had been held in contempt of court and sentenced to three months’ imprisonment, during which he had fallen ill and died. It was clear that compliance with the Convention required respect for the rights of court and sentenced to three months’ imprisonment, and the right to appeal. The Government was bound to respect the Convention and should therefore be encouraged to strengthen its capacity and its interaction with the representatives of employers and workers. It would also be important to improve its compliance with its reporting obligations so that there could be a better understanding of the national situation by the Office. They therefore encouraged the Government to take decisive measures to improve social dialogue and bring the tripartite partners together.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government and the discussion that ensued. The Committee noted that the outstanding issues concerned the operation of consultation mechanisms and the lack of information on the effective tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee noted that the Government’s indication of the establishment of the Higher Committee for Labour and Social Security in April 2003 and the National Committee on Social Dialogue in November 2009, as well as some discussions that took place between the Government and the trade unions. The Committee noted that the Government had not provided the information on the consultations held between representatives of the Government, employers’ and workers’ organizations on the issues provided for in the Convention related to international labour standards. The Committee regretted the absence of reports by the Government since 2009 and stressed the importance of social dialogue and the practice of tripartism between governments and the representative organizations of workers and employers as provided for by this Convention. The Committee invited the Government to take all appropriate measures to ensure effective functioning of the procedures required by this governance Convention. The Committee also invited the Government to seek ILO technical assistance including an exchange of good practices with other member States in order to strengthen social dialogue and to build an effective national mechanism in order to support tripartite consultation required by Convention No. 144.

Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159)

ICELAND (ratification: 1990)

A Government representative gave a brief description of the two main legislative instruments that implemented the Convention, that is the Disabled Persons Act that took effect on 1 January 2011 and aimed to guarantee people with disabilities equality and quality of life comparable to that of other citizens, and Act No. 60/2012 on Employment-Related Vocational Rehabilitation and the Operation of Vocational Rehabilitation Funds, which was adopted on 12 June 2012 with a view to ensuring that individuals with reduced working capacity had access to vocational rehabilitation and that as many people as possible remained active in the labour market. Under section 4 of the Act, all wage-earners and employers or self-employed individuals aged 16–70 were guaranteed the right to vocational rehabilitation through the payment of a premium to a vocational rehabilitation fund. The speaker emphasized the importance of social dialogue and tripartite commitment in the preparation of the Act as its origins went back to the collective agreements of 2008 which included provisions on the development of new rehabilitation arrangements designed to provide remedies for workers who fell ill for long periods or suffered accidents resulting in a reduction of their working capacity. The social partners had also reached an agreement on the imposition of a special premium on employers as from 1 June 2008 to be paid to a special fund operated for this purpose. The fund was established by the social partners on 19 May 2008 to give effect to the provisions of the collective agreement. The Government subsequently announced that legislative provisions would be made for the imposition of a new wage-based fee of 0.13 per cent on employers as well as a corresponding contribution by the pension funds and the State Treasury to allow for an equal three-way division of the costs of the Vocational Rehabilitation Fund (VIRK). This legislation had now been passed and work was under way on the details of the system in practice.

The Worker members referred to the general economic context and, in particular, the results achieved from measures taken to emerge from the crisis. Despite that context, Iceland had an ambitious employment policy for persons with disabilities, with the general aim of guaranteeing satisfaction could be drawn from the fact that all the new legislation that had been adopted on persons with disabilities was based on collective agreements that had been reached between the social partners; that policy was exemplary in that it was the epitome of tripartism.

The Employer members welcomed the possibility to address a case of progress after having examined 25 cases of non-compliance and failure to implement the provisions of ratified Conventions. They joined the Worker members in praising the Government’s steps to recover from the 2008 financial crisis, while maintaining the social dialogue which concluded in a collective agreement providing for the establishment of a vocational rehabilitation fund.

The Worker member of Iceland highlighted that the foundations of VIRK had been laid in a collective agreement reached between the social partners at the national level, which demonstrated that, when it came to matters of national interest to all workers and employers concerning the labour market, the employers’ and workers’ organizations were the best placed to identify and address important problems and opportunities. The Government had seized this opportunity and transformed the results of the collective agreement into law so that the entire labour market, employers and workers would be bound by it and could reap the results. Social dialogue, with collective bargaining at its heart, was a vehicle of progress, and presupposed strong unions and employers’ associations and Governments committed to international labour standards.

The Employer member of Iceland stated that VIRK, which had been founded by the social partners in 2008, was an excellent example of successful social dialogue and that the cooperation between the social partners had been very effective since the beginning of that process.

The Government representative thanked the Committee for highlighting recent developments in Iceland concerning the vocational rehabilitation of persons with disabilities as a case of progress and for praising the Government’s approach to economic recovery. He recalled that when the crisis hit in 2008, in one week, 90 per cent of the banking system had collapsed and, within a year, unemployment had risen from 1 to 10 per cent. The Government, however, managed to take care of disadvantaged persons, while addressing at the same time economic restructuring, which was also a good example of how social dialogue and tripartism could produce positive results. His Government fully supported the ILO supervisory system, including the work of the Committee of Experts and the Office.

The Worker members said that they had appreciated the opportunity to discuss that case in which progress had been made. That experience should be repeated in the future in order to ensure that the Committee not only examined difficult cases, but was also able to report on cases in which positive measures had been taken to improve workers’ and citizens’ lives.

The Employer members stated that they were pleased to conclude the Committee’s discussions with a case of progress, which permitted a somewhat difficult year to end on a very positive note. They hoped that the practice of including cases of progress in the Committee’s list of cases would continue for future sessions of the Conference.

Conclusions

The Committee welcomed the discussion of this case of progress and the exchange that took place on the application by Iceland of Convention No. 159. The Committee praised the Government’s ambitious approach to promote employment opportunities for persons with disabilities. This approach involved the social partners who had established the Vocational Rehabilitation Fund (VIRK) to give effect to the provisions of a collective agreement adopted at the national level in 2008.

The Committee considered this case as an example of good practice. It commended the Government for its comprehensive efforts to improve access to the labour market for persons with disabilities. The Committee invited the Government to continue to report on progress made in the implementation of the Convention.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182)

Senegal (ratification: 2000)

A Government representative recalled the international Conventions ratified by Senegal concerning the protection of children’s rights and also recalled the existing national framework in that regard. Referring to the request of the Committee of Experts regarding the steps taken against begging and the trafficking of persons, she emphasized the adoption by the Council of Ministers on 29 November 2012 of the National Framework Plan for the Prevention and Elimination of Child Labour (PCNPETE), together with an action plan up to 2016 for combating child labour; and the holding of an inter-ministerial council on 8 February 2013, chaired by the Prime Minister, on the ways and means of eradicating the practice of begging. The Steering Committee responsible for the follow-up and implementation of recommendations from the inter-ministerial council had drawn up a National Framework Plan for the Eradication of Begging (PNEMI) 2013–15. The Plan, adopted in April 2013, contained a set of short-term measures involving, inter alia, the following priority areas of action: provision of care for children; the eligibility of children aged between 10 and 18 years old who were under the return of foreign children to their families; and an information campaign for both the public and the authorities.

During his address to the nation on 3 April 2013, the President of the Republic had announced important measures for basic education, including some specifically for pupils in Koranic schools. Regarding the application of Articles 3(a) and 7(1) of the Convention, the Government representative referred to the report of 28 December 2010 submitted to the Human Rights Council further to the mission to Senegal, and indicated that her Government had presented further information at the 16th session of the Human Rights Council in February–March 2011 to clarify the inconsistency noted between the provisions of section 245 of the Penal Code and those of Act No. 2005-06. She reiterated the remarks made by her Government at the 16th session of the Human Rights Council, explaining that section 3 of the aforementioned Act penalized all forms of exploitation of begging undertaken by others, and section 245 of the Penal Code made the distinction between prohibited begging, which was punished, and tolerated begging, namely begging undertaken on days and in places established by religious traditions. Both Acts coincided in condemning persons who allowed begging by young people under their authority. Consequently, her Government considered that there was no ambiguity between the provisions of section 245 of the Penal Code and those of Act No. 2005–06. Furthermore, the Government was contemplating strengthening the child protection system by establishing a children’s code, which was being finalized. Describing the existing legal framework, she stated that the statistics compiled from the prosecution services showed many prosecutions and convictions of perpetrators of trafficking. The Ministry of Justice had addressed Circular No. 4131 in August 2010 to the authorities responsible for prosecution and judgment, requesting them to be rigorous in handling cases relating to the trafficking of persons in general and the economic exploitation of children through begging in particular.

With regard to the application of Article 7(2) of the Convention, the Government representative reported on government initiatives in the context of the implementation of the national action plan adopted in 2011 to eradicate child begging, notably: the identification of 1,129 families likely to entrust their children to Koranic teachers in at-risk regions; the identification of 5,160 children thus entrusted; the identification of 759 daaras (Koranic schools) in 200 villages in Senegal; the establishment of 146 committees for the protection of talibé children; the drawing up and publication of a code of conduct for teachers and managers of daaras; the modernization of 168 daaras; the development of a national curriculum for Koranic teaching, and also of quality standards for Koranic teaching; and the national campaign for the application of a law developed in 2010 by PARRER and the child protection support unit (CAPE). Moreover, the Care, Information and Counselling Centre for Children in Difficulties (the GINNDI centre), under the Ministry of Family Affairs, had a free 24-hour helpline for children under the age of 18. A total of 13,321 calls had been recorded by the helpline in 2011 and 2012. In accordance with the Government’s policy of pursuing the daara programme, the Government representative also highlighted the signature of a framework agreement between the Ministry of Education and the federations of Koranic schools in Senegal. In this agreement, accredited daaras undertook to refrain from any form of begging. Furthermore, in partnership with the Islamic Development Bank for the next four years, a pilot project had been set up to support the modernization of daaras which would make for significant improvements in living and learning conditions in 64 daaras. The Government representative indicated that with the emergence of modern daaras, Senegal was acquiring the means to control and stop the rate of removal and reintegration of street children. Article 3 of Act No. 2005-06 prohibited organizing the begging activities of others with a view to profiting therefrom and recruiting, coercing or misleading another person with a view to forcing them into begging or exerting pressure on them to beg or continue doing so. Those measures were currently suspended owing to pressure from lobby groups that encouraged illegal and dangerous practices to the detriment of society. Those lobby groups exploited vulnerable children and women in conditions that were degrading and morally deprived. The Worker members recalled that the Act penalized the Government for not having delayed the strict application of enforcement measures that were grounded in the existing legal instruments, particularly Act No. 2005–06. The report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornogra phy, submitted to the Human Rights Council on 28 December 2010, noted with concern that more than half of the children who were forced to beg in the Dakar region came from neighbouring countries. If begging was a cultural and educational practice that aimed at the outset to foster humanity and compassion in adults, it had to be acknowledged that the situation of street children was more worrying than ever given that it was on the increase, and becoming particularly widespread throughout the country.

The Worker members also indicated that the measures the Government had taken were not effective and that all the work mentioned in Article 3(3) of the Convention should be prohibited under Article 4(1), by domestic legislation or the competent authority, after consultation with the relevant employers’ and workers’ organizations, taking account of the relevant international standards, particularly Paragraphs 3 and 4 of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Recommendation, 1999 (No. 190). The social partners should be more involved in finding solutions to problems arising, particularly the fact that the Government had delayed the strict application of enforcement measures that were grounded in the existing legal instruments, particularly Act No. 2005-06. foremost, to punish violations of the Convention by using all the means provided for in criminal law. There was a wide disparity between the Act on protecting the rights of the child and effective application thereof in the country. They also emphasized that the key provision of the Convention, Article 8, was unique in stipulating that member States should for appropriate steps, including the establishment and imposition of sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions, for its provisions, including the establishment and imposition of sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions. There were serious doubts that people in Senegal were taken to court for such crimes as well as for trafficking. Given the seriousness of the problem, the coverage of PARRER that was set up in February 2007 to save children from the streets and return them to society was insufficient. What was needed to eradicate poverty was to implement programmes that were wider in scope.

The Employer members declared that the Convention, adopted in 1999 and ratified by Senegal in 2000, was one of the last generation of fundamental Conventions. The marabouts’ practice of using talibé children in Koranic schools to make money, by sending them out to work in the fields or beg in the streets or to engage in other lucrative forms of illegal work was a major cause for concern, as it denied them access to health, education and decent living conditions. ILO—IPEC’s effort to eradicate child labour in Africa was also directed at combating the worst forms of child labour such as these. A few marabouts had been arrested in 2010, but none of them had been convicted. Member States should take all necessary steps to ensure that, both in law and in practice, children under the age for admission to employment, was still being examined and strongly urged the Government to amend its legislation. The Committee had requested the Government to ensure that, both in law and in practice, children under the age of 16 could not be employed in underground mines and quarries, given that order No. 3750/MPTE/DTSS of 6 June 2003, determining the nature of dangerous work that children were prohibited from engaging in, stated that no child could work under the age of 16. The Committee could not accept light jobs in underground mines and quarries. Notwithstanding that section 2 of the Act of 2005, to combat the trafficking of persons and similar practices and to protect victims, forcing children to beg was a criminal offence incurring the maximum penalty, section 245 of the Penal Code unfortunately did not provide for adequate resources. Although under the 2005 Act the trafficking of persons and similar practices and to protect victims, forcing children to beg was a criminal offence incurring the maximum penalty, section 245 of the Penal Code unfortunately did not provide for adequate resources. Although under the 2005 Act the police brigade for minors attached to the Ministry of the Interior and the local and national police were mandated to prevent sexual tourism, but the minors’ brigade only existed in the capital whereas the sexual exploitation of children was particularly prevalent in tourist areas outside Dakar. The labour inspectorate did not have enough transport resources to carry out its inspections, and only rarely were violators of the law sanctioned for a first offence. Consequently, employers were never really dissuaded from employing children. Apart from a few modern daaras, the school curricula of Koranic schools in Senegal, the living conditions and health of the children and the qualifications of the teachers were not subject to any kind of regulation. Although a daara inspectorate had been set up in the Ministry of Labour to implement the daara modernisation programme and to integrate the talibé schools into the State education system, it did not cover all the daaras, which continued to proliferate without any kind of supervision. Finally, it was unfortunate that legal proceedings against forced begging had been initiated only in a few rare instances in recent years and that the marabouts involved had not been convicted. Bernard’s legislation for cautionary measures for children up to the age of 12, while according to the Labour Code, the minimum age for employment was 15. Consequently, because they were not in school and were not legally old enough to work, children aged from 13 to 15 years of age were particularly vulnerable to the worst forms of child labour.

The Worker member of Senegal recalled that the Committee of Experts had expressed its concern at the large number of working children under 15 years of age in Senegal and at their long working hours. The Committee had also noted with regret that the amendment of section L.145 of the Labour Code, which permitted the Ministry of Labour to issue decrees derogating from the minimum age for admission to employment, was still being examined and strongly urged the Government to amend its legislation. The Committee had requested the Government to ensure that, both in law and in practice, children under the age of 16 could not be employed in underground mines and quarries, given that order No. 3750/MPTE/DTSS of 6 June 2003, determining the nature of dangerous work that children were prohibited from engaging in, stated that no child could work under the age of 16. Consequently, because they were not in school and were not legally old enough to work, children aged from 13 to 15 years of age were particularly vulnerable to the worst forms of child labour.

The Worker member of France recalled that the Government had ratified the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), Convention No. 182 of the ILO, the United Nations (UN) 1989 Convention on the Rights of the Child, the UN Protocol on Trafficking, as well as the 1990 African Charter on the Rights of the Child. Yet the Government appeared on the list of double footnoted cases, meaning an obvious failure to apply the ratified Conventions and Charters. The Government bore a heavy responsibility for child victims and the problem was even more worrying that Senegal was not the poorest country on the continent. Talibé children, some of whom were just 5 years old, were part of the urban landscape tourism. Only boys studied in koranic schools under the authority of Koranic teachers or marabouts. In exchange for free education, food and housing these children spent five hours a day begging. Meeting their own needs, enhancing the ability to cope independently contributed to the solidarity of the village community and was not in itself reprehensible and was part of the value of humility that the cultural context wanted to pass on to the children; many parents were attached to these values. However in this case, it was no longer a question of cultural tradition, but of manipulation which would require the Government to clarify the prohibition of begging in public context but a mafia exploitation of children subjected to brutal slavery that could leave almost irreparable consequences. The fact that those responsible could hide behind values of a cultural heritage and continue to allow such horrors was becoming unbearable. The impact on health and the physical and mental integrity of these children was enormous. Child beggars were undernourished for most. Fever, fatigue, abdominal pain, diarrhoea, dermatitis, and periodically malaria were the most frequently reported diseases. The Government must take measures to eradicate such practices, work to provide a controlled education system, ensure an active fight against poverty through allocation programmes that would allow poor families, even those in extreme poverty, not to use their children to meet their own needs. Senegal had national policies and a comprehensive legal framework needed to create a situation free of child begging. The use of these instruments needed to be intensified in order to achieve the desired results.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom stated that talibé children suffered gross exploitation by being forced into begging for the benefit of their marabouts through extreme psychological and physical abuse. Boys who were sent to daara residential schools in urban centres far from home became victim to the most cynical distortion of the religious duty to offer alms. The practice was a long-standing one and twisted and contorted into a false justification for a widespread abuse of the vulnerable. This abuse continued despite legislative provisions which could be invoked to stop it. The 2005 Act to combat the trafficking of persons and similar practices and to protect victims, criminalized forced begging and provided for sentences of fines and imprisonment. This should have been used to tackle the practice, but this legislation was undermined by another legal provision about the collection of religious alms. Those who forced children into begging had used this law as a screen to hide behind. As a result, very few prosecutions had been brought. Figures were unclear, but Anti-Slavery International reported that there had been only two arrests for physical abuse in 2005 and three in 2006. The speaker recalled that an estimated 50,000 talibé children were in this situation in 2004, half child begging, the use of these instruments needed to be intensified in order to achieve the desired results.

The Worker member of Swaziland stated that, as serious violations of human dignity and personal development, forced labour and child labour contributed to the persistence of the cycle of poverty. Child labour could have severe consequences on the education, health and the development of its victims. The harmful effects of child labour prejudiced the opportunities for children, seriously arrested their social and psychological development and eroded their chance to a better future. In Senegal, child begging was a threat. Empirical evidence showed that forced labour, child labour and discrimination were major obstacles to economic development and contributed to the persistence of poverty. In 2004, the ILO–IPEC study had demonstrated that the economic benefits of eliminating child labour would be nearly seven times higher than the costs required for its elimination. The Senegalese authorities had largely failed to enforce the existing regulations prohibiting the engagement of underage persons to work. This failure was responsible in part for the ever growing numbers of street child beggars and their abuses. Only a few isolated cases of extreme violence and abuses perpetrated against talibés had been prosecuted under the Penal Code. Until 2010, no marabout had been arrested, prosecuted or convicted expressly for forcing talibés to beg. In Senegal, it was not a question of the absence of the legislation, but rather of the failure to enforce it. The Government had demonstrated fable political commitment to protect and promote the rights of these children. It was paramount to ensure that there were specific bodies responsible and capable of addressing the issue. The current legislation relating to forced child begging should be brought in full compliance with the Convention and labour inspection would need to be involved. Social partners had a collective duty to end the worst forms of child labour whereas the Government should develop programmes, in consultation with the social partners and civil society organizations, to address the plight of the talibés.

The Government member of Morocco thanked the Government for the rich and exhaustive information on the implementation of the Convention provided by the Government for the rich and exhaustive information on the implementation of the Convention. The Government’s commitment appeared to be ensured by both normative and social policies and by adherence to international instruments relating to child labour. The Government’s action was not limited to the adoption of legislation but also to its implementation and the creation of important social infrastructure which aimed at reducing child begging. However, there could have been a gap between available resources and the social reality, because the practice of talibés concerned many people. Strengthening the programmes put in place by the Office and the contribution by the national non-governmental organizations would support the Government in its efforts to protect a particularly vulnerable category of children and help to meet the expectations of the international community.

The Government representative expressed her Government’s appreciation for the contributions during the discussion of the case and the interventions which had highlighted the efforts of the Government. The question of the rights of children, particularly of those in Koranic schools, was a concern for the highest authorities of the State. While the legal framework provided basic protection against begging by children and trafficking in-
Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182)
Senegal (ratification: 2000)

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the oral information provided by the Government representative and the discussion that followed concerning the persistence of child begging for purely economic ends, as well as the trafficking of children for this purpose.

The Committee noted the Government's statement that continuous begging in the streets of the city was a penal offence under Senegalese law, while asking for alms was tolerated in light of socio-cultural beliefs. The Committee noted the several measures adopted by the Government in the framework of the partnership for the removal and reintegration of street children (PARRER), including advocacy visits to major religious leaders and Koranic masters, measures of prevention and of removal of children from the streets, and the development of broad awareness-raising campaigns. The Committee also noted the Government's indication that it had adopted action plans to combat trafficking and child begging, and that, in the context of the modernization of the daaras system, it had taken a number of measures to train Koranic masters and talibé children on the rights of children and their protection, and to improve the living conditions and education of child talibés in daaras.

While noting the policies and programmes adopted by the Government to address begging by talibé children, the Committee shared the deep concern expressed by several speakers regarding the persistence of the economic exploitation of a large number of children in begging, and at the fact that children continued to be trafficked for this purpose, especially from neighbouring countries. The Committee reminded the Government that, while the issue of seeking alms as an educational tool fell outside the scope of the Committee's mandate, it was clear that the use of children for begging for purely economic ends could not be accepted under the Convention. The Committee emphasized the seriousness of such violations of Convention No. 182. It urged the Government to take immediate and effective measures to eliminate, as a matter of urgency, the use of children in begging for purely economic ends, as well as trafficking of children for this purpose. In this regard, the Committee encouraged the Government to ensure the implementation of the recently validated Framework Plan to combat trafficking, and of the National Plan of Action adopted in February 2013 to eradicate child begging by 2015.

The Committee noted that, although Law No. 2005-06 of 29 April 2005 prohibited the organization of begging for economic gains, the Penal Code appeared to permit the organization of begging by talibé children. Moreover, the Committee expressed its serious concern that Law No. 2005-06 was not applied in practice. In this regard, the Committee deeply regretted that a very low number of marabouts had been prosecuted and given prison sentences, which amounted in practice to a climate of impunity. The Committee therefore strongly urged the Government to take the necessary measures to harmonize the national legislation so as to guarantee that the use of begging by talibé children for economic exploitation was clearly prohibited, and to ensure that this legislation was applied in practice. In this regard, the Committee strongly urged the Government to take immediate and effective measures to strengthen the capacity of the relevant public authorities, in particular the labour inspectorate which would be dedicated to identifying talibé children with a view to removing them from their situation of exploitation. It also urged the Government to strengthen the capacity of law enforcement officials, particularly the police and the judiciary, in order to ensure that the perpetrators were prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions were imposed.

Noting the information highlighted by several speakers that the worst forms of child labour were the result of poverty and underdevelopment in Senegal, the Committee welcomed the decision of the Government to continue to avail
The Government provided the following information.

Having ratified the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), and the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), the Government had consistently been implementing the National Plan of Action in this area. For example, the Labour Code provided the minimum age for employment – 16, in exceptional cases, with the permission of parents or persons replacing them – 15. For workers below 18 years, employers are obliged to provide necessary conditions for a combination of work with study and privileged terms for work and rest, to ensure the observance of the labour safety norms, including prevention from dangerous types of labour. Moreover, on 26 March 2012, the Cabinet of Ministers adopted the decision “About additional measures for the realization in 2012–13 of the Forced Labour Convention and the Convention concerning prohibition and immediate action for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour, ratified by the Republic of Uzbekistan”. In addition, the system of state institutions for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour was created. The Special Commission on Affairs of Minors of the Cabinet of Ministers, headed by the General Public Prosecutor had been functioning, whose competence included deciding practically all questions concerning the elimination of the worst forms of child labour. With the decision of the Cabinet of Ministers on 24 March 2011, the inter-institutional Working Group on the preparation and presentation of the information on the implementation of the ratified ILO Conventions was formed.

With a view to eliminating forced labour and the worst forms of child labour, comprehensive measures were developed, connected with the creation of about 1 million jobs annually, by ensuring the employment of not less than 500,000 graduates of the vocational colleges that were for the first time entering the labour market. On 29 July 2009, the Ministry of Justice registered the new edition of the list of jobs with adverse working conditions, forbidden for workers below 18 years (No. 1990), that was developed by the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection and the Ministry of Health, according to the Labour Code and the decision of the Cabinet of Ministers, No. 207 of 12 September 2008. In addition, with the joint decision of the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection and the Ministry of Health of 21 January 2010, “The regulation about the requirement for elimination of the use of labour of youth” was confirmed, according to which the use of youth labour in the following jobs is prohibited: (a) underground, underwater, at dangerous heights or in closed spaces; (b) with dangerous mechanisms and in unhealthy conditions at which the minor can be exposed to the influence of dangerous substances or the processes harming his or her health; (c) the jobs carried out in especially difficult conditions (work at night, etc.); (d) which by its character can damage the morals of this category of workers; and (e) connected with lifting and moving the weights exceeding the established limits. The State Labour Inspectorate of the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection carried out regular monitoring with respect to compliance with the labour legislation regarding minors.

In 2012, during monitoring by the State Labour Inspectorate, 448 cases of violations of the labour legislation concerning minors were revealed, 432 instructions were given out, 36 officials were charged with administrative responsibility and fined more than 13.1 million Uzbek soms (UMS). Violations of the labour legislation with regard to minors typically concerned the following elements: (a) the permission of employment of persons below 18 (section 239 of the Labour Code); (b) violation of the conditions of employment of persons below 18 (sections 97, 99 and 100); and (c) violation of the levy for the protection of children from hazardous work (section 240); (d) violation of the procedure of transfer to another work (section 81); (e) violation of the procedure of termination of the labour contract (section 107).
interest in attracting additional workers; the representative office of the United Nations Children’s Fund (UNICEF) in Uzbekistan, on the basis of data of the monitoring carried out in 2012, ascertained that pupils of schools were not involved in cotton harvesting; and according to the Ministry of Health in 2012, during the cotton harvest in 6,161 places measures were taken to ensure the health and storage of drinking water; and 6,583 toilets were installed; 7,902 kilograms of antiseptics were distributed; and 7,700 canteens were set up.

Thus it was necessary to distinguish between child labour and its worst forms which involved infringements of the rights of the child and demanded elimination. With a view to implementing effective measures on the elimination of forced labour and the worst forms of child labour, the practice of parliamentary hearings on labour and social development had been introduced. In 2011 and 2012, the members of Parliament heard the reports of the Ministries of Labour and Social Protection, and of Higher and Secondary Special Education concerning the implementation of programmes for the establishment of workplaces and the maintenance of employment including for graduates of educational institutions. Concrete work was done to bring to the attention of concerned ministries, agencies and public organizations, and also the international organizations, such as the ILO, the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), and UNICEF, the measures adopted by the Government to implement the ratified Conventions of the ILO. For this purpose, the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection held a seminar in Tashkent City in May 2012 on the theme “Realization of substantive provisions of the ILO Conventions ratified by the Republic of Uzbekistan” and meetings in the corresponding ministries and agencies were held. The ILO participated in both the seminar and bilateral meetings. The participants of the seminar and the organized meetings recommended developing cooperation with the ILO by drafting and undertaking concrete programmes; informing the ILO and other international organizations about the measures adopted on the implementation of the ILO Conventions; and carrying out monitoring of observance of requirements of the ratified ILO Conventions, including concerning forced labour and the worst forms of child labour.

The information set forth above, and also materials requested by the Committee of Experts concerning the implementation of the Convention, as well as the Forty-Hour Week Convention, 1935 (No. 47), the Holidays with Pay Convention, 1947 (No. 131), the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) and the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), were officially presented to the ILO secretariat, and on the eve of the present session of the International Labour Conference, the positive reply from the International Labour Standards Department of the International Labour Office was received. If the results of the abovementioned measures on implementation of the ratified Conventions and on the elimination of forced labour and the worst forms of child labour were recognized, it would be necessary to reflect them appropriately in the decisions of this Committee. With a view to increasing awareness on measures carried out in Uzbekistan on the implementation of the ratified Conventions, including concerning forced labour and the worst forms of child labour, it has been considered possible, in the context of discussions concerning cooperation with the ILO and the European Union (EU), the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, the Council of the Federation of Trade Unions, the Chamber of Commerce and Industry, and the National Centre of Uzbekistan for Human Rights to carry out, in November-December 2013 in Tashkent City, a round table on “the prospects of technical cooperation on the implementation of the international obligations of Uzbekistan in the ILO framework”. Representatives of the ILO and its Moscow Office, the European Commission, the international organizations accredited in Uzbekistan (UNDP, UNICEF, UzburoyKES, etc.), and also foreign representatives of workers and employers, with the participation of representatives of the intergovernmental organizations and the representatives of non-governmental organizations of Uzbekistan, would be invited. During the round table and bilateral meetings, consideration of the following basic questions would be proposed: cooperation with the ILO on the implementation of the national plan of action on the realization of the Convention, including concerning the organization and carrying out of monitoring of the worst forms of child labour; participation of trade unions, as representative bodies of workers, in practical realization of ILO Conventions on forced labour and the worst forms of child labour, the rights of representatives of workers at the enterprises and to collective bargaining; participation of employers (the Chamber of Commerce and Industry, the Council of Farmers) in the realization of the ratified Conventions on forced labour and the worst forms of child labour, and also the state policy of the development of business and ensuring freedom to employ-ment by the population; prospects of ratification of various Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO, presentation of country reports to the ILO; protection of the social and labour rights of citizens in the light of the ratified Conventions of the United Nations and the ILO; implementation of the international social and labour standards through the national legislation, etc.

In addition, before the Committee a Government representative stated that the protection of children’s rights was one of the priorities of the country, which was implemented through coherent and systemic policies including: (i) the adoption of legislation and the further improvement of existing legislation on children’s rights; (ii) the strengthening of supervisory mechanisms; (iii) the assistance to non-governmental organizations, the media and civil society organizations; and (iv) international cooperation with the relevant United Nations specialized agencies related to the rights of the child. In the context of the economic crisis, the Government was pursuing a policy aimed at preventing the worsening of living conditions, particularly of children, and significant progress had been made in the areas of education, health, and gender equality. All these policies aimed at giving full effect to the provisions of ILO Conventions, including Convention No. 182.

The Government had adopted a national plan of action under which specific measures to eliminate the worst forms of child labour had been implemented, including the adoption of a legislative framework, provisions in the national legislation on the minimum age for admission to employment or work and on the worst forms of child labour, as well as special protection measures for children under 18 years of age. In addition to the information provided to this Committee on the issues to be discussed during the round table in November–December 2013 which has been proposed, as well as in bilateral meetings, he mentioned the issue of capacity building of the tripartite partners through training and international reporting on future legislation. In addition, during the Universal Periodic Review of the second report submitted to the United Nations Human Rights Council, the Government accepted 101 recommendations, 23 of which related to the protection and guarantee of children’s rights. He affirmed his Government’s willingness to implement a tripartite Memorandum of Understanding on cooperation with the UNDP and UNICEF covering 2013–16 which included a package of measures. The recent visit of the United Nations Assistant Secretary-General on Human Rights to Uzbekistan on 27–28 May 2013 also demonstrated the willingness to cooperate on the recommendations made by the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights and UNDP. In May 2013, a midterm report related to cooperation between the Government and UNICEF was also discussed and made a recommendation to monitor the implementation of children’s rights. The discussion on the Government’s third and fourth periodic reports had also taken place in the Committee on the Rights of the Child, and reports had been submitted on a range of issues, including trafficking, prostitution and armed conflict. Further, there had been discussions with the European Commission and bilateral discussions with a number of countries, including the United States.

Turning to some of the constraints in implementing the Convention, he stated that these were related to the global economic recession and its impact on vulnerable groups and communities, and stressed that the aggregate effect on the quality and means to implement the Convention had to be taken into account. This also included the serious ecological situation and the water issue in Central Asia which had an impact on food security in the region. Central Asia had developed and that the private sector was responsible for the harvesting. His Government fully supported ILO action in this area and was committed to national obligations and to implement the recommendations of the Committee of Experts, in cooperation with the ILO.

The Worker members noted that the Committee was yet again discussing the forced participation of children in cotton production in Uzbekistan, often in hazardous conditions. They also noted the conflicting statements on the subject. On the one hand, the Government claimed that now that the law prohibited children from working, that monitoring arrangements were effective, that the economy had developed and that the private sector was responsible for the harvesting, there was no longer any forced child labour in the sector. On the other hand, the ILO social partners (the ITUC and the IOE) presented figures and reports showing that forced labour of children was widespread and that the cotton harvest was the most important period with full access to all regions of the country. Moreover, the Report of the Committee of Experts in its last report, had substantially changed in the 2011 UNICEF report, and noted by the Committee of Experts in its last report, had substantially changed in 2011 to 2012. The only difference appeared to be a reduction in the number of children under the age of 16 forced to work in the harvest, while the number of children between 16 and 18 years of age who were being forced to work during this period, instead of attending school, had increased. The Employer members emphasized that the Convention defined children as being under the age of 18, and that moving the problem from one group of children (under 16 years of age) to another group of children (under 18 years of age) did not cure the lack of compliance, but created another compliance issue.

While the Employer members appreciated the ratification of fundamental Conventions by member States, including Convention No. 182, such ratification was meaningless if it was not accompanied by effective implementation and a demonstrated commitment to live up to international obligations. They further expressed concern that this Committee still had to deal with this long-standing problem and that the Government had provided a similar response in each of the years that the Committee had dealt with the case. Moreover, it was particularly worrying when a member State ignored the conclusions of the Committee of Experts in its last report, had substantially changed in 2011 to accept a high-level mission to allow for the effective monitoring during the harvest season. The Employer members emphasized that, as a minimum, the Government had to allow ILO monitoring during this year’s harvest period with full access to all regions of the country. They expressed the hope that such monitoring would show that the Government’s actions matched its words.

The Worker member of Uzbekistan indicated that the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, the Chamber of Commerce and the trade unions in the country were working together for the effective implementation of international labour Conventions. She particularly emphasized the role of trade unions and their participation in various activities in this regard. The implementation of the Convention was being ensured through a relevant tripartite agreement, as well as standards related to the prohibition of child labour in a great number of agreements at the sectoral, regional and enterprise level. On the basis of the recommendations made by this Committee, working groups for the monitoring of child labour and combating its worst forms had been set up, working together with the trade unions at all levels within an agreed framework. These activities had shown that there had been no use of any specific information on the number of offences recorded and the number of people prosecuted for mobilizing child workers for the cotton harvest. Since the Government maintained that children were no longer involved in the cotton harvest, there was no reason why it should not allow independent monitors to verify the situation in the country itself.
child labour or lack of school attendance. Only in one region two high-school students were found to be working with their parents after school, which had resulted in the release from duty of the headmaster of the relevant school. In her view, the social monitoring of legislation by trade unions would guarantee social and economic protection for children of those working in the cotton harvest. She further highlighted awareness raising and educational measures on child labour and forced labour during harvest among farmers, parents and teachers disseminated through publications, media programmes and education centres. Annual round tables, particularly relating to forced labour, were also being organized with the Government and the social partners, and annual training courses were being held on the rights of children for regional authorities with the participation of trade unions. Furthermore, they were also aiming at eradicating child labour through leisure activities particularly for disadvantaged children up to the age of 14 years, and work and cultural activities for children above the age of 14 years. Furthermore, promotional activities were aimed at encouraging children to go into higher education. Considering the measures taken, she requested that Uzbekistan be removed from the list of individual cases by the Committee, and expressed interest in ongoing technical cooperation on the basis of mutually accepted standards for the enhancement of the rights enshrined in the Convention.

The Employer member of Uzbekistan elaborated on the various activities which the Chamber of Commerce had carried out since its creation in 2004, namely its participation in the plan of action to implement ILO Conventions, including the Convention, its programme to create new jobs, especially in the rural areas, the seminars to identify relevant legal provisions and the dissemination of brochures regarding legal provisions on minimum age and the Convention. He pointed out that with agriculture being exclusively a private sector activity with high dynamic growth, the Government needed to create the necessary conditions for business; a dialogue was already ongoing in this respect. Historically, his country had always given great importance to education and science, and the Chamber of Commerce was working hard to cooperate with educational institutions in this regard. While social dialogue had been established only very recently in the country, he considered this a success as this had led to legislation on minimum age and a national monitoring mechanism, although this mechanism could be improved to take into account ILO standards. He affirmed the commitment of the employers of Uzbekistan in line with the Convention and that a national mechanism for protection, including of those working in the cotton harvest, they called on the Government to firmly lock in and build upon this progress this year and in the years ahead. They remained seriously concerned with the persistent use of child labour among children above 15 years of age, often in conditions that could be hazardous work, and with the continued failure by the Government to make all efforts to eliminate such a phenomenon. While having noted the Order issued by the Prime Minister in August 2012, and the concrete progress registered last year as regards the use of child labour during the cotton harvest, they called on the Government to firmly lock in and build upon this progress this year and in the years ahead. They remained seriously concerned with the persistent use of child labour among children above 15 years of age, often in conditions that could be hazardous work, and with the continued failure by the Government to fully implement the Convention. They urged the Government to resolutely step up its efforts towards the Convention in the current plan of action 2011. They also noted that in the country’s education system represented another major success in avoiding the use of child labour. His Government further welcomed the increased cooperation between the Government and the ILO. Joint seminars had been held, and technical assistance provided, to incorporate ILO Conventions into domestic legislation. He also observed that the activities of workers’ and employers’ representative organizations to safeguard the rights of workers and children had intensified. Based on the above, he requested that the Committee should not continue its consideration of the application of the Convention by Uzbekistan at its current session.

A representative of the European Union, speaking on behalf of the European Union (EU) and its Member States, as well as Croatia, Montenegro, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina and Norway, reiterated their strong condemnation of the use of forced child labour and asked governments to make all efforts to eliminate such phenomena. The Government of Uzbekistan (ratification: 2008) putting in its health and education sector were to be really successful.

The Employer member of Turkmenistan expressed the view that the Government had implemented a broad package of measures to combat the worst forms of child labour, including legislative measures which were implemented in the framework of a plan of action actively involving workers and employers, and the establishment of an educational system with 12 years of compulsory education, covering all children up to 18 years of age. She considered that the Government was willing and ready to fulfill its obligations, which was further confirmed by the technical seminars that had been held with the participation of the social partners and the technical assistance that had been received, including by organizations specializing in the protection of the rights of the child. It was therefore necessary to discontinue the consideration of the application of the Convention by the Government in the Committee.

The Worker member of the Russian Federation, taking note of the Government’s willingness to engage in dialogue, considered that the discrepancy in the information available was a source of concern, the violations of the Convention were unacceptable and that the Government should put an immediate stop to them. As for the information the Government had recently submitted, he said that the existence of numerous measures aimed at eliminating the worst forms of child labour constituted a de facto recognition of the phenomenon. The measures taken by the trade unions for monitoring and follow-up should be backed up by experts in order to increase their effectiveness. Further, he recalled that Uzbekistan was one of the few countries of the region that had not ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). In this regard, the willingness expressed by the Government to cooperate with the ILO should cover a wide range of questions including the said Convention. In the area of the eradication of child labour, the cooperation with the ILO should not be limited to strengthening capacities, but should equally allow for the monitoring by the ILO itself, as well as the involvement of the social partners in a more active manner. He further deplored that the activities of the IPEC programme had to be interrupted and considered that the ILO should be involved at the local level in the preparation of scheduled meetings and activities in the country relating to child labour. Deeply regretting that the ILO had not received the authorization to undertake a visit in the country during the cotton harvest, he emphasized that such a technical mission would take place in the near future, allowing for the preparation of a tripartite high-level mission.

The Government member of Azerbaijan stated that his Government noted with satisfaction the measures taken by the Government to address the issues regarding the application of the Convention. The national plans and programs that had been adopted were steps in the right direction, including the National Action Plan adopted in 2008, the resolution of the Cabinet of Ministers adopted in 2012 “On additional measures for implementation in 2012–13 of the Convention concerning forced or compulsory labour and the Convention concerning the prohibition and immediate action for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour”, and the monitoring exercises conducted in 2012–13. Since the Government had taken the necessary measures for complying with the requirements of the Convention, the examination of this case by the Committee should be discontinued.

The Worker member of Belarus, while noting the concern expressed by the workers’ representatives of several countries, wished to highlight the positive aspects of the case. Firstly, the Government was continuing its dialogue with the international organizations, such as the ILO and UNICEF, and was committed to finding a solution to the problem and, secondly, the country’s unions were making considerable efforts to combat child labour and to follow up measures in that area. During a visit to Uzbekistan, the trade unions of Belarus had been able to observe the steps taken by the social partners and the technical assistance that had been given. Despite the gravity of the situation, the Government continued its efforts, especially in sectors other than family enterprises, it was moving in the right direction and the positive measures it had already taken should be noted.

The Government member of Sri Lanka stated that, since ratifying the Convention in 2008, the Government of Uzbekistan had taken remedial measures and effective initiatives to implement the provisions of the Convention in law and in practice, including adopting regulations in 2009 on hazardous forms of employment specifying the conditions for the employment of minors which took into account the requirements of the Convention; establishing a special working group; and adopting a programme for local monitoring of the prohibition of forcing students to take part in the cotton harvest. A number of programmes had also been implemented to raise awareness among stakeholders. Her Government appreciated these initiatives, which indicated that the Government was fully committed and willing to achieve the objectives of the Convention. She called upon the Government to continue such initiatives with the close collaboration of the employers and the trade unions and requested the ILO to extend its fullest cooperation and support in terms of technical assistance to the Government.

The Employer member of Belarus emphasized that numerous measures had been taken by the Government. Child labour was prohibited by law and in the Constitution. Moreover, due to ILO technical assistance, a monitoring system had been introduced, and, in 2012, no cases of child labour had been identified. Furthermore, the best means of solving the problem of child labour in the agricultural sector would be to increase mechanization in that sector. He considered that the case should no longer appear in the list of cases discussed by the Committee.

The Worker member of Brazil stated that, even though the legislation prohibited the use of children in hazardous activities, UNICEF had observed that children between 11 and 17 years of age, and even some under 10 years of age, were used in the cotton harvest – a harvest that was planned by the public authorities and employers. Children were withdrawn from the education system as a result, and their work continued during the harvest, he emphasized that such a programme could only be found through continued dialogue. His Government was appreciative of the Government of Uzbekistan’s readiness to pursue its efforts. A certain commitment had been made by the Governments of both countries to bring this deplorable situation to an end. Since the Government had adopted new laws and regulations, the scope of the case should no longer be examined in the context of the application of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), which prohibited the imposition of work to which no consent had been given. Despite the gravity of the situation, the Government systematically refused to avail itself of ILO technical assistance or to accept the participation of trade unions in the process of combating child labour. Progress had been made in Brazil in combating child labour where, between 2004 and 2009, 1 million children and young persons had been removed from labour. Such progress had been possible due to joint action by the Government and workers, and with the technical assistance of the Office. A high-level mission should be set up to investigate the causes of this deplorable situation and the measures that had been taken to improve the situation.
The Government was urged to accept the ILO’s recommendation for a high-level tripartite mission to observe the cotton harvest and to work with the ILO to strengthen the enforcement of forced labour and child labour laws to fully meet the requirements of the Convention.

The Government member of Thailand observed that the Government had cooperated fully with the Committee on child labour issues and expressed his satisfaction with the country’s consistent implementation of, and commitment to, the National Plan of Action in this area. The Government was to be commended for the creation of state institutions, mechanisms and regulations to eliminate the worst forms of child labour, including the Special Commission on Affairs of Minors, parliamentary hearings, Cabinet resolutions, state inspection of violations, ministerial regulations prohibiting dangerous and difficult working conditions, and related social programmes implemented nationwide. The speaker indicated that the Joint Statement issued by the Association of Farmers of Uzbekistan, the Council of the Federation of Trade Unions and the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, that virtually all cotton was harvested by farm owners who had no interest in making extensive use of children for the harvesting of cotton, was a further positive sign. His Government had cooperated with the Committee and had satisfied its commitment to that aim and had satisfied its commitment with the participation of the ILO in a seminar held in May 2012 and the organization of a round table planned for the end of 2013. The Committee’s conclusions should highlight the progress that the Government had made and encourage it to continue down that path.

The Government member of Canada indicated that his Government shared the concerns of the Committee of Experts regarding the continued use of forced labour and of children for hazardous work in the cotton harvest in Uzbekistan. Even though the Government reported that no child labour was used in the cotton harvest, the awareness-raising and preventive measures it had reportedly undertaken tacitly pointed to a recognition that this practice continued. There was a lack of transparency and information available on the impact of measures taken to prevent the use of forced child labour and persons seeking to monitor the harvest had found the fields patrolled by police and experienced harassment and intimidation. While noting reports that the Government had scaled back the forced labour of younger children during the most recent harvest, he recalled that the Convention was applicable to all children under the age of 18, while the continued forced use of youths and public servants in the harvest was also a serious issue.

The speaker added that, despite reassuring statements, it had still not been clearly demonstrated that policy and legislative measures had been fully implemented or had had concrete effects on the eradication of the worst forms of child labour. The Government was therefore asked to comply with the requests of the Committee of Experts for information on the concrete impact of the measures taken to monitor by the cotton harvest of forced child labour, and on the number and nature of violations detected specifically in regard to the mobilization of children under 18 to work in the cotton harvest. The policies and laws which had been put into place by the Government constituted progress, but momentum towards the full implementation of these measures should continue. The Government was urged to accept the ILO’s recommendation.
lowed to continue without further intervention on the part of the ILO’s supervisory bodies.

The Worker member of Indonesia expressed deep concern about the situation of child labour in Uzbekistan. In a country which figured as third in the world in terms of cotton exports, and among the most important producers of cotton in the world, a state-run system of child labour and prolonged working conditions that endangered their safety and health. The speaker referred to Indonesia’s experience with regard to technical cooperation received in the area of freedom of association and the elimination of the worst forms of child labour and expressed the view that, with ILO assistance, effective programmes could be set up and the eradication of the worst forms of child labour was possible. A high-level tripartite mission with ILO-IPEC involvement would be the essential first step towards a successful solution and should be the starting point for further technical assistance.

The Government member of the United States stated that her Government remained seriously concerned about the systematic and persistent use of forced labour and the worst forms of child labour in cotton production in Uzbekistan. Referring to the Prime Minister’s decree of July 2012 barring participation of children under 15 in the harvest, she noted that there had been a decline in the number of children under the age of 15 who were compelled to work in the 2012 cotton harvest, but children between 15 and 18 years of age continued to be forced to work in cotton production. There were also credible reports that children were compelled to work under conditions that endangered their safety and health. The speaker further noted that the mass mobilization of labour for the annual cotton harvest also included adult forced labour, which gave rise to serious concern not only about the application of the Convention, but also Convention No. 105, which prohibited the use of forced or compulsory labour for purposes of economic development. Her Government deeply regretted that the Government had resisted accepting ILO assistance in determining on the ground whether the cotton harvest was conducted in compliance with internationally accepted standards. Referring to the Committee of Experts’ comment that there was an “evident contradiction” between the Government’s position that children were not compelled to work in the cotton harvest, and the concerns expressed by numerous UN bodies, employers’ and workers’ organizations, and non-governmental organizations, she noted that there were justifiable reasons for concern and that the stated legal and policy situation did not match actual practices. The ILO was uniquely qualified, and the only international organization with the specific mandate, to judge the facts and analyse the concrete impact of the measures indicated by the Government. The Government could be confident that ILO monitoring activities would be transparent and objective, and would provide the Government with an opportunity to work collaboratively with the ILO to verify facts and resolve implementation gaps. Her Government called for a serious and a serious approach to address the practical implementation of ILO Conventions, and strongly urged the Government to respond positively to the call for ILO monitoring of the 2013 cotton harvest, and to ensure that those involved in the monitoring had full freedom of movement and timely access to all situations and all relevant parties.

The Worker member of Germany expressed serious concern about the violations of the Convention in Uzbekistan. Approximately 1.5 million children under the age of 18 were forced to work in cotton plantations. There was still a State-controlled system of child labour under which children, who were the most vulnerable, were coerced into the fields by force of circumstance into which they had no choice. According to the Committee of Experts, the Uzbekistan government had failed to fully implement both the core ILO Conventions and the Domestic Labour Code. There was an “evident contradiction” between the government’s public denunciation of forced labour and the stated legal and policy situation. The ILO had repeatedly warned that the legal and policy situation did not match actual practice. The ILO was uniquely qualified, and the only international organization with the specific mandate, to judge the facts and analyse the concrete impact of the measures indicated by the Government. The Government could be confident that ILO monitoring activities would be transparent and objective, and would provide the Government with an opportunity to work collaboratively with the ILO to verify facts and resolve implementation gaps. Her Government called for a serious and a serious approach to address the practical implementation of ILO Conventions, and strongly urged the Government to respond positively to the call for ILO monitoring of the 2013 cotton harvest, and to ensure that those involved in the monitoring had full freedom of movement and timely access to all situations and all relevant parties.

The Worker member of China noted that the Government had taken effective measures to apply the Convention, in particular by setting the compulsory schooling age at 12 years, increasing the minimum age for work, setting up an inter-ministerial working group, sentencing offenders and participating in ILO technical assistance activities. These positive achievements should be recognized by the Committee, and the international community should continue to cooperate with it in its fight against poverty and in its efforts to strengthen national capacity so as to ensure the effective application of the Convention.

The Government member of Kenya noted the Government’s commitment to review labour legislation concerning child labour, as well as the fact that the Government cooperated with the social partners in this endeavour. He further noted the monitoring mechanisms in place and the training and advocacy initiatives that the Government had undertaken. There had been progress and the Government should be encouraged to continue its efforts to further improve compliance.

The Government member of Cuba referring to the National Plan for the implementation of the Convention and Convention No. 138, stated that the Government had spared no effort to combat child labour. The Constitution contained a provision prohibiting child labour and criminal legislation made it an offence for people to involve minors in illegal activities. There was also a list of occupations that children under 18 were prohibited from undertaking. Furthermore, the Government participated in activities and mechanisms to monitor child labour, along with seminars and campaigns to raise awareness among the social partners, local administrations and international organizations. The speaker underlined the Government’s readiness to engage in dialogue with all interested parties and her Government called for further technical cooperation between the Government and the ILO to ensure effective application of the Convention.

The Government member of Indonesia took note of the positive developments in the implementation of the Convention, including placing child labour monitoring mechanisms in place. The Constitution provided a mechanism to prevent illegal child labour, as well as programmes to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. The challenge to eliminate child labour could not be denied, and the Government hoped that the Government would continue to take the necessary steps including technical cooperation with the ILO, which was necessary in this matter.
The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran welcomed the positive developments to ensure the full application of the Convention, as well as a new series of constructive initiatives adopted by the Government towards eliminating the worst forms of child labour and the constant monitoring of child labour. The constructive and well-targeted cooperation with UNICEF had enabled the strengthening of child education capacities and helped implement the provisions of the Convention. His Government urged the ILO to collaborate fully with the Government and ensure it received full technical cooperation necessary for the fair and final elimination of all forms of child labour.

The Government member of India appreciated the efforts made by the Government to eliminate child labour. Among the positive steps, he noted the plan of additional measures for the implementation of Conventions Nos 29 and 182 for the period 2012–13, the 2011 “Joint Statement concerning the inadmissibility of using forced child labour in agricultural works” adopted by the Association of Farmers of Uzbekistan, the Council of the Federation of Trade Unions and the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection as well as the operationalization of the hotline on child labour issues throughout the country. He also noted the establishment of an inter-ministerial working group which was headed by the First Deputy Minister of Labour and Social Protection, and was made up of representatives of the Council of the Federation of Trade Unions, the Chamber of Commerce and Industry and key ministries. The resolution adopted by the Cabinet of Ministers on additional measures in 2012–13 for implementation of the Convention indicated the good intent of the Government. His Government firmly believed that the dialogue and cooperation alone would help in resolving the outstanding issues. His Government considered that the examination of this case by the Committee should be discontinued.

The Government member of Egypt commended the Government on its efforts, especially its reinforcement of the legislative framework and its development of the education and training system, which had done much to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. The Government should also be commended on the steps it had taken to ensure the sustainable development of the economy. It should be encouraged to continue along that path and to take advantage of the assistance that the ILO could provide in the area of job creation and social welfare. His Government requested that the case no longer be placed on the Committee’s agenda.

The Government representative referred to the manner in which its opening statement had been interpreted, including one paragraph which had not been translated into English that had included among the Government’s priorities cooperation with the ILO concerning the implementation of the Convention, which involved the question of monitoring the cotton harvest in the forthcoming autumn. However, the Worker and Employer members continued to see everything painted in black. The speaker quoted a passage from a UNICEF report, which took into account the outcome of monitoring exercises carried out by UNICEF in 2012, in which investigations confirmed that in all 13 regions none of the 3.5 million pupils were obliged to participate in the harvest. His Government did not understand why this UNICEF report was never sent to the ILO or to the Committee of Experts. Reference of the conclusions of the UNICEF report, he stated that progress was recognized, both in the report and by several Government members who had participated in the discussion, but neither the Committee of Experts nor the Worker and Employer members took note of that progress. The World Bank had commented on the extremely high level of literacy in Uzbekistan, and the Director of the World Health Organization had praised the results of reforms in the health sector and the decreasing child mortality rate. As regards the cooperation with the ILO, his Government had proposed a round table to clarify the situation, but this proposal had not been accepted. His Government further suggested that a long-term cooperation plan could include monitoring the cotton harvest. Those Governments that were prepared to support Uzbekistan’s efforts were thanked because children were their greatest treasure.

The Worker members emphasized that the Government had carried out many awareness-raising and prevention activities, which suggested that it acknowledged, at least implicitly, that the mobilization of children for the cotton harvest was a reality in the country. However, the Government did not supply any information on the specific results of monitoring activities. The Worker members considered that the Government’s proposal to set up a round table was not sufficient inasmuch as it did not provide for the possibility of observing the situation on the ground. Hence, the Government should agree to receive a high-level monitoring mission which would evaluate the manner in which the Convention was applied, particularly in cotton plantations at harvest time. Pending a positive reply from the Government, the case should be included once again in a special paragraph of the Committee’s report.

The Employer members noted all of the steps the Government had taken and continued to take with a view to meeting its obligations under the Convention, including the legal provisions, government orders, seminars and penalties. The Employer members did not disagree with the view that the Government was on the right path – as one Government member had put it – but being on a path meant that the Government had not yet reached the goal of full compliance with the Convention. It was clear that, while the Government might be making progress, forced labour was still occurring. In addition to a lack of openness, the Government had not produced any factual data but made only statements. The Employer members were under the impression that the Government was willing to allow the ILO to observe the 2013 harvest, which, if confirmed, would be a positive development. Echoing the statement of the Worker members, the Employer members agreed that the Government should accept a high-level monitoring mission and also that the Committee’s conclusions should be placed in a special paragraph of its report.

Conclusions

The Committee took note of the oral and written information provided by the Government representative and the discussion that followed.

The Committee noted the issues raised by the IOE and the ITUC relating to the systematic mobilization of children by the State in the cotton harvest, including the extensive use of labour of teenagers, young persons and adults in all regions of the country, as well as the substantial negative impact of this practice on the health and education of school-aged children obliged to participate in the cotton harvest.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government outlining the laws and policies put in place to combat the forced labour of, and hazardous work by, children. This included the order issued by the Prime Minister in August 2012 banning the use of children under 15 and the adoption of a plan of additional measures for the implementation of Conventions Nos 29 and 182 in 2012, including measures to maintain monitoring for the cotton harvest to combat forced child labour. The Committee also noted the Government’s statement that it had established a tripartite Inter-ministerial Working Group with a view to developing specific programmes and actions aimed at fulfilling Uzbekistan’s obligations under ILO Conventions. Lastly, the Committee noted the Government’s statement that the use of compulsory labour was punishable with penal and administrative sanctions and that, in this regard, concrete measures were being taken by the Labour Inspectorate officials to prosecute persons for violations of labour legislation.

The Committee noted the information from the Government, as well as other sources, that as a result of the measures taken, school children under 15 years of age had not been mobilized during the cotton harvest in 2012. It nevertheless observed with serious concern information provided by several speakers, including representatives of governments and the social partners, that school children between the ages of 16 and 18 continued to be mobilized for work during the cotton harvest. The Committee reminded the Government that the forced labour of, or hazardous work by, all children under 18 constituted one of the worst forms of child labour. It therefore urged the Government to take the necessary measures, as a matter of urgency, to ensure the effective implementation of national legislation prohibiting compulsory labour and hazardous work for all children below the age of 18.

The Committee noted the Government’s indication that it was willing to engage in broad technical cooperation with the ILO, which would consist of awareness-raising measures and capacity building of the national social partners and various stakeholders, and would also include monitoring of the 2013 cotton harvest with ILO–IPEC technical assistance. In this regard, the Committee requested the Government to accept an ILO high-level monitoring mission during the 2013 cotton harvest, that would have full freedom of movement and timely access to all situations and relevant parties, including in the cotton fields, in order to enable the Committee of Experts to assess the implementation of the Convention at its 2013 Session. Noting the Government’s statement that it would be amenable to the terms of reference put forward by the ILO in this respect, the Committee urged the Government to pursue its efforts to undertake, in the very near future, a round-table discussion with the ILO, UNDP, UNICEF, the European Commission and the representatives of national and international organizations of workers and employers.

The Committee requested the Government to include in its report to the Committee of Experts, due in 2013, comprehensive information on the manner in which the Convention was applied in practice, including, in particular, enhanced statistical data on the number of children working in agriculture, their age, gender, and information on the number and nature of contraventions reported and penalties applied. The Committee expressed the hope that it would be able to note tangible progress in the very near future.

The Committee decided to include its conclusions in a special paragraph of the report.

The Government representative stated that this Committee was starting to get used to the discussions on this case and he therefore wished to raise some points with regard to the conclusions that had been adopted. While acknowledging the importance of broad technical cooperation to implement fundamental ILO Conventions, he recalled the organization of a forthcoming round table on the “Prospects of technical cooperation on the implementation of international obligations of Uzbekistan within the ILO framework” this year in Tashkent. On this occasion, representatives would be invited from the ILO Office in Moscow and Geneva, the European Commission, international organizations such as UNICEF and the UNDP, and foreign representatives of workers and employers, as well as interested national ministries and members of Parliament and representatives of non-governmental organizations of Uzbekistan. The round table would review all aspects of broad-based technical cooperation on the Convention, including the issue of monitoring during the cotton harvest period, and would be based on tripartite consultation and dialogue. It would also focus on enhancing the capacity to protect social and labour rights and prospects of ratification of ILO Conventions. However, he expressed his Government’s disagreement with the issues raised by the IOE and the ITUC regarding the systematic mobilization of children by the State in the cotton harvest, including the extensive use of labour of teenagers. His Government also disagreed with the decision to include the conclusions on this case in a special paragraph of the report of this Committee.
II. SUBMISSION TO THE COMPETENT AUTHORITIES OF THE CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS ADOPTED BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE
(ARTICLE 19 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

Observations and information

(a) Failure to submit instruments to the competent authorities

A Government representative of Bangladesh explained that the submission of Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the International Labour Conference to the competent authority was in progress, and that his Government had already completed the initial task of translating the instruments into Bangla, which was a mandatory and lengthy process and which also involved tripartite consultations. He recalled that the ILO Office in Bangladesh had extended support in that regard, and expressed the hope that the process would be completed in the shortest time possible.

A Government representative of Angola indicated that the situation was carefully considered by the responsible services of the Ministry of Labour which took all measures in order to rapidly meet the obligation to submit instruments to the competent authorities. In this respect, ILO technical assistance with a view to training the relevant officials in this area would be appropriate.

The Government representative of Seychelles indicated that the failure to submit instruments to the competent authority remained a challenge for the Government, given the number of outstanding instruments to be submitted to the National Assembly. The Government strongly anticipated submitting the adopted instruments to the competent authority as soon as possible. The Ministry of Labour and Human Resources Development had recruited additional personnel to assist in fulfilling the Government's obligations and it had recently completed an online training on international labour standards and reporting. With ILO technical assistance, through a national tripartite workshop on international labour standards in 2012, the Government had been advised on relevant approaches to show progress and ensure timely submission. The Ministry of Labour and Human Resources Development was exploring the possibility of submitting to the National Assembly six instruments every year to clear the backlog, and the focus had been placed on the MLC, 2006, the Work in Fishing Convention, 2007 (No. 188) and the HIV and AIDS Recommendation, 2010 (No. 200). Importantly, the MLC, 2006, had been submitted to the Cabinet of Ministers for ratification, following which it would be submitted to the National Assembly for endorsement.

The Committee took note of the information provided and of the explanations of the Government representatives who had taken the floor. The Committee took note of the specific difficulties mentioned by certain delegates and the commitments to submit shortly to the competent authorities the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference.

The Committee pointed out that a particularly high number of governments had been invited to provide explanations on the important delay in meeting their constitutional obligation of submission. As had been done by the Committee of Experts, the Committee expressed great concern at the failure to respect the obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to the competent authorities. Compliance with the obligation to submit meant the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to national parliaments and was a requirement of the highest importance in ensuring the effectiveness of the Organization's standards-related activities. The Committee recalled in this regard that the Office could provide technical assistance to support compliance with this obligation.

The Committee expressed the firm hope that the 33 countries mentioned, namely Angola, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Belize, Comoros, Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Dominica, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Fiji, Guinea, Haiti, Iraq, Kyrgyzstan, Libya, Mozambique, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sudan, Suriname, Syrian Arab Republic, Tajikistan and Uganda, would transmit in the near future information on the submission of Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to the competent authorities. The Committee decided to mention these cases in the corresponding paragraph of the General Report.

(b) Information received

Ukraine. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government indicated that the instruments adopted at the 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th and 101st Sessions of the Conference were submitted to the Supreme Rada in May 2013.
III. REPORTS ON UNRATIFIED CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS
(ARTICLE 19 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

(a) Failure to supply reports for the past five years on unratified Conventions and Recommendations

The Committee took note of the information provided. The Committee stressed the importance it attached to the constitutional obligation to transmit reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations. These reports permitted a better evaluation of the situation in the context of General Surveys of the Committee of Experts. In this respect, the Committee recalled that the ILO could provide technical assistance to support compliance with this obligation.

The Committee insisted that all member States should fulfil their obligations in this respect and expressed the firm hope that the Governments of Brunei Darussalam, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Equatorial Guinea, Guinea, Guinea Bissau, Ireland, Libya, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Tajikistan and Vanuatu, would comply with their future obligations under article 19 of the ILO Constitution. The Committee decided to mention these cases in the corresponding paragraph of the General Report.

(b) Information received

Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations have subsequently been received from the following countries: Afghanistan, Cambodia, Central African Republic, Niger and Samoa.

(c) Reports received on Conventions Nos 151 and 154 and Recommendations Nos 159 and 163

In addition to the reports listed in Appendix IV on page 239 of the Report of the Committee of Experts (Report III, Part 1B), reports have subsequently been received from the following countries: Afghanistan, Central African Republic and Trinidad and Tobago.
Appendix I. Table of Reports received on ratified Conventions
